FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that, although the original estimates made by the Americans of the uranium deposits in South Africa had been too optimistic, he believed that in fact the amount available in South Africa would be found to be higher than had been suggested in the later reports made by British investigators. He was anxious that the world's supplies of material, which so far as could be seen were limited, should be used to the best advantage. He was most sceptical about the success of any scheme of international control since all the proposals which he had so far seen appeared to be incompatible with the existing conception of national sovereignty. He felt therefore that the British Commonwealth should not place too much reliance on the outcome of the proposals for international control and that in the meantime every effort should be made to promote research and development and to find sources of raw materials within the Commonwealth. He hoped that it would not be found that the United States were monopolising all the available Canadian supplies.

MR. NASH said that a recent expedition to a remote part of the West coast of New Zealand had given some reason to hope that some supplies of raw material would be found in New Zealand. The New Zealand Government favoured international control and felt that the right line of advance was that suggested by the Washington Declaration, namely the consolidation and extension of the authority of the United Nations Organisation and the creation of conditions of mutual trust in which all people would be free to devote themselves to works of peace. Unless an advance could be made on these lines he did not believe that mere fear of the results of the use of atomic weapons would deter an aggressor. At the same time he agreed that in the meantime the members of the Commonwealth should safeguard their position by developing the resources available to them.

MR. NOEL BAKER said that he had been in the United States when the Lilienthal Report had been published. The conclusions in the report had not yet been accepted by the United States Government, but it was not unlikely that they would be put forward by the United States Government to the United Nations Commission, and it might be that the concept of an International Atomic Energy Development Authority would promote that spirit of international goodwill and co-operation which was the essential basis of any scheme of international control.

MR. ATTLEE said that the general feeling of the meeting seemed to be that the members of the British Commonwealth should lend their support to the establishment of a scheme for international control under the aegis of the United Nations Organisation. At the same time, however, it had to be recognised that the successful working out of such a scheme was problematical, and it was essential that we should go ahead in the meantime with research and development and with the exploitation of raw material resources within the British Commonwealth. For this purpose it was desirable that all the raw material possibilities in the Commonwealth should be fully surveyed, and he hoped also that Dominion Governments would be willing to help forward the United Kingdom programme of research and development by lending scientists to serve for agreed periods with the team at Harwell. He thought there was general agreement that we should do all we could to co-operate together in these matters.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX, MINUTE 1.

(3rd May, 1946—11 a.m.)

Atomic Energy.

THE Meeting had before them a note by the Secretaries (P.M.M. (46) 19) to which was annexed—

(i) a note on United Kingdom arrangements for research and development work on atomic energy;
(ii) a note on the proposals for the international control of atomic energy.

MR. ATTLEE said that, in view of the delicate negotiations which were at present in progress between the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the United States and Canada on the subject of atomic energy, it was important that there should be no public disclosure that this matter had been discussed in the course of the present consultations.

On the question of research and development, the Dominion Ministers were aware that our work had been based upon the close partnership with the Canadian and United States Governments which had grown up during the war. Much of the information which we possessed derived in part from American and Canadian sources and we were, therefore, bound to act in agreement with them in the use which we made of it. We had not yet negotiated a revision of our war-time agreement with the Americans and they were naturally anxious, on the one hand, that proceedings before the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy should not be prejudiced by any fresh bilateral understanding, and on the other that knowledge of American origin should not be spread to a wider circle in advance of concessions which they might have to make as a result of recommendations of the Commission. We were still hoping to reach an understanding with them providing for the full exchange of scientific and technical information between us; but the position was delicate and there were at present limitations on our freedom of action. Subject to these limitations, we were most anxious that there should be the fullest possible co-operation between the Governments of the Commonwealth. Such co-operation might be concerned with any of the following:—

(b) Production of raw materials.
(c) Large-scale plants for the production of fissile material.

The position with regard to the international control of atomic energy was set out in Annex II to P.M.M. (46) 19. The United Nations Commission had not yet begun its deliberations, and its first task would be to consider what effective safeguards could be devised, by way of inspection and other means, to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions. Mr. Attlee said that, in general, he was inclined to be sceptical about the possibility of control through an international inspectorate, and felt that in practice it would probably be necessary to build up any system of international control by stages.

Mr. Attlee then invited Lord Portal to make a statement on the United Kingdom atomic energy project.

LORD PORTAL made a full statement explaining the lines on which it was proposed that the Harwell Research Establishment should be developed and the progress already made with the setting up of the establishment. Research and development work on a considerable scale was expected to start there early next year and the existing plans for the whole establishment should have been substantially implemented by July 1947. He emphasised that the services of any scientists from the Dominions who were considered by Dominion Governments to be suitable for the work and could be spared for a time would be warmly welcomed at Harwell. He hoped that Dominion Ministers would accept in principle the temporary posting of suitable men for a period of service at Harwell after which they would return to their own country, and that in view of the difficulty of direct recruitment at such a great distance, each Government would accept responsibility for selecting and paying their own scientists during the period of attachment. If this form of co-operation were approved in principle, the details could be discussed at the official level.

Lord Portal explained that the supply of raw materials had a powerful bearing on policy and that investigations carried out in recent months tended to show that previous estimates had been optimistic. We had a fairly clear picture of where substantial supplies of uranium were likely to be found and there had been informal discussions with representatives of the Dominions on the question of carrying out raw material surveys within the Commonwealth.

With regard to the preparations for large-scale production in the United Kingdom, the headquarters of the production organisation had been set up at Risley in Lancashire and the necessary staff was being recruited. Design work was in hand for the plant required for the production of uranium metal which would be carried out at Springfields, near Preston, and the fundamental research work into the processes used in the purification of uranium ores and the manufacture of uranium metal had been carried out. On the basis of this, negotiations for the purchase of the various raw materials which were required for the processes had in some cases been completed and in other cases were actively in hand. It was hoped that production operations would start at the Springfields factory in September 1947 and that the first uranium metal would be produced at about the end of that year. Preliminary consideration had also been given to the question of selecting a site for the pile and the plutonium separation plant, though it would be necessary to operate the uranium metal fabrication plant for a year before sufficient stocks of metal to start the pile were available. A great deal of other fundamental organisation work was going on at Risley and steps such as the standardisation of engineering stores, the development of systems for purchasing, progressing and programming, and estimating are well advanced.

MR. CHIFLEY said that there was some reason to believe that there might be in Australia substantial deposits of thorium which could supplement the available supplies of uranium. It was hoped to carry out a more careful survey with a view to determining what quantities of materials were available and meantime the Australian Government had already taken powers to protect the available supplies of thorium from exploitation. He asked whether there was not a danger that too much of the limited supplies of fissile material available would be devoted to warlike developments, with the result that possible industrial development would be handicapped. On the question of international control, it had to be borne in mind that any scheme of control could be vitiated by failure to co-operate on the part of any one of the States concerned.

DR. EVATT pointed out that the Lilienthal Report on the International Control of Atomic Energy seemed likely to form the basis of the proposals which would be put before the United Nations Commission by the United States Government. These proposals might not be acceptable to other nations since the implicit assumption in them was that the United States would not share any information with regard to use of atomic energy for warlike purposes with other nations until such time as these other nations could in any event have obtained the information for themselves. With regard to the proposal that an International Atomic Energy Development Authority should be set up to conduct all intrinsically dangerous operations in the nuclear field, the success of this would seem to depend on the effectiveness of the proposals for denaturing fissile material, as to which scientific opinion appeared to be sceptical.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that, although the original estimates made by the Americans of the uranium deposits in South Africa had been too

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH FINLAND.

NOTE BY THE SECRETARIES.

THERE is circulated herewith a memorandum on the above subject prepared in the Foreign Office.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK.
J. E. STEPHENSON.

Cabinet Office, S.W. 1,

ANNEX.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH FINLAND.

MEMORANDUM PREPARED IN THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

The Soviet Delegation to the Council of Foreign Ministers circulated on the 31st March, 1946, a draft Peace Treaty with Finland.

The draft has been discussed by the Soviet and United Kingdom Deputies, and the United Kingdom Deputy has proposed certain modifications. The text, as so far agreed, is set out below. The passages in square brackets have not yet been agreed.

1. Preamble.

"The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, Australia, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, New Zealand, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of South Africa, as the States which are at war with Finland and actively waged war against the European enemy States with substantial military force, hereinafter called the Allied and Associated Powers, of the one part, and Finland, of the other part;

"Whereas Finland, having become an ally of Hitlerite Germany and participating on her side in the war against the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and other United Nations, bears her share of responsibility for this war.

"Whereas, however, Finland on the 4th September, 1944, entirely ceased military operations against the U.S.S.R., withdrew from the war against the United Nations, broke off relations with Germany and her satellites, and, having concluded on the 19th September, 1944, an Armistice with the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom, acting on behalf of the United Nations at war with Finland, loyally carried out the Armistice terms; and

"Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers and Finland wish to settle questions still outstanding between them as a result of the events hereinbefore recited; [thereby enabling the Allied and Associated Powers to support Finland's application to become a member of the United Nations and also to adhere to any convention concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, and forming the basis of friendly relations between them];

"Now, therefore, have agreed to declare the cessation of the state of war, and for this purpose to conclude the present Peace Treaty, and the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers and of Finland have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries (names of the Governments and of their Plenipotentiaries .....) who, after presentation of their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following."

This was agreed by the Deputies except that it was left for decision whether the passage in square brackets should be included in the preamble or set out as a separate article (see article 13 below).

Article 1.

"The maintenance of armaments for ground, sea, and air will be closely restricted to the necessities of—

"(a) the maintenance of order in Finnish territory;
"(b) defence of local frontiers;
"(c) such military contingents, if any, in addition to the foregoing as may be required by the Security Council."

This was agreed by the Deputies and was referred to the Joint Committee of Naval, Military and Air experts for a report on the limitations to be imposed on Finnish armaments.

Article 2.

"Finland undertakes to restore all legal rights and interests of the United Nations and their nationals in Finland as they existed before the war and to return their property in complete good order."

The above was discussed but no decision was reached.

Article 3.

"In accordance with the Armistice Agreement the effect of the Peace Treaty between the Soviet Union and Finland, concluded in Moscow on the 12th March, 1940, is restored [subject to the changes which follow from the present Treaty.]"

This was discussed and agreed, subject to the consideration of the proposal of the United Kingdom Delegation that the words in square brackets should be replaced by the following:—

"except for the substitution of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of that Treaty by Articles 4 and 5 of the present Treaty."

Article 4.

"In accordance with the Armistice Agreement Finland confirms having returned to the Soviet Union the oblast of Petsamo (Pechenga) voluntarily ceded to Finland by the Soviet State under the Peace Treaty of the 14th October, 1920, and the 12th March, 1940."

This was agreed in principle.

Article 5.

"In accordance with the Armistice Agreement the Soviet Union confirms having renounced its rights to the lease of the Peninsula of Hangö, accorded to it by the Soviet-Finnish Peace Treaty of the 12th March, 1940, and Finland for her part confirms having made available to the Soviet Union on lease territory and waters for the establishment of a Soviet naval base in the area of Porkkala-Udd.

"In accordance with the Armistice Agreement Finland confirms having secured to the Soviet Union the use of the railways, waterways, roads and air routes necessary for the transport of personnel and freight despatched from the Soviet Union to the naval base at Porkkala-Udd, and also confirms having granted the Soviet Union the right of unimpeded use of all forms of communication between the U.S.S.R. and the territory leased in the area of Porkkala-Udd."

This was agreed in principle.

Article 6.

"[In accordance with the Armistice Agreement the effect of the Agreement concerning the Aaland Islands, concluded between the Soviet Union and Finland on the 11th October, 1940, is completely restored.]"

This was agreed in principle as His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were in agreement with the Soviet Government that the Aaland Islands should remain demilitarised. But the United Kingdom Government were not a party to the bilateral arrangement between the Soviet Union and Finland of the 11th October, 1940. They could, therefore, only agree to the insertion of a reference to it in the Peace Treaty if the Soviet Government would agree to mention also being made of the convention of 1921, which was, broadly speaking, of the same effect as the 1940 Treaty, the United Kingdom Government and not the Soviet Government being a party to the convention. The United Kingdom Delegation entered a reservation in this sense.

Article 7.

"Losses caused to the Soviet Union by military operations and by the occupation by Finland of Soviet territory will be made good by Finland to the Soviet Union, but, taking into consideration that Finland has not only withdrawn from the war against the United Nations but has declared war on Germany and assisted with her forces in driving German troops out of Finland, the Parties agree that compensation for the above losses will be made by Finland not in full but only in part, namely to the amount of 300 million United States dollars payable over eight years in commodities—timber products, paper, cellulose, sea-going and river craft, sundry machinery, &c.

"The basis for accounts regarding the payment of indemnity will be the American dollar at its gold parity on the day of the signing of the Armistice Agreement, i.e., 35 dollars for one ounce of gold."

This was agreed.

Article 8.

"Finland undertakes to transfer to the Soviet Union all German assets in Finland."

This was agreed in principle.

Article 9.

"Finland, in so far as she has not yet done so, undertakes within the time-limits indicated by the Government of the U.S.S.R., to return to the Soviet Union, in complete good order, all valuables and materials removed from its territory during the war, and belonging to State, public and co-operative organisations, enterprises, institutions and individual citizens, such as: factory and works equipment, locomotives, rolling-stock, tractors, motor vehicles, historic monuments, museum treasures and any other property [or to compensate the Soviet Union for the cost of the said valuables and materials on the basis of the relevant Soviet-Finnish agreement]."

This was agreed in principle, except that the United Kingdom Delegation expressed the desire for an expansion of the phrase in brackets.

It was also agreed that a paragraph should be added to the Article providing for the rights of other United Nations to restitution of such property as may be found on Finnish territory.

Article 10.

"Finland, which, in accordance with the Armistice Agreement, has taken measures for dissolving all organisations of a Fascist type on Finnish territory whether political, military or para-military, as well as other organisations conducting propaganda hostile to the Soviet Union or to any of the other United Nations, undertakes not to permit in future the existence and activities of organisations of that nature which have as their aim denial to the people of their democratic rights."

This was agreed.

Article 11.

"Finland, which in accordance with the Armistice Agreement has taken measures to set free, irrespective of citizenship and nationality, all persons held in confinement on account of their activities in favour of the United Nations or because of their sympathies with the United Nations or because of their racial origin, and to repeal discriminatory legislation and restrictions imposed thereunder, undertakes to complete those measures and, in future, not to take any measures or enact any laws which would be incompatible with the objects and purposes mentioned in this Article."

This was agreed.

Article 12.

"[Finland undertakes to co-operate with the Allied and Associated Powers in the apprehension and trial of persons accused of war crimes.]"

This was agreed in principle, subject to the right of the United Kingdom Delegation to suggest textual alterations.

Article 13.

"[Upon the conclusion of the present Treaty the Allied and Associated Powers will support Finland's candidature for membership of the United Nations. Finland will co-operate with the United Nations and will carry out the arrangements made by them for the maintenance of universal peace]."

This was agreed in principle except that the United Kingdom Delegation expressed their preference for the first sentence of this Article to be included in the Preamble. The United Kingdom Delegation also stated that the second sentence should be drafted in the same way as for the other Peace Treaties.

Article 14.

"The present Treaty, of which the Russian and English texts are both authentic, will be ratified by the Allied and Associated Powers. It shall also be ratified by Finland. It will come into force immediately after its ratification by the U.S.S.R. and the United Kingdom. The Instruments of Ratification will, in the shortest possible time, be deposited with the Government of the U.S.S.R. Certified copies of the present Treaty will be sent by the Government of the U.S.S.R. to the Governments of the other Allied and Associated Powers.

This was agreed.

Other Provisions.

(a) It was agreed that the following provisions should also be inserted in the draft Treaty:

(1) Recognition of Peace Treaties.

"Finland undertakes to recognise the full force of the Peace Treaties concluded with Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria and Roumania, and of the agreements or arrangements which have been or will be reached by the Allied and Associated Powers in relation to Austria, Germany and Japan for the restoration of peace."

(2) Liquidation of certain international organisations.

"Finland undertakes to accept any arrangements which may be agreed for the liquidation of the Leagues of Nations and the Permanent Court of International Justice.

"Finland also undertakes to accept any arrangements which may be agreed for the liquidation of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome."

(3) Human Rights.

"The Finnish Government undertakes to take all measures necessary to secure to all persons under its jurisdiction without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, the enjoyment of human rights and of the fundamental freedoms including freedom of expression, press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and of public meeting."

(b) No decision was reached on Finland's position as regards certain existing treaties and on certain economic and financial questions. It was agreed to recommend that no provision was necessary for the return of Allied vessels by Finland. Finally, it was agreed to recommend that no provision was necessary to cover the resumption of diplomatic and consular relations with Finland.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH ROUMANIA.

MEMORANDUM PREPARED IN THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

The major issues on which difficulties arose in the Deputies' discussions of the draft peace treaties with Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary were summarised in the memorandum circulated by the Foreign Secretary (P.M.M. (46) 11).

2. Particulars of the progress made by the Deputies at Lancaster House in the preparation of the draft Treaty with Roumania are given below.

Foreign Office, S.W. 1,
7th May, 1946.

(N.B.—Passages enclosed in square brackets have not yet been agreed.)

PREAMBLE.

1. "The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Australia, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, New Zealand, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of South Africa, as the States which are at war with Roumania and actively waged war against the European enemy States with substantial military force, hereinafter called the Allied and Associated Powers, of the one part, and Roumania, of the other part;

"Whereas Roumania, having become an ally of Hitlerite Germany and participating on her side in the war against the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and other United Nations, bears her share of responsibility for this war;

"Whereas, however, Roumania on the 24th August, 1944, entirely ceased military operations against the U.S.S.R., withdrew from the war against the United Nations, broke off relations with Germany and her satellites, and, having concluded on the 12th September, 1944, an Armistice with the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, acting in the interests of all the United Nations, took [an active] part in the war against Germany; and

" Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers and Roumania wish to settle questions still outstanding between them as a result of the events hereinbefore recited; [thereby enabling the Allied and Associated Powers to support Roumania's application to become a member of the United Nations and also to adhere to any convention concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, and forming the basis of friendly relations between them;]

" Now, therefore, have agreed to declare the cessation of the state of war and for this purpose to conclude present Peace Treaty, and the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers and of Roumania have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries (names of the Governments and of their Plenipotentiaries .....) who, after presentation of their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following" :—

The above Preamble has been agreed subject to later decision on the question of including the second passage in brackets in the Preamble or as a separate Article (see paragraph 15 below).

Limitation of Armaments.

2. The following clause has been accepted by the Deputies and referred to the Joint Committee of Naval, Military and Air Experts for a report on the limitations to be imposed on Roumanian armaments :—

" The maintenance of armaments for ground, sea and air will be closely restricted to the necessities of—

" (a) the maintenance of order in Roumanian territory;
" (b) defence of local frontiers;
" (c) such military contingents, if any, in addition to the foregoing as may be required by the Security Council."

Restoration of United Nations Property.

3. This point is still under discussion on the basis of a clause in the Soviet draft which is as follows :—

ARTICLE 2.

" Roumania undertakes to restore all legal rights and interests of the United Nations and their nationals in Roumania as they existed before the war and to return their property in complete good order."

Reparation to the Soviet Union.

4. A clause has been agreed in principle as follows :—

" Losses caused to the Soviet Union by military operations and by the occupation by Roumania of Soviet territory will be made good by Roumania to the Soviet Union, but taking into consideration that Roumania has not only withdrawn from the war against the United Nations, but has declared and, in fact, waged war against Germany, the Parties agree that compensation for the above losses will be made by Roumania not in full but only in part, namely to the amount of 300 million United States dollars payable over 6 years in commodities—oil-products, grain, timber, seagoing and river craft, sundry machinery, &c.

" The basis for calculating the settlement provided for in this Article will be the American dollar at its gold parity on the day of the signing of the Armistice Agreement, i.e., 35 dollars for one ounce of gold."

German Assets in Roumania.

5. The following clause has been agreed in principle :—

" Roumania recognises that the Soviet Union is entitled to all German assets in Roumania transferred to the Soviet Union by the Control Council for Germany and undertakes to take all necessary measures for facilitating such transfers."

Restitution.

6. The following clause has been agreed in principle subject to (a) the wording of the reference to the time limit and to compensation; (b) the inclusion in the Treaty of provision for restitution to United Nations other than the Soviet Union, which is still under discussion :—

Reparation to the Soviet Union.

> " Roumania, in so far as she has not yet done so, undertakes within the time-limits indicated by the Government of the U.S.S.R. to return to the Soviet Union in complete good order all valuables and materials removed from its territory during the war, and belonging to State, public and co-operative organisations, enterprises, institutions or individual citizens, such as : factory and works equipment, locomotives, railway trucks, tractors, motor vehicles, historic monuments, museum valuables and any other property, or to compensate the Soviet Union for the cost of the said valuables and materials on the basis of the relevant Soviet-Roumanian Agreement."

Return of Allied Vessels.

7. The Deputies agreed that this would be covered by the article governing the restoration of United Nations property.

Transylvania.

8. A clause has been agreed as follows :—

> " The decision of the Vienna Award of the 30th August, 1940, is declared null and void. The frontier between Roumania and Hungary existing on the 1st January, 1938, is hereby restored [the whole of Transylvania being thus included in the territory of Roumania]. [Nevertheless, the Allied and Associated Powers would be prepared to recognise any rectification of the Roumanian-Hungarian frontier that may subsequently be mutually agreed between the parties directly concerned and which would substantially reduce the number of persons living under Alien rule."]

Human Rights.

9. The following clause has been agreed :—

> " The Roumanian Government undertakes to take all measures necessary to secure to all persons under its jurisdiction, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, the enjoyment of human rights and of the fundamental freedoms including freedom of expression, press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and of public meeting."

Dissolution of Fascist Organisations.

10. The following clause has been agreed :—

> " Roumania, which in accordance with the Armistice Agreement has taken measures for dissolving all organisations of a Fascist type on Roumanian territory, whether political, military or para-military, as well as other organisations conducting propaganda hostile to the Soviet Union or to any of the other United Nations, undertakes not to permit in future the existence and activities of organisations (of that nature) which have as their aim denial to the people of their democratic rights."

Repeal of Discriminatory Legislation.

11. The following clause has been agreed :—

> " Roumania, which in accordance with the Armistice Agreement has taken measures to set free, irrespective of citizenship and nationality, all persons held in confinement on account of their activities in favour of the United Nations or because of their sympathies with the United Nations or because of their racial origin, and to repeal discriminatory legislation and restrictions imposed thereunder, undertakes to complete these measures and in future not to take any measures or enact any laws which would be incompatible with the objects and purposes mentioned in this Article."

Validity of Allied Acts in Roumania.

12. Article 10 of the Soviet draft, which is still under discussion, is as follows :—

> " Roumania to recognise the legality and validity of all action taken by the Allied States on Roumanian territory, including territorial waters, pending the entering into force of this Treaty.

"Roumania to renounce all claims with regard to all acts and removals carried out by the Allied States in respect to Roumanian property on Roumanian territory since the outbreak of war up to the entering into force of this Treaty."

War Criminals.

13. The decision of the Council of Foreign Ministers of the 20th September, 1945, that Article 14 of the Armistice should be accepted as the basis for dealing with this question, was developed in the Soviet draft treaty, as follows:—

"Roumania undertakes to collaborate with the Allied and Associated Powers in the apprehension and trial of persons accused of war crimes."

This clause was considered by the Deputies, without prejudice to the inclusion of an article on this subject in the Treaty or in a separate Protocol. The United States Delegation believes that the Treaty should contain a more detailed statement of Roumania's obligation.

Withdrawal of Allied Forces.

14. The following clause has been agreed, but the United States Delegation pointed out that, if a Treaty restoring the independence of Austria is concluded before or simultaneously with the Treaty of Roumania, this article will have to be modified:—

"Upon the entry into force of the present Treaty, all Allied forces will, within the period of ..... days, be withdrawn from Roumania, subject to the right of the Soviet Union to keep on Roumanian territory such armed forces as it may need for the maintenance of the lines of communication of the Red Army with the Soviet zone of occupation in Austria. All unused Roumanian currency and all Roumanian goods in possession of the Allied forces in Roumania, acquired pursuant to Article 10 of the Armistice, will be returned to the Roumanian Government within the same period of ..... days. Roumania, however, undertakes to make available such supplies and facilities as may specifically be required for the maintenance of the lines of communication with the Soviet zone of occupation in Austria, for which due compensation will be made to the Roumanian Government."

Admission of Roumania to the United Nations.

15. The first sentence of the following clause has been agreed in principle. The United Kingdom and the United States Delegations have expressed their preference for inclusion of its substance in the Preamble. The second sentence has not been agreed:—

"Upon the conclusion of the present Treaty the Allied and Associated Powers will support Roumania's candidature for membership of the United Nations Organisation. [Roumania will collaborate with the United Nations and will carry out the arrangements made by them for the maintenance of international peace.]"

Ratification of the Peace Treaty.

16. The following clause was agreed early in April:—

"The present Treaty, of which the Russian and English texts are both authentic, will be ratified by the Allied and Associated Powers. It shall also be ratified by Roumania. It will come into force immediately after its ratification by the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States. The Instruments of Ratification will in the shortest possible time be deposited with the Government of the U.S.S.R. Certified copies of the present Treaty will be sent by the Government of the U.S.S.R. to the Governments of the other Allied and Associated Powers.

"Done at ..... in ..... copies, in Russian, English and Roumanian."

Subsequently the United States Delegation proposed the following redraft:—

"The present Treaty, of which the Russian and English texts are authentic, shall be ratified by the Allied and Associated Powers. It shall also be ratified by Roumania. It will come into force immediately upon [the deposit of] ratifications by the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United Termination of state of war between Roumania and Hungary.

17. Agreement has been reached on the following :—

"The state of war between Roumania and Hungary will terminate upon the entry into force both of the present Treaty and of the Treaty of Peace between the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia, the Byelorussians S.S.R., Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, New Zealand, the Ukrainian S.S.R., the Union of South Africa and Yugoslavia on the one part and Hungary on the other part."

Acceptance of Peace Treaties.

18. The following has been agreed :—

"Roumania undertakes to recognise the full force of the Peace Treaties concluded with Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria and Finland, and the agreements or arrangements which have been or will be reached by the Allied and Associated Powers in relation to Austria, Germany and Japan for the restoration of Peace."

Liquidation of certain international Organisations.

19. The following clause has been agreed :—

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH ITALY.

MEMORANDUM PREPARED IN THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

THE position reached by the Deputies in the drafting of the Peace Treaty with Italy has been summarised in the memorandum circulated by the Foreign Secretary (P.M.M. (46) 11).

Supplementary particulars are given in the following notes, with special reference to the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers now in session at Paris.

Foreign Office, S.W. 1,
7th May, 1946.

A.—The following decisions have been taken by the Foreign Ministers :—

1. Preamble.—The Foreign Ministers agreed on the 26th April to the following text :—

The U.S.S.R., United Kingdom, United States, China, France, Australia, Belgium, Byelorussian S.S.R., Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Ukrainian S.S.R., Union of South Africa and Yugoslavia, hereinafter referred to as the Allied and Associated Powers of the one part of the other part;

Whereas Italy under the Fascist régime became a party to the Tripartite Pact with Germany and Japan, declared a war of aggression and entered into war with all the Allied and Associated Powers and with other United Nations and bears her share of responsibility for the War; and

Whereas, in face of the pressure of military events the Fascist régime in Italy was overthrown on the 25th July, 1943, and Italy surrendered unconditionally and accepted terms of Armistice signed on the 3rd and 29th September of the same year; and

Whereas, after the said Armistice Italian armed forces took an active part in the war against Germany and Italy declared war on Germany as from the 13th October, 1943, and thereby became a co-belligerent against Germany; and

Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers and Italy are respectively desirous of concluding a treaty of peace which will settle questions still outstanding between them as a result of the events hereinbefore recited thereby enabling the Allied and Associated Powers to support Italy's application to become a member of the United Nations and also to adhere to any convention concluded under the auspices of the United Nations and forming the basis of friendly relations between them;

Now, therefore, have agreed to declare the cessation of the state of war and for this purpose to conclude the present Peace Treaty, and the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers and of Italy have accordingly appointed as Plenipotentiaries for this purpose : . . . .

2. Italian Navy.—The Foreign Ministers agreed on the 27th April that the Italian navy should consist of the following :—

Two Old Battleships,
Four Six-inch Cruisers,
Four Destroyers,
Sixteen Torpedo-boats, and Twenty Corvettes.

They also instructed the Committee of Naval Experts—

(1) To specify by name the ships to be allowed to be left in Italian hands and
(2) To recommend the total number of naval personnel to be allowed to Italy.

As regards the disposal of the vessels to be taken from Italy, the Foreign Ministers instructed the Committee of Naval Experts—

(1) to consider and report to the Council on the question of the disposal of the Surplus units of the Italian Fleet, with the following terms of reference :—

"1. After it is determined what specific ships within the limits set for each category shall be left to Italy, and
2. After the claims of Greece and Yugoslavia have been taken into account.
3. The balance of Italian war vessels (except submarines) shall be allocated equitably among the United Kingdom, United States, Soviet Union and France, and the Italian submarines, except a few which may be reserved for experimental purposes, will be destroyed."

(2) to make recommendations to the Council on the disposal of the unfinished and damaged units of the Italian Fleet.

3. Franco-Italian Frontier.—The Foreign Ministers on the 27th April accepted the rectifications of the frontier demanded by the French Government in the areas of the Little St. Bernard Pass, the Mt. Cenis Plateau and Mt. Thabor–Chaberton. They further agreed to appoint a commission of enquiry to ascertain the sentiments of the population of the Tenda–Briga area, which is also claimed by France, and agreed that when the commission had presented their report it could be considered whether the views of the Italian Government should be taken into account. Terms of reference for the commission of enquiry drafted by the Deputies were approved by the Foreign Ministers on the 29th April.

4. Austro-Italian Frontier.—On the 1st May the Foreign Ministers approved a recommendation from the Deputies in the following terms :—

"Having reconsidered the requests made by Austria for the rectification of the Austro-Italian Frontier (which in fact amounted to the cession of the province of Bolzano to Austria), the Deputies confirm that these requests are not minor rectifications in the sense of the decision taken by the Council of Ministers of the 14th September, 1945.

Consequently, these requests cannot be considered, unless the Council decides otherwise.

The Austrian Government should be officially informed of the decision of the 14th September, 1945, and of the fact that their requests are not considered to be in conformity with that decision and cannot therefore be considered."

(It now remains to be seen whether the Russian Government will submit a revised claim to what may or may not be regarded as a "minor rectification" of the frontier.)

5. The Islands of Pelagosa and Pianosa.—The Foreign Ministers agreed on the 2nd May that provisions should be included in the Peace Treaty requiring Italy to cede to Yugoslavia the island of Pelagosa, provided that—

(a) the island should remain unmilitarised; and (b) the necessary fishing rights should be secured for Italian nationals.

They further agreed that provisions should be included in the Treaty requiring Italy not to militarise the island of Pianosa.

B.—The following subjects have been discussed by the Foreign Ministers without reaching conclusive results:—

1. Reparations.—On the 26th April the Foreign Ministers considered a memorandum submitted by the Soviet Delegation. This memorandum proposed that Italy should be required to pay reparations for her share in the war on Germany's side but that, in view of her co-belligerency, she should not be required to pay in full. Accordingly she would have to pay 300 million dollars to the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, Greece and Albania over a period of 6 years, of which 100 million dollars would go to the Soviet Union. Payment would be made by the removal of industrial machinery which had been used for war purposes; by drawing on Italy's foreign assets, the gold returned to Italy and the property of war criminals; and also on the current production of the Italian economy. M. Molotov claimed that these proposals would ensure that justice was done to the Soviet people and that they corresponded to the principles enunciated in the preamble (see under A—1).

Mr. Byrnes recognised that Italy was liable to pay reparations but maintained that their amount and character should be such that Italy could pay them without external assistance. He mentioned the sums expended by the United States on aid to Italy since the Armistice both directly and through U.N.R.R.A. While the United States did not claim reparations from Italy, they thought that they should not have to carry additional burdens in order that reparations should be paid to another Government. At the first session of the Council Mr. Byrnes had proposed that reparations should be limited to—

(b) Italy's assets in foreign countries.

He was willing that the probable amount to be obtained in this way should be investigated. He thought that any attempt to obtain from Italy a particular amount determined in advance would fail just as it did in the case of Germany. He mentioned the recent Italian request for a loan and credits from the United States as showing how impossible it was for Italy to pay reparations to the amount suggested by the Soviet Delegation.

M. Bidault agreed that Italy should pay reparations but not to the full extent of the damage she had caused. He agreed that reparations might be paid from the sources suggested by the Soviet Delegation, but he took exception to the omission of France from the list of countries entitled to reparations from Italy.

Mr. Bevin said that the repayment of Allied expenditure on relief should take precedence over payment of reparations. The United Kingdom did not wish to condone what Italy had done, but thought that account should be taken of the contribution made by Italy to the Allied victory. He therefore considered that the Allies should, first, enable Italy to repay what had been supplied to her by way of relief; secondly, help her restore her economy upon a peace-time basis; and, thirdly, remove machinery and equipment which were not needed for a peace-time economy and would help to create a war potential. If, as Mr. Byrnes suggested, the overall capacity of Italy to pay reparations was to be examined, he, Mr. Bevin, must put in a claim for reparations on behalf of the United Kingdom. In order that a correct distribution might be reached, all countries who had claims to reparation must be included whether they pressed those claims or not. The food provided to Italy had been obtained and paid for by the British people in foreign exchange.

Mr. Byrnes said that in view of Mr. Bevin's statement he must put in a claim for reparations on behalf of the United States.

The Foreign Ministers agreed to appoint a committee of experts to consider the new Soviet memorandum as well as the original United States proposal and any proposal that might be made by the United Kingdom and French delegations.

The matter was further discussed at an informal meeting of the Foreign Ministers on the 2nd May. M. Bidault then propounded a compromise whereby after a certain period of time and after relief payments to Italy had ceased, Italy would agree to pay a certain amount of reparations within the limits of her current production. Mr. Byrnes, for his part, thought that anything which any country received from Italy in the shape of territory or booty or goods should be valued in terms of money and set against reparation claims. M. Molotov could not agree and refused to admit any connexion between relief payments and reparations. Mr. Bevin tentatively suggested that the experts should, in the first instance, examine the position regarding the relief debts; then proceed to assess claims for reparations and to ascertain what the total external debt of Italy was likely to be; then examine M. Bidault's plan; and finally try to reach agreed recommendations. It was eventually agreed that M. Bidault's plan should be referred to the experts.

2. The Dodecanese.—This question was discussed by the Foreign Ministers on the 29th April.

The four Foreign Ministers severally recalled their previous agreement in principle that the Islands should be ceded to Greece and be demilitarised.

M. Molotov, however, insisted that the question should be considered when other territorial questions were discussed.

Since no progress could be made, Mr. Byrnes proposed, and his colleagues agreed, that the discussion should be deferred.

3. Colonies.—On the 29th April Mr. Byrnes brought up again the United States proposal of last September for collective trusteeship.

M. Bidault restated the French Government's view that Italian trusteeship for all colonies was the only practical solution.

M. Molotov tabled a new proposal that each colony should be placed for 10 years under international trusteeship to be exercised in each case by one of the major Allies and Italy. The administrator for each colony would be appointed by the Allied State, his deputy by Italy, and in addition there would be in each colony an advisory committee of 5, i.e., two representatives of the local inhabitants and one representative of each of the three Allies not exercising the trust. Thus in Tripolitania the administrator would be Russian, his deputy Italian and the advisory committee would consist of United Kingdom, United States and French representatives with two local inhabitants. In Cyrenaica, on the other hand, there could be either a United States or a United Kingdom administrator and an Italian deputy.

Mr. Bevin recalled the part played by the British Commonwealth in conquering this territory and the pledges which the United Kingdom Government had given to the inhabitants. He stressed the importance of finding the solution which corresponded to the wishes of the inhabitants and then developed proposals which he undertook to circulate immediately in writing.

The discussion having been adjourned until the following day Mr. Bevin on the 30th April presented the following memorandum :—

(1) Italy shall renounce her Sovereignty over all her colonies.

(2) Libya, which comprises Cyrenaica and Tripolitania, shall be created as an independent State. Consultations shall take place with the representatives of the inhabitants for the establishment of a constitution and consideration of the necessary steps to assist the new State in establishing her administration. Provision should be made for a special régime to safeguard minorities.

(3) Red Sea Colonies :—

(a) Eritrea. It having been brought to the notice of the Foreign Ministers that Ethiopia is making claim to Eritrea, it is suggested that the Ethiopian Government should be heard before a final decision on the future of Eritrea is taken.

(b) Italian Somaliland. There should be a study by the Deputies as to the possibility of the creation of a new territory to be known as United Somalia, consisting of British Somaliland, Italian Somaliland, the Ogaden, the Reserved Areas, the last two now being under the sovereignty of Ethiopia, in order to provide an economic and ethnic unit in the interests of the people. Should there be agreement on this proposal, the United Kingdom should be given the trusteeship for United Somalia, (i) on the grounds that the area was liberated by British Commonwealth Forces, and (ii) since the United Kingdom would be voluntarily placing the protectorate of British Somaliland under the trusteeship system in the interests of the wider area. If, after investigation agreement was not reached on this scheme, the British offer would be withdrawn.

In informal discussion on the 2nd May, after M. Molotov had criticised the United Kingdom proposals as being "too selfish," it was agreed that not only the United States, French and Soviet but also the United Kingdom proposals should be taken into consideration.

4. Italo-Yugoslav Frontier.—On the 30th April the Foreign Ministers considered the report of the Four-Power Boundary Commission set up in accordance with the decision taken by the Council at its First Session in London. By its terms of reference the Commission was required to report upon a line "which will in the main be the ethnic line leaving a minimum population under alien rule."

The Commission's report contained no conclusions or recommendations because, after preliminary consideration of the boundary, there was wide divergence between the proposals of the Soviet Delegation and those of the other three Delegations. Each Commissioner therefore submitted his own recommendations to his Government. The Soviet Commissioner virtually supported the maximum Yugoslav claims involving the cession to Yugoslavia of the whole of Istria, Trieste, Monfalcone, Gorizia, a large part of the province of Udine and the whole district of Tarvisio, including the town of Pontebba, which was Italian before 1914. The United States Commissioner suggested a line running from Tarvisio (which was to remain Italian), along the old 1914 boundary until north-west of Gorizia. Gorizia, Monfalcone and Trieste would remain Italian. Istria would be divided, about three-fifths going to Yugoslavia and two-fifths, comprising the west coast district and the whole southern end of the peninsula as far north as and including Albona, to Italy. The United Kingdom Commissioner's line was virtually the same as that of the United States Commissioner down to Trieste. Istria would be divided so as to leave the coastal areas with Italy. In the region of Gorizia and in Istria it would be less favourable to Italy than the United States line in order to leave fewer Yugoslavs under alien rule. The French Commissioner favoured a line broadly the same as the United States Commissioner down to Trieste but drawn narrowly round Gorizia, while Istria would go to Yugoslavia with the exception of the Italian corner in the north-west.

The Foreign Ministers invited their Chairman to communicate to the Italian and Yugoslav Governments the report of the Boundary Commission, together with the various frontier lines suggested by the Commissioners, making it clear that these suggested lines were put forward by the experts and did not constitute official proposals by the Governments represented on the Council. They also invited the Yugoslav and Italian Governments to send representatives to present their views to the Council on the 3rd May.

The Yugoslav and Italian Governments were duly heard on the 3rd May. M. Kardelj spoke for the Yugoslav Government and Signor de Gasperi for the Italian Government. The former took the line that only the Soviet Commissioner's proposal went anywhere near satisfying the Yugoslav claims. The latter preferred the United States as being nearest to the Wilson Line, previously described as the Italian Government's minimum.

On the 4th May the Foreign Ministers discussed Venezia Giulia in the light of the views presented by the Italian and Yugoslav representatives. M. Molotov began by supporting the Yugoslav claims using the familiar arguments. Mr. Bevin suggested that the Soviet line, which included about half a million Italians in Yugoslavia and no Yugoslavs in Italy, was wide of the mark and might lead to future wars. He thought that the French line was the best on ethnic grounds, while the United Kingdom line took the greater account of economic interests. Later on the same day Mr. Byrnes appeared ready to compromise between the French and United Kingdom proposals, subject to Yugoslavia compensating Italy for at any rate the equipment in the Albona coalfields. M. Molotov and M. Bidault suggested that Trieste was the focal point on which the Foreign Ministers should now concentrate. Mr. Bevin pointed out that the trade of Trieste depended on many countries, including northern Italy. It would also serve world trade and for this reason the United Kingdom thought that it should be an international free port. M. Molotov thought it would be necessary to consider Trieste in relation to the colonies and reparation. Mr. Byrnes then proposed a plebiscite in the area between the Soviet and United States lines. M. Molotov objected that if there were a plebiscite it should be held in the whole area. Mr. Bevin deprecated any suggestion of a plebiscite as being contrary to the London decision. Mr. Byrnes then dropped his suggestion, but it was agreed to discuss it later.

5. Allied Inspectorate.—At the meeting of the Foreign Ministers on the 1st May Mr. Bevin recalled that the Council had at their previous session decided that "provision should be made for the establishment of Allied machinery to enforce the naval, military, and air clauses of the Peace Treaty until such time as Italy can be accepted as a reliable member of the United Nations Organisation."

Mr. Byrnes put forward a modification of an earlier United States proposal for a Treaty Commission with general powers to supervise the execution of the provisions of the Peace Treaty.

M. Bidault supported Mr. Byrnes's proposal subject to further consideration of its precise wording.

M. Molotov could not agree to any form of Allied body to supervise the execution of the peace treaty. He maintained that such a body was inconsistent with Italian sovereignty, which the treaty was to recognise, and also with the professed intention of the Allies to support Italy's admission to the United Nations.

Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Bevin felt that there must be some Allied body to supervise the execution of at least some part of the provisions of the Treaty.

M. Molotov feared that the existence of an Allied Inspectorate might be used as a pretext for keeping troops in Italy and he therefore objected to the establishment of any Inspectorate or Commission after the conclusion of the peace treaty. Any questions as to the enforcement of the provisions of the treaty could be settled direct between Italy and the countries concerned.

Mr. Byrnes declared that the United States had no desire to keep troops in Italy or anywhere else.

Further discussion on this matter was adjourned.

6. War Criminals.—At the meeting of the Foreign Ministers on the 2nd May the Foreign Ministers considered a memorandum by the United States Delegation dealing with the provisions on this subject to be included in the draft treaty.

M. Molotov said that the main question in dispute was whether or not a committee was required to supervise the implementation of whatever provisions might be included in the treaty.

Mr. Bevin thought it was necessary to have some Allied body to decide who was a war criminal and who was not, after the withdrawal of Allied troops and the winding up of the Allied Commission in Italy.

M. Molotov thought that this task could be left to the normal diplomatic channel. The treaty should merely require Italy to co-operate with the Allies in the apprehension and trial of war criminals.

Mr. Byrnes said that the United States proposal set a limit on the period within which demands could be presented to the Italian Government for the extradition of war criminals. When the Allied Commission again came to an end there ought to be some machinery set up to carry out its functions in this sphere for the short period—say about 12 months—for which they would be required.

M. Molotov asked whether any of the Allied Governments concerned (Yugoslavia, Greece, Albania or Poland) had asked for the establishment of such a body and whether the Allied Commission had ever had to intervene in order to ensure the compliance of the Italian Government with an Allied request for the extradition of a particular war criminal.

Mr. Byrnes said that the second of M. Molotov's questions did not arise since, under the present procedure, it was the Allied Commission and not the Italian Government which considered requests for the extradition of war criminals. He thought it would be in the interests of the Allied Powers to establish some machinery to take over the functions of the Allied Commission in this matter.

The Council agreed to defer further consideration of this matter for the time being.

C.—The following recommendations of the deputies (given in the form of draft heads of treaty) still remain to be referred to the Foreign Ministers for consideration :—

1. Recognition of other Peace Treaties.

Italy undertakes to recognise the full force of the Treaties of Peace with Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland and other agreements or arrangements which have been or will be reached by the Allied and Associated Powers in respect of Austria, Germany and Japan for the restoration of peace.

Political Situation in India.

1. MR. ATTLEE informed visiting Ministers of the state of the discussions which were now being conducted by the Cabinet Mission in India.

In subsequent discussion DR. EVATT expressed the hope that India would not acquire a status different from that of the other members of the British Commonwealth. Each had full autonomous rights but all co-operated, and this should be the position of India. If, unfortunately, India chose to leave the Commonwealth, it would be bound to affect adversely the strength of the whole Commonwealth. He assumed that if she did decide to leave the Commonwealth the United Kingdom Government would propose to include in any treaty with her adequate provisions on defence matters.

MR. ATTLEE agreed that this would certainly be the case.

MR. NASH suggested that Indians might think that Dominion status implied some degree of inferiority. Existing members of the Commonwealth would, he was certain, be very ready to assure her that this was not the case. It might perhaps be useful if all members of the Commonwealth were to issue a statement that they were anxious to see India in an equal position with themselves.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS suggested that it might be well to consider whether the use of the word "Dominion" could not be avoided in describing the position of the different members of the British Commonwealth.

LORD ADDISON said that he was interested in Field-Marshal Smuts' suggestion and would certainly take note of it.

Policy towards Germany.

2. The meeting had before them a memorandum by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on Policy towards Germany (P.M.M. (46) 21). The paper set out some of the problems facing the United Kingdom in Germany, with particular reference to the question whether her policy should be to work towards a unified though federalised Germany or towards a separate Western German State or States which would be more amenable to her influence.

MR. ATTLEE said that in his view it would be wrong to work towards a permanent separation between Eastern and Western Germany. He doubted whether the German people would be likely permanently to acquiesce in such a separation; he did not think that the separate units would be economically viable; and the separation would do much to divide Europe into two separate camps.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS agreed with Mr. Attlee's view. He thought it would be a grave mistake to work for a divided Germany. It would be bound to create in the future a fresh movement towards unification and in the meanwhile it would weaken our whole position in Western Europe. He thought that the British Commonwealth should certainly strive to the utmost to consolidate democratic institutions in Western Germany, but we should not do this with the idea in the back of our minds that there would always be separation between East and West. In his view our ultimate objective should be a federal Germany on the lines of the Germany that had existed before the days of Bismarck. The territorial units which then existed had behind them the sanction of tradition and local sentiment. For the present he thought it very important that we should do our best, despite the absence of political unity, to preserve some degree of economic unity. He agreed with the general lines of the statement which Mr. Bevin suggested he should make when it became necessary to discuss these questions.

He would leave it to the Germans to work out the precise form of their future constitution. Our primary business was to de-militarise and disarm Germany and to prevent a resurgence of a highly centralised State such as had been built up by Bismarck and his successors.

Field-Marshal Smuts added that he would wish to see the Ruhr remain under British control for the present.

DR. EVATT agreed with the line which Mr. Attlee proposed. He thought that it would be wrong to split Germany into parts. It had been implicit in the Potsdam Declaration that Germany should not be permanently split along the lines of the present military occupation. He did not like the suggestion on page 3 of the paper that the danger from Russia had become as great as the danger from a revived Germany. It was true that this was in accordance with the views expressed by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff in the paper circulated as P.M.M. (46) 1, but we must be on our guard against assuming that any State was necessarily a danger to peace. If we did so, foreign policy might present fewer difficulties (since it would no longer be necessary to consider what was just but only what was required to strengthen our position against that State), but it would be a policy of despair. At an earlier meeting Mr. Morrison had been critical of the Potsdam Agreement, but that Agreement was enlightened compared to such a policy.

There were many variations of federation. The Central Government could be strong or weak. In the paper under discussion the plan was to make the Central Government weak and the local governments as strong as possible. He doubted whether the Germans could be relied on to accept such a solution permanently. It was because of the disadvantages of the loose association which had existed in the past that there had been such a notable tendency towards strong central government in the history of Germany during the last hundred years. It might not be wise to go now to the opposite extreme.

Dr. Evatt suggested that it would be well for the problems of Germany to be discussed as soon as possible between a wider circle of States. He thought this might well have the effect of easing the difficulties which had arisen between the four occupying Powers.

Mr. NASH agreed with Dr. Evatt that the United Kingdom should not follow a policy which implied that conflict between the European Powers was one day inevitable. To do so would be to abandon the policy of building up the United Nations and to destroy everything for which we had been fighting. He did not belittle the difficulties of relations between the eastern and western Powers in Germany, but he was sure that we should pursue the goal of a unified and not a divided Germany. At the same time, the French proposals for dealing with the Rhineland should not be lightly set aside. The French would not necessarily exclude those areas economically from the rest of Germany.

Mr. Nash thought that it would be wrong to base a policy on the assumption that Communist ideology would prevail in Germany. He was not convinced that it would do so. It was not true that all behind the iron curtain were convinced adherents of communism. It might quite well be that our ideology would prevail over that of the Communists if we pursued a forward constructive policy.

Mr. ATTLEE said that it seemed to be common ground between those present that a great effort should be made to continue working with Russia. The idea of a division of Germany should be rejected. Equally, he thought it was common ground that we should reject complete centralisation. In between, there existed, as Dr. Evatt had said, many possible degrees of decentralisation and the precise degree required was a matter that could be further considered. The objective was sufficient decentralisation to make an effective democracy possible. Without this there would be a danger of Germany falling completely under Russian influence. A Germany under Russian influence might in time develop into a Russia under German influence.

LORD ADDISON added that we should not be unduly afraid of communism. The results of the French referendum showed that there might be a reaction against it. In Germany, much depended upon the way of life that was built up in the Western zones. If there was distress there, communism would spread. At the moment, the situation was one of great difficulty. There was real danger of catastrophic famine in Germany.

Mr. ATTLEE gave the visiting Ministers information regarding the food shortage in the British zone. The zone had always been a deficit area which had in the past obtained its supplies from Eastern Germany. This had not been possible since the occupation. Now the supplies which had been looked for chiefly from the United States were not forthcoming. The United Kingdom had already assisted to the best of her ability from her own resources, and it would be very difficult for her to do more. Fresh efforts were being made to increase supplies from America.

THE PRIME MINISTER:

I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding on this point and I should like to take this opportunity of making clear the nature and purpose of our consultation with the Dominions on matters of this kind. It is our practice and our duty as members of the British Commonwealth, to keep other members of the Commonwealth fully and continuously informed of all matters which we are called upon to decide, but which may affect Commonwealth interests. The object is to give them an opportunity of expressing their views in confidence, if they so desire. These views are taken fully into account, but the decision must be ours, and the other Governments are not asked, and would not wish, to share the responsibility for it. Dominion Governments follow the same practice. This course was followed with regard to these negotiations with Egypt. The Dominion Governments were kept fully informed by telegram and, in addition, we took the opportunity of personal discussion with the Australian, New Zealand and South African Ministers now in London. I hope that this general statement will be a guide to the House as to the nature of Commonwealth consultation in such matters, and will indicate the difficulty in which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are placed if pressed to disclose the views expressed by Dominion Governments in such circumstances.

Egypt: Revision of Anglo-Egyptian Treaty.

(Previous reference : P.M.M. (46) 4th Meeting, Item 1, and 6th Meeting, Item 4.)

1. MR. ATTLEE said that in the course of the debate in the House of Commons on the previous day regarding the proposal to withdraw British forces from Egypt he had been closely questioned on the extent to which Dominion Governments had been consulted and had agreed to the proposal. He read to the Ministers extracts from the Official Report of the debate (attached as Appendix I).

He recalled that at their 4th Meeting he had informed the Ministers from Australia and New Zealand—Field-Marshal Smuts had not then arrived—of the course which the United Kingdom Government proposed to take. They, like the United Kingdom Ministers, had seen the grave danger of this course, but he had understood that they acquiesced in the view that, in the circumstances, the course proposed was that best calculated to secure our interests in the Canal zone.

In the debate he had been pressed to define the attitude of the Dominions. He had been anxious not to commit Dominion Ministers or their Governments and he now wished to make it clear to them that the United Kingdom Government took full responsibility for the decision.

DR. EVATT said that the record of the 4th Meeting showed that the matter had been presented to Dominion Ministers as a decision already taken by the United Kingdom Government; they had regarded it as one within the jurisdiction of that Government. He recalled that Field-Marshal Smuts, at the first meeting held after he arrived in England (the 6th Meeting), had raised the subject again and had expressed the view that it would be greatly preferable if an announcement regarding the facilities to be given to the British Commonwealth in Egypt could be made simultaneously with that relating to the withdrawal of British forces.

Dr. Evatt said that Dominion Ministers had to consider the reactions in their own countries to the statements made in the debate in the House of Commons. They would certainly be questioned regarding their attitude.

He suggested that, when United Kingdom Ministers discussed with Dominion Governments matters of importance to the Commonwealth, discussion might take one of three forms. First, Dominion Governments might be asked to assent to a proposed course of action and to share the responsibility for it. Secondly, they might be consulted as to their views before a decision was taken by the United Kingdom Government. Thirdly, they might be kept informed of the action which the United Kingdom Government proposed to take. In the present case the Australian Government had certainly been informed of the course proposed. He did not think they should be taken as having assented to it : they regarded the matter as one on which the decision rested with the United Kingdom Government.

MR. NASH agreed with Dr. Evatt that it would not be correct to say that Dominion Ministers had shared in the decision. On the other hand, they had been fully informed of what the United Kingdom had in mind and he personally had not at the time had any doubt that the course proposed was the only course possible, though he had had certain misgivings after listening to Field-Marshal Smuts's statement at the 6th Meeting. So far as he was concerned, it would be true to say that he had acquiesced in the decision, though he did not share in the responsibility for it.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he fully understood that Mr. Attlee had been placed in a very difficult situation during the debate. He did not think it right that United Kingdom Ministers should be pressed to state in the House of Commons the views expressed by Dominion Governments in such consultations as this. That was hardly fair to those Governments. They had no means of joining in the debate themselves and anything said in the House of Commons might place them in an uncomfortable position in their own countries. He was in fact sure to be cross-examined in his own Parliament on the attitude he had adopted to the United Kingdom's proposal.

He had himself raised the question of Egypt as soon as he arrived in England because, when passing through Egypt, Lord Stansgate had told him what the United Kingdom Government had in mind. It had been a surprise and a shock to him and he had thought that he should express his opinion openly as soon as he arrived. He had hoped that it would be possible for the announcement to be held up until an announcement could be made simultaneously regarding the facilities to be granted to the British Commonwealth in Egypt.

Dominion Ministers were certainly informed of what was in mind, but he did not think it would be right to say that they were consulted in such a way as to associate them with the decision. The decision was clearly that of the United Kingdom Government.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he would be very glad if it were possible to issue some general statement about the nature and purpose of consultations between the Governments of the Commonwealth, which might reduce the risk of misunderstanding, both on this and future occasions.

MR. ATTLEE said that he was quite prepared to make a further statement in the House. The statement should, he suggested, explain the general method of consultation pursued between the Commonwealth Governments, and make it clear that it was the established practice of the United Kingdom Government to give Dominion Governments an opportunity to comment on matters affecting the general welfare of the Commonwealth.

MR. NASH said that this was fully in conformity with his wishes. The New Zealand Government would certainly wish to be consulted not only on problems of immediate interest to Dominion Governments but also on wider problems of general Commonwealth interest.

LORD ADDISON said that this was already the practice of the United Kingdom Government on many questions. There had been many occasions on which the United Kingdom Cabinet had modified a decision in the light of views expressed by Dominion Governments. The United Kingdom Government always welcomed an expression of the views of Dominion Governments on matters of general interest, even though the responsibility for decision rested with the United Kingdom Government. Field-Marshal Smuts, for instance, had sent in recent months many telegrams on the subject of policy in Greece which had been most valuable to the United Kingdom Government.

DR. EVATT suggested that if the Government of one member of the Commonwealth were asked in its Parliament what were the views of the Government of another member of the Commonwealth, the safest line to take was usually that this was a matter on which a statement could not be made without reference to that Government.

Later in the meeting, MR. ATTLEE read to the visiting Ministers the text of a statement which he proposed to make in the House of Commons that afternoon. The text of this statement, as finally agreed after discussion, is attached at Appendix II.

Draft Peace Treaty with Italy.

2. MR. ATTLEE asked Lord Hood, who was a member of the United Kingdom Delegation to the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris, to report recent developments in the negotiations.

LORD HOOD said that the four Foreign Ministers had reviewed the draft treaty with Italy on the 7th May. M. Molotov had developed his conception of a bargain. He had suggested that the Yugoslav frontier claims should be met in full, including the claim to Trieste, that the Dodecanese should be awarded to Greece, that Italian property and assets in Greece and Yugoslavia should be reckoned as reparations, Italy's liability being reduced pro tanto, and that the Italian Colonies should be placed either under sole Italian trusteeship or under joint trusteeship in which she had a share. These proposals did not commend themselves to Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes.

There had ensued a lengthy discussion on three principal issues :—

(i) Reparations.—A Committee of Experts had been appointed to examine the various proposals put forward, including a fresh proposal of Mr. Byrnes that, as there were no Italian assets in Russia, the Soviet Government should be awarded Italian assets in Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary. The Committee had not been able to reach agreement. Their report was, he understood, to be considered that day by the Foreign Ministers.

(ii) Venezia Giulia.—Mr. Bevin and Mr. Byrnes had intimated their readiness to agree to the frontier line proposed by the French Delegation. M. Molotov had not, however, been prepared to modify his previous stand.

(iii) Italian Colonies.—No progress had been made.

It has finally been decided that no useful purpose would be served by continuing the discussion of the Italian treaty and the Foreign Ministers had proceeded to consider the draft treaties with the Balkan States.

It appeared that, in the case of these draft treaties, there might not be much difficulty in reaching agreement on draft articles on territorial questions. Difficulties, however, were likely to arise in the economic field, in particular in regard to control of the Danube and the economic rights of foreign countries.

As regards the future timetable, it seemed that the Foreign Ministers would continue to discuss outstanding aspects of the Balkan treaties, and would then proceed to discuss questions relating to Germany. They might then review once more the outstanding points of difference on the draft peace treaties.

The impression had been gained that the Soviet Government wished allied unity to be maintained, and there seemed to be a chance of agreement being reached. But the possibility of a breakdown could not be ruled out. If a breakdown should become likely, it would be necessary to decide on the course to be followed then. Lord Hood believed that the Foreign Secretary had it in mind to propose that documents should be drawn up showing the clauses of the draft treaties on which agreement had been reached and the various points on which there was disagreement; and that these documents should be laid before the proposed Peace Conference.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that the procedure was reminiscent of the Five-Power sponsorship of the Dumbarton Oaks draft at San Francisco, where points not agreed between the Five Powers were left over until the Conference. The prospects of an early Conference did not, however, appear to be favourable, for while the Soviet Government might not have a veto on the convening of the Conference in a technical sense, in practice it would be very difficult to proceed without Russian concurrence.

Subsequent discussion centred on the need for expediting the holding of the Peace Conference. The Council of Foreign Ministers might continue its discussions for some little while, and after that there would have to be an interval between the issue of invitations to the Conference and the holding of it. It was very inconvenient to Dominion Ministers to be away from their countries long; and, besides, they looked to the Conference to settle the terms of the treaties.

DR. EVATT said he had the impression that there was little enthusiasm for the Conference. He expressed the hope that it would be held as soon as possible, whether or not agreement was reached between the Four Powers. Complete agreement would, indeed, be likely to limit the scope of the Peace Conference; for the four Foreign Ministers were now engaged in discussions of substance rather than of drafting. He recalled that the Moscow Agreement clearly provided for the convoking of the Peace Conference. The countries who had made a substantial contribution to victory and who were not represented on the Council of Foreign Ministers could not acquiesce in an evasion or nullification of the previous assurance of a Conference. It was on account of this assurance that they had accepted the Moscow Agreement. He added that some countries not represented on the Council of Foreign Ministers had a better right than France to participate in the peace settlement. As regards the possibility of the conclusion of separate treaties with Italy by the different countries at war, he observed that the allied countries had specifically agreed not to conclude a separate peace.

MR. ATTLEE said that Mr. Bevin had been informed of the views expressed at the 12th Meeting and had been asked to supply information as to the prospects of convening the Peace Conference in the near future. The Foreign Secretary was doing all that he could to insist on the summoning of the Conference, but the Russians had been opposing a Conference until complete agreement had been reached by the drafting countries. To insist on a Conference against Russia's wishes might well involve a complete breach with her, and the implications of that would be very serious. Mr. Bevin had made clear his view that, when the draft treaties were laid before the Conference, it would be open to any of the Governments represented on the Council of Foreign Ministers to consider amendments suggested by the other States present at the Conference and to support them if they thought fit.

MR. MCNEIL said that the Russian view had so far been that complete agreement must be reached by the drafting countries on draft treaties before the Conference was convened. If she could not be persuaded to change her view, there were three alternative courses in the event of failure to reach agreement. First, it would be possible for separate treaties to be made by each State at war. The Foreign Secretary was opposed to this course. Secondly, it would be possible for certain countries to issue a declaration of their intentions in regard to their future relations with Italy and the Balkan States. Thirdly, he supposed that it would conceivably be possible for a Conference to be held without the participation of Russia, but such a course might have grave repercussions and would clearly require the most serious consideration.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it might suit Russia to let things drift. She was the Power in effective possession of the Balkans and she might well see no particular advantage in formal treaties with the Balkan States.

MR. NASH shared the view of the Australian Government that the Moscow Agreement should be adhered to and a Peace Conference convened as soon as possible. He also feared that the effect of the present meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers might be to restrict the scope of the Conference.

In discussion it was suggested that it might be useful if the Foreign Secretary could return from Paris for a further discussion with Dominion Ministers. Dr. Evatt was anxious that Mr. Mackenzie King should be present at any further discussion. Other Ministers thought that it would not be possible to wait until he arrived.

DR. EVATT said that he would himself be going to Paris in the following week on other matters, but he proposed to express to M. Molotov and Mr. Byrnes the views of the Australian Government, which were wholly in accord with those expressed at the meetings. He would impress on them the bad effect on public opinion that failure to convene a Peace Conference would have. He doubted whether, if Russia would not agree to the holding of a Conference, the convening of it would necessarily involve a serious breach between her and the participating allies. It should be borne in mind that, so far as the Italian treaty was concerned, Russia had not contributed to the defeat of Italy. He agreed that it did not seem possible to carry consideration of the Italian treaty further at this stage.

MR. ATTLEE said that the strong feeling of the Meeting that it was urgent that the Peace Conference should be held would be conveyed fully to Mr. Bevin and, if in the meanwhile there had been no developments, arrangements would be made for the subject to be discussed again as soon as possible after Mr. Mackenzie King's arrival.

APPENDIX I.

EXTRACT FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS' OFFICIAL REPORT FOR MONDAY, 6TH MAY, 1946.

THE PRIME MINISTER: . . . I am certain that this is the best approach. That is the advice we have received . . . My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Air is accompanied by both civilians and soldiers with great experience of these problems. We have discussed this matter with the Chiefs-of-Staff who are, naturally, supporting this step. We have discussed it with the Dominion Prime Ministers [an Hon. Member: "Did they agree?"] They agreed that this was the best method of approach. After weighing all the factors as to what was the best way in which we could come to an agreement with Egypt in this matter, they have agreed that this is the best way of approach. Fortunately, we had the Dominion Prime Ministers' representatives over here, and we have discussed with them, perfectly clearly, why we are doing this, what we are doing, and what is our endeavour. . . .

MR. EDEN: May I put one question? I am not sure whether I heard the right hon. Gentleman aright. I asked whether the timing, method and wording, were agreed with the Dominions?

THE PRIME MINISTER: Yes, I brought this draft before the Dominion Prime Ministers and discussed it with them. [Hon. Members: "Did they agree?"] Well, I did not come to this House to—[Hon Members: "Oh!"]—His Majesty's Government take full responsibility. I discussed it with the Dominion representatives very fully. They agreed that this was the best method of approach.

MR. CHURCHILL: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not leave us in any doubt about this point as to the Dominions. He has assured us they were consulted, and no doubt there were discussions, but is it the fact that they were consulted before the decision was taken, or was the decision taken and they were just told of the decision?

THE PRIME MINISTER: Of course they were consulted before the decision.

MR. CHURCHILL indicated dissent.

THE PRIME MINISTER: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. He was not there. He was not there when we discussed this. We decided on this draft and considered that it was the right line of approach, and naturally we brought it before the Dominions representatives, but I am not attempting to shelter myself by putting responsibility on others. I am saying they were fully consulted.

APPENDIX II.

EGYPT: STATEMENT BY MR. ATTLEE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS ON 8TH MAY, 1946.

I should like, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to make the following statement.

In the course of yesterday's debate on Egypt, I was asked whether the Dominion Government's were consulted before the announcement was made in Cairo and whether they agreed to its terms and timing. I replied that they were fully consulted and that they agreed that this was the best method of approach, though I made it clear that the responsibility for the decision rested entirely with His Majesty's Government here.

I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding on this point and I should like to take this opportunity of making clear the nature and purpose of our consultation with the Dominions on matters of this kind. It is our practice and our duty as members of the British Commonwealth to keep other members of the Commonwealth fully and continuously informed of all matters which we are called upon to decide, but which may affect Commonwealth interests. The object is to give them an opportunity of expressing their views in confidence, if they so desire. These views are taken fully into account, but the decision must be ours and the other Governments are not asked, and would not wish, to share the responsibility for it. Dominion Governments follow the same practice.

This course was followed with regard to these negotiations with Egypt. The Dominions Governments were kept fully informed by telegram and in addition we took the opportunity of personal discussion with the Australian, New Zealand and South African Ministers now in London.

I hope that this general statement will be a guide to the House as to the nature of Commonwealth consultation in such matters, and will indicate the difficulty in which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are placed if pressed to disclose the views expressed by Dominion Governments in such circumstances.

So much for general principles. I wish now to deal with one particular remark which I made yesterday. I said that the Dominions had " agreed " to our method of approach to the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. I think the word " agreed " may have given a wrong impression. There was full information and discussion. The Dominion Ministers were not called upon to express agreement in a matter which was one of United Kingdom responsibility, but they realised that the line of approach had to be decided by the United Kingdom in the light of the conditions and of the advice given to them by their civil and military advisers on the spot.

This statement, I may add, is made after consultation with the Dominion Ministers now in London and has their full agreement.

ANNEX.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH HUNGARY.

MEMORANDUM PREPARED IN THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

NOTE.—The major questions on which difference has arisen between the Soviet Delegation, on the one side, and the United Kingdom and United States Delegations on the other, are summarised in the memorandum previously circulated by the Foreign Secretary (P.M.M. (46) 11). The following statement outlines the progress made by the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers in the preparation of the Draft Treaty. Square brackets denote that agreement has not been reached on the passage bracketed.

The following preamble was agreed subject to later decision as to whether the passage in brackets should be included in the preamble or set out as a separate article (see paragraph ~~13~~ 14 below) :—

1. Preamble.

" The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Australia, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, New Zealand, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of South Africa, Yugoslavia, as the States which are at war with Hungary and actively waged war against the European enemy States with substantial military force, hereinafter called the Allied and Associated Powers, of the one part, and Hungary, of the other part;

" Whereas Hungary, having become an ally of Hitlerite Germany and participating on her side in the war against the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and other United Nations, bears her share of responsibility for this war;

" Whereas, however, Hungary on the 28th December, 1944, broke off relations with Germany, declared war on Germany and on the 20th January, 1945, concluded an Armistice with the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, acting on behalf of all the United Nations, which were at war with Hungary; and

" Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers and Hungary wish to settle questions still outstanding between them as a result of the events hereinbefore recited [thereby enabling the Allied and Associated Powers to support Hungary's application to become a member of the United Nations and also to adhere to any Convention concluded under the auspices of the United Nations and forming the basis of friendly relations between them],

"Now, therefore, have agreed to declare the cessation of the state of war and for this purpose to conclude the present Peace Treaty, and the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers and of Hungary have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries (names of the Governments and of their Plenipotentiaries .....
.....) who, after presentation of their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following."

2. Limitation of Armaments.

The following clause, which is still under discussion, has been accepted provisionally :—

"The maintenance of armaments for land, sea and air will be closely restricted to the needs of—

(a) the maintenance of order in Hungarian territory;
(b) defence of local frontiers;
(c) such military contingents, if any, in addition to the foregoing as may be required by the Security Council."

The clause has been referred to the Joint Committee of Naval, Military and Air experts for a report on the limitations to be imposed on Hungarian armaments.

3. Restoration of United Nations Property.

This point is under discussion, on the basis of the following clause of the Soviet draft treaty :—

["Hungary undertakes to restore all legal rights and interests of the United Nations and their nationals as they existed before the war and to return their property in complete good order."]

4. Reparation.

The following clause, which is under discussion, was proposed by the Soviet Delegation :—

["Losses caused to the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia by military operations and by the occupation by Hungary of the territory of these States will be indemnified by Hungary to the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, but, taking into consideration that Hungary has not only withdrawn from the war against the United Nations but has also declared war on Germany, the Parties agree that compensation for the above losses will be made by Hungary not in full but only in part, namely to the amount of 300 million United States dollars payable over 6 years in commodities (machine equipment, river craft, grain, &c.), the sum to be paid to the Soviet Union to amount to 200 million United States dollars, and the sum to be paid to Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia to amount to 100 million United States dollars.

The basis for calculating the settlement provided for in this article will be the American dollar at its gold parity on the day of the signing of the Armistice Agreement, i.e., 35 dollars for one ounce of gold."]

In the discussion of the above clause the United States Deputy made the following statement :—

"I should like to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that at the time of the signature of the Hungarian Armistice, the United States Government made reservations with respect to the reparation obligations imposed upon Hungary by Article 12. The United States Government has repeatedly made known its disagreement with the process of fixing reparation obligations in the abstract without regard to the possible effects of the obligations thus established upon economic conditions in the enemy States concerned. In Hungary the economic situation has been steadily deteriorating for some months and is now deteriorating at an even more rapid pace. Conditions of advanced inflation have been reached. About one month ago the United States Government proposed that the representatives of the Soviet, United Kingdom and United States Governments in Hungary be instructed to concert in studying the programme which would halt the economic disintegration of Hungary and would provide a basis with the rehabilitation of that country. As far as I am aware, no steps in this direction have been taken. The United States Government desires to have more detailed information on the Hungarian economic situation before reaching a decision with respect to reparation. We believe that this subject should be deferred pending the receipt of information regarding the approach made by the United States Government to the Soviet and British Governments."

5. German Assets in Hungary.

The following clause has been agreed in principle :—

" Hungary recognises that the Soviet Union is entitled to all German assets in Hungary transferred to the Soviet Union by the Control Council for Germany and undertakes to take all necessary measures for facilitating such transfers."

6. Restitution.

The following clause has been agreed in principle, subject to inclusion of a time limit and to reconsideration of the wording of the reference to restitution to United Nations other than the Soviet Union :—

" Hungary, in so far as she has not yet done so, undertakes to return to the Soviet Union, as well as to Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and other United Nations in complete good order all valuables and materials removed during the war from United Nations' territory to Hungary, and belonging to State, public and co-operative organisations, enterprises, institutions and individual citizens, such as : factory and works equipment, locomotives, rolling-stock, tractors, motor vehicles, historic monuments, museum treasures and any other property."

7. Return of Allied vessels.

The Deputies agreed that provision for return of Allied vessels would be made under the Article governing the restoration of United Nations property.

8. Annulment of the Vienna Awards.

The following clause is under discussion :—

" The decisions of the Vienna Awards of the 2nd November, 1938, and the 30th August, 1940, are declared null and void. The frontier between Hungary and Roumania existing on the 1st January, 1938, is hereby restored [the whole of Transylvania being thus included in the territory of Roumania]. [Nevertheless, the Allied and Associated Powers would be prepared to recognise any rectification of the Hungarian-Roumanian frontier that may subsequently be mutually agreed between the parties directly concerned and which would substantially reduce the number of persons living under alien rule."]

9. Human Rights.

A clause has been agreed as follows :—

" The Hungarian Government undertakes to take all measures necessary to secure to all persons under its jurisdiction, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, the enjoyment of human rights and of the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of expression, press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and of public meeting."

10. Dissolution of Fascist Organisations.

A clause has been agreed as follows :—

" Hungary, which in accordance with the Armistice Agreement has taken measures for dissolving all organisations of a Fascist type on Hungarian territory whether political, military or para-military, as well as other organisations conducting propaganda hostile to the United Nations, undertakes not to permit in future the existence and activities of organisations [of that nature] which have as their aim denial to the people of their democratic rights."

11. Repeal of Discriminatory Legislation.

The following has been agreed :—

"Hungary, which in accordance with the Armistice Agreement has taken measures to set free, irrespective of citizenship and nationality, all persons held in confinement on account of their activities in favour of the United Nations or because of their sympathies with the United Nations or because of their racial origin, and to repeal discriminatory legislation and restrictions imposed thereunder, undertakes to complete these measures and in future not to take any measures or enact any laws which would be incompatible with the objects and purposes mentioned in this Article."

12. War Criminals.

The clause in the Soviet Draft Treaty, based on Article 14 of the Armistice, is as follows :—

"Hungary undertakes to collaborate with the Allied and Associated Powers in the apprehension and trial of persons accused of war crimes."

This was considered by the Deputies, without prejudice to the inclusion of an article on this subject in the draft Treaty or in a separate Protocol. The United States Delegation believes that the Treaty should contain a more detailed statement of Hungary's obligation.

13. Withdrawal of Allied Forces.

This clause has been agreed, subject to the view expressed by the United States Delegation that, if a Treaty restoring the independence of Austria is concluded before, or simultaneously with, the Treaty with Hungary, this Article will have to be modified :—

"Upon the entry into force of the present Treaty, all Allied forces will, within the period of . . . . days, be withdrawn from Hungary, subject to the right of the Soviet Union to keep on Hungarian territory such armed forces as it may need for the maintenance of the lines of communication of the Red Army with the Soviet zone of occupation in Austria. All unused Hungarian currency and all Hungarian goods in possession of the Allied forces in Hungary, acquired pursuant to Article 10 of the Armistice, will be returned to the Hungarian Government within the same period of . . . . days. Hungary, however, undertakes to make available such supplies and facilities as may specifically be required for the maintenance of the lines of communication with the Soviet zone of occupation in Austria, for which due compensation will be made to the Hungarian Government."

14. Admission of Hungary to the United Nations.

The clause has been agreed to in principle; but the United Kingdom and United States Delegations prefer to include the substance of the first sentence of the following clause in the preamble; and the second sentence has not been agreed :—

"Upon the conclusion of the present Treaty the Allied and Associated Powers will support Hungary's candidature for membership of the United Nations Organisation. [Hungary will collaborate with the United Nations and will carry out the arrangements made by them for the maintenance of international peace.]"

15. Ratification of the Peace Treaty.

The following clause has been agreed :—

"The present Treaty, of which the Russian and English texts are both authentic, will be ratified by the Allied and Associated Powers. It shall also be ratified by Hungary. It will come into force immediately after its ratification by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The Instruments of Ratification will in the shortest possible time be deposited with the Government of the U.S.S.R. Certified copies of the present Treaty will be sent by the Government of the U.S.S.R. to the Governments of the other Allied and Associated Powers.

16. Termination of State of War between Hungary and Roumania.

The following has been agreed :—

" The state of war between Hungary and Roumania will terminate upon the entry into force both of the present Treaty and of the Treaty of Peace between the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Australia, the Byelorussian S.S.R., Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, New Zealand, the Ukrainian S.S.R., the Union of South Africa of the one part and Roumania of the other part."

17. Acceptance of Peace Treaties.

The following has been agreed :—

" Hungary undertakes to recognise the full force of the Peace Treaties concluded with Italy, Bulgaria, Roumania and Finland, and of the agreements or arrangements which have been or will be reached by the Allied and Associated Powers in relation to Austria, Germany and Japan for the restoration of peace."

18. Liquidation of certain International Organisations.

The following clause has been agreed :—

" Hungary undertakes to accept any arrangements which may be agreed for the liquidation of the League of Nations and the Permanent Court of International Justice.

" Hungary also undertakes to accept any arrangements which may be agreed for the liquidation of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome."

19. Validity of Allied Acts in Hungary.

This question, raised by the Soviet Delegation, has not been discussed.

International Control of the Danube.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH BULGARIA.

NOTE BY THE SECRETARIES.

THERE is circulated herewith a memorandum on the draft Peace Treaty with Bulgaria prepared in the Foreign Office.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK.
J. E. STEPHENSON.

Cabinet Office, S.W. 1,
8th May, 1946.

ANNEX.

DRAFT PEACE TREATY WITH BULGARIA.

MEMORANDUM PREPARED IN THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

Notes.

(1) The major questions on which difference has arisen between the Soviet Delegation, on the one side, and the United Kingdom and United States Delegations on the other, are summarised in the memorandum previously circulated by the Foreign Secretary (P.M.M. (46) 11). The following statement outlines the progress made by the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers in the preparation of the draft treaty. Square brackets denote that agreement has not been reached on the passage bracketed.

(2) The Bulgarian Government has not yet been recognised by the United Kingdom and United States Governments and it is not yet known whether recognition will be accorded to it early enough for a Peace Treaty to be concluded with Bulgaria in the same way and at the same time as the Treaties with Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland. Recognition is conditional on the Bulgarian Government being broadened along the lines laid down in the Moscow decisions. The United Kingdom Government have no intention of concluding a treaty with the present Government unless those decisions are implemented, but this in no way precludes discussions on the Peace Treaty or drafting of the clauses which will compose it.

Preamble.

" The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Australia, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Greece, India, New Zealand, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of South Africa, Yugoslavia, as the States which are at war with Bulgaria and actively waged war against the European enemy States with substantial military force, hereinafter called the Allied and Associated Powers, of the one part, and Bulgaria, of the other part;

" Whereas Bulgaria, having become an ally of Hitlerite Germany and participating on her side in the war against the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and other United Nations, bears her share of responsibility for this war;

" Whereas, however, Bulgaria having ceased military operations against the United Nations, broke off relations with Germany, and, having concluded on the 28th October, 1944, an Armistice with the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, acting on behalf of all the United Nations at war with Bulgaria, took [an active] part in the war against Germany; and

" Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria wish to settle questions still outstanding between them as a result of the events hereinbefore recited; [thereby enabling the Allied and Associated Powers to support Bulgaria's application to become a member of the United Nations and also to adhere to any convention concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, and forming the basis of friendly relations between them;]

" Now, therefore, have agreed to declare the cessation of the state of war and for this purpose to conclude the present Peace Treaty, and the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers and of Bulgaria have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries (names of the Governments and of their Plenipotentiaries .....
.....) who, after presentation of their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following."

The above has been agreed, subject to later decision as to whether the second passage in brackets should be included in the preamble or set out as a separate clause (see paragraph 12 below).

1. Limitation of Armaments.

The following clause was accepted by the Deputies and referred to the Joint Committee of Naval, Military and Air experts for a report on the limitations to be imposed on the Bulgarian Government :—

" The maintenance of armaments for ground, sea, and air will be closely restricted to the necessities of—

(a) the maintenance of order in Bulgarian territory;
(b) defence of local frontiers;
(c) such military contingents, if any, in addition to the foregoing as may be required by the Security Council."

2. Restoration of United Nations Property.

The following clause of the Soviet draft treaty is still under discussion and has been referred to the Committee of Economic Experts :—

" Bulgaria undertakes to restore all rights and interests of the United Nations and their nationals in Bulgaria.

3. Reparation.

The Deputies decided to postpone consideration of this question until it could be discussed with the Governments of Yugoslavia and Greece.

4. German Assets in Bulgaria.

The following clause has been agreed in principle :—

" Bulgaria recognises that the Soviet Union is entitled to all German assets in Roumania transferred to the Soviet Union by the Control Council for Germany and undertakes to take all necessary measures for facilitating such transfers."

5. Restitution.

The following clause has been agreed in principle, subject to the inclusion of a time limit and to the rewording of the reference to United Nations other than the Soviet Union :—

" Bulgaria undertakes, in so far as she has not yet done so, to return to the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, Greece and other United Nations in complete good order all valuables and materials removed during the war from their territories by Germany and Bulgaria and located on Bulgarian territory, and belonging to State, public and co-operative organisations, enterprises, institutions or individual citizens, such as : factory and works equipment, locomotives, rolling-stock, tractors, motor vehicles, historic monuments, museum treasures and any other property."

6. Return of Allied Vessels.

The Deputies agreed that provision would be made in the article governing the restoration of United Nations property.

7. Human Rights.

The following clause has been agreed :—

" The Bulgarian Government undertakes to take all measures necessary to secure to all persons under its jurisdiction, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, the enjoyment of human rights and of the fundamental freedoms including freedom of expression, press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and of public meeting."

8. Dissolution of Fascist Organisations.

A clause has been agreed as follows :—

" Bulgaria, which in accordance with the Armistice Agreement has taken measures for dissolving all organisations of a fascist type on Bulgarian territory, whether political, military or para-military, as well as other organisations conducting propaganda hostile to United Nations, undertakes not to permit in future the existence and activities of organisations [of that nature,] which have as their aim denial to the people of their democratic rights."

9. Repeal of Discriminatory Legislation.

A clause has been agreed as follows :—

" Bulgaria, which, in accordance with the Armistice Agreement, has taken measures to set free, irrespective of citizenship and nationality, all persons held in confinement on account of their activities in favour of the United Nations or because of their sympathies with the United Nations or because of their racial origin, and to repeal discriminatory legislation and restrictions imposed thereunder, undertakes to complete these measures and in future not to take any measures or enact any laws which would be incompatible with the objects and purposes mentioned in this Article."

10. War Criminals.

The following is the clause of the Soviet draft treaty, drawn up on the basis of the decision of the Council of Foreign Ministers of the 20th September, 1945, that Article 6 of the Armistice should be accepted as the basis for dealing with this question, as developed in the Soviet draft treaty :—

" Bulgaria undertakes to collaborate with the Allied and Associated Powers in the apprehension and trial of persons accused of war crimes."

This clause was considered by the Deputies, without prejudice to the question whether this provision should be covered in the Treaty or in a separate Protocol. The United States Delegation believes that the treaty should contain a more detailed statement of Bulgaria's obligation.

11. Withdrawal of Allied Forces.

The subject is under discussion.

12. Admission of Bulgaria to the United Nations.

The substance of the first sentence of the following clause has been agreed in principle. The United Kingdom and the United States Delegations would prefer that it should be covered in the Preamble. The second sentence has not been agreed :—

[" Upon the conclusion of the present Treaty the Allied and Associated Powers will support Bulgarian candidature for membership of the United Nations Organisation. Bulgaria will collaborate with the United Nations and will carry out the arrangements made by them for the maintenance of international peace."]

14. Acceptance of the Peace Treaties.

As Honourable Members are aware, a series of consultations between the Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth countries began in London some weeks ago with the visit of Prime Minister Chifley of Australia and the representative of the Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Nash, the Minister of Finance of that country. They were joined a few days ago by Field Marshal Smuts, Prime Minister of South Africa, who managed to arrive in London shortly before Mr. Chifley had to depart for Australia.

I should wish to say at this point that it had been our hope that Mr. Chifley would be able to pay a visit to Canada, as the guest of the Canadian Government, on his way to or from London. I understand, however, that his very strenuous timetable and the need for his returning as promptly as possible to Australia will deny us this pleasure on this occasion.

I may say that I cordially welcomed Prime Minister Attlee's original suggestion that there should be a meeting of the Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth countries this year, and shared his regrets that the exigencies of our several timetables made such a meeting impracticable. Instead of a meeting at which all could be present at one time, we have agreed that there should be a series of consultations between the Commonwealth Prime Ministers and their representatives. It has been made very clear that these meetings in London in no sense constitute an Imperial Conference. They should, however, provide a very useful opportunity for the informal exchange of views on a number of questions of mutual concern. During the visit of the Australian and New Zealand representatives there was naturally, as has been reported in the press, some discussion of future arrangements in the Southwest Pacific. With the arrival of Field Marshal Smuts and the coincidental meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris, there was some discussion of aspects of the Italian peace settlement. These and other questions will doubtless come up for some consideration during the conversations which will take place while I am in London.

In this connection, I might perhaps read what Field Marshal Smuts said to the South African Parliament shortly before his departure for the Prime Minister's meetings:

> "There is no formal agenda. I have not been advised that there is a formal agenda. I have mentioned the principal points for discussion, and others may arise as affairs develop. I have given the assurance to the House, and I give it again to this Committee, that as far as I am concerned no commitments, no undertakings, will be entered into that will bind us. If anything occurs affecting us it will be submitted to this Parliament for approval."

It has been my hope,and I have not yet abandoned it, that it would be possible to combine, in one absence from Canada, participation in the Prime Ministers' talks in London and attendance at the representative of Canada at a conference for the conclusion of treaties of peace with Italy and the other unfortunate countries whose governments threw in their lot with the Axis powers. The international timetable is, however, as the House knows, extremely uncertain and I am not in a position to add anything to the speculation, of which the press is full, about the prospects of a conference in Paris next month.

1) Southampton (Radio broadcast)

I am glad to have the opportunity to visit Britain again and to share with Mr. Attlee, Field Marshal Smuts, Mr. Nash and Dr. Evatt in the informal discussion of a variety of matters of common interest and concern to our several countries.

In the year which has elapsed since the end of hostilities in Europe, we in Canada have had to grapple with many problems which relate to the physical well-being and prosperity of large areas of the world. We have, for example, been able to provide, out of our abundance, large quantities of foodstuffs towards the world's great need. Through UNRRA, and through the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, we are seeking constantly to help to alleviate and remove conditions of distress and suffering. To assist now war-ravaged countries to rebuilding their industrial and commercial life, we have extended credits under legislation passed by the Parliament of Canada. Very recently, our Parliament has approved a loan to Britain of one and a quarter billion dollars.

Beyond all our concern for physical well-being lies the greater concern for the peace and security of the world in which we are a part. Our discussions in London will deal with several aspects of the peace settlement which we all hope may be brought about on the fairest and at the same time the most secure basis. To these and all other efforts for prosperity and peace throughout the world we are determined to devote our best efforts.

D R A F T 2) Southampton (Peace Statement) (JAG) C224023 14/V/46

This is my second visit to Britain within seven months, and the fourth I have been able to make in the past five years. On the first two visits, I saw Britain at war - war for the preservation of the world's freedom, and war waged so that the rule of law might replace the menacing spectre of tyranny and brutal force. On my last previous visit, as on this present visit I saw, and will hope again to see, something of the work of rebuilding after nearly six years of war - a work which has continued with increasing speed.

Within the circle of the nations of the British Commonwealth it has always been of marked advantage to hold, from time to time, informal consultations on matters of common interest and concern. I am therefore pleased to have this present opportunity of conferring with Mr, Attlee, Field Marshal Smuts, Mr. Nash and Dr. Evatt, not only on matters arising from the peace settlement, but upon questions relating to the general organization of peace and world security, in which all the nations of the Commonwealth have an important part to play.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SOUTH AFRICAN DELEGATION.

THE existing nationality laws of the various members of the British Commonwealth of Nations uphold the principle that the wife of a British subject is deemed to be a British subject and the wife of an alien, an alien.

In consequence of the Hague Nationality Convention of 1930, the United Kingdom and Canada have imported into their nationality legislation certain exceptions to the above principle. These exceptions are :—

1. That a woman possessing British nationality who marries an alien but does not thereby acquire his nationality (i.e., who would have become stateless under the existing law) retains her British nationality;
2. That a woman, who having married a British subject is liable to become stateless on his acquiring another nationality, retains her British nationality; and
3. That where a certificate of naturalisation is granted to an alien, his wife, if not already a British subject, shall not be deemed to be a British subject unless, within a period of twelve months from the date of the certificate, she makes a declaration that she desires to acquire British nationality.

Forceful representations have been made to the Union Government that the principle of the equality of the sexes in matters of nationality should be recognised by legislation and that the nationality of the wife should not be affected without her consent either by the mere fact of marriage or by any change in the nationality of her husband.

The Union Government are inclined to give favourable consideration to these representations to the extent that they agree with the view that a woman possessing British nationality who marries an alien should retain her British nationality after marriage unless she explicitly declares that she desires to acquire the nationality of her husband and that, similarly, she should retain her British nationality if her husband, being a British subject, subsequently becomes an alien.

The Union Government would welcome the views of the other members of the British Commonwealth on this question.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN.

MEMORANDUM BY THE HOME SECRETARY AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DOMINION AFFAIRS.

1. The Union Delegation in the paper circulated (P.M.M. (46) 28) ask for the views of the other members of the British Commonwealth on two questions —first, whether "a woman possessing British nationality who marries an alien should retain her British nationality after marriage unless she explicitly declares that she desires to acquire the nationality of her husband"; and, secondly, whether "she should retain her British nationality if her husband, being a British subject, subsequently becomes an alien."

2. As regards the second question, the position is that provision has already been made in the laws of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions, other than the Union of South Africa, giving effect to Article 10 of The Hague Convention of 1930, which provided that "naturalisation of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent." The United Kingdom Act of 1933 provides (a) that when a husband ceases to be a British subject the wife may nevertheless retain her British nationality by making a declaration that she desires to do so, and (b) that, when an alien is naturalised as a British subject, his wife does not acquire British nationality unless she makes a declaration of her desire to do so.

3. As regards the question whether a woman possessing British nationality who marries an alien should retain her British nationality after marriage unless she makes some explicit declaration of a desire to renounce it, the laws of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions other than the Union of South Africa already provide for the retention by the woman of her British nationality in a number of cases—i.e., in all those cases where the marriage does not under the laws of the husband's country confer his nationality on the wife.

4. If, however, under the laws of the husband's country the woman acquires his nationality by reason of marriage, she ceases to be a British subject under the laws of the countries of the British Commonwealth; but under the laws of Australia and New Zealand, while she ceases to be a British subject, provision is made that she shall have all the rights and obligations of a British subject within those territories on making a declaration that she desires to retain them. Moreover, the Australian Government have introduced a Bill to provide that a British woman resident in Australia shall on marriage to a foreigner (without the need of any declaration) retain her British nationality under Australian law irrespective of whether she acquires her husband's nationality under the laws of his country. The extra-territorial effect of this outside Australia is not entirely clear.

5. As pointed out in the paper of the Union Delegation, the general principle hitherto has been that the wife of a British subject is deemed to be a British subject and the wife of an alien is deemed to be an alien, and exceptions to this general principle have been made for special reasons only. The abandonment of this general principle in favour of the principle that marriage should not by itself and apart from some action on the part of the woman affect her national status would necessitate consideration of the position not only of British women who marry foreigners but also of foreign women who marry British men.

6. The view generally taken by the advocates of the principle of equality of the sexes in matters of nationality is that the marriage of a British woman to a foreigner should not automatically entail the loss of the woman's British nationality, and that similarly the marriage of an alien woman to a British subject should not automatically entail the acquisition of British nationality by the wife.

7. Consideration of such a change in the nationality law involves the question whether a foreign woman on marriage to a British man should have the right immediately to opt for British nationality, or whether the conferment of British nationality on the wife should be dependent on certain conditions as to residence or other matters. The question would also arise what is to be the nationality of children born outside His Majesty's Dominions to a father who is British and a mother who is an alien, or to a mother who is British and a father who is alien.

8. In any consideration of amendments to the nationality law account must be taken of the situation recently created by the Canadian Citizenship Bill, which proposes a fundamental alteration, so far as Canada is concerned, of the existing system by which the common status of a British subject is maintained throughout the British Commonwealth. Hitherto this common status has rested on the principle that there shall be a common code for the purpose of determining who are British subjects and that substantial amendments of this code are matters for agreement between the self-governing parts of the Commonwealth.

9. The Canadian Bill imparts a new principle of (a) determining in the first instance who are Canadian citizens and (b) providing that every Canadian citizen is a British subject and that persons who are British subjects under the laws of other parts of the Commonwealth will, though not Canadian citizens, be recognised in Canada as British subjects.

10. In view of the far-reaching changes which the Canadian Bill involves, it is necessary to consider whether similar changes should be made in the laws of the other self-governing parts of the Commonwealth, or what other action can be taken to preserve the common status; and at the request of the United Kingdom Government each of the Dominion Governments has agreed that this question shall be examined by a conference of experts which is to be held in the late summer.

11. Any future amendments of the law relating to the nationality of married women may be, to some extent, dependent on any decision which may be reached after the proposed conference of experts as to the general system on which the nationality laws of the self-governing parts of the Commonwealth are to be based in the future. It may, therefore, be found desirable, after there has been an exchange of views at the present meeting, to instruct the experts who will attend the forthcoming conference to study not only the issues raised by the Canadian Bill but also the detailed questions which would be involved if the equality principle were generally accepted by countries of the Commonwealth as the basis of the provisions relating to the nationality of married women.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

Br. Commonwealth Relations - Prime Ministers' Conference, 1946 ✓

If you think well of the suggestion that you should raise the question of the absence of the Irish from this series of consultations between Commonwealth Prime Ministers, it would be worth mentioning the question to Lord Addison in a preliminary way today.

You will recall that, when he took office as Dominions Secretary, he circulated a personal memorandum outlining his hopes for bringing the Irish back into Commonwealth councils as opportunity offered. I thought it was a sensible and helpful note, and that it forecast some invitation to De Valera to take part in such talks as have now been arranged. I have not, however, seen any evidence that the new policy in this direction which the Labour Government laid down has been followed up.

If you decide to refer to the question of Irish participation, it would be advisable to make it clear from the beginning that you were not expecting them to be invited to take part in discussions relating to the settlement of the war, in which they were neutral. Clearly, they have no contribution to make to the discussion of terms of the Italian peace treaty or of policy toward Germany. When other questions of general Commonwealth interest are to be discussed they should, I think, be invited to be represented.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX: MINUTE 3.

(20th May, 1946—3·45 p.m.)

Council of Foreign Ministers: Draft Peace Treaties with Italy and Balkan Countries.

MR. BEVIN gave Dominion Ministers a review of the discussions at the Council of Foreign Ministers regarding the draft Peace Treaties with Italy and the Balkan States. The Council had also given preliminary examination to German questions (a subject on which he would give Dominion Ministers a report on the following day), the question of a Treaty with Austria, the Bulgarian-Greek frontier and Northern Epirus.

Mr. Bevin recalled that at earlier meetings Dominion Ministers had emphasized the importance of the Peace Conference being summoned without further delay. These views had been communicated to him. He himself shared these views. Before, however, he had had any opportunity of taking action on the point, Mr. Byrnes had himself opened the subject in the Council. M. Molotov had refused to agree that the Peace Conference should be held until there had been agreement at the Council of Foreign Ministers on "all fundamental issues." It seemed that he regarded as "fundamental issues" the future of Trieste, the Italian Colonies and Italian reparations, but not the future of the Dodecanese. Mr. Bevin himself had proposed that the Foreign Ministers should do their best to reach agreement among themselves, but should then refer outstanding points, as well as the uncompleted draft Treaties, to the Peace Conference. The Russians, however, would not agree to this. Despite many attempts to find a formula that would meet their wishes, no decision had been reached, and the subject stood adjourned until the Council met again on the 15th June.

Mr. Bevin said that in general more had been accomplished on drafting the five Peace Treaties than had perhaps been apparent. The military clauses of four of the five Treaties had been practically completed. Even on the Italian Colonies and reparations the various points of view had, he thought, been brought somewhat nearer agreement. The general political clauses of the Treaties, including most of the provisions regarding frontiers and the human rights clauses had been settled. The economic clauses, however, were still outstanding.

The two critical points in the Italian Treaty were the future of Trieste and the Italian Colonies. As regards Trieste, each of the four countries represented at the Conference had proposed a boundary line. The line proposed by the Russians would award to Yugoslavia the whole of the Yugoslav claims, leaving about 600,000 Italians in Yugoslavia and no Yugoslavs in Italy. The French line approximated more closely to the ethnic line. The British line awarded a larger area to Italy, including Pola, and in effect left the minimum number of persons under alien rule. The American line differed from the British in leaving to Italy certain economic resources, including the Arsa coal mines, as a result of which more Yugoslavs would be left under Italian rule. After considerable discussion the United Kingdom and United States had been ready to accept the French line, but the Russians had insisted upon their line and the other Powers could not agree to that. The matter had then been referred to the Deputies.

Mr. Bevin recalled that it had been generally agreed in September that the port of Trieste should be internationalised but no progress could be made with this until agreement had been reached about the sovereignty of the city of Trieste. It was possible that, when the Council resumed its activities, the French would propose that the whole of the strip between the French and the Russian lines should be internationalised.

As regards the Italian Colonies, the United States had proposed in September that they should all be placed under collective trusteeship. Faced also with the Soviet demand for trusteeship over Tripolitania, the United Kingdom Government had then thought that the balance of advantage lay in supporting the United States proposal. At the recent meeting, when the United States had shown signs of weakening in their view, Mr. Bevin had proposed that Libya should be given virtually complete independence and that the problems of Eritrea and Italian Somaliland should be examined more closely by commissions. Subsequently, M. Molotov had withdrawn his claims for trusteeship and had supported a proposal originally made by the French that the Italian Colonies should be restored to Italy under United Nations trusteeship. Mr. Bevin had not been able to accept this proposal on account of the pledges given to the Senussi tribes of Cyrenaica. He had, therefore, insisted that, whatever might happen to Tripolitania, Cyrenaica must not be returned to Italy and had suggested that it be placed under United Kingdom trusteeship.

Mr. Byrnes had subsequently proposed that all Italian Colonies should be placed under the trusteeship of the four Powers until their future could be determined, and that, if after a certain period no decision had been reached, they should be handed over to the United Nations Organisation. At this point, the matter had been referred to the Deputies.

Mr. Bevin commented that M. Molotov's withdrawal of the Soviet demand for Tripolitania had, he thought, been prompted by the hope that he would thereby secure a settlement of the Trieste question. Mr. Bevin had not been able to agree to a bargain which would in effect have involved injustice to several hundred thousand Senussi as well as injustice to several hundred thousand Italians.

It had been evident to him that the Russians attached primary importance to the settlement of Trieste and Venezia Giulia. If the area were to be given to the Yugoslavs it would, in effect, become part of the Russian bloc. It would enable her to draw closer the " iron curtain " across Eastern Europe. The question was thus closely related to the draft Treaties with the Balkan satellite States. There was no doubt that Russia was most reluctant to draw back the " iron curtain." For instance, Mr. Bevin had been endeavouring to establish the principle of freedom of navigation on the Danube; and Mr. Byrnes had pressed his plan for an international waterway; but the Russians had been unwilling to agree to either proposal. Again, in the matter of withdrawal of troops the Russians had attempted to go back on a decision made by the Council in September that all Allied forces should be withdrawn from Bulgaria. They had endeavoured to bargain this withdrawal against the withdrawal of British troops from Italy.

The question of withdrawal of troops was in turn bound up with the future of Austria, as the main justification alleged for the retention of troops in the Balkans was that they were on the Russian lines of communication with Austria. An attempt had been made in Paris to discuss a draft Treaty with Austria but the Russians had been unwilling to agree to its being placed on the agenda.

These had been the main points on which difficulty had arisen at Paris. A great many other questions had been discussed and Mr. Bevin made the following report on certain of these :—

(a) The Dodecanese.

The Soviet Delegation had agreed in principle that these islands should be ceded to Greece, but they had made this conditional on agreement on other territorial questions. M. Stalin had informed Mr. Bevin when he had been in Moscow that Russia had no particular interest in the Dodecanese, and M. Molotov had said much the same. Nevertheless, Mr. Bevin could not be certain that some Soviet claim would not be put forward.

(b) Austro-Italian Frontier.

The Council had rejected the Austrian claim to the whole of the province of Bolzano. The Austrian Government had then claimed the area of Brunico which would afford lateral communication between the Austrian provinces of the North and East Tyrol. The Deputies would hear the Austrian and Italian case on this claim before the Council reassembled in June.

(c) Franco-Italian Frontier.

The Council had agreed that three of the four changes of frontier requested by the French might be accepted. The fourth area had been visited by a Commission. There seemed little doubt that, whatever the future sovereignty over the area, arrangements should be made to ensure that Italy was not deprived of the water-power in it. This matter, too, was to be considered by the Deputies and he hoped that a satisfactory settlement would be reached.

(d) Zara, the Dalmatian Islands and Pelagosa.

It had been agreed that these places should be ceded to Yugoslavia. Pelagosa was to be demilitarised.

(e) Italian Fleet.

The Council reached agreement on the size by categories of the future Italian fleet. Discussion was still proceeding on the units to be left to Italy and the allocation of the surplus. The principle outstanding issues were the allocation of the two 15-inch battleships and the French demand that their claim to certain specific units should be recognised in toto. There were good prospects of agreement on this question.

(f) Existing Bi-lateral Treaties.

Mr. Bevin had sought to include in all the Treaties a provision that each Allied and Associated Power should be able to notify the ex-enemy State of the pre-war bi-lateral Treaties which it desired to keep in force. He thought that this provision would preserve the rights of small States and prevent the ex-enemy State from renouncing Treaties essential to international intercourse. M. Molotov had been willing to accept this proposal on condition that it was open to any member of the Council to veto the maintenance in force of any one of these Treaties. No agreement had therefore been reached.

Mr. Bevin said that if Dominion Ministers so desired he could give further information on the details of the Council's discussions. He repeated in conclusion that he was sorry that it had not been possible to agree upon a date for the holding of the Peace Conference.

MR. MACKENZIE KING thanked Mr. Bevin for his interesting review. He appreciated the difficulties which he had encountered in the negotiations. He asked whether Mr. Bevin thought that the date for the Peace Conference would be fixed when the Council met on 15th June.

MR. BEVIN thought that this turned largely on the question whether a solution could then be found for the problem of Trieste. He did not believe that the Russians had the same interest in the Italian Colonies or any other of the points at issue. Once it was agreed that the Conference should be held at all, it could take place within a month.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he had been much impressed, in following the messages from Paris, by Mr. Bevin's argument that Trieste was the "mouth" of Central Europe and had been the natural port of Austria, Yugoslavia and neighbouring countries. This being so, was it right to insist on the area being returned to Italy? What, he asked, would be the Russian reaction to a suggestion of internationalising the port and city of Trieste?

MR. BEVIN said that he personally was in sympathy with the idea but did not wish to raise it himself because Russia would regard it as the first sign of a weakening in his position. If, however, the French proposed it and he saw signs that the Russians might agree to it, he would certainly not reject it himself.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that the tactics of the negotiations must, of course, be Mr. Bevin's concern. The primary interest of the Empire, in his view, was to ensure that Russia renounced all demands which would give her a position across the Empire's lines of communication through the Mediterranean. It would be worth paying some price for that. If in effect Trieste was the only major issue which prevented a general peace settlement with Italy and the Balkan States, might not some compromise be worked out in discussion with the United States and France which would be acceptable to the Russians?

MR. BEVIN said that he saw the strength of this argument. He thought, however, that it would be wisest to keep our own counsel until the French and Italian elections on 2nd June were over.

DR. EVATT said that he fully recognised the difficulties of the present position, many of which were legacies from arrangements which had to be made to win the war. He wished to state again the point of view of the Australian Government on certain matters.

Comparisons might be drawn with the experience of 1919 on two aspects of the settlement. In the first place, President Wilson had been criticised because the Peace Treaty and the provisions for a new international organisation had both been embodied in the same document. This criticism had been avoided on the present occasion by the establishment of the United Nations before the peace settlement; but, owing to the delay in reaching a peace settlement, there was a danger that many contentious questions would be brought before the Security Council. This would cause many critical situations. Secondly, in 1919 all active belligerents had been invited to participate in the making of peace. On this occasion only four Powers had so far taken part in the preparation of the Treaties. This was more than a matter of procedure; it was also a matter of principle. It was plain, moreover, that the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers constituted an effort to reach agreement by a process of bargaining on the substance of the Treaties, and not only on matters of drafting. This posed a dilemma. On the one hand, if the four Powers had already established their inability to agree among themselves, this would reduce the power of a full Conference to secure agreement. If, on the other hand, the four Powers reached agreement, would not the other active belligerents be thus faced with a fait accompli and be expected to refrain from upsetting bargains and compromises? Admittedly, Dominion Governments were fortunate in having the opportunity to consult with the United Kingdom Government on the issues at stake; but other countries had no such opportunity; and it was ironic that defeated Italy should have had an opportunity to state its views before countries who had contributed to victory. Equally, it seemed unjust that France who had taken no part in the war against Italy should be brought into conference at the Council of Foreign Ministers while nations like the four Dominions had no such opportunity. He believe that the wider Conference could bring effective pressure to bear in favour of a just settlement, and he hoped that Mr. Bevin would be able at the next meeting of the Council to obtain a rapid decision as to its date.

Dr. Evatt commented on two aspects of the draft Italian Treaty. As regards the disposal of the Colonies he was very glad that, through Mr. Bevin's insistence, the Soviet Government had withdrawn their claim to trusteeship over Tripolitania—not because it was Russia that made the claim but because the claim was intrinsically unjust. Russia—like France—had contributed little or nothing to the defeat of Italy. The Australian Government, for their part, would have preferred the solution of international trusteeship, but he entirely endorsed the view that it would be intolerable to bargain away the rights of the Italians in Trieste for the rights of Arabs in Libya. As regards Trieste, he recalled that the Australian Government had put forward at the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers a proposal for the internationalisation of the city and port of Trieste, and he was glad that Mr. Bevin was favourably disposed towards this solution.

Dr. Evatt was most anxious that the post-war settlement should not be based on the hypothesis of a struggle between Russia and her satellites on one side and the Western Powers on the other side. He hoped that the settlement generally, and the case of Trieste in particular, would not be influenced by strategic considerations vis-à-vis Russia, but be based on simple considerations of justice.

MR. NASH thanked Mr. Bevin for his review. He appreciated the difficulty of negotiations with Russia, whose actions were unpredictable. While he paid tribute to Mr. Bevin's handling of the difficulties, he wished to make clear that the New Zealand Government had always believed that the best results would be likely to be reached by a wider Conference than the Council of Foreign Ministers, and he regretted that the Peace Conference had not been held on 1st May as planned. He was much disappointed that, contrary to his previous understanding, it appeared that it had still to be decided whether the Peace Conference should be held at all. Moreover, the Conference, when held, would be unsatisfactory if, in effect, any one of the "drafting" countries on the Council of Foreign Ministers could exercise a veto over the Conference's recommendations.

As regards the provisions of the Italian Treaty, the New Zealand Government considered that Trieste should be internationalised and that no Colonies should be returned to Italy. Libya should be placed under international trusteeship by the United Nations—not on any account a four-power Trusteeship. But the New Zealand Government were not opposed to the suggestion that the United Kingdom should be granted trusteeship over Cyrenaica.

MR. BEVIN said that the United Kingdom had on three occasions said that the Treaty should provide for renunciation of the Colonies to the United Nations. It was the United States who had proposed cession to the four Powers. In his view, this would cause great practical difficulties; for instance, the other three Powers might well claim the right to provide occupying forces. He had, therefore, appealed to the United States to modify their proposal by substitution of the United Nations for the four Powers in this context.

As regards Trieste, he emphasised that it was of the greatest importance that no public reference should be made to internationalisation as a possible solution, and he asked that the views expressed on this point should be treated as highly confidential.

Mr. Bevin said that the tactics of the Soviet approach to the German and Japanese settlements might be similar to their approach in the case of the Italian and Balkan Treaties. It would help if the ground could be cleared by prior settlement of outstanding differences not strictly relevant; e.g., by withdrawal of Allied troops from areas other than Germany and Japan. He added that the attitude of other Governments towards the German settlement might be largely determined by considerations relating to the Japanese settlement; it seemed that the United States Government, in particular, might be anxious not to prejudice the procedure for the Japanese Treaty. In discussion regarding the German settlement, he was anxious to avoid the weakness of the procedure laid down in the Potsdam Agreement, and had in mind to propose the summoning of a wider conference of active belligerents before as well as after the stage of drafting the Treaties.

DR. EVATT said that the Japanese settlement was vital to Australia. The Australian Government would be opposed to any proposal that the Council of Foreign Ministers should handle this matter, even in a preliminary way. After a long struggle, and largely as a result of Australian efforts, the Far Eastern Commission had been established. The United States was endeavouring once again to return to four-power procedures in relation to Japan. He agreed with the United Kingdom Government that this could not be accepted. Australia was a primary power in the Pacific and would never consent to be treated on any other basis. The future of Japan was a life and death matter to Australia.

In reply to a request from Mr. Nash, MR. BEVIN outlined the position in regard to the Austrian settlement. There seemed to be three main questions to be considered: first, the disposal of German assets; secondly, the oil resources; thirdly, the designs that the Russians seemed to be entertaining to establish a Slav colony in Eastern Austria. Austria had a special importance as the meeting place of Eastern and Western Europe and the Russians were keeping very large forces there. Since the shock of the Austrian election results, they had reverted to an attempt to dominate the country by direct means and the Renner Government now exercised little effective control. Mr. Bevin thought that the Russians would find it hard to avoid discussing Austria at the next meeting of the Council, when the United States had given notice that they proposed to raise the subject again.

Mr. Mackenzie King.

1. MR. ATTLEE welcomed Mr. Mackenzie King who had arrived in London on the previous day. He was very glad that he had found it possible to join the discussions.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he was sorry he had not been able to take part in the earlier discussions owing to the pressure of his engagements in Canada.

2. LORD ADDISON outlined to the meeting the agenda provisionally arranged for further meetings during the week. The arrangements, which were satisfactory to Dominion Ministers, were subsequently circulated as P.M.M. (A) (46) 10.

Council of Foreign Ministers: Draft Peace Treaties with Italy and Balkan Countries.

3. MR. BEVIN gave Dominion Ministers an account of the proceedings at the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris, and a discussion followed. The proceedings are recorded in a Confidential Record.

At the end of the discussion MR. ATTLEE suggested that it would be well that any statement issued to the press should be limited to the fact that a review of the situation had taken place.

MR. BEVIN indicated that this would be helpful from his point of view.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that it was just as important from his point of view that too much information should not be given to the press. Press cables which had been sent to Canada and the United States after some of the earlier meetings had given rise to false impressions.

It was agreed that officials should consult together as to the terms of the statement to be issued.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX: MINUTE 3.

(20th May, 1946—3·45 p.m.)

Council of Foreign Ministers: Draft Peace Treaties with Italy and Balkan Countries.

MR. BEVIN gave Dominion Ministers a review of the discussions at the Council of Foreign Ministers regarding the draft Peace Treaties with Italy and the Balkan States. The Council had also given preliminary examination to German questions (a subject on which he would give Dominion Ministers a report on the following day), the question of a Treaty with Austria, the Bulgarian-Greek frontier and Northern Epirus.

Mr. Bevin recalled that at earlier meetings Dominion Ministers had emphasized the importance of the Peace Conference being summoned without further delay. These views had been communicated to him. He himself shared these views. Before, however, he had had any opportunity of taking action on the point, Mr. Byrnes had himself opened the subject in the Council. M. Molotov had refused to agree that the Peace Conference should be held until there had been agreement at the Council of Foreign Ministers on "all fundamental issues." It seemed that he regarded as "fundamental issues" the future of Trieste, the Italian Colonies and Italian reparations, but not the future of the Dodecanese. Mr. Bevin himself had proposed that the Foreign Ministers should do their best to reach agreement among themselves, but should then refer outstanding points, as well as the uncompleted draft Treaties, to the Peace Conference. The Russians, however, would not agree to this. Despite many attempts to find a formula that would meet their wishes, no decision had been reached, and the subject stood adjourned until the Council met again on the 15th June.

Mr. Bevin said that in general more had been accomplished on drafting the five Peace Treaties than had perhaps been apparent. The military clauses of four of the five Treaties had been practically completed. Even on the Italian Colonies and reparations the various points of view had, he thought, been brought somewhat nearer agreement. The general political clauses of the Treaties, including most of the provisions regarding frontiers and the human rights clauses had been settled. The economic clauses, however, were still outstanding.

The two critical points in the Italian Treaty were the future of Trieste and the Italian Colonies. As regards Trieste, each of the four countries represented at the Conference had proposed a boundary line. The line proposed by the Russians would award to Yugoslavia the whole of the Yugoslav claims, leaving about 600,000 Italians in Yugoslavia and no Yugoslavs in Italy. The French line approximated more closely to the ethnic line. The British line awarded a larger area to Italy, including Pola, and in effect left the minimum number of persons under alien rule. The American line differed from the British in leaving to Italy certain economic resources, including the Arsa coal mines, as a result of which more Yugoslavs would be left under Italian rule. After considerable discussion the United Kingdom and United States had been ready to accept the French line, but the Russians had insisted upon their line and the other Powers could not agree to that. The matter had then been referred to the Deputies.

Mr. Bevin recalled that it had been generally agreed in September that the port of Trieste should be internationalised but no progress could be made with this until agreement had been reached about the sovereignty of the city of Trieste. It was possible that, when the Council resumed its activities, the French would propose that the whole of the strip between the French and the Russian lines should be internationalised.

As regards the Italian Colonies, the United States had proposed in September that they should all be placed under collective trusteeship. Faced also with the Soviet demand for trusteeship over Tripolitania, the United Kingdom Government had then thought that the balance of advantage lay in supporting the United States proposal. At the recent meeting, when the United States had shown signs of weakening in their view, Mr. Bevin had proposed that Libya should be given virtually complete independence and that the problems of Eritrea and Italian Somaliland should be examined more closely by commissions. Subsequently, M. Molotov had withdrawn his claims for trusteeship and had supported a proposal originally made by the French that the Italian Colonies should be restored to Italy under United Nations trusteeship. Mr. Bevin had not been able to accept this proposal on account of the pledges given to the Senussi tribes of Cyrenaica. He had, therefore, insisted that, whatever might happen to Tripolitania, Cyrenaica must not be returned to Italy and had suggested that it be placed under United Kingdom trusteeship.

Mr. Byrnes had subsequently proposed that all Italian Colonies should be placed under the trusteeship of the four Powers until their future could be determined, and that, if after a certain period no decision had been reached, they should be handed over to the United Nations Organisation. At this point, the matter had been referred to the Deputies.

Mr. Bevin commented that M. Molotov's withdrawal of the Soviet demand for Tripolitania had, he thought, been prompted by the hope that he would thereby secure a settlement of the Trieste question. Mr. Bevin had not been able to agree to a bargain which would in effect have involved injustice to several hundred thousand Senussi as well as injustice to several hundred thousand Italians.

It had been evident to him that the Russians attached primary importance to the settlement of Trieste and Venezia Giulia. If the area were to be given to the Yugoslavs it would, in effect, become part of the Russian bloc. It would enable her to draw closer the " iron curtain " across Eastern Europe. The question was thus closely related to the draft Treaties with the Balkan satellite States. There was no doubt that Russia was most reluctant to draw back the " iron curtain." For instance, Mr. Bevin had been endeavouring to establish the principle of freedom of navigation on the Danube, and Mr. Byrnes had pressed his plan for an international waterway; but the Russians had been unwilling to agree to either proposal. Again, in the matter of withdrawal of troops the Russians had attempted to go back on a decision made by the Council in September that all Allied forces should be withdrawn from Bulgaria. They had endeavoured to bargain this withdrawal against the withdrawal of British troops from Italy.

The question of withdrawal of troops was in turn bound up with the future of Austria, as the main justification alleged for the retention of troops in the Balkans was that they were on the Russian lines of communication with Austria. An attempt had been made in Paris to discuss a draft Treaty with Austria but the Russians had been unwilling to agree to its being placed on the agenda.

These had been the main points on which difficulty had arisen at Paris. A great many other questions had been discussed and Mr. Bevin made the following report on certain of these :—

(a) The Dodecanese.

The Soviet Delegation had agreed in principle that these islands should be ceded to Greece, but they had made this conditional on agreement on other territorial questions. M. Stalin had informed Mr. Bevin when he had been in Moscow that Russia had no particular interest in the Dodecanese, and M. Molotov had said much the same. Nevertheless, Mr. Bevin could not be certain that some Soviet claim would not be put forward.

(b) Austro-Italian Frontier.

The Council had rejected the Austrian claim to the whole of the province of Bolzano. The Austrian Government had then claimed the area of Brunico which would afford lateral communication between the Austrian provinces of the North and East Tyrol. The Deputies would hear the Austrian and Italian case on this claim before the Council reassembled in June.

(c) Franco-Italian Frontier.

The Council had agreed that three of the four changes of frontier requested by the French might be accepted. The fourth area had been visited by a Commission. There seemed little doubt that, whatever the future sovereignty over the area, arrangements should be made to ensure that Italy was not deprived of the water-power in it. This matter, too, was to be considered by the Deputies and he hoped that a satisfactory settlement would be reached.

(d) Zara, the Dalmatian Islands and Pelagosa.

It had been agreed that these places should be ceded to Yugoslavia. Pelagosa was to be demilitarised.

(e) Italian Fleet.

The Council reached agreement on the size by categories of the future Italian fleet. Discussion was still proceeding on the units to be left to Italy and the allocation of the surplus. The principle outstanding issues were the allocation of the two 15-inch battleships and the French demand that their claim to certain specific units should be recognised in toto. Mr. Bevin said that the tactics of the Soviet approach to the German and Japanese settlements might be similar to their approach in the case of the Italian and Balkan Treaties. It would help if the ground could be cleared by prior settlement of outstanding differences not strictly relevant; e.g., by withdrawal of Allied troops from areas other than Germany and Japan. He added that the attitude of other Governments towards the German settlement might be largely determined by considerations relating to the Japanese settlement; it seemed that the United States Government, in particular, might be anxious not to prejudice the procedure for the Japanese Treaty. In discussion regarding the German settlement, he was anxious to avoid the weakness of the procedure laid down in the Potsdam Agreement, and had in mind to propose the summoning of a wider conference of active belligerents before as well as after the stage of drafting the Treaties.

DR. EVATT said that the Japanese settlement was vital to Australia. The Australian Government would be opposed to any proposal that the Council of Foreign Ministers should handle this matter, even in a preliminary way. After a long struggle, and largely as a result of Australian efforts, the Far Eastern Commission had been established. The United States was endeavouring once again to return to four-power procedures in relation to Japan. He agreed with the United Kingdom Government that this could not be accepted. Australia was a primary power in the Pacific and would never consent to be treated on any other basis. The future of Japan was a life and death matter to Australia.

In reply to a request from Mr. Nash, MR. BEVIN outlined the position in regard to the Austrian settlement. There seemed to be three main questions to be considered: first, the disposal of German assets; secondly, the oil resources; thirdly, the designs that the Russians seemed to be entertaining to establish a Slav colony in Eastern Austria. Austria had a special importance as the meeting place of Eastern and Western Europe and the Russians were keeping very large forces there. Since the shock of the Austrian election results, they had reverted to an attempt to dominate the country by direct means and the Renner Government now exercised little effective control. Mr. Bevin thought that the Russians would find it hard to avoid discussing Austria at the next meeting of the Council, when the United States had given notice that they proposed to raise the subject again.

MR. MACKENZIE KING

1. MR. ATTLEE welcomed Mr. Mackenzie King who had arrived in London on the previous day. He was very glad that he had found it possible to join the discussions.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he was sorry he had not been able to take part in the earlier discussions owing to the pressure of his engagements in Canada.

PROVISIONAL AGENDA FOR SUBSEQUENT DISCUSSIONS

2. LORD ADDISON outlined to the meeting the agenda provisionally arranged for further meetings during the week. The arrangements, which were satisfactory to Dominion Ministers, were subsequently circulated as P.M.M.(A)(46) 10.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS: DRAFT PEACE TREATIES WITH ITALY AND BALKAN COUNTRIES

3. MR. BEVIN gave Dominion Ministers an account of the proceedings at the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris, and a discussion followed. The proceedings are recorded in a Confidential Record.

At the end of the discussion MR. ATTLEE suggested that it would be well that any statement issued to the press should be limited to the fact that a review of the situation had taken place.

MR. BEVIN indicated that this would be helpful from his point of view.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that it was just as important from his point of view that too much information should not be given to the press. Press cables which had been sent to Canada and the United States after some of the earlier meetings had given rise to false impressions.

It was agreed that officials should consult together as to the terms of the statement to be issued.

Confidential Annex

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS: DRAFT PEACE TREATIES WITH ITALY AND BALKAN COUNTRIES

MR. BEVIN gave Dominion Ministers a review of the discussions at the Council of Foreign Ministers regarding the draft Peace Treaties with Italy and the Balkan States. The Council had also given preliminary examination to German questions (a subject on which he would give Dominion Ministers a report on the following day), the question of a treaty with Austria, the Bulgarian-Greek frontier and Northern Epirus.

Mr. Bevin recalled that at earlier meetings Dominion Ministers had emphasized the importance of the Peace Conference being summoned without further delay. These views had been communicated to him. He himself shared these views. Before, however, he had had any opportunity of taking action on the point, Mr. Byrnes had himself opened the subject in the Council. M. Molotov had refused to agree that the Peace Conference should be held until there had been agreement at the Council of Foreign Ministers on "all fundamental issues". It seemed that he regarded as "fundamental issues" the future of Trieste, the Italian Colonies and Italian reparations, but not the future of the Dodecanese. Mr. Bevin himself had proposed that the Foreign Ministers should do their best to reach agreement among themselves but should then refer outstanding points, as well as the uncompleted draft Treaties, to the Peace Conference. The Russians, however, would not agree to this. Despite many attempts to find a formula that would meet their wishes no decision had been reached, and the subject stood adjourned until the Council met again on 15th June.

Mr. Bevin said that in general more had been accomplished on drafting the five Peace Treaties than had perhaps been apparent. The military clauses of four of the five Treaties had been practically completed. Even on the Italian Colonies and reparations the various points of view had, he thought, been brought somewhat nearer agreement. The general political clauses of the Treaties, including most of the provisions regarding frontiers and the human rights clauses had been settled. The economic clauses, however, were still outstanding.

The two critical points in the Italian Treaty were the future of Trieste and the Italian Colonies. As regards Trieste, each of the four countries represented at the Conference had proposed a boundary line. The line proposed by the Russians would award to Yugoslavia the whole of the Yugoslav claims, leaving about 600,000 Italians in Yugoslavia and no Yugoslavs in Italy. The French line approximated more closely to the ethnic line. The British line awarded a larger area to Italy, including Pola, and in effect left the minimum number of persons under alien rule. The American line differed from the British in leaving to Italy certain economic resources, including the Arsa coal mines, as a result of which more Yugoslavs would be left under the Italian rule. After considerable discussion the United Kingdom and United States had been ready to accept the French line, but the Russians had insisted upon their line and the other Powers could not agree to that. The matter had then been referred to the Deputies.

Mr. Bevin recalled that it had been generally agreed in September that the port of Trieste should be internationalised but no progress could be made with this until agreement had been reached about the sovereignty of the city of Trieste. It was possible that, when the Council resumed its activities, the French would propose that the whole of the strip between the French and the Russian lines should be internationalised.

As regards the Italian Colonies, the United States had proposed in September that they should all be placed under collective trusteeship. Faced also with the Soviet demand for trusteeship over Tripolitania, the United Kingdom Government had then thought that the balance of advantage lay in supporting the United States proposal. At the recent meeting, when the United States had shown signs of weakening in their view, Mr. Bevin had proposed that Libya should be given virtually complete independence and that the problems of Eritrea and Italian Somaliland should be examined more closely by commissions. Subsequently M. Molotov had withdrawn his claims for trusteeship and had supported a proposal originally made by the French that the Italian Colonies should be restored to Italy under United Nations trusteeship. Mr. Bevin had not been able to accept this proposal on account of the pledges given to the Senussi tribes of Cyrenaica. He had, therefore, insisted that, whatever might happen to Tripolitania, Cyrenaica must not be returned to Italy and had suggested that it be placed under United Kingdom trusteeship.

Mr. Byrnes had subsequently proposed that all Italian Colonies should be placed under the trusteeship of the four Powers until their future could be determined, and that, if after a certain period no decision had been reached, they should be handed over to the United Nations Organisation. At this point, the matter had been referred to the Deputies.

Mr. Bevin commented that M. Molotov's withdrawal of the Soviet demand for Tripolitania had, he thought, been prompted by the hope that he would thereby secure a settlement of the Trieste question. Mr. Bevin had not been able to agree to a bargain which would in effect have involved injustice to several hundred thousand Senussi as well as injustice to several hundred thousand Italians.

It had been evident to him that the Russians attached primary importance to the settlement of Trieste and Venezia Giulia. If the area were to be given to the Yugoslavs it would, in effect, become part of the Russian bloc. It would enable her to draw closer the "iron curtain" across Eastern Europe. The question was thus closely related to the draft treaties with the Balkan satellite states. There was no doubt that Russia was most reluctant to draw back the "iron curtain". For instance, Mr. Bevin had been endeavouring to establish the principle of freedom of navigation on the Danube, and Mr. Byrnes had pressed his plan for an international waterway; but the Russians had been unwilling to agree to either proposal. Again, in the matter of withdrawal of troops the Russians had attempted to go back on a decision made by the Council in September that all Allied forces should be withdrawn from Bulgaria. They had endeavoured to bargain this withdrawal against the withdrawal of British troops from Italy.

The question of withdrawal of troops was in turn bound up with the future of Austria, as the main justification alleged for the retention of troops in the Balkans was that they were on the Russian lines of communication with Austria. An attempt had been made in Paris to discuss a draft Treaty with Austria but the Russians had been unwilling to agree to its being placed on the agenda.

These had been the main points on which difficulty had arisen at Paris. A great many other questions had been discussed and Mr. Bevin made the following report on certain of these:-

(a) The Dodecanese

The Soviet Delegation had agreed in principle that these islands should be ceded to Greece but they had made this conditional on agreement on other territorial questions. M. Stalin had informed Mr. Bevin when he had been in Moscow that Russia had no particular interest in the Dodecanese and M. Molotov had said much the same. Nevertheless, Mr. Bevin could not be certain that some Soviet claim would not be put forward.

(b) Austro-Italian Frontier

The Council had rejected the Austrian claim to the whole of the province of Bolzano. The Austrian Government had then claimed the area of Brunico which would afford lateral communication between the Austrian provinces of the North and East Tyrol. The Deputies would hear the Austrian and Italian case on this claim before the Council reassembled in June.

(c) Franco-Italian Frontier

The Council had agreed that three of the four changes of frontier requested by the French might be accepted. The fourth area had been visited by a Commission. There seemed little doubt that, whatever the future sovereignty over the area, arrangements should be made to ensure that Italy was not deprived of the water-power in it. This matter, too, was to be considered by the Deputies and he hoped that a satisfactory settlement would be reached.

(d) Zara, the Dalmatian Islands and Pelagosa

It had been agreed that these places should be ceded to Yugoslavia. Pelagosa was to be demilitarised.

(e) Italian Fleet

The Council reached agreement on the size by categories of the future Italian fleet. Discussion was still proceeding on the units to be left to Italy and the allocation of the surplus. The principle outstanding issues were the allocation of the two 15" battleships and the French demand that their claim to certain specific units should be recognised in toto. There were good prospects of agreement on this question.

(f) Existing Bi-lateral Treaties

Mr. Bevin had sought to include in all the Treaties a provision that each Allied and Associated Power should be able to notify the ex-enemy state of the pre-war bi-lateral Treaties which it desired to keep in force. He thought that this provision would preserve the rights of small states and prevent the ex-enemy state from renouncing Treaties essential to international intercourse. M. Molotov had been willing to accept this proposal on condition that it was open to any member of the Council to veto the maintenance in force of any one of these Treaties. No agreement had therefore been reached.

Mr. Bevin said that if Dominion Ministers so desired he could give further information on the details of the Council's discussions. He repeated in conclusion that he was sorry that it had not been possible to agree upon a date for the holding of the Peace Conference.

MR. MACKENZIE KING thanked Mr. Bevin for his interesting review. He appreciated the difficulties which he had encountered in the negotiations. He asked whether Mr. Bevin thought that the date for the Peace Conference would be fixed when the Council met on 15th June.

MR. BEVIN thought that this turned largely on the question whether a solution could then be found for the problem of Trieste. He did not believe that the Russians had the same interest in the Italian Colonies or any other of the points at issue. Once it was agreed that the Conference should be held at all, it could take place within a month.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he had been much impressed, in following the messages from Paris, by Mr. Bevin's argument that Trieste was the "mouth" of Central Europe and had been the natural port of Austria, Yugoslavia and neighbouring countries. This being so, was it right to insist on the area being returned to Italy? What, he asked, would be the Russian reaction to a suggestion of internationalising the port and city of Trieste?

MR. BEVIN said that he personally was in sympathy with the idea but did not wish to raise it himself because Russia would regard it as the first sign of a weakening in his position. If, however, the French proposed it and he saw signs that the Russians might agree to it, he would certainly not reject it himself.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that the tactics of the negotiations must, of course, be Mr. Bevin's concern. The primary interest of the Empire, in his view, was to ensure that Russia renounced all demands which would give her a position across the Empire lines of communication through the Mediterranean. It would be worth paying some price for that. If in effect Trieste was the only major issue which prevented a general peace settlement with Italy and the Balkan States, might not some compromise be worked out in discussion with the United States and France which would be acceptable to the Russians?

MR. BEVIN said that he saw the strength of this argument. He thought, however, that it would be wisest to keep our own counsel until the French and Italian elections on the 2nd June were over.

DR. EVATT said that he fully recognised the difficulties of the present position, many of which were legacies from arrangements which had to be made to win the war. He wished to state again the point of view of the Australian Government on certain matters.

Comparisons might be drawn with the experience of 1919 on two aspects of the settlement. In the first place, President Wilson had been criticised because the Peace Treaty and the provisions for a new international organisation had both been embodied in the same document. This criticism had been avoided on the present occasion by the establishment of the United Nations before the peace settlement; but, owing to the delay in reaching a peace settlement, the main result seemed to be that many contentious questions were brought before the Security Council which placed a great strain on the new machinery. Secondly, in 1919 all active belligerents had been invited to participate in the making of peace. On this occasion, only four Powers had so far taken part in the preparation of the Treaties. This was more than a matter of procedure; it was also a matter of principle. It was plain, moreover, that the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers constituted an effort to reach agreement on the substance of the Treaties, and not only on matters of drafting. This posed a dilemma. On the one hand, if the four Powers had already established their inability to agree among themselves, this would reduce their power to secure agreement. If, on the other hand, the four Powers reached agreement, would not the other active belligerents be thus faced with a fait accompli? Admittedly, Dominion Governments were fortunate in having the opportunity to consult with the United Kingdom Government on the issues at stake; but other countries had no such opportunity; and it was ironic that defeated Italy should have had an opportunity to state its views before countries who had contributed to victory. Equally it seemed unjust that France who had taken no part in the war against Italy should obtain any booty from Italy while nations who had played a prominent part in the fighting might get none. He believed that the wider Conference could bring effective pressure to bear in favour of an early settlement and he hoped that Mr. Bevin would be able at the next meeting of the Council to obtain a rapid decision as to its date.

Dr. Evatt commented on two aspects of the draft Italian Treaty. As regards the disposal of the Colonies he was very glad that, through Mr. Bevin's insistence, the Soviet Government had withdrawn their claim to trusteeship over Tripolitania - not because it was Russia that made the claim but because the claim was intrinsically unjust. Russia - like France - had contributed little or nothing to the defeat of Italy. The Australian Government, for their part, would have preferred the solution of international trusteeship, but he entirely endorsed the view that it would be intolerable to bargain away the rights of the Italians in Trieste for the rights of Arabs in Libya. As regards Trieste, he recalled that the Australian Government had put forward at the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers a proposal for the internationalisation of the city and port of Trieste, and he was glad that Mr. Bevin was favourably disposed towards this solution.

Dr. Evatt was most anxious that the post-war settlement should not be based on the hypothesis of a struggle between Russia and her satellites on one side and the Western Powers on the other side. He hoped that the settlement generally, and the case of Trieste in particular, would not be influenced by strategic considerations vis-a-vis Russia, but be based on simple considerations of justice.

MR. NASH thanked Mr. Bevin for his review. He appreciated the difficulty of negotiations with Russia, whose actions were unpredictable. While he paid tribute to Mr. Bevin's handling of the difficulties, he wished to make clear that the New Zealand Government had always believed that the best results would be likely to be reached by a wider Conference than the Council of Foreign Ministers, and he regretted that the Peace Conference had not been held on 1st May as planned. He was much disappointed that, contrary to his previous understanding, it appeared that it had still to be decided whether the Peace Conference should be held at all. Moreover, the Conference, when held, would be unsatisfactory if, in effect, any one of the "drafting" countries on the Council of Foreign Ministers could exercise a veto over the Conference's recommendations.

As regards the provisions of the Italian Treaty, the New Zealand Government considered that Trieste should be internationalised and that no Colonies should be returned to Italy. Libya should be placed under international trusteeship by the United Nations - not on any account a four-Power Trusteeship. But the New Zealand Government were not opposed to the suggestion that the United Kingdom should be granted trusteeship over Cyrenaica.

MR. BEVIN said that the United Kingdom had on three occasions that the Treaty should provide for renunciation of the Colonies to the United Nations. It was the United States who had proposed cession to the four Powers. In his view, this would cause great practical difficulties; for instance, the other three Powers might well claim the right to provide occupying forces. He had, therefore, appealed to the United States to modify their proposal by substitution of the United Nations for the four Powers in this context.

As regards Trieste, he emphasised that it was of the greatest importance that no public reference should be made to internationalisation as a possible solution and he asked that the views expressed on this point should be treated as highly confidential.

Mr. Bevin said that the tactics of the Soviet approach to the German and Japanese settlements might be similar to their approach in the case of the Italian and Balkan Treaties. It would help if the ground could be cleared by prior settlement of outstanding differences not strictly relevant; e.g. by withdrawal of Allied troops from areas other than Germany and Japan. He added that the attitude of other Governments towards the German settlement might be largely determined by considerations relating to the Japanese settlement; it seemed that the United States Government, in particular, might be anxious not to prejudice the procedure for the Japanese Treaty. In discussion regarding the German settlement, he was anxious to avoid the weakness of the procedure laid down in the Potsdam Agreement, and had in mind to propose the summoning of a wider conference of active belligerents before as well as after the stage of drafting the Treaties.

DR. EVATT said that the Japanese settlement was vital to Australia. The Australian Government would be opposed to any proposal that the Council of Foreign Ministers should handle this matter, even in a preliminary way.

In reply to a request from Mr. Nash, MR. BEVIN outlined the position in regard to the Austrian settlement. There seemed to be three main questions to be considered; first, the disposal of German assets; secondly, the oil resources; thirdly, the designs that the Russians seemed to be entertaining to establish a Slav colony in Eastern Austria. Austria had a special importance as the meeting place of Eastern and Western Europe and the Russians were keeping very large forces there. MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

PROVISIONAL TIMETABLE ON RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS

Note by the Secretaries

Since the provisional timetable, as revised, (P.M.M.(A)(46) 8) was circulated, a request has been received from the Australian Delegation that, if possible, the consultations should be concluded next week. In these circumstances, the provisional timetable has been revised, as below. It will be seen that it has been suggested that meetings should be held twice a day on Tuesday, 21st May and Wednesday, 22nd May, if required. As Mr. Attlee has to be in Scotland on Friday, 24th May, and Saturday, 25th May under a longstanding engagement, it will not be practicable to hold meetings on these days.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR INTER-GOVERNMENTAL DISCUSSIONS ON COMMERCIAL POLICY.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DOMINION AFFAIRS.

1. It will be remembered that, when the United States Government published their "Proposals for Consideration by an International Conference on Trade and Employment" (Cmd. 6709), the Government of the United Kingdom stated that it "is in full agreement on all important points in these proposals and accepts them as a basis for international discussion . . . ." At the same time the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom stated that the United Kingdom and the United States intended, well in advance of the Conference, to carry on between themselves and other countries, including, of course, British Commonwealth countries, preliminary negotiations upon the subjects dealt with in the United States document. This was a reference to the intention of the United States Government to convene the so-called Meeting of Drafting Countries consisting of 15 principal trading nations.

2. Owing to the prolongation of the debate on the Loan in the United States Congress and to the impending congressional elections in November, the United States Government have found it necessary to postpone until March 1947 the Meeting of Drafting Countries.

3. It was always the intention of the United States Government to invite the United Nations Organisation to summon the full International Conference to take place after the Meeting of Drafting Countries. A proposal to this effect was considered by the Economic and Social Council, who, on the 5th March, adopted a resolution (a) deciding to call the full International Conference, (b) constituting a Preparatory Committee to elaborate an annotated draft agenda, and (c) suggesting as a basis for the Preparatory Committee's discussions a number of subjects which follow closely the headings in Cmd. 6709.

4. Thus the international discussions will fall into three stages :—

(1) A meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council (consisting of the 15 Drafting Countries plus 3 others) to elaborate an annotated draft agenda for the eventual United Nations Conference.

(2) The Meeting of Drafting Countries to be convened by the United States Government to negotiate on the basis of Cmd. 6709, including detailed negotiations on tariffs and preferences.

(3) The full international conference to be called by the United Nations.

5. The United States Government, more especially in view of the postponement of the Meeting of Drafting Countries, recently put forward suggestions regarding the time-table for the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council. The principal features of these suggestions were (a) that the Committee should meet in New York on the 1st July to begin the work assigned to it by the Council and to discuss the United States Proposals on a general exploratory basis without aiming at definite agreement and without any detailed tariff bargaining, and (b) that a drafting sub-committee should then draft detailed proposals in the light of the views expressed.

6. These suggestions and the United Kingdom counter-suggestions have been considered by the Governments of the Dominions and India. They concurred in the lines of the reply which the United Kingdom Government proposed to make to the United States Government.

7. The United Kingdom Government accordingly informed the United States Government of their counter-proposals, which may be summarised as follows :—

(1) On the assumption that Congress will have acted in time on the Loan, a meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council should be held in Europe in October 1946 for purely educative purposes on non-tariff aspects of the negotiations.
(2) There should be no attempt to set up a drafting sub-committee.

Our views have now been accepted by the United States Government, who suggest that the Preparatory Committee should meet in London or Geneva on the 15th October.

8. Accordingly the time-table for international discussions is now as follows :—

15th October, 1946.—Meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council in Europe.

March 1947.—Meeting of Drafting Countries to be convened by United States. No announcement is to be made for the present that the meeting is to be postponed till this date.

No date yet fixed.—Full International Conference on Trade and Employment to be called by United Nations.

9. There is general agreement among British Commonwealth Governments that the meeting of Drafting Countries (which would cover detailed bargaining on tariffs and preferences as well as on non-tariff matters) should be preceded by British Commonwealth discussions, which would presumably take place in January 1947.

10. There remains the question whether there should also be preliminary British Commonwealth discussions in advance of the meeting of the Preparatory Committee which it is now proposed to hold on the 15th October. The United Kingdom Government suggested to the Governments of the Dominions and India that such preliminary discussions should be held on the 1st July to consider the subjects which will come up at the meeting of the Preparatory Committee, i.e., matters other than detailed tariff negotiations. It was thought that there might be a general desire to have a preliminary exchange of views between members of the Commonwealth on such questions as the use of import quotas, subsidies, State trading, cartels, full employment and other topics before entering into even non-committal discussions with foreign Governments. This view was questioned by the Governments of Canada and the Union of South Africa. It also appears that the date suggested, the 1st July, would be inconvenient to the Governments of Canada, South Africa and India. The views of the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia as to the date have not yet been received The Government of New Zealand supported the United Kingdom suggestion.

11. Accordingly it is for consideration whether the suggestion of a preliminary British Commonwealth meeting on non-tariff questions on the 1st July should be pursued or whether some alternative arrangements for consultation before the 15th October should be adopted.

12. The telegrams exchanged with the Dominion Governments on this question are being circulated separately (P.M.M. (46) 33).

TIME-TABLE OF COMMONWEALTH AND INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES ON COMMERCIAL POLICY

Reference Document P.M.M.(46) 29.

The main features of the time-table set forth in this paper are acceptable to the Canadian Government. The postponement of negotiations between the so-called drafting countries until March, 1947, is disappointing but, in the circumstances, unavoidable. I feel that the longer these negotiations are deferred the more difficult may be the task of getting tariffs reduced and trade restrictions removed. The Canadian Government has promised its full support to the initiative which the United States and United Kingdom Governments have taken in this field, and attaches great importance to it. It is not necessary to emphasize again the importance, both from a political and economic point of view, of pressing forward successfully the objectives set forth in the American proposals. We none of us can afford to fail to maintain high levels of employment, and we can only combine this objective with high real incomes for our peoples if we base our national policies on a programme of full international economic collaboration. I may say, in parenthesis, that we were very glad to learn from M. Blum, some weeks ago, that the Government of France will associate itself fully and unreservedly with the general programme that the United States and United Kingdom Governments have sponsored.

As regards the details of the time-table mentioned in the

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

UNITED KINGDOM DEFENCE OBLIGATIONS.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DOMINION AFFAIRS.

THE present military commitments of the United Kingdom may be briefly summarised as follows :—

(i) The provision of occupational forces in Germany, Austria, Japan, Venezia Giulia and ex-Italian colonies.
(ii) The provision of forces to provide military backing to our foreign policy in respect of Greece and Italy.
(iii) The maintenance of law and order in British territories such as India, Palestine, Malaya and certain British territories in South-East Asia.
(iv) The fulfilment of United Nations military commitments in the Netherlands East Indies.
(v) The maintenance of strategic reserves at home and overseas.
(vi) The provision of forces for the protection of our bases overseas and of our world-wide lines of communication.
(vii) The provision of forces in the United Kingdom and for the training and administration of our forces throughout the world.

2. Any forces which it may be agreed to provide for the United Nations Organisation would probably be additional to those required for peace-time commitments which are a purely British concern.

3. If the United Kingdom is to be in a position to conduct an effective foreign policy, the military commitments enumerated above must be met in full. The bargaining position of the United Kingdom vis-à-vis other countries is dependent upon adequate military backing, and any failure or apparent lack of determination to meet our commitments will not only encourage our potential adversaries, but will also discourage our friends. Ample proof of this was provided in the period between the two wars, when there grew up abroad the impression that the British people had lost both the will and self-discipline to protect themselves and to enforce their will in world affairs.

4. Assuming that there will be an improvement in the political situation during coming months which will permit the liquidation of certain commitments in Southern Europe, the Chiefs of Staff have, after effecting all possible economies, made the following forecast of the manpower requirements of the three Services during 1947. It is emphasised that these forecasts make no provision for additional undertakings which may arise, for example, the extra forces which may be required in the event of widescale disorders in the Middle East following the endorsement of the Anglo-American Commission's Report on Palestine :—

Royal Navy	194,000	182,000
Army	695,000	590,000
Royal Air Force	305,000	305,000

5. To meet our military requirements during the next five years there is no alternative but to retain compulsory military service.

6. The United Kingdom Government propose to make a public statement to the effect that as from the 1st January, 1947, new entrants to the armed forces will be called up for a period of service of two years, this period being progressively reduced to 18 months.

7. In order to maintain the forces during the critical year 1947, it has also been necessary to adopt other severe measures :—

(i) Men called up before the 1st January, 1947, will continue to be released according to age and length of service. This means that at the end of 1947 there will be in the forces some men with as much as 4½ years' service.

(ii) During the year 1947 apprentices will be called up at the age of 18 without deferment, except to the extent that on further examination some relaxation of this provision is found possible.

8. The measures outlined above will have a serious effect on industry; and this at a time when our livelihood is dependent upon our capacity to increase our export trade by 75 per cent. over pre-war figures. On the assumption that the optimistic estimates of the numbers who will volunteer for the Services are achieved, even these measures will fail to meet the requirements of the Services, it being estimated that there will be a deficiency at the end of 1947 in the Army of approximately 76,000 and in the Royal Air Force of 7,000. Moreover, owing to the vast and complex training problem which demobilisation imposes on the highly technical organisation of the Royal Air Force, this Service will lose a great deal of its effectiveness during the next two or three years, and the efficiency of the Navy and the Army will also be seriously reduced.

Financial Commitments.

9. Our total military expenditure in 1946 is over £1,200,000,000; this figure includes overseas military expenditure shown below, but does not take account of heavy charges arising from the termination of the war, amounting to an additional £576,000,000. The following approximate estimates of certain items of overseas expenditure in 1946 indicate the strain which overseas commitments impose on our balance of payments :—

Overseas military expenditure, 1946	250,000,000
U.N.R.R.A., 1946	80,000,000
Expenditure in foreign exchange for Germany, 1946 (excluding military expenditure) ...	50,000,000
Greece and Polish Refugees in 1946	20,000,000
Relief and Rehabilitation in Far East in 1946	30,000,000
Colonies, 1946	15,000,000

It is too early to give comparable figures for 1947, but expenditure on a number of the above items is recurrent.

10. From the foregoing review it may be seen that the United Kingdom is bearing a burden of unprecedented magnitude in the field of defence. Nevertheless, it is a burden which cannot be laid down or set aside without serious repercussions in international relations. How long the United Kingdom resources of money, man-power and materials will stand the strain of this burden is a question which is causing His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom the gravest anxiety.

Points for discussion

A. Defence obligations See PMM (46) 31, 32, attached

Present military and financial commitments of United Kingdom Government

(discussed by Commonwealth Ministers at meeting on May 22, 1946).

1. Armed forces. Strength during 1947 beginning 1,194,000
   end 1,077,000

2. Announcement shortly to be made continuing compulsory military service for two years (probably required for five years and for first time in Britain's history in peace-time).

3. Total military expenditure current year £1,200,000,000
   plus additional charges, end of war (largely non-recurring) £ 576,000,000

   Of the overall figure (£1,200,000,000) expected expenditures overseas £ 250,000,000

   Other compulsory expenditures overseas (developmental and continuation of pre-1939 projects) £ 195,000,000

B. Comments on this situation by U.K. Ministers

Mr. Bevin:

1) Cost of overseas commitments by U.K. had formerly been met by income from foreign investments.

2) In changed circumstances, only by increased exports of manufactured goods could overseas expenditures be met.

3) This in turn implied serious strain on man-power (500,000 a year additional for export industries alone).

4) Also involved would be repayments under U.S. Loan.

CANADA

5) In these circumstances could some relief of the defence burden be achieved, as to

(a) man-power
(b) finance.

6) Mr. Bevin did not suggest either

(a) contribution to a common pool, nor
(b) any modification of present freedom of action within the Commonwealth.

But could there be a redirection of responsibilities so that each member assumed special obligations in respect of that part of the world in which it was chiefly interested.

- no return to 1939, when there had been no really co-ordinated plan of action in a common war effort.

- it would be a great re-assurance to know that each Commonwealth country had a certain force which could be speedily mobilised and concentrated in a particular area.

C. Comment by Commonwealth Ministers

1) Mr. Mackenzie King

(a) no commitments but would make contents of memorandum (P.M.M.(46) 41 known to his colleagues for careful study;

(b) Canada's own commitments were already much greater than before 1939, and the U.K. was not alone in having liabilities;

(c) Military commitments of Canada to United Nations not yet known;

(d) Could U.S. be asked to assume greater security obligations in Europe?

MG 26 J 4, Volume 324, pages C223301-C224270

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

2) Dr. Evatt

(a) Australia already committed to accept a permanent obligation heavier than any before 1939;

(b) the old method of direct contribution would be out of harmony with temper in the Dominions;

(c) Suggested a "regionalisation" of defence in particular areas (as was developing in the Pacific); decentralization of control required improved methods of military liaison.

3) Mr. Nash

(a) New Zealand commitments outside defence altogether included army occupation (Japan)
UNRRA

(b) New Zealand was willing to undertake certain responsibilities in Pacific, but this would still leave U.K. responsible for lines of communication.

4) Field Marshal Smuts

(a) Members of British Commonwealth had undertaken undefined obligations to United Nations, but they had at least as great an obligation to the British group of nations.

(b) The burden on one member of the group was well-nigh intolerable; it was unfair to make the British Isles pay for the peace at the rate now indicated.

(c) The objective of every member of the Commonwealth must be the support of "one group of nations as a great power."

D. Comment by Mr. Mackenzie King on F/M Smuts' remarks:

1) Question whether it would not be best to have a Commonwealth defence policy with allocation of specific liabilities was a recurrent one;

suggestions on this subject had been made as early as 1923 and again in 1926;

opposition from Dominions arose from political considerations which no government among them could overlook, even if there were military and financial advantages in such a Commonwealth system as was suggested.

2) The surest way to win the support of the Commonwealth Governments was to trust them to accept the obligations which they believed to be natural and right;

experience of the war had proved this point; a highly-centralized policy might have had a very different response from the Dominions;

if ever liberty were at stake, they could be trusted to respond wholeheartedly.

3) He believed in the closest co-ordination and closest understanding which would be achieved; but he was not in favour of reversing the tendencies of the last 20 years.

TIME-TABLE OF BRITISH COMMONWEALTH AND INTERNATIONAL DISCUSSIONS ON COMMERCIAL POLICY.

NOTE BY THE SECRETARIES.

WE circulate herewith the text of recent correspondence between British Commonwealth Governments on the above subject.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK.
J. E. STEPHENSON.

Cabinet Office, S.W. 1,

ANNEX.

(1)

Cypher telegram of the 9th May, 1946, from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs to the Minister of External Affairs, Wellington and Capetown, Ottawa, Canberra.

MY telegram G. No. 29. Commercial Policy.

We have now received United States recommendations as to revised programme for international discussions. These recommendations are designed to deal with difficulties arising from delays in passage of United States loan. United States Administration consider it inexpedient until loan is through to give 90 days' notice required by their legislation of intention to enter into tariff negotiations. On the other hand, tell us in strict confidence that they do not wish to give such notice shortly before their elections in November. Notice therefore cannot be given until middle of November which means tariff negotiations cannot start until about March 1947. United States Government therefore suggest following time-table :—

(a) 1st July to 15th August.—Meeting of Preparatory Committee of Economic and Social Council in New York to begin work assigned to it by the Council and to discuss United States proposals on general exploratory basis without necessarily aiming at definite agreement and without any detailed tariff bargaining.

(b) 15th August to 15th October.—Meeting of drafting sub-committee also in New York of five or six members of Preparatory Committee to draw up detailed Charter for International Trade Organisation in light of views expressed during (a).

(c) March 1947.—Second meeting of Preparatory Committee to coincide with meeting of original "drafting countries" and to consider draft Charter simultaneously with tariff negotiations.

C224092

2. We see following disadvantages in this programme :—

(a) It has always been a cardinal point of tactics with us not to be drawn into anything like commitments on non-tariff questions ahead of detailed negotiations on tariffs. We hold the view that it is of great advantage to us and we assume to Dominions also, that negotiations on Charter of I.T.O. and non-tariff questions should proceed simultaneously with tariff negotiations.

(b) We therefore see strong objections to proposal to set up drafting committee of Preparatory Committee of Economic and Social Council, and consider that Governments would have to make repeated reservations in connexion with drafting of Charter until they knew to what extent tariffs were likely to be reduced.

(c) We doubt whether we or other countries could spare man-power for long period involved in latest United States programme.

(d) We are not prepared to enter into negotiations which publicly commit us on commercial policy until we know the United States loan is through, which will probably not be before July.

3. On the other hand we do not want flatly to reject United States programme. We agree with Americans that some action is necessary this year in order to prevent interest evaporating. If no progress is made either the Preparatory Committee or Economic and Social Council itself may feel called upon to intervene and disturb careful balance of proposals agreed with Americans. Also a meeting this year would provide useful opportunity for discussion with foreign countries that are less familiar with many of proposals and for ascertaining what differences of view exist.

4. We therefore propose to reply to United States Government on following lines. We share their desire to keep interest alive until tariff negotiations can take place next March, and we therefore see advantage in meeting of Preparatory Committee (which would last about four weeks) for purpose of exchanging views, removing doubts and explaining intentions of United States proposals and enlisting support for them. On other hand we oppose appointment of drafting sub-committee of Preparatory Committee for reasons explained in 2 (b) above. We consider July to be too early for meeting of Preparatory Committee because fate of loan may still not be known and we think Governments concerned ought to have six weeks' notice before meeting of Preparatory Committee starts. We think therefore that a decision on the date of the meeting of the Preparatory Committee should be deferred. Provided Congress has acted in time aim should be to hold meeting of Committee in early autumn preferably in London or Geneva. (We think this would probably mean October rather than September to avoid clash with General Assembly of U.N.O. and Economic and Social Council meetings.)

5. If Americans accept our views on time-table there would remain question of fixing dates for prior British Commonwealth discussions. We assume Dominion Governments would share our view that if negotiations on tariffs with foreign countries are to be postponed until March, it would be preferable also to postpone say until January British Commonwealth discussions on tariffs and preferences. We think however that there would be advantage in holding separate British Commonwealth meeting for preliminary discussion of all questions other than tariffs and preferences, which will come up at meeting of Preparatory Committee in October. We understand that it will not be convenient to Australian or New Zealand Governments to hold such meeting in August or September and we therefore suggest that we should adhere to date previously suggested, i.e., the 1st July. If nearer that date loan prospects still seem highly doubtful reconsideration of date of British Commonwealth meeting would be necessary.

6. We shall be glad to learn whether Dominion Governments agree with line we propose to take in reply to latest United States suggestions and with our proposal that, subject to satisfactory developments in regard to the United States loan, British Commonwealth meeting should take place on the 1st July for discussion of commercial policy questions other than tariffs and preferences. We should be grateful for reply by the 15th May.

Cypher telegram of the 11*th May*, 1946, from the Minister of External Affairs, Ottawa, to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

YOUR telegram circular D. No. 452 of the 9th May : Commercial Policy.

We are in general agreement with the reply you propose to make to the United States Government as outlined in paragraph 4 of your telegram, and had taken much the same attitude in discussions at the official level held here recently with Winthrop Brown, Chief of the Commercial Policy Division of the State Department. While we would be agreeable to postponement of the first preparatory committee meeting until September or October we did not press the point. We have no strong views about the site of the meeting.

We have, however, serious doubts about the need for a prior British Commonwealth meeting for the preliminary discussion of questions other than tariffs and preferences. We would find it extremely difficult to be represented adequately at such a meeting, as we do not see how we shall be able to make the man-power available. We are short-handed and would be reluctant to take the officials required away from their continuing administrative duties and from preparations for the tariff negotiations.

We do not, moreover, see any special Commonwealth interest in the non-tariff questions as such and believe that one Commonwealth meeting, called shortly before the general tariff talks to deal with the special Commonwealth trust in preferences, would provide an adequate opportunity for any Commonwealth consultation that might be felt to be necessary.

We agree with you that it is desirable that negotiations on non-tariff and tariff matters proceed simultaneously and that the agenda of the preparatory committee should be pretty narrowly defined so as not to disturb this timing. Even with a limited agenda, the preparatory committee meeting should help to maintain the interest already generated in the commercial policy proposals.

Cypher telegram of the 14*th May*, 1946, from the Minister of External Affairs, Canberra, to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

(No. 206.)

ADDRESSED to Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, London, No. 206, repeated Australian Legation, Washington, No. 721, Minister of External Affairs, Wellington, No. 138, Minister of External Affairs, Capetown, No. 41.

Your circular D. No. 452.

1. We agree fully with you that it is unwise to be drawn into any commitment on the general principles of a future trade charter ahead of detailed tariff negotiations. We think, therefore, that :

(a) discussion at the first meeting of the Preparatory Committee should be confined to a general exchange of views and the connexion of the I.T.O. with the other machinery of the United Nations;

(b) it should be made clear to the United States and to the Preparatory Committee that no commitment on the proposed charter can be accepted without knowledge of the outcome of the tariff negotiations.

2. Regarding paragraph 4 we could not agree to enlisting support for the United States proposals in their present form prior to their substantial modification. Otherwise we concur in the lines of your proposed reply to the United States with the proviso that we desire the proposed meeting of the Preparatory Committee to be held as late in the year as possible.

3. We prefer to await the return of the Prime Minister at the end of the week before agreeing upon a date for the first British Commonwealth meeting.

Letter of the 15*th May*, 1946, from the High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa in London to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

My dear Secretary of State,

Commercial Policy.

WOULD you please refer to your circular telegram D. No. 452 (reference W.T. 980/–) of the 9th May.

My Government appreciate the difficulties resulting from the delays in the decision about the American loan and would, therefore, not be opposed to a reply by the United Kingdom Government to the United States Government on the lines suggested in paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference.

My Government cannot see, however, what purpose would be served by separate Commonwealth discussions in July if tariffs and preferences are excluded. They agree that the inclusion of tariffs and preferences at this stage would be premature, but consider that the remaining questions could best be discussed after and not before these. If the general feeling amongst Dominion Governments is to the contrary my Government would wish to be informed of the Agenda visualised for the proposed Commonwealth discussions in order to enable them to reconsider their attitude.

It would also be appreciated if the United Kingdom Government could furnish us with the earliest indication of the size and nature of the delegations which would have to be sent to the projected Commonwealth Conference, if it is to be held, and to the meeting of the Preparatory Committee.

I have sent copies of this letter to the other Dominion High Commissioners.

Yours sincerely,

G. HEATON NICHOLLS.

MY telegram D. No. 452 and your reply : Commercial Policy.

We are most grateful for your prompt answer.

2. My immediately following telegram gives the text of our reply to the American proposals summarised in paragraph 1 of my telegram D. No. 452 which was handed to representative of United States Embassy on the 16th May. No indication was given to him that we had consulted other Commonwealth Governments before replying.

3. You will note that it contained nothing on the question of holding preliminary British Commonwealth discussions in advance of the proposed meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council. This we are treating as a matter of domestic concern within the Commonwealth.

4. On this question Canada and South Africa are doubtful about the need, in advance of the meeting of Preparatory Committee, for Commonwealth discussions in which tariffs and preferences would not be considered. Canada would also find it extremely difficult to be adequately represented while India considers July too early in view of possible political developments there. Australia is awaiting the return of Prime Minister before expressing an opinion. New Zealand continues to favour British Commonwealth discussions beginning on 1st July. (7)

(D. No. 500. Secret.)

MY immediately preceding telegram.

Following is text of reply given to United States authorities on time-table for commercial policy discussions :—

" (a) We fully appreciate the circumstances in which the United States Government have proposed this new programme and accept the necessity to postpone the detailed discussions on tariffs until March 1947. We share their desire to keep interest alive and make some progress in the meantime. But having undertaken to use our best endeavours to bring the discussions to a successful conclusion, we feel bound to say that, in our view, the new programme in its entirety would not serve to further this object.

" (b) We see considerable advantage in a meeting of the Preparatory Committee (lasting preferably not more than four and certainly not more than six weeks) for the purpose of (i) exchanging views and removing any doubts about the intentions of the American proposals, (ii) of expounding the considerations which led up to the Joint Statement by the United States and the United Kingdom which was issued on their publication on the 6th December, and (iii) of enlisting support of the principle of a world-wide reduction of trade barriers.

" (c) On the other hand we see no merit in the proposed drafting sub-committee. We do not see how such a sub-committee could do any useful work. Either there would be constant reservations which would thwart hopes of positive progress or some degree of commitment would be involved for which Governments would not be ready until commitments on actual tariff reductions were also under negotiation, that is' to say until the ' drafting ' countries meet in March. Indeed, if for such reasons Governments were led to take firm positions on points of difficulty, we feel that the establishment of a drafting sub-committee might positively impede the successful outcome of the later conference.

" (d) Moreover, we consider that July is too soon for the meeting of the Preparatory Committee. Owing to the close connexion between the published Proposals on Commercial Policy and the financial position we, for our part, could not attend a meeting of the Preparatory Committee appointed by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations until Congress has acted on the Financial Agreement, and we consider that six weeks' notice should be given in order that members of the Preparatory Committee may have time to make the necessary arrangements to attend.

" (e) Our view is, therefore, that a decision on the date of the meeting of the Preparatory Committee should be deferred. Provided Congress has acted on the Financial Agreement in time, the aim should be to hold a meeting early in the autumn. We should have been inclined to suggest September, but as meetings in the United States of the General Assembly of the United Nations and of the Economic and Social Council have already been arranged for the 1st September, the 1st October appears to us to be the earliest practicable date.

" (f) We consider it extremely desirable, for reasons which we feel sure are appreciated by the United States Government, that the proposed meeting should be held in Europe (preferably in London or Geneva).

" (g) Meanwhile we welcome their proposal that we and they should continue to have informal exchanges of views with other countries such as have already served to remove misunderstandings and to promote the ideas which both countries share."

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX.

(21st May, 1946—11 a.m.)

Policy towards Germany.

MR. BEVIN recalled that the present policy in Germany was founded on the decisions taken at Potsdam in August, 1945. The four zones into which the country was divided were in many respects very differently administered. Each of the Powers had a different approach. We knew little of the method adopted in the Russian zone. Of the other zones the British zone was in many respects the most critical because it contained the Ruhr and the Rhineland. Much depended on the future of the Ruhr. With complete control of it, a re-united Germany could quite well become again a danger to Europe. Equally, if it passed for any reason under Russian control, Western Europe would be faced with an even greater menace than Germany under Hitler had been.

The French had been pressing for the separation of the Ruhr from the rest of Germany both politically and industrially. Mr. Bevin said that he had so far declined to consider this. He had himself prepared various possible schemes for controlling the industrial production of the Ruhr. There was an immense industrial potential there and it seemed to him that there were only two alternatives, first to destroy much of that potentiality and to leave only that amount which could be absorbed by a largely de-industrialised Germany; and secondly, to make some arrangement whereby its full potentialities could be used for the benefit of Europe as a whole. It was his dream that this latter course might be possible. The Ruhr might become the Pittsburgh of Europe. It seemed to him wrong to adopt a course which meant wasting this great potential wealth.

One reason why he had not agreed to discuss the French proposal for the separation of the Ruhr was that he had declined to discuss with the other Powers the British zone apart from the other three zones. Sooner or later the Allies must decide whether Germany was to be divided or not. He felt that it would be fatal to allow Russia to intervene in the administration of the Western zones while consolidating her position in the Eastern zone and in all the territory which she held from Stettin to the Adriatic.

Mr. Bevin said that on the Control Commission the United Kingdom representative had been in favour of the re-establishment of different political parties in Germany provided that they had not been identified with the Nazi régime. In Berlin, however, and in the Russian zone, the Russians were supporting only the United Socialist and Communist party and they were carrying on a determined propaganda to ensure that it was the dominant party in the other zones too, no doubt with the idea that, whatever Power had the nominal control of the zone, they would control the main political party in it.

Mr. Bevin explained that the British zone was far from being a self-supporting economic unit at the present time. Its population, which before the war had been about 19 millions had now risen to some 23 millions. It was not primarily an agricultural zone and was dependent for its food supply on imports. These in the past had come from the East, but at the moment no food was coming out of the Russian zone. We had been pressing for free exchange between the four zones but so far had not succeeded in obtaining it. At the same time the British zone could not utilise to the full its industrial production which might have enabled it to pay for the food it required. There had been a long controversy as to the permitted level of German industry. Steel production had been taken as the main yardstick of this. The figure originally fixed by the United Kingdom as the minimum required for maintaining the economic life of Germany as a whole was 11 million tons a year. The American and Russian figures had been 5·8 million tons. The United Kingdom Government had taken the view that on this basis Germany could not have supported a reasonable standard of life and that the consequent charge on the United Kingdom Exchequer for the maintenance of the British zone alone would have been of the order of £100 million a year. The United Kingdom figure had then been reduced to 9 million tons and eventually agreement had been reached at a figure of 7·5 million tons. At the same time it had been agreed that additional plants, e.g., for the production of fertilisers, might be retained. Taking this into account the United Kingdom Government had thought that this figure was not unworkable.

For the most part, Mr. Byrnes had taken a very reasonable line on German questions. In discussion with M. Stalin in Moscow Mr. Byrnes had said that the United States could not look on and watch the German problem being solved by the slow starvation of millions : a way must be found which would not affect adversely the security of the Allied Powers, yet would allow a reasonable standard of living to Germany. Otherwise the German people would be driven to desperation, with incalculable results for the future of Europe. Mr. Byrnes had told M. Stalin that he did not favour the French plan for the permanent separation of portions of Germany but that the French were, in his view, entitled to an absolute guarantee of their security. They should not have to fear an American withdrawal from European politics such as occurred between the two wars. He had therefore put forward the idea of a 25-year treaty between the four Powers for the de-militarisation and disarmament of Germany. M. Stalin had seemed to welcome the idea. When later Mr. Byrnes had sent Mr. Bevin a draft of such a treaty, he had asked him to regard it as a document of great secrecy. At the recent meetings in Paris, however, Mr. Byrnes had laid his draft on the table. There had immediately been a strong reaction from M. Molotov. There had been a heated discussion between Mr. Byrnes and M. Molotov, and it became clear that Russia would not enter into any arrangement of this type with the three Western Powers. Mr. Byrnes had appeared somewhat discouraged that his draft had not received a public welcome from the United Kingdom Government, apparently forgetting that it had been given to them in great confidence. A public statement that the draft had the warm approval of the Government of the United Kingdom had now been made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Bevin said that following on Mr. Byrnes's proposal for a four-power treaty there had been some general discussion on the future of Germany at the Council of Foreign Ministers.

There had been some pressure for the future of the Ruhr to be considered separately. Mr. Bevin, however, had consistently maintained the view that he was not prepared to discuss the future of the Ruhr except as part of a discussion regarding the future of Germany as a whole, which would include, for instance, the future of industrial districts in the Russian zone such as Saxony and Thuringia. His view was that there must be as frank a discussion of the future of one part of Germany as of another.

Mr. Bevin said that he could not attempt to say whether Russian policy was to favour a united or a dismembered Germany. The Communists in Germany were preaching in favour of a united Germany but the Communists in France in favour of a dismembered Germany. He thought that the Russian Government had not, at the moment, determined their policy. It seemed that they were attempting to consolidate what they held in the Eastern zone and the satellite States and were attempting simultaneously to claim some say in the administration of the Western zones

For himself, Mr. Bevin said that he thought that the solution might lie in the creation of a united but federalised Germany with the minimum powers in the centre and the maximum powers in the provinces.

In the last sessions of the Council Mr. Byrnes had put forward certain further proposals for Germany. The gist of these had been that unless agreement could be reached that Germany was to be treated as a whole both politically and economically, the United States would have to cease the dismantling of German industry for reparations and the delivery to the Russians of their share.

Mr. Byrnes had also proposed that Deputies should be appointed for the study of certain questions relating to Germany, but this had not obtained Russian approval. Simultaneously, he had proposed that a Conference for the discussion of a Peace Treaty with Germany should be summoned for the 12th November. This proposal, too, had not been approved. Mr. Bevin had now told Mr. Byrnes first, that he did not favour the fixing of a precise date for a Conference on Germany, and secondly, that in his view discussion of a peace settlement with Germany should be in three stages: a preliminary Conference of all the belligerents, followed by a smaller meeting of drafting countries, followed by a second Conference to consider the drafts thus prepared.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had been much impressed by Mr. Bevin's clear review. His own views were, in general, completely in accord with those expressed by Mr. Bevin.

He felt strongly that Germany must be maintained as a whole. If any other policy was followed, grave problems would be sure to arise in the future. A policy of splitting the country up would be foredoomed to failure. Germany would remain an entity by the strength of her national sentiment. He did not think that the German people as a whole, as distinct from certain groups, would want war if they had work.

He was in entire agreement as to the importance of getting German industrial production under way as soon as possible. Until that was done we should have continual demands for relief of one kind or another. Once Europe began to supply itself with its own needs and exchange of commodities between Germany and other countries began again, many difficult problems would find a natural solution.

Mr. Mackenzie King expressed his full concurrence with the view that there must be complete reciprocity between the zones; if, for example, the Russians were to have any voice in the affairs of the British zone, the United Kingdom must have an equal say in the affairs of the Russian zone. He said that the choice clearly lay between a world based on goodwill and one split into two groups, Communist Russia and the rest. A striking illustration of Russian methods had been afforded by the recent unearthing in Canada of underground activities on an unsuspected scale. Individuals in positions of confidence had been involved. Some of them seemed to have been motivated by the highest ideals, although they had failed to realise the true character of the system they were supporting. If an impression should get abroad that the democracies were displaying impatience and lack of understanding in their relations with Russia, they might find among their own people sympathy of surprising magnitude with Russian ideals.

Reference had been made by Dr. Evatt at the previous meeting to the unfortunate fact that important decisions on the post-war settlements had been taken during the war without the participation of Commonwealth Governments and those of other lesser Powers. Mr. Mackenzie King was also sorry that that had been necessary, and he thought that the United Kingdom Government shared this view. But he recognised that, at times, decisions had had to be taken in the light of pressing current situations. No doubt if the end of the war could have been foreseen different decisions might have been taken in one or two cases, but, as it was, we were bound by them. He was also very sympathetic with the view of Dr. Evatt that the Peace Conference regarding Italy and the Balkans should not be a mere formality; the participating Governments must have an effective opportunity to express their views. He suggested that British Commonwealth Governments probably attached no less importance to this issue than European countries concerned with the Peace Conference; the latter were so fully occupied with their own immediate problems of reconstruction that he did not think that they expected to be more fully consulted at this stage. In all the circumstances, he was inclined to the view that it would be a mistake to hasten the final settlements. Time was a healing influence. The apparent lack of success of the meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers was no doubt unfortunate. Nevertheless the delay had its advantages. For instance, it had made it possible for the Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth to meet United Kingdom Ministers. They could now speak with knowledge not only of the facts of the situation, but also of the way in which Mr. Bevin was dealing with them. Mr. Bevin, for his part, would be aware of their views, and the United Kingdom Government's policy in the settlement would be influenced by the views of Commonwealth Governments.

At the same time, he sympathised with the views expressed by Mr. Nash as to the inconvenience of the indefinite dates for the Conference. It would have been preferable for the British Commonwealth consultations to have been held immediately before or after the Peace Conference or possibly, as sometimes at Geneva in the past, during the session of the Conference.

Mr. Mackenzie King was doubtful as to the wisdom of trying to hold a Peace Conference without the prior general agreement of all the four Powers. If the Council of Foreign Ministers could not reach agreement, there was little prospect of agreement emerging from the wider Conference. He was becoming doubtful as to the efficiency of open conferences as a medium of international negotiation in its early stages. The reaction against the methods of the old secret diplomacy had, he thought, gone too far. It was difficult for Governments to recede from positions which had been publicly taken up. There were thus advantages in some degree of secrecy until general lines of agreement were apparent. A happy mean must be found.

Mr. Mackenzie King felt strongly that, if there should be an eventual breakdown of negotiations owing to Russia's attitude, negotiations should be so conducted that it should be manifestly Russia who was in the wrong. He believed that if at every meeting she raised difficulty after difficulty, other nations would become increasingly impatient and that that circumstance, in its turn, might influence Russia's own attitude. Admittedly there was the risk that delay would enable her to consolidate her position in occupied territories. Nevertheless he did not believe in haste. It was at this moment most difficult to distinguish which movements in current affairs were important. With the passage of time this would become clearer. He believed that the balance of advantage lay in caution. The settlement, when reached, would govern the world situation for years to come. If there was no settlement, the future was dark indeed. A policy of consistent, cautious and patient effort might in the end bring success.

Dr. EVATT referred to the views expressed by Mr. Chifley and himself in the previous discussion of the subject. A policy of balkanising Germany would be a sure way to encourage a recrudescence of nazism : and according to his reading of the Potsdam Agreement, it would be contrary to its provisions. Germany should be treated as a whole

He thought that Mr. Bevin's idea of two Conferences of the active belligerents in the case of Germany would, if applied, be a step forward. He was not sure that time was on our side in the matter of the peace settlements. Europe needed stabilisation and the continued uncertainty must operate against this. Delay would not prevent awkward issues being brought to the point of decision, for the Security Council might at any time be asked to deal with them as situations likely to endanger the peace of the world. This was one result of the establishment of the United Nations Organisation before the peace settlement. It was now nearly three years since Italy had been conquered; and Dr. Evatt expressed the hope that it would be possible to call together a Peace Conference for the Italian Treaty as soon as possible.

He wished again to state that the objectives in the settlement should be based solely on considerations of justice. He recognised the difficulties on the score of Russia. The Soviet Government should not be permitted to outmanœuvre the other participants in the settlement. But to adopt a hostile attitude towards Russia would produce just the consequences which it was desired to avoid. As Mr. Chifley had said, any assumption of an ultimate struggle between East and West would be a counsel of despair. He had previously expressed his dislike of the suggestion on page 3 of the paper circulated as P.M.M. (46) 21 that the danger from Russia had become as great as the danger from a revived Germany. He realised that this paper did not necessarily represent the view of the United Kingdom Government. He did not think the proposition correct in application to either Europe or the Pacific. While it might be a prophecy, he did not accept it as a fact. Were the argument accepted, problems would be tackled in terms of strategy and not in terms of what was just. It would be dangerous to give grounds for the propaganda that preparations were already being made for the next struggle and that Russia would be the enemy.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was in general agreement with the position taken up by Mr. Bevin. They had now heard from him accounts of the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers in regard both to the Mediterranean basin and South-Eastern Europe and also to Germany. Speaking personally, he was in agreement with his policy and he felt that they were profoundly indebted to Mr. Bevin for the line which he had taken in these discussions and the courage and tenacity which he had shown in standing up for the interests of the British Commonwealth and, indeed, of the ideals for which they stood. He himself got the impression that the United States could not be relied upon to carry their full weight in these negotiations; they did not seem to have made up their mind on a policy; they seemed to be still experimenting. If a fair settlement was to be brought out of the chaos and disorder of the present world, it would be largely through the efforts of the British group of nations. The Commonwealth might at the moment be somewhat reduced in apparent power; they were all exhausted by the conflict in which they had spent every ounce of their strength. Nevertheless, they had between them great experience in the arts of human government; they had imponderable resources on their side, which still enabled them to make the major contribution to the peace.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he looked on the general position as grave in the extreme. There had been such a shift of power in the world to-day that it made it very difficult indeed to see clearly into the future. He thought it would be rash to condemn Russia out of hand for the line she was taking, but he had no doubt that, unless a stand was made against the tendencies of power politics as they appeared at the moment, the future held out gloomy prospects to us. It might, indeed, still be too early to say who had won and who had lost the war; we might in the future find that we had been the victims of it. If the ideals for which we stood were not maintained, the world would have lost immeasurably. The peace settlement, therefore, might be more important than the war. He was glad that the British Commonwealth were aligned on the right side. The United Kingdom Government was putting up a fight which was worth while and he felt that other Commonwealth Governments should be most grateful to them for the line they were taking.

As to the future of Germany, he agreed that it would be wrong to envisage a fully centralised Germany as it had been under Bismarck or Hitler. The German people were by nature a formidable people on account of their many qualities, their power of organisation and their intelligence, and under a highly centralised State they might again become a menace to peace. We should aim at a Germany which, while remaining united, was to a large extent decentralised. We should also aim at a Germany which could maintain a possible standard of living. He was sure that Mr. Bevin was right to insist that, if Russia were to have a say in the administration of the British zone, then we must have an equal say in the administration of her zone.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he had spent four days in Germany in the previous week and had had discussions with the Commander-in-Chief and Sir Brian Robertson and with many of their advisers. The impression he had gathered was that, quite apart from the nature of the peace settlement, there was an immediate problem in the zone which required urgent and most serious attention. It was the most difficult zone, containing a large population in an industrialised area; its industries were being dismantled and its livelihood thus taken away. The position, he thought, was worse now than it had been. The resources on which they had lived during the first few months were used up. The German attitude was also getting worse because conditions were getting worse.

The food situation had been most menacing. He hoped that now, through the negotiations of Mr. Morrison in Washington, that might to some extent right itself. But the coal situation seemed to him to be equally difficult. Not only were the industries being dismantled, but the coal that they could use in their remaining industries was being sent out of the country. He thought that matters had reached a very dangerous pass and, unless there were a moratorium on the export of coal, we might soon find ourselves with a completely derelict zone with a huge and hungry population, gradually relapsing into anarchy and perhaps communism.

An industrial standard had been laid down which in the end might prove ruinous to the British zone and create there an intolerable problem for us. He did not see how, on this level of industry, we could possibly be responsible for feeding the people and keeping them from anarchy—and still export coal. We must remember that, whatever the real truth of the matter, the whole blame for conditions in the zone would fall on us. People would not realise that we had been saddled with an impossible situation. They would compare conditions in the British zone with conditions in the East, where the situation might well appear much better.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that, in his view, the situation called for great care and he could not help feeling that a reversal of some of the decisions taken at Potsdam was called for. He hoped that he did not paint the picture in too dark colours. But the outlook was, in truth, gloomy. If the other Powers clamoured for the further dismantling of the Ruhr and for the continued export of coal, our zone might well become a quite unworkable proposition.

On the long-range questions, he was in full agreement with Mr. Bevin. It was only on these practical immediate questions that he felt qualms whether our present policy was on the right basis. He ventured to suggest that we should have a short-range plan from our men on the spot dealing not so much with the shaping of the peace as with the practical problems of the administration of the zone in the next few months. He feared that, within a matter of months, we might be in a sorry state in the zone. He instanced the city of Hamburg, a city of 2 million people, which was now fast becoming a dead city, with its industries dismantled, its population unemployed and the town itself largely destroyed by bombing. The people had been living on their resources, but these were now exhausted. Field-Marshal Smuts said that he did not wish to see the United Kingdom blamed, however wrongly, because their zone became derelict.

MR. ATTLEE asked whether the urgency of these immediate problems did not constitute an argument against delay in the peace settlement.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he had doubts in his mind whether it would be a wise move to press for a conference while there were such deep-seated differences in policy between the principal Allies. While they had not been thrashed out, would a general conference help or would it increase the dangers? Would it bring wisdom out of apparent chaos? Or would not tempers perhaps get worse?

At this dangerous point the fundamental question was whether there should be one Europe or two Europes, one world or two worlds. This was not a question which a general conference could resolve while a state of high tension continued. If it appeared, when the Council of Foreign Ministers met again in June, that fundamental differences remained insoluble between the four Powers a conference might result in dividing Europe into two. By a conference leading to that result we should have stereotyped the lines of the future in a manner that we were all most anxious to avoid. It was for these reasons that, like Mr. Mackenzie King, he was for marking time. We could not read the mind of Russia. Perhaps at present we were misreading it and the phase of expansion would pass. At the June session of the Council the United Kingdom should do all she could to come to a general settlement. If it appeared that Russia remained irreconcilable, then the Commonwealth countries could put their heads together again.

Field-Marshal Smuts recalled that he had said three years ago that he doubted whether the peace would be settled by Peace Conferences after the war. What had happened since had deepened his doubts. He was now the more inclined to wonder whether it was not better to take more time and to allow a little drift.

MR. NASH said that he himself believed that a satisfactory peace settlement was more likely to be secured by the method of public discussion at a Peace Conference than by secret diplomacy or by seeking to impose on the other belligerents decisions taken initially by the four Powers. He also believed that the Soviet Government were more likely to be brought to a reasonable attitude in public discussions among the 21 belligerent States. It was these considerations which had led him to favour the early holding of a Peace Conference to consider the peace settlements for the ex-enemy satellite States in Europe. As regards the German settlement, he supported Mr. Bevin's suggestion of two full conferences. At the first conference, which might be held in the autumn of 1946, there could be a preliminary exchange of views; and there might then be an interval, during which detailed drafting could be undertaken, before the final settlement was attempted at the second conference.

Mr. Nash said that he would be strongly opposed to any attempt to dismember Germany. The feelings of the German people in favour of a unitary Germany were far too strong for such an attempt to succeed. And a unitary Germany need not be dominated in the future as in the past, by Prussia. Our policy should be to re-educate the German people; and we should remember that before 1914 the Social Democrat movement had been stronger in Germany than anywhere else in the world. He saw no reason to abandon our hope of finding a satisfactory solution of the long-term problem in Germany. Though he regretted the policies which the Soviet Government appeared to be following at the present time, this might be only a passing phase, and we should persevere in trying to bring about a better mutual understanding between ourselves and Russia. We had, in his view, made a mistake at the Berlin Conference in conceding so much of the territorial claims of the Soviet Government; we should always remember that they had annexed half of Poland before they entered the war on the Allied side. Our main difficulty was that the Russian people themselves were unaware of the real facts of the situation and we had no means of putting the facts before them. He did not believe, however, that Communism was gaining ground in Europe. It was significant that the Czechs, even though they believed that they were betrayed by us and delivered by the Russians, were unwilling even so to embrace the Communist ideology. We should not, he thought, adopt a policy of appeasement towards the Soviet Government.

LORD ADDISON said that, so far as concerned Germany, two points had emerged from the discussion. First, in the immediate future we must do everything possible to avoid a breakdown in the British Zone of Germany; for failure of our administration there would prejudice the chances of a satisfactory long-term solution. He therefore supported Field-Marshal Smuts's proposal that we should at once prepare an emergency programme for dealing with the immediate situation in the British Zone; and he added the further suggestion that we should see whether the United States authorities would co-operate with us in framing a short-term plan which would be applicable to their zone as well as ours. Secondly, as regards the long-term problems, he strongly supported the views which had been expressed by Mr. Bevin. He agreed with what Mr. Nash had said about Communism in Europe; but that, in his view, strengthened the case for not seeking to force a settlement of the long-term problem. The Soviet Government might themselves be compelled to modify their attitude in time, and an attempt to force an early settlement might have the effect of consolidating their position in Eastern Germany. In this matter time was on our side.

Lord Addison said that he saw great danger in premature discussion of these difficult issues at a Peace Conference. If it appeared, at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in June, that the four Powers were substantially nearer to agreement on the main lines of the peace settlements for the ex-enemy satellite States in Europe, it might well be advantageous to hold an early conference on those settlements; but he would prefer to see how things went at the Council's next meeting before he finally made up his mind on this point.

MR. HALL endorsed the views expressed by Lord Addison. The most urgent need was to seek some solution of the short-term economic problems of Germany. The existing position was most unsatisfactory; and it was intolerable that the British taxpayer should have to continue to find £80 million a year for the British Zone. Far from receiving any reparations from Germany, the United Kingdom were in effect paying reparations to Germany; and this was a situation which could not be allowed to continue.

As regards long-term problems, he supported the line which Mr. Bevin had been taking in the discussions in Paris. He and all his colleagues in the United Kingdom Government were deeply grateful to Mr. Bevin for the tenacity and skill with which he had presented the British case in the course of these difficult negotiations; and he had been glad to hear that these feelings were shared by the representatives of the Dominion Governments now in London.

MR. BEVIN thanked Dominion Ministers for their most valuable contributions to the discussion of these difficult problems. He was clear that we could no longer afford the policy of appeasement to Russia which we had had to adopt during the war. We could not expect the change to be popular with Russia.

He did not know what conclusion to draw as to the ultimate aim of Russian policy. It was dictated, he thought, partly by fear, partly by expansionism and partly by the Communist philosophy. A very powerful machine had been built up and it might be difficult to change its direction. But there were great internal problems and stresses in Russia and they might cause a change. Policy was still rigidly controlled from the Kremlin—which added to the difficulty of negotiation —and it might be changed if M. Stalin thought it expedient.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX.

Policy towards Germany.

MR. BEVIN recalled that the present policy in Germany was founded on the decisions taken at Potsdam in August, 1945. The four zones into which the country was divided were in many respects very differently administered. Each of the Powers had a different approach. We knew little of the method adopted in the Russian zone. Of the other zones the British zone was in many respects the most critical because it contained the Ruhr and the Rhineland. Much depended on the future of the Ruhr. With complete control of it, a re-united Germany could quite well become again a danger to Europe. Equally, if it passed for any reason under Russian control, Western Europe would be faced with an even greater menace than Germany under Hitler had been.

The French had been pressing for the separation of the Ruhr from the rest of Germany both politically and industrially. Mr. Bevin said that he had so far declined to consider this. He had himself prepared various possible schemes for controlling the industrial production of the Ruhr. There was an immense industrial potential there and it seemed to him that there were only two alternatives, first to destroy much of that potentiality and to leave only that amount which could be absorbed by a largely de-industrialised Germany; and secondly, to make some arrangement whereby its full potentialities could be used for the benefit of Europe as a whole. It was his dream that this latter course might be possible. The Ruhr might become the Pittsburgh of Europe. It seemed to him wrong to adopt a course which meant wasting this great potential wealth.

One reason why he had not agreed to discuss the French proposal for the separation of the Ruhr was that he had declined to discuss with the other Powers the British zone apart from the other three zones. Sooner or later the Allies must decide whether Germany was to be divided or not. He felt that it would be fatal to allow Russia to intervene in the administration of the Western zones while consolidating her position in the Eastern zone and in all the territory which she held from Stettin to the Adriatic.

Mr. Bevin said that on the Control Commission the United Kingdom representative had been in favour of the re-establishment of different political parties in Germany provided that they had not been identified with the Nazi régime. In Berlin, however, and in the Russian zone, the Russians were supporting only the United Socialist and Communist party and they were carrying on a determined propaganda to ensure that it was the dominant party in the other zones too, no doubt with the idea that, whatever Power had the nominal control of the zone, they would control the main political party in it.

Mr. Bevin explained that the British zone was far from being a self-supporting economic unit at the present time. Its population, which before the war had been about 19 millions had now risen to some 23 millions. It was not primarily an agricultural zone and was dependent for its food supply on imports. These in the past had come from the East, but at the moment no food was coming out of the Russian zone. We had been pressing for free exchange between the four zones but so far had not succeeded in obtaining it. At the same time the British zone could not utilise to the full its industrial production which might have enabled it to pay for the food it required. There had been a long controversy as to the permitted level of German industry. Steel production had been taken as the main yardstick of this. The figure originally fixed by the United Kingdom as the minimum required for maintaining the economic life of Germany as a whole was 11 million tons a year. The American and Russian figures had been 5·8 million tons. The United Kingdom Government had taken the view that on this basis Germany could not have supported a reasonable standard of life and that the consequent charge on the United Kingdom Exchequer for the maintenance of the British zone alone would have been of the order of £100 million a year. The United Kingdom figure had then been reduced to 9 million tons and eventually agreement had been reached at a figure of 7·5 million tons. At the same time it had been agreed that additional plants, e.g., for the production of fertilisers, might be retained. Taking this into account the United Kingdom Government had thought that this figure was not unworkable.

For the most part, Mr. Byrnes had taken a very reasonable line on German questions. In discussion with M. Stalin in Moscow Mr. Byrnes had said that the United States could not look on and watch the German problem being solved by the slow starvation of millions : a way must be found which would not affect adversely the security of the Allied Powers, yet would allow a reasonable standard of living to Germany. Otherwise the German people would be driven to desperation, with incalculable results for the future of Europe. Mr. Byrnes had told M. Stalin that he did not favour the French plan for the permanent separation of portions of Germany but that the French were, in his view, entitled to an absolute guarantee of their security. They should not have to fear an American withdrawal from European politics such as occurred between the two wars. He had therefore put forward the idea of a 25-year treaty between the four Powers for the de-militarisation and disarmament of Germany. M. Stalin had seemed to welcome the idea. When later Mr. Byrnes had sent Mr. Bevin a draft of such a treaty, he had asked him to regard it as a document of great secrecy. At the recent meetings in Paris, however, Mr. Byrnes had laid his draft on the table. There had immediately been a strong reaction from M. Molotov. There had been a heated discussion between Mr. Byrnes and M. Molotov, and it became clear that Russia would not enter into any arrangement of this type with the three Western Powers. Mr. Byrnes had appeared somewhat discouraged that his draft had not received a public welcome from the United Kingdom Government, apparently forgetting that it had been given to them in great confidence. A public statement that the draft had the warm approval of the Government of the United Kingdom had now been made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Bevin said that following on Mr. Byrnes's proposal for a four-power treaty there had been some general discussion on the future of Germany at the Council of Foreign Ministers.

There had been some pressure for the future of the Ruhr to be considered separately. Mr. Bevin, however, had consistently maintained the view that he was not prepared to discuss the future of the Ruhr except as part of a discussion regarding the future of Germany as a whole, which would include, for instance, the future of industrial districts in the Russian zone such as Saxony and Thuringia. His view was that there must be as frank a discussion of the future of one part of Germany as of another.

Mr. Bevin said that he could not attempt to say whether Russian policy was to favour a united or a dismembered Germany. The Communists in Germany were preaching in favour of a united Germany but the Communists in France in favour of a dismembered Germany. He thought that the Russian Government had not, at the moment, determined their policy. It seemed that they were attempting to consolidate what they held in the Eastern zone and the satellite States and were attempting simultaneously to claim some say in the administration of the Western zones

For himself, Mr. Bevin said that he thought that the solution might lie in the creation of a united but federalised Germany with the minimum powers in the centre and the maximum powers in the provinces.

In the last sessions of the Council Mr. Byrnes had put forward certain further proposals for Germany. The gist of these had been that unless agreement could be reached that Germany was to be treated as a whole both politically and economically, the United States would have to cease the dismantling of German industry for reparations and the delivery to the Russians of their share.

Mr. Byrnes had also proposed that Deputies should be appointed for the study of certain questions relating to Germany, but this had not obtained Russian approval. Simultaneously, he had proposed that a Conference for the discussion of a Peace Treaty with Germany should be summoned for the 12th November. This proposal, too, had not been approved. Mr. Bevin had now told Mr. Byrnes first, that he did not favour the fixing of a precise date for a Conference on Germany, and secondly, that in his view discussion of a peace settlement with Germany should be in three stages: a preliminary Conference of all the belligerents, followed by a smaller meeting of drafting countries, followed by a second Conference to consider the drafts thus prepared.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING said that he had been much impressed by Mr. Bevin's clear review. His own views were, in general, completely in accord with those expressed by Mr. Bevin.

He felt strongly that Germany must be maintained as a whole. If any other policy was followed, grave problems would be sure to arise in the future. A policy of splitting the country up would be foredoomed to failure. Germany would remain an entity by the strength of her national sentiment. He did not think that the German people as a whole, as distinct from certain groups, would want war if they had work.

He was in entire agreement as to the importance of getting German industrial production under way as soon as possible. Until that was done we should have continual demands for relief of one kind or another. Once Europe began to supply itself with its own needs and exchange of commodities between Germany and other countries began again, many difficult problems would find a natural solution.

Mr. Mackenzie King expressed his full concurrence with the view that there must be complete reciprocity between the zones; if, for example, the Russians were to have any voice in the affairs of the British zone, the United Kingdom must have an equal say in the affairs of the Russian zone. He said that the choice clearly lay between a world based on goodwill and one split into two groups, Communist Russia and the rest. A striking illustration of Russian methods had been afforded by the recent unearthing in Canada of underground activities on an unsuspected scale. Individuals in positions of confidence had been involved. Some of them seemed to have been motivated by the highest ideals, although they had failed to realise the true character of the system they were supporting. If an impression should get abroad that the democracies were displaying impatience and lack of understanding in their relations with Russia, they might find among their own people sympathy of surprising magnitude with Russian ideals.

Reference had been made by Dr. Evatt at the previous meeting to the unfortunate fact that important decisions on the post-war settlements had been taken during the war without the participation of Commonwealth Governments and those of other lesser Powers. Mr. Mackenzie King was also sorry that that had been necessary, and he thought that the United Kingdom Government shared this view. But he recognised that, at times, decisions had had to be taken in the light of pressing current situations. No doubt if the end of the war could have been foreseen different decisions might have been taken in one or two cases, but, as it was, we were bound by them. He was also very sympathetic with the view of Dr. Evatt that the Peace Conference regarding Italy and the Balkans should not be a mere formality; the participating Governments must have an effective opportunity to express their views. He suggested that British Commonwealth Governments probably attached no less importance to this issue than European countries concerned with the Peace Conference; the latter were so fully occupied with their own immediate problems of reconstruction that he did not think that they expected to be more fully consulted at this stage. In all the circumstances, he was inclined to the view that it would be a mistake to hasten the final settlements. Time was a healing influence. The apparent lack of success of the meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers was no doubt unfortunate. Nevertheless the delay had its advantages. For instance, it had made it possible for the Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth to meet United Kingdom Ministers. They could now speak with knowledge not only of the facts of the situation, but also of the way in which Mr. Bevin was dealing with them. Mr. Bevin, for his part, would be aware of their views, and the United Kingdom Government's policy in the settlement would be influenced by the views of Commonwealth Governments.

At the same time, he sympathised with the views expressed by Mr. Nash as to the inconvenience of the indefinite dates for the Conference. It would have been preferable for the British Commonwealth consultations to have been held immediately before or after the Peace Conference or possibly, as sometimes at Geneva in the past, during the session of the Conference.

Mr. Mackenzie King was doubtful as to the wisdom of trying to hold a Peace Conference without the prior general agreement of all the four Powers. If the Council of Foreign Ministers could not reach agreement, there was little prospect of agreement emerging from the wider Conference. He was becoming doubtful as to the efficiency of open conferences as a medium of international negotiation in its early stages. The reaction against the methods of the old secret diplomacy had, he thought, gone too far. It was difficult for Governments to recede from positions which had been publicly taken up. There were thus advantages in some degree of secrecy until general lines of agreement were apparent. A happy mean must be found.

Mr. Mackenzie King felt strongly that, if there should be an eventual breakdown of negotiations owing to Russia's attitude, negotiations should be so conducted that it should be manifestly Russia who was in the wrong. He believed that if at every meeting she raised difficulty after difficulty, other nations would become increasingly impatient and that that circumstance, in its turn, might influence Russia's own attitude. Admittedly there was the risk that delay would enable her to consolidate her position in occupied territories. Nevertheless he did not believe in haste. It was at this moment most difficult to distinguish which movements in current affairs were important. With the passage of time this would become clearer. He believed that the balance of advantage lay in caution. The settlement, when reached, would govern the world situation for years to come. If there was no settlement, the future was dark indeed. A policy of consistent, cautious and patient effort might in the end bring success.

DR. EVATT referred to the views expressed by Mr. Chifley and himself in the previous discussion of the subject. A policy of balkanising Germany would be a sure way to encourage a recrudescence of nazism : and according to his reading of the Potsdam Agreement, it would be contrary to its provisions. Germany should be treated as a whole

He thought that Mr. Bevin's idea of two Conferences of the active belligerents in the case of Germany would, if applied, be a step forward. He was not sure that time was on our side in the matter of the peace settlements. Europe needed stabilisation and the continued uncertainty must operate against this. Delay would not prevent awkward issues being brought to the point of decision, for the Security Council might at any time be asked to deal with them as situations likely to endanger the peace of the world. This was one result of the establishment of the United Nations Organisation before the peace settlement. It was now nearly three years since Italy had been conquered; and Dr. Evatt expressed the hope that it would be possible to call together a Peace Conference for the Italian Treaty as soon as possible.

He wished again to state that the objectives in the settlement should be based solely on considerations of justice. He recognised the difficulties on the score of Russia. The Soviet Government should not be permitted to outmanœuvre the other participants in the settlement. But to adopt a hostile attitude towards Russia would produce just the consequences which it was desired to avoid. As Mr. Chifley had said, any assumption of an ultimate struggle between East and West would be a counsel of despair. He had previously expressed his dislike of the suggestion on page 3 of the paper circulated as P.M.M. (46) 21 that the danger from Russia had become as great as the danger from a revived Germany. He realised that this paper did not necessarily represent the view of the United Kingdom Government. He did not think the proposition correct in application to either Europe or the Pacific. While it might be a prophecy, he did not accept it as a fact. Were the argument accepted, problems would be tackled in terms of strategy and not in terms of what was just. It would be dangerous to give grounds for the propaganda that preparations were already being made for the next struggle and that Russia would be the enemy.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was in general agreement with the position taken up by Mr. Bevin. They had now heard from him accounts of the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers in regard both to the Mediterranean basin and South-Eastern Europe and also to Germany. Speaking personally, he was in agreement with his policy and he felt that they were profoundly indebted to Mr. Bevin for the line which he had taken in these discussions and the courage and tenacity which he had shown in standing up for the interests of the British Commonwealth and, indeed, of the ideals for which they stood. He himself got the impression that the United States could not be relied upon to carry their full weight in these negotiations; they did not seem to have made up their mind on a policy; they seemed to be still experimenting. If a fair settlement was to be brought out of the chaos and disorder of the present world, it would be largely through the efforts of the British group of nations. The Commonwealth might at the moment be somewhat reduced in apparent power; they were all exhausted by the conflict in which they had spent every ounce of their strength. Nevertheless, they had between them great experience in the arts of human government; they had imponderable resources on their side, which still enabled them to make the major contribution to the peace.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he looked on the general position as grave in the extreme. There had been such a shift of power in the world to-day that it made it very difficult indeed to see clearly into the future. He thought it would be rash to condemn Russia out of hand for the line she was taking, but he had no doubt that, unless a stand was made against the tendencies of power politics as they appeared at the moment, the future held out gloomy prospects to us. It might, indeed, still be too early to say who had won and who had lost the war; we might in the future find that we had been the victims of it. If the ideals for which we stood were not maintained, the world would have lost immeasurably. The peace settlement, therefore, might be more important than the war. He was glad that the British Commonwealth were aligned on the right side. The United Kingdom Government was putting up a fight which was worth while and he felt that other Commonwealth Governments should be most grateful to them for the line they were taking.

As to the future of Germany, he agreed that it would be wrong to envisage a fully centralised Germany as it had been under Bismarck or Hitler. The German people were by nature a formidable people on account of their many qualities, their power of organisation and their intelligence, and under a highly centralised State they might again become a menace to peace. We should aim at a Germany which, while remaining united, was to a large extent decentralised. We should also aim at a Germany which could maintain a possible standard of living. He was sure that Mr. Bevin was right to insist that, if Russia were to have a say in the administration of the British zone, then we must have an equal say in the administration of her zone.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he had spent four days in Germany in the previous week and had had discussions with the Commander-in-Chief and Sir Brian Robertson and with many of their advisers. The impression he had gathered was that, quite apart from the nature of the peace settlement, there was an immediate problem in the zone which required urgent and most serious attention. It was the most difficult zone, containing a large population in an industrialised area; its industries were being dismantled and its livelihood thus taken away. The position, he thought, was worse now than it had been. The resources on which they had lived during the first few months were used up. The German attitude was also getting worse because conditions were getting worse.

The food situation had been most menacing. He hoped that now, through the negotiations of Mr. Morrison in Washington, that might to some extent right itself. But the coal situation seemed to him to be equally difficult. Not only were the industries being dismantled, but the coal that they could use in their remaining industries was being sent out of the country. He thought that matters had reached a very dangerous pass and, unless there were a moratorium on the export of coal, we might soon find ourselves with a completely derelict zone with a huge and hungry population, gradually relapsing into anarchy and perhaps communism.

An industrial standard had been laid down which in the end might prove ruinous to the British zone and create there an intolerable problem for us. He did not see how, on this level of industry, we could possibly be responsible for feeding the people and keeping them from anarchy—and still export coal. We must remember that, whatever the real truth of the matter, the whole blame for conditions in the zone would fall on us. People would not realise that we had been saddled with an impossible situation. They would compare conditions in the British zone with conditions in the East, where the situation might well appear much better.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that, in his view, the situation called for great care and he could not help feeling that a reversal of some of the decisions taken at Potsdam was called for. He hoped that he did not paint the picture in too dark colours. But the outlook was, in truth, gloomy. If the other Powers clamoured for the further dismantling of the Ruhr and for the continued export of coal, our zone might well become a quite unworkable proposition.

On the long-range questions, he was in full agreement with Mr. Bevin. It was only on these practical immediate questions that he felt qualms whether our present policy was on the right basis. He ventured to suggest that we should have a short-range plan from our men on the spot dealing not so much with the shaping of the peace as with the practical problems of the administration of the zone in the next few months. He feared that, within a matter of months, we might be in a sorry state in the zone. He instanced the city of Hamburg, a city of 2 million people, which was now fast becoming a dead city, with its industries dismantled, its population unemployed and the town itself largely destroyed by bombing. The people had been living on their resources, but these were now exhausted. Field-Marshal Smuts said that he did not wish to see the United Kingdom blamed, however wrongly, because their zone became derelict.

MR. ATTLEE asked whether the urgency of these immediate problems did not constitute an argument against delay in the peace settlement.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he had doubts in his mind whether it would be a wise move to press for a conference while there were such deep-seated differences in policy between the principal Allies. While they had not been thrashed out, would a general conference help or would it increase the dangers? Would it bring wisdom out of apparent chaos? Or would not tempers perhaps get worse?

At this dangerous point the fundamental question was whether there should be one Europe or two Europes, one world or two worlds. This was not a question which a general conference could resolve while a state of high tension continued. If it appeared, when the Council of Foreign Ministers met again in June, that fundamental differences remained insoluble between the four Powers a conference might result in dividing Europe into two. By a conference leading to that result we should have stereotyped the lines of the future in a manner that we were all most anxious to avoid. It was for these reasons that, like Mr. Mackenzie King, he was for marking time. We could not read the mind of Russia. Perhaps at present we were misreading it and the phase of expansion would pass. At the June session of the Council the United Kingdom should do all she could to come to a general settlement. If it appeared that Russia remained irreconcilable, then the Commonwealth countries could put their heads together again.

Field-Marshal Smuts recalled that he had said three years ago that he doubted whether the peace would be settled by Peace Conferences after the war. What had happened since had deepened his doubts. He was now the more inclined to wonder whether it was not better to take more time and to allow a little drift.

MR. NASH said that he himself believed that a satisfactory peace settlement was more likely to be secured by the method of public discussion at a Peace Conference than by secret diplomacy or by seeking to impose on the other belligerents decisions taken initially by the four Powers. He also believed that the Soviet Government were more likely to be brought to a reasonable attitude in public discussions among the 21 belligerent States. It was these considerations which had led him to favour the early holding of a Peace Conference to consider the peace settlements for the ex-enemy satellite States in Europe. As regards the German settlement, he supported Mr. Bevin's suggestion of two full conferences. At the first conference, which might be held in the autumn of 1946, there could be a preliminary exchange of views; and there might then be an interval, during which detailed drafting could be undertaken, before the final settlement was attempted at the second conference.

Mr. Nash said that he would be strongly opposed to any attempt to dismember Germany. The feelings of the German people in favour of a unitary Germany were far too strong for such an attempt to succeed. And a unitary Germany need not be dominated in the future as in the past, by Prussia. Our policy should be to re-educate the German people; and we should remember that before 1914 the Social Democrat movement had been stronger in Germany than anywhere else in the world. He saw no reason to abandon our hope of finding a satisfactory solution of the long-term problem in Germany. Though he regretted the policies which the Soviet Government appeared to be following at the present time, this might be only a passing phase, and we should persevere in trying to bring about a better mutual understanding between ourselves and Russia. We had, in his view, made a mistake at the Berlin Conference in conceding so much of the territorial claims of the Soviet Government; we should always remember that they had annexed half of Poland before they entered the war on the Allied side. Our main difficulty was that the Russian people themselves were unaware of the real facts of the situation and we had no means of putting the facts before them. He did not believe, however, that Communism was gaining ground in Europe. It was significant that the Czechs, even though they believed that they were betrayed by us and delivered by the Russians, were unwilling even so to embrace the Communist ideology. We should not, he thought, adopt a policy of appeasement towards the Soviet Government.

LORD ADDISON said that, so far as concerned Germany, two points had emerged from the discussion. First, in the immediate future we must do everything possible to avoid a breakdown in the British Zone of Germany; for failure of our administration there would prejudice the chances of a satisfactory long-term solution. He therefore supported Field-Marshal Smuts's proposal that we should at once prepare an emergency programme for dealing with the immediate situation in the British Zone; and he added the further suggestion that we should see whether the United States authorities would co-operate with us in framing a short-term plan which would be applicable to their zone as well as ours. Secondly, as regards the long-term problems, he strongly supported the views which had been expressed by Mr. Bevin. He agreed with what Mr. Nash had said about Communism in Europe; but that, in his view, strengthened the case for not seeking to force a settlement of the long-term problem. The Soviet Government might themselves be compelled to modify their attitude in time, and an attempt to force an early settlement might have the effect of consolidating their position in Eastern Germany. In this matter time was on our side.

Lord Addison said that he saw great danger in premature discussion of these difficult issues at a Peace Conference. If it appeared, at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in June, that the four Powers were substantially nearer to agreement on the main lines of the peace settlements for the ex-enemy satellite States in Europe, it might well be advantageous to hold an early conference on those settlements; but he would prefer to see how things went at the Council's next meeting before he finally made up his mind on this point.

MR. HALL endorsed the views expressed by Lord Addison. The most urgent need was to seek some solution of the short-term economic problems of Germany. The existing position was most unsatisfactory; and it was intolerable that the British taxpayer should have to continue to find £80 million a year for the British Zone. Far from receiving any reparations from Germany, the United Kingdom were in effect paying reparations to Germany; and this was a situation which could not be allowed to continue.

As regards long-term problems, he supported the line which Mr. Bevin had been taking in the discussions in Paris. He and all his colleagues in the United Kingdom Government were deeply grateful to Mr. Bevin for the tenacity and skill with which he had presented the British case in the course of these difficult negotiations; and he had been glad to hear that these feelings were shared by the representatives of the Dominion Governments now in London.

MR. BEVIN thanked Dominion Ministers for their most valuable contributions to the discussion of these difficult problems. He was clear that we could no longer afford the policy of appeasement to Russia which we had had to adopt during the war. We could not expect the change to be popular with Russia.

He did not know what conclusion to draw as to the ultimate aim of Russian policy. It was dictated, he thought, partly by fear, partly by expansionism and partly by the Communist philosophy. A very powerful machine had been built up and it might be difficult to change its direction. But there were great internal problems and stresses in Russia and they might cause a change. Policy was still rigidly controlled from the Kremlin—which added to the difficulty of negotiation —and it might be changed if M. Stalin thought it expedient.

Nationality of Married Women.

1. The meeting had before them memoranda by the South African Delegation (P.M.M. (46) 28) and by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) on the nationality of married women.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that forceful representations had been made to the Union Government to the effect that the nationality of a wife should not be affected without her consent either by the mere fact of marriage or by any change in her husband's nationality. The Union Goverment were disposed to agree that a British woman should retain her British nationality on marriage to an alien unless she explicitly declared her desire to acquire her husband's nationality; and that, similarly, a British woman should be allowed to retain her British nationality if her husband, having been a British subject at the time of the marriage, subsequently became an alien. The Union Government had, however, wished to ascertain the views of other members of the British Commonwealth on this question. In the memorandum by the United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) it had been pointed out that provision had already been made in the laws of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions other than South Africa to give effect to the principle that the naturalisation of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent. The nationality laws of these parts of the British Commonwealth also enabled a British woman, on marriage with an alien, to retain her British nationality in all cases where she did not acquire her husband's nationality under the law of his country. British nationality law would, however, be profoundly affected by a new Nationality Bill now under consideration by the Canadian Parliament; and the United Kingdom Government had already suggested to all Dominion Governments that a conference of experts should be held to consider what changes should be made in the nationality laws of the other self-governing parts of the Commonwealth, or what other action should be taken, to preserve the common status of British subjects, in the light of the new approach to the question of British nationality which was made in this Canadian Bill. The United Kingdom Ministers had therefore suggested that this conference of experts should now be invited to study, not only the issues raised by the Canadian Bill, but also the detailed questions which would arise if the principle of equality of the sexes were generally accepted by all countries of the Commonwealth as the basis of their law relating to the nationality of married women.

Field-Marshal Smuts said he recognised that this was a technical subject which called for detailed study by experts; and he supported the suggestion that it should be remitted for detailed investigation by the conference of experts on nationality law which had been proposed by the United Kingdom Government.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government agreed that such a conference should be held and would be glad to nominate legal experts to take part in it. He also agreed that the questions which Field-Marshal Smuts had raised about the nationality of married women should be included among the subjects to be discussed at the conference. While he agreed with the substance of what was said about the new Canadian Bill in paragraph 10 of the memorandum by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) he asked that, if reference were made to this in any public statement, it should take the following form :—

> " In view of the fact that the Canadian Bill introduces certain new principles in nationality legislation, the United Kingdom Government has suggested the desirability of holding a meeting of legal experts to examine the possible modifications in the general status of British subjects that would result from it and which may make desirable corresponding changes in the legislation of the other countries of the Commonwealth."

LORD ADDISON said that he readily accepted the amended version of this statement proposed by Mr. Mackenzie King.

DR. EVATT said that, as stated in paragraph 4 of P.M.M. (46) 30, the Australian law already provided that a British woman marrying an alien should retain the rights and obligations of a British subject in Australia, even though she acquired by her marriage the nationality of her husband. The Australian Government desired, however, that such rights conceded by the laws of one part of the British Commonwealth should be recognised in other parts of the Commonwealth; and they therefore favoured discussion of this problem on a Commonwealth basis. They also desired similar discussion of the new situation created by the Canadian Bill—though they were themselves disposed in principle to favour the changes proposed by that Bill. All these matters raised, however, a number of complex legal issues, which required detailed examination by experts; and it would be inexpedient for Governments to express their final views until a conference of experts had been held and its report had been considered.

MR. NASH said that his Government favoured the view that the law relating to the nationality of married women should be based on the principle of equality of the sexes. At the same time they recognised that difficult legal issues were involved and he supported the proposal for the holding of a conference of experts to consider these problems relating to the nationality of married women, and also the wider issues raised by the Canadian Nationality Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government were anxious to bring their new Nationality Bill into operation on the 1st January, 1947, and on this account they would be glad if the proposed conference of experts could be held at an early date.

Further discussion showed that there was general agreement that the conference of experts should be held in London during the course of the next few weeks.

> It was agreed that Lord Addison should discuss with the Lord Chancellor the detailed terms of reference for the proposed conference of experts on British nationality law and should thereafter take steps to convene the conference in London at the earliest date convenient to the representatives of the various Dominions.

South-West Africa.

2. FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he wished to take this opportunity of discussing with representatives of other parts of the Commonwealth the proposals of the South African Government for the future of South-West Africa.

South-West Africa was now held by the Union of South Africa under a "C"-class Mandate. It was, however, different from other territories in that class in that geographically it was part and parcel of South Africa. Indeed, it was only by historical accident that it did not form part of the Union. In the scramble for Africa, Germany had acquired this barren country in 1886 and built up a colony there with immigrants from Germany. These German settlers caused the South African Government considerable trouble during the 1914–18 war.

At the Peace Conference after the last war President Wilson had been sympathetic to the idea that the territory should be annexed by South Africa. A statement had, however, been included in the Fourteen Points which precluded annexations of territory. A way out of this difficulty was found by the creation of the special "C"-class Mandates, which could be administered by the Mandatory Power as integral parts of its territory. South-West Africa had been administered accordingly ever since, but there was a strong feeling in South Africa that it should now be incorporated in the Union. South Africa had been troubled again before this war by a Nazi movement among the settlers in South-West Africa, and it had been necessary to send from the Union a strong police force to keep the peace in the territory.

The white population in South-West Africa, numbering some 31,000, had a local Parliament of their own. It had, however, no jurisdiction over the native population, as the Union had responsibility under the Mandate for native policy. The local Parliament had passed unanimously more than one resolution that the territory should be incorporated in the Union. The Union Government had consulted the native population; this numbered some 350,000, consisting in part of scattered and disintegrated tribes, with very little tribal organisation, but for the most part of more highly organised and virile Bantu tribes. These were governed practically on the principles of indirect rule with their own chiefs and councils. While it had been rather difficult to consult the scattered tribes, consultation with those who had their own council had been easier and it was possible to say that some 80 per cent. of the native population had agreed that the territory should be incorporated in the Union.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that in San Francisco he had given notice that he would apply to the United Nations Organisation for their approval of incorporation. He recalled that the objective of the trusteeship system was the development of self-government. It seemed to him that this objective could be reached equally well by making a mandated territory independent and by making it, at its own request, part of a neighbouring independent territory. He proposed to raise the matter, therefore, at the Assembly in September next. He quite appreciated that there might be criticisms of the proposals in the Assembly, because other Powers holding Mandates were accepting trusteeship arrangements. There would be opposition from those who, for one reason or another, were not in sympathy with the policy of the Union Government and from those who objected in principle to the colonial system or imperialism. In these circumstances, the South African Government were anxious for such assurances of support as they could obtain and naturally they turned first to their friends in the Commonwealth. The argument was often put forward in South Africa that she derived status and strength from membership of the immensely powerful association of the Commonwealth. If now she received support from the other members of the Commonwealth, that would be striking evidence of the truth of the argument and would be of very great assistance in promoting the causes they all had at heart.

LORD ADDISON said that the United Kingdom Government had given much thought to this matter. They recognised the great force of the considerations to which Field-Marshal Smuts had referred and they were clear that geographically South-West Africa would naturally be associated with the Union. Indeed Walvis Bay, its port, was already part of the Union. On the other hand, they were alive to the difficulties which were likely to arise in discussion of this matter at the United Nations Assembly. The chief concern of the United Kingdom Government had been whether incorporation would be supported by the inhabitants of the territory. They had concluded that, on the understanding that it was so supported, they would themselves give the South African Government their support. It seemed clear that the white population was heartily in support of incorporation. As to the natives, they understand that a section of the Herreros did not favour it but that a very large majority of the remainder were in favour.

Lord Addison said that the view of the United Kingdom Government had been reached after full consideration and detailed discussion as to the facts of the situation.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that, if he had been in Field-Marshal Smuts's place, he did not doubt that he would have taken the same view of the matter. He had not had an opportunity of discussing it with his colleagues but he thought that they would share his opinion. He assumed that it would not be advisable to make any declaration of the attitude of the other members of the Commonwealth before the matter was brought before the United Nations Assembly.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS agreed with this. He thought that any prior expression of solidarity by countries of the Commonwealth would be very undesirable.

DR. EVATT said that his advice would be that Field-Marshal Smuts should tread very warily in this matter. He felt certain that his proposal would meet with objection at the United Nations Assembly. At San Francisco there had been very strong feeling against the annexation of Mandated Territories. He thought that that feeling would be found also in the Assembly.

Speaking personally, he had every sympathy with Field-Marshal Smuts's general objectives and so far as he could he would do nothing to embarrass him. But the Australian Government had had no opportunity of considering the matter. They would have to take into account that, if South Africa incorporated South-West Africa, it would provide an argument to their own expansionists for the incorporation of New Guinea into Australia. Although geographically New Guinea was separate from Australia, it was part and parcel of their defence system. The Australian Government had always resisted such suggestions in the past on the ground that the obligations of the Mandate must continue and that the new trusteeship system, which would replace the Mandate, would give to the trustee much greater powers in regard to defence matters than they had had under the Mandate system. They had been asked by the United Kingdom Government whether they would take the lead in announcing that they were ready to place their mandated territories under trusteeship and they had, in fact, made a public statement that they would do so. He suggested that in bringing the matter before the United Nations Assembly Field-Marshal Smuts should present to the Assembly full factual information regarding the territory.

MR. NASH said that from a personal point of view he, too, would like to support Field-Marshal Smuts. But he foresaw much argument in the Assembly on the proposition. He referred to the fact that the objective of the trusteeship system was that the territories under trusteeship should be led towards independence. If the overwhelming majority of the population wished that independence to take the form of association with South Africa, would that not be possible within the trusteeship system? In that event he thought that it might be possible for the New Zealand Government to support the proposition.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that an analogy for what Mr. Nash was proposing could be found in the case of Transjordan. Transjordan had now been given her independence and it was open to her, if she so desired, to associate herself with any other Arab State.

MR. NASH agreed that this would be an analogy.

DR. EVATT suggested, however, that the circumstances might be somewhat different, since it was not suggested that the population of South-West Africa were ready for full self-government now or would be within any foreseeable time. He suggested that it might be possible to include in a trusteeship agreement for South-West Africa a clause to the effect that if the people of the territory made it clear by a vote or plebiscite that they desired incorporation in the Union, then the trusteeship agreement should cease and incorporation should take place. He suggested that Field-Marshal Smuts might consider this suggestion.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that it might be useful if the initiative for incorporation could be shown to come from the people of South-West Africa rather than from the Union.

MR. HALL recalled that it was possible to specify in a trusteeship agreement a period of transition. Might not Field-Marshal Smuts's best course be to seek to place South-West Africa under trusteeship, obtaining in the trusteeship agreement a provision that after a period of, say, five years, the territory should be incorporated in the Union? He was bound to confess that if a straight application for immediate incorporation were made, he foresaw that there would be many difficulties at the Assembly. He reminded Field-Marshal Smuts that it would be necessary for him to secure a two-thirds majority for his proposal at the Assembly. If by any chance the proposal was not accepted, this would place not only South Africa but also some of the nations who supported her in a position of some difficulty. Nevertheless, what Lord Addison had said represented, of course, the considered view of the United Kingdom Government.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was most anxious not to by-pass the United Nations Organisation because he had always been a strong supporter of the system. The position under the United Nations Charter was that if no agreement was reached for the placing of South-West Africa under trusteeship, it would remain with the Union. It could only come within the United Nations Organisation by an agreement to which the Union was a party. If there were no such agreement, then it remained outside the Organisation. The obligations of the Mandate would theoretically remain, but owing to the winding up of the League of Nations and the Permanent Mandates Commission there would be no authority to enforce their observance.

MR. MACKENZIE KING asked Field-Marshal Smuts what his answer would be if the United Nations Assembly were to request that a commission of enquiry might be sent to South-West Africa to confirm that the views of the inhabitants were in favour of incorporation.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that that was a matter which could then be considered. The Union Government had already obtained the consent of both white and native inhabitants.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said he understood that Field-Marshal Smuts had in the Union Parliament expressed his willingness to continue to make reports to the Trusteeship Council on affairs in South-West Africa. He suggested that it would be very helpful if he could make this point in laying the matter before the United Nations Organisation. He thought that if in addition Field-Marshal Smuts also offered a commission of enquiry, it might turn the scale in favour of South Africa's proposals. He thought that the United States delegation would be very anxious that nothing should be done which would discourage the French, the Belgians, or indeed the United States themselves from placing other territories under trusteeship. He suggested that it might be worth while for the South African Government before raising the matter in the Assembly to establish contact with the United States delegation, and particularly with Mr. John Foster Dulles, who had taken a particular interest in the subject.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said he was most grateful for the views expressed at the meeting. He proposed to consider further in the light of these the procedure which the Union Government should follow in the matter.

It was agreed that no public reference should be made to the fact that the subject had been discussed.

Future Business and Final Communiqué.

3. It was agreed that a draft of a communiqué to be issued after the final session on the following day should be circulated to Dominion Ministers as soon as possible. Various suggestions were made as to matters to be included in the communiqué.

LORD ADDISON said that before the meetings closed he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they could suggest any improvements in the existing machinery for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. It was agreed that this might be discussed on the following afternoon.

Nationality of Married Women.

1. The meeting had before them memoranda by the South African Delegation (P.M.M. (46) 28) and by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) on the nationality of married women.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that forceful representations had been made to the Union Government to the effect that the nationality of a wife should not be affected without her consent either by the mere fact of marriage or by any change in her husband's nationality. The Union Goverment were disposed to agree that a British woman should retain her British nationality on marriage to an alien unless she explicitly declared her desire to acquire her husband's nationality; and that, similarly, a British woman should be allowed to retain her British nationality if her husband, having been a British subject at the time of the marriage, subsequently became an alien. The Union Government had, however, wished to ascertain the views of other members of the British Commonwealth on this question. In the memorandum by the United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) it had been pointed out that provision had already been made in the laws of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions other than South Africa to give effect to the principle that the naturalisation of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent. The nationality laws of these parts of the British Commonwealth also enabled a British woman, on marriage with an alien, to retain her British nationality in all cases where she did not acquire her husband's nationality under the law of his country. British nationality law would, however, be profoundly affected by a new Nationality Bill now under consideration by the Canadian Parliament; and the United Kingdom Government had already suggested to all Dominion Governments that a conference of experts should be held to consider what changes should be made in the nationality laws of the other self-governing parts of the Commonwealth, or what other action should be taken, to preserve the common status of British subjects, in the light of the new approach to the question of British nationality which was made in this Canadian Bill. The United Kingdom Ministers had therefore suggested that this conference of experts should now be invited to study, not only the issues raised by the Canadian Bill, but also the detailed questions which would arise if the principle of equality of the sexes were generally accepted by all countries of the Commonwealth as the basis of their law relating to the nationality of married women.

Field-Marshal Smuts said he recognised that this was a technical subject which called for detailed study by experts; and he supported the suggestion that it should be remitted for detailed investigation by the conference of experts on nationality law which had been proposed by the United Kingdom Government.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government agreed that such a conference should be held and would be glad to nominate legal experts to take part in it. He also agreed that the questions which Field-Marshal Smuts had raised about the nationality of married women should be included among the subjects to be discussed at the conference. While he agreed with the substance of what was said about the new Canadian Bill in paragraph 10 of the memorandum by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) he asked that, if reference were made to this in any public statement, it should take the following form :—

> "In view of the fact that the Canadian Bill introduces certain new principles in nationality legislation, the United Kingdom Government has suggested the desirability of holding a meeting of legal experts to examine the possible modifications in the general status of British subjects that would result from it and which may make desirable corresponding changes in the legislation of the other countries of the Commonwealth."

LORD ADDISON said that he readily accepted the amended version of this statement proposed by Mr. Mackenzie King.

The position under the United Nations Charter was that if no agreement was reached for the placing of South-West Africa under trusteeship, it would remain with the Union. It could only come within the United Nations Organisation by an agreement to which the Union was a party. If there were no such agreement, then it remained outside the Organisation. The obligations of the Mandate would theoretically remain, but owing to the winding up of the League of Nations and the Permanent Mandates Commission there would be no authority to enforce their observance.

MR. MACKENZIE KING asked Field-Marshal Smuts what his answer would be if the United Nations Assembly were to request that a commission of enquiry might be sent to South-West Africa to confirm that the views of the inhabitants were in favour of incorporation.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that that was a matter which could then be considered. The Union Government had already obtained the consent of both white and native inhabitants.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said he understood that Field-Marshal Smuts had in the Union Parliament expressed his willingness to continue to make reports to the Trusteeship Council on affairs in South-West Africa. He suggested that it would be very helpful if he could make this point in laying the matter before the United Nations Organisation. He thought that if in addition Field-Marshal Smuts also offered a commission of enquiry, it might turn the scale in favour of South Africa's proposals. He thought that the United States delegation would be very anxious that nothing should be done which would discourage the French, the Belgians, or indeed the United States themselves from placing other territories under trusteeship. He suggested that it might be worth while for the South African Government before raising the matter in the Assembly to establish contact with the United States delegation, and particularly with Mr. John Foster Dulles, who had taken a particular interest in the subject.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said he was most grateful for the views expressed at the meeting. He proposed to consider further in the light of these the procedure which the Union Government should follow in the matter.

It was agreed that no public reference should be made to the fact that the subject had been discussed.

Future Business and Final Communiqué.

3. It was agreed that a draft of a communiqué to be issued after the final session on the following day should be circulated to Dominion Ministers as soon as possible. Various suggestions were made as to matters to be included in the communiqué.

LORD ADDISON said that before the meetings closed he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they could suggest any improvements in the existing machinery for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. It was agreed that this might be discussed on the following afternoon.

Nationality of Married Women.

1. The meeting had before them memoranda by the South African Delegation (P.M.M. (46) 28) and by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) on the nationality of married women.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that forceful representations had been made to the Union Government to the effect that the nationality of a wife should not be affected without her consent either by the mere fact of marriage or by any change in her husband's nationality. The Union Goverment were disposed to agree that a British woman should retain her British nationality on marriage to an alien unless she explicitly declared her desire to acquire her husband's nationality; and that, similarly, a British woman should be allowed to retain her British nationality if her husband, having been a British subject at the time of the marriage, subsequently became an alien. The Union Government had, however, wished to ascertain the views of other members of the British Commonwealth on this question. In the memorandum by the United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) it had been pointed out that provision had already been made in the laws of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions other than South Africa to give effect to the principle that the naturalisation of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent. The nationality laws of these parts of the British Commonwealth also enabled a British woman, on marriage with an alien, to retain her British nationality in all cases where she did not acquire her husband's nationality under the law of his country. British nationality law would, however, be profoundly affected by a new Nationality Bill now under consideration by the Canadian Parliament; and the United Kingdom Government had already suggested to all Dominion Governments that a conference of experts should be held to consider what changes should be made in the nationality laws of the other self-governing parts of the Commonwealth, or what other action should be taken, to preserve the common status of British subjects, in the light of the new approach to the question of British nationality which was made in this Canadian Bill. The United Kingdom Ministers had therefore suggested that this conference of experts should now be invited to study, not only the issues raised by the Canadian Bill, but also the detailed questions which would arise if the principle of equality of the sexes were generally accepted by all countries of the Commonwealth as the basis of their law relating to the nationality of married women.

Field-Marshal Smuts said he recognised that this was a technical subject which called for detailed study by experts; and he supported the suggestion that it should be remitted for detailed investigation by the conference of experts on nationality law which had been proposed by the United Kingdom Government.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government agreed that such a conference should be held and would be glad to nominate legal experts to take part in it. He also agreed that the questions which Field-Marshal Smuts had raised about the nationality of married women should be included among the subjects to be discussed at the conference. While he agreed with the substance of what was said about the new Canadian Bill in paragraph 10 of the memorandum by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M. (46) 30) he asked that, if reference were made to this in any public statement, it should take the following form :—

> "In view of the fact that the Canadian Bill introduces certain new principles in nationality legislation, the United Kingdom Government has suggested the desirability of holding a meeting of legal experts to examine the possible modifications in the general status of British subjects that would result from it and which may make desirable corresponding changes in the legislation of the other countries of the Commonwealth."

LORD ADDISON said that he readily accepted the amended version of this statement proposed by Mr. Mackenzie King.

DR. EVATT said that, as stated in paragraph 4 of P.M.M. (46) 30, the Australian law already provided that a British woman marrying an alien should retain the rights and obligations of a British subject in Australia, even though she acquired by her marriage the nationality of her husband. The Australian Government desired, however, that such rights conceded by the laws of one part of the British Commonwealth should be recognised in other parts of the Commonwealth; and they therefore favoured discussion of this problem on a Commonwealth basis. They also desired similar discussion of the new situation created by the Canadian Bill—though they were themselves disposed in principle to favour the changes proposed by that Bill. All these matters raised, however, a number of complex legal issues, which required detailed examination by experts; and it would be inexpedient for Governments to express their final views until a conference of experts had been held and its report had been considered.

MR. NASH said that his Government favoured the view that the law relating to the nationality of married women should be based on the principle of equality of the sexes. At the same time they recognised that difficult legal issues were involved and he supported the proposal for the holding of a conference of experts to consider these problems relating to the nationality of married women, and also the wider issues raised by the Canadian Nationality Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government were anxious to bring their new Nationality Bill into operation on the 1st January, 1947, and on this account they would be glad if the proposed conference of experts could be held at an early date.

Further discussion showed that there was general agreement that the conference of experts should be held in London during the course of the next few weeks.

> It was agreed that Lord Addison should discuss with the Lord Chancellor the detailed terms of reference for the proposed conference of experts on British nationality law and should thereafter take steps to convene the conference in London at the earliest date convenient to the representatives of the various Dominions.

South-West Africa.

2. FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he wished to take this opportunity of discussing with representatives of other parts of the Commonwealth the proposals of the South African Government for the future of South-West Africa.

South-West Africa was now held by the Union of South Africa under a "C"-class Mandate. It was, however, different from other territories in that class in that geographically it was part and parcel of South Africa. Indeed, it was only by historical accident that it did not form part of the Union. In the scramble for Africa, Germany had acquired this barren country in 1886 and built up a colony there with immigrants from Germany. These German settlers caused the South African Government considerable trouble during the 1914–18 war.

At the Peace Conference after the last war President Wilson had been sympathetic to the idea that the territory should be annexed by South Africa. A statement had, however, been included in the Fourteen Points which precluded annexations of territory. A way out of this difficulty was found by the creation of the special "C"-class Mandates, which could be administered by the Mandatory Power as integral parts of its territory. South-West Africa had been administered accordingly ever since, but there was a strong feeling in South Africa that it should now be incorporated in the Union. South Africa had been troubled again before this war by a Nazi movement among the settlers in South-West Africa, and it had been necessary to send from the Union a strong police force to keep the peace in the territory.

The white population in South-West Africa, numbering some 31,000, had a local Parliament of their own. It had, however, no jurisdiction over the native population, as the Union had responsibility under the Mandate for native policy. The local Parliament had passed unanimously more than one resolution that the territory should be incorporated in the Union. The Union Government had consulted the native population; this numbered some 350,000, consisting in part of scattered and disintegrated tribes, with very little tribal organisation, but for the most part of more highly organised and virile Bantu tribes. These were governed practically on the principles of indirect rule with their own chiefs and councils. While it had been rather difficult to consult the scattered tribes, consultation with those who had their own council had been easier and it was possible to say that some 80 per cent. of the native population had agreed that the territory should be incorporated in the Union.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that in San Francisco he had given notice that he would apply to the United Nations Organisation for their approval of incorporation. He recalled that the objective of the trusteeship system was the development of self-government. It seemed to him that this objective could be reached equally well by making a mandated territory independent and by making it, at its own request, part of a neighbouring independent territory. He proposed to raise the matter, therefore, at the Assembly in September next. He quite appreciated that there might be criticisms of the proposals in the Assembly, because other Powers holding Mandates were accepting trusteeship arrangements. There would be opposition from those who, for one reason or another, were not in sympathy with the policy of the Union Government and from those who objected in principle to the colonial system or imperialism. In these circumstances, the South African Government were anxious for such assurances of support as they could obtain and naturally they turned first to their friends in the Commonwealth. The argument was often put forward in South Africa that she derived status and strength from membership of the immensely powerful association of the Commonwealth. If now she received support from the other members of the Commonwealth, that would be striking evidence of the truth of the argument and would be of very great assistance in promoting the causes they all had at heart.

LORD ADDISON said that the United Kingdom Government had given much thought to this matter. They recognised the great force of the considerations to which Field-Marshal Smuts had referred and they were clear that geographically South-West Africa would naturally be associated with the Union. Indeed Walvis Bay, its port, was already part of the Union. On the other hand, they were alive to the difficulties which were likely to arise in discussion of this matter at the United Nations Assembly. The chief concern of the United Kingdom Government had been whether incorporation would be supported by the inhabitants of the territory. They had concluded that, on the understanding that it was so supported, they would themselves give the South African Government their support. It seemed clear that the white population was heartily in support of incorporation. As to the natives, they understand that a section of the Herreros did not favour it but that a very large majority of the remainder were in favour.

Lord Addison said that the view of the United Kingdom Government had been reached after full consideration and detailed discussion as to the facts of the situation.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that, if he had been in Field-Marshal Smuts's place, he did not doubt that he would have taken the same view of the matter. He had not had an opportunity of discussing it with his colleagues but he thought that they would share his opinion. He assumed that it would not be advisable to make any declaration of the attitude of the other members of the Commonwealth before the matter was brought before the United Nations Assembly.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS agreed with this. He thought that any prior expression of solidarity by countries of the Commonwealth would be very undesirable.

DR. EVATT said that his advice would be that Field-Marshal Smuts should tread very warily in this matter. He felt certain that his proposal would meet with objection at the United Nations Assembly. At San Francisco there had been very strong feeling against the annexation of Mandated Territories. He thought that that feeling would be found also in the Assembly.

Speaking personally, he had every sympathy with Field-Marshal Smuts's general objectives and so far as he could he would do nothing to embarrass him. But the Australian Government had had no opportunity of considering the matter. They would have to take into account that, if South Africa incorporated South-West Africa, it would provide an argument to their own expansionists for the incorporation of New Guinea into Australia. Although geographically New Guinea was separate from Australia, it was part and parcel of their defence system. The Australian Government had always resisted such suggestions in the past on the ground that the obligations of the Mandate must continue and that the new trusteeship system, which would replace the Mandate, would give to the trustee much greater powers in regard to defence matters than they had had under the Mandate system. They had been asked by the United Kingdom Government whether they would take the lead in announcing that they were ready to place their mandated territories under trusteeship and they had, in fact, made a public statement that they would do so. He suggested that in bringing the matter before the United Nations Assembly Field-Marshal Smuts should present to the Assembly full factual information regarding the territory.

MR. NASH said that from a personal point of view he, too, would like to support Field-Marshal Smuts. But he foresaw much argument in the Assembly on the proposition. He referred to the fact that the objective of the trusteeship system was that the territories under trusteeship should be led towards independence. If the overwhelming majority of the population wished that independence to take the form of association with South Africa, would that not be possible within the trusteeship system? In that event he thought that it might be possible for the New Zealand Government to support the proposition.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that an analogy for what Mr. Nash was proposing could be found in the case of Transjordan. Transjordan had now been given her independence and it was open to her, if she so desired, to associate herself with any other Arab State.

MR. NASH agreed that this would be an analogy.

DR. EVATT suggested, however, that the circumstances might be somewhat different, since it was not suggested that the population of South-West Africa were ready for full self-government now or would be within any foreseeable time. He suggested that it might be possible to include in a trusteeship agreement for South-West Africa a clause to the effect that if the people of the territory made it clear by a vote or plebiscite that they desired incorporation in the Union, then the trusteeship agreement should cease and incorporation should take place. He suggested that Field-Marshal Smuts might consider this suggestion.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that it might be useful if the initiative for incorporation could be shown to come from the people of South-West Africa rather than from the Union.

MR. HALL recalled that it was possible to specify in a trusteeship agreement a period of transition. Might not Field-Marshal Smuts's best course be to seek to place South-West Africa under trusteeship, obtaining in the trusteeship agreement a provision that after a period of, say, five years, the territory should be incorporated in the Union? He was bound to confess that if a straight application for immediate incorporation were made, he foresaw that there would be many difficulties at the Assembly. He reminded Field-Marshal Smuts that it would be necessary for him to secure a two-thirds majority for his proposal at the Assembly. If by any chance the proposal was not accepted, this would place not only South Africa but also some of the nations who supported her in a position of some difficulty. Nevertheless, what Lord Addison had said represented, of course, the considered view of the United Kingdom Government.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was most anxious not to by-pass the United Nations Organisation because he had always been a strong supporter of the system. The position under the United Nations Charter was that if no agreement was reached for the placing of South-West Africa under trusteeship, it would remain with the Union. It could only come within the United Nations Organisation by an agreement to which the Union was a party. If there were no such agreement, then it remained outside the Organisation. The obligations of the Mandate would theoretically remain, but owing to the winding up of the League of Nations and the Permanent Mandates Commission there would be no authority to enforce their observance.

MR. MACKENZIE KING asked Field-Marshal Smuts what his answer would be if the United Nations Assembly were to request that a commission of enquiry might be sent to South-West Africa to confirm that the views of the inhabitants were in favour of incorporation.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that that was a matter which could then be considered. The Union Government had already obtained the consent of both white and native inhabitants.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said he understood that Field-Marshal Smuts had in the Union Parliament expressed his willingness to continue to make reports to

DRAFT COMMUNIQUÉ.

In the course of the last five weeks the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and South Africa, and the Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand, have engaged in informal consultations on a number of questions arising in connection with the post-war settlements. The Prime Minister of Canada was present from the 20th to 24th May, the Prime Minister of Australia from the 23rd April to the 6th May, and the Prime Minister of South Africa from the 28th April to the 23rd May. The Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand was present throughout. The Prime Minister of Australia was represented, after his departure, by the Australian Minister of External Affairs. The representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa desire to place on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The discussions have been in the nature of an informal exchange of views. They have covered a broad field and have contributed greatly to the elucidation of many problems and to a mutual understanding of the issues involved. Among the subjects on which views were exchanged were the draft peace treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland; the future of Germany; security responsibilities and arrangements for liaison between British Commonwealth Governments on military affairs; and economic and welfare co-operation in the South Pacific and South-East Asia. The opportunity was taken for consultations on other current issues and matters of mutual interest, including separate consultations between individual United Kingdom and Dominion Ministers on questions specially affecting one or two countries only.

At the conclusion of the meetings, the assembled representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa place on record their appreciation of the value of this series of consultations which exemplifies the system of free discussion and exchange of view that characterises the relations of the countries of the British Commonwealth. This system has proved its worth. It is based on a continuous exchange of information and comment between the different members of the Commonwealth. It is flexible and can be used to meet a variety of situations and needs, both those where the responsibility is on one member alone and where the responsibility may have to be shared. It is peculiarly appropriate to the character of the British Commonwealth, with its independent members who have shown by their sacrifices in the common cause their devotion to kindred ideals and their community of outlook. While all are willing to consider and adopt any practical proposals for developing the existing system, it is agreed that the methods now practised are preferable to any formal centralised machinery. In their view such centralised machinery would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the effective co-operation which is the essential characteristic of the British Commonwealth and its great achievement.

They reaffirm their belief in the efficacy of free and constant consultation and co-operation, not only within the British Commonwealth but also in the wider international sphere. Moreover, they are determined to do everything in their power so that the historic co-operation of the allies in war shall be maintained in peace, to the utmost possible extent, and they look forward to the steady development of closer international co-operation based on increasing mutual confidence and devoted to the raising of human standards in conditions of liberty throughout the whole world. They declare again the determination of their Governments to give the fullest support to the United Nations Organisation, not only as a foundation of future peace and security but also as a means for promoting economic progress and social welfare.

United Kingdom Defence Obligations.

2. The meeting had before them a memorandum by Lord Addison (P.M.M. (46) 31) summarising the present military and financial commitments of the United Kingdom. The memorandum showed that, in order to carry out the military commitments essential to an effective foreign policy, the United Kingdom would need to maintain in 1947 forces varying between 1,194,000 in strength at the beginning of the year and 1,077,000 at the end. There would be no alternative to the maintenance of lengthy compulsory military service over the next five years. Total military expenditure in the current year was £1,200 million plus additional charges arising from the termination of the war of £576 million which would be largely non-recurrent. Of the figure of £1,200 million some £250 million would be incurred overseas. Particulars were also given of other inescapable overseas expenditure to a total of £195 million to indicate the strain imposed on the United Kingdom's balance of payments.

LORD ADDISON, in recalling the previous discussions on responsibilities for Commonwealth defence, said that United Kingdom Ministers desired to bring to the attention of the Dominions the heavy burden now being borne by the United Kingdom. This short factual statement had therefore been prepared to focus attention on the magnitude of her military and financial obligations.

MR. BEVIN said that in the past the United Kingdom had, to a great degree, assumed the responsibility of the provision of forces to maintain the security of the Commonwealth, and for that matter of much of the rest of the world also. She had been able to bear the cost of this largely out of the income derived from foreign investments. To-day the position had changed. Her income from foreign investments had been very greatly reduced and, in order to earn foreign exchange to make good the loss of revenue from foreign investments, she must increase her exports of manufactured goods. This in its turn involved a most serious strain on her man-power, for it had been estimated that it would entail an increase of approximately 500,000 in the labour force required for the export industries. The supply of civilian goods to the home market must also be severely curtailed for some years to come. There was also the problem of finding funds for the repayment of the American loan—if it was granted—over the next 50 years. Mr. Bevin thought that it would have a disastrous effect in the sphere of foreign affairs if the United Kingdom defaulted on her obligations under the loan.

In these difficult circumstances the question arose in the mind of United Kingdom Ministers whether some relief could not be obtained for part of her defence burden, in respect of both man-power and finance. He did not suggest that there should be contributions to a common pool, nor was he suggesting any modification of the present freedom of action of the different members of the Commonwealth. But there might perhaps be some redistribution of responsibilities so that each member assumed special obligations in respect of that part of the world in which it was chiefly interested. We could not afford to return to the position of 1939 when the United Kingdom had had forces of only 500,000 and there had been no really co-ordinated plan of action in a common war effort. Having regard to the very great difficulty of maintaining the British position in foreign affairs, it would be a great reassurance to him if he knew that each member of the Commonwealth had a certain force ready which at the direction of the responsible Government could in an emergency be speedily mobilised and concentrated to take the strain in a particular area.

Referring to the measures necessary to maintain the strength of the armed forces in the United Kingdom, Mr. Bevin pointed out that for the first time in her history she would have to resort to compulsory military service in peace-time. The adolescent life of the country would be gravely affected by this measure, at a time when it was the universal desire to improve the standard of life and of education.

The Dominions could assist the United Kingdom in meeting her heavy obligations by direct or indirect means, and an overall review of the Commonwealth defence obligations seemed desirable, so that the burden could be apportioned in an equitable manner.

Dr. DALTON emphasised the magnitude of the financial commitments of the United Kingdom. Sterling balances to a very large total were held by many countries, both within the Empire and outside it. India's holdings accounted for approximately half the total; Egypt's holdings were also very large. As indicated in the memorandum military expenditure during the financial year 1946–47 would amount to £1,776 million, of which £1,200 million was recurrent. There were also other heavy commitments in overseas expenditure, such as the United Kingdom contribution to U.N.R.R.A., the expenditure in foreign exchange for Germany, expenditure in Greece and for Polish refugees, the relief and rehabilitation in Far Eastern colonies which had been overrun by the Japanese, and expenditure falling on the British Exchequer for peace-time developments in the Colonies.

Mr. ATTLEE made four points. First he wished to take this opportunity of acknowledging the very generous financial assistance already provided by the Dominions and especially by Canada. Secondly, he pointed out that, with the development of the United Nations Organisation, the United Kingdom would be called upon to make a contribution to the military forces to be put at the disposal of that Organisation. This would place an added burden upon this country, which would have to be met. Thirdly, he emphasised the magnitude of the military tasks in Europe which were the responsibility of British forces; these would continue for some time. Lastly, the United Kingdom was faced with the provision of forces for the protection of world-wide lines of communication; while in the past the Royal Navy had been able to carry out this task, air and ground forces were now also necessary. With the development of weapons, the quality and number of men required had increased, involving a greater strain than ever before on our resources of both man-power and finance. The future, therefore, gave cause for grave concern.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the memorandum with great attention. He would have liked to be able to make a positive contribution to the discussion but, as he had warned United Kingdom Ministers before he came, it would be quite impossible for him to discuss in any detail questions of defence or finance. His Ministers for Defence and Finance were not with him. He would be happy to make sure that the memorandum was made known to his colleagues and carefully studied by them. The matter was indeed one which required careful study and he was not in a position to make any commitment at the present time. There were many considerations to be taken into account. Canada's own obligations were already very much greater than they had been before the war and the United Kingdom was not alone in having liabilities for the objects specified in the paper. It had also to be remembered that any contribution made to the military forces at the disposal of the United Nations Organisation must affect the decision on the extent of the Canadian contribution in the field of specific Commonwealth obligation. He added that the United States had vast resources. Had not the time come to ask them to assume greater security responsibilities in Europe?

DR. EVATT said that he found the memorandum a most impressive document. The figures it contained were to him most significant and he could quite understand the great anxiety which Mr. Attlee and his colleagues had on account of them. As in the case of the United Kingdom and Canada, Australia's expenditure on defence was already greatly increased, but Mr. Chifley had indicated at their earlier discussions that, in future, Australia must accept a permanent obligation greater than any that she had had before the war. It was worth taking out an insurance in peace-time against finding ourselves in the future as embarrassed as we had been in 1939. It had been the general view at the previous discussion that the problem could not be solved by the old method of a direct contribution by Dominion Governments to the cost of the United Kingdom services. Such a contribution to the Royal Navy had been suggested before the war. But this would be out of harmony with the temper of opinion in the Dominions. It seemed to him that each Dominion should rather assume obligations to provide forces under its own control for the defence of its territory and region. This was, in effect, a pooling of reserves. That was, indeed, the way that matters were developing in the Pacific. He added that greater decentralisation of control necessitated improved methods of military liaison. That matter had been discussed at an earlier meeting and he regarded it as very important. It was virtually true to say that there had been no Commonwealth plan for defence in 1939. We had had to improvise and in the result very effective arrangements had been worked out. He thought it would be most unfortunate if the foundations of this organisation were not kept in being. For instance, the Air Training Scheme had been a very important factor leading to victory. He would like a framework to be retained, which could be quickly revived if need be.

Dr. Evatt thought it worth mentioning that it had seemed to him more difficult in this war than in the previous war for officers from Dominion forces to rise to the most senior commands in the Empire, as General Monash had done. This might be due only to a difference in personal qualifications but it might also indicate some deficiency in the machinery for co-ordination of effort.

He noticed in the United Kingdom memorandum a reference to the fulfilment of commitments in the Netherlands East Indies. He hoped that British soldiers would not be kept there to maintain the Dutch position against the Indonesians. Quite apart from considerations of finance, he thought that politically this would be most unfortunate.

Finally, Dr. Evatt said that he would show this impressive document to Mr. Chifley who would study it most sympathetically with the desire to help in every way possible. Whatever could be done to lighten the burden on the United Kingdom should be done.

MR. NASH said that on the figures given it looked as though members of the Commonwealth other than the United Kingdom should bear some part of the cost at present being borne by her. But there were other factors which must also be taken into account and, as others had said, the subject required study. Dominion Governments, too, had their overseas expenditure: for instance, on the army of occupation in Japan and on contributions to U.N.R.R.A.

He suggested that it would be very useful if figures could be got out to show what was the cost in money and man-power of the defence of the whole Commonwealth. On that basis it would be possible to consider how the cost should be divided. Even if each Dominion were made responsible for the defence of its own region—and New Zealand would be willing to take their share in the Pacific—this would still leave the United Kingdom responsible for the lines of communication.

Mr. Nash feared that New Zealand's contribution could not in any event be large, compared to the very large figures of the United Kingdom. Her own expenditure for defence purposes had been in the neighbourhood of £1,000,000 before the war. It was this year of the order of £30,000,000.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he found the memorandum a very alarming document. At the end of the last war there was much talk of disarmament. We no longer thought disarmament possible, but it was melancholy to think that the responsibilities set out in this paper were the fruits of victory—and only the first fruits; what the future held in store no one could tell.

The members of the British Commonwealth had undertaken undefined obligations to the United Nations Organisation, but they had at least as great an obligation to the British group of nations as they had to the United Nations. If they were prepared to support the former, how much more should they be prepared to support their own group? Everything depended on maintaining strong and intact the influence of this group. In this dangerous world it was one of the great buttresses of world order. If it went, what would remain?

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he could not see what decisions could be taken at the moment in the light of this memorandum. They must take home the facts given in it and study them. Those facts would be a great shock to the people of the Dominions if they became known and would, he feared, lead to a greater sense of frustration than already existed. One thing, however, appeared to him quite clear—that the burden on one member of the group was well nigh intolerable. It was unfair to look to the British Isles, after the sacrifices made during the war, to continue to pay for the peace at the rate now indicated. The Dominions had been very proud of the record of the United Kingdom as well as of their own war efforts, but they had not perhaps thought of the burdens she bore. These matters had not been brought out, but they must now be considered very carefully.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that there were many difficulties with which Dominion statesmen had to reckon. For instance, any help given could not be in the form of "tribute." The United Kingdom would not expect that. There was in the Dominions a strong sense of nationalism. But there was also a strong national self-respect; they would realise a duty to carry part of this burden.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that the objective of every member of the Commonwealth must be the support of our group of nations as a great Power. The United Kingdom alone was no longer a great Power; it could not be so in the nature of things. Its power was now spread over the whole group and we must all adjust our view-points to this new situation. But it would require a great deal of education before people throughout the Empire would realise this fundamental change in the balance of power. Certainly the public in the Dominions, and he thought also the public in the United Kingdom, were not educated on these matters.

MR. MACKENZIE KING hoped that it would not be misunderstood if he took a somewhat reserved attitude on a paper of this importance. The question whether it would not be best to have a Commonwealth defence policy with allocation of specific liabilities was a recurrent one. Suggestions on this subject had been made as early as the Imperial Conference of 1923 and again in 1926. There had been strong Dominion opposition to the proposals, for while there were military and financial advantages in such a system, there were also political considerations which no Dominion Minister could afford to overlook. The best plan in the world was of no value if the people would not accept it.

Mr. Mackenzie King said that, in his view, the surest way to win the support of the Dominions was to trust them to accept the obligations which they believed to be natural and right. The experience of the war had proved the wisdom of this course. If there had been a highly centralised policy there might have been a very different response from the Dominions. But if ever liberty was at stake, they could be trusted to respond wholeheartedly to the call.

Mr. Mackenzie King believed in the closest co-ordination and closest understanding which could be achieved, but he was not in favour of reversing the tendencies of the last 20 years.

DR. EVATT felt that none of the views expressed had been in any way inconsistent with the principles stated by Mr. Mackenzie King. He did not disagree with anything that the Prime Minister of Canada had said. There was, he thought, general agreement that there could not be a rigid plan, based on centralised methods.

DR. DALTON said that he much appreciated the response of Dominion representatives to the statement of the United Kingdom Government's obligations. He shared the view of Field-Marshal Smuts that, when the public knew the facts of the heavy burden that remained as an aftermath of the war on the Commonwealth as a whole, they would be shocked by them. It would, he said, be of great assistance if figures comparable to those of the paper under discussion could be made available in respect of each Dominion. Not only would these be of great interest for comparisons within the Commonwealth, but they would also give the outside world an adequate picture of the position.

MR. ATTLEE agreed that this would be very useful.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS also agreed that such figures would be useful. He was not for a tighter organisation but he had a profound belief in the importance of educating public opinion, and he could vouch from his own reaction to the United Kingdom figures now circulated that the facts were little known.

LORD ADDISON said that there was unanimous support among British Commonwealth Governments for the political principles enunciated by Mr. Mackenzie King. These were of the first importance. There was much slipshod thought on the subject of Commonwealth relations and it was not generally realised that the Commonwealth was an association of independent States living and working according to common ideals. As Field-Marshal Smuts said, it was important that public opinion should be educated on these matters.

Particulars were also given of other inescapable overseas expenditure to a total of £195 million to indicate the strain imposed on the United Kingdom's balance of payments.

LORD ADDISON, in recalling the previous discussions on responsibilities for Commonwealth defence, said that United Kingdom Ministers desired to bring to the attention of the Dominions the heavy burden now being borne by the United Kingdom. This short factual statement had therefore been prepared to focus attention on the magnitude of her military and financial obligations.

MR. BEVIN said that in the past the United Kingdom had, to a great degree, assumed the responsibility of the provision of forces to maintain the security of the Commonwealth, and for that matter of much of the rest of the world also. She had been able to bear the cost of this largely out of the income derived from foreign investments. To-day the position had changed. Her income from foreign investments had been very greatly reduced and, in order to earn foreign exchange to make good the loss of revenue from foreign investments, she must increase her exports of manufactured goods. This in its turn involved a most serious strain on her man-power, for it had been estimated that it would entail an increase of approximately 500,000 in the labour force required for the export industries. The supply of civilian goods to the home market must also be severely curtailed for some years to come. There was also the problem of finding funds for the repayment of the American loan—if it was granted—over the next 50 years. Mr. Bevin thought that it would have a disastrous effect in the sphere of foreign affairs if the United Kingdom defaulted on her obligations under the loan.

In these difficult circumstances the question arose in the mind of United Kingdom Ministers whether some relief could not be obtained for part of her defence burden, in respect of both man-power and finance. He did not suggest that there should be contributions to a common pool, nor was he suggesting any modification of the present freedom of action of the different members of the Commonwealth. But there might perhaps be some redistribution of responsibilities so that each member assumed special obligations in respect of that part of the world in which it was chiefly interested. We could not afford to return to the position of 1939 when the United Kingdom had had forces of only 500,000 and there had been no really co-ordinated plan of action in a common war effort. Having regard to the very great difficulty of maintaining the British position in foreign affairs, it would be a great reassurance to him if he knew that each member of the Commonwealth had a certain force ready which at the direction of the responsible Government could in an emergency be speedily mobilised and concentrated to take the strain in a particular area.

Referring to the measures necessary to maintain the strength of the armed forces in the United Kingdom, Mr. Bevin pointed out that for the first time in her history she would have to resort to compulsory military service in peace-time. The adolescent life of the country would be gravely affected by this measure, at a time when it was the universal desire to improve the standard of life and of education.

The Dominions could assist the United Kingdom in meeting her heavy obligations by direct or indirect means, and an overall review of the Commonwealth defence obligations seemed desirable, so that the burden could be apportioned in an equitable manner.

DR. DALTON emphasised the magnitude of the financial commitments of the United Kingdom. Sterling balances to a very large total were held by many countries, both within the Empire and outside it. India's holdings accounted for approximately half the total; Egypt's holdings were also very large. As indicated in the memorandum military expenditure during the financial year 1946–47 would amount to £1,776 million, of which £1,200 million was recurrent. There were also other heavy commitments in overseas expenditure, such as the United Kingdom contribution to U.N.R.R.A., the expenditure in foreign exchange for Germany, expenditure in Greece and for Polish refugees, the relief and rehabilitation in Far Eastern colonies which had been overrun by the Japanese, and expenditure falling on the British Exchequer for peace-time developments in the Colonies.

MR. ATTLEE made four points. First he wished to take this opportunity of acknowledging the very generous financial assistance already provided by the Dominions and especially by Canada. Secondly, he pointed out that, with the development of the United Nations Organisation, the United Kingdom would be called upon to make a contribution to the military forces to be put at the disposal of that Organisation. This would place an added burden upon this country, which would have to be met. Thirdly, he emphasised the magnitude of the military tasks in Europe which were the responsibility of British forces; these would continue for some time. Lastly, the United Kingdom was faced with the provision of forces for the protection of world-wide lines of communication; while in the past the Royal Navy had been able to carry out this task, air and ground forces were now also necessary. With the development of weapons, the quality and number of men required had increased, involving a greater strain than ever before on our resources of both man-power and finance. The future, therefore, gave cause for grave concern.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the memorandum with great attention. He would have liked to be able to make a positive contribution to the discussion but, as he had warned United Kingdom Ministers before he came, it would be quite impossible for him to discuss in any detail questions of defence or finance. His Ministers for Defence and Finance were not with him. He would be happy to make sure that the memorandum was made known to his colleagues and carefully studied by them. The matter was indeed one which required careful study and he was not in a position to make any commitment at the present time. There were many considerations to be taken into account. Canada's own obligations were already very much greater than they had been before the war and the United Kingdom was not alone in having liabilities for the objects specified in the paper. It had also to be remembered that any contribution made to the military forces at the disposal of the United Nations Organisation must affect the decision on the extent of the Canadian contribution in the field of specific Commonwealth obligation. He added that the United States had vast resources. Had not the time come to ask them to assume greater security responsibilities in Europe?

DR. EVATT said that he found the memorandum a most impressive document. The figures it contained were to him most significant and he could quite understand the great anxiety which Mr. Attlee and his colleagues had on account of them. As in the case of the United Kingdom and Canada, Australia's expenditure on defence was already greatly increased, but Mr. Chifley had indicated at their earlier discussions that, in future, Australia must accept a permanent obligation greater than any that she had had before the war. It was worth taking out an insurance in peace-time against finding ourselves in the future as embarrassed as we had been in 1939. It had been the general view at the previous discussion that the problem could not be solved by the old method of a direct contribution by Dominion Governments to the cost of the United Kingdom services. Such a contribution to the Royal Navy had been suggested before the war. But this would be out of harmony with the temper of opinion in the Dominions. It seemed to him that each Dominion should rather assume obligations to provide forces under its own control for the defence of its territory and region. This was, in effect, a pooling of reserves. That was, indeed, the way that matters were developing in the Pacific. He added that greater decentralisation of control necessitated improved methods of military liaison. That matter had been discussed at an earlier meeting and he regarded it as very important. It was virtually true to say that there had been no Commonwealth plan for defence in 1939. We had had to improvise and in the result very effective arrangements had been worked out. He thought it would be most unfortunate if the foundations of this organisation were not kept in being. For instance, the Air Training Scheme had been a very important factor leading to victory. He would like a framework to be retained, which could be quickly revived if need be.

Dr. Evatt thought it worth mentioning that it had seemed to him more difficult in this war than in the previous war for officers from Dominion forces to rise to the most senior commands in the Empire, as General Monash had done. This might be due only to a difference in personal qualifications but it might also indicate some deficiency in the machinery for co-ordination of effort.

He noticed in the United Kingdom memorandum a reference to the fulfilment of commitments in the Netherlands East Indies. He hoped that British soldiers would not be kept there to maintain the Dutch position against the Indonesians. Quite apart from considerations of finance, he thought that politically this would be most unfortunate.

Finally, Dr. Evatt said that he would show this impressive document to Mr. Chifley who would study it most sympathetically with the desire to help in every way possible. Whatever could be done to lighten the burden on the United Kingdom should be done.

MR. NASH said that on the figures given it looked as though members of the Commonwealth other than the United Kingdom should bear some part of the cost at present being borne by her. But there were other factors which must also be taken into account and, as others had said, the subject required study. Dominion Governments, too, had their overseas expenditure: for instance, on the army of occupation in Japan and on contributions to U.N.R.R.A.

He suggested that it would be very useful if figures could be got out to show what was the cost in money and man-power of the defence of the whole Commonwealth. On that basis it would be possible to consider how the cost should be divided. Even if each Dominion were made responsible for the defence of its own region—and New Zealand would be willing to take their share in the Pacific—this would still leave the United Kingdom responsible for the lines of communication.

Mr. Nash feared that New Zealand's contribution could not in any event be large, compared to the very large figures of the United Kingdom. Her own expenditure for defence purposes had been in the neighbourhood of £1,000,000 before the war. It was this year of the order of £30,000,000.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he found the memorandum a very alarming document. At the end of the last war there was much talk of disarmament. We no longer thought disarmament possible, but it was melancholy to think that the responsibilities set out in this paper were the fruits of victory—and only the first fruits; what the future held in store no one could tell.

The members of the British Commonwealth had undertaken undefined obligations to the United Nations Organisation, but they had at least as great an obligation to the British group of nations as they had to the United Nations. If they were prepared to support the former, how much more should they be prepared to support their own group? Everything depended on maintaining strong and intact the influence of this group. In this dangerous world it was one of the great buttresses of world order. If it went, what would remain?

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he could not see what decisions could be taken at the moment in the light of this memorandum. They must take home the facts given in it and study them. Those facts would be a great shock to the people of the Dominions if they became known and would, he feared, lead to a greater sense of frustration than already existed. One thing, however, appeared to him quite clear—that the burden on one member of the group was well nigh intolerable. It was unfair to look to the British Isles, after the sacrifices made during the war, to continue to pay for the peace at the rate now indicated. The Dominions had been very proud of the record of the United Kingdom as well as of their own war efforts, but they had not perhaps thought of the burdens she bore. These matters had not been brought out, but they must now be considered very carefully.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that there were many difficulties with which Dominion statesmen had to reckon. For instance, any help given could not be in the form of "tribute." The United Kingdom would not expect that. There was in the Dominions a strong sense of nationalism. But there was also a strong national self-respect; they would realise a duty to carry part of this burden.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that the objective of every member of the Commonwealth must be the support of our group of nations as a great Power. The United Kingdom alone was no longer a great Power; it could not be so in the nature of things. Its power was now spread over the whole group and we must all adjust our view-points to this new situation. But it would require a great deal of education before people throughout the Empire would realise this fundamental change in the balance of power. Certainly the public in the Dominions, and he thought also the public in the United Kingdom, were not educated on these matters.

MR. MACKENZIE KING hoped that it would not be misunderstood if he took a somewhat reserved attitude on a paper of this importance. The question whether it would not be best to have a Commonwealth defence policy with allocation of specific liabilities was a recurrent one. Suggestions on this subject had been made as early as the Imperial Conference of 1923 and again in 1926. There had been strong Dominion opposition to the proposals, for while there were military and financial advantages in such a system, there were also political considerations which no Dominion Minister could afford to overlook. The best plan in the world was of no value if the people would not accept it.

Mr. Mackenzie King said that, in his view, the surest way to win the support of the Dominions was to trust them to accept the obligations which they believed to be natural and right. The experience of the war had proved the wisdom of this course. If there had been a highly centralised policy there might have been a very different response from the Dominions. But if ever liberty was at stake, they could be trusted to respond wholeheartedly to the call.

Mr. Mackenzie King believed in the closest co-ordination and closest understanding which could be achieved, but he was not in favour of reversing the tendencies of the last 20 years.

DR. EVATT felt that none of the views expressed had been in any way inconsistent with the principles stated by Mr. Mackenzie King. He did not disagree with anything that the Prime Minister of Canada had said. There was, he thought, general agreement that there could not be a rigid plan, based on centralised methods.

DR. DALTON said that he much appreciated the response of Dominion representatives to the statement of the United Kingdom Government's obligations. He shared the view of Field-Marshal Smuts that, when the public knew the facts of the heavy burden that remained as an aftermath of the war on the Commonwealth as a whole, they would be shocked by them. It would, he said, be of great assistance if figures comparable to those of the paper under discussion could be made available in respect of each Dominion. Not only would these be of great interest for comparisons within the Commonwealth, but they would also give the outside world an adequate picture of the position.

MR. ATTLEE agreed that this would be very useful.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS also agreed that such figures would be useful. He was not for a tighter organisation but he had a profound belief in the importance of educating public opinion, and he could vouch from his own reaction to the United Kingdom figures now circulated that the facts were little known.

LORD ADDISON said that there was unanimous support among British Commonwealth Governments for the political principles enunciated by Mr. Mackenzie King. These were of the first importance. There was much slipshod thought on the subject of Commonwealth relations and it was not generally realised that the Commonwealth was an association of independent States living and working according to common ideals. As Field-Marshal Smuts said, it was important that public opinion should be educated on these matters.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX: MINUTE 1.

(22nd May, 1946—3·45 p.m.)

Atomic Energy.

The Meeting had before them a note by the Secretaries (P.M.M. (46) 19).

MR. ATTLEE said that a preliminary discussion had taken place on this subject before Mr. Mackenzie King's arrival (P.M.M. (46) 11th Meeting, Minute 1), and that, as on that occasion, it might be convenient to consider the matter under the two heads of:

(i) Research and development work carried out on atomic energy in the Commonwealth.
(ii) The international control of atomic energy.

At the previous meeting Lord Portal had made a full statement on plans for research and development in the United Kingdom, some account of which had also been given in the paper circulated. It would be of interest to the meeting to hear from Mr. Mackenzie King of the progress made with the experimental work in Canada.

MR. WILMOT said that work was proceeding in the United Kingdom under three heads:

(a) The conversion of Harwell aerodrome to provide accommodation for the research establishment.
(b) The design and construction of a plant for the production of uranium metal.
(c) The selection of a suitable site for the large-scale graphite pile.

It would be most helpful to have the views of the Dominion Governments on the contribution which they might feel able to make to the project in the shape of raw materials and scientific man-power.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that Canada would certainly be able to help by the provision of raw material and would gladly make whatever contribution they could through the seconding of scientists to work for a period in the United Kingdom.

Turning to developments in Canada, he said that the special laboratory of the National Research Council established at Montreal in 1942 continued to be the principal centre of research into atomic energy in Canada. This laboratory had been set up as a result of a proposal by the United Kingdom authorities that an important research project should be undertaken in Canada during the war as a joint enterprise. A pilot plant had also been erected at Chalk River, Ontario, to investigate the use of thorium as a starting point for the production of active material. This plant had been constructed under the direction of Professor J. D. Cockcroft who was to become the head of the atomic research establishment in the United Kingdom. Both United Kingdom and Canadian scientists had been closely associated in its design and very close liaison had been maintained throughout with the research authorities in the United States, who had helped particularly by the provision of materials. Information had been made freely available to scientific workers in the United States.

Dealing with raw materials, he said that the current output from the Eldorado Mines on Great Bear Lake in Canada was at present being delivered to the United States Army under a war-time contract, which required a certain tonnage to be delivered by 1947, after which it would terminate. Current production was less than 300 tons a year, and while this was a useful contribution toward the total requirements of the United States it was a comparatively modest percentage of the total demand of the United States and the United Kingdom. The Canadian Advisory Panel estimated that the Belgian Congo might produce between 3,300 and 4,000 tons of uranium oxide in 1946. This source might, however, be exhausted or depleted in the near future. It was understood that there were possibilities of developing important deposits in South Africa. If this was confirmed it might substantially change the supply position in favour of the United Kingdom. There were also reports of deposits of raw material in South Australia.

The Government of Canada under its war-time powers had taken over the entire plant of the Eldorado Mine and had also reserved to itself control of all uranium ore and similar minerals that might be discovered in Canada in the future. The Government also intended to introduce legislation very similar to that which had just been introduced in the United Kingdom.

Dr. EVATT said that the Lilienthal Report made it clear that there were limitations to the extent to which the United States Government had shared with the United Kingdom and Canada the lead which they enjoyed in the development of atomic energy. If we were to continue to work closely with the United States, should there not be a greater measure of disclosure, particularly of technical know-how? He could confirm the statement that deposits of uranium had been discovered in South Australia, and there were also extensive deposits of thorium in Australia. The Australian Government proposed to pass legislation on lines similar to those adopted in the United Kingdom. They would certainly be willing that their scientists should continue to co-operate in work carried out by the United Kingdom Government, as had been done during the war.

In reply to a question by Field-Marshal Smuts, Mr. MACKENZIE KING said that he could give no accurate estimate of the life of the uranium deposits in Canada, though he thought it possible they were more extensive than had been supposed. Under the contract with the United States Army, which would be completed next year, considerable supplies had been made available to the United States, although the bulk of their requirements had been obtained from the Belgian Congo.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that the United States Government had full information about the uranium deposits in South Africa. Samples had been sent for analysis both to the United States and to the United Kingdom. The South African Government had assumed complete control over the production, processing and disposal of all such materials.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government were fully satisfied with the co-operation which had been achieved with the United Kingdom Government. They felt, however, that the establishment of the plan at Chalk River as a joint enterprise was to be regarded as a war-time arrangement and they might wish in future to assume sole responsibility for its development for industrial purposes.

Turning to the subject of the international control of atomic energy, Mr. ATTLEE summarised the conclusions which had emerged from the previous discussion. The report published in America, known as the Lilienthal Report, had attracted considerable attention. At the same time doubts had been expressed both by British and American scientists about the feasibility of the proposal for the "denaturing" of active material. While, therefore, the report might prove useful as a starting point, its conclusions would require further examination.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the minutes of the previous discussion on this subject and fully agreed with what had been said about the difficulty of formulating a workable scheme of inspection and control. He agreed, however, that the Lilienthal Report might be found useful as a starting point for further discussion.

The Government also intended to introduce legislation very similar to that which had just been introduced in the United Kingdom.

DR. EVATT said that the Lilienthal Report made it clear that there were limitations to the extent to which the United States Government had shared with the United Kingdom and Canada the lead which they enjoyed in the development of atomic energy. If we were to continue to work closely with the United States, should there not be a greater measure of disclosure, particularly of technical know-how? He could confirm the statement that deposits of uranium had been discovered in South Australia, and there were also extensive deposits of thorium in Australia. The Australian Government proposed to pass legislation on lines similar to those adopted in the United Kingdom. They would certainly be willing that their scientists should continue to co-operate in work carried out by the United Kingdom Government, as had been done during the war.

In reply to a question by Field-Marshal Smuts, MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he could give no accurate estimate of the life of the uranium deposits in Canada, though he thought it possible they were more extensive than had been supposed. Under the contract with the United States Army, which would be completed next year, considerable supplies had been made available to the United States, although the bulk of their requirements had been obtained from the Belgian Congo.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that the United States Government had full information about the uranium deposits in South Africa. Samples had been sent for analysis both to the United States and to the United Kingdom. The South African Government had assumed complete control over the production, processing and disposal of all such materials.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government were fully satisfied with the co-operation which had been achieved with the United Kingdom Government. They felt, however, that the establishment of the plan at Chalk River as a joint enterprise was to be regarded as a war-time arrangement and they might wish in future to assume sole responsibility for its development for industrial purposes.

Turning to the subject of the international control of atomic energy, MR. ATTLEE summarised the conclusions which had emerged from the previous discussion. The report published in America, known as the Lilienthal Report, had attracted considerable attention. At the same time doubts had been expressed both by British and American scientists about the feasibility of the proposal for the "denaturing" of active material. While, therefore, the report might prove useful as a starting point, its conclusions would require further examination.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the minutes of the previous discussion on this subject and fully agreed with what had been said about the difficulty of formulating a workable scheme of inspection and control. He agreed, however, that the Lilienthal Report might be found useful as a starting point for further discussion.

P.M.M. (46) 18th Meeting.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX: MINUTE 1.

(22nd May, 1946—3·45 p.m.)

Atomic Energy.

The Meeting had before them a note by the Secretaries (P.M.M. (46) 19).

MR. ATTLEE said that a preliminary discussion had taken place on this subject before Mr. Mackenzie King's arrival (P.M.M. (46) 11th Meeting, Minute 1), and that, as on that occasion, it might be convenient to consider the matter under the two heads of :

(i) Research and development work carried out on atomic energy in the Commonwealth.
(ii) The international control of atomic energy.

At the previous meeting Lord Portal had made a full statement on plans for research and development in the United Kingdom, some account of which had also been given in the paper circulated. It would be of interest to the meeting to hear from Mr. Mackenzie King of the progress made with the experimental work in Canada.

MR. WILMOT said that work was proceeding in the United Kingdom under three heads :

(a) The conversion of Harwell aerodrome to provide accommodation for the research establishment.
(b) The design and construction of a plant for the production of uranium metal.
(c) The selection of a suitable site for the large-scale graphite pile.

It would be most helpful to have the views of the Dominion Governments on the contribution which they might feel able to make to the project in the shape of raw materials and scientific man-power.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that Canada would certainly be able to help by the provision of raw material and would gladly make whatever contribution they could through the seconding of scientists to work for a period in the United Kingdom.

Turning to developments in Canada, he said that the special laboratory of the National Research Council established at Montreal in 1942 continued to be the principal centre of research into atomic energy in Canada. This laboratory had been set up as a result of a proposal by the United Kingdom authorities that an important research project should be undertaken in Canada during the war as a joint enterprise. A pilot plant had also been erected at Chalk River, Ontario, to investigate the use of thorium as a starting point for the production of active material. This plant had been constructed under the direction of Professor J. D. Cockcroft who was to become the head of the atomic research establishment in the United Kingdom. Both United Kingdom and Canadian scientists had been closely associated in its design and very close liaison had been maintained throughout with the research authorities in the United States, who had helped particularly by the provision of materials. Information had been made freely available to scientific workers in the United States.

Dealing with raw materials, he said that the current output from the Eldorado Mines on Great Bear Lake in Canada was at present being delivered to the United States Army under a war-time contract, which required a certain tonnage to be delivered by 1947, after which it would terminate. Current production was less than 300 tons a year, and while this was a useful contribution toward the total requirements of the United States it was a comparatively modest percentage of the total demand of the United States and the United Kingdom. The Canadian Advisory Panel estimated that the Belgian Congo might produce between 3,300 and 4,000 tons of uranium oxide in 1946. This source might, however, be exhausted or depleted in the near future. It was understood that there were possibilities of developing important deposits in South Africa. If this was confirmed it might substantially change the supply position in favour of the United Kingdom. There were also reports of deposits of raw material in South Australia.

The Government of Canada under its war-time powers had taken over the entire plant of the Eldorado Mine and had also reserved to itself control of all uranium ore and similar minerals that might be discovered in Canada in the future. The Government also intended to introduce legislation very similar to that which had just been introduced in the United Kingdom.

DR. EVATT said that the Lilienthal Report made it clear that there were limitations to the extent to which the United States Government had shared with the United Kingdom and Canada the lead which they enjoyed in the development of atomic energy. 1. The meeting discussed questions relating to the development and use of Atomic Energy. The discussion is recorded in a Confidential Annex.

United Kingdom Defence Obligations.

2. The meeting had before them a memorandum by Lord Addison (P.M.M. (46) 31) summarising the present military and financial commitments of the United Kingdom. The memorandum showed that, in order to carry out the military commitments essential to an effective foreign policy, the United Kingdom would need to maintain in 1947 forces varying between 1,194,000 in strength at the beginning of the year and 1,077,000 at the end. There would be no alternative to the maintenance of lengthy compulsory military service over the next five years. Total military expenditure in the current year was £1,200 million plus additional charges arising from the termination of the war of £576 million which would be largely non-recurrent. Of the figure of £1,200 million some £250 million would be incurred overseas. Particulars were also given of other inescapable overseas expenditure to a total of £195 million to indicate the strain imposed on the United Kingdom's balance of payments.

LORD ADDISON, in recalling the previous discussions on responsibilities for Commonwealth defence, said that United Kingdom Ministers desired to bring to the attention of the Dominions the heavy burden now being borne by the United Kingdom. This short factual statement had therefore been prepared to focus attention on the magnitude of her military and financial obligations.

Mr. BEVIN said that in the past the United Kingdom had, to a great degree, assumed the responsibility of the provision of forces to maintain the security of the Commonwealth, and for that matter of much of the rest of the world also. She had been able to bear the cost of this largely out of the income derived from foreign investments. To-day the position had changed. Her income from foreign investments had been very greatly reduced and, in order to earn foreign exchange to make good the loss of revenue from foreign investments, she must increase her exports of manufactured goods. This in its turn involved a most serious strain on her man-power, for it had been estimated that it would entail an increase of approximately 500,000 in the labour force required for the export industries. The supply of civilian goods to the home market must also be severely curtailed for some years to come. There was also the problem of finding funds for the repayment of the American loan—if it was granted—over the next 50 years. Mr. Bevin thought that it would have a disastrous effect in the sphere of foreign affairs if the United Kingdom defaulted on her obligations under the loan.

In these difficult circumstances the question arose in the mind of United Kingdom Ministers whether some relief could not be obtained for part of her defence burden, in respect of both man-power and finance. He did not suggest that there should be contributions to a common pool, nor was he suggesting any modification of the present freedom of action of the different members of the Commonwealth. But there might perhaps be some redistribution of responsibilities so that each member assumed special obligations in respect of that part of the world in which it was chiefly interested. We could not afford to return to the position of 1939 when the United Kingdom had had forces of only 500,000 and there had been no really co-ordinated plan of action in a common war effort. Having regard to the very great difficulty of maintaining the British position in foreign affairs, it would be a great reassurance to him if he knew that each member of the Commonwealth had a certain force ready which at the direction of the responsible Government could in an emergency be speedily mobilised and concentrated to take the strain in a particular area.

Referring to the measures necessary to maintain the strength of the armed forces in the United Kingdom, Mr. Bevin pointed out that for the first time in her history she would have to resort to compulsory military service in peace-time. The adolescent life of the country would be gravely affected by this measure, at a time when it was the universal desire to improve the standard of life and of education.

The Dominions could assist the United Kingdom in meeting her heavy obligations by direct or indirect means, and an overall review of the Commonwealth defence obligations seemed desirable, so that the burden could be apportioned in an equitable manner.

DR. DALTON emphasised the magnitude of the financial commitments of the United Kingdom. Sterling balances to a very large total were held by many countries, both within the Empire and outside it. India's holdings accounted for approximately half the total; Egypt's holdings were also very large. As indicated in the memorandum military expenditure during the financial year 1946–47 would amount to £1,776 million, of which £1,200 million was recurrent. There were also other heavy commitments in overseas expenditure, such as the United Kingdom contribution to U.N.R.R.A., the expenditure in foreign exchange for Germany, expenditure in Greece and for Polish refugees, the relief and rehabilitation in Far Eastern colonies which had been overrun by the Japanese, and expenditure falling on the British Exchequer for peace-time developments in the Colonies.

MR. ATTLEE made four points. First he wished to take this opportunity of acknowledging the very generous financial assistance already provided by the Dominions and especially by Canada. Secondly, he pointed out that, with the development of the United Nations Organisation, the United Kingdom would be called upon to make a contribution to the military forces to be put at the disposal of that Organisation. This would place an added burden upon this country, which would have to be met. Thirdly, he emphasised the magnitude of the military tasks in Europe which were the responsibility of British forces; these would continue for some time. Lastly, the United Kingdom was faced with the provision of forces for the protection of world-wide lines of communication; while in the past the Royal Navy had been able to carry out this task, air and ground forces were now also necessary. With the development of weapons, the quality and number of men required had increased, involving a greater strain than ever before on our resources of both man-power and finance. The future, therefore, gave cause for grave concern.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the memorandum with great attention. He would have liked to be able to make a positive contribution to the discussion but, as he had warned United Kingdom Ministers before he came, it would be quite impossible for him to discuss in any detail questions of defence or finance. His Ministers for Defence and Finance were not with him. He would be happy to make sure that the memorandum was made known to his colleagues and carefully studied by them. The matter was indeed one which required careful study and he was not in a position to make any commitment at the present time. There were many considerations to be taken into account. Canada's own obligations were already very much greater than they had been before the war and the United Kingdom was not alone in having liabilities for the objects specified in the paper. It had also to be remembered that any contribution made to the military forces at the disposal of the United Nations Organisation must affect the decision on the extent of the Canadian contribution in the field of specific Commonwealth obligation. He added that the United States had vast resources. Had not the time come to ask them to assume greater security responsibilities in Europe?

DR. EVATT said that he found the memorandum a most impressive document. The figures it contained were to him most significant and he could quite understand the great anxiety which Mr. Attlee and his colleagues had on account of them. As in the case of the United Kingdom and Canada, Australia's expenditure on defence was already greatly increased, but Mr. Chifley had indicated at their earlier discussions that, in future, Australia must accept a permanent obligation greater than any that she had had before the war. It was worth taking out an insurance in peace-time against finding ourselves in the future as embarrassed as we had been in 1939. It had been the general view at the previous discussion that the problem could not be solved by the old method of a direct contribution by Dominion Governments to the cost of the United Kingdom services. Such a contribution to the Royal Navy had been suggested before the war. But this would be out of harmony with the temper of opinion in the Dominions. It seemed to him that each Dominion should rather assume obligations to provide forces under its own control for the defence of its territory and region. This was, in effect, a pooling of reserves. That was, indeed, the way that matters were developing in the Pacific. He added that greater decentralisation of control necessitated improved methods of military liaison. That matter had been discussed at an earlier meeting and he regarded it as very important. It was virtually true to say that there had been no Commonwealth plan for defence in 1939. We had had to improvise and in the result very effective arrangements had been worked out. He thought it would be most unfortunate if the foundations of this organisation were not kept in being. For instance, the Air Training Scheme had been a very important factor leading to victory. He would like a framework to be retained, which could be quickly revived if need be.

Dr. Evatt thought it worth mentioning that it had seemed to him more difficult in this war than in the previous war for officers from Dominion forces to rise to the most senior commands in the Empire, as General Monash had done. This might be due only to a difference in personal qualifications but it might also indicate some deficiency in the machinery for co-ordination of effort.

He noticed in the United Kingdom memorandum a reference to the fulfilment of commitments in the Netherlands East Indies. He hoped that British soldiers would not be kept there to maintain the Dutch position against the Indonesians. Quite apart from considerations of finance, he thought that politically this would be most unfortunate.

Finally, Dr. Evatt said that he would show this impressive document to Mr. Chifley who would study it most sympathetically with the desire to help in every way possible. Whatever could be done to lighten the burden on the United Kingdom should be done.

MR. NASH said that on the figures given it looked as though members of the Commonwealth other than the United Kingdom should bear some part of the cost at present being borne by her. But there were other factors which must also be taken into account and, as others had said, the subject required study. Dominion Governments, too, had their overseas expenditure: for instance, on the army of occupation in Japan and on contributions to U.N.R.R.A.

He suggested that it would be very useful if figures could be got out to show what was the cost in money and man-power of the defence of the whole Commonwealth. On that basis it would be possible to consider how the cost should be divided. Even if each Dominion were made responsible for the defence of its own region—and New Zealand would be willing to take their share in the Pacific—this would still leave the United Kingdom responsible for the lines of communication.

Mr. Nash feared that New Zealand's contribution could not in any event be large, compared to the very large figures of the United Kingdom. Her own expenditure for defence purposes had been in the neighbourhood of £1,000,000 before the war. It was this year of the order of £30,000,000.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he found the memorandum a very alarming document. At the end of the last war there was much talk of disarmament. We no longer thought disarmament possible, but it was melancholy to think that the responsibilities set out in this paper were the fruits of victory—and only the first fruits; what the future held in store no one could tell.

The members of the British Commonwealth had undertaken undefined obligations to the United Nations Organisation, but they had at least as great an obligation to the British group of nations as they had to the United Nations. If they were prepared to support the former, how much more should they be prepared to support their own group? Everything depended on maintaining strong and intact the influence of this group. In this dangerous world it was one of the great buttresses of world order. If it went, what would remain?

Field-Marshal Smuts said that he could not see what decisions could be taken at the moment in the light of this memorandum. They must take home the facts given in it and study them. Those facts would be a great shock to the people of the Dominions if they became known and would, he feared, lead to a greater sense of frustration than already existed. One thing, however, appeared to him quite clear—that the burden on one member of the group was well nigh intolerable. It was unfair to look to the British Isles, after the sacrifices made during the war, to continue to pay for the peace at the rate now indicated. The Dominions had been very proud of the record of the United Kingdom as well as of their own war efforts, but they had not perhaps thought of the burdens she bore. These matters had not been brought out, but they must now be considered very carefully.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that there were many difficulties with which Dominion statesmen had to reckon. For instance, any help given could not be in the form of "tribute." The United Kingdom would not expect that. There was in the Dominions a strong sense of nationalism. But there was also a strong national self-respect; they would realise a duty to carry part of this burden.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that the objective of every member of the Commonwealth must be the support of our group of nations as a great Power. The United Kingdom alone was no longer a great Power; it could not be so in the nature of things. Its power was now spread over the whole group and we must all adjust our view-points to this new situation. But it would require a great deal of education before people throughout the Empire would realise this fundamental change in the balance of power. Certainly the public in the Dominions, and he thought also the public in the United Kingdom, were not educated on these matters.

MR. MACKENZIE KING hoped that it would not be misunderstood if he took a somewhat reserved attitude on a paper of this importance. The question whether it would not be best to have a Commonwealth defence policy with allocation of specific liabilities was a recurrent one. Suggestions on this subject had been made as early as the Imperial Conference of 1923 and again in 1926. There had been strong Dominion opposition to the proposals, for while there were military and financial advantages in such a system, there were also political considerations which no Dominion Minister could afford to overlook. The best plan in the world was of no value if the people would not accept it.

Mr. Mackenzie King said that, in his view, the surest way to win the support of the Dominions was to trust them to accept the obligations which they believed to be natural and right. The experience of the war had proved the wisdom of this course. If there had been a highly centralised policy there might have been a very different response from the Dominions. But if ever liberty was at stake, they could be trusted to respond wholeheartedly to the call.

Mr. Mackenzie King believed in the closest co-ordination and closest understanding which could be achieved, but he was not in favour of reversing the tendencies of the last 20 years.

DR. EVATT felt that none of the views expressed had been in any way inconsistent with the principles stated by Mr. Mackenzie King. He did not disagree with anything that the Prime Minister of Canada had said. There was, he thought, general agreement that there could not be a rigid plan, based on centralised methods.

DR. DALTON said that he much appreciated the response of Dominion representatives to the statement of the United Kingdom Government's obligations. He shared the view of Field-Marshal Smuts that, when the public knew the facts of the heavy burden that remained as an aftermath of the war on the Commonwealth as a whole, they would be shocked by them. It would, he said, be of great assistance if figures comparable to those of the paper under discussion could be made available in respect of each Dominion. Not only would these be of great interest for comparisons within the Commonwealth, but they would also give the outside world an adequate picture of the position.

MR. ATTLEE agreed that this would be very useful.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS also agreed that such figures would be useful. He was not for a tighter organisation but he had a profound belief in the importance of educating public opinion, and he could vouch from his own reaction to the United Kingdom figures now circulated that the facts were little known.

LORD ADDISON said that there was unanimous support among British Commonwealth Governments for the political principles enunciated by Mr. Mackenzie King. These were of the first importance. There was much slipshod thought on the subject of Commonwealth relations and it was not generally realised that the Commonwealth was an association of independent States living and working according to common ideals. As Field-Marshal Smuts said, it was important that public opinion should be educated on these matters.

NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN

1. The meeting had before them memoranda by the South African Delegation (P.M.M.(46) 28) and by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M.(46) 30) on the nationality of married women.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that forceful representations had been made to the Union Government to the effect that the nationality of a wife should not be affected without her consent either by the mere fact of marriage or by any change in her husband's nationality. The Union Government were disposed to agree that a British woman should retain her British nationality on marriage to an alien unless she explicitly declared her desire to acquire her husband's nationality; and that, similarly, a British woman should be allowed to retain her British nationality if her husband, having been a British subject at the time of the marriage, subsequently became an alien. The Union Government had, however, wished to ascertain the views of other members of the British Commonwealth on this question. In the memorandum by the United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M.(46) 30) it had been pointed out that provision had already been made in the laws of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions other than South Africa to give effect to the principle that the naturalisation of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent. The nationality laws of these parts of the British Commonwealth also enabled a British woman, on marriage with an alien, to retain her British nationality in all cases where she did not acquire her husband's nationality under the law of his country. British nationality law would, however, be profoundly affected by a new Nationality Bill now under consideration by the Canadian Parliament; and the United Kingdom Government had already suggested to all Dominion Governments that a conference of experts should be held to consider what changes should be made in the nationality laws of the other self-governing parts of the Commonwealth, or what other action should be taken, to preserve the common status of British subjects, in the light of the new approach to the question of British nationality which was made in this Canadian Bill. The United Kingdom Ministers had therefore suggested that this conference of experts should now be invited to study, not only the issues raised by the Canadian Bill, but also the detailed questions which would arise if the principle of equality of the sexes were generally accepted by all countries of the Commonwealth as the basis of their law relating to the nationality of married women.

Field Marshal Smuts said he recognised that this was a technical subject which called for detailed study by experts; and he supported the suggestion that it should be remitted for detailed investigation by the conference of experts on nationality law which had been proposed by the United Kingdom Government.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government agreed that such a conference should be held and would be glad to nominate legal experts to take part in it. He also agreed that the questions which Field-Marshal Smuts had raised about the nationality of married women should be included among the subjects to be discussed at the conference. While he agreed with the substance of what was said about the new Canadian Bill in paragraph 10 of the memorandum by United Kingdom Ministers (P.M.M.(46) 30) he asked that if reference were made to this in any public statement it should take the following form:-

"In view of the fact that the Canadian Bill introduces certain new principles in nationality legislation, the United Kingdom Government has suggested the desirability of holding a meeting of legal experts to examine the possible modifications in the general status of British subjects that would result from it and which may make desirable corresponding changes in the legislation of the other countries of the Commonwealth."

LORD ADDISON said that he readily accepted the amended version of this statement proposed by Mr. Mackenzie King.

DR. EVATT said that, as stated in paragraph 4 of P.M.M.(46) 30, the Australian law already provided that a British woman marrying an alien should retain the rights and obligations of a British subject in Australia, even though she acquired by her marriage the nationality of her husband. The Australian Government desired, however, that such rights conceded by the laws of one part of the British Commonwealth should be recognised in other parts of the Commonwealth; and they therefore favoured discussion of this problem on a Commonwealth basis. They also desired similar discussion of the new situation created by the Canadian Bill - though they were themselves disposed in principle to favour the changes proposed by that Bill. All these matters raised, however, a number of complex legal issues, which required detailed examination by experts; and it would be inexpedient for Governments to express their final views until a conference of experts had been held and its report had been considered.

NR. NASH said that his Government favoured the view that the law relating to the nationality of married women should be based on the principle of equality of the sexes. At the same time they recognised that difficult legal issues were involved and he supported the proposal for the holding of a conference of experts to consider these problems relating to the nationality of married women and also the wider issues raised by the Canadian Nationality Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government were anxious to bring their new Nationality Bill into operation on 1st January, 1947, and on this account they would be glad if the proposed conference of experts could be held at an early date.

Further discussion showed that there was general agreement that the conference of experts should be held in London during the course of the next few weeks.

It was agreed that Lord Addison should discuss with the Lord Chancellor the detailed terms of reference for the proposed conference of experts on British nationality law and should thereafter take steps to convene the conference in London at the earliest date convenient to the representatives of the various Dominions.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

2. FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he wished to take this opportunity of discussing with representatives of other parts of the Commonwealth the proposals of the South African Government for the future of South West Africa.

South West Africa was now held by the Union of South Africa under a 'C' class Mandate. It was, however, different from other territories in that class in that geographically it was part and parcel of South Africa. Indeed, it was only by historical accident that it did not form part of the Union. In the scramble for Africa, Germany had acquired this barren country in 1886 and built up a colony there with immigrants from Germany. These German settlers caused the South African Government considerable trouble during the 1914-18 war.

At the Peace Conference after the last war President Wilson had been sympathetic to the idea that the territory should be annexed by South Africa. A statement had, however, been included in the Fourteen Points which precluded annexations of territory. A way out of this difficulty was found by the creation of the special 'C' class Mandates, which could be administered by the Mandatory Power as integral parts of its territory. South West Africa had been administered accordingly ever since but there was a strong feeling in South Africa that it should now be incorporated in the Union. South Africa had been troubled again before this war by a Nazi movement among the settlers in South West Africa and it had been necessary to send from the Union a strong police force to keep the peace in the territory.

The white population in South Africa, numbering some 31,000, had a local Parliament of their own. It had, however, no jurisdiction over the native population, as the Union had responsibility under the Mandate for native policy. The local Parliament had passed unanimously more than one resolution that the territory should be incorporated in the Union. The Union Government had consulted the native population; this numbered some 350,000, consisting in part of scattered and disintegrated tribes with very little tribal organisation but for the most part of more highly organised and virile Bantu tribes. These were governed practically on the principles of indirect rule with their own chiefs and councils. While it had been rather difficult to consult the scattered tribes, consultation with those who had their own councils had been easier and it was possible to say that some 80 per cent of the native population had agreed that the territory should be incorporated in the Union.

Field Marshal Smuts said that in San Francisco he had given notice that he would apply to the United Nations Organisation for their approval of incorporation. He recalled that the objective of the trusteeship system was the development of self-government. It seemed to him that this objective could be reached equally well by making a mandated territory independent and by making it, at its own request, part of a neighbouring independent territory. He proposed to raise the matter, therefore, at the Assembly in September next. He quite appreciated that there might be criticisms of the proposals in the Assembly, because other Powers holding Mandates were accepting trusteeship arrangements. There would be opposition from those who for one reason or another were not in sympathy with the policy of the Union Government and from those who objected in principle to the colonial system or imperialism. In these circumstances, the South African Government were anxious for such assurances of support as they could obtain and naturally they turned first to their friends in the Commonwealth. The argument was often put forward in South Africa that she derived status and strength from membership of the immensely powerful association of the Commonwealth. If now she received support from the other members of the Commonwealth, that would be striking evidence of the truth of the argument and would be of very great assistance in promoting the causes they all had at heart.

LORD ADDISON said that the United Kingdom Government had given much thought to this matter. They recognised the great force of the considerations to which Field Marshal Smuts had referred and they were clear that geographically South West Africa would naturally be associated with the Union. Indeed Walvis Bay, its port, was already part of the Union. On the other hand, they were alive to the difficulties which were likely to arise in discussion of this matter at the United Nations Assembly. The chief concern of the United Kingdom Government had been whether incorporation would be supported by the inhabitants of the territory. They had concluded that, on the understanding that it was so supported, they would themselves give the South African Government their support. It seemed clear that the white population was heartily in support of incorporation. As to the natives, they understand that a section of the Herreros did not favour it but that a very large majority of the remainder were in favour.

Lord Addison said that the view of the United Kingdom Government had been reached after full consideration and detailed discussion as to the facts of the situation.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that, if he had been in Field Marshal Smuts' place, he did not doubt that he would have taken the same view of the matter. He had not had an opportunity of discussing it with his colleagues but he thought that they would share his opinion. He assumed that it would not be advisable to make any declaration of the attitude of the other members of the Commonwealth before the matter was brought before the United Nations Assembly.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS agreed with this. He thought that any prior expression of solidarity by countries of the Commonwealth would be very undesirable.

DR. EVATT said that his advice would be that Field Marshal Smuts should tread very warily in this matter. He felt certain that his proposal would meet with objection at the United Nations Assembly. At San Francisco there had been very strong feeling against the annexation of Mandated Territories. He thought that that feeling would be found also in the Assembly.

Speaking personally, he had every sympathy with Field Marshal Smuts' views and so far as he could he would do nothing to embarrass him. But the Australian Government had had no opportunity of considering the matter. They would have to take into account that, if South Africa incorporated South West Africa, it would provide an argument to their own expansionists for the incorporation of New Guinea into Australia. Although geographically New Guinea was separate from Australia, it was part and parcel of their defence system. The Australian Government had always resisted such suggestions in the past on the ground that the obligations of the Mandate must continue and that the new trusteeship system, which would replace the Mandate, would give to the trustee much greater powers in regard to defence matters than they had had under the Mandate system. They had been asked by the United Kingdom Government whether they would take the lead in announcing that they were ready to place their mandated territories under trusteeship and they had in fact made a public statement that they would so so. The Australian Government would certainly consider Field Marshal Smuts' proposals in regard to South West Africa and he could assure him of his desire so to carry out the Australian proposals in regard to New Guinea as not to embarrass South Africa. He suggested that in bringing the matter before the United Nations Assembly Field Marshal Smuts should present to the Assembly full factual information regarding the territory.

MR. NASH said that from a personal point of view he too would like to support Field Marshal Smuts. But he foresaw much argument in the Assembly on the proposition. He referred to the fact that the objective of the trusteeship system was that the territories under trusteeship should be led towards independence. If the overwhelming majority of the population wished that independence to take the form of association with South Africa, would that not be possible within the trusteeship system? In that event he thought that it might be possible for the New Zealand Government to support the proposition.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that an analogy for what Mr. Nash was proposing could be found in the case of Transjordan. Transjordan had now been given her independence and it was open to her, if she so desired, to associate herself with any other Arab state.

MR. NASH agreed that this would be an analogy.

DR. EVATT suggested, however, that the circumstances might be somewhat different, since it was not suggested that the population of South West Africa were ready for full self-government now or would be within any foreseeable time. He suggested that it might be possible to include in the trusteeship agreement a clause to the effect that if the people of the territory made it clear by a vote or plebiscite that they desired incorporation in the Union, then the trusteeship agreement should cease and incorporation should take place. He suggested that Field Marshal Smuts might consider this suggestion.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that it might be useful if the initiative for incorporation could be shown to come from the people of South West Africa rather than from the Union.

MR. HALL recalled that it was possible to specify in a trusteeship agreement a period of transition. Might not Field Marshal Smuts' best course be to seek to place South West Africa under trusteeship, obtaining in the trusteeship agreement a provision that after a period of, say, five years, the territory should be incorporated in the Union? He was bound to confess that if a straight application for immediate incorporation were made, he foresaw that there would be many difficulties at the Assembly. He reminded Field Marshal Smuts that it would be necessary for him to secure a two-thirds majority for his proposal at the Assembly. If by any chance the proposal was not accepted, this would place not only South Africa but also some of the nations who supported her in a position of some difficulty. Nevertheless what Lord Addison had said represented, of course, the considered view of the United Kingdom Government.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was most anxious not to by-pass the United Nations Organisation because he had always been a strong supporter of the system. The position under the United Nations Charter was that if no agreement was reached for the placing of South West Africa under trusteeship, it would remain with the Union. It could only come within the United Nations Organisation by an agreement to which the Union was a party. If there were no such agreement, then it remained outside the Organisation. The obligations of the Mandate would theoretically remain, but owing to the winding up of the League of Nations and the Permanent Mandates Commission there would be no authority to enforce their observance.

MR. MACKENZIE KING asked Field Marshal Smuts what his answer would be if the United Nations Assembly were to request that a commission of enquiry might be sent to South West Africa to confirm that the views of the inhabitants were in favour of incorporation.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that that was a matter which could then be considered. The Union Government had already obtained the consent of both white and native inhabitants.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said he understood that Field Marshal Smuts had in the Union Parliament expressed his willingness to continue to make reports to the Trusteeship Council on affairs in South West Africa. He suggested that it would be very helpful if he could make this point in laying the matter before the United Nations Organisation. He thought that if in addition Field Marshal Smuts also offered a commission of enquiry, it might turn the scale in favour of South Africa's proposals. He thought that the United States delegation would be very anxious that nothing should be done which would discourage the French, the Belgians, or indeed the United States themselves from placing other territories under trusteeship. He suggested that it might be worth while for the South African Government before raising the matter in the Assembly to establish contact with the United States delegation, and particularly with Mr. John Foster Dulles, who had taken a particular interest in the subject.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said he was most grateful for the views expressed at the meeting. He proposed to consider further in the light of these the procedure which the Union Government should follow in the matter.

It was agreed that no public reference should be made to the fact that the subject had been discussed.

FUTURE BUSINESS AND FINAL COMMUNIQUE

3. It was agreed that a draft of a communique to be issued after the final session on the following day should be circulated to Dominion Ministers as soon as possible. Various suggestions were made as to matters to be included in the communique.

LORD ADDISON said that before the meetings closed he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they could suggest any improvements in the existing machinery for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. It was agreed that this might be discussed on the following afternoon.

ATOMIC ENERGY

1. The meeting discussed questions relating to the development and use of Atomic Energy. The discussion is recorded in a Confidential Annex.

UNITED KINGDOM DEFENCE OBLIGATIONS

2. The meeting had before them a memorandum by Lord Addison (P.M.M.(46) 41) summarising the present military and financial commitments of the United Kingdom. The memorandum showed that in order to carry out the military commitments essential to an effective foreign policy, the United Kingdom would need to maintain in 1947 forces varying between 1,194,000 in strength at the beginning of the year and 1,077,000 at the end. There would be no alternative to the maintenance of lengthy compulsory military service over the next five years. Total military expenditure in the current year was £1,200,000,000 plus additional charges arising from the termination of the war of £576,000,000 which would be largely non-recurrent. Of the figure of £1,200,000,000 some £250,000,000 would be incurred overseas. Particulars were also given of other inescapable overseas expenditure to a total of £195,000,000 to indicate the strain imposed on the United Kingdom's balance of payments.

LORD ADDISON, in recalling the previous discussions on responsibilities for Commonwealth defence, said that United Kingdom Ministers desired to bring to the attention of the Dominions the heavy burden now being borne by the United Kingdom; this short factual statement had therefore been prepared to focus attention on the magnitude of her military and financial obligations.

MR. BEVIN said that in the past the United Kingdom had, to a great degree, assumed the responsibility for the provision of forces to maintain the security of the Commonwealth, and for that matter of much of the rest of the world also. She had been able to bear the cost of this largely out of the income derived from foreign investments. To-day the position had changed. Her income from foreign investments had been very greatly reduced, and, in order to earn foreign exchange to make good the loss of revenue from foreign investments, she must increase her exports of manufactured goods. This in its turn involved a most serious strain on her man-power for it had been estimated that it would entail an increase of approximately 500,000 in the labour force required for the export industries. The supply of civilian goods to the home market must also be severely curtailed for some years to come. There was also the problem of finding funds for the repayment of the American loan - if it was granted - over the next 50 years. Mr. Bevin thought that it would have a disastrous effect in the sphere of foreign affairs if the United Kingdom defaulted on her obligations under the loan.

In these difficult circumstances the question arose in the mind of United Kingdom Ministers whether some relief could not be obtained for part of her defence burden, in respect of both man-power and financ . He did not suggest that there should be contributions to a common pool, nor was he suggesting any modification of the present freedom of action of the different members of the Commonwealth. But there might perhaps be some re-distribution of responsibilities so that each member assumed special obligations in respect of that part of the world in which it was chiefly interested. We could not afford to return to the position of 1939 when the United Kingdom had had forces of 500,000 and there had been no really co-ordinated plan of action in a common war effort. Having regard to the very great difficulty of maintaining the British position in foreign affairs it would be a great reassurance to him if he knew that each member of the Commonwealth had a certain force ready which at the direction of the responsible Government could in an emergency be speedily mobilized and concentrated to take the strain in a particular area.

Referring to the measures necessary to maintain the strength of the armed forces in the United Kingdom, Mr. Bevin pointed out that for the first time in her history she would have to resort to compulsory military service in peace-time. The adolescent life of the country would be gravely affected by this measure, at a time when it was the universal desire to improve the standard of life and of education.

The Dominions could assist the United Kingdom in meeting her heavy obligations by direct or indirect means, and an overall review of the Commonwealth defence obligations seemed desirable, so that the burden could be apportioned in an equitable manner.

DR. DALTON emphasised the magnitude of the financial commitments of the United Kingdom. Sterling balances to a very large total were held by many countries, both within the Empire and outside it. India's holdings accounted for approximately half the total; Egypt's holdings were also very large. As indicated in the memorandum military expenditure during the financial year 1946/47 would amount to £1,770,000,000, of which £1,200,000,000 was recurrent. There were also other heavy commitments in overseas expenditure, such as the United Kingdom contribution to U.N.R.R.A., the expenditure in foreign exchange for Germany, expenditure in Greece and for Polish refugees, the relief and rehabilitation in Far Eastern colonies which had been overrun by the Japanese, and expenditure falling on the British Exchequer for peace-time developments in the Colonies.

MR. ATTLEE made four points. First he wished to take this opportunity of acknowledging the very generous financial assistance already provided by the Dominions and especially by Canada. Secondly, he pointed out that, with the development of the United Nations Organisation, the United Kingdom would be called upon to make a contribution to the military forces to be put at the disposal of that Organisation. This would place an added burden upon this country, which would have to be met. Thirdly he emphasised the magnitude of the military tasks in Europe which were the responsibility of British forces; these would continue for some time. Lastly the United Kingdom was faced with the provision of forces for the protection of world-wide lines of communication; while in the past the Royal Navy had been able to carry out this task, air and ground forces were now also necessary. With the development of weapons, the quality of the men and the numbers required had increased, involving a greater strain than ever before on our resources of both man-power and finance. The future, therefore, gave cause for grave concern.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the memorandum with great attention. He would have liked to be able to make a positive contribution to the discussion but, as he had warned United Kingdom Ministers before he came, it would be quite impossible for him to discuss in any detail questions of defence or finance. His Ministers for Defence and Finance were not with him. He would be happy to make sure that the memorandum was made known to his colleagues and carefully studied by them. The matter was indeed one which required careful study and he was not in a position to make any commitment at the present time. There were many considerations to be taken into account. Canada's own obligations were already very much greater than they had been before the war and the United Kingdom was not alone in having liabilities for the objects specified in the paper. It had also to be remembered that any contribution made to the military forces at the disposal of the United Nations Organisation must affect the decision on the extent of the Canadian contribution in the field of specific Commonwealth obligation. He added that the United States had vast resources. Had not the time come to ask them to assume greater security responsibilities in Europe?

DR. EVATT said that he found the memorandum a most impressive document. The figures it contained were to him most significant and he could quite understand the great anxiety which Mr. Attlee and his colleagues had on account of them. As in the case of the United Kingdom and Canada, Australia's expenditure on defence was already greatly increased, but Mr. Chifley had indicated at their earlier discussions that, in future, Australia must accept a permanent obligation greater than any that she had had before the war. It was worth taking out an insurance in peacetime against finding ourselves in the future as embarrassed as we had been in 1939. It had been the general view at the previous discussion that the problem could not be solved by the old method of a direct contribution by Dominion Governments to the cost of the United Kingdom services. Such a contribution to the Royal Navy had been suggested before the war. But this would be out of harmony with the temper of opinion in the Dominions. It seemed to him that each Dominion should rather assume obligations to provide forces under its own control for the defence of its territory and region. That was, indeed, the way that matters were developing in the Pacific. He added that greater decentralisation of control necessitated improved methods of military liaison. That matter had been discussed at an earlier meeting and he regarded it as very important. It was virtually true to say that there had been no Commonwealth plan for defence in 1939. We had had to improvise and in the result very effective arrangements had been worked out. He thought it would be most unfortunate if the foundations of this organisation were not kept in being. For instance, the Air Training Scheme had been a very important factor leading to victory. He would like a framework to be retained, which could be quickly revived if need be.

Dr. Evatt thought it worth mentioning that it had seemed to him more difficult in this war than in the previous war for officers from Dominion forces to rise to the most senior commands in the Empire, as General Monash had done. This might be due only to a difference in personal qualifications but it might also indicate some deficiency in the machinery for co-ordination of effort.

He noticed in the United Kingdom memorandum a reference to the fulfilment of commitments in the Netherlands East Indies. He hoped that British soldiers would not be kept there to maintain the Dutch position against the Indonesians. Quite apart from considerations of finance, he thought that politically this would be most unfortunate.

Finally, Dr. Evatt said that he would show this impressive document to Mr. Chifley who would study it most sympathetically with the desire to help in every way possible. Whatever could be done to lighten the burden on the United Kingdom should be done.

MR. NASH said that on the figures given it looked as though members of the Commonwealth other than the United Kingdom should bear some part of the cost at present being borne by her. But there were other factors which must also be taken into account and, as others had said, the subject required study. Dominion Governments too had their overseas expenditure: for instance, on the army of occupation in Japan and on contributions to U.N.R.R.A.

He suggested that it would be very useful if figures could be got out to show what was the cost in money and man-power of the defence of the whole Commonwealth. On that basis it would be possible to consider how the cost should be divided. Even if each Dominion were made responsible for the defence of its own region - and New Zealand would be willing to take their share in the Pacific - this would still leave the United Kingdom responsible for the lines of communication.

Mr. Nash feared that New Zealand's contribution could not in any event be large, compared to the very large figures of the United Kingdom. Her own expenditure for defence purposes had been in the nighbourhood of £1,000,000 before the war. It was now of the order of £30,000,000.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he found the memorandum a very alarming document. At the end of the last war there was much talk of disarmament. We no longer thought disarmament possible but it was melancholy to think that the responsi-bilities set out in this paper were the fruits of victory - and only the first fruits; what the future held in store no one could tell.

The members of the British Commonwealth had undertaken undefined obligations to the United Nations Organisation but they had at least as great an obligation to the British group of nations as they had to the United Nations. If they were prepared to support the former, how much more should they be prepared to support their own group? Everything depended on maintaining strong and intact the influence of this group. In this dangerous world it was one of the great buttresses of world order. If it went, what would remain?

Field Marshal Smuts said that he could not see what decisions could be taken at the moment in the light of this memorandum. They must take home the facts given in it and study them. Those facts would be a great shock to the people of the Dominions if they became known and would, he feared, lead to a greater sense of frustration than already existed. One thing, however, appeared to him quite clear - that the burden on one member of the group was well nigh intolerable. It was unfair to look to the British Isles, after the sacrifices made during the war, to continue to pay for the peace at the rate now indicated. The Dominions had been very proud of the record of the United Kingdom as well as of their own war efforts, but they had not perhaps thought of the burdens she bore. These matters had not been brought out but they must now be considered very carefully.

Field Marshal Smuts said that there were many difficulties with which Dominion statesmen had to reckon. For instance, any help given could not be in the form of "tribute". The United Kingdom would not expect that. There was in the Dominions a strong sense of nationalism. But there was also a strong national self-respect; they would realise a duty to carry part of this burden.

Field Marshal Smuts said that the objective of every member of the Commonwealth must be the support of our group of Nations as a great Power. The United Kingdom alone was no longer a great Power; it could not be so in the nature of things. Its power was now spread over the whole group and we must all adjust our viewpoints to this new situation. But it would require a great deal of education before people throughout the Empire would realise this fundamental change in the balance of power. Certainly the public in the Dominions, and he thought also the public in the United Kingdon, were not educated on these matters.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he hoped that it would not be misunderstood if he took a somewhat reserved attitude on a paper of this importance. The question whether it would not be best to have a Commonwealth defence policy with allocation of specific liabilities was a recurrent one. Suggestions on this subject had been made as early as the Imperial Conference of 1923 and again in 1926. There had been strong Dominion opposition to the proposals, for while there were military and financial advantages in such a system, there were also political considerations which no Dominion Minister could afford to overlook. The best plan in the world was of no value if the people would not accept it.

Mr. Mackenzie King said that, in his view, the surest way to win the support of the Dominions was to trust them to accept the obligations which they believed to be natural and right. The experience of the war had proved the wisdom of this course. If there had been a highly centralised policy there might have been a very different response from the Dominions. But if ever liberty was at stake, they could be trusted to respond wholeheartedly to the call.

Mr. Mackenzie King said that he believed in the closest co-ordination and closest understanding which could be achieved, but he was not in favour of reversing the tendencies of the last 20 years.

DR. EVATT said that he felt that none of the views expressed had been in any way inconsistent with the principles stated by Mr. Mackenzie King. He did not disagree with anything that the Prime Minister of Canada had said. There was, he thought, general agreement that there could not be a rigid plan, laid down by centralised methods, with which the different countries of the Commonwealth would conform. There could not be a better or more effective system than that practised during the war. And no country had contributed more to the positive achievement of the Commonwealth than Canada. But he suggested that Commonwealth Governments could usefully develop still further their practice of consultation and co-operation in relation to attempts to forecast and to provide for the future.

DR. DALTON said that he much appreciated the response of Dominion representatives to the statement of the United Kingdom Government's obligations. He shared the view of Field Marshal Smuts that when the public knew the facts of the heavy burden that remained as an aftermath of the war on the Commonwealth as a whole they would be shocked by them. It would, he said, be of great assistance if figures comparable to those of the paper under discussion could be made available in respect of each Dominion. Not only would these be of great interest for comparisons within the Commonwealth, but they would also give the outside world an adequate picture of the position.

MR. ATTLEE agreed that this would be very useful.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS also agreed that such figures would be useful. He was not for a tighter organisation but he had a profound belief in the importance of educating public opinion and he could vouch from his own reaction to the United Kingdom figures now circulated that the facts were little known.

LORD ADDISON said that there was unanimous support among British Commonwealth Governments for the political principles enunciated by Mr. Mackenzie King. These were of the first importance. There was much slipshod thought on the subject of Commonwealth relations and it was not generally realized that the Commonwealth was an association of independent states living and working according to common ideals. As Field Marshal Smuts said, it was important that public opinion should be educated on these matters.

ATOMIC ENERGY

The Meeting had before them a note by the Secretaries (P.M.M.(46) 19).

MR. ATTLEE said that a preliminary discussion had taken place on this subject before Mr. Mackenzie King's arrival (P.M.M.(46) 11th Meeting, Minute 1), and that, as on that occasion, it might be convenient to consider the matter under the two heads of:

(i) Research and development work carried out on atomic energy in the Commonwealth.

(ii) The international control of atomic energy.

At the previous meeting Lord Portal had made a full statement on plans for research and development in the United Kingdom, some account of which had also been given in the paper circulated. It would be of interest to the meeting to hear from Mr. Mackenzie King of the progress made with the experimental work in Canada.

MR. WILMOT said that work was proceeding in the United Kingdom under three heads:

(a) The conversion of Harwell aerodrome to provide accommodation for the research establishment.

(b) The design and construction of a plant for the production of uranium metal.

(c) The selection of a suitable site for the large-scale graphite pile.

It would be most helpful to have the views of the Dominion Governments on the contribution which they might feel able to make to the project in the shape of raw materials and scientific man-power.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that Canada would certainly be able to help by the provision of raw material and would gladly make whatever contribution they could through the seconding of scientists to work for a period in the United Kingdom.

Turning to developments in Canada, he said that the special laboratory of the National Research Council established at Montreal in 1942 continued to be the principal centre of research into atomic energy in Canada. This laboratory had been set up as a result of a proposal by the United Kingdom authorities that an important research project should be undertaken in Canada during the war as a joint enterprise. A pilot plant had also been erected at Chalk River, Ontario, to investigate the use of thorium as a starting point for the production of active material. This plant had been constructed under the direction of Professor J.D. Cockcroft, who was to become the head of the atomic research establishment in the United Kingdom. Both United Kingdom and Canadian scientists had been closely associated in its design and very close liaison had been maintained throughout with the research authorities in the United States, who had helped particularly by the provision of materials. Information had been made freely available to scientific workers in the United States.

Dealing with raw materials, he said that the current output from the Eldorado Mines on Great Bear Lake in Canada was at present being delivered to the United States Army under a war-time contract, which required a certain tonnage to be delivered by 1947, after which it would terminate. Current production was less than 300 tons a year, and while this was a useful contribution toward the total requirements of the United States it was a comparatively modest percentage of the total demand of the United States and the United Kingdom. The Canadian Advisory Panel estimated that the Belgian Congo might produce between 3,300 and 4,000 tons of uranium oxide in 1946. This source might, however, be exhausted or depleted in the near future. It was understood that there were possibilities of developing important deposits in South Africa. If this was confirmed it might substantially change the supply position in favour of the United Kingdom. There were also reports of deposits of raw material in South Australia.

The Government of Canada under its war-time powers had taken over the entire plant of the Eldorado Mine and had also reserved to itself control of all uranium ore and similar minerals that might be discovered in Canada in the future. The Government also intended to introduce legislation very similar to that which had just been introduced in the United Kingdom.

DR. EVATT said that the Lilienthal Report made it clear that there were limitations to the extent to which the United States Government had shared with the United Kingdom and Canada the lead which they enjoyed in the development of atomic energy. If we were to continue to work closely with the United States, should there not be a greater measure of disclosure, particularly of technical know-how? He could confirm the statement that deposits of uranium had been discovered in South Australia, and there were also extensive deposits of thorium in Australia. The Australian Government proposed to pass legislation on lines similar to those adopted in the United Kingdom. They would certainly be willing that their scientists should continue to co-operate in work carried out by the United Kingdom Government, as had been done during the war.

In reply to a question by Field Marshal Smuts, MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he could give no accurate estimate of the life of the uranium deposits in Canada, though he thought it possible they were more extensive than had been supposed. Under the contract with the United States Army, which would be completed next year, considerable supplies had been made available to the United States, although the bulk of their requirements had been obtained from the Belgian Congo.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that the United States Government had full information about the uranium deposits in South Africa. Samples had been sent for analysis both to the United States and to the United Kingdom. The South African Government had assumed complete control over the production, processing and disposal of all such materials.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government were fully satisfied with the co-operation which had been achieved with the United Kingdom Government. They felt, however, that the establishment of the plant at Chalk River as a joint enterprise was to be regarded as a war-time arrangement and they might wish in future to assume sole responsibility for its development for industrial purposes.

Turning to the subject of the international control of atomic energy, MR. ATTLEE summarised the conclusions which had emerged from the previous discussion. The report published in America, known as the Lilienthal Report, had attracted considerable attention. At the same time doubts had been expressed both by British and American scientists about the feasibility of the proposal for the "denaturing" of active material. While, therefore, the report might prove useful as a starting point, its conclusions would require further examination.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had read the minutes of the previous discussion on this subject and fully agreed with what had been said about the difficulty of formulating a workable scheme of inspection and control. He agreed, however, that the Lilienthal Report might be found useful as a starting point for further discussion.

over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The discussions have been in the nature of an informal exchange of views. They have covered a broad field and have contributed greatly to the elucidation of many problems and to a mutual understanding of the issues involved. Among the subjects on which views were exchanged were the draft peace treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland; the future of Germany; security responsibilities and arrangements for liaison between British Commonwealth Governments on military affairs; and economic and welfare co-operation in the South Pacific and South-East Asia. The opportunity was taken for consultations on other current issues and matters of mutual interest, including separate consultations between individual

Commercial Policy.

1. The Meeting had before them a paper on the arrangements for intergovernmental discussions on commercial policy (P.M.M. (46) 29) and the text of recent correspondence between British Commonwealth Governments on the subject (P.M.M. (46) 33).

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be of assistance to obtain some preliminary indication of the policies of British Commonwealth Governments in relation to imperial preference. The question affected all parts of the Commonwealth. There was a widespread impression, especially, but not only, in the United States, that, when the Loan Agreement had been passed by Congress, there would be an obligation to modify the system of imperial preference. He recognised that this had never been the intention. Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement made it clear that reduction of preferences would be related to reductions of tariffs. But public opinion had not grasped the point.

MR. ATTLEE said that the United Kingdom Government had taken the line that, while they were in favour of the freest commercial interchange and the reduction of tariffs, concessions must be reciprocal. They could not accept the view that the British Empire must be put in the dock on account of imperial preference. The United States tariff was a very high tariff and it was not for her to point the finger of scorn.

LORD ADDISON referred to the statement made by Mr. Attlee in the House of Commons on the 6th September, 1945, which had included the passage: "There is thus no question of any unilateral surrender of preferences. There must be adequate compensation for all parties affected." This view had been repeated on several occasions. The United States were inclined to represent themselves as apostles of free trade: but the United States tariff itself represented a very great obstruction of trade.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government had always taken the view that the reference in Article VII to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce would be interpreted as imposing a commitment to abolish preferences. They had made strong representations in this sense before the signature of the Agreement.

DR. EVATT took a different view. He did not think that the Lend-Lease Agreement was subject to the interpretation to which Mr. Nash referred. He added that the United States Government themselves intended to maintain a system of preferences with the Philippines for a period of years, even after they became independent. In his experience it was recognised in both official and commercial circles in the United States that reductions in imperial preference must be related to United States tariff concessions.

The United States proposals on commercial policy, put forward last year, were part and parcel of the loan negotiations. The United States had used "pressure tactics" and, in particular, the question of financial aid to force conditions on the preference issue. The Australian view had then been, and still was, that they were "prepared to join in commercial policy negotiations only on the basis of making concessions in return for equivalent reciprocal concessions on the part of other countries."

In November of last year they had informed the United Kingdom Government that they could not agree to the United States proposals, and did not wish to associate themselves with them when they were announced. The Australian Government had, at that time, made the following statement: "We desire complete freedom of action in relation to the formula and all other proposals in the document. Indeed, we feel that all countries should be in a position to approach both negotiations and the conferences with full freedom to discuss and finally resolve all sections of the proposals on mutually advantageous lines."

In a public statement issued on the 7th December of last year Mr. Chifley had said that the Australian Government would "enter the proposed negotiations and take part in the discussions without any prior commitment or implied obligation to make any specific concessions in respect of tariffs or Empire preferences." Any proposals in these fields would be "dealt with on their merits and any concessions agreed to must be counter-balanced by fully equivalent concessions which will enlarge the market opportunities for Australia's exports, both primary and secondary."

He wished to reiterate the views of the Australian Government. They had repeatedly maintained the necessity for a high level of employment and a high purchasing power. They had regarded the removal of trade barriers as ancillary to the task of maintaining the highest possible degree of employment. It was that view which prevailed at San Francisco, and led to the inclusion of an undertaking to pursue full employment as a main objective. It was their insistence on this point of view, now widely accepted in both government and academic fields, that had led to the decision to call a conference on trade and employment.

Having got so far, they would not allow the United States Government to push into the background their obligation in the Charter, and their decision to consider employment along with tariff negotiations. When imperial preference was attacked, we should remember that it was introduced after and not before the Hawley–Smoot tariff of 1930. As in the case of bases, there could be no concessions unless there were reciprocal obligations. Unless the United States was willing, not only to make very great concessions—and Australia's trade negotiations with her had led them to doubt whether she would do so—but also to fulfil her obligation to maintain high levels of employment, Australia could not afford to make any concessions. Her demands for imports were growing all the time because of the great demand caused by her high level of employment. These demands could only be met by sales overseas. If she was forced into the choice of reducing employment levels or placing restrictions on imports, she must adopt the latter.

The Australian Government considered that in the United States a wrong interpretation was being placed on Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement. On the one hand, the United States Government had shown no positive intention to reduce tariffs: on the other hand, they proposed to maintain a preferential system with the Philippines. In entering the commercial policy negotiations the Australian Government would not regard themselves as bound by any commitment. They could not contemplate modifying imperial preference without reciprocal concessions.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government would not consider themselves bound by any commitment in entering upon the negotiations. They would welcome any progress towards increased freedom of trade, but considered that changes in preferences must depend on changes in tariffs.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government were not opposed in principle to reduction of tariffs and preferences, but they could not agree to any prior commitment to abolish preferences as they attached the highest importance to them. A reduction of United States tariffs was essential. He observed that, in the case of New Zealand, control of exchange and arrangements for licensing imports on a quota basis were a more important means of control of trade than tariffs. He granted that the present procedure was highly discriminatory in favour of the United Kingdom, but the New Zealand Government regarded the system as of great value. He added that with regard to Bretton Woods, New Zealand's exchange control and import procedure met all the requirements for the necessary exchange to be available to meet payments for all current transactions. If substantial United States tariff reductions were obtained, New Zealand would be prepared to consider modifying its present method of issuing of import licences. He did not, however, take the view that if all available overseas exchange was used control by quota must necessarily restrict the expansion of international trade.

He summarised the policy of the New Zealand Government. As stated in their telegram No. 389 of the 18th November, 1945, to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, their policy was to maintain complete control of New Zealand's external exchange; this control of exchange could not be effective without control of imports; and control of imports and effective use of exchange funds were linked up with the expansion of manufacturing facilities within

New Zealand which they considered essential if they were to meet their commitments for full employment. They were anxious to maintain their preferences for United Kingdom imports into New Zealand and to continue to receive preferences in the United Kingdom for New Zealand's primary products. In their opinion, this policy would not prevent New Zealand negotiating for the reciprocal reduction of tariffs and for the expansion of trade by other means within and without the Commonwealth.

MR. MARQUAND said that the United Kingdom Government would enter the negotiations with the hope that a world trade agreement would result from them. The issue largely depended on the extent of the tariff concessions which the United States were prepared to make. In this connection he suggested that it was important that Commonwealth Governments should do nothing which might have the effect of discouraging the United States Government in advance of the discussions.

SIR PERCIVALE LIESCHING said that at the time of the negotiations of the Mutual Aid Agreement the dangers of misconstruction of Article VII had been fully appreciated and the United Kingdom Government might not haye signed it if it had not been for the explicit understandings recorded in the accompanying exchange of letters. It was clearly recognised that there must be concessions on both sides, and he observed that the terms of Mr. Attlee's statement of the 6th December had been agreed with the United States Government. In the recent Washington conversations the United Kingdom Delegation had taken a very firm stand, and he was fully satisfied as to the strength of the bargaining position of British Commonwealth Governments, provided that no Government adopted the position that no reduction in imperial preference could be considered. As regards the United States arrangements with the Philippines, he suggested that it would not be wise to press analogies between these and imperial preference too far, for the Philippines arrangements contemplated the automatic abolition of preferences in twenty years' time.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the understanding of the Canadian Government and their general attitude was the same as that of the United Kingdom Government as stated by Sir Percivale Liesching.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was satisfied with Sir Percivale Liesching's statement of the position.

Summing up, MR. ATTLEE said that there appeared to be a wide measure of agreement between British Commonwealth Governments on the general lines of approach to the problem.

The Meeting then turned to consider the timetable for the forthcoming intergovernmental discussions on commercial policy.

MR. MORRISON said that the international discussions now proposed would fall into three stages :—

(i) A meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council to elaborate an annotated draft agenda for the eventual United Nations Conference.
(ii) A meeting of "Drafting Countries" to be convened by the United States Government to negotiate on the basis of the "Proposals on Trade and Employment" which had been published at the time of the Loan Agreement last December (Cmd. 6709). This meeting would include detailed negotiations on tariffs and preferences.
(iii) A full international conference to be called by the United Nations.

After consultations between the United States, the United Kingdom and Dominion Governments, it had now been agreed that the Preparatory Committee should meet on the 15th October, probably in London or Geneva. The meeting of the Drafting Countries would take place in March. No date had yet been fixed for the United Nations Conference.

The question now arose what separate discussions were required between Commonwealth countries. Telegrams had passed between the various countries on this subject and there was general agreement that discussions would be necessary before the Drafting Countries met in March, when detailed bargaining on tariffs and preferences would occur as well as discussions on non-tariff matters. It had also been proposed that there might be a preliminary exchange of views before the October meeting, to cover such questions as the use of import quotas, subsidies, State trading, cartels and full employment. There seemed, however, to be some doubt as to the necessity for these discussions and some difficulty in fixing a date for them.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the number of international conferences made very heavy demands on the time of Ministers and officials. He doubted whether a special meeting would be necessary before the Preparatory Committee met in October, unless it were for a few days immediately before that meeting. The peculiar Commonwealth interest in the general commercial policy proposals lay in the special relationship between preferences and tariff reductions and this question would not be considered by the Preparatory Committee. There could be no doubt that the officials of Commonwealth countries, who had been associated with the earlier stages of the commercial discussions, would continue to work closely together within the Preparatory Committee. He thought it would probably be a mistake to try to formulate a specifically Commonwealth approach to the various questions of general commercial policy which would then be considered.

As regards discussions before the meeting of the Drafting Countries, he thought that these should immediately precede the meeting. They would, indeed, naturally merge into them, for discussions between Commonwealth countries about the modifications of preferences to which they could consent could hardly proceed very far until they knew fairly precisely what reductions the other parties to the negotiations would be ready to offer, and these offers would only be developed in the course of the actual negotiations between the Drafting Countries. He suggested, therefore, that the discussions between Commonwealth countries should start not more than three weeks before the meeting of the Drafting Countries.

DR. EVATT thought that discussions prior to the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would be worth while. He suggested that discussions between officials a fortnight or so before the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would suffice. It would probably be well not to give any undue publicity to these preliminary discussions.

MR. NASH said that he would have preferred that the discussions should take place in July as New Zealand officials would be in this country at that time and he would also be here himself. He thought it would be very useful to have preliminary talks on such matters as State trading, bulk purchase and subsidies which, to New Zealand at any rate, were quite as important as tariffs. He was also anxious to give public indication in New Zealand that the principle of imperial preference was not in doubt.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be difficult for South Africa to make officials available in July in addition to October. He was, therefore, in favour of a preliminary discussion before the October meeting.

LORD ADDISON suggested that it would be possible for United Kingdom representatives to have useful talks during July with Mr. Nash and New Zealand officials, with the participation of the High Commissioners for the other Dominions and such officials as happened to be in this country at that time.

After further discussion it was agreed that this would be the best course to follow, and that arrangements should be set in train accordingly.

Arrangements for Consultation between Governments.

2. LORD ADDISON said that he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they had any suggestions to make to improve the present arrangements for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. The arrangements in practice were founded on the resolutions of the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930. The Conference of 1930 had summarised the main points of the system of communication and consultation in relation to foreign affairs as follows :—

" (1) Any of His Majesty's Governments conducting negotiations should inform the other Governments of His Majesty in case they should be interested and give them the opportunity of expressing their views if they think that their interests may be affected.

(2) Any of His Majesty's Governments on receiving such information should, if it desires to express any views, do so with reasonable promptitude.

(3) None of His Majesty's Governments can take any steps which might involve the other Governments of His Majesty in any active obligations without their definite assent."

In commenting on (1), the Conference had said :—

"The application of this is not confined to treaty negotiations. It cannot be doubted that the fullest possible interchange of information between His Majesty's Governments in relation to all aspects of foreign affairs is of the greatest value to all the Governments concerned."

Lord Addison said that a very large number of telegrams and despatches were now sent by the United Kingdom Government to Dominion Governments to keep them informed of developments in world affairs. In many cases the messages were confined to factual information. Others also gave the views or comments of the United Kingdom Government. In such cases the United Kingdom Government proceeded on the assumption that, if a Dominion Government wished to offer any comments of its own, it would not hesitate to do so. When no comment was made by a Government, they assumed that it did not wish to express any views on the subject.

Lord Addison said that in his opinion the system worked very well. But he would welcome their comments or suggestions for improvement of it.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he thought that the system worked excellently. The Dominions Office kept Dominion Governments very fully informed, and the arrangements had worked with remarkable efficiency both during and since the war. The Canadian Government agreed with the statement of principles mentioned by Lord Addison. When, on receipt of information from another Commonwealth Government, they offered no comment, neither acceptance nor rejection of the points made in the communication was implied by the absence of comment. In such a case the position was merely that the Canadian Government had been informed. He suggested that it was necessary carefully to distinguish the two processes, first, of informing and, secondly, of consulting other Governments. Consultation placed an immediate responsibility on the Government consulted. But be observed that, in the case of messages addressed by the United Kingdom Government to all four Dominion Governments, it was not the invariable practice of the Canadian Government to send a reply even when comments were invited, since it often was apparent that the subject was of concern to others of the Dominion Governments addressed rather than to the Canadian Government.

Mr. Mackenzie King considered that the system of exchange of communications between Governments, supplemented by the contacts maintained by High Commissioners, was now of great efficiency. He had been a strong advocate of the method of consultation by written messages. This enabled the Minister concerned in each country to discuss the subject with his Government colleagues. Under the present system, therefore, there was, in effect, a continuous conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth capable of dealing with all questions by Governmental decisions. As he had explained, he hesitated to express opinions at Commonwealth meetings such as the present, because he could not consult his colleagues. It was, moreover, valuable to have the written record of the views expressed on each side which resulted from an exchange of messages. By this means, also, all British Commonwealth Governments could be kept informed; for where the subject of a communication was of interest to more than one Commonwealth Government, the Canadian Government usually communicated their reply to all the Governments concerned.

DR. EVATT doubted whether the summary of points made by the 1930 Imperial Conference now entirely covered the ground. He gave as an instance the development of Dominion responsibilities in international affairs. Far Eastern affairs were of vital concern to Australia, and the Australian Government wished to have immediate information of developments. As regards the general arrangements for consultation, during the war there had been occasions when, under the stress of circumstances, decisions of great importance to Dominion Governments had been taken without any consultation with them, but that was not the case now. As to the principles, he considered that the proposed communiqué to be issued after the meeting summed up the position well. The alternative to the present system would be the establishment of some centralised machinery, but such a step might impose a strain on inter-governmental relations. It would lead to a very difficult situation if relations between British Commonwealth Governments became a matter of party politics in any country of the Commonwealth and he hoped that this situation would not arise. He thought that Lord Addison and his Department were to be complimented on their work; Dominion Governments were, he was sure, most grateful to them.

MR. NASH said that he endorsed the views expressed by Mr. Mackenzie King. He considered that the system worked very well in general, but he would like to make four points. First, he suggested that sometimes information might be supplied to Dominion Governments earlier. Secondly, he thought that there could usefully be an extension of the practice of repetition to other Commonwealth Governments of the messages addressed by one Dominion Government to another or to the United Kingdom Government. Thirdly, there might be scope for Dominion Governments on their side to improve their own arrangements for consultation with other Commonwealth Governments, and he referred to the negotiation of the Australia–New Zealand Agreement of 1943 as a case in point. In such cases Dominion Governments should, he suggested, see that other members of the Commonwealth were informed of the progress of events. Finally, he suggested that Dominion Governments might supply to the United Kingdom Government information received from their representatives in foreign capitals.

MR. ATTLEE said that reports of this kind received from Dominion Governments during the war had often been found most useful.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that in his view the present system worked admirably. He did not see how it could be improved at present. Indeed Dominion Governments were kept so fully informed by the United Kingdom Government that it was sometimes difficult to absorb the information. He distinguished between the classes of messages. Telegrams imparting information were of great value as a background for Commonwealth co-operation; these did not necessarily call for acknowledgment. Another class required a response from Dominion Governments. The South African Government endeavoured to reply promptly and dealt in complete frankness with the other members of the Commonwealth. In addition to the telegrams exchanged between Governments, each Government was in constant touch with its High Commissioner, who supplied valuable supplementary information. This representation should, he suggested, be extended between all the Governments of the Commonwealth. When they all had High Commissioners in the capitals of the other members of the Commonwealth, then he thought that the present machinery for consultation could not be further improved.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that it was recognised that, during the war, certain decisions had had to be treated with special secrecy. Certainly, since the end of the war, the fullest information had been supplied in a most efficient manner, and he expressed his gratitude to Lord Addison and the Dominions Office.

He thought that few people realised how constant and close was the contact at present maintained between Commonwealth Governments and he suggested that it would be very useful if Mr. Attlee or Lord Addison could make a public statement on the subject, possibly in connection with the discussion at that meeting.

MR. ATTLEE and LORD ADDISON said that they would certainly consider this suggestion.

Nationality of Married Women.

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (46) 17th Meeting, Item 1.)

3. LORD ADDISON said that in accordance with the decision taken at the 17th Meeting, draft terms of reference for the meeting of experts had been prepared at a meeting of officials.

There was general agreement with the substance of this draft. The precise wording should be settled between officials. It was agreed that the meeting of experts should be convened as soon as possible.

Final Communiqué.

4. The Meeting had before them a draft of a final communiqué circulated by Lord Addison (P.M.M. (46) 34) and amendments to the draft suggested by Mr. Mackenzie King and Dr. Evatt (P.M.M. (46) 36 and 35). The text of the communiqué as finally agreed is annexed to these Minutes.

Field-Marshal Smuts.

5. MR. ATTLEE, speaking with the warm approval of all present at the meeting, called attention to the fact that the following day was the 76th birthday of Field-Marshal Smuts. He was sure that he spoke on behalf of all present in conveying to Field-Marshal Smuts his congratulations and best wishes for long life and happiness. It was an honour to have among them one who was, without doubt, the doyen among the statesmen of the world.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS expressed his thanks to the Meeting. He was much touched by this expression of their good wishes and regard.

Mr. Attlee and Lord Addison.

6. MR. MACKENZIE KING and the other Dominion Ministers expressed to Mr. Attlee their deep gratitude for the time and patience he had devoted to the meetings, which they well knew must have been an exacting call on him among his many preoccupations. They much appreciated his sympathetic understanding of the points of view of Dominion Governments. They were most grateful also to Lord Addison for his indefatigable efforts and help. They expressed appreciation to the officials concerned for the arrangements; these had been most satisfactory. Finally, they were grateful to His Majesty's Government for their generous hospitality and the facilities afforded to them.

MR. ATTLEE, in reply, said that it had been a great pleasure, and he was sure a great advantage, to have an opportunity of supplementing the official communications between Governments by the personal contacts established at these meetings.

ANNEX.

TEXT OF FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED TO THE PRESS ON 23RD MAY, 1946.

In the course of the last five weeks the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the Right Honourable C. R. Attlee, and several of his Cabinet colleagues, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister of Australia, the Right Honourable J. B. Chifley, and the Australian Minister of External Affairs, the Right Honourable H. V. Evatt, the Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Right Honourable W. Nash, and the Prime Minister of South Africa, Field-Marshal the Right Honourable J. C. Smuts, have engaged in informal consultations on a number of questions arising in connection with the post-war settlements.

The representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa desire to place on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The discussions have been in the nature of an informal exchange of views. They have covered a broad field and have contributed greatly to the elucidation of many problems and to a mutual understanding of the issues involved. Among the subjects on which views were exchanged were the draft Peace Treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland; the future of Germany; security responsibilities and arrangements for liaison between British Commonwealth Governments on military affairs; and economic and welfare co-operation in the South Pacific and South-East Asia. The opportunity was taken for consultations on other current issues and matters of mutual interest, including separate consultations between individual United Kingdom and Dominion Ministers on questions specially affecting one or two countries only.

At the conclusion of the meetings, the assembled representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa place on record their appreciation of the value of this series of consultations, which exemplifies the system of free discussion and exchange of views that characterises the relations of the countries of the British Commonwealth. The existing methods of consultation have proved their worth. They include a continuous exchange of information and comment between the different members of the Commonwealth. They are flexible and can be used to meet a variety of situations and needs, both those where the responsibility is on one member alone and where the responsibility may have to be shared. They are peculiarly appropriate to the character of the British Commonwealth, with its independent members who have shown by their sacrifices in the common cause their devotion to kindred ideals and their community of outlook. While all are willing to consider and adopt practical proposals for developing the existing system, it is agreed that the methods now practised are preferable to any rigid centralised machinery. In their view such centralised machinery would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the combination of autonomy and unity which is characteristic of the British Commonwealth and is one of their great achievements.

They reaffirm their belief in the efficacy of free and constant consultation and co-operation, not only within the British Commonwealth but also in the wider international sphere. They are determined to do everything in their power to maintain in time of peace the historic co-operation achieved by the Allies in time of war. They look forward to the steady development throughout the whole world of closer international co-operation based on increasing mutual confidence and devoted to the raising of standards of living and the promotion of democratic liberty. Their Governments and peoples are determined to give the fullest support to the United Nations Organisation, not only as a foundation of peace and security, but also as a means for promoting economic progress and social welfare.

Commercial Policy.

1. The Meeting had before them a paper on the arrangements for inter-governmental discussions on commercial policy (P.M.M. (46) 29) and the text of recent correspondence between British Commonwealth Governments on the subject (P.M.M. (46) 33).

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be of assistance to obtain some preliminary indication of the policies of British Commonwealth Governments in relation to imperial preference. The question affected all parts of the Commonwealth. There was a widespread impression, especially, but not only, in the United States, that, when the Loan Agreement had been passed by Congress, there would be an obligation to modify the system of imperial preference. He recognised that this had never been the intention. Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement made it clear that reduction of preferences would be related to reductions of tariffs. But public opinion had not grasped the point.

MR. ATTLEE said that the United Kingdom Government had taken the line that, while they were in favour of the freest commercial interchange and the reduction of tariffs, concessions must be reciprocal. They could not accept the view that the British Empire must be put in the dock on account of imperial preference. The United States tariff was a very high tariff and it was not for her to point the finger of scorn.

LORD ADDISON referred to the statement made by Mr. Attlee in the House of Commons on the 6th September, 1945, which had included the passage: "There is thus no question of any unilateral surrender of preferences. There must be adequate compensation for all parties affected." This view had been repeated on several occasions. The United States were inclined to represent themselves as apostles of free trade: but the United States tariff itself represented a very great obstruction of trade.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government had always taken the view that the reference in Article VII to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce would be interpreted as imposing a commitment to abolish preferences. They had made strong representations in this sense before the signature of the Agreement.

DR. EVATT took a different view. He did not think that the Lend-Lease Agreement was subject to the interpretation to which Mr. Nash referred. He added that the United States Government themselves intended to maintain a system of preferences with the Philippines for a period of years, even after they became independent. In his experience it was recognised in both official and commercial circles in the United States that reductions in imperial preference must be related to United States tariff concessions.

The United States proposals on commercial policy, put forward last year, were part and parcel of the loan negotiations. The United States had used "pressure tactics" and, in particular, the question of financial aid to force conditions on the preference issue. The Australian view had then been, and still was, that they were "prepared to join in commercial policy negotiations only on the basis of making concessions in return for equivalent reciprocal concessions on the part of other countries."

In November of last year they had informed the United Kingdom Government that they could not agree to the United States proposals, and did not wish to associate themselves with them when they were announced. The Australian Government had, at that time, made the following statement: "We desire complete freedom of action in relation to the formula and all other proposals in the document. Indeed, we feel that all countries should be in a position to approach both negotiations and the conferences with full freedom to discuss and finally resolve all sections of the proposals on mutually advantageous lines."

In a public statement issued on the 7th December of last year Mr. Chifley had said that the Australian Government would "enter the proposed negotiations and take part in the discussions without any prior commitment or implied obligation to make any specific concessions in respect of tariffs or Empire preferences." Any proposals in these fields would be "dealt with on their merits and any concessions agreed to must be counter-balanced by fully equivalent concessions which will enlarge the market opportunities for Australia's exports, both primary and secondary."

He wished to reiterate the views of the Australian Government. They had repeatedly maintained the necessity for a high level of employment and a high purchasing power. They had regarded the removal of trade barriers as ancillary to the task of maintaining the highest possible degree of employment. It was that view which prevailed at San Francisco, and led to the inclusion of an undertaking to pursue full employment as a main objective. It was their insistence on this point of view, now widely accepted in both government and academic fields, that had led to the decision to call a conference on trade and employment.

Having got so far, they would not allow the United States Government to push into the background their obligation in the Charter, and their decision to consider employment along with tariff negotiations. When imperial preference was attacked, we should remember that it was introduced after and not before the Hawley–Smoot tariff of 1930. As in the case of bases, there could be no concessions unless there were reciprocal obligations. Unless the United States was willing, not only to make very great concessions—and Australia's trade negotiations with her had led them to doubt whether she would do so—but also to fulfil her obligation to maintain high levels of employment, Australia could not afford to make any concessions. Her demands for imports were growing all the time because of the great demand caused by her high level of employment. These demands could only be met by sales overseas. If she was forced into the choice of reducing employment levels or placing restrictions on imports, she must adopt the latter.

The Australian Government considered that in the United States a wrong interpretation was being placed on Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement. On the one hand, the United States Government had shown no positive intention to reduce tariffs : on the other hand, they proposed to maintain a preferential system with the Philippines. In entering the commercial policy negotiations the Australian Government would not regard themselves as bound by any commitment. They could not contemplate modifying imperial preference without reciprocal concessions.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government would not consider themselves bound by any commitment in entering upon the negotiations. They would welcome any progress towards increased freedom of trade, but considered that changes in preferences must depend on changes in tariffs.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government were not opposed in principle to reduction of tariffs and preferences, but they could not agree to any prior commitment to abolish preferences as they attached the highest importance to them. A reduction of United States tariffs was essential. He observed that, in the case of New Zealand, control of exchange and arrangements for licensing imports on a quota basis were a more important means of control of trade than tariffs. He granted that the present procedure was highly discriminatory in favour of the United Kingdom, but the New Zealand Government regarded the system as of great value. He added that with regard to Bretton Woods, New Zealand's exchange control and import procedure met all the requirements for the necessary exchange to be available to meet payments for all current transactions. If substantial United States tariff reductions were obtained, New Zealand would be prepared to consider modifying its present method of issuing of import licences. He did not, however, take the view that if all available overseas exchange was used control by quota must necessarily restrict the expansion of international trade.

He summarised the policy of the New Zealand Government. As stated in their telegram No. 389 of the 18th November, 1945, to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, their policy was to maintain complete control of New Zealand's external exchange; this control of exchange could not be effective without control of imports; and control of imports and effective use of exchange funds were linked up with the expansion of manufacturing facilities within

New Zealand which they considered essential if they were to meet their commitments for full employment. They were anxious to maintain their preferences for United Kingdom imports into New Zealand and to continue to receive preferences in the United Kingdom for New Zealand's primary products. In their opinion, this policy would not prevent New Zealand negotiating for the reciprocal reduction of tariffs and for the expansion of trade by other means within and without the Commonwealth.

MR. MARQUAND said that the United Kingdom Government would enter the negotiations with the hope that a world trade agreement would result from them. The issue largely depended on the extent of the tariff concessions which the United States were prepared to make. In this connection he suggested that it was important that Commonwealth Governments should do nothing which might have the effect of discouraging the United States Government in advance of the discussions.

SIR PERCIVALE LIESCHING said that at the time of the negotiations of the Mutual Aid Agreement the dangers of misconstruction of Article VII had been fully appreciated and the United Kingdom Government might not haye signed it if it had not been for the explicit understandings recorded in the accompanying exchange of letters. It was clearly recognised that there must be concessions on both sides, and he observed that the terms of Mr. Attlee's statement of the 6th December had been agreed with the United States Government. In the recent Washington conversations the United Kingdom Delegation had taken a very firm stand, and he was fully satisfied as to the strength of the bargaining position of British Commonwealth Governments, provided that no Government adopted the position that no reduction in imperial preference could be considered. As regards the United States arrangements with the Philippines, he suggested that it would not be wise to press analogies between these and imperial preference too far, for the Philippines arrangements contemplated the automatic abolition of preferences in twenty years' time.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the understanding of the Canadian Government and their general attitude was the same as that of the United Kingdom Government as stated by Sir Percivale Liesching.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was satisfied with Sir Percivale Liesching's statement of the position.

Summing up, MR. ATTLEE said that there appeared to be a wide measure of agreement between British Commonwealth Governments on the general lines of approach to the problem.

The Meeting then turned to consider the timetable for the forthcoming intergovernmental discussions on commercial policy.

MR. MORRISON said that the international discussions now proposed would fall into three stages :—

(i) A meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council to elaborate an annotated draft agenda for the eventual United Nations Conference.
(ii) A meeting of "Drafting Countries" to be convened by the United States Government to negotiate on the basis of the "Proposals on Trade and Employment" which had been published at the time of the Loan Agreement last December (Cmd. 6709). This meeting would include detailed negotiations on tariffs and preferences.
(iii) A full international conference to be called by the United Nations.

After consultations between the United States, the United Kingdom and Dominion Governments, it had now been agreed that the Preparatory Committee should meet on the 15th October, probably in London or Geneva. The meeting of the Drafting Countries would take place in March. No date had yet been fixed for the United Nations Conference.

The question now arose what separate discussions were required between Commonwealth countries. Telegrams had passed between the various countries on this subject and there was general agreement that discussions would be necessary before the Drafting Countries met in March, when detailed bargaining on tariffs and preferences would occur as well as discussions on non-tariff matters. It had also been proposed that there might be a preliminary exchange of views before the October meeting, to cover such questions as the use of import quotas, subsidies, State trading, cartels and full employment. There seemed, however, to be some doubt as to the necessity for these discussions and some difficulty in fixing a date for them.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the number of international conferences made very heavy demands on the time of Ministers and officials. He doubted whether a special meeting would be necessary before the Preparatory Committee met in October, unless it were for a few days immediately before that meeting. The peculiar Commonwealth interest in the general commercial policy proposals lay in the special relationship between preferences and tariff reductions and this question would not be considered by the Preparatory Committee. There could be no doubt that the officials of Commonwealth countries, who had been associated with the earlier stages of the commercial discussions, would continue to work closely together within the Preparatory Committee. He thought it would probably be a mistake to try to formulate a specifically Commonwealth approach to the various questions of general commercial policy which would then be considered.

As regards discussions before the meeting of the Drafting Countries, he thought that these should immediately precede the meeting. They would, indeed, naturally merge into them, for discussions between Commonwealth countries about the modifications of preferences to which they could consent could hardly proceed very far until they knew fairly precisely what reductions the other parties to the negotiations would be ready to offer, and these offers would only be developed in the course of the actual negotiations between the Drafting Countries. He suggested, therefore, that the discussions between Commonwealth countries should start not more than three weeks before the meeting of the Drafting Countries.

DR. EVATT thought that discussions prior to the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would be worth while. He suggested that discussions between officials a fortnight or so before the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would suffice. It would probably be well not to give any undue publicity to these preliminary discussions.

MR. NASH said that he would have preferred that the discussions should take place in July as New Zealand officials would be in this country at that time and he would also be here himself. He thought it would be very useful to have preliminary talks on such matters as State trading, bulk purchase and subsidies which, to New Zealand at any rate, were quite as important as tariffs. He was also anxious to give public indication in New Zealand that the principle of imperial preference was not in doubt.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be difficult for South Africa to make officials available in July in addition to October. He was, therefore, in favour of a preliminary discussion before the October meeting.

LORD ADDISON suggested that it would be possible for United Kingdom representatives to have useful talks during July with Mr. Nash and New Zealand officials, with the participation of the High Commissioners for the other Dominions and such officials as happened to be in this country at that time.

After further discussion it was agreed that this would be the best course to follow, and that arrangements should be set in train accordingly.

Arrangements for Consultation between Governments.

2. LORD ADDISON said that he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they had any suggestions to make to improve the present arrangements for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. The arrangements in practice were founded on the resolutions of the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930. The Conference of 1930 had summarised the main points of the system of communication and consultation in relation to foreign affairs as follows :—

"(1) Any of His Majesty's Governments conducting negotiations should inform the other Governments of His Majesty in case they should be interested and give them the opportunity of expressing their views if they think that their interests may be affected.

(2) Any of His Majesty's Governments on receiving such information should, if it desires to express any views, do so with reasonable promptitude.

(3) None of His Majesty's Governments can take any steps which might involve the other Governments of His Majesty in any active obligations without their definite assent."

In commenting on (1), the Conference had said :—

"The application of this is not confined to treaty negotiations. It cannot be doubted that the fullest possible interchange of information between His Majesty's Governments in relation to all aspects of foreign affairs is of the greatest value to all the Governments concerned."

Lord Addison said that a very large number of telegrams and despatches were now sent by the United Kingdom Government to Dominion Governments to keep them informed of developments in world affairs. In many cases the messages were confined to factual information. Others also gave the views or comments of the United Kingdom Government. In such cases the United Kingdom Government proceeded on the assumption that, if a Dominion Government wished to offer any comments of its own, it would not hesitate to do so. When no comment was made by a Government, they assumed that it did not wish to express any views on the subject.

Lord Addison said that in his opinion the system worked very well. But he would welcome their comments or suggestions for improvement of it.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he thought that the system worked excellently. The Dominions Office kept Dominion Governments very fully informed, and the arrangements had worked with remarkable efficiency both during and since the war. The Canadian Government agreed with the statement of principles mentioned by Lord Addison. When, on receipt of information from another Commonwealth Government, they offered no comment, neither acceptance nor rejection of the points made in the communication was implied by the absence of comment. In such a case the position was merely that the Canadian Government had been informed. He suggested that it was necessary carefully to distinguish the two processes, first, of informing and, secondly, of consulting other Governments. Consultation placed an immediate responsibility on the Government consulted. But be observed that, in the case of messages addressed by the United Kingdom Government to all four Dominion Governments, it was not the invariable practice of the Canadian Government to send a reply even when comments were invited, since it often was apparent that the subject was of concern to others of the Dominion Governments addressed rather than to the Canadian Government.

Mr. Mackenzie King considered that the system of exchange of communications between Governments, supplemented by the contacts maintained by High Commissioners, was now of great efficiency. He had been a strong advocate of the method of consultation by written messages. This enabled the Minister concerned in each country to discuss the subject with his Government colleagues. Under the present system, therefore, there was, in effect, a continuous conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth capable of dealing with all questions by Governmental decisions. As he had explained, he hesitated to express opinions at Commonwealth meetings such as the present, because he could not consult his colleagues. It was, moreover, valuable to have the written record of the views expressed on each side which resulted from an exchange of messages. By this means, also, all British Commonwealth Governments could be kept informed; for where the subject of a communication was of interest to more than one Commonwealth Government, the Canadian Government usually communicated their reply to all the Governments concerned.

DR. EVATT doubted whether the summary of points made by the 1930 Imperial Conference now entirely covered the ground. He gave as an instance the development of Dominion responsibilities in international affairs. Far Eastern affairs were of vital concern to Australia, and the Australian Government wished to have immediate information of developments. As regards the general arrangements for consultation, during the war there had been occasions when, under the stress of circumstances, decisions of great importance to Dominion Governments had been taken without any consultation with them, but that was not the case now. As to the principles, he considered that the proposed communiqué to be issued after the meeting summed up the position well. The alternative to the present system would be the establishment of some centralised machinery, but such a step might impose a strain on inter-governmental relations. It would lead to a very difficult situation if relations between British Commonwealth Governments became a matter of party politics in any country of the Commonwealth and he hoped that this situation would not arise. He thought that Lord Addison and his Department were to be complimented on their work; Dominion Governments were, he was sure, most grateful to them.

MR. NASH said that he endorsed the views expressed by Mr. Mackenzie King. He considered that the system worked very well in general, but he would like to make four points. First, he suggested that sometimes information might be supplied to Dominion Governments earlier. Secondly, he thought that there could usefully be an extension of the practice of repetition to other Commonwealth Governments of the messages addressed by one Dominion Government to another or to the United Kingdom Government. Thirdly, there might be scope for Dominion Governments on their side to improve their own arrangements for consultation with other Commonwealth Governments, and he referred to the negotiation of the Australia–New Zealand Agreement of 1943 as a case in point. In such cases Dominion Governments should, he suggested, see that other members of the Commonwealth were informed of the progress of events. Finally, he suggested that Dominion Governments might supply to the United Kingdom Government information received from their representatives in foreign capitals.

MR. ATTLEE said that reports of this kind received from Dominion Governments during the war had often been found most useful.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that in his view the present system worked admirably. He did not see how it could be improved at present. Indeed Dominion Governments were kept so fully informed by the United Kingdom Government that it was sometimes difficult to absorb the information. He distinguished between the classes of messages. Telegrams imparting information were of great value as a background for Commonwealth co-operation; these did not necessarily call for acknowledgment. Another class required a response from Dominion Governments. The South African Government endeavoured to reply promptly and dealt in complete frankness with the other members of the Commonwealth. In addition to the telegrams exchanged between Governments, each Government was in constant touch with its High Commissioner, who supplied valuable supplementary information. This representation should, he suggested, be extended between all the Governments of the Commonwealth. When they all had High Commissioners in the capitals of the other members of the Commonwealth, then he thought that the present machinery for consultation could not be further improved.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that it was recognised that, during the war, certain decisions had had to be treated with special secrecy. Certainly, since the end of the war, the fullest information had been supplied in a most efficient manner, and he expressed his gratitude to Lord Addison and the Dominions Office.

He thought that few people realised how constant and close was the contact at present maintained between Commonwealth Governments and he suggested that it would be very useful if Mr. Attlee or Lord Addison could make a public statement on the subject, possibly in connection with the discussion at that meeting.

MR. ATTLEE and LORD ADDISON said that they would certainly consider this suggestion.

3. LORD ADDISON said that in accordance with the decision taken at the 17th Meeting, draft terms of reference for the meeting of experts had been prepared at a meeting of officials.

There was general agreement with the substance of this draft. The precise wording should be settled between officials. It was agreed that the meeting of experts should be convened as soon as possible.

4. The Meeting had before them a draft of a final communiqué circulated by Lord Addison (P.M.M. (46) 34) and amendments to the draft suggested by Mr. Mackenzie King and Dr. Evatt (P.M.M. (46) 36 and 35). The text of the communiqué as finally agreed is annexed to these Minutes.

Field-Marshal Smuts.

5. MR. ATTLEE, speaking with the warm approval of all present at the meeting, called attention to the fact that the following day was the 76th birthday of Field-Marshal Smuts. He was sure that he spoke on behalf of all present in conveying to Field-Marshal Smuts his congratulations and best wishes for long life and happiness. It was an honour to have among them one who was, without doubt, the doyen among the statesmen of the world.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS expressed his thanks to the Meeting. He was much touched by this expression of their good wishes and regard.

Mr. Attlee and Lord Addison.

6. MR. MACKENZIE KING and the other Dominion Ministers expressed to Mr. Attlee their deep gratitude for the time and patience he had devoted to the meetings, which they well knew must have been an exacting call on him among his many preoccupations. They much appreciated his sympathetic understanding of the points of view of Dominion Governments. They were most grateful also to Lord Addison for his indefatigable efforts and help. They expressed appreciation to the officials concerned for the arrangements; these had been most satisfactory. Finally, they were grateful to His Majesty's Government for their generous hospitality and the facilities afforded to them.

MR. ATTLEE, in reply, said that it had been a great pleasure, and he was sure a great advantage, to have an opportunity of supplementing the official communications between Governments by the personal contacts established at these meetings.

ANNEX.

TEXT OF FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED TO THE PRESS ON 23RD MAY, 1946.

In the course of the last five weeks the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the Right Honourable C. R. Attlee, and several of his Cabinet colleagues, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister of Australia, the Right Honourable J. B. Chifley, and the Australian Minister of External Affairs, the Right Honourable H. V. Evatt, the Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Right Honourable W. Nash, and the Prime Minister of South Africa, Field-Marshal the Right Honourable J. C. Smuts, have engaged in informal consultations on a number of questions arising in connection with the post-war settlements.

The representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa desire to place on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The discussions have been in the nature of an informal exchange of views. They have covered a broad field and have contributed greatly to the elucidation of many problems and to a mutual understanding of the issues involved. Among the subjects on which views were exchanged were the draft Peace Treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland; the future of Germany; security responsibilities and arrangements for liaison between British Commonwealth Governments on military affairs; and economic and welfare co-operation in the South Pacific and South-East Asia. The opportunity was taken for consultations on other current issues and matters of mutual interest, including separate consultations between individual United Kingdom and Dominion Ministers on questions specially affecting one or two countries only.

At the conclusion of the meetings, the assembled representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa place on record their appreciation of the value of this series of consultations, which exemplifies the system of free discussion and exchange of views that characterises the relations of the countries of the British Commonwealth. The existing methods of consultation have proved their worth. They include a continuous exchange of information and comment between the different members of the Commonwealth. They are flexible and can be used to meet a variety of situations and needs, both those where the responsibility is on one member alone and where the responsibility may have to be shared. They are peculiarly appropriate to the character of the British Commonwealth, with its independent members who have shown by their sacrifices in the common cause their devotion to kindred ideals and their community of outlook. While all are willing to consider and adopt practical proposals for developing the existing system, it is agreed that the methods now practised are preferable to any rigid centralised machinery. In their view such centralised machinery would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the combination of autonomy and unity which is characteristic of the British Commonwealth and is one of their great achievements.

They reaffirm their belief in the efficacy of free and constant consultation and co-operation, not only within the British Commonwealth but also in the wider international sphere. They are determined to do everything in their power to maintain in time of peace the historic co-operation achieved by the Allies in time of war. They look forward to the steady development throughout the whole world of closer international co-operation based on increasing mutual confidence and devoted to the raising of standards of living and the promotion of democratic liberty. Their Governments and peoples are determined to give the fullest support to the United Nations Organisation, not only as a foundation of peace and security, but also as a means for promoting economic progress and social welfare.

COMMERCIAL POLICY

1. The Meeting had before them a paper on the arrangements for inter-governmental discussions on commercial policy (P.M.M.(46) 29) and the text of recent correspondence between British Commonwealth Governments on the subject (P.M.M.(46) 33).

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be of assistance to obtain some preliminary indication of the policies of British Commonwealth Governments in relation to imperial preference. The question affected all parts of the Commonwealth. There was a widespread impression, especially, but not only, in the United States, that, when the Loan Agreement had been passed by Congress, there would be an obligation to modify the system of imperial preference. He recognised that this had never been the intention. Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement made it clear that reduction of preferences would be related to reductions of tariffs. But public opinion had not grasped the point.

MR. ATTLEE said that the United Kingdom Government had taken the line that, while they were in favour of the freest commercial interchange and the reduction of tariffs, concessions must be reciprocal. They could not accept the view that the British Empire must be put in the dock on account of imperial preference. The United States tariff was a very high tariff and it was not for her to point the finger of scorn.

LORD ADDISON referred to the statement made by Mr. Attlee in the House of Commons on 6th September, 1945, which had included the passage:- "There is thus no question of any unilateral surrender of preferences. There must be adequate compensation for all parties affected". This view had been repeated on several occasions. The United States were inclined to represent themselves as apostles of free trade: but the United States tariff itself represented a very great obstruction of trade.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government had always taken the view that the terms of the Lend-Lease Agreement would cause difficulties in this connection. They had made strong representations in this sense before signature of the Agreement.

DR. EVATT took a different view. He did not think that the Lend-Lease Agreement was subject to the interpretation to which Mr. Nash referred. He added that the United States Government themselves intended to maintain a system of preferences with the Philippines for a period of years, even after they became independent. In his experience it was recognised in both official and commercial circles in the United States that reductions in imperial preference must be related to United States tariff concessions.

The United States proposals on commercial policy, put forward last year, were part and parcel of the loan negotiations. The United States had used "pressure tactics" and, in particular, the question of financial aid to force conditions on the preference issue. The Australian view had then been, and still was, that they were "prepared to join in commercial policy negotiations only on the basis of making concessions in return for equivalent reciprocal concessions on the part of other countries."

In November of last year they had informed the United Kingdom Government that they could not agree to the United States proposals, and did not wish to associate themselves with them when they were announced. The Australian Government had at that time made the following statement:- "We desire complete freedom of action in relation to the formula and all other proposals in the document. Indeed, we feel that all countries should be in a position to approach both negotiations and the conferences with full freedom to discuss and finally resolve all sections of the proposals on mutually advantageous lines".

In a public statement issued on 7th December of last year, Mr. Chifley had said that the Australian Government would "enter the proposed negotiations and take part in the discussions without any prior commitment or implied obligation to make any specific concessions in respect of tariffs or Empire preferences". Any proposals in these fields would be "dealt with on their merits and any concessions agreed to must be counter-balanced by fully equivalent concessions which will enlarge the market opportunities for Australia's exports, both primary and secondary".

He wished to reiterate the views of the Australian Government. They had repeatedly maintained the necessity for a high level of employment and a high purchasing power. They had regarded the removal of trade barriers as ancillary to the task of maintaining the highest possible degree of employment. It was that view which prevailed at San Francisco, and led to the inclusion of an undertaking to pursue full employment as a main objective. It was their insistence on this point of view, now widely accepted in both government and academic fields, that had led to the decision to call a conference on trade and employment.

Having got so far, they would not allow the United States Government to push into the background their obligation in the Charter, and their decision to consider employment along with tariff negotiations. When imperial preference was attacked, we should remember that it was introduced after and not before the Hawley - Smoot tariff of 1930. As in the case of bases, there could be no concessions unless there were reciprocal obligations. Unless the United States was willing, not only to make very great concessions - and Australia's trade negotiations with her had led them to doubt whether she would do so - but also to fulfil her obligation to maintain high levels of employment, Australia could not afford to make any concessions. Her demands for imports were growing all the time because of the great demand caused by her high level of employment. These demands could only be met by sales overseas. If she was forced into the choice of reducing employment levels or placing restrictions on imports, she must adopt the latter.

The Australian Government considered that in the United States a wrong interpretation was being placed on Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement. On the one hand the United States Government had shown no positive intention to reduce tariffs: on the other hand they proposed to maintain a preferential system with the Philippines. In entering the commercial policy negotiations the Australian Government would not regard themselves as bound by any commitment. They could not contemplate modifying imperial preference without reciprocal concessions.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government would not consider themselves bound by any commitment in entering upon the negotiations. They would welcome any progress towards increased freedom of trade, but considered that changes in preferences must depend on changes in tariffs.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government was not opposed in principle to reduction of tariffs and preferences, but they could not agree to any prior commitment to abolish preferences, to which they attached the highest importance. A reduction of United States tariffs was essential. He observed that in the case of New Zealand the arrangements for licensing imports on a quota basis were a more important means of control of trade than tariffs. He granted that they were highly discriminatory, but the New Zealand Government regarded the system as of great value. This aspect required careful consideration. He added that such modifications would be made as might be required to fulfil international commitments, e.g. under the Bretton Woods Agreements. If substantial United States tariff reductions were obtained, they might be prepared to relax the present quota restrictions. He did not, however, consider that control by quota must necessarily restrict the expansion of international trade.

MR. MARQUAND said that the United Kingdom Government would enter the negotiations with the hope that a world trade agreement would result from them. The issue largely depended on the extent of the tariff concessions which the United States were prepared to make. In this connection he suggested that it was important that Commonwealth Governments should do nothing which might have the effect of discouraging the United States Government in advance of the discussions.

SIR PERCIVALE LIESCHING said that at the time of the negotiations of the Mutual Aid Agreement the dangers of misconstruction of Article VII had been fully appreciated and the United Kingdom Government might not have signed it if it had not been for the explicit understandings recorded in the accompanying exchange of letters. It was clearly recognised that there must be concessions on both sides, and he observed that the terms of Mr. Attlee's statement of the 6th December had been agreed with the United States Government. In the recent Washington conversations the United Kingdom Delegation had taken a very firm stand, and he was fully satisfied as to the strength of the bargaining position of British Commonwealth Governments, provided that no Government adopted the position that no reduction in imperial preference could be considered. As regards the United States arrangements with the Philippines, he suggested that it would not be wise to press analogies between these and imperial preference too far, for the Philippines arrangements contemplated the automatic abolition of preferences in twenty years' time.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the understanding of the Canadian Government and their general attitude was the same as that of the United Kingdom Government as stated by Sir Percivale Liesching.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was satisfied with Sir Percivale Liesching's statement of the position.

Summing up, MR. ATTLEE said that there appeared to be a wide measure of agreement between British Commonwealth Governments on the general lines of approach to the problem.

The Meeting then turned to consider the timetable for the forthcoming inter-governmental discussions on commercial policy.

MR. MORRISON said that the international discussions now proposed would fall into three stages:-

(i) a meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council to elaborate an annotated draft agenda for the eventual United Nations Conference;

(ii) a meeting of "Drafting Countries" to be convened by the United States Government to negotiate on the basis of the "Proposals on Trade and Employment" which had been published at the time of the Loan Agreement last December (Cmd. 6709). This meeting would include detailed negotiations on tariffs and preferences;

(iii) a full international conference to be called by the United Nations.

After consultations between the United States, the United Kingdom and Dominion Governments, it had now been agreed that the Preparatory Committee should meet on 15th October, probably in London or Geneva. The meeting of the Drafting Countries would take place in March. No date had yet been fixed for the United Nations Conference.

The question now arose what separate discussions were required between Commonwealth countries. Telegrams had passed between the various countries on this subject and there was general agreement that discussions would be necessary before the Drafting Countries met in March when detailed bargaining on tariffs and preferences would occur as well as discussions on non-tariff matters. It had also been proposed that there might be a preliminary exchange of views before the October meeting, to cover such questions as the use of import quotas, subsidies, state trading, cartels and full employment. There seemed, however, to be some doubt as to the necessity for these discussions and some difficulty in fixing a date for them.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the number of international conferences made very heavy demands on the time of Ministers and officials. He doubted whether a special meeting would be necessary before the Preparatory Committee met in October, unless it were for a few days immediately before that meeting. The peculiar Commonwealth interest in the general commercial policy proposals lay in the special relationship between preferences and tariff reductions and this question would not be considered by the Preparatory Committee. There could be no doubt that the officials of Commonwealth countries, who had been associated with the earlier stages of the commercial discussions, would continue to work closely together within the Preparatory Committee. He thought it would probably be a mistake to try to formulate a specifically Commonwealth approach to the various questions of general commercial policy which would then be considered.

As regards discussions before the meeting of the Drafting Countries, he thought that these should immediately precede the meeting. They would indeed naturally merge into them, for discussions between Commonwealth countries about the modifications of preferences to which they could consent could hardly proceed very far until they knew fairly precisely what reductions the other parties to the negotiations would be ready to offer, and these offers would only be developed in the course of the actual negotiations between the Drafting Countries. He suggested, therefore, that the discussions between Commonwealth countries should start not more than three weeks before the meeting of the Drafting Countries.

DR. EVATT thought that discussions prior to the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would be worth while. He suggested that discussions between officials a fortnight or so before the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would suffice. It would probably be well not to give any undue publicity to these preliminary discussions.

MR. NASH said that he would have preferred that the discussions should take place in July as New Zealand officials would be in this country at that time and he would also be here himself. He thought it would be very useful to have preliminary talks on such matters as state trading, bulk purchase and subsidies which, to New Zealand at any rate, were quite as important as tariffs. He was also anxious to give public indication in New Zealand that the principle of imperial preference was not in doubt.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be difficult for South Africa to make officials available in July in addition to October. He was, therefore, in favour of a preliminary discussion before the October meeting.

LORD ADDISON suggested that it would be possible for United Kingdom representatives to have useful talks during July with Mr. Nash and New Zealand officials, with the participation of the High Commissioners for the other Dominions and such officials as happened to be in this country at that time.

After further discussion it was agreed that this would be the best course to follow and that arrangements should be set in train accordingly.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR CONSULTATION BETWEEN GOVERNMENTS

2. LORD ADDISON said that he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they had any suggestions to make to improve the present arrangements for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. The arrangements in practice were founded on the resolutions of the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930. The Conference of 1930 had summarised the main points of the system of communication and consultation in relation to foreign affairs as follows:-

"(1) Any of His Majesty's Governments conducting negotiations should inform the other Governments of His Majesty in case they should be interested and give them the opportunity of expressing their views, if they think that their interests may be affected.

(2) Any of His Majesty's Governments on receiving such information should, if it desires to express any views, do so with reasonable promptitude.

(3) None of His Majesty's Governments can take any steps which might involve the other Governments of His Majesty in any active obligations without their definite assent."

In commenting on (1), the Conference had said:-

"The application of this is not confined to treaty negotiations. It cannot be doubted that the fullest possible interchange of information between His Majesty's Governments in relation to all aspects of foreign affairs is of the greatest value to all the Governments concerned."

Lord Addison said that a very large number of telegrams and despatches were now sent by the United Kingdom Government to Dominion Governments to keep them informed of developments in world affairs. In many cases, the messages were confined to factual information. Others also gave the views or comments of the United Kingdom Government. In such cases the United Kingdom Government proceeded on the assumption that, if a Dominion Government wished to offer any comments of its own, it would not hesitate to do so. When no comment was made by a Government, they assumed that it did not wish to express any views on the subject.

Lord Addison said that in his opinion the system worked very well. But he would welcome their comments or suggestions for improvement of it.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he thought that the system worked excellently. The Dominions Office kept Dominion Governments very fully informed, and the arrangements had worked with remarkable efficiency both during and since the war. The Canadian Government agreed with the statement of principles mentioned by Lord Addison. When, on receipt of information from another Commonwealth Government, they offered no comment, neither acceptance nor rejection of the points made in the communication was implied by the absence of comment. In such a case the position was merely that the Canadian Government had been informed. He suggested that it was necessary carefully to distinguish the two processes, first, of informing and, secondly, of consulting other Governments. Consultation placed an immediate responsibility on the Government consulted. But he observed that, in the case of messages addressed by the United Kingdom Government to all four Dominion Governments, it was not the invariable practice of the Canadian Government to send a reply even when comments were invited, since it often was apparent that the subject was of concern to others of the Dominion Governments addressed rather than to the Canadian Government.

Mr. Mackenzie King considered that the system of exchange of communications between Governments, supplemented by the contacts maintained by High Commissioners, was now of great efficiency. He had been a strong advocate of the method of consultation by written messages. This enabled the Minister concerned in each country to discuss the subject with his Government colleagues. Under the present system, therefore, there was, in effect, a continuous conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth capable of dealing with all questions by Governmental decisions. As he had explained, he hesitated to express opinions at Commonwealth meetings such as the present, because he could not consult his colleagues. It was, moreover, valuable to have the written record of the views expressed on each side which resulted from an exchange of messages. By this means, also, all British Commonwealth Governments could be kept informed; for where the subject of a communication was of interest to more than one Commonwealth Government, the Canadian Government usually communicated their reply to all the Governments concerned.

DR. EVATT doubted whether the summary of points made by the 1930 Imperial Conference now entirely covered the ground. He gave as an instance the development of Dominion responsibilities in international affairs. Far Eastern affairs were of vital concern to Australia, and the Australian Government wished to have immediate information of developments. As regards the general arrangements for consultation, during the war there had been occasions when, under the stress of circumstances, decisions of great importance to Dominion Governments had been taken without any consultation with them, but that was not the case now. As to the principles, he considered that the proposed communiqué to be issued after the meeting summed up the position well. The alternative to the present system would be the establishment of some centralised machinery, but such a step might impose a strain on inter-Governmental relations. It would lead to a very difficult situation if relations between British Commonwealth Governments became a matter of party politics in any country of the Commonwealth and he hoped that this situation would not arise. He thought that Lord Addison and his Department were to be complimented on their work; Dominion Governmentswere, he was sure, most grateful to them.

MR. NASH said that he endorsed the views expressed by Mr. Mackenzie King. He considered that the system worked very well in general, but he would like to make four points. First, he suggested that sometimes information might be supplied to Dominion Governments earlier. Secondly, he thought that there could usefully be an extension of the practice of repetition to other Commonwealth Governments of the messages addressed by one Dominion Government to another or to the United Kingdom Government. Thirdly, there might be scope for Dominion Governments on their side to improve their own arrangements for consultation with other Commonwealth Governments, and he referred to the negotiation of the Australia-New Zealand Agreement of 1943 as a case in point. In such cases Dominion Governments should, he suggested, see that other members of the Commonwealth were informed of the progress of events. Finally, he suggested that Dominion Governments might supply to the United Kingdom Government information received from their representatives in foreign capitals.

MR. ATTLEE said that reports of this kind received from Dominion Governments during the war had often been found most useful.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that in his view the present system worked admirably. He did not see how it could be improved at present. Indeed Dominion Governments were kept so fully informed by the United Kingdom Government that it was sometimes difficult to absorb the information. He distinguished between the classes of messages. Telegrams imparting information were of great value as a background for Commonwealth co-operation; these did not necessarily call for acknowledgment. Another class required a response from Dominion Governments. The South African Government endeavoured to reply promptly and dealt in complete frankness with the other members of the Commonwealth. In addition to the telegrams exchanged between Governments, each Government was in constant touch with its High Commissioner who supplied valuable supplementary information. This representation should, he suggested, be extended between all the Governments of the Commonwealth. When they all had High Commissioners in the capitals of the other members of the Commonwealth, then he thought that the present machinery for consultation could not be further improved.

Field Marshal Smuts said that it was recognised that, during the war, certain decisions had had to be treated with special secrecy. Certainly, since the end of the war, the fullest information had been supplied in a most efficient manner, and he expressed his gratitude to Lord Addison and the Dominions Office.

He thought that few people realised how constant and close was the contact at present maintained between Commonwealth Governments and he suggested that it would be very useful if Mr. Attlee or Lord Addison could make a public statement on the subject, possibly in connection with the discussion at that meeting.

MR. ATTLEE and LORD ADDISON said that they would certainly consider this suggestion.

3. LORD ADDISON said that in accordance with the decision taken at the 17th Meeting, draft terms of reference for the meeting of experts had been prepared at a meeting of officials.

There was general agreement with the substance of this draft. The precise wording should be settled between officials. It was agreed that the meeting of experts should be convened as soon as possible.

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

4. The Meeting had before them a draft of a final communiqué circulated by Lord Addison (P.M.M.(46) 34) and amendments to the draft suggested by Mr. Mackenzie King and Dr. Evatt (P.M.M.(46) 36 and 35). The text of the communiqué as finally agreed is annexed to these Minutes.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS

5. MR. ATTLEE, speaking with the warm approval of all present at the meeting, called attention to the fact that the following day was the 76th birthday of Field Marshal Smuts. He was sure that he spoke on behalf of all present in conveying to Field Marshal Smuts his congratulations and best wishes for long life and happiness. It was an honour to have among them one who was, without doubt, the doyen among the statesmen of the world.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS expressed his thanks to the Meeting. He was much touched by this expression of their good wishes and regard.

MR. ATTLEE AND LORD ADDISON

6. MR. MACKENZIE KING and the other Dominion Ministers expressed to Mr. Attlee their deep gratitude for the time and patience he had devoted to the meetings, which they well knew must have been an exacting call on him among his many preoccupations. They much appreciated his sympathetic understanding of the points of view of Dominion Governments. They were most grateful also to Lord Addison for his indefatigable efforts and help. They expressed appreciation to the officials concerned for the arrangements which had been most satisfactory. Finally, they were grateful to His Majesty's Government for their generous hospitality and the facilities afforded to them.

MR. ATTLEE, in reply, said that it had been a great pleasure, and he was sure a great advantage, to have an opportunity of supplementing the official communications between Governments by the personal contacts established at these meetings.

ANNEX

TEXT OF FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ
ISSUED TO THE PRESS ON 23RD MAY, 1946

In the course of the last five weeks the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, The Right Honourable C.R. Attlee, and several of his Cabinet colleagues, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable W.L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister of Australia, the Right Honourable J.B. Chifley, and the Australian Minister of External Affairs, the Right Honourable H.V. Evatt, the Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Right Honourable W. Nash, and the Prime Minister of South Africa, Field Marshal the Right Honourable J.C. Smuts, have engaged in informal consultations on a number of questions arising in connection with the post-war settlements.

The representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa desire to place on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The discussions have been in the nature of an informal exchange of views. They have covered a broad field and have contributed greatly to the elucidation of many problems and to a mutual understanding of the issues involved. Among the subjects on which views were exchanged were the draft peace treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland; the future of Germany; security responsibilities and arrangements for liaison between British Commonwealth Governments on military affairs; and economic and welfare co-operation in the South Pacific and South-East Asia. The opportunity was taken for consultations on other current issues and matters of mutual interest, including separate consultations between individual United Kingdom and Dominion Ministers on questions specially affecting one or two countries only.

At the conclusion of the meetings, the assembled representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, place on record their appreciation of the value of this series of consultations, which exemplifies the system of free discussion and exchange of views that characterises the relations of the countries of the British Commonwealth. The existing methods of consultation have proved their worth. They include a continuous exchange of information and comment between the different members of the Commonwealth. They are flexible and can be used to meet a variety of situations and needs, both those where the responsibility is on one member alone and where the responsibility may have to be shared. They are peculiarly appropriate to the character of the British Commonwealth, with its independent members who have shown by their sacrifices in the common cause their devotion to kindred ideals and their community of outlook. While all are willing to consider and adopt practical proposals for developing the existing system, it is agreed that the methods now practised are preferable to any rigid centralised machinery. In their view such centralised machinery would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the combination of autonomy and unity which is characteristic of the British Commonwealth and is one of their great achievements.

The reaffirm their belief in the efficacy of free and constant consultation and co-operation, not only within the British Commonwealth but also in the wider international sphere. They are determined to do everything in their power to maintain in time of peace the historic co-operation achieved by the Allies in time of war. They look forward to the steady development throughout the whole world of closer international co-operation based on increasing mutual confidence and devoted to the raising of standards of living and the promotion of democratic liberty. Their Governments and peoples are determined to give the fullest support to the United Nations Organisation, not only as a foundation of peace and security, but also as a means for promoting economic progress and social welfare.

Commercial Policy.

1. The Meeting had before them a paper on the arrangements for inter-governmental discussions on commercial policy (P.M.M. (46) 29) and the text of recent correspondence between British Commonwealth Governments on the subject (P.M.M. (46) 33).

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be of assistance to obtain some preliminary indication of the policies of British Commonwealth Governments in relation to imperial preference. The question affected all parts of the Commonwealth. There was a widespread impression, especially, but not only, in the United States, that, when the Loan Agreement had been passed by Congress, there would be an obligation to modify the system of imperial preference. He recognised that this had never been the intention. Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement made it clear that reduction of preferences would be related to reductions of tariffs. But public opinion had not grasped the point.

MR. ATTLEE said that the United Kingdom Government had taken the line that, while they were in favour of the freest commercial interchange and the reduction of tariffs, concessions must be reciprocal. They could not accept the view that the British Empire must be put in the dock on account of imperial preference. The United States tariff was a very high tariff and it was not for her to point the finger of scorn.

LORD ADDISON referred to the statement made by Mr. Attlee in the House of Commons on the 6th September, 1945, which had included the passage: "There is thus no question of any unilateral surrender of preferences. There must be adequate compensation for all parties affected." This view had been repeated on several occasions. The United States were inclined to represent themselves as apostles of free trade: but the United States tariff itself represented a very great obstruction of trade.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government had always taken the view that the reference in Article VII to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce would be interpreted as imposing a commitment to abolish preferences. They had made strong representations in this sense before the signature of the Agreement.

DR. EVATT took a different view. He did not think that the Lend-Lease Agreement was subject to the interpretation to which Mr. Nash referred. He added that the United States Government themselves intended to maintain a system of preferences with the Philippines for a period of years, even after they became independent. In his experience it was recognised in both official and commercial circles in the United States that reductions in imperial preference must be related to United States tariff concessions.

The United States proposals on commercial policy, put forward last year, were part and parcel of the loan negotiations. The United States had used "pressure tactics" and, in particular, the question of financial aid to force conditions on the preference issue. The Australian view had then been, and still was, that they were "prepared to join in commercial policy negotiations only on the basis of making concessions in return for equivalent reciprocal concessions on the part of other countries."

In November of last year they had informed the United Kingdom Government that they could not agree to the United States proposals, and did not wish to associate themselves with them when they were announced. The Australian Government had, at that time, made the following statement: "We desire complete freedom of action in relation to the formula and all other proposals in the document. Indeed, we feel that all countries should be in a position to approach both negotiations and the conferences with full freedom to discuss and finally resolve all sections of the proposals on mutually advantageous lines."

In a public statement issued on the 7th December of last year Mr. Chifley had said that the Australian Government would "enter the proposed negotiations and take part in the discussions without any prior commitment or implied obligation to make any specific concessions in respect of tariffs or Empire preferences." Any proposals in these fields would be "dealt with on their merits and any concessions agreed to must be counter-balanced by fully equivalent concessions which will enlarge the market opportunities for Australia's exports, both primary and secondary."

He wished to reiterate the views of the Australian Government. They had repeatedly maintained the necessity for a high level of employment and a high purchasing power. They had regarded the removal of trade barriers as ancillary to the task of maintaining the highest possible degree of employment. It was that view which prevailed at San Francisco, and led to the inclusion of an undertaking to pursue full employment as a main objective. It was their insistence on this point of view, now widely accepted in both government and academic fields, that had led to the decision to call a conference on trade and employment.

Having got so far, they would not allow the United States Government to push into the background their obligation in the Charter, and their decision to consider employment along with tariff negotiations. When imperial preference was attacked, we should remember that it was introduced after and not before the Hawley–Smoot tariff of 1930. As in the case of bases, there could be no concessions unless there were reciprocal obligations. Unless the United States was willing, not only to make very great concessions—and Australia's trade negotiations with her had led them to doubt whether she would do so—but also to fulfil her obligation to maintain high levels of employment, Australia could not afford to make any concessions. Her demands for imports were growing all the time because of the great demand caused by her high level of employment. These demands could only be met by sales overseas. If she was forced into the choice of reducing employment levels or placing restrictions on imports, she must adopt the latter.

The Australian Government considered that in the United States a wrong interpretation was being placed on Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement. On the one hand, the United States Government had shown no positive intention to reduce tariffs: on the other hand, they proposed to maintain a preferential system with the Philippines. In entering the commercial policy negotiations the Australian Government would not regard themselves as bound by any commitment. They could not contemplate modifying imperial preference without reciprocal concessions.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the Canadian Government would not consider themselves bound by any commitment in entering upon the negotiations. They would welcome any progress towards increased freedom of trade, but considered that changes in preferences must depend on changes in tariffs.

MR. NASH said that the New Zealand Government were not opposed in principle to reduction of tariffs and preferences, but they could not agree to any prior commitment to abolish preferences as they attached the highest importance to them. A reduction of United States tariffs was essential. He observed that, in the case of New Zealand, control of exchange and arrangements for licensing imports on a quota basis were a more important means of control of trade than tariffs. He granted that the present procedure was highly discriminatory in favour of the United Kingdom, but the New Zealand Government regarded the system as of great value. He added that with regard to Bretton Woods, New Zealand's exchange control and import procedure met all the requirements for the necessary exchange to be available to meet payments for all current transactions. If substantial United States tariff reductions were obtained, New Zealand would be prepared to consider modifying its present method of issuing of import licences. He did not, however, take the view that if all available overseas exchange was used control by quota must necessarily restrict the expansion of international trade.

He summarised the policy of the New Zealand Government. As stated in their telegram No. 389 of the 18th November, 1945, to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, their policy was to maintain complete control of New Zealand's external exchange; this control of exchange could not be effective without control of imports; and control of imports and effective use of exchange funds were linked up with the expansion of manufacturing facilities within

New Zealand which they considered essential if they were to meet their commitments for full employment. They were anxious to maintain their preferences for United Kingdom imports into New Zealand and to continue to receive preferences in the United Kingdom for New Zealand's primary products. In their opinion, this policy would not prevent New Zealand negotiating for the reciprocal reduction of tariffs and for the expansion of trade by other means within and without the Commonwealth.

MR. MARQUAND said that the United Kingdom Government would enter the negotiations with the hope that a world trade agreement would result from them. The issue largely depended on the extent of the tariff concessions which the United States were prepared to make. In this connection he suggested that it was important that Commonwealth Governments should do nothing which might have the effect of discouraging the United States Government in advance of the discussions.

SIR PERCIVALE LIESCHING said that at the time of the negotiations of the Mutual Aid Agreement the dangers of misconstruction of Article VII had been fully appreciated and the United Kingdom Government might not haye signed it if it had not been for the explicit understandings recorded in the accompanying exchange of letters. It was clearly recognised that there must be concessions on both sides, and he observed that the terms of Mr. Attlee's statement of the 6th December had been agreed with the United States Government. In the recent Washington conversations the United Kingdom Delegation had taken a very firm stand, and he was fully satisfied as to the strength of the bargaining position of British Commonwealth Governments, provided that no Government adopted the position that no reduction in imperial preference could be considered. As regards the United States arrangements with the Philippines, he suggested that it would not be wise to press analogies between these and imperial preference too far, for the Philippines arrangements contemplated the automatic abolition of preferences in twenty years' time.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the understanding of the Canadian Government and their general attitude was the same as that of the United Kingdom Government as stated by Sir Percivale Liesching.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was satisfied with Sir Percivale Liesching's statement of the position.

Summing up, MR. ATTLEE said that there appeared to be a wide measure of agreement between British Commonwealth Governments on the general lines of approach to the problem.

The Meeting then turned to consider the timetable for the forthcoming intergovernmental discussions on commercial policy.

MR. MORRISON said that the international discussions now proposed would fall into three stages :—

(i) A meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Economic and Social Council to elaborate an annotated draft agenda for the eventual United Nations Conference.
(ii) A meeting of "Drafting Countries" to be convened by the United States Government to negotiate on the basis of the "Proposals on Trade and Employment" which had been published at the time of the Loan Agreement last December (Cmd. 6709). This meeting would include detailed negotiations on tariffs and preferences.
(iii) A full international conference to be called by the United Nations.

After consultations between the United States, the United Kingdom and Dominion Governments, it had now been agreed that the Preparatory Committee should meet on the 15th October, probably in London or Geneva. The meeting of the Drafting Countries would take place in March. No date had yet been fixed for the United Nations Conference.

The question now arose what separate discussions were required between Commonwealth countries. Telegrams had passed between the various countries on this subject and there was general agreement that discussions would be necessary before the Drafting Countries met in March, when detailed bargaining on tariffs and preferences would occur as well as discussions on non-tariff matters. It had also been proposed that there might be a preliminary exchange of views before the October meeting, to cover such questions as the use of import quotas, subsidies, State trading, cartels and full employment. There seemed, however, to be some doubt as to the necessity for these discussions and some difficulty in fixing a date for them.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the number of international conferences made very heavy demands on the time of Ministers and officials. He doubted whether a special meeting would be necessary before the Preparatory Committee met in October, unless it were for a few days immediately before that meeting. The peculiar Commonwealth interest in the general commercial policy proposals lay in the special relationship between preferences and tariff reductions and this question would not be considered by the Preparatory Committee. There could be no doubt that the officials of Commonwealth countries, who had been associated with the earlier stages of the commercial discussions, would continue to work closely together within the Preparatory Committee. He thought it would probably be a mistake to try to formulate a specifically Commonwealth approach to the various questions of general commercial policy which would then be considered.

As regards discussions before the meeting of the Drafting Countries, he thought that these should immediately precede the meeting. They would, indeed, naturally merge into them, for discussions between Commonwealth countries about the modifications of preferences to which they could consent could hardly proceed very far until they knew fairly precisely what reductions the other parties to the negotiations would be ready to offer, and these offers would only be developed in the course of the actual negotiations between the Drafting Countries. He suggested, therefore, that the discussions between Commonwealth countries should start not more than three weeks before the meeting of the Drafting Countries.

DR. EVATT thought that discussions prior to the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would be worth while. He suggested that discussions between officials a fortnight or so before the meeting of the Preparatory Committee would suffice. It would probably be well not to give any undue publicity to these preliminary discussions.

MR. NASH said that he would have preferred that the discussions should take place in July as New Zealand officials would be in this country at that time and he would also be here himself. He thought it would be very useful to have preliminary talks on such matters as State trading, bulk purchase and subsidies which, to New Zealand at any rate, were quite as important as tariffs. He was also anxious to give public indication in New Zealand that the principle of imperial preference was not in doubt.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that it would be difficult for South Africa to make officials available in July in addition to October. He was, therefore, in favour of a preliminary discussion before the October meeting.

LORD ADDISON suggested that it would be possible for United Kingdom representatives to have useful talks during July with Mr. Nash and New Zealand officials, with the participation of the High Commissioners for the other Dominions and such officials as happened to be in this country at that time.

After further discussion it was agreed that this would be the best course to follow, and that arrangements should be set in train accordingly.

Arrangements for Consultation between Governments.

2. LORD ADDISON said that he would like to discover from Dominion Ministers whether they had any suggestions to make to improve the present arrangements for consultation between Commonwealth Governments. The arrangements in practice were founded on the resolutions of the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930. The Conference of 1930 had summarised the main points of the system of communication and consultation in relation to foreign affairs as follows :—

" (1) Any of His Majesty's Governments conducting negotiations should inform the other Governments of His Majesty in case they should be interested and give them the opportunity of expressing their views if they think that their interests may be affected.

(2) Any of His Majesty's Governments on receiving such information should, if it desires to express any views, do so with reasonable promptitude.

(3) None of His Majesty's Governments can take any steps which might involve the other Governments of His Majesty in any active obligations without their definite assent."

In commenting on (1), the Conference had said :—

"The application of this is not confined to treaty negotiations. It cannot be doubted that the fullest possible interchange of information between His Majesty's Governments in relation to all aspects of foreign affairs is of the greatest value to all the Governments concerned."

Lord Addison said that a very large number of telegrams and despatches were now sent by the United Kingdom Government to Dominion Governments to keep them informed of developments in world affairs. In many cases the messages were confined to factual information. Others also gave the views or comments of the United Kingdom Government. In such cases the United Kingdom Government proceeded on the assumption that, if a Dominion Government wished to offer any comments of its own, it would not hesitate to do so. When no comment was made by a Government, they assumed that it did not wish to express any views on the subject.

Lord Addison said that in his opinion the system worked very well. But he would welcome their comments or suggestions for improvement of it.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he thought that the system worked excellently. The Dominions Office kept Dominion Governments very fully informed, and the arrangements had worked with remarkable efficiency both during and since the war. The Canadian Government agreed with the statement of principles mentioned by Lord Addison. When, on receipt of information from another Commonwealth Government, they offered no comment, neither acceptance nor rejection of the points made in the communication was implied by the absence of comment. In such a case the position was merely that the Canadian Government had been informed. He suggested that it was necessary carefully to distinguish the two processes, first, of informing and, secondly, of consulting other Governments. Consultation placed an immediate responsibility on the Government consulted. But be observed that, in the case of messages addressed by the United Kingdom Government to all four Dominion Governments, it was not the invariable practice of the Canadian Government to send a reply even when comments were invited, since it often was apparent that the subject was of concern to others of the Dominion Governments addressed rather than to the Canadian Government.

Mr. Mackenzie King considered that the system of exchange of communications between Governments, supplemented by the contacts maintained by High Commissioners, was now of great efficiency. He had been a strong advocate of the method of consultation by written messages. This enabled the Minister concerned in each country to discuss the subject with his Government colleagues. Under the present system, therefore, there was, in effect, a continuous conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth capable of dealing with all questions by Governmental decisions. As he had explained, he hesitated to express opinions at Commonwealth meetings such as the present, because he could not consult his colleagues. It was, moreover, valuable to have the written record of the views expressed on each side which resulted from an exchange of messages. By this means, also, all British Commonwealth Governments could be kept informed; for where the subject of a communication was of interest to more than one Commonwealth Government, the Canadian Government usually communicated their reply to all the Governments concerned.

DR. EVATT doubted whether the summary of points made by the 1930 Imperial Conference now entirely covered the ground. He gave as an instance the development of Dominion responsibilities in international affairs. Far Eastern affairs were of vital concern to Australia, and the Australian Government wished to have immediate information of developments. As regards the general arrangements for consultation, during the war there had been occasions when, under the stress of circumstances, decisions of great importance to Dominion Governments had been taken without any consultation with them, but that was not the case now. As to the principles, he considered that the proposed communiqué to be issued after the meeting summed up the position well. The alternative to the present system would be the establishment of some centralised machinery, but such a step might impose a strain on inter-governmental relations. It would lead to a very difficult situation if relations between British Commonwealth Governments became a matter of party politics in any country of the Commonwealth and he hoped that this situation would not arise. He thought that Lord Addison and his Department were to be complimented on their work; Dominion Governments were, he was sure, most grateful to them.

MR. NASH said that he endorsed the views expressed by Mr. Mackenzie King. He considered that the system worked very well in general, but he would like to make four points. First, he suggested that sometimes information might be supplied to Dominion Governments earlier. Secondly, he thought that there could usefully be an extension of the practice of repetition to other Commonwealth Governments of the messages addressed by one Dominion Government to another or to the United Kingdom Government. Thirdly, there might be scope for Dominion Governments on their side to improve their own arrangements for consultation with other Commonwealth Governments, and he referred to the negotiation of the Australia–New Zealand Agreement of 1943 as a case in point. In such cases Dominion Governments should, he suggested, see that other members of the Commonwealth were informed of the progress of events. Finally, he suggested that Dominion Governments might supply to the United Kingdom Government information received from their representatives in foreign capitals.

MR. ATTLEE said that reports of this kind received from Dominion Governments during the war had often been found most useful.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that in his view the present system worked admirably. He did not see how it could be improved at present. Indeed Dominion Governments were kept so fully informed by the United Kingdom Government that it was sometimes difficult to absorb the information. He distinguished between the classes of messages. Telegrams imparting information were of great value as a background for Commonwealth co-operation; these did not necessarily call for acknowledgment. Another class required a response from Dominion Governments. The South African Government endeavoured to reply promptly and dealt in complete frankness with the other members of the Commonwealth. In addition to the telegrams exchanged between Governments, each Government was in constant touch with its High Commissioner, who supplied valuable supplementary information. This representation should, he suggested, be extended between all the Governments of the Commonwealth. When they all had High Commissioners in the capitals of the other members of the Commonwealth, then he thought that the present machinery for consultation could not be further improved.

Field-Marshal Smuts said that it was recognised that, during the war, certain decisions had had to be treated with special secrecy. Certainly, since the end of the war, the fullest information had been supplied in a most efficient manner, and he expressed his gratitude to Lord Addison and the Dominions Office.

He thought that few people realised how constant and close was the contact at present maintained between Commonwealth Governments and he suggested that it would be very useful if Mr. Attlee or Lord Addison could make a public statement on the subject, possibly in connection with the discussion at that meeting.

MR. ATTLEE and LORD ADDISON said that they would certainly consider this suggestion.

Nationality of Married Women.

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (46) 17th Meeting, Item 1.)

3. LORD ADDISON said that in accordance with the decision taken at the 17th Meeting, draft terms of reference for the meeting of experts had been prepared at a meeting of officials.

There was general agreement with the substance of this draft. The precise wording should be settled between officials. It was agreed that the meeting of experts should be convened as soon as possible.

Final Communiqué.

4. The Meeting had before them a draft of a final communiqué circulated by Lord Addison (P.M.M. (46) 34) and amendments to the draft suggested by Mr. Mackenzie King and Dr. Evatt (P.M.M. (46) 36 and 35). The text of the communiqué as finally agreed is annexed to these Minutes.

Mr. Attlee and Lord Addison.

6. MR. MACKENZIE KING and the other Dominion Ministers expressed to Mr. Attlee their deep gratitude for the time and patience he had devoted to the meetings, which they well knew must have been an exacting call on him among his many preoccupations. They much appreciated his sympathetic understanding of the points of view of Dominion Governments. They were most grateful also to Lord Addison for his indefatigable efforts and help. They expressed appreciation to the officials concerned for the arrangements; these had been most satisfactory. Finally, they were grateful to His Majesty's Government for their generous hospitality and the facilities afforded to them.

MR. ATTLEE, in reply, said that it had been a great pleasure, and he was sure a great advantage, to have an opportunity of supplementing the official communications between Governments by the personal contacts established at these meetings.

ANNEX.

TEXT OF FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED TO THE PRESS ON 23RD MAY, 1946.

In the course of the last five weeks the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the Right Honourable C. R. Attlee, and several of his Cabinet colleagues, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister of Australia, the Right Honourable J. B. Chifley, and the Australian Minister of External Affairs, the Right Honourable H. V. Evatt, the Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Right Honourable W. Nash, and the Prime Minister of South Africa, Field-Marshal the Right Honourable J. C. Smuts, have engaged in informal consultations on a number of questions arising in connection with the post-war settlements.

The representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa desire to place on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The discussions have been in the nature of an informal exchange of views. They have covered a broad field and have contributed greatly to the elucidation of many problems and to a mutual understanding of the issues involved. Among the subjects on which views were exchanged were the draft Peace Treaties with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland; the future of Germany; security responsibilities and arrangements for liaison between British Commonwealth Governments on military affairs; and economic and welfare co-operation in the South Pacific and South-East Asia. The opportunity was taken for consultations on other current issues and matters of mutual interest, including separate consultations between individual United Kingdom and Dominion Ministers on questions specially affecting one or two countries only.

At the conclusion of the meetings, the assembled representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa place on record their appreciation of the value of this series of consultations, which exemplifies the system of free discussion and exchange of views that characterises the relations of the countries of the British Commonwealth. The existing methods of consultation have proved their worth. They include a continuous exchange of information and comment between the different members of the Commonwealth. They are flexible and can be used to meet a variety of situations and needs, both those where the responsibility is on one member alone and where the responsibility may have to be shared. They are peculiarly appropriate to the character of the British Commonwealth, with its independent members who have shown by their sacrifices in the common cause their devotion to kindred ideals and their community of outlook. While all are willing to consider and adopt practical proposals for developing the existing system, it is agreed that the methods now practised are preferable to any rigid centralised machinery. In their view such centralised machinery would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the combination of autonomy and unity which is characteristic of the British Commonwealth and is one of their great achievements.

They reaffirm their belief in the efficacy of free and constant consultation and co-operation, not only within the British Commonwealth but also in the wider international sphere. They are determined to do everything in their power to maintain in time of peace the historic co-operation achieved by the Allies in time of war. They look forward to the steady development throughout the whole world of closer international co-operation based on increasing mutual confidence and devoted to the raising of standards of living and the promotion of democratic liberty. Their Governments and peoples are determined to give the fullest support to the United Nations Organisation, not only as a foundation of peace and security, but also as a means for promoting economic progress and social welfare.

Empire 'No' to defence plan

By NORMAN BARRYMAINE

A blueprint for the defence of the Empire as a single unit—drawn up by Field-marshal Alanbrooke before he relinquished his post of Chief of the Imperial General Staff—has not been adopted by the Dominions.

It was discussed by the Dominion Premiers and their deputies at the conference at 10, Downing-street under the chairmanship of Mr. Attlee.

Only concrete result achieved at the conference was an agreement in principle to the exchange of military liaison officers.

Dominion officers will be attached to the staffs of the High Commissioners in London and have direct access to the British Chiefs of Staff.

BRITAIN'S BURDEN

Rejection of the Alanbrooke Plan means that the main responsibility of Empire defence must for some years continue to fall upon Britain—at least until Uno's regional security arrangements and the world "police" force become effective instruments to maintain peace.

Opposition to the plan, I understand, came from Mr. Mackenzie King, Premier of Canada, and General Smuts, Premier of South Africa.

Neither the Canadian nor the South African Governments were willing to undertake commitments for the defence of the Empire on a broad basis.

It is understood that Canada envisages linking her defence more closely with that of U.S.A. A common army between the two countries has even been talked about.

The Chiefs of Staff of the Admiralty, War Office and Air Ministry hope the plan may be revived later.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON THE LONDON MEETINGS.

C224248

SUGGESTED POINTS

1. Origin of meetings -

Proposed conference of Prime Ministers of Commonwealth nations to be held immediately prior to Conference at Paris to conclude treaties of peace with Italy, Finland, Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria.

2. Plans changed by circumstances

Delay and uncertainty in regard to Paris Conference;

Conflict of original date with Dominion-Provincial Conference;

Inability of Field Marshal Smuts to come to London until May;

Inability of Prime Minister of Australia (Mr. Chifley) to remain in London beyond first week of May;

Only practical procedure to have a series of meetings;

3. Conduct of meetings

Early meetings largely devoted to matters in which Canadian interest more indirect (e.g. South-West Pacific);

Canadian government fully informed of matters discussed at earlier meetings;

Subjects of greatest interest to Canada discussed after Canadian participation began on May 20th;

Emphasise informal, exploratory and general nature of consultations;

Purpose of meetings: not to solve problems so much as to understand them;

Matters requiring decisions call rather for direct negotiation between Commonwealth governments concerned;

In this connection stress anew the adequacy and efficiency of methods of Commonwealth communication - the continuing conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth.

4. Commonwealth Consultations

Read communique into record and compare with speech to two Houses of British Parliament in May, 1944: also with earlier statement in Canadian Parliament.

The communique of Thursday, May 23, 1946 is a complete vindication of the time honoured Canadian position in this matter.

(In this connection also refer to Evatt's statement of May 23, 1946).

5. Value of direct consultations between Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

In view of the general agreement as to the excellence of existing methods of consultation, it may be asked what purpose is served by direct consultations face-to-face.

The answer is that immediate personal consultations are desirable not to concert policy or to settle definite issues, but to explore one another's minds on matters of general interest: to form personal friendships which contribute so greatly to a proper understanding and appreciation of written communications.

First meeting of Prime Ministers since present U.K. Government came into office. Particularly valuable to establish direct contacts with new Ministers.

6. No "British bloc"

Here repeat what was said in London speech of 1944 -

No thought of "ganging up" on other nations; or of seeking to form competing power blocs.

7. Disappointment over Paris Conference

Had hoped to combine London meetings and Paris Conference in a single visit overseas: Inconvenience of too many conferences. What is more serious:

Paris Conference has not met because of lack of agreement on fundamentals among great powers.

Great powers should not settle all details of peace treaties in advance: but equally no object in a conference until agreement in principle on fundamentals among the great powers.

Necessity of doing nothing to widen breach between great powers - time and patience - not too much talk - peace will be built slowly.

NOTE: THE FIGURES IN THIS STATEMENT ARE OF THE HIGHEST SECRECY. THEY HAVE NOT YET BEEN GIVEN TO PARLIAMENT

Points for discussion

British Commonwealth Relations - Defence
British Commonwealth Relations - Prime ministers' Conference, 1946

A. Defence obligations

Present military and financial commitments of United Kingdom Government

(discussed by Commonwealth Ministers at meeting on May 22, 1946).

1. Armed forces. Strength during 1947 beginning 1,194,000
   end 1,077,000

2. Announcement shortly to be made continuing compulsory military service for two years (probably required for five years and for first time in Britain's history in peace-time).

3. Total military expenditure current year £1,200,000,000
   plus additional charges, end of war (largely non-recurring) £ 576,000,000

   Of the overall figure (£1,200,000,000) expected expenditures overseas £ 250,000,000

   Other compulsory expenditures overseas (developmental and continuation of pre-1939 projects) £ 195,000,000

B. Comments on this situation by U.K. Ministers

Mr. Bevin:

1) Cost of overseas commitments by U.K. had formerly been met by income from foreign investments.

2) In changed circumstances, only by increased exports of manufactured goods could overseas expenditures be met.

3) This in turn implied serious strain on man-power (500,000 a year additional for export industries alone).

4) Also involved would be repayments under U.S. Loan.

5) In these circumstances could some relief of the defence burden be achieved, as to

(a) man-power
(b) finance.

6) Mr. Bevin did not suggest either

(a) contribution to a common pool, nor
(b) any modification of present freedom of action within the Commonwealth.

But could there be a redirection of responsibilities so that each member assumed special obligations in respect of that part of the world in which it was chiefly interested.

- no return to 1939, when there had been no really co-ordinated plan of action in a common war effort.

- it would be a great re-assurance to know that each Commonwealth country had a certain force which could be speedily mobilised and concentrated in a particular area.

C. Comment by Commonwealth Ministers

1) Mr. Mackenzie King

(a) no commitments but would make contents of memorandum (P.M.M.(46) 41 known to his colleagues for careful study;

(b) Canada's own commitments were already much greater than before 1939, and the U.K. was not alone in having liabilities;

(c) Military commitments of Canada to United Nations not yet known;

(d) Could U.S. be asked to assume greater security obligations in Europe?

2) Dr. Evatt

(a) Australia already committed to accept a permanent obligation heavier than any before 1939;

(b) the old method of direct contribution would be out of harmony with temper in the Dominions;

(c) Suggested a "regionalisation" of defence in particular areas (as was developing in the Pacific); decentralization of control required improved methods of military liaison.

3) Mr. Nash

(a) New Zealand commitments outside defence altogether included army occupation (Japan)
UNRRA

(b) New Zealand was willing to undertake certain responsibilities in Pacific, but this would still leave U.K. responsible for lines of communication.

4) Field Marshal Smuts

(a) Members of British Commonwealth had undertaken undefined obligations to United Nations, but they had at least as great an obligation to the British group of nations.

(b) The burden on one member of the group was well-nigh intolerable; it was unfair to make the British Isles pay for the peace at the rate now indicated.

(c) The objective of every member of the Commonwealth must be the support of "one group of nations as a great power."

D. Comment by Mr. Mackenzie King on F/M Smuts' remarks:

1) Question whether it would not be best to have a Commonwealth defence policy with allocation of specific liabilities was a recurrent one;

suggestions on this subject had been made as early as 1923 and again in 1926;

opposition from Dominions arose from political considerations which no government among them could overlook, even if there were military and financial advantages in such a Commonwealth system as was suggested.

2) The surest way to win the support of the Commonwealth Governments was to trust them to accept the obligations which they believed to be natural and right;

experience of the war had proved this point; a highly-centralized policy might have had a very different response from the Dominions;

if ever liberty were at stake, they could be trusted to respond wholeheartedly.

3) He believed in the closest co-ordination and closest understanding which would be achieved; but he was not in favour of reversing the tendencies of the last 20 years.

DOMINIONS CONFERENCE - LONDON

(May 1 to 27, 1946)

NEWS TREATMENT

Previous to the participation of Canada in the Dominions Conference the question of Empire defense was thrashed out and decision reached that "it would be built largely on an arrangement for a constant exchange of information and ideas and close liaison at all times" (Baltimore Sun 5/3). "Any other decision would have gone against British custom, tradition and history; and not even atomic bombs have yet shaken the British out of their traditions...the Dominions Conference... is just another proof of the faith of the British in their ability to continue to muddle through" (N.Y.Times 5/3). Another point of view on this loose defense plan however was "There will be not tightly centralized British Commonwealth defense system which could be interpreted by Russia, rightly or wrongly, as a hostile encircling sanitary cordon drawn around Soviet Asia...Added to this is the continuing political need throughout the Dominions for treading lightly in any area which touches their independence. Whatever their own opinions, Dominion statesmen cannot ignore political concern back home at any strengthening of British military controls ...Canada's controversy over wartime conscription has only to be remembered in this connection" (C.S.Monitor 5/3).

General plans were "laid for the creation of a South Seas Commission...to promote the general welfare of the native population...quite the opposite of imperialism (and) it was specifically emphasized that the proposed commission...would seek as soon as possible a link with the United Nations" (Balt.Sun 5/4). With regard to defense plans in this area and American demands for retention of Pacific bases "the conference was said to favor an invitation to the United States, France, Portugal and Holland to share in a regional defense scheme (in which) each power would be allocated its own defense area under this plan" (Los Angeles Examiner 4/28).

The apology by Prime Minister Attlee in the House of Commons to the Dominions occasioned by his previous statement that they had agreed to the proposed withdrawal of British troops from Egypt received coverage in the Buffalo News, Seattle Times, New Orleans Times Picayune, Boston Globe, Balt.Sun, Washington Post, Louisville Courier-Journal, Cleveland Plain Dealer. Australia and South Africa were reportedly viewing the proposal with misgivings from the point of view that the Suez Canal was a vital link and were disturbed that the Empire would be deprived of a Middle East military base. The N.Y.Herald-Tribune reported Canada's response to the misstatement "Prime Minister W.L.Mackenzie King told the Canadian House of Commons that Canada had neither given or been asked for advice on the British decision to withdraw military forces from Egypt, according to a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa." C.S.Monitor stated "Mr. Eden made much of Prime Minister Mackenzie King's statement that Canada had merely been informed about Egypt. But it was Mr. King who told the Labor Government when he recently visited here that no effort to tighten the machinery of joint Commonwealth decisions would be acceptable. It was likewise Mr. King who not only found it impossible to come to London at the time when other Dominion prime ministers could all gather here but, after the talks began, postponed the date of his arrival."

Discussions on the French Ruhr plan led to a general but unbinding agreement "with Canada unrepresented"(the latter being pointed out by the Chicago Sun) upon a plan for Germany under which Ruhr and Rhineland industries would be nationalized, their administration left in the hands of the Germans but their policies fixed by the occupying powers" (N.Y.Herald-Tribune). There was also agreement "upon three other general principles - that measures must be taken to insure that Germany shall not become a great military power again, that with this understanding Germany must be helped to develop economically and that any settlement must permit the growth of a democratic form of government". Point was also made that "the British Empire is not going to the peace conference to vote as a bloc (N.Y.Times - similarly Balt.Sun).

The arrival of Mr. King in London brought the conference out of recess and caused the N.Y.Times 5/20 to report that on renewal of defense discussions "Mr. King is in a position to present an authoritative view on atomic energy, which has transformed the basis of empire strategy...Food problems may also come up this week. Food was the first problem Mr. King asked about when he arrived...he said he was going to study...the question of the diversion by Britain of 200,000 tons of Canadian wheat to Germany."

"With Prime Minister W.L. Mackenzie King of Canada participating for the first time the empire leaders turned to a general exchange of views on the European situation as it had been affected by the Paris meeting" (N.Y.Times 5/21) and they "are said to have urged...that an enlarged peace conference be held soon and, if necessary, without the Soviet Union...Bevin is understood to have stressed Soviet responsibility for the failure to make more headway at Paris, but Mackenzie King, Smuts, Evatt and Nash hardly needed much prodding to urge that they and the representatives of the 16 other United Nations which fought the Axis should be brought into the peace conference quickly." (Chicago Sun and small item in PM 5/21)

"There was an impressive turnout for" the meeting on "atomic energy (which) was the subject of a general report by W.L.Mackenzie King...British leaders also gave reviews of what is being done here in the atomic energy line, but both they and the Canadian Prime Minister are in the position of being unable to divulge secrets held in common with the United States. Further arrangements were made for an interchange of scientists between the Dominions" (N.Y.Times 5/23).

"Wean an Empire" (Kansas City Star), "British Reject Empire Policy Plan" (Wash.Post); "Dominions Win Policy Freedom" (Minneapolis Morn. Tribune); "Dominions Turn Down United Foreign Policy" (Wash.Star) headlined the AP report of the decision "against the molding of an empire foreign policy and agreed to maintain 'decentralized' ties instead. The decision emphasized the autonomy of the dominions and formally marked the end of acknowledged United Kingdom predominance...all the dominions, and Canada and Australia particularly, opposed any move toward requiring joint commonwealth action in foreign affairs."

The end of the conference on May 23 disclosed that "the dominions and the United Kingdom are in agreement that the present loose system of communication and consultation within the Empire is much to be preferred over any hard and fast machinery...Prime Minister Mackenzie King of Canada described the existing system, unanimously preferred by the dominions, as a sort of continuous daily Imperial conference...Aside from this arrangement nothing emerged from the discussions here that could remotely be described as an agreed Empire policy or program. Each dominion will take away with it from London its own full sovereign right to act as it thinks best at the World Trade Conference, or when some future question of defense or social or economic co-operation arises. But each will also take away a much fuller understanding of the views of the other dominions and a bit understanding that they will undertake to act in unison in as many directions and on as many mutual problems as possible." (Balt. Sun - similarly N.Y.Times)

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Comment, apparently confined to only two papers, emphasized the "relationship in which the United Kingdom acts in equal partnership with the Dominions, instead of ruling over them." (Louisville Courier-Journal 5/27) calling its editorial "The Twilight of Empire" the Courier-Journal continued: "Conservative voices have been raised in England in a demand for a unified Empire foreign policy as an antidote to the 'dangerous' liberality of the Labor Government in relinquishing controls in India and Egypt. The representatives of the Dominions politely declined to be bound by a common agreement on foreign affairs. Each Dominion prefers to chart its own course. This decision has economic as well as political implications. It recognizes the coming demise of the Empire preference system of trade, which is doomed by the terms of the British loan. Citizens of Canada, Australia and New Zealand, staunchly loyal to a king who symbolizes their British heritage, feel nevertheless that their economic future lies in closer ties with the United States. The war has pulled them once and for all into our economic orbit. Younger and more liberal minds in the United Kingdom regard this new relationship with the Dominions as healthy and desirable." The Kansas City Times 5/27 commented: "The 1946 Imperial conference has both reaffirmed the autonomy in external affairs conferred on the dominions by the statute of Westminister and rejected all proposals which would have led to the development of a commonwealth foreign policy through regular consultation. The representatives of Canada and Australia, it is reported, were especially insistent that the dominions retain complete liberty of action. The net result appears to have been to emphasize the growing tendency of the dominions not to accept foreign leadership from Great Britain. In matters pertaining to the community of British nations, nevertheless, appearances are apt to be a dangerous guide. The dominions (always excepting Eire) like to proclaim their independence. But they are bound to Great Britain by ties that defy legal definition. Common ways of thinking, common aspirations, to say nothing of common self-interest, create powerful bonds. The latest imperial conference may seem to some outsiders to have carried the dissolution of the British Empire one step farther. Yet by the very fact of recognizing freedom the conference may have only strengthened the basis for voluntary co-operation in future emergencies."

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION C224262

There has been renewed and continuing discussion of the machinery which ought to be employed in the processes of consultation and co-operation among the several governments of the Commonwealth. My own feeling is now, as it has been for some years, that there is no substitute for mutual confidence; and in the discussions recently concluded in London there was a full measure of it. But I am equally clear that any tendency towards a centralization of authority ought to be resisted, as being something opposed to the best interests of Commonwealth relationships viewed as a whole.

I will only add, that in the lengthening history of our free association within the British Commonwealth, the emphasis has been away from centralization. The steps by which our own government progressed - by slow and sometimes painful stages - to responsible government, from responsible government to federation, and from federation to the autonomous stature of free nationhood - all of these represent a progressive devolution of function which is a principal achievement of our free governments.

The meetings in London in 1946 have recognized this to be the fact. The communique issued at the conclusion of the meetings speaks of preferring the existing methods of consultation which, by their flexibility, can be used to meet a variety of needs, alike where responsibilities are those of one nation alone and where responsibilities are shared by all nations of the Commonwealth. Without ruling out the possibility of development and improvement, it was agreed that flexibility is to be preferred to any rigid centralized machinery; since rigidity or centralization "would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the combination of autonomy and unity, which is characteristic of the British Commonwealth and is one of their great achievements."

It may be asked, "Where does Britain herself stand, in this atmosphere as of a world recovering from an earth-shaking storm, with commitments of varying degree in many parts of the world? What assurance has Britain that her own position is recognized; and that after six years of titanic effort her needs for re-establishment as a major trading nation have been appreciated and acted upon? What can Britain count upon when domestic demands upon her manpower both for defence and for industrial production for export are so heavy and so continuous?

To these questions there are, I believe, at least three answers:

1) In the broad picture, Britain must trust in some measure the democratic ideals, the matured goodwill, and the generous impulses of her partner-nations in the Commonwealth. Twice within a generation the Commonwealth and Empire have taken up arms in the defence of the world's freedom. But they took up arms of their own free will, by the deliberate decision of their respective Parliaments, and not because of any centralized direction of defensive or strategic planning. I believe that such a centralized direction of strategic planning, if it were to be directed only to the Commonwealth, would militate against the success of the very objects most prominently in view. But if Britain is prepared to trust the other nations of the Commonwealth, as they are prepared to trust Britain and all their partner-nations, even as they trusted in 1914 and again in 1939, I for one have no fear what the outcome will be.

2) The British Commonwealth ought not to be regarded as a defensive entity to the exclusion of any other relationships. I have suggested that any rigid or centralized system interposed upon political consultation would hinder rather than help; and I believe that any attempt at rigidity in defence arrangements would equally be open to objection.

The answer, it seems to me, lies in a twofold objective, the first general, the second more particular.

(a) The first and general need may best be met by the conclusion of defence agreements within the overall framework of the United Nations.

(b) The second and more particular objective can best be realized through the development of regional agreements and regional arrangements. In this way we can readily continue the very valuable agencies of co-operation built up during the years of war; and only in this way, I suggest, can we in Canada give full weight to the over-riding position arising from our immediate neighborhood with the United States.

One region with which we are closely and directly concerned is the North Atlantic, across which, through more than five years of war, Canada's fighting men helped to keep afloat that bridge of ships on which Allied victory depended. Another region is the Arctic frontier of the Canadian North, in which air transport has opened many new avenues of trade and communication, and has brought in its criss-cross pattern of aerial flight still newer problems of political security.

In each of these regions there are many peace-time areas of fruitful co-operation. The development of safety and reliability in aerial naviagion, in weather forecasting, in the application of radio-listening devices on land and at sea - all of these are open to still further research and development. Our clear duty, both for ourselves and for our immediate neighbours,is to concentrate upon those areas of most direct and immediate strategic concern.

3) If the Commonwealth is not to be regarded as a defensive entity, neither can it become a commercial area oblivious to the main currents of world trade. I have every sympathy for any well-designed attempt to augment the trading relations of all of the nations of the Commonwealth. But I cannot see in what way this objective can be reached on any basis bounded exclusively by the limits of the Commonwealth. If prosperity, like security, is indivisible, then surely prosperity must be built upon the widest possible foundation of trade on a global scale.

Nor do I forget that Canada has reached its present position as a trading nation by the operation of trading arrangements all around the globe. The operation of Canadian Mutual Aids and the continuation of the basic system under the Export Credits Guarantee legislation approved by this Parliament last year have brought aid and encouragement to not a few war-ravaged nations who were our Allies. But in addition this system has enabled us to maintain, to our own considerable advantage, a high level of employment at home, and on the basis of this high level of employment a uniformly high standard of living. If we are to succeed in maintaining these two high levels - the one of employment and the other of the public welfare - then we must look to our export and import trade.

I have said in this House on earlier occasions, and I repeat it now, that no country in the world has a greater stake in the removal of obstacles from the free exchange of goods and services all around the world. It is with this in mind that the Government attaches very particular importance to the United States proposals for an international conference on world trade and employment. The present indications are that the full conference may not now meet until the Spring of 1947, though the preliminary work of drafting has been proceeding steadily.

To sum up, I have, as anyone who has visited Britain within the past year must have, a tremendous admiration for the spirit and resolution with which the tasks of rebuilding have been tackled. After a great outpouring of the nation's resources there are signs of fatigue and of an understandable desire for a few years of peace and quiet. Meanwhile broad experiments are being made in the realm of national welfare, the extension of social services, and in shouldering and meeting the unprecedently high level of the public debt. I need scarcely add that the people of Canada will watch with sympathy and interest, giving aid and comfort where they can.

I should perhaps call attention to one problem to which the swift passage of events has given a peculiar urgency. I refer to the succession of international conferences which developed with and have ~~succeeded~~ followed in the wake of the end of the war. Since August of 1944 there has been scarcely a single month in which representation from Canada has not been required at one or more international conference or technical meeting under the aegis of the United Nations or one of its principal agencies. In many cases the Canadian representation has ~~had to be~~ been headed by one or more ministers of the Crown — in my own case at San Francisco last summer & more recently at two different sets of meetings in London; and in nearly every case technical or expert advisers have been drawn from departments of the Government at Ottawa.

There are few of these conferences which have not drawn upon the resources (and personnel) of the Department of External Affairs. Already understaffed at the outbreak of War, this Department has had to make the best possible use of a relatively small number of trained men. Despite new recruitment from men released from the forces during 1945

Memorandum for the Prime Minister:

Re: Prime Ministers' Meeting in London

When I called the United Kingdom High Commissioner this morning he had had no word from London. I have just been advised that word has now come of which the gist is that there will be no formal meeting of Prime Ministers at all, but simply individual discussions with those Prime Ministers and other Ministers who may be in London.

Sir Alexander Clutterbuck would like, if possible, to come in and see you for a minute or two at the end of the afternoon to give you the full details he has received in connection with this matter, if that would be convenient.

1. Opening of Meeting

MR. ATTLEE extended, on behalf of the United Kingdom Government, a warm welcome to the representatives of the other Commonwealth countries. He hoped that their stay in London would be happy and fruitful. He offered a special welcome to the Prime Ministers of India, Pakistan and Ceylon whose countries were for the first time being represented at a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. All would share his very great regret that Mr. Mackenzie King would be prevented by indisposition from attending the meeting; and he suggested that a message should be sent to Mr. Mackenzie King in the following terms :—

> "We wish to extend our sincere sympathy to the Prime Minister of Canada in the unfortunate illness which is preventing him from joining us during this meeting. His counsel and advice will be very greatly missed from our deliberations. We all join in wishing him a speedy return to good health and take this opportunity of congratulating him on the great part which he has played in the affairs of the Commonwealth for so many years."

This proposal was unanimously approved.

MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON read the following message from Mr. Mackenzie King :—

> "I wish to express to Prime Minister Attlee, his colleagues, and the Prime Ministers and representatives of the other nations of the Commonwealth, my great regret at not being able to be present this morning at the opening meeting of the Conference to which I have been much looking forward for the past few months. I should like, however, through Mr. Robertson, to convey to all present my warmest of greetings. I send a special word of greeting to those whom I have met at previous conferences in London and in Canada, and wish particularly to extend a word of greeting to the representatives of India, Pakistan and Ceylon, who for the first time are seated around the table at No. 10 Downing Street.
> "The first meeting of Prime Ministers and others which I attended was the Imperial Conference of 1923. Since that time I have been present at a number of other conferences and meetings. Each occasion has helped to widen and extend my appreciation not only of Commonwealth but of world affairs, and to confirm more strongly than ever my belief in the great value to be attached to co-operation between the different nations of the Commonwealth, and to the larger co-operation which our unity has made possible with the peoples of other nations. While I shall not be able to be present at the meetings, I am arranging for a member of the Canadian Cabinet to be present in a day or two. Meanwhile, Mr. Robertson, who has been associated with me in the work of government over many years, will, I feel confident, be able to represent my views accurately and adequately.
> "I hope, though confined to my room and at present to bed, I shall in the course of the Conference be able to meet the representatives from the countries of the Commonwealth who are attending the present meetings."

C224277

DR. EVATT expressed his thanks for the welcome extended by Mr. Attlee. He was glad to meet once again with representatives of the other members of the Commonwealth. In this critical stage in world affairs there were important questions for them to discuss; and he believed that by taking counsel together they could do much to help one another and to help the world. He also expressed his special thanks to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, Mr. Noel-Baker, and to his predecessor, Lord Addison, for the keen interest which they took in all Commonwealth matters.

MR. FRASER endorsed these remarks. He was sure that he could speak for all present in saying how pleased he was that Mr. Attlee had recovered from his illness, and was able to preside over their discussions. He believed that this would be an important and a useful meeting. There were difficult problems affecting them as members of the British Commonwealth which could most usefully be discussed, and he was confident that the difficulties could be overcome. Free discussion would bring the self-governing nations of the Commonwealth more closely together. The Commonwealth was the surest hope and the firmest foundation for world peace.

MR. LOUW thanked Mr. Attlee for his welcome, and said that he was particularly glad to find Mr. Attlee sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to preside over the meeting. He had been asked to express Dr. Malan's regret at his inability to attend the meeting. Dr. Malan was heavily engaged with the problems which necessarily confront a Government which has only recently taken office, and it had not been possible for him to leave South Africa at the present juncture. South Africa was glad, however, to be represented at the meeting in order to discuss the various matters which were of common concern to South Africa and other Commonwealth countries. Foremost amongst the problems of common interest to Great Britain and South Africa were those of the African Continent. In the sphere of international relations there were the problems of Western Europe, which were also of interest to South Africa. South Africa was happy to collaborate with the other Commonwealth countries in the discussion of such questions of common concern.

PANDIT NEHRU said he was grateful for the welcome extended to himself and to his delegation. He had long looked forward to the participation of a free India at a Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. He had many old friends amongst those present, and he hoped that more friendships would be forged during his stay. India was engrossed at the present time in problems consequent upon her new status but he recognised that these could not be studied or dealt with in isolation. Already he had felt an atmosphere of friendship and goodwill, which could be more important than logical argument. If this atmosphere could be more freely applied to the problems of the world, they would be nearer to solution than they were now. He hoped for the success of the conference, and on behalf of the Indian Government expressed his appreciation for the opportunity of these discussions with the other members of the Commonwealth.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN thanked Mr. Attlee for his welcome and said that he was proud to number Pakistan amongst the nations at the meeting. Representatives of between 500 and 600 million people were here assembled to discuss matters of common concern. With the spirit of goodwill and co-operation and the close association inherent in membership of the Commonwealth, he hoped their endeavours would contribute to the peace and happiness of mankind. He hoped that with a greater unity of heart and action between them the Commonwealth countries would be able to play an effective part in maintaining world peace and stimulating the peaceful progress of the world as a whole.

MR. SENANAYAKE thanked Mr. Attlee for his welcome and for the arrangements that had been made for their stay in London. He was glad to meet the representatives of the other Commonwealth countries. During the meeting they would no doubt discuss many problems and he hoped these would be approached, not from the point of view of each particular country, but on the basis of partnership in the Commonwealth. The discussions would strengthen the bonds of friendship and draw the member nations into an even closer association. There were many advantages to be gained from discussing their family matters together. There would also be great advantage if Prime Ministers could find time to visit the countries of each other so that understanding could be promoted from personal knowledge and experience. Ceylon would give a ready welcome to Commonwealth visitors. He promised the full co-operation of Ceylon in the coming discussions.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS expressed his gratitude that Southern Rhodesia had been invited to be represented at the meeting. He congratulated the new members of the Commonwealth on achieving their independent status. Southern Rhodesia was not jealous of their achievement. She recognised that, before she claimed full independence, she must be ready and able to undertake all the obligations implied by sovereignty. He thought that in present international conditions these discussions between the nations of the Commonwealth would prove to be of the highest importance.

MR. ATTLEE thanked the other Commonwealth representatives for these statements. He noted with interest the emphasis laid on the family nature of these discussions. This was how he himself regarded them. He believed that informal discussion of matters of common concern would be more fruitful than eloquence. He hoped that the results of the meeting would prove lasting, mutually helpful, and of practical benefit to all.

2. Procedure for the Meeting

(a) Subjects for Discussion at Plenary Sessions

MR. ATTLEE referred to P.M.M. (48) 5 and suggested that items (ix) and (x)—Precedence of Commonwealth High Commissioners and Situation in South-East Asia (Burma, Indonesia and Malaya)—should be added to the eight items which had already been agreed upon. This was approved.

(b) Subjects for Discussion outside Plenary Sessions

MR. ATTLEE said that, apart from the subjects agreed upon for discussion at plenary sessions, there were various other items of primary concern to certain Commonwealth countries only, such as migration and the co-ordination of social services. Doubtless these could best be talked over by groups of the Ministers concerned. Suggestions for meetings on any other such topics could be made to the Secretary, who would be ready to assist in making the necessary arrangements.

(c) Time-table

MR. ATTLEE referred to P.M.M. (48) 4 and said that, in view of Mr. Mackenzie King's unfortunate illness and the prospect that a senior Canadian Minister would have arrived before the end of the week, it seemed desirable to alter somewhat the time-table which had been proposed in P.M.M. (48) 4. He suggested that on Tuesday, 12th October, Mr. Bevin, after a general review of the world situation, might concentrate on affairs in the eastern half of the world. His statement, followed by one from Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, might form the basis for discussion in the afternoon. On the morning of Wednesday, 13th October, it might be suitable to resume discussion of the economic situation; and on Thursday, 14th October, there might be discussion on such subjects as Commonwealth consultation and the status of Commonwealth High Commissioners. The important subjects of foreign affairs in the west and Defence, which were closely connected, would then be left over for discussion in the second week of the meeting, when Canada would be represented by a Minister.

Generally speaking, MR. ATTLEE said that the aim had been to restrict the number of plenary meetings, so as to give plenty of opportunity for discussions between smaller groups of Ministers. It was proposed to hold no plenary session during the first week after Thursday, since Dr. Evatt had then to return to Paris as President of the United Nations Assembly.

MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON said that if the suggested change of programme commended itself to the other members of the Conference, the rearrangement would be much appreciated by Canada.

DR. EVATT, while concurring in the proposed arrangements for Tuesday and Wednesday, hoped that discussion of the status of High Commissioners and the machinery of Commonwealth consultation might be deferred until the second week.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN said that a plenary session on the morning of Thursday, 14th October, would not be convenient for the Pakistan delegation.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that in the circumstances it might be better to hold no plenary meeting on Thursday, 14th October. The business for plenary meetings might be provisionally arranged as follows:—

Tuesday, 12th October.—Foreign Affairs, with particular reference to South-East Asia and Japan.
Wednesday, 13th October.—Economic Questions (resumed).
Monday, 18th October.—Commonwealth consultation, and Status of High Commissioners.
Tuesday, 19th October.—Foreign Affairs in the western half of the World.
Wednesday, 20th October.—Defence.

There was general agreement with this rearrangement of the time-table.

MR. LOUW asked whether it was intended that the meeting should last longer than two weeks and expressed the view that the aim should be to finish by the end of the second week. MR. ATTLEE said that, while no precise concluding date had been fixed, it had been assumed that the final plenary session would be on Friday, 22nd October. There was general agreement that two weeks was the desirable limit of the meeting, though MR. FRASER made the point that this limit might be exceeded by a day or two if there was important business still outstanding at the end of the second week.

(d) Attendance at Meetings

MR. ATTLEE said that Ministers would be free to bring their High Commissioners with them to the meetings whenever they so desired. He hoped that Ministers would restrict to a minimum the number of official advisers who accompanied them to the plenary meetings, as space was very limited.

(e) Publicity

MR. ATTLEE said there was bound to be speculation about the course of the discussions. He hoped, however, that Ministers and their advisers would observe complete secrecy since, as had been made clear, the purpose of the Meeting was to facilitate the free and informal exchange of views on large questions of common concern.

A brief communiqué would be issued to the Press after each meeting. This would give the subject under discussion, and might on occasion indicate the broad lines of what had been said. The substance of the communiqués might be settled at the end of each meeting.

Mr. P. C. Gordon Walker, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, had been asked to supervise the Press arrangements on behalf of the United Kingdom Government. Mr. Gordon Walker had been in close touch with the Commonwealth Press Officers and would continue to meet them daily.

(f) Form of Record of Meeting

MR. ATTLEE said it was not proposed to have a verbatim record of the discussions. The Secretariat would prepare minutes in the general form adopted in 1946. These would give an account of the general trend of the discussion and would include a statement of the views expressed by each Prime Minister or Commonwealth representative on the more important questions. Such a record had been found on the last occasion to be satisfactory, and Ministers would probably not find it necessary to supplement it by making their own separate records. The record of each day's discussions would be circulated to delegations at 8 a.m. on the following day. The Secretariat would be glad to have any comments or corrections within forty-eight hours.

(g) Hospitality

MR. ATTLEE said that, acting on what was doubtless the wish of Prime Ministers, the programme of entertainment had been kept as light as possible and formal engagements had been kept to a minimum. There were, in fact, no large United Kingdom engagements apart from His Majesty's Dinner on 13th October, a dinner at No. 10 Downing Street on the 21st, a reception at Lloyd's on the 14th and a reception for the Empire Parliamentary Association on the 18th.

(h) Accommodation and Services

MR. ATTLEE said that he hoped the arrangements for accommodation of the delegations were to everyone's satisfaction. Arrangements had been made to provide boxes, keys, secrecy telephones for Prime Ministers themselves in their hotels, and circulation of Foreign Office and other telegrams. If there was any point on which Ministers found themselves in difficulty, the Secretariat would be glad to do everything possible to help.

(i) Times of Meetings

There was general agreement that plenary sessions should be held at 11 o'clock in the mornings (not 11·30 a.m. as previously proposed) and 3 p.m. in the afternoons.

3. First Press Communiqué

It was agreed that the communiqué regarding the morning's meeting should give a brief account of the introductory speeches, quoting the message to the Meeting from Mr. Mackenzie King and the Meeting's reply thereto, and adding that arrangements for the conduct of future business were also discussed.

1. The Economic Situation

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that he proposed to give a general picture of the economic situation and prospects of the United Kingdom and the sterling area. The United Kingdom Government had recently completed the preparation of their Four-Year Programme (P.M.M. (48) 2) for the Economic Co-operation Administrator. He did not over-estimate the accuracy of the forecast contained in that Programme, but it was the best that could be produced—neither unduly optimistic nor pessimistic and necessarily based on a great many uncertainties and assumpions. It was not a plan which would bind future action. It was rather a framework of estimates within which current problems could be considered and decided as they arose. It was possible that the outcome would be better than the estimate, or worse, but the Programme would be a helpful guide to future action. It had been submitted to the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation in Paris with a special reservation to the effect that it must be regarded as provisional pending consultation with other Commonwealth Governments.

He would first mention one or two general points in connexion with the Programme. The facts and figures which it contained covered primarily details of United Kingdom trade and earnings. But the figures of the sterling area as a whole were the true indication of the situation. The United Kingdom was responsible for the stability of sterling and the maintenance of the sterling area reserves of gold and dollars. These reserves must be maintained at about £500 million. At the moment they were a little below that figure, but taking into account certain E.R.P. credits outstanding it remained broadly true that during the last nine months the reserves had been maintained at the desired level. The necessity of maintaining the reserves made the position of the United Kingdom's economy, including her internal economy, of great importance to the whole sterling area.

Special problems arose from the fact that the Commonwealth also included a part of the dollar area, namely, Canada. He had, however, discussed these recently in detail in Ottawa, and he need not go over that ground again now. He had gone on from Ottawa to Washington, where the Economic Co-operation Administrator had accepted the principle that the rest of the sterling area deficit should be taken into account in assessing the allocation of E.R.P. aid to the United Kingdom. At the last moment the Americans had said that they could not meet our dollar or gold payments to countries outside the sterling area, i.e., primarily Egypt and Iran. This point would be pursued in Washington, but the dollar deficits of the sterling area would in effect become a charge on E.R.P. funds.

In Washington he had taken the line that unless the rest of the sterling area deficit were covered by E.R.P., it would be impossible for the deficits of the other participating countries with the rest of the sterling area to be covered by the European Payments Scheme. This point had now been met. The present position was, therefore, that the European Payments Scheme covered a considerable area outside Europe—for instance, the sterling area, the French franc area, the Belgian franc area, and the Dutch guilder area. Sir Stafford Cripps drew attention to the table in paragraph 11 of the paper on the European Payments Scheme and Trade Rules (Annex "D" to P.M.M. (48) 3). This showed that the United Kingdom had undertaken to make a contribution of the sterling equivalent of $312 million and would receive a contribution of the Belgian franc equivalent of $30 million. The United Kingdom had also agreed that participating countries might draw down their sterling balances by $209 million, making a total net contribution to European countries of nearly $500 million for which there would be no immediate return in the form of goods.

Sir Stafford Cripps then turned to consider certain basic assumptions which had been made in drawing up the estimates for the future which were contained in the Long-Term Programme. These were—

(i) That there would be no general rearmament or major political change in Europe.
(ii) That there would be no adverse change in the terms of trade for the sterling area as a whole and for the United Kingdom in particular. This could not be forecast with certainty, but on the instructions of the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation the Programme had been constructed on the basis of 1948–49 prices.
(iii) That E.R.P. aid would be continued for the full period of four years and in a reasonable, though diminishing, volume.
(iv) That a reasonable amount of east–west trade would continue to be conducted in Europe across the Iron Curtain.
(v) That there would be substantial progress in European economic co-operation, i.e., that it would become increasingly possible for the sterling area to obtain in Europe, and for Europe to obtain from the sterling area, goods which at the moment had to be purchased in dollar countries.

Sir Stafford Cripps said that, in the view of the United Kingdom Government, the future of democracy in the British Commonwealth was closely bound up with the survival of democracy in Western Europe, and in consequence the economic strength and progress of the two were inter-related through the United Kingdom. These two in their turn were linked intimately to the United States and Canada by E.R.P. aid and by Canadian assistance.

The sterling area's major problem at present was that of its dollar balance. That was also the main problem confronting the world as a whole, including Canada. The dollar shortage was caused by the disproportion in production between the United States and the great food and raw material producing areas of the Western Hemisphere and, on the other hand, the rest of the world, especially Western Europe and its associated areas. This point was brought out by the United Kingdom 1947 balance of payments figures given on page 4 of the White Paper circulated with P.M.M. (48) 8. This showed a total deficit of £630 million and a dollar deficit of £670 million. For the first six months of 1948, the total deficit was £140 million and the dollar deficit was £195 million. In the third quarter of 1948 the total gold and dollar deficit of the sterling area as a whole, before taking into account the amounts received under E.R.P., amounted to £76 million, compared with £157 million in the first quarter and £107 million in the second quarter of the year. During the third quarter the United Kingdom were provisionally allocated an amount of £85 million in grants and loans under the European Recovery Programme. This was in addition to the sum of £100 million in grants and loans for the second quarter and brought the total for the six months up to £183 million, out of which the United Kingdom had received during the second quarter £22 million in reimbursement of dollar expenditure already incurred. In the third quarter the United Kingdom received £41 million in further reimbursement of expenditure incurred both in the current and in the preceding quarter. The balance of the total third quarter deficit of £76 million, i.e., £35 million, was met by a reduction in the holdings of gold and dollars which, at the end of September amounted to £437 million.

As the balance of payments with the dollar area improved through the switching of purchases to other areas, other problems of balance were created. These would be manageable as between the United Kingdom and certain other members of the sterling area, but much less as between the sterling area and the non-dollar non-participating countries. While currencies remained inconvertible it was not easy to solve this problem, which might be expected to become more difficult as the dollar position improved. We might therefore expect that a general balance would be reached in the current quarter or in the next quarter, but that this would be accompanied by heavy deficits with the dollar area and with the non-dollar non-participating area. Progress was, however, being made and the people of the United Kingdom were working hard. Suggestions to the contrary were untrue. The United Kingdom were grateful for the great help given by other Commonwealth countries.

Sir Stafford Cripps then turned to examine in detail the forecast of the United Kingdom's position in the next four years. The Long-Term Programme was designed to show what the United Kingdom hoped to be able to do by 1952, on the assumptions described above, to redress her balance of payments and that of the rest of the sterling area, particularly in dollars, without drawing down reserves. Obviously the United Kingdom could not plan in detail for the rest of the sterling area countries, but certain assumptions had been made about their trade with the United Kingdom and their dollar expenditures which affected the Programme and were now being verified. He hoped that by the end of 1952–53 there would be a general balance on current account of $400 million and that the Western Hemisphere deficit would be reduced to $291 million. This we hoped to be able to meet by gold and by earnings elsewhere.

To this end certain policies were being adopted which were set out in Chapter 2 of the Long-Term Programme. These were not only present but continuing policies. Sir Stafford Cripps explained these under the following heads :—

(a) A publicity campaign.
(b) Fiscal policy.
(c) Stabilising of personal incomes.
(d) The redeployment of man-power.
(e) Emigration and immigration.
(f) Productivity.
(g) Controls over home production and consumption.
(h) Measures to maintain the strength of sterling.
(i) Export policy.
(j) Import policy.
(k) The objective of multilateral trading.
(l) Expansion of international trade.
(m) International co-operation.

On the subject of export policy Sir Stafford Cripps explained that the United Kingdom Government were pressing every kind of export, both of consumer and of capital goods. The principal difficulty was the shortage of steel. There was no general direction of exports to particular markets but, short of that, every kind of pressure was used to induce exporters to send to the desired markets. He understood that there was some anxiety in Commonwealth countries lest goods should be diverted away from traditional Commonwealth markets as a result of our bilateral trade agreements with foreign countries. This was discussed in Annex " A " to P.M.M. (48) 3. All the United Kingdom's bilateral agreements were for short periods, and the requirements of the rest of the Commonwealth were always taken fully into account. Moreover, the agreements did not normally guarantee deliveries. Even in the agreement with Russia, where we had gone further than usual in this direction, we had only undertaken to use our " best endeavours " to secure delivery; and, not all the goods had in fact been supplied as the Russians did not place the orders. Bilateral agreements were a great help in the short run in encouraging the flow of trade.

Sir Stafford Cripps then explained the major industrial plans described in Chapter 3 of the Long-Term Programme. These included plans for increased production of food, coal, oil, iron and steel, engineering products, chemicals, textiles and shipping.

Sir Stafford Cripps next referred to Chapter IV of the Long-Term Programme. Paragraph 158 in this Chapter showed how the available investment resources would be distributed over the main industries and services. In effect from 1949 on some 20 per cent. of the national income would be invested annually, which would involve an annual capital sum of £2 billion. Even this sum would not cover all requirements, in particular for arrears of maintenance.

In the development of overseas territories, discussed in Chapter V, the main problem was not finance but equipment. A complete survey had been made with a view to ascertaining what were the principal projects of economic improvement. Steel was so scarce that little would be available for any of these projects. What was available must be used to the best advantage and priorities had been established accordingly. Paragraph 185 gave a summary of the main increases in production which it was hoped to achieve.

Chapter VI gave the final estimate of the balance of payments which it was hoped to achieve by the policies described in the preceding paragraphs and on the four main assumptions set out in paragraph 192. In the light of this it was hoped (paragraph 194) that United Kingdom exports, taking them year in and year out, would run at 150 per cent. of the 1938 volume. Net invisible earnings would increase, particularly from oil and shipping, though by 1951 interest would begin to be payable on the United States and Canadian Loans. Imports on the other hand were planned to run at 85 per cent. of the 1938 volume, reduction in the standard of consumption being avoided by means of the projected increase in the home production of food; and at the end of the period the standard of living, though not luxurious, would be somewhat above that of 1947. Paragraph 201 summarised the possible composition of the balance of payments in 1952–53 compared with 1947 and with 1948–49, and showed how by the end of the period the old ratio between imports of food and of raw materials would have changed.

Turning to the pattern of international payments (Section 4 of Chapter VI) Sir Stafford Cripps said that, though there was expected to be a general balance, there would be deficits with the Western Hemisphere and with the non-dollar non-participating countries. Special means would have to be adopted to liquidate these deficits. That with the Western Hemisphere could probably be liquidated by the gold production and dollar earnings of the rest of the sterling area. In this way it should be possible to liquidate the deficit of $291 million, while at the same time maintaining a fairly high rate of imports from Canada. The smaller deficit with the non-dollar non-participating countries would be liquidated by the proceeds of sales of sterling area goods to those countries: this was dealt with in paragraphs 208 to 210. The present deficit was partly due to the very high prices being charged by those countries.

Summing up, Sir Stafford Cripps said that this review of United Kingdom policies and prospects led to the following conclusions :—

(i) The continued need for careful control of imports, particularly from dollar areas, by all sterling countries.
(ii) The need to expand supplies of raw materials and food-stuffs within the sterling area so as to enable a switch to be made from dollar sources: this expansion was, indeed, no less necessary in respect of manufactured goods.
(iii) The close connection between Western Europe and the sterling area and their value to one another.
(iv) The great importance of maintaining the strength and stability of sterling: a large part of the trade of the world was now being conducted in sterling, and all bilateral agreements were based on that currency.
(v) Prosperity could return to the sterling area only if world trade as a whole were expanded. Bilateral agreements were essential at present when sterling was not convertible, but the aim must be the re-establishment of multilateral trading. This should be achieved first through the extended use of sterling, and later through its convertibility.
(vi) The need to make every effort to expand exports to the dollar area, principally to Canada and to the United States. At the same time the only real solution of the dollar problem was to be found through trade, and not through financial arrangements.

The whole problem must be viewed in the light of the vital need to build up the strength and economy of Western Europe: in that object the sterling area countries were partners with the United States and with Canada. There would be inconveniences and sacrifices for all, but without these Western Europe could not be saved: even with them, its salvation could not be certain. If Western Europe were to fall a victim to communism, the economic recovery of the United Kingdom would be in jeopardy.

Canada formed a distinct and necessary part of the pattern, both as a link with the dollar area and as a large supplier of food-stuffs and raw materials. The help of the dollar countries was vital to Western Europe and the sterling area over the next four years at any rate.

The real picture might be thus described. A rather feeble Western Europe, exhausted by war, was the key-point of danger in the world to-day, and we must all—the sterling area, the United States and Canada—combine to play our part in supporting and strengthening the economy of Western Europe; otherwise we should lose the world struggle against communism and totalitarian domination.

MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON said there was a distinctive Canadian point of view on these matters which had already been fully discussed between Canada and the United Kingdom.

DR. EVATT said he was sure that Mr. Chifley, had he been present, would have welcomed the notable achievement disclosed by the paper which Sir Stafford Cripps had so admirably expounded and also by the reduction in the drain on the sterling area reserves for the third quarter of 1948. Other Commonwealth nations had made a substantial contribution to this achievement. Australia, for instance, which had in 1947–48 imported from the dollar area goods to the value of $263 million was for the current financial year importing only some $190 million worth. There were various detailed questions on which he would like to consult his advisers. He would then give notice of these points with a view to their later discussion. Meanwhile he would observe that we were faced with the paradoxical situation in which we wanted to expand trade with the United States and at the same time to reduce imports from that country. As for Western Europe, the difficulties there were not merely economic but also political. In conclusion he offered the congratulations of Australia on the achievement of the United Kingdom Government, not only for their planning but also for the courageous fashion in which they had kept the British people informed of the facts and needs of the situation.

MR. FRASER, in agreement with Dr. Evatt, said that the results surpassed the world's expectations and justified considerable optimism about the economic future of the United Kingdom and of the Commonwealth. He had as yet had no opportunity for detailed study of the papers, but he had been much helped by Sir Stafford Cripps's clear exposition.

There were one or two matters particularly affecting New Zealand which he would like to discuss after considering them further, e.g., the question of a Western Customs Union and the effects on New Zealand of the bilateral agreements.

MR. LOUW said that South Africa was watching with interest and sympathy the efforts of the United Kingdom Government to restore the economic damage suffered during the war, and was impressed with the determined manner in which the problem was being tackled. Most impressive of all was the spirit of sacrifice in which this task was being approached. South Africa in her turn was beginning to realise what an adverse balance of trade meant. Her gold reserves had been dangerously depleted and the Government had recently been obliged to reduce the level of their minimum reserves. If this continued, import control might have to be considered. The principal means of correcting the adverse balance would be increased production, particularly of gold, but here South Africa was suffering the same difficulty as the United Kingdom, namely, dearth of capital goods, particularly steel and machinery. He had been informed by those responsible for gold production in South Africa that, without large quantities of steel and machinery, it would be very difficult to develop the new gold fields in the Orange Free State, which promised to be particularly rich in high-grade ore. If South Africa were to co-operate in the work of rehabilitating the economy of Western Europe—a work whose importance the South African Government fully realised—they must have help of this kind. He was glad that Sir Stafford Cripps had emphasised the danger that an economic failure in Western Europe would mean a victory for communism. Finally, he stressed South Africa's appreciation of the difficulties of the United Kingdom, citing as an example the gold loan granted by the previous Government with the full concurrence of the then Opposition.

PANDIT NEHRU said that it was difficult at short notice to draw the lessons for India from this complex statement of the economic position. He had followed with interest and admiration the efforts of the United Kingdom Government to deal with the economic situation and had drawn inspiration from them. The object for India seemed to be to avoid the extremes of inaction and of wrong action, and a socialised economy on a carefully planned basis seemed the only safeguard against economic disaster. India was industrially undeveloped and her Government's chief object must be to increase production, particularly by means of industrialisation. From the larger point of view, it was exceedingly important that industrially backward areas should be developed. Accordingly, although the resuscitation of Western Europe was vital, attention should also be turned to parts of the world which were capable of fairly rapid development, but had not been developed in the past. India would like to get capital goods from the sterling area, but her need of them was so great that she must resort to the United States if she could not get what she wanted elsewhere. It was necessary for India to organise and increase production. Only so could recurring crises be avoided with their fruits of despair, frustration and chaos.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN said he wished to join in the tributes to the United Kingdom Government and people, and to their undoubted achievements in the economic field. A number of important matters in Sir Stafford Cripps's statement would require further examination. At this stage he would make the point that Pakistan, though rich in natural resources, was backward industrially. All the hopes of her people depended on industrial development. Following the policy described by Sir Stafford Cripps, Pakistan was securing all possible equipment from the sterling area, but a country of more than 80 million people, with a high density of population, must industrialise quickly; and it was not possible, if progress was to be made, to limit purchases to the sterling area. Pakistan's prospective balance of trade, if not very favourable, was certainly not adverse. Sir Stafford Cripps had mentioned the shortage of labour in the United Kingdom. Would it not be possible to invest capital in other parts of the Commonwealth where labour was plentiful? Such a step would benefit the Commonwealth as a whole, as well as assisting to industrialise countries which needed it. There was great force in Sir Stafford's statement that the economic condition of Western Europe must be improved, but if we desired peace and progress, development must not be confined to certain areas only.

MR. SENANAYAKE associated himself with the tributes which had been paid to the United Kingdom Government and people. Ceylon wanted to play her part in the common efforts to meet the economic problems of the sterling area. Ceylon was, in fact, at present a net dollar earner, but it was uncertain how long that situation would last. Much depended on certain raw products: tea and coconut production were flourishing, but rubber production had become precarious. Ceylonese home food production sufficed for only one-third of her requirements: it could not be increased without capital goods. Ceylon would like to buy these from sterling countries but could not wait until they were ready to supply. Delay would not only affect Ceylon's prosperity but would also give the Communists their opportunity.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS said that he had been much encouraged by Sir Stafford Cripps's statement. Southern Rhodesia's greatest need was for more capital goods. Though the restrictions suffered by her people were lighter than those applied in the United Kingdom, they would bear comparison with those current elsewhere, and they had been courageously accepted.

MR. ATTLEE expressed his appreciation of these statements. The Government and people of the United Kingdom were deeply grateful for the help which had so generously been given by other Commonwealth countries. It was true that all Commonwealth countries had more or less the same problems and the same interests, but the assistance rendered by them to the United Kingdom went far beyond anything which those interests alone would have justified. He thought that to-day's opening discussion on economic matters had been useful and suggested that a fuller and more detailed discussion might be held on 13th October. Delegations might inform the Secretary in advance of the particular topics which they would then wish to raise.

MR. ATTLEE read a message from the Chairman and Members of the London County Council. In deference to the known wishes of Commonwealth Ministers, the Council were refraining from pressing hospitality on them. Nevertheless, if it proved possible, the Council would be glad to receive Ministers, e.g., at a luncheon which the Council were giving on 27th October to some of the leading delegates of the Empire Parliamentary Association.

1. Attendance

MR. ATTLEE said that all Commonwealth Ministers would be gratified to know that Mr. St. Laurent was coming to London to represent Canada at the meeting, and would arrive before the end of the week.

Sir Godfrey Huggins was unwell and would be unable to attend that day's meetings.

Mr. Senanayake was also unable to attend the morning meeting.

2. Field-Marshal Smuts

The meeting invited Mr. Attlee to send a message on their behalf to Field-Marshal Smuts expressing their deep sympathy with him and Mrs. Smuts at the death of their son.

3. Foreign Affairs

MR. ATTLEE invited Mr. Bevin to open a discussion on Foreign Affairs, with special reference to the Middle and Far East. Two relevant papers had been circulated :—

P.M.M. (48) 6 on Japan and P.M.M. (48) 7 on Malaya.

MR. BEVIN said that the primary aim of his foreign policy was to create conditions in which the economic life of the world could go forward in peace. When he had assumed office in 1945 the prospects were not encouraging. The situation in Germany seemed almost impossible of solution. His forebodings about the future of Eastern Europe had quickly been fulfilled. Which of the nations of Europe would be able to regain their independence and economic viability? This opportunity seemed to be denied to all save those on the outer crust of Europe, namely, the Scandinavian countries, Turkey and possibly France—though the internal situation of the latter was so critical that there were moments of doubt about her future. The United Kingdom was bound to do her utmost to help these European countries, not only because of her historical and cultural associations with them, but because Europe's future must have a powerful effect on the future of the Near and Middle East or, as he termed it, the "middle planet." He recognised that among these nations of the "middle planet" there were divergencies of creed, race and outlook, but there was a basic similarity in their approach to world problems which, if it could be organised on the basis of a mutual understanding and trust, would create an equilibrium between the United States on the one hand and Russia on the other. These two great Powers represented rival ideologies and had very different standards of living. Between them was the United Kingdom, with her ties with the Commonwealth and with Europe. Here was an opportunity for peace-loving nations to prevent the middle of the world from becoming embroiled in a conflict and to exert their influence in preserving world peace.

The Soviet Union was apparently determined to achieve her ends by all means short of war. Her method was to break down national Governments and political systems from within. If she found that this was meeting with too strong a resistance in Europe, she would turn elsewhere. There were signs that she was beginning to do so, by reason of the steps taken to organise effective military and economic co-operation between the countries of Western Europe.

Recent events in Indonesia, Burma and Malaya had not therefore come as a surprise. Russian methods were a cheap means of warfare, particularly as many countries did not realise the danger until it was too late. If the Commonwealth countries stood together on the basis of a common understanding of their economic and political interests, he believed that an equilibrium could be secured and a long period of peace assured. The alternative was a conflict of ideologies which might lead to war, or at least to a prolonged period of tension.

The United States Government understood this approach to world problems. It was their policy to support the reconstruction of nations devastated by war wihout seeking to subordinate them to United States influence. In the period immediately after the end of the war the United States might have been prepared to seek agreement with the Soviet Union on the basis of spheres of influence. After the Moscow Conference of 1945 their attitude had changed and they had turned to the policy of supporting an association of the remaining nations of the world.

Soon afterwards an acute situation had arisen in Persia. The Four Powers had previously agreed that foreign troops should be simultaneously withdrawn from Persia on 2nd March, 1946. The British and American forces were withdrawn on that date. The Tudeh Party, the agents of Communism in Persia, then promoted internal disorder throughout the country and raided the refineries at Abadan. It was not until we took military precautions to defend our interests that Russia, realising the prospects of conflict, withdrew her forces. Since then, the internal affairs of Persia had been administered in comparative quiet through the constituted authority of the Majlis.

Since the end of the war Turkey had maintained a steady independence in the face of Russian pressure. Russia had claimed two of her northern provinces in order to give access behind Turkey into Iraq. This move, coupled with the pressure on Greece, had been designed to force Turkey into the position of a Russian satellite. The United Kingdom Government, in the face of much criticism, had upheld the independence of Greece and Turkey, and had thus helped to frustrate these designs, which would have brought serious threats to the integrity of the Middle East.

The countries of the Commonwealth had strong economic and political interests in preserving the integrity of the Middle East. Its economic importance was evident from the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the meeting on the previous day. The development of Persian oil supplies was particularly important. It was the policy of the United Kingdom Government to ensure that this development was pursued without any exploitation of the workers; and great progress had been made in recent years in improving the housing, welfare facilities, hospitals and social services for the employees at the oil installations at Abadan. Politically, the Middle East was of vital importance to the Commonwealth as the bridge between east and west and a centre of Commonwealth communications.

Since the end of the war, however, there had been difficulties with Middle East countries. Negotiations with Egypt over the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936 had been prolonged and so far unsuccessful. A fresh approach was now being made to overcome these difficulties. Although Egypt, like other countries of the Middle East, was potentially rich, the standard of living of the majority of the population was too low. It was an object of United Kingdom policy to remedy this. For this purpose we had established a Middle East Office and concentrated there a team of technical experts on water supply, irrigation, transport and agriculture whose services were available to all the Middle East Governments. They had made many investigations and several of their projects were under way. The United States had also been interested in these possibilities of economic development in the Middle East. For example, if a relatively small scheme for the irrigation of the Euphrates could be undertaken, a population of 10 or 15 million could be supported in Iraq with an improved standard of life and the country's economy would not be dependent exclusively on oil. This attitude towards economic development and co-operation had been the basis of the approach to the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. The United Kingdom Government had advocated the creation of a Middle East Defence Board which would have removed the need for occupation forces in each country and would have enabled the Middle East countries to approach their defence problems jointly. Unfortunately, this approach had been rejected, but we were still pursuing by all possible means the economic and cultural projects which might provide the foundation for future co-operation.

The United Kingdom Government were anxious to secure a trusteeship of Cyrenaica. This would enable us to reduce our commitments in Egypt, and at the same time to secure a firm base from which to protect our vital interests in the Mediterranean and the Middle East.

In Palestine the United Kingdom Government had worked hard to find a solution acceptable to both Jews and Arabs, but they had in the end been forced to the conclusion that it was impossible to find such a solution within the terms of the Mandate. They had therefore decided to surrender the Mandate and to refer the problem to the United Nations. When the British troops were withdrawn, King Adbullah marched in, as was now understood, with the intention of occupying only those portions of Palestine which were allotted to the Arabs under the United Nations plan; but the Stern Gang had started a battle in the old quarter of Jerusalem and King Adbullah's troops were drawn into the fighting. The Egyptian and Syrian forces, on the other hand, seemed to have intended from the first to occupy as much of Palestine as they could. From this stage onwards the main object of the United Kingdom Government was to bring about a truce, and in this they had been successful, as they were later in their proposal for the appointment of a mediator by the United Nations. Count Bernadotte's assassination was a most deplorable outrage. As to the future, it was the view of the United Kingdom Government that Count Bernadotte's plan now offered the best method of approach to the problem, and they were therefore lending it their support. Mr. Bevin doubted whether the Arab States could ever accept any solution which recognised the existence of a Jewish State in Palestine, but he did believe that they might acquiesce in Count Bernadotte's plan if the behaviour of the Jews was not too aggressive. Once the Palestine problem was settled, he believed that the peace-loving countries of east and west could collaborate in bringing peace and prosperity to the whole of the Middle East.

In Indonesia the United Kingdom Government had at the outset adopted a policy of mediation. It was a matter for great regret that a settlement had not been reached on the basis proposed by Lord Inverchapel and later by Lord Killearn. The Dutch had been warned of the importance of reaching an early settlement, while Communist efforts were concentrated on Europe: they had not heeded that warning and Communist intervention in Indonesia had now matured. Now at last there seemed to be some prospect of a settlement between the Dutch and the Indonesian Government. It was understood that the only point now outstanding was the date on which elections should be held. The Dutch were reluctant to agree to their being held as early as January or February next, since the recent Communist disturbances had created conditions unsuitable for the early holding of a free election. Mr. Bevin said that in recent conversations in Paris he had done his best to ensure that differences over this question of timing should not frustrate the hopes of an early settlement.

The United Kingdom had hoped that the grant of independence to Burma would conduce to internal stability. This hope had not been realised, and internal unrest in Burma not only disturbed international relations, but also threatened the standard of life of the many millions of people who depended upon her exports of rice. It was the rice situation which had led him to send Lord Killearn to South-East Asia in 1945 to create an organisation which would assist in preventing famine and restoring economic stability. This organisation had achieved useful results, and food supplies throughout the area had been greatly improved during the last two years. The present situation in Burma might, however, have very serious results.

Conditions in South-East Asia generally were so unsettled and future prospects so uncertain that Commonwealth countries might ask themselves what they could do to help towards its pacification. He would like to throw out the suggestion, for consideration by the other Commonwealth representatives at the meeting, that, without interference of any sort in the internal affairs of countries in South-East Asia, there should be some regular means of consultation between Commonwealth countries interested in that area with the object of helping to put the political and economic life of countries in South-East Asia on a firm footing, based upon internal stability and freedom from the menace of Communist attacks. This would in turn lead to a high standard of life for the peoples of the countries concerned. He was not suggesting any elaborate machinery—indeed, he had not worked out any detailed proposals. He did, however, think that an understanding approach to the problem by all interested Commonwealth Governments would have a most salutary effect in South-East Asia.

This was an area which was of special interest to India, Pakistan and Ceylon; and their recent attainment of independence meant that their collaboration in such an approach would be of special value and influence.

With regard to Japan, Mr. Bevin said that a summary of the position was given in P.M.M. (48) 6. Since the Canberra Conference of 1947 the United Kingdom and the other Commonwealth Governments there represented had been ready to discuss a peace treaty. He was, however, inclined to the view that the United States were now coming to think that Japan should be regarded no longer as a potential enemy, but as a potential ally in the event of war with Russia. Thus, in the negotiations for the European Economic Co-operation Agreement he had been pressed to agree to a most-favoured-nation provision in favour of Japan. He had resisted this and had informed the United States Government that, though the question must be discussed, it should be dealt with as a separate issue after the United Kingdom Government had had an opportunity of discussion with the other countries of the Commonwealth. The United States also seemed inclined to abandon all control of the Japanese level of industry. It might well be that the United States would withdraw General MacArthur into a supervisory rôle, entrust the substance of power to a Japanese Government and leave occupation forces at only a few points in the country. Such a move would stultify the Far Eastern Commission. Russian policy in Japan was following the familiar pattern. Although the meetings of the Far Eastern Commission were supposed to be secret, the Russians had now begun to publish excerpts giving versions of discussions in the Commission designed to show that the United States were attempting unjustly to hold Japan down.

If this reading of the situation were correct, all the Commonwealth countries must review their policy towards Japan, and the time had come for the Commonwealth countries to take counsel together on this question.

In China the situation seemed to be almost hopeless. There had recently been a reform of the currency; but the Central Government was growing weaker and the Communists stronger. There might be a repetition of the situation in the 1920's, when autonomous Provincial Governments and independent war-lords had reduced the country to a state of chaos. Mr. Dewey, in his speech at Salt Lake City on 30th September, had declared that the United States would not desert her old friend China, and would do everything possible to strengthen her Government. Mr. Bevin could, however, see little prospect of success for whatever efforts the United States might make to help the Central Government. China might once more be united, but only after a long lapse of time.

Dr. EVATT thanked Mr. Bevin not only for the detailed account he had given but also for making so clear the broad sweep of United Kingdom foreign policy. This, he noted, went hand in hand with the economic policy which Sir Stafford Cripps had described on the previous day and involved a new approach to the proplems of overseas policy and a new attitude towards dependent peoples. This new policy, although often subject to party political criticism, must in the end succeed.

In the Middle East and in Asia the message of freedom and self-government had been substituted for the old "imperialist" policies. He fully endorsed the implication in Mr. Bevin's statement of the need, in any positive plan, to give high place to economic questions, particularly the development of backward areas. The most efficacious weapon against communism was improvement of the living conditions of the people. Persia offered a striking example of this. The presence at this meeting of representatives of three new independent members of the Commonwealth showed how earnestly the United Kingdom Government, notwithstanding criticism, had endeavoured to put its principles into practice. Now that these countries were sovereign and self-governing nations, Australia for her part found a better basis of friendship and a greater sense of security. The troubles in Indonesia were due partly to the slowness of the Dutch in granting full self-government to the Indonesians. The story of Indonesia was that of a people waking to nationhood and demanding responsible self-government. Though the Netherlands Government had specially grave difficulties to contend with because of Holland's dependence on Indonesia's resources, the present troubles were accentuated by failure to execute agreements after they had been made and to apply quickly the principles on which the United Kingdom Government had so promptly acted. However, from his recent conversations in Holland, he had some reason to hope that the whole issue might now be settled without further delay.

In Palestine, he believed that the ultimate aim must be to achieve economic unity. For the present, however, political separation was inevitable as Jews and Arabs would not work together. It should be clearly understood that Count Bernadotte's suggestions were based on political partition in line with the United Nations decision of last year.

No international problem could at present be handled in isolation. All were dominated by the acute tension between the United States and Russia. Japan was an illustration of this. At Canberra a year ago all the Commonwealth countries had been of one mind. The United States Government had at that time proposed an early peace conference. Shortly afterwards, however, they withdrew that proposal. If the relations between the United States and Russia had not been so strained, there would have been no difficulty in making a peace treaty for Japan: the heads of such a treaty were in fact already settled in principle. The United States might now be thinking of Japan as a possible ally in a future war with Russia. This was a view which must be treated with special caution by the Pacific countries: whether it was wise called for nice judgment of Japan's future policy. The war trials suggested that there had been little real change of heart on the part of the Japanese. He knew that General MacArthur was still anxious for the conclusion of a peace treaty but it did not follow that his view was entirely shared by the United States Government. The Japanese people could not be permanently held down to an artificially low standard of life. Australia did not wish to be dogmatic about the level of Japanese industry, but the method by which the Japanese economy was restored must be watched: Japan must not be allowed to establish a dangerous war potential. The United States were inclined to proceed on the assumption that they could alone determine the future of Japan. This was an assumption which the Commonwealth nations could not accept. Australia and other Commonwealth countries had done much to contribute to the defeat of Japan and were vitally concerned in discussions about her future.

Dr. Evatt said that Australia was anxious to continue and extend all forms of consultation in the Commonwealth, instancing the importance of such consultation on the problems of South-East Asia, Japan and Europe.

PANDIT NEHRU said that when allusion had been made on the previous day to the Communist threat in Western Europe he himself had felt that Asia was at least as important. In the issue of peace or war, Asia, and particularly its newly independent nations, would carry great weight. It was important, therefore, that the world should look at Asia in its proper perspective and that there should be a full understanding of the main forces at work there.

Asia was now going through the phase which Europe had passed through three generations ago. Nationalism was now a very great force to be reckoned with. There had been three competing ideas—nationalism, imperialism and communism. Originally, communism had supported nationalism, as championing the underdog, against imperialism; and it had then been welcomed in Asia by many people who lacked any genuine understanding of its economic doctrine or its international implications. When, however, imperialism was removed in a country which had attained its independence, communism then came into conflict with nationalism; and when this conflict became apparent, communism had no hold on Asian peoples.

Thus the Governments of both Burma and Indonesia, though Leftist, had found themselves in conflict with the Communists. The people might for a time retain some sympathy for communism, for people were slow to adapt themselves to the idea that imperialism was in fact largely a thing of the past. Moreover, people in Indonesia had been astonished at the dilatoriness of the Dutch Government in giving effect to self-government, and they had entertained some hostility towards the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom because they believed that the Dutch must be receiving support from those Governments. Pandit Nehru said that he could not but feel that the United States, in pursuing material advantage, had lost its dominion over people's minds, which was of much greater importance. He suggested that an anti-Communist appeal was not likely to succeed with Asian peoples, in view of the extent to which Communists had in the past supported legitimate Nationalist aspirations. Asian peoples had, however, no sympathy for Russian expansionist policies; and publicly drawing attention to the dangers of Russian encroachment upon Asia would be much more likely to be effective. In most countries in Asia people would in the long run be influenced mostly by their indigenous outlook and culture. Communism might carry weight if it came in support of nationalism and the underdog; but there would be no welcome for Slavism and communism of a specifically Russian brand. As long as there were other forces championing nationalism and the betterment of living conditions, the ground would be cut from under the feet of the Communists.

In India some years ago many people had been friendly to communism. To-day the Communists, though well organised, were only a small party and lacked strength because they had divorced themselves from Nationalist feeling. They had only won five seats out of about 500 in the election and were not likely to win any more. As long as nationalism remained allied with the forces of progress, communism might make mischief in India, but could not have any vital influence on the trend of events.

As regards Japan, Pandit Nehru said that it was difficult to predict the future, but he agreed that it was possible that Japan might again become militaristic. He doubted, however, whether any policy of permanent repression would succeed. The Japanese were virile, disciplined and industrious people, who could not be suppressed for long. If the Japanese had reason to fear a long period of repression, it would be difficult to influence their minds in the right direction. Military disarmament was, of course, necessary, but the long-term control of industry in Japan was not practicable. Moreover, it was not expedient, since Japanese goods were wanted in the world and, what was even more important, the effect on Japanese minds would be most harmful.

Turning to the general strategic situation, Pandit Nehru emphasised that India, by her geographical position, was vitally interested both in the Middle East and the Far East. She was particularly interested in South-East Asia, and both Indonesia and Burma had sought her counsel. The future would bring her into even closer contact with South-East Asia and with Australia and New Zealand, and a regional understanding on a broad basis between all these countries was most desirable. It was important, therefore, that in surveying the larger world picture, account should be taken of any regional understandings reached in South-East Asia and the Pacific, so that there should be no conflict between the policies agreed in these regions and those envisaged in a larger world perspective.

As regards Malaya, Pandit Nehru awaited with interest the statement of Mr. Malcolm MacDonald. The difficulties of Malaya were enhanced by the population question; there were more Chinese than native Malays and communism had its main hold among the Chinese. Yet communism could not succeed in Malaya unless it could also play on the economic discontent of the Malay labouring classes. It must be admitted that conditions of labour on the estates in Malaya had often been very bad, and during the war there had been occasions on which labourers had been fired on by troops. All this had won support for the Communists among the labouring classes, who could be won over only by political reform and the betterment of their economic conditions.

The discussion was then adjourned until the afternoon meeting.

1. Foreign Affairs

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 3rd Meeting.)

The Meeting resumed discussion of the statement on foreign affairs which had been made by Mr. Bevin earlier in the day.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN associated himself with earlier speakers in thanking Mr. Bevin for his clear and comprehensive statement. There were in the world to-day two ideologies in conflict. He did not think that Russia would actually go to war; her method was that of internal disruption. Communism was not merely an economic programme, it was a mission. Russia regarded communism as the salvation of the world and she would make every effort to spread it. This was a menace to human liberty, which should be resisted by all who believed in the right of men to choose their own way of life.

Mr. Bevin had emphasised the importance of supporting Western Europe, both militarily and economically, in its resistance to the Communist menace. It was equally important to build up the economic and political strength of other countries to fight the Communist menace. He agreed that the Middle East was a necessary bulwark in this respect. The countries of the Middle East were already opposed to communism on ideological, religious and political grounds. It was therefore all the more important to assist them by building up their military and economic strength. Mr. Bevin had made no mention of the prevalence of communism in any Middle East country. It would be wise to ensure the continuation of this situation by affording every assistance towards improving the economic life of the peoples of the Middle East. This could best be done by developing the existing resources of these territories, which could be a valuable source of supplies for the rest of the world. Capital investment in the Middle East would yield a larger and quicker return than in most other countries of the world.

Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan said that he did not believe that the Arabs in Palestine would accept a Jewish State. It was not merely that they felt that part of their land was being taken away from them for the benefit of an alien people; they also felt that the existence of a Jewish State in Palestine would be a menace to the integrity and independence of the Arab world and would become a hotbed of Russian and Communist intrigue.

As regards the countries of South-East Asia, Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan thought that the objective should be to give freedom and independence to all. But even this essential first step would not be enough to stop the spread of communism there. It would be necessary to build up the economic strength of the countries of South-East Asia as well as those in the Middle East. Communism had triumphed in the past only where Governments were weak economically and militarily, and were thus open to undermining from within. Communism only joined hands with nationalism against the common enemy of imperialism. But once independence and freedom had been conceded the appeal of nationalism was diminished.

Eastern Pakistan, as the neighbour of Burma and China, was closely affected by the happenings in those two countries. The Pakistan Government considered that both these Governments should be helped in their fight against communism. Burma was at the moment in great difficulties. Her present Government was a leftist government, and yet communism appeared to be growing in strength. This was, he thought, because those who once adopted communism looked upon themselves as participating in a mission which could only be fulfilled when all countries had become Communist.

It would be a mistaken policy to try to hold the Japanese down indefinitely and to prohibit all economic progress. As Pakistan had made a substantial contribution towards the defeat of Japan, and as she would be closely affected by future developments there, she should be made a member of the Far Eastern Commission.

MR. FRASER thanked Mr. Bevin for his incisive analysis. He was impressed by Mr. Bevin's conception of a politically stable and economically viable Western Europe occupying a middle position and showing a middle way between the great rival ideologies of Russia and the United States. If it were possible to arrive at a lasting basis of European co-operation which would enable Europe to act as a balance in the world in favour of peace and democratic progress, he would be the first to welcome it. The Commonwealth countries should themselves seek to reach a common policy in this matter. He considered that the time might be ripe for a re-examination of Mr. Curtin's proposal for the creation of a Commonwealth Secretariat. New Zealand would, in any case, like to be assured that representations made by her as regards foreign policy would under any arrangement be seriously considered. This had not always happened in the past.

Mr. Bevin's suggestion for some sort of regional consultation on South-East Asia was also worthy of consideration. He certainly hoped that it would be possible for the nations of the Commonwealth to go forward together with other countries of like outlook on the basis of democratic progress. At the same time he thought that we should approach proposals for regional consultation with some caution. There were few problems which were purely regional. The problems of the South Pacific, which were of the closest concern to New Zealand, were also of concern to the United Kingdom and to Europe, just as much as the problem of Western European Union, for instance, was of close concern to New Zealand. He was fully in favour of consultation, but he would not like to see consultation on matters relating to a particular area confined to Commonwealth countries in that area. On Cyrenaica he felt sure that a United Kingdom trusteeship would prove acceptable to the local population.

He still hoped that it might prove possible to find a lasting settlement of the Palestine problem. Were there not possibilities in the economic development of the Arab areas, particularly by irrigation schemes? This would recompense the Arabs for the creation of the Jewish State.

He doubted whether Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan was right in assuming that communism had made no impression in the countries of the Middle East. His information was that communism had gained a secure foothold among the younger members of the Arab communities who were denied a proper opportunity to reap the fruits of the education which was now available to them. It was optimistic to think that any area was immune from the ravages of communism. He agreed with Pandit Nehru's analysis of the forces at work in the world. It was fantastic for Russia to maintain that she was threatened by the west. There was no such threat nor any question of the economic domination of Russia. The fact was that under Russian inspiration communism was becoming synonymous with aggression.

In the Dutch East Indies he had never been optimistic of a quick solution. The greatest hope lay in the Dutch getting away from an apparent policy of imperialism, and they now seemed to be alive to their responsibilities. Now that communism had appeared in Indonesia, the greatest hope lay in the two sides co-operating to establish some means of giving expression to local self-government on a democratic basis.

The problem in China appeared to be a straight choice between the government of Chiang Kai-shek and the forces of communism. The Commonwealth countries seemed to have no choice but to support General Chiang Kai-shek.

In Japan, he agreed that a policy of repression would be mistaken, but we need not think that Japan would be grateful to anyone for treating her lightly. The smaller nations of the Pacific still feared a recurrence of the Japanese menace.

The choice was to subject Japan to a permanent and rigid supervision or to build her up only to a position from which she could not again threaten her neighbours. There was an urgent need for a conference on the future of Japan. He thought that every effort should be made to hold this conference as soon as the United States elections were over.

MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON said that he would leave the main statement of Canada's views to Mr. St. Laurent. He might, however, offer some comment on one point mentioned in the discussion, namely, the earlier attitude of the United States towards the Indonesian claim to self-government. This attitude did not represent any hostility towards the nationalist aspirations of the Indonesian people. At the end of the war the United States Government had been chiefly concerned to re-establish the economy of the Dutch East Indies as rapidly as possible. These territories could supply food and raw materials of which the world stood in urgent need. This consideration had perhaps led them to place too high a value on firm government and administrative efficiency at the cost of under-rating the importance of facilitating the progress of the inhabitants towards self-government.

MR. LOUW said that he welcomed the frankness of Mr. Bevin's statement. He would like to be equally frank in making clear the position of South Africa. South Africa was willing to discuss questions which were of common concern to herself and other Commonwealth countries. Although she was interested in a general way in the problems of the Far East and South-East Asia, she did not regard them at this stage as matters of common concern. If, of course, there developed from these countries a threat of war which might spread to the west, South Africa would wish to participate in any Commonwealth discussion of the situation. At this stage, however, he did not wish to comment on the problems in China, Japan, Indonesia, Malaya or Burma. The interest of the South African Government was centred more in the nations of the Middle East, in particular in what he might call the "keystone States" of Egypt and Cyrenaica. These countries were of special importance to Commonwealth communications, and they bordered on the Mediterranean, which was one of the seas of the African Continent. South Africa wished to keep on good terms with the Arab States.

He endorsed Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan's statement that communism was not just a political ideal or philosophy, but was a mission, or even a religion.

The South African Government had no desire to be drawn into the dispute between the Arab and Jewish peoples in Palestine. The previous Government of South Africa had recognised the State of Israel, and his Government did not intend to withdraw this recognition.

MR. ATTLEE invited Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, the High Commissioner for South-East Asia, to make a statement on the present position in Malaya.

MR. MACDONALD said that the population of Malaya was about 6 million, of whom rather more than 40 per cent. were Malays and rather more than 40 per cent. Chinese. Among the remainder, there was a large Indian population and comparatively small numbers of of Ceylonese, Eurasians and Europeans. In the Federation of Malaya (that is, the Peninsula with Penang) the Malays outnumbered the Chinese. If Singapore were included, the Chinese would perhaps slightly exceed the Malays.

In 1946 and 1947 the Communist Party in Malaya was a small but potent force. The total number of party members was something over 12,000, of whom 10,000 were Chinese, 2,000 Indian and only a few hundred Malays. The Communist Party had set itself out to exert influence by appealing to the under-dog, and much of what they alleged was true, for the economic condition of the workers in Malaya had been very low. They had also followed a policy of infiltrating into the trade unions, which were being formed with the encouragement of the Government, and had put themselves forward as the champions of the workers. By early 1947 they dominated more than 50 per cent. of the trade unions. They had also made an appeal to nationalism and gained a strong position in the left-wing groups and political organisations. To them their appeal had been to turn out the British and secure immediate self-government.

Though the Communists had made a successful start, they gradually lost their influence during 1947 as the Government got back into its constructive stride after the war, and started its attempt to bring all races in Malaya into partnership. On the economic side, Lord Killearn's organisation had secured an improvement in the supply of rice and a reduction in its price. Other measures were also set on foot for bettering the economic lot of the workers, e.g., rises in wages, improvements in housing and the establishment of democratic trade unions. On the political side, after consultation with the Malay rulers and the Chinese, Indian and other communities, the Government had produced a constitution for a Federation of Malaya which met the current demands of moderate opinion in all communities. A new constitution was launched for Singapore. Both these constitutions were far in advance of anything that had been expected before the war.

As a result, the influence of the Communists decreased in both the trade unions and the political groups, and by March 1948 the number of unions which the Communists controlled had fallen to 30 per cent. A more revolutionary element then obtained control of the Communist Party and there was a complete change of policy and tactics. The reasons for this change were, first, that the Communists were disappointed with the results of their earlier policy and felt that they were losing ground; and, secondly, that they had been stimulated to more aggressive action by Communists outside Malaya, e.g., at the Calcutta Conference. The result of the new policy was a campaign of violence and aggression. An instrument lay ready to hand in the shape of those people (mostly Chinese Communists) who had taken to the jungle during the war and acted as a resistance movement. We had dropped arms to these people and many had remained in the jungle and kept their arms. The Communists launched in June their anti-imperialist and anti-European campaign. Among the first objectives of their attacks were the European managers of plantations and mines. They hoped that, when the steadying influence of the managers was removed, they would be able by intimidating the workers to stop production and produce economic chaos. They also attacked all others who resisted their attempt to seize the Government by force, among them many law-abiding Chinese.

The figures of those murdered since June were instructive. Of a total of 178, there were 138 Chinese, 16 Europeans, 13 Malays, 6 Indians, 3 Siamese and 2 Sakeis. Most of these were humble people. But the fact that 75 per cent. of them were Chinese suggested that we were faced with what was, in part, an overflow of the civil war in China between the Communists and the Kuomintang.

The Communists were working on a careful plan. They had hoped to gain complete control of various districts and then to proclaim these as "liberated areas." They had an administrative staff and an organisation already earmarked. By proclaiming such "liberated areas" they hoped to gain prestige and attract recruits. Later the "liberated areas" would expand and eventually combine: when the Communists had thus obtained control of the greater part of the country they would set up a central government and proclaim a Communist republic.

The main steps taken by the Government against the Communists were political, police and military measures: but the main reason for the Communists' lack of success was the fact that they obtained very little support from the people. This was no nationalist rising of a people demanding self-government, nor a demand by organised labour for workers' rights. Our policy since the war had in fact satisfied many of their present demands. As a result, the appeal of the Communists fell on hostile ears, and those who rallied to them were mostly alien Chinese. Here again figures were instructive. Of the 343 terrorists killed or captured since June, 332 were Chinese and of these the majority had not been born in Malaya, but were comparatively new immigrants who still retained a first loyalty to China. The Communists did get support from a few Malays; but the majority of these were again not native-born, but had recently entered the country illegally from Indonesia in order to foment trouble.

The Communist movement was therefore largely alien and had little support from the country. No political group had declared for it, and the United Malays National Organisation (which represented the majority of Malays) and other organisations had supported law and order through their representatives in the Legislative Councils. There had been no sympathetic strikes, even in those unions which had once been Communist-controlled. On the contrary, labourers in tin mines, plantations, &c., were working better than they had since the liberation and rubber and tin production were being maintained. The majority of Malays and Indians and all the Ceylonese, Eurasians and Europeans were anti-Communist and appeals for recruits for the regular police, the auxiliary police, special constables, &c., had brought in more volunteers than could be used. Among the Chinese also, a great majority were at heart anti-Communist, though many of them did not dare to say so. The smaller traders in particular were very timid, but it was hard to blame them since, living in remote villages, they were gravely exposed to the vengeance of the Communists. They mostly gave merely passive support to the Government and were sitting on the fence waiting to see if the Government would win and give them personal security against Communist attacks.

It was reckoned that the Communists had not less than 3,000 and not more than 5,000 fighting men. They had been well supplied with arms and ammunition, but these were now running short. Their plan of campaign had definitely failed. They had not succeeded in declaring a single " liberated area " or in establishing any central directional control of the campaign. Each unit worked as an independent guerilla force without inter-communication, and they had little military strength. Nevertheless, it was going to be very difficult to root them out altogether, since they had two powerful allies, namely, the jungle, into which they could disappear completely, and the Chinese squatters who, during the Japanese occupation, had occupied pockets of land in the jungle. These areas were very difficult to police and the Communists could intimidate the squatters into supplying them with food. It had been estimated that it would take until next June to root them out entirely.

Mr. MacDonald said that the policy for destroying these Communist groups was of necessity partly repressive. He agreed warmly with Pandit Nehru that one could not get rid of the Communist menace by purely negative means and that a positive policy was necessary. On the economic side we had already fostered the trade unions, raised wage levels, started machinery for the settlement of industrial disputes, begun drafting a new labour code and improved social services. We were in fact trying to show that we were as much the champions of the workers as their own leaders. On the political side, we must show that we were ready to do everything possible to help the people to realise their natural aspirations for self-government. This would not be easy to achieve in Malaya, because of the communal problem and the many conflicting interests. But it was our task to get the peoples of Malaya to co-operate and make themselves fit to be masters of their own affairs. This double principle of economic improvement and political advancement, which Mr. Bevin had enunciated, ought also to be applied in the rest of South-East Asia, where relics of imperialism remained. One must try to persuade the Dutch in Indonesia and the French in Indo-China that this was the only way to defeat the Communist appeal to the economically and politically under-privileged.

PANDIT NEHRU asked for particulars of the communal conflicts in Malaya to which Mr. MacDonald had referred.

MR. MACDONALD said that there were serious conflicts latent, chiefly between the Chinese and Malays because of their almost exactly balanced numbers. Each was afraid of domination by the other once self-government was attained. It was a crucial problem of the present administration to persuade these two communities to learn to live and work together. Communal feeling against the Indians was not so acute, because they numbered only some 10 to 14 per cent. of the whole population.

MR. SENANAYAKE after expressing regret at having been obliged to miss Mr. Bevin's statement of the morning, referred to the peculiar difficulties of Ceylon. Her great desire to help in establishing peace and democratic institutions throughout the world was frustrated by uncertainty about her position. The United Nations had been established with the two main purposes : to bring peace to the world, and to prevent the formation of power groups. There was now less confidence in the United Nations, since it was already generally recognised that two power groups existed with differing ideas and aims. The Commonwealth had always stood for peace and for improving the condition of the people. The present meeting must devise means for protecting both the Commonwealth and the world at large. Ceylon, however, excluded as she was from the United Nations, was in doubt how best to contribute to this object. This made it difficult for her to suggest a solution for the problems of international affairs.

Ceylon was, as it were, surrounded by volcanoes which might erupt at any moment. There must be one main concern : to secure the peace and prosperity first of the Commonwealth, and secondly of the rest of the world. But it was difficult to see how Ceylon's policies should fit in with that general principle. He must emphasise that any solution of the problem of the Communist revolution against peace must be a common one. If that were accepted it followed that, if it were indeed necessary to meet to discuss the danger from Russia, the peace-loving nations should cease to associate with Russia. He did not say this because Russia had vetoed Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations. It was possible that Russia desired to create a separate group of nations. If the original object of the United Nations had been to prevent such separate groupings, then the present fissure in the Organisation was frustrating that primary object. If, on the other hand, Russia proceeded as she was now doing in numerous countries, then, unless the Commonwealth Nations stood together, the stage would soon be reached of revolution and war throughout the world. It was necessary to work with a high sense of mission : merely to draw up formulæ, which left each Power to pursue its own course, was to evade and not to solve difficulties and only led to further trouble.

As for Malaya, the course of affairs there, as described by Mr. MacDonald, could be paralleled throughout South-East Asia. It was not the Communists who had the real hold over the people, but economic conditions which made the people turn to the Communists. The policy of economic improvement and opportunities for progressive self-government described by Mr. MacDonald would, if applied elsewhere, equally lead to the defeat of the Communists. This was certainly true of Ceylon. Her resources were sufficient to allow of great improvement in economic conditions, and communism appealed, not as an ideology, but only in so far as it allied itself with nationalism or a desire for economic improvement.

MR. BEVIN, replying to the discussion, said he was grateful for the views which had been expressed and particularly for the psychological factors which had been made plain.

Taking up a point made by Mr. Fraser, Mr. Bevin said he was not anxious to see too much elaborate machinery for Commonwealth consultation. He was much more anxious to devise some means of establishing a common understanding of general trends of policy, in the light of which particular problems might be approached. This was a question which he hoped Mr. Fraser would particularly consider before foreign affairs were next discussed. The Commonwealth countries had emerged into self-governing Powers and it was necessary to collect the opinions of all and then to try to reach a solution which summarised the total view—not necessarily to the satisfaction of each country but certainly after each view had been taken into account. The correct solution need not always be a compromise : it was more important that it should follow a consistent and coherent trend.

A point which was now causing him acute anxiety was that every discussion on international problems came back in the end to a decision by three—sometimes perhaps two—Great Powers. There was always a tendency to try to adopt a solution satisfactory to those Powers alone. This had arisen acutely in the case of the Japanese peace treaty. He had been under great pressure to agree that this treaty should be settled by five Great Powers only to the exclusion of many others—for example, New Zealand, India and Pakistan—who were vitally concerned and who would resent being asked to accept a fait accompli.

Politics must create the ground on which economic policy could succeed. At the same time, economics reacted powerfully upon politics. This led to another consideration on which he would like the Meeting to reflect. When Mr. Marshall made his great speech, the United Kingdom Government had to take a quick decision. It soon became clear that without the proffered American aid there could be no salvation for Europe. The effect of accepting the Marshall offer was to create a close cohesion, not political but economic, among sixteen European countries. This had been forced upon the United Kingdom and other European countries by events. The choice had been difficult, but he was sure it was right. Surely this story had a moral for the present Meeting. There had been talk on the previous day of the need of Commonwealth countries for capital goods. In Asia there was nothing comparable with the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation. Such an organisation, if it existed, would enable conflicting claims to be balanced and disposed in order of priorities. Over the last thirty years the United Kingdom had been mobilised for one day out of every three. For ten years she had been able to make, as an industrial Power, no contribution to the economic development of the world. When Commonwealth countries made demands either upon the United States or the United Kingdom for capital goods, he would beg them to bear in mind this ten years' gap. It had also to be remembered that even by 1952, when we hoped that the United Kingdom would attain economic equilibrium, it would be at the standard (apart from a better distribution of income) only of 1938. In the ten years since them, education had been going on, the school-leaving age had been raised, and every child had acquired a greater conception of the physical and spiritual possibilities to which it might lay claim. Yet, after another four years, we could offer those children no higher standard than that of ten years ago. The same story was repeated throughout the world; yet everywhere the radio was telling the peoples of the world of the higher standards achieved by some countries and raising in them the desire for betterment. Like Pandit Nehru, he was not afraid of communism. With our industrial capacity, our inventive genius, our sense of right distribution which made us ready to put everything into the pool for the common advantage, the Commonwealth countries could challenge any other system. There must, however, be consultation between us and some method must be devised to enable us to see our problems as a whole.

1. Mr. Mackenzie King

The Secretary read to the meeting a letter from Mr. Mackenzie King expressing his appreciation of their message of sympathy at his inability to join in their discussions.

2. Economic Affairs

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 2nd Meeting, Minute 1)

DR. EVATT said that the admiration which he had expressed at the second meeting for the progress made by the United Kingdom Government towards economic recovery had been confirmed by more detailed study of the Long-Term Economic Programme prepared by the United Kingdom Government. It would, however, be a poor tribute to such a notable piece of work if the Australian Delegation failed to examine it from their own point of view with the same care as had been devoted towards its composition, and he proposed to raise various points which were of importance, not only to Australia, but also to the rest of the sterling area, the Commonwealth and, in some cases, the world as a whole.

This Long-Term Programme had already been presented to the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation. He appreciated the courtesy of the United Kingdom Government in making that presentation provisional until the document had been discussed by Commonwealth Ministers. But, although Commonwealth Ministers would be glad of this opportunity for discussion and would doubtless wish to offer comments, the Programme must remain a United Kingdom document. It was a statement of the intentions of the United Kingdom Government in the economic field based on their judgment of economic developments in the Commonwealth and in the sterling area, and it could not be assumed that other Commonwealth Governments would necessarily agree with that assessment or, even after consultation, necessarily concur in the decisions of policy it implied. As Mr. Chifley had indicated, Australia was only too anxious to assist in making the Programme a success. The Australian Government would play their part in restoring a sound world economy and in particular would make the largest possible contribution to the restoration of the United Kingdom economy; but a document of this character could not represent the collective views of the Commonwealth Governments. It should therefore be made clear that, while Commonwealth Governments had been consulted about this Programme, their views had been ascertained only in order to enable the United Kingdom to form a better judgment, and that those Governments were not committed to the judgments or the policies set out in the Programme.

Dr. Evatt then dealt with a number of major questions which particularly concerned Australia. First, Australia was both interested and anxious about United Kingdom plans for purchases abroad during the four-year period. The Australian Government had always looked upon the United Kingdom as their most important market. They therefore derived little comfort from forecasts which suggested that up to 1952–53 there would be no substantial increase in United Kingdom overseas purchases and that purchases from Australia would remain at about their present level At the same time Australia was being asked to expand her production, e.g., of food and raw materials. If the total level of purchases by the United Kingdom were to remain constant, this expansion could only be at the expense of some of the smaller Australian primary industries, which were most important to the agricultural structure of Australia and had hitherto found their market almost exclusively in the United Kingdom. For both economic and political reasons Australia might find difficulty in complying with this request. The forecasts might prove in practice to have been unduly pessimistic. The assessment of overseas expenditure was naturally based on an estimate of earnings from exports and overseas services. This had been a cautious estimate, and it had been thought right to assume that the United Kingdom would be able to sell abroad a volume of exports somewhat lower than that which she had the capacity to produce. This caution in framing the estimate might have unfortunate results; for when the estimate formed the basis of policy, undue caution in estimation might lead to errors of policy. In one respect, at any rate, he felt that this question might have been approached more boldly. Within the sterling area the United Kingdom's income from exports was determined by the amount of her purchases, and she could afford to buy to the limit of the capacity of sterling area countries to supply. If, for instance, Australia's income were increased by greater exports to the United Kingdom, Australia's power to purchase abroad was so much the greater; and, as Australia bought most of her requirements from the United Kingdom, the trade of both countries would then balance at a higher level. It might be argued that Australia would not make all her purchases from the United Kingdom. Even so, her purchases would come mainly from Western Europe, with several countries of which Australia's trade was seriously out of balance. Such a policy would only be dangerous if Australia bought largely from dollar countries, but this could be checked by her strict control over dollar imports. The United Kingdom had little to fear from a policy of buying boldly from the sterling area.

Sir Stafford Cripps hoped for full restoration of multilateral trading. Article VII of the Lend-Lease Agreement made it a condition that national tariffs should be lowered so that world trade might be resumed: the present dollar situation was a complete contradiction of the principle there embodied. Yet it was in the faith that effect would be given to Article VII that Australia had settled in hard cash, without gaining any advantage, her Lend-Lease liabilities to the United States by means of what was commonly known as the "£1,000 million settlement." Multilateral trading could be restored most quickly if multilateral practices were established over as wide an area as possible. He hoped that Sir Stafford Cripps would consider that present conditions justified multilateral trading within the sterling area as a whole and the removal of United Kingdom restrictions on purchases within that area.

Another large question which emerged from this Programme was the relation between Western Europe and the sterling area. The scheme for intra-European payments was a large contribution towards improving that relation. The Programme assumed that by 1952–53 Western Europe would no longer need extraordinary aid from the United States. He recognised that this assumption had been imposed by the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation, but it was of vital concern to Australia. If in fact Western Europe in four years' time was unable to stand on its own feet, the alternatives were further aid to the sterling area from the United States or a more precise system of bilateral balances. How was Western Europe to overcome this sterling deficiency? If it was to be overcome by expansionist rather than restrictive methods, surpluses must be built up in countries outside the sterling area. Failure would threaten the whole economy of Western Europe and prevent the restoration of multilateral trading. Australia was anxious to see the restoration of normal trade, and the creation of new trade, between Western Europe and the world. If that were achieved, it would result in higher standards all round and real multilateral trade between the dollar countries and the non-dollar world.

Dr. Evatt expressed agreement with Pandit Nehru's statement of the need for industrial development in India and the other less developed countries of the Commonwealth. This was a matter in which Australia desired to assist. In particular she recognised the need for capital goods in South Africa, India, Pakistan, South-East Asia and Ceylon. The provision of capital equipment would facilitate industrial development which would not only increase the domestic standard of living but would increase purchasing power to the advantage of Australia and other countries.

As he had said, the Long-Term Programme assumed that Western Europe would receive no extraordinary aid from the United States after 1952–53. What was not clear was how thereafter normal trade and payments with the United States were to be restored. The Programme assumed that after 1952–53 there would still be restrictions on dollar purchases. It was to be hoped, however, that the United Kingdom would eventually remove those restrictions. Continued discrimination against United States exports must have reactions on United States policy both internally and externally, particularly as it would be contrary to several international agreements. It seemed, however, that after 1952 further measures would still be necessary if true multilateral trade were to be achieved, and he would be interested to hear Sir Stafford Cripps's view on the progressive steps to be taken to that end and on the period over which the process should be spread.

Judgment of the speed and certainty with which multilateral trading was to be resumed affected measures which Australia and other Commonwealth countries must take in the immediate future. The United Kingdom had, for instance, suggested that Australia should develop the production of goods previously purchased from the Western Hemisphere. Australia had her own plans on the same lines, and for her own reasons. Many such changes would have been natural economic developments in any case. In some instances, however, projects could be given a higher priority with a prospect of their being economically sound only if Australia could assume a long continuation of restrictions against purchases from dollar countries. There were major capital schemes which would eventually show no profit if their market were to disappear in favour of the original and cheaper sources of supply. Australian development would be planned so as to provide the maximum help to the United Kingdom, and, in so far as this could be done without disadvantage to Australia, those plans would proceed. Before, however, Australia set out to compete with normal and cheaper sources of supply in dollar countries, she must have precise assurances of long-term demand from the United Kingdom. He would wish his advisers to discuss this matter further with United Kingdom officials; but he felt bound to bring the broad question of principle to the notice of United Kingdom Ministers.

Finally, Dr. Evatt said that there were various smaller points which he need not raise in the present discussion, but would take up with United Kingdom Ministers concerned. For the present he had limited himself to the large questions which seemed fundamentally to affect the sterling area and the Commonwealth. As he had said, judgments now being made about the future course of affairs must affect policy decisions taken by individual countries in the forthcoming years. Those decisions would be each country's own responsibility. Before they were taken, however, it seemed reasonable to ask the United Kingdom for the best and fullest information and advice.

MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON said that, in view of the recent discussions on economic matters which Canadian Ministers had held with Sir Stafford Cripps in Ottawa, and the decision to establish continuing machinery for consultation between the United Kingdom and Canada on economic matters of mutual interest, it was unnecessary for him to raise at this meeting matters which particularly concerned the trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. He would, however, like to mention certain broad implications of the Long-Term Programme which gave his Government some concern and were of interest to all Commonwealth countries.

The Programme of course conformed with the general conditions laid down by the Economic Co-operation Administrator and the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation. It was also true that Canada had been greatly helped in the short run by the provision of dollars to Western Europe under the European Recovery Programme. Nevertheless Canada was uneasy at some of the consequences of the requirement, which had been laid down as a condition for the grant of aid, that participating countries should work out plans to achieve a dollar balance in the course of the Four-Year period of the Marshall Plan. The United Kingdom Programme proposed to achieve this in part by increasing dollar exports and reducing dollar imports, and it was an essential feature of the United Kingdom Programme that the whole sterling area should co-operate in it, and particularly in dollar saving. Dollars in this context meant not merely United States dollars, but Canadian dollars. There were fears in Canada lest the process of achieving this objective of viability might seriously distort the pattern of trade between Canada and the sterling area. Canada had built up her economy on the basis of imperial preference and a substantial volume of trade with the sterling area, and she must look with concern at the effect which the methods proposed in the Programme to eliminate the dollar deficit would have in limiting important and historic trades between Canada and the sterling area. He did not wish to suggest that Canada had any quarrel with proposals for a reasonable reduction of imports from dollar sources and for diverting purchases to new sources of supply outside the dollar area. But Canada did ask that, in carrying out the Programme, the emphasis should be placed on dollar earning rather than on dollar saving. He hoped that Sir Stafford Cripps would press this point of view also in Paris, and that other participating countries and Commonwealth countries in the sterling area would follow the United Kingdom's lead in promoting and developing exports to dollar sources. Canada had herself tried to assist the sterling area as far as she could by encouraging imports from other Commonwealth countries. To some extent she was hampered in her efforts by the difficulty of giving special facilities for imports from sterling sources which were not also extended to imports from other countries; but she was doing her best. In return for these efforts on the part of Canada, the Commonwealth countries of the sterling area would, he hoped, conduct their policies so as to create the minimum of dislocation in the normal pattern of trade with Canada during the difficult interim period before the attainment of viability.

A second general point which had given rise to concern in Canada was the difficulty of reconciling the short-term interest of the sterling area in securing supplies, possibly at higher cost, from non-dollar sources, and the long-term interest of maintaining purchases in markets where goods could be produced most economically. The Canadian Government feared that the short-term necessity for diverting imports from dollar sources might in the long run produce the same effects as the old style protective tariffs, by developing uneconomic production in non-dollar sources which it would not be possible to abandon when dollars were less scarce.

A further source of doubt to the Canadian Government arose from the fact that the United Kingdom Programme contemplated the continuance of import restrictions against goods from dollar sources even at the end of the Marshall Aid period. He asked what the political and economic effects might be, particularly if a recession in economic activity in the Western Hemisphere made marginal exports a matter of greater importance to the United States economy than at present. It would then become apparent to business interests in the United States that the result of their aid to Europe had been to erect prohibitory and discriminatory barriers against their exports. These barriers would also exist against Canadian exports, and to Canada the matter was more vital than to the United States because a much higher percentage of Canadian production was for export.

MR. FRASER said that the Long-Term Programme was marked by boldness and dignity. The United Kingdom had no need to represent herself as dependent on the charity of the United States, and he was glad she had not done so. She had thrown all her resources into the war, and had laid all the countries of the world in her debt. The first point which struck him about the Programme was the similarity which it revealed in the problems before all Commonwealth countries. All, for instance, were in need of capital goods; and, if they could obtain them, would be able to contribute more effectively to the recovery of Western Europe. In New Zealand, for instance, there were great timber resources from which, with the necessary machinery, substantial supplies of pulp and paper could be obtained. Similarly, New Zealand was in great need of fencing-wire and of equipment for the development of water-power. Economic relations between the United Kingdom and New Zealand were so close that the New Zealand Government would need to give the Long-Term Programme close attention. They would certainly examine it to discover how best New Zealand could play her part in its realisation. There had, indeed, already been discussions between officials in London, and he was anxious that New Zealand officials should maintain their contact with the Central Economic Planning Staff. He could already say that the New Zealand Government endorsed the main objectives of the Programme, and that they would shape their own plans to take full account of it. There was, however, one point which needed separate mention. It had formerly been assumed that the Southern Hemisphere countries were, and should remain, primary producing countries only. That idea was now obsolete. On a basis of primary production only, it would have been impossible for New Zealand to maintain her population. There had been considerable industrial development during the war, and this must continue. Moreover, certain industries were strategically important and should be encouraged for this reason. He looked to the United Kingdom to help in providing the necessary technical skill for this kind of development. In future, therefore, there must in New Zealand be a parallel development in industry and agriculture, and in this respect her position was very similar to that of other Commonwealth countries. He had been specially interested in the remarks made by Sir Stafford Cripps on the relation between the economic problems of Western Europe and those of the Commonwealth. It was clear that on the political side the policy of Western Union need not involve any conflict of interests. On the economic side, there was an essential identity of interests; for Western Europe and the Commonwealth countries would each gain from the economic development of the other. Nevertheless, some difficult problems of adjustment would arise if the creation of a Western European Customs Union became a practical issue. If this seemed an essential part of the recovery programme, New Zealand would try to accommodate herself to the changes involved; but had the need for such a Union been proved? Would it not be rather the negation of co-operative economic planning in the sense described on page 18 of P.M.M. (48) 3? Finally, he recognised the conditions which had made it necessary for the United Kingdom Government to resort to a bilateral trade policy as a temporary device. He would, however, like to be assured that the needs of Commonwealth countries for scarce essential commodities were taken fully into account before commitments were entered into with foreign countries.

MR. LOUW said that his Government had not yet been able to give to the Long-Term Programme the detailed study which it deserved. As a proof of their interest, however, they were considering the desirability of sending an official over to this country to confer with the Central Economic Planning Staff. This would assist South Africa in deciding on the extent to which she would be able to co-operate in the policies described in the Programme.

Mr. Louw said that he had listened with particular interest to Dr. Evatt's remarks, because South Africa and Australia had many problems in common. As regards trade between the United Kingdom and South Africa, he suggested that an attitude of realism must be adopted. It should be remembered that South Africa was the United Kingdom's best customer. He hoped that any criticism which he might make on points of detail, would be taken in good spirit. South Africa, in fact, fully realised the value of the British market for her own products. While South Africa did not favour an economic unity of the Commonwealth, that did not mean that she was unwilling to collaborate with other Commonwealth countries on the understanding that South Africa's national interests must receive first consideration.

Dr. Evatt had referred to the limitation of purchases by the United Kingdom. This was a matter which also affected the interests of South Africa. Thus, for example, the South African Government had encouraged the production of jam during the war and there had been very large exports of South African jams, particularly for the Armed Forces. They had, of course, expected that the demand for South African jams would fall after the war, but now they were faced with the situation that the United Kingdom was not willing to take all jams that South Africa offered. The jam factories in South Africa were now in a very difficult position: they already had over half a million cases from the old season which had been produced for the United Kingdom, and for which there was now no market, and the new season was already upon them. There had also been difficulty with regard to the British territories in East Africa, particularly those south of the Equator. South Africa had built up her industries largely with a view to serving these areas, which she regarded as her natural market. This market had been closed to certain South African exports, owing to the limitation of imports in East Africa; and Mr. Louw quoted as an instance the case of two footwear factories which had been compelled to close down temporarily. These examples were quoted to show how United Kingdom action had detrimentally affected South African industries. The United Kingdom should realise the difficulties of South Africa, as South Africa in her turn fully appreciated the difficulties of the United Kingdom and her great efforts to recover from the effects of the war.

On the question of capital goods, Mr. Louw said that South Africa had been asked to avoid buying from dollar areas. But steps must then be taken to ensure that this did not involve curtailing the development of South Africa's industries. South Africa could not develop her industries without imported steel and capital goods. The new goldfields in the Orange Free State, for instance, could not be developed without steel, and gold production would decrease, since some of the Rand mines were beginning to be worked out. The Chairman of the Gold Producers' Committee had recently urged most strongly the need for more machinery and cement if production was to be maintained. In the Orange Free State the mines would go down very deep and the nature of the ground was such that it was necessary to line the shafts with cement. Huge quantities of cement were needed for this purpose alone. South Africa had the raw materials for making cement but lacked the necessary machinery. The United Kingdom's own building requirements must, of course, be met and it was easy for anybody to see the amount of war damage in London alone. But it had been alleged that there had been occasions when machinery, &c., ordered for South Africa had subsequently been diverted to other countries outside the Commonwealth. If these allegations were substantiated, South Africa would have a legitimate grievance.

In this connection Mr. Louw recalled Sir Stafford Cripps's reference to the United Kingdom trade agreement with Russia which, among other things, included railway material. South Africa urgently needed railway locomotives and trucks. She had huge supplies of manganese, which was wanted also for British steel production, but without the trucks she could not move it, and without the steel she could not build more trucks.

Mr. Louw said that South Africa was also a very good customer of the United States. She was anxious to secure steel from the United States, but there also the Union was confronted with difficulties and it was sometimes even necessary to guarantee that the steel would be used for purposes stipulated by the United States.

As regards Western Union, Mr. Louw felt that the economic rehabilitation of Western Europe was very important in the fight against Communist infiltration. South Africa, as a Western democracy, was interested in Western Europe and was most anxious to co-operate, subject to her own national interests. She herself was financing her own dollar deficit and had paid all that she owed under lease-lend. If, therefore, South Africa helped in Western Europe she would be doing so in the general interest, rather than for her own financial advantage.

Mr. Louw noted that the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation had proposed to integrate the African territories and that discussions were pending between the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and Portugal, with the object of making Africa a base of supplies for the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation. The Union of South Africa felt that this was an African matter and that her interests in it must be fully recognised. As the only independent sovereign State in Africa south of the Equator, Mr. Louw claimed that South Africa should come into any such discussions as an equal partner with the other Powers.

PANDIT NEHRU said that the immediate economic task for India was to fight inflation. Her greatest need was to increase production and for this purpose she urgently required large supplies of capital goods. Shortage of transport was one of the factors limiting her industrial expansion, and she needed to increase substantially her stock of railway wagons. Irrigation schemes, agricultural development, hydro-electric plants and anti-malaria campaigns were the main features of her economic programme. But many of these schemes were delayed by difficulty in obtaining the plant and machinery required. Large-scale economic development was necessary in order to raise the standard of living of the Indian people. This need to raise the economic standards of the less developed countries was, indeed, one of the most urgent problems now confronting the world; and, unless it could be solved, the continued prosperity of the industrialised countries could not be assured. He therefore deprecated any suggestion that the economic assistance which was now being provided by the United States Government was being offered solely for the benefit of the countries which received it: in fact it was a measure necessary for the common good of all the peoples of the world, including the United States itself, whose current level of prosperity could not be maintained indefinitely unless the purchasing power of other countries were restored.

It must therefore be an object of policy for all peace-loving nations to remove as many areas as possible from the economic danger zone. It seemed to him unfortunate that economic plans should have to be qualified by reference to the possibility that they might be upset by war or by political upheavals. For the risks of war and political disturbance arose mainly from economic grievances and low standards of living. If Governments could concentrate all their efforts and resources on raising economic standards, particularly in the less developed countries, the risk of war would be substantially reduced.

India certainly intended to do her utmost to raise the standard of living of her people. For this she needed help, particularly in the supply of capital goods, preferably from the other countries of the Commonwealth, or, if they could not provide it, from the United States. If necessary, she would proceed with her plans even without outside aid. But this would mean delay; and delay in promoting the economic development of India would encourage the spread of communism and create grave social and political problems. Many people now feared communism as an ogre trying to swallow the world. An attitude of fear was, however, a purely negative approach to the problem posed by communism. The fact was that, in Asia at any rate, communism flourished only where the economic standards of the people were indefensibly low; and the positive answer to the Communist threat was to remedy those conditions. It was only by these means that we could hope to secure lasting peace throughout the world. He therefore strongly stressed the importance of linking together the economic and political aspects of national policies.

It was fashionable to contrast the capitalist economy of the United States with Russian communism; but, so far as India was concerned, he was satisfied that it would be unprofitable and even dangerous to invite comparison between these two economic systems. Communism had a theoretical appeal for many people who would not find it agreeable in practice to live under a Communist régime. On the other hand, though many Indians might envy the material prosperity of the United States, few would welcome the consequences of applying to India the principles of American capitalism. It would certainly be undesirable to build up new vested interests in India at her present stage of development. He believed that India's approach to her economic problems was more likely to approximate to the policies and outlook of the United Kingdom Government. It was with this in mind that he had said, in his original comments on Sir Stafford Cripps's review of the economic situation at the meeting on 11th October, that he had drawn inspiration from the efforts which the United Kingdom was making to re-establish her economy.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN said that Pakistan's first concern was with industrial development; for only by this means could any improvement be secured in the standard of life of the population. He agreed that in Asia economic progress should be sought by means different from those of either Russian communism or American capitalism. Pakistan's immediate need was for capital goods; and he proposed to discuss her detailed requirements from the United Kingdom with the individual Ministers concerned. In general, economic policy should aim at the expansion, rather than the restriction, of trade; and special attention should be given to the development of trade between Commonwealth countries. While every effort must be made to assist Western Europe, he shared Mr. Fraser's view that this should not be permitted to injure the economy of any Commonwealth country. He suggested that an organisation should be established, comparable with the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation, which would be responsible both for preparing a plan of Commonwealth development and for ensuring that it was carried out. Such a body would have two main functions: to assist Commonwealth countries to expand their agricultural production by the provision of machinery, fertilisers, &c.; and to encourage Commonwealth industrial development, particularly in the production and processing of raw materials.

The discussion was then adjourned until the afternoon meeting.

1. Economic Affairs

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 5th Meeting, Minute 2)

The meeting resumed their discussion of economic affairs which had been adjourned earlier in the day.

MR. SENANAYAKE said that the possible effects of the United Kingdom Long-Term Programme on Commonwealth countries should be carefully examined. It was to the interest of all Commonwealth countries to expand their trade and production and he feared that the Programme might handicap them in doing this. Commonwealth countries should seek to do as much business as possible among themselves, and those with the lowest standards of living should be the first to receive assistance. In view of the difficulty of meeting from Commonwealth sources all the Commonwealth requirements for capital goods, should not the aim be rather to earn more dollars than to restrict purchases from dollar countries? He pointed out that, whereas Ceylon had set up no barriers to free trade, the limits placed by the United States on the use of natural rubber prevented full exploitation of Ceylon's potential resources and restricted her capacity to earn dollars.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS pointed out that it would be imprudent to embark on ambitious development projects without regard to future demand. He recalled that Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan had suggested that any surplus production could be absorbed by the large populations of Africa and Asia; but he thought that consideration should be given to the future of such developments as the groundnuts scheme. It would presumably be necessary to introduce animal husbandry in the area covered by the scheme and, if this took the form of beef-raising on a large scale, other Commonwealth countries would be affected.

MR. STRACHEY said that he was advised that for a long period to come the land could, given adequate fertilisers and a suitable rotation with other crops, be maintained under groundnuts for one year in every two; and that, for as long as could be foreseen, there would be ample demand for the oils and fats obtained from groundnuts.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that the Long-Term Programme was an entirely United Kingdom document and that there was no question of asking the Commonwealth countries to concur in it. It had, however, been thought right to submit the Programme to Commonwealth Ministers in order to get the benefit of their criticism and because, owing to the close links between the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries, the representatives of these countries were entitled to know what the United Kingdom was proposing.

Sir Stafford Cripps then dealt with certain specific matters which Dr. Evatt had raised at the meeting earlier in the day.

On the question of the limitation of overseas purchases, he explained that the estimates in the Programme were based on 1948–49 prices and that if there was some reduction in these prices the volume of purchases could be increased.

Accordingly the Programme should not be regarded as a rigid plan and the aim would be to expand United Kingdom trade to the highest possible level consistent with achieving a balance both in the total external trade and in the dollar account.

It was impossible to forecast how soon after 1952–53 multilateral trading could be resumed. It was hoped that by 1952–53 the United Kingdom and the other Western European countries would have become viable, but it would be unprofitable to attempt to say now what changes in the pattern of trade between the United States and Europe and the sterling area would by then have taken place. It was, however, certain that general multilateral trade could not be resumed for some years after 1952–53.

The restoration of trade between Western Europe and the sterling area would be facilitated through the scheme for intra-European payment. Under this scheme the equivalent of $500 million would be made available to European countries for the purchase of goods in the sterling area and about $350 million of this sum would be expended outside the United Kingdom.

Sir Stafford Cripps said that he had prepared a statement showing the exports of capital goods and machinery from the United Kingdom to Commonwealth countries in 1946, 1947 and 1948. (A copy of this statement is annexed to these minutes.) The statement, which was expressed in terms of 1938 prices, showed that exports of capital goods had increased by 75 per cent. since 1938 and exports of machinery by 63 per cent. Every Commonwealth country had received more than before the war, and some much more. It was in his view, unfair to make comparisons between the exports to Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth countries, since the United Kingdom had been faced with an urgent need to expand her exports and had been forced to send abroad goods which could ill be spared from the home market. The main reasons for this were:—

(i) The cessation of convertibility;
(ii) the loss of United Kingdom overseas investments;
(iii) the need to acquire a special commodity available only in particular areas and in exchange for specified goods; and
(iv) the desire to rehabilitate the economies of the war shattered countries.

For political reasons the United Kingdom had deliberately set out to help in the rehabilitation of the Western European economy as an essential step towards world stability. The rehabilitation of this area was also of special importance for Commonwealth countries because, once the productive power of Western Europe was restored, it would be able to meet part of their demand for capital goods.

Since the war the countries participating in the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation had been supplied with sterling goods to the value of $2,000 million without requital. Thus, the liability of the United Kingdom under the Intra-European Payments Scheme meant some reduction in the rate of unrequited exports that had ruled during the past three years, and it should therefore be possible to provide more capital goods for Commonwealth countries.

The changes brought about by the war, and since then by dollar stringency, made it impossible to contemplate a return to the exact pre-war pattern of trade. It must be recognised that the channels of trade had altered and that any attempt to revert to the pre-war pattern would lead to chaos.

The United Kingdom had sought to ensure that her exports of capital goods went to the areas where they were most needed and for this purpose there had been frequent consultations with individual Commonwealth countries. The suggestion that methods of consultation on this matter might be improved would no doubt be considered when the general question of Commonwealth consultation was discussed on 18th October.

A long period must elapse before full convertibility was achieved, and, though each project must be considered on its merits, there should be a bias in favour of developments designed to save dollar purchases, unless it was clear that they would be uneconomical in the long run. It should often be possible to make long-term contracts which would assure producers that their market would hold for a number of years.

Sir Stafford Cripps said that he had recently discussed with Mr. St. Laurent and other Canadian Ministers the special problem of Canadian trade with the sterling area. He was in full agreement with Mr. Robertson's point that the emphasis should be on dollar earning rather than on dollar saving and he explained that in the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation the United Kingdom had always stressed the need for European countries to earn dollars even though this might operate to the disadvantage of the United Kingdom in the immediate future. The general aim must be to enable Western European countries to adjust their economies, without undue dislocation of their principal industries, in such a way as to attain a true balance of trade; and in pursuing this objective the United Kingdom would try to make all possible dollar purchases in Canada rather than in the United States.

Mr. Robertson had asked what the situation would be if there were a recession in the United States. It was impossible to forecast what would happen, but policies could not be based on the assumed effects of pressure on the United States Government by particular interests. He believed that some readjustment of the United States economy was inevitable, but meanwhile the primary task of the United Kingdom must be to secure her economic independence.

Sir Stafford Cripps said that he very much appreciated what Mr. Fraser had said about the Long-Term Programme. The question of maintaining a proper balance between exports of capital goods to the Commonwealth countries and exports to other countries was one for general discussion, subject to acceptance of the need to rehabilitate Western Europe. The development of New Zealand's timber resources was already being discussed by officials, and United Kingdom Ministers fully realised the need of New Zealand for additional supplies of fencing wire, though, owing to the shortage of steel and of wire manufacturing capacity it was difficult to see how exports could be increased. The United Kingdom were putting in hand a great expansion of steel capacity in order to supply the Commonwealth countries and, though new plant took time to come into production, it was hoped that by 1953 the United Kingdom would be able to meet all Commonwealth requirements.

As was made clear in P.M.M. (48) 3, the United Kingdom were doubtful about the proposed European Customs Union and did not regard it as a necessary part of the policy of Western Union. The experience of the Benelux countries had not been encouraging and there seemed to be less pressure for a European Customs Union from the United States as the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation began to show concrete results. The objects which it was sought to attain by a European Customs Union could probably be secured by a greater measure of international planning and it might be that a Republican Government in the United States would favour this alternative.

While it was true that under certain bilateral agreements the United Kingdom had had to supply to countries outside the Commonwealth goods which would have been welcome to Commonwealth countries, this had been done only when there was no other way of obtaining imports needed by the United Kingdom and account had always been taken of the interests of Commonwealth countries.

Sir Stafford Cripps recalled that Mr. Louw had raised the question of the limitations imposed by the United Kingdom on purchases of certain goods from South Africa. These limitations had been forced on the United Kingdom by the need to achieve a balance of trade and had not been imposed arbitrarily. As regards the import of South African goods into East Africa, he understood that the restrictions which had been imposed in 1947 had now been adjusted to the satisfaction of South Africa. Though it was true that some goods that might have gone to Commonwealth countries were being exported to the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom were actually supplying to the Soviet Union far less in the way of capital goods than had been contemplated in the Anglo–Soviet Agreement. It was, of course, important to maintain East-West trade in Europe at the highest possible level and the Agreement had enabled the United Kingdom to obtain from Russia much needed supplies of coarse grains, as well as making it possible for Commonwealth countries to market some of their surplus production in the Soviet Union.

Sir Stafford Cripps said that he was in full agreement with Pandit Nehru on the need to raise the standard of living in the less developed areas of the Commonwealth.

He also agreed with Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan about the desirability of achieving viability by increasing exports to dollar countries rather than by reducing imports from them.

Mr. Senanayake had asked that efforts should be made to remove to some extent the limitations on United States purchases of natural rubber which resulted from the provision made in the United States for maintaining the production of artificial rubber. The United States, however, considered it necessary to maintain a considerable production of artificial rubber for strategic reasons and there was little or no hope of persuading them to reduce the present level of output.

MR. SENANAYAKE said that during the war Ceylon had been encouraged to produce the maximum possible quantity of rubber and had received a price based on the pre-war average, which was too low to provide for adequate re-planting. Moreover, the large production achieved in the common interest had been secured only at the expense of great damage to the trees. The stocks of rubber which had thus been built up had subsequently been used to depress the price to such an extent that the Ceylon rubber industry now faced ruin. Thus the sacrifices made by Ceylon during the war had been turned to her disadvantage. The Ceylon Government regarded it as necessary to keep the industry in being for both economic and defence reasons. The Soviet Union had now offered to buy the whole of Ceylon's production of rubber. If Ceylon were now told that it was right to sell her rubber to the Soviet Union, it would appear to the people of Ceylon that the industry, which during the war had been bled at the request of the United Kingdom, was now being saved by Russian purchases. It would be correspondingly more difficult to persuade the people of Ceylon that it was in their interest to join in the common struggle against communism and the danger of Communist infiltration into Ceylon would be increased. Further, if it was now agreed that it was right for Ceylon to sell her rubber to the Soviet Union, all facilities should be made available for this purpose. It would be important that there should be no feeling in Ceylon that the United Kingdom was not doing her best to help in every possible way in this difficult matter.

MR. BEVIN said that he appreciated the difficulties referred to by Mr. Senanayake. He believed, however, that the price paid for rubber produced in Ceylon during the war had been adequate, since it had included an allowance for extra production costs. In his view, the right solution for the problem of Ceylon was to aim at an international arrangement based on the principle of the International Wheat Agreement under which limits would be set to the extent to which prices could fluctuate. Something of this kind might eventually emerge from the work of the International Rubber Study Group, though it would be optimistic to hope for an early agreement. The same principle could also be applied with benefit to other raw materials in which Commonwealth countries were interested. As regards the export of rubber to the Soviet Union, it was, in his view, impossible to apply what would in effect be economic sanctions against a particular country unless that country had been declared by the United Nations to be a danger to peace. As long as the sale of rubber was left to normal commercial practice it was not possible to refuse to send to Russia a commodity which had a normal commercial use.

MR. FRASER said that the sale of rubber to the Soviet Union in present circumstances was comparable to the sale of scrap iron to Japan before the war and was difficult to justify to public opinion in New Zealand. He fully appreciated the difficulty of discriminating on political grounds amongst the countries to which exports were sent, but he pointed out that the veto could always be used to prevent a decision of the United Nations in favour of the application of economic sanctions to the Soviet Union.

MR. HAROLD WILSON said that Ceylon's production of rubber would represent only a small proportion of the total world production and that, so long as there was a free world market for rubber, the Soviet would be able to meet her needs from purchases elsewhere. Ceylon should, however, consider the risks attendant upon selling the whole of her production to such an undependable market as the Soviet Union. The fall in price was due to the production of synthetic rubber in the United States, but there had been some recovery in price as a result of stockpiling by the United States and purchases by the Soviet Union.

DR. EVATT said that the remarks made by him at the meeting earlier in the day had been in no sense a criticism of the remarkable achievement of the United Kingdom in the economic field and that he was full of admiration for the hard work and sacrifices which had enabled the United Kingdom to attain so large a measure of economic recovery. As had been shown by her actions, Australia was most anxious to promote the economic recovery of the United Kingdom, and the importance of rehabilitating the economy of Western Europe was fully realised. He believed, however, that, without prejudice to these objectives, it might be possible in working out the Long-Term Programme to pursue policies which would bring more advantages to Commonwealth countries and lighten the burdens which they had at present to bear. For example, could not more of the off-shore purchases under the European Recovery Programme be made in Commonwealth countries? He was satisfied that closer consultation among the Commonwealth countries on economic affairs was most desirable, particularly on such matters as the supply of capital goods, and he urged that such consultation should come at an early stage in the formulation of policy. He suggested that the points which he had raised should be considered again at a later meeting and that, meanwhile, they should be explored at meetings among officials.

MR. FRASER stressed the importance of adequate consultation with Commonwealth countries before the United Kingdom entered into bilateral agreements with countries outside the Commonwealth. He realised that under such agreements the United Kingdom did not normally guarantee deliveries. Nevertheless, the knowledge that commodities which were needed in order to enable New Zealand to develop production for the benefit of the United Kingdom were being exported to countries outside the Commonwealth inevitably created a bad impression. Could not Commonwealth countries have a greater say in the allocation of scarce United Kingdom products?

MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON suggested that more use might be made of price comparisons in securing a fair allocation of commodities of which there was a shortage. Resort to this method would limit the need for consultation and remove some of the invidious responsibility for allocation which now rested on the United Kingdom.

MR. BEVIN said that it should not be assumed that present shortages of commodities would continue indefinitely and that it might be useful to consider more closely the probable duration of each of the current shortages. Such a study might show that some at least of the commodities for which demand at present exceeded supply might in a relatively short time become freely available.

MR. HAROLD WILSON pointed out that some United Kingdom commodities of which there were serious shortages immediately after the war were now freely available. On the other hand, it would be two or three years before supplies of such goods as caustic soda and steel products, particularly tinplate and wire, were sufficient to meet all demands.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that in the working out of the four-year plan full account would be taken of the points which had been made in the discussion. He was afraid, however, that, in view of the agreement to cover the sterling area dollar deficit of $169 million in the allocation of aid to the United Kingdom for 1948–49, it would be impossible to ask the United States to extend off-shore purchases to Commonwealth countries outside the Western Hemisphere. He agreed that there was a need for some continuing machinery to ensure that there would be full consultation with Commonwealth countries in the development of the plan. There had already been some discussion between officials on this matter and he welcomed Dr. Evatt's suggestion that the matter should be explored further by officials and thereafter discussed again by Ministers.

MR. NOEL-BAKER pointed out that on 18th October there would be a further opportunity of discussing the question of consultation on economic matters as part of the general question of Commonwealth consultation. Meanwhile, he would arrange to discuss with Mr. Senanayake the problem of rubber production in Ceylon.

1. Attendance

MR. ATTLEE, on behalf of all the Commonwealth Ministers, extended a warm welcome to Mr. St. Laurent.

2. Status of High Commissioners

MR. ATTLEE said that there seemed to be general agreement among all Commonwealth countries that Commonwealth High Commissioners should be accorded a high place in the order of precedence in the countries to which they were accredited, and in his paper P.M.M. (48) 9 he had put forward certain specific suggestions for giving effect to this object. If these suggestions could be accepted in principle each Commonwealth country could work out their detailed application in its own territory.

MR. ST. LAURENT said that Canada accepted these suggestions in principle.

DR. EVATT said that he also approved these suggestions in principle, though he would not wish to be committed to accepting every detail in Mr. Attlee's paper.

MR. FRASER also agreed in principle. He thought it important to retain a distinction between Commonwealth High Commissioners and foreign Ambassadors, as the countries represented by High Commissioners belonged to the same family group and were not foreign to one another. He could not, therefore, support any proposal to give High Commissioners the title of Ambassador; but, subject to that, he agreed that they should rank with Ambassadors for purposes of precedence. He welcomed the proposal that visiting Cabinet Ministers, while given no formal place in Tables of Precedence, should, when representing their Governments, be placed as a matter of courtesy above their High Commissioners.

MR LOUW welcomed the opportunity to discuss this subject, which he himself had first raised in 1929, when he was High Commissioner for South Africa in London. He thought that the application of the principle proposed in P.M.M. (48) 9 would raise many detailed difficulties which called for further discussion. He suggested the appointment of a sub-committee to examine these matters and report back. Mr. Attlee's proposals were confined to the question of precedence. There was also the question of title. South Africa would like to see High Commissioners designated Ambassadors or Ministers Plenipotentiary, as appropriate. It should be possible to overcome the technical difficulties of accrediting: thus, Commonwealth representatives might be accredited by and to Ministers of External Affairs.

MR. NEHRU accepted the general principles outlined in P.M.M. (48) 9, and supported the suggestion that there should be flexibility in their application.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN and MR. SENANAYAKE also agreed with the general principles contained in P.M.M. (48) 9.

MR. JORDAN urged that precedence of High Commissioners should be treated on a family, rather than a formal, basis. He also suggested that some further consideration might be advisable before varying the existing rule whereby precedence of High Commissioners inter se is determined by order of seniority of country.

MR. ATTLEE said that his paper had aimed at getting general agreement on this question. The United Kingdom Government did not favour the absorption of High Commissioners into the diplomatic corps. As regards title, various alternatives to "High Commissioner" had been suggested but none had won general acceptance. There seemed to be general agreement that a Committee of Commonwealth representatives should be appointed to go into the points of detail; and he would arrange for such a Committee to be convened and asked to report back before the end of the Prime Ministers' meeting.

3. Commonwealth Consultation

MR. ATTLEE said that there appeared to be a general desire to examine the existing methods of consultation between Commonwealth Governments, in order to see whether they met the requirements of the present situation or whether they could be improved. The situation had been changed by the increased tempo of affairs and the need for rapid action. There had also been some change in the degree of common interest between Commonwealth countries. Although there was still much of common interest to all, there were now many questions which concerned certain Commonwealth countries or groups of countries much more directly than others. Thus, members of the sterling area had common financial interests which were not shared in the same degree by Canada. There were questions of security in the South Pacific in which Australia and New Zealand had a closer interest than other Commonwealth countries. The economic development of South-East Asia was of particular interest to Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and Ceylon. Atlantic security affected Canada and the United Kingdom more closely than other Commonwealth countries. And African questions were of special concern to South Africa. It would be wrong, therefore, to apply a rigid and uniform pattern of consultation to all subjects. Future arrangements must be more flexible, and it was natural that on certain matters there should be fuller consultation between some Commonwealth countries than between others. It followed that there was not always a "Commonwealth view" on every subject: it might often be a matter rather of ascertaining the Canadian view or the Australian view or the Indian view. It also followed that there would be increasingly frequent need for regional discussions between the Commonwealth countries specially concerned with a given problem. The composition of these groups would naturally vary according to the nature of the subject.

Mr. Attlee next emphasised the need for supplementing written communications by more frequent personal contacts. Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers were of great value in providing opportunities for the free exchange of views and promoting greater understanding of common purposes, and he suggested that such meetings should be held more frequently, possibly at intervals of two or three years. He appreciated the practical difficulties of gathering Prime Ministers together, particularly now that nine countries were involved, but he again emphasised the value of these meetings and suggested that the aim should be more frequent informal meetings rather than the old-style formal meetings, with elaborate agenda and many committees, held at infrequent intervals.

In the intervals between the meetings of Prime Ministers, there might be meetings of Commonwealth Ministers responsible for foreign affairs, economic affairs, and defence. Ministers attending such meetings would not be expected to commit their Governments to decisions, and here again regional conferences of the countries most directly concerned might often be the right way of dealing with particular points. These meetings need not always be held in London. For the secretarial services at such meetings he would be glad to place the experience of the United Kingdom Cabinet Secretariat at the disposal of any Commonwealth Government which might desire to use it.

These meetings could be held only at relatively long intervals and the need remained for arrangements to enable Commonwealth representatives in London to establish even more regular personal contacts with Ministers and officials concerned in the formulation of policy. This also applied, of course, to capitals other than London.

Turning to the three main subjects on which closer consultation was required, Mr. Attlee dealt first with foreign affairs. There could be no question of trying to frame a uniform foreign policy for the Commonwealth as a whole. Each member country must continue to form its independent judgment on matters of foreign policy. At the same time members of the Commonwealth had many common interests, and it was most desirable that they should be able to form their judgments with a full knowledge of the views and interests of other members. The United Kingdom Government were particularly anxious to be seized of the views of Commonwealth countries at an early stage, so that when a crisis arose they should not be deprived of the advantages of those views for want of time to obtain them.

In reply to a question by Mr. Louw, Mr. Attlee said that he had particularly in mind closer and more regular personal contacts between Commonwealth High Commissioners in London and the Foreign Secretary. Mr. Bevin had recently invited High Commissioners to approach him directly on matters of foreign policy, and he hoped that they would take full advantage of this. The Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations would be kept informed of such meetings and would normally be present at them. In addition to these continuing contacts in London, Mr. Attlee suggested that there should be frequent meetings of Ministers of External Affairs, perhaps once or twice a year. Here again, all Commonwealth countries need not necessarily be represented at every meeting, and the meetings need not always be held in London. It would perhaps be convenient if some of them could be timed to be held just before or after a meeting of the United Nations Assembly.

The Political Secretaries of the Commonwealth High Commissioners also had a right of direct access to the Foreign Office, mainly for the purpose of collecting factual information, and he hoped that fuller use would be made of this facility.

As regards economic affairs, discussion at meetings in the previous week had shown a general desire for more regular consultation. There was need for more regular exchange of information about the future intentions of Commonwealth Governments in the economic field, though here again it was important to bear in mind that final decisions could only be taken by Governments. Much the same procedure might be followed as for foreign affairs, e.g., there should be meetings of Ministers or senior officials, not necessarily in London, and not necessarily including all members of the Commonwealth For example, problems of economic development in South-East Asia might well be discussed by representatives of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and Ceylon. It was also important that there should be closer contact between the central organisations dealing with economic planning in London and the senior economic advisers of the other Commonwealth Governments. But meetings, which at best could only be periodical, must be supplemented by a regular flow of information, week by week, on economic subjects, and it might be useful for this purpose if some central focus could be established in London for the exchange of information between Commonwealth Governments on all economic subjects. There might be a Standing Committee for this purpose, through which the economic advisers attached to the Commonwealth High Commissioners in London could maintain direct and regular contact with the appropriate officials of United Kingdom Departments. There were already in existence two such official committees : first, the Sterling Area Statistical Committee, which met at regular intervals to review dollar expenditure and, second, the Commonwealth Liaison Committee for the European Recovery Programme, which was designed to keep Commonwealth countries in close touch with the development of the European Recovery Programme. Neither of these Committees was, however, designed to provide regular information on subjects such as bilateral trade agreements and the supply of capital goods, which had been mentioned in the discussions in the previous week. It might, therefore, be advisable to reconstitute these two Committees as one Committee with broader terms of reference, which should serve as a focus for the exchange of information between Commonwealth countries on all economic questions of common interest. Such a Committee would work, in a wider field, on the same model as the two existing Committees, which had proved their value in practice. It would comprise official representatives of all the Commonwealth

High Commissioners in London and representatives of all the economic Departments of the United Kingdom Government. It might also be possible to set up parallel Committees in some of the other Commonwealth capitals.

Mr. Attlee emphasised that no such Committee could be a medium for formulating Commonwealth policy on economic questions, still less for reaching decisions, which must remain in the hands of Governments. It would, however, provide a forum for the exchange of information, a general background of knowledge and common understanding, and advance information of probable future developments, which would give Commonwealth Governments a chance of making their views known early enough to enable them to be taken into account in the formulation of economic policy.

In conclusion, Mr. Attlee said that he did not wish to put forward any specific proposals for closer consultation on defence until the general problems of defence had been discussed at the meeting arranged for 20th October.

Mr. St. LAURENT said that Canada was in a somewhat special position. She had, however, greatly appreciated all the opportunities for contact with other Commonwealth countries in the past and would certainly try to send representatives to any meetings which might be arranged for the future. He agreed that a meeting of Prime Ministers every two or three years was a reasonable aim, but doubted whether any fixed interval should be rigidly prescribed. Meetings of the United Nations Assembly would offer a suitable opportunity for meetings of Ministers of External Affairs. Canada appreciated past endeavours to keep her well informed on foreign affairs, and she had done her best to reciprocate. Where personal meetings were required, these could no doubt be arranged, if necessary on a regional basis. Canada would be glad to have such meetings held in Ottawa, when appropriate. The object of such meetings would be discussion and the exchange of views : final decisions must be reserved to Governments. Close and continuing contact between High Commissioners and the Government Departments in capitals where they were stationed was most important; and it was Canada's experience that this was secured under existing practice both in London and in other Commonwealth capitals.

As regards foreign relations, Canada was in a special position as a country of the North American continent. Many of her problems concerned herself and the United States exclusively, but she had always striven, in dealing with those problems, to avoid doing anything which might embarrass other Commonwealth countries. The work of the North American Defence Board, for example, had not caused any embarrassment to any Commonwealth Government.

On the economic side, Mr. St. Laurent said that, although he looked forward to the ultimate restoration of multilateral trading, international trade was at present very largely on a bilateral basis and could most conveniently be discussed bilaterally. Canada and the United Kingdom, for instance, had recently set up a Committee to keep under review their common economic problems and the progress of the measures taken to ease them. No doubt the work of this Committee could, if desired, be integrated with the larger Committee which had been suggested; but for the moment it was concerned largely with matters of detail which would not be suitable for discussion by a larger Committee. The problems of Anglo-Canadian trade, with their dollar implications, were primarily a matter for those two countries, but he appreciated that they would have repercussions on other sterling countries.

Speaking generally, he felt that what was required was, not so much to set up a new and elaborate organisation for Commonwealth consultation, as to ensure that the existing organisations functioned more effectively.

Dr. EVATT welcomed the proposals put forward by Mr. Attlee, and suggested that they might with advantage be examined in detail by a committee of the Conference. During the war, consultation between the United Kingdom Government and the other Commonwealth Governments had on occasion been seriously inadequate; indeed, important decisions had from time to time been taken, as at Yalta, on which no information at all had been given to Commonwealth Governments at the time. Mr. Curtin had been deeply concerned at this situation and had for this reason put forward, at the Prime Ministers' meeting in 1944, a suggestion that machinery should be devised which would avoid the recurrence of such incidents. Since the war, consultation between the United Kingdom Government and other Commonwealth Governments had markedly improved; and the flow of information provided by despatch and telegram was much appreciated. But the need still remained for improving the existing machinery, or devising new machinery, which would ensure that, before important decisions were taken there was proper consultation between the United Kingdom Government and other Commonwealth Governments. To be effective, consultation must be timely: it was not enough for Commonwealth Governments merely to be kept informed of developments as they occurred. In view of the rapid tempo of events, effective consultation in foreign affairs might not always be easy; but decisions in this field often involved issues of vital importance to the Commonwealth. In particular, all Commonwealth countries were interested in European problems, since these might raise fundamental issues of peace or war. As regards the specific proposals put forward by the Prime Minister, he supported the idea of regular meetings of Prime Ministers, though he thought that the suggested interval of two or three years was rather too long. He strongly supported the suggestion that the contacts between Commonwealth High Commissioners in London and various United Kingdom Departments should be developed: it was particularly important that Commonwealth High Commissioners should be in close touch with the Foreign Office. In his view, these regular contacts ought to be supplemented by meetings of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers, or their deputies, which should be held twice a year. Such meetings, which might take place in the different Commonwealth capitals according to convenience, would afford an opportunity for the Ministers concerned to acquaint themselves with the trends of opinion in the Commonwealth and to ascertain the extent to which there was agreement between the views of Commonwealth Governments on important international issues. He thought that the success of the Canberra Conference in 1947 indicated the benefit which was likely to be obtained from such meetings. In the financial and economic field, however, he was not sure whether there would be any great advantage in the establishment of a new committee, on the lines suggested by Mr. Attlee, merely for the exchange of information. This limited function could be adequately fulfilled by the High Commissioners themselves, who would in any event be in a better position than officials to discuss issues of policy. Final decisions could only be taken by Governments; but in this field there appeared to be no reason why there should not be adequate Commonwealth consultation before final decisions were made.

MR. FRASER said that he was in general agreement with the proposals put forward by Mr. Attlee. He thought that there would be advantage in establishing machinery for joint discussion of financial and economic questions. By this means, Commonwealth Governments would be enabled to gain regular information about each other's needs and problems. He thought, too, that there would be merit in setting up a committee on which Commonwealth Governments would be represented by financial and economic experts. These would be attached to the offices of the Commonwealth High Commissioners in London and would therefore be in constant consultation with their own High Commissioners; and occasional meetings might be held which the High Commissioners themselves could attend. He supported the proposal for regular meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, although there were bound to be serious practical difficulties in the way of arranging times suitable to the general convenience. He also welcomed the proposal that there might be regular meetings of Commonwealth Ministers on foreign affairs and other problems. Nevertheless, he wished it placed on record that in his view the arrangements for consultation between the United Kingdom Government and the other Commonwealth Governments had never been better than they were at present. The urgent pressure of events, however, inevitably made effective consultation impossible at times; and it was clearly desirable to review the existing arrangements for consultation in order to limit such occasions to the minimum. There was one point on which some change in existing practice was desirable. In the past the United Kingdom Government had assumed that failure to reply to a communication by a prescribed time implied that the Commonwealth Government consulted had no objection to a given proposal. Under present conditions action ought not to be based on this assumption.

MR. LOUW said that his Government, in the short time for which they had been in office, had been much impressed with the existing arrangements for the communication of information to Commonwealth Prime Ministers. His Prime Minister had asked him to express the appreciation of the South African Government for the full information which had been supplied to them on current matters. If the status of High Commissioners were raised, and if it were understood that they had a right of access to the Foreign Secretary, South Africa would consider that the present arrangements for consultation with the United Kingdom Government were satisfactory.

Commonwealth Governments should not be presented with faits accomplis. There was no profit in regular transmission of information and consultation if it applied only to minor matters, and did not extend equally to major decisions. Where telegraphic consultation was not enough, oral explanations should be given through the High Commissioner.

With regard to Mr. Attlee's specific proposals, the South African Government did not consider that the Commonwealth should be regarded as a unit for economic, political or defence purposes. Though they were glad to be consulted on all such matters, they would deprecate any steps which gave even an appearance of development in that direction. But regional consultation was necessary; South Africa was naturally most concerned with African affairs, and on these her consultations were likely to be mainly with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Louw doubted whether it would be necessary to have more frequent Ministerial meetings. Important events requiring consultation might occur between such meetings. Moreover, the number of overseas meetings which Ministers of External Affairs, and their advisers, already had to attend was such as to prejudice their work at home.

There was the possibility that the suggested arrangements for economic consultation might develop into a permanent organisation for Commonwealth co-operation. South Africa, as he had indicated, did not favour the establishment of any permanent organisation which might imply that the Commonwealth was an economic unit, and would not wish any standing body to be more than a clearing-house for the exchange of economic information.

PANDIT NEHRU expressed general agreement with Mr. Attlee's proposals. Three years was, however, a long time to look ahead in a rapidly changing world: he would prefer to say that meetings of Prime Ministers should be held as often as possible. Ministers of External Affairs—a portfolio often held by the Prime Minister—might find it difficult to meet as often as twice a year, but they should certainly do so whenever possible.

Regional conferences were desirable, although it was sometimes difficult, particularly in foreign affairs, to treat any problem as of purely regional interest. Moreover, regional problems would often concern nations which were not members of the Commonwealth. In any joint consultations about South-East Asia, India would wish, for instance, to see Burma included: but if she were included, the meeting would cease to be a purely Commonwealth affair. In economic affairs frequent meetings were desirable, though it had to be remembered that Commonwealth Governments were responsible to sovereign Parliaments.

High Commissioners should certainly have free access to Ministers of the Governments in whose countries they were stationed; and everything possible should be done to ensure that Commonwealth Governments were consulted while there was still time for their views to be taken into account.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN said that the Commonwealth had become an important instrument for peace and progress. As such, it could be most effective if all its members pursued a common line. Necessary though consultation was for that purpose, consultation alone was not enough. The Commonwealth might be likened to a club which, beginning with foundation members, had gradually extended its membership, the latest joined members having equal rights, privileges and obligations with the others. But it was not his conception of a club that it should offer, as it sole amenity, the opportunity to read the newspapers in solitude and then to go home. If the Commonwealth were really to play its part in world affairs for its members, there must be not merely consultation, but also collaboration. Consultation, if it were not to be sterile, should have as its objectives (a) closer economic collaboration; (b) better co-operation in the spheres of politics and defence; and (c) means of seeking settlement of any differences between member countries. He therefore suggested that, at appropriate intervals, there should be ad hoc meetings, both of Ministers and of officials. The present machinery for consultation and collaboration should be improved, with particular respect to economic and foreign affairs. On foreign affairs hung the issues of peace or war. Telegrams from the Commonwealth Relations Office, though informative, were not always enough. On large questions the views of Commonwealth countries ought to be available to the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom. It should no longer be possible to say that Commonwealth foreign policy was decided in London alone.

It would not be enough to limit economic consultation to the maintenance of a clearing-house for information. Unless members of the Commonwealth could know and understand each other's problems, the policy of individual Governments could not be framed to take account of the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole. Bilateral or regional discussions were often necessary: but more consultation throughout the Commonwealth was necessary if the Commonwealth were to be effective.

With Mr. Attlee's specific proposals for meetings of Prime Ministers, Ministers of External Affairs and others, and for holding meetings in other Commonwealth capitals, he was in entire agreement.

Discussion was then adjourned until the afternoon meeting.

1. Commonwealth Consultation

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 7th Meeting, Minute 3)

The meeting resumed the discussion on methods of consultation between Commonwealth Governments which had been begun earlier in the day.

MR. SENANAYAKE agreed with earlier speakers that there should be regular meetings of Commonwealth Ministers. He also endorsed the view expressed by Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan that there should be more stress on consultation with other Commonwealth Governments, in addition to the present satisfactory flow of information. The methods of consultation proposed by Mr. Attlee were agreeable to Ceylon.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS said that he doubted whether this meeting would be more successful than earlier meetings in finding means of improving the machinery for Commonwealth consultation. He supported the proposal which had been made for consultation on a regional basis. He thought it inconsistent for countries which sought to loosen the ties between Commonwealth countries to ask at the same time for increased consultation.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said that Commonwealth consultation was now closer and more effective than ever in the past. In 1947 eleven times as many circular telegrams, and four times as many other written communications, had been sent out by the Commonwealth Relations Office to other Commonwealth Governments as in 1937. Considerable importance was also attached to meetings with Commonwealth High Commissioners in London. The Commonwealth Relations Office did not in any way stand between the High Commissioners' Offices and other United Kingdom Government Departments. On the contrary, it was his aim and that of his Department to bring Commonwealth High Commissioners and their staffs into close touch with other United Kingdom Government Departments. An instance of direct contact which his Department had arranged was that between the Australian High Commissioner's Office and the Ministry of Transport in the provision of ships for migrants for Australia. There was also direct contact between Commonwealth High Commissioners' Offices and the Foreign Office on foreign affairs. It often happened, of course, that he himself, or members of his Office, were present at these direct discussions. Mr. Noel-Baker also thought that more frequent meetings of Commonwealth Ministers in London and in other Commonwealth capitals would be most useful. These would afford an opportunity for providing Commonwealth Governments with background information and for indicating to them the trend of developments in policy. They would be less suitable as occasions for taking specific decisions. In the past, there always had been differences of view among Commonwealth Governments and this would no doubt continue. It was not an unhealthy sign. But consultation among Commonwealth Governments had also led to the independent formation of common judgments on the most important issues facing the world. When, as a result, Commonwealth countries spoke in an international forum with concordant or very nearly concordant voices, the view thus expressed carried all the greater weight. On the question of consultation generally, the Commonwealth Relations Office was willing to take any steps on the desirability of which there was general agreement among Commonwealth Governments. Meanwhile he welcomed Dr. Evatt's proposal for the setting up of a committee to go into the matter in further detail.

MR. ATTLEE said that arrangements for the supply of information and for consultation should be reciprocal. Hitherto the discussion had turned mainly on the outward flow from the United Kingdom. He trusted, however, that arrangements made for the benefit of other Commonwealth Governments or High Commissioners and members of their staffs in London would be equally and fully applied in other Commonwealth capitals for the benefit of the United Kingdom.

MR. BEVIN said that, although all Commonwealth countries were now completely equal in status, that equality did not in practice always operate in the supply of information and consultation in the field of foreign affairs. For instance, he received replies from other Commonwealth Governments when he consulted them specifically on some proposed line of policy, but he did not seem often to receive a spontaneous indication from other Commonwealth Governments of their own views on policy. He would prefer not to have to wait until he had made up his own mind on a subject, and put his conclusions to other Commonwealth Governments, before obtaining some indication of the lines on which the views of those Governments were developing. When deciding an issue of policy in the Foreign Office he always asked what was known of the views of other Commonwealth Governments and, if they were available at all times, it would be a great convenience to him. He could then take account of them at a very early stage. He would, therefore, urge all Commonwealth Governments to take the initiative in letting the United Kingdom Government have their views at an early stage.

The Commonwealth Relations Office was an essential co-ordinating factor in the process of consultation. But its existence did not prevent the Foreign Office from following the practice of treating High Commissioners not less favourably than foreign Ambassadors in the matter of direct access to him and his Department. He and his Junior Ministers were, however, busy men and could not always be available to meet High Commissioners at short notice. He hoped, therefore, that when a Minister was not available High Commissioners would talk to senior Foreign Office officials. He also felt that there was room for much more consultation on the official level, particularly in the formative stages of policy-making. He suggested that High Commissioners should designate officials to meet corresponding Foreign Office officials to make full enquiries on policy, however early might be the stage in its evolution.

Mr. Bevin said that it was not possible to reduce the principle of Commonwealth consultation to a formula. It was largely a question of establishing good personal relations. The important thing to keep clearly in view was the ultimate objective. His own feeling was that to keep concord and harmony within the Commonwealth on a basis of comradeship would be an achievement which would make the Commonwealth a strong force for world peace. This objective could be achieved without any new form of organisation by the free exchange of information and opinions, and by constant personal contact. When a new facet of policy was in process of evolution, it was often unsatisfactory to have to explain it by telegram. Oral discussion was the best course and he was, therefore, in favour of closer personal contact at all levels.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that he was in full agreement with Mr. Bevin's remarks. In the economic field, it was only recently that, both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, unregulated private enterprise had given place to Government action and control. Because of this, there was now greater need than ever for close exchange of information and plans with the other Commonwealth countries. The United Kingdom was in a special position owing to the different facets of her economic problems—her link with the dollar area, her close ties with the Commonwealth as a whole, and her relations with Western Europe. Each of these factors had to be taken into account, and it was, therefore, of the highest importance that the United Kingdom Government should be adequately informed of the economic circumstances and plans of the Commonwealth countries. It was equally important that Commonwealth Governments should be fully informed of the position in the United Kingdom. If Governments devised their economic policies in ignorance of the position in other Commonwealth countries, there was a serious risk that confusion would result. He therefore hoped that there would be general support for the proposal, put forward by Mr. Attlee, for the establishment of a Committee for the continual and mutual exchange of economic information. Such a Committee should have no power to decide policy. But the exchange of information would throw up questions which could then be handled by the Governments concerned, and it would provide a basis for all the countries of the Commonwealth to make their own economic plans with a full knowledge of those of the other countries. Commonwealth Governments would, in fact, have foreknowledge of each other's intentions instead of having to wait until difficulties emerged. Consultation was always easier at the stage where plans were only in a formative state: once they had been worked out, it was a thankless task to induce their makers to alter them. He was also in agreement with Mr. Attlee's suggestion that there should, from time to time, be meetings of the Economic Ministers of the Commonwealth, either as a whole or in groups. The mere fact of the volume of trade between Commonwealth countries meant that each must be intimately affected by the plans of the others. He suggested that skeleton machinery for consultation on the various lines suggested should be set up forthwith.

DR EVATT supported this proposal. A Committee on the lines suggested by Mr Attlee would, in his view, be very valuable.

MR. ST. LAURENT said that some of the existing ad hoc Committees were doing very useful work; Canada would be reluctant to see the benefits from these Committees lost by merging them with larger Committees, which could not deal so conveniently with concrete problems. One Committee which should certainly not be abolished was that which had recently been set up as the result of Sir Stafford Cripps's recent visit to Canada to deal with United Kingdom–Canada trade problems.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS explained that there was no intention of suggesting that this Committee should be abolished. It would certainly be necessary to continue appointing ad hoc bilateral Committees in appropriate cases. But the proposed Committee would absorb the Sterling Area Statistical Committee and the Commonwealth Liaison Committee for the European Recovery Programme, and would, in addition, do much necessary liaison work for which at the moment there was no provision.

MR. FRASER agreed that ad hoc bilateral arrangements were inevitable; but they did not give the wide sweep required. He thought that the peoples of the Commonwealth countries would expect something positive to emerge from the present conference, and that the Meeting should be in a position to announce that it had agreed (subject to the approval of the Governments concerned) to some definite step, such as the setting up of a Committee on the lines proposed by Mr. Attlee.

MR. LOUW said that he saw objection to the proposal for a permanent Committee on economic matters. Sir Stafford Cripps, if he understood him rightly, had envisaged not only economic information but also economic plans as coming within the purview of the Committee. Intentionally or unintentionally, the pooling of plans by the Committee might result in some sort of economic pressure being applied by one Commonwealth country on another. South Africa traded mainly with Great Britain and the Rhodesias, to some extent with Australia and New Zealand and not at all with India. Nearly all her trade problems were bilateral problems, and none of her economic problems were of general concern, as was the case with the problems of foreign policy and defence. South Africa would not like the idea of a permanent organisation which might have the effect, even unintentionally, of influencing policy.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that it was not the intention that the Committee should be concerned with economic planning. But it was essential that any one Commonwealth country should, in making its own plans, have information about the needs and intentions of others. The proposed Committee would ensure that all countries of the Commonwealth would have timely information about each other's intentions, so that any questions of difference could be taken up before any harm was done. At the moment it was necessary to deal bilaterally with many subjects which ought properly to be handled in a more general context. For instance, he himself had been separately approached by a number of Commonwealth Ministers on the subject of the supply of capital goods.

MR. FRASER expressed agreement with Sir Stafford Cripps. If the other countries had known beforehand of some of the United Kingdom's bilateral trade pacts, they could have laid their own plans accordingly.

MR. ATTLEE said that it appeared to be the general wish of the Meeting that a Committee of officials should be set up, as suggested by Dr. Evatt, to work out his proposals in detail in the light of the discussion.

It was agreed that the discussion should be resumed on the basis of the Committee's conclusions.

2. Ceylon's Application for Membership of the United Nations Organisation

MR. ATTLEE said that two papers (P.M.M. (48) 11 and P.M.M. (48) 12) relating to Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations had been circulated at the request of the Prime Minister of Ceylon. The first proposed that the present meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers should issue a declaration, which could be made public, affirming that Ceylon enjoyed the same status as the other self-governing countries of the Commonwealth. The second asked for the support of Commonwealth Governments for a resolution, which was shortly to be moved by the Argentine Delegation in the United Nations General Assembly, proposing that countries receiving seven supporting votes on the Security Council should be admitted to membership of the Organisation.

MR. SENANAYAKE said that the people of Ceylon had been deeply disturbed by the action of the Soviet Government in vetoing, in the Security Council, Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations. Very great importance was attached to this question, and he thought that a declaration on the lines suggested in P.M.M. (48) 11 might serve to demonstrate Ceylon's fitness for admission. The Argentine resolution appeared to afford a practical method by which Ceylon might secure membership, and he thought that public opinion in his country would seriously misunderstand any failure by the other Commonwealth Governments to support it. He was anxious to avoid a situation arising in which the people of Ceylon ascribed their country's failure to secure admission to the United Nations to her continued membership of the Commonwealth.

There was general support for the proposal that a statement should be issued on the lines proposed in P.M.M. (48) 11. After discussion, it was agreed that this should be in the following terms—

> "The Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth of Nations have taken note of the constitutional documents published by the Ceylon Government in Ceylon Sessional Paper XXII of 1947 under the title 'The Independence of Ceylon' and in Ceylon Sessional Paper III of 1948 under the title 'The Constitution of Ceylon.' They affirm that Ceylon enjoys the same sovereign independent status as those self-governing countries of the British Commonwealth which are members of the United Nations."

MR. ATTLEE said that the most convenient arrangement would be to include this statement in the final communiqué to be issued at the end of the series of meetings.

Discussion then turned to the proposal in P.M.M. (48) 12 that Commonwealth Governments should support the Argentine resolution in the General Assembly proposing a revision of the procedure for admission to membership of the United Nations.

MR. BEVIN said that he had great sympathy with Ceylon in her disappointment at the failure of her application. All members of the Commonwealth were anxious for her success. He was confident that her application would eventually succeed. He did not think, however, that the Argentine resolution would provide a solution of the difficulty. He was advised that it was clearly inconsistent with the terms of the Charter; and, even if it were passed, it could not be effective, and Ceylon would thus have gained no advantage. It was, moreover, most undesirable, in his view, to invite a major conflict on the veto issue on an individual claim for membership. No advantage could accrue to Ceylon from attempting to find a solution of her problems by opening up these far-reaching issues in relation to her application for membership.

DR. EVATT endorsed Mr. Bevin's views. The Argentine resolution was inconsistent with the Charter, and could not therefore be effective. A solution must sooner or later be found for the problem created by the Soviet use of the veto. In the meantime, Ceylon could be assured that her application had the full support of the other members of the Commonwealth; and he thought that the better course was to invite the General Assembly to pass a resolution asking the Security Council to reconsider their decision. It was unlikely that the Argentine resolution would be rejected as it stood : it was more probable that an amendment would be moved which other Commonwealth Governments could support. This would avoid the political consequences in Ceylon about which Mr. Senanayake had expressed anxiety.

MR. NEHRU said that he was in agreement with Mr. Bevin and Dr. Evatt. Any proposal to amend the Charter would raise very grave issues indeed; there would be no advantage to Ceylon in raising these on her application.

MR. NOEL-BAKER suggested that Commonwealth Delegations in the United Nations should be asked to make it clear that opposition to the Argentine proposal did not imply any lack of sympathy with Ceylon's application. He hoped that they would also make every effort to secure the widest support for any resolution that might be put forward in the General Assembly in favour of Ceylon's application.

MR. BEVIN said that he would give appropriate instructions to the United Kingdom Delegation.

MR. SENANAYAKE said that he did not wish to press his proposal further in view of the opinions expressed in the discussion.

(Previous reference: P.M.M. (48) 4th Meeting.)

At the invitation of Mr. Attlee, MR. BEVIN gave a review of the political situation in the western world.

MR. BEVIN said that, since the end of the war, the situation in Europe had grown steadily more difficult. It had been agreed by the Allied Powers that there should be free democratic elections in all the liberated countries, but it soon became clear that the Soviet Government had no intention of adhering to this agreement. In Poland, for instance, the Communists quickly secured control of the key post of the Ministry of the Interior. This gave them control of the police; all the apparatus of a police State was promptly put into action and other parties were forced to merge or were drastically purged. In Hungary, free elections were held, and were won by the Small-holders' Party. Soon, however, the familiar methods were employed: there was a purge, and the Communists seized control. In Roumania, the elected Government was destroyed by the Communists as early as 1945. The situation was discussed in Moscow in that year, when the United States representative took the view that, if the Opposition could be represented in the Governments of these liberated countries, democratic freedom would have been reasonably safeguarded. Great efforts were made by both the United States and the United Kingdom to secure at least this element of protection for minority opinion in Roumania, Bulgaria, Albania and elsewhere, but they were quite ineffective. By these means, the Soviet Union had secured effective control over the whole of Eastern Europe. None of these countries could move in foreign affairs or in economic matters without the approval of the Soviet Government. The Western Allies had found themselves powerless to help these countries. Protests, enquiries and Four-Power meetings had proved equally useless, and they had been treated as if these matters were in no sense their legitimate concern.

In Germany, the issue had emerged in its most acute form. Germany lay very near to the United Kingdom, and the security and future of Western Europe would be intimately affected by what happened there. It had long been clear that the Soviet Government intended to create a situation in Germany which would enable it to produce the same results there as it had achieved in the Eastern European countries. The Western Allies on their side had sought to build up a united democratic Germany based on a federal system, with considerable powers left to the individual Länder. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, had aimed at the establishment of a highly centralised State. The Soviet authorities had trained and indoctrinated a large police force in the Eastern Zone and, behind this, stood the army of German prisoners which was being organised by Field-Marshal von Paulus and others. If the troops were withdrawn from the Western Zones, all Germany east of the Rhine would fall a victim to communism. West of Germany stood France, which was very weak and about one-quarter Communist. In Italy, also, there were eight million Communists. They had lost the recent elections, but there could be no certainty that the position there would remain stable. Western Germany must, therefore, be regarded in present circumstances as the main bulwark against further Communist aggression.

It had, therefore, been the object of the Western Allies both to reorganise Germany on a basis of genuine democracy and to recreate her economic life; in their view, the occupation should be maintained until the new Germany was firmly established. Expediency alone demanded that the Germans should be assisted to attain a reasonable standard of life. The object of the Soviet Government, on the other hand, was clearly to keep Germany in a state of chaos. With this object, they had stripped Eastern Germany of her capital assets, and even so had claimed that reparations should be paid out of current production. It was clear that Germany could not, out of her own diminished resources, pay reparations on this basis, and that, therefore, if this claim were conceded, payment would, in fact, be made by the United Kingdom and the United States. The United Kingdom Government were at one time spending as much as £160 million in one year on the British Zone alone. This burden could obviously not be maintained indefinitely, and Mr. Bevin had had to make it clear to the other Occupying Powers that it would be necessary for the United Kingdom Government to take the necessary economic and financial steps in the British Zone to relieve the British taxpayer of this charge, even though this might involve a fundamental change of economic and financial policy. Subsequently arrangements were made for the merging of the British and American Zones. As a result, when the four Powers returned to consideration of the German peace settlement, the Bi-zone was already in existence. Further attempts were then made to obtain a Four-Power agreement on various issues, such as currency reform. For eighteen months, the experts had tried unsuccessfully to reach agreement with the Soviet authorities. At last, the Administration had introduced a drastic currency reform in the Anglo-American Zone. This measure had inevitably done some injustice to individuals, which it was hoped later to remedy, but it had put the currency of the Bi-zone on a sound basis, and the standard of living and production were both improving.

At the same time it was decided to introduce a new Constitution in the Anglo-American Zone. These decisions brought matters to a head, and on 18th June the Soviet authorities had cut all land and water communications between the Western Zones and Berlin. At the outset, it had not been expected that the air lift could be more than a temporary expedient; it had, however, succeeded far beyond expectations, and it seemed likely that it could be maintained almost indefinitely. The Western Powers had agreed to accept Soviet currency for all the sectors of Berlin, provided that its use was placed under quadripartite control. Discussions took place between the four Military Governors in Berlin, but eventually the Soviet Government refused to make any concession on the fundamental point of quadripartite control, and the negotiations broke down. From the point of view of the international situation generally, the Berlin crisis had done some good. It had proved the capacity and resolution of the Western Powers. At the start of the air lift there had been some anxiety lest the Soviet authorities should provoke incidents by the use of fighter aircraft, barrages, &c. They had not in fact done so; and Mr. Bevin thought they would be disinclined to provoke any incident likely to lead to war as long as the Western Powers maintained a firm and united attitude. The further success of Communist penetration would, in his view, depend on Western Europe's capacity to resist the Soviet technique of piece-meal absorption of individual States. Indeed, his impression was that the Soviet Government had reached the conclusion that its policy had been excessively aggressive, and was anxious to withdraw from the extreme position which it had taken.

It had been agreed in Moscow in 1943 that, at the end of the war, Austria should be re-established as an independent State within her 1938 boundaries. But efforts to conclude a Peace Treaty had so far proved unsuccessful. The main cause of the trouble was Yugoslavia's claims in Carinthia: but in a plebiscite after the First World War this province had decided to join Austria, and there were no grounds to justify its transfer to Yugoslavia now. Such action would, moreover, place Austria in a poor strategic position. Difficulty had also arisen over another question. It had been agreed that no reparations, apart from German assets, should be exacted from Austria. The Soviet Government had interpreted the term "German assets" in the broadest sense to cover all assets in German possession. In the view of the other Powers concerned, there could be no justification for removing assets which had been seized under duress, after the German occupation of Austria in 1938, except where reasonable compensation had been paid. It had not, however, been possible to secure agreement on this issue.

Every effort had been made to reach a settlement in Trieste. The population of the City was overwhelmingly Italian and there was no case for transferring it to Yugoslav sovereignty. Nevertheless, the Yugoslav Government had made determined attempts to secure control of the City. It had proved impossible to obtain agreement on the appointment of a Governor, and the present position was that Trieste remained in the occupation of United States and United Kingdom troops as a bastion on the edge of the Iron Curtain. To end the deadlock the United States, the United Kingdom and France had proposed that the Territory should be ceded to Italy. It was, perhaps, significant than this proposal had not in fact been rejected.

The problem of Greece was strategic rather than political. The real issue was whether the Soviet Union could secure control of the Dardenelles, and whether Greece and Turkey should become Soviet satellites. Mr. Bevin had himself asked M. Stalin in Moscow what were his desiderata as regards the Dardanelles, and the latter had replied that he wanted a base there. Mr. Bevin had indicated that it was unlikely that the United Kingdom Government could accept such a proposal, but he had suggested that the Montreux Powers should be convened to discuss the matter, the place of Japan being taken by the United States. He had received no response to this suggestion. When he asked M. Stalin how he proposed to prevent the question of the Dardanelles developing into a continuing source of friction with the Western Powers, the latter had replied that, if he could not settle the matter by agreement with the Western Powers, he would settle it direct with Turkey. There seemed little doubt that the civil war in Greece, which had followed, represented a move towards the Soviet objective. It was in line with the usual Communist tactics of infiltration leading up to military occupation, with the aim of presenting the Western Powers with a fait accompli.

In the light of these developments, the United Kingdom Government had felt it necessary to take effective measures to call a halt to Soviet aggression. Agreement with France had been delayed because of General de Gaulle's insistence on the detachment of the Ruhr from Germany. Mr. Bevin had been unwilling to create so dangerous an irredentist problem in Europe or to accept so grave a weakening of Germany's economy. His view had been that the right course was to leave the German Government to socialise the Ruhr industries, and that this would be the most effective safeguard against their use for aggressive purposes. Subsequent French Governments had been more amenable, and the first stage in the policy of Western Union had been the conclusion of the Treaty of Dunkirk. The basic assumption of the policy of Western Union was that, if only for reasons of cost, the United Kingdom was not in a position to build up effective defences by her own efforts alone. On the other hand, the United Kingdom Government did not wish to be wholly dependent on the United States Government. The policy of Western Union was, therefore, based on the principle inherent in the Marshall Plan, that is that aid should depend upon the degree of self-help. The scope of this policy was more limited than the European Recovery Programme; the signatories of the Brussels Treaty were the United Kingdom's immediate neighbours. The most notable feature of this Treaty was its functional nature; its purpose was to secure collective action in economic and cultural matters as well as in defence. Commonwealth Ministers would be aware that there had been considerable political discussion in the United Kingdom on the question of the form which the principle of Western Union should take. Mr. Bevin was not himself in favour of an immediate attempt to establish a United States of Europe, since he did not regard this as a practical possibility within the foreseeable future. It was alien to the British inclination to create grandiose paper constitutions; in his view the right course was to create Western Union step by step on the basis of solid practical achievements. The chief pressure for more spectacular measures came from France and Italy, but there were in fact wide divergences of view within these countries on the whole question. Mr. Bevin therefore preferred to build slowly on the lines already established in the Treaty of Brussels, but he thought that the time would shortly come when it would be advisable to hold general meetings attended both by the Foreign Ministers of the signatory Powers and of the members of the functional committees. Experience had proved the difficulty of isolating special problems, and this appeared to offer a better means of obtaining effective collective decisions.

In giving effect to the policy of Western Union, the United Kingdom Government was fully mindful of the United Kingdom's special position as a member of the Commonwealth; and, indeed, all the signatory Powers were fully alive to the dependence of Western Europe on trade with, and the resources of, other parts of the world. In return, Western Europe would be able, when her economy had been restored, to provide the world with great supplies of capital goods. In his view, the recreation of Western Europe was the greatest contribution that could be made to the peace of the world, and this was the basic aim of the policy of Western Union. The question had arisen how far the existing group might be extended. It was not at this stage possible to say whether the Scandinavian countries would be prepared to enter into a similar association; at the present time the Scandinavian Governments were thinking in terms of a purely Scandinavian organisation. It could not be expected that Italy would reach any early decision about an association with the Western Union Powers; in any event, under present circumstances she would be likely to be more a liability than an asset. The United Kingdom Government was under considerable pressure from other foreign countries in regard to their attitude towards Spain. This question raised wide issues, but there appeared to be no grounds at present for departing from the policy accepted by the United Nations in 1946, to which the United Kingdom Government had loyally adhered.

Mr. Bevin, in conclusion, said that the policy of the United Kingdom Government was to promote the security and stability of Western Europe on the basis of the European Recovery Programme and the policy of Western Union, and thus to create a material force which could call a halt to further Communist infiltration and to the menace of totalitarian aggression. The United States Government was necessarily closely interested in this policy. Defence could no longer be considered in terms of the land only or of narrow geographical areas. For these reasons, there had been exchanges of views with both the United States and Canadian Governments with the object of devising a wider policy of Atlantic defence. The United States Government could not be expected, before the Presidential election, to go further than the Vandenberg Resolution. The United Kingdom Government had been much encouraged by the speech which Mr. St. Laurent had made, on the occasion of the signature of the Treaty of Brussels, in which he had welcomed the idea of regional defence under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter; and discussions on that basis were proceeding. Mr. Bevin had told the House of Commons that, if it proved impossible to achieve an adequate system of collective security through the United Nations, the United Kingdom Government could not permit the creation of more limited arrangements for security to be held up at the will of one Power. In the view of the United Kingdom Government, it should be possible to establish in Western Europe a co-ordinated policy covering foreign affairs, defence and security, developed in accordance with the conceptions inherent in Article 51 of the United Nations Charter and based on mutual confidence in the knowledge that armed conflict between members of the group was unthinkable. He was concerned to ensure that, if aggression came from without, the United Kingdom should not be left again to stand alone, with the help of the Commonwealth peoples, against attack. Co-operation over a wide field would be the best contribution to lasting peace. If a strong force could be successfully built up in this way, Communist expansion would be checked and there was hope of a lasting settlement.

Mr. St. LAURENT said that Mr. Bevin's statement had confirmed Canadian opinion on these difficult problems. Canada had recognised the expansionist tendencies of the Soviet Government, and the weakness of the continental Powers of Western Europe in resisting such aggression. The Slav peoples were realists, and it was improbable that they would contemplate policies which did not promise success. But the prospect, if they gained control of the resources of Western Europe, would be formidable indeed. In order to build up an organisation able to demonstrate that, though unaggressive, it held the preponderance of force, it might be necessary to contribute only a small fraction of what would inevitably have to be sacrificed if war came. If possible aggressors realised that they would have to meet the productive power of the Western Hemisphere, they would take account of it in reaching their decisions. Canada felt that the task now was to convince France and the other continental Powers of Western Europe that it would be worth while resisting aggression from the beginning. As soon as the Brussels Treaty was announced, President Truman and Mr. Mackenzie King had made public statements welcoming it as the germ of a wider scheme of regional security to provide some of the advantages which had been hoped for from a fully effective United Nations. There had been other favourable pronouncements in the United States and Canada, and it seemed that public support was assured.

DR. EVATT said that, in the vast field covered by Mr. Bevin, it at once became clear that individual consideration of problems might lead to conclusions which, though just, had to be abandoned because of the overriding claims of expediency. In Greece, for example, constant interference from the North was considered intolerable by Australia. Yet the Greek Government's methods were exceedingly distasteful to anyone of sound democratic ideas. A just solution, while requiring firm support against external interference, would concentrate on improving internal conditions. The policy which had to be pursued was an example of the straits to which honest men, with the ideals of the United Nations at heart, could be driven by a series of Soviet-inspired emergencies. Australia, as a member of the United Nations Balkans Commission, had tried to keep in mind the real purposes of that body and its authority as an organ of the United Nations; and within limits the Commission had not been without effect. Its very presence served to deter aggression; and Australia was anxious that it should continue in being. Turkey's stand against the Soviet Union in difficult circumstances had earned commendation. It had, therefore, been disappointing that, at the United Nations, the Western Powers had supported Egypt in preference to Turkey as a candidate for membership of the Security Council. Within a day or two Egypt had shown her unfitness for this post by reopening hostilities against the Jewish State. But in the case of Egypt, also, too abstract a view could not be taken. The whole Middle East was of great strategic importance, and claims of expediency had to be balanced against those of justice. As for Spain, Australia, which had supported the 1946 Resolution, now thought it absurd to keep Spain outside the functional organs of the United Nations, such as those concerned with health, aviation, &c. Her exclusion hurt the other nations more than Spain. The present régime made Spain no more unfit for membership of such functional organs than their past records rendered Italy, Germany or Japan. Possibly they should be admitted before Spain, but in any case justice must give way to expediency. At the same time, the present Spanish régime, detested because of its past association with the dictators, was not such as to rouse much enthusiasm in the countries now struggling against communism.

At the heart of each of these problems was the relationship with Russia. Austria had become an incident of that relationship. Even the Soviet Government could not deny that, if the Austrian problem stood in isolation, a just peace treaty could soon be concluded. The same was true of Japan. The heads of a Treaty—shocking as some of them were—had all been agreed and, as the Canberra Conference had shown, a peace treaty could rapidly be made. This was not possible because relations between the Soviet Union and the United States were strained. So long as they continued strained, and so long as there was any possibility of war, the United States Government would be reluctant to conclude the treaty. Soviet expansion could not be permitted to continue. Events in Czechoslovakia showed how France might be overwhelmed without any overt violence. The Soviet Government must learn that aggression of this nature must end. There were three main stages by which the present position had been reached. First, the right of veto in the Security Council which the Soviet Government had succeeded in securing at the San Francisco Conference. Secondly, the Paris Conference, at which the principle of Four-Power unanimity had been pressed to excessive lengths. Thirdly, the arrangements made for the peace settlement. The Australian Government had always thought it a mistake that a broader basis of consultation had not been provided for, with an opportunity to the Commonwealth countries to take part in the discussions. But the mistake had been made, and the United States Government had shared the responsibility with the Soviet Union for the arrangements ultimately adopted. In his view, the Conference of Foreign Ministers was no longer an effective body. Its action in referring the Berlin question to the Security Council was evidence of this. Even questions arising in connection with the peace settlements were being referred to the United Nations. It now seemed very likely that the peace settlement with Germany would prove to be beyond the resources of the Council of Foreign Ministers. President Roosevelt had often said he did not intend to repeat President Wilson's mistake in linking the peace treaties with the new world organisation. The world organsation was now in existence, but the peace treaties were not complete, and the United Nations was blamed because the Great Powers could not agree.

Regional defence systems as contemplated by Article 51 were to be encouraged. The purpose of the United Nations was to maintain peace, and that purpose would be fulfilled by such arrangements. The Soviet Union had achieved very great advantages by the post-war settlement. It had secured the veto in the Security Council. It had secured enormous territorial gains. For long its expansionist activities had gone unchecked. But Mr. Marshall's appointment as Secretary of State had produced a new and firmer United States attitude, and a halt had been finally called at Berlin. If the Western Allies had not stood firm in Berlin, the consequences would have been disastrous. The maintenance of the air lift into Berlin had been a magnificent feat. Australian airmen were participating in it, and this in itself indicated what would be Australia's attitude if the crisis should further deteriorate. His impression was, however, that the Soviet Government was anxious to retreat, if a way could be found which would not involve loss of prestige. For this reason, he did not believe that the Soviet authorities would agree to lift the blockade on traffic into Berlin in advance of the resumption of talks. In some respects the present position of Soviet Russia was comparable to that of Germany before 1939; she was afraid, and fear bred suspicion. Under such conditions, the right course was to be firm and frank; and for this reason he thought that Mr. Bevin's recent speech in the United Nations General Assembly had been a remarkable achievement. It had made a great impression on the Soviet Government. There were, therefore, grounds for hoping for some change in Soviet policy; but this would not come unless they had confidence that any arrangements entered into with the Western Powers would be adhered to. He had much sympathy with the anxiety of French opinion about the dangers of a renewal of German aggression; but it was idle to suppose that any permanent settlement could be based on the partition of Germany. Any attempt by the Allied Powers to divide Germany permanently would provide the most effective material for a revival of German nationalism. In his view, the establishment of a central power between Soviet Russia and the United States was an issue of cardinal importance, provided that it was based on the principles of the United Nations; and he was grateful to Mr. Bevin for all his efforts to secure this objective.

MR. FRASER said that he was most grateful for the full statement which had been made by Mr. Bevin. He had been much relieved to learn that the air lift into Berlin could be maintained for as long as could be foreseen. The stand taken by the United Kingdom Government on the Berlin question had his full support; indeed, retreat would have involved the surrender of the very fortress of democracy. The New Zealand Government strongly supported the policy of Western Union; and the consequences in the defence field which flowed from this would be discussed on the following day. In retrospect, it could be seen that the Soviet Government had won a victory of major importance when the principle of unanimity among the Great Powers was accepted at Yalta. Once this had been agreed, resistance on such issues as that of the right of veto in the Security Council was no longer possible. But what now mattered was the future; how was the United Nations to be freed from this right of veto which effectively stultified its purpose? He had heard with great relief Mr. Bevin's view that there might now be some hope of a change in Soviet policy. Indeed, no historical parallel could be found for the situation which had developed since the war. Nor could any example be found of a country which attempted by all means within its power to impose its ideology on every other country, whether or not within its orbit of control or influence. Mention had been made of the situation in Greece and Spain. As regards the former, he could not help feeling that, if the situation had been handled more wisely, it might have been possible to establish in Greece a political régime less offensive to democratic opinion. As regards the latter, all Governments were in a dilemma. Nevertheless, in his view, the situation created by the United Nations Resolution of 1946 was highly illogical. Whatever personal feelings might be held about the Spanish régime, how could it be argued that it was appropriate for the United Nations to intervene in the internal affairs of Spain without taking similar action in regard to the totalitarian régimes in Poland, Czechoslovakia and elsewhere? The policy of Western Union brought comfort to the people of New Zealand at a time when they were appalled by the prospect of impending war; nobody in the world wanted war, but it would be inevitable if Soviet aggression continued. For this reason, agreement must be sought by every means possible, but the Western democracies must negotiate from strength and not from weakness. The New Zealand Government would support any means of establishing peace. They saw no present prospect of achieving this through existing international machinery and, in these circumstances, they had reluctantly to turn to consider questions of defence.

The discussion was then adjourned until the afternoon meeting.

MR. LOUW said that the people of South Africa had been greatly impressed by the frank and courageous attitude adopted by Mr. Bevin during the last three years. Although her primary concern was with the African continent, South Africa was watching very closely the dangerous situation in Europe. The fact must be faced that, despite the Charter and the aspirations of the founders of the United Nations, the world was now split into two blocs, and that Russia and her satellites were using the United Nations as nothing more than a propaganda platform. South Africa was, therefore, losing faith in the United Nations and was beginning to wonder whether it might even be better to set up an entirely new organisation without Russia and her satellites. Meanwhile, Russia was building up her fifth columns and the world was faced with an ideology backed by great power and having the force of a mission or religion. South Africa realised that the United Kingdom, with the backing of the United States, must take the lead in the fight in Europe against the Communist menace. South Africa was closely concerned and would follow the United Kingdom's lead, though not necessarily blindly. But, if South Africa was thus to give support, it was of great importance that she should have timely information of what was going on. The South African Government, Mr. Louw said, were satisfied with the present system of Commonwealth consultation, and he had noted Mr. Bevin's complaint that a little more initiative might be shown by Commonwealth Governments in making their views known to the United Kingdom Government.

South Africa would give her full moral support to Western Union and such material support as was consistent with her own interests and problems. She would favour gaining the support of all European nations outside the Russian orbit, and could see no valid reason for excluding Spain. It was, he suggested, for the Spaniards themselves to decide what form of Government they should have, so long as it was not a menace to the peace of other nations.

South Africa was interested in the military steps taken or proposed in connection with Western Union, but it was on the economic side that South Africa could offer the most valuable contribution. There were vast supplies of raw materials in Africa, and if South Africa, in co-operation with the United Kingdom and other Powers with African dependencies, could assist in developing the natural resources of the southern half of the continent, she would be providing a very powerful weapon in the fight against communism.

The South African Government were not at this stage prepared to undertake any form of military commitment: that would be a matter for further discussion. South Africa's geographical position was such that her main rôle would be to assist, in co-operation with the Rhodesias and the British African territories, in regional arrangements for the security of Southern Africa, the southern part of the Indian Ocean, and the trade routes and communications leading to the East and Australasia.

To sum up, South Africa's first concern was with Africa itself, but outside Africa she attached particular importance to the countries of the Middle East, which should be assisted in every way to resist the advance of communism. The Union of South Africa was ready to help in this fight against communism in Africa; but, if she was to co-operate fully, she must take her place as an equal partner in any discussions dealing with the affairs of the African continent, whether they were discussions between Commonwealth countries only, or whether foreign countries also were involved. As an earnest of the South African Government's desire to co-operate, Mr. Louw quoted the assistance offered towards the Berlin air-lift. The use of South African aircraft had been offered; and, although these had not been required, the United Kingdom request for pilots had immediately been met. General Poole, who had commanded the South African Forces in North Africa and Italy, had come over specially from Berlin to act as his military adviser during the present meeting. He himself hoped to visit Berlin before returning to South Africa. He suggested that it was important not to lose sight of the internal situation in Germany. His own party in South Africa had never agreed with the policy of dismantling German industries, and he thought that this policy had now been proved mistaken. It was essential to improve economic conditions in Germany, to make a peace with Germany as soon as possible and to provide that, subject to the necessary safeguards, the Germans should once more have control over their own political and economic life.

PANDIT NEHRU said that he felt some difficulty in discussing these problems of the west; they must, of course, affect India, but India was geographically very far away, and he would leave the more immediate problems to those who were more competent to deal with them. In a wider context, however, he agreed that aggression must be stopped and that for this purpose firmness was required. Apart from Russia's active expansionism, what grieved many people in India was her apparent lack of any sense of ethics in international affairs and her disregard of her plighted word. There was, no doubt, a widespread desire for a long period of peace, but it seemed to him that there was a general failure to keep that object in full and steady view and a tendency to be concerned with more immediate and minor objectives and with preparations against a hypothetical war. He called for a wider perspective. More than once in the past we had gone on as we were doing now, apparently towards peace, but in reality towards war. It was not enough to say that we were being frustrated by outside forces; we must see that we did not allow such forces to frustrate us in the pursuit of our long-term objective.

There was also a tendency to think too much in terms of the intentions of Governments; but behind the Governments stood the vast masses of the peoples. In the fight against communism, it was the great masses of the peoples who would ultimately count. Therefore, whether the ultimate struggle took the shape of war or a battle of ideologies or both, it would in essence be a fight for the souls of men. We must realise this and penetrate into the minds of the great masses and win them over, otherwise we should lose the fight in the long run in spite of all our material equipment. We should base our actions on definite objectives and on moral principles, which in the long run were the surest foundation for policy. It was no use saying that because our opponents had strayed from the narrow path, we should do the same; that was a fatal course, which would bring us to ruin. Mr. Bevin had borne out Pandit Nehru's own view that there was no near prospect of war for some time. We were, therefore, in a position now to aim at a long-term objective and, if we were able to ensure peace for the next few years, he thought that it would last very much longer.

From Asia they were watching the expansionist tendencies of Russia. Whether the expansion was Communist or Slavist or merely Russian, they did not like such expansionism and would oppose it. On the other side, however, there were also expansionist tendencies on the part of the United States, largely in the economic field. The United States was a great country with a sense of mission, and it was trying to make other countries follow the way of life which it thought they should follow. This, again, India did not like. At the moment it seemed that Russia and the United States were fighting for the mastery of the world, but he did not think that either would succeed. He believed that democratic freedom would survive and grow despite these contending pressures. He thought that the British Commonwealth could make an important contribution to this end. There was grave danger that each of the main contending Powers, in order to gain strength, would ally itself with wrong elements. The example of Spain had already been mentioned. It would, he thought, be deplorable if the democratic Powers sought the support of a country under such a reactionary totalitarian régime. Such action would assist the Soviet Union in its claim that it stood for enlightenment and progress. The Soviet Union had acquired the allegiance of its satellites, partly to spread Communist doctrine, but much more with the object of ensuring Soviet security in any future war by preparing new bases for use in defence or aggression. Was the United States pursuing a similar policy? She, too, was acquiring bases throughout the world and there were countries which he had heard called satellites of the United States, some of which might almost be said to be under the latter's political control, as others were certainly under her economic domination. How great, for instance, was the freedom of action enjoyed by Turkey? It was important that all countries should keep their hands clean in this matter.

The policy of Western Union was doubtless an inevitable development, but he was concerned about its relationship to the United Nations. Like many others, he was not proud of the past or present achievements of the United Nations, but he thought it was essential to preserve it as a focus for efforts to maintain the peace of the world. The unanimity rule had been abused, but it was difficult to proceed on the basis that all members of the United Nations were of equal importance. Nothing would be gained by breaking up the United Nations and losing the opportunity of resolving international difficulties. Regional arrangements were also desirable, but they must not conflict with the principle of the United Nations. It must be borne in mind that, if regional arrangements were started in Europe, they would spread to other parts of the world, e.g., the Middle East. He himself had hitherto resisted proposals made to him by other Asiatic countries for the formation of an Asian Union, but pressure for this type of arrangement would doubtless grow as the regional idea was developed in Europe. Mr. Nehru paid tribute to the courageous action of the United Kingdom in relation to India and generally to its abandonment of colonialism and imperialism as a policy in that part of Asia. But colonialism still subsisted in other parts of Asia, e.g., in French Indo-China and Indonesia. Governments in these territories were apt to turn to the Indian Government for advice. Only recently he had learned from the Indonesian Government that the Dutch were contemplating further military action.

Mr. Nehru agreed that it was right to resist aggression by a policy of firmness, but he could not approve any policy which was based on an armaments race and led on from the talk of war to war itself. He hoped that now that the danger of immediate war was, as he thought, averted, there would be an easing in the tension. If it was right that we should talk of ourselves as a democracy, it was right also that we should think of and provide for the democracy of others. By enlisting the support of other democracies it would be possible to combat the totalitarian enemy. It would not do to deny subject peoples their rights and their freedom on the ground that they were uncivilised. Duty lay in the direction of providing these peoples with both civilisation and freedom. Great stress should be laid on seeking a peaceful solution to the problems before the world through the agency of the United Nations.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN agreed with Mr. Nehru in deploring the lack of a sense of morality in international relations. He agreed, too, that a determined stand should be made against expansionist policies. He was glad to know that the United Kingdom Government were not in favour of a policy of appeasement. He welcomed the strong stand taken by the United Kingdom Government and the other Western Powers, and he approved the policy of strengthening the countries of Western Europe.

Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan said that he had hoped that there might have emerged, from the discussions on Commonwealth consultation on the previous day, a stronger desire to bring the countries of the Commonwealth more closely together. If the Commonwealth were consolidated politically and economically, it could make a much greater contribution to world peace. He agreed that every effort should be made to strengthen the authority of the United Nations and that one of the best methods of promoting peace and security was to foster the formation of regional associations. He wished, however, again to stress that it was useless for the countries of Western Europe to unite and make themselves strong if the countries of the Middle East were not also similarly linked in a strong association. He hoped that the present meeting would seriously consider what steps should be taken to improve the economic position of these countries in the Middle East. Turkey and Greece, he knew, were already receiving help, but the Arab countries beyond Turkey were not receiving the same assistance. He also asked what concrete steps were being taken to help the Burmese Government in its struggle against communism; this was a matter in which Pakistan was vitally interested because Eastern Pakistan was Burma's neighbour. He asked that the Commonwealth should give a lead, as he believed it was in a position to do, by drawing up a plan for strengthening the countries of the Commonwealth, the Middle East and South-East Asia by methods similar to those which were being applied in Western Europe.

MR. SENANAYAKE thanked Mr. Bevin for the clear statement which he had made. Ceylon was gratified at the determined stand which the United Kingdom were making against aggression; but, though she was confident of the United Kingdom's ability to face the situation, she might perhaps be pardoned for doubting whether the means at present proposed would attain their end. Might not the stand made in Germany result in enforced withdrawal? There had been plans for the democratic development of other countries in Europe; but the Soviet Union had been able to enforce their abandonment. There was need for a protective belt between the Soviet Union and the West; but how strong would it be and would it succeed in resisting Russian encroachment? The Soviet Union, by means short of war, were constantly gaining ground. There was little profit in desiring peace and speaking of peace, only to withdraw in the face of every Russian advance designed to break the peace. The nations wanted peace but were preparing for war; and that involved a grave risk of war, later if not sooner. Could it be believed that peace would be enduring, or was it only a question of postponing the evil day and preparing for that day when it ultimately came? If it was intended to allow the Soviet to secure further gains, all talk of resistance was a waste of time. If the Soviet Government could not be trusted and was clearly working against peace, the sooner that fact was openly recognised the better, and the greater the chance of salvation when war came. It was possible that with the assistance of the United Kingdom the countries of Western Europe might be able to stand against the Soviet Union. It was also possible that the Soviet Government might be deterred from resort to hostilities in Germany itself; but the result might only be to transfer the Soviet Union's activities from Europe elsewhere.

At the end of the war there were five great Powers who, it was expected, would maintain peace between them. Of these, China no longer counted and France was weak. The United States were following one policy, the Soviet Government another, and the United Kingdom alone was trying to maintain peace. The best course seemed to be that all the Commonwealth nations in unity should try to prevent aggression in such fashion that a check in the west did not produce an outbreak in the east. That was surely better than simply hoping that the Soviet Government would recognise the failure of their attempts. The longer the Soviet Union was allowed to follow its own devices, the worse the situation would be. He might be pessimistic, but the position as he saw it to-day was that the nations wished to avoid war, were willing to prevent it, but in fact withdrew when the Soviet Union took a step forward.

MR. BEVIN, in reply to the discussion, said he was grateful for the views which had been expressed. It had been remiss of him, during the morning meeting, to forget to say how much he had appreciated the assistance which other Commonwealth Governments had given to the air-lift to Berlin.

He had no desire to break up the United Nations. The difficulties, particularly over the veto, were great; but he was not sorry that they had arisen early in the work of the organisation. They were now known and must be faced, and he was confident that ultimately the organisation could be made to work. Instead, however, of building up confidence by working outwards from the centre, it was now necessary to work inwards from the circumference. If regional associations could be organised with success, this would form a basis for confidence in the world organisation. It should then be possible to secure amendments to the Charter based on mutual recognition of the respective strengths of the contending parties. At the outset the United Kingdom Government had taken the lead in securing the establishment of the Military Committee and the Commission on Atomic Energy. Those attempts, working from the centre outwards, had failed. The Soviet Union had hitherto regarded the United Nations as a sort of Trojan horse by means of which they could smuggle in their propaganda to the embarrassment of the freedom-loving nations. This move was in process of being defeated at the present meeting in Paris. It was now the turn of the Soviet Government to be publicly arraigned, and doubtless they would soon learn that their misuse of the organisation would not pay. At the early meetings the Soviet Union had been regarded as a new Power which, if handled with patience, would take its proper part in the comity of nations. But appetite had grown with what it fed on. With what had been said about the veto he agreed. The veto could not, however, be abolished: some matters must always be subject to the unanimity rule. In others, it would be foolish to use the veto. He had tried at New York to establish a "code of conduct." Until something like that was secured, trouble would continue. If, however, the veto were applied in a case where the great Powers were directly involved—hitherto it had been employed only in matters concerning the smaller Powers—that in itself would justify a great Power's referring a matter to the Security Council, whatever the outcome might be. Outside the political sphere good work was going on under the United Nations as it had under the League of Nations. All that was being done for education, health, treatment of children, establishment of human rights, was helping to form common opinion and produce uniform action.

Pandit Nehru had said there was now no immediate danger of war. This was probably true: but, if so, it was because Russia's aggression had been checked by a consolidation of power. Until the stand taken over Berlin, the Russians had assumed that the western Powers would take no effective action. The air-lift to Berlin, far cheaper than war, was an effective demonstration that the Russians would meet determined opposition if they went beyond a certain point. If, however, the western Powers weakened, the same tactics would be repeated elsewhere, and no country would be safe from attack. Only in association could the various countries threatened ensure their safety against Soviet aggression. The method was well known from events in Czechoslovakia. In each factory and on the railways a small proportion of the workers were armed and put under orders. At a given signal this striking force was assembled. The ordinary people, indifferent until too late, were powerless: the revolution was accomplished before they were aware that it had begun. This underground danger was a very real one, of which the United Kingdom had long and bitter experience.

As for the relationship between Western Union and the United Nations, there was no intention of allowing the former to encroach upon the latter. As with the Commonwealth itself, membership of both groups was not incompatible. The members of the Western Union would not even form a bloc within the United Nations. As with the Commonwealth, common problems led to an exchange of views within the framework of the United Nations and association brought reconciliation. "Western Union" was, indeed, a misnomer: it was rather an association of nations on the lines of the Commonwealth.

Reference had been made to United States policy. The fear of the United Kingdom Government had been, not of United States' expansionism, but of a reversion to an isolationist policy which would involve her withdrawal from Europe. Until now the United States had been unwilling to take her full share in international affairs: United Kingdom policy was to ensure that she continued to take that share. With her tremendous power and her democratic tradition, the United States was a great asset to the peace-loving nations of the world. Her constitutional checks meant that no President could lead her into war without the full consent of Congress and people. The need for Congressional consent to treaties ensured open diplomacy and enabled other nations to understand her intentions. A great evolutionary process was going on in the recognition by the American people of their responsibilities as a world Power. Association with the United States could be of marked benefit to like-minded nations: this was a Power with whom it was possible to co-operate and with whom differences could be discussed. It could make a great contribution to the world.

That was why the United Kingdom had exchanged views with the United States over Western Union. Once the Presidential election was over, there would be further exchanges to settle the relationship of an Atlantic Pact with the Brussels Treaty. The rebuilding of the economic and defensive power of Western Europe was as much a vital interest of the United States as it was of the United Kingdom. The object was so to rebuild Western Europe that it would be self-reliant by 1952. No candidate running in that year could hope for election as President if he had to say that Western Europe, having failed to evolve sufficiently meantime, required further assistance from the United States.

With regard to a regional arrangement in the East, he had already invited suggestions. He had himself no precise plan, but he was convinced that consultation and association in South-East Asia were vitally necessary. Pandit Nehru had rightly suggested the wisdom of considering how to associate Burma with such consultation. It was now difficult to see how Burma could be saved from communism. From their meagre resources in arms and equipment the United Kingdom had given Burma all she asked for. What more could they do to defend the constitution and Government of Burma? Direct military intervention was no longer possible or wise. Subject to that, whatever help the United Kingdom could give would be given.

The Middle East was a source of anxiety. Mention has been made of Turkey. For two years after the end of the war Turkey had been under constant pressure and had had to keep 700,000 men constantly mobilised. The United Kingdom gave all the assistance within its power, but the financial strain proved too great. There was no question of imposing assistance on Turkey; that country was a suppliant for aid and was still constantly appealing to the United Kingdom for help in securing greater contributions from the United States.

With reference to the points made by Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan, the States in the Middle East had attained their independence after the first world war and were still too weak to stand alone. Their economies were not broadly enough based, and in particular those of Iraq and Persia depended too much on a single commodity, oil. But, as he had said, the United Kingdom were doing all they could to remedy that state of affairs. The Middle East should not be too narrowly defined: common problems existed right down to the Indian Ocean. Great as was the interest of the Western nations in supporting the Middle East, that support would be greatly enhanced if the nations east of Suez contributed their part. The Eastern nations of the Commonwealth might well consider this suggestion. Religious and psychological factors counted for much. The Middle East had great potentialities but needed help, and help from both sides.

The United Kingdom had gone into Greece with open eyes. Their desire had been to re-establish a free democracy there. All the steps to that end had been agreed on at the Lebanon Conference, the recommendations of which had been accepted by the Coalition Government, with the concurrence of Mr. Attlee, Mr. Morrison and himself; but at that time civil war was not expected. The proposal for a vote on the monarchy question had come from the Greeks themselves. It was also the Greeks themselves who had asked that the order originally proposed should be reversed, and that the question of the monarchy should be deferred until after an election had taken place. These plans were never given a chance in practice. The Soviet Government had said they would not intervene; but as the United Kingdom troops were withdrawn, so the civil war grew in intensity. The United Kingdom could not condone the instigation of civil war as an instrument of policy. The Greek Government had been chosen by free elections held under international supervision; and, if the results of such an election were not to be accepted, what alternative was there but force? The United Kingdom Government were not prepared to condone force. Once the civil war came to an end—and the Soviet Union could stop it at a moment's notice—it would be possible to hold another election and to restore the normal machinery of government in Greece.

On Germany, it had been suggested that the setting up of a Government in the Western Zones would lead to conflict. In order to avoid that, the Government to be set up was so framed as to be consistent with an eventual central Government of a unified Germany. Germany would become a unity sooner or later. The question was from which side the irredentist movement was to spring—from a Communist East or from a West which had been launched on sound and democratic lines. The overwhelming majority of the Germans were against communism. That was why Western Germany had been included in the European Recovery Programme and why Western Union provided for the adherence of an eventual German Government. He was glad to say that at last there were signs of a change of attitude on the part of the French. They were coming to realise that their age-old feud with Germany could be carried on only at the expense of their own recovery.

In regard to Spain, he was well aware of the difficulties and sympathised with Pandit Nehru's point of view. There were moral factors which could not be left out of account. It was difficult for the present Government of the United Kingdom to forget events in Spain. The present position derived from the Potsdam Agreement: he quoted the clause providing for the exclusion of Spain from the United Nations, on the ground of her support of the Axis and of the nature and record of her Government. Nevertheless, the United Kingdom had maintained diplomatic relations until 1946. It was only after the United Nations resolution of that year that the United Kingdom Ambassador had been withdrawn. Just when it seemed that changes in the right direction might be produced in Spain by constitutional means, the French had closed the frontier. The only, and inevitable, result was greatly to strengthen the position of General Franco.

It had been suggested that the Commonwealth should give a lead. The very fact that the present Meeting was being held would help to give a lead. The nations now consulting were of diverse characters but united principles, and they were joined together by strong bonds. In Commonwealth matters the United Kingdom had a proud history. Reforms had sometimes come late, but they had come. Canada, South Africa, India all provided milestones in a tradition of wise action.

In conclusion, Mr. Bevin said that he was grateful for the contributions which had been made to the discussion, all of which would be studied with the greatest care. The main object of foreign policy must be to ensure that the spiritual, economic and defensive forces represented by the Commonwealth countries and other freedom-loving nations should be brought into voluntary cohesion so as to maintain the peace of the world.

MR. FRASER asked whether, before the Meeting broke up, Mr. Bevin would make a statement on the latest moves of the Soviet Government in regard to disarmament. MR. BEVIN said he hoped to be able to do so in the course of the discussion on the following day.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX

Mr. ATTLEE said that the discussions on foreign affairs had been an essential preliminary to the consideration of defence problems. At the outset of the Meeting, the United Kingdom Government had circulated a paper (P.M.M. (48) 1) in order that all members of the Commonwealth might be informed of their views on the defence aspects of the world situation. They recognised that the facts set out must be seen in a different light and approached from a different angle by each of the Commonwealth countries. Principles of policy might be generally agreed, but their practical application must vary with the special interests, status and geographical position of each country. The Meeting should by this time be well informed as to United Kingdom views. The United Kingdom Government in its turn was now seeking the views of the Commonwealth countries, so that, if possible, a common view might be established.

P.M.M.(48) 1 took as its starting point the Charter of the United Nations, which had, as the first of its purposes, the maintenance of international peace and security. In the course of their discussions, Ministers had displayed their overriding concern with the maintenance of peace. The task was now to consider how this could be achieved. In the past, the peace of a large part of the world had rested mainly on the British fleet. This was widely accepted because of the general recognition that the interests of the British Commonwealth were fundamentally pacific. Some countries were only now beginning to realise what that situation meant; for instance, the United States had for long failed to recognise the extent to which their security had rested on the maintenance of a strong British fleet. But in recent years there had been great changes, due to the development of new weapons, and to the growth of air power, and the effect upon the United Kingdom had been profound. Formerly, it had been a secure island base; now these Islands were probably the most exposed portion of the whole Commonwealth. A large population and great industrial resources were concentrated in a small area highly vulnerable to air attack.

For these reasons, the United Kingdom Government had in recent years sought security through the establishment of a system of collective defence. Every effort had been made to achieve this first through the League of Nations, and subsequently through the United Nations; but these efforts had not been successful. Similarly, between the wars, continuous efforts were made to secure a reduction of armaments; and similar discussions were in progress at the present time. But experience showed that such reductions, whether qualitative or quantitative, could not be achieved in an atmosphere of insecurity. If, then, security could not be achieved under present circumstances, on a comprehensive basis through the United Nations, it must be sought through regional arrangements; and this consideration lay behind the efforts which were being made by the United Kingdom Government to make effective regional arrangements covering Western Europe and the Atlantic. But Western Europe was not the only point of danger; each member of the Commonwealth must wish to consider when and how danger might threaten it. The most striking and tragic conclusion which had emerged from the discussions on foreign affairs was that there was one Power which was not interested in reaching a settlement of international differences by peaceful means. The Soviet Union had a vested interest in chaos.

There were two distinct dangers which must be taken into account: first, direct war-like attack, against which it was necessary to maintain strong defensive forces; secondly, that, owing to the economic weight of those defensive forces, living standards would be so lowered as to open the way for Communist infiltration. It was, therefore, important to remember that the best foundation of an effective defence policy was a sound industrial economy. Action must therefore be twofold: negatively, defensive forces must be built up; positively, the peace-loving Powers must offer a better way of life than the aggressor. Pandit Nehru had rightly spoken of the danger that a moral position might be forfeited in grasping what seemed to be a material advantage.

P.M.M. (48) 1 set out what the United Kingdom Government had done in the light of these considerations. It explained the steps taken to secure the recovery of the United Kingdom's own economy: the United Kingdom Government's participation, with the United States and with the Western European countries in the European Recovery Programme; and the first stages in the establishment of Western Union. The aim had been to restore the war-shattered economy of Europe, and to provide the basis of security against aggression. The United Kingdom Government was anxious to extend this system of co-operation in defence consultation to the Commonwealth generally. No doubt, defence co-operation must in the first instance be on a regional basis. Commonwealth countries had their special interests in their own areas, and it was logical that they should be primarily concerned with those interests. But the way in which the interests of the different areas interacted had been brought out in earlier discussions, and there was need to ensure co-ordination between the defence policies of the different regions. That did not mean subordination, but a free partnership for mutual help.

Mr. ALEXANDER said that the United Kingdom war effort could be measured by the fact that, at the end of the war, there had been over 5 million men and women in the Armed Forces. The first post-war task was their orderly demobilisation; the economic situation demanded that they should be freed urgently for productive employment. The scheme of release by age and service groups was put into force, and worked smoothly. The mistakes of the years 1918–21 were avoided, and in particular the amount of unemployment during the transitional period was very small. In 1946 the United Kingdom spent £1,100 millions on defence; the Service estimates for 1947–48 amounted only to £653 millions. But this meant that the Forces would have to be run down to 715,000 by the end of March 1949. Against this, it might be noted that the Soviet Defence budget for 1948 had made provision for 66 billion roubles, which was only 6 billion roubles below the expenditure in 1946. That contrast exposed the fantastic nature of the Soviet suggestion that an equitable reduction in armaments might be achieved by an all-round cut of one-third. The rapid run-down of the Armed Forces in the United Kingdom had created serious difficulties because of the wholesale exodus of skilled and experienced men. The consequent unbalance of the Forces had created a grave problem for United Kingdom Service Ministers.

In 1947 two events had affected demobilisation. The financial crisis had made it necessary to exercise the most drastic economy on defence expenditure, and thus to reduce the Forces to the absolute minimum. At the same time, the international situation made it increasingly difficult to liquidate overseas commitments. It became clear that for some time large occupation forces must be maintained in Germany, Austria, Trieste and Greece. There was also the additional strain on the Forces caused by events in Palestine; great gratitude was due to the Australian and New Zealand Governments for making it possible to withdraw substantial numbers of United Kingdom troops from Japan.

The United Kingdom Government were thus faced with a paradoxical situation. On the one hand, they were continuing to uncoil the spring of their strength in order to assist economic recovery. On the other hand, there was the need to provide forces capable of backing diplomatic policy and of providing a measure of security in the event of war. Because of the economic straits of the United Kingdom and of the occupational burdens arising from the war, and because the first objective necessarily had to be economic reconstruction, it was not possible for her to re-form, re-equip and maintain forces to guarantee her own safety and that of others at the present time. It was necessary carefully to weigh the priorities under which resources should be allocated to defence. High priority had to be given to research and development, because the United Kingdom's disadvantage in man-power increased the need to maintain a technical ascendancy; to maintaining deterrent weapons in readiness and efficiency; to safeguarding the security of sea communications and overseas garrisons; and to the training of National Service men with a view to establishing a substantial trained reserve capable of rapid mobilisation.

In recent months, the state of international affairs had become serious enough to warrant a survey of the policy governing the size and shape of the Forces. It was decided that it was still necessary to concentrate on the economic recovery of the country, but that a beginning should so far as possible be made with remedying the deficiencies in the Armed Forces and their supplies. The following decisions had been taken as a result of this survey:—

(a) To suspend releases from the Armed Forces for a period of three months at least.
(b) To review the National Service Act.
(c) To review the pay and conditions of the members of the Armed Forces.
(d) To institute a drive for recruits for the Regular, Territorial and Auxiliary Services.
(e) To start again the production of small and heavy army ammunition, to repair and overhaul reserve equipment, to provide additional constructional materials for accommodation and for the preparation of airfields, and to accelerate the production of fighter aircraft and the refitting and overhaul of naval vessels.

The United Kingdom Government's wide commitments overseas had created a difficult man-power problem. The forces in Germany, Austria, Trieste, Greece, Tripoli, Cyrenaica, Egypt, Transjordan, Iraq, Singapore and, until recently, in Palestine and Japan, had imposed a very serious strain on United Kingdom resources, and the rapid running down of service manpower had materially affected the administrative efficiency of the three Services. The United Kingdom Government had no wish to shirk the tasks before it, because they believed that the only way to peace was to undertake them. They proposed therefore to carry them out to the best of their ability within the limits set by their economic resources. Mr. Alexander was glad to note that all Commonwealth countries had welcomed the stand taken by the United Kingdom against Soviet aggression and had approved the policy followed in regard to Berlin. This had only been made possible by means of the air-lift. This had been a most formidable undertaking, and its difficulties would increase during the winter months. It had been estimated that Berlin could be sustained on a daily air-lift of 5,500 metric tons. If this were in fact sufficient for the purpose, it should be possible to maintain it. But the strain on the staff and aircraft engaged was very great. He therefore welcomed the offers of help which had been forthcoming from Commonwealth countries.

The United Kingdom Government had entered upon the policy of Western Union with a determination to build up Western Europe. The Military Committee had two purposes: short-term—to create the confidence necessary to make economic recovery a reality; long-term—to provide the solidarity and security necessary to show that aggression would not pay. All the Governments concerned participated on a basis of equality of status, and of a common pooling of resources. On this understanding the United States and Canada co-operated in the work of the Committee. The results already achieved had increased confidence in Western Europe. Further bodies had also been set up: the Chiefs of Staff Committee: the Commanders-in-Chief Committee, of which Field-Marshal Viscount Montgomery had recently been appointed Chairman; and the Supply and Resources Board. The United Kingdom Government hoped that these efforts towards co-operation in the defence field in relation to Western Europe could now be matched by a determined attempt to improve the system of consultation between Commonwealth Governments. This did not, of course, mean that valuable co-operation in various aspects of defence had not already been achieved. In certain directions, substantial progress had been made. First, the Commonwealth Advisory Committee on Defence Sciences performed a valuable function in exchanging information on scientific data. Secondly, the Joint Intelligence Bureau collected statistics essential for defence purposes. It was satisfactory to note that the Governments of Canada, Australia and New Zealand had set up similar Bureaux. The Joint Intelligence Bureau in London had been instructed to render freely to other Commonwealth countries all the help and assistance which they might ask of it. He hoped that those Commonwealth countries which had not yet set up such a Bureau would consider it worth while to enquire into the possibilities of this aspect of co-operation. Thirdly, there were the Service Liaison Officers. The United Kingdom Government had now appointed Service Liaison Officers in four Commonwealth countries and they were performing valuable services.

At the moment there was a tendency for the United Kingdom to disseminate a great volume of information to other Commonwealth countries and to receive little information in return. This was understandable and natural, but the United Kingdom Government hoped that the reciprocal flow of information inwards to the United Kingdom would increase in due course.

In conclusion, Mr. Alexander said that, if the spirit of co-operation were lacking, it would make no difference what machinery for consultation were devised. The first essential was to secure general agreement on the principles and objects of defence policy, and then to give freedom to staffs to consult and to discuss, within the scope of the principles agreed, the plans which Commonwealth Governments might consider appropriate to the safety of their peoples. He hoped that other Commonwealth Prime Ministers would express their views on the methods of defence consultation, especially on the suggestions contained in paragraphs 14 and 15 of P.M.M. (48) 1.

LORD TEDDER, on behalf of the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff, said that though the world to-day was not formally at war, it could not be said to be enjoying a real peace. In countless parts of the world the hand of the Soviet Union could be seen—in Czechoslovakia, Greece, Burma and Indonesia, in the infiltration of Nazis into Eastern Germany, and in the Communist-provoked strikes in France. Under such conditions, the risk of open conflict could not be ignored. The democratic countries everywhere should face the fact that a ruthless and unprincipled "cold" war was being directed from Moscow and was probing the weak spots of each country. Its main object was to sap the power of Governments in democratic countries and to create the conditions of economic chaos in which Communism flourished. The "cold" war was world-wide; it compelled the United Kingdom to disperse its resources and it laid an increasing strain on the national economy. Its effect therefore was to weaken the capacity to resist in the event of open aggression. The war against Germany had left many military commitments which were in themselves sufficient to hamper economic recovery; but the "cold" war had imposed heavy additional burdens of which the most recent were the Berlin air-lift and the operations in Malaya. In the light of these considerations, the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff view was that the "cold" war was a very real insidious war which might, unless it was effectively countered, prove more dangerous than open war.

There appeared to be general agreement that an essential part of any effective reply to Soviet aggression was the building up of the political, economic and military strength of the democratic countries. Commonwealth Governments should be aware that the Soviet Union was maintaining very large land forces and was making strenuous efforts to modernise her Air Forces. Further, she was making full use of German scientists on the production of submarines. But so far as information was available—and it was admittedly not complete—there was no direct evidence of preparations specifically attributable to an intention to make actual war in the immediate future. It was in any event arguable that the Soviet Union was not in an economic position to contemplate war; and that she would be unwilling to do so until she possessed atomic weapons, which did not appear to be the case at present. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff view was that, for the present, the Soviet Union would not incur serious risk of war and that, faced with such a risk, she would decide to withdraw.

It was clearly impossible, on economic grounds, for the United Kingdom to attempt to maintain in peacetime forces comparable to those maintained by the Soviet Union. This meant that the latter's aggressive tactics could be countered only by the maintenance of available forces in the highest state of technical efficiency and readiness.

As regards the nature of modern war, the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff did not regard so-called "push-button" warfare as a practical possibility in the immediate future. Any war within the next six or seven years would be fought with equipment which was already on the drawing boards; but that included the atomic bomb and possibly some form of bacterial weapon. The last war showed the danger of sudden attack; this danger had been immeasurably increased by the advent of the atomic weapon. The power of the offensive had increased enormously, and it was difficult at present to see how it could be overtaken by the development of defensive power. The conclusion, therefore, became inevitable that, in order to provide a deterrent to war, the Armed Forces of the democratic countries must be maintained in a state to enable them to strike hard and rapidly. If war came, the United Kingdom would have to rely on immediate help from the United States. Neither the United Kingdom nor the other Western European Powers could themselves maintain in peacetime forces adequate to cope with the power of the Soviet Union. It was no longer possible for the United Kingdom to expect, during a war, to have time to build up its forces behind the barrier of sea power. The blitzkrieg with atomic weapons was a far more real and dangerous threat in the future than any form of attack during the recent war.

Lord Tedder then discussed the broad outlines of strategy in a possible war. The conclusion had been reached that the fundamental basis for United Kingdom strategy must rest on the defence of the United Kingdom; on the maintenance of sea communications between the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth and the United States; and on the defence of the Middle East. The strategy of a world-wide war would have many facets. Each country would have problems of its own; groups of countries in various regions would have their different regional problems. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff thought that these regional problems might be discussed and worked out amongst those immediately concerned so that they might be fitted into the world-wide problems with which all Commonwealth countries were concerned. In Western Europe some progress had been made in this direction; the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff would like to feel that similar progress was being made in other fields, especially as regards the defence of the Middle East, in which so many members of the Commonwealth were more or less directly concerned. If, without setting up any complicated organisation, Ministers could give authority for their military advisers to consult on this specific problem and to draft concerted plans, without committing their Governments, an advance would have been made towards filling a very dangerous gap in the armour against aggression.

MR. ST. LAURENT said that he had been impressed by the indications given by Lord Tedder of the dangers of the situation. Canada realised that she would not be faced with a war against a single opponent of comparable size, and that she must fit her resources into the general plan for resisting aggression. Hence, she had welcomed the establishment of the United Nations as a means for ensuring, by collective action, the peace of all countries. When it became clear that, under present conditions, this hope could not be realised, the Canadian Government had concentrated their attention on devising arrangements for regional defence and, with the knowledge of the United Kingdom Government, had developed further the system of co-operation with the United States Government which had worked so successfully in the recent war. Substantial progress had already been made along these lines. Until there was some prospect of the fulfilment of the intentions of the United Nations Charter, the right course clearly was for like-minded Governments to co-operate in building up security on a regional basis in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter; and it was on this basis that Canada was participating in the military discussions under the Treaty of Brussels and was entering into political discussions regarding the establishment of an Atlantic scheme of defence. The Canadian Government were, therefore, in agreement with the proposals contained in the Chief of Staff memorandum annexed to P.M.M. (48) 1 regarding the need for preparations of defence plans on a regional basis; the Canadian Government accepted this as the basis of their policy, and were in fact already giving effect to it. In other regions of Commonwealth defence, the Canadian interest was less direct; moreover, her resources were likely to be fully committed by her own regional plans. Agreement on defence policy and general strategy by all the Commonwealth Governments was not in his view a prerequisite for regional planning. It could not be suggested that the consultations on regional planning in which the Canadian Government was already engaged should be interrupted for a general study of Commonwealth defence problems. Any plans for North American defence could easily be fitted into any arrangements that might be made with regard to the North Atlantic area as a whole; and Canada's part in these plans would be her contributions to general defence based on her available resources which would be fully deployed for the purpose. Nevertheless, he did not wish to deny the value of a continual exchange of views and information on defence matters between Commonwealth countries. Up to now the United Kingdom had been the focal point for such information, and he hoped that this would continue; but he felt that this exchange of views could best be carried on by the existing Military Liaison Staffs, and the Canadian Government could not see the need for any substantial modification of the existing arrangements. It should be possible, through existing machinery, to secure the adequate co-ordination of regional arrangements.

DR. EVATT said that his Government were in general agreement with the views and proposals contained in P.M.M. (48) 1, though this did not imply acceptance in detail. He thought that this paper contained three basic assumptions: that the Soviet Union was unlikely to provoke a major war in the immediate future; that the Soviet Government hoped to obtain their objectives by methods such as political pressure and infiltration which fell short of active aggression; and that the democratic Powers must maintain a firm and united front against further Soviet pressure, and prepare themselves against the eventuality of unforeseen war. Whatever estimate might be made of Soviet intentions, prudence demanded that the Western Powers should take into account the possible risk that a minor incident might result in war, and experience had shown the risks attendant on failure to maintain Commonwealth defences in an adequate state of preparation. For these reasons, the Australian Government were in general agreement with the views of the Chiefs of Staff, as set out in the Appendix to P.M.M. (48) 1. The Australian Government had, indeed, already adopted a five-year defence plan, which would involve a total expenditure of £250 millions; and a large part of this expenditure would be devoted to the technical and research side of defence. When Commonwealth Prime Ministers last met in 1946, there had been agreement on the need for the development of close consultation in defence matters; but only the Australian and New Zealand Governments had attempted to give concrete effect to the recommendations then made. In their view, it was not sufficient for Commonwealth Governments to consider defence problems on a regional basis; for instance, in the last war, Australian and New Zealand troops had early been employed in defence of the Middle East. If war came, it would not be a regional war; and consultation on defence matters should take place on the Commonwealth as well as a regional basis.

The second major consideration which Commonwealth Governments ought to keep in mind was the close interconnection of political and defence policy. It was an axiom that international collective security could only be established in an atmosphere of international confidence, though it might be true that, once such confidence had been secured, little attention would be given to building up arrangements for security. There was no doubt that even a limited agreement on the restriction of armaments would contribute significantly towards the growth of international confidence. The Charter admittedly contemplated the establishment of regional defence arrangements, but it ought to be remembered that, in so far as this involved the division of the world into two groups, the ultimate aim of world-wide collective security might not be furthered. He did not dissent from the view that in military planning the assumption must be that the enemy would be Soviet Russia. The assumptions on which military planning took place necessarily governed also the political decisions on such matters as policy in relation to Spain, but there was a risk that excessive concentration on the purely military aspects of any problem might obscure the equally important political issues involved. Political action based on considerations of justice might at times have to outweigh immediate military advantage; but there was a real sense in which action arising from moral considerations might bring substantial material advantage. In general, the basis of Commonwealth policy should be adherence to the principles of the United Nations and a determination to ensure the success of the Organisation. Reference had been made to the weaknesses which it had so far displayed; these had been accentuated by Soviet policy, but had not been unexpected. All were agreed that, in the economic and social fields, it had done work of the greatest importance; and in the political field its achievements had been substantially greater than many of its critics were willing to admit. For instance, the recent discussions in Paris had undoubtedly had a sobering effect on the Soviet authorities. Dr. Evatt did not think that there was any hope of a comprehensive agreement with the Soviet Government covering the whole field of the questions at issue, but he was not unhopeful that agreement could be reached step by step. It must, however, be made clear to the Soviet Government that an essential condition of a general settlement was that they must cease to intervene in the affairs of other countries through the means of Communist agents and parties.

C224357

MR. FRASER said that he was much impressed by Lord Tedder's remarks. He did not deny the importance of supporting the United Nations; but in his view a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers had equal importance. If Commonwealth Governments agreed on unity and on the need for pooling their resources in time of trouble, a major contribution towards world peace would have been achieved. Was it not possible for the Commonwealth and the United States together to declare their intention of defending world peace against any aggressor? He agreed with Dr. Evatt that each Commonwealth Government was necessarily closely interested in the regional arrangements covering its own area; the New Zealand Government was immediately concerned with the problems of the Pacific. But it was obvious that the events which affect the major issues of war or peace did not take place in the Pacific. In his view the right course was for all Commonwealth Governments to pool their knowledge and plans in the defence field. Even if the Meeting could not commit Governments, yet much could be achieved by securing identity of outlook between the Commonwealth representatives present. In 1946 the Prime Ministers Meeting had agreed on the need for establishing Military Liaison Staffs; but conditions had not been created in which this arrangement could work effectively. The New Zealand Government were anxious for the fullest information about the international situation and to learn what, in the view of the United Kingdom Government, was the best contribution which New Zealand might make in time of war and what form this should take. His Government wished for this information because both they and the people of New Zealand were fully alive to the necessity for an effective defence policy. In modern conditions of war, no country could hope to stand apart in isolation. The universal sense of danger underlined the need for co-operation; and he hoped that all Commonwealth Governments would recognise the need for mutual co-operation and consultation in the defence field.

The discussion was then adjourned until the afternoon meeting.

1. Defence

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 11th Meeting.)

The Meeting resumed their discussion of the memorandum by the United Kingdom Government (P.M.M. (48) 1) on the world situation and its defence aspects.

TOP SECRET

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX

MR. LOUW said that he had already dealt with certain aspects of defence in the discussion on foreign affairs on the previous day. The Government of the Union of South Africa were fully conscious of the dangers of Communism and of Soviet penetration both in Europe and elsewhere; and he could not share Dr. Evatt's hope that Soviet policy, based as it was on the teachings of Marx and Lenin, would change. His Government recognised the need for co-operation among all like-minded nations to resist the Soviet threat, and the only question was what should be the form and extent of this co-operation. The statement by Mr. Attlee at the 11th Meeting and P.M.M. (48) 1 seemed to offer a basis acceptable to South Africa, and Lord Tedder had also laid stress on regional schemes worked out so as to fit into a general plan. His Government favoured the idea of collaboration on a regional basis as set out in paragraph 8 of the Appendix to P.M.M. (48) 1, but they could not agree to the wider proposals which seemed to be envisaged by Australia and New Zealand. Nor could the South African Government engage in a general defence scheme involving commitments in different parts of the world. They would not, however, define regional defence too narrowly or limit it to purely local arrangements. South Africa's interests were primarily those of Southern Africa but extended to the whole African continent as regards both external attack and internal dangers. The defence of Africa related also to sea routes and other lines of communication, which were important also to Australia and New Zealand. His Government recognised the importance of the Middle East countries, which constituted the keystone of the structure of defence of Africa and, while he could not commit the Union to participate in military measures for the defence of the Middle East, he recognised that the question of South African participation might be a matter for further discussion.

The Government of South Africa would wish, as a first step, to undertake discussions with the United Kingdom Government, who had a direct interest in Africa, and with the Government of the neighbouring country of Southern Rhodesia. These discussions could be based on the principles set out in paragraphs 14 and 15 of P.M.M. (48) 1, it being understood that no country would be committed to any particular solution until it had been accepted by its Government.

The United Kingdom, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia were not the only countries interested in the defence of Africa, and he believed that the discussions between the Commonwealth countries concerned should lead on to wider discussions in which the Governments of France, Belgium and Portugal should participate. He did not know whether the United Kingdom Government had considered the possibility of having discussions with those other countries, but he emphasised that the Government of South Africa should be brought into any such discussions at the outset as an equal partner.

He agreed that defence policy must rest on a sound economic basis; and pointed out that South Africa was an important source of supply of food-stuffs and raw materials, and was in course of becoming the greatest producer of uranium in the world. In the United Nations discussions on the control of atomic energy South Africa had reserved her position with regard to uranium production, but she was anxious to exploit her uranium in co-operation with like-minded countries.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS said that he accepted P.M.M. (48) 1 in its entirety. Commonwealth countries must realise that it was no longer possible for the United Kingdom to protect them as in the past and must be prepared to make adequate contributions in man-power and other resources, even though this should entail considerable sacrifices. Unless a united stand was made, the Commonwealth countries would disappear one by one. Though there had as yet been no opportunity to make contact with the new South African Government, Southern Rhodesia would naturally have to discuss defence problems with South Africa, and she was already in close touch with the United Kingdom on these matters. His Government regarded Southern Rhodesia as a vital link in the chain and were anxious to play their full part.

PANDIT NEHRU said that it was fortunate that the present political crisis had come at a time when the big Powers were not prepared for war; and, since the Soviet Union was not likely to be ready to fight for eight to ten years and the United States and the United Kingdom did not in any event want war, there was a period of grace which could be used to mould the future in such a way as to avert war. He agreed that Commonwealth countries must not be unprepared and should not surrender to evil; but, with the prospect of atomic and biological warfare, another war would be a disaster for all well-intentioned peoples irrespective of who might be the ultimate victor. All countries must therefore set about creating conditions which would make war impossible. The defensive preparations of Commonwealth countries must not be aggressive and should be supplemented by a positive policy designed to do away with the idea of war altogether. There must be a proper balance in the distribution of the available resources between defence preparations and economic development, and it was most important that India should develop her industrial potential. He agreed that it should be made plain to would-be aggressors that war would be unprofitable, and he emphasised that India would permit no incursion into her territory or into the regions around it. To secure this she was prepared to co-operate with other members of the Commonwealth and to share in the burdens which such co-operation would impose. India had resources of monazite, thorium and uranium which it was important to her to develop for peaceful purposes, and he believed that a policy of economic development would both strengthen India's ability to wage war, should this be necessary, and, by providing a higher standard of living, counter the Communist menace. The surest defence against the spread of Communism in India was, in his view, not coercion, but the removal of the conditions of poverty in which Communism found its advantage; and the Government of India were guided by this principle.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN said that, as was recognised in P.M.M. (48) 1, it was impossible to separate questions of defence from political and economic questions. He suggested that there were three points on which it was necessary for Commonwealth countries to agree. First, were all agreed that no Commonwealth country should desire or seek war? Secondly, did all regard Communism as a menace to freedom? Thirdly, if any member of the Commonwealth were attacked, whether in open warfare or otherwise, would all other Commonwealth countries come to its aid, it being understood that such aid must not be confined to the Commonwealth members of British stock? He was prepared to answer all three questions in the affirmative. All Commonwealth countries wanted peace because they were anxious to improve the lot of their peoples, and if they ever became involved in war it would be in self-defence. In his view, every country should be at liberty to do as it liked within its own territory, provided that it did not interfere with the affairs of others. His objection to the Soviet Union was that it did not accept this principle.

If there were agreement on the questions he had enumerated he would accept the procedure proposed in paragraph 15 of P.M.M. (48) 1. He thought it most important that the regional arrangements contemplated should be dovetailed into arrangements for the defence of the Commonwealth as a whole. As a member of the Commonwealth, Pakistan was ready and willing to play her full part in the maintenance of peace and in defensive preparations for that purpose. But, just as Pakistan did not seek to secure only advantages from the Commonwealth connection and to give nothing in return, so also she thought that others should share the responsibilities as well as the privileges of membership. The mere exchange of views and information on defence matters was not enough; it must lead on to some definite conclusions, followed by agreed action.

Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan emphasised that Pakistan was already playing her full part in Commonwealth defence; the partition of India had left her with responsibility for the defence of the North-West Frontier, which was a matter of interest to the whole Commonwealth, and she was also responsible for the frontier with Burma, where there was a definite Communist threat. The Pakistan Navy would also play its part in the defence of the oil resources of the Persian Gulf. These important contributions to Commonwealth defence would, he hoped, be recognised by other Commonwealth countries.

In conclusion, Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan emphasised that, while there must be regional defence schemes, including a scheme for the defence of the vital Middle East countries, such schemes must fit into wider plans for the defence of the Commonwealth as a whole. Moreover, the plans should cover not merely defence in the narrow sense, but the development of the economic resources of the Commonwealth and other countries concerned. It would thus be possible to meet any external emergency should it arise, and also to combat the internal menace of Communism by the only really effective weapon, namely, raising the standard of living of the people.

MR. SENANAYAKE stressed the dependence of Ceylon on sea and air communications, and the importance to her of her import and export trade. The communications on which she relied were shared with the rest of the East, with the United Kingdom, and with Australia and New Zealand, and she must therefore look beyond South-East Asia in the matter of defence. For much of the 1939–45 war Ceylon had been the only Allied source of natural rubber, and she was bound to occupy a position of great strategic importance in any future war. Thus, the two sections of Pakistan could communicate by sea only via Ceylon, and a hostile Power holding Ceylon would not only dominate India, Pakistan and Malaya, but would also be able to stop oil supplies from the Persian Gulf. It was true that a direct attack on Ceylon seemed remote; but might not enemy bases be established in Burma, Malaya or Indonesia? In that case, local resources, even with regional planning, would be quite inadequate for the defence of Ceylon. It was natural that the United Kingdom should at present be most interested in Western Europe; but the Soviet Union might well choose to launch an attack in the East.

Mr. Senanayake added that Ceylon could not contribute much in men or military equipment, but she was a valuable source of raw materials. She must reserve her liberty of action according to circumstances, but she would certainly help, provided that her political independence was not jeopardised. Meanwhile, she would take her full share in fighting the " cold " war.

VISCOUNT MONTGOMERY said that Lord Tedder had expressed the views of the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff and that he had little to say in supplement. In surveying the possibilities of a future war the importance of Africa should be fully recognised. Other parts of the Commonwealth might be lost, but as long as Africa, the Atlantic Ocean and the Indian Ocean were held it would be possible to fight back and win in the end. Hence the vital importance of strengthening the Middle East and Western Europe in order to block the enemy's approaches to Africa.

If a war were to break out soon, it could not be expected that much help would be forthcoming from the countries of Western Europe, who had not yet recovered from five years of German occupation, whose morale was low and whose general officers had inevitably spent most of the last war as prisoners. The aim should be first to raise the morale of the Western European countries; secondly, to assist those countries to create organised defence forces; and thirdly, to ensure that these forces were properly equipped. All this would take time, and it would inevitably be a matter of years before the forces of Western Europe could be welded into an efficient fighting machine. He had already held a meeting with the Commanders-in-Chief of the Western Union countries at which they had agreed to work on three plans: an immediate plan, designed to meet any crisis that might arise in the very near future, a two-year plan and a five-year plan. The countries of Western Europe would be greatly encouraged if they knew that, in the event of war, the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries, as well as the United States, would fight in Western Europe.

PANDIT NEHRU asked how the weakness of the Netherlands could be reconciled with the fact that large forces were being maintained in Indonesia.

VISCOUNT MONTGOMERY said that it was for consideration whether the Netherlands Government should not be asked to bring some of these forces back to Europe.

DR. EVATT asked whether Viscount Montgomery considered that planning on a regional basis would be adequate.

VISCOUNT MONTGOMERY said that, in his view, there must be a grand design and a master plan into which the regional plans would fit.

MR. ALEXANDER said that he had been impressed by the high degree of unanimity on fundamental principles shown in the discussion. There was surely no doubt that no Commonwealth country would seek to develop its military strength for aggressive purposes or because it believed that might was right; and there would be general agreement with Pandit Nehru's view that the conscience of each nation must be satisfied about the purpose of any defence preparations. It was clear that all Commonwealth nations were at one in believing that they must be prepared to fight for freedom and justice, and this offered a basis for co-operation.

On the question whether it would suffice to rely on regional defence schemes alone, Mr. Alexander pointed out that the regional co-operation in Western Europe, of which the Brussels Treaty was tangible evidence, might well lead the Soviet Union to turn in other directions with a view to exploiting weaknesses in the countries opposed to her in any part of the world.

The proposals in P.M.M. (48) 1 had originated in the fact that it had been impossible to achieve security on a world basis through the United Nations and it had, therefore, become necessary to consider what could be done under Article 51 of the Charter. It was clear that all Commonwealth countries were willing to give political authority for defence planning to proceed at least on a regional basis and, in view of the general agreement on political objectives, it should now be possible for the military staffs to proceed with the study of defence problems on a joint basis, on the understanding that no Commonwealth Government would be committed in advance to acceptance of any particular solution that might emerge. The question of consultation on defence was, of course, part of the wider question of Commonwealth consultation in general and, just as it had been suggested that there might be meetings of Commonwealth Ministers on such topics as foreign affairs and economic affairs, it would also seem appropriate that there should be from time to time meetings of Commonwealth Defence Ministers, at which background information could be exchanged and the results of the various regional plans examined. As Mr. Louw had said, defence plans must take into account not merely man-power and munitions, but also economic resources, and it would be necessary to examine questions of Commonwealth defence from this wider point of view and also to take into account how the regional plans could be fitted into a general design accepted by all.

The Service Liaison Staffs already established had acheived much work of value in the exchange of information, and they might be used for exchanging information about the various regional plans. In particular the United Kingdom would be most willing to share their experience in matters such as training and production of equipment. He suggested that the staffs attending the present meeting should, while they were still in London, consider what improvements were necessary in the arrangements for consultation on military matters, with a view to submitting recommendations to the various Commonwealth Governments.

Mr. Alexander said that he had been interested in what Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan had said about the need for improving living conditions in regions, such as the Middle East, as a means of defence against the spread of Communism, and he knew that no one was more concerned than the Foreign Secretary to encourage the development of the indigenous resources of the Middle East with a view to raising the standard of living in that area. He was most grateful to the representatives of other Commonwealth countries for their helpful contributions to the discussions and he had been particularly encouraged by the statements made by Pandit Nehru and Mr. Liaqat Ali Khan, who had spoken in a spirit which amply justified the policy pursued by the United Kingdom Government in the past three years.

Mr. BEVIN said that the policy of Western Union was occasionally criticised on the ground that it was difficult to reconcile it with the development of closer co-operation among Commonwealth countries He was convinced that this criticism was misconceived, and it would be very helpful, in getting rid of the misconception, if in the final communiqué there could be a statement to the effect that Commonwealth countries were in general agreement with the policy of Western Union and did not regard it as being in any way in conflict with the interests of Commonwealth countries. He did not suggest that Commonwealth countries need necessarily endorse the detailed programme by which Western Union would be achieved, but it would be helpful if they could indicate their approval and understanding of the main objectives of the policy. Perhaps the representatives of Commonwealth countries would be good enough to consider this suggestion before the meeting on the following day.

As regards disarmament, Mr. Bevin said that the United Kingdom Government had always taken the view that, before any real progress could be made, there must be general agreement on a policy of collective security. As the Commonwealth representatives knew, it had been impossible to make any progress in the meetings of the United Nations Committee on Conventional Armaments in New York, and, when the matter had come before the General Assembly in Paris, Mr. Vyshinski had proposed that each of the five big Powers should cut its forces by one-third. He had pointed out that a cut of this kind would fall much more heavily on the Western Powers, and there had since been a series of discussions in the Political Committee, in the course of which the United Kingdom Delegation had put forward a resolution which had not secured approval. The position now was that the Committee had before them six different resolutions, the general effect of which was to amend Mr. Vyshinski's resolution so as to remove the proposal for a one-third cut by the five big Powers, and to introduce a system of verification and inspection under which Governments would have to report on the size of their military forces and armaments. It was hoped that agreement might be reached on a single resolution to this effect, and the United Kingdom Delegation had been informed that they might support such a resolution.

Mr. FRASER suggested that a paragraph about consultation on defence matters on the lines indicated by the Minister of Defence might be included in the general statement about Commonwealth consultation which the Meeting were to consider.

Dr. EVATT supported this proposal. He pointed out that the Minister of Defence had seemed to imply that regional defence arrangements might be made under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. The purpose of this Article, however, was not to authorise regional arrangements but to recognise the right of collective self-defence, and it was in the exercise of this right that Commonwealth countries, who taken together could not be regarded as a single region, should co-operate in defence matters.

Mr. ATTLEE suggested that officials of the delegations should, in the light of the discussion, draw up a statement about consultation on defence matters which could be included in the proposed general statement on Commonwealth consultation.

2. Commonwealth Consultation

(Previous Reference : P.M.M. (48) 8th Meeting, Minute 1.)

Mr. ATTLEE said that a note (P.M.M. (48) 13), prepared by the Secretary after consultation with officials of all the Delegations, had been circulated covering a detailed statement of the suggestions made in the discussion on 18th October. A further note by the Secretary (P.M.M. (48) 15), covering a statement on Commonwealth consultation, prepared by Dr. Evatt, had also been circulated. He suggested that Dr. Evatt's draft, which seemed more suitable for publication, might be taken as a basis for discussion with a view to reaching an agreed statement which could be included in the final communiqué about the Meeting.

Mr. LIAQAT ALI KHAN suggested that, before Dr. Evatt's draft was considered, it should be revised to cover consultation on defence.

Dr. EVATT said that his draft had been designed to set out in more specific terms the main results of the discussion on Commonwealth consultation. He believed that an announcement on the lines that he proposed would be helpful. He agreed that the statement should cover consultation on defence.

Mr. St. LAURENT said that, to a considerable extent, the arrangements set out in Dr. Evatt's draft were already in operation and that it would therefore be misleading to announce them as though they were new developments agreed on at the Meeting. For example, it would be wrong to imply that the Canadian High Commissioner in London had not in the past had direct access to the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. LOUW said that he had no authority to agree, on behalf of the South African Government, to the arrangements proposed in the draft.

Mr. NOEL-BAKER said that, in general, he preferred Dr. Evatt's draft to the draft annexed to P.M.M. (48) 13. It would, however, be desirable to amend it so as to indicate to what extent it was a declaration of arrangements already in force, and to make it clear that it was subject to endorsement by the Governments of the Commonwealth countries.

Mr. ATTLEE proposed that the draft should be revised by officials in the light of the discussion, and that a revised version should be circulated for consideration at a Meeting at 12 noon on 21st October.

3. Seventh Press Communiqué

The Meeting discussed the substance of the communiqué to be released to the Press describing the day's discussion, and agreed that Mr. Attlee should settle the final terms of the communiqué in the light of their discussion. It was also agreed that no background information about this communiqué should be given to the Press.

1. Most-Favoured-Nation Treatment for Japan

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 3rd Meeting, Minute 3.)

MR. BEVIN said that, in his review of foreign affairs in the East, he had mentioned the pressure to which he had been subjected by the United States Government to agree to most-favoured-nation treatment for Japan. This had been resisted in connection with the European Recovery Programme. Now, however, the United States Government had formally proposed that this question should be discussed at a meeting between official representatives of the United States and of Commonwealth countries. He proposed that the United States invitation should be accepted, the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth representatives being instructed that, without committing their Governments, they were to consider the United States proposals as well as the policy involved and to report back to their Governments. The place and time of the proposed meeting had not yet been fixed. Mr. Bevin promised to consider a suggestion by Dr. Evatt that the meeting should be held in Paris.

There was general agreement with Mr. Bevin's proposal.

2. Commonwealth Consultation

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 12th Meeting, Minute 2.)

The Meeting had before them a note by their Secretary (P.M.M. (48) 16) covering a revised draft of the proposed statement on Commonwealth Consultation.

MR. LOUW said that, if it were intended to publish a document purporting to contain the agreed conclusions of the meeting on this subject, he would have specifically to reserve the position of the South African Government. The paper proposed the creation of new machinery for consultation, or the extension of existing machinery. He could not commit his Government to public acceptance of these proposals at the present stage. He did not wish to suggest that his Government were opposed to consultation and co-operation where suitable, but he would urge the unwisdom of hasty publication. If, however, it were merely a question of making recommendations for consideration by Governments, he would be able to assent to much of the contents of this statement.

After discussion, it was agreed to consider the statement on the basis of a recommendation to Commonwealth Governments and not as a document for publication. It was also agreed that the communiqué to be issued to the Press at the conclusion of the Prime Ministers' Meeting should incorporate a passage stating in general terms that recommendations on the subject of Commonwealth consultation had been drawn up for submission to Commonwealth Governments.

In the ensuing discussion of the draft statement the following were the main points raised—

(a) Paragraph 2.—Varying views were expressed about the frequency with which Ministerial meetings could be held on foreign affairs. Stress was laid on the physical difficulty of arranging as many as two such meetings a year, in view of the many other commitments falling upon a Minister of External Affairs—especially when he might also be Prime Minister.

DR. EVATT said that if it were proposed to recommend only one meeting a year, the recommendation was scarcely worth making, since one such meeting was usually held at the time of the United Nations Assembly. MR. BEVIN made it clear that he was prepared to agree to another such meeting in addition to any which might take place at the same time as the Assembly. Thus, in effect, two meetings a year were contemplated, though for tactical reasons it might be unwise to state publicly an intention to hold one regularly at the time of the United Nations Assembly since this might be taken to imply a "ganging-up" of Commonwealth countries in connection with United Nations business.

It was accordingly agreed that the recommendation should be for Ministerial meetings on foreign affairs to be held at least once, and, if possible, twice, a year.

(b) Paragraph 3.—It was pointed out that, although Commonwealth High Commissioners in London had direct access to the Foreign Secretary, it would not always be practicable for the Foreign Secretary at short notice to give personal interviews. It was agreed that on such occasions High Commissioners should see other Foreign Office Ministers or senior officials.

(c) Paragraph 6.—There was a general discussion of the question whether this paragraph should recommend consultation and co-operation, as envisaged in the draft before the Meeting, or consultation only. MR. LOUW thought the latter sufficient in itself, and stated that the Union Government could not be committed to any co-operation necessarily developing out of the consultation on defence matters which she was willing to undertake.

MR. FRASER said that all Commonwealth countries must take account of the facts. Speaking for New Zealand, he would say that if the United Kingdom were defeated in war, it would only be a question of time before New Zealand fell too. He therefore regarded New Zealand's defence interests as being closely linked with those of the United Kingdom, and was anxious to enter into the closest co-operation as well as consultation with the latter on defence matters. DR. EVATT agreed with Mr. Fraser and emphasised that consultation which did not lead to co-operation could be positively dangerous.

There was also considerable discussion whether paragraph 6, which made specific mention of regional security, laid sufficient stress also on the prior necessity of drawing up an overall strategic plan into which regional plans could be dovetailed. DR. EVATT and MR. FRASER were anxious that regional co-operation should not be over-emphasised to the exclusion of general co-operation, whilst MR. LOUW advocated limiting the application of the paragraph more strictly to regional defence.

LORD TEDDER referred to paragraph 6 of the memorandum by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff attached to P.M.M. (48) 1, which stated that, before regional planning could take place or be put effectively into practice, it was necessary to reach agreement on the fundamental principles of defence policy and strategy. He said that it was necessary to be practical, and to base one's plans on what was reasonably likely to happen during the next ten years. As things stood at present, it must be admitted that the United Kingdom had made further progress in co-operation in planning with the Western Union countries than it had with the other Commonwealth countries. The United Kingdom and the Western Union countries had started by trying to plan the defence of Western Europe on a purely regional basis, but it had soon been found that this was not practicable and that it was necessary to consider the problems of Western European defence in the broader context of the world-wide commitments of the countries taking part. As part of this it was necessary for the United Kingdom to have defence discussions with the other members of the Commonwealth.

MR. BEVIN said that the defence of Africa was of the greatest importance in world strategy, and it was difficult to see how it could be a matter of regional concern. On the wider question of Commonwealth co-operation in defence matters, it ought to be recognised that the other members of the Commonwealth would be placed in a position of considerable difficulty if they were left in doubt as to the intentions of any individual Commonwealth Government.

MR. ST. LAURENT was anxious that paragraph 6 should be so drafted as not to make it appear that consultation and co-operation in defence matters was necessarily confined to British Commonwealth countries. It would be quite unrealistic for Canada to agree to any arrangement which precluded her from concerting defence measures with the United States, and the same applied also in the economic sphere. This point found general acceptance, MR. BEVIN pointing out that the United Kingdom already had such consultation and co-operation with, for instance, other members of the Western Union.

MR. FRASER also supported Mr. St. Laurent's view and said that consultation and co-operation on defence matters which might be contemplated also with, for instance, the United States, made it all the more imperative to achieve agreement inside the Commonwealth first.

MR. NEHRU, MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN and MR. SENANAYAKE also made the point that their Governments were anxious for close consultation in defence matters. MR. ATTLEE said that this was also the desire of the United Kingdom Government.

Various amendments were made to the text of P.M.M. (48) 16 in order to meet the points made in the course of the discussion.

A revised text of the statement incorporating the amendments approved in the discussion is reproduced in the Annex to these minutes. The Meeting agreed that the statement should be submitted in this form to all Commonwealth Governments for approval.

ANNEX

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

Discussions during the meeting have demonstrated the value to Commonwealth Governments of consultation with one another on foreign and economic affairs, defence and other matters of common concern. Although the exchange of information is fuller at the present time than it has ever been, it is specially important that consultation should take place early while policy is still in the formative stages. The Meeting recommend, subject to endorsement by the respective Governments, the following arrangements for Commonwealth consultation, which in part reflect existing practice :—

1. Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be held as often as is practicable.

2. In the intervals between those meetings Commonwealth meetings on foreign affairs will be held at the Ministerial level at least once a year and twice a year if possible. These meetings will normally be held in one or other of the Commonwealth countries. The first of these meetings will be held in Ceylon.

3. Greater use will be made of facilities in London for consultation and the exchange of information. In addition to their contacts with the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations and his staff :—

(i) Commonwealth High Commissioners in London have direct access to the Foreign Secretary. Meetings between the Foreign Secretary and individual High Commissioners will be held more frequently. Meetings between the Foreign Secretary and two or more High Commissioners will also be arranged from time to time, as occasion requires, for the discussion of matters of common interest.

(ii) Political Secretaries (or comparable officials) attached to the staffs of Commonwealth High Commissioners in London also have direct access to the Foreign Office. Meetings between them and officials of the Foreign Office, either individually or in groups, will be arranged as required.

Other Commonwealth Governments will endeavour to make comparable arrangements in their capitals.

4.—(a) Commonwealth meetings on economic and financial questions of common concern will be held at the Ministerial level when required and practicable. These meetings will normally be held in one or other of the Commonwealth countries, according to circumstances. Where a particular problem directly concerns only some of the Commonwealth countries, the meeting might be confined to representatives of those countries.

(b) For the discussion of matters affecting only two Commonwealth countries meetings of Ministers or officials will also be held as necessary; and, where appropriate, formal machinery could be established for this purpose on the lines of the recently constituted Continuing Canada–United Kingdom Economic Committee.

(c) The existing contacts between officials of Commonwealth Governments concerned with financial and economic matters will be maintained and extended, and in particular there will be more frequent interchange of visits.

5.—(a) To meet present needs the existing Commonwealth Liaison Committee for the European Recovery Programme, which includes officials of all Commonwealth countries, will under the title "Commonwealth Economic Information Committee" serve in London as a clearing-house for economic information generally to provide the basis for informed consultation between Governments.

(b) Other Commonwealth Governments will endeavour to make comparable arrangements in their capitals.

6. In furtherance of the general aim of co-operation between all peace-loving nations to deter and to resist aggression there will be close consultation between Commonwealth Governments to arrange co-operative action in matters of defence, including those matters which arise from a common interest in the security of a particular region. The military advisers of those Governments will consult together to frame proposals and plans for submission to their respective Governments.

Meetings will be arranged on the Ministerial level, as the occasion demands, to discuss defence problems, whether general or regional.

In the system of Commonwealth Service Liaison Officers there already exists machinery for the exchange of military information of general interest, and Commonwealth Governments will consider how that machinery can be improved to render it fully effective as a means of exchanging information about the progress of the defence plans, whether general or regional, and securing the maximum appropriate degree of defence co-ordination.

7. The arrangements summarised above will supplement but will not supersede the existing channels of communication between Commonwealth Governments. In London, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations will continue to be responsible for relations with other Commonwealth Governments.

1. Status of High Commissioners

(Previous Reference : P.M.M. (48) 7th Meeting, Minute 2)

MR. ATTLEE recalled that, at their seventh meeting on 18th October, Ministers had agreed that a Committee of Commonwealth representatives should work out detailed proposals regarding the status of High Commissioners on the basis of the proposals contained in P.M.M. (48) 9. The Committee's report had been circulated as P.M.M. (48) 14, and he thought that it would be convenient for the Meeting to consider the summary of their recommendations set out in Section IV of this report.

There was general support for recommendations 1 to 9 in this Section. In discussion, the following points were made—

(a) MR. JORDAN said that there would be general appreciation of the generous gesture which the Canadian Government had made in offering to forego the long-standing arrangement under which the Canadian High Commissioner in London took precedence over other Commonwealth High Commissioners.

(b) MR. NOEL-BAKER said that the proposal that High Commissioners should take precedence in accordance with their seniority would be warmly welcomed by United Kingdom High Commissioners in Commonwealth countries.

(c) MR. LOUW pointed out that there was some ambiguity in the suggestion that Ambassadors and High Commissioners should take precedence according to "date of appointment;" and there was general agreement that, for the purpose of determining the relative seniority of High Commissioners, arrangements should be adopted which were in conformity with those which governed the relative precedence of Ambassadors.

(d) MR. FRASER said that he was not happy about the Committee's proposal that it should be left to different Commonwealth Governments to decide whether High Commissioners should be styled "Excellency." Opinion in New Zealand was unsympathetic to the multiplication of titles of this type; moreover, he thought that confusion would result by leaving a discretion to Governments. He recognised, however, that High Commissioners were at some disadvantage in relation to Ambassadors in the matter and, in view of the general support for this proposal, he did not propose to press his objections.

The discussion then turned on the question of the title of High Commissioners, on which the Committee had not been able to reach agreement.

MR. BEASLEY said that the Australian Government were strongly in favour of changing the title "High Commissioner" to "Ambassador." He understood now for the first time that the United Kingdom Government was not in favour of this proposal. He had himself attended the meeting of the Committee with precise instructions on the point, and he thought that it was unfortunate that the attitude of the United Kingdom Government had not been made clear in the Committee's discussion.

C224372

MR. LOUW said that the Union Government also was in favour of the adoption of the title "Ambassador." In his view, the only technical difficulty in the way of this proposal was that it might be held to make it necessary for The King to address Letters of Credence to himself. It was, indeed arguable that this procedure was not open to constitutional objection; but, in any event, it ought to be possible to reach a satisfactory solution of this difficulty, for instance by arranging for High Commissioners to be accredited through Foreign Offices. The manner in which Commonwealth Ambassadors were accredited to other Commonwealth countries was not the concern of foreign States. The change in title which he proposed was the logical outcome of Commonwealth constitutional developments in recent years; apart from this, it was desirable because the title "High Commissioner" no longer conveyed a sense of dignity and importance in the public mind.

SIR NOEL CHARLES, speaking on behalf of the United Kingdom Foreign Office, said that Mr. Bevin had been most anxious to meet the views of Commonwealth Governments. But it had not been possible for Commonwealth representatives to reach unanimity on this question. The changes which the United Kingdom proposed to make in the precedence of Ambassadors relative both to certain other persons and to the Commonwealth High Commissioners would not be very acceptable to foreign Governments; and there might be some advantage in not changing the title of High Commissioner at the same time.

MR. FRASER said that it was not clear whether the proposal put forward by the representatives of Australia and the Union of South Africa was related merely to the narrow issue of status or whether it implied a changed conception of the Commonwealth relationship. Did it mean that the relationship between Commonwealth Governments was to become more remote, reserved and formal? If so, the proposal stood condemned on its merits. He did not think that it was proper for Commonwealth countries, as a family group, to be represented by Ambassadors in other Commonwealth territories.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said that the United Kingdom standpoint on this question had been made clear in P.M.M. (48) 9. The United Kingdom Government saw no great merit in the title "High Commissioner," but no satisfactory alternative had so far been found. The proposal for the adoption of the title "Ambassador," however, clearly involved an issue of substance. The relationship of Commonwealth High Commissioners with the United Kingdom Government was on a wholly different footing from that of foreign Ambassadors; and he thought that the same was true of the position in other Commonwealth countries. In the United Kingdom, at least, there could be no doubt that the standing of High Commissioners in the public estimation was a great deal higher than that of Ambassadors. Indeed, the number of Ambassadors was now so great that the title had lost much of its former significance. The adoption of this title for Commonwealth representatives would, moreover, give rise to strong criticism in Parliament and elsewhere in the United Kingdom, on the ground that it must imply some weakening of Commonwealth ties; and he thought that a similar criticism might well be made in other Commonwealth Parliaments.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that the adoption of the title "Ambassador" would suggest that High Commissioners in Commonwealth countries were in the same relationship to Governments as were the Ambassadors of foreign Powers. This was not in fact the case, and it was most undesirable that any step should be taken which might tend to assimilate the two relationships. High Commissioners enjoyed facilities for consultation very different from those accorded to Ambassadors; if, however, the same title were employed for both, the door would be open to claims for similar treatment by the Ambassadors of foreign countries.

LORD ADDISON said that, in the United Kingdom the title "High Commissioner" was associated in the public mind with the Commonwealth relationship and that, in consequence, High Commissioners were held in much higher public estimation than Ambassadors.

MR. ST. LAURENT suggested that, in view of the fact that it had not been possible to reach a generally acceptable solution, this question should be held over for discussion by a subsequent Meeting.

MR. ATTLEE agreed that, as agreement had not been reached, it seemed best to leave the matter over for another Meeting. The United Kingdom Government were not opposed to the idea of finding an alternative title; but that of "Ambassador" carried with it, by tradition and practice, the implication that its holder was the representative of a foreign State.

2. Final Communiqué

The Meeting discussed the terms of a final communiqué on the basis of a draft circulated by their Secretary under P.M.M. (48) 17. It was agreed that a revised draft should be prepared in the light of the criticisms and suggestions made in the discussion, and that this should be considered at a subsequent meeting on the following day.

3. Commonwealth Consultation

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 13th Meeting, Minute 2.)

MR. ST. LAURENT said that he thought it necessary to make an explanatory statement in connection with the recommendations on Commonwealth consultation which the Meeting had agreed earlier in the day. In agreeing to recommend consultation between Commonwealth Governments to arrange co-operative action in matters of defence, he wished to make it clear that, in view of her historic position, it would be unreal for Canada to regard as effective either general or regional plans of defence which would comprise Commonwealth countries exclusively, and which did not also include other peace-loving countries prepared to co-operate in resisting aggression. He asked that a note to that effect should be circulated with the statement which the Meeting had approved for submission to Commonwealth Governments. The Meeting agreed to this proposal.

1. Final Communiqué

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 14th Meeting, Minute 2.)

The meeting had before them a revised draft (P.M.M. (48) 17 (Revise)) of the final communiqué for the Press, which had been prepared by representatives of the Delegations in the light of the criticisms and suggestions made at the previous meeting.

The meeting considered the revised draft paragraph by paragraph and various suggestions for amendment were discussed.

The final text of the communiqué, incorporating the amendments approved in the discussion, is reproduced in the annex to these minutes.

2. Commonwealth Consultation

(Previous Reference: P.M.M. (48) 13th Meeting, Minute 2.)

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS said that a clear understanding should be reached that there would be no publication in any Commonwealth country of the detailed recommendations on Commonwealth consultation until all Governments had approved them and agreed to their publication.

MR. FRASER said that Governments might soon be pressed to give information about these recommendations in their Parliaments; and all Governments should, therefore, undertake to reach decisions on them with the minimum of delay. If ultimately no general agreement could be reached, each Government would be at liberty to disclose the views on this subject which had been expressed on its behalf at the meeting.

There was general agreement that all Governments should reach decisions on these recommendations as quickly as possible, and in any event by the end of November; and that meanwhile there should be no publication of the recommendations in any country.

3. Concluding Speeches

MR. ATTLEE said that at the conclusion of the plenary sessions of the Meeting he would like to express, on behalf of himself and his colleagues in the United Kingdom Government, their pleasure as hosts in having had the opportunity of welcoming the Delegations. They were impressed with the value of the exchange of views which had taken place, with the high level of the discussions and with the great measure of agreement which had been reached. He thought that all present could regard the Meeting as having been highly successful.

MR. ST. LAURENT said he would like to express, on behalf of the representatives of the other Commonwealth Governments, their sincere thanks to Mr. Attlee for presiding over the meetings and for giving his constant and valuable help, which had contributed so much to the success of the discussions.

PANDIT NEHRU, in associating himself with Mr. St. Laurent's remarks, expressed the great pleasure of the Indian Delegation at having been able to participate in the Meeting.

MR. LOUW asked to be associated with what had been said about Mr. Attlee's chairmanship. A word of thanks was also due to the officials of the Commonwealth Relations Office and to the members of the Secretariat for the assistance which they had given to all Delegations. The South African Delegation were most grateful for the hospitality they had received during their stay in London.

MR. LIAQAT ALI KHAN joined in the tributes to Mr. Attlee's chairmanship. He was particularly happy to have had this opportunity of closer contact with his Commonwealth colleagues. He hoped that the ties between the Commonwealth countries would be strengthened by this Meeting.

MR. SENANAYAKE expressed his great pleasure at having been able to attend the Meeting as the representative of Ceylon.

MR. BEASLEY said that the Meeting had been of great educative value for all taking part in it. It had provided for each Commonwealth Government an opportunity to gain a clearer understanding of the problems and viewpoints of the others.

MR. FRASER said that Mr. Attlee's fair and forbearing chairmanship had done much to ensure the success of the Meeting. He himself had been much impressed by the spirit of mutual accommodation shown throughout the proceedings. He had derived great pleasure from the presence of the representatives of India, Pakistan and Ceylon. This had been an inspiration to them all, and he hoped that these countries would derive from their Commonwealth membership strength and confidence in facing the great tasks before them. He himself believed that the world had rarely seen anything finer than the courage and enlightenment shown by Mr. Attlee's Government in recognising the rights of these peoples who had so long been struggling to achieve their independent destiny. This indeed was an example which had been an inspiration to the world.

MR. ATTLEE, in concluding the Conference, expressed his gratitude for the assistance given to him by his colleagues in the United Kingdom Government and for the spirit of helpful co-operation shown by all the representatives of Commonwealth countries throughout the discussions.

ANNEX

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

The Final Plenary Session of the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was held at No. 10 Downing Street this morning. At the end of the meeting the representatives of the other Commonwealth Governments placed on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

The purpose of these informal meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers is to provide opportunities for a free exchange of views on matters of common concern.

The meetings held during the past two weeks have covered many such matters of common concern, including international relations, economic affairs and defence. The discussions have shown a substantial community of outlook among all the Commonwealth Governments in their approach to present world problems. Fundamentally, this approach is based upon their support of the objectives of the United Nations as an instrument for world peace and their determination to make its work fully effective. All the Commonwealth Governments are resolved to work together and with other Governments to establish world peace on a democratic basis.

In furtherance of these objectives, the representatives of Commonwealth Governments affirmed their purpose to build up the economic strength of their countries and to take all appropriate measures to deter and resist aggression. At the same time they will do their utmost to encourage an increased production of wealth so as to achieve higher standards of living, especially for the peoples of the less developed countries of the world, as a constructive contribution to the preservation of world peace.

The economic forecast for the coming years made by the United Kingdom Government for the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation was considered in order to give the other Commonwealth countries an opportunity to examine its implications for their own economies. The conference re-affirmed the desirability for all the Commonwealth Governments, in formulating their policies, to consult with one another, so far as practicable, so that each can co-operate by taking into account the needs and policies of the others.

The United Kingdom Government outlined the nature of its association with other Western European nations under the Brussels Treaty, as a regional association within the terms of the United Nations Charter. There was general agreement that this association of the United Kingdom with her European neighbours was in accordance with the interests of the other members of the Commonwealth, the United Nations, and the promotion of world peace. It was agreed that other Commonwealth Governments should be kept in close touch with the progress of this co-operation with Western Europe.

The Conference was impressed by the value of the discussions which had taken place at the Ministerial level and expressed a general desire to maintain and extend methods of consultation between the Governments of the Commonwealth. Recommendations for improving Commonwealth consultation on foreign affairs, economic affairs and defence are being submitted to the Governments for consideration and decision.

The Meeting recorded its support for Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations. The representatives of all the other Commonwealth Governments took note of the constitutional documents published by the Ceylon Government in Ceylon Sessional Paper XXII of 1947 under the title "The Independence of Ceylon" and in Ceylon Sessional Paper III of 1948 under the title "The Constitution of Ceylon." They agreed to take this opportunity of their meeting in London to place on record their recognition of Ceylon's independence and to affirm that Ceylon enjoys the same sovereign independent status as the other self-governing countries of the Commonwealth which are members of the United Nations.

This meeting included for the first time the Prime Ministers of India, Pakistan and Ceylon. Their presence symbolised the extension of the bounds of democratic freedom which reflects the spirit and steadfast purpose of the Commonwealth. These new representatives of sovereign nations brought to the deliberations of their colleagues from the other free countries of the Commonwealth the wisdom of their ancient civilisations vivified by the dynamism of the modern age. This blending of the West and the East in the lofty task of building a lasting peace on the foundations of freedom, justice and economic prosperity provides a new hope for harassed mankind

THE WORLD SITUATION AND ITS DEFENCE ASPECTS

MEMORANDUM BY THE UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

THE Charter of the United Nations, signed at San Francisco in 1945, announced as the first of the purposes of the United Nations the maintenance of international peace and security. To that end, the Charter prescribes a detailed procedure, under the primary responsibility of the Security Council, for the pacific settlement of disputes and, in the event of pacific settlement failing, for collective action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression. For the fulfilment of its task of maintaining international peace and security, the Security Council is empowered to have at its disposal armed forces and other facilities to be made available by members of the United Nations under special agreements to be made between Member States and the Security Council itself.

2. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have, from the outset, devoted their best efforts to ensuring that the United Nations should be successful in its task of maintaining international peace and security. The establishment of collective security under the United Nations has, however, not been achieved. In the Security Council the abuse by the Soviet Government of their right of veto has in many cases prevented the Council even from reaching a decision as to the facts of the case presented to it, let alone the taking of action in connection therewith. It has proved impossible for the Security Council to reach agreement upon some of the most important principles on which, in the view of the Military Staff Committee, agreement must be reached before steps can be taken to establish the forces on which the Security Council must rely in order to carry out its decisions. Further, the inability of the Soviet Government to agree to negotiate in the Atomic Energy Commission and in the Commission for Conventional Armaments on the basis of the majority views has contributed powerfully towards the disruption of international confidence, and it is an axiom that only in an atmosphere of international confidence can international collective security, in the full sense of the term, be built up.

3. Faced with this situation, the Western Powers feel that it is of paramount importance that all like-minded Governments should co-operate in building up collective security from another angle, that of regional security, which is also contemplated by the Charter, and should seek their justification in the right of collective self-defence which is expressly recognised in Article 51 of the Charter.

4. The only two Powers who are singly capable at the present time of menacing world security are the United States and the Soviet Union. There is no threat to world peace from the United States and, in view of the close political and other ties and the considerable community of interests between members of the Commonwealth and the United States, it is unthinkable that any member of the Commonwealth should ever engage in hostilities against the United States or against a combination of Powers which includes the United States. On the other hand, the Soviet policy and aims are a threat to all free nations, who are in danger of being subjugated one by one.

5. It is important to realise clearly the nature of the Soviet threat to peace. Communist parties now exist in some form in every country in the world without exception. In every country they have the same aim, the establishment of a régime which, whatever its merits, is fundamentally opposed to the conceptions of human rights and civil liberties which lie at the basis of the civilisation common to all Commonwealth countries and indeed to the whole free world.

6. In other circumstances, this might have been an internal affair for each country. But the whole problem is transformed by the fact that these Communist parties derive their strength from the support they receive from a formidable national State. The Soviet Union and its satellites now form a solid political and economic bloc extending from the Mediterranean to the Pacific. From behind these secure entrenchments the Soviet Government are exerting constantly increasing pressure which threatens the whole fabric of civilisation, religious, political, cultural and material, as we know it. In some countries the danger is still latent, but in Germany, France, Trieste, Italy, Greece, Burma, Malaya and China the conflicting forces are already at grips with one another. This policy is sustained in every country, to a greater or lesser degree, by the Communist parties. The aim of this pressure is to accelerate what Communists believe to be an inevitable process, the downfall of the free democracies and their replacement by the Marxist State. They believe that time is on their side, and would prefer to achieve their ends by political means rather than by war. They regard constant friction and struggle as only natural in the relations between Communist and non-Communist States, and have no interest whatever in the establishment of orderly and prosperous conditions for the common man in the non-Communist world. While their strategy is fixed, their tactics are opportunist and flexible.

7. In pursuit of these aims, the policy of the Soviet Government has five main facets :—

(a) first, the consolidation of Soviet strategic security by the establishment of a belt of subservient States around the frontiers of the Soviet Union.

(b) second, the restoration of Soviet economy and its development to a point where it will rival and eventually outstrip that of the United States.

(c) third, the avoidance of a major war unless a Soviet vital interest is menaced or conditions are judged to be sufficiently favourable to the Soviet Union.

(d) fourth, the continued aggressive promotion of Communism by all means short of a major war throughout the non-Communist world.

(e) fifth, an endeavour to weaken and disintegrate the non-Communist world, by political infiltration, leading to unrest and economic distress, by the promotion of civil war in independent countries, and by the fostering of revolutionary movements and unrest in non-self-governing territories or those under trusteeship.

This policy, if pursued, will inevitably lead to a clash.

8. The United Kingdom Government have taken into account what military strength the Soviet Union possesses as a backing for her policy.

9. It is unlikely that before the end of the second post-war Five-Year Plan the Soviet Union will be capable of supporting her armed forces in a major war entirely from the natural resources and industrial potential now under her control. Nevertheless, if the Soviet Union wished to go to war and felt confident of attaining her primary objectives rapidly, economic considerations would not in themselves be enough to prevent her from doing so.

10. The Soviet armed forces, despite certain deficiencies, could embark on a land war at any time and would, at least in the early stages, have the advantage of numbers against any likely combination of opposing forces. But in any major war that started before 1956–60, the fact that Russia's industrial plan was not complete would, as hostilities continued, tend increasingly to counterbalance her advantage in terms of numbers. Moreover, the strategic air situation is, at least at present, unfavourable to the Soviet Union; her air striking force, although making great efforts towards technical parity with the Royal Air Force, is still comparatively backward. She could thus not yet count upon a reasonable degree of immunity for her centres of population and industry from serious air attack. Her future readiness to embark upon a major war is likely therefore to be conditioned by consideration of her own air power in relation to that of probable opponents.

11. Failing the early development of new weapons to a point which she believed would ensure her rapid victory, the Soviet Union's economic situation is likely to weigh heavily against her provoking a major war at any rate until the satisfactory completion of the second Five-Year Plan.

12. In the present world situation the United Kingdom Government have thought it necessary to pursue the following policy :—

(a) To devote all possible material resources to economic reconstruction in order to strengthen the position of the United Kingdom.

(b) To stimulate political resistance to the spread of Communism and to promote economic recovery in those countries threatened by it.

(c) Recognising that no one country can safely stand alone, to join with the United States and the countries of Western Europe and the Commonwealth in organising all possible deterrent forces, in building up effective defences, and in working out appropriate collective security arrangements in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

13. The United States through her geographic position is affected by the Soviet threat both in the West and in the East, and, because her political ideals are similar to those of the Commonwealth and Western European countries, close co-operation with her is obvious and natural. Western Europe is in a special position of danger, her nations are impoverished and, unless built up quickly, are in danger of being overcome by Communist infiltration. For her recovery and future security, a regional plan was both necessary and urgent, and the foundation for such a plan was laid by the Brussels Treaty. The United Kingdom Government have in this way reached the prerequisite political agreement with the Governments of the United States and of the countries of Western Europe to enable long-term and emergency military planning with these Governments to take place. It is very desirable, in the view of the United Kingdom Government, that, as this planning with the United States and the Western European countries proceeds, corresponding planning should take place within the Commonwealth.

14. The United Kingdom Government believe that no system of defence co-operation can work effectively unless there is continuous and close political co-operation between the Governments concerned, and unless there is agreement between those Governments as to the objects of the defence policy which is to be pursued. In their view it is only when the necessary agreement in the political field has been reached that planning can satisfactorily proceed and a coherent plan be devised. If, therefore, an adequate defence system is to be built up, which will enable the countries of the Commonwealth to live in security and exercise their rightful influence in world affairs and will lessen their dependence on any outside source, an essential preliminary will be the requisite degree of political agreement between the respective Commonwealth Governments on basic objectives of policy.

15. Once agreement has been reached in the political field it will then be possible, with the agreement of the Commonwealth Governments concerned, to allow the study of defence problems by the military staffs to proceed on a joint basis, whether globally or regionally as circumstances might necessitate, on the understanding that no country would be committed to accepting any particular solution that might emerge from the study until it had been accepted by the Government concerned.

16. The forthcoming Meeting would afford a suitable opportunity for a discussion of the problems dealt with in this memorandum and the United Kingdom Government would welcome an expression of the views of Commonwealth Ministers on these matters at the Meeting.

17. The foregoing paragraphs are an expression of the views of United Kingdom Ministers which it is desired to bring to the notice of other Commonwealth Ministers before the Commonwealth Meeting in October. A statement of the views of the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff on the need for closer co-operation among Commonwealth countries in the field of defence is appended in order that Commonwealth Ministers may also be aware of their views.

APPENDIX

COMMONWEALTH DEFENCE CO-OPERATION

MEMORANDUM BY THE CHIEFS OF STAFF

1. At the request of His Majesty's Government, the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff have studied the fundamental principles which should guide defence policy in the situation described in the review contained in the covering memorandum. The Chiefs of Staff emphasise that the advent of weapons of mass destruction means that air attack has become much more devastating and might bring about a decisive issue in a short time. Nations with highly centralised industrial and man-power resources are now more vulnerable than ever. Methods of lessening this threat must therefore form a cardinal point of policy.

2. The primary aim of our defence policy must be to prevent war, provided our vital interests are not prejudiced.

(a) Essential steps to prevent war are—

(i) Tangible evidence that the Commonwealth countries and their Allies possess adequate forces and resources, which they are fully prepared to use, and that they are capable of taking immediate offensive action on a large scale.

(ii) Taking all possible means short of war, not only to arrest the further spread of Communism but also to weaken the hold of Russia over countries she now dominates.

(b) Essential measures required in peace to allow the Commonwealth countries to fight successfully in the event of war are—

(i) To prepare common strategic objectives and co-ordinated plans
(ii) To possess balanced armed forces ready for immediate use on the outbreak of war with the necessary resources to support them.
(iii) To maintain co-operation between all members of the Commonwealth in all aspects of defence.
(iv) To ensure the active and early support of the United States.
(v) To co-ordinate defence plans with the Western Union.
(vi) To maintain and increase Allied scientific and technical lead.

(c) If war should occur, the aim should be in co-operation with all Allies to—

(i) Secure the integrity of the Commonwealth countries.
(ii) Mount a strategic air offensive.
(iii) Hold the enemy as far east as possible in Western Europe.
(iv) Maintain a firm hold on the Middle East.
(v) Control essential sea communications.

3. The analysis of defence policy in paragraph 2 shows that defence co-operation and the organisation required for it are of paramount importance in peace-time. The prerequisite political agreement and the means of maintaining close political consultation have been established with the United States and with the Western Union. Consequently defence co-operation with them is effective through the medium of the Combined Chiefs of Staff and the Western Union Chiefs of Staff.

4. To improve Commonwealth co-operation in the field of defence, the Prime Ministers' Meeting of May 1946 agreed to establish a liaison organisation on the model of the system in existence between the United Kingdom and the United States. This system was intended to provide a method of co-ordination based on the national defence organisations of the Commonwealth countries, to assist in the direction of war so that it could be carried out from anywhere in the Commonwealth, and to be sufficiently flexible to cope with the varying outlooks and resources of the different countries of the Commonwealth. It is, however, clear that Commonwealth Defence Liaison requires further development to make it fully effective and it is a matter for consideration how this can be done.

5. The work done by the Combined Chiefs of Staff and the Western Union Chiefs of Staff shows that there are two main aspects of defence co-operation, namely :—

(a) The co-ordination of general issues affecting all Allies, e.g., the fundamental objectives of defence policy and strategy, the utilisation of resources, dispersal, &c.
(b) The planning of action in the various regions.

6. Before regional planning can take place or be put effectively into practice, it is necessary to reach agreement amongst all members of the Allies on the fundamental principles of a policy and strategy. The allocation of resources, standardisation of equipment, war production, dispersal, and defence science and research must also be kept under constant review.

7. If agreement can be reached on a closer measure of defence co-operation within the Commonwealth, initial joint studies on the following general subjects might be carried out for submission to individual Commonwealth Governments :—

(a) The basic objectives of defence policy and general strategy.
(b) A distribution of effort by devising regions of strategic responsibility.
(c) General outline plans to meet immediate and long-term dangers.

8. The general studies suggested in paragraph 7 would concern all members of the Commonwealth, but, where it is necessary to prepare plans involving the provision of forces or the undertaking of commitments, co-operation can only be on a regional basis. Thus, Canada is primarily interested in the defence of the American continent and in the northern Atlantic and Pacific approaches; Australia and New Zealand in the Pacific and in the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean sea communications; South Africa in the Mediterranean, South Atlantic and Indian Ocean sea communications; and India, Pakistan and Ceylon in the Middle East and the sea and land approaches to the Indian continent. Accordingly, where defence co-operation is required to cover the preparations for defence and action by force in any particular region, it is natural that the countries who consult together will only be those who have a special interest in that region.

Conclusions

9. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff therefore conclude that to provide closer defence co-operation within the Commonwealth it will be necessary—

(i) To maintain the closest political co-operation to provide the policy foundation on which defence co-operation can become effective.
(ii) To obtain political authority for the preparation of plans to cover the subjects in paragraphs 7 and 8, and to allow freedom of consultation on the official level in the preparation of these plans on the clear understanding that no country can be committed to any course of action until that country has endorsed it by governmental approval.

If political authority is forthcoming—

(iii) Discussion of the general issues mentioned in paragraph 7 could probably be undertaken by a slight adjustment to the present Service Liaison Staffs.
(iv) The preparation of regional plans could be undertaken without any alteration to the present methods of consultation. It would, however, be necessary for such planning to be carried out by planning staffs in the closest touch with the views of their own Defence Organisations, and exchanges of visits between planning staffs would probably be necessary.

CHAPTER I.—INTRODUCTORY

(1) THE GENERAL OBJECTIVES

It is the purpose of this Long-Term Programme to describe in some detail the policies which the United Kingdom proposes to follow in order to "achieve and maintain a satisfactory level of economic activity without extraordinary outside assistance" by 1952–53. Alone and unaided the United Kingdom could not succeed in this endeavour; strengthened by its close contacts with the other members of the Commonwealth, in co-operation with the other participating countries of Western Europe and aided by the generous assistance afforded by the United States under the European Recovery Programme, it is confident of success. As means to this end, the United Kingdom has undertaken in common with the other participating countries to make the fullest use of productive resources, to increase production, to develop and modernise industrial and agricultural equipment, to maintain the stability of its economy, to expand trade and to join in measures to reduce the barriers obstructing it.

2. The Government must give a clear guide as to the direction and intensity of the sustained and strenuous efforts which will be needed to reach these objectives. In present conditions, the quasi-automatic operation of economic forces could not produce the right results or produce them without immense social upheaval. But large-scale and long-term economic planning in time of peace is a novel field for Government initiative in democratic communities. Moreover, it must never be overlooked that for a democracy economic planning is a means to an end and not an end in itself.

3. Economic planning in the United Kingdom is based upon three fundamental facts: the economic fact that the United Kingdom economy must be heavily dependent upon international trade; the political fact that it is and intends to remain a democratic nation with a high degree of individual liberty; and the administrative fact that no economic planning body can be aware (or indeed ever could be aware) of more than the very general trends of future economic developments. Many of the assumptions about the future on which plans must be based are profoundly uncertain and many economic events are wholly outside the control of any one nation; many can only be partially influenced by international agreements, and those such as the effect of weather on the crops are beyond human control. Even in purely domestic economic matters the means of control which can be effectively used within a democracy are limited. Underlying economic uncertainties there is the factor of political stability in the world at large.

4. It is nevertheless essential to prepare long-term forward programmes in those fields of economic activity in which substantial changes will have to be made if the United Kingdom is to overcome those difficulties which lie within its own power, and to play its full share in the combined task before the O.E.E.C. countries as a whole. To follow any other course would be to jeopardise all hope of recovery. But the uncertainty which necessarily attends the future makes it essential that many of the long-term plans must be kept flexible. A persistent adherence to targets or timetables based on assumptions which have been falsified by events might well be as disastrous as leaving the whole matter to chance.

5. For a nation with an open economy like the United Kingdom, the assumptions and forecasts underlying long-term plans are largely assumptions and forecasts about events overseas and these plans cannot be effectively prepared in isolation in its own capital. They need to be formulated and kept under review in collaboration with countries overseas, and especially, in this case, with the other parts of the Commonwealth, with the countries of O.E.E.C., and with the United States. Such consultation will narrow the range of uncertainty about future developments and thus enable the plans to be made more precise and realistic. Still more, it will allow both the plans of the United Kingdom and the plans of other nations to be modified by agreement to mutual advantage. The benefits of a world-wide division of labour must be secured. Until these possibilities are explored, the plans must remain provisional.

6. Finally, recovery must not be bought at the price of arbitrary and excessive interference with the rights of the individual. The United Kingdom intends to make resolute use of its traditional techniques of financial policy and of the direct public control of certain basic industries. A large measure of control will have to be retained over imports, over the total amount of home consumption, and over the scale and composition of investment. But powers of prohibition and compulsion, though they must be used to set limits to economic freedom, must not be allowed except in very special circumstances to infringe the personal freedom of the individual. The execution, as well as the preparation, of plans must be based upon the willing co-operation and understanding of the general public.

7. For the United Kingdom, therefore, a long-term plan can be no more and no less than a statement of economic strategy. It will not attempt to be a complete and rigid set of instructions for several years ahead. Certain of its parts will be worked out in detail, but its main purpose will be to provide the framework within which more precise short-term plans can subsequently be worked out. The practice of preparing annual programmes has already been established in the United Kingdom and this system has been adapted to the needs and opportunities of the European Recovery Programme in the programmes submitted for 1948–49 and 1949–50. These annual programmes are the necessary instruments with which the broad stategic plans contained in the Long-Term Programme will be given precise content. The United Kingdom hopes, therefore, that the joint discussion and revision of this draft of its Long-Term Programme, side by side with the programmes of the other countries of O.E.E.C., will result in a joint programme and a set of national programmes that will be clear and effective guides in the preparation of the detailed plans in the coming years.

(2) THE PROBLEM BEFORE THE UNITED KINGDOM

8. The crucial immediate problem for the United Kingdom, as for all member nations of the O.E.E.C., is the balance of payments. In some respects, however, the United Kingdom's problem differs from that which faces Europe as a whole.

9. For Europe as a whole in 1947 imports had increased and exports decreased by comparison with 1938; net incomes from shipping and investment had fallen and the world rise in prices had enormously enhanced the monetary measure of the increased deficit. These changes were accompanied by very large structural changes in the pattern of intra-European trade and payments.

10. By contrast the United Kingdom by 1947 had already increased the volume of visible exports to 9 per cent. above 1938; and visible imports were kept 20–25 per cent. below the 1938 level, despite the greatly increased volume of employment and output. Though the terms of trade were 15 per cent. worse than in 1938—in contrast with the experience of most other O.E.E.C. countries—the proceeds of exports paid for a far greater proportion of imports than in 1938. This was a great achievement; but it was more than offset by the loss of investment revenue, and by the increase in necessary Government overseas expenditure caused by the aftermath of war. The result was a current deficit of £630 million in 1947 compared with only some £70 million in 1938. The figures are summarised in the following Table :—

	1938	1947
Total Payments for Imports (f.o.b.) ...	835	1,540
Receipts for Exports and Re-exports	533	1,102
Deficit on Visible Trade	−302	−438
Invisibles (Net)	+232	−192
Total Deficit	− 70	−630

11. The deficit in 1947 was due wholly to a deficit with the Western Hemisphere of £670 million ($2,700 million); with the remainder of the world the United Kingdom had, in fact, a small surplus. In 1947 by far the gravest problem was therefore the dollar problem.

12. In 1947 the gold and dollar reserves of the sterling area (including the expenditure of loan resources) were subject to a net drain of $4,100 million, of which over $800 million was on account of the rest of the sterling area. These reserves are, of course, the reserves of the sterling area as a whole. Very large reductions have already been made in this outflow during 1948; in the first half of the year the net outflow was at an annual rate of little over $2,000 million, half that of 1947.

(3) NATURE OF THE SOLUTION PROPOSED

13. The task before the United Kingdom for the next four years, as for the other participating countries, is to close the gap in the balance of payments and to overcome the shortages of essential commodities which were experienced even when expenditure on imports exceeded overseas income by so large a margin. A wide variety of policies must work together to this end.

14. Total home production must be increased. This requires steady increases in productivity and the maintenance of stable financial conditions. Exports must be expanded, and the proportion of imports coming from non-dollar sources must be increased. The general policies which it is intended to follow on these matters are set out in Chapter II.

15. A number of particular industries have especially important parts to play. These are described in Chapter III.

16. A large home investment programme and a careful control of its composition are clearly of great importance. This is discussed in Chapter IV, while Chapter V deals with investment in overseas territories.

17. If these policies are carried through successfully and are accompanied by the development of international collaboration on the one hand and on the other by the continuance of external aid on an adequate scale, it is believed that the objective of stable and satisfactory economic conditions independent of outside aid can be achieved in the United Kingdom in 1952–53. Chapter VI sets out estimates of the balance of payments that might be reached and indicates some of the problems associated with it.

18. In Chapter VII the consequences of the policies and programmes set out in Chapters II–VI to the levels of activity and consumption in 1952–53 are briefly described. Finally, this Chapter emphasises the vital parts which external assistance and international collaboration must play in the development and execution of this programme.

19. Before commencing the full exposition it may be convenient to summarise at the outset certain essential features of these policies.

20. This Programme pays full regard to the obligations entered into under the Convention for European Economic Co-operation signed in Paris on 16th April, 1948, and the Economic Co-operation Agreement with the United States Government signed in London on 6th July, 1948. It is submitted to the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation as a contribution towards the preparation of a joint recovery programme.

21. It has been prepared on the assumption that the obligations of the European Convention will be continuously and progressively implemented during the period to 1952, and that the co-operation thus achieved will continue to bear fruit in later years. The results it is hoped to achieve would be impossible without the continuance of external assistance during the period of recovery and without the closest co-operation with the participating countries and with the other countries of the British Commonwealth.

22. A major objective of the United Kingdom's programme is the maintenance of sterling as an international currency : this in itself is a positive contribution to international economic stability. In order to secure this objective the maintenance of the sterling area gold and dollar reserves is essential.

23. The policies and programmes described are designed to solve both the general balance of payments problem and within this the particular problem of the balance with the Western Hemisphere. The solution of the former is seen to lie much more in the continued increase of overseas earnings than in a reduction of overseas payments. Thus exports in 1952–3 are estimated at 150 per cent. of the volume of 1938, and 38 per cent. above the level achieved in 1947. A very great improvement is also sought in the balance of invisible payments, including under this term earnings from oil. Net invisible earnings are estimated to yield in 1952–53 over $1,000 million against some $950 million, at the present exchange rate in 1938, and a deficit in 1947 of nearly $800 million. Aggregate imports, after allowing for a measure of overseas investment, are expected to remain at around the level now programmed for 1948–9, somewhat above the 1947 level, but still significantly less than pre-war.

24. The programme shows a potential solution of the Western Hemisphere payments problem along the following lines. Starting from the huge deficit of $2,700 million in 1947, it shows a gain in net invisibles of some $600 million, largely due to shipping, oil and tourism. It allows for an expansion of export earnings of $800 million, an increase of some 120 per cent. above the 1947 level, and a reduction of imports of $1,000 million. Even these large changes will still leave some $300 million to be covered by gold or dollar earnings from the rest of the sterling area. These increases in exports and invisibles presuppose an immense effort, and it should be made quite clear that the reduction in imports from the 1947 level is in no way conceived as desirable in itself. This reduction, much of which has already taken place, is in the main a return towards the traditional distribution of imports from the distorted pattern of 1947 when the United Kingdom, in common with other European countries, was abnormally dependent on supplies from the Western Hemisphere. On present evidence it is not now thought realistic to estimate direct earnings of Western Hemisphere currencies at a higher figure than here shown, or to rely upon earning more gold and dollars by trade with the rest of the world. If in the event it proves possible to increase these earnings further, the Western Hemisphere import programme can be readily increased to the advantage of the United Kingdom economy and without modification to other plans.

25. The eventual balance of payments shown is consistent with levels of production and consumption substantially higher than the present. This is due not so much to the increase in imports over 1947, as to the fact that home production is planned to increase by more than is needed to provide the additional exports. The expansion of home agriculture will enable the level of food consumption to rise considerably above that of 1948–49. Manufacturing output, supported by the increased output of steel and by provision in the import programme of a higher scale of raw material supplies, can be about 25 per cent. above 1947, and the supply of capital equipment to industry about 15 per cent. above.

(4) PROGRESS SINCE 1947

26. The attainment of such levels clearly calls for a sustained effort from the British people. But the substantial progress achieved during the first half of 1948 is solid evidence that it will be forthcoming.

27. The improvement in the balance of payments has been striking. The following table compares the provisional estimate of the balance in the first half of 1948 (expressed as an annual rate) with the figures for 1947 and the estimates for 1952–53 given in Chapter VI :—

UNITED KINGDOM BALANCE OF PAYMENTS ON CURRENT ACCOUNT

(A) With all Areas

	1947 (Current Prices)	1948 (Annual rate) January–June (Current Prices)	($ million) 1952–53 (Programme Prices)
Total payments for Imports	6,206	7,150	8,030
Receipts from Exports and Re-exports ...	4,441	5,892	7,377
Deficit on Visible Trade	− 1,765	− 1,258	− 653
Invisibles (Net)	− 774	+ 130	+ 1,053
Balance on Current Account	− 2,539	− 1,128	+ 400

(B) With Western Hemisphere

Total payments for Imports	2,885	2,370	1,888
Receipts from Exports and Re-exports ...	661	944	1,455
Deficit on Visible Trade	− 2,224	− 1,426	− 433
Invisibles (Net)	− 476	− 146	+ 142
Balance on Current Account	− 2,748	− 1,572	− 291

Moreover, as already stated, the net drain on gold and dollar resources in the first half of 1948 was at a rate only half of that ruling in 1947.

28. Similar progress has been made with home production. The index of industrial production for the second quarter of 1948 stood at 13 per cent. above the average of 1947. During the same three months, coal production averaged 9 per cent. above the same quarter last year. In the first six months of 1948 steel production was at the annual rate of 15¼ million tons compared with a total output of 12¾ million tons in 1947. During the second quarter of 1948 cotton yarn output was nearly 20 per cent. above the average for 1947 and rayon yarn about 20 per cent. above. The total value of production of agricultural machinery in the second quarter of 1948 was $67 millions compared with a quarterly average in 1947 of $44 millions. There has been a marked expansion over last year in livestock numbers and in the amount of land under cultivation. Poultry flocks have increased by a fifth and the number of pigs by a third. The rate of exports in the second quarter of 1948 was already more than half-way between that of 1947 and the rate now expected to be maintained in 1952–53 and later years. The increases in the exports of engineering products and textiles are especially notable. Many other examples of steady progress could be given to illustrate the distance the United Kingdom has already gone along the road to recovery.

CHAPTER II.—GENERAL POLICIES

29. In this chapter are described the policies of a general nature that the United Kingdom intends to adopt in order to guide the nation's effort in the economic field during the next four years. These general policies are fundamental to the success of the more detailed plans and programmes described in subsequent chapters.

(1) THE PROMOTION OF UNDERSTANDING AND COMMON EFFORT

30. The difficulties of the present economic position do not present themselves in an obvious form to the British public. Unemployment is barely noticeable; jobs are apparently secure; industry is finding it easy to earn profits; wages are relatively high; the necessities of life are more fairly distributed than ever before; and because they cannot buy many necessaries, many people have money which they can spend on things which they would otherwise regard almost as luxuries. A real and grave crisis in economic affairs seems remote and unreal. At the same time many workers have in the background of their minds the unemployment between the wars. This comes to the surface when the practical problems of changes in the structure of industry involve changes of employment, and, perhaps, the risk of unemployment in the transition.

31. For this reason it has been, ever since the end of the war, the policy of the United Kingdom Government to give the people at all times the fullest information about the realities of the economic situation, and to impress upon them the need for a high level of production. A large volume of statistics of current economic affairs is published monthly; and every year there is issued an Economic Survey in which immediate needs, prospects and policies are explained as fully and forcibly as possible. Modern techniques of publicity are used to explain and bring home the contents of these surveys, and generally to make known to the nation its fundamental economic problems and the policies necessary for their solution.

32. Techniques of joint consultation between Government, management and labour in the preparation and execution of plans have been widely developed. These are essential to the efficiency of democratic planning and to the promotion of a proper understanding of national problems. At the highest national level the Economic Planning Board, the National Joint Advisory Council and the National Production Advisory Council for Industry are particularly concerned with general policies. For particular industries the Departments concerned have their own machinery for consulting the management and trade union side of such industries at the national level. At the Regional level the Regional Boards for Industry (represented by their chairmen on the National Production Advisory Council for Industry) bring together the regional officers of Government Departments and the two sides of industry. The general purpose of all these consultative bodies is similar; they provide a regular means of consultation between Government, management and labour.

(2) FISCAL POLICY

33. The central principle which guides the financial policy of the United Kingdom was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in opening his budget on 6th April, 1948, "Government expenditure and revenue ought not to be considered in isolation from their effects upon the general economic prospects of the country. . . . . The new task of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not merely to balance the budget; it is a much wider one—to match our resources against our needs so that the main features of our economy may be worked out for the benefit of the community as a whole."

34. In order to make the fullest use of the available resources, the fiscal policy of the Government must be directed to the maintenance of a high level of employment. It became evident in the course of the year 1947 that a persisting inflationary pressure, originating in the necessities of financing a total war, was liable to impede the course of recovery. The pressure of home demand was competing with the needs of the export drive, both directly and through its tendency to drive up costs and prices. At the same time, an abnormal prosperity was being experienced by all industries, which hindered the best use of resources because of its effect upon the expansion of those industries whose products were most urgently needed from the national point of view. Both the supplementary budget of November 1947 and the budget for the fiscal year 1948–49 were designed to correct this situation. In opening the 1948 budget, the Chancellor stated one of its principal objectives in the following words: "Sufficient purchasing power must be withheld by taxation and by voluntary saving to offset the purchasing power created by public expenditure and capital investment." Since the current level of voluntary savings was inadequate to finance the investment programme, the 1948 budget was designed to produce a surplus of revenue over current expenditure of £780 million (over 3 billion dollars), which was expected not only to meet the capital expenditure of the Government but to provide a further sum estimated at about £321 million (over $1\frac{1}{4}$ billion dollars) towards the total saving needed to offset private investment.

35. Thus the policy of public finance is to maintain full employment but to counter any inflationary pressure arising from a deficiency of voluntary saving in relation to the projected level of investment. The application of this policy is a matter of considerable delicacy and it is clearly impossible to forecast the particular form which will be taken by subsequent budgets. The investment policy described elsewhere in this programme, which plays a large part in the plans for recovery, is placing, and will place, a heavy strain on British resources, particularly in view of the objective to eliminate the present overseas deficit within the period of four years.

36. If a deficiency in demand became apparent, the policy of full employment would require an appropriate change in fiscal policy. To quote again from the 1948 budget speech "We must watch the situation carefully and be ready to detect the moment when the inflationary pressure vanishes and gives place to deflationary tendencies; if such a thing should happen, we must then make a rapid readjustment of our economic and financial policies."

37. Within this general framework the fiscal provisions should encourage the general increase in productivity which is looked for during the recovery period; while the system of indirect taxation and of subsidies contributes towards a general policy of price and wage stabilisation. To encourage productive effort the 1948 budget made considerable reductions in the burden of direct taxation on earned incomes and the rates paid on the lower ranges of income were reduced. The policy of food subsidies, which was designed to keep down the costs of essential foodstuffs and thus to support the general objective of costs stabilisation referred to in the following section, was continued. One of the problems of an inflationary situation is the difficulty of securing the redeployment of labour into the more essential but not always the more attractive industries, and the present fiscal policy, accompanied by the measures described below, is designed to assist this movement.

(3) POLICY IN RESPECT OF PERSONAL INCOMES

38. A general increase in the level of personal incomes unless matched by increased production would merely raise costs and prices, imperilling the drive for exports and imposing hardships on all those with fixed incomes. Ultimately a continued movement of this kind must bring economic ruin and social breakdown. All are agreed that it must be prevented. In the United Kingdom wages are determined by collective bargaining. These methods of free negotiation and agreement have had great success. In the last three years only 10 million days' work have been lost in industrial disputes compared with practically 150 million in the same period after the first world war. It is the Government's constant concern to assist the two sides of industry in developing their machinery for joint negotiation and the settlement of disputes. Owing to the awareness by both sides of industry of their responsibilities, movements of wages and prices have not been so rapid as to cause fears of a runaway inflation. The Government has, however, issued a statement setting out certain vital principles for the guidance of those responsible for determining the level of personal incomes from whatever source. The Government at the same time announced as its policy that when remuneration is increased in any class of employment there can be no presumption, whatever may have been the practice in the past, that the resulting costs will be taken into account in settling controlled prices, charges or margins, or other financial matters requiring Government action. Another problem which is being faced in the United Kingdom concerns traditional or customary relationships between personal incomes which tend to persist in spite of changed conditions. The important industries now short of manpower have in the past been generally the worst paid, and there has been general approval of the movement which has greatly improved the relative earnings of coalminers, farm workers, textile workers and others in essential occupations.

(4) SPECIFIC MEASURES TO SECURE THE REDEPLOYMENT OF MANPOWER

39. Certain specific measures to secure the redeployment of manpower have also been adopted. Publicity has been used to dispel exaggerated beliefs about conditions in undermanned industries, and to explain the national importance of recruitment to them. In certain cases priority has been given to the building work required to modernise and improve working conditions and to the construction of new houses and hostels in areas where shortage of accommodation is an obstacle.

40. In 1947 certain direct controls were reintroduced. By one Order employers were required to engage their workers. and workers were required to take their jobs, through the machinery of the national employment service. By another, unoccupied persons of certain categories were required to register for employment. Both orders were supported by the use of the Minister of Labour's powers compulsorily to direct labour to specific employment. The great majority of workers, however, willingly accepted guidance into essential employment and direction has been used only in a very few cases when a worker has refused to take any form of essential work. The need for continuance of these direct controls is kept continually under review.

(5) IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION

41. Both to assist in recruitment for essential undermanned industries and also to make a contribution to the problem of displaced persons and of the mobility of European labour reserves, the United Kingdom has welcomed a substantial body of immigrants. Since the end of the war nearly 200,000 foreign workers have been settled here on a permanent basis. Some 70,000 of these were displaced persons, and indeed in this way the United Kingdom has afforded asylum for more displaced persons than any other country in the world. Many other immigrants who have settled permanently were at one time members of the Allied Forces, particularly Poles. In addition, permits for some 50,000 other foreign workers have been issued for employment on an individual basis. All workers so admitted have, of course, been employed at wages and on conditions not less favourable than those applicable to British workers. For the future, for any approved demands which cannot be met by British workers recourse will be had in accordance with existing policy to the recruitment of foreign workers, subject to adequate housing being available. As regards emigration, it is open to British subjects to leave the country as they wish and to move to any countries which are ready to receive them, though that movement is in fact hampered by lack of shipping facilities and by exchange limitations. In the case of schemes approved on economic and other grounds, the Government facilitates recruitment and movement of persons of the kind which the receiving country desires to secure.

(6) POLICIES RELATING TO PRODUCTIVITY

42. The labour force of the United Kingdom is now fully occupied and the numbers available for work may be somewhat less in five years' time. The proportion of the total population which is of working age is becoming smaller, while the average age of the working population is increasing. Increased productivity per head is therefore the only means of solving the present economic difficulties while maintaining and improving the standard of living.

43. Increased productivity partly depends on the maintenance and improvement of capital equipment, both building and machinery. This is recognised in the investment programmes discussed in Chapters III and IV but, as there explained, there are severe limitations on what can be done, and careful measures have therefore been adopted to put the available resources to the best uses, and so make good shortages of new equipment by the more efficient use of existing plant, e.g., by improved layout and adaptation. Improvements in productivity also depend on an adequate flow of raw materials. In regulating import programmes care has to be taken to see that this is not checked by avoidable shortages of imported supplies.

44. In addition research has an important part to play. The contribution of the State to industrial research has been greatly increased, directly through the research establishments administered by the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research and indirectly through Industrial Research Associations fostered and financially assisted by the Department, of which there are now thirty-six. Much of the work of these bodies will only bear fruit after a long interval; but they are being encouraged to concentrate on the solution of immediate problems and on the widest and most prompt dissemination of their findings. There is also being set up a National Research and Development Corporation, financed from public funds, to take over inventions from Government Research Stations and universities, develop them to the stage at which they are commercially useful and license them out to industry. The Corporation will also take up private inventions of public interest which would otherwise fail to be properly developed. These are steps undertaken by the State. The research expenditure of private industrial firms is equally important. It has recently been estimated that this expenditure is now ten times as great as it was before the War. The combination of intensive research with the traditional skills of British industry will ensure that United Kingdom products remain in the van of technical progress.

45. Most active efforts are being made to increase technical skills. There are to-day twice as many students in the scientific and technological faculties of the Universities as there were in 1938; there are more than twice as many in Technical Colleges. The number of young employees released in working hours for technical education has been quadrupled. The limitation on still further expansion is mainly one of premises; special attention is being given to this in the investment programme. A number of National Colleges for advanced technological education for particular industries are being established. The creation of apprenticeship schemes has the active support of the Ministry of Labour and the training of supervisory workers on the lines of the Training Within Industry Scheme introduced in the United States during the war has been promoted with considerable success. The Ministry of Labour also provides intensive courses in skilled crafts for adults needing this training.

46. The average level of effort, the intensity and length of work, and the adaptability of labour are greatly influenced by a better understanding of economic problems. Information policy seeks to secure this, while fiscal policy attempts to ensure that monetary incentives can operate effectively by maintaining a reasonable stability of prices and money values. Joint consultation between management and employees in industry, which is being developed with the encouragement and assistance of the Government, is also helping toward an effective productive effort.

47. Managements throughout the country are seeking to improve managerial efficiency. To encourage this process, the Government has financed the setting up of the British Institute of Management to collect and spread information on the best management practice, to undertake further research and to encourage education in this field. The research organisations already mentioned also have an important part to play. The object in all this work is especially to raise the level of the bad and the less good to that of the best.

48. This desire for greater productive efficiency must not be impeded by monopolistic practices. Recent legislation has made provision for a Monopolies and Restrictive Practices Commission to enquire into any industrial and commercial arrangements of a restrictive or monopolistic character which are referred to it by the Government. Power has been taken to deal by Order, subject to the approval of Parliament, with arrangements which are found to operate against the public interest.

49. In the whole matter of productivity valuable advice is expected to be obtained from the joint Anglo-American Council which is being set up by the two sides of industry, by British and American management and labour, to exchange information about their industrial experience.

50. There is clear evidence that the measures taken so far are meeting with a substantial response. It is broadly estimated that during the past two years the volume of physical output per worker in manufacturing industry has regained the pre-war level. An important contribution to this remarkable progress has, of course, been the maintenance of industrial peace to a much greater extent than might have been expected in this difficult period of readjustment or as compared with the experience in the corresponding period after the 1914–18 war.

(7) CONTROLS OVER HOME PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

51. Many types of food, fuel and clothing are at present rationed and the Government controls the prices of nearly all foodstuffs and consumer goods and of many raw materials and semi-manufactured goods as well as the charges for some services. These consumer rationing schemes are necessary to-day to secure " fair shares " of essential goods in short supply and to moderate inflationary forces. More directly affecting specific production plans, both in industry and agriculture, are licensing controls over production and allocation or rationing schemes for materials. In the past these have, in conjunction with price controls over certain materials and semi-manufactured goods, served the same anti-inflationary purposes as consumption controls, and they have moderated the severe dislocations that maldistribution and scarce supplies would have caused. They have, moreover, immensely helped the export drive and the breaking of particular bottlenecks in home production, and secured the devotion of productive resources to the most essential purposes.

52. All these rationing schemes are costly in money and in manpower to administer but the possibility of bringing them to an end depends upon a variety of factors, such, for instance, as the balance between demand and supply, the need to secure fair shares of essentials, and, in the case of food, the securing of proper nutritional standards. It cannot be entirely a coincidence that despite the strain of war and the limitation of supplies of many valuable foodstuffs in the last few years, the general health of the British population has continued to improve, as may particularly be seen from the trend of the infant and maternal mortality rates.

53. Controls over production, however exercised, undoubtedly restrain initiative and enterprise. They are being simplified wherever possible. They are means to an end, not ends in themselves, and will be abolished as soon as their advantages appear to be outweighed by their disadvantages. But they will be retained so long as they are needed to implement production plans and in some cases it is unlikely that they can be relaxed for several years.

54. For the future, food rationing will have to be continued as long as is necessary to secure the allied objectives of fair shares and nutritional standards. Other rationing schemes for essential consumer goods can be removed as demand and supply come more into balance.

(8) THE STRENGTH OF STERLING

55. The external economic policies of the United Kingdom to which the remainder of this Chapter is devoted have as their primary objective the attainment of a stable balance of payments. The governing principle behind them is that the sterling area gold and dollar reserves must be maintained throughout the period of the economic recovery programme, and that in consequence expenditure of gold and dollars must be limited to the amount of gold and dollars earned together with the amount of external aid received.

56. The whole of the United Kingdom's balance of payments policy thus rests on the maintenance and strengthening of sterling as an international currency. Not only is this vital to the immediate interests of the United Kingdom; it is equally important to the other members of the sterling area and to all other countries which conduct much of their trade in sterling. This policy is itself a positive contribution to international economic stability.

(9) EXPORT POLICY

57. Among policies dealing directly with the problem of the overseas deficit, the expansion of exports takes first place. But it is obvious that it is impossible to " plan " to sell a given volume of exports in any given period since a willingness abroad to buy is as important as the United Kingdom's capacity to supply. A number of domestic policies are directed to ensuring that, wherever possible, ample supplies are available for export. The Government has established the practice of laying down each year, in consultation with each industry, a series of export targets, and has appealed to industry, with very considerable success, to co-operate in reaching them as a matter of national endeavour. Supporting this voluntary effort, general fiscal measures help to prevent the pressure of home demand from restricting export supplies and to secure that production for export is at least as profitable as production for the home market. So long as physical controls over raw materials and production are available, they provide a further means of seeing that production for export is kept at the highest possible level.

58. The means open to Government of directing exports to particular markets are necessarily limited. The growth of British exports rests on innumerable separate transactions. The building of a connection for a steady trade in any individual market is slow and costly and it is rarely possible to switch selling effort quickly from one line or market to another. The policy of the Government has, therefore, been to indicate in broad terms the markets to which it attaches most importance. Special emphasis has been laid on sales to the Western Hemisphere, and assistance is given to manufacturers seeking to promote such exports. These efforts will, however, be fruitless unless exporters are given the opportunity to enter these markets.

59. As already pointed out, neither these nor any other export policies can guarantee a given expansion of exports. Planning cannot be based upon an ideal figure: it must work on a realistic assessment of probable trends. In the provisional estimates of the overseas balance in 1952–53 given in Chapter VI, the volume of exports of 150 per cent. of 1938 has, for reasons there stated, been taken as such a realistic assessment. But it is in no sense a maximum and policy will be adapted to achieve a higher level if sales opportunities allow.

(10) IMPORT POLICY

60. The nature of British imports, which are mainly primary products, is such that planning measures can be applied so far as this is necessary. Despite the utmost exertions in the export field, the volume of imports is bound to remain below the pre-war level well beyond 1952–53, and Government control over imports is expected to be required in 1952–53 and for some years thereafter.

61. In addition to the need to keep imports down to a total consistent with its overseas earnings, the United Kingdom is compelled to pay careful regard to the sources from which it secures these imports. The achievement of a stable balance of payments requires, according to any realistic analysis of possible world economic trends, a change in the distribution of imports from the acutely distorted pattern of 1947. In particular, as is explained in more detail in Chapter VI, imports from the Western Hemisphere in 1952–53 seems likely to be some 17½ per cent. below the planned level for 1948–49, which is in turn below the 1947 level. This contraction, which is a matter of necessity and not choice, involves a considerable change in the source of supply of a number of commodities. In the majority of cases the increased production in the sterling area is being achieved by private capital in the ordinary course of business. Special Governmental arrangements are, however, made, especially as regards food supplies, and these often take the form of long-term contracts to give assurance to the producer of a market for his crop. Developments in the associated overseas territories are described in Chapter V.

(11) THE OBJECTIVE OF MULTILATERALISM

62. The prospective position of the United Kingdom in 1952–53, as set out in Chapter VI, underlines the importance of working for the application of multilateral principles of trade and finance over increasingly wide areas. The United Kingdom's balance of payments policy is designed to encourage movement as fast as possible in this direction. The impossibility of maintaining the convertibility of sterling which was attempted in 1947 made it necessary to embark upon a system of bilateral agreements in order to secure the continuance of as large a volume of international trade as possible. But these agreements have been expressly directed to expand trade by allowing each party to use its purchasing power in the other country in the way that suits it best and thus to maintain the exporter's confidence in the continuance of his market and to counter any danger of a downward spiral in international trade. Throughout the difficult post-war period the United Kingdom has remained the centre of the largest multilateral trading system in the world—the sterling area—and has sought, wherever possible, to extend the field of uses to which sterling can be put. During the E.R.P. period the United Kingdom will seek progressively to widen the scope of multilateral trade and payments agreements. It has already taken its full share in the formulation of the new Intra-European Payments Scheme.

63. In considering the long-term O.E.E.C. programme, the United Kingdom would, therefore, deprecate attempts to work towards complete bilateral balance even between broad geographical groups. On present calculations, it seems likely that the sterling area as a whole will tend to be in surplus with the other participating countries. It is not expected that in the early 'fifties the other participating countries will in general be able to finance such a surplus in dollars or gold, and so contribute to meeting the United Kingdom's dollar deficit. But it is thought possible that part of this surplus could be matched against the sterling area's deficit with certain other non-participating countries in the Middle East, in Eastern Europe and in South America. For example if the sterling area were in deficit with Brazil, and if France had a surplus with Brazil and a deficit with the sterling area of the same amount, it would be possible to clear these deficits against one another provided that appropriate payments arrangements existed. The development of multilateral payments arrangements between the participating countries and their monetary areas should not be allowed to develop in any way which would prejudice the matching of surpluses and deficits over a much wider field.

64. How fast the United Kingdom will be able to modify its own trading and financial policies in the direction of a more complete multilateralism depends upon a number of factors outside its control. No multilateral system can work while large disequilibria exist in important trading countries' balances of payments either in the creditor or debtor sense. The necessary structural changes have to be made in each country's pattern of production, consumption and trade before a sound multilateral system can be firmly established.

(12) THE EXPANSION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

65. Subject to the overriding objective of achieving a balance of payments, it is the policy of the United Kingdom to expand the total volume of international trade to take the fullest advantage of the international division of labour. To this end it has participated in international negotiations designed to reduce the obstacles to the free interchange of world production and services.

66. As regards the obligations assumed by signatories under Article 6 of the Convention, the Government of the United Kingdom, by their provisional application from 1st January, 1948, of the commitments under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade for the reduction or elimination of a number of tariffs and preferences, have already taken practical steps towards the fulfilment of the objectives both of the Convention and of the Havana Charter as is recognised by Article 17 (3) of the latter document. They are continuing as Contracting Parties to the General Agreement to co-operate with other countries in discussions directed to the expansion of international trade on a multilateral basis. The United Kingdom will take part in the further tariff negotiations to be held next April with the object of bringing a number of additional countries within the scope of the General Agreement.

67. The shipping policy of the United Kingdom has been directed to the removal of all obstacles to the free international circulation of shipping. In particular, the United Kingdom has been active in the promotion of the Convention for the setting up of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organisation, one of the objectives of which is to "encourage the removal of discriminatory action and unnecessary restrictions by Governments affecting shipping engaged in international trade so as to promote the availability of shipping services to the commerce of the world without discrimination."

(13) INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

68. The external policies described in the preceeding five sections will require for their successful fulfilment a very large measure of international co-operation with the other participating countries and the other countries of the British Commonwealth in all matters affecting overseas trade and economic affairs. In particular they imply a continuous observance of the principles laid down in the Convention for European Economic Co-operation and the Economic Co-operation Agreement with the United States Government. As part of this co-operative endeavour the United Kingdom attaches special importance to the studies of the "fields of activity" which are being undertaken by the O.E.E.C. in order to expand the production of essential supplies by, or in collaboration with, the participating countries. It is hoped that other projects likely to offer prospects for successful co-operation will suggest themselves when the national programmes are jointly examined in Paris. The United Kingdom will play its full part both in the exploratory work and in implementing any agreed projects that may emerge.

CHAPTER III.—MAJOR INDUSTRIAL PLANS

69. This chapter discusses the production policies of various industries which will have a large part to play in the economic recovery of the United Kingdom.

(1) AGRICULTURE

70. Before the war imports of food and feeding-stuffs accounted for 47 per cent. of total imports. Plans were announced in 1947 which sought to secure by 1952 an increase in the net value of annual agricultural output 15 per cent. above the wartime peak of 1943–44. This should yield in terms of calories for human consumption one-third more than before the war. In addition increased home output will save the equivalent of 4 million tons of imported feeding-stuffs. Production at this level would exceed the highest output hitherto known by the agricultural industry.

71. The production targets for the principal crops and livestock products for 1952–53 as compared with figures for earlier years are as follows :—

	'000 metric tons
	1934–38 Average	1947–48 Actual	1948–49 Programme	1952–53 Programme

Separate figures for production of the main livestock products may be summarised as follows :—

	1952–53 as per cent. of 1936–39
Milk	123
Beef and Veal	110
Mutton and Lamb	83
Pigmeat	92
Eggs	131

72. The acreage of wheat in 1951–52 has been set at $2\frac{3}{4}$ million acres. This is considered to be the highest that can be maintained as a permanent feature of British farming without an acute distortion of the general farming pattern and a loss of soil fertility. As the supply of alternative foods improves it is intended to reduce the area devoted to potatoes to approximately 50 per cent. above pre-war. Vigorous efforts are being made to extend the cultivation of linseed, a new crop which is of particular value as a source of cattle cake and of oil for industrial purposes.

73. The expansion of livestock production necessitates larger acreages under coarse grains and other fodder crops if dependence on imported feedingstuffs is to be reduced. Substantial improvements are being planned in grass production and grass drying. Special emphasis is being laid on ley farming as a means of maintaining the arable acreage and at the same time improving the yield of grass for feeding purposes. The planned increases in livestock production are very large by comparison with current levels of output, which reflect the shortage of feedingstuffs, the results of the wartime reduction of flocks and herds and, particularly in the case of sheep and lambs, the heavy loss in the hard winter of 1946–47.

74. The following specific measures for achieving the objectives may be mentioned :—

(a) Provision of Farm Buildings.—It is hoped to provide approximately $400 million of farm buildings in the next four years. These include steel Dutch barns and buildings to house grain-drying plant.

(b) Provision of Machinery.—Rapid progress has been made over recent years in the mechanisation of United Kingdom agriculture, and it is now one of the most highly mechanised in the world. The number of tractors of all kinds in use has risen from some 50,000 in 1939 to over 250,000 to-day and big developments have taken place in the employment of other implements. Over the next four years farms will require replacements and new machinery at the rate of $200 million a year. The total tractor strength will be maintained at about 275,000 to 300,000, the increase over mid-1948 being mainly in the number of heavy types, including crawlers; the number of combine harvesters will rise from 6,500 to at least 11,000, which is the figure planned for 1950, and grass driers from 400 to at least 1,500 The United Kingdom already supplies most of her own requirements of agricultural machinery and has developed a substantial and expanding export trade which is of increasing assistance to other participating countries and to world food production generally. Research workers are examining the problems of agricultural mechanisation, including the standardisation of machinery.

(c) Fertilisers.—The quantity used in 1947–48 was more than double that used before the war, but consumption will need to be further increased by at least one-fifth if the expansion programme is to be carried out. Despite the fact that this year more fertilisers have been produced in the United Kingdom than ever before, the country is still dependent upon imports. For example, all supplies of potash and phosphate rock have to be imported.

(d) Maintenance and Improvement of Land Drainage and Water Supplies.—By 1952–53 $60 million will have been spent on improving main arterial water courses. About 2½ million acres of land will be improved by the clearance of farm ditches and field drainage during the next four years at a cost of $36 million. About $32 million will be spent on providing piped water supplies to farms. Between 1 and 1½ million acres will benefit.

(e) Feedingstuffs.—Imports of feedingstuffs included in the programme for 1952–53 though more than at present, will still be below the pre-war level. The increased production of feedingstuffs at home is therefore vital to the expansion in livestock. Subject to the maximum practicable production of bread grains, farmers are at present allowed to grow fodder crops, e.g., oats, mixed corn, and to retain these crops for feeding to their own stock; they may also retain strictly limited quantities of wheat, rye and barley. There is strict control of distribution and methods of utilisation both of bread grains and of animal feedingstuffs, and virtually all the feedingstuffs imported, manufactured within the country, or sold off farms are distributed through the feedingstuffs rationing scheme. Quantities of grain of their own growing retained by farmers are taken into account in the allocation of feedingstuffs rations to them. As stated in paragraphs 47–51, controls must be continued for some considerable time, but may need to be modified to conform with the increased home production of fodder crops and with the changes in imports of feedingstuffs so that the best use is made of all available resources for achieving the desired expansion of livestock production.

(f) Finance.—The total fixed investment required in the industry in four years up to the end of 1952 is estimated at approximately $1,800 million, about half of which will be spent on machinery. Prices of farm products have been raised to help the farmer to finance this investment and to increase his livestock. Ad hoc grants or subsidies are also given to encourage desirable developments such as the ploughing up of grassland of three years or over. The Government has undertaken to reimburse Artificial Insemination Centres for any losses they may incur in the early years of their activity. Under the price-fixing mechanism of the Agriculture Act 1947, the farmer is assured that the prices of crops will be fixed eighteen months ahead and, in the case of livestock and livestock products, minimum prices are made known two to four years ahead.

75. The fulfilment of the programme depends ultimately on the skill and initiative of the farming community. Each county has an Agricultural Executive Committee, consisting of representatives of farmers, landworkers and landowners to ensure by propaganda and persuasion that the crop targets are achieved and to assist farmers by the hire of machinery and supplementary labour, by contract services and by the provision of short-term credit facilities. Working with these committees is the National Agricultural Advisory Service of about 1,300 qualified technical officers, available to advise farmers on all questions of technical improvement and efficient production. Special attention is being given to grassland improvement. Where advisory methods fail to secure greater efficiency, the Agricultural Act 1947 gives the County Agricultural Executive Committee powers to enforce standards of good husbandry, even to the point of dispossessing inefficient farmers. The Act also enables the Minister of Agriculture, subject to Parliamentary approval, and for one year at a time, to authorise the committees to issue directions to farmers in order to maintain the national food supply. These powers have been invoked, where necessary, in order to ensure the essential expansion of the tillage area in 1949. Corresponding powers and machinery exist in Scotland.

76. Agricultural research will play an important part in raising efficiency. The Research Institutes guided by the Agricultural Research Council are very active, and an Agricultural Improvement Council sees that the results of research are made known and used. A series of experimental husbandry farms and horticultural stations has been set up to enable research workers to test the results of their research work under practical farming conditions.

77. The expansion programme will require about 75,000 more civilian agricultural workers than in 1946. The provision of more rural housing to enable the recruitment of more British workers and their families is an important part of the campaign. Farm workers are not called up for military service. 32,000 Poles and European Volunteer Workers had been recruited for permanent settlement by June 1948. Most of these workers are being accommodated for the time being in hostels. In addition 23,000 German prisoners of war have been allowed to stay as civilians at their own request.

78. The programme will still leave the United Kingdom the world's greatest food importer, and it would certainly be the Government's hope that, if the means of payment could be found, a still larger volume of food and feedingstuffs imports than is shown in the 1952–53 estimates could be acquired.

79. Fishing.—By 1952, about eighty new trawlers will be in commission with an average capacity of up to 700,000 lbs. of fish. As a result it is hoped by then to expand output by about $32 million a year. Landings will then be well above pre-war. New factories planned by the herring industry for the production of herring oil and meal will also be in operation. Regard is being paid to the necessity of preventing over-fishing in the North Sea and the majority of the new vessels now being built will be fishing in other areas.

(2) COAL

80. The United Kingdom is almost completely dependent upon coal for industry, trade and domestic purposes since indigenous supplies of other fuels are insignificant. Coal has also been a traditional export, valuable both for itself and because it has provided an outward freight for the shipping industry and thus reduced the transport cost of imported food and raw materials.

81. The importance of coal exports is now greater than ever before since it can directly reduce the dollar expenditure of other European countries. In 1947 shipments of United States coal to the participating countries amounted to 36 million tons, at a cost (excluding freight) of about $337 million. The estimated figures for 1948 are 25 million tons and $275 million respectively. The substitution of this quantity of American coal by British or other European coal is clearly essential to the restoration of Europe's balance of payments. Furthermore, coal exports to Canada and Argentina can be useful earners of hard currencies.

82. For these reasons a large increase in British coal output is planned for the four-year period. Output has already recovered a good deal of ground since 1945, when it amounted to only 186 million metric tons, rising to 193 million tons (184 million deep-mined) in 1946 and 201 million tons (190 million deep-mined) in 1947. During the first 35 weeks of 1948 output has been 9 million metric tons above the output for the corresponding period of 1947. Output per man-shift rose from 1·02 metric tons in 1945 to 1·05 in 1946 and 1·09 tons in 1947, and is currently about 1·12. Exports and foreign bunker shipments have increased from 5·4 million tons in 1947 to the current rate of 20 million tons a year. The commitment to supply 13 million tons of solid fuel exports to participating countries and bunker shipments in 1948, promised in Paris in July 1947, is well on the way to fulfilment. Substantial shipments are also being made to the American continent. The sharp rate of increase in exports is, however, partly due to a reduction in stocks at home which cannot, of course, continue. Consumption in the United Kingdom has been kept down by restrictions on the use of domestic coal, gas and electricity, by the more efficient use of fuel, and by the effective use of the dirtier coals which have had to be used because of the shortage of cleaning plant.

83. The aims are to produce over the next four years sufficient coal and coke to meet all the requirements of this country at the lowest possible cost in materials and resources, to ensure that the solid fuel needs of Europe will be fully satisfied from European (and in large part from British) sources, and to increase shipments to South America and Canada. So long as abnormal conditions prevail it is only possible to guess at the level which internal demand would reach were supplies freely available. In the export markets uncertainties exist as to the speed of industrial recovery in the participating countries, the availability of additional supplies of solid fuel from Germany and Poland, the total European demand for solid fuel, the prospects of selling British coal in South America, Canada and other distant markets, and the availability of particular qualities of coal. The appraisal of these prospects is clearly a field for European consultation. It has been assumed, however, that demand for United Kingdom exports and bunkers will reach by 1952–53 a level of 40 million metric tons. It should be practicable to meet that demand with a total production (including opencast production) of between 250–260 million metric tons. This will require over the next four years an increase of some 40 million metric tons of deep-mined coal. It implies an annual increase of about 5 per cent. in output per man-year, a rate substantially higher than has ever been sustained for a long period by any large section of industry. To achieve such an advance will involve a tremendous effort. It means nearly doubling the rate of expansion thought possible for other industries.

84. All this will have to be achieved in the early stages of a long-term programme, involving radical reconstruction of the whole industry, which is expected to extend over a 15-year period. A rapid development in productivity during this time will be hard to achieve, especially as it will necessarily take a long time to complete the underground haulage reorganisation, and the design and construction of large-scale surface cleaning plant, upon which much reliance must be placed for increased productivity and improved quality. Every effort will also be made to reduce internal consumption by the more efficient use of our fuel supplies—a field in which very considerable success has already been achieved.

85. Underground haulage productivity must be raised as quickly as possible from the present figure of about 5 tons a manshift to 20–25 tons obtained in the most modern European mines. This is largely a matter of replanning and driving tunnels for locomotives. For reasons of working space the speed at which tunnels can be driven is limited, and, because of the age of British coal mines and the great distance of most workings from the deep shafts, these new tunnels must be long. Improved haulage will make mining operations run more smoothly and release men in considerable numbers for face work.

86. Many surface cleaning plants are already in hand, and plants ordered or projected should be able by 1952 to deal with 70 per cent. of total coal output. These plants will release men from hand picking coal, and the coal produced from them will be burnt at higher efficiencies.

87. Production at the coal face is already highly mechanised with 75 per cent. of the output mechanically cut and face conveyed in 1947. The chief means of improved productivity by further face mechanisation must, therefore, be looked for in the installation of mechanical loaders. Geological conditions in the British coalfields, however, do not lend themselves readily to this form of mechanisation by reason of the great depths at which many seams are worked with consequential difficulties in roof control.

88. During the four years ending December 1952 the Coal Board expect to invest nearly $600 million on development and reconstruction, including plant replacement. A large part of this expenditure will be devoted to the three principal mining activities referred to above. In addition it is proposed progressively to close down the less efficient mines, to concentrate working within existing collieries, and to undertake an extensive programme of drift mining. At the same time plans are being worked out for the major reconstruction of existing collieries, new sinkings and the like, which can hardly be expected to yield any considerable returns by the end of the period.

(3) OIL

89. The world's current consumption of oil is already 70 per cent. higher than in 1938. The United States of America's present consumption alone is about equal to the world's total consumption in 1938, and as the United States of America has now become a net importer of oil—it has been for years a very considerable exporter—the shortage for the rest of the world is an acute problem. A very large expansion of oil production is, therefore, necessary if economic recovery in Europe and the development of those territories to which Europe must increasingly turn for her supplies of food and raw materials are not to be retarded.

90. The United Kingdom has a special interest in the expansion of oil supplies. In spite of the fact that the output of the British oil companies is much greater than consumption in the United Kingdom, particularly at the very restricted level which it has imposed upon itself, the oil industry makes at present the largest single claim for dollar expenditure. The British-controlled oil companies are engaged in a highly complex foreign trade. Their activities involve large dollar expenditure both for operating expenses and the purchase of equipment. In addition, large quantities of oil are still having to be purchased by British companies from United States companies to meet their market requirements in non-dollar areas. A substantial part of this dollar expenditure is incurred in order to make oil available to the participating countries of Europe. In all, the British companies sold for inland consumption over 10 million metric tons of oil to the participating countries (excluding the United Kingdom) in 1947. This will rise to about 13 million tons in 1948 and will then constitute 40 per cent. of their total estimated oil supplies. These supplies are essential to the economic recovery of the participating countries; trade and industry would be most seriously dislocated if they were withheld. When it is appreciated that this assistance to recovery and development of the European recovery is made at the cost of a substantial drain on the United Kingdom's gold and dollar resources it will be realised that the United Kingdom's oil supplies constitute an altogether outstanding immediate contribution to European collaboration.

91. To deal with this situation oil production and refining capacity by British companies are being expanded both to reduce the need to purchase oil from dollar sources and to enable more oil to be sold to dollar purchasers. British companies (including under this heading the Royal Dutch Shell group) produced 46 million tons of crude oil in 1946 and nearly 54 million tons in 1947. This year it is hoped to increase production to 64 million tons. In 1953 the expansion of the industry should yield approximately double the 1947 output.

92. The main contribution will come from the development of concessions held outside the dependent overseas territories, principally in the Middle East and Venezuela. Production in British Borneo and Trinidad, about 4½ million tons in 1947, is expected to increase to about 6 million tons, as a result of extensions in hand.

93. An important feature of the expansion programme is the development of refinery capacity. A large industry will be established within the United Kingdom capable of treating nearly 20 million tons of crude oil a year, compared with a through-put of 2½ million tons in 1947. Seven new refineries or major extensions will be erected in the United Kingdom at an approximate cost of $500 million. Work has already begun on three of them. This ambitious project will make a major change in the oil position of the United Kingdom. Imports of crude oil will increasingly replace imports of refined products and give rise to large savings in foreign exchange.

The new plants will result in a much greater variety of products being refined in the United Kingdom and will stimulate the development of a petroleum chemical industry capable of producing many organic chemicals now imported from hard currency sources. Refinery capacity owned by British companies outside the United Kingdom is also being increased considerably. A new refinery is now under construction in Venezuela, while increases in capacity in Holland, the Middle East, and the East Indies are already under way or planned. Capacity overseas will be increased by more than 40 per cent. compared with 1947.

94. With regard to the pipe-line projects, increased output in the Iraq fields will necessitate increasing the capacity of the existing pipe-lines which carry the oil to the Mediterranean coast. British companies in conjunction with American companies also have plans for building pipe-lines to carry crude oil from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean coast.

95. The programme of the British oil companies is vast. If it is successfully carried out, it is estimated that the dollar-saving and dollar-earning effect of the increased output will reduce the net dollar drain on oil in the United Kingdom balance of payments very considerably. The increased availability of sterling oil will, of course, make it possible for British companies to play their part in meeting the rising needs of the rest of the world including the sterling area and participating countries and will be an important contribution to the Recovery Programme. But it will be possible to achieve these objectives only if the large quantities of steel and steel equipment required for the programme are made available to the companies. It is estimated that in 1949–52 over 1 million tons of steel will be needed for plant and buildings over and above 2½ million tons for maintenance, production and marketing. Part of this can only be obtained from the United States. The rest must come from the United Kingdom and other continental steel producers can help in this by increasing their supplies to the United Kingdom of the steel it needs. The satisfaction of current requirements is already placing a heavy strain on United Kingdom steel supplies. While more steel will become available for oil development as United Kingdom steel production expands, it is clear that the carrying out of the full programme in good time and the meeting of this large demand for steel will require the co-operation of other participating countries, who will so largely benefit from it.

(4) IRON AND STEEL

96. The United Kingdom steel industry is now operating at the full stretch of its steel-making capacity. The official target for output of crude steel in 1948 is 14·7 million ingot tons, but there are good hopes that this figure will be exceeded. Production up to the end of August was at a rate equivalent to 14·9 million tons a year, and for many weeks output has been maintained at an annual rate of over 15¼ million tons. Home output of crude steel in the United Kingdom is not, however, sufficient to meet demand. There is an excess of finishing capacity, but it has not been possible to obtain sufficient supplies of imported semi-finished steel to employ this capacity fully.

97. A review has recently been made of the probable demand for steel in the United Kingdom in the 1950's. This indicates a total requirement for home and export in the region of 18¼ million ingot tons a year. Consumption for home use, including consumption in the manufacture of goods for export, is estimated at 15¾ to 16¼ million ingot tons. The possible demand for steel for export as such has been estimated at 2 to 2½ million ingot tons. This may be compared with actual supplies for all purposes, including exports, of 14·4 million ingot tons in 1947 and 13·2 million ingot tons in the years 1937–38.

98. The considerable increase in the estimated requirements of steel in the 1950's as compared with pre-war arises from three main causes. First, there has already been a very great substitution of steel for timber—for example, in coal mines and in the building of railway wagons. This tendency may be expected to continue. Second, a large part of the expected expansion of exports is in engineering products. Third, the high level of investment needed to restore and modernise the industries of the United Kingdom will make demands on steel which will certainly continue for some years beyond the period of this Programme.

99. Since the war ended the steel industry has embarked on a major re-equipment and development plan, the first stage of which is estimated to cost about $1,000 million. Included in this figure is certain specialised plant (in particular a continuous strip mill), valued at $70 million, which is being obtained from the United States and is a most important contribution to the scheme. The objects of the plan as a whole are to make good the modernisation and development postponed by the war, to increase capacity, and to lower costs by concentrating production. Under this plan, the production of crude steel in 1952–53 will rise to 17 million ingot tons. Some developments, which will expand the capacity for the production of crude steel still further, will not be finished until 1953 or 1954.

100. Despite the increased output of crude steel there will still be in 1952–53 some excess of finishing capacity which could be employed only by the import of some 560,000 tons of steel for finishing. Having regard, however, to the supplies likely to be available, only 380,000 tons of semi-finished steel have been provided for in estimating the import programme for 1952–53. This quantity will be imported under the already existing agreements with continental steel producers which do not expire until 1953. With these supplies it will be possible to produce 17·5 m. tons of finished steel (in terms of ingot equivalent). The level of the import demand for semi-finished steel in 1952–53 contrasts with the existing position where, owing to the present large excess of finishing capacity over crude steel capacity in the United Kingdom, there is a demand for imports of semi-finished steel of some 1·2 m. tons a year, which can be met only in small part, chiefly from the continent of Europe. One of the main features of the steel development plan is, therefore, the reduction of the gap between steel making and steel finishing capacities. This will reduce the United Kingdom's dependence on imports of semi-finished steel, which is expected to remain difficult to obtain from abroad in any quantity, and will eliminate the present need to seek substantial supplies from dollar sources.

101. It will be seen that there is a gap between this forecast of output of finished steel and the demand estimated in paragraph 97 above. It is expected that this will be partly closed by the use of second-hand material arising in the United Kingdom (estimated at 200,000 ingot tons) and by the import of 400,000 tons of finished steel (in terms of ingot equivalent), most of it under the existing agreements with the Continental steel producers. Unless additional imports of semi-finished steel are available, the remainder of the gap can be filled only by importing more finished steel from other O.E.E.C. countries, but whether or not it will be desirable to do this will depend on the strength of the demand for United Kingdom exports of steel. No provision has been made for such supplementary supplies of finished steel in the import programme. On the assumption that the home demand, taken as 16·0 million ingot tons, is met in full, provision has been made for exports of 1·6 million tons of finished steel (2·1 million tons in terms of ingot equivalent), including supplies to the oil industry abroad and for capital development in the sterling area. The position will, however, be reconsidered in the light of the discussion by the O.E.E.C. of the long-term programmes submitted by other participating countries.

102. A notable feature of the development plan is the modernisation and expansion of blast furnace capacity, which is designed to serve a three-fold purpose. It will increase the production of pig iron for steel making to 9·4 million tons in 1952–53 compared with 7·2 million tons in 1948, and also expand the output of foundry pig iron. The installation of the latest equipment will yield a marked saving in fuel consumption—a matter of first importance since great efforts will be needed to maintain the supply and quality of coking coal and coke to keep pace with the expansion of the steel industry. An increased output of pig iron will diminish the pressure on scrap supplies.

103. As regards particular types of finished steel products, the expansion of capacity will be particularly important in sheets and tinplate. The total output from the sheet and tinplate mills in 1952 is estimated to be sufficient to meet the home demand and to provide for export about 375,000 tons of tinplate and 175,000 tons of sheets. The improvement in the production of sheets and tinplate should enable the United Kingdom in the 1950's to make an important contribution to the supplies of the other O.E.E.C. countries. The Paris report of 1947 showed that in 1951 there would be a net import demand for tinplate by the O.E.E.C. countries on the United States of 250,000 tons a year. Full operation of the United Kingdom's new mill by 1952–53 should enable this prospective dollar drain to be considerably reduced.

104. On the heavy side of the industry, the main feature of the plan is the proposed installation of mills for rolling constructional sections. In the case of plates and light sections, the plan is concerned with the modernisation rather than the expansion of capacity. There will be a substantial increase in the output of wire rod, from about 750,000 tons in 1948 to over 1 m. tons in 1952. At present the United Kingdom is obliged to include a substantial quantity of wire rod in her import programme and indeed has considerable difficulty in obtaining the imports needed; the development plan is designed to eliminate this need for imports.

105. A further expansion of steel-making and finishing capacity in the United Kingdom is under consideration in the light of the present forward estimates of demand, but the existing development plan will be well on its way to completion before any new plans can be put into operation.

106. The following table briefly summarises the principal statistics :—

(5) ENGINEERING

107. The engineering industries are directly involved in nearly every aspect of economic recovery : in the mechanisation of agriculture; in the re-equipment of home industries and public utilities; in the export of capital goods not only to pay for current imports but also to develop the resources of the participating countries, the sterling area and other parts of the world.

108. Between 1938 and 1948 the production of the mechanical and electrical engineering sections of this industrial group has increased by about one half and it is expected that by 1952 production will rise still further to about 70 per cent. above the 1938 level.

109. Exports of all engineering products are at present over twice the level of 1938 and account for about 40 per cent. of the United Kingdom's total visible exports. By the end of 1948 the engineering industries as a whole should be exporting 230 per cent. by volume of their 1938 exports. The aim is to maintain at least this high level throughout the period under review

110. The supply of machinery for home investment (including a small but important amount of imported equipment) was in 1947 about 20 per cent. above the pre-war level. By 1952 it is expected to increase the rate of supply to 40 per cent. above the 1938 level. The expansion of output of industrial machinery and equipment will exceed that of vehicles and other metal goods Much of this plant will be needed in the next few years to make good the arrears of replacement accumulated during the war; part will go to increase the capacity of other exporting industries; all of it will increase the efficiency of British industry.

111. The engineering industries are making a major contribution to the agricultural expansion programme. In addition to a wide range of other agricultural machinery they are now producing agricultural tractors at a rate of 100,000 per annum compared with a pre-war output of some 12,000 a year and an output in 1947 of 56,000. This rate will be increased as steel supplies expand. Some 50,000 tractors a year are currently being exported and as the demand from the United Kingdom agricultural industry is approaching the point at which it will be stabilised at the replacement level, the major part of the increased production will be available for export. It is expected that about 27,000 agricultural and industrial tractors will be exported to the participating countries in 1948–49. Steps are being taken to encourage the manufacture of larger wheeled tractors, crawler tractors and specialised types of agricultural machinery for which the United Kingdom and the sterling area generally have hitherto been dependent on imported supplies from the Western Hemisphere.

112. The engineering industries are also making a direct contribution to the reduction of dollar expenditure by developing or manufacturing under licence types of equipment hitherto imported including agricultural machinery, specialised machine tools, contractors' plant, automatic textile and hosiery machinery, office appliances and a diverse range of other equipment used throughout industry. Continued encouragement will be given to this process.

113. It is not possible to give in precise quantitative terms a programme for the engineering industries as they are not a homogeneous entity. They consist of at least as many different sections as there are industries using their products. The broad objectives, for which it is believed material supplies will be adequate, are :—

(a) To achieve by 1952 an aggregate output in mechanical and electrical engineering 170 per cent. of the 1938 level; vehicles 135 per cent., and tools and implements 160 per cent.;

(b) to maintain the export of engineering products as a whole at not less than 230 per cent. of the 1938 level;

(c) to organise the productive capacity of the industries so as to produce the equipment needed for the home investment programme in the required quantity, type of product and time;

(d) to develop those categories of engineering exports likely to make the best and quickest contribution to the restoration of economic stability, namely, those which will increase the hard currency earnings, or reduce hard currency expenditure of the United Kingdom and other sterling area members of the Commonwealth, develop the production of foodstuffs and raw materials in the sterling area and other overseas territories, and contribute to the re-equipment of the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the participating countries;

(e) to maintain and improve the efficiency of the industry by research, the application of new techniques, good management and improved skills.

The various controls over resources exercised by the Government will be used to these ends.

(6) CHEMICALS

114. The production of chemicals has a major contribution to make both towards righting the balance of payments and increasing industrial production generally. For some years large amounts of organic chemicals and plastic materials have been imported from North America, including molasses, alcohols, solvents, and a wide range of oil derivatives, together with materials for the rapidly growing plastics industry. Expenditure has been in the region of $60–70 million a year. Increased production will also help the sterling area and participating countries to reduce purchases for dollars. Exports have increased rapidly and in the second quarter of 1948 were 56 per cent. above the 1938 level. By 1952 it is hoped that they will be 90 per cent. above 1938.

115. The main object is to increase production in nearly all branches of the industry : organic chemicals and plastic materials, dyestuffs and basic chemicals (particularly alkalis). The current dollar expenditure of over $60 million a year for the import of organic chemicals will be almost eliminated. A surplus for export will become available. The increases in production will also put the organic chemicals industry into a more balanced state. At present it is largely self-supporting in coal tar products, and to a lesser extent in derivatives of ethyl alcohol obtained from the fermentation of molasses, but production is deficient in the large number of chemicals obtained from cracking oil.

116. Progress is also being made in making up the leeway lost during the war in keeping pace with developments in the manufacture of plastics. Production of the main plastic materials in use at present is being expanded and within three years United Kingdom production will be sufficient to make most imports unnecessary and provide for expanded exports. By 1952 United Kingdom output of plastics should be three times as great as in 1938.

117. About 95 per cent. of the dye-stuffs required by industry are already made in the United Kingdom; the remaining 5 per cent. must be imported mainly from Europe. Increased capacity, at a cost of about $40–50 million, is being installed to meet increasing demands, and by 1952 British production will be about 30 per cent. greater than in 1947. It should then cover the majority of the newer and faster dyestuffs required by industry of which the supply from United Kingdom sources is not yet adequate.

118. Soda ash is now unrationed for the home trade and all the demands of the export market on this country are likely now to be met in full. An increase of 40 per cent. over the 1947 production capacity is in hand, which should meet growing demands over the next few years. The shortage of caustic soda is serious. Although most essential needs at home are being met, exports are substantially less than the demand. Increases of 80 per cent. over the 1947 production capacity are in hand but it will be some years before the new plant can be in full operation. These extensions will enable the Sterling Area from now onwards to increase its exports of soda ash and caustic soda to South America and the Far East.

119. Prospective United Kingdom production of nitrogenous fertilisers will be sufficient for some expansion in home consumption and for the maintenance of the long-established export trade to Commonwealth countries and the Far East. Existing plans to increase capacity in Europe, North America, India and Australia will contribute largely to overcoming the present world shortage, but the need for additional United Kingdom output is also being considered. As regards the other fertilisers, some increase in the output of superphosphates is planned.

120. By 1952, as a result of these developments costing in all some $800 million, the United Kingdom chemical industry will meet all major needs of domestic industry and maintain an extended export trade in many parts of the world. The contribution to European recovery will come not so much through exports to Europe, which already has a large chemical industry with a wide range of products, but rather in reducing the sterling area's demands for dollars to buy essential chemicals from North America.

(7) TEXTILES

121. The United Kingdom textile industries not only provide the home market with one of the basic necessities of life, but also make an export contribution of outstanding importance. Even in 1947, when exports were well below the 1938 level, they earned $900 million out of the total visible exports of $4,600 million. In recent months about one-sixth of textile exports have been going to the United States, Canada and Argentina, one-sixth to the countries of Western Europe, and over half to other countries of the sterling area. The expansion of textile exports has until now been limited by the level of production and the minimum needs of the home consumer.

122. Before the war the cotton industry had been suffering for several decades from a long-term contraction of the demand for its products, upon which were superimposed large-scale fluctuations due to the international trade cycle. Prolonged depression of trade, heavy unemployment and under-maintenance of capital equipment were the results. In wool there was no long-term decline in demand, though the industry suffered severely in periods of cyclical depression such as 1932–34. The young rayon industry, on the other hand, was expanding rapidly.

123. Textile output declined and export trade was sacrificed as labour was transferred from civilian industries to war production and to the fighting services. The cotton and wool industries emerged from the war with a greatly depleted labour force and with plant and equipment suffering from heavy arrears of maintenance and replacement—worse in the cotton industry because pre-war difficulties had caused under-maintenance.

124. Since the war substantial progress has been made. In the second quarter of 1948 the cotton industry's production was about 28 per cent. higher than the 1945 rate, while the quantity exported was 70 per cent. higher. This increase in production corresponds closely with the increase in the labour force over the same period. Labour, output and exports are still, however, substantially below the pre-war level. In the wool industry manpower rose by 35 per cent. between mid-1945 and the end of last year; output has increased considerably, and exports in the second quarter of this year were running at a rate about three times as high as that of 1945, and indeed substantially above pre-war. The expansion of the production of synthetic fibres (rayon, nylon, &c.) has been rapid; both output and exports are now considerably greater than pre-war.

125. Further expansion of textile exports is aimed at. For this the output of the textile industries must be increased. It is hoped by 1952 to increase the output of woven cotton and rayon cloth by about 35–40 per cent. over 1947. The production of synthetic fibres is expected to double in the same period. As much as possible of this increased production is to go to increased textile exports, and home consumption will be restrained by rationing or other means so long as this is necessary to the attainment of the required exports. It is expected that exports of cotton goods in 1952 will be at least 80 per cent. greater than in 1947, but the industry will be in a position to secure as great expansion as market opportunities allow. Similarly, wool exports are expected to be between 60 and 80 per cent. above the 1947 level. It should be possible to raise exports of staple fibre to at least double their 1947 level, a large part of the additional supplies going to North America.

126. Various measures are in hand to increase production and to steer a larger proportion of the output into export markets. First, plans have been made for a steady improvement in the capital equipment of the industries. New factories are being built to produce synthetic fibres, needed for industrial purposes of many kinds. Rayon output is expected to increase from about 120,000 tons in 1948 to some 200,000 tons in 1952–53. This should make the United Kingdom largely, if not entirely, independent of dollar imports of industrial yarn. Plans are also in hand for developing new synthetics such as terylene, which is highly resistant to chemicals and moisture, and ardil made from the residue of groundnuts. In the cotton weaving industry it is hoped to install about 30,000 more automatic looms before 1952. Most of these will be produced in the United Kingdom apart from some specialised types of machinery which are being imported from the United States and from Switzerland. It is expected that about 30 per cent. of the capacity of the cotton-spinning industry and a somewhat higher proportion of weaving will be newly equipped by 1952; and this will be achieved concurrently with a large export of British textile machinery, much of it to other participating countries.

127. Special efforts are being made to increase productivity in the cotton industry by the reorganisation of methods of production inside the factory. In cotton weaving the industry is at present working out the details of a scheme to improve incentives to efficiency by changing the wage structure, while at the same time enabling the skilled workers to make the best use of their skill by transferring routine tasks to less skilled assistants. A considerable increase in output per head should eventually be secured as a result.

128. Measures to increase the number of workers in the industry have been adopted. These are the more necessary because fewer women workers are expected to be available in future, a factor of particular importance to the textile industries which rely heavily on female labour and are largely localised in areas where a high proportion of the women are in work. Day nurseries are being provided to enable married women with young children to work in the factories. Particular attention is being given to improvements in working conditions. A large-scale publicity campaign is being conducted to drive home to the public and to potential workers the importance of the industry and the advantages it offers. In the last twelve months the Control of Engagement Order has been used to encourage recruitment. The Government has organised the immigration of displaced persons and foreign nationals to take up employment in textiles, and it is hoped to obtain further recruits from this source both for the cotton and woollen industries.

129. Government control and the allocation of production have been used to ensure that production intended for export is not diverted to the home market. Controls, in the form most convenient, will continue to be used so long as they are necessary.

130. The main statistics are summarised in the following table :—

(8) SHIPPING

131. In 1947 net income from dry cargo shipping services amounted to $121 million. This exceeded the corresponding figure for 1938, partly as a result of the rise in price levels, and it was achieved despite the fact that the fleet available is smaller and relatively older. At the same time, a large proportion of foreign shipping is being employed; there are unsatisfied requirements for ships of the right type and speed for the expansion of the export programme, the development of passenger and tourist trades, and for the cross trades. No comparative figures of earnings by tankers are available, but shipping requirements for the trade in oil have increased out of proportion to the tanker fleet. A much larger proportion of foreign tankers is now on charter to the oil companies than before the war and income from tankers barely balances outgoings.

132. The increase in exports in the next four years is not expected to require appreciably more shipping, since they will be carried in outgoing ships bringing imports into this country. It will, however, account for a large part of the increased income from shipping services that is foreseen.

133. For some years United Kingdom shipping resources have had to be concentrated mainly on the carriage of imports to the United Kingdom and to those territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible. Even so, by chartering tonnage, the United Kingdom has been able to maintain between 3½ and 4 million tons of shipping wholly in the service of other countries. The expected development in world trade should provide opportunities for British shipping to earn more foreign currencies in these so-called "cross trades," but performance must be improved by quicker turn-round and by the introduction of new and faster ships specially designed and constructed for the particular trades they are intended to serve. The rapidly increasing trade in oil requiring shipment from more distant sources of supply calls for a greatly increased amount of tanker tonnage as well as for faster and larger types of tankers.

134. The present programme of shipbuilding for the United Kingdom flag aims at building up, with a conservative allowance for obsolescence and losses, the tonnage of dry cargo vessels (of 500 gross tons and upwards including those with passenger accommodation) to 12·9 million gross tons by the end of 1952 as compared with 12·1 million gross tons at the beginning of 1948 and 13·9 million gross tons in 1939. Since this programme allows for an abnormally low rate of obsolescence, a much greater proportion of the shipping in use in 1952 as compared with before the war or even to-day will be over the age beyond which ships are normally not expected to give efficient service.

135. Delays in United Kingdom ports and in ports overseas in loading and discharging are still seriously retarding the turn-round of ships and reducing the effective performance of British dry cargo shipping. There is to be a sustained effort to improve turn-round in United Kingdom ports, and it is assumed in estimating earnings that conditions will have improved by 1952–53. Efforts are also being made to speed up ship repairs.

136. With the increased and better balanced fleet referred to above, it is expected that the net income on shipping account will be about $360 million in 1952–53. The services of a substantial amount of foreign shipping will still be required, but an increasing proportion of these services should be provided by other participating countries as their own fleets increase. It is, however, a basic condition of the full attainment of these shipping objectives that the United Kingdom, like the other participating countries, should be able to offer shipping services throughout the world in free and fair competition and that there should be no governmental obstruction, by discrimination and other measures, to their acceptance.

137. The principal problem of the United Kingdom, so far as tankers are concerned, is to produce enough tankers for the British oil companies to carry their increased trade. The United Kingdom tanker fleet has already passed its pre-war volume and an increasing proportion of shipbuilding capacity will be employed in the building of tankers during the next four years. The British tanker fleet at the end of 1952 should be 4·3 million gross tons, 0·9 million gross tons more than end-1947 and well above 1939.

138. Requirements, however, may increase by considerably more than this between 1947 and 1952. With a world shortage of tankers it may not be possible to fill the gap by chartering and the building of more tankers must be an important factor in the plan to increase net income from shipping. As more oil supplies have to be carried on the long haul from the Middle East, larger faster tankers operating at lower cost will be needed and port facilities will have to be adapted to accommodate them.

139. Present programmes require an investment by the shipping industry of between $200 million and $250 million a year throughout the period. This is limited not by the capacity of the yards but by the availability of steel.

(9) TOURISM

140. There are no precise figures of the pre-war earnings of the United Kingdom's overseas tourist trade, but they were probably about $120 million per annum. This was at a time when travel was relatively easy and there were few obstacles in the way of the expansion of tourist facilities.

141. With the changed situation resulting from the war, particularly the loss of so many of Britain's invisible exports, tourism has acquired a greatly increased importance. It figures among those industries which can become, relatively rapidly and at a comparatively small cost in capital investment, raw material, labour, &c., one of our major exporting trades and, moreover, one whose dollar content can be outstandingly high.

142. In addition, and perhaps even more important is the fact that tourism, by bringing the peoples of the world together—people of all sorts and from all walks of life—can make an important contribution to the development of international understanding and the lessening of political tension. For this reason it has always been the policy of the United Kingdom to secure the removal of all possible restrictions on foreign travel. To this end agreements have already been negotiated with France, Belgium, Luxembourg, Norway, Denmark, The Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Iceland and Italy for the mutual abolition of visas. The United Kingdom Government attach great importance to this removal of formal obstacles to the interchange of tourists between the participating countries. Nor do they believe it less important that restrictions should as far as possible be removed from the travel of visitors to the O.E.E.C. countries from the United States. By this means they hope that the understanding of the ideals and achievements of the European Recovery Programme will be stimulated among people in the countries taking part in it on both sides of the Atlantic. They are convinced that this will do much to ensure its success.

143. At present owing to financial difficulties there are necessarily still restrictions on the travel of tourists between the O.E.E.C. countries themselves. The United Kingdom Government hopes that as the European countries' balances of payments improve these financial restrictions can gradually be removed.

144. The United Kingdom has already suggested to the O.E.E.C. that the development of the European tourist industry is a promising field of joint activity for the participating countries. It can make an important contribution towards righting Europe's balance of payments with the Western Hemisphere. The United Kingdom will co-operate fully in the examination of joint measures for this purpose.

145. For its part the United Kingdom has taken many measures to encourage and develop tourism in the United Kingdom. The most important single step was the setting up of the British Tourist and Holidays Board and the Scottish Tourist Board, both non-governmental organisations, whose members are largely drawn from the tourist, hotel and catering industries. The British Board, particularly through its tourist branch—the Travel Association—and with the co-operation in Scotland of the Scottish Tourist Board, has the task of promoting the organisation of the tourist industry in this country. Much of the work being undertaken by these bodies is still only in its early stages, but there are already ample indications that the efforts being made will be repaid.

146. In 1947 some 300,000 overseas visitors came to the United Kingdom and earnings from this trade amounted to about $80 million apart from the sums spent by tourists on transport to and from their homeland in British ships and aircraft. It is estimated that in 1948 the total number of visitors should reach about 500,000 and that total earnings should be in the region of $140 million, of which $60 million should be in dollars and equivalent currencies. It is estimated that the trade's earnings may be as much as $260 million by 1952–53 with the dollar contribution at more than $150 million. While the United Kingdom's total expenditure on tourism overseas is expected to exceed its total tourist income from all sources, it is expected that there will be a large dollar surplus.

147. Shipping space at present limits the number of tourists coming to the United Kingdom particularly from the Western Hemisphere and the other countries of the Commonwealth. Efforts are being made to increase the space available and to make the fullest possible use of it by persuading tourists to come to the United Kingdom out of the normal summer tourist season. Attention will also be paid to increasing the aircraft space available for the transport of tourists. The shortage of hotel accommodation, caused partly by the war, is being successfully tackled.

148. For the 1948 season ample allowances of petrol have been given to tourists bringing their cars with them, or buying them in the United Kingdom for subsequent export; special arrangements have also been made to provide adequate hire-car and coach facilities for tourists. A new system, known as the Tourist Voucher Scheme, to enable tourists to buy reasonable quantities of rationed clothing for immediate delivery has also been in operation for the first time this year, and the scheme for the direct export of goods ordered by tourists has been widely publicised and used. All these schemes will be reviewed and where practicable improved before the 1949 tourist season.

149. Efforts will be made to make travel easier by abolishing burdensome controls on movement wherever possible and by ensuring that those which must be maintained, either for security or economic reasons, should be operated as speedily, simply and efficiently as possible.

150. The development of the tourist trade will necessarily depend to a considerable extent on the achievement of international political and economic stability and in this the success of European Co-operation within O.E.E.C. will play a decisive part.

CHAPTER IV.—INVESTMENT IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

151. The development and modernisation of industrial and agricultural equipment is one of the explicit objectives of the European Recovery Programme. A careful balance between this and other objectives must be maintained. Excessive home investment might defeat its own ends; it would endanger stability, require more imports than can be afforded and sharply limit exports. This chapter sets out the scale and composition of the investment programme, which on present evidence is believed to be practicable.

152. The effective limits on investment are three: the need for countervailing savings; the limits imposed by raw material supplies; and the limits of the productive capacities of the building and engineering industries.

153. The problem of financing investment has already been discussed in paragraphs 33–37 where it has been made clear that it is the intention of the United Kingdom to pursue a fiscal policy which will seek to prevent financial limitations from hindering essential investment.

154. The physical limitations are primarily those of steel and timber. The total available supplies of steel are being currently used as to 60 per cent. for home investment, 32 per cent. for exports in direct form or as manufactures, and 8 per cent. on consumption and defence. With a finished steel supply perhaps $2\frac{3}{4}$ million tons greater in 1952–53 than in 1947, it is estimated that on present expectations about the progress of exports some $7\frac{1}{2}$ million tons will be available for investment purposes. The division must clearly be provisional and will be subject to adjustment in the light of economic developments over the next four years. The limitations of timber for the United Kingdom are set by the exportable surpluses of overseas countries and by the ability of the United Kingdom to finance its timber imports. Present prospects suggest that the supplies of softwood (excluding sleepers) available to the United Kingdom in 1952–53 may be of the order of 5,700,000 cubic metres compared with a consumption of 4,600,000 cubic metres in 1947–48 and 1948–49. A higher scale of investment in building will therefore be practicable.

155. The engineering industries, taken as a whole, are now producing 40 per cent. more than in 1938. Their capacity to provide the capital equipment needed for home investment is at present limited partly by the shortage of steel and partly by the extremely large contribution which they are making to exports (amounting to 40 per cent. of the total in the first half of the current year). The growth of steel supplies made possible by the iron and steel development plan described in Chapter III will progressively ease the former limitation. It is calculated that sufficient engineering capacity will be available both to satisfy the needs of the proposed investment programme and to sustain the assumed level of capital goods exports, though a careful balance will have to be maintained in the distribution between home investment and exports of particular categories of plant and machinery.

156. In the light of these factors an annual gross investment programme at current prices of about $8,500 million of fixed investment at home represents the practicable limit of what the United Kingdom may reasonably hope to achieve, having regard also to the claims of overseas investment for colonial and other development within the sterling area. Together with the latter it will account for 20 per cent. of the gross national product. This home investment programme compares with an investment at the same prices of about $7,500 million in 1947 and about the same amount in 1938. The high rate of home investment in 1947 was achieved in a year where there was also a deficit of $2,500 million on the balance of payments. Without this, investment on this scale would not have been possible. Without external aid drastic cuts would clearly have been necessary. With external aid the United Kingdom expects not only to achieve a gross domestic investment of $8,500 million a year but also to be in a position by 1952–53 to sustain this level out of its current income. This does not imply a rigid ceiling for investment over the next four years. To the extent that the United Kingdom succeeds in its endeavours to increase the national income, it will also be its aim to accelerate and expand the investment programme.

157. The resources available for investment will be concentrated on the following purposes:—

(a) the expansion of home agriculture and fisheries;
(b) the development of basic industries, particularly steel, coal, oil, basic chemicals and cement, in order to make possible the unfettered expansion of industrial production;
(c) the strengthening of the public utility services where necessary, particularly electricity, transport and port services, in order to support the expanding level of industrial activity;
(d) the modernisation of industrial equipment so as to increase the volume and reduce the cost of production;
(e) the development of new raw materials and alternative sources of supply for existing raw materials at home, in the Colonies and elsewhere overseas;
(f) the removal of shortages of widely used basic products, such as ball bearings, precision chain, refractories;
(g) the stimulation of industrial research;
(h) the provision of essential services, such as housing and of basic social services such as water and health services and education (particularly on the technical side) which contribute to the nation's economic strength.

158. Excluding ordinary maintenance of houses and miscellaneous small works the available investment resources will be distributed in this period approximately as follows:—

	Per cent.
Fuel and Power	15
Transport and Communications	18
Agriculture	6
Industry (including Iron and Steel and Shipbuilding)	33
Housing	16
Social Services (Water Supplies, Health, Education, &c.)	7
Defence and Public Administration	5

159. Until the equipment of the export industries and of the basic industries serving industrial production as a whole has been adequately restored and modernised, investment for these purposes must take precedence over investment designed solely or mainly to increase consumption standards. In accordance with this policy the volume of investment to meet the needs of social services and to serve directly the home consumption market will not be raised above its present level, increases in one direction being balanced by reductions elsewhere within this group. Should any additional resources become available for investment they will be concentrated on industrial investment.

160. There is a wide range of controls in force to ensure that investment resources are canalised in the desired direction. In addition to the control of capital issues on the capital market these also include the licensing or authorisation of all building work above small fixed limits, statutory distribution schemes for steel and timber and arrangements, statutory or voluntary, with the various sections of the engineering industries about the division of the output of plant and machinery between the home and export markets. In the case of the nationalised industries the Boards are required by Statute when framing programmes of reorganisation or development involving substantial outlay on capital account to act on lines settled from time to time by the responsible Minister. Future policy towards these controls will be guided by the general principles enunciated in paragraphs 51–54 above. An important part of the United Kingdom's industrial investment policy has been the encouragement of investment in areas that suffered prolonged economic depression between the two world wars and which might, owing to the lack of industrial capacity, have undergone a similar experience again. The United Kingdom Government, using special powers and machinery, has already erected 290 factories in such areas and 250 more are at present being built. Private industry has also with much success been encouraged, wherever possible, to undertake investment in these areas.

161. The principal features of the investment programmes for major industries have been described in the previous chapter. The largest remaining items in the total investment programme are the public utilities, housing and the social services. To complete the account, a brief description of these is given below.

162. Electricity.—The consumption of electricity is now over 80 per cent. greater than in 1938. Throughout the war years, however, the installation of plant was severely curtailed and reliance had to be placed on extending the life of old plant, improving the load factor and in recent years on load shedding and load spreading arrangements with their attendant difficulties for industry. To meet this situation the investment programme for electricity generating stations contemplates the installation of thermal plant to increase the available generating capacity by about 40–50 per cent. above the present amount. The total cost will be about $2,000 million including ancillary work on transmission lines and distribution. In addition over 600 megawatts of hydro-electric capacity will be installed in the North of Scotland, much of which will supply industrial needs in Scotland and make possible new developments in the Highlands. It is hoped that this increase in capacity will assist a general increase in industrial efficiency.

163. Railways.—After heavy use and inadequate maintenance throughout the war, the railways stand in need of considerable re-equipment to overtake arrears of repairs and renewals, quite apart from the pressing need to keep up with new developments of rolling stock, or to extend the use of modern equipment, e.g., colour light signalling on heavily operated lines. This applies with special force to the permanent way. There is also a considerable need for goods wagons (of which the railways have nearly 30 per cent. over 35 years of age) and for passenger coaches (of which the railways in 1947 had about 13 per cent. fewer than in 1939 to meet a 24 per cent. increase in passenger miles). Much general repair and maintenance work is required on buildings, locomotive sheds, bridges, and embankments. All these works contribute towards raising the efficiency of the railways and enabling them to transport quickly and cheaply the larger volume of raw materials, minerals and merchandise which will arise during the next four years.

164. In 1948 gross investment by the railways will amount to about $600 million and, if all the needs were to be met on a reasonable scale, the annual rate ought to rise to about $800 million by 1952. The greater part of the increase will consist of renewals to rolling stock (an additional $40–60 million a year) and civil engineering works (about $120 million).

165. Housing.—As in all highly organised communities housing necessarily absorbs a substantial share of investment resources. The expenditure needed for ordinary maintenance and repair of the existing stock of houses for a community of 50 million people is in itself a very substantial item, the more so as in the case of the United Kingdom the volume of such work had necessarily to be reduced to the barest minimum during the six years of war.

166. During the war 220,000 houses were completely destroyed by enemy action and 250,000 rendered uninhabitable. During the same period house construction was suspended, apart from the minimum necessary to accommodate workers on war production. Since 1939 the population has also increased by $2\frac{1}{4}$ million and there is an urgent need for more houses to increase the mobility of the working population to facilitate the structural changes that are taking place in United Kingdom industry and encourage recruitment to the undermanned industries. Towards these various needs between the end of the war and the end of July 1948 330,000 permanent and 155,000 temporary houses have been built and 235,000 housing units have been provided by the conversion of existing premises and the repair of heavily damanged houses. So far the replacement of obsolescent houses and of houses condemned as unfit for occupation by pre-war standards has had to give way to these more pressing needs.

167. To meet the outstanding and continuing requirements for repair and new construction of houses it is believed that it will be possible to find sufficient resources to enable work to the value of $1,660 million to be undertaken in 1949, of which about 40 per cent. will be for repair and maintenance work. Within this programme preference will be given to building houses in agricultural and mining areas in order to facilitate recruitment to agriculture and mining. Likewise provision will be made for the housing needs of industries such as the steel and chemical industries where large schemes of expansion are planned. The rate of house construction in the following three years will depend on the progress of economic recovery.

168. Social Services.—The chief items under this head are education, health services, and water and sewerage, on which capital expenditure in 1949 is estimated at approximately $400 million. These services suffered severely during the war.

169. Five thousand schools were destroyed or severely damaged by enemy action and at the end of the war 40 per cent. of all the classes in England and Wales were officially classified as overcrowded. Over one million new school places are needed. Two-thirds of this requirement is due to the steep rise in the birth-rate and to shifts of population, and the remainder to the destruction of schools and the increase in the school-leaving age to fifteen years. Special provision will be made for technical education by the erection of new technical colleges for various branches of industry, and the provision of accommodation for the rapidly increasing number of part-time students, who have grown from 36,000 before the war to 200,000. The number of whole-time technical students has quadrupled in the same period.

170. Investment in water supplies and sewerage includes the making good of wartime arrears which cannot be postponed without danger to public health and without imposing limits on supplies to industry. On the health side the next four years must be spent mainly in bringing existing hospital accommodation up to standard, overtaking arrears of maintenance and war damage, converting wartime hospitals to serve peacetime uses, and in carrying out urgent schemes of extension and improvement. Improvements are badly needed in nursing staff accommodation (where additional facilities are required to attract staff for the 60,000 unstaffed beds), and in mental hospitals and mental deficiency institutions, to relieve serious overcrowding. New general hospitals urgently required in a number of districts must, however, wait until towards the end of the period.

CHAPTER V.—DEVELOPMENT OF OVERSEAS TERRITORIES

171. The forty-five Colonies included under the heading of United Kingdom's Dependent Overseas Territories have very varied economies and have reached very different states in social and economic progress. It is a prime objective of British policy to ensure that their future development is conducted for the benefit of the native populations and that increases in trade and production are reflected in a rising standard of living and steady social progress. They have already made a remarkable recovery from the effects of the war.

172. The Colonies have also reached very different stages of political advancement. They are not governed by executive instructions from London. Many, such as Malta and several of the West Indies, are already wholly or nearly autonomous in their internal affairs, with wholly or preponderantly elected legislative bodies. The United Kingdom Government has throughout been in close consultation with Colonial Governments. Most of them have now signified their willingness to join with the United Kingdom in the European Recovery Programme because the purposes of Colonial development are complementary with those of European recovery. Development needs above all a high level of investment in the Colonies and this over a period of years, can be achieved only by a net financial investment from overseas (principally from the United Kingdom) supported by a high level of imports of capital goods and manufactured consumption goods. These the countries of Europe can provide. The imports not covered by net overseas investment have to be financed by the export of food and raw materials, and these in turn are, of course, essential to European recovery, both directly and as a source of hard currencies.

173. The United Kingdom is, therefore, anxious to stimulate Colonial exports as an integral part of the recovery programme, and a substantial net investment in the Colonial areas as a whole during and beyond the period covered has been allowed for in the balance of payments calculations. Furthermore, unless the sterling area maintains a sufficiently high level of exports to the Colonies, the net dollar earnings of the Colonies will be reduced either because production will fall off or because it will be essential for a larger proportion of the dollar earnings of Colonies to be spent on essential imports.

174. In all plans for this development, Colonial authorities have to recognise that, apart from limitations on the supply of capital from outside sources, there are internal limits on the rate of investment as a whole. Pushed too far too fast it would give rise to conditions that would have the gravest consequences to social welfare and stability. Further, since the Colonies are, broadly speaking, now in the early stages of their development, a high proportion of investment must be concentrated on basic services, on health and education, on transport, irrigation and water supplies, and research. It would be inconsistent with trusteeship, and would moreover be economically impracticable, to subordinate progress in these fields, fundamental to the healthy development of the native communities, to a breakneck increase in food and raw material production wholly designed for export. Nevertheless a large development of exports is fundamental to an increase in the standards of living of the indigenous peoples.

175. It is unnecessary in a document dealing primarily with European affairs to give details of the schemes in hand or in preparation in the fields of education, transport and other basic services. Important work is proceeding on the expansion of secondary and technical education and the training of teachers. Four new university colleges, three in Africa and one in the West Indies, and a new university in Malaya are being established. In health the emphasis is on preventive work and the training of local medical staffs. Much work is being done on malarial control, particularly in Cyprus, Trinidad and British Guiana. Over $12 million has been allocated in the last two years for research. Special efforts are being devoted to locust control. Geodetic and topographical surveys have been undertaken in East and Central Africa, Malaya, North Borneo and Sarawak, in which the Royal Air Force is taking part. An expenditure of about $80 million has been approved for road and railway development, including the construction in Africa of a trunk road linking Northern Rhodesia with the Tanganyika, Kenya and Uganda road systems, and thence through to the Sudan.

176. The following notes describe the main food and material programmes that have an especially direct bearing on Colonial exports, and thence on European recovery :—

177. Groundnuts.—The total Colonial output for export of decorticated nuts is expected to rise to 880,000 metric tons in 1952–53, as compared with 300,000 tons in 1936 and 335,000 tons in 1946. In East Africa a large scheme for the production of groundnuts by mechanical methods was started in 1946. Exports on a small scale are due to begin in 1949 and are expected to increase to over 460,000 tons of decorticated nuts annually when full production is reached about 1953. In West Africa the shortage of locomotives and rolling-stock has made it impossible to move all the crop to the coast in recent years. By 1950 these difficulties should have been overcome.

178. Sugar.—Annual production of the principal Colonial producing areas for the period 1937–39 averaged 980,000 tons. Steps are being taken to improve the efficiency of the industry in the various Colonies and considerable sums of money are being spent on research. The chief shortage has hitherto been of fertilisers, and the total colonial demand for sugar cultivation has not yet been met, though every effort is being made to increase supplies. Sugar production, which had fallen to 740,000 tons in 1945, should reach 1,400,000 tons in 1952–53.

179. Rubber.—Production of rubber which was 400,000 tons in 1936 is expected to rise to 830,000 tons in 1952–53 This is an important earner of dollars : in 1947 exports to the United States were valued at about $180 million.

180. Tin.—Tin is produced in the Federation of Malaya and Nigeria. Nigerian production, however, is expected to decline gradually in a few years time, unless new discoveries are made. It is at present running at about 8,000 tons of ore per annum. Peak production was reached in Malaya in 1940 with a figure of 82,000 tons of tin content, but the industry has had to be restored after the Japanese occupation from 1941 to 1945 and Government loans totalling some $30 million have been made. Production in 1947 amounted to 27,500 tons of tin, and during the June quarter it was running at the rate of 59,000 tons a year. In 1947, 17,000 tons to the value of about $28 million were exported to the United States. Total production of tin ore for both Malaya and Nigeria in 1950 is expected to be about 94,500 tons.

181. Copper.—Northern Rhodesia is the only British Colonial producer of copper apart from a comparatively small production of concentrates in Cyprus. Northern Rhodesia produces both blister and electrolytic copper. Production in 1952–53 is expected to reach 340,000 tons as compared with 195,000 tons in 1947 and 144,000 tons in 1936. The postponement of normal development work during the war and transport difficulties have led to a temporary decline in production from the war-time peak. The planned expansion of production and the proposed doubling of electrolytic refining in Rhodesia will effect dollar savings.

182. Cobalt.—Cobalt is produced in Northern Rhodesia in association with copper. Present output is about 400 tons a year. The installation of a new refining plant in the copper belt should make available some 1,200 tons of cobalt (metal) a year from 1951 or earlier. All the ore produced will then be refined in Northern Rhodesia and the metal and various compounds produced on the spot.

183. Bauxite.—Bauxite is at present being produced in British Guiana, the Gold Coast and the Federation of Malaya and there are deposits in Jamaica. Under present conditions virtually all British Guiana bauxite is exported to Canada and the United States. There are various deposits of bauxite in the Gold Coast and the reserves have been tentatively estimated at something in the neighbourhood of 230 million tons. Under present conditions large-scale exploitation is not economic. Total Colonial production of bauxite may rise to nearly 2 million tons by 1952–53.

184. Lead.—The only Colonial territory now producing lead is Northern Rhodesia. Sulphide ores are now being worked by shaft working and production of pig lead has increased from a few hundred tons a year to 16,000 tons in 1947. Lead deposits have been discovered in Tanganyika and active steps are being taken to develop them, including the building of a railway of about 120 miles to link up the deposits with the main line. Colonial lead production in 1952–53 may amount to about 35,000 tons.

186. Funds for these developments are available from a variety of sources. Under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts of 1940 and 1945 $480 million have been made available from United Kingdom funds over the ten years 1946–56; Colonial Governments' surplus balances are very large, and further loans can be raised on the British market. The seventeen major long-term development plans which have already been approved provide for total expenditure from all three of these sources of $750 million. These long-term plans provide for the general expansion of basic economic services, social services, and the development of research in each of the territories. A few examples have already been given in paragraph 175. They do not normally include substantial provision for projects of a purely commercial character. To meet this need, there are two British Government Corporations, the Overseas Food Corporation and the Colonial Development Corporation, with authorised capitals of $200 and $400 million respectively, local savings, private investment, and the possibilities, still under examination, of E.C.A. loans and finance from the International Bank.

187. The major difficulties in connection with these large expansion plans are likely to be supply of the capital goods required and all the technical experts, skilled tradesmen and technicians required. The provisional estimates of United Kingdom exports in 1952–53 allow for a very substantial increase in machinery supplies and in steel. Whether they can be attained or exceeded depends on the actual development of the balance of payments, and thus on many uncertain factors. Much depends also upon the exports of capital goods and consumption goods that the other countries of O.E.E.C. plan to make when the joint recovery programme is prepared. It is also obvious that to the extent that the joint recovery programme increases supplies from the Western Hemisphere of scarce capital goods it will assist colonial production either directly or, by adding to supplies available in the United Kingdom and thereby enabling increased exports of such supplies to the Colonies to be released from the United Kingdom production.

188. There is also an important field for international co-operation in the provision of skilled technicians, particularly trained agricultural and scientific staffs, the shortage of which is at present a factor in limiting development in many direct and indirect ways. It must, however, be understood that the numbers required are relatively very small and that the main solution must lie in the increasing substitution of trained locally recruited personnel rather than in any considerable employment of technicians from abroad, which would be unacceptable to the Colonial peoples.

189. Lastly there are hopeful possibilities of improving the administrative efficiency of health and research programmes by joint consultation between the Colonial authorities of different nations, and in the joint planning of transport and communication developments. A number of valuable conferences have already been held on matters concerned with education, health, labour and the prevention of disease in Africa. More are already planned in the next two years. It is the United Kingdom's desire to develop such co-operation to the limit.

190. The plans described contemplate a large increase in the contribution of the Colonies to European recovery. In 1947 Colonial exports to the United Kingdom were about $600 million. In 1948–49 they are expected to run at about $800 million, at the price levels assumed in preparing the programme for this year. By 1952–53, on the provisional calculations given in Chapter VI, this total should have increased to $950 million. Against these receipts exports from the United Kingdom are expected to rise from $930 million in 1948–49 to some $1,000 million in 1952–53. Still more significant, in conditions in which the dollar currencies will still be scarce, is the expected increase in the Colonial dollar surplus. Already in 1947 the Colonies had recovered to the point of having a small dollar surplus; in the current year this has been running at a rate of about $150 million.

191. Assistance towards United States Stockpiling.—Under the provisions of Article V of the Economic Co-operation Agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, the United Kingdom Government have undertaken to facilitate the transfer to the United States of materials which are needed by the latter for stockpiling or other purposes and to promote the production of these materials. Preliminary discussions have already taken place between the United States and the United Kingdom authorities with a view to ascertaining what materials will be needed by the United States Government and what measures the United Kingdom Government can take to carry out their obligations. The United Kingdom Government for their part intend in collaboration with the Colonial Governments to take all possible steps to increase the production of materials which the United States Government may require and are already considering the measures to be taken for this purpose. They recognise the importance which the United States Government attach to chrome and manganese.

CHAPTER VI.—ESTIMATE OF THE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS IN 1952–53

(1) INTRODUCTORY

192. The four previous chapters have described the principal policies which the United Kingdom proposes to follow in order to solve its balance of payments problem and achieve independence of external economic assistance by 1952–53. As has already been pointed out, these policies must be flexible and to some extent provisional. It is impossible to forecast with precision what position will be reached in 1952–53 as a result of these policies. Too much depends upon world economic developments outside the control of the United Kingdom and the other Governments with which it is co-operating. But an attempt has been made to prepare a set of estimates of a realistic kind. These are based upon four assumptions :—

(i) that there is a high level of business activity throughout the world, and that this leads to a high level of demand for imports (especially in the Western Hemisphere);
(ii) that the United States Government provides sufficient funds between now and 1952 to permit the full development of the European Recovery Programme;
(iii) that substantial progress is made in European co-operation, particularly in the "fields of activity" to which O.E.E.C. is giving special attention;
(iv) that a reasonable amount of East–West trade within Europe is possible on commercial lines.

193. The results are presented in this Chapter. They show that, on the present assessment of the prospects, and on the assumptions made about the factors it cannot itself control, the United Kingdom expects to achieve the objectives it has set itself. But they show, too, that the balance will not be reached at all easily.

(2) OVERSEAS EARNINGS

194. A major factor in restoring the overseas balance will be the increase in earnings from exports. After an analysis of sales possibilities, product by product and market by market, taking account of the expressed desire of most of the world's Governments to increase trade, it is believed that in the early 1950's the United Kingdom should be able, year in year out, to maintain exports at a rate of 150 per cent. of the 1938 volume. This represents, on the information now available to the United Kingdom, a realistic assessment of the prospects, and has been taken as the appropriate figure for planning purposes. With uniformly favourable conditions a higher figure might be reached; it would be of advantage to the United Kingdom's economy if it could, and the additional supplies for export (after appropriate adjustments to import and home production plans) could be produced.

195. In achieving a level of exports half as great again as in 1938 and well above even the level of the peak years of world trade (1927–29), reliance is placed upon the recovery of solid fuel exports to about 40 million tons (including bunkers), and continuing expansion of equipment and textile exports. Domestic policies to assist these expansions have been discussed above. Some diminution in sales of miscellaneous products has been allowed for.

196. Net invisible earnings are also expected to make a very large contribution. The most important item is likely to arise from the increased oil production of the British companies discussed in paragraphs 89–95. Also significant will be increased shipping earnings (paragraphs 131–139 above). A recovery of earnings from foreign investments is expected, but in 1951 obligations require to be met under the Anglo-American and Anglo-Canadian Financial Agreements of 1946, and provision is made for them; this is the main element of amortisation included in the balance of payments—no allowance is made for amortisation of private loans. In the rest of the "invisible" field, continued recovery is expected in earnings from the traditional services performed by London, such as insurance. In total, net invisible earnings are expected to be $1,053 million, compared with $140 million in 1948–49; at this level, net invisible earnings will be much the same in value as they were in 1938, but their buying power in terms of imports will be little more than one-third of that of 1938.

197. In calculating export earnings and earnings from oil sales the level of prices assumed in preparing the 1948–49 programme for O.E.E.C. has been used in accordance with the instructions received from the Council. The corresponding import prices have been adopted for the import programme discussed below. There is, of course, every reason to expect substantial changes in many of these prices.

(3) OVERSEAS EXPENDITURE

198. On these assumptions total earnings from exports, re-exports and net invisibles have been estimated at over $8,400 million in 1952–53. Not all of this can be applied directly to imports. Allowance has to be made for foreign investment and the repayment of debt. The need to provide for net lending for the development of the dependent overseas territories has already been discussed in Chapter V. In other parts of the sterling area development now proceeding will likewise require to be financed. Many of these are as important to the United Kingdom as anything in the home investment programme. There are, moreover, countries, both in the sterling area and outside, with large sterling balances which will need to use part of them. On the other hand, some countries may be accumulating sterling assets. For the purposes of this estimate the net capital outflow for these purposes together has been put at a figure of $400 million, but it would be advantageous to increase this figure if possible.

199. There will thus remain available for imports a sum of about $8,000 million. At the prices assumed this will permit a volume of imports 10 per cent. higher than in 1947, but still less by about 15 per cent. than the volume in 1938. It is, in fact, much the same in volume as the import programme for 1948–49, but it should be possible as a result of developments of agriculture, oil refining, engineering and chemicals at home and of greater world supplies of basic products to change its composition to the advantage of the economy as a whole. Some imports regarded as essential elements of the present import programme could be reduced and release funds for increased purchases of other supplies which cannot now be afforded.

200. Thus food imports might be reduced significantly below the 1948–49 level in value, but this lower level of food imports, combined with increased output from home agriculture, would allow consumption to be distinctly above 1947 levels. Raw material imports must be increased to take account of rising industrial production and productivity, though the consumption of pulp and paper, and above all of timber would continue to be below pre-war levels. In spite of a smaller expenditure on petroleum, the consumption of petroleum products could increase by over 20 per cent. above 1948–49 as a direct result of the oil refinery programme. Similarly, imports of machinery and some manufactured goods could be reduced below the 1948–49 level without hardship.

201. The following table summarises the possible composition of the balance of payments in 1952–53 compared with 1947 and 1948–49 :—

(4) THE PATTERN OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

202. The overall balance of payments which the United Kingdom hopes to have secured by 1952–53 is not in itself sufficient to secure full stability in the overseas financial situation. Achieving an overall balance is sufficient only when a surplus with one country can be used to offset a deficit with another. This can happen only if all important countries' balances of payments are in reasonable equilibrium.

203. The geographical distribution of the estimated balance of payments for the United Kingdom may be summarised as follows :—

$ million at programme prices

	Western Hemisphere	Other Non-Participants	Sterling Area	Participating Countries (Non-sterling)	Total

204. These figures relate to the United Kingdom alone. In considering the United Kingdom's financial position vis-à-vis other groups of countries, however, the significant relationship is not the surplus or deficit of the United Kingdom alone, but the surplus or deficit with the group of the whole sterling area, and even this may be somewhat modified by payments of sterling between non-sterling countries of the kind described in paragraph 63 above. Sterling is an international currency and this means that it is impossible from United Kingdom trade figures alone to forecast the precise sterling position of other countries or groups of countries. The following paragraphs give a brief commentary on some of the factors underlying the distribution of payments indicated in the table above.

205. Western Hemisphere.—The earnings of $1,455 million from exports and re-exports to the Western Hemisphere shown represent an increase of $800 million, or 120 per cent. over the level of 1947, and over $500 million, or 55 per cent. over the level achieved in the first half of 1948. It is believed that exports to the United States might continue to rise above the 1947 level of about $195 million to some $340 million in 1952–53. Exports to Canada are forecast as rising during the same years from $180 million to $365 million. In invisibles likewise, the most vigorous possible efforts are being made to increase dollar earnings, e.g., in tourism which is expected to yield $150 million in 1952–53. But this will be offset by the service of the United States and Canadian Loans ($190 million) and the service of E.C.A. loans.

206. Increases of earnings even of this magnitude would close less than half a Western Hemisphere deficit of the scale of that in 1947. A reduction of imports has therefore to be provided for below the exceptionally high level of 1947. In that year, in common with most other European countries, the United Kingdom imported a greater volume of goods from the Western Hemisphere than in 1938, despite a large contraction in total imports from all sources. The import programme shown is therefore $1,000 million below the 1947 total and $450 million below the programme for 1948–49. It takes full account of the possibilities now foreseen of obtaining supplies of essential goods in the rest of the world, above all in the Sterling Area and in the participating countries. Thus the temporary over-dependence upon Western Hemisphere supplies which largely contributed to the dollar crisis of 1947 will be relieved by a return to traditional sources of supply.

207. Even with these changes there remains a deficit of nearly $300 million with the Western Hemisphere. It is estimated that this can be covered by the gold production and dollar earnings of the rest of the sterling area together with United States commercial investment in the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area. But this, of course, turns on the maintenance of a strong demand in the United States for the raw materials which are produced in the sterling area, and a continuing restriction of dollar imports by the other sterling area countries themselves. Indeed, this entire balance depends upon the ability and willingness of the United States to absorb sterling manufactures, petroleum products and raw materials, and upon continued economy in dollar expenditures throughout the sterling area. The United Kingdom for its part has no intention of allowing its present estimates of the absorptive capacity of the Western Hemisphere to limit its efforts to maximise its Western Hemisphere earnings. But the balance now envisaged is precarious and depends to a considerable extent on factors outside the control of the United Kingdom.

208. Other Non-Participants.—On the estimates submitted, the United Kingdom has a prospective deficit of some $175 million with the non-sterling, non-participating countries of the Eastern Hemisphere. Of this deficit, about half represents the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and half is attributable to the other countries, particularly the Middle East.

209. The general scale of trade with Eastern Europe envisaged in these estimates is appreciably less than that ruling before the war. It can be assumed for practical purposes that the trade between the sterling area and this group of countries will broadly speaking balance, allowance being made for deliveries of raw materials from the rest of the sterling area.

210. With the other non-participating countries a marked United Kingdom deficit is shown; this is attributable partly to the very high prices assumed for certain primary products from these countries, and partly to the heavy local expenditures involved in the expansion of oil production. The rest of the sterling area is likely to have a surplus with these countries taken as a whole, and it should be possible to match some of these deficits against surpluses with participating countries in the manner already described. It is not the United Kingdom's intention to seek bilateral balance with every country or group of countries, and this appears to be a case in which multilateral settlement of surpluses and deficits can readily take place.

211. Rest of Sterling Area.—The United Kingdom normally has a heavy surplus on current account with the rest of the sterling area. For 1952–53 it is estimated at about $820 million—a much smaller figure, at present prices, than that normally ruling before the war. It has been assumed earlier that the gold production and net dollar earnings of the non-participating sterling area would cover the United Kingdom deficit of $300 million with the Western Hemisphere; these countries may have a surplus with the non-participating countries and on present indications are likely to have a tendency to surplus with the participating countries. By the normal workings of the sterling area system, these surpluses of the outer sterling area countries are matched against their current deficit with the United Kingdom. The remainder of the surplus is accounted for by the net overseas investment already discussed.

212. Participating Countries.—It appears that the tendency now developing for the United Kingdom to be in surplus with the other participating countries will persist into 1952–53. If the rest of the sterling area likewise tends to be in surplus with the other participating countries (as it is now) the latter, taken as a whole, will be confronted with a difficult sterling problem. This should to some extent be covered by multilateral use of sterling—for example by the financing of the United Kingdom's deficit with the non-dollar countries—and the possibilities of this will no doubt be fully explored. But it is perhaps likely that after taking account of all such possibilities, the participating countries as a whole will tend to be short of sterling.

213. In this balance of payments submission, it has been assumed that this is the likely state of affairs. The United Kingdom's exports to these countries have been stated at a somewhat lower figure than that which is expected in 1948–49; imports have been put some 10 per cent. above 1948–49, and tourist expenditure by United Kingdom citizens has been allowed for at a rate about a third above 1947, when a large foreign exchange ration was allowed for tourism.

214. In framing the import programme, increased supplies of essential products from the other participating countries have been assumed. It is only by making this assumption, indeed, that it has been possible to reduce the United Kingdom dollar deficit to manageable dimensions. This import programme therefore concentrates heavily upon essential supplies to the United Kingdom—cereals, oils and fats, bacon, dairy produce, iron ore, timber, &c. Allowance is made for quotas for manufactured goods substantially above those of 1947. It is, of course, possible to envisage an increase above this level in the mutual trade of the United Kingdom and the participating countries without disturbing the pattern of multilateral payments here assumed. It is to be hoped that this will take place. The vital consideration underlying the present estimates is, however, the mutual adjustment of the economies of the participating countries so as to provide sources of essential supplies which it will no longer be possible to obtain from the Western Hemisphere in 1952–3.

215. The picture which is presented of the United Kingdom balance of payments in 1952–53 is therefore one in which viability could unquestionably be secured at a very high level of production and a reasonable level of consumption—if it were possible to offset surpluses against deficits. But in fact the balance with the dollar area will be precarious, though fully possible; the extent of the difficulties which the United Kingdom will encounter in securing this balance will depend largely upon her ability to draw essential supplies from the Commonwealth and from the other participating countries.

CHAPTER VII.—CONCLUSIONS

(1) THE SCALE AND CONSEQUENCES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM'S PROGRAMME

216. The preceding chapters have described the problem before the United Kingdom, the policies it is intended to pursue, and the manner in which they may lead to a solution of the problem of the balance of payments. The productive efforts that the United Kingdom intends to make are on a huge scale, and apply to every sector of productive industry.

217. Agricultural output is to be increased above the highest point reached in the war years. It is hoped to raise coal output by a quarter, generating capacity by a half, and to double the world-wide production of the British oil industry as compared with the 1947 levels. The export of coal is to be restored to its high traditional scale. Steel output, already pressing at the limit of available capacity, is to be increased by a sixth above the present level. The engineering industries, already half as great again as before the war, are to be called upon to expand still further. Corresponding efforts are to be called for from other industries. A massive investment programme, carefully concentrated upon the vital sectors of the economy, is designed to support these targets, and to foster the production overseas of commodities essential to the recovery of Europe.

218. The following figures illustrate the proposed development of production in some major sectors of the economy :—

	Pre-war†	1947	1948–49	1952–53
Grain production	4·6	6·3	7·6	8·4

219. Broadly speaking this Programme provides for an expansion of output in manufacturing, mining, agriculture, building and public utilities taken as a whole to a level about one-third above pre-war and, despite a constant or slightly declining labour force, to increase manufacturing output by a quarter in the five years from 1947 to a level about 40 per cent. above 1938. This expanding output will make possible an estimated expansion of exports by nearly two-fifths above the level achieved, after two years' intensive effort, in 1947, and this in turn will support a considerable increase in raw material imports. At the same time the supply of capital equipment to home industry should increase to a level about 15 per cent. above 1947. As has been shown in paragraphs 26–28 the United Kingdom has already made substantial progress towards these objectives.

220. A growth of output and trade of this magnitude will, besides reducing the balance of payments problem to manageable dimensions, permit a distinct increase in home consumption per head beyond not only the somewhat meagre standards of 1947 but, in many respects, beyond pre-war levels. The supply of manufactured goods for the consumer should rise 15–20 per cent. above the 1947 level, with clothing and household goods somewhat above the pre-war level. There should be sufficient supplies of the chief energy-producing foods and notable increases in the 1947 levels of consumption per head of meat, eggs, oils and fats. The consumption of food as a whole would approach the pre-war volume and the more equal distribution of the national income which has been secured in recent years would imply that the standard of food consumption of a large part of the population should be markedly better than before the war.

(2) THE ROLE OF EXTERNAL ASSISTANCE

221. This strenuous effort by the United Kingdom would be impossible without the continuance of external assistance during the period of recovery. Aid is necessary to enable the United Kingdom to continue to acquire essential supplies from the Western Hemisphere on a scale which otherwise could not be afforded. In the revised estimate of United Kingdom expenditures of just over $2,000 million on dollar goods and shipping services submitted by United Kingdom to O.E.E.C. and E.C.A., food and tobacco accounted for nearly $600 million, raw materials for $650 million, oil, tanker services and oil equipment nearly $400 million, machinery and manufactures $150 million and shipping services over $200 million. This programme was based on the assumption of aid, as recommended by O.E.E.C., of $1,263 million. As the United Kingdom's long-term programme develops, the need for aid to finance dollar area imports will decline for two reasons : the replacement of dollar supplies from non-dollar sources, and the increase of dollar earnings. Aid is essentially required to give time for these fundamental adjustments.

222. The absence or the inadequacy of aid would, in the first instance, show itself in a reduction in the years before 1952 in the supplies of food, raw materials, machinery or oil presupposed in the programme set out in the preceding chapters. The implications of such a deficiency are clear. A reduction in the supplies of food would endanger first the nutrition of the British people and thus in time undermine the drive for increased productivity on which so much of the United Kingdom's hopes for the future depend. Without this assistance it would be necessary for the United Kingdom to devote more of its resources to meeting its essential food needs, so reducing correspondingly the home investment programme and the exports of capital goods required for the development of the participating countries and the associated overseas territories. More directly, any substantial cut in raw material supplies would inevitably imply a corresponding cut in home investment and in exports of capital goods—in the rate of industrial re-equipment at home and in the contribution which the United Kingdom can make to development overseas. Hope would have to be abandoned of carrying through the great developments in the United Kingdom economy which are the basis of this programme.

223. It is thus seen that the assistance of the United States plays a vital part in the United Kingdom's recovery plans. But it also strengthens the United Kingdom's capacity to co-operate with the other countries of O.E.E.C. in the pursuit of joint recovery plans. It contributes to the stability of their currencies thus enabling the gradual strengthening of multilateral trade. The position of the United Kingdom as the centre of a large group of nations trading in sterling is such that any setback in its recovery would have widespread repercussions that would spread throughout the economic systems of the world. The immediate measures of self-protection enforced by such a setback might start a downward spiral that could not easily be halted.

(3) THE IMPORTANCE OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

224. Co-operation with the other countries of the British Commonwealth and the participating nations has an importance no less decisive than that of external assistance in this programme. It is needed not only in order that the United Kingdom can surmount the problems before it, but still more in order that it can play its full part in the joint endeavour of European recovery. The programme presented in the foregoing chapters is provisional. It is in its present form no more than one nation's contribution to discussions from which a joint programme is to emerge. It can within limits be modified to conform with the needs of such a joint and integrated plan.

225. The development of trade with other countries of the British Commonwealth, based on the steady expansion of their production and that of the United Kingdom, is vital to the recovery of the United Kingdom. It will be of parallel importance to the programmes of the other participating countries. The Commonwealth countries are a great source of supplies of imported food and raw materials which are essential to the development of the participating countries and the United Kingdom proposes to initiate discussions with the other Commonwealth countries about the possibilities of developing their resources to the mutual advantage of themselves and the O.E.E.C. countries.

226. These proposals as they stand already imply a high degree of co-operation between the United Kingdom, its associated overseas territories, and the other participating countries. In the first place the United Kingdom is making a major contribution to the solution of the European economic problem as a whole by surmounting the United Kingdom dollar problem. Of the aid allocated for this year one-quarter is for the United Kingdom. By the operation of the policies indicated in this Programme the need for aid will entirely disappear and with it one-quarter of the total European problem. The production and export programmes of the United Kingdom, as outlined above, contemplate the supply of vital products—for example, oil, coal, agricultural and other machinery—in great quantities and, in some cases at least, at no small expense in dollar resources and in restrictions on the United Kingdom economy. From the participating countries, on the other hand, the foregoing plans presuppose increased imports of essentials, both raw materials and foodstuffs. The plans outlined here for reducing the United Kingdom dollar deficit to manageable dimensions are dependent upon the realisation of this changed pattern of imports from the participating countries.

227. It is the United Kingdom's hope that, in its examination of the programme presented in this document side by side with those of the other participating countries, the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation will find scope for developing joint plans in many particular sectors that will hasten still more the attainment of European recovery. The United Kingdom has already tabled with the O.E.E.C. a list of fields of activity for intensive study, leading, it is hoped, to early and profitable results. The examination of the national plans of the participating countries may point to dangers of wasteful duplication or opportunities for further expansion. Further types of co-operation among the Governments of overseas territories may suggest themselves. The scrutiny of the balance of payments estimates may indicate to each participating country types of output, the expansion of which would in the long run serve both to assist the difficult balance of intra-European trade and thereby the smooth working of a multilateral system of trade and payments. Studies of this kind will, it is hoped, lead the participating countries towards a joint programme that will provide the basis both of short and of long-term co-operation. Just as a long-term programme for a particular nation is needed to guide the preparation of its annual programme, so a joint strategy for European recovery is needed to guide the development of particular measures of co-operation.

228. In this programme much emphasis has been laid on the necessity for removing obstacles to increased production. In equal measure it is necessary to remove the barriers to increased trade. The United Kingdom has worked, and will continue to work for the reduction and elimination of these obstacles on a mutually advantageous basis and towards the goal of full convertibility of currencies and a freer flow of international trade.

229. The preparation and execution of a Joint Recovery Programme, in which full account is taken of these objectives, calls for a common effort in the whole field of administrative and productive endeavour unprecedented in its scope and urgency. The United Kingdom is prepared and anxious to make its full contribution to the success of this enterprise.

ANNEX A

THE EFFECT OF UNITED KINGDOM BILATERAL TRADE POLICY ON SUPPLIES TO THE REST OF THE COMMONWEALTH

The effect of our bilateral trade negotiations on the supply of goods, particularly capital goods and scarce commodities, to other parts of the Commonwealth has been the subject of various representations. It may be useful to set out the facts as we see them.

2. In general our bilateral arrangements with foreign countries are a direct consequence of the absence of a multilateral system of exchanges, which means that in order to keep trade moving and increase the availability of goods, particularly (but not entirely) in Europe, Governments have to make arrangements with the object of ensuring that individual buyers and sellers can procure or dispose of quantities of goods adequate to maintain the economy of the country concerned. There are many commodities in short supply of which we are thus enabled to augment our imports. One result of that is that other countries acquire sterling which they can use to purchase wool and other goods from the Commonwealth, thereby preserving a market for these things and furnishing the other Commonwealth countries with additional sterling for purchases in the United Kingdom. Another result of course is that the foreign countries wish to spend some of their sterling in the United Kingdom. It is the demand thus created rather than any " commitment " we undertake which creates a pressure on the United Kingdom production of capital goods and scarce commodities. And it is the total demand in relation to supply rather than any priority arrangements which causes what difficulty there is in supplying customers.

3. Apart from the arrangement with Russia which is sui generis, bilateral trade negotiations with foreign countries amount to no more than an examination of the extent to which they will be prepared to sell to us goods which we require, in the light of the extent to which, having regard to our commitments to Commonwealth and other countries, we can supply goods against demands which the foreign country is likely to make. It must be remembered that these demands will not be wholly from the foreign Government but from private importers whose exact demands can only be approximately forecast. Apart from certain specially scarce commodities referred to in paragraph 6 below, the most we can do is to indicate broadly availabilities of particular classes of goods.

4. Although for reasons understood and followed in Commonwealth countries we have been encouraging manufacturers and traders to sell their goods in hard currency countries, particularly in the Western Hemisphere, in general we do not direct exports to particular markets. Commonwealth countries, being valued as traditional markets, are attractive to exporters and there is every indication that their share of United Kingdom exports (of every kind, capital goods, consumer goods and the scarce commodities described below in paragraph 6) is not declining. It has sometimes been suggested that the machinery figures in our bilateral agreements are such that they must hinder our manufacturers from accepting new business from Commonwealth countries and delay the carrying out of old contracts. It is true that, under the Russian Agreement, we undertook to facilitate the placing of contracts for a wide range of specified and rather specialised machinery (we have, in fact, got tenders into the hands of the Russians but most of these have been rejected) and also indicated (though we did not pledge ourselves to) prospective dates of delivery. In no other negotiations have we entered into similar commitments or mentioned delivery dates for comparable items; the amounts written in the bilateral agreements in respect of machinery are estimates of the deliveries which would take place in any event largely against orders placed in previous years; they do not represent firm commitments to ensure that a given country receives an increased flow of capital goods or, indeed, any fixed quantity at all.

5. Immediately after the war our order books were filled up with long deferred demands, principally of Commonwealth countries, but also of foreign countries. It would cause endless confusion and reduce both production and exports to go in for any widespread administrative interference with manufacturers' order books. It should be noted, however, that with machinery as with other things, we must, by any means of encouragement or assistance that are practicable, try to ensure that a proper degree of importance is attached to orders for the hard currency markets (which, of course, includes Canada), to whom it is of paramount necessity that we increase our exports.

6. There are, finally, a few commodities in acutely short supply over which we can exercise a greater degree of control, e.g., steel, coal, cement, soda ash, caustic soda and some textiles. This control is, in no case, direct compulsory allocation in detail; the distribution of exports we are compelled to seek, even in these items, can only be achieved by co-operation with the industry concerned and can never be completely rigid and predetermined. Nevertheless, it is with respect to these commodities that we have to make more specific commitments in our bilateral agreements than those already described. Even these commitments are not firm guarantees that a given volume of supplies will be provided. What we do is to undertake to "use our best endeavours" to facilitate the country in question buying—through the normal channels—the agreed amount. We implement this by detailed discussions with the industry concerned as to the distribution of all its exports to all destinations. This gives us and the industry every opportunity to keep the Commonwealth demands in focus and ensure the Commonwealth gets fair shares. Indeed, because of a sort of natural preference, Commonwealth orders tend, in practice, to have rather better treatment from the producers, whose co-operation we retain all along.

TRADE WITH JAPAN

A.—Trade Negotiations with S.C.A.P.

I.—Introductory

In the immediate post-war period the financial arrangements with Japan were most unsatisfactory from the point of view of the sterling area. The Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers could only accept payment in dollars for Japanese exports, and could not get dollars from his Government for expenditure on imports from countries other than the United States; we were therefore getting the worst of both worlds. In an effort to rectify this state of affairs, protracted negotiations took place; these culminated early in 1948 in the conclusion of the Overall Payments Agreement, under which trade between the sterling area and Japan was to be conducted in convertible sterling. Japan still remained a hard source of supplies, since under the Agreement S.C.A.P. had the right to convert his sterling accumulations at six monthly intervals; but the understanding was that he would only do so if those accumulations exceeded his prospective requirements of sterling over a considerable period.

2. As well as the United Kingdom and the Colonies (excluding Hong Kong), all the sterling area Dominions are parties to the Overall Payments Agreement. The exclusion of Hong Kong is due to her special position; her large entrepôt trade with Japan would lead to a serious dollar drain if she were included in the arrangements covering the rest of the sterling area, and for the time being she is meeting this deficit with United States dollars purchased on her free market in exchange. (The position of Hong Kong is in fact complicated and difficult; it is now under re-examination by His Majesty's Government.)

3. Once satisfactory payments arrangements had been made, the stage was set for the expansion of trade between the sterling area and Japan. It was therefore proposed that there should be negotiations in Tokyo between S.C.A.P. and as many of the sterling area countries of the Commonwealth as wished to participate in the discussions. The negotiations took place in July and August of this year, and, in addition to representatives of the United Kingdom and the Colonies, delegations from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa participated in full, and Indian observers attended and took part in the discussions. The general aim of the negotiations was to secure balanced trade between Japan and the sterling area participants as a whole at the highest level; since, under the Overall Payments Agreement, a sterling area deficit involved the possiblity of dollar settlements, the sterling area could not afford a deficit, and equally S.C.A.P. was not prepared to import more from the sterling area than his sterling earnings would allow. A particular aim was to secure the inclusion of Japanese textiles manufactured from cotton of United States origin in the sterling payments arrangements; these had been excluded from the terms of the Overall Payments Agreement.

4. So far as the sterling area was concerned, the advantage of a joint negotiation on the lines proposed, as distinct from a series of bilateral negotiations, was that the sterling area participants who were likely to be in deficit with Japan would benefit from the fact that others were likely to be in surplus. A particular benefit was that it would secure for the sterling area large quantities of cotton textiles, of which there was a very serious shortage in the Colonies; textiles from Japan for sterling are to be regarded as dollar savers, since the Colonies are marginal buyers of dollar textiles.

II.—Summary of Agreement with S.C.A.P.

5. The main negotiations in Tokyo have now been concluded, and as soon as all the Commonwealth participants have notified their acceptance of the proposals, letters are to be exchanged between S.C.A.P. and the sterling area negotiators confirming that the following arrangements will govern trade between Japan and the sterling area during the year ending July 1949:—

(a) Trade will be conducted on a sterling basis, payment and credits being dealt with in accordance with the Overall Payments Agreement amended to include cotton textiles exported from Japan whatever the origin of the raw cotton from which they are made.

(b) The parties to the arrangements will do everything in their power to facilitate the exchange of the commodities listed in an agreed balance sheet drawn up in the course of the discussions (see below), on the understanding that this balance sheet is not to be regarded as committing either party but simply as "a reasonable computation made in good faith of the volume of sales and purchases." (The understanding has of necessity to be expressed in this form, since the implementation of the arrangements will depend to a great extent on private traders, and Commonwealth Governments cannot guarantee that their nationals will in fact carry out the sales and purchases estimated.)

(c) Each party to the arrangement undertakes to expend on imports from the other party the full amount of its earnings from exports to that party under the arrangements.

(d) Provision is made for consultation if it emerges that either party is failing significantly to supply or export commodities on the scale indicated in the agreed balance sheet.

(e) Special machinery is to be devised for the regular exchange of information on the implementation of the trade arrangements.

III.—Summary of Balance Sheet

6. The following table shows the estimated purchases and sales by each of the sterling area parties to the Agreement. The figures are all in millions of dollars, and the items in the fourth column relate to trade with S.C.A.P. during the period before the Overall Payments Agreement became effective.

	Estimated Purchases	Estimated Sales	S.C.A.P.'s Debt in respect of Past Sales	Surplus
United Kingdom and Colonies ...	54·4	46·7	4·0	− 3·7
Australia	18·5	19·7	...	+ 1·2
New Zealand	2·5	2·5	...	0
South Africa	6·8	8·2	...	+ 1·4
India	26·3	28·5	12·0	+14·2

The above figures are those provisionally agreed in Tokyo. The Government of India has, however, now drastically revised its figures, and proposes increased purchases and reduced sales. The final Indian figures are not yet available, but it seems clear that the Indian surplus may be reduced to something of the order of $2–$4 million. The balance in favour of the Sterling Area may therefore be more or less eliminated.

7. The above figures cover a large number of items, but the main commodities to be supplied by the various parties to the Agreement are as follows:—

United Kingdom—
- Salt.
- Wool Waste and Rags.
- Crude Oil.
- Sisal.

Colonies—
- Rubber.
- Tin.
- Iron Ore.
- Sago Flour.
- Coconut Oil.

Australia—
- Wool.
- Wheat.

South Africa—
- Wool.
- Coal.

New Zealand—
- Wool.

India—
- Cotton.
- Iron Ore.
- Manganese Ore.
- Coal.
- Jute.
- Oilseeds.

Japan—
- Raw Silk.
- Silk, Rayon and Woollen Yarns.
- Cotton Textiles.
- Silk, Rayon and Woollen Manufactures.
- Caustic Soda.
- Cement.
- Iron and Steel.
- Canned Food.

IV.—Processing of the Arrangements

8. Consideration has now been given to the special machinery which, as provided in the exchange of letters, is to be devised for supervising the implementation of the Agreement. The balance sheet is, necessarily, of a tentative nature and does not purport to be all-inclusive. The Sterling Area participants, therefore, will wish to consult with each other in good time should the adjustments, as they occur, look like creating a serious unbalance, with a view to adopting remedial action in a way which will protect the interests of the Sterling Area as a whole. The participants will also wish to agree between themselves on a fair division of such Japanese goods in short supply as S.C.A.P. can be persuaded to make available to them.

C224433.

9. It has been decided that a special co-ordinator should be appointed to watch the forward position in Tokyo on behalf of all the sterling area participants and report periodically to the Governments concerned. As regards consideration of the action to be taken on these reports, with particular reference to the adjustment of the balance sheet, it is considered that the best place for this is London, where representatives of all the sterling area participants are available. It is, however, understood that some of the other Commonwealth participants would prefer the working party to meet in Tokyo and, in order to get the arrangement working, they have been told that we agree to this as an interim arrangement.

B.—Most Favoured-Nation Treatment for Japan

1. The United States have been trying for a considerable time to get from us and others an undertaking to give most-favoured-nation treatment to the exports from Japan and Korea. The United States Administration attach the utmost importance to reducing the cost to the American taxpayer of maintaining the Japanese economy. This they can only do by increasing exports; and Congressional opinion is that the granting of most-favoured-nation treatment by other countries to Japanese exports would increasingly facilitate the attainment of this objective.

2. Having raised the matter without success first at Havana, then during the Tripartite Talks on Germany in March, and again in connection with the drafting of the O.E.E.C. convention in April, the Americans tried to secure their objective by the insertion of a clause in the draft Bilateral Economic Co-operation Agreements. We resisted this for the following reasons:—

(1) We were still at war with Japan and no peace treaty had been made or was under consideration.

(2) The matter of the status of Japan from a commercial and economic point of view was for decision by all those countries who took part in the war against Japan.

(3) The proper tribunal to which both the United States and ourselves had agreed that such matters should be referred was the Peace Conference or, pending that, the Far Eastern Commission.

(4) We could not take any action in this matter except by agreement with the other Powers concerned in the war against Japan and particularly the other Commonwealth countries so concerned.

(5) There was no connection whatever between the 18 nations of Western Europe and Japan. The great majority of them never took any part at all in the war against Japan.

(6) It was unfair and unethical to drag this issue into E.R.P. discussions.

(7) From an economic point of view it would be definitely inimical to the interests of the Western Union and European co-operation to force any condition upon European Powers which would make Japan an equal entrant to their markets with their own neighbours in Western Europe.

(8) The United Kingdom and its colonies could not afford to be compelled to buy goods from Japan whether for dollars or sterling.

(9) There would be an immediate and justifiable outcry by the workers and industrialists of this country (and of Lancashire in particular) if this agreement were to be made without consultation with them or indeed at all, and there is no conceivable justification that the United Kingdom Government could put forward for their action. In the event we induced the Americans to accept our point of view; but we did undertake to discuss the matter with them further in an attempt to reach a satisfactory solution.

3. The next development came when the Americans notified us that they were considering seeking signatures at the G.A.T.T. Conference in Geneva to a protocol giving most-favoured-nation treatment to Japan on a reciprocal basis. We took the line that, as we had already told the State Department, it was impossible for us to commit ourselves in any way until we had had an opportunity of consulting both the other Commonwealth countries and British industry.

4. In the meantime we sent telegrams to the Governments of the Commonwealth countries and also of the European signatories to G.A.T.T., sounding them as to their attitude to the American request. In reply we received a considerable volume of support for at least postponing the consideration of the question. The result was that in the event the Americans withdrew their proposals for the collection of signatures at Geneva to a draft agreement, or for the appointment of a sub-committee of G.A.T.T. The United Kingdom Delegation was, however, authorised to discuss the question purely informally and without any commitment whatever with the American delegates outside the Conference, advancing the argument that other considerations apart we could not consider ourselves granting or supporting the grant by other nations of most-favoured-nation treatment to Japanese exports until we had a firm guarantee against either S.C.A.P. or the Japanese engaging in commercial malpractices such as multiple exchange rates, concealed subsidies and so on.

5. Apart from this question of an exchange rate for the yen, there are obvious political implications to be considered, both here and in the Commonwealth. Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have taken the same line as the United Kingdom at Geneva, and the first two Governments, as well as the Indian Government, have stated that in their view the F.E.C. is the correct body to consider and formulate policy, and that nothing should be done to prejudice its rights in the matter.

6. In the event, the Americans did not wish to pursue the matter even informally at Geneva. They have, however, now raised the matter again, and advantage should be taken of the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss the next step with Commonwealth representatives.

ANNEX C

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES OF EUROPEAN RECOVERY PROGRAMME

1. The Commonwealth Governments and their representatives in London have already had copies of the basic documents. These are :—

(i) The Convention for European Economic Co-operation, setting up the O.E.E.C. and defining its purposes;

(ii) The Economic Agreement between the United Kingdom and United States Governments;

(iii) The United Kingdom Programme for 1948–49, 1949–50 and the Long-term Programme.

By the time the Commonwealth Prime Ministers meet, the revised 1948–49 Programme will have been sent on to the Economic Co-operation Administration by the O.E.E.C. The 1949–50 Programme and the Long-term Programme were sent to Paris on 1st October, but we have made it clear that the Long-term Programme is not to be regarded as final until after the meeting with the Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

2. Commonwealth Governments have been kept constantly and closely informed of all matters connected with E.R.P. Major developments are reported regularly in telegrams which are sent direct to Commonwealth Governments. More detailed information is also currently supplied through their representatives on the Commonwealth Liaison Committee in London. This Committee, of which Mr. Makins of the Foreign Office is Chairman, meets fortnightly and is attended by representatives of all the Commonwealth High Commissioners in London. Developments in connection with E.R.P. are explained fully at the meetings and Commonwealth representatives are free to raise any points that may be of interest to them.

3. In addition, discussions have already taken place with some Commonwealth Governments on matters arising out of the Long-term Programme and on development planning generally. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on his recent visit to Ottawa, has discussed these matters with the Canadian authorities, and officials of the Governments of Australia and New Zealand have recently been engaged in detailed discussions with C.E.P.S. and other authorities concerned. It is hoped that representatives of other Commonwealth Governments will also take the opportunity for similar discussions on matters of detail while they are in London.

4. Commonwealth Prime Ministers will thus be familiar with the main outline of E.R.P. and of the ways in which it is likely to affect their interests.

Objects of E.R.P.

5. The main purpose of O.E.E.C. is to enable the Participating Countries as soon as possible to achieve and maintain a satisfactory level of economic activity without extraordinary outside assistance. What this means in fact is that they should attain dollar viability, collectively and as far as possible individually, by the end of the E.R.P. period, that is 1952–53. To this end the Organisation has requested each Participating Country to submit, by 1st October, a Four-Year Programme showing how it intends to attain dollar viability by 1952–53. These programmes will be considered by the Organisation between 1st October and 15th November, and are due to be forwarded on the latter date to the Economic Co-operation Administration as part of a general plan, drawn up by the Organisation, for the Participating Countries as a whole. The part which the United Kingdom hopes to play in the rehabilitation of Europe is set out in its Four-Year Programme. The successive stages of this Programme are given in the 1948–49 and 1949–50 Programmes.

The Four-Year Programme

6. The Four-Year Programme will be an important document for the meetings since it is the latest and fullest exposition of economic problems before the United Kingdom, particularly in its external economic affairs. But it is not final until both the other members of the Commonwealth have discussed it and it has been examined side by side with the programmes of other participating countries in Paris. This may involve significant changes. In its present form it is an answer to a request from O.E.E.C. for a statement of the policies we propose to follow to become independent of aid in 1952–53. The Programme shows that on the assumptions that we can sell 150 per cent. of 1938 exports at present terms of trade and succeed in turning the large invisible deficit of 1947 into a net surplus of £250 million, we can reach "viability," with imports at 80–85 per cent. of the pre-war level. To deal with the dollar problem a substantial switch of imports from the Western Hemisphere to the Sterling Area and the rest of the world has to be achieved, as well as a determined effort to increase gold and dollar earnings. Further essential parts of the programme are the rapid development of home agricultural, steel and coal output, and other export or import saving industries. There is also implied a high level of industrial investment in the United Kingdom and the promotion of economic development in the Colonies and other countries of the Commonwealth. Throughout the Programme it is assumed that the people of Britain will make a long sustained effort, that no large scale rearmament is necessary, that there is no American depression, that adequate E.R.P. aid is received in the next three years, and that European co-operation will be a success. Granted these assumptions, both consumption and industrial activity in 1952–53 could be markedly higher than at present despite the cessation of external aid.

General Effect of E.R.P.

7. We should have had to carry out something of the nature of the Four-Year Programme whether Marshall Aid had been forthcoming or not. The main importance of Marshall Aid is that it gives us time to put through such a programme without a disastrous fall in our standard of living. Without dollar assistance in this or some other form, we should have had to try to attain dollar viability without having time to make the necessary industrial and economic adjustments. This would have meant reducing raw material imports, with the consequent loss of exports and rise in unemployment, and drastic reductions in our standard of living and in the Investment Programme. One of the consequences would have been that far less goods would have been available, both from this country and from Europe, for the Commonwealth countries. Moreover, without Marshall Aid we should have been forced to ask the Rest of the Sterling Area countries to restrict still further their dollar deficits; this would have adversely affected their standard of living also. The Long-term Programme shows how we propose to use Marshall Aid to achieve viability by 1952, whilst in the meantime maintaining living standards and securing a reasonably satisfactory rate of investment.

Maintenance of Sterling Area Reserves

8. It is a major object of our policy not to let the central reserves of the Sterling Area fall below their level at the beginning of the E.R.P. period. Since the beginning of the E.R.P. period the reserves have, in fact, fallen because we make our dollar purchases in the ordinary way and then have them reimbursed from E.R.P. funds. There is a delay in this process of reimbursement, but on the whole the amount of E.R.P. funds due to us is equivalent to the reduction in our reserves since the beginning of April. The job of maintaining the reserves is, therefore, being achieved so far.

9. It is essential to this objective that the dollar deficit of the Rest of the Sterling Area should be included in our dollar balance of payments for E.R.P. purposes. We fix our dollar expenditure programme according to the amount of E.R.P. aid which is available. Clearly if the dollar deficit of the Rest of the Sterling Area were not taken into account, we should be unable to escape a reduction in the Sterling Area reserves, whatever we did to our own dollar import programme. The dollar deficit of the Rest of the Sterling Area (other than Colonies) is estimated at $169 million in 1948–49.

10. In this policy of including the dollar deficit of the Rest of the Sterling Area for E.R.P. purposes, we have the full support of all the other Participating Countries, and our contribution to the Intra-European Payments scheme is dependent on this deficit being met. The United States Administration is sympathetic to this point of view and is trying to find some way in which it can cover the deficit without running into trouble with Congress. If it fails to do so, the results will be extremely serious, as the whole of the work in Paris in connexion with the 1948–49 programme and the Intra-European Payments Scheme was based on the assumption that the Sterling Area dollar deficit would be taken into account in assessing the United Kingdom allocation of aid. The Americans are, however, probably influenced by some sort of ideas on the following lines:—

(a) They feel that the net result, so far as the Rest of the Sterling Area is concerned, is that they get out of the general pool $169 million without having had their programmes scrutinised either in Paris or Washington. The Americans agree that there may be excellent reasons why the R.S.A. should have these dollars, but fear the criticism that they are the only people whose dollar deficit would be met without going through the established procedure of producing programmes for scrutiny by O.E.E.C. and E.C.A.

(b) Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa are, of all countries in the world, those most comparable with the United States in standard of living, way of life, &c. They have suffered no more than the United States from actual devastation due to war. Yet, according to the American point of view, notwithstanding what they may have done in the past (e.g., Australian and New Zealand gifts in 1947, the Canadian Loan, the South African gold loan, &c.), and, notwithstanding what they may be supplying by way of goods, they appear at present to be making no obvious financial contribution, with the exception, of course, of Australia's £8 million gift. The Australian decision to contribute £8 million was very well received by the Americans and has undoubtedly improved the prospects of a decision in favour of including the deficit of the non-participating sterling area for E.R.P. purposes.

11. It is probably for some such reasons as these that E.C.A. suggested some time ago that they should make direct approaches to non-Participating Commonwealth Governments with the object of asking them to make direct contributions to E.R.P. They are not disposed to regard the deferment of an immediate return in the form of goods (reflected in an increase in the sterling balances of the Rest of the Sterling Area countries) as a sufficient contribution, since this involves a deferred liability on the United Kingdom economy which the United States are endeavouring to make permanently stable by large free gifts during the E.R.P. period. We have, of course, lost no opportunity of countering the American arguments and making the position quite clear to them; we have throughout urged E.C.A. most strongly that this matter can be left to the discretion of the Commonwealth Governments concerned.

12. A message dated 3rd October from Washington informs us that Mr. Hoffman told the Chancellor that he would agree to the inclusion of the R.S.A. deficit, and that he would be informing the Watchdog Committee accordingly. Mr. Hoffman's agreement was only obtained after a long discussion in which the American representatives raised various issues such as extra sterling area contributions and a close watch on the flow of commodities from the rest of the Sterling Area to O.E.E.C. participants. In face of all these suggestions we maintained the line that we could not contemplate making unilateral declarations or undertakings regarding matters concerning the Commonwealth. Further information will be available in due course.

European Trade and Payments

13. The details of the European Payments Scheme and Trade Rules will be found at Annex D. The principle of conditional aid (i.e., the making of part of the dollar aid to European creditor countries conditional on their making an equivalent sum in their own currency available to debtor countries) meant that the conception of off-shore purchases could be abandoned, and will enable the Participating Countries' sterling deficit to be met without recourse to that process. It is the United Kingdom view that an essential part of the scheme is the establishment of Trade Rules, the underlying principles of which are that debtor countries must be economical in their external expenditure and do their best to increase their exports, while creditor countries must be as liberal as they can in their import policy and try to help the debtors by not insisting on the export of inessential goods that the latter do not require for their economic recovery.

14. The short effect of the Payments Scheme is that the other participating countries will, during 1949, have available the sterling equivalent of some $500 million with which to pay for imports from the United Kingdom and the Rest of the Sterling Area. It is estimated that about 30 per cent. of this money will be spent in the United Kingdom and the remainder in Australia and other sterling area countries. The United Kingdom proportion will constitute unrequited exports, notably machinery, ships, tractors and other capital equipment. In so far as the other 70 per cent. is spent in other sterling area countries it will represent assistance by them, to the extent that they part with goods for which they get no immediate return in the form of goods or services. The supplies involved will consist substantially of raw materials such as wool, wheat, rubber, &c., which are all vital for the European economy, the revival of which is an essential prerequisite if markets for these products are to be maintained in the long term.

United Kingdom Supply Commitments to Europe

15. The Commonwealth Governments have shown some anxiety lest our commitments to Europe, either under E.R.P. or in connexion with Bilateral Negotiations, should prevent them from getting the commodities they need, particularly in the field of capital goods, from this country. This is a matter which we have had constantly in mind. The position as regards our commitments under bilateral negotiations is set out in Annex A.

16. As regards E.R.P., it is evident that the extension of greater credits to Europe must to a certain extent increase the competition for our exports. For instance, in the process of cutting down the 1948–49 programmes of the Participating Countries to bring them within the amount of United States aid, certain suggestions were made as to imports which might be switched from Western Hemisphere to other sources of supply. Nevertheless we have throughout refused to enter into specific commitments to the Participating Countries. (The only exception to this is coal, where we have undertaken to provide 6 million tons in 1948, and in fact expect to export nearly 10 million tons of solid fuel in the 1948–49 period.)

17. The $500 million credit does not imply any change in this policy. The figure was arrived at as the result of a realistic estimate of the trade which was likely to move between each Participating Country and the Sterling Area as a whole during the course of 1948–49. It is therefore a method of financing trade which might otherwise have been frustrated. It is in no way a commitment to supply specific goods or to increase our exports beyond the volume which we would have expected them to reach in the normal course of events. As regards possible switches, some small increase in our exports to Europe may arise to the extent that United Kingdom goods are concerned and that the switches are translated in the event into actual transactions.

18. Finally, it should be emphasised—

(a) That the credits granted under the Payments Scheme are a sine qua non of receipt of dollar aid, which has enormous advantages for the Commonwealth countries, and

(b) In so far as E.R.P. assists in the rehabilitation of Europe, it will enable the United Kingdom and the other participating countries to produce more of the goods needed by the Commonwealth countries than would otherwise have been the case. It will also make Europe a more stable market than it might otherwise have been for the products of the Commonwealth countries.

Other Long-term Commitments which might Affect the Commonwealth Countries

19. The Customs Union Study Group is still continuing its work and we shall continue to take part in the discussions. So far these have been carried on separately from the more general question of long-term European co-operation, but we hope that in the future it may be possible to relate the question of a Western European Customs Union more closely to the wider field to be covered by O.E.E.C. Studies of possible integration in selected fields are only at their inception and it is too early to guess what their practical effect may be. It is possible, however, that they may point the way to some permanent form of European co-operation which would be more selective than a Customs Union and would fit in better with our Commonwealth associations and other vital interests. Separate notes on Customs Union and Fields of Activity will be found in Annexes E and F.

European Economic Co-operation

20. It is not yet possible to get a clear picture of what precisely European economic co-operation is going to mean in practice. A certain amount has already been done through the E.C.E., e.g., coal allocations. The recent work in Paris in dividing the aid for 1948–49 and in drawing up the European Payments Scheme is a tremendous step in this direction and represents a high degree of co-ordinated economic activity. The next steps are likely to emerge from the preparation by the Organisation of the long-term plan for Europe, based on the individual plans which have been submitted. The process of fitting together individual plans will throw up many fields for co-ordinated activity, but it is still impossible to foresee their exact nature.

ANNEX D

EUROPEAN PAYMENTS SCHEME AND TRADE RULES

I.—Introductory

It has become apparent in the discussions in Paris that the lack of balance which exists in European trade, and the payments difficulties to which this leads, form a problem second only in importance to the problem of the dollar deficit. Just as there is a persistent scarcity of dollars amongst the countries of Europe, so those countries themselves have become divided into two classes—those who are persistent net creditors in Europe and whose currencies therefore tend to be scarce, and those who are persistent net debtors and cannot therefore purchase within Europe the imports which they need. This difficulty leads in turn to a second, that since some European currencies have become "harder" than others, European currencies are no longer freely convertible one with another. The result is that trade can no longer be carried on through a multilateral system in which a country can offset its surpluses with one country against a deficit with another. Instead, bilateral relationships have been substituted, the object of which is to produce an exact balance in trade and payments between each pair of countries. These tendencies have had a restrictive effect upon European trade.

2. For some countries, some means to bridge the gap in their European payments is urgently needed. France, for example, is faced with a serious deficit in her trade with the sterling area; and most countries in Europe are unable to balance their payments with Belgium. A solution of this problem is not only of great importance to European recovery, it is also closely linked with the problem of the dollar deficit. The United States, for example, can hardly be expected to meet large demands from participating countries for the export of steel so long as European supplies of steel are not being fully used as a result of payments difficulties. Moreover, the European countries themselves cannot build up their economies so as to make themselves independent of American aid by 1952 unless they can import essential goods and services from other participating countries.

3. To meet this situation, measures are needed falling broadly under two heads:—

(1) Some system of financial assistance to cover the deficits of participating countries with one another.

(2) The formulation of a common commercial policy designed to enable debtors and creditors to bring their balance of payments more closely into equilibrium with one another at the highest possible level of trade.

Action under the first head is intended to assist in the achievement of the aim stated in the second. A system of financial assistance alone may provide a palliative for the existing disequilibrium, but cannot of itself provide a cure. It must be emphasised, therefore, that the action under the two heads must go together and that the scheme now being worked out in Paris is one for the restoration of European trade on a healthy basis and not merely one to remove current payments difficulties.

II.—Financial Assistance to Cover European Deficits

4. After many schemes had been considered, it was agreed that the financial assistance to be given under the first head should be linked with the distribution of dollar aid. The method finally worked out, and embodied in the present plan, divides into two parts the dollar aid received by each participating country which is a creditor in relation to the other participating countries:—

(a) Unconditional Aid (based upon what has been called the "overall deficit," i.e., the Western Hemisphere deficit of each country, minus its surplus in Europe), and

(b) Conditional Aid, equivalent to the European surplus.

Conditional aid would be granted only on condition that the country receiving it would be willing to contribute an equivalent amount in its own currency for the purpose of financing the deficits with it of other participating countries.

5. The general effect of the scheme is that countries which are creditors in Europe are required to make a free grant in their own currency in the shape of a contribution towards the European Payments Scheme, and only on condition that they do this will they receive the full amount of dollar aid allocated to them for the purpose of covering their Western Hemisphere deficit. Those countries, on the other hand, which are debtors in Europe (whose "overall deficit" is therefore larger than their Western Hemisphere deficit) will receive, in addition to the dollar aid allocated to them to cover their Western Hemisphere deficit, indirect aid in the shape of drawing rights upon their European creditors.

6. Each participating country, therefore, besides receiving a certain sum in dollars, undertakes to make grants in its own currency to other participating countries with whom it is in a creditor position, and receives in its turn grants from those participating countries which are in a creditor position towards it. For the purposes of the European Payments Scheme, participating countries will thus fall into three classes :—

(i) Net Creditors—which will make grants exceeding the total of the grants received by them from other participating countries.
(ii) Net Debtors—for whom the grants received will exceed the grants made, and
(iii) Intermediate countries—which received on balance no more than they themselves contribute.

7. As indicated in paragraph 3, the major objective of the scheme is to facilitate the development of trade in Europe along lines which will lead to restoration of the external equilibrium of the participating countries and so facilitate orderly progress towards multilateral trading. With the assistance of the grants provided under the Scheme, participating countries will be enabled to take part in a scheme of multilateral compensation to be operated by the Bank for International Settlements on the lines already followed in what is known as the Basle Compensation Scheme. The general effect of these arrangements, which will, it is hoped, come into force on 1st October, 1948, will be to enable countries to offset a surplus with one participating country against a deficit with another, instead of seeking to achieve an exact balance in their payments with each country. This becomes possible to a greater degree under the European Payments Scheme because the granting of assistance by the creditors to the debtors should go some way to remove the existing disparity between what are now known as "hard" and "soft" currencies.

III.—Measures to Bring European Trade into Balance

8. Action under the second main head referred to in paragraph 3 above has been taken by drawing up a set of Trade Rules. These Rules are designed to bring the participating countries more closely into equilibrium in their accounts with one another. As the major creditor in Europe we felt entitled to ask that such rules should be accepted as a condition for our participation in the European Payments Scheme. The debtor countries have made no difficulty about this, but have seen in the formulation of Trade Rules an opportunity to get the necessary assurances, for their part, that they should be able to use the financial resources to be made available to them under the Payments Scheme to good advantage in the form of goods and services of the kind they need for their recovery programmes.

9. For purposes of restoring equilibrium in Europe the rules revolve round the essential principles that debtor countries must be economical in their external expenditure and do their best to increase their exports, while creditor countries must be as liberal as they reasonably can in their import policy and try to help the debtors when it comes to exporting goods that the latter do not require for their economic recovery. The broad result should be that pronounced creditors and debtors should get nearer to a balance, while countries that are already in approximate equilibrium would contribute to this balance by buying more from the debtor countries and selling more to the creditors.

10. As regards the question of assuring essential supplies to debtor countries, we have first of all got it clearly prescribed in the rules that it is the duty of every country to do its best to maintain and increase essential supplies to the others so far as it can afford to do so without prejudice to its own recovery programme. Then, in order to reconcile debtor countries to relying on European sources of supply instead of standing out for a bigger share of direct dollar aid to finance such supplies from the Western Hemisphere, the rules provide that net creditors shall facilitate the use of the monies they are putting up for the purchase of necessary goods and, in particular, that all countries should do their best to increase exports of products which it is understood should be supplied within Europe as a corollary to the agreed division of direct aid.

IV.—The United Kingdom Contribution

11. Contributions and drawing rights provided under the Scheme are set out in the table annexed to this note. It will be seen that the United Kingdom has undertaken to make a net contribution of sterling equivalent to $282 million, divided as follows :—

	$ million
France	200
Italy	25
Austria	25
Bizone	46½
French Zone	5½
Greece	10
	312
Belgium (receipt)	30

12. The net deficit of the other participating countries with the sterling area as a whole was estimated in O.E.E.C. at $491 million. The $209 million uncovered by the grants can be financed by existing means of finance, and particularly the drawing down of sterling balances. This will, like the grants, represent supplies of goods and services by the sterling area as a whole without immediate return in the form of goods.

13. This large sterling area surplus underlines the importance which the United Kingdom attaches to the Trade Rules and to the urgent need for European co-operation to right the disequilibrium. It is hoped that substantial progress will be made by the debtor countries in 1948–49 in order to close this gap—and to close it by means which contribute to the United Kingdom's basic economic problem of reducing its dollar deficit.

14. In terms of supplies, the United Kingdom is expecting to export to the other participating countries at a substantially higher level than in 1947. Exports of machinery, ships, tractors, vehicles and other capital equipment are estimated at around $585 million; exports of steel at around 330,000 tons; exports of coal and coke at around 10 million tons; sales of crude oil and petroleum products by British-controlled companies at around 15 million tons, or $425 million; shipping services to a value of $200 million. In each of these fields, except coal, the supplies to be provided by the United Kingdom are comparable in amount to those which will be provided to the other participating countries by the United States.

ANNEX E

ATTITUDE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT TO A WESTERN EUROPEAN CUSTOMS UNION

1. At Paris on 12th September, 1947, the United Kingdom Government, together with other Governments now members of O.E.E.C., agreed to a declaration that they would "create a Study Group for the purpose of examining the problems involved and the steps to be taken in the formation of a Customs Union. . . . ." As has repeatedly been stated, this declaration and participation in the Study Group set up in Brussels involves no commitment to enter a Customs Union. The United Kingdom Delegation to the Study Group has throughout made it clear that the purpose of the study was merely to provide the evidence on which Governments could base a decision whether or not to enter a Union. The other participants agreed with this United Kingdom view.

2. Observers from various Commonwealth countries have attended most of the main meetings of the Study Group, and Commonwealth Governments have been kept generally informed of the various lines of enquiry which the Study Group has been pursuing, in particular, the study of a common tariff and of the effect on certain sectors of industry, including agriculture, of the creation of a Customs Union. It is now possible to give some information about the studies which have been made on the possible effects of a Customs Union on various industries. The studies which the United Kingdom submitted to the Study Group in Brussels showed that in the case of about two-thirds of the industries examined a Customs Union would be likely to cause some degree of damage to United Kingdom industry or have an unwelcome effect—not always great—on trade covered by preferences accorded by the United Kingdom. Examples of commodities in respect of which a Customs Union would be liable to cause some interference with trade at present facilitated by imperial preference arrangements, were maize, pears, dried fruits, i.e., currants, sultanas and raisins, wines, butter, cheese, bacon and ham, sugar, motor vehicles and pneumatic tyres. These studies, together with the studies submitted by other countries, were considered by technical sub-committees in Brussels in September. The reports of the sub-committees in general confirmed the conclusions reached in the studies submitted by the United Kingdom.

The international political aspect

3. A decision in favour of a European Customs Union would go a long way to convince the Americans that we were in earnest in our attempts to make E.R.P. a success, and would therefore assist in the passage of the future appropriations. It is, however, worth noting that Mr. Finletter, head of the Economic Administration Mission to the United Kingdom, has emphasised that it would be mistaken policy for the United Kingdom Government to embark on a project of this nature if they were not convinced that it was sound, and that they should not do so merely to please United States opinion. On the other hand, if we refuse to join a Customs Union, we shall be accused of damaging the prospects of O.E.E.C. and we shall give the impression that we do not really mean business when we advocate a Western Union.

Economic considerations

4. At present the real obstacle to expanded trade among European countries is not tariffs, but the quantitative restriction of imports dictated by balance of payment difficulties. A Customs Union in which such restrictions between members continued would be meaningless. On the other hand, to abolish them in present circumstances would mean going beyond a Customs Union to a more or less full Economic Union which would involve some measure of control by a Union authority over the economic and financial policies of the members. In particular, it would involve a measure of Union control over exchange rates combined with a system of Union rationing of "hard" foreign currencies and with inter-member credit facilities going some way, but not necessarily the whole way, towards a pooling of monetary reserves and a possible right of the Union to intervene in domestic policy in the event of substantial inflationary or deflationary developments in the economies of particular members having severe repercussions on the economies of other members. Some degree of Union control would also be necessary over the use of subsidies, and the Union would have to have the right to require the discontinuance and scaling down of any internal tax which discriminated against imports from other countries in the Union and of any consumption tax which bore severely on Union imports of which there was no home production. There would have to be also a close Union interest in State trading to ensure that the I.T.O. rules, designed to secure non-discrimination as between the members and to limit protection of home industry, were strictly observed.

5. It would not be easy to bring about the necessary measure of joint action. It is doubtful whether democratic Governments would be willing to give such powers to an international body. If so, there is a strong presumption that if a Customs Union were to survive it would have to move towards a full Economic Union with a single economic and financial policy.

6. Entry into any close Economic Union with the countries of Western Europe, and the consequent removal of restrictions of all kinds on trade between the members of the Union, would require substantial adjustments in many policies which we regard as fundamental, in particular, the system of imperial preference and the sterling area arrangements as well as our policy for home agriculture.

Imperial Preference

7. From the outset we have given great attention to the possible effect of a European Customs Union on the market for goods from other Commonwealth countries. It will be remembered that in the course of the discussions of the Havana Charter the United Kingdom Delegation succeeded in securing a revised draft of the Article dealing with Customs Unions. This revised version has already been incorporated in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. It provides that preferences "shall not be affected" by the formation of a Customs Union but "may be eliminated or adjusted by means of negotiations between affected countries (including countries outside the Union). Further, the Article now permits the International Trade Organisation (or, in the case of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the contracting parties) by a two-thirds majority to approve proposals for a Customs Union not fully complying with the rules otherwise applicable. All this gives considerable flexibility and leaves to future negotiations the treatment within a Union of preference systems as a whole or of individual preferences. In any such negotiations involving the United Kingdom the other Commonwealth countries could take part. It would be essential to have these negotiations before a commitment was taken by the United Kingdom to enter a Customs Union, and a settlement of the preference problem on lines satisfactory to all countries concerned is a sine qua non of our even considering entering a Customs Union. We have made this clear to the countries participating in the Brussels discussions.

8. It is impossible to forecast with confidence how the eventual arrangements would work out. It might prove possible to secure some small departure in our favour from the strict rules. In some cases we might be able to maintain a diminished preference for Commonwealth countries by retaining some duty against Union members. In others we might have it accepted that long-term contracts should afford a certain preference to Commonwealth goods. In some cases the common tariff might be so arranged as to give higher preferences in the United Kingdom over all but Union members. But there is a danger that the other members of the Union could not or would not be willing adequately to compensate the other Commonwealth countries for their loss of preferences in the United Kingdom.

9. The studies referred to in paragraph 2, as to the effects which a Customs Union might have on certain sectors of production, had to be based on certain assumptions about preferences. The assumptions were that where a member of the Union now gives preferences, it is deemed to continue to give such preferences as against other countries which are not members of the Union but not as against the members; except that where goods now enter a country on preferential terms free of duty, they can be deemed to continue to do so. Where before the formation of a Union a member has been giving preferences, any preference which it is deemed to continue to give after the formation of a Union is not deemed also to be given by the other members of the Union. Quota preferences are deemed to have been abolished. These assumptions were, however, only working hypotheses intended to give a clear and uniform basis for the studies; they do not prejudice the eventual solution of the problem. The results of the United Kingdom studies, referred to in paragraph 2, show the degree of difficulty which might arise as regards preferences in respect of particular commodities.

Sterling Area Arrangements

10. To go as far as full Economic Union would involve a limitation on our freedom to settle our own exchange rate or, at least, a measure of pooling of exchange reserves. In practice this would mean that a Commonwealth country which was a member of the sterling area would find that its financial relations with the United Kingdom were extended into relations with the Union as a whole. If, for example, it was felt, say, that Australia had too much sterling the responsibility of correcting this by reducing imports, so far as it now falls upon the United Kingdom, would fall on the Union, although the United Kingdom (as the principal consumer of Australian goods) would take the lead. This would mean rationing on the lines appropriate to scarcity of any non-Union currency. Similarly, if Australia found herself short of sterling she would restrict her imports, and financially it would make no difference to anyone whether imports from the United Kingdom or the rest of the Union were in question.

11. The same conversion of relations with the United Kingdom into relations with the Union would presumably take place in regard to the supply to the Commonwealth of non-Union currencies—primarily the dollar. Commonwealth countries would, presumably, have to accept rationing by the Union in the same way as they accept it at present, tacitly or formally, by the United Kingdom. This would probably be very difficult. No doubt the United Kingdom could act as an intermediary and perhaps receive an over all dollar ration for the whole Commonwealth. But in the last resort the Commonwealth would become dependent on the Union for its supply of dollars.

Strategic Considerations

12. We have not examined the strategic considerations but they are obviously of great importance and would have to be examined carefully before we contemplated entering a Customs Union. The economic studies of the Brussels Study Group are being made without reference to strategic considerations which would fall to be examined at a later stage of the Group's work.

Alternative means of economic collaboration

13. In view of the difficulties inherent in a full Economic Union with Western Europe to which a Customs Union would almost certainly lead if it were not to be a sham, and the fact that such a Union could not come into operation for some time and would contribute nothing immediately to the solution of the problems of the viability of Western Europe, we have considered whether it would not be better to pay more attention to alternative means of economic collaboration which would be more immediately effective and at the same time be an earnest to the Americans of our seriousness in promoting European co-operation. What we have in mind is the development of the tentative discussions initiated in Paris in connexion with O.E.E.C. regarding the integration of production in Western Europe. These discussions might be developed with the aim of examining, as regards selected industries, how far the Western European countries could plan new investment in particular countries in the interests of Western Europe as a whole, and how far, by Government action, existing sources of production could be expanded and the free exchange of goods in Western Europe facilitated through the gradual relaxation of quantitative restrictions, tariffs and other barriers to trade. Progress along these lines would be by no means simple. It might involve, without the excuse of a Customs Union, discrimination against non-participants and the repercussions of this on the international economic obligations of the United Kingdom and other European countries would require very careful consideration. Centralised planning would certainly not be easy or readily acceptable to some of the Governments concerned. Moreover, integration might tend to be confined to a few industries in which the difficulties of collaboration were least acute. No really effective collaboration could be brought about without more or less painful adjustments in particular industries.

14. As indicated in paragraph 13, to be effective a plan of this kind would probably necessitate adjustments of United Kingdom tariffs and quotas between the participating countries which would involve discrimination against non-participants. Discriminatory quotas could be justified only on the ground of balance of payments difficulties. Discriminatory tariffs entailing some departure from most-favoured-nation principles and perhaps reducing the value of preferences enjoyed by the Commonwealth might also be involved. Discriminatory tariffs would be permissible under existing international obligations only in the case of a full Customs Union. Indeed, it might, in practice, be found, if the adjustments required under this policy were really substantial, that it would be easier to bring them about if something very nearly approaching a Customs Union existed. If so, we could not avoid the difficulties inherent in a Customs Union although, in so far as the alternative arrangements had a smaller scope, the difficulties would be confined to a smaller range of industries.

15. To proceed on these lines would not involve a definite rejection of the Customs Union plan as a long-term solution. But we are continuing, without of course entering into commitments, to proceed with the Study Group in Brussels and propose to try to ensure that its work is closely co-ordinated with the studies of the Joint European Plan which are being initiated in Paris. This would, we hope, result in attention being concentrated on the more urgent and practical steps to be taken to facilitate European collaboration rather than on the particular method of a Customs Union. The progress of these studies during the winter should enable the United Kingdom Government to form a more definite view on the Customs Union proposals in relation to alternative schemes for expanded economic collaboration between the countries of Western Europe which the United Kingdom Government might sponsor, and to consider how far such a plan of collaboration might need to contain elements of the Customs Union method as well as other approaches to the problem.

CO-OPERATIVE PLANNING IN SPECIFIC FIELDS OF EUROPEAN ECONOMIC ACTIVITY

1. The United Kingdom long-term programme prepared for submission to the O.E.E.C. represents a major contribution to the solution of the European economic problem. By surmounting the dollar problem and planning for supplies of vital products to participating countries it assists Europe to achieve in 1952–53 a reasonable level of economic activity without extraordinary external aid. The effectiveness of the United Kingdom contribution will largely depend upon the degree to which the resources of the other participating countries are mobilised individually and collectively to the same end.

2. The individual contributions of the other participating States will be presented to the O.E.E.C. in the form of similar long-term programmes. From the examination of these will emerge the adequacy, or otherwise, of the various national targets for the achievement of a viable European economy within the planning period. From this, too, will emerge a picture of the overall economic strategy, in the light of which many adjustments in the national programmes will undoubtedly be indicated.

3. The establishment of the required trends and, in particular, the revival of intra-European trade, will involve more or less painful adjustments in the pattern of production, exports and imports. For this purpose the close and continuous co-operation of all participating countries will be indispensable.

4. The first approach must be through a study of how the resources of the participating countries can be applied in given fields of activity in a manner calculated to serve their interests as a whole. It will not be necessary to wait upon the final agreement on the long-term programme to initiate action. In many of the important fields of activity an immediate consideration of possibilities for joint action both on a short- and long-term basis is possible.

5. Where comparison of the national plans throws up shortages of raw materials, action to remedy them has clearly to be related to the capacity of plant and equipment in the later stages of the industrial process. This will, in turn, call for a review of the various types of capacity available, so that shortages in capacity at particular stages of production may be matched, whenever practicable, by surpluses elsewhere. The most effective starting-point for the consideration of expanded production will be increased productivity through the more efficient utilisation of existing resources. New investment will be required for most stages of the industrial process, and the relative efficiency of different types of investment will have to be reviewed in the light of common interests of the participating countries.

6. The choice between dollar-earning and dollar-saving projects has to be considered in the light of a review, on the one hand, of the overall export possibilities for given types of output in the dollar area, and, on the other, of their potential contribution to the difficult balance of intra-European trade and the ultimate development of a multilateral system of trade and payments.

7. The solution of the dollar problem and the revival of intra-European trade contemplated by the United Kingdom in its long-term programme entails important economic developments in its overseas territories. The possibilities of further increasing the production of dollar-earning and dollar-saving raw materials in other overseas territories may suggest opportunities for co-operation between the Governments concerned.

8. The United Kingdom, for its part, has already tabled with the O.E.E.C. a list of the following fields of activity, as offering scope for the development of joint plans, the study of which might lead to early and profitable results. The United Kingdom has not as yet entered into any commercial commitments in relation to these projects.

C224447

I.—Food and Agriculture

Cereals

9. The first of our suggestions to the O.E.E.C. was that a main objective of European co-operation should be a substantial increase in the output of cereals. The main object is to recover pre-war production. Owing to the difficulties of procuring adequate supplies of coarse grain from overseas or from Eastern Europe the European livestock population cannot recover to its former scale unless more coarse grain can be grown in Europe itself. The uncertainties in Eastern Europe have induced us to seek to obtain wheat and coarse grain from the O.E.E.C. countries and their dependencies. The United Kingdom 1952–53 import programme includes an item of half a million tons of wheat and/or coarse grain from France and North Africa. This gives us a direct interest in European cereals expansion.

10. We recognise that if cereals production is to be rapidly expanded in Europe it will be necessary for large quantities of nitrogenous fertilisers to be supplied. More agricultural machinery to compensate for the reduction in the rural population will also be necessary. We are hoping to deal with the general shortage of nitrogenous fertiliser through stimulating European hydro-electric projects, though this is a long-term proposition; we are also making an assessment of the forward fertiliser position, from the point of view of production in this country. Shortage of steel is, of course, a limitation on our capacity to send more tractors and agricultural machinery to Europe, without stinting the Commonwealth or dollar markets. Certain types, however, are now available for Europe. The shortage of steel (and of scrap) is itself a European problem to which attention will have to be given by O.E.E.C.

11. We consider that substantial increases in cereal output could be achieved from the more efficient control of seed-borne diseases in Europe. In France alone, we reckon that the general application of organo-mercury seed dressings would, on the planned acreage, increase the yield by 900,000 tons in 1949. We are prepared to help in a campaign to get farmers to use chemical controls more extensively, and we shall offer to supply chemicals and technical advice.

Livestock and Dairy Produce

12. The European livestock population has been greatly reduced by the war and shortage of feeding-stuffs is hindering its recovery. In addition to stimulating increased output of coarse grain we propose to press for the extensive development of modern farming methods both to increase grassland yield for silage and drying, and to increase the yield of arable crops. A Grassland Improvement Campaign, as conducted in our own Agricultural Expansion Programme, could well be extended to, say, Northern France. Our import programme for France and French colonies in 1952–53 takes into account possible increases in output under this head.

Fish

13. A rapid increase in the consumption of protein foods could be achieved by greatly extending the consumption of fish in Europe. There is no shortage of supplies, and the problem is essentially one of transport and storage, in addition to publicity for raising consumer demand. We shall press for co-ordinated action on these lines.

II.—Inland Transport

14. This important sector of European economy does not lend itself easily to the application of individual large-scale projects, but it is an essential subject for European co-operation. The transport system of Europe is bound to suffer from old age and decrepitude as a result of the war, from the current shortages of raw materials, labour and power, and from frontier restrictions, made worse by post-war currency problems. As a result, transport costs are high, thus affecting all other industrial and commercial activity, and delays and hindrances cause further losses. Moreover, it is difficult to develop the movement of, e.g., perishable food-stuffs, and of inflammable liquid fuels, owing to shortages of special equipment.

15. It will be necessary to induce each country (a) to allocate a fair share of its resources to the manufacture of transport equipment; (b) to reduce frontier formalities; (c) to agree to standardisation of equipment. The existence of a Transport Committee of O.E.E.C. has already had one important result. Surpluses of rail equipment in Italy and Belgium were able to be matched against demands for similar equipment from the United States. This resulted in a substantial saving in dollars.

16. The United Kingdom representatives on the Transport Committee will continue to press for measures of co-operation.

III.—Fertilisers

Nitrogenous Fertilisers

17. Reference has already been made to the position on nitrogenous fertilisers. There is at present a world shortage (demand is about 4 million tons and supply about 3 million tons) and we are considering what the situation is likely to be in four or five years' time. In the long run output could be raised through hydro-electric schemes in Europe. If a real long-term deficiency is likely to develop it would be worth while considering the installation of new plant in the United Kingdom. Plans for more nitrogen, therefore, depend on a survey of the European and other agricultural expansion plans, and, as far as Europe is concerned, we shall not be able to come to a clear view until the Long-Term Agricultural programmes have been discussed in Paris.

Potash

18. A rough statistical assessment suggests that there will be no serious world shortage of potash by 1952. About one half of United Kingdom supplies come, however, from the Russian Zone of Germany, and are, therefore, extremely uncertain. Moreover we have not been able to take into account, in our calculation of demand, a number of agricultural expansion plans of which we as yet know nothing, but which, in all probability, exist, or will shortly be formulated. It seems, therefore, highly desirable to stimulate increased output in France (and Spain). Both countries are anxious for this, and all that is needed is more plant and equipment. We propose, therefore, to discuss at O.E.E.C. the possibility of obtaining what is needed.

Phosphate Rock

19. We at present import about 950,000 tons of rock phosphate from French North Africa for use as fertilisers. We are hoping to get larger supplies in 1952, in order to dispense with imports from America, which we use for industrial purposes. This will not involve very much more capital equipment and will save us some half a million dollars.

Sulphur

20. About 50 per cent. of the sulphuric acid produced in the United Kingdom is used in the production of fertilisers. Forty-five per cent. of present sulphuric acid production is based on imported natural sulphur (as distinct from the use of pyrites, zinc concentrate, &c.). This has to come, at present, from the United States at a cost of over 4 million dollars per annum.

21. There are sulphur mines in Italy, but owing to their obsolescence and other factors the Italian price is three times that of the American. The rehabilitation and re-organisation of the Italian mines so as to provide for more efficient equipment and a less wasteful use of man-power should result in more and cheaper sulphur, thus enabling the countries participating in O.E.E.C. to lessen their dependence for this mineral on the United States. We propose to press for this to be treated as a project.

IV.—Raw Materials

Timber

22. Schemes for increasing European timber production chiefly affect Eastern Europe, which is outside the range of O.E.E.C. In one particular respect, however, Western Europe could be of substantial assistance to the United Kingdom. Before the war our imports of pitprops from France and Portugal totalled 135,000 fathoms. This was a convenient trade, since pitprops were shipped to Cardiff from the South of France and from Portugal and the vessels returned with coal. These two sources of pitprops have declined since the war and in 1947 only 35,000 fathoms were shipped to the United Kingdom. Pitprops are so vital to the expansion and safety of the coal industry (to which France and Portugal look for supplies) that, in the absence of Russian timber, we are spending 3 million dollars per annum on pitprops. It is expected that Portugal will be able to supply more, but currency difficulties may present an obstacle. France, however, will be a soft currency source and the French should have every interest in rehabilitating their forests and providing more machinery and transport. As this matter is so closely tied up with the vital problem of expanding European coal production, we propose to press it at O.E.E.C.

Coal

23. The objective is to make Europe independent once more of Western Hemisphere supplies, and we have assumed that the O.E.E.C. Coal Committee will be producing a programme to secure this. The problem is two-fold: first, to co-ordinate production programmes to meet Europe's overall requirements without Western Hemisphere aid and to build up production to remove shortages of particular types of coal, such as gas coal, coking coal and anthracite. Secondly, there is the need for co-ordinated consumption policy with a view to the full utilisation of qualities in surplus supply, e.g., untreated smalls. The possibility of achieving or furthering this aim by means of changes in industrial practice is an important point for consideration.

Steel

24. The Steel Committee will report on how Europe can achieve independence of Western Hemisphere supplies of steel. The development of iron ore production in North Africa is an immediate point for consideration.

V.—International Electricity Programme

25. As in the United Kingdom the demand for electric power in Continental Europe has outrun the supply. Since adequate power is vital for industrial recovery (and hydro-electric schemes can also be used for fertilizer and aluminium production) an international programme was drawn up at the O.E.E.C. meeting in Paris last summer for plant extensions based on purely economic considerations and without regard to national frontiers. Some of the stations would supply electricity mainly to other countries than those in which they would be situated.

26. This striking project of co-operative enterprise is virtually no longer existent. Most of the stations included in the scheme have been drawn into the national programmes, and it is unlikely that the export of electricity from them can be developed until national needs are met. A further difficulty is that very substantial amounts of equipment would be needed which cannot be produced within the area.

27. The United Kingdom has no immediate stake in the various schemes, save in our general interest in European recovery, since our own power plans are entirely independent of those of other countries. Nevertheless, national schemes of this kind have great public appeal, and will require continued and persistent support from O.E.E.C. if they are to be developed. Our independent position should give added weight to our influence in this matter, and we shall endeavour to stimulate O.E.E.C. into consideration of all possible schemes of the kind.

VI.—Overseas Territories

28. There may be considerable scope for co-operation amongst the European countries with dependent overseas territories. It is accepted that opportunities exist for expanding the production of various raw materials for local consumption, export to participating countries with consequent saving of dollars, and for export to hard currency destinations. There will, in addition, be some opportunities for co-operation on single projects which will be of mutual benefit to the countries. Co-operation on colonial economic policy is at present carried out by means of ad hoc but increasingly frequent meetings between representatives of the various Colonial Offices. In order to ensure the systematic treatment of this problem in relation to European economic recovery, agreement has eventually been reached for O.E.E.C. to set up a committee to study the whole problem and make any necessary recommendations for special projects.

29. While it is recognised that the overseas territories of France tend to be complementary to the economy of the mother country, there will undoubtedly be some scope for the development of production for common ends: African hardwoods are a case in point. Agreements on communications and health also offer opportunities for co-operative effort.

30. As regards the Belgian Congo, we should like to see an expansion of cotton production, which would help to relieve European dependence on dollar cotton. The greatest single contribution from a dependent territory to European recovery, however, would be the recovery of the N.E.I. whose pre-war output of sugar molasses and cattlefeed would alter the European picture considerably. It seems doubtful whether anything can be done there, however, until political conditions improve.

31. Our own plans for the development of primary production in Central Africa are closely affected by the state of the railway running through Portuguese East Africa to the port of Beira. There is room for a substantial project for improving this port and increasing the carrying capacity of the railway which serves it.

ANNEX G

THE WORLD ECONOMIC POSITION IN 1952–53

Difficulties of Estimation

1. It is at any time very difficult to foresee world economic trends for four or five years ahead and these difficulties are particularly acute at the present time. Many countries are still unable to re-establish a balance in their overseas payments and receipts and in many cases are still struggling to check internal inflation, and most countries still have difficulties in establishing a balance, either directly or indirectly, in their accounts with the dollar area.

Main Assumptions regarding the International Balance of Payments

2. In spite of these uncertainties, however, it has been necessary for the purpose of establishing our Long-Term Programme to make some working assumptions about the shape of the world economy in the early 'fifties. For this purpose it has been assumed that the present extreme disequilibrium in world economic relationships will have been corrected, and that some form of balance will have been re-established. The United Kingdom aims at balancing its overseas payments and receipts by 1952–53 with some provision for debt repayment and other investment overseas. It is assumed that the sterling area as a whole will also be in balance with the outside world and that the countries members of O.E.E.C. will also succeed in their aim of being independent of special outside assistance to their balances of payments by that time. In view of the uncertainty about the way in which the disequilibrium in the balance of payments of the dollar area with the rest of the world will eventually be corrected it has been thought prudent to assume that the Sterling Area as a whole must attain a balance with the Western Hemisphere and that the O.E.E.C. countries as a whole must do the same.

Volume of World Trade

3. United Kingdom exports in 1952–53 are estimated at 150 per cent. of the pre-war volume. This estimate presupposes a prosperous world, with a continued high level of economic activity in the United States and considerable progress towards full economic recovery in Europe. In these conditions the volume of world trade might rise to about 115 per cent. of the 1938 volume, compared with about 95 per cent. at the present time. A relatively greater expansion in trade in manufactured goods may be expected, and this is estimated at about 125 per cent. of the pre-war volume. Trade in primary products is estimated at about 105 per cent. of the pre-war volume.

4. It is reasonable to hope that Europe will have gone a long way towards full economic recovery by 1952–53, but the volume of Western European imports is unlikely to be above the pre-war level. A considerable increase in exports may, however, be necessary to purchase even this volume of imports in view of the loss of income from invisible transactions. The overseas trade of Germany and Japan is assumed to be much reduced compared with pre-war, though considerably above the present level and trade between Eastern and Western Europe is also assumed to be less than before the war. How far this trade is in fact expanded will depend on the willingness of Eastern European countries to offer on acceptable terms the food and materials required by the West. A tendency for these countries to insist on payment in the form of scarce capital goods needed for their industrialisation plans will tend to reduce the possibilities and attractions of such trade for the West. In view of the present published plans and apparent tendencies of these countries it has been considered wise not to count on any very considerable development of East–West trade, and trade between the United Kingdom and this group of countries has been estimated for long-term programme purposes at slightly above the pre-war level.

5. The trade of the sterling Dominions is in general expected to expand considerably above the present levels, but Canadian trade may be affected by the continuing dollar shortage and the need of countries which have been living partly on credits to re-establish a balance in their accounts with the Western Hemisphere.

6. The Western Hemisphere's contribution to world trade will probably remain considerably greater than before the war, although the abnormal level of

United States exports in recent years is unlikely to be maintained, and is indeed already falling. United States trade in 1952–53 compared with the recent past is estimated as follows (1936–38 = 100) :—

	U.S. imports	U.S. exports
1947	110	272
1948 (1st half)	121	218
1952–53	155	170

The United States supplies nearly half the world exports of manufactures in 1947, while the German and Japanese share of the trade was negligible. The following table shows the approximate change in the distribution of world trade in manufactures that has been assumed in the forecast of the United Kngdom position :—

	Per cent. of world exports of manufactures
	1936–38	1947	1952–53
United Kingdom	18·6	20·4	23
United States	16·3	48·0	29
Germany	19·8	0·5	8
Japan	7·0	negligible	3
Other countries	38·3	31·1	37
	100·0	100·0	100

World Prices

7. The relative and absolute levels of world prices in the future are clearly of great importance to both the United Kingdom and to the Dominions. As a result of a decision reached by O.E.E.C. all countries were obliged to draw up their balance of payments estimates for 1952–53 on the completely arbitrary asumption that import and export prices were the same as had been assumed for 1948–49 (for the United Kingdom, about the current levels). It is possible that some fall in food and some raw material prices may occur as production increases but may be balanced by a reduction in United Kingdom export prices to meet increasing competition from other countries, and that the United Kingdom terms of trade will not in fact be very different in 1952–53 from those ruling at present. In attempting to estimate the probable balance of payments position and the dollar earnings of the rest of the sterling area, however, it has not been considered necessary to adhere rigidly to the assumption of 1948–49 prices and different price assumptions have been made where this has seemed justifiable.

United States Overseas Investment

8. Another important factor in the world economic situation in the 1950's is the level of United States overseas investment. It seems probable that a major part of any commercial lending will be in other parts of the Western Hemisphere, and it has seemed unwise to count on any significant contribution from this source to the dollar income of the rest of the world. It is assumed that the United States Government, which is contributing over £1,000 million in E.R.P. assistance alone in 1948–49, will not be lending abroad in the 1950's except perhaps in the form of some continued assistance to Germany and Japan.

The Pattern of Trade and Payments

9. The pattern of trade and payments envisaged in 1952–53 in the conditions described above is that of a large United Kingdom surplus on current account with the sterling area, a small surplus with the O.E.E.C. countries, and a deficit with the Western Hemisphere and with the rest of the world. The surplus with the sterling area is entirely due to the Dominions and is assumed to be financed partly by debt repayment and capital exports from the United Kingdom, partly by the proceeds of gold production and partly by these countries' surplus with Europe. The surplus which the Colonies are estimated to have with the United States is assumed to be available to help meet the deficits of the rest of the Sterling Area. Some transfer of surpluses with the O.E.E.C. countries to meet deficits with other non-dollar countries is also assumed. In estimating the balance of payments position with Canada it appears probable that the sterling area as a whole will have a deficit with Canada, and it is assumed that this will be met from the Sterling Area's gold production.

C224453

Trade Controls and Discrimination

10. Even assuming a high level of activity and demand for imports in the United States in the 1950's, and considerable recovery in Europe, it is very unlikely that the balances of payments of the Sterling Area group, the O.E.E.C. countries, and the rest of the world can be restored to a balance such as has been assumed without continuing restriction of imports from the Western Hemisphere. In estimating the position in 1952–53, therefore, it is assumed that dollars will continue to be generally scarce and that the Sterling Area cannot count on any net earnings of gold or dollars from countries outside the Western Hemisphere. Within the Western Hemisphere itself it seems probable that there will still be a shortage of United States dollars. In these circumstances it is probable that some discrimination against United States exports will continue to be necessary in most countries and that energetic attempts will be made to find other sources of supply of goods now obtained from the Western Hemisphere. The estimates of the United Kingdom position in 1952–53 assume that United Kingdom exports benefit both from some reduction in prices relatively to United States goods, particularly in the United States market, and from continued discrimination against United States goods in other markets. They also assume complete discrimination against the United States of America in United Kingdom import policy.

11. In these conditions, the sterling Dominions may expect a continuing strong demand for their primary products, particularly in so far as they are substitutes for Western Hemisphere goods. The demand for their exports may however be limited to some extent by the need of many European countries to achieve and maintain total balance of payments equilibrium. This may result in attempts to increase import-saving agricultural production in Europe as well as to increase exports. The actual effect of these tendencies on the export trade of the sterling Dominions will depend in part on their demand for United Kingdom and other European exports.

12. The degree of restriction of United States imports into the United Kingdom and the sterling Dominions which will be necessary in 1952–53 will depend not only on relative cost levels in the sterling area and in the United States but also on the level of United States demand both for manufactures and for primary products such as wool, rubber, tin, and cocoa, exported from the Commonwealth. The level of gold production and its value in terms of other commodities will also be exceedingly important. It seems possible on balance that the net dollar earnings of the Colonies will amount to some £80 million and that gold production will yield another £125 million. Against this the deficits of the sterling Dominions with the Western Hemisphere are estimated at some £100 million compared with about £300 million in 1947. Restriction of net dollar expenditure to these levels would probably involve continued restriction of imports from the Western Hemisphere though not restriction of the degree of severity assumed for the United Kingdom.

13. It has been assumed that United Kingdom imports from the Western Hemisphere will be restricted to about 60 per cent. of the 1947 volume and that the maximum effort will be made to find alternative sources of supply. On present estimates of exports and making some provision for debt repayment and other overseas investment, however, total imports in 1952–53 will be 10 per cent. greater in volume than in 1947 and only about 85 per cent. of the 1938 volume. Unless exports can be increased above the levels so far estimated even imports from the sterling area will have to be restricted below the levels which they might otherwise attain, and are estimated at about 130 per cent. of the 1947 volume. If, in the event, the Dominions, and other countries are prepared to take larger quantities of United Kingdom exports than it has been thought prudent at this stage to assume, our ability to import will be increased. There is little doubt that the domestic demand for imported goods in 1952–53 will be great enough to absorb much larger quantities of imports, particularly of food, than have been provided for in these estimates if our export trade can be expanded sufficiently to provide the means of payment in foreign exchange are available.

International Payments and the Position of Sterling

14. In the conditions of continuing dollar shortage and import restriction that seem likely to persist into the 1950s, it seems most unlikely that sterling can be made freely convertible into dollars. It remains the policy of His Majesty's Government, however to co-operate so far as possible in any arrangements which may help to extend the area of multilateral trading outside the dollar area, including the encouragement of the widest possible use of sterling as a means of payment in the finance of international trade. It is our intention to maintain the multilateralism of trade and payments which at present prevails within the Sterling Area so that payments deficits arising between one part of the Sterling Area and any particular country can be settled by surpluses with that country earned by other parts of the area.

15. It is hoped, also, that as more and more countries succeed in regaining overall equilibrium in their external payments it will become possible to extend multilateralism as between third countries also so that the Sterling Area surpluses with one country can be used to meet Sterling Area deficits with other countries. In many cases this result may be attainable by the transfer of sterling between non-Sterling Area countries, and it is hoped to extend substantially the present existing facilities for such transfers. Within the ambit of the O.E.E.C. or of any continuing form of intra-European co-operation which may succeed it, multilateralism should be facilitated both by jointly organised compensation arrangements and possibly also by some measure of planning of intra-European surpluses and deficits. But clearly it is impossible to forecast at this date how far this process can be carried even within the non-dollar world. If there are important trading countries which are unable or unwilling to bring their overall external accounts into balance, they may break the chain of multilateral compensation to an incalculable extent.

16. As between dollar countries and non-dollar countries, the position is still more difficult to foretell. An attempt will certainly be made to avoid a complete bilateralism, but there are limits to the extent to which this can go.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

JAPANESE PROBLEMS

MEMORANDUM BY THE UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

I.—The Peace Treaty

It remains the view of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom that an early Peace Treaty is desirable, but it is unlikely that there will be any response from the United States before the new Administration has taken office after the Presidential election. There would appear to be no advantage in pressing the Americans on the Peace Treaty issue for the time being.

II.—Level of Industry

2. The important question of establishing the level of Japanese economic life, which has been under discussion for over two years in the Far Eastern Commission without result, was the subject of an exchange of views during the summer between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth Governments.

3. The draft policy decision now before the Far Eastern Commission is supported by a substantial majority of the eleven members of the Commission and is, in general, on lines favoured by all the Commonwealth Governments who are represented on the Commission.

4. Unfortunately, there seems very little prospect of the Commission reaching agreement. Of the veto Powers, neither the Soviet Union nor the United States have come out in favour of the paper and the indications are that neither will support it as it stands.

5. United States policy has not yet been clearly defined and it seems probable that inter-Departmental differences of opinion in Washington still remain unresolved. It is probable, however, that the United States Government, in their desire that Japan should have a viable economy within a short term of years and that the cost of Japan to the American taxpayer should be reduced, may advocate building up the Japanese economy to a much higher level than that which either they or other Powers have hitherto considered necessary or desirable. They are also anxious that economic conditions in Japan should not remain at a level which would play into the hands of extremist agitators.

6. There is no indication that the United States Government would wish to allow Japan to develop primary war industries again; on the other hand, they seem disposed not to restrict secondary war-supporting industries. In a recent aide-mémoire, the State Department informed the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington that the Government of the United States could not agree with the contention of the United Kingdom Government that the building by the Japanese for export of merchant ships exceeding certain limits of size and speed constituted a security threat. They added that the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, who was keenly alive to any possible security threat, had stated categorically that no such threat existed; and that this opinion was concurred in by the Department of the Navy.

7. The fact must be faced that, in the last resort, the United States Government can take unilateral action as regards Japan. The share of countries other than the United States in the physical occupation and control of Japan, and in the provision of economic assistance, has become so small that they are in a weak position to press upon the Americans arguments based on either security or economic grounds.

8. An outline of the new trend in American policy towards Japan, as seen in London, and suggestions as to the steps which the United Kingdom might take, in consultation with other members of the Commonwealth, to meet it, were considered in the exchange of views with Commonwealth Governments earlier this year. It was suggested that the interests of Commonwealth Governments might be best served by not adhering too rigidly to the proposals embodied in the Far Eastern Commission paper (which is based upon estimates made at the end of 1945) if good evidence were produced to show that, in view, for instance, of the unexpectedly rapid rise in the Japanese population, somewhat higher levels were required for the achievement of viability. At the same time, it was felt that certain restrictions on war-supporting industries should be insisted upon in the interests of security. In particular, restrictions upon the size and speed of merchant ships should be enforced. The view was put forward that it might be useful to seek to persuade the United States Government that Japanese viability could be achieved by the adoption of much lower levels than those suggested in the " Strike " and " Johnston " Reports. Other Commonwealth Governments expressed general sympathy with the objectives outlined but some doubt was expressed whether it would be possible to convince the United States Government.

So far, no such approach has been made to the United States Government. In the summer, it seemed possible that the United States Government were on the point of submitting new proposals to the Far Eastern Commission. They have not yet done so and the most recent indications are that the new proposals may not be ready for some time yet. On the whole, it seems probable that this matter, too, might best be left in abeyance until after the Presidential election. The views of Commonwealth Governments have been clearly set forth in Far Eastern Commission discussions and are therefore well-known to the United States Government.

THE SITUATION IN MALAYA

MEMORANDUM BY THE UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Introduction

1. The present disturbances in Malaya must be reviewed in proper perspective against developments in that territory since the end of the war. The Japanese occupation gave a great impetus to " national " movements in South-East Asia. But the trouble in Malaya does not spring from a genuine nationalist movement: or from economic discontent. Since the establishment of the civil administration the Malayan Government have worked—

(a) to restore Law and Order throughout the territory by re-establishing the machinery of administration and police arrangements and by disbanding the Malaya Peoples Anti-Japanese Army (which had been supplied by us with arms as a resistance group). Considerable quantities of arms (although not all, unfortunately) have been collected and order restored in considerable areas which had been under organised guerilla control;

(b) to secure sound constitutional arrangements acceptable to all the principal elements in the population. The existing constitution is a delicate balance of all the elements in Malaya, containing much compromise between the communities. It is accepted by all sections as substantially equitable;

(c) to provide the people with food and to create the conditions for economic rehabilitation and expansion of production. The economic recovery of Malaya has been one of the outstanding achievements since the war.

(d) A direct appeal has been made to the interests of the Malaya peoples by a progressive social policy in the fields of housing, education, taxation, the development of sound trade unionism and other social services.

The Communist Party

2. The present wave of violence is entirely the work of some thousands of Chinese, mostly aliens by birth and of Communist sympathies. Before the war the Malayan Communist Party, the membership of which was almost exclusively Chinese, was an illegal organisation. Shortly before the capture of Singapore, however, its assistance was accepted in mobilising the Chinese community in the struggle against the Japanese. Members of the Party were trained and armed by the British Military authorities and some escaped to form the nucleus of a resistance movement on the Mainland. During the Japanese occupation the Party gained control of the main resistance movement, which was supplied by South-East Asia Command; and before the re-occupation of Malaya by British troops, they established some control over important areas of the Mainland.

3. On the liberation of Malaya full recognition was given to the part played by the resistance movement; and an attempt was made to gain the confidence of the leaders of the Communist Party (which was then recognised as a legal association) by inviting their co-operation in the work of rehabilitation. This attempt, however, soon proved impossible; it became clear that the Communists, playing as usual upon the opportunities of economic uncertainty, were attempting to win control largely by intimidation over the labour unions. During 1946 and 1947 the Party made great efforts to gain the support of the workers in rubber and tin, but order was improved and violence by bandit gangs decreased The Party remained almost wholly a Chinese organisation, although a few Malays and Indians were found among its ranks.

The Communist Attack

4. The attempt to dominate Malayan industrial and political life by fomenting strikes and disrupting the country's economy was frustrated by Government action; and in the spring of this year the Party determined on a new line of attack. A decision was taken to start an armed attack on the authority of Government and on any person, of any community, who took the side of Government. Former members of the Malayan Peoples Anti-Japanese Army were mobilised, and special assassination squads were formed to liquidate those prepared to challenge the Communists. Estate and village populations were intimidated and victimised and numerous outrages and murders were committed. In the first few weeks, the prime objective of the insurgents was the assassination of European planters and plantation and mine staffs in out-lying areas, and the destruction of buildings and stocks on rubber estates, with a view to disrupting the country's economy. The majority of those murdered were Chinese, some were local Kuomintang leaders, but the majority were simply law-abiding persons who would not join with the Communists in their campaign.

5. Since the attacks began in May, 199 civilians, including 14 Europeans, had been murdered up to the end of September; and a number of armed attacks had been carried out by large bodies of men on police stations and isolated mines.

Government Counter-Measures

6. Strong measures were taken by Government to meet this further phase of the Communist menace. A state of emergency was proclaimed throughout the Federation, leaders have been arrested for deportation, a large number of suspected persons have been detained for screening, the Communist Party (with three subsidiary organisations) was declared illegal and new regulations affecting Trade Union Organisations were made The army has been reinforced by the Guards Brigade, the Fourth Hussars and First Inniskillings. The regular police force has been strengthened by the recruitment of 3,000 other ranks locally and by the despatch of officers by air from this country. An auxiliary police force numbering more than 200,000 (of all Communities) has been raised and is being trained and led by about 500 officers and men formerly of the Palestine Police. In addition part-time Auxiliary Constabulary have been raised.

7. Offensive operations by the military and police, and by the special "ferret" forces operating in the jungle, have resulted in a marked increase in the number of terrorist casualties which now total 260 killed and 282 captured; and, in many instances, attacks on estates and mines have been beaten off by the Special Constabulary. Such attacks are becoming less frequent in consequence, and the insurgents now tend to seek easier targets and move in smaller numbers. They appear to be confining themselves almost entirely to individual assassinations and to be concentrating on native labourers and Asiatic employees rather than on European estates. There are also signs that they are beginning to revert to their earlier tactics of interfering with labour relations, which may be an indication of weakness. Their "mobilisation" may now have been completed within the limits imposed by our operations: but captured documents reveal that they are suffering from a growing lack of money, ammunition, food and medical supplies, and that their communications are severely restricted.

8. It is now hoped that the insurgents' initiative has been disorganised, and it is most improbable that they will be able to launch the co-ordinated offensive throughout the country which they had intended. They have failed to secure the support of the vast majority of the Chinese or any other community in Malaya, all of whom have rallied firmly behind Government in their efforts to suppress the few terrorists who are disturbing the country. At the same time, they retain a considerable power of intimidation over their Chinese compatriots. The difficulties of eradicating their menace completely will not be overcome quickly.

INTRODUCTORY NOTES

1. In this paper, which has been prepared in the Treasury, the estimates of the United Kingdom Balance of Payments given in Cmd. 7324 (United Kingdom Balance of Payments, 1946 and 1947) have been revised and brought up to date. Provisional estimates for the first half of 1948 are included, and may be read in conjunction with the forecasts in the Economic Survey for 1948 (Cmd. 7344).

2. There are a number of additions and amplifications to the form of the tables in Cmd. 7324:

Table I, the current account with the whole world, shows details of imports divided into main classes. (The principal differences between the classification adopted here and in Table III, and the classification used in the Trade and Navigation Accounts are set out in the Notes to this table.) Under the heading of "Government overseas expenditure", normal expenditure (Item 2 (d)) has been separated from special transactions of a discontinuous nature (Item 2 (e)). An estimate of receipts from travel in the United Kingdom, business and private, is shown for the first time; as separation of tourist from business travel is impossible, the scope of the parallel entry on the payments side has been correspondingly enlarged to include business travel.

Table II is a new table which divides the current account summary among certain important geographical areas.

Table III is also new. It sets out expenditure on the main classes of imports by geographical areas.

Table IV is on the same basis as the capital account in Cmd. 7324, with minor changes.

Table V gives figures of the drain on gold and dollar resources, half yearly in 1946, and quarterly thereafter.

3. The notes appended to the tables are designed to indicate methods, amplify some of the figures in the tables and explain certain significant changes whose origin would not otherwise be clear.

The following symbols have been used:

... = Not available
— = Nil or negligible

NOTES TO TABLES

(Figures in brackets show values in £ millions in 1946, 1947, and first half of 1948 respectively)

TABLE I

The figures for 1946 onwards cover, so far as possible, actual payments and receipts derived from exchange control and other sources (exceptions to this rule being mentioned in succeeding notes). The figures in Items 1 and 8, therefore, may differ considerably from published figures of movements of imports and exports; this difference is quite apart from that between the valuation of imports c.i.f. in Trade and Navigation Accounts and f.o.b. in the Balance of Payments. The figures for 1938 are not strictly comparable as they are based on pre-war estimates by the Board of Trade from the Trade and Navigation Accounts and other data.

As many of the items, especially in the invisible account, are subject to a certain margin of error, deficits are shown to the nearest £5 million.

Item 1.—(i) Includes imports for re-export, imports through the Lend-Lease pipeline and imports under the European Recovery Programme.

(ii) Imports from the Channel Islands are included (7, 10, 5), as in the Trade and Navigation Accounts and the Economic Survey.

(iii) The classification of imports is that adopted for Departmental programming purposes, not that of the Trade and Navigation Accounts. The major differences from the classification in the Trade Accounts are that in the present table munitions and certain military equipment, which are covered by military expenditure, are excluded from imports; diamonds are also excluded. "Food and Feeding-stuffs" includes commodities classified as food and drink in the Trade Accounts, and in addition oilseeds and nuts, fats and oils (other than petroleum), and starch. "Raw Materials" includes all commodities classified as raw materials in the Trade Accounts (with the exception of oils and fats) and in addition iron and steel (including finished steel), non-ferrous metals, plywood, paper and board, leather, chemicals, dyes and colours, plastic materials and some types of textile yarns and piece goods. "Manufactures and other imports" includes all purchases of ships.

Item 1 (a).—Includes, in first half of 1948, the special cost of production payment (10) to Argentina under the Andes Agreement. This relates to food to be shipped up to early 1949.

Item 1 (b).—Includes imports of U.K. stocks (24, 13, 8), accumulated overseas and paid for during the war. A compensating offset is included as a receipt in the invisible account (Item 12).

Item 1 (d).—The difference between the f.o.b. value and the estimated overseas costs incurred by British companies in producing oil for import into the United Kingdom is allowed for in Item 12.

Item 1 (e).—Includes purchase of tankers and other ships (5, 45, 1).

Item 2 (a).—Represents overseas expenditure on the forces, including the f.o.b. value of oil for the forces in U.K. and overseas.

C224474

Item 2 (b).—UNRRA and advances to devastated countries. Includes the value of U.K. exports and re-exports by UNRRA (51, 21, 2). (See note to Item 8.)

Item 2 (c).—Identifiable net cost to H.M. Government of supplies and services to the civilian population in Germany. Excludes occupation costs. Includes the excess (16, 4, 9) of the value of goods and services supplied by the U.K., without immediate payment, over the value of such goods received. The full value of the U.K. imports and exports is included in Items 1 and 8. Reparations deliveries are excluded throughout.

Item 2 (d).—This item covers normal overseas Government expenditure, including pensions and Colonial Office expenditure on development and welfare.

Item 2 (e).—This is a miscellaneous item. The main components are specified below (minus sign equals net receipt):

	1946	1947	1948 First Half
Sales of wool held abroad	− 56	− 13	− 3
Lend-Lease: Reimbursements, and goods received under the 1945 settlement	− 48	− 3	—
Repayment to H.M.G. of loans and advances (net)	− 22	− 17	− 2
Settlement with Canada (net)	20	—	—
Other (net)	− 15	− 13	—
	−121	− 46	− 5

Items 3 and 9.—Partly estimated. Excludes tankers' disbursements and oil freights which are embodied with other oil transactions in Item 12.

Item 4.—Excludes, so far as possible, service on foreign loans paid through London agents.

Item 6.—Includes business travel (roughly estimated at 12, 16, 9).

Item 8.—Estimates of actual receipts for commercial exports and re-exports, including those to the Channel Islands (10, 13, 8), exports of oil equipment to British companies operating abroad (offset in Item 12), non-commercial exports and re-exports by UNRRA (see Item 2 (b)) and those to Germany (see Item 2 (c)).

Item 10.—Excludes insurance, shipping and oil.

Item 11.—Includes business travel. The amount cannot be distinguished.

Item 12.—This is a miscellaneous collection of receipts and payments. The principal components are the overseas transactions of British oil companies, insurance, expenses on the upkeep of British enterprises abroad, commissions, royalties and private remittances. It also includes the offsets for items shown elsewhere in the Table for which actual payments in cash have not been made or received, referred to above, and an allowance for errors and omissions on current account.

TABLE II

1. For the purpose of this table and of Table III, Egypt and Sudan are included in the sterling area until 30th June, 1947, and Palestine and Trans-Jordan until 31st December, 1947, thereafter in " Other Countries ".

2. " Western Hemisphere " excludes British and European Colonies (see note 3 below), but includes the Philippines.

3. " O.E.E.C. countries " is used to describe non-sterling area members of the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation—France, Italy, Belgium, Luxemburg, Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland, Portugal, Austria, Greece, Turkey, the Bizone and French Zone of Germany, and Trieste, together with their dependent overseas territories (but imports of oil from U.S. companies operating in the Dutch West Indies are regarded as coming from a " Western Hemisphere " source).

4. The deterioration in the Western Hemisphere balance on invisible account between 1946 and 1947 was mainly due to the increased cost of Germany (from 28 to 54), the reduction in special Government receipts (see Note to Item 2 (e)), and an increase in miscellaneous commercial and financial expenditure. The improvement in the first half of 1948 compared with 1947 has resulted from the cessation of direct expenditure in the Western Hemisphere on Germany, and an increase in net receipts from shipping and oil.

TABLE IV

CAPITAL ACCOUNT

Section I.

1. An attempt is made here to allocate the net decrease in United Kingdom gold and dollar resources so far as possible between the United Kingdom and the Rest of Sterling Area. As regards the dollar area no serious difficulty arises although even here excessive weight may have been given to the United Kingdom share—for example, the whole of British oil companies' production expenditure in dollars is allocated to the United Kingdom though much of the output is sent to the Rest of the Sterling Area. Any valid allocation is impossible when dealing with the gain or loss of resources to countries which convert only part of their sterling receipts into gold or dollars. This item is therefore attributed to the whole sterling area in Section IC.

2. " Dollar Area " covers U.S.A., Canada and other American Account countries.

Section II.

Item 9. — Mainly Reconstruction Finance Corporation and Canadian Interest-Free Loans.

Item 10.—Includes sales and redemptions of U.S. and Canadian securities applied to amortisation of the R.F.C. and Canadian Interest-Free Loans.

Item 11.—This is a miscellaneous item and includes changes in official holdings of foreign exchange other than gold and dollars, repayment by France of the loan by H.M. Government, and, in 1946, an allowance for net capital inflow into the United Kingdom. In the first half of 1948 the figure also covers the sale of British railways in Argentina (—150) and the advance by H.M. Government to Argentina under the Andes Agreement (+100), partially offset by the value of goods (—29) exported by Argentina to the United Kingdom without current payment, under the provisions of that Agreement.

Item 12.—These gifts were effected by a reduction in sterling balances shown under Item 16.

Item 13.—Includes sales and redemptions of securities so far as known, and an estimate of capital investment and of the movement of funds from the United Kingdom to the Rest of the Sterling Area, including funds taken abroad by emigrants. It takes account of the " balancing item " involved in the construction of a complete United Kingdom balance of payments. The figure for the first half of 1948 is very tentative and may be subject to considerable amendment.

Section III.

Sterling balances comprise net liabilities of banks in the United Kingdom to their overseas offices and other account holders, including funds held as cover for overseas currencies, etc., and loans to H.M. Government expressed in sterling or sterling area currencies. Private holdings of securities and sterling balances of the International Bank and Monetary Fund are excluded. In this section Egypt, Sudan, Palestine and Trans-Jordan are included in the non-sterling area for the whole period.

Section IV.

In Sections I to III above changes in assets and liabilities are denoted by plus and minus signs bearing the normal interpretation, i.e., plus equals an increase and minus equals a decrease in each of the sections. In Section IV these changes are presented as parts of total overseas disinvestment. A decrease in reserves or in external capital assets and an increase in sterling liabilities are therefore shown as positive (sign omitted); an increase in reserves and in external capital assets and a decrease in sterling liabilities are shown as negative (minus sign).

TABLE V

DRAIN ON GOLD AND DOLLAR RESOURCES

1. " Gold and dollar holdings " means the Exchange Equalisation Account's holdings of gold, U.S. and Canadian dollars. These amounted to £473 million at 30th June, 1948.

2. Drawings on the International Monetary Fund include £7 million in January—March, 1948, and £4 million in April–June, 1948, drawn by India.

3. All figures are correct to the nearest £1 million and the totals, therefore, are not in all cases equal to the sum of the components.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

STATUS OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS

NOTE BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

THERE is general agreement that Commonwealth High Commissioners should be accorded a higher place in the order of precedence in the countries to which they are accredited. The specific suggestions which I made for this purpose in my telegram of 4th August have not, however, proved acceptable to all Commonwealth Governments. In the light of the comments received I now offer the following amended suggestions for giving effect to the object which we all have in view:—

(1) All Commonwealth Governments should agree in principle that, for purposes of precedence, High Commissioners should rank with foreign Ambassadors. The practical application of this principle would be for each Government to decide. The United Kingdom Government, for their part, would propose to treat High Commissioners and Ambassadors as separate groups on a footing of equality, and to submit to The King that both groups should rank immediately after the Lord Privy Seal. At functions where both Ambassadors and High Commissioners were present as a body, a system of "interleaving" would be adopted. It would be for the other Governments to decide whether to adopt a similar course or to arrange that, for purposes of precedence only, High Commissioners would rank among Ambassadors according to date of appointment.

(2) High Commissioners and Ambassadors should continue to be regarded as separate groups in the sense that a High Commissioner should not become doyen of the Diplomatic Corps.

(3) As regards precedence of High Commissioners inter se, it would be for each Government to decide whether precedence should be governed by date of appointment or by seniority of countries.

(4) As a further mark of enhancement of status, it would be open to each Government to accord to the High Commissioners of other Commonwealth countries the style "His Excellency the High Commissioner for . . . ."

(5) It would also be open to any Government which so desired to adopt a procedure whereby its High Commissioners would be appointed by The King, though it is not thought appropriate that the instrument of appointment should take the form of a Letter of Credence or other document addressed to His Majesty.

(6) Visiting Cabinet Ministers would not be given any place in formal Tables of Precedence, but as a matter of courtesy they would in practice be placed at formal functions above the High Commissioners of their countries—at least on any occasion when they were representing their Governments.

The suggestion has been put forward in some quarters that the title "High Commissioner" is now somewhat anomalous and should be altered. The United Kingdom Government appreciate this view and have considered very carefully the possibility of a change, but they have been unable to think of any wholly satisfactory alternative.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE EVENTS LEADING UP TO A REFERENCE OF THE BERLIN QUESTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

INTRODUCTION

The present situation in Berlin is the result of the failure of the Four Powers, owing to Soviet intransigence, to agree to a common policy for Germany. This intransigent attitude has been shown in breaches by the Soviet Government of the political and economic principles laid down at Potsdam.

The Soviet Government has withdrawn its representatives from the Allied Control Council for Germany in Berlin and from the Berlin City Kommandatura. It has unilaterally declared that the Governments of the United Kingdom, United States and France have forfeited their right to be in Berlin or to take part in the Four-Power occupation and administration of the city.

The culmination of the Soviet attitude of obstruction and intransigence has been the blockade of Berlin. The Soviet Government has, in clear violation of the obligations imposed by the Charter of the United Nations(1) to settle disputes by peaceful means, embarked upon a carefully prepared attempt to compel the Western Occupying Powers to abandon under duress their rights in Berlin. With this end in view the Soviet authorities have introduced a series of illegal measures which, consistently pursued, and progressively applied, amount to a blockade of all land and water communications between the Western Zones of Occupation and Berlin. This has not only endangered the maintenance of the Forces of Occupation of the United Kingdom, United States and France in Berlin, but has also jeopardised the discharge by these Governments of their duties as occupying authorities through the threat of starvation, disease and economic ruin for the population of Berlin. It is in these circumstances that the Western Powers have been forced to establish the air lift to supply food and fuel to the Western sectors.

The three Western Occupying Powers refrained, in the first instance, from introducing the new currency of Western Germany into the Western sectors of Berlin because they hoped for Four-Power agreement on Berlin's currency, just as they had worked patiently over a long period to secure Four-Power agreement on currency reform throughout Germany until this was made impossible by the withdrawal from the Allied Control Council on 20th March of the Soviet Military Governor. In regard to Berlin, the Western Powers offered to permit the Soviet Zone currency to circulate throughout the city provided that its issue and use was subject to Four-Power control. This was an essential condition since without it the Soviet authorities would be able, if they chose, to stifle the economic life of Western Berlin or to manipulate the new currency to serve their own ends. The Soviet authorities refused to agree to this condition and at once announced a currency conversion to cover both the Soviet Zone and the entire area of Greater Berlin. In order to safeguard their own position and to prevent the practical absorption of the Western sectors of Berlin in the Soviet Zone, the Western Occupying Powers introduced into the Western sectors a reformed currency linked to, but not the same as, that of the Western Zones.

Faced with the action of the Soviet Government already described, the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France have made every effort to arrive at a settlement by peaceful negotiations in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. On their own initiative they opened discussions with the Soviet Government in Moscow and expressed their readiness, if agreement could first be reached on the lifting of the blockade between Berlin and the Western Zones of Occupation in Germany, to negotiate with the Soviet Government on all outstanding questions regarding Berlin and Germany as a whole. The result of these discussions, which were begun in Moscow, continued in Berlin, resumed again in Moscow and concluded by an exchange of notes between the Governments, has been to make it clear that the Soviet Government has no intention of reaching an agreement save on its own terms, the acceptance of which would have meant the immediate or progressive absorption of the Western sectors of Berlin within the Soviet Zone economy and the whittling away of the rights and obligations of the Western Occupying Powers to a point at which the whole city of Berlin was under exclusive Soviet domination. The blockade has been maintained throughout the talks, while the Soviet authorities in Berlin have tolerated attempts by minority groups sympathetic to their aims to overthrow the legal Municipal Government of the city constituted by democratic elections under Four-Power supervision.

It is thus clear that the Soviet Government intend to exact as a price for lifting their unlawful blockade of Berlin abandonment by the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France of their rights in Berlin as Occupying Powers.

In these circumstances the three Governments have referred the action of the Soviet Government to the Security Council of the United Nations. His Majesty's Government have accordingly decided to publish an account of the events leading up to the present situation.

PART I.—GENERAL REVIEW

A.—The Legal Basis of the Allied Occupation of Germany

The Allies' rights as Occupying Powers arise from the total defeat and unconditional surrender of Nazi Germany.

In September, 1944, in anticipation of Germany's defeat, the Allied Powers represented in the European Advisory Commission (the United Kingdom, United States and U.S.S.R.) concluded an Agreement which defined the boundaries of the future Zones of Occupation and provided that there should be a special Greater Berlin area under joint inter-Allied authority. This area was not to form part of the Soviet or any other zone of occupation, and was to be divided into sectors, each to be occupied by one of the Allied Powers concerned. The Agreement also provided that an Allied governing authority (Kommandatura), consisting of Commandants appointed by the respective Commanders-in-Chief, should be established to direct jointly the administration of the Greater Berlin area. This Agreement, which, for the sake of clarity, will henceforth be referred to as the E.A.C. Agreement, was modified in November, 1944, and in July, 1945, in order to provide for participation by the French Government and for the creation of a fourth sector of Berlin occupied by France. The provisions of the E.A.C. Agreement were made known in a statement issued in Berlin on 5th June, 1945(2), two months before the Potsdam Conference, simultaneously with the Declaration regarding the defeat of Germany and the assumption of supreme authority by the Four Powers. The arrangements provided for in the E.A.C. Agreement on Zones of Occupation were put into effect with the withdrawal in June, 1945, of British and United States troops from parts of the Soviet Zone and the movement of troops of the Western Powers to Berlin.

The rights of the Four Powers to participate in the Occupation and Administration of Berlin and of their defined Zones of Occupation arise, therefore, from the E.A.C. Agreement which was made in anticipation of, and took effect in consequence of, the total defeat of the common enemy as a result of the joint efforts of the Four Powers. The right of the United Kingdom, the United States and France to be in Berlin is therefore, absolute and unqualified. The E.A.C. Agreement, from which this right derives, is completely independent of the Yalta(3) and Potsdam(4) Agreements and the Agreement on Control Machinery, referred to in the following section of this White Paper, having been concluded in its original form several months before the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences. This Agreement provided not only for the arrangements in respect of Berlin which have already been described, but also for the zones of occupation in Germany. Accordingly, in the summer of 1945, the United Kingdom and United States Governments withdrew their troops, which had pursued the German armies far to the east of the agreed boundary of the Soviet Zone, within the limits laid down by the E.A.C. Agreement. They naturally assumed that the Soviet Government would show the same good faith in regard to their own obligations concerning Berlin in the E.A.C. Agreement. The formal allegation contained in the Soviet Government's note of the 14th July, 1948 (printed as Annex III) that the Governments of the United Kingdom, and the United States and France have infringed the Yalta and Potsdam Agreements and also the Agreement on Control Machinery is untrue; but even if it were true it could have no bearing on their juridical right to participate in the Four-Power occupation and control of Berlin, although the Soviet Government has contended in their Note under reference that by these alleged violations of Four-Power agreements the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France have destroyed this right.

B.—The Legal Basis of Four-Power Control in Germany

As early as the Yalta Conference (3rd to 11th February, 1945) it was announced that:—

> "Co-ordinated administration and control has been provided for through a Central Control Commission consisting of the Supreme Commanders with headquarters in Berlin."

Further reference is made to co-ordinated administration in the "Declaration regarding the defeat of Germany and the assumption of supreme authority by the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Provisional Government of the French Republic" dated 5th June, 1945. In this assumption of supreme authority the Declaration lists a number of requirements which are imposed upon Germany and in which constant reference is made to the instructions, directions, etc., of the "Allied Representatives" who are defined as the "Representatives of the Supreme Command of the United Kingdom, United States of America, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the French Republic."

On the same day (June 5th, 1945) the four Governments issued a "Statement on Control Machinery in Germany." This Statement was an implementation of an agreement on Control Machinery signed in the European Advisory Commission on 14th November, 1944, (two months after the Agreement on Zones of Occupation referred to in Chapter I) and was amended on 1st May, 1945, to provide for French participation. In the statement on Control Machinery it is expressly stated that:—

> ". . . supreme authority in Germany will be exercised on instructions from their Governments, by the British, United States, Soviet and French Commanders-in-Chief, each in his own zone of occupation, and also jointly in matters affecting Germany as a whole. The four Commanders-in-Chief will together constitute the Control Council.
> 2. The Control Council, whose decisions shall be unanimous, will ensure appropriate uniformity of action by the Commanders-in-Chief in their respective zones of occupation and will reach agreed decisions on the chief questions affecting Germany as a whole."

This statement was followed by the report of the Tripartite Conference of Berlin (the Potsdam Agreement), which amongst other provisions stated that:—

> "It was felt that further work of a detailed character for the co-ordination of Allied policy for the control of Germany . . . . would in future fall within the competence of the Allied Control Council."

Power was actually assumed by the Control Council by Proclamation No. 1 dated 30th August, 1945. This document refers to the Declaration and the statement of 5th June, 1945, and establishes the Control Council upon which is conferred supreme authority.

The agreements in this and the preceding chapter constitute the formal basis of Allied Occupation and Allied Control in Germany.

C.—The Basis of Allied Policy in Germany

The principles upon which Allied policy in Germany was to be based were defined in a number of agreements of which the two most important are those signed at Yalta and Potsdam.

The Yalta Agreement resulted from the Yalta Conference (3rd to 11th February, 1945). Since this Conference was held some time before the end of hostilities it laid greater stress on the military than on the political aspects of Allied policy towards Germany. The relevant section of the communiqué reads:—

> "It is our inflexible purpose to destroy German militarism and Nazism and to ensure that Germany will never again be able to disturb the peace of the world. We are determined to disarm and disband all German armed forces; break up for all time the German General Staff that has repeatedly contrived the resurgence of German militarism; remove or destroy all German military equipment; eliminate or control all German industry that could be used for military production; bring all war criminals to just and swift punishment and exact reparation in kind for the destruction wrought by the Germans; wipe out the Nazi Party, Nazi laws, organisations and institutions, remove all Nazi and militarist influences from public office and from the cultural and economic life of the German people; and take in harmony such other measures in Germany as may be necessary to the future peace and safety of the world."

The communiqué goes on:—

> "It is not our purpose to destroy the people of Germany, but only when Nazism and militarism have been extirpated will there be hope for a decent life for Germans and a place for them in the comity of Nations."

The Potsdam Agreement was signed in Berlin on 2nd August, 1945. This was a more detailed Agreement following upon Yalta. His Majesty's Government and the other Western Occupying Powers have been frequently accused of breaking the Potsdam Agreement, without any specific mention being made of the part of the Agreement which has allegedly been broken. The relevant sections dealing with the treatment of Germany are therefore reproduced as Annex I to this paper.

The aim of the Potsdam Agreement was to establish the conditions in which a new Germany, from which the spirit of Nazism and militarism had been eradicated, could eventually take its place in a peaceful and prosperous Europe. To this end detailed political and economic principles were laid down, certain of which were of cardinal importance for the immediate development of Germany towards unity, prosperity and security for the individual. For instance, in the political field, all discrimination on grounds of race, creed or political opinion was expressly forbidden. German education was to be so controlled as to make possible the successful development of democratic ideas; the judicial system was to be reorganised in accordance with the principles of democracy, of justice under law, and of equal rights for all citizens. Freedom of speech and of the press was proclaimed and provision was made for the establishment of democratic political parties. On the economic side, Germany was to be treated as an economic unit and steps were to be taken for the equitable distribution of essential commodities between the Zones. Common policies were to be adopted in regard to import and export programmes for Germany as a whole and also in regard to currency and banking.

D.—The Failure of Four-Power Control

It was clear from the very beginning that there were many gaps in the Potsdam Agreement—gaps which were inevitable since that Agreement was a comparatively short statement of principle rather than a Statute Book for the Government of Germany, but gaps which had to be filled if the agreed principles were to be put into effect. But even had the Potsdam Agreement been more comprehensive, the experiment of Four-Power Control required that all four Allies should work together in a spirit of collaboration to carry out the obligations which the Agreement imposed.

This essential condition has not been met. Although at the outset of Four-Power administration some useful measures were passed, there has not been co-ordinated administration and control in accordance with the Yalta Declaration; the Control Council has not ensured uniformity of action by the Commanders-in-Chief in their respective Zones nor has it reached agreed decisions on all matters affecting Germany as a whole; still less have the German people as a whole been given the opportunity to prepare for the eventual reconstruction of their life on a democratic and peaceful basis as was agreed at Potsdam.

British Attitude

His Majesty's Government have always considered themselves bound by the provisions and the principles of the Potsdam Agreement and, in attempting to put these principles into effect, the British representative in the Control Council and elsewhere have followed a consistent, yet developing, policy. This also was summed up in a comprehensive statement which the Foreign Secretary transmitted to the Council of Foreign Ministers in Moscow and which he circulated again with minor amendments during the London session in November, 1947. In a document entitled "Supplementary Principles to Govern the Treatment of Germany," Mr. Bevin suggested certain principles in the political and economic field which, fully in conformity with the spirit of the Potsdam Agreement, should in the light of experience guide the Four Powers in their intention that the German people should reconstruct their life on a democratic and peaceful basis.

> "(1) To establish political conditions which will secure the world against any German reversion to dictatorship and any revival of German aggressive policy.
> (2) To establish economic conditions which will enable Germany to become self-supporting and to repay the expediture incurred on her behalf by the occupying Powers; which will enable her to make good the damage done by the war; and will further enable Germans and the world outside Germany to benefit from German industry and resources without re-establishing the economic foundations of an aggressive policy.
> (3) To establish constitutional machinery in Germany which will ensure these ends and which will be acceptable to the German people.
> (4) To establish with this end in view the maximum responsibility for, and interest in, political, administrative and economic developments along democratic lines on the part of the Germans themselves."

Soviet Policy

Unfortunately Soviet policy developed on different lines and, at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers on 11th July, 1946, M. Molotov went so far as to declare that the proposal for economic unity put forward by Mr. Bevin violated the Potsdam Agreement. Again at the Moscow Council of Foreign Ministers in March and April, 1947, he refused to listen to similar proposals.

The main point of divergence between Soviet policy and that of the other Allies was the question of the economic unity of Germany. The Four Powers were at least agreed that, in implementing the Potsdam Agreement, priority should be given to the achievement of economic unity. It was, in fact, specifically agreed on 2nd April, 1947, at the Moscow Council of Foreign Ministers that political agreement must be dependent on the achievement of economic unity. Moreover it has always been the opinion of His Majesty's Government that the main principles agreed at Potsdam must be taken as a whole; for instance, when speaking on economic principles in the Council of Foreign Ministers on 17th March, 1947, the Foreign Secretary said:—

> "It is our opinion that economic unity is of itself indivisible. By that I mean that we cannot act in some matters as if economic unity had been achieved, while in other important matters the principle is not applied."

Reparations

The history of Allied disagreement on the realisation of economic unity can only be made clear if the nature of the Soviet claim to reparations is fully understood. At the Yalta Conference in March, 1945, the Soviet representatives put forward a claim to ten thousand million dollars of reparations from Germany. This figure was never agreed by the other parties to the Conference and the British representative in particular made it clear that he regarded it as impracticably high. It was agreed, however, at Yalta that a Commission should be formed to work out a detailed reparations plan and one of the forms of reparations agreed for detailed discussion by the Commission was the taking of reparations from current production. Before any decision could be reached on the Yalta proposals the Potsdam Conference intervened. It has always been the view of His Majesty's Government that the decisions of the Potsdam Conference supplemented and in so far as they did not explicitly confirm the decisions of the Yalta Conference, superseded them.

The Potsdam Agreement about reparations (Part III of the Protocol) has, in the view of His Majesty's Government, to be interpreted in the light of certain crucial phrases in the Agreement on Economic Principles (Part II B of the Protocol). The opening sentences of Paragraph 19 of the Economic Principles read as follows:—

> "Payment of reparations should leave enough resources to enable the German people to subsist without external assistance. In working out the economic balance of Germany the necessary means must be provided to pay for imports approved by the Control Council in Germany. The proceeds of exports from current production and stock shall be available in the first place for payment for such imports."

This article of the Potsdam Agreement embodies one of the cardinal principles of the economic policy of His Majesty's Government towards Germany. The words quoted can only mean that current production shall be used to finance current imports, not that current production shall be used mainly to maintain a flow of deliveries to one Power by way of reparations. His Majesty's Government have also had always in mind their obligations under Article 14 of the same Agreement which provides that "during the period of occupation Germany shall be treated as a single economic unit" and that:

"To this end common policies shall be established with regard to:

. . . . . .

(d) Import and export programmes for Germany as a whole;

(f) reparation and removal of industrial war potential."

Paragraph 14 of the Economic Principles of the Potsdam Agreement further contains the explanatory note that "in applying these policies account shall be taken, where appropriate, of varying local conditions." Although the Control Council had, on 20th September, 1945, already approved the establishment of a common export-import programme, the Soviet delegate, on 5th April, 1946, stated in the Economic Directorate that each Zone should be responsible for its own trade and, on 3rd May, 1946, General Dratvin justified this contention by interpreting the note referred to as meaning that local conditions in the Soviet Zone as a whole could prevent the application to it of the economic principles of the Potsdam Agreement. He categorically refused to agree that until Germany was self-supporting, no Occupying Power should remove from its Zone reparations from current production and stocks.

Breakdown of Inter-zonal Trade

The result of this attitude on the part of the Soviet Government has been that the essential free economic exchange between the hard coal, steel, fertilisers and other commodities of Western Germany and the grain, potatoes, timber, brown coal and special machinery of Eastern Germany has been virtually restricted to a rigid process of barter and the whole process of European recovery has been thereby retarded. The economic division of Germany has, moreover, forced the Governments of the United Kingdom and United States to import at their own expense into Western Germany materials, especially foodstuffs, which should, under the Potsdam Agreement, have been paid for by the proceeds of exports, including goods produced in Eastern Germany which are now either used by the Soviet Army on the spot or sent as reparations to Russia.

The Soviet authorities have, moreover, consistently and intransigently refused information on any point connected with the economy of their Zone. In June, 1946, for example, they refused to give figures for the issue of Marks in their Zone. At the meeting in New York in December, 1946, and finally at the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in December, 1947, M. Molotov refused to give any figures for the reparations already taken by the Soviet authorities from their Zone unless the Governments of the United Kingdom the United States and France would first agree to a scheme involving a total reparations payment to the Soviet Union of 10,000 million dollars over a period of 20 years. Mr. Bevin, on this occasion put forward the estimate that, by December, 1947, the Soviet Government had already taken a total of 7,000 million dollars worth of reparations from Germany, while Mr. Marshall estimated that the Soviet Union was at that time extracting assets from current production in Eastern Germany at the rate of 500 million dollars annually at a time when the United States and United Kingdom Governments were importing food alone into Western Germany at the rate of 700 million dollars a year.

The essence of the failure of the Four Powers to achieve economic unity lies, therefore, in a conflict between the Soviet Government's demands for reparations, and, consequently, for exclusive economic control of its own Zone, and the desire of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States, in the interests of the German people and of their own taxpayers, to balance the economy of Germany as a whole and achieve a unified plan for exports and imports.

Paragraph 15 of the Economic Principles specifically refers to the "equitable distribution of essential commodities between the several Zones so as to produce a balanced economy throughout Germany and to reduce the need for imports" as an objective of Allied control. In total disregard of this and the above-quoted provisions of the Potsdam Agreement, it has been the policy of the Soviet Government to absorb exclusively a very high proportion of the production of their Zone; and by so doing they have increased the burden imposed on the Governments of the United Kingdom and United States of providing, at the cost of their taxpayers, the imports necessary to put Western Germany on its feet. German feeling on this subject has been graphically expressed in a current comparison of Germany to a cow which was fed from the West and milked from the East.

Preliminary Protective Measures

In order to diminish this drain upon United Kingdom and United States resources, and in order to prevent the total economic collapse of Western Germany, it became urgently necessary to take certain steps. In July, 1946, Mr. Byrnes, at that time the United States Secretary of State, announced that, pending agreement on the treatment of Germany as an economic whole, the United States Government was prepared to enter into agreement with the Government of any other Occupying Power for the treatment of their two Zones as one economic unit. He made it clear at the time that such arrangements would not conflict with quadripartite control and that the proposal was not intended to divide Germany, but to hasten its unity. His Majesty's Government accepted this offer and, on 2nd December, 1946, a Bizonal Fusion Agreement was signed in New York(5). The Agreement specifically said:—

> "They [i.e., the representatives of the two Governments] have taken as the basis of their discussion the fact that the aim of the two Governments is to achieve the economic unity of Germany as a whole, in accordance with the Agreement reached at Potsdam on 2nd August, 1945. The arrangements set out hereunder for the United States and United Kingdom Zones should be regarded as the first step towards the achievement of the economic unity of Germany as a whole, in accordance with that Agreement."

There follows a significant statement. It reads:—

> "The two Governments are ready at any time to enter into discussions with either of the other Occupying Powers with a view to the extension of these arrangements to their Zones of occupation."

At the same time steps were taken to bring about the economic unity of the two Zones by merging the separate German economic administrations. The Anglo-American agreement establishing this integration expressly provided for the entry of the Russian and French Zones at any time. In May, 1947, to increase the efficiency of the bi-zonal economic organisation and to grant greater responsibility to German authorities, a central economic administration was set up in Frankfurt. It had by then become obviously desirable that the political parties, whose representatives in the Land Diets had been concerned with economic problems on a Land level, should equally be allowed a voice in the direction of economic affairs on a bi-zonal level. Council was accordingly set up composed of members nominated by the political parties represented in the popularly elected Land Diets. At the same time an Executive Committee consisting of the Heads of the Land Governments was formed to protect the interests of the Länder and to supervise the work of the German executive departments. Once again the two Military Governments expressed the hope on this occasion that the other Occupying Powers would accept the permanently open invitation to participate in this economic fusion.

Widening Disagreement.

These steps were merely palliatives intended to save the two Zones concerned from swift economic disaster and they in no way precluded Four-Power agreement on the German problem as a whole. Unfortunately no such agreement was achieved.

While, owing to the Soviet attitude towards freedom of movement, knowledge of conditions in the Soviet Zone only reaches the world with difficulty, it became clear over a period of time that, quite apart from their infringements of the Potsdam economic principles, the Soviet authorities were violating in their Zone the fundamental personal and political freedoms prescribed by the Potsdam agreement. Within the Soviet Zone the population are not accorded freedom of speech or of information. The judiciary is not independent and thousands of people, including children have been arbitrarily arrested and confined in concentration camps within the Soviet Zone or deported to the Soviet Union. Skilled workers have also been forcibly removed to the Soviet Union. In addition the Soviet authorities have used pressure and discrimination against all political parties who oppose the Socialist Unity Party, which is under Communist control.

At the same time, the Soviet Government embarked upon a carefully planned propaganda campaign designed to divert attention from those malpractices or infringements of Four-Power Agreements which the Soviet authorities were committing, or proposed to commit, and to persuade public opinion by a process of reiteration, that it was France, the United Kingdom and the United States who had broken the economic and political principles of the Yalta and Potsdam Agreements and the Agreement on Control Machinery.

From the summer of 1947 onwards, Four-Power disagreement on the application of both the economic and political principles of the Potsdam Agreement has been aggravated by the Soviet Government's refusal to participate in the European Recovery Plan and its avowed hostility to the implementation of the Plan by others, while the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in November and December 1947 showed clearly that the Soviet Government had come to regard that body as a rostrum for propaganda rather than as a forum for negotiation.

Soviet Claim to Participate in Ruhr Control

The character of the differences that had arisen between the Four Powers was further exemplified in the Soviet Government's pursuit of its claim to participate in the control of the Ruhr even in the absence of economic unity.

This particular demand was first advanced by Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov at the Potsdam conference, but it proved impossible to reach agreement upon it. His Majesty's Government declined to enter into such a commitment without consultation with the French Government, which was not represented at the conference, but which was directly concerned. Moreover with the transfer to provisional Polish administration of the German Silesian territory the second largest industrial concentration in Germany was withdrawn from the scope of any possible measure of Four-Power control and subjected wholly to Soviet influence. The Soviet Government refused to fulfil its obligations to maintain German economic unity so that the industrial areas of Saxony and Thuringia were also outside Four-Power control. His Majesty's Government refused to accept any special régime involving participation by the Soviet Government in the administration of the Ruhr unless, reciprocally, Four-Power control were to be extended to the rest of German industry. In the absence of such a reciprocal concession and in the light of the Soviet attitude to the European Recovery Plan, it became clear that the Soviet claim to participate in the control of the Ruhr was in fact a claim to be allowed to sabotage the recovery of Western Europe.

Mr. Bevin's Statement of 22nd January

Faced with this attitude on the part of the Soviet Government, the Secretary of State, speaking in the Foreign Affairs debate in the House of Commons on 22nd January, 1948, summarised the steps which the three Western Powers had been compelled to take in their Zones of Germany and struck a note of warning.

> "We have been in favour of a centralised German Government, but not an over-centralised German Government which, in our view, could be a danger to peace. In this I believe the Americans, the French and ourselves, despite slight differences between us, can reconcile our views. On the other hand, the Soviet Government are pressing for an over-centralised Government which we know could be used in the same way to develop a one-party dictatorship as has been done in the Eastern European countries, and we cannot agree to it.
> It became clear a year ago that Germany was to be made, as a result of the series of disagreements between the Great Powers, a terrific financial liability on the United States and ourselves. No food was to come from the East into the West, no exchange, and hence the burden would fall upon our exchequers. I indicated that we had to make it pay by hook or by crook. We really had to make our Zone go, and take the liability off the taxpayer here. Then the Americans offered fusion of the two Zones in 1946, and negotiations for the first fusion agreement then took place in New York . . . we have tried to make this fusion work, and work better, by setting up an Economic Council. We are still hopeful in Germany, and I hope I shall not be told I am too patient—because I am not waiting. We are going on with the work. By taking the right lines in our bi-zonal organisation in Germany, I believe that in the end we shall achieve a proper organisation of Central Europe. We have first to get the organisation on our own side efficient.
> Later in 1947 we proceeded with a new fusion agreement. Now, as a result of talks between the American Military Governor and our Military Governor, we have improved, expanded and extended the Economic Council as an interim basis. But that is an interim matter, and in a few weeks' time it is intended that the British, French and Americans shall have an exchange of views on the three Zones, as well as the two. Those talks will take place at a very early date. What we have done up to now is an interim arrangement."

The Three- and Six-Power Conferences

This statement by the Foreign Secretary was made after the failure of the London meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers had made it clear that although the Soviet Government continued to represent itself as the champion of the principle of German unity, its intransigence prevented the achievement of that unity on any terms which were acceptable to the Western Occupying Powers or compatible with the restoration of the economic well-being of Western Europe. Thus, for the palliative measures which had been so far employed, it became necessary to substitute some more comprehensive arrangements. Denied by the Soviet attitude the possibility of applying to all four zones of occupation the economic and political principles of the Potsdam Agreement, it had become imperative for the three Western Occupying Powers to reach agreement among themselves on the uniform application, in the first place and as a provisional measure, to the three Western Zones of those principles to which the whole of Germany was entitled. The conference, the summoning of which the Foreign Secretary had foreshadowed in his speech of 22nd January, met in London in March and took under consideration:

(a) The economic rehabilitation of Germany.

(b) Security against revival of German aggression.

(c) The incorporation of Germany in the European Recovery Programme.

Discussions began in March on a Three-Power basis and a Benelux Delegation was immediately invited to take part. The talks were pursued in April and May and produced a wide measure of agreement.

After re-affirming the security requirements of the Western Powers in relation to Germany and making provision for the international control of the Ruhr, the Conference agreed, after careful study, that a political and constitutional programme was necessary in the three Western Zones if the German political parties were reasonably to be asked to accept the requisite measure of responsibility for their own economic revival. In order to enable Western Germany to play her proper part in the European Recovery Programme, the conference agreed that a responsible provisional German Government for the three Western Zones should be created (within the framework of Allied security requirements) at the earliest possible date.

Currency Reform and Constitutional Development

In the light of this overall programme the three Western Occupying Powers decided to introduce into their Zones of Occupation, without further delay, a long-overdue currency reform. Attempts to achieve this reform by Four-Power negotiation in Berlin, after long months of discussion, had broken down when the Russians walked out of the Control Commission in March. The reform was put into operation in the Western Zones on 18th June and has had a most beneficial effect. As a result money now has real value in Western Germany. Production has increased, the black market has been crippled and absenteeism has been greatly reduced.

In execution of the decision to create a responsible German government for the three Western Zones, the three Commanders-in-Chief met the Ministers-President of the Land Governments in the Western Zones and invited them to prepare plans for the convocation of a constituent assembly. This body, the Parliamentary Council, was convened at Bonn on 1st September, 1948. After careful study of the basic principles which the three Allied Powers had indicated as necessary for the framing of a democratic constitution, the Council is now engaged in full and free discussion of the future provisional constitution for Western Germany.

These steps do not preclude the creation by Four-Power agreement of a government for the whole of Germany. Indeed, in the face of the policies at present pursued by the Soviet Government in Germany, they constitute the most hopeful and progressive course which can be taken towards the reconstruction of German political life on a free and responsible basis and the reconstitution of Germany as a member of the community of European nations.

PART II.—THE BLOCKADE OF BERLIN

Early in 1948 the Soviet authorities began to interfere with access to Berlin.

The Soviet Government has maintained first that its measures restricting communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and Western Germany were necessitated by "technical difficulties" and then that they were "defensive" against conditions created by the currency reform in Western Germany and Western Berlin. They have also alleged that large quantities of equipment were being moved to Western Germany from Berlin. The following chronological record of events reveals that many of the Soviet restrictive measures were imposed months before the currency reform in the Western Zones of occupation and that they were the systematic products of a deliberate coercive purpose rather than the results of genuine technical difficulties. The blockade was virtually complete before the Western Mark "B" was introduced into Berlin. The allegations of large-scale removals of equipment to the West were unjustified.

On 24th January, 1948, the Berlin to Bielefeld night train carrying British officials and 120 Germans, whose journey had been sponsored by the British authorities, was detained for 11 hours in the Soviet Zone. The Germans were eventually returned to Berlin on the grounds that they carried insufficient documents. The British authorities showed willingness to meet all reasonable demands for documentation. Only later did it become apparent that this was the beginning of a systematic programme to blockade the city by land and water.

On 30th March, 1948, ten days after the Soviet Delegation had walked out of the Allied Control Council meeting, the Soviet Deputy Military Governor, General Dratvin, stated in a letter to the United States, French and British Military Governments that supplementary provisions regarding communications between the Soviet and United States, French and British Zones of occupation in Germany would be put into effect on 1st April, 1948. These provisions, which were contrary to practice established since the quadripartite occupation of Berlin, set forth that:

(1) United States, French and British personnel travelling through the Soviet Zone by rail and highway must present documentary evidence of identity and affiliation with the United States, French and British Military Administrations of Germany;

(2) Military freight shipments from Berlin to the Western Zones must be cleared through Soviet check points by means of a Soviet permit; freight shipments into Berlin would be cleared by accompanying documents;

(3) All baggage must be inspected at Soviet check points, with the exception of personal belongings of United States, French and British personnel carried in a passenger railway car or a passenger automobile.

The United States and British Authorities in reply stated their readiness to discuss the provision of additional documentation but protested against the 24-hour ultimatum and refused to recognise the right of the Soviet Authorities to impose a unilateral decision as to what persons or goods might enter and leave Berlin, or to interfere with or enter Allied military trains. These protests were of no avail.

Meanwhile on 1st April, two United States passenger trains were stopped at the Soviet Zone border and turned back upon refusing to accept Soviet inspection. Two British trains were turned back for the same reasons.

From 1st April, the Soviet Authorities refused to permit mail cars containing packages to depart from Berlin to the West, and demanded the filing of additional forms, the character of which was not adequately clarified. On 3rd April, 1948, the Soviet Authorities closed the Hamburg-Berlin and Bavaria-Berlin rail routes requiring all freight to move to Berlin via Helmstedt.

For three days from 2nd April inland water transport from the British Zone to Berlin was held up, on the grounds that the shipping permits were invalid.

On 2nd April the Soviet Authorities requested the British and United States Authorities to close their aid stations on the highway between Helmstedt and Berlin.

A few days later the Soviet Authorities also requested the removal by 15th April of the British and United States Signal Corps men in the Soviet Zone who maintained the official telephone lines. A United States protest of 9th April was without effect.

On 9th April the Russians ordered that consignment notes for all goods in inter-zonal traffic leaving Berlin must be stamped by them and that the stamp of the Berlin Magistrat was no longer valid. On 16th April consignment notes for rail freight began to be issued in very limited numbers. Outgoing road freight was subject to arbitrary interference.

On 20th April, the Soviet Authorities imposed the requirement for individual clearance of barges moving through the Soviet Zone to and from Berlin. A protest by the British Authorities had no effect.

On 22nd April the international train service from Berlin was suspended by Soviet refusal to continue to allow the Nord Express through-coaches to be attached to German passenger trains.

On 30th April some British military freight travelling by road from Berlin was turned back on the ground that it was inadequately documented and on 7th May two German freight trains travelling from the West were similarly stopped.

On 20th May the Russians introduced a stricter documentation for barges which throttled traffic, while five days later they announced that all military freight travelling to Berlin after 1st June must show on the waggon (a) the consignee, (b) the unloading station, (c) the contents. Between 1st and 4th June three West-bound mail trains were held up and one British military freight train was stopped and the sealed waggons broken open.

On 9th June the Russians began to turn back most Germans trying to enter the Soviet Zone from the West by road or rail. On the same date the Soviet Authorities, by orders to German railway officials, tried to interfere with operations in the railroad yards in the United States sector of Berlin. This interference was prevented by the appearance of United States military guards.

This action was followed next day by a hold-up of five coal trains destined for Berlin—the excuse was insufficient documentation. On 11th June all trains from the West were stopped and when resumed next day large numbers of waggons were rejected as " defective ".

On 15th June the Soviet Authorities closed the Elbe bridge on the autobahn between Berlin and the west for repairs. A détour and ferry service were arranged.

On 16th June the Soviet Delegation walked out of the Allied Kommandatura of Berlin.

On 18th June General Robertson wrote to Marshal Sokolovsky informing him that as the long-continued impassé in securing a quadripartitely-agreed scheme of financial reform for Germany as a whole was unlikely to be resolved in the foreseeable future the economic stagnation in the British Zone compelled him to include the British Zone in a scheme of currency reform to be introduced in the three Western Zones on 20th June. The text of the letter is as follows:—

> " To Marshal Sokolovsky. As you know, we have striven for many months to reach quadripartite agreement on a currency and financial reform which would apply to the whole of Germany. I am still firmly convinced that the only satisfactory course is to have financial reform on an all-German basis. To my great regret it does not seem possible to achieve this in the foreseeable future. Meanwhile the economy of the British Zone is suffering acutely from the evils of inflation and of economic stagnation which our quadripartite proposals for financial reform were designed long ago to eradicate, and I feel that I am not justified in waiting any longer before taking remedial measures. I have therefore decided to include the British Zone in a scheme of currency reform to be introduced into the Western Zones on Sunday, 20th June. Advance copies of the relevant laws will be sent to you.
> " The British sector of Berlin will remain unaffected by this decision. I recognise the special circumstances of quadripartite government in Berlin and have no wish to disturb it, unless it becomes unavoidable. Meanwhile it will be my first care to ensure that all appropriate measures are promptly taken for the maintenance of trade and exchange between the British Zone and Berlin and between the British and Soviet Zones.
> " I can only hope that it will be possible for the Occupying Powers to agree at an early date to reintroduce a single currency for the whole of Germany as well as to take the other measures of economic unity, to which we have always attached so much importance."

On 19th June the Soviet authorities suspended all passenger traffic between the Western and Eastern Zones. All road traffic from the Western Zones into the Soviet Zone, including traffic on the autobahn to Berlin, was also stopped. Incoming rail freight was reduced in volume by changes in technical procedure and water transport was subject to stricter regulations.

Soviet traffic restrictions issued on 19th June were followed by further prohibitions in the following week. West-bound road traffic only was still permitted for a time, subject to Soviet control at check points. Mail and parcel post traffic was completely suspended.

The French Commandant, Chairman of the Berlin Kommandatura, on 19th June invited the other members to a special meeting to discuss the effects of the currency reform on Berlin, but the Soviet member declined the invitation.

However, on 22nd June, at the request of the three Western Powers, a quadripartite meeting of Financial and Economic Advisers took place in Berlin to discuss the problem of currency for the city. The Soviet representative insisted that there could be no currency for Berlin different from the currency of the surrounding Soviet Zone. The representatives of the Western Powers replied that they could understand the reasons for this and were prepared to accept the Soviet Zone currency as the sole currency for Greater Berlin provided that its issue and continued circulation was made on the authority and subject to the control of the Four-Power Kommandatura of the city. This was refused by the Soviet representative and after the meeting the Soviet authorities announced a currency reform to cover not only the Soviet Zone but also the whole of Greater Berlin.

Immediate action was necessary if the Western Powers were to be able to prevent the economic life of the Western sectors coming under complete Soviet domination, and they therefore announced the introduction into these sectors of the new Deutschmark of the Western Zones (overstamped "B" for Berlin). General Robertson's letter dated 23rd June to Marshal Sokolovsky informing him of this decision reads as follows:—

"My dear Marshal,

I have received your letter of 22nd June advising me of the measures which you propose to take for currency reform in the Soviet Zone and Berlin.

"I have no wish to cause difficulties to you in your Zone nor to complicate economic life in the city of Berlin. I was, and am, prepared to consider any reasonable arrangements for the use of a single currency in Berlin under quadripartite control, not excluding the possibility of this being the same as that in use in your Zone. At the meetings between our respective staffs yesterday, my representatives made this clear. They stipulated however that the orders for introducing these measures in Berlin must be quadripartite orders, since Berlin is under quadripartite jurisdiction, and no one Power can make enactments valid for the city as a whole.

"I am sorry that you have been unable to accept this stipulation, the justice of which cannot be questioned. I note with regret that your orders purport to apply to the entire city of Berlin. It is impossible for me to accept this position, and I am compelled to join with my American and French colleagues in the issue of separate instructions and currency in order to protect the interests of the German population of my sector.

(Signed) B. H. ROBERTSON."

On 23rd June the Soviet authorities suspended all railroad passenger and freight traffic into Berlin, because of alleged "technical difficulties" on the Berlin-Helmstedt railway line. They also stopped barge traffic on similar grounds. These steps virtually completed the blockade of Berlin by land and water.

On 24th June, because of these unacceptable restrictions, the United States and British authorities ordered all freight trains from the United States and British Zones to the Soviet Zone to be stopped. Traffic from the East continued to be accepted.

Shortly before midnight on 23rd June the Soviet authorities issued orders to the Berlin central electric switch-control station (located in their sector) to disrupt delivery of electric power from Soviet Zone and Soviet sector plants to the Western sectors. Shortage of coal was given as a reason for this measure.

On 24th June the Soviet authorities issued orders prohibiting the distribution of any supplies from the Soviet Zone to the Western sectors of Berlin, thereby violating a Four-Power agreement for supplying Berlin from a common pool. The Western Powers thereupon forbade distribution of any supplies from Western sources to the Soviet sector of Berlin.

On 26th June, General Robertson in a letter to Marshal Sokolovsky protested against the interruption of essential freight traffic between Berlin and the West.

On 29th June, Marshal Sokolovsky answered General Robertson's letter. He described the restrictions on passenger traffic between the three Western Zones and the Soviet Zone (but not Berlin) as connected with the currency exchange and announced the re-establishment of rail facilities for movement of the German population. He stated that the restrictions on traffic to Berlin by road must be retained to prevent conveyance to Berlin of currency from the Western Zones. He announced that the technical defects on the railroad line to Berlin were in process of elimination and declared his expectation that traffic would recommence as soon as possible. He protested against the stoppage by the British authorities of freight train movements between the Soviet and British Zones.

General Robertson answered this letter on 3rd July, reiterating his willingness to discuss the use of one currency in Berlin. He repeated his request for the resumption of normal transport facilities between Berlin and Western Germany.

On 3rd July, Generals Robertson, Noiret and Clay, visited Marshal Sokolovsky. General Robertson enquired what the technical difficulties were which, according to Marshal Sokolovsky's letter, were holding up train traffic. He asked for an assurance that traffic could be resumed at an early date, and enquired when that date would be. He further drew attention to the fact that no alternative routes had been made available. Marshal Sokolovsky replied that the question raised by General Robertson was important to the Western Allies and that they wished to treat it alone, whereas there were other questions important to him. He denied that he had ever said that traffic on the railway was held up for other than technical reasons. These reasons still applied. He declared at length that the Western Allies as a result of their London Conference had created economic disorders in the Soviet Zone which made it impossible to provide alternative routes. He reiterated that the present stoppage was for technical reasons, although he would not guarantee that when these technical difficulties had been cleared, others might not occur elsewhere.

On 10th July the Soviet authorities announced that the lock at Rathenow needed repair and that barge traffic had been interrupted (in fact it had been held up for some days already). The blockade of Berlin by land and water was thus made absolute.

In response to this blockade, the Western Allies made arrangements to supply their troops and the population of the Western sectors of Berlin by the only means available to them—by air. For the last three months the Western sectors of Berlin, with a population of well over two million, have been supplied exclusively by air with food, fuel, raw materials and other necessities of life.

During this period British and American aircraft have delivered over 270,000 tons of essential freight to the people of Berlin. The American contribution has accounted for some 65 per cent. and the British for some 35 per cent., of the total tonnage moved. British aircraft have flown more than 22,000 sorties and over seven million miles. Stocks of most of the essential commodities in the Western sectors, including coal, are to-day greater than they were in June when the blockade was introduced.

The persistent and successful efforts of the Western Powers to keep the air link open has had a heartening effect on the Berlin population and has strengthened their resolve to resist exclusive Soviet domination.

PART III.—DISCUSSIONS IN MOSCOW AND BERLIN

By 3rd July it had become clear that negotiations in Berlin would not succeed in raising the blockade. After discussions between His Majesty's Government, the United States Government and the French Government, Notes were therefore presented to the Soviet Ambassadors in London, Washington and Paris on 6th July. These Notes called the attention of the Soviet Government to the extremely serious international situation which had been brought about by the action of the Soviet Government in imposing restrictive measures on transport which amounted to a blockade of the Western sectors of Berlin. The British Note made it clear that His Majesty's Government regarded these measures as a clear violation of existing agreements concerning the administration of Berlin by the four Occupying Powers. It stated that it was intolerable that any one of the occupying authorities should attempt to impose a blockade upon the people of Berlin, and insisted that arrangements for the movement of freight and passenger traffic between the Western Zones and Berlin be fully restored at once. The Note went on to say that His Majesty's Government were ready, as a first step to reaching a settlement of any disagreements which might exist between the Soviet Government and His Majesty's Government in respect of any aspect of the Berlin situation, to participate in negotiations in Berlin among the four Allied Occupying Authorities for the settlement of any question in dispute arising out of the administration of the City of Berlin. It was, however, a pre-requisite that the lines of communication and the movement of persons and goods between the Western sectors of Berlin and the Western Zones should have been fully restored. The full text of this Note is set out in Annex II.

On 14th July the Soviet Ambassador delivered a reply to this Note. The Soviet Government in this reply alleged that the situation in Berlin had arisen as a result of the infringement by the Governments of Great Britain, the United States of America and France of agreed decisions undertaken by the Four Powers with regard to Germany and Berlin. The pretext of "technical reasons" for the interference with the railway communications, having served its purpose, was put on one side. The Soviet Note claimed that the difficulties in supplying the population of Berlin in the Western sectors were created by the acts of the three Governments and above all by their introduction of new currency into the Western Zones and separate currency in the Western sectors of Berlin. The Note went on to assert that Berlin was in the centre of the Soviet Zone and was part of that zone, and stated that the Soviet High Command had been compelled to take urgent measures to protect the interests of the German population and also the economy of the Soviet Zone and the area of Greater Berlin. With regard to the expressed readiness of the Western Governments to discuss the Berlin situation, the Soviet Government declared that, without objecting to conversations, they must state that they could not connect the beginning of these conversations with the fulfilment of any preliminary conditions, and that quadripartite conversations could only have effect in the event that they were not limited to the question of the government of Berlin, because it was impossible to separate this question from the general question of quadripartite control in Germany. The full text of this Note is set out in Annex III.

After further discussion with the United States and French Governments, it was decided that an approach should be made to the Soviet Government in Moscow.

The three Governments desired to leave no stone unturned in their efforts to reach a settlement with the Soviet Government, and the task of their representatives in Moscow was to clarify the situation and to ascertain whether it was possible for negotiations to begin with a view to reaching a progressive solution on outstanding differences in regard in the first place to Berlin and then to Germany as a whole. Owing to the fact that M. Molotov was away on leave and that M. Vyshinsky was also absent at Belgrade, separate interviews were arranged on 30th July between M. Zorin, Deputy Foreign Minister, and the representatives of the three Governments, the United States Ambassador, General W. Bedell-Smith, the French Ambassador, M. Yves Chataigneau, and Mr. F. K. Roberts who, in the unavoidable absence through illness of His Majesty's Ambassador, had been sent to Moscow as personal representative of the Foreign Secretary.

At his interview with M. Zorin, Mr. Roberts delivered an aide-mémoire, the full text of which is set out in Annex IV. Mr. Roberts also explained the attitude of His Majesty's Government on the lines of the Foreign Secretary's speech in the House of Commons on 29th July and stated that it was hoped that a progressive approach by personal contact, instead of by a further exchange of notes, to the problems which had arisen, beginning with the most urgent questions, would lead to useful results. M. Zorin asked a few questions and concluded the interview by stating that he would report to the Soviet Government.

The First Meeting with Generalissimo Stalin

After a preliminary meeting on 31st July with M. Molotov, who had returned from his leave, the three Western representatives met Generalissimo Stalin on 2nd August.

At this and at subsequent meetings with Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov the United States Ambassador, for reasons of convenience and as the senior of the three diplomatic representatives in Moscow, acted, with the agreement of his two colleagues and after full co-ordination between them of the instructions received from their three Governments, as the principal spokesman. The British and French representatives also took a considerable part in the discussions, but generally speaking the views expressed by any of the three Western envoys represented the joint views of their three Governments.

On 2nd August the United States Ambassador opened by making an oral statement to Generalissimo Stalin, the full text of which agreed between the three Governments is set out in Annex V.

The remainder of the two-hour meeting was taken up with a discussion which developed from the points brought out in this oral statement.

Generalissimo Stalin, though emphatically maintaining that it was not the purpose of the Soviet Government to oust allied forces from Berlin, reiterated the contention of the Soviet note of 14th July that the Western Powers no longer had a juridical right to occupy Berlin. This of course had been categorically rejected in the oral statement presented by the United States Ambassador which declared that the three Western Governments "re-emphasise their right to be in Berlin to be unquestionable and absolute. They do not intend to be coerced by any means whatsoever into abandoning this right."

Discussion of the possibility of resumption of negotiations on Berlin and of a Four-Power meeting to consider problems relating to Germany as a whole revealed agreement as to the desirability of such developments. But to a suggestion by Generalissimo Stalin as to items to be included in the agenda of a Four-Power meeting, the Western representatives replied that they were not in a position to consider an agenda, and that in any event negotiations on broad German problems would not be possible until duress in Berlin had been removed.

Generalissimo Stalin developed the argument that the communication restrictions in Berlin had been made necessary because of the decisions taken in London in regard to the establishment of a new German government at Frankfurt and because of the introduction of a special western currency in Berlin. The Western representatives explained that, contrary to the Generalissimo's apparent understanding, it had never been contemplated that the government at Frankfurt would be a central German government. The agency now to be set up under the London decisions would in no way hamper eventual understanding on a central government for a united Germany. The Western representatives added that they were not authorised to discuss the London decisions and that there could be no question of suspending their application or interrupting the programme laid down which provided in the first place for a meeting of the Parliamentary Council at Bonn on 1st September. Some time would however necessarily elapse before any West German government were actually set up. They undertook, nevertheless, to report Generalissimo Stalin's views; but in the meanwhile they felt strongly that agreement should be reached on the immediate issues in regard to Berlin, without which questions concerning Germany as a whole could not be discussed.

It should be noted here that Generalissimo Stalin explained at this meeting that the only real issue he had in mind in this context was the formation in the Western Zones of a German Government. He did not object to the unification of the three Zones and even considered this to be progress.

At the opening of the meeting, the United States Ambassador had specified in his prepared statement, after emphasising that the three Western Powers were in Berlin as a matter of right and as co-equals, that if the blockade measures were " in any way related to the currency problem, such measures are obviously uncalled for, since this problem could have been, and can now be, adjusted by representatives of the Four Powers in Berlin." There seemed no reason, consequently, why agreement could not immediately be reached with respect to the Berlin situation. However, the Ambassador stated that he was not himself an expert on currency matters and that the Western representatives were not competent to deal with technical arrangements of the currency question; with this view his British and French colleagues associated themselves.

At the end of the discussion Generalissimo Stalin asked whether the Western representatives wanted to settle the matter that night. If so, he could meet them and make the following proposal:—

(1) There should be a simultaneous introduction in Berlin of the Soviet Zone Deutsche Mark in place of the Western Mark B, together with the removal of all transport restrictions.

(2) He would no longer ask as a condition the deferment of the implementation of the London decisions although he wished this to be recorded as the insistent wish of the Soviet Government.

The United States Ambassador then asked Generalissimo Stalin whether he still wanted an announcement of a resumption of negotiations on Berlin and the holding of a Four-Power meeting to consider other problems affecting Germany. Generalissimo Stalin said this should also be included in the proposed basis of agreement. Following this the three Western representatives agreed to present Generalissimo Stalin's proposal to their Governments.

At this opening meeting with Generalissimo Stalin, as later at the second meeting with him on 23rd August, the desire of the three Western Governments to reach a settlement of outstanding problems in regard to Berlin and to Germany as a whole by agreement with the Soviet Government, as also their conviction of the grave consequences of failure to reach such an agreement, was very clearly stated. Generalissimo Stalin was, however, left in no doubt of the firm intention of the Western Occupying Powers to maintain their rights in Berlin and of their readiness to continue and increase the air lift, as circumstances might require.

It was the belief of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France that the progress made in the discussion with Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov was such that the settlement of the immediate Berlin crisis could be effected. The Soviet authorities were prepared to remove all transport restrictions between Berlin and the Western Zones. Resumption of negotiations on Berlin and a Four-Power meeting to consider other outstanding problems affecting Germany was accepted without conditions, although Generalissimo Stalin wished it recorded as the insistent desire of the Soviet Government that the execution of the London decisions with respect to the establishment of a West German government be suspended until such time as the Four Powers met and tried to reach an agreement concerning Germany.

There remained the problem of working out the details of agreement with M. Molotov, and the arrangements of technical matters regarding the substitution of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone for the Western " B " Mark in Berlin.

The position of His Majesty's Government in regard to quadripartite control of any new currency arrangements in Berlin had already been clearly stated to M. Zorin and M. Molotov by Mr. Roberts on 30th and 31st July respectively and the refusal of the three Western Occupying Powers to consider any weakening of their juridical rights in Berlin, which included of course their right to participate in quadripartite control of the financial and economic life of Berlin, had been clearly set out in the oral statement to Generalissimo Stalin on 2nd August. But in order that there should be no misunderstanding of the position of His Majesty's Government in regard to completing the currency proposal developed at the meeting, the following specific instruction was sent to Mr. Roberts:—

> "It is quite essential to our position that the arrangements for withdrawing our currency and for introducing the Soviet currency should result from quadripartite decision and this implies that any future alterations of the position must also be dealt with in the same way."

Throughout the conversations the Soviet Government were never left in any doubt upon this point, which was the subject of repeated and prolonged discussions.

The Drafting Meetings with M. Molotov

The British, French and United States representatives, acting under the instructions of their respective Governments, then endeavoured to arrive at a draft implementation of the conversation with Generalissimo Stalin, to be brought into final form in a further conversation with M. Molotov. To this end they arranged a meeting with the latter which in fact became a drawn-out series of meetings with him on 6th, 9th 12th and 16th August, some of them over three hours long, ending in failure to arrive at any satisfactory agreement.

This failure to reach agreement in drafting a concrete implementation of the principles for terminating the Berlin crisis, as discussed with Generalissimo Stalin, resulted from the fact that the fundamental objectives with which M. Molotov approached the drafting were diametrically opposed to those of the representatives of the three Governments. This fundamental conflict is reflected in the differences between the initial draft suggested by the latter, and the counter-draft proposed by M. Molotov.

The initial draft proposed by the Western representatives and rejected by M. Molotov was in the form of a draft communiqué to be issued in the name of the four Governments. Its text is as follows:—

> "As the result of discussions held in Moscow between Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov, and French, United Kingdom and United States representatives, the Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have agreed as follows:—
> "All restrictions which have been imposed on the transport of persons and goods in either direction between the three Western zones of Germany and Berlin shall be immediately removed, and freedom of communications shall be maintained.
> "Meetings shall be held among representatives of the four Governments to consider any questions which may be outstanding as regards Berlin and any other outstanding problems affecting Germany as a whole. The Soviet Zone Mark will be accepted as the sole currency for Berlin and the Western Mark will be withdrawn > as soon as quadripartite arrangements have been agreed upon by the four Military Governors for the issue and control of currency in Berlin. These arrangements shall ensure: no discrimination or action against holders of either Eastern or Western Zone currency; equal treatment as to currency and provision of fully accessible banking and credit facilities for all Sectors of Berlin; adequate funds for budgetary purposes and Occupation Costs; and a satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and the Western Zones. Implementation of these arrangements shall be carried out by the Berlin Kommandatura."

At this meeting on 6th August, Mr. Roberts made an oral statement formally reserving the full juridical rights of His Majesty's Government in regard to Berlin, with which his United States and French colleagues associated themselves.

Mr. Roberts said:—

> "The Soviet Government has stated that, as the result of recent changes introduced into the Western Zones, His Majesty's Government have lost their juridical right to occupy Berlin. The Soviet Government has also stated that all the restrictive measures adopted by the Soviet authorities in Germany have been taken in order to prevent the invasion of the Soviet Zone by the currency which has been introduced into the Western Zones and into Berlin by the Western Powers and as a result of the decisions of the London Conference.
> "His Majesty's Government cannot admit the validity of the Soviet contention as regards His Majesty's Government's unqualified right to occupy the Western Sectors of Berlin. Nor can His Majesty's Government admit that the introduction of the Western Mark into the Western Zones of Germany and into the Western Sectors of Berlin or the decisions of the London Conference in any way justify the blockade measures which the Soviet authorities had taken against those Sectors.
> "Having stated their position on the above matters, His Majesty's Government are glad to note that the Soviet Government are willing to agree to a joint statement being issued for the purpose of resolving the outstanding difficulties."

In response to further pressure from M. Molotov for the suspension of the decisions of the London Conference regarding Western Germany, the United States Ambassador also made an oral statement in which he said:—

> "My own Government has taken note of the insistent desire of the Soviet Government that the execution of the London decisions with respect to the establishment of a West German Government be suspended until such time as the Four Powers can meet and try to reach an agreement concerning Germany. I am authorised to say that no definite date is now envisaged for the establishment of a governmental organisation for the Western Zones of Germany. 1st September does not represent the date of any formal establishment of such an organisation but is rather the date on which representatives from the German states will begin to study the problems involved in setting up a common organisation. This study is likely to be of protracted duration and it is certainly not intended that any conclusions which the German representatives may reach shall in any way preclude or contravene any agreement arrived at by the Four Powers in connexion with a central government for Germany."

M. Molotov rejected the draft of the three Governments presented on 6th August, and, at the second meeting, on 9th August, made his own counter-proposals as follows:—

"1. All restrictions which have been imposed after the announcement of currency reform in the Western Zones on the transport of persons and goods in either direction between the three Western Zones of Germany and Berlin shall be removed on 15th August, and freedom of communications shall be maintained in accordance with the present agreement.

"2. All restrictions which have been imposed after the announcement of currency reform in the Western Zones on the traffic of goods to and from the Soviet Zone and the three Western Zones of Germany shall be removed on 15th August, and freedom of communications shall be maintained.

"3. Meetings among representatives of the four Governments in the form of the Council of Foreign Ministers or a separate conference of representatives of the Four Powers shall be held in the near future to discuss:—

(A) Any questions which may be outstanding as regards Berlin, and

(B) Any other outstanding problems affecting Germany as a whole.

In the negotiations which took place between representatives of the Four Powers consideration was given to the wish of the Soviet Government to defer the implementation of the decisions of the London Conference on the creation of a West German Government until the results of the above-mentioned meeting of representatives of the four Governments have been ascertained. In this connexion the representatives of the three Western Powers stated that the Governments of these Powers do not propose for the time being to deal with the question of the formation of a Government for Western Germany.

"4. The German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be accepted as from 15th August as a sole currency for Berlin and the Western Mark "B" shall be simultaneously withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"The regulation of currency circulation in Berlin shall be undertaken by the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone of Occupation through the credit establishments operating at present in Berlin and shall be equally extended to the whole of Berlin without discrimination against any part of Berlin; organisations, enterprises, firms and private persons in Berlin shall be allowed to maintain unhampered trade and economic connexions with third countries and the Western Zones of Germany through the German Export-Import Agency of the Soviet Zone.

"Occupation Costs resulting from the presence of forces in Berlin shall be met from the budgets of the respective Zones of Occupation of Germany, Berlin being exempted from defraying Occupation Costs."

The fundamental differences between these two drafts are evident. The draft of the three Governments proceeds from the position that their Occupation Forces in Berlin are there as a matter of established right, and seeks to liquidate the present crisis on an orderly basis which would permit the use of the Soviet Zone currency throughout Berlin provided that the terms of such use could be agreed upon among the Four Powers and that this agreed use would be under quadripartite control. The counter-draft of M. Molotov proceeds from the position that the Western Allies have lost their right to be in Berlin but would be permitted to remain there by "the present agreement" which in turn would enable the Soviet authorities to exercise full economic control over Berlin and to block further development of plans for the formation of a Western German Government, while remaining able at any time to resume obstruction of our access to Berlin if they considered that the authorities of the Western Occupying Powers were not complying with "the present agreement."

M. Molotov's draft provided for lifting of communication restrictions imposed "after the announcement of currency reform in the Western Zones" (i.e., 18th June). This would have meant the continuation of a large number of hampering measures which had been put into effect between 30th March and 18th June, and would have constituted tacit acceptance of the Soviet contention that its inauguration of a blockade had been "defensive" in character, a contention which the three Governments categorically rejected. M. Molotov's version also reintroduced the question of the implementation of the London decisions regarding Western Germany, despite the fact that it had been stated by Generalissimo Stalin on 2nd August that this issue would not constitute a condition to agreement on a settlement of the Berlin crisis. Furthermore, M. Molotov's draft would have delegated control over Berlin's currency and credit to a bank subject to the exclusive control of the Soviet authorities, and similarly would have entrusted the conduct of Berlin's external trade entirely to an agency dominated by them.

The representatives of the three Governments immediately stated their objections to this draft. They said they would of course transmit it to their respective Governments, but that they were sure that it would be found unacceptable, for reasons which they pointed out forthwith. Considerable time was also devoted to an examination of its details in order that the three representatives might also give their Governments the benefit of an analysis of M. Molotov's thinking concerning it, in order to facilitate the search for some acceptable basis for agreement.

As anticipated by Mr. Roberts, His Majesty's Government found M. Molotov's formula unacceptable. The United States and French Governments were also unable to accept the Soviet position reflected in M. Molotov's counter-draft. Instructions in this sense were sent by all three Governments to their representatives in Moscow and a meeting was held with M. Molotov on 12th August. At this meeting, the following statement, agreed between them before the meeting, was made by the U.S. Ambassador on behalf of the three representatives:—

"We have now received and compared instructions from our respective Governments and find, as anticipated at the conclusion of the 9th August conference, that the Soviet proposals in their present form are unacceptable. M. Molotov will recall that at the last conference we each directed particular attention to paragraphs 3 and 5 of the Soviet draft and stated that they raised issues which our Governments regarded as of fundamental importance. I will refer to these issues again during our detailed discussion of the Soviet draft and re-emphasise the position of our Governments with respect thereto.

"1. The Soviet Government has inserted into the original Western draft the words 'after announcement of currency reform in the Western Zones'. The other three Governments cannot agree to insertion of these words. Their inclusion would mean that certain restrictions on communications between Berlin and the Western Zones which began long before currency reform took place in Western Germany would not be wholly removed. However, as said before, the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States are willing to settle as between the Allied Commanders in Berlin the necessary regulations to prevent illicit black market operations in currency, etc., between the Western and Eastern Zones of Germany or between the Western Zone of Germany and the Western Sectors of Berlin, which we understood from M. Molotov to be a major concern of the Soviet Government.

" The Soviet draft also inserts at the end of paragraph 1 the words ' in accordance with the present agreements ', which are not included in paragraph 2. Our Governments are unable to accept these words which imply a new agreement is now being made derogatory to, or possibly even invalidating, the established rights of the French, British and American Governments in regard to Berlin. These rights were clearly set forth in the oral statement made to Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov on 2nd August and have been reiterated emphatically at our subsequent conferences. Our Governments are not prepared to make any new agreement now which might be held in any way to weaken these rights.

" 2. It is clearly the intention of all four Governments that paragraphs 1 and 2 should be uniform in so far as possible. Accordingly our Governments consider that the words ' after the announcement of currency reform in the Western Zones ' should also be deleted from paragraph 2 although we are unaware of any restrictions placed on interzonal trade before currency reform was introduced in the Western Zones.

" 3. Our Governments are not in any circumstances prepared to agree to the additional sub-paragraph inserted by the Soviet Government. As they understand the position, it is that Generalissimo Stalin made an oral statement regarding the insistent desire of the Soviet Government for deferment of the physical establishment of a West German Government. In reply I made an oral statement (quoted above) on behalf of the United States Government with which the representatives of the French and British Governments associated themselves, and this statement went as far as possible to meet the Generalissimo's oral statement. The Generalissimo expressly declared that this statement was not a condition for issuance of the joint statement now under discussion in Moscow. The statements made on the one hand by the Generalissimo and on the other hand by the British, French and American representatives were made privately but have been recorded. Our Governments cannot agree to any statement on this matter being inserted in a published communiqué representing preliminary agreement by our four Governments nor are they prepared to accept any suggestion that negotiations have taken place on this subject. As we stated very clearly in the original conference with Stalin and yourself at the outset of our conversations, our Governments are only prepared to undertake negotiations in an atmosphere free of all pressure and cannot accept any position which carries implication of negotiating under duress.

" 4. While the principle implied in the first sub-paragraph is acceptable, the paragraph as written in the Soviet draft is unacceptable for reasons given to M. Molotov on 9th August. Our Governments consider that the re-draft proposed by the Soviet Government involves a fundamental question of principle. They can only interpret the wording of this paragraph in the Soviet draft as implying a Soviet intention to incorporate Berlin fully into the Soviet Zone. The position of our respective Governments on this question and its essential connexion with Four-Power discussions on Germany as whole have been stated on several different occasions during our earlier conversations and need not be repeated now. Consequently, while prepared to accept substitution of the Soviet Zone Mark for the Western Mark as the sole currency for Berlin, such acceptance is possible only if some Four-Power regulation of the flow and use of the Soviet currency in Berlin proper is provided which safeguards the rights and interests of our three Governments in Berlin and the legitimate interests of the Berlin population, while taking fully into account, as explained in our previous meeting, the legitimate interests of the Soviet Occupation Authorities, and their responsibilities for safeguarding the economic situation in the Soviet Zone, which we fully recognise. In the opinion of our Governments the Soviet draft of paragraph 4 completely fails to take into account these basic considerations, which are concerned not only with fundamental issues of principle but also with essential and practical issues of daily economic life in Berlin. I repeat that while ready to consider and assist in a practical solution of the currency problem in Berlin on a basis of sole use of Soviet currency, our Governments can only do so if the Soviet Government is prepared to recognise our basic rights in Berlin. This is really the crux of the matter, but I will mention further details.

" Aside from these fundamental questions of principle, clarification is required of the phrase in sub-paragraph 2 concerning ' discrimination against any part of Berlin '. We think our intentions are the same. In the draft we submitted on 6th August this phrase read ' no action or discrimination against the holders of Eastern or Western Zone currency '. If, as we assume, the Soviet draft covers discrimination not only against any part of Berlin but against all persons, firms, etc., resident in any part of Berlin, this corresponds to our own intention and in that case our Governments suggest that the phrase in the 6th August draft would be clearer.

" Then we come to trading agencies. This brings us back to our fundamental point. We cannot recognise Berlin as part of the Soviet Zone, and it follows from this that we cannot accept conduct of Berlin's external trade through the medium of Soviet Zone trade monopolies. Our Governments have a substantial interest in the city and in seeking agreement on regulation of trade matters, we are asking for no more than assurances concerning proper and effective use of our very extensive contributions to the economy of Berlin. The economic well-being of Berlin depends on maximum freedom of its trade with other parts of Germany. This confirms again, from our viewpoint, the necessity of technical discussions in Berlin and the impossibility of such discussions among us here. In the interest of simplification and to obviate a currency war our Governments are willing to accept the Soviet Mark as sole circulating medium but I must say again that Four-Power supervision of its use in Berlin is essential to establish satisfactory economic relationship between Berlin and the rest of Germany. It is possible that M. Molotov misunderstood the wording in our draft: ' For the issue and control of currency in Berlin '. We do not insist on control over the total issuance of Soviet Zone currency. What we are seeking is agreement for quadripartite regulation of the flow and use of Soviet Zone currency within Berlin and in its trade. Our Governments are convinced it is necessary to provide for non-discrimination as to availability of currency throughout Berlin through equitable budgetary and credit procedures and the orderly conduct of trade between Berlin on one hand and the Western and Eastern Zones and third countries on the other. This can only be done by some quadripartite authority in Berlin.

"While our Governments consider the question of Occupation Costs a pertinent one, they do not believe the Soviet proposal in sub-paragraph 4 of paragraph 4 is best adapted for this purpose. The Soviet draft implies that the British, French and American Governments have no right to claim Occupation Costs in or from Berlin. Our Governments cannot accept this position and they maintain their rights to call on the Berlin Magistrat to meet such charges, and are not prepared to obtain what is their fully established right from sources under the control of another Power. Our Governments have for a long time past been contributing largely to the supply of Berlin with food and coal with no appreciable reimbursement and they see no reason why Berlin, which is part of Germany, should not bear its due share of the Occupation Costs, particularly since the heavy costs of the Soviet Occupation Forces in Germany are, according to the Soviet proposal, to be borne by the Soviet Zone surrounding Berlin. This question might be dealt with as proposed in our draft of 6th August or postponed for discussion at the time when the four Powers meet to discuss the question of Berlin and Germany in all its aspects. I must, however, emphasise that the view of our Governments on this question is one of principle affecting their juridical rights in Berlin."

M. Molotov's reaction to this statement was summarised by Mr. Roberts in a report to London as follows:—

"M. Molotov's reply was very cursory in regard to the first two paragraphs. He suggested words 'in conformity with what is set forth below' as substitution for the last phrase of paragraph 1, and remarked that a satisfactory alternative wording could probably be found which would more specifically define restrictions which were to be removed, in lieu of the wording to which we objected in paragraphs 1 and 2. He then reverted to paragraph 4. Today, however, he did not as on previous occasions reject our position in Berlin nor did he insist that quadripartite control had lapsed nor maintain any demand for the Soviet wording of this paragraph. His conversation seemed to me to be generally exploratory, in order to determine whether or not we had reached our definite and final position. We continued to press strongly the point that our entire discussions really hinged on one basic factor—our right to be in Berlin and to continue quadripartite regulation and control of the flow and use of the new currency when introduced. M. Molotov never directly challenged any of our statements in this connexion. He also readily admitted that certain practical questions would have to be settled in Berlin. The point to which he reverted most frequently and on which he seemed to concentrate today was the specific mention of a date on which the currency change would be made and the restrictions lifted. Discussion of this subject became involved and protracted and finally, to bring matters to a head, we suggested the possibility that a tentative date be accepted toward which planning would begin immediately in Berlin by the four Military Commanders, pointing out that until the machinery for the control and use of the Soviet Mark was established any date was meaningless. This subject also M. Molotov did not directly challenge or reject, although he criticised it as vague.

"M. Molotov then discussed occupation costs briefly, taking the attitude that he could not see any reason in our objection to the Soviet formula or to exempting Berlin from cost of occupation since all four Powers were treated alike. An interesting feature of this phase of the discussion was that again he failed to challenge our juridical right, stating that Soviet proposals in this matter did not affect juridical rights of either side to be in Berlin, and that the problem was purely a practical one. We took note of this. Our final statement was that the solution of the question of occupation costs was dependent on solution of basic question which remained to be dealt with in first part of that paragraph. This brought us back to the question of currency, and after lengthy discussion, M. Molotov suggested as an alternate solution that the Soviet Government might be willing to agree to the issue of the same quantity of Soviet Zone Marks for the Western Sectors of Berlin as have been issued or introduced in Berlin by Western Powers, arguing that this would dispose of the technical question. We rejected this on the ground that it did not cover our basic requirement which was quadripartite control of currency in Berlin, and did not provide enough currency for our present and future operations.

"After this M. Molotov again came back to the question of a fixed date for the introduction of Soviet currency in Berlin and the lifting of traffic restrictions, and proposed that we draw up a list of questions relating to the flow of currency to be discussed by the representatives of the Soviet Union and Western Powers in Berlin. We replied that we would be perfectly willing to accept a tentative date and in fact proposed such discussion, but that the Commanders in Berlin must be provided with terms of reference which covered the basic points on which we insisted, and the technical points which we felt must be settled with regard to new currency. There was still outstanding the major question of Four-Power control in Berlin and until this was decided, nothing could be done. We said it would be worse to fix a date and fail to meet it than to leave things as they are now.

"We then asked M. Molotov if he could meet us on the question of Four-Power regulation of currency. He evaded direct reply to this by reverting to the second part of paragraph 3 (London Agreements) although not aggressively. We repeated our Government's past objection to the Soviet wording. We reiterated that our instructions were specific and our Governments could not agree to any statements of this nature being inserted in a communiqué representing preliminary agreement. However, the United States Ambassador said that he was willing to ask his Government if the oral exchange between Generalissimo Stalin and ourselves might be confirmed confidentially by written notes, providing agreement was reached on all other points.

"I then suggested that insertion of this material would unbalance the document, pointing out that Articles I and II were to our mutual advantage, and insofar as the Soviet Government might think Part I benefited us more than Part II benefited them, this was more than balanced by paragraph 4. Paragraph 3 would, we hoped, be to our mutual advantage. M. Molotov agreed, and at this point for a few minutes I thought that he was going to accept and conclude the conference. However, he paused and rediscussed some of the parts of paragraph 4, during which occasion was taken to point out that he would have to meet us on the basic point of principle under 4 if we were even to consider his proposal under 3, emphasising again that unless our basic requirement for Four-Power control and regulation of currency in Berlin were accepted, the rest of the document would automatically fall.

"M. Molotov terminated the conversation shortly afterward by saying that he would report our statements to his Government, who would consider them carefully. We said we would report his comments and proposals and would inform him when we were ready for further discussions."

Though failing to produce definitive progress toward final agreement, the atmosphere of the 12th August meeting was sufficiently encouraging to induce the three Governments to examine exhaustively among themselves the issues in controversy, and to reduce their demands to absolute essentials in the hope that Soviet objections would be overcome. These efforts resulted in the following draft text which was presented to M. Molotov at the fourth and last drafting meeting, that of 16th August.

"One. On 25th August all restrictions which have been imposed since 1st March on transport of persons and goods in either direction between the three Western Zones of Germany and Berlin shall be removed and freedom of communications shall be maintained.

"Two. On 25th August all restrictions which have been imposed since 1st March on traffic of goods to and from Soviet Zone of Germany shall be removed and freedom of communications shall be maintained.

"Three. The four Military Governors are charged with the duty of making all arrangements necessary to ensure that the provisions of paragraphs one and two above are brought into effect on 25th August.

"Four. In addition to meetings of Military Governors, meetings among representatives of the four Governments in form of the Council of Foreign Ministers or other conferences of representatives of four Powers shall be held in near future to discuss: (A) Any questions which may be outstanding as regards Berlin and (B) any other outstanding problems affecting Germany as a whole.

"Five. As from 25th August the German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be accepted as the sole currency for Berlin and the Western Mark "B" shall be simultaneously withdrawn from circulation in Berlin provided however that before that date the four Military Governors shall have worked out arrangements for continued issue and use in Berlin under quadripartite authority, of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone.

"These arrangements shall ensure no discrimination or action against holders of German Marks of either the Soviet Zone or the Western Zones; equal treatment as to currency and provision of full and accessible banking and credit facilities throughout all Sectors of Berlin; unhampered trade and economic connexions with third countries and with all Zones of Germany subject only to such provisions as may be agreed from time to time among the four Military Governors; and provision of sufficient currency for budgetary purposes and occupation costs. These arrangements shall be implemented by the four Military Governors."

This latest redraft was received by M. Molotov in much the same way as the first draft. The representatives of the three Governments discussed it with him for nearly four hours. His reaction to it appeared to be mainly exploratory, to try to sound out the three representatives.

After a lengthy discussion of specific points in it, much along the lines of the earlier discussions, Mr. Roberts and his colleagues were unable to convince M. Molotov that their draft met his requirements. Breaking off the discussion of particular points, M. Molotov suddenly suggested that he could provide a simple formula to deal with paragraphs 1, 2 and 5, and that the other paragraphs could be left for later discussion. He then wrote down and read out the following proposed directive to the Military Governors in Berlin:

"The Governments of France, Great Britain, United States and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics have agreed that the following steps should be taken simultaneously:

"(A) Restrictions recently imposed on both sides on communications between Berlin and the Western Zones shall be lifted;

"(B) The German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be introduced as the sole currency for Berlin, and the Western Mark 'B' shall be withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"In connexion with the above you are instructed to examine, together with your colleagues, within the shortest time possible, and if possible before 25th August, the detailed arrangements necessary for the implementation of this agreement and to inform your Government of the exact date on which provisions under 'A' and 'B' above can be brought into effect."

As the discussion had already gone on for more than two hours, and M. Molotov showed no disposition to give serious consideration to accepting the draft proposed by the three representatives, they stated that they would be willing to submit his new proposal to their Governments but that it would serve no useful purpose to do so unless the directive he suggested were completed by adding an additional paragraph covering all the points in the second part of their draft paragraph 5 which their Governments considered the absolute minimum that could be accepted in the way of a directive to the four Military Governors. M. Molotov argued against this, taking the line, contrary to his previous position, that the Military Governors in Berlin might very well be able to work out practical solutions of the technical problems without specific instructions. The United States Ambassador pointed out that this would simply transfer the unsolved problems from Moscow to Berlin, with even less hope of a solution in the absence of agreement in Moscow on the two or three basic issues which still remain unsettled. M. Molotov then agreed to go through the draft proposed by the three representatives together with the Soviet draft to see whether it would be possible to bring them into conformity and set down principles under which the four Military Governors could work.

Further discussion of details again and again brought the three representatives face to face with a point of principle on which they had to repeat their position, reminding M. Molotov that while their Governments were willing to accept the German Mark of the Soviet Zone as the sole currency in Berlin, they would not be willing to accept terms for the use of that currency which would place the financial and economic life of the city under exclusive Soviet control. The United States' Ambassador repeated that it was quite useless to send any directive to the Military Governors unless there was agreement in Moscow on the basic issues. It would be equally useless to propose a vague and undefined directive to the Military Governors which would still be obliged to obtain answers to the basic questions they had already raised. He repeated that there was no point in simply transferring to Berlin problems which it had not been possible to solve in Moscow through direct contact with M. Molotov.

The meeting was finally adjourned with Mr. Roberts and his colleagues recording their disappointment at the lack of progress. The United States Ambassador suggested that they study and report the results of the meeting to their Governments in case they should have any final instructions or additional guidance. He said he would then ask for a final conference.

The Second Meeting with Stalin on 23rd August

After considering the series of drafting meetings with M. Molotov, the three Governments then decided to request another meeting with Generalissimo Stalin. This was held on 23rd August.

In preparation for it the three Governments had agreed upon a new draft to put before Generalissimo Stalin, embodying the points discussed in the first meeting with him, and taking into account the points raised meanwhile by M. Molotov in so far as these could be harmonised with the rights and duties of the Western Occupying Powers in Berlin. This draft took the form of a directive to the Military Governors in Berlin to work out the concrete means for implementing the principles with respect to the currency of Berlin and to restrictions on communications and transport, together with a communiqué to be issued in Moscow on behalf of the four Governments, confirming the arrangements worked out by the Military Governors.

Generalissimo Stalin began the meeting by producing a Soviet draft for this purpose which he said he had prepared after studying the reports of the drafting meetings with M. Molotov. This draft read as follows:

"On 25th August all restrictions which have been recently imposed on the transport of persons and goods in either direction between the three Western Zones of Germany and Berlin shall be removed and freedom of communications shall be maintained.

2. On 25th August all restrictions which have been recently imposed on the traffic of goods to and from the Soviet Zone of Germany shall be removed and freedom of communications shall be maintained.

3. In addition to meetings of the Commanders-in-Chief, meetings among representatives of the four Governments in the form of the Council of Foreign Ministers or other conferences of representatives of the Four Powers shall be held in the near future to discuss:

(A) any questions which may be outstanding as regards Berlin, and

(B) any other outstanding problems affecting Germany as a whole.

4. As from 25th August the German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be accepted as the sole currency for Berlin and the Western Mark "B" shall be simultaneously withdrawn from circulation in Berlin. The regulation of currency flow in Berlin to be undertaken by the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone through the medium of the credit establishments operating at present in Berlin. Prior to that date, the four Comamnders will work out arrangements involved in the introduction of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone in Berlin and the regulation of its flow in Berlin by the German Bank of Emission. These arrangements shall ensure:

(A) no discrimination or action against holders of German Marks "B" so that the exchange of Western Marks "B", issued at the time of their introduction, for German Marks of the Soviet Zone at the rate of one for one is ensured;

(B) equal treatment as to currency and provision of fully accessible banking and credit facilities throughout all Sectors of Berlin so that this will not lead to disorganising currency flow or disturbing the stability of currency in the Soviet Zone of occupation:

(C) a satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin, third countries and the Western Zones in conformity with the existing procedure of interzonal trade and barter accounting and on condition that any modification of this procedure of trade will be made only by agreement between the four Commanders;

(D) provision of sufficient currency for budgetary purposes provided that the balance of the Berlin budget is maintained;

(E) Occupation Costs resulting from the presence of forces in Berlin shall be met from the budgets of the respective Zones of Occupation of Germany, Berlin being exempted from Occupation Costs;

(F) a financial commission of representatives of the four Commanders shall be set up to control the practical implementation of financial arrangements involved in the introduction of a single currency in Berlin.

5. Should the preparation of the arrangements implicated here not be completed prior to 25th August the four Commanders shall agree on another date for the simultaneous implementation of the above-mentioned decisions.

The three representatives then produced their own draft, which stated:—

Draft Western Directive to Military Governors

23rd August

"The Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics have decided that, subject to agreement being reached among the four Military Governors in Berlin for their practical implementation, the following steps should be taken simultaneously:—

(a) Restrictions on communications between Berlin and the Western Zones (and on the traffic of goods to and from the Soviet Zone of Germany) shall be lifted;

(b) The German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be introduced as the sole currency for Berlin, and the Western Mark 'B' shall be withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"In connexion with the above you are instructed to consult together with your colleagues so as to make, in the shortest time possible, the detailed arrangements necessary for the implementation of these decisions, and to inform your Government not later than —th August of the results of your discussions, including the exact date on which the measures under (a) and (b) above can be brought into effect.

"The arrangements relating to the currency changeover and to the continued provision and use in Berlin, under quadripartite agreement, of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall include such regulations as may be necessary to safeguard the currency of the Soviet Zone issued by the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone and the currency of the Western Zones and to prevent illicit black market operations in currency;

they shall also ensure:

that in connexion with the substitution of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone for the Western Mark "B" in Berlin at the rate of one for one there shall be no discrimination against holders of the Western Mark "B" or the German Mark of the Soviet Zone;

equal treatment as to currency and provision of fully accessible banking and credit facilities throughout all sectors of Berlin;

unhampered trade and economic connexions for Berlin with third countries and with all the Zones of Germany, subject only to such provisions as may be agreed from time to time among the four Military Governors; and the provision of sufficient currency for budgetary purposes and occupation costs."

After a general discussion of the two drafts the meeting with Generalissimo Stalin terminated and M. Molotov and the three representatives withdrew to continue in drafting session to try to harmonise the two drafts.

During the discussion with Generalissimo Stalin, he and the three representatives noted that the two drafts were in many respects close to each other. Generalissimo Stalin thought, however, that the directive to the Commanders should contain more concrete wording with regard to safeguarding the Soviet Zone currency. The United States Ambassador pointed out that this point was covered in the draft of the three representatives. Generalissimo Stalin replied that it should be made more explicit. It may be stated here that throughout the whole series of meetings in Moscow the three Western representatives made it clear that their Governments were ready and indeed eager to agree on all measures consistent with their rights in Berlin to protect the currency and economy of the Soviet Zone and to ensure that the new arrangements foreseen in the agreements worked smoothly and to the general interest of all four Occupying Powers and of the population of Berlin. They showed a similar desire to be helpful over the Soviet desire to reduce Occupation Costs and to balance the Berlin city budget.

Generalissimo Stalin also discussed the provision for the exchange of currency, and for the issue of currency thereafter by the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone and for the establishment for these purposes of a financial commission composed of representatives of the four Commanders to control their practical implementation. He considered these points essential. He then added that it would also be desirable to have some indication in the draft of a postponement of the establishment of a Western German Government on the basis of the decisions of the London Conference. On this point the three representatives rested on the position of their three Governments which had already been made clear at earlier meetings, insisting that this was a question for discussion at the proposed meeting of Foreign Ministers.

The United States Ambassador then again reiterated the necessity for ensuring that the currency arrangements for Berlin were on a basis which would provide absolute equality of control and would respect the juridical position of the Western Occupying Powers in Berlin. Generalissimo Stalin replied that if German unity were restored by confirming the decisions of previous Four-Power conferences, Berlin would remain the capital of Germany and then there would be no objection to the forces and authority of the three Western Occupying Powers remaining in Berlin and sharing the control of the German Government in Berlin with those of the Soviet Union. If this did not happen, then Berlin would lose its standing as the capital of Germany. But even in this case Generalissimo Stalin would not wish to oust the Occupation Forces of the three Western Governments from Berlin. The United States Ambassador expressed the hope that such a situation would not arise and took occasion to explain fully the juridical position of the Western Occupying Powers in Berlin. It was decided that details should be worked out with M. Molotov with a view to drafting a Directive to the Military Governors in Berlin, requesting them to report back their recommendations within about a week after the Directive had been issued to them.

Before Generalissimo Stalin withdrew, the United States Ambassador specifically took occasion to bring out clearly certain questions on which the three Governments wanted to get an unequivocal clarification of the Soviet position. With respect to transport restrictions, it is worth quoting the following passage from the record of the meeting of 23rd August, drawn up by the three Western representatives in Moscow:—

"The United States Ambassador then asked if he could first query one or two points, for example, the Soviet wording with regard to the transport restrictions. M. Molotov remarked, after a certain amount of discussion, that the Soviet Government meant the restrictions imposed since the 18th June. We indicated that this was unsatisfactory. Generalissimo Stalin then suggested that it might be better to say 'the restrictions lately imposed' and confirmed that if there were any imposed before that date they would also be lifted."

It was with this understanding, personally confirmed by Generalissimo Stalin, that a Directive was ultimately sent to the Military Governors in Berlin to work out the technical arrangements necessary to give effect to the above agreement.

The principle of quadripartite control over the currency within the city of Berlin was an important issue in the discussion at Moscow. On this point Generalissimo Stalin, during the discussion, gave the following confirmation of the interpretation to be placed on the language of the Directive dealing with the powers of the Financial Commission:—

"Generalissimo Stalin stated that the German Bank of Emission controlled the flow of currency throughout the whole of the Soviet Zone, and it was impossible to exclude Berlin from the Soviet Zone. However, if the question was asked whether it did so without being controlled itself, the answer was 'no.' Such control would be provided by the Financial Commission and by the four Commanders in Berlin, who would work out the arrangements connected with the exchange of the currency and with the control of the provision of currency, and would supervise what the Bank was doing.

"Generalissimo Stalin said the Soviet draft had kept the word 'control' with reference to the Four-Power Finance Committee and the Soviet Government did not object to it. But from the point of view of financial science and political economy, it was impossible to exclude the German Bank of Emission from Berlin. To avoid abuse in its operations, the word 'control' had been included. The United States Ambassador then suggested that the mention of regulation by the German Bank of Emission should be made after the Financial Commission. Generalissimo Stalin replied that the subjects had been mentioned in the logical order and that the authority conducting the operations had been mentioned first and afterwards the body controlling this authority had been mentioned."

It was on this clear understanding of these points that the three representatives continued the discussion and drafting. It should, however, be noted that on this as on many other occasions the three Western representatives made it clear beyond all doubt that their claim that the Financial Commission must control the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone related only to its functions in respect of the currency issued and circulating in Berlin and not to its functions in regard to the Soviet Zone.

Just before the meeting broke off Generalissimo Stalin expressed persistent interest in including some reference to the decisions of the London Conference. He suggested insertion of the following or some similar wording:

> "The question of the London decisions was also discussed including the formation of a Western German Government. The discussion took place in an atmosphere of mutual understanding."

The three representatives said they would inform their Governments of Generalissimo Stalin's desire but did not expect that their Governments could accede to any such wording unless it were also made explicit that no agreement was reached on this subject since Generalissimo Stalin himself had stated that this was not a condition attaching to the lifting of the restrictions on transport and communications. Mr. Roberts added that his Government did not want there to be any misunderstanding or misinterpretation, as there certainly would be in London, if a vague formula were published.

The ensuing drafting meeting with M. Molotov elaborated a joint draft which was then submitted to the Governments for consideration. This stated;

Revised draft Directive agreed with M. Molotov on 23rd August

"The Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have decided that, subject to agreement being reached among the four Military Governors in Berlin for their practical implementation, the following steps should be taken simultaneously:—

(a) Restrictions on communications between Berlin and the Western Zones and on the traffic of goods to and from the Soviet Zone of Germany which have recently been imposed shall be lifted;

(b) The German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be introduced as the sole currency for Berlin, and the Western Mark 'B' shall be withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"2. In connexion with the above you are instructed to consult together with your colleagues so as to make, in the shortest time possible, the detailed arrangements necessary for the implementation of these decisions, and to inform your Government not later than 31st August of the results of your discussions, including the exact date on which the measures under (a) and (b) above can be brought into effect. The four Commanders will work out arrangements involved in the introduction of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone in Berlin and the regulation of its circulation in Berlin by the German Bank of Emission.

"3. The arrangements relating to the currency changeover and to the continued provision and use in Berlin of the German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall ensure:

(a) no discrimination or action against holders of Western Marks 'B' in connexion with the exchange of those Western Marks 'B' issued at the time of introduction of that currency into Berlin. These shall be exchanged for German Marks of the Soviet Zone at the rate of one for one;

(b) equal treatment as to currency and provision of fully accessible banking and credit facilities throughout all sectors of Berlin on the understanding that this will not lead to disorganising currency circulation or disrupting the stability of currency in the Soviet Zone of occupation;

(c) a satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and third countries and Western Zones, taking into account the existing procedure of inter-zonal trade and clearing accounts. Modification of the existing procedure of inter-zonal trade will be made only by agreement between the four Military Governors.

(d) The provision of sufficient currency for budgetary purposes and for occupation costs, reduced to the greatest extent possible, and also the balancing of the Berlin budget.

(e) The regulation of currency circulation in Berlin to be undertaken by the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone through the medium of the credit establishments operating at present in Berlin. A financial commission of representatives of the four Military Governors shall be set up to control the practical implementation of the financial arrangements indicated above involved in the introduction and the circulation of a single currency in Berlin."

His Majesty's Government, in expressing their views to Mr. Roberts took occasion among other things to corroborate the view expressed by Mr. Roberts to Generalissimo Stalin that a provision such as Generalissimo Stalin desired with respect to Western Germany would be open to misinterpretation and, therefore, could not be accepted. Any such provision should make clear that while His Majesty's Government desired a united Germany and would make a sincere effort to ascertain whether agreement on a Four-Power basis was possible, they were not prepared to make any commitments whatsoever for postponement of the London decisions in connexion with the present negotiations. Mr. Roberts was instructed to make this clear to the Soviet authorities and to agree at most to a statement that:

> "During the conversations the Soviet Government expressed its wish that the implementation of the decisions of the London Conference should not result in the establishment of a Government for Western Germany before the representatives of the four Powers had been able to meet to discuss the whole German problem. The representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and France affirmed the desire of their Governments for a Four-Power agreement whereby a Government for the whole of Germany would be established. They explained that the London decisions did not preclude such an agreement and, while they were not able to agree to any postponement to the implementation of the London decisions, they would make a sincere endeavour to acertain whether there is a real prospect of agreement among the four Powers. Further discussion of this point was accordingly deferred."

In framing its further instructions to Mr. Roberts His Majesty's Government proceeded from the following basic requirements, upon which they had insisted from the beginning;

1. Insistence on our co-equal rights to be in Berlin;
2. No abandonment of our position with respect to Western Germany;
3. Unequivocal lifting of the blockade on communications, transport and commerce for goods and persons; and
4. Adequate quadripartite control of the issue and continued use in Berlin of the Soviet Mark.

After the three Governments had consulted each other and instructed their respective representatives in Moscow, the latter met with M. Molotov and M. Vyshinsky on 27th August and worked out a Directive to be issued to the Military Governors, the text of which is set out in Annex VI, and of a communiqué to be issued after the Military Governors had completed their discussions in the following terms:—

Draft Communiqué

"The Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. have agreed that the following measures under (A) and (B) shall be put into effect simultaneously, and have approved detailed arrangements for their implementation jointly worked out by the four Military Governors.

"(A) The restrictions which have recently been imposed on communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and the Western Zones and between the various Zones of Germany shall be lifted, and freedom of communications, transport and commerce shall be maintained.

"(B) The German Mark of the Soviet Zone shall be accepted, on the basis agreed between the four Military Governors, as the sole currency for Berlin and the Western Mark 'B' shall be simultaneously withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"The four Governments have also agreed that in addition to meetings of the four Military Governors, meetings among representatives of the four Governments in the form of the Council of Foreign Ministers or other conferences of representatives of the four Powers shall be held in the near future to discuss:

"(1) Any outstanding questions regarding Berlin, and (2) any other outstanding problems affecting Germany as a whole."

During this discussion, as during previous ones, M. Molotov endeavoured again, without success, to insert some provision into the communiqué that would tie the hands of the three Governments with respect to the London decisions.

After a final review by the several Governments it was arranged with M. Molotov on 30th August that the directive to the Military Governors be despatched to them by midnight calling for a report from them by 7th September.

Although the Directive was finally agreed and sent, it was not possible to reach agreement on the ultimate draft Communiqué, because M. Molotov still insisted on a final paragraph concerning the London decisions. M. Molotov eventually stated that, while the above text of the Communiqué was acceptable to the Soviet Government, so far as it went, the Communiqué as a whole could not be regarded as agreed until a decision was reached on how to deal with Generalissimo Stalin's insistent desire that the question should be covered. He accepted, however, Mr. Roberts' argument that it was unnecessary to pursue this issue further until after the Four Military Governors had begun work on the directive, since, if they failed in Berlin the whole agreement would fall to the ground.

The United States Ambassador told him that, regardless of the finally agreed text, when the Communiqué was made public we would be obliged to publish a statement that the agreement represented by it was entered into without prejudice to the co-equal rights, duties and obligations of the Western Occupying Powers in Berlin. M. Molotov's reply to this was that the position of the Soviet Government was well known and that it might wish to make a similar public reservation.

At the end of the meeting on 30th August Mr. Roberts, with the support of his two colleagues, referred to the disturbed situation in Berlin and pointed out the special desirability of maintaining a favourable atmosphere in Berlin during the deliberations of the Military Governors. He suggested that instructions should be sent accordingly to the Military Governors, but M. Molotov declined to pursue the matter further, stating that the Soviet Military Governor already had his instructions.

M. Molotov further refused on 30th August to agree to the issue of an interim communiqué as suggested by the three Western representatives and he insisted that the agreed ban on publicity about the discussions should be maintained. It is worth noticing that the Soviet Government was the first to depart from this agreement by their unilateral release of a statement by "Tass" on 26th September.

The Discussions in Berlin between the Military Governors

On 31st August the four Commanders and their staffs met for the first time to work out, under instructions from their Governments, the implementation of the Directive. They continued these meetings daily throughout the week allotted for the Berlin discussions.

It soon became apparent that Marshal Sokolovsky was not ready to honour the understandings reached in Moscow. During the course of the meetings it was evident that he was seeking to increase, rather than to decrease, the restrictions on transport, and also to exclude any measure of quadripartite control over the German Bank of Emission for the Soviet Zone with respect to Berlin and to assert for the Soviet Military Authority sole jurisdiction over the trade between Berlin and the Western Zones of Germany as well as third countries.

With respect to the transport restrictions, Marshal Sokolovsky began by declaring that he would agree to removal of only those restrictions imposed after 18th June, the date of the currency reform. This position was taken in spite of Generalissimo Stalin's categorical statement on 23rd August that under the final wording of the Directive any restrictions imposed before that date would also be removed. Marshal Sokolovsky even endeavoured to discuss the imposition of restrictions on air traffic between the Western Zones of Occupation and Berlin. When the Western Commanders sought to discuss freedom of passage for military trains, the condition of the railroad tracks and the need of more paths, Marshal Sokolovsky began by declining to discuss rail traffic unless the three Commanders of the Western Occupying Powers would agree to discuss the imposition of restrictions on air traffic. The three Military Governors refused to do this, pointing out that the Directive referred only to the removal of existing restrictions, not to the imposition of new ones. In justifying his adherence to the date of 18th June, Marshal Sokolovsky argued that, since traffic restrictions were being removed in exchange for the currency provisions of the Directive, the latter must refer only to traffic restrictions imposed after the currency reform of 18th June in the Western Zones; he went on to say that traffic restrictions imposed before that date were connected with the London Conference. He later receded from his initial position on this point, but continued to try to put limitations on air traffic.

With respect to the provisions of the Directive concerning the currency itself, Marshal Sokolovsky took the position (despite the clear understanding confirmed by Generalissimo Stalin in Moscow), that the proposed Four-Power Financial Commission should have no authority to control the operations of the German Bank of Emission with respect to Berlin but should be confined to supervising the functions described in sub-heads A-D of the Directive. Yet without such authority over the institution issuing and promulgating regulations concerning the currency of Berlin the Financial Commission would have proved a completely ineffective instrument if deprived of the necessary measure of control of the operations of the Bank of Emission in regard to Berlin: it would have been unable to ensure that sufficient currency and credit were provided to sustain the economic life of the Western Sectors and it would have had no means of remedying any discriminatory action taken by the Bank or by the Soviet authorities. Moreover, the meaning of the Directive on this point is clear since the necessary control of the Bank's activities in regard to Berlin is obviously included in the functions assigned to the Financial Commission in the last paragraph of the Directive, i.e., controlling the practical implementation of the financial arrangements involved in the introduction and continued circulation of a single currency in Berlin. Marshal Sokolovsky's repudiation of the understanding reached on this point with Generalissimo Stalin in Moscow was sufficient in itself to prevent agreement upon genuine quadripartite administration of the currency of Berlin, quite apart from other differences which arose concerning the detailed financial arrangements for Berlin.

With respect to trade arrangements between Berlin and the Western Zones of Germany and third countries, Marshal Sokolovsky asserted for the Soviet authorities the exclusive right to control such trade. This claim obviously contradicted the meaning of the agreed Directive to the four Military Governors, and in no way constituted a reasonable approach to the problem of working out a mutually "satisfactory basis" for the trade of Berlin.

Marshal Sokolovsky in Berlin thus took a position contrary to the explicit assurances given by Generalissimo Stalin in Moscow, with respect to restrictions on transport and communications, currency and trade for Berlin.

The week of discussion in Berlin thus failed to advance the prospects of final agreement being reached.

The Military Governors were unable to submit an agreed Four-Power report; Marshal Sokolovsky remarked that there was nothing to report. The United Kingdom, United States and French Military Governors therefore submitted an agreed Three-Power report to their Governments, the text of which is set out in Annex VII. The three main points at issue (apart from the continuance of the blockade measures) were:—

(a) The Soviet refusal to admit that the Financial Commission was to have any control whatsoever over the operations of the German Bank of Emission;

(b) The Soviet insistence on Soviet control of the trade of Berlin;

(c) The Soviet proposal to introduce restrictions on air transport.

On the first of these points the Soviet attitude was directly at variance with the assurance given in Moscow by Generalissimo Stalin, while the third was outside the scope of the Directive.

The talks in Berlin could make no progress until these three points of principle were settled. It was therefore decided to raise them in Moscow.

The representatives in Moscow of the three Western Occupying Powers were therefore instructed to approach the Soviet Government and to seek an interview with Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov with a view to resolving the three points of disagreement which had brought the talks with the Soviet Military Governor to a standstill. Having been informed that Generalissimo Stalin was away on a vacation which could not be interrupted, on 14th September they handed M. Molotov an Aide-Mémoire on the points at issue, the text of which is set out in Annex VIII. The Soviet reply of 18th September, the text of which is set out in Annex IX, sustained the attitude of the Soviet Military Governor and declined to admit that he had departed from the Directive which had been agreed in Moscow. Considerable discussion took place at these two meetings. For instance, in their note the Soviet Government claimed that to permit the operations of the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone in regard to Berlin to be subject to Four-Power control would lead to such interference in matters of the regulation of currency circulation in the Soviet Zone as was incompatible with the Soviet administration's responsibility in that Zone. Mr. Roberts and his colleagues pointed out that the Western Powers were fully alive to the importance of this point and explained that the Military Governors of the Western Powers were ready to work out the necessary detailed safeguards with the Soviet Military Governor and to keep the contacts between the Four-Power Financial Commission and the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet Zone to the minimum necessary to ensure that its control was effective in currency matters relating to Berlin.

On this point and on others, M. Molotov was given every opportunity to modify the intransigent Soviet attitude but these talks contained no suggestion that such modification was likely, and at the last meeting on 18th September the three Western representatives made it clear that in their view the Soviet attitude was unlikely to be acceptable to their Governments, and in the face of the unsatisfactory Soviet reply the Governments of the United States, France and the United Kingdom therefore sent a note to the Soviet Government on 22nd September setting out their final views on the points at issue and asking the Soviet Government to state whether they were prepared to remove the blockade measures. The text of this note is set out in Annex X.

On 25th September a reply, the text of which is set out in Annex XI, was received from the Soviet Government. This reply did not provide the assurance which the three Governments had requested that the blockade measures would be removed. The Soviet Government further demanded that commercial and passenger traffic between the Western Zones of Occupation and Berlin, including air transport, should be controlled by the Soviet Command in Germany. In regard to currency, the Note indicated no advance on the position which the Soviet Government had taken up, but the Soviet Government offered to agree to Four-Power control of the trade of Berlin provided that agreement were reached on the other two points.

In view of the failure of all efforts to find an acceptable basis of negotiation with the Soviet Government a note was handed to the Soviet Ambassador in London on 27th September stating that the Governments of the United States, France and the United Kingdom, while reserving to themselves full rights to take such measures as might be necessary to maintain their position in Berlin, found themselves obliged to refer the action of the Soviet Government to the Security Council of the United Nations. The text of this note is set out in Annex XII.

ANNEX I

REPORT ON THE TRIPARTITE CONFERENCE OF BERLIN (POTSDAM AGREEMENT), 2ND AUGUST, 1945

II

GERMANY

The Allied armies are in occupation of the whole of Germany and the German people have begun to atone for the terrible crimes committed under the leadership of those whom, in the hour of their success, they openly approved and blindly obeyed.

Agreement has been reached at this Conference on the political and economic principles of a co-ordinated Allied policy toward defeated Germany during the period of Allied control.

The purpose of this agreement is to carry out the Crimea declaration on Germany. German militarism and Nazism will be extirpated and the Allies will take in agreement together, now and in the future, the other measures necessary to assure that Germany never again will threaten her neighbours or the peace of the world.

It is not the intention of the Allies to destroy or enslave the German people. It is the intention of the Allies that the German people be given the opportunity to prepare for the eventual reconstruction of their life on a democratic and peaceful basis. If their own efforts are steadily directed to this end, it will be possible for them in due course to take their place among the free and peaceful peoples of the world.

The text of the agreement is as follows:—

THE POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC PRINCIPLES TO GOVERN THE TREATMENT OF GERMANY IN THE INITIAL CONTROL PERIOD

A. Political Principles

1. In accordance with the Agreement on Control Machinery in Germany, supreme authority in Germany is exercised, on instructions from their respective Governments, by the Commanders-in-Chief of the armed forces of the United States of America, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the French Republic, each in his own zone of occupation, and also jointly, in matters affecting Germany as a whole, in their capacity as members of the Control Council.

2. So far as is practicable, there shall be uniformity of treatment of the German population throughout Germany.

3. The purposes of the occupation of Germany by which the Control Council shall be guided are:

I. The complete disarmament and demilitarization of Germany and the elimination or control of all German industry that could be used for military production. To these ends:

(a) All German land, naval and air forces, the S.S., S.A., S.D. and Gestapo, with all their organizations, staffs and institutions, including the General Staff, the Officers' Corps, Reserve Corps, military schools, war veterans' organizations and all other military and quasimilitary organizations, together with all clubs and associations which serve to keep alive the military tradition in Germany, shall be completely and finally abolished in such manner as permanently to prevent the revival or reorganization of German militarism and Nazism.

(b) All arms, ammunition and implements of war and all specialized facilities for their production shall be held at the disposal of the Allies or destroyed. The maintenance and production of all aircraft and all arms, ammunition and implements of war shall be prevented.

II. To convince the German people that they have suffered a total military defeat and that they cannot escape responsibility for what they have brought upon themselves, since their own ruthless warfare and the fanatical Nazi resistance have destroyed German economy and made chaos and suffering inevitable.

III. To destroy the National Socialist Party and its affiliated and supervised organizations, to dissolve all Nazi institutions, to ensure that they are not revived in any form, and to prevent all Nazi and militarist activity or propaganda.

IV. To prepare for the eventual reconstruction of German political life on a democratic basis and for eventual peaceful cooperation in international life by Germany.

C224524

4. All Nazi laws which provided the basis of the Hitler regime or established discrimination on grounds of race, creed, or political opinion shall be abolished. No such discriminations, whether legal, administrative or otherwise, shall be tolerated.

5. War Criminals and those who have participated in planning or carrying out Nazi enterprises involving or resulting in atrocities or war crimes shall be arrested and brought to judgment. Nazi leaders, influential Nazi supporters and high officials of Nazi organisations and institutions and any other persons dangerous to the occupation or its objectives shall be arrested and interned.

6. All members of the Nazi Party who have been more than nominal participants in its activities and all other persons hostile to Allied purposes shall be removed from public and semi-public office, and from positions of responsibility in important private undertakings. Such persons shall be replaced by persons who, by their political and moral qualities, are deemed capable of assisting in developing genuine democratic institutions in Germany.

7. German education shall be so controlled as completely to eliminate Nazi and militarist doctrines and to make possible the successful development of democratic ideas.

8. The judicial system will be reorganized in accordance with the principles of democracy, of justice under law, and of equal rights for all citizens without distinction of race, nationality or religion.

9. The administration of affairs in Germany should be directed towards the decentralization of the political structure and the development of local responsibility. To this end:

I. local self-government shall be restored throughout Germany on democratic principles and in particular through elective councils as rapidly as is consistent with military security and the purposes of military occupation;

II. all democratic political parties with rights of assembly and of public discussion shall be allowed and encouraged throughout Germany;

III. representative and elective principles shall be introduced into regional, provincial and state (Land) administration as rapidly as may be justified by the successful application of these principles in local selfgovernment;

IV. for the time being no central German government shall be established. Notwithstanding this, however, certain essential central German administrative departments, headed by State Secretaries, shall be established, particularly in the fields of finance, transport, communications, foreign trade and industry. Such departments will act under the direction of the Control Council.

10. Subject to the necessity for maintaining military security, freedom of speech, press and religion shall be permitted, and religious institutions shall be respected. Subject likewise to the maintenance of military security, the formation of free trade unions shall be permitted.

B. Economic Principles

11. In order to eliminate Germany's war potential, the production of arms, ammunition and implements of war as well as all types of aircraft and sea-going ships shall be prohibited and prevented. Production of metals, chemicals, machinery and other items that are directly necessary to a war economy shall be rigidly controlled and restricted to Germany's approved post-war peacetime needs to meet the objectives stated in Paragraph 15. Productive capacity not needed for permitted production shall be removed in accordance with the reparations plan recommended by the Allied Commission on Reparations and approved by the Governments concerned or if not removed shall be destroyed.

12. At the earliest practicable date, the German economy shall be decentralized for the purpose of eliminating the present excessive concentration of economic powers as exemplified in particular by cartels, syndicates, trusts and other monopolistic arrangements.

13. In organizing the German economy, primary emphasis shall be given to the development of agriculture and peaceful domestic industries.

14. During the period of occupation Germany shall be treated as a single economic unit. To this end common policies shall be established in regard to:

(a) mining and industrial production and allocation;

(b) agriculture, forestry and fishing;

(c) wages, prices and rationing;

(d) import and export programmes for Germany as a whole;

(e) currency and banking, central taxation and customs;
(f) reparation and removal of industrial war potential;
(g) transportation and communications.

In applying these policies account shall be taken, where appropriate, of varying local conditions.

15. Allied controls shall be imposed upon the German economy but only to the extent necessary:

(a) to carry out programmes of industrial disarmament and demilitarization, of reparations, and of approved exports and imports;

(b) to assure the production and maintenance of goods and services required to meet the needs of the occupying forces and displaced persons in Germany and essential to maintain in Germany average living standards not exceeding the average of standards of living of European countries. (European countries means all European countries excluding the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics);

(c) to ensure in the manner determined by the Control Council the equitable distribution of essential commodities between the several zones so as to produce a balanced economy throughout Germany and reduce the need for imports;

(d) to control German industry and all economic and financial international transactions, including exports and imports, with the aim of preventing Germany from developing a war potential and of achieving the other objectives named herein;

(e) to control all German public or private scientific bodies, research and experimental institutions, laboratories, etcetera, connected with economic activities.

16. In the imposition and maintenance of economic controls established by the Control Council, German administrative machinery shall be created and the German authorities shall be required to the fullest extent practicable to proclaim and assume administration of such controls. Thus it should be brought home to the German people that the responsibility for the administration of such controls and any breakdown in these controls will rest with themselves. Any German controls which may run counter to the objectives of occupation will be prohibited.

17. Measures shall be promptly taken:

(a) to effect essential repair of transport;
(b) to enlarge coal production;
(c) to maximize agricultural output; and
(d) to effect emergency repair of housing and essential utilities.

18. Appropriate steps shall be taken by the Control Council to exercise control and the power of disposition over German-owned external assets not already under the control of United Nations which have taken part in the war against Germany.

19. Payment of Reparations should leave enough resources to enable the German people to subsist without external assistance. In working out the economic balance of Germany the necessary means must be provided to pay for imports approved by the Control Council in Germany. The proceeds of exports from current production and stock shall be available in the first place for payment for such imports.

The above clause will not apply to the equipment and products referred to in paragraphs 4 (a) and 4 (b) of the Reparations Agreement.

III

REPARATIONS FROM GERMANY

In accordance with the Crimea decision that Germany be compelled to compensate to the greatest possible extent for the loss and suffering that she has caused to the United Nations and for which the German people cannot escape responsibility, the following agreement on reparations was reached:

1. Reparation claims of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics shall be met by removals from the zone of Germany occupied by the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and from appropriate German external assets.

2. The Union of Socialist Soviet Republics undertakes to settle the reparation claims of Poland from its own share of reparations.

3. The reparation claims of the United States, the United Kingdom and other countries entitled to reparations shall be met from the Western Zones and from appropriate German external assets.

C224526

4. In addition to the reparations to be taken by the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics from its own zone of occupation, the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics shall receive additionally from the Western zones:

(a) 15 per cent of such usable and complete industrial capital equipment, in the first place from the metallurgical, chemical and machine manufacturing industries, as is unnecessary for the German peace economy and should be removed from the Western Zones of Germany, in exchange for an equivalent value of food, coal, potash, zinc, timber, clay products, petroleum products and other commodities as may be agreed upon.

(b) 10 per cent of such industrial capital equipment as is unnecessary for the German peace economy and should be removed from the Western Zones, to be transferred to the Soviet Government on reparations account without payment or exchange of any kind in return.

Removals of equipment as provided in (a) and (b) above shall be made simultaneously.

5. The amount of equipment to be removed from the Western Zones on account of reparations must be determined within six months from now at the latest.

6. Removals on industrial capital equipment shall begin as soon as possible and shall be completed within two years from the determination specified in paragraph 5. The delivery of products covered by 4 (a) above shall begin as soon as possible and shall be made by the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in agreed instalments within five years of the date hereof. The determination of the amount and character of the industrial capital equipment unnecessary for the German peace economy and therefore available for reparations shall be made by the Control Council under policies fixed by the Allied Commission on Reparations, with the participation of France, subject to the final approval of the Zone Commander in the Zone from which the equipment is to be removed.

7. Prior to the fixing of the total amount of equipment subject to removal, advance deliveries shall be made in respect of such equipment as will be determined to be eligible for delivery in accordance with the procedure set forth in the last sentence of paragraph 6.

8. The Soviet Government renounces all claims in respect of reparations to shares of German enterprises which are located in the Western Zones of occupation in Germany as well as to German foreign assets in all countries except those specified in paragraph 9 below.

9. The Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States renounce their claims in respect of reparations to shares of German enterprises which are located in the Eastern Zone of occupation in Germany, as well as to German foreign assets in Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary, Rumania, and Eastern Austria.

10. The Soviet Government makes no claims to gold captured by the Allied troops in Germany.

President Truman to Premier Stalin on 14th June, 1945, which agreed to the withdrawal of United States forces to the zonal boundaries, provided satisfactory arrangements could be entered into between the military commanders, which would give access by rail, road and air to United States forces in Berlin. Premier Stalin replied on 16th June, suggesting a change in date but no other alteration in the plan proposed by the President. Premier Stalin then gave assurances that all necessary measures would be taken in accordance with the plan. Correspondence in a similar sense took place between Premier Stalin and Mr. Churchill. In accordance with this understanding, the United States, whose armies had penetrated deep into Saxony and Thuringia parts of the Soviet zone, withdrew its forces to its own area of occupation in Germany and took up its position in its own sector in Berlin.* Thereupon the agreements in regard to the occupation of Germany and Berlin went into effect. The United States would not have so withdrawn its troops from a large area now occupied by the Soviet Union had there been any doubt whatsoever about the observance of its agreed right of free access to its sector of Berlin. The right of the United States to its position in Berlin thus stems from precisely the same source as the right of the Soviet Union. It is impossible to assert the latter and deny the former.

"It clearly results from these undertakings that Berlin is not a part of the Soviet zone, but is an international zone of occupation. Commitments entered into in good faith by the zone commanders, and subsequently confirmed by the Allied Control Authority, as well as practices sanctioned by usage, guarantee the United States together with other Powers, free access to Berlin for the purpose of fulfilling its responsibilities as an occupying Power. The facts are plain. Their meaning is clear. Any other interpretation would offend all the rules of comity and reason.†

"In order that there should be no misunderstanding whatsoever on this point, the United States Government categorically asserts that it is in occupation of its sector in Berlin with free access thereto as a matter of established right deriving from the defeat and surrender of Germany and confirmed by formal agreements among the principal Allies. It further declares that it will not be induced by threats, pressure or other actions to abandon these rights. It is hoped that the Soviet Government entertains no doubts whatsoever on this point.

"This Government now shares with the Governments of France and the United Kingdom the responsibility initially undertaken at Soviet request on 7th July, 1945, for the physical well-being of 2,400,000 persons in the western sectors of Berlin. Restrictions recently imposed by the Soviet authorities in Berlin have operated to prevent this Government and the Governments of the United Kingdom and of France from fulfilling that responsibility in an edequate manner.

"The responsibility which this Government bears for the physical well-being and the safety of the German population in its sector of Berlin is outstandingly humanitarian in character. This population includes hundreds of thousands of women and children, whose health and safety are dependent on the continued use of adequate facilities for moving food, medical supplies and other items indispensable to the maintenance of human life in the western sectors of Berlin. The most elemental of those human rights which both our Governments are solemly pledged to protect are thus placed in jeopardy by these restrictions. It is intolerable that any one of the occupying authorities should attempt to impose a blockade upon the people of Berlin.

"The United States Government is therefore obliged to insist that in accordance with existing agreements the arrangements for the movement of freight and passenger traffic between the Western zones and Berlin be fully restored. There can be no question of delay in the restoration of these essential services since the needs of the civilian population in the Berlin area are imperative.

"Holding these urgent views regarding its rights and obligations in the United States sector of Berlin, yet eager always to resolve controversies in the spirit of fair consideration for the view points of all concerned, the Government of the United States declares that duress should not be invoked as a method of attempting to dispose of any disagreements which may exist between the Soviet Government and the Government of the United States in respect of any aspect of the Berlin situation.

* The Note of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom read: "In accordance with this understanding, the British 21st Army Group which had reached a line Wismar—Schwerin—Ludwigslust—Domitz withdrew . . . ."

† The Note of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom read: "Any other interpretation would violate all the rules of reason and all the established principles of international conduct."

"Such disagreements if any should be settled by negotiation or by way of the other peaceful methods provided for in Article 33 of the Charter in keeping with our mutual pledges as co-partners in the United Nations. For these reasons the Government of the United States is ready as a first step to participate in negotiations in Berlin among the four Allied Occupying Authorities for the settlement of any question in dispute arising out of the administration of the City of Berlin. It is, however, a prerequisite that the lines of communication and the movement of persons and goods between the United Kingdom, the United States and the French sectors in Berlin and the Western Zones shall have been fully restored.

ANNEX IIB

NOTE FROM THE GOVERNMENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS, DATED 6TH JULY, 1948

The French Government wishes to call the attention of the Soviet Government to the extremely serious international situation which has been brought about in Berlin as a result of the restrictive measures on transport imposed recently by the Soviet authorities which amount to the establishment of a blockade against the sector of the City occupied by France, as well as sectors occupied by the United States and Great Britain. The French Government regards these measures as a violation of the agreements between the four Occupying Powers concerning the control and occupation of Berlin.

The rights of France as an occupying power in Berlin derive from the total defeat and unconditional surrender of Germany. The international agreements undertaken in connection therewith by the Governments of France, the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union defined the zones in Germany and the sectors in Berlin which are occupied by these Powers. They established the quadripartite control of Berlin on a basis of friendly co-operation which the French Government has time and time again expressed the desire to pursue. Those agreements imply the right of free access to Berlin and this right has been confirmed by long usage.

It clearly results from the above that Berlin is not part of the Soviet zone but is an international zone of occupation. Commitments entered into in good faith by the Zone Commanders and subsequently confirmed by the Allied Control Authority as well as practices sanctioned by usage, guarantee to France together with the other Powers, free access to Berlin for the purpose of permitting her to assume her responsibilities as an Occupying Power.

The operation of this system during the last three years should be sufficient to prove that it is both the indispensable prerequisite for the administration of Berlin and a practicable solution which does no damage to the interests of any of the Occupying Powers. Nothing can justify its disruption by the Soviet Authorities.

In this connection the French Government wishes to underline that it is the Soviet authorities in Germany who have interrupted communications between Berlin and the Western zones. It is they who put an end to the activities of the Berlin Kommandatura. It is they who took the initiative in introducing in the International zone constituted by Berlin the currency circulating in their own zone, thus obliging the French authorities in Berlin to introduce in turn in their sector of the City the currency circulating in the French zone of occupation. The French Government recalls that its representatives have made every effort to avoid such a situation. They have gone as far as possible in seeking an understanding by suggesting by agreement with the American and British representatives that the currency circulating in the Soviet zone should be the sole legal tender in Berlin, provided that the introduction of this currency should be on a quadripartite basis. By refusing this suggestion the Soviet authorities have taken upon themselves responsibility for the disruption of the monetary unity of Berlin.

In order that there should be no misunderstanding whatsoever the French Government categorically asserts that its occupation of its sector of Berlin and freedom of movement between the French zone and the French sector of Berlin are matters of established right deriving from the defeat and surrender of Germany and confirmed by formal agreements among the principal allies.

It further declares that it has no intention of abandoning these rights and that it will not yield to threats or pressure. It hopes that the Soviet Government entertains no doubts whatsoever on this point.

It was the Soviet Government who on 7th July, 1945, requested the French Government as well as the American and British Governments to accept responsibility for the feeding and maintenance of the population of the Western sectors of Berlin, that is to say of 2,400,000 people. The restrictions recently imposed by the Soviet authorities in Berlin have operated to prevent the French Government and the American and British Governments from fulfilling in an adequate manner the obligations undertaken at the specific request of the Soviet Government.

The responsibility which the French Government bears for the maintenance and safety of the German population in its sector of Berlin is outstandingly humanitarian in character. This population includes hundreds and thousands of men, women and children whose existence depends on the continued use of transport facilities adequate to ensure the provision of food, medical supplies and other indispensable items. The present restrictions endanger the most elementary human rights which our two Governments are solemnly pledged to protect. It is intolerable that any one of the Occupying Powers should attempt to impose a blockade upon the people of Berlin.

The French Government is, therefore, obliged to insist that in accordance with existing agreement, arrangements should be made to restore the movement of persons and goods between the Western zones and Berlin. There can be no question of delay in the restoration of these services which are essential to cover the imperative needs of the civilian population in Berlin.

Conscious of the gravity of the problem and the necessity of a rapid solution the French Government desires to resolve controversies in the spirit of fair consideration for the view point of all concerned. It must declare, however, that duress should not be invoked as a method of settling any disagreements which may exist between the Soviet Government and the French Government in respect of any aspect of the Berlin situation. Such disagreements, if any, should be settled by negotiation or by any other of the peaceful methods provided for in Article 33 of the Charter in keeping with the mutual pledges of our Governments as members of the United Nations.

For these reasons the French Government is ready as a first step to agree that a settlement of any question in dispute arising out of the administration of Berlin should be discussed in Berlin among the Allied authorities on a quadripartite basis. It is, however, a prerequisite that lines of communication and the movement of persons and goods between the French, United Kingdom and United States sectors of Berlin and the Western zones should be fully restored.

ANNEX IIIA

IDENTIC NOTE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE UNITED STATES, DATED 14TH JULY, 1948

(Unofficial Translation)

"1. The Soviet Government has familiarised itself with the note of the Government of the United States of America* of 6th July, 1948, in which the situation which has been created at the present time in Berlin is described as a result of measures taken by the Soviet side. The Soviet Government cannot agree with this statement of the Government of the United States and considers that the situation which has been created in Berlin has arisen as a result of violation by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France, of agreed decisions taken by the four Powers in regard to Germany and Berlin which (violation) has found its expression in the carrying out of a separate currency reform, in the introduction of a special currency for the western sectors of Berlin and in the policy of the dismemberment of Germany. The Soviet Government has more than once warned the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France of the responsibility which they would take upon themselves in following along the path of the violation of agreed decisions previously adopted by the four Powers in regard to Germany. The decisions adopted at the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences and also the agreement of the four Powers concerning the control mechanism in Germany have as their aim the demilitarisation and democratisation of Germany, the removal of the base itself of German militarism and the prevention of the revival of Germany as an aggressive Power and thereby the transformation of Germany into a peace-loving and democratic State. These agreements envisage the obligation of Germany to pay reparations and thereby to make at least partial compensation for the damage to those countries which suffered from German aggression. In accordance with these agreements the Governments of the four Powers took upon themselves the responsibility for the administration of Germany and bound themselves jointly to draw up a statute for Germany or for any areas including Berlin which were part of German territory and to conclude with Germany a peace treaty which should be signed by a Government of a democratic Germany adequate for that purpose.

* The note to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom was phrased in identic terms.

"These most important agreements of the four Powers in regard to Germany have been violated by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France. Measures for the demilitarisation of Germany have not been completed and such a very important centre of German war industry as the Rhur district has been taken out from under the control of the four Powers. The execution of decisions concerning reparations from the western zones of occupation of Germany has been interrupted by the Governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom and France. By the separate actions of the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France the Four-Power control mechanism in Germany has been destroyed and the Control Council as a result thereof has ceased its activity.

"Following the London meeting of the three Powers with the participation of Benelux, measures have been undertaken by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France directed towards the division and dismemberment of Germany including preparations which are now in progress for the designation of a separate Government for the western zones of Germany and the separate currency reform for the western zones of occupation carried out on 18th June of this year.

"In as much as the situation created in Berlin as well as in all Germany is the direct result of the systematic violation by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France of the decisions of the Potsdam Conference and also of the agreement of the four Powers concerning the control mechanism in Germany, the Soviet Government must reject as completely unfounded the statement of the Government of the United States to the effect that the measures for the restriction of transport communications between Berlin and the western zones of occupation of Germany introduced by the Soviet command for the defence of the economy of the Soviet zone against its disorganisation are allegedly in violation of the existing agreements concerning the administration of Berlin.

"2. The Government of the United States declares that it is occupying its sector in Berlin by right arising out of the defeat and capitulation of Germany, referring in this connexion to agreements between the four Powers in regard to Germany and Berlin. This merely confirms the fact that the exercise of the above mentioned right in regard to Berlin is linked to the obligatory execution by the Powers occupying Germany of the Four-Power agreements concluded among themselves in regard to Germany as a whole. In conformity with these agreements Berlin was envisaged as the seat of the supreme authority of the four Powers occupying Germany, in which connection the agreement concerning the administration of 'Greater Berlin' under the direction of the Control Council was reached.

"Thus the agreement concerning the Four-Power administration of Berlin is an inseparable component part of the agreement for the Four-Power administration of Germany as a whole. After the United States of America, Great Britain and France by their separate actions in the western zones of Germany destroyed the system of Four-Power administration of Germany and had begun to set up a capital for a Government for Western Germany in Frankfurt-am-Main, they thereby undermined as well the legal basis which assured their right to participation in the administration of Berlin.

"The Government of the United States in its note points out that its right to be in Berlin is based also on the fact that the United States withdrew its forces from certain regions of the Soviet zone of occupation into which they had penetrated during the period of hostilities in Germany, and that if it (the United States Government) had foreseen the situation, which has been created in Berlin, it would not have withdrawn its forces from those regions. However, the Government of the United States well knows that in removing its troops to the boundaries of the American zone established by agreement of the four Powers concerning zones of occupation in Germany it was only carrying out an obligation which it had taken upon itself, the execution of which could alone accord the right of the entry of the troops of the United States into Berlin. An examination of the letter referred to in the note of the Government of the United States of America of President Truman to Premier Stalin of 14th June, 1945, and the letter in reply of Premier Stalin of 16th June, 1945, confirms the fact that, thanks to the agreement then reached, the forces of the United States of America, Great Britain and France were given the opportunity to enter not only the capital of Germany, Berlin, but also the capital of Austria, Vienna, which as is known, were taken only by the forces of the Soviet Army. In addition, it is known that the agreements referred to concerning the question of Berlin and also of Vienna were only a part of the agreements concerning Germany and Austria upon the fulfilment of which the Soviet Government continues to insist.

"3. The Government of the United States declares that the temporary measures put into effect by the Soviet Command for the restriction of transport communications between Berlin and the western zones have created difficulties in supplying the Berlin population of the western sectors. It is impossible, however, to deny the fact that these difficulties were occasioned by the actions of the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain, and France, and primarily by their separate actions in the introduction of new currency in the western zones of Germany and special currency in the western sectors of Berlin.

"Berlin lies in the centre of the Soviet zone and is a part of that zone. The interests of the Berlin population do not permit a situation in which in Berlin or only in the western sectors of Berlin there shall be introduced special currency which has no validity in the Soviet zone. Moreover, the carrying out of a separate monetary reform in the western zones of Germany has placed Berlin and the whole Soviet zone of occupation as well in a situation in which the entire mass of currency notes which were cancelled in the western zone threatened to pour into Berlin and the Soviet zone of occupation of Germany.

"The Soviet Command has been forced therefore to adopt certain urgent measures for the protection of the interests of the German population and also of the economy of the Soviet zone of occupation and the area of 'Greater Berlin.' The danger of the disruption of the normal economic activity of the Soviet zone and of Berlin has not been eliminated even at the present time, inasmuch as the United States, Great Britain and France continue to maintain in Berlin their special currency.

"Furthermore, the Soviet Command has consistently displayed and is displaying concern for the well-being of the Berlin population and for assuring to them normal supply in all essentials and is striving for the speediest elimination of the difficulties which have arisen recently in the matter. In this connexion, if the situation requires, the Soviet Government would not object to assuring by its own means adequate supply for all 'Greater Berlin.'

"With reference to the statement of the Government of the United States that it will not be compelled by threats, pressure or other actions to renounce its right to participation in the occupation of Berlin, the Soviet Government does not intend to enter into discussion of this statement since it has no need for a policy of pressure, since by violation of the agreed decisions concerning the administration of Berlin the above-mentioned Governments themselves are reducing to naught their right to participation in the occupation of Berlin.

"4. The Government of the United States in its note of 6th July, expresses the readiness to begin negotiations between the four Allied occupying authorities for consideration of the situation created in Berlin but passes by in silence the question of Germany as a whole.

"The Soviet Government, while not objecting to negotiations, considers, however, it necessary to state that it cannot link the inauguration of these negotiations with the fulfilling of any preliminary conditions whatsoever and that, in the second place, Four-Power conversations could be effective only in the event that they were not limited to the question of the administration of Berlin, since that question cannot be severed from the general question of Four-Power control in regard to Germany."

NOTE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, DATED 14TH JULY, 1948.

The Soviet Government has familiarised itself with the note of the French Government of 6th July, 1948, in which the situation which has been created at the present time in Berlin is described as a result of measures taken by the Soviet side. The French Government declares that the temporary measures put into effect by the Soviet Command for the restriction of transport communications between Berlin and the western zones have created difficulties in supplying the Berlin population of the western sectors. It is impossible, however, to deny the fact that these difficulties were occasioned by the actions of the Governments of France, the United States of America and Great Britain, and primarily by their separate actions in the introduction of new currency in the western zones of Germany and special currency in the western sectors of Berlin.

"Berlin lies in the centre of the Soviet zone and is a part of that zone. The interests of the Berlin population do not permit a situation in which in Berlin or only in the western sectors of Berlin there shall be introduced special currency which has no validity in the Soviet zone. Moreover, the carrying out of a separate monetary reform in the western zones of Germany has placed Berlin and the whole Soviet zone of occupation as well in a situation in which the entire mass of currency notes which were cancelled in the western zone threatened to pour into Berlin and the Soviet zone of occupation of Germany.

"The Soviet Command has been forced therefore to adopt certain urgent measures for the protection of the interests of the German population and also of the economy of the Soviet zone of occupation and the area of 'Greater Berlin.' The danger of the disruption of the normal economic activity of the Soviet zone and of Berlin has not been eliminated even at the present time, in as much as France, the United States and Great Britain continue to maintain in Berlin their special currency.

"Furthermore, the Soviet Command has consistently displayed and is displaying concern for the well-being of the Berlin population and for assuring to them normal supply in all essentials and is striving for the speediest elimination of the difficulties which have arisen recently in the matter. In this connexion, if the situation requires, the Soviet Government would not object to assuring by its own means adequate supply for all 'Greater Berlin.'

"With reference to the statement of the French Government that it will not be compelled by threats, pressure or other actions to renounce its rights to participation in the occupation of Berlin, the Soviet Government does not intend to enter into discussion of this statement since it has no need for a policy of pressure, since by violation of the agreed decisions concerning the administration of Berlin the above-mentioned Governments themselves are reducing to naught their right to participation in the occupation of Berlin.

"4. The French Government in its note of 6th July expresses the readiness to begin negotiations between the four Allied occupying authorities for consideration of the situation created in Berlin but passes by in silence the question of Germany as a whole.

"The Soviet Government, while not objecting to negotiations, considers, however, it necessary to state that it cannot link the inauguration of these negotiations with the fulfilling of any preliminary conditions whatsoever and that, in the second place, Four-Power conversations could be effective only in the event that they were not limited to the question of the administration of Berlin, since that question cannot be severed from the general question of Four-Power control in regard to Germany.

ANNEX IV

AIDE MEMOIRE BY THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE DELIVERED TO M. ZORIN ON 30TH JULY, 1948.

"The United States Government* has given the most serious consideration to the note delivered by the Soviet Ambassador in Washington and have exchanged views with the British and French Governments on the similar notes received by these Governments. The United States Government does not accept the contention in the Soviet note that the right of the Western Occupying Powers to participate in the occupation of Berlin no longer exists, and while they do not wish to enter into a detailed discussion of the allegations contained in M. Panyushkin's note of 14th July, they would like to make it plain at the outset that they cannot accept the Soviet version of the facts nor the interpretation placed on them.

"Whatever may be the reasons which have led the Soviet authorities to decide the restriction of communications between Berlin and Western zones of occupation of Germany, whether these reasons be technical as was first stated, or political, as M. Panyushkin's note would seem to indicate, the measures taken by the Soviet authorities in Berlin have created an abnormal and dangerous situation, the gravity of which does not need to be emphasised.

* The notes of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and of the Government of the French Republic were phrased in identic terms.

"The Soviet reply of 14th July offers no constructive suggestion for the bringing to an end of the abnormal situation in Berlin. Nevertheless the United States Government as any peace-loving government, holds the view that this situation is capable of settlement. They trust that the Soviet Government share this view. The question of negotiation has never been, and is not the issue. The willingness to negotiate in the absence of duress has always been there. In the opinion of the United States Government, the best way to a solution of the present difficulties lies in direct approach. They think that a frank discussion between Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov on one side and the representatives of each of the three Western Occupying Powers on the other side should give the opportunity of finding a solution. I accordingly have been instructed by my Government to request that you should arrange an interview between Generalissimo Stalin and M. Molotov on the one hand and the French Ambassador, the United Kingdom Chargé d'Affaires and myself on the other hand in order to discuss the present situation in Berlin and its wider implications."

ANNEX V

ORAL STATEMENT BY THE UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR ON BEHALF OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE UNITED STATES AND THE FRENCH REPUBLIC TO PREMIER STALIN MADE ON 3RD AUGUST, 1948

"It is not our purpose at this time to rebut in detail the charges contained in the Soviet note. It is highly important, however, to make completely clear certain fundamental points in the position of the United States, the United Kingdom and France and to clarify the position of the Soviet Union which in certain respects is obscure. The three Governments must re-emphasise their right to be in Berlin to be unquestionable and absolute. They do not intend to be coerced by any means whatsoever into abandoning this right.

"Action taken by the Soviets in interfering with rights in connection with occupation, derived through the defeat and surrender of Germany and through international agreement and usage, by interrupting communications between Berlin and the Western Zones, thus interfering with duties of Allied Military Forces of Occupation, is viewed with extreme seriousness by the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France. It is incumbent on them to take such measures as are necessary to assure the supply of their forces and discharge of their occupational duties. The United States, the United Kingdom and France do not wish the situation to deteriorate further and assume that the Soviet Government shares this desire. The three Governments have in mind restrictive measures which have been placed by Soviet authorities on communication between the Western Zones of Germany and Western sectors of Berlin. It was the feeling of our Governments that if these measures arose from technical difficulties, such difficulties could easily be remedied. The three Governments renew their offer of assistance to this end. If in any way related to the currency problem, such measures are obviously uncalled-for, since this problem could have been, and can now be, adjusted by representatives of the four Powers in Berlin. If, on the other hand, these measures are designed to bring about negotiations among the four Occupying Powers they are equally unnecessary, since the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France have never at any time declined to meet representatives of the Soviet Union to discuss questions relating to Germany. However, if the purpose of these measures is to attempt to compel the three Governments to abandon their rights as Occupying Powers in Berlin, the Soviet Government will understand from what has been stated previously that such an attempt could not be allowed to succeed.

"In spite of recent occurrences, the three Powers are unwilling to believe that this last reason is the real one. Rather they assume that the Soviet Government shares their view that it is in the interest of all four Occupying Powers, of the German people and of the world in general to prevent any further deterioration of the position and to find a way by mutual agreement to bring to an end the extremely dangerous situation that has developed in Berlin.

"The Soviet Government will, however, appreciate that the three Governments are unable to negotiate in the situation which the Soviet Government has taken the initiative in creating. Free negotiations can only take place in an atmosphere relieved of pressure. This is the issue. Present restrictions upon communications between Berlin and the Western Zones offend against this principle. When this issue is resolved, such difficulties as stand in the way of resumption of conversations on the lines set out should be removed."

ANNEX VI

THE DIRECTIVE TO THE FOUR MILITARY GOVERNORS IN BERLIN AGREED TO BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS, THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND FRENCH REPUBLIC ON 30TH AUGUST, 1948

"Directive

"The Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States, and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics have decided that subject to agreement being reached among the four military governors in Berlin for their practical implementation, the following steps shall be taken simultaneously:

"(A) Restrictions on communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and the Western zones and to and from Soviet zone of Germany which have recently been imposed shall be lifted;

"(B) The German mark of the Soviet zone shall be introduced as the sole currency for Berlin, and the Western mark B shall be withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"In connection with the above you are instructed to consult together with your colleagues so as to make, in the shortest time possible, the detailed arrangements necessary for the implementation of these decisions, and to inform your government not later than 7th September of the results of your discussions, including the exact date on which the measures under (A) and (B) above can be brought into effect. The four military governors will work out arrangements involved in the introduction of the German mark of the Soviet zone in Berlin.

"The arrangements relating to the currency change-over and to the continued provision and use in Berlin of the German mark of the Soviet zone shall ensure:

"(a) No discrimination or action against holders of Western marks B in connexion with the exchange of those Western marks issued in Berlin. These shall be accepted for exchange for German marks of the Soviet zone at the rate of one for one;

"(b) Equal treatment as to currency and provision of fully-accessible banking and credit facilities throughout all sectors of Berlin. The four military governors are charged with providing adequate safeguards to prevent the use in Berlin of the German mark of the Soviet zone from leading to disorganising currency circulation or disrupting the stability of currency in the Soviet zone;

"(c) A satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and third countries and the Western zones of Germany. Modification of this agreed basis to be made only by agreement among the four military governors;

"(d) The provision of sufficient currency for budgetary purposes and for occupation costs, reduced to the greatest extent possible, and also the balancing of the Berlin budget.

"The regulation of currency circulation in Berlin is to be undertaken by the German bank of emission of the Soviet zone through the medium of the credit establishments operating at present in Berlin.

"A financial commission of representatives of the four military governors shall be set up to control the practical implementation of the financial arrangements indicated above, involved in the introduction and continued circulation of a single currency in Berlin."

ANNEX VII

JOINT REPORT OF THE CONVERSATIONS OF THE FOUR MILITARY GOVERNORS IN BERLIN BY THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND FRENCH MILITARY GOVERNORS IN GERMANY, DATED 7TH SEPTEMBER, 1948.

The French, United States and United Kingdom Commanders-in-Chief in Germany have agreed to report jointly to their Governments as follows on the discussions which have taken place in Berlin in accordance with the directive upon which agreement has been reached between their Governments and the Soviet Government in Moscow.

1. The discussions have not produced agreement on the subjects referred to examination by the Commanders-in-Chief in the directive. The position on the main issue is as set out below.

2. Removal of restrictions on communications and transport. No progress was made on this matter until today, 7th September, when Marshal Sokolovsky produced a fresh proposal in which he made a considerable advance on the position which he had hitherto taken up. As regards road and rail traffic, his proposals, although they do not completely restore the position as it existed in March, are probably acceptable. We have agreed to study them carefully. With regard to inland water traffic his proposals are less clear and less satisfactory. At the conclusion of his proposals he presented a clause dealing with air traffic in which he stipulated that the regulations adopted by the Control Council in November, 1945, shall be strictly observed. By his interpretation of these regulations civil air traffic to Berlin would be prohibited. On this point we have informed him that we are unable to discuss the imposition of restrictions on air traffic since none existed in March.

3. On financial matters agreement has been reached on a number of points of detail regarding the conversion of 'B' marks in currency and in accounts into the German mark of the Soviet zone. The financial experts have not yet completed discussion of their agenda. In particular there has as yet been no discussion on the question of

(A) How payments are to be made for food and coal brought into Berlin by the Western Powers.

(B) Balancing the Berlin city budget.

(C) Occupation costs.

We would point out that these are important questions with far-reaching consequences. However, in the financial field the disagreement regarding the functions of the Finance Commission is of overriding importance. In essence we have contended according to our interpretation of the directive that the Finance Commission should control the activities of the German bank of emission in regard to the conversion of currency and its subsequent circulation in Berlin. Marshal Sokolovsky has refused to admit this and has maintained that the functions of the Finance Commission are limited to the four points (A) to (D) with regard to which the Military Governors were instructed to make financial arrangements.

4. Trade: Deadlock has been reached in the discussion regarding the establishment of a satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and the western zones and foreign countries. This is due to Soviet insistence that the Soviet Military Authorities shall be exclusively responsible for approving the relevant trade agreements and for issuing import/export licences. We have contended that the trade of Berlin should be controlled or supervised by a quadripartite body. Agreement has been reached on interzonal trade only.

5. We feel that we can sum up the over-all position by reporting that after some days of little progress Marshal Sokolovsky has given ground on most of the subsidiary issues as well as making a reasonable proposal in regard to road and rail traffic. There remain three main points of disagreement, namely:

(A) The functions of the Finance Commission and in particular its relation to the German bank of emission.

(B) The Soviet insistence on Soviet control of the trade of Berlin.

(C) The Soviet proposal to introduce restrictions on air transport.

We feel that the last minute concessions which the Soviet have made today were designed to improve their bargaining position on these main issues in view of the probability that they would be raised on the government level.

6. We have observed no sign in Marshal Sokolovsky of an intention to yield on these three points and we see no chance of real progress here until action has been taken on a governmental level to resolve them. Given a satisfactory solution to each of these points we believe that discussions can usefully be resumed in Berlin since a number of detailed matters will still require settlement; however we must point out that some of the matters which have not yet been discussed, particularly the question of payment for food and coal and that of the occupation costs may yet constitute very serious difficulties.

7. We informed Marshal Sokolovsky today that in accordance with the directive we propose to report to our Governments. We emphasised that this did not imply in any way that the conversations in Berlin had broken down. We suggested that our Governments would probably wish to consider our reports and might send us further instructions. We promised to tell him when we were able to resume discussions with him. We have agreed that comment to the Press here will be to explain discontinuance of meetings as being to permit detailed study of the reports before us.

ANNEX VIII

AIDE-MÉMOIRE DELIVERED BY THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND FRANCE TO M. MOLOTOV ON 14TH SEPTEMBER, 1948

"1. The Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States having received and studied reports from their Military Governors of the discussions in Berlin find it necessary to draw the attention of the Soviet Government to the fact that the position adopted by the Soviet Military Governor during the meetings in Berlin on a number of points deviates from the principles agreed at Moscow between the four Governments and contained in the agreed directive to the four Military Governors. As the Soviet Government is aware, the terms of this directive were finally agreed after long and careful consideration, and after clarifications as to interpretation had been received from the Soviet Government.

"2. The specific issues on which in the opinion of the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, the Soviet Military Governor has departed from the understandings reached at Moscow relate to: (1) restrictions on communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and the Western zones; (2) the authority and functions of the financial commission, and in particular its relation to the German Bank of Emission; and (3) the control of the trade of Berlin.

"3. As to the first, the Soviet Military Governor has presented a proposal which falls outside the agreed principle that the restrictions which have recently been imposed on communications, transport and commerce be lifted. He has proposed that restrictions upon air traffic, not heretofore existing, should now be imposed, and in particular that air traffic to Berlin should be strictly limited to that necessary to meet the needs of the military forces of occupation.

"4. As the Soviet Government is aware, the directive makes no mention of air transport and this question was not discussed at Moscow. The directive reads: 'Restrictions on communications, transport, and commerce between Berlin and the Western Zones and to and from the Soviet zone of Germany which have recently been imposed shall be lifted.' There have been and are no such restrictions on air traffic. The purpose of the directive is to lift restrictions and not to impose new ones. The proposal of the Soviet Commander-in-Chief, therefore, falls outside the scope of the present discussions and is unacceptable.

"5. Secondly, on the question of the authority and functions of the financial commission there should be not the slightest grounds for any misunderstanding. At the meeting on 23rd August attended by Premier Stalin and M. Molotov and the representatives of the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, the intention of the directive in regard to the powers of the financial commission including its power to control the operations in Berlin of the German Bank of Emission was clearly and specifically confirmed by Premier Stalin. The Soviet Military Governor has refused to accept both the meaning of the directive and the clear understanding of the Four Powers reached at Moscow.

"6. Thirdly, there is the question of the control of the trade of Berlin. The position of the Soviet Military Governor during the discussions in Berlin in regard to matters relating to the control of trade between Berlin and the Western zones of Germany amounts to a claim for exclusive Soviet authority over such matters. Such a claim is a contradiction of the spirit and meaning of the directive to the four Military Governors to which the four Governments gave their approval and is therefore unacceptable.

"7. In bringing these major points of difference to the notice of the Soviet Government, the Governments of United States, the United Kingdom and France do not wish to imply that these are the only points of difference which have arisen during the conversations in Berlin.

"8. The Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States have understood clearly the principles agreed to in Moscow and the assurances given by Premier Stalin. Their Military Governors in Berlin have acted in accordance with those principles and assurances. The position taken by the Soviet Military Governor, on the contrary, has constituted a departure from what was agreed in Moscow and strikes at the very foundation upon which these discussions were undertaken. The divergencies which have accordingly arisen on these questions are so serious that the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States feel compelled to inquire whether the Soviet Government is prepared to affirm the understandings outlined herein and to issue the necessary instructions to the Soviet Military Governor, confirming the agreed intention of the directive in regard to:

"(a) the lifting of all restrictions on communication, transport and commerce imposed after 30th March, 1948, without imposition of any new air or other restrictions; and

"(b) the control by the Financial Commission of the financial arrangements contemplated by the agreed directive, including control of the operations of the Bank of Emission with respect to Berlin as specifically confirmed by Premier Stalin; and

"(c) a satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and third countries and the Western zones of Germany in accordance with an agreement to be reached between the four Military Governors which does not involve the unilateral control of such trade by the Soviet Trade Administration and which recognises the right of each of the occupying Powers to import in fulfilment of their respective responsibilities, and to control the proceeds from, food and fuel imported for the use of the Berlin population and industry.

"9. The Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States believe that only if the steps proposed in this aide-mémoire are taken will it be possible for the Military Governors to continue their discussions."

ANNEX IX

AIDE-MEMOIRE OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT DELIVERED TO THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND FRANCE ON 18TH SEPTEMBER, 1948

(Unofficial Translation)

"1. The Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics has acquainted itself with the aide-mémoire dated 14th September last of the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, which gives a unilateral account of the course of discussions between the four Military Governors in Berlin and which presents incorrectly the position adopted by the Soviet Military Government during those discussions.

"The Soviet Government believes that consideration of the differences referred to in the said aide-mémoire, which arose during the Berlin discussions in regard to the interpretation of the directive to the Military Governors would have been facilitated and expedited had the four Military Governors submitted to their Governments a joint report with an account of the course of discussions. In that event the discussions in Moscow would not have been based on any unilateral communications but on an accurate statement of the positions adopted by all four Military Governors both on points already agreed between them and on points left outstanding. Since, however, the representatives of the three Governments have refused to follow that method of discussion, the Soviet Government finds it necessary to reply to the questions raised in the aide-mémoire.

"The aide-mémoire of 14th September refers to the following three questions: (1) Restrictions on communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and the Western zones; (2) the authority and functions of the financial commission, and in particular its relation to the German Bank of Emission; (3) the control of the trade of Berlin. At the same time it is asserted that the Soviet Military Governor allegedly deviated from the understanding reached on these questions in Moscow.

"The Soviet Government believes this assertion to be without foundation because during the Berlin discussions the Soviet Military Governor strictly followed the agreed directive and the clarification which had been given by the Soviet Government when it was being drawn up in Moscow. Study by the Soviet Government of all materials relating to the Berlin discussions has shown that the reason for the differences which arose during the Berlin discussions lies in the desire of the United States, the United Kingdom and the French Military Governors to interpret the directive agreed upon in Moscow in a unilateral manner and to give it an interpretation which had not been implied when it was being drawn up and which constitutes a violation of the directive, and with this the Soviet Government is unable to agree.

"2. The directive to the four Military Governors states the following in regard to the first question referred to in the aide-mémoire of 14th September; 'restrictions on communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and the Western zones and on the traffic of goods to and from the Soviet zone of Germany which have recently been imposed shall be lifted.'

"The concrete proposals submitted by the Soviet Military Governor on this point are in full conformity with the directive and have for their purpose the lifting of all restrictions on communications, transport and commerce, which have been imposed after 30th March, 1948, as was stipulated when the directive was drawn up. During consideration of this question the Soviet Military Governor pointed to the necessity of the other three Military Governors complying strictly with the regulations imposed by the Control Council's decision of 30th November, 1945, on air traffic for the needs of the occupation forces and this had never been disputed by any of the Military Governors since the adoption of these regulations three years ago. There is no foundation whatsoever for regarding this justified demand of the Soviet Military Governor as an imposition of new restrictions on air traffic, because these regulations had been imposed as far back as 1945 and not after 30th March, 1948. Nevertheless, the United States Military Governor attempted to deny the necessity of observing the regulations which had been imposed by the Control Council on air traffic of the occupation forces and which remain in force to this very day.

"In view of the above, the Soviet Government believes that the position of the Soviet Military Governor on this question is absolutely correct, while the position of the United States Military Governor, far from being based on the agreed directive, is in contradiction with it. An interpretation to the contrary might lead to an arbitrary denial of any decision previously agreed upon by the Control Council, and to this the Soviet Government cannot give its assent.

"3. The directive to the Military Governors also contains a clear statement regarding the authority and functions of the Financial Commission and regarding the German Bank of Emission:

> 'The arrangements relating to the currency change-over and to the continued provision and use in Berlin of the German mark of the Soviet zone shall ensure:
> '(A) No discrimination or action against holders of Western marks in connexion with the exchange of those Western marks "B" issued in Berlin. These shall be accepted for exchange for German marks of the Soviet zone at the rate of one for one.
> '(B) Equal treatment as to currency and provision of fully accessible banking and credit facilities throughout all sectors of Berlin. The four Military Governors are charged with providing adequate safeguards to prevent the use in Berlin of the German marks of the Soviet zone from leading to disorganising currency circulation or disrupting the stability of currency in the Soviet zone of occupation.
> '(C) A satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and third countries and the Western zones of Germany. Modifications of this agreed basis to be made only by agreement among the four Military Governors;
> '(D) The provision of sufficient currency for budgetary purposes and for occupation costs, reduced to the greatest extent possible, and also the balancing of the Berlin budget.
> 'The regulation of currency circulation in Berlin is to be undertaken by the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet zone through the medium of the credit establishments operating at present in Berlin.
> 'A financial commission of representatives of the four Military Governors shall be set up to control the practical implementation of the financial arrangements indicated above, involved in the introduction and the circulation of a single currency in Berlin.'

"This directive was drawn up in full conformity with the preliminary clarifications on this matter made by Premier J. V. Stalin on 23rd August, and referred to in the above-mentioned aide-mémoire.

"It will be seen from the above text that the authority and functions of the Financial Commission and of the German Bank of Emission are precisely laid down in the directive, and it was by this that the Soviet Military Governor was guided. According to that directive and to the understanding reached in Moscow by the four Powers, the Financial Commission should not exercise control over all operations of the Bank of Emission in regard to Berlin, but only over those operations of the Bank of Emission in Berlin which are specifically provided for in paragraphs (A), (B), (C), and (D) of the directive. The proposal to establish control of the Financial Commission over the whole activity of the German Bank of Emission in Berlin was not accepted during the discussion of this question in Moscow because this would have led to such interference on the part of the Financial Commission in matters of the regulation of currency circulation as is incompatible with the Soviet administration's responsibility for the regulation of currency circulation in the Soviet zone of occupation.

"Accordingly, the Soviet Government cannot agree to the incorrect interpretation of the agreed directive given in the aide-mémoire of the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and believes it necessary that the directive should be strictly followed.

"4. As to trade, the previously agreed directive is confined to an instruction to the Military Governors to work out a satisfactory basis for trade between Berlin and third countries and the Western zone of Germany. It will be recalled that on 23rd August, during the discussions in Moscow, the Soviet Government submitted a definite proposal on this subject, but the question was not considered in detail and was referred to the Military Governors for discussion.

"The proposals on this subject made by the Soviet Military Governor give no reason to assert that they are a contradiction of the spirit and meaning of the agreed directive. On the contrary, the intention of those proposals is to have the directive fulfilled in accordance with the agreements reached in Moscow.

"However, for the purpose of expediting the drawing up of practical arrangements in Berlin the Soviet Government proposes that the Military Governors be given more detailed instructions on this matter than those contained in the agreed directive. The Soviet Government agrees to have trade between Berlin and third countries and the Western zones of Germany placed under the control of the quadripartite Financial Commission, which control should provide at the same time for the maintenance of the existing procedure regarding the traffic of goods in and out of Berlin under licence of the Soviet Military Administration. The Soviet Government believes that such an instruction would be of help in the drawing up of a concrete agreement on matters of trade with Berlin.

"5. The Soviet Government believes that discussions between the Military Governors in Berlin can yield positive results only in the event that all the Military Governors follow strictly the directives and instructions agreed between the Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics."

ANNEX X

IDENTIC NOTES FROM THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, UNITED STATES AND THE FRENCH REPUBLIC ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS, DATED 22ND SEPTEMBER, 1948.

"1. The Government of the United States,* together with the Governments of France and the United Kingdom, has now reviewed the discussions which have taken place on the Berlin situation and which have culminated in the Soviet reply of the 18th September to the aide-mémoire of the three Governments of the 14th September, 1948.

"2. The three Governments find that the Soviet unwillingness to accept previous agreements, to which reference is made in their aide-mémoire of the 14th September is still preventing a settlement. The reply of the Soviet Government in its aide-mémoire of the 18th September is unsatisfactory.

"3. The final position of the three Governments on the specific points at issue is as follows:

(a) They cannot accept the imposition of any restrictions on air traffic between Berlin and the Western zones.

(b) They insist that the Finance Commission must control the activities of the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet zone in so far as they relate to the financial arrangements for the introduction and continued use of the Soviet zone mark as the sole currency in the City of Berlin.

(c) They insist that trade between Berlin and the Western zone and other countries must be under quadripartite control including the issuance of licences.

* The notes of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, and of the Government of the French Republic were phrased in identic terms.

"4. After more than six weeks of discussion, the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France feel that the Soviet Government is now fully acquainted with the position of the three Governments, and that further discussions on the present basis would be useless.

"5. It is clear that the difficulties that have arisen in the attempts to arrive at practical arrangements which would restore normal conditions in Berlin derive not from technical matters but from a fundamental difference of views between the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France and the Soviet Government as to the rights and obligations of the occupying Powers in Berlin, their right to have access by air, rail, water and road to Berlin and to participate in the administration of the affairs of the City of Berlin. The blockade imposed by the Soviet authorities together with other of their acts in Berlin are in violation of the rights of the three Western Occupying Powers.

"6. Accordingly, the Government of the United States in agreement with the Governments of France and the United Kingdom asks the Soviet Government whether in order to create conditions which would permit a continuance of discussions, it is now prepared to remove the blockade measures, thus restoring the right of the three Western Occupying Powers to free communications by rail, water, and road, and to specify the date on which this will be done.

"7. The Foreign Ministers of the three Governments will be meeting shortly in Paris, and they will be glad to have the reply of the Soviet Government as soon as possible."

ANNEX XI

IDENTIC NOTE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOCIALIST SOVIET REPUBLICS, ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND FRANCE, DATED 25TH SEPTEMBER, 1948.

(Unofficial Translation)

"The Ambassador of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics presents his compliments to the Acting Secretary of State of the United States* and has the honour, under instructions of the Soviet Government, to communicate the following.

"The Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics has acquainted itself with the note of the Government of the United States of America of 22nd September, 1948, concerning negotiations of the four Powers which have taken place in Moscow and Berlin on the question of the introduction of the German mark of the Soviet Zone as the sole currency in Berlin and concerning the removal of the restrictions on communications, transport and trade between Berlin and the Western Zones of Germany.

"In connection with this the Soviet Government considers it necessary to declare that the position taken by the Government of the United States of America not only does not facilitate but on the contrary complicates the reaching of agreement concerning the settlement of the situation which has arisen in Berlin as a result of carrying out of a separate currency reform and the introduction of a separate currency in the Western zones of Germany and in the Western sectors of Berlin, which constituted an extreme and most far-reaching measure in execution of the policy of partitioning Germany being carried out by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France.

"In its note the Government of the United States of America refers to three disputed questions which were mentioned by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France in the Aide-Mémoire of 15th September and by the Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in the Aide-Mémoire of 18th September, 1948.

"The Government of the United States of America states that the continuation of the negotiations on the above-mentioned questions on the present basis would be useless and considers that in order to create the conditions which would permit a continuation of the negotiations, there would have to be a removal of the temporary transport restrictions between Berlin and the Western zones which were introduced by the Soviet Command for the purpose of protecting the interests of the German population as well as the economy of the Soviet zone of occupation and of Berlin itself.

"Such a statement of the Government of the United States of America is in direct conflict with the agreements reached on 30th August in Moscow between the four Governments (the directive to the Military Governors), in which it was stated:

> "The Governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States, and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics have decided that subject to agreement being reached among the four Military Governors in Berlin for their practical implementation, the following steps shall be taken simultaneously:
> "(A) Restrictions on communications, transport and commerce between Berlin and the Western zones, and also on the movement of freight to and from the Soviet zone of Germany which have recently been imposed, shall be lifted.
> "(B) The German mark of the Soviet zone shall be introduced as the sole currency for Berlin, and the Western mark B shall be withdrawn from circulation in Berlin.

"From the text of the Agreement cited above it is evident that the four Governments agreed during the negotiations in Moscow on the simultaneous lifting of restrictions on trade and communications between Berlin and the western zones and introduction of the German mark of the Soviet zone as the sole currency in Berlin. The Soviet Government insists on this, since the situation created by the separated measures of the Western Powers means that the three Governments are not limiting themselves to their sovereign administration of the Western zones of Germany but wish at the same time to administer in currency and financial matters the Soviet zone of occupation as well, by means of introducing into Berlin, which is in the centre of the Soviet zone, their separate currency and thus disrupting the economy of the eastern zone of Germany and in the last analysis forcing the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics to withdraw therefrom.

"The Soviet Government considers it necessary that the agreement reached in Moscow be carried out and considers that further negotiations can be successful only in the event that the other three Governments likewise observe that agreement. If the Government of the United States of America repudiates the agreement reached on 30th August, only one conclusion can be drawn therefrom: namely that the Government of the United States of America does not wish any agreement between the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, the United States of America, Great Britain and France for the settlement of the situation in Berlin.

"In as much as the position of the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France on the three disputed points was set forth in the note of 22nd September, the Soviet Government considers it necessary to do likewise.

> "(A) As regards air communication between Berlin and the Western zones, the establishment by the Soviet Command of a control over the transport of commercial freight and passengers is just as necessary in this case as in the case of rail, water and highway transport. The air routes cannot remain uncontrolled, since an understanding has been reached between the four Governments to the effect that the agreement must envisage the establishment of a corresponding control over currency circulation in Berlin and the trade of Berlin with the Western zones.
> "(B) In the directive to the Military Governors adopted by the four Governments on 30th August the functions of control by the Four-Power Financial Commission of the execution of measures connected with the introduction and circulation of a single currency in Berlin were explicitly provided for.

"The Soviet Government considers it necessary that this agreement be carried out, including the maximum reduction of occupation costs in Berlin and the establishment of a balanced budget in Berlin (not considered up to this time in the Berlin conversations), which were provided for in that agreement.

> "(C) The Soviet Government has already expressed its agreement that trade between Berlin, third countries and the Western zones of Germany should be placed under the control of the Four-Power Financial Commission. The Soviet Government now declares its readiness to agree to the establishment of Four-Power control likewise over the issuance of import and export licences, provided agreement is reached on all other questions.

"Thus the reaching of agreement about the situation in Berlin now depends above all on whether the Governments of Great Britain, the United States of America and France are seeking such agreement."

ANNEX XII

IDENTIC NOTES FROM THE GOVERNMENTS OF FRANCE, THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE UNITED STATES TO THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT DATED 26TH/27TH SEPTEMBER, 1948*

1. The Governments of the United States, France and the United Kingdom, conscious of their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations to settle disputes by peaceful means, took the initiative on 30th July, 1948, in approaching the Soviet Government for informal discussions in Moscow in order to explore every possibility of adjusting a dangerous situation which had arisen by reason of measures taken by the Soviet Government directly challenging the rights of the other occupying powers in Berlin. These measures, persistently pursued, amounted to a blockade of land and water transport and communication between the western zones of Germany and Berlin which not only endangered the maintenance of the forces of occupation of the United States, France and the United Kingdom in that City but also jeopardised the discharge by those Governments of their duties as occupying Powers through the threat of starvation, disease and economic ruin for the population of Berlin.

2. The Governments of the United States, France and the United Kingdom have explicitly maintained the position that they could accept no arrangement which would deny or impair the rights in Berlin acquired by them through the defeat and unconditional surrender of Germany and by Four-Power agreements. They were, however, willing to work out in good faith any practical arrangements, consistent with their rights and duties, for restoring to normal the situation in Berlin, including the problems presented by the existence of two currencies in that City.

3. After long and patient discussion, agreement was arrived at in Moscow on a directive to the four Military Governors under which the restrictive measures placed by the Soviet Military Government upon transport and communications between the Western zones and Berlin would be lifted simultaneously with the introduction of the German mark of the Soviet zone as the sole currency for Berlin under Four-Power control of its issue and continued use in Berlin.

4. In connection with the lifting of restrictions and the maintenance of freedom of communication and the transport of persons and goods between Berlin and the Western zones, the agreed directive provided that restrictions recently imposed should be lifted. Generalissimo Stalin during the discussions personally confirmed that this meant the removal also of any restrictions imposed prior to 18th June, 1948.

In connexion with the currency situation in Berlin, the Soviet authorities insisted that the German mark of the Soviet zone be accepted as the sole currency for Berlin. The three Western Occupying Powers declared that they were ready to withdraw from circulation in Berlin the western mark "B" issued in that City and to accept the German mark of the Soviet zone subject to Four-Power control over its issuance, circulation and continued use in Berlin (i.e. in Berlin only and not in the Soviet zone). After long discussions Generalissimo Stalin, on 23rd August, 1948, personally agreed to this Four-Power control and himself proposed the establishment of a Four-Power Financial Commission which would control the practical implementation of the financial arrangements involved in the introduction and continued circulation of a single currency in Berlin and which, Generalissimo Stalin specifically stated, would have the power to control the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet zone in so far as its operations with respect to Berlin were concerned.

5. It was with these understandings, personally confirmed by Generalissimo Stalin, that the agreed directive was sent to the four Military Governors in Berlin to work out the technical arrangements necessary to put it into effect.

6. Despite these clear understandings, the Soviet Military Governor soon made it plain in the discussions held by the four Military Governors in Berlin that he was not prepared to abide by the agreed directive.

Although the directive called for the unqualified lifting of the restrictions on transport and communications between the Western zones and Berlin, the Soviet Military Governor failed to comply. What is more he demanded that restrictions should be imposed on air traffic. He endeavoured to support his demand by a false interpretation of a decision of the Control Council of 30th November, 1945. Actually,

* The note of the United States Government was delivered on 26th September. The notes of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and of the Government of the French Republic were delivered on 27th September.

during the discussions leading up to the decision of the Control Council of November, 1945, to establish air corridors, the Soviet military authorities in Berlin had suggested that the traffic in the corridors should be limited to the needs of the military forces. Neither the Control Council, however, nor any other Four-Power body accepted this proposal and the traffic in the corridors has since been subject only to those safety regulations which were agreed on a Four-Power basis other than these agreed safety regulations, no restrictions whatsoever have been or are in existence on the use by aircraft of the Occupying Powers of air communications in the corridors between Berlin and the Western zones of Germany.

In regard to Four-Power control of the German mark of the Soviet zone in Berlin, the Soviet Military Governor refused to admit, despite the agreement in Moscow, that the Financial Commission should exercise control over the operations with respect to Berlin of the German Bank of Emission of the Soviet zone.

Furthermore, with respect to the question of the control of the trade of Berlin, the position of the Soviet Military Governor amounted to a claim for exclusive Soviet authority over the trade of Berlin with the Western zones of occupation and with foreign countries. This claim was a contradiction of the clear meaning of the agreed directive to the four Military Governors.

7. Even while discussions were in progress, the Soviet authorities in Berlin tolerated attempts on the part of minority groups sympathetic to their political aims forcibly to overthrow the legal government of the City of Berlin, constituted by democratic elections held under Four-Power supervision. On 30th August the representatives of the three Western Occupying Powers in Moscow had drawn M. Molotov's attention to the disturbed situation in Berlin. They suggested that instructions should be sent to the four Military Governors that they should do all in their power to preserve a favourable atmosphere in Berlin, but M. Molotov claimed that such instructions to the Soviet Military Governor were unnecessary. Nevertheless, after that date these attempts to overthrow the City Government increased in violence.

8. On 14th September, 1948, the representatives of the Governments of the United States, France and the United Kingdom, acting on specific instructions, called the attention of the Soviet Government to the Soviet Military Governor's disregard of the agreements reached during the Moscow discussions and requested that he be instructed to give effect to them.

9. The Soviet Government's reply of 18th September, however, upheld the Soviet Military Governor's position. The Soviet Government further confirmed its intention to disregard its commitment to lift the restrictions imposed on transport and communications by seeking to impose restrictions which had not before been in effect.

With respect to trade, the Soviet requirement that the licensing of trade with Berlin be placed in the hands of the Soviet military authorities made plain the Soviet Government's intention to obtain exclusive control over the trade of Berlin.

As regards the powers of the Four-Power Financial Commission, the Soviet reply asserted that the Western Occupying Powers desired to establish control over all operations of the German Bank of Emission. In fact the United States, the United Kingdom and French Military Governors sought only to secure the Soviet Military Governor's acceptance of the agreed principle that the Four-Power Financial Commission should control the operations of the Bank with respect to the financial arrangements relating to the currency change-over and to the continued provision and use of the German mark of the Soviet zone in the City of Berlin (i.e., in Berlin only and not in the Soviet zone). In the light of M. Molotov's statements during the discussion of the Soviet reply, it became clear that no assurance was given that the Soviet Military Governor would be prepared to proceed on the previously agreed basis. Thus in this matter, as in others, the intention of the Soviet Government was manifestly to impose conditions nullifying the authority of the Western Occupying Powers and to acquire complete control over the City of Berlin.

10. For the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France to continue discussions when fundamental agreements previously reached had been disregarded by the Soviet Government would have been futile. It would have been equally fruitless to continue such discussions in the face of the unmistakable intention of the Soviet Government to undermine, and indeed to destroy, the rights of the three Governments as Occupying Powers in Berlin as a price for lifting the blockade, illegally imposed in the first instance and still unlawfully maintained. The three Governments therefore despatched identic notes on 22nd September to the Soviet Government. In those notes after restating their position on the specific points at issue they asked the Soviet Government whether it was prepared to remove the blockade measures which it had imposed and thereby to establish conditions which would permit a continuation of discussions.

11. The reply of the Soviet Government in its notes to the three Governments of the 25th September, 1948, is unsatisfactory.

As regard the introduction and continued circulation and use in Berlin of the German mark of the Soviet zone, the Soviet Government misrepresents the position of the three Western Occupying Powers. The latter have made it clear from the outset that they do not desire to exercise any control over the financial arrangements in the Soviet zone of occupation, but are insisting on those conditions only which would provide adequate Four-Power control over the financial arrangements for the introduction and continued circulation and use of the German Mark of the Soviet zone as the sole currency in Berlin.

As regards control of the trade of Berlin the Soviet Government contrary to its previous attitude now states its willingness to agree to the establishment of four-power control over the issuance of licences for the import and export of goods provided that agreement is reached on all other questions. It is clear, after more than six weeks of discussions, from the Soviet Government's persistent refusal to remove the blockade measures and its continued insistence on other conditions which would enable it to destroy the authority and rights of the United Kingdom, the United States and France as occupying powers in Berlin that this conditional concession is illusory.

As regards air traffic between Berlin and the Western zones of occupation, the Soviet Government, while neither affirming nor withdrawing the demand for the particular restrictions put forward by the Soviet Military Governor during the discussions in Berlin and confirmed in its reply of 18th September introduces another requirement to the effect that transport by air of commercial freight and passengers must be placed under the control of the Soviet Command.

The Soviet Government's note of 25th September therefore not only ignores the request of the three Governments that the blockade measures should be removed in order that conditions may be established which would permit the continuation of discussions. It also seeks to impose restrictions on transport and communications between Berlin and the Western zones which would place the maintenance of the forces of occupation of the three Western Occupying Powers and the whole life of the Berlin population within the arbitrary power of the Soviet Command, thus enabling the Soviet military authorities to reimpose the blockade at any moment in the future if they so desired.

12. Accordingly it is apparent that the Soviet Government had no intention of carrying out the undertakings to which it had subscribed during the Moscow discussions in August. In the face of the expressed readiness of the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France to negotiate with the Soviet Government all outstanding questions regarding Berlin and Germany as a whole in an atmosphere free from duress, the Soviet Government has, in fact, persisted in using duress. It has resorted to acts of force rather than to the processes of peaceful settlement. It has imposed and maintained illegal restrictions amounting to a blockade of Berlin. It has failed to work out in good faith Four-Power arrangements for the control of the currency of that City. Even while the Western Occupying Powers were seeking agreement on measures to implement the understandings reached in Moscow, the Soviet military authorities condoned and encouraged attempts to overthrow the legally constituted municipal government of Berlin. These actions are plainly attempts to nullify unilaterally the rights of the Western Occupying Powers in Berlin, which are co-equal with those of the Soviet Union and like them are derived from the defeat and unconditional surrender of Germany and from Four-Power agreements to which the Soviet Government is a party. Moreover, the use of coercive pressure against the Western Occupying Powers is a clear violation of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

13. The issue between the Soviet Government and the Western Occupying Powers is therefore not that of technical difficulties in communications nor that of reaching agreement upon the conditions for the regulation of the currency for Berlin. The issue is that the Soviet Government has clearly shown by its actions that it is attempting by illegal and coercive measures in disregard of its obligations to secure political objectives to which it is not entitled and which it could not achieve by peaceful means. It has resorted to blockade measures; it has threatened the Berlin population with starvation, disease and economic ruin; it has tolerated disorders and attempted to overthrow the duly elected municipal government of Berlin. The attitude and conduct of the Soviet Government reveal sharply its purpose to continue its illegal and coercive blockade and its unlawful actions designed to reduce the status of the United States, the United Kingdom and France as occupying powers in Berlin to one of complete subordination to Soviet rule, and thus to obtain absolute authority over the economic, political and social life of the people of Berlin, and to incorporate the City in the Soviet zone.

14. The Soviet Government has thereby taken upon itself sole responsibility for creating a situation, in which further recourse to the means of settlement prescribed in Article 33 of the Charter of the Nations is not, in existing circumstances, possible, and which constitutes a threat to international peace and security. In order that international peace and security may not be further endangered the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France, therefore, while reserving to themselves full rights to take such measures as may be necessary to maintain in these circumstances their position in Berlin, find themselves obliged to refer the action of the Soviet Government to the Security Council of the United Nations.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

CEYLON'S APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP OF THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANISATION

MEMORANDUM BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

THE Prime Minister of Ceylon has asked that in view of the present very unsatisfactory position with regard to Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations, we should agree to the issue of a declaration from our meetings on the following lines :—

> "The Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth of Nations have taken note of the constitutional documents published by the Ceylon Government in Ceylon Sessional Paper XXII of 1947 under the title 'The Independence of Ceylon' and in Ceylon Sessional Paper III of 1948 under the title 'The Constitution of Ceylon.' They affirm that Ceylon is an autonomous country within the British Commonwealth, in no way subordinate to any other in any aspect of its domestic or external affairs, and enjoying the same status of independence as the other nations of the British Commonwealth."

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

CEYLON'S APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP OF THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANISATION

Memorandum by the Prime Minister of Ceylon

1. The Prime Ministers and Representatives of the Commonwealth countries attending the Prime Ministers' Meetings will have seen the memorandum circulated by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom (P.M.M. (48) 11) regarding my suggestion that a declaration should be issued as to Ceylon's constitutional status, in order to assist the Ceylon Government in connection with Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations.

2. I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues to the very unsatisfactory position which now prevails with regard to our application.

3. The position is that we applied to the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 25th May for admission to membership with the necessary declarations as required by the Charter. We had our representative in Lake Success in attendance throughout the discussion of our application both by the Membership Committee of the Security Council and by the Security Council itself. Our representative was not invited to furnish any information as to the fitness of Ceylon for admission. He had, however, furnished by circular memorandum such information as he thought might be useful to the members when considering Ceylon's application. We understand that the Soviet representative on the Security Council vetoed the application of Ceylon on the ground that he was not satisfied as to Ceylon's independence. In accordance with the procedure for admission of new members, the application is now before the General Assembly of the United Nations, but it seems unlikely, in view of the Soviet veto, that the present application would normally prove successful.

4. I feel sure that my colleagues will realise how strong my feelings are on this question and how important it is that my country should not feel that in some way their membership of the British Commonwealth of Nations has prevented the success of their application to join the United Nations Organisation. In these circumstances, I have been considering what further step might be taken in order to overcome the present difficulty.

5. I now see that the Argentine Government are proposing to raise in the United Nations the suggestion that those countries whose applications for membership of the United Nations Organisation have received seven supporting votes in the Security Council should now be admitted to membership. I understand that certain serious legal disadvantages are seen against this resolution, but as it at least seems to provide a practical method by which Ceylon could secure membership, I am convinced that opposition to the Argentine proposal by the Commonwealth Governments would be seriously misunderstood by public opinion in my country.

6. In these circumstances I should be grateful if my colleagues would consider carefully whether they could not see their way to support the Argentine proposal, despite the objections to it, or, alternatively, whether they can take any other action which would result in the admission of Ceylon to the United Nations.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE CONFERENCE

AT their meeting this afternoon Ministers asked that officials of the various Delegations should meet to draw up for their consideration a detailed statement of the suggestions made in their discussion for improving the existing methods of consultation between Commonwealth Governments.

I attach, for the consideration of Ministers, a statement which I have prepared after consultation with officials of all the Delegations.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK,
Secretary.

Cabinet Office, S.W. 1,
18*th October*, 1948.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

1. Decisions binding Commonwealth Governments must be taken by those Governments themselves, and formal consultation on specific issues must therefore be held between Governments. The Commonwealth Relations Office will continue to be the normal channel of communication between the United Kingdom Government and other Commonwealth Governments for the purpose of these formal consultations.

There is, however, need for less formal exchanges of information and views on matters of common interest to all, or some, of the Commonwealth countries in order to give the background knowledge against which decisions on specific issues will be taken by Governments. This can be secured by the following methods.

Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers

2. Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be held as often as possible. In normal times the aim should be to hold such meetings every two or three years. All Commonwealth Governments should be represented at these meetings.

Foreign Affairs

3. Each of the self-governing members of the Commonwealth reserves its right to form its independent judgment on issues of foreign policy. But members of the Commonwealth group have many common interests in international affairs, and it is desirable that each should form its judgments on foreign policy with full knowledge of the views and interests of the other members. All Commonwealth Governments should therefore make their views known to one another at a sufficiently early stage to ensure that they can be taken into account in the formulation of policy.

4. Commonwealth meetings on foreign affairs at the Ministerial level should be held more frequently than Prime Ministers' meetings, possibly twice a year. Travelling could be reduced if one of these meetings were held near the time of a meeting of the United Nations Assembly. The other could be held in one or other of the Commonwealth countries, chosen according to circumstances. Such meetings should not be abandoned merely because one or two Commonwealth Governments cannot be represented at the time convenient to the others.

5. Between these meetings Commonwealth High Commissioners and their staffs should maintain close and regular contact with the Ministers and senior officials concerned with the formulation of foreign policy in the capitals to which they are accredited.

To facilitate this, the United Kingdom Government have provided or will provide the following facilities in London :—

(a) Commonwealth High Commissioners in London have the right of direct access to the Foreign Secretary. Meetings between the Foreign Secretary and particular High Commissioners will be held more frequently. Meetings between the Foreign Secretary and two or more High Commissioners will also be arranged from time to time, as occasion requires, for the discussion of matters of common interest.

(b) Political Secretaries (or comparable officials) attached to the staffs of Commonwealth High Commissioners in London are invited to make full use of their right of direct access to the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office will also invite these officials to come, individually or in groups, to discuss matters on which the Foreign Office desire informal discussion with representatives of other Commonwealth Governments.

(c) The Commonwealth Relations Office will be kept generally informed of exchanges made in these direct contacts between Commonwealth High Commissioners (and their staffs) and the Foreign Office.

6. Other Commonwealth Governments will endeavour to make comparable arrangements in their capitals.

Economic Affairs

7. In economic affairs also, decisions on specific issues are for Governments and nothing can displace formal consultation from Government to Government when that is required. But there is also need for an exchange of information and views so that all Commonwealth Governments in framing their economic policies can do so with the fullest possible knowledge and understanding of the needs and intentions of other Commonwealth Governments.

8. Meetings on economic questions of common concern should be held at the Ministerial level, as required and practicable. Where a particular problem directly concerns only some of the Commonwealth countries, the meetings might be confined to representatives of those countries. These meetings should be held in the most appropriate Commonwealth country.

9. Closer contact should be maintained between the Departments in London dealing with financial and economic matters and the senior economic officials of other Commonwealth Governments. These contacts should not be made only in London : members of the Departments dealing with financial and economic matters in the United Kingdom should themselves visit other Commonwealth countries.

10. Problems concerning only two Commonwealth countries should similarly be handled by discussion as appropriate. Formal machinery for the discussion of economic questions of common concern can be established where necessary—cf. the new Anglo-Canadian Economic Committee. In the main, however, it should suffice to leave such bilateral meetings to be arranged as occasion requires, without establishing any formal machinery for that purpose.

11. These meetings (of Commonwealth Ministers and their senior economic officials) should be supplemented by a regular flow of information on economic subjects. This economic reporting between the various countries of the Commonwealth would be stimulated by the establishment of a central focus for the exchange of economic information. Present circumstances seem to call for the establishment in London of a Committee which could serve as a clearing-house through which the economic officials attached to the Commonwealth High Commissioners could maintain direct and regular contact with officials of the economic Departments of the United Kingdom Government.

For this purpose the existing Commonwealth Liaison Committee for the European Recovery Programme might, under the title "Commonwealth Committee for the Exchange of Economic Information," serve as a focus for the exchange of information between Commonwealth countries on all economic questions of common interest, thus providing a basis for more informed consultation between Governments on these matters.

This Committee comprises representatives of all Commonwealth countries (officials attached to the staffs of the various High Commissioners in London). On the United Kingdom side, the Treasury, Board of Trade, Foreign Office, Commonwealth Relations Office and Colonial Office are regularly represented, and representatives of other United Kingdom Departments are brought into consultation as required.

The Sterling Area Statistical Committee could become a sub-committee of this Committee.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

STATUS OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE CONFERENCE

I circulate herewith, for consideration by Ministers, the report of the Committee of High Commissioners and officials which was appointed at the morning meeting on 18th October (P.M.M. (48) 7th Meeting, Minute 2) to consider the status of High Commissioners.

A summary of the recommendations in the report is contained in paragraph 4 on page 3.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK,

STATUS OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS AND OFFICIALS

We were invited by the Prime Minister's Meeting to consider certain questions in connection with the status of High Commissioners in the light of—

(a) a note by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom circulated as P.M.M. (48) 9 dated 13th October, 1948;

(b) the discussions in the Prime Ministers' Meeting on 18th October (P.M.M. (48) 7th and 8th Meetings).

2. Our discussions were attended by the High Commissioners for Australia, South Africa and Ceylon, and by representatives of Canada (Mr. Pickersgill and Mr. Leger), Australia (Mr. Oldham), New Zealand (Mr. McIntosh), India (Sir Girja Bajpai) and Pakistan (Mr. Mohammad Ali).

3. After full discussion we reached the following conclusions, which are submitted for consideration. Our recommendations are unanimous, save where otherwise shown—

(i) All Commonwealth Governments should agree that for purposes of precedence High Commissioners should rank with Foreign Ambassadors. The practical application of this principle should be for each Government to decide, but the Committee felt that it would be desirable to have the maximum degree of uniformity in the practice of Commonwealth Governments.

(ii) The Committee took note that the United Kingdom Government, as at present advised, proposed to treat High Commissioners and Ambassadors as separate groups on a footing of equality, and at functions where both Ambassadors and High Commissioners were present as a body to adopt a system of interleaving.

(iii) The general sense of the Committee was, however, strongly that unless decisive objection on technical grounds was seen by the Foreign Office, it would be preferable no longer to treat High Commissioners and Ambassadors as separate groups. Such a distinction accentuated in the eyes of foreigners the differences between Commonwealth and Foreign diplomatic representatives, and it was not consistent with the equality of status with Ambassadors which it was now proposed to secure for High Commissioners.

(iv) It was agreed that there was no good reason why a High Commissioner should not become the doyen of the Diplomatic Corps, but that it was unnecessary to press the point. The general sense of the Committee was that at functions where both Ambassadors and High Commissioners were present as a body, and indeed generally, while they would not object to the diplomatic doyen of the Diplomatic Corps continuing to take precedence over other Ambassadors or High Commissioners, Ambassadors and High Commissioners should otherwise rank inter se strictly according to date of appointment. This recommendation, if accepted, would make it unnecessary to devise a special system for "interleaving" Ambassadors and High Commissioners.

(v) As regards precedence of High Commissioners inter se the Committee considered that precedence should in future be governed not, as at present, by seniority of countries, but by date of appointment. It was recognised that this would result in the United Kingdom representative no longer occupying first place in the order of precedence among High Commissioners in Commonwealth countries. The representative of Canada indicated that his Government would be prepared to abandon the present arrangement under which precedence was governed by seniority of Commonwealth countries if the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries did the same.

(vi) Title of Excellency.—The representatives of Canada, New Zealand and South Africa felt that in the circumstances of their respective countries, the title was open to misunderstanding. The remaining Commonwealth representatives present were in favour of its adoption. There was general agreement that a High Commissioner should have this style in countries in which it was given to Ambassadors. Subject to this, it was agreed that the matter was one for each Government to decide as it thought fit.

(vii) Precedence of visiting Cabinet Ministers.—The Committee accepted the proposals on this subject contained in (6) of Mr. Attlee's paper of 13th October (P.M.M. (48) 9).

(viii) Title.—The Committee considered in detail various alternatives to the title "High Commissioner." The view was strongly expressed by some representatives that the title was no longer appropriate to a Commonwealth representative, and that an alternative to it, which would more clearly mark the sovereign status of Commonwealth countries and which would not have misleading and outmoded associations, should be found. Much difficulty was, however, experienced in finding any generally acceptable alternative. "Minister of State" would be open to misunderstanding and lead to confusion in certain Commonwealth countries. "Envoy-General" met with no support. "Envoy Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary" was regarded as cumbrous, and did not otherwise find favour on merits.

The general sense of the majority of the Committee was that if the title "High Commissioner" were to be abandoned, "Ambassador," despite the arguments against it, was the only possible substitute.

Arguments for and against the title "Ambassador"

Against adopting "Ambasasdor" the following arguments were advanced—

(a) Was it not desirable to mark the family character, and the greater intimacy and in some respects informality of the relations between Commonwealth countries by retaining the long-established title of High Commissioner and avoiding a title traditionally reserved to foreign representatives?

(b) The well-settled tradition was that Ambassadors were representatives of a Sovereign or other Head of State, while High Commissioners represented a Government.

(c) Was there not some difference in practice between the relations of a United Kingdom representative with a Commonwealth Government and those of foreign representatives? Surely his contacts both in nature and extent were closer, more intimate and more extensive? Could it seriously be maintained that the ordinary Foreign Ambassador in a Commonwealth country bore anything like the same relation or was in the same intimate confidence as a United Kingdom representative?

(d) The functions of Ambassadors and High Commissioners were not necessarily identical.

(e) Would not any misuderstandings that might now exist as to the true position of High Commissioners be removed by the proposed raising of their status to that of Ambassador?

In favour of "Ambassador" it was urged that—

(a) It constituted a recognition of the sovereign and independent character of Commonwealth countries. Now that steps were being taken to place those representatives on a position of equality in other respects with Foreign Ambassadors, there was less reason for continuing to draw this distinction.

(b) "Ambassador" was a well understood title carrying greater prestige than the title "High Commissioner" with its misleading associations, and was better understood by the public.

(c) There might in the past have been a substantial difference between the functions discharged by the United Kingdom High Commissioners and those of Ambassadors. This was, however, rapidly ceasing to be the case.

(d) Nor was there any difference in practice between the relations of Commonwealth countries with the representatives of other Commonwealth countries and their relations with the representatives of certain foreign countries with which they had close association.

(e) In the case of Ceylon, it might be of real importance politically to Ceylon's international position that the change should be made.

(f) Adoption of "Ambassador" would dispose of all difficulties in connection with the personal status and precedence of United Kingdom representatives.

The representatives of Australia, South Africa, Pakistan and Ceylon favoured the change. The Canadian representative intimated that his Government appreciated that there were important arguments on both sides, and were doubtful if the present was the right moment for the change. The representatives of New Zealand and India were against any change.

No agreed recommendation could be made on this important issue, and it was reserved for consideration by Ministers.

(ix) Accrediting of High Commissioners.—The Committee did not recommend the adoption of a procedure by which High Commissioners would be accredited by The King: they felt, however, that consideration should be given to the question of some form of credentials, since this might affect the readiness of the Diplomatic Corps to accept High Commissioners in their body.

4. Summary of Recommendations

(1) High Commissioners should rank with Foreign Ambassadors for purposes of precedence. (Section 3 (i).)

(2) The practical application of this principle would be for each Commonwealth Government to determine, but the maximum degree of uniformity between Commonwealth Governments should be aimed at. (Section 3 (i).)

(3) The practice of treating High Commissioners and Ambassadors as separate groups should be abandoned unless there are decisive technical objections to doing so. (Section 3 (iii).)

(4) While there are arguments for a Commonwealth representative being able to become doyen of the Diplomatic Corps, there is no objection, on the assumption that this is not pressed, to the diplomatic doyen of the Diplomatic Corps continuing to take precedence over other Ambassadors or High Commissioners. (Section 3 (iv).)

(5) Subject to (4), Ambassadors and High Commissioners should take precedence in strict order and date of appointment. (Section 3 (iv).)

(6) Seniority of countries should be abandoned as a basis for precedence of High Commissioners inter se. (Section 3 (v).)

(7) It should be left to each Commonwealth Government to decide whether High Commissioners should be styled "Excellency." (Section 3 (vi).)

(8) Precedence of visiting Cabinet Ministers should be regulated as in (6) of P.M.M. (48) 9 of 13th October. (Section 3 (vii).)

(9) It is not recommended that High Commissioners be accredited by The King. The question of providing some form of credentials for them should, however, be considered. (Section 3 (ix).)

(10) Title.—Strong objection was voiced by the majority of the Committee to the term "High Commissioner." If, however, that title was to be changed, the general sense of the majority was in favour of "Ambassador," despite the arguments against that style. (Section 3 (viii).)

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE CONFERENCE

With reference to my note of 18th October (P.M.M. (48) 13), I circulate herewith, for consideration by Ministers, a statement on Commonwealth Consultation prepared by the Deputy Prime Minister of Australia.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK,
Secretary.

Cabinet Office, S.W.1,
19th October, 1948.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

Discussions during the Conference have demonstrated the value to Commonwealth Governments of consultation with one another particularly in the fields of foreign affairs and economic policy. For the fullest benefit to be obtained, however, such consultation should take place early while policy is still in the formative stages. In order to develop further the opportunities for such consultation, the following arrangements have been agreed upon.

1. Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers

Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be held as often as is practicable at which all Commonwealth Governments will be represented.

2. Meetings of Ministers on Foreign Affairs

Commonwealth meetings on foreign affairs at the Ministerial level will be held twice a year. At least one of these meetings will be held outside the United Kingdom in one or other of the Commonwealth countries chosen according to circumstances. The next such meeting will be held in next .

3. Improved facilities in Commonwealth capitals

(a) Greater use will be made of facilities in London for consultation and the provision of information.

(i) Commonwealth High Commissioners in London will have the right of direct access to the Foreign Secretary. Meetings between the Foreign Secretary and particular High Commissioners will be held more frequently. Meetings between the Foreign Secretary and two or more High Commissioners will also be arranged from time to time, as occasion requires, for the discussion of matters of common interest.

(ii) Political Secretaries (or comparable officials) attached to the staffs of Commonwealth High Commissioners in London will have a right of direct access to the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office will also invite these officials to come, individually or in groups, to discuss matters on which the Foreign Office desire informal discussion with representatives of other Commonwealth Governments.

(b) Other Commonwealth Governments will endeavour to make comparable arrangements in their capitals.

4. Meetings on Economic Affairs

(a) Commonwealth meetings on economic questions of common concern will be held at the Ministerial level, as required and practicable. Where a particular problem directly concerns only some of the Commonwealth countries, the meetings might be confined to representatives of those countries. These meetings will be held in the most appropriate Commonwealth country.

(b) For the discussion of matters affecting only two Commonwealth countries, meetings of Ministers of the countries concerned will be arranged, and, where necessary, formal machinery will be established (cf., the new Anglo-Canadian Economic Committee).

(c) Closer contact will be maintained between officials of Commonwealth Governments concerned with financial and economic matters by interchanges of visits.

5. Improved facilities for the flow of economic information

(a) To meet present needs the existing Commonwealth Liaison Committee for the European Recovery Programme which includes officials of all Commonwealth countries will under the title "Commonwealth Economic Information Committee" serve in London as a clearing-house for economic information generally to provide the basis for informed consultation between Governments.

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE CONFERENCE

1. Meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be held as often as is practicable.

These meetings will normally be held in one or other of the Commonwealth countries, according to circumstances. [The first of these meetings will be held in next .]

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

FINAL PRESS COMMUNIQUÉ

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE CONFERENCE

I circulate herewith, for consideration by Ministers at the meeting this afternoon, a draft for a final communiqué which might be issued to the Press at the conclusion of the Conference.

(Signed) NORMAN BROOK.

Cabinet Office, S.W. 1,
21*st October*, 1948.

DRAFT FINAL PRESS COMMUNIQUÉ

The final Plenary Session of the Prime Ministers Meetings took place to-day.

2. As is well known it is not the purpose of such Meetings to reach formal decisions but to provide opportunities for a free exchange of views on matters of common concern to Commonwealth Governments.

3. During the past two weeks such matters of common concern relating to international and economic affairs and defence have been the subject of fruitful deliberations. The discussions have shown a united view on certain principles in the approach of all the Commonwealth Governments to world problems. The conditions for peace must be restored and to this end it is necessary to build up the strength of all countries in the Commonwealth and to create forces sufficient to deter aggression from whatever quarter it may come, and simultaneously all efforts must be devoted to the improvement of the standard of living as the constructive means of preventing war.

4. The nature of the United Kingdom's association with other Western European Powers in the Brussels Treaty organisation was fully discussed. The representatives of the Commonwealth Governments expressed their general approval of the policy followed in this matter by the United Kingdom Government and gave assurances of support for these measures to avert by measures of collective defence the catastrophe of war. The Meeting felt that the combination of the efforts of the United Kingdom and those of her European neighbours is in accord with the interests of the Commonwealth and its members. It was agreed that the closest possible contact should be maintained between the Governments of the Commonwealth for the purpose of working out and furthering co-operation between the members of the Commonwealth and the signatories of the Brussels Treaty.

5. It was agreed actively to develop all practicable steps to secure a common understanding on issues affecting both themselves and other nations, and to this end to improve and extend methods of consultation and exchange of information among all the countries of the Commonwealth. There was a united desire still further to extend and develop ways and means for securing the fullest possible exchange of information during the formative stage of the development of policy. The meeting decided to recommend to the various Governments arrangements for closer Commonwealth consultation on Foreign Affairs, Economic Affairs and Defence. These recommendations are being submitted to the several Governments for their decision.

6. The Meeting recorded its regret at the rejection of Ceylon's applicatio for membership of the United Nations. The representatives of all the othe

Commonwealth Governments took note of the constitutional documents published by the Ceylon Government in Ceylon Sessional Paper XXII of 1947 under the title "The Independence of Ceylon" and in Ceylon Sessional Paper III of 1948 under the title "The Constitution of Ceylon." They agreed to take this opportunity of their meeting in London to place on record their recognition of Ceylon's independence and to affirm that Ceylon enjoys the same sovereign independent status as those self-governing countries of the Commonwealth which are members of the United Nations.

REVISED DRAFT OF FINAL PRESS COMMUNIQUÉ

THE Final Plenary Session of the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was held at No. 10 Downing Street this morning. At the end of the meeting the representatives of the other Commonwealth Governments placed on record their sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for presiding over the meetings and for his constant and valuable help.

2. The purpose of these informal meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers is to provide opportunities for a free exchange of views on matters of common concern.

3. The meetings held during the past two weeks have covered many such matters of common concern, including international relations, economic affairs and defence. The discussions have shown a substantial community of outlook among all the Commonwealth Governments in their approach to the present world problems. Fundamentally, this approach is based upon their support of the principles and purposes of the United Nations and their determination to make its work more effective. All the Commonwealth Governments are resolved to work together to establish world peace on a democratic basis.

4. In furtherance of these objectives, the representatives of Commonwealth Governments affirmed their purpose to build up the economic strength of their countries and to take all necessary measures to deter and resist aggression. At the same time they will do their utmost to encourage an increased production of wealth so as to achieve a just standard of living, especially for the people of the less developed countries of the world, as a constructive contribution to the preservation of world peace.

5. The economic forecast for the coming years made by the United Kingdom Government for the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation was considered in order to give the other Commonwealth countries an opportunity to examine its implications for their own economics. The conference reaffirmed the need for all the Commonwealth Governments, in formulating their policies, to consult with one another, so far as practicable, so that each can co-operate by taking into account the needs and policies of the others.

6. The United Kingdom Government outlined the nature of its association with other Western European nations under the Brussels Treaty, as a regional association within the terms of the United Nations Charter. There was general agreement that this association of the United Kingdom with her European neighbours to build up their economies and to deter aggression was in accord with the interests of the other members of the Commonwealth and also of world peace. It was agreed that other Commonwealth Governments should be kept fully informed of the progress of this co-operation with Western Europe.

7. The discussions showed a general desire to maintain and extend methods of consultation between all the Governments of the Commonwealth. Detailed recommendations for improving Commonwealth consultation on foreign affairs, economic affairs and defence are being submitted to the Governments for consideration and decision.

8. The Meeting recorded its support for Ceylon's application for membership of the United Nations. The representatives of all the other Commonwealth Governments took note of the constitutional documents published by the Ceylon Government in Ceylon Sessional Paper XXII of 1947 under the title "The Independence of Ceylon" and in Ceylon Sessional Paper III of 1948 under the title "The Constitution of Ceylon." They agreed to take this opportunity of their meeting in London to place on record their recognition of Ceylon's independence and to affirm that Ceylon enjoys the same sovereign independent status as the other self-governing countries of the Commonwealth which are members of the United Nations.

9. This meeting included for the first time the Prime Ministers of India, Pakistan and Ceylon. Their presence symbolised the extension of the bounds of democratic freedom which reflects the spirit and steadfast purpose of the Commonwealth. These new representatives of sovereign nations brought to the deliberations of their colleagues from the other free countries of the Commonwealth the wisdom of their ancient civilisations vivified by the dynamism of the modern age. This blending of the West and the East in the lofty task of building a lasting peace on the foundations of freedom, justice and economic prosperity provides a new hope for harassed mankind.

DRAFT by Swp re. Commonwealth Pm's meetings 1948

When asked for his comment on the outcome of the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, Mr. Mackenzie King expressed anew his regret that circumstances had prevented him from participating actively in the meetings.

Mr. King said that he had had opportunities for private conversation with most of the Prime Ministers and was looking forward to meeting all of them before his departure from London. These conversations, together with daily contacts with the Canadian High Commissioner, Mr. Norman Robertson, and later with Mr. St.-Laurent after the latter's arrival from Canada, had enabled Mr. King to keep in close touch with the proceedings of the meetings.

Mr. King said, however, that he preferred not to make any comment beyond saying that there had been no thought of attempting to alter the character of the Commonwealth as a group of like-minded and freely associated nations in no way exclusive in character but serving at once as a model of free co-operation and

④ Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers –

– while unable to attend formal meetings due to health, did meet and talk with all Prime Ministers present, and also leading public men of the United Kingdom.

– valuable opportunity for frank and intimate discussion

– presence of India (Mr. Nehru), Pakistan (Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan) and Ceylon (Mr. Senanayake) a new development of much interest and significance.

– discussions and day-to-day progress of meetings impressed point I had commented on in my address at Paris — that the United Nations might learn much from the success of the Commonwealth in bringing countries together – showed value of sense of community over attempts at rigid and elaborate organization; showed also virtue of slow growth and solid progress before attempting too much.

⑤ North Atlantic Security Pact (if asked)

– a reflection of the sense of present inadequacy of the United Nations to provide security.

– Canadian position has been made clear in statements by myself and Mr. St. Laurent, – do not wish to comment at this time.

- Canada so close in geography and relations to U.S. that we are much interested in all that happens there; will be looking forward to continuance at all times of cordial and happy relations.

⑦ Retirement from Office (if asked)

- indicated before departure that I would seek retirement shortly after my return to Canada at a time convenient to my successor.
- do not wish to say anything further at present.

No. 892. 13th May, 1948.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the declaration made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on May 5th on the possibility of convening a Commonwealth Conference in the near future.

2. As you are aware, Mr. Attlee made this declaration during the debate on foreign affairs, and the exact words he used were the following:

> "There is no reluctance whatever on the part of the Government to have a full Commonwealth Conference, but the Right Honourable Gentlemen know that in one Dominion there may be an election while in another Parliament may be in session, so that the Prime Minister cannot leave. We are planning to have one as soon as we can, but it is really not a question of reluctance but of the difficulties we experience. We want to get together."

3. This statement was made in answer to remarks by Mr. Anthony Eden, who, earlier in the debate, had emphasized the fact that although he was wholeheartedly supporting the policy of closer relations with the Western Powers, there was one condition to such progress which must be absolute, "and it is that the Empire is with us in the conception and the execution of that plan at every stage". Mr. Eden added that he hoped that it might be possible, for the purpose of consultation in the reasonably near future, to have a conference of Empire statesmen on this matter.

4. Mr. Attlee's declaration came as a surprise, as only a few days before this debate, on April 28th, he had announced in the House of Commons that it was "extremely hard to get a suitable time to convene a Conference", and rather gave the impression that, due to the conditions in the different Dominions, such a possibility was not contemplated for the time being.

5. I have been informed by a close adviser to the Prime Minister on Commonwealth affairs that this new declaration should not be taken too literally, as Mr. Attlee had not intended to go any further on May 5th than he did on April 28th, but that he had rather answered on the spur of the moment the question put forward by Mr. Eden, and that he had committed himself more definitely than he had intended. This explanation, which would appear to be the proper one, does not prevent the fact that the Prime Minister has now given an assurance that a Commonwealth Conference would be held as soon as possible, and we may therefore expect that all those forces, both in the United Kingdom and in other countries of the Commonwealth, which are in favour of holding a conference will not let the opportunity go by without making the most of it.

6. While Mr. Attlee may not have intended to give as definite an assurance as he did, there is no doubt that the position of Australia and New Zealand must have been uppermost in his mind when he spoke of the possibility of convening a Commonwealth Conference. Recent developments in Western Union have disturbed these two Dominions, and I have already reported on the financial and economic implications they attach to the increasing continentalization of the United Kingdom policy in my despatch No. 713 of April 21st. The Australian and New Zealand Governments seem to be concerned lest the financial and political commitments of the United Kingdom in Western Europe play against the Commonwealth and Empire. They would therefore welcome wholeheartedly a Commonwealth Conference at this time to discuss these problems, and there is little doubt in my mind that some pressure must have been brought to bear on the United Kingdom Government in favour of such a course of action. It could easily be argued that the more the United Kingdom would become integrated in Western Union the more Australian and New Zealand fears would become acute; were the idea of a Conference shelved for the time being for one reason or another the problem would be but postponed until some member of the Commonwealth made it quite clear that such a Conference would serve no useful purpose.

7. The whole conception of the relations between the United Kingdom and Western Union on the one hand and the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth on the other has been given a great deal of attention lately. In a speech in the Guildhall on April 30th Mr. Eden said that he considered there was no fundamental clash in the conception of Britain as a member of the Commonwealth and as a member of Western Union. Mr. Bevin, in his speech on foreign affairs on May 4th, stressed the fact that the United Kingdom must take great care in building up the new structure of Western Europe "that we do nothing to jeopardize the already-existing solid framework of another union of free nations, that of the British Commonwealth".

8. It was to be expected that Lord Kemsley would lose little time in welcoming Mr. Attlee's announcement about the possibility of a Commonwealth Conference. In "The Sunday Times" of May 9th he wrote an editorial, copy of which is attached hereto, under the title of "Belonging Together", which he concluded as follows:

> "The Commonwealth Conference is capable of launching a new era of hope and achievement in our affairs; it is equally capable of bequeathing nothing but pious phrases and minor official arrangements - the flotsam and jetsam of Commonwealth affairs.

> The first condition of its success is the spirit of the peoples represented; the second is vision in high places; and the third is determination so to organize our common resources and act together for common purposes as to replace the weakness of the parts by the unbounded strength of the whole community."

9. "Scrutator", writing in the same edition of "The Sunday Times", discussed the problem of co-ordinating the policy of the British Commonwealth with Western Union, and after having welcomed Mr. Attlee's announcement, concluded his article with these words:

> "The real obstacle, presumably, lies, as it always has since the war, in the attitude of the Canadian Government; and it ought not to be allowed indefinitely to prevent the other Governments from meeting."

10. "The Economist" offered another solution. It remarked that the difficulties in the way of an early meeting were very great, in spite of the British Government's professed willingness to call a Commonwealth Conference, but that a solution might be "for London to conduct bilateral talks with each Dominion and to take the responsibility for sorting out and grouping together the various views about future political and economic policy developments in the Commonwealth."

11. Generally speaking, Mr. Attlee's declaration has been well received, both in Parliament and by the press, and, as already reported, it is to be expected that the powerful interests both within and without the United Kingdom which favour the idea of a Conference, would make the most of it and even try and force the issue were they to discover that the United Kingdom authorities would prove lukewarm in following up the matter.

12. According to my information, no plans have been made yet by the United Kingdom Government, and it is not expected that a Conference will be held within the next few months. In some circles, however, it is believed that a Commonwealth Conference could be held either before or after the General Assembly of the United Nations which is to meet in Paris at the end of September. It is too early to foresee whether this will prove practicable at that time. A Conference called at any earlier date would, in my opinion, serve little purpose, and might even cause more harm than good.

13. I am sending copies of this despatch and the enclosure to the High Commissioners in Canberra, Wellington, Pretoria, Dublin, and New Delhi.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,

High Commissioner.

BELONGING TOGETHER

By Viscount Kemsley.

The announcement that a Commonwealth Conference is to be called as soon as possible to consider the grave international problems that face us is the best of news. Many of us have felt that much of the strength of the British Commonwealth, so wonderfully proved during the war, so grimly cemented by the sacrifices of its peoples, has since been dissipated by failure in practice to observe the lesson that power beyond the capacity of any member is inherent in the unity of the whole.

There is another general lesson from the example of the Commonwealth in its mutual affairs: the lesson that solutions to the most stubborn problems can often be found by a common-sense, practical approach, when only bitterness and frustration can result from an approach in terms of prestige or pre-conceived attitudes or ideologies. Commonwealth unity itself is founded on an essentially practical basis: we have the sense of belonging together - the underlying condition of acting together - because we have the same long-term interests and because history has taught us that we can serve them best by keeping together.

We in Britain are fully aware of the difficulties which have stood in the way of closer Commonwealth unity in terms of political forms of institutions, and which have a special force for some of the Dominions, including the newer ones - internal divisions, regional interests, harsh immediate problems which like our own seem to demand priority, a right and natural insistence on the full exercise of national independence. But the more that these and other reasons diminish the formal political bonds of the Commonwealth unity, the greater the importance of the unseen, informal bonds which gain their strength from the feelings of ordinary people in all the countries under the Crown. It is the spirit of our peoples which enables the politicians to seize the opportunities of Commonwealth solidarity through whatever means of consultation and agreed action may be available. The success of the Commonwealth Conference is assured if, and only if, the people insist that it should succeed.

EMPIRE-MINDEDNESS

The Commonwealth owes much to the leadership of its greatest statesmen - men like General Smuts, who of all men living can be counted the chief architect of the modern Commonwealth of free and equal nations. But it owes just as much to the spirit of the ordinary man and woman - the spirit that inspires those wonderful food parcels from the Dominions and Colonies, the spirit of the thousands of British families who are eager to start a new life with its wider opportunities in the countries of the Commonwealth overseas, the spirit so vividly made manifest, and so happily stimulated, by the visits of the Royal Family upon whom it focuses in loyalty.

Empire-mindedness, as I may call this underlying sense of belonging together in the Commonwealth, is certainly a rising force in Britain. In days of greater prosperity and ease, we were perhaps too ready to take the Empire for granted. To-day, in our time of testing and trouble, we are rediscovering both its values and its problems. One expression of this is the unprecedented demand after the war for the chance to set up in the Commonwealth overseas.

But we must beware of exaggerating the potentialities of migration, great though they are, as a means of strengthening the Commonwealth and overcoming our own difficulties, or we run the risk of entering into a new phase of disillusionment. For the next, say, five or ten years physical bottlenecks like the shortage of ships or the housing problem in the Dominions mean that only a very small fraction of the population could move from Britain. The problem of earning our imported food and materials, and of dispersing our resources for purposes of defence, though marginally relieved, would remain little altered in general character.

What is needed, as well as a movement of men, is a movement of ideas. We need to stop thinking of the British Commonwealth as a collection of countries with different destinies, helping each other externally, so to speak, and to think of it as a unit, with functions and opportunities dovetailed into each other internally. We need to have that attitude towards the whole Commonwealth community which makes it seem as natural, though it may not always be as practicable, to move from England to Canada, or from Australia to England, as to move between two places in the same county.

A JOINT ESTATE

That is the true spirit of belonging together - to think of England and South Africa and Nigeria and the rest, though having different national governments, as part of a joint estate, with opportunities shared and resources available to all - resources in materials, space, manpower and skill. We are, in short, a family with a common inheritance.

Thinking does not by itself accomplish much. But many people thinking together make a big force. The next task is to mobilize that force of opinion behind organization and action for common purposes. To start with, if we in Britain enlarge our minds to the Commonwealth scale, we shall begin to take a quite different view of our own national destiny. As a small island off the coast of Europe, unable to feed itself and deprived of the world economic leadership which it had in the age of coal and steam, Britain's future may well appear less than its past. But as part of a Commonwealth with vast resources, of which its own population with their skill and their capital equipment are a vital element, it shares in the glorious prospects of the whole community of nations of which it was the founder and is still the chief. We still have more to put into the Commonwealth pool than any of its other members, great as their resources are.

Thinking that way, we shall find, throws a new light on old problems of our own. Housing, for example. Viewing the resources of the Empire as a whole in the field of housing, including both manpower and capital goods, we may well conclude that priority ought to be given to making houses in the Dominions rather than in Britain, apart from urgently needed special requirements. As Sir Ronald Weeks asked on this page last Sunday, why not a policy of New Towns in the Dominions instead of our over-crowded counties?

Or take food as another example. While we must clearly strive to grow the maximum in this country, we shall always have to import a large fraction of our needs. To the non-Empire-minded that is a great anxiety. To the Empire-minded it is a challenge to produce everything that we can in the Empire. We should be asking ourselves, for instance, whether it is better to spend the same money on ploughing up pasture in England or on restoring eroded soil in the Dominions and Colonies.

In foreign affairs, too, where more than ever before we need all the strength we can get, the enlargement of our thought to the Commonwealth scale bids us always strive for Commonwealth agreement before national policy is expressed to the United Nations or to foreign countries. That objective applies as much to the Dominions as to Britain, where their interests are primarily engaged. But the responsibility for leadership remains, generally speaking, with Britain, a s the acknowledged Great Power of the Commonwealth group: we should not expect of others that which we fail to insist upon ourselves. Witness, for example, Palestine - an issue of vital importance to the whole Empire, yet one on which it has been hopelessly divided. That is the way to dissipate our inheritance.

FAITH IN THE FUTURE

To-day is Empire Youth Sunday. The call to refresh our Empire-mindedness, our sense of belonging together in the Commonwealth, is eminently a call to the youth of our nations, who have the most to gain from the future. But youthfulness is not the prerogative of the young, neither of young men and women nor of young nations. It is a call to all of us to renew our youth at the fountain of the Commonwealth's youthful strength and hope. It is a call to faith, faith in our future as a group of free nations. "Where there is no vision, the people perish." Without faith in the future, based on our sense of belonging together, we who believe in freedom would fall easy prey to those who do boast a fanatical faith in a very different future of their own devising.

The Commonwealth Conference is capable of launching a new era of hope and achievement in our affairs: it is equally capable of bequeathing nothing but pious phrases and minor official arrangements - the flotsam and jetsam of Commonwealth affairs. Memorandum for the Prime Minister:

The Canadian Press have just telephoned with regard to an item which they have received, stating that -

> "authoritative quarters in London say that plans for an autumn conference of Dominion Leaders will go forward, as far as Britain is concerned, regardless of post-election changes in the composition of the South African Government."

They report that an item from Australia indicates that Prime Minister Chifley has stated that he has received a communication from Mr. Attlee with regard to the matter. They are asking whether there is any comment from here.

Would you wish to have it said, should there be any further calls, that there is "no comment" from here?

It is possible that there might be a question on the Orders of the Day this afternoon arising out of this report.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER:

Commonwealth relationships;
attitude of U.K. government

1. Following the talk which you and Mr. St. Laurent had, on August 13th, with the Secretary of the U.K. Cabinet (Sir Norman Brook) and the U.K. High Commissioner, Pearson, a number of other officials and I had conversations with them on August 16th and 17th.

2. Probably the most significant single impression with which we were left concerning the U.K. government's attitude was their desire to avoid, if possible, any attempt at the forthcoming meetings to devise a new "constitution" for the Commonwealth.

While the main purpose of Brook's current tour is to seek informally the views of the Prime Ministers of the "older members" on possible re-definition of Commonwealth relationships, it is evident that U.K. authorities have come to the opinion that, in present circumstances, the prospects of satisfactory agreement are so remote that it would be better all round if formal discussion of the subject in London can be avoided. At the same time, it is recognized that the Indian situation (or possibly an initiative on the part of the Irish) may make it necessary for something to be done. In any event, the U.K. government propose that the subject be explored while you are in London but informally and not at sessions of the Prime Ministers' meetings.

3. Having in mind the distinct possibility that the Indian situation or some move by the Irish (or both) may render it necessary to consider some changes of general application in Commonwealth relationships, U.K. Ministers have been examining in a preliminary way a number of proposals. In this connection, Brook gave us the opportunity of looking at two papers prepared in London by a committee of officials for consideration by Ministers. These had been discussed but not approved and Brook had not been authorized to give them to us. (For that reason, the fact that they have been shown to us should be kept particularly confidential.)

These papers, while they contain nothing of importance that Brook did not mention, either in conversation with you and Mr. St.Laurent or with the officials whom he met here, confirm our principal impression indicated in paragraph 2 above, namely that the U.K. government are anxious, if at all possible, to avoid at this time any formal redefinition of the nature of the Commonwealth.

4. In the event that it does not prove possible to avoid a general discussion in London on the nature of the Commonwealth, the various suggestions which are being considered by U.K. authorities are of great interest. Some of these are the same or similar to proposals which have been discussed in Ottawa at various times; most of them, I think, are in line with developments which Canadian government representatives have favoured in recent years.

5. Of the suggestions mentioned by Brook (and apparently considered but not decided upon by the U.K. Ministers), the following are among the more significant:

(a) The change, as a matter of practice, from the expression "British Commonwealth of Nations" to "The Commonwealth of Nations".

(b) Introduction of the term "Commonwealth citizen" as alternative to "British subject". (This has already been provided for by the new British Nationality Act.)

(c) Discontinuance of the expressions "Dominion", "Dominion government", etc., and substitution of such phrases as "Commonwealth country," "Member of the Commonwealth", etc. (Apparently no "legal" change is proposed here, but merely a change in practice.)

(d) Use of the term "Commonwealth Prime Ministers" to include the Prime Ministers of all Commonwealth countries, including the United Kingdom.

6. The U.K. government take the position that there is no need for relations between all members of the Commonwealth to be identical; there is scope for a wide variety.

7. As you know, the United Kingdom are even prepared to agree that a "republican" form of government for India is not inconsistent with membership in the Commonwealth, provided that the President is the representative of the King. In fact, the U.K. view is that the title of the King's representative in any member nation is a matter for that nation's own discretion. (This is directly relevant to the question which has been raised here from time to time of a change in the style of the Governor General.)

If it is necessary to consider any change in the King's title, the United Kingdom would probably suggest some such formula as follows:

"George VI King by the Grace of God, Head of all countries of the Commonwealth of Nations, and Defender of the Faith."

8. It became evident in our conversations with Brook that U.K. authorities are inclined to consider the present status of Ireland as the "irreducible minimum" beyond which it would be impossible for any member state to go without terminating completely the Commonwealth relationship. In this connection, the U.K. government are quite anxious to know the intentions of the present Irish government. They are also inclined to think that something should be done to "warn" the Irish that if they go farther they will have to take the consequences of complete separation at least in the eyes of other nations; for example, it would be difficult to continue extension of Imperial preference to Ireland.

9. After examining the possibility of having a "two-class" Commonwealth of British and "associated" nations, U.K. officials conclude that this would afford no satisfactory solution to present problems. It would on the other hand raise a good many new questions of great difficulty.

Another alternative is a "Union of British Commonwealth and Other Nations", a plan which would also involve two classes of members, of which the inner ring would be "British" and the outer, for all practical purposes, "foreign" in rather shadowy alliance.

10. The United Kingdom recognise that the courses mentioned in the preceding paragraph are full of difficulty from the "constitutional" point of view. U.K. Ministers are also acutely conscious of the domestic controversy which would be raised by suggestions for "weakening" the Commonwealth connection. Nevertheless, if the issue is forced, the U.K. government would be willing to consider the proposals for changing the character of the Commonwealth along the lines indicated in the hope of finding a solution which would be generally acceptable. They hope that this will not prove necessary.

11. What the reactions of Australia and New Zealand may be can only be conjectured. Certainly they will find little comfort in the attitude of U.K. Ministers if Dr.Evatt or Mr.Fraser contemplate renewing any of their earlier suggestions such as those for a central secretariat or closer defence arrangements on a Commonwealth basis.

From the Canadian point of view, there are perhaps four principal conclusions to be drawn from Brook's mission:

(a) The United Kingdom will seek to avoid any general discussion of Commonwealth relationships at the London meetings and, so far as possible, will resist any attempt to produce any new "constitutional" declaration.

(b) The U.K. government have no intention of proposing any tightening of the "Imperial" connection, nor have they in mind suggesting any new "centralized" mechanisms such as a Commonwealth secretariat, joint staff, or the like. On the contrary, their present attitude in this respect is much closer to that of the Canadian government than it has ever been.

(c) If the issue is forced by the Indian situation (or by Ireland), the proposals which the United Kingdom would favour are not, in general, of a character which would afford particular difficulty from the Canadian point of view.

DATED 4th SEPTEMBER, 1948

Agenda for Prime Ministers' Meetings

I have been considering subjects which we might talk over at our meeting and now suggest the following provisional list:-

(i) International Relations with particular reference to the Soviet Union.

(ii) The future of Germany.

(iii) Japanese problems and the future of the Pacific.

(iv) Commonwealth interest in collaboration with Western Europe.

(v) General economic situation and the European Recovery Programme.

(vi) The development of economic resources of the Commonwealth.

(vii) Defence questions.

(viii) Machinery for consultation between Commonwealth Governments.

If there are any items which you wish added I would be grateful if you would let me know as early as possible.

2. I need not say that, apart from the matters on the list, I greatly hope that we shall be able to take the opportunity to have less formal gatherings and informal discussions between individuals, and it may well be also that there will prove to be advantage in keeping the number of plenary meetings down.

3. I am telegraphing in similar terms to the other Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

Press Release

Ottawa, September 13, 1948.

The Office of the Prime Minister made public this afternoon the text of the following announcement, made public at the same time by the Prime Minister of Great Britain in London:

The Prime Minister (Mr. Clement Attlee) announced in the House of Commons on 28th June that it was hoped to hold a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss broad general questions of common interest in October. Arrangements have now been made for a meeting to take place in London on 11th October.

It is hoped that most Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be able to be present. Mr. Chifley, who visited this country as recently as July, will however be unable to leave Australia again after so short an interval and Australia will therefore be represented by Dr. Evatt. Dr. Malan owing to pressure of domestic matters and Parliamentary business in South Africa will also be unable to be present and South Africa will be represented by Mr. Eric Louw, Minister of Mines and Economic Affairs, who will attend meetings when his responsibilities as the leader of the South African Delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations admit of his doing so.

As is customary on these occasions the meeting will be a private one at which there will be confidential discussions and exchanges of view on matters of common concern between Commonwealth Prime Ministers. It is not the practice on these occasions to take formal decisions.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

Attached is the text of your remarks at the opening of the Prime Ministers' Meetings in August 1944. As you will recall, the meetings in May and June 1946 were broken into two parts, Chifley being here for the first half, while you only arrived for the second half. The official record of the formal opening meeting, at which you were not present, would indicate that there were no "opening statements" between Prime Ministers, beyond the exchange of the ordinary civilities.

Mr. Mackenzie King said: I express my warm and sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of Great Britain for the words of welcome which he has so cordially extended. I welcome this opportunity of our meeting together. Great responsibilities rest on the nations of the Commonwealth, and the purposes for which these meetings are taking place, as outlined by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, will find an echo in the hearts of all present to-day. The Government of Canada is as anxious as the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his colleagues to display to the world the solidarity of the Commonwealth in loyalty to the cause for which we fight, and in seeking a solution of its many problems to have its different parts kept at all times in the closest possible relationship. After the united way in which nations of the Commonwealth have joined to prosecute the war, I, myself, anticipate no difficulty in reaching agreement on all essential matters, by a convergence of views, as suggested by Mr. Churchill.

I desire to convey warm greetings from the Canadian Government. The Government at Ottawa has its own heavy responsibilities, smaller in scope perhaps, but not less complex in nature. The discharge of common responsibilities has given all our Government's better understanding of each other's problems, and brought us all closer together. I feel, Prime Minister, that this island's leadership in the fight for freedom has brought Canada closer than ever to Britain's side.

CHAPTER I.—INTRODUCTORY

(1) THE GENERAL OBJECTIVES

It is the purpose of this Long-Term Programme to describe in some detail the policies which the United Kingdom proposes to follow in order to "achieve and maintain a satisfactory level of economic activity without extraordinary outside assistance" by 1952–53. Alone and unaided the United Kingdom could not succeed in this endeavour; strengthened by its close contacts with the other members of the Commonwealth, in co-operation with the other participating countries of Western Europe and aided by the generous assistance afforded by the United States under the European Recovery Programme, it is confident of success. As means to this end, the United Kingdom has undertaken in common with the other participating countries to make the fullest use of productive resources, to increase production, to develop and modernise industrial and agricultural equipment, to maintain the stability of its economy, to expand trade and to join in measures to reduce the barriers obstructing it.

2. The Government must give a clear guide as to the direction and intensity of the sustained and strenuous efforts which will be needed to reach these objectives. In present conditions, the quasi-automatic operation of economic forces could not produce the right results or produce them without immense social upheaval. But large-scale and long-term economic planning in time of peace is a novel field for Government initiative in democratic communities. Moreover, it must never be overlooked that for a democracy economic planning is a means to an end and not an end in itself.

3. Economic planning in the United Kingdom is based upon three fundamental facts: the economic fact that the United Kingdom economy must be heavily dependent upon international trade; the political fact that it is and intends to remain a democratic nation with a high degree of individual liberty; and the administrative fact that no economic planning body can be aware (or indeed ever could be aware) of more than the very general trends of future economic developments. Many of the assumptions about the future on which plans must be based are profoundly uncertain and many economic events are wholly outside the control of any one nation; many can only be partially influenced by international agreements, and those such as the effect of weather on the crops are beyond human control. Even in purely domestic economic matters the means of control which can be effectively used within a democracy are limited. Underlying economic uncertainties there is the factor of political stability in the world at large.

4. It is nevertheless essential to prepare long-term forward programmes in those fields of economic activity in which substantial changes will have to be made if the United Kingdom is to overcome those difficulties which lie within its own power, and to play its full share in the combined task before the O.E.E.C. countries as a whole. To follow any other course would be to jeopardise all hope of recovery. But the uncertainty which necessarily attends the future makes it essential that many of the long-term plans must be kept flexible. A persistent adherence to targets or timetables based on assumptions which have been falsified by events might well be as disastrous as leaving the whole matter to chance.

5. For a nation with an open economy like the United Kingdom, the assumptions and forecasts underlying long-term plans are largely assumptions and forecasts about events overseas and these plans cannot be effectively prepared in isolation in its own capital. They need to be formulated and kept under review in collaboration with countries overseas, and especially, in this case, with the other parts of the Commonwealth, with the countries of O.E.E.C., and with the United States. Such consultation will narrow the range of uncertainty about future developments and thus enable the plans to be made more precise and realistic. Still more, it will allow both the plans of the United Kingdom and the plans of other nations to be modified by agreement to mutual advantage. The benefits of a world-wide division of labour must be secured. Until these possibilities are explored, the plans must remain provisional.

6. Finally, recovery must not be bought at the price of arbitrary and excessive interference with the rights of the individual. The United Kingdom intends to make resolute use of its traditional techniques of financial policy and of the direct public control of certain basic industries. A large measure of control will have to be retained over imports, over the total amount of home consumption, and over the scale and composition of investment. But powers of prohibition and compulsion, though they must be used to set limits to economic freedom, must not be allowed except in very special circumstances to infringe the personal freedom of the individual. The execution, as well as the preparation, of plans must be based upon the willing co-operation and understanding of the general public.

7. For the United Kingdom, therefore, a long-term plan can be no more and no less than a statement of economic strategy. It will not attempt to be a complete and rigid set of instructions for several years ahead. Certain of its parts will be worked out in detail, but its main purpose will be to provide the framework within which more precise short-term plans can subsequently be worked out. The practice of preparing annual programmes has already been established in the United Kingdom and this system has been adapted to the needs and opportunities of the European Recovery Programme in the programmes submitted for 1948–49 and 1949–50. These annual programmes are the necessary instruments with which the broad stategic plans contained in the Long-Term Programme will be given precise content. The United Kingdom hopes, therefore, that the joint discussion and revision of this draft of its Long-Term Programme, side by side with the programmes of the other countries of O.E.E.C., will result in a joint programme and a set of national programmes that will be clear and effective guides in the preparation of the detailed plans in the coming years.

(2) THE PROBLEM BEFORE THE UNITED KINGDOM

8. The crucial immediate problem for the United Kingdom, as for all member nations of the O.E.E.C., is the balance of payments. In some respects, however, the United Kingdom's problem differs from that which faces Europe as a whole.

9. For Europe as a whole in 1947 imports had increased and exports decreased by comparison with 1938; net incomes from shipping and investment had fallen and the world rise in prices had enormously enhanced the monetary measure of the increased deficit. These changes were accompanied by very large structural changes in the pattern of intra-European trade and payments.

10. By contrast the United Kingdom by 1947 had already increased the volume of visible exports to 9 per cent. above 1938; and visible imports were kept 20–25 per cent. below the 1938 level, despite the greatly increased volume of employment and output. Though the terms of trade were 15 per cent. worse than in 1938—in contrast with the experience of most other O.E.E.C. countries—the proceeds of exports paid for a far greater proportion of imports than in 1938. This was a great achievement; but it was more than offset by the loss of investment revenue, and by the increase in necessary Government overseas expenditure caused by the aftermath of war. The result was a current deficit of £630 million in 1947 compared with only some £70 million in 1938. The figures are summarised in the following Table :—

	(£ million at current prices)
	1938	1947
Total Payments for Imports (f.o.b.) ...	835	1,540
Receipts for Exports and Re-exports	533	1,102
Deficit on Visible Trade	−302	−438
Invisibles (Net)	+232	−192
Total Deficit	− 70	−630

11. The deficit in 1947 was due wholly to a deficit with the Western Hemisphere of £670 million ($2,700 million); with the remainder of the world the United Kingdom had, in fact, a small surplus. In 1947 by far the gravest problem was therefore the dollar problem.

12. In 1947 the gold and dollar reserves of the sterling area (including the expenditure of loan resources) were subject to a net drain of $4,100 million, of which over $800 million was on account of the rest of the sterling area. These reserves are, of course, the reserves of the sterling area as a whole. Very large reductions have already been made in this outflow during 1948; in the first half of the year the net outflow was at an annual rate of little over $2,000 million, half that of 1947.

(3) NATURE OF THE SOLUTION PROPOSED

13. The task before the United Kingdom for the next four years, as for the other participating countries, is to close the gap in the balance of payments and to overcome the shortages of essential commodities which were experienced even when expenditure on imports exceeded overseas income by so large a margin. A wide variety of policies must work together to this end.

14. Total home production must be increased. This requires steady increases in productivity and the maintenance of stable financial conditions. Exports must be expanded, and the proportion of imports coming from non-dollar sources must be increased. The general policies which it is intended to follow on these matters are set out in Chapter II.

15. A number of particular industries have especially important parts to play. These are described in Chapter III.

16. A large home investment programme and a careful control of its composition are clearly of great importance. This is discussed in Chapter IV, while Chapter V deals with investment in overseas territories.

17. If these policies are carried through successfully and are accompanied by the development of international collaboration on the one hand and on the other by the continuance of external aid on an adequate scale, it is believed that the objective of stable and satisfactory economic conditions independent of outside aid can be achieved in the United Kingdom in 1952–53. Chapter VI sets out estimates of the balance of payments that might be reached and indicates some of the problems associated with it.

18. In Chapter VII the consequences of the policies and programmes set out in Chapters II–VI to the levels of activity and consumption in 1952–53 are briefly described. Finally, this Chapter emphasises the vital parts which external assistance and international collaboration must play in the development and execution of this programme.

19. Before commencing the full exposition it may be convenient to summarise at the outset certain essential features of these policies.

20. This Programme pays full regard to the obligations entered into under the Convention for European Economic Co-operation signed in Paris on 16th April, 1948, and the Economic Co-operation Agreement with the United States Government signed in London on 6th July, 1948. It is submitted to the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation as a contribution towards the preparation of a joint recovery programme.

21. It has been prepared on the assumption that the obligations of the European Convention will be continuously and progressively implemented during the period to 1952, and that the co-operation thus achieved will continue to bear fruit in later years. The results it is hoped to achieve would be impossible without the continuance of external assistance during the period of recovery and without the closest co-operation with the participating countries and with the other countries of the British Commonwealth.

22. A major objective of the United Kingdom's programme is the maintenance of sterling as an international currency : this in itself is a positive contribution to international economic stability. In order to secure this objective the maintenance of the sterling area gold and dollar reserves is essential.

23. The policies and programmes described are designed to solve both the general balance of payments problem and within this the particular problem of the balance with the Western Hemisphere. The solution of the former is seen to lie much more in the continued increase of overseas earnings than in a reduction of overseas payments. Thus exports in 1952–3 are estimated at 150 per cent. of the volume of 1938, and 38 per cent. above the level achieved in 1947. A very great improvement is also sought in the balance of invisible payments, including under this term earnings from oil. Net invisible earnings are estimated to yield in 1952–53 over $1,000 million against some $950 million, at the present exchange rate in 1938, and a deficit in 1947 of nearly $800 million. Aggregate imports, after allowing for a measure of overseas investment, are expected to remain at around the level now programmed for 1948–9, somewhat above the 1947 level, but still significantly less than pre-war.

24. The programme shows a potential solution of the Western Hemisphere payments problem along the following lines. Starting from the huge deficit of $2,700 million in 1947, it shows a gain in net invisibles of some $600 million, largely due to shipping, oil and tourism. It allows for an expansion of export earnings of $800 million, an increase of some 120 per cent. above the 1947 level, and a reduction of imports of $1,000 million. Even these large changes will still leave some $300 million to be covered by gold or dollar earnings from the rest of the sterling area. These increases in exports and invisibles presuppose an immense effort, and it should be made quite clear that the reduction in imports from the 1947 level is in no way conceived as desirable in itself. This reduction, much of which has already taken place, is in the main a return towards the traditional distribution of imports from the distorted pattern of 1947 when the United Kingdom, in common wih other European countries, was abnormally dependent on supplies from the Western Hemisphere. On present evidence it is not now thought realistic to estimate direct earnings of Western Hemisphere currencies at a higher figure than here shown, or to rely upon earning more gold and dollars by trade with the rest of the world. If in the event it proves possible to increase these earnings further, the Western Hemisphere import programme can be readily increased to the advantage of the United Kingdom economy and without modification to other plans.

25. The eventual balance of payments shown is consistent with levels of production and consumption substantially higher than the present. This is due not so much to the increase in imports over 1947, as to the fact that home production is planned to increase by more than is needed to provide the additional exports. The expansion of home agriculture will enable the level of food consumption to rise considerably above that of 1948–49. Manufacturing output, supported by the increased output of steel and by provision in the import programme of a higher scale of raw material supplies, can be about 25 per cent. above 1947, and the supply of capital equipment to industry about 15 per cent. above.

(4) PROGRESS SINCE 1947

26. The attainment of such levels clearly calls for a sustained effort from the British people. But the substantial progress achieved during the first half of 1948 is solid evidence that it will be forthcoming.

27. The improvement in the balance of payments has been striking. The following table compares the provisional estimate of the balance in the first half of 1948 (expressed as an annual rate) with the figures for 1947 and the estimates for 1952–53 given in Chapter VI :—

Moreover, as already stated, the net drain on gold and dollar resources in the first half of 1948 was at a rate only half of that ruling in 1947.

28. Similar progress has been made with home production. The index of industrial production for the second quarter of 1948 stood at 13 per cent. above the average of 1947. During the same three months, coal production averaged 9 per cent. above the same quarter last year. In the first six months of 1948 steel production was at the annual rate of 15 million long tons compared with a total output of 12½ million tons in 1947. During the second quarter of 1948 cotton yarn output was nearly 20 per cent. above the average for 1947 and rayon yarn about 20 per cent. above. The total value of production of agricultural machinery in the second quarter of 1948 was $67 millions compared with a quarterly average in 1947 of $44 millions. There has been a marked expansion over last year in livestock numbers and in the amount of land under cultivation. Poultry flocks have increased by a fifth and the number of pigs by a third. The rate of exports in the second quarter of 1948 was already more than half-way between that of 1947 and the rate now expected to be maintained in 1952–53 and later years. The increases in the exports of engineering products and textiles are especially notable. Many other examples of steady progress could be given to illustrate the distance the United Kingdom has already gone along the road to recovery.

CHAPTER II.—GENERAL POLICIES

29. In this chapter are described the policies of a general nature that the United Kingdom intends to adopt in order to guide the nation's effort in the economic field during the next four years. These general policies are fundamental to the success of the more detailed plans and programmes described in subsequent chapters.

(1) THE PROMOTION OF UNDERSTANDING AND COMMON EFFORT

30. The difficulties of the present economic position do not present themselves in an obvious form to the British public. Unemployment is barely noticeable; jobs are apparently secure; industry is finding it easy to earn profits; wages are relatively high; the necessities of life are more fairly distributed than ever before; and because they cannot buy many necessaries, many people have money which they can spend on things which they would otherwise regard almost as luxuries. A real and grave crisis in economic affairs seems remote and unreal. At the same time many workers have in the background of their minds the unemployment between the wars. This comes to the surface when the practical problems of changes in the structure of industry involve changes of employment, and, perhaps, the risk of unemployment in the transition.

31. For this reason it has been, ever since the end of the war, the policy of the United Kingdom Government to give the people at all times the fullest information about the realities of the economic situation, and to impress upon them the need for a high level of production. A large volume of statistics of current economic affairs is published monthly; and every year there is issued an Economic Survey in which immediate needs, prospects and policies are explained as fully and forcibly as possible. Modern techniques of publicity are used to explain and bring home the contents of these surveys, and generally to make known to the nation its fundamental economic problems and the policies necessary for their solution.

32. Techniques of joint consultation between Government, management and labour in the preparation and execution of plans have been widely developed. These are essential to the efficiency of democratic planning and to the promotion of a proper understanding of national problems. At the highest national level the Economic Planning Board, the National Joint Advisory Council and the National Production Advisory Council for Industry are particularly concerned with general policies. For particular industries the Departments concerned have their own machinery for consulting the management and trade union side of such industries at the national level. At the Regional level the Regional Boards for Industry (represented by their chairmen on the National Production Advisory Council for Industry) bring together the regional officers of Government Departments and the two sides of industry. The general purpose of all these consultative bodies is similar; they provide a regular means of consultation between Government, management and labour.

(2) FISCAL POLICY

33. The central principle which guides the financial policy of the United Kingdom was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in opening his budget on 6th April, 1948, "Government expenditure and revenue ought not to be considered in isolation from their effects upon the general economic prospects of the country. . . . . The new task of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not merely to balance the budget; it is a much wider one—to match our resources against our needs so that the main features of our economy may be worked out for the benefit of the community as a whole."

34. In order to make the fullest use of the available resources, the fiscal policy of the Government must be directed to the maintenance of a high level of employment. It became evident in the course of the year 1947 that a persisting inflationary pressure, originating in the necessities of financing a total war, was liable to impede the course of recovery. The pressure of home demand was competing with the needs of the export drive, both directly and through its tendency to drive up costs and prices. At the same time, an abnormal prosperity was being experienced by all industries, which hindered the best use of resources because of its effect upon the expansion of those industries whose products were most urgently needed from the national point of view. Both the supplementary budget of November 1947 and the budget for the fiscal year 1948–49 were designed to correct this situation. In opening the 1948 budget, the Chancellor stated one of its principal objectives in the following words: "Sufficient purchasing power must be withheld by taxation and by voluntary saving to offset the purchasing power created by public expenditure and capital investment." Since the current level of voluntary savings was inadequate to finance the investment programme, the 1948 budget was designed to produce a surplus of revenue over current expenditure of £780 million (over 3 billion dollars), which was expected not only to meet the capital expenditure of the Government but to provide a further sum estimated at about £321 million (over $1\frac{1}{4}$ billion dollars) towards the total saving needed to offset private investment.

35. Thus the policy of public finance is to maintain full employment but to counter any inflationary pressure arising from a deficiency of voluntary saving in relation to the projected level of investment. The application of this policy is a matter of considerable delicacy and it is clearly impossible to forecast the particular form which will be taken by subsequent budgets. The investment policy described elsewhere in this programme, which plays a large part in the plans for recovery, is placing, and will place, a heavy strain on British resources, particularly in view of the objective to eliminate the present overseas deficit within the period of four years.

36. If a deficiency in demand became apparent, the policy of full employment would require an appropriate change in fiscal policy. To quote again from the 1948 budget speech "We must watch the situation carefully and be ready to detect the moment when the inflationary pressure vanishes and gives place to deflationary tendencies; if such a thing should happen, we must then make a rapid readjustment of our economic and financial policies."

37. Within this general framework the fiscal provisions should encourage the general increase in productivity which is looked for during the recovery period; while the system of indirect taxation and of subsidies contributes towards a general policy of price and wage stabilisation. To encourage productive effort the 1948 budget made considerable reductions in the burden of direct taxation on earned incomes and the rates paid on the lower ranges of income were reduced. The policy of food subsidies, which was designed to keep down the costs of essential foodstuffs and thus to support the general objective of costs stabilisation referred to in the following section, was continued. One of the problems of an inflationary situation is the difficulty of securing the redeployment of labour into the more essential but not always the more attractive industries, and the present fiscal policy, accompanied by the measures described below, is designed to assist this movement.

(3) POLICY IN RESPECT OF PERSONAL INCOMES

38. A general increase in the level of personal incomes unless matched by increased production would merely raise costs and prices, imperilling the drive for exports and imposing hardships on all those with fixed incomes. Ultimately a continued movement of this kind must bring economic ruin and social breakdown. All are agreed that it must be prevented. In the United Kingdom wages are determined by collective bargaining. These methods of free negotiation and agreement have had great success. In the last three years only 10 million days' work have been lost in industrial disputes compared with practically 150 million in the same period after the first world war. It is the Government's constant concern to assist the two sides of industry in developing their machinery for joint negotiation and the settlement of disputes. Owing to the awareness by both sides of industry of their responsibilities, movements of wages and prices have not been so rapid as to cause fears of a runaway inflation. The Government has, however, issued a statement setting out certain vital principles for the guidance of those responsible for determining the level of personal incomes from whatever source. The Government at the same time announced as its policy that when remuneration is increased in any class of employment there can be no presumption, whatever may have been the practice in the past, that the resulting costs will be taken into account in settling controlled prices, charges or margins, or other financial matters requiring Government action. Another problem which is being faced in the United Kingdom concerns traditional or customary relationships between personal incomes which tend to persist in spite of changed conditions. The important industries now short of manpower have in the past been generally the worst paid, and there has been general approval of the movement which has greatly improved the relative earnings of coalminers, farm workers, textile workers and others in essential occupations.

(4) SPECIFIC MEASURES TO SECURE THE REDEPLOYMENT OF MANPOWER

39. Certain specific measures to secure the redeployment of manpower have also been adopted. Publicity has been used to dispel exaggerated beliefs about conditions in undermanned industries, and to explain the national importance of recruitment to them. In certain cases priority has been given to the building work required to modernise and improve working conditions and to the construction of new houses and hostels in areas where shortage of accommodation is an obstacle.

40. In 1947 certain direct controls were reintroduced. By one Order employers were required to engage their workers. and workers were required to take their jobs, through the machinery of the national employment service. By another, unoccupied persons of certain categories were required to register for employment. Both orders were supported by the use of the Minister of Labour's powers compulsorily to direct labour to specific employment. The great majority of workers, however, willingly accepted guidance into essential employment and direction has been used only in a very few cases when a worker has refused to take any form of essential work. The need for continuance of these direct controls is kept continually under review.

(5) IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION

41. Both to assist in recruitment for essential undermanned industries and also to make a contribution to the problem of displaced persons and of the mobility of European labour reserves, the United Kingdom has welcomed a substantial body of immigrants. Since the end of the war nearly 200,000 foreign workers have been settled here on a permanent basis. Some 70,000 of these were displaced persons, and indeed in this way the United Kingdom has afforded asylum for more displaced persons than any other country in the world. Many other immigrants who have settled permanently were at one time members of the Allied Forces, particularly Poles. In addition, permits for some 50,000 other foreign workers have been issued for employment on an individual basis. All workers so admitted have, of course, been employed at wages and on conditions not less favourable than those applicable to British workers. For the future, for any approved demands which cannot be met by British workers recourse will be had in accordance with existing policy to the recruitment of foreign workers, subject to adequate housing being available. As regards emigration, it is open to British subjects to leave the country as they wish and to move to any countries which are ready to receive them, though that movement is in fact hampered by lack of shipping facilities and by exchange limitations. In the case of schemes approved on economic and other grounds, the Government facilitates recruitment and movement of persons of the kind which the receiving country desires to secure.

(6) POLICIES RELATING TO PRODUCTIVITY

42. The labour force of the United Kingdom is now fully occupied and the numbers available for work may be somewhat less in five years' time. The proportion of the total population which is of working age is becoming smaller, while the average age of the working population is increasing. Increased productivity per head is therefore the only means of solving the present economic difficulties while maintaining and improving the standard of living.

43. Increased productivity partly depends on the maintenance and improvement of capital equipment, both building and machinery. This is recognised in the investment programmes discussed in Chapters III and IV but, as there explained, there are severe limitations on what can be done, and careful measures have therefore been adopted to put the available resources to the best uses, and so make good shortages of new equipment by the more efficient use of existing plant, e.g., by improved layout and adaptation. Improvements in productivity also depend on an adequate flow of raw materials. In regulating import programmes care has to be taken to see that this is not checked by avoidable shortages of imported supplies.

44. In addition research has an important part to play. The contribution of the State to industrial research has been greatly increased, directly through the research establishments administered by the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research and indirectly through Industrial Research Associations fostered and financially assisted by the Department, of which there are now thirty-six. Much of the work of these bodies will only bear fruit after a long interval; but they are being encouraged to concentrate on the solution of immediate problems and on the widest and most prompt dissemination of their findings. There is also being set up a National Research and Development Corporation, financed from public funds, to take over inventions from Government Research Stations and universities, develop them to the stage at which they are commercially useful and license them out to industry. The Corporation will also take up private inventions of public interest which would otherwise fail to be properly developed. These are steps undertaken by the State. The research expenditure of private industrial firms is equally important. It has recently been estimated that this expenditure is now ten times as great as it was before the War. The combination of intensive research with the traditional skills of British industry will ensure that United Kingdom products remain in the van of technical progress.

45. Most active efforts are being made to increase technical skills. There are to-day twice as many students in the scientific and technological faculties of the Universities as there were in 1938; there are more than twice as many in Technical Colleges. The number of young employees released in working hours for technical education has been quadrupled. The limitation on still further expansion is mainly one of premises; special attention is being given to this in the investment programme. A number of National Colleges for advanced technological education for particular industries are being established. The creation of apprenticeship schemes has the active support of the Ministry of Labour and the training of supervisory workers on the lines of the Training Within Industry Scheme introduced in the United States during the war has been promoted with considerable success. The Ministry of Labour also provides intensive courses in skilled crafts for adults needing this training.

46. The average level of effort, the intensity and length of work, and the adaptability of labour are greatly influenced by a better understanding of economic problems. Information policy seeks to secure this, while fiscal policy attempts to ensure that monetary incentives can operate effectively by maintaining a reasonable stability of prices and money values. Joint consultation between management and employees in industry, which is being developed with the encouragement and assistance of the Government, is also helping toward an effective productive effort.

47. Managements throughout the country are seeking to improve managerial efficiency. To encourage this process, the Government has financed the setting up of the British Institute of Management to collect and spread information on the best management practice, to undertake further research and to encourage education in this field. The research organisations already mentioned also have an important part to play. The object in all this work is especially to raise the level of the bad and the less good to that of the best.

48. This desire for greater productive efficiency must not be impeded by monopolistic practices. Recent legislation has made provision for a Monopolies and Restrictive Practices Commission to enquire into any industrial and commercial arrangements of a restrictive or monopolistic character which are referred to it by the Government. Power has been taken to deal by Order, subject to the approval of Parliament, with arrangements which are found to operate against the public interest.

49. In the whole matter of productivity valuable advice is expected to be obtained from the joint Anglo-American Council which is being set up by the two sides of industry, by British and American management and labour, to exchange information about their industrial experience.

50. There is clear evidence that the measures taken so far are meeting with a substantial response. It is broadly estimated that during the past two years the volume of physical output per worker in manufacturing industry has regained the pre-war level. An important contribution to this remarkable progress has, of course, been the maintenance of industrial peace to a much greater extent than might have been expected in this difficult period of readjustment or as compared with the experience in the corresponding period after the 1914–18 war.

(7) CONTROLS OVER HOME PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

51. Many types of food, fuel and clothing are at present rationed and the Government controls the prices of nearly all foodstuffs and consumer goods and of many raw materials and semi-manufactured goods as well as the charges for some services. These consumer rationing schemes are necessary to-day to secure "fair shares" of essential goods in short supply and to moderate inflationary forces. More directly affecting specific production plans, both in industry and agriculture, are licensing controls over production and allocation or rationing schemes for materials. In the past these have, in conjunction with price controls over certain materials and semi-manufactured goods, served the same anti-inflationary purposes as consumption controls, and they have moderated the severe dislocations that maldistribution and scarce supplies would have caused. They have, moreover, immensely helped the export drive, and the breaking of particular bottlenecks in home production, and secured the devotion of productive resources to the most essential purposes.

52. All these rationing schemes are costly in money and in manpower to administer but the possibility of bringing them to an end depends upon a variety of factors, such, for instance, as the balance between demand and supply, the need to secure fair shares of essentials, and, in the case of food, the securing of proper nutritional standards. It cannot be entirely a coincidence that despite the strain of war and the limitation of supplies of many valuable foodstuffs in the last few years, the general health of the British population has continued to improve, as may particularly be seen from the trend of the infant and maternal mortality rates.

53. Controls over production, however exercised, undoubtedly restrain initiative and enterprise. They are being simplified wherever possible. They are means to an end, not ends in themselves, and will be abolished as soon as their advantages appear to be outweighed by their disadvantages. But they will be retained so long as they are needed to implement production plans and in some cases it is unlikely that they can be relaxed for several years.

54. For the future, food rationing will have to be continued as long as is necessary to secure the allied objectives of fair shares and nutritional standards. Other rationing schemes for essential consumer goods can be removed as demand and supply come more into balance.

(8) THE STRENGTH OF STERLING

55. The external economic policies of the United Kingdom to which the remainder of this Chapter is devoted have as their primary objective the attainment of a stable balance of payments. The governing principle behind them is that the sterling area gold and dollar reserves must be maintained throughout the period of the economic recovery programme, and that in consequence expenditure of gold and dollars must be limited to the amount of gold and dollars earned together with the amount of external aid received.

56. The whole of the United Kingdom's balance of payments policy thus rests on the maintenance and strengthening of sterling as an international currency. Not only is this vital to the immediate interests of the United Kingdom; it is equally important to the other members of the sterling area and to all other countries which conduct much of their trade in sterling. This policy is itself a positive contribution to international economic stability.

(9) EXPORT POLICY

57. Among policies dealing directly with the problem of the overseas deficit, the expansion of exports takes first place. But it is obvious that it is impossible to "plan" to sell a given volume of exports in any given period since a willingness abroad to buy is as important as the United Kingdom's capacity to supply. A number of domestic policies are directed to ensuring that, wherever possible, ample supplies are available for export. The Government has established the practice of laying down each year, in consultation with each industry, a series of export targets, and has appealed to industry, with very considerable success, to co-operate in reaching them as a matter of national endeavour. Supporting this voluntary effort, general fiscal measures help to prevent the pressure of home demand from restricting export supplies and to secure that production for export is at least as profitable as production for the home market. So long as physical controls over raw materials and production are available, they provide a further means of seeing that production for export is kept at the highest possible level.

58. The means open to Government of directing exports to particular markets are necessarily limited. The growth of British exports rests on innumerable separate transactions. The building of a connection for a steady trade in any individual market is slow and costly and it is rarely possible to switch selling effort quickly from one line or market to another. The policy of the Government has, therefore, been to indicate in broad terms the markets to which it attaches most importance. Special emphasis has been laid on sales to the Western Hemisphere, and assistance is given to manufacturers seeking to promote such exports. These efforts will, however, be fruitless unless exporters are given the opportunity to enter these markets.

59. As already pointed out, neither these nor any other export policies can guarantee a given expansion of exports. Planning cannot be based upon an ideal figure: it must work on a realistic assessment of probable trends. In the provisional estimates of the overseas balance in 1952–53 given in Chapter VI, the volume of exports of 150 per cent. of 1938 has, for reasons there stated, been taken as such a realistic assessment. But it is in no sense a maximum and policy will be adapted to achieve a higher level if sales opportunities allow.

(10) IMPORT POLICY

60. The nature of British imports, which are mainly primary products, is such that planning measures can be applied so far as this is necessary. Despite the utmost exertions in the export field, the volume of imports is bound to remain below the pre-war level well beyond 1952–53, and Government control over imports is expected to be required in 1952–53 and for some years thereafter.

61. In addition to the need to keep imports down to a total consistent with its overseas earnings, the United Kingdom is compelled to pay careful regard to the sources from which it secures these imports. The achievement of a stable balance of payments requires, according to any realistic analysis of possible world economic trends, a change in the distribution of imports from the acutely distorted pattern of 1947. In particular, as is explained in more detail in Chapter VI, imports from the Western Hemisphere in 1952–53 seems likely to be some 17½ per cent. below the planned level for 1948–49, which is in turn below the 1947 level. This contraction, which is a matter of necessity and not choice, involves a considerable change in the source of supply of a number of commodities. In the majority of cases the increased production in the sterling area is being achieved by private capital in the ordinary course of business. Special Governmental arrangements are, however, made, especially as regards food supplies, and these often take the form of long-term contracts to give assurance to the producer of a market for his crop. Developments in the associated overseas territories are described in Chapter V.

(11) THE OBJECTIVE OF MULTILATERALISM

62. The prospective position of the United Kingdom in 1952–53, as set out in Chapter VI, underlines the importance of working for the application of multilateral principles of trade and finance over increasingly wide areas. The United Kingdom's balance of payments policy is designed to encourage movement as fast as possible in this direction. The impossibility of maintaining the convertibility of sterling which was attempted in 1947 made it necessary to embark upon a system of bilateral agreements in order to secure the continuance of as large a volume of international trade as possible. But these agreements have been expressly directed to expand trade by allowing each party to use its purchasing power in the other country in the way that suits it best and thus to maintain the exporter's confidence in the continuance of his market and to counter any danger of a downward spiral in international trade. Throughout the difficult post-war period the United Kingdom has remained the centre of the largest multilateral trading system in the world—the sterling area—and has sought, wherever possible, to extend the field of uses to which sterling can be put. During the E.R.P. period the United Kingdom will seek progressively to widen the scope of multilateral trade and payments agreements. It has already taken its full share in the formulation of the new Intra-European Payments Scheme.

63. In considering the long-term O.E.E.C. programme, the United Kingdom would, therefore, deprecate attempts to work towards complete bilateral balance even between broad geographical groups. On present calculations, it seems likely that the sterling area as a whole will tend to be in surplus with the other participating countries. It is not expected that in the early 'fifties the other participating countries will in general be able to finance such a surplus in dollars or gold, and so contribute to meeting the United Kingdom's dollar deficit. But it is thought possible that part of this surplus could be matched against the sterling area's deficit with certain other non-participating countries in the Middle East, in Eastern Europe and in South America. For example if the sterling area were in deficit with Brazil, and if France had a surplus with Brazil and a deficit with the sterling area of the same amount, it would be possible to clear these deficits against one another provided that appropriate payments arrangements existed. The development of multilateral payments arrangements between the participating countries and their monetary areas should not be allowed to develop in any way which would prejudice the matching of surpluses and deficits over a much wider field.

64. How fast the United Kingdom will be able to modify its own trading and financial policies in the direction of a more complete multilateralism depends upon a number of factors outside its control. No multilateral system can work while large disequilibria exist in important trading countries' balances of payments either in the creditor or debtor sense. The necessary structural changes have to be made in each country's pattern of production, consumption and trade before a sound multilateral system can be firmly established.

(12) THE EXPANSION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

65. Subject to the overriding objective of achieving a balance of payments, it is the policy of the United Kingdom to expand the total volume of international trade to take the fullest advantage of the international division of labour. To this end it has participated in international negotiations designed to reduce the obstacles to the free interchange of world production and services.

66. As regards the obligations assumed by signatories under Article 6 of the Convention, the Government of the United Kingdom, by their provisional application from 1st January, 1948, of the commitments under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade for the reduction or elimination of a number of tariffs and preferences, have already taken practical steps towards the fulfilment of the objectives both of the Convention and of the Havana Charter as is recognised by Article 17 (3) of the latter document. They are continuing as Contracting Parties to the General Agreement to co-operate with other countries in discussions directed to the expansion of international trade on a multilateral basis. The United Kingdom will take part in the further tariff negotiations to be held next April with the object of bringing a number of additional countries within the scope of the General Agreement.

67. The shipping policy of the United Kingdom has been directed to the removal of all obstacles to the free international circulation of shipping. In particular, the United Kingdom has been active in the promotion of the Convention for the setting up of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organisation, one of the objectives of which is to "encourage the removal of discriminatory action and unnecessary restrictions by Governments affecting shipping engaged in international trade so as to promote the availability of shipping services to the commerce of the world without discrimination."

(13) INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

68. The external policies described in the preceeding five sections will require for their successful fulfilment a very large measure of international co-operation with the other participating countries and the other countries of the British Commonwealth in all matters affecting overseas trade and economic affairs. In particular they imply a continuous observance of the principles laid down in the Convention for European Economic Co-operation and the Economic Co-operation Agreement with the United States Government. As part of this co-operative endeavour the United Kingdom attaches special importance to the studies of the "fields of activity" which are being undertaken by the O.E.E.C. in order to expand the production of essential supplies by, or in collaboration with, the participating countries. It is hoped that other projects likely to offer prospects for successful co-operation will suggest themselves when the national programmes are jointly examined in Paris. The United Kingdom will play its full part both in the exploratory work and in implementing any agreed projects that may emerge.

CHAPTER III.—MAJOR INDUSTRIAL PLANS

69. This chapter discusses the production policies of various industries which will have a large part to play in the economic recovery of the United Kingdom.

(1) AGRICULTURE

70. Before the war imports of food and feeding-stuffs accounted for 47 per cent. of total imports. Plans were announced in 1947 which sought to secure by 1952 an increase in the net value of annual agricultural output 15 per cent. above the wartime peak of 1943–44. This should yield in terms of calories for human consumption one-third more than before the war. In addition increased home output will save the equivalent of 4 million tons of imported feeding-stuffs. Production at this level would exceed the highest output hitherto known by the agricultural industry.

71. The production targets for the principal crops and livestock products for 1952–53 as compared with figures for earlier years are as follows :—

	'000 metric tons
	1934–38 Average	1947–48 Actual	1948–49 Programme	1952–53 Programme
Bread grains	1,751	1,716	2,284	2,764
Coarse grains	2,876	4,585	5,277	5,644
Meat and bacon	1,485	885	958	1,468
Milk and milk products	703	913	938	1,067
Potatoes	4,951*	7,890	10,100	7,750
Sugar beet (roots)	2,785*	2,932	3,650	3,650

* 1936–39.

Separate figures for production of the main livestock products may be summarised as follows :—

	1952–53 as per cent. of 1936–39
Milk	123
Beef and Veal	110
Mutton and Lamb	83
Pigmeat	92
Eggs	131

72. The acreage of wheat in 1951–52 has been set at 2¾ million acres. This is considered to be the highest that can be maintained as a permanent feature of British farming without an acute distortion of the general farming pattern and a loss of soil fertility. As the supply of alternative foods improves it is intended to reduce the area devoted to potatoes to approximately 50 per cent. above pre-war. Vigorous efforts are being made to extend the cultivation of linseed, a new crop which is of particular value as a source of cattle cake and of oil for industrial purposes.

73. The expansion of livestock production necessitates larger acreages under coarse grains and other fodder crops if dependence on imported feedingstuffs is to be reduced. Substantial improvements are being planned in grass production and grass drying. Special emphasis is being laid on ley farming as a means of maintaining the arable acreage and at the same time improving the yield of grass for feeding purposes. The planned increases in livestock production are very large by comparison with current levels of output, which reflect the shortage of feedingstuffs, the results of the wartime reduction of flocks and herds and, particularly in the case of sheep and lambs, the heavy loss in the hard winter of 1946–47.

74. The following specific measures for achieving the objectives may be mentioned :—

(a) Provision of Farm Buildings.—It is hoped to provide approximately $400 million of farm buildings in the next four years. These include steel Dutch barns and buildings to house grain-drying plant.

(b) Provision of Machinery.—Rapid progress has been made over recent years in the mechanisation of United Kingdom agriculture, and it is now one of the most highly mechanised in the world. The number of tractors of all kinds in use has risen from some 50,000 in 1939 to over 250,000 to-day and big developments have taken place in the employment of other implements. Over the next four years farms will require replacements and new machinery at the rate of $200 million a year. The total tractor strength will be maintained at about 275,000 to 300,000, the increase over mid-1948 being mainly in the number of heavy types, including crawlers; the number of combine harvesters will rise from 6,500 to at least 11,000, which is the figure planned for 1950, and grass driers from 400 to at least 1,500 The United Kingdom already supplies most of her own requirements of agricultural machinery and has developed a substantial and expanding export trade which is of increasing assistance to other participating countries and to world food production generally. Research workers are examining the problems of agricultural mechanisation, including the standardisation of machinery.

(c) Fertilisers.—The quantity used in 1947–48 was more than double that used before the war, but consumption will need to be further increased by at least one-fifth if the expansion programme is to be carried out. Despite the fact that this year more fertilisers have been produced in the United Kingdom than ever before, the country is still dependent upon imports. For example, all supplies of potash and phosphate rock have to be imported.

(d) Maintenance and Improvement of Land Drainage and Water Supplies.—By 1952–53 $60 million will have been spent on improving main arterial water courses. About 2½ million acres of land will be improved by the clearance of farm ditches and field drainage during the next four years at a cost of $36 million. About $32 million will be spent on providing piped water supplies to farms. Between 1 and 1½ million acres will benefit.

(e) Feedingstuffs.—Imports of feedingstuffs included in the programme for 1952–53 though more than at present, will still be below the pre-war level. The increased production of feedingstuffs at home is therefore vital to the expansion in livestock. Subject to the maximum practicable production of bread grains, farmers are at present allowed to grow fodder crops, e.g., oats, mixed corn, and to retain these crops for feeding to their own stock; they may also retain strictly limited quantities of wheat, rye and barley. There is strict control of distribution and methods of utilisation both of bread grains and of animal feedingstuffs, and virtually all the feedingstuffs imported, manufactured within the country, or sold off farms are distributed through the feedingstuffs rationing scheme. Quantities of grain of their own growing retained by farmers are taken into account in the allocation of feedingstuffs rations to them. As stated in paragraphs 47–51, controls must be continued for some considerable time, but may need to be modified to conform with the increased home production of fodder crops and with the changes in imports of feedingstuffs so that the best use is made of all available resources for achieving the desired expansion of livestock production.

(f) Finance.—The total fixed investment required in the industry in four years up to the end of 1952 is estimated at approximately $1,800 million, about half of which will be spent on machinery. Prices of farm products have been raised to help the farmer to finance this investment and to increase his livestock. Ad hoc grants or subsidies are also given to encourage desirable developments such as the ploughing up of grassland of three years or over. The Government has undertaken to reimburse Artificial Insemination Centres for any losses they may incur in the early years of their activity. Under the price-fixing mechanism of the Agriculture Act 1947, the farmer is assured that the prices of crops will be fixed eighteen months ahead and, in the case of livestock and livestock products, minimum prices are made known two to four years ahead.

75. The fulfilment of the programme depends ultimately on the skill and initiative of the farming community. Each county has an Agricultural Executive Committee, consisting of representatives of farmers, landworkers and landowners to ensure by propaganda and persuasion that the crop targets are achieved and to assist farmers by the hire of machinery and supplementary labour, by contract services and by the provision of short-term credit facilities. Working with these committees is the National Agricultural Advisory Service of about 1,300 qualified technical officers, available to advise farmers on all questions of technical improvement and efficient production. Special attention is being given to grassland improvement. Where advisory methods fail to secure greater efficiency, the Agricultural Act 1947 gives the County Agricultural Executive Committee powers to enforce standards of good husbandry, even to the point of dispossessing inefficient farmers. The Act also enables the Minister of Agriculture, subject to Parliamentary approval, and for one year at a time, to authorise the committees to issue directions to farmers in order to maintain the national food supply. These powers have been invoked, where necessary, in order to ensure the essential expansion of the tillage area in 1949. Corresponding powers and machinery exist in Scotland.

76. Agricultural research will play an important part in raising efficiency. The Research Institutes guided by the Agricultural Research Council are very active, and an Agricultural Improvement Council sees that the results of research are made known and used. A series of experimental husbandry farms and horticultural stations has been set up to enable research workers to test the results of their research work under practical farming conditions.

77. The expansion programme will require about 75,000 more civilian agricultural workers than in 1946. The provision of more rural housing to enable the recruitment of more British workers and their families is an important part of the campaign. Farm workers are not called up for military service. 32,000 Poles and European Volunteer Workers had been recruited for permanent settlement by June 1948. Most of these workers are being accommodated for the time being in hostels. In addition 23,000 German prisoners of war have been allowed to stay as civilians at their own request.

78. The programme will still leave the United Kingdom the world's greatest food importer, and it would certainly be the Government's hope that, if the means of payment could be found, a still larger volume of food and feedingstuffs imports than is shown in the 1952–53 estimates could be acquired.

79. Fishing.—By 1952, about eighty new trawlers will be in commission with an average capacity of up to 700,000 lbs. of fish. As a result it is hoped by then to expand output by about $32 million a year. Landings will then be well above pre-war. New factories planned by the herring industry for the production of herring oil and meal will also be in operation. Regard is being paid to the necessity of preventing over-fishing in the North Sea and the majority of the new vessels now being built will be fishing in other areas.

(2) COAL

80. The United Kingdom is almost completely dependent upon coal for industry, trade and domestic purposes since indigenous supplies of other fuels are insignificant. Coal has also been a traditional export, valuable both for itself and because it has provided an outward freight for the shipping industry and thus reduced the transport cost of imported food and raw materials.

81. The importance of coal exports is now greater than ever before since it can directly reduce the dollar expenditure of other European countries. In 1947 shipments of United States coal to the participating countries amounted to 36 million tons, at a cost (excluding freight) of about $337 million. The estimated figures for 1948 are 25 million tons and $275 million respectively. The substitution of this quantity of American coal by British or other European coal is clearly essential to the restoration of Europe's balance of payments. Furthermore, coal exports to Canada and Argentina can be useful earners of hard currencies.

82. For these reasons a large increase in British coal output is planned for the four-year period. Output has already recovered a good deal of ground since 1945, when it amounted to only 186 million metric tons, rising to 193 million tons (184 million deep-mined) in 1946 and 201 million tons (190 million deep-mined) in 1947. During the first 35 weeks of 1948 output has been 9 million metric tons above the output for the corresponding period of 1947. Output per man-shift rose from 1·02 metric tons in 1945 to 1·05 in 1946 and 1·09 tons in 1947, and is currently about 1·12. Exports and foreign bunker shipments have increased from 5·4 million tons in 1947 to the current rate of 20 million tons a year. The commitment to supply 13 million tons of solid fuel exports to participating countries and bunker shipments in 1948, promised in Paris in July 1947, is well on the way to fulfilment. Substantial shipments are also being made to the American continent. The sharp rate of increase in exports is, however, partly due to a reduction in stocks at home which cannot, of course, continue. Consumption in the United Kingdom has been kept down by restrictions on the use of domestic coal, gas and electricity, by the more efficient use of fuel, and by the effective use of the dirtier coals which have had to be used because of the shortage of cleaning plant.

83. The aims are to produce over the next four years sufficient coal and coke to meet all the requirements of this country at the lowest possible cost in materials and resources, to ensure that the solid fuel needs of Europe will be fully satisfied from European (and in large part from British) sources, and to increase shipments to South America and Canada. So long as abnormal conditions prevail it is only possible to guess at the level which internal demand would reach were supplies freely available. In the export markets uncertainties exist as to the speed of industrial recovery in the participating countries, the availability of additional supplies of solid fuel from Germany and Poland, the total European demand for solid fuel, the prospects of selling British coal in South America, Canada and other distant markets, and the availability of particular qualities of coal. The appraisal of these prospects is clearly a field for European consultation. It has been assumed, however, that demand for United Kingdom exports and bunkers will reach by 1952–53 a level of 40 million metric tons. It should be practicable to meet that demand with a total production (including opencast production) of between 250–260 million metric tons. This will require over the next four years an increase of some 40 million metric tons of deep-mined coal. It implies an annual increase of about 5 per cent. in output per man-year, a rate substantially higher than has ever been sustained for a long period by any large section of industry. To achieve such an advance will involve a tremendous effort. It means nearly doubling the rate of expansion thought possible for other industries.

84. All this will have to be achieved in the early stages of a long-term programme, involving radical reconstruction of the whole industry, which is expected to extend over a 15-year period. A rapid development in productivity during this time will be hard to achieve, especially as it will necessarily take a long time to complete the underground haulage reorganisation, and the design and construction of large-scale surface cleaning plant, upon which much reliance must be placed for increased productivity and improved quality. Every effort will also be made to reduce internal consumption by the more efficient use of our fuel supplies—a field in which very considerable success has already been achieved.

85. Underground haulage productivity must be raised as quickly as possible from the present figure of about 5 tons a manshift to 20–25 tons obtained in the most modern European mines. This is largely a matter of replanning and driving tunnels for locomotives. For reasons of working space the speed at which tunnels can be driven is limited, and, because of the age of British coal mines and the great distance of most workings from the deep shafts, these new tunnels must be long. Improved haulage will make mining operations run more smoothly and release men in considerable numbers for face work.

86. Many surface cleaning plants are already in hand, and plants ordered or projected should be able by 1952 to deal with 70 per cent. of total coal output. These plants will release men from hand picking coal, and the coal produced from them will be burnt at higher efficiencies.

87. Productivity at the coal face is already highly mechanised with 75 per cent. of the output mechanically cut and face conveyed in 1947. The chief means of improved productivity by further face mechanisation must, therefore, be looked for in the installation of mechanical loaders. Geological conditions in the British coalfields, however, do not lend themselves readily to this form of mechanisation by reason of the great depths at which many seams are worked with consequential difficulties in roof control.

88. During the four years ending December 1952 the Coal Board expect to invest nearly $600 million on development and reconstruction, including plant replacement. A large part of this expenditure will be devoted to the three principal mining activities referred to above. In addition it is proposed progressively to close down the less efficient mines, to concentrate working within existing collieries, and to undertake an extensive programme of drift mining. At the same time plans are being worked out for the major reconstruction of existing collieries, new sinkings and the like, which can hardly be expected to yield any considerable returns by the end of the period.

(3) OIL

89. The world's current consumption of oil is already 70 per cent. higher than in 1938. The United States of America's present consumption alone is about equal to the world's total consumption in 1938, and as the United States of America has now become a net importer of oil—it has been for years a very considerable exporter—the shortage for the rest of the world is an acute problem. A very large expansion of oil production is, therefore, necessary if economic recovery in Europe and the development of those territories to which Europe must increasingly turn for her supplies of food and raw materials are not to be retarded.

90. The United Kingdom has a special interest in the expansion of oil supplies. In spite of the fact that the output of the British oil companies is much greater than consumption in the United Kingdom, particularly at the very restricted level which it has imposed upon itself, the oil industry makes at present the largest single claim for dollar expenditure. The British-controlled oil companies are engaged in a highly complex foreign trade. Their activities involve large dollar expenditure both for operating expenses and the purchase of equipment. In addition, large quantities of oil are still having to be purchased by British companies from United States companies to meet their market requirements in non-dollar areas. A substantial part of this dollar expenditure is incurred in order to make oil available to the participating countries of Europe. In all, the British companies sold for inland consumption over 10 million metric tons of oil to the participating countries (excluding the United Kingdom) in 1947. This will rise to about 13 million tons in 1948 and will then constitute 40 per cent. of their total estimated oil supplies. These supplies are essential to the economic recovery of the participating countries; trade and industry would be most seriously dislocated if they were withheld. When it is appreciated that this assistance to recovery and development of the European recovery is made at the cost of a substantial drain on the United Kingdom's gold and dollar resources it will be realised that the United Kingdom's oil supplies constitute an altogether outstanding immediate contribution to European collaboration.

91. To deal with this situation oil production and refining capacity by British companies are being expanded both to reduce the need to purchase oil from dollar sources and to enable more oil to be sold to dollar purchasers. British companies (including under this heading the Royal Dutch Shell group) produced 46 million tons of crude oil in 1946 and nearly 54 million tons in 1947. This year it is hoped to increase production to 64 million tons. In 1953 the expansion of the industry should yield approximately double the 1947 output.

92. The main contribution will come from the development of concessions held outside the dependent overseas territories, principally in the Middle East and Venezuela. Production in British Borneo and Trinidad, about 4½ million tons in 1947, is expected to increase to about 6 million tons, as a result of extensions in hand.

93. An important feature of the expansion programme is the development of refinery capacity. A large industry will be established within the United Kingdom capable of treating nearly 20 million tons of crude oil a year, compared with a through-put of 2½ million tons in 1947. Seven new refineries or major extensions will be erected in the United Kingdom at an approximate cost of $500 million. Work has already begun on three of them. This ambitious project will make a major change in the oil position of the United Kingdom. Imports of crude oil will increasingly replace imports of refined products and give rise to large savings in foreign exchange.

The new plants will result in a much greater variety of products being refined in the United Kingdom and will stimulate the development of a petroleum chemical industry capable of producing many organic chemicals now imported from hard currency sources. Refinery capacity owned by British companies outside the United Kingdom is also being increased considerably. A new refinery is now under construction in Venezuela, while increases in capacity in Holland, the Middle East, and the East Indies are already under way or planned. Capacity overseas will be increased by more than 40 per cent. compared with 1947.

94. With regard to the pipe-line projects, increased output in the Iraq fields will necessitate increasing the capacity of the existing pipe-lines which carry the oil to the Mediterranean coast. British companies in conjunction with American companies also have plans for building pipe-lines to carry crude oil from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean coast.

95. The programme of the British oil companies is vast. If it is successfully carried out, it is estimated that the dollar-saving and dollar-earning effect of the increased output will reduce the net dollar drain on oil in the United Kingdom balance of payments very considerably. The increased availability of sterling oil will, of course, make it possible for British companies to play their part in meeting the rising needs of the rest of the world including the sterling area and participating countries and will be an important contribution to the Recovery Programme. But it will be possible to achieve these objectives only if the large quantities of steel and steel equipment required for the programme are made available to the companies. It is estimated that in 1949–52 over 1 million tons of steel will be needed for plant and buildings over and above 2½ million tons for maintenance, production and marketing. Part of this can only be obtained from the United States. The rest must come from the United Kingdom and other continental steel producers can help in this by increasing their supplies to the United Kingdom of the steel it needs. The satisfaction of current requirements is already placing a heavy strain on United Kingdom steel supplies. While more steel will become available for oil development as United Kingdom steel production expands, it is clear that the carrying out of the full programme in good time and the meeting of this large demand for steel will require the co-operation of other participating countries, who will so largely benefit from it.

(4) IRON AND STEEL

96. The United Kingdom steel industry is now operating at the full stretch of its steel-making capacity. The official target for output of crude steel in 1948 is 14·7 million ingot tons, but there are good hopes that this figure will be exceeded. Produetion up to the end of August was at a rate equivalent to 14·9 million tons a year, and for many weeks output has been maintained at an annual rate of over 15¼ million tons. Home output of crude steel in the United Kingdom is not, however, sufficient to meet demand. There is an excess of finishing capacity, but it has not been possible to obtain sufficient supplies of imported semi-finished steel to employ this capacity fully.

97. A review has recently been made of the probable demand for steel in the United Kingdom in the 1950's. This indicates a total requirement for home and export in the region of 18¼ million ingot tons a year. Consumption for home use, including consumption in the manufacture of goods for export, is estimated at 15¾ to 16¼ million ingot tons. The possible demand for steel for export as such has been estimated at 2 to 2½ million ingot tons. This may be compared with actual supplies for all purposes, including exports, of 14·4 million ingot tons in 1947 and 13·2 million ingot tons in the years 1937–38.

98. The considerable increase in the estimated requirements of steel in the 1950's as compared with pre-war arises from three main causes. First, there has already been a very great substitution of steel for timber—for example, in coal mines and in the building of railway wagons. This tendency may be expected to continue. Second, a large part of the expected expansion of exports is in engineering products. Third, the high level of investment needed to restore and modernise the industries of the United Kingdom will make demands on steel which will certainly continue for some years beyond the period of this Programme.

99. Since the war ended the steel industry has embarked on a major re-equipment and development plan, the first stage of which is estimated to cost about $1,000 million. Included in this figure is certain specialised plant (in particular a continuous strip mill), valued at $70 million, which is being obtained from the United States and is a most important contribution to the scheme. The objects of the plan as a whole are to make good the modernisation and development postponed by the war, to increase capacity, and to lower costs by concentrating production. Under this plan, the production of crude steel in 1952–53 will rise to 17 million ingot tons. Some developments, which will expand the capacity for the production of crude steel still further, will not be finished until 1953 or 1954.

100. Despite the increased output of crude steel there will still be in 1952 some excess of finishing capacity which could be employed only by the import of some 650,000 tons of steel for finishing. Having regard, however, to the supplies likely to be available, only 440,000 tons (i.e., 380,000 tons of semi-finished steel, and 90,000 tons of material for tubes and wire) have been provided for in estimating the import programme for 1952–53. This quantity will be imported under the already existing agreements with continental steel producers which do not expire until 1953. With these supplies it will be possible to produce 17·5 m. tons of finished steel (in terms of ingot equivalent). The level of the import demand for semi-finished steel in 1952–53 contrasts with the existing position where, owing to the present large excess of finishing capacity over crude steel capacity in the United Kingdom, there is a demand for imports of semi-finished steel of some 1·5 m. tons a year, which can be met only in small part, chiefly from the continent of Europe. One of the main features of the steel development plan is, therefore, the reduction of the gap between steel making and steel finishing capacities. This will reduce the United Kingdom's dependence on imports of semi-finished steel, which is expected to remain difficult to obtain from abroad in any quantity, and will eliminate the present need to seek substantial supplies from dollar sources.

101. It will be seen that there is a gap between this forecast of output of finished steel and the demand estimated in paragraph 97 above. It is expected that this will be partly closed by the use of second-hand material arising in the United Kingdom (estimated at 200,000 ingot tons) and by the import of 400,000 tons of finished steel (in terms of ingot equivalent), most of it under the existing agreements with the Continental steel producers. Unless additional imports of semi-finished steel are available, the remainder of the gap can be filled only by importing more finished steel from other O.E.E.C. countries, but whether or not it will be desirable to do this will depend on the strength of the demand for United Kingdom exports of steel. No provision has been made for such supplementary supplies of finished steel in the import programme. On the assumption that the home demand, taken as 14·8 million ingot tons, is met in full, provision has been made for exports of 1·6 million tons of finished steel (2·1 million tons in terms of ingot equivalent), including supplies to the oil industry abroad and for capital development in the sterling area. The position will, however, be reconsidered in the light of the discussion by the O.E.E.C. of the long-term programmes submitted by other participating countries.

102. A notable feature of the development plan is the modernisation and expansion of blast furnace capacity, which is designed to serve a three-fold purpose. It will increase the production of pig iron for steel making to 9·3 million tons in 1952–53 compared with 7·2 million tons in 1948, and also expand the output of foundry pig iron. The installation of the latest equipment will yield a marked saving in fuel consumption—a matter of first importance since great efforts will be needed to maintain the supply and quality of coking coal and coke to keep pace with the expansion of the steel industry. An increased output of pig iron will diminish the pressure on scrap supplies.

103. As regards particular types of finished steel products, the expansion of capacity will be particularly important in sheets and tinplate. The total output from the sheet and tinplate mills in 1952 is estimated to be sufficient to meet the home demand and to provide for export about 375,000 tons of tinplate and 175,000 tons of sheets. The improvement in the production of sheets and tinplate should enable the United Kingdom in the 1950's to make an important contribution to the supplies of the other O.E.E.C. countries. The Paris report of 1947 showed that in 1951 there would be a net import demand for tinplate by the O.E.E.C. countries on the United States of 250,000 tons a year. Full operation of the United Kingdom's new mill by 1952–53 should enable this prospective dollar drain to be considerably reduced.

104. On the heavy side of the industry, the main feature of the plan is the proposed installation of mills for rolling constructional sections. In the case of plates and light sections, the plan is concerned with the modernisation rather than the expansion of capacity. There will be a substantial increase in the output of wire rod, from about 750,000 tons in 1948 to over 1 m. tons in 1952. At present the United Kingdom is obliged to include a substantial quantity of wire rod in her import programme and indeed has considerable difficulty in obtaining the imports needed; the development plan is designed to eliminate this need for imports.

105. A further expansion of steel-making and finishing capacity in the United Kingdom is under consideration in the light of the present forward estimates of demand, but the existing development plan will be well on its way to completion before any new plans can be put into operation.

106. The following table briefly summarises the principal statistics:—

(5) ENGINEERING

107. The engineering industries are directly involved in nearly every aspect of economic recovery: in the mechanisation of agriculture; in the re-equipment of home industries and public utilities; in the export of capital goods not only to pay for current imports but also to develop the resources of the participating countries, the sterling area and other parts of the world.

108. Between 1938 and 1948 the production of the mechanical and electrical engineering sections of this industrial group has increased by about one half and it is expected that by 1952 production will rise still further to about 70 per cent. above the 1938 level.

109. Exports of all engineering products are at present over twice the level of 1938 and account for about 40 per cent. of the United Kingdom's total visible exports. By the end of 1948 the engineering industries as a whole should be exporting 230 per cent. by volume of their 1938 exports. The aim is to maintain at least this high level throughout the period under review

110. The supply of machinery for home investment (including a small but important amount of imported equipment) was in 1947 about 20 per cent. above the pre-war level. By 1952 it is expected to increase the rate of supply to 40 per cent. above the 1938 level. The expansion of output of industrial machinery and equipment will exceed that of vehicles and other metal goods Much of this plant will be needed in the next few years to make good the arrears of replacement accumulated during the war; part will go to increase the capacity of other exporting industries; all of it will increase the efficiency of British industry.

111. The engineering industries are making a major contribution to the agricultural expansion programme. In addition to a wide range of other agricultural machinery they are now producing agricultural tractors at a rate of 100,000 per annum compared with a pre-war output of some 12,000 a year and an output in 1947 of 56,000. This rate will be increased as steel supplies expand. Some 50,000 tractors a year are currently being exported and as the demand from the United Kingdom agricultural industry is approaching the point at which it will be stabilised at the replacement level, the major part of the increased production will be available for export. It is expected that about 27,000 agricultural and industrial tractors will be exported to the participating countries in 1948–49. Steps are being taken to encourage the manufacture of larger wheeled tractors, crawler tractors and specialised types of agricultural machinery for which the United Kingdom and the sterling area generally have hitherto been dependent on imported supplies from the Western Hemisphere.

112. The engineering industries are also making a direct contribution to the reduction of dollar expenditure by developing or manufacturing under licence types of equipment hitherto imported including agricultural machinery, specialised machine tools, contractors' plant, automatic textile and hosiery machinery, office appliances and a diverse range of other equipment used throughout industry. Continued encouragement will be given to this process.

113. It is not possible to give in precise quantitative terms a programme for the engineering industries as they are not a homogeneous entity. They consist of at least as many different sections as there are industries using their products. The broad objectives, for which it is believed material supplies will be adequate, are:—

(a) To achieve by 1952 an aggregate output in mechanical and electrical engineering 170 per cent. of the 1938 level; vehicles 135 per cent., and tools and implements 160 per cent.;

(b) to maintain the export of engineering products as a whole at not less than 230 per cent. of the 1938 level;

(c) to organise the productive capacity of the industries so as to produce the equipment needed for the home investment programme in the required quantity, type of product and time;

(d) to develop those categories of engineering exports likely to make the best and quickest contribution to the restoration of economic stability, namely, those which will increase the hard currency earnings, or reduce hard currency expenditure of the United Kingdom and other sterling area members of the Commonwealth, develop the production of foodstuffs and raw materials in the sterling area and other overseas territories, and contribute to the re-equipment of the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the participating countries;

(e) to maintain and improve the efficiency of the industry by research, the application of new techniques, good management and improved skills.

The various controls over resources exercised by the Government will be used to these ends.

(6) CHEMICALS

114. The production of chemicals has a major contribution to make both towards righting the balance of payments and increasing industrial production generally. For some years large amounts of organic chemicals and plastic materials have been imported from North America, including molasses, alcohols, solvents, and a wide range of oil derivatives, together with materials for the rapidly growing plastics industry. Expenditure has been in the region of $60–70 million a year. Increased production will also help the sterling area and participating countries to reduce purchases for dollars. Exports have increased rapidly and in the second quarter of 1948 were 56 per cent. above the 1938 level. By 1952 it is hoped that they will be 90 per cent. above 1938.

115. The main object is to increase production in nearly all branches of the industry: organic chemicals and plastic materials, dyestuffs and basic chemicals (particularly alkalis). The current dollar expenditure of over $60 million a year for the import of organic chemicals will be almost eliminated. A surplus for export will become available. The increases in production will also put the organic chemicals industry into a more balanced state. At present it is largely self-supporting in coal tar products, and to a lesser extent in derivatives of ethyl alcohol obtained from the fermentation of molasses, but production is deficient in the large number of chemicals obtained from cracking oil.

116. Progress is also being made in making up the leeway lost during the war in keeping pace with developments in the manufacture of plastics. Production of the main plastic materials in use at present is being expanded and within three years United Kingdom production will be sufficient to make most imports unnecessary and provide for expanded exports. By 1952 United Kingdom output of plastics should be three times as great as in 1938.

117. About 95 per cent. of the dye-stuffs required by industry are already made in the United Kingdom; the remaining 5 per cent. must be imported mainly from Europe. Increased capacity, at a cost of about $40–50 million, is being installed to meet increasing demands, and by 1952 British production will be about 30 per cent. greater than in 1947. It should then cover the majority of the newer and faster dyestuffs required by industry of which the supply from United Kingdom sources is not yet adequate.

118. Soda ash is now unrationed for the home trade and all the demands of the export market on this country are likely now to be met in full. An increase of 40 per cent. over the 1947 production capacity is in hand, which should meet growing demands over the next few years. The shortage of caustic soda is serious. Although most essential needs at home are being met, exports are substantially less than the demand. Increases of 80 per cent. over the 1947 production capacity are in hand but it will be some years before the new plant can be in full operation. These extensions will enable the Sterling Area from now onwards to increase its exports of soda ash and caustic soda to South America and the Far East.

119. Prospective United Kingdom production of nitrogenous fertilisers will be sufficient for some expansion in home consumption and for the maintenance of the long-established export trade to Commonwealth countries and the Far East. Existing plans to increase capacity in Europe, North America, India and Australia will contribute largely to overcoming the present world shortage, but the need for additional United Kingdom output is also being considered. As regards the other fertilisers, some increase in the output of superphosphates is planned.

120. By 1952, as a result of these developments costing in all some $800 million, the United Kingdom chemical industry will meet all major needs of domestic industry and maintain an extended export trade in many parts of the world. The contribution to European recovery will come not so much through exports to Europe, which already has a large chemical industry with a wide range of products, but rather in reducing the sterling area's demands for dollars to buy essential chemicals from North America.

(7) TEXTILES

121. The United Kingdom textile industries not only provide the home market with one of the basic necessities of life, but also make an export contribution of outstanding importance. Even in 1947, when exports were well below the 1938 level, they earned $900 million out of the total visible exports of $4,600 million. In recent months about one-sixth of textile exports have been going to the United States, Canada and Argentina, one-sixth to the countries of Western Europe, and over half to other countries of the sterling area. The expansion of textile exports has until now been limited by the level of production and the minimum needs of the home consumer.

122. Before the war the cotton industry had been suffering for several decades from a long-term contraction of the demand for its products, upon which were superimposed large-scale fluctuations due to the international trade cycle. Prolonged depression of trade, heavy unemployment and under-maintenance of capital equipment were the results. In wool there was no long-term decline in demand, though the industry suffered severely in periods of cyclical depression such as 1932–34. The young rayon industry, on the other hand, was expanding rapidly.

123. Textile output declined and export trade was sacrificed as labour was transferred from civilian industries to war production and to the fighting services. The cotton and wool industries emerged from the war with a greatly depleted labour force and with plant and equipment suffering from heavy arrears of maintenance and replacement—worse in the cotton industry because pre-war difficulties had caused under-maintenance.

124. Since the war substantial progress has been made. In the second quarter of 1948 the cotton industry's production was about 28 per cent. higher than the 1945 rate, while the quantity exported was 70 per cent. higher. This increase in production corresponds closely with the increase in the labour force over the same period. Labour, output and exports are still, however, substantially below the pre-war level. In the wool industry manpower rose by 35 per cent. between mid-1945 and the end of last year; output has increased considerably, and exports in the second quarter of this year were running at a rate about three times as high as that of 1945, and indeed substantially above pre-war. The expansion of the production of synthetic fibres (rayon, nylon, &c.) has been rapid; both output and exports are now considerably greater than pre-war.

125. Further expansion of textile exports is aimed at. For this the output of the textile industries must be increased. It is hoped by 1952 to increase the output of woven cotton and rayon cloth by about 35–40 per cent. over 1947. The production of synthetic fibres is expected to double in the same period. As much as possible of this increased production is to go to increased textile exports, and home consumption will be restrained by rationing or other means so long as this is necessary to the attainment of the required exports. It is expected that exports of cotton goods in 1952 will be at least 80 per cent. greater than in 1947, but the industry will be in a position to secure as great expansion as market opportunities allow. Similarly, wool exports are expected to be between 60 and 80 per cent. above the 1947 level. It should be possible to raise exports of staple fibre to at least double their 1947 level, a large part of the additional supplies going to North America.

126. Various measures are in hand to increase production and to steer a larger proportion of the output into export markets. First, plans have been made for a steady improvement in the capital equipment of the industries. New factories are being built to produce synthetic fibres, needed for industrial purposes of many kinds. Rayon output is expected to increase from about 120,000 tons in 1948 to some 200,000 tons in 1952–53. This should make the United Kingdom largely, if not entirely, independent of dollar imports of industrial yarn. Plans are also in hand for developing new synthetics such as terylene, which is highly resistant to chemicals and moisture, and ardil made from the residue of groundnuts. In the cotton weaving industry it is hoped to install about 30,000 more automatic looms before 1952. Most of these will be produced in the United Kingdom apart from some specialised types of machinery which are being imported from the United States and from Switzerland. It is expected that about 30 per cent. of the capacity of the cotton-spinning industry and a somewhat higher proportion of weaving will be newly equipped by 1952; and this will be achieved concurrently with a large export of British textile machinery, much of it to other participating countries.

127. Special efforts are being made to increase productivity in the cotton industry by the reorganisation of methods of production inside the factory. In cotton weaving the industry is at present working out the details of a scheme to improve incentives to efficiency by changing the wage structure, while at the same time enabling the skilled workers to make the best use of their skill by transferring routine tasks to less skilled assistants. A considerable increase in output per head should eventually be secured as a result.

128. Measures to increase the number of workers in the industry have been adopted. These are the more necessary because fewer women workers are expected to be available in future, a factor of particular importance to the textile industries which rely heavily on female labour and are largely localised in areas where a high proportion of the women are in work. Day nurseries are being provided to enable married women with young children to work in the factories. Particular attention is being given to improvements in working conditions. A large-scale publicity campaign is being conducted to drive home to the public and to potential workers the importance of the industry and the advantages it offers. In the last twelve months the Control of Engagement Order has been used to encourage recruitment. The Government has organised the immigration of displaced persons and foreign nationals to take up employment in textiles, and it is hoped to obtain further recruits from this source both for the cotton and woollen industries.

129. Government control and the allocation of production have been used to ensure that production intended for export is not diverted to the home market. Controls, in the form most convenient, will continue to be used so long as they are necessary.

130. The main statistics are summarised in the following table :—

(8) SHIPPING

131. In 1947 net income from dry cargo shipping services amounted to $121 million. This exceeded the corresponding figure for 1938, partly as a result of the rise in price levels, and it was achieved despite the fact that the fleet available is smaller and relatively older. At the same time, a large proportion of foreign shipping is being employed; there are unsatisfied requirements for ships of the right type and speed for the expansion of the export programme, the development of passenger and tourist trades, and for the cross trades. No comparative figures of earnings by tankers are available, but shipping requirements for the trade in oil have increased out of proportion to the tanker fleet. A much larger proportion of foreign tankers is now on charter to the oil companies than before the war and income from tankers barely balances outgoings.

132. The increase in exports in the next four years is not expected to require appreciably more shipping, since they will be carried in outgoing ships bringing imports into this country. It will, however, account for a large part of the increased income from shipping services that is foreseen.

133. For some years United Kingdom shipping resources have had to be concentrated mainly on the carriage of imports to the United Kingdom and to those territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible. Even so, by chartering tonnage, the United Kingdom has been able to maintain between 3½ and 4 million tons of shipping wholly in the service of other countries. The expected development in world trade should provide opportunities for British shipping to earn more foreign currencies in these so-called "cross trades," but performance must be improved by quicker turn-round and by the introduction of new and faster ships specially designed and constructed for the particular trades they are intended to serve. The rapidly increasing trade in oil requiring shipment from more distant sources of supply calls for a greatly increased amount of tanker tonnage as well as for faster and larger types of tankers.

134. The present programme of shipbuilding for the United Kingdom flag aims at building up, with a conservative allowance for obsolescence and losses, the tonnage of dry cargo vessels (of 500 gross tons and upwards including those with passenger accommodation) to 12·9 million gross tons by the end of 1952 as compared with 12·1 million gross tons at the beginning of 1948 and 13·9 million gross tons in 1939. Since this programme allows for an abnormally low rate of obsolescence, a much greater proportion of the shipping in use in 1952 as compared with before the war or even to-day will be over the age beyond which ships are normally not expected to give efficient service.

135. Delays in United Kingdom ports and in ports overseas in loading and discharging are still seriously retarding the turn-round of ships and reducing the effective performance of British dry cargo shipping. There is to be a sustained effort to improve turn-round in United Kingdom ports, and it is assumed in estimating earnings that conditions will have improved by 1952–53. Efforts are also being made to speed up ship repairs.

136. With the increased and better balanced fleet referred to above, it is expected that the net income on shipping account will be about $360 million in 1952–53. The services of a substantial amount of foreign shipping will still be required, but an increasing proportion of these services should be provided by other participating countries as their own fleets increase. It is, however, a basic condition of the full attainment of these shipping objectives that the United Kingdom, like the other participating countries, should be able to offer shipping services throughout the world in free and fair competition and that there should be no governmental obstruction, by discrimination and other measures, to their acceptance.

137. The principal problem of the United Kingdom, so far as tankers are concerned, is to produce enough tankers for the British oil companies to carry their increased trade. The United Kingdom tanker fleet has already passed its pre-war volume and an increasing proportion of shipbuilding capacity will be employed in the building of tankers during the next four years. The British tanker fleet at the end of 1952 should be 4·3 million gross tons, 0·9 million gross tons more than end-1947 and well above 1939.

138. Requirements, however, may increase by considerably more than this between 1947 and 1952. With a world shortage of tankers it may not be possible to fill the gap by chartering and the building of more tankers must be an important factor in the plan to increase net income from shipping. As more oil supplies have to be carried on the long haul from the Middle East, larger faster tankers operating at lower cost will be needed and port facilities will have to be adapted to accommodate them.

139. Present programmes require an investment by the shipping industry of between $200 million and $250 million a year throughout the period. This is limited not by the capacity of the yards but by the availability of steel.

(9) TOURISM

140. There are no precise figures of the pre-war earnings of the United Kingdom's overseas tourist trade, but they were probably about $120 million per annum. This was at a time when travel was relatively easy and there were few obstacles in the way of the expansion of tourist facilities.

141. With the changed situation resulting from the war, particularly the loss of so many of Britain's invisible exports, tourism has acquired a greatly increased importance. It figures among those industries which can become, relatively rapidly and at a comparatively small cost in capital investment, raw material, labour, &c., one of our major exporting trades and, moreover, one whose dollar content can be outstandingly high.

142. In addition, and perhaps even more important is the fact that tourism, by bringing the peoples of the world together—people of all sorts and from all walks of life—can make an important contribution to the development of international understanding and the lessening of political tension. For this reason it has always been the policy of the United Kingdom to secure the removal of all possible restrictions on foreign travel. To this end agreements have already been negotiated with France, Belgium, Luxembourg, Norway, Denmark, The Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Iceland and Italy for the mutual abolition of visas. The United Kingdom Government attach great importance to this removal of formal obstacles to the interchange of tourists between the participating countries. Nor do they believe it less important that restrictions should as far as possible be removed from the travel of visitors to the O.E.E.C. countries from the United States. By this means they hope that the understanding of the ideals and achievements of the European Recovery Programme will be stimulated among people in the countries taking part in it on both sides of the Atlantic. They are convinced that this will do much to ensure its success.

143. At present owing to financial difficulties there are necessarily still restrictions on the travel of tourists between the O.E.E.C. countries themselves. The United Kingdom Government hopes that as the European countries' balances of payments improve these financial restrictions can gradually be removed.

144. The United Kingdom has already suggested to the O.E.E.C. that the development of the European tourist industry is a promising field of joint activity for the participating countries. It can make an important contribution towards righting Europe's balance of payments with the Western Hemisphere. The United Kingdom will co-operate fully in the examination of joint measures for this purpose.

145. For its part the United Kingdom has taken many measures to encourage and develop tourism in the United Kingdom. The most important single step was the setting up of the British Tourist and Holidays Board and the Scottish Tourist Board, both non-governmental organisations, whose members are largely drawn from the tourist, hotel and catering industries. The British Board, particularly through its tourist branch—the Travel Association—and with the co-operation in Scotland of the Scottish Tourist Board, has the task of promoting the organisation of the tourist industry in this country. Much of the work being undertaken by these bodies is still only in its early stages, but there are already ample indications that the efforts being made will be repaid.

146. In 1947 some 300,000 overseas visitors came to the United Kingdom and earnings from this trade amounted to about $80 million apart from the sums spent by tourists on transport to and from their homeland in British ships and aircraft. It is estimated that in 1948 the total number of visitors should reach about 500,000 and that total earnings should be in the region of $140 million, of which $60 million should be in dollars and equivalent currencies. It is estimated that the trade's earnings may be as much as $260 million by 1952–53 with the dollar contribution at more than $150 million. While the United Kingdom's total expenditure on tourism overseas is expected to exceed its total tourist income from all sources, it is expected that there will be a large dollar surplus.

147. Shipping space at present limits the number of tourists coming to the United Kingdom particularly from the Western Hemisphere and the other countries of the Commonwealth. Efforts are being made to increase the space available and to make the fullest possible use of it by persuading tourists to come to the United Kingdom out of the normal summer tourist season. Attention will also be paid to increasing the aircraft space available for the transport of tourists. The shortage of hotel accommodation, caused partly by the war, is being successfully tackled.

148. For the 1948 season ample allowances of petrol have been given to tourists bringing their cars with them, or buying them in the United Kingdom for subsequent export; special arrangements have also been made to provide adequate hire-car and coach facilities for tourists. A new system, known as the Tourist Voucher Scheme, to enable tourists to buy reasonable quantities of rationed clothing for immediate delivery has also been in operation for the first time this year, and the scheme for the direct export of goods ordered by tourists has been widely publicised and used. All these schemes will be reviewed and where practicable improved before the 1949 tourist season.

149. Efforts will be made to make travel easier by abolishing burdensome controls on movement wherever possible and by ensuring that those which must be maintained, either for security or economic reasons, should be operated as speedily, simply and efficiently as possible.

150. The development of the tourist trade will necessarily depend to a considerable extent on the achievement of international political and economic stability and in this the success of European Co-operation within O.E.E.C. will play a decisive part.

CHAPTER IV.—INVESTMENT IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

151. The development and modernisation of industrial and agricultural equipment is one of the explicit objectives of the European Recovery Programme. A careful balance between this and other objectives must be maintained. Excessive home investment might defeat its own ends; it would endanger stability, require more imports than can be afforded and sharply limit exports. This chapter sets out the scale and composition of the investment programme, which on present evidence is believed to be practicable.

152. The effective limits on investment are three: the need for countervailing savings; the limits imposed by raw material supplies; and the limits of the productive capacities of the building and engineering industries.

153. The problem of financing investment has already been discussed in paragraphs 33–37 where it has been made clear that it is the intention of the United Kingdom to pursue a fiscal policy which will seek to prevent financial limitations from hindering essential investment.

154. The physical limitations are primarily those of steel and timber. The total available supplies of steel are being currently used as to 60 per cent. for home investment, 32 per cent. for exports in direct form or as manufactures, and 8 per cent. on consumption and defence. With a finished steel supply perhaps $2\frac{3}{4}$ million tons greater in 1952–53 than in 1947, it is estimated that on present expectations about the progress of exports some $7\frac{1}{2}$ million tons will be available for investment purposes. The division must clearly be provisional and will be subject to adjustment in the light of economic developments over the next four years. The limitations of timber for the United Kingdom are set by the exportable surpluses of overseas countries and by the ability of the United Kingdom to finance its timber imports. Present prospects suggest that the supplies of softwood (excluding sleepers) available to the United Kingdom in 1952–53 may be of the order of 5,700,000 cubic metres compared with a consumption of 4,600,000 cubic metres in 1947–48 and 1948–49. A higher scale of investment in building will therefore be practicable.

155. The engineering industries, taken as a whole, are now producing 40 per cent. more than in 1938. Their capacity to provide the capital equipment needed for home investment is at present limited partly by the shortage of steel and partly by the extremely large contribution which they are making to exports (amounting to 40 per cent. of the total in the first half of the current year). The growth of steel supplies made possible by the iron and steel development plan described in Chapter III will progressively ease the former limitation. It is calculated that sufficient engineering capacity will be available both to satisfy the needs of the proposed investment programme and to sustain the assumed level of capital goods exports, though a careful balance will have to be maintained in the distribution between home investment and exports of particular categories of plant and machinery.

156. In the light of these factors an annual gross investment programme at current prices of about $8,500 million of fixed investment at home represents the practicable limit of what the United Kingdom may reasonably hope to achieve, having regard also to the claims of overseas investment for colonial and other development within the sterling area. Together with the latter it will account for 20 per cent. of the gross national product. This home investment programme compares with an investment at the same prices of about $7,500 million in 1947 and about the same amount in 1938. The high rate of home investment in 1947 was achieved in a year where there was also a deficit of $2,500 million on the balance of payments. Without this, investment on this scale would not have been possible. Without external aid drastic cuts would clearly have been necessary. With external aid the United Kingdom expects not only to achieve a gross domestic investment of $8,500 million a year but also to be in a position by 1952–53 to sustain this level out of its current income. This does not imply a rigid ceiling for investment over the next four years. To the extent that the United Kingdom succeeds in its endeavours to increase the national income, it will also be its aim to accelerate and expand the investment programme.

157. The resources available for investment will be concentrated on the following purposes:—

(a) the expansion of home agriculture and fisheries;
(b) the development of basic industries, particularly steel, coal, oil, basic chemicals and cement, in order to make possible the unfettered expansion of industrial production;
(c) the strengthening of the public utility services where necessary, particularly electricity, transport and port services, in order to support the expanding level of industrial activity;
(d) the modernisation of industrial equipment so as to increase the volume and reduce the cost of production;
(e) the development of new raw materials and alternative sources of supply for existing raw materials at home, in the Colonies and elsewhere overseas;
(f) the removal of shortages of widely used basic products, such as ball bearings, precision chain, refractories;
(g) the stimulation of industrial research;
(h) the provision of essential services, such as housing and of basic social services such as water and health services and education (particularly on the technical side) which contribute to the nation's economic strength.

158. Excluding ordinary maintenance of houses and miscellaneous small works the available investment resources will be distributed in this period approximately as follows:—

	Per cent.
Fuel and Power	15
Transport and Communications	18
Agriculture	6
Industry (including Iron and Steel and Shipbuilding)	33
Housing	16
Social Services (Water Supplies, Health, Education, &c.)	7
Defence and Public Administration	5

159. Until the equipment of the export industries and of the basic industries serving industrial production as a whole has been adequately restored and modernised, investment for these purposes must take precedence over investment designed solely or mainly to increase consumption standards. In accordance with this policy the volume of investment to meet the needs of social services and to serve directly the home consumption market will not be raised above its present level, increases in one direction being balanced by reductions elsewhere within this group. Should any additional resources become available for investment they will be concentrated on industrial investment.

160. There is a wide range of controls in force to ensure that investment resources are canalised in the desired direction. In addition to the control of capital issues on the capital market these also include the licensing or authorisation of all building work above small fixed limits, statutory distribution schemes for steel and timber and arrangements, statutory or voluntary, with the various sections of the engineering industries about the division of the output of plant and machinery between the home and export markets. In the case of the nationalised industries the Boards are required by Statute when framing programmes of reorganisation or development involving substantial outlay on capital account to act on lines settled from time to time by the responsible Minister. Future policy towards these controls will be guided by the general principles enunciated in paragraphs 51–54 above. An important part of the United Kingdom's industrial investment policy has been the encouragement of investment in areas that suffered prolonged economic depression between the two world wars and which might, owing to the lack of industrial capacity, have undergone a similar experience again. The United Kingdom Government, using special powers and machinery, has already erected 290 factories in such areas and 250 more are at present being built. Private industry has also with much success been encouraged, wherever possible, to undertake investment in these areas.

161. The principal features of the investment programmes for major industries have been described in the previous chapter. The largest remaining items in the total investment programme are the public utilities, housing and the social services. To complete the account, a brief description of these is given below.

162. Electricity.—The consumption of electricity is now over 80 per cent. greater than in 1938. Throughout the war years, however, the installation of plant was severely curtailed and reliance had to be placed on extending the life of old plant, improving the load factor and in recent years on load shedding and load spreading arrangements with their attendant difficulties for industry. To meet this situation the investment programme for electricity generating stations contemplates the installation of thermal plant to increase the available generating capacity by about 40–50 per cent. above the present amount. The total cost will be about $2,000 million including ancillary work on transmission lines and distribution. In addition over 600 megawatts of hydro-electric capacity will be installed in the North of Scotland, much of which will supply industrial needs in Scotland and make possible new developments in the Highlands. It is hoped that this increase in capacity will assist a general increase in industrial efficiency.

163. Railways.—After heavy use and inadequate maintenance throughout the war, the railways stand in need of considerable re-equipment to overtake arrears of repairs and renewals, quite apart from the pressing need to keep up with new developments of rolling stock, or to extend the use of modern equipment, e.g., colour light signalling on heavily operated lines. This applies with special force to the permanent way. There is also a considerable need for goods wagons (of which the railways have nearly 30 per cent. over 35 years of age) and for passenger coaches (of which the railways in 1947 had about 13 per cent. fewer than in 1939 to meet a 24 per cent. increase in passenger miles). Much general repair and maintenance work is required on buildings, locomotive sheds, bridges, and embankments. All these works contribute towards raising the efficiency of the railways and enabling them to transport quickly and cheaply the larger volume of raw materials, minerals and merchandise which will arise during the next four years.

164. In 1948 gross investment by the railways will amount to about $600 million and, if all the needs were to be met on a reasonable scale, the annual rate ought to rise to about $800 million by 1952. The greater part of the increase will consist of renewals to rolling stock (an additional $40–60 million a year) and civil engineering works (about $120 million).

165. Housing.—As in all highly organised communities housing necessarily absorbs a substantial share of investment resources. The expenditure needed for ordinary maintenance and repair of the existing stock of houses for a community of 50 million people is in itself a very substantial item, the more so as in the case of the United Kingdom the volume of such work had necessarily to be reduced to the barest minimum during the six years of war.

166. During the war 220,000 houses were completely destroyed by enemy action and 250,000 rendered uninhabitable. During the same period house construction was suspended, apart from the minimum necessary to accommodate workers on war production. Since 1939 the population has also increased by 2¼ million and there is an urgent need for more houses to increase the mobility of the working population to facilitate the structural changes that are taking place in United Kingdom industry and encourage recruitment to the undermanned industries. Towards these various needs between the end of the war and the end of July 1948 330,000 permanent and 155,000 temporary houses have been built and 235,000 housing units have been provided by the conversion of existing premises and the repair of heavily damanged houses. So far the replacement of obsolescent houses and of houses condemned as unfit for occupation by pre-war standards has had to give way to these more pressing needs.

167. To meet the outstanding and continuing requirements for repair and new construction of houses it is believed that it will be possible to find sufficient resources to enable work to the value of $1,660 million to be undertaken in 1949, of which about 40 per cent. will be for repair and maintenance work. Within this programme preference will be given to building houses in agricultural and mining areas in order to facilitate recruitment to agriculture and mining. Likewise provision will be made for the housing needs of industries such as the steel and chemical industries where large schemes of expansion are planned. The rate of house construction in the following three years will depend on the progress of economic recovery.

168. Social Services.—The chief items under this head are education, health services, and water and sewerage, on which capital expenditure in 1949 is estimated at approximately $400 million. These services suffered severely during the war.

169. Five thousand schools were destroyed or severely damaged by enemy action and at the end of the war 40 per cent. of all the classes in England and Wales were officially classified as overcrowded. Over one million new school places are needed. Two-thirds of this requirement is due to the steep rise in the birth-rate and to shifts of population, and the remainder to the destruction of schools and the increase in the school-leaving age to fifteen years. Special provision will be made for technical education by the erection of new technical colleges for various branches of industry, and the provision of accommodation for the rapidly increasing number of part-time students, who have grown from 36,000 before the war to 200,000. The number of whole-time technical students has quadrupled in the same period.

170. Investment in water supplies and sewerage includes the making good of wartime arrears which cannot be postponed without danger to public health and without imposing limits on supplies to industry. On the health side the next four years must be spent mainly in bringing existing hospital accommodation up to standard, overtaking arrears of maintenance and war damage, converting wartime hospitals to serve peacetime uses, and in carrying out urgent schemes of extension and improvement. Improvements are badly needed in nursing staff accommodation (where additional facilities are required to attract staff for the 60,000 unstaffed beds), and in mental hospitals and mental deficiency institutions, to relieve serious overcrowding. New general hospitals urgently required in a number of districts must, however, wait until towards the end of the period.

CHAPTER V.—DEVELOPMENT OF OVERSEAS TERRITORIES

171. The forty-five Colonies included under the heading of United Kingdom's Dependent Overseas Territories have very varied economies and have reached very different states in social and economic progress. It is a prime objective of British policy to ensure that their future development is conducted for the benefit of the native populations and that increases in trade and production are reflected in a rising standard of living and steady social progress. They have already made a remarkable recovery from the effects of the war.

172. The Colonies have also reached very different stages of political advancement. They are not governed by executive instructions from London. Many, such as Malta and several of the West Indies, are already wholly or nearly autonomous in their internal affairs, with wholly or preponderantly elected legislative bodies. The United Kingdom Government has throughout been in close consultation with Colonial Governments. Most of them have now signified their willingness to join with the United Kingdom in the European Recovery Programme because the purposes of Colonial development are complementary with those of European recovery. Development needs above all a high level of investment in the Colonies and this over a period of years, can be achieved only by a net financial investment from overseas (principally from the United Kingdom) supported by a high level of imports of capital goods and manufactured consumption goods. These the countries of Europe can provide. The imports not covered by net overseas investment have to be financed by the export of food and raw materials, and these in turn are, of course, essential to European recovery, both directly and as a source of hard currencies.

173. The United Kingdom is, therefore, anxious to stimulate Colonial exports as an integral part of the recovery programme, and a substantial net investment in the Colonial areas as a whole during and beyond the period covered has been allowed for in the balance of payments calculations. Furthermore, unless the sterling area maintains a sufficiently high level of exports to the Colonies, the net dollar earnings of the Colonies will be reduced either because production will fall off or because it will be essential for a larger proportion of the dollar earnings of Colonies to be spent on essential imports.

174. In all plans for this development, Colonial authorities have to recognise that, apart from limitations on the supply of capital from outside sources, there are internal limits on the rate of investment as a whole. Pushed too far too fast it would give rise to conditions that would have the gravest consequences to social welfare and stability. Further, since the Colonies are, broadly speaking, now in the early stages of their development, a high proportion of investment must be concentrated on basic services, on health and education, on transport, irrigation and water supplies, and research. It would be inconsistent with trusteeship, and would moreover be economically impracticable, to subordinate progress in these fields, fundamental to the healthy development of the native communities, to a breakneck increase in food and raw material production wholly designed for export. Nevertheless a large development of exports is fundamental to an increase in the standards of living of the indigenous peoples.

175. It is unnecessary in a document dealing primarily with European affairs to give details of the schemes in hand or in preparation in the fields of education, transport and other basic services. Important work is proceeding on the expansion of secondary and technical education and the training of teachers. Four new university colleges, three in Africa and one in the West Indies, and a new university in Malaya are being established. In health the emphasis is on preventive work and the training of local medical staffs. Much work is being done on malarial control, particularly in Cyprus, Trinidad and British Guiana. Over $12 million has been allocated in the last two years for research. Special efforts are being devoted to locust control. Geodetic and topographical surveys have been undertaken in East and Central Africa, Malaya, North Borneo and Sarawak, in which the Royal Air Force is taking part. An expenditure of about $80 million has been approved for road and railway development, including the construction in Africa of a trunk road linking Northern Rhodesia with the Tanganyika, Kenya and Uganda road systems, and thence through to the Sudan.

176. The following notes describe the main food and material programmes that have an especially direct bearing on Colonial exports, and thence on European recovery :—

177. Groundnuts.—The total Colonial output for export of decorticated nuts is expected to rise to 880,000 metric tons in 1952–53, as compared with 300,000 tons in 1936 and 335,000 tons in 1946. In East Africa a large scheme for the production of groundnuts by mechanical methods was started in 1946. Exports on a small scale are due to begin in 1949 and are expected to increase to over 460,000 tons of decorticated nuts annually when full production is reached about 1953. In West Africa the shortage of locomotives and rolling-stock has made it impossible to move all the crop to the coast in recent years. By 1950 these difficulties should have been overcome.

178. Sugar.—Annual production of the principal Colonial producing areas for the period 1937–39 averaged 980,000 tons. Steps are being taken to improve the efficiency of the industry in the various Colonies and considerable sums of money are being spent on research. The chief shortage has hitherto been of fertilisers, and the total colonial demand for sugar cultivation has not yet been met, though every effort is being made to increase supplies. Sugar production, which had fallen to 740,000 tons in 1945, should reach 1,400,000 tons in 1952–53.

179. Rubber.—Production of rubber which was 400,000 tons in 1936 is expected to rise to 830,000 tons in 1952–53 This is an important earner of dollars : in 1947 exports to the United States were valued at about $180 million.

180. Tin.—Tin is produced in the Federation of Malaya and Nigeria. Nigerian production, however, is expected to decline gradually in a few years time, unless new discoveries are made. It is at present running at about 8,000 tons of ore per annum. Peak production was reached in Malaya in 1940 with a figure of 82,000 tons of tin content, but the industry has had to be restored after the Japanese occupation from 1941 to 1945 and Government loans totalling some $30 million have been made. Production in 1947 amounted to 27,500 tons of tin, and during the June quarter it was running at the rate of 59,000 tons a year. In 1947, 17,000 tons to the value of about $28 million were exported to the United States. Total production of tin ore for both Malaya and Nigeria in 1950 is expected to be about 94,500 tons.

181. Copper.—Northern Rhodesia is the only British Colonial producer of copper apart from a comparatively small production of concentrates in Cyprus. Northern Rhodesia produces both blister and electrolytic copper. Production in 1952–53 is expected to reach 340,000 tons as compared with 195,000 tons in 1947 and 144,000 tons in 1936. The postponement of normal development work during the war and transport difficulties have led to a temporary decline in production from the war-time peak. The planned expansion of production and the proposed doubling of electrolytic refining in Rhodesia will effect dollar savings.

182. Cobalt.—Cobalt is produced in Northern Rhodesia in association with copper. Present output is about 400 tons a year. The installation of a new refining plant in the copper belt should make available some 1,200 tons of cobalt (metal) a year from 1951 or earlier. All the ore produced will then be refined in Northern Rhodesia and the metal and various compounds produced on the spot.

183. Bauxite.—Bauxite is at present being produced in British Guiana, the Gold Coast and the Federation of Malaya and there are deposits in Jamaica. Under present conditions virtually all British Guiana bauxite is exported to Canada and the United States. There are various deposits of bauxite in the Gold Coast and the reserves have been tentatively estimated at something in the neighbourhood of 230 million tons. Under present conditions large-scale exploitation is not economic. Total Colonial production of bauxite may rise to nearly 2 million tons by 1952–53.

184. Lead.—The only Colonial territory now producing lead is Northern Rhodesia. Sulphide ores are now being worked by shaft working and production of pig lead has increased from a few hundred tons a year to 16,000 tons in 1947. Lead deposits have been discovered in Tanganyika and active steps are being taken to develop them, including the building of a railway of about 120 miles to link up the deposits with the main line. Colonial lead production in 1952–53 may amount to about 35,000 tons.

186. Funds for these developments are available from a variety of sources. Under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts of 1940 and 1945 $480 million have been made available from United Kingdom funds over the ten years 1946–56; Colonial Governments' surplus balances are very large, and further loans can be raised on the British market. The seventeen major long-term development plans which have already been approved provide for total expenditure from all three of these sources of $750 million. These long-term plans provide for the general expansion of basic economic services, social services, and the development of research in each of the territories. A few examples have already been given in paragraph 175. They do not normally include substantial provision for projects of a purely commercial character. To meet this need, there are two British Government Corporations, the Overseas Food Corporation and the Colonial Development Corporation, with authorised capitals of $200 and $400 million respectively, local savings, private investment, and the possibilities, still under examination, of E.C.A. loans and finance from the International Bank.

187. The major difficulties in connection with these large expansion plans are likely to be supply of the capital goods required and all the technical experts, skilled tradesmen and technicians required. The provisional estimates of United Kingdom exports in 1952–53 allow for a very substantial increase in machinery supplies and in steel. Whether they can be attained or exceeded depends on the actual development of the balance of payments, and thus on many uncertain factors. Much depends also upon the exports of capital goods and consumption goods that the other countries of O.E.E.C. plan to make when the joint recovery programme is prepared. It is also obvious that to the extent that the joint recovery programme increases supplies from the Western Hemisphere of scarce capital goods it will assist colonial production either directly or, by adding to supplies available in the United Kingdom and thereby enabling increased exports of such supplies to the Colonies to be released from the United Kingdom production.

188. There is also an important field for international co-operation in the provision of skilled technicians, particularly trained agricultural and scientific staffs, the shortage of which is at present a factor in limiting development in many direct and indirect ways. It must, however, be understood that the numbers required are relatively very small and that the main solution must lie in the increasing substitution of trained locally recruited personnel rather than in any considerable employment of technicians from abroad, which would be unacceptable to the Colonial peoples.

189. Lastly there are hopeful possibilities of improving the administrative efficiency of health and research programmes by joint consultation between the Colonial authorities of different nations, and in the joint planning of transport and communication developments. A number of valuable conferences have already been held on matters concerned with education, health, labour and the prevention of disease in Africa. More are already planned in the next two years. It is the United Kingdom's desire to develop such co-operation to the limit.

190. The plans described contemplate a large increase in the contribution of the Colonies to European recovery. In 1947 Colonial exports to the United Kingdom were about $600 million. In 1948–49 they are expected to run at about $800 million, at the price levels assumed in preparing the programme for this year. By 1952–53, on the provisional calculations given in Chapter VI, this total should have increased to $950 million. Against these receipts exports from the United Kingdom are expected to rise from $930 million in 1948–49 to some $1,000 million in 1952–53. Still more significant, in conditions in which the dollar currencies will still be scarce, is the expected increase in the Colonial dollar surplus. Already in 1947 the Colonies had recovered to the point of having a small dollar surplus; in the current year this has been running at a rate of about $150 million.

191. Assistance towards United States Stockpiling.—Under the provisions of Article V of the Economic Co-operation Agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, the United Kingdom Government have undertaken to facilitate the transfer to the United States of materials which are needed by the latter for stockpiling or other purposes and to promote the production of these materials. Preliminary discussions have already taken place between the United States and the United Kingdom authorities with a view to ascertaining what materials will be needed by the United States Government and what measures the United Kingdom Government can take to carry out their obligations. The United Kingdom Government for their part intend in collaboration with the Colonial Governments to take all possible steps to increase the production of materials which the United States Government may require and are already considering the measures to be taken for this purpose. They recognise the importance which the United States Government attach to chrome and manganese.

CHAPTER VI.—ESTIMATE OF THE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS IN 1952–53

(1) INTRODUCTORY

192. The four previous chapters have described the principal policies which the United Kingdom proposes to follow in order to solve its balance of payments problem and achieve independence of external economic assistance by 1952–53. As has already been pointed out, these policies must be flexible and to some extent provisional. It is impossible to forecast with precision what position will be reached in 1952–53 as a result of these policies. Too much depends upon world economic developments outside the control of the United Kingdom and the other Governments with which it is co-operating. But an attempt has been made to prepare a set of estimates of a realistic kind. These are based upon four assumptions :—

(i) that there is a high level of business activity throughout the world, and that this leads to a high level of demand for imports (especially in the Western Hemisphere);

(ii) that the United States Government provides sufficient funds between now and 1952 to permit the full development of the European Recovery Programme;

(iii) that substantial progress is made in European co-operation, particularly in the "fields of activity" to which O.E.E.C. is giving special attention;

(iv) that a reasonable amount of East–West trade within Europe is possible on commercial lines.

193. The results are presented in this Chapter. They show that, on the present assessment of the prospects, and on the assumptions made about the factors it cannot itself control, the United Kingdom expects to achieve the objectives it has set itself. But they show, too, that the balance will not be reached at all easily.

(2) OVERSEAS EARNINGS

194. A major factor in restoring the overseas balance will be the increase in earnings from exports. After an analysis of sales possibilities, product by product and market by market, taking account of the expressed desire of most of the world's Governments to increase trade, it is believed that in the early 1950's the United Kingdom should be able, year in year out, to maintain exports at a rate of 150 per cent. of the 1938 volume. This represents, on the information now available to the United Kingdom, a realistic assessment of the prospects, and has been taken as the appropriate figure for planning purposes. With uniformly favourable conditions a higher figure might be reached; it would be of advantage to the United Kingdom's economy if it could, and the additional supplies for export (after appropriate adjustments to import and home production plans) could be produced.

195. In achieving a level of exports half as great again as in 1938 and well above even the level of the peak years of world trade (1927–29), reliance is placed upon the recovery of solid fuel exports to about 40 million tons (including bunkers), and continuing expansion of equipment and textile exports. Domestic policies to assist these expansions have been discussed above. Some diminution in sales of miscellaneous products has been allowed for.

196. Net invisible earnings are also expected to make a very large contribution. The most important item is likely to arise from the increased oil production of the British companies discussed in paragraphs 89–95. Also significant will be increased shipping earnings (paragraphs 131–139 above). A recovery of earnings from foreign investments is expected, but in 1951 obligations require to be met under the Anglo-American and Anglo-Canadian Financial Agreements of 1946, and provision is made for them; this is the main element of amortisation included in the balance of payments—no allowance is made for amortisation of private loans. In the rest of the "invisible" field, continued recovery is expected in earnings from the traditional services performed by London, such as insurance. In total, net invisible earnings are expected to be $1,053 million, compared with $140 million in 1948–49; at this level, net invisible earnings will be much the same in value as they were in 1938, but their buying power in terms of imports will be little more than one-third of that of 1938.

197. In calculating export earnings and earnings from oil sales the level of prices assumed in preparing the 1948–49 programme for O.E.E.C. has been used in accordance with the instructions received from the Council. The corresponding import prices have been adopted for the import programme discussed below. There is, of course, every reason to expect substantial changes in many of these prices.

(3) OVERSEAS EXPENDITURE

198. On these assumptions total earnings from exports, re-exports and net invisibles have been estimated at over $8,400 million in 1952–53. Not all of this can be applied directly to imports. Allowance has to be made for foreign investment and the repayment of debt. The need to provide for net lending for the development of the dependent overseas territories has already been discussed in Chapter V. In other parts of the sterling area development now proceeding will likewise require to be financed. Many of these are as important to the United Kingdom as anything in the home investment programme. There are, moreover, countries, both in the sterling area and outside, with large sterling balances which will need to use part of them. On the other hand, some countries may be accumulating sterling assets. For the purposes of this estimate the net capital outflow for these purposes together has been put at a figure of $400 million, but it would be advantageous to increase this figure if possible.

199. There will thus remain available for imports a sum of about $8,000 million. At the prices assumed this will permit a volume of imports 10 per cent. higher than in 1947, but still less by about 15 per cent. than the volume in 1938. It is, in fact, much the same in volume as the import programme for 1948–49, but it should be possible as a result of developments of agriculture, oil refining, engineering and chemicals at home and of greater world supplies of basic products to change its composition to the advantage of the economy as a whole. Some imports regarded as essential elements of the present import programme could be reduced and release funds for increased purchases of other supplies which cannot now be afforded.

200. Thus food imports might be reduced significantly below the 1948–49 level in value, but this lower level of food imports, combined with increased output from home agriculture, would allow consumption to be distinctly above 1947 levels. Raw material imports must be increased to take account of rising industrial production and productivity, though the consumption of pulp and paper, and above all of timber would continue to be below pre-war levels. In spite of a smaller expenditure on petroleum, the consumption of petroleum products could increase by over 20 per cent. above 1948–49 as a direct result of the oil refinery programme. Similarly, imports of machinery and some manufactured goods could be reduced below the 1948–49 level without hardship.

201. The following table summarises the possible composition of the balance of payments in 1952–53 compared with 1947 and 1948–49 :—

(4) THE PATTERN OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

202. The overall balance of payments which the United Kingdom hopes to have secured by 1952–53 is not in itself sufficient to secure full stability in the overseas financial situation. Achieving an overall balance is sufficient only when a surplus with one country can be used to offset a deficit with another. This can happen only if all important countries' balances of payments are in reasonable equilibrium.

203. The geographical distribution of the estimated balance of payments for the United Kingdom may be summarised as follows :—

$ million at programme prices

204. These figures relate to the United Kingdom alone. In considering the United Kingdom's financial position vis-à-vis other groups of countries, however, the significant relationship is not the surplus or deficit of the United Kingdom alone, but the surplus or deficit with the group of the whole sterling area, and even this may be somewhat modified by payments of sterling between non-sterling countries of the kind described in paragraph 63 above. Sterling is an international currency and this means that it is impossible from United Kingdom trade figures alone to forecast the precise sterling position of other countries or groups of countries. The following paragraphs give a brief commentary on some of the factors underlying the distribution of payments indicated in the table above.

205. Western Hemisphere.—The earnings of $1,455 million from exports and re-exports to the Western Hemisphere shown represent an increase of $800 million, or 120 per cent. over the level of 1947, and over $500 million, or 55 per cent. over the level achieved in the first half of 1948. It is believed that exports to the United States might continue to rise above the 1947 level of about $195 million to some $340 million in 1952–53. Exports to Canada are forecast as rising during the same years from $180 million to $365 million. In invisibles likewise, the most vigorous possible efforts are being made to increase dollar earnings, e.g., in tourism which is expected to yield $150 million in 1952–53. But this will be offset by the service of the United States and Canadian Loans ($190 million) and the service of E.C.A. loans.

206. Increases of earnings even of this magnitude would close less than half a Western Hemisphere deficit of the scale of that in 1947. A reduction of imports has therefore to be provided for below the exceptionally high level of 1947. In that year, in common with most other European countries, the United Kingdom imported a greater volume of goods from the Western Hemisphere than in 1938, despite a large contraction in total imports from all sources. The import programme shown is therefore $1,000 million below the 1947 total and $450 million below the programme for 1948–49. It takes full account of the possibilities now foreseen of obtaining supplies of essential goods in the rest of the world, above all in the Sterling Area and in the participating countries. Thus the temporary over-dependence upon Western Hemisphere supplies which largely contributed to the dollar crisis of 1947 will be relieved by a return to traditional sources of supply.

207. Even with these changes there remains a deficit of nearly $300 million with the Western Hemisphere. It is estimated that this can be covered by the gold production and dollar earnings of the rest of the sterling area together with United States commercial investment in the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area. But this, of course, turns on the maintenance of a strong demand in the United States for the raw materials which are produced in the sterling area, and a continuing restriction of dollar imports by the other sterling area countries themselves. Indeed, this entire balance depends upon the ability and willingness of the United States to absorb sterling manufactures, petroleum products and raw materials, and upon continued economy in dollar expenditures throughout the sterling area. The United Kingdom for its part has no intention of allowing its present estimates of the absorptive capacity of the Western Hemisphere to limit its efforts to maximise its Western Hemisphere earnings. But the balance now envisaged is precarious and depends to a considerable extent on factors outside the control of the United Kingdom.

208. Other Non-Participants.—On the estimates submitted, the United Kingdom has a prospective deficit of some $175 million with the non-sterling, non-participating countries of the Eastern Hemisphere. Of this deficit, about half represents the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and half is attributable to the other countries, particularly the Middle East.

209. The general scale of trade with Eastern Europe envisaged in these estimates is appreciably less than that ruling before the war. It can be assumed for practical purposes that the trade between the sterling area and this group of countries will broadly speaking balance, allowance being made for deliveries of raw materials from the rest of the sterling area.

210. With the other non-participating countries a marked United Kingdom deficit is shown; this is attributable partly to the very high prices assumed for certain primary products from these countries, and partly to the heavy local expenditures involved in the expansion of oil production. The rest of the sterling area is likely to have a surplus with these countries taken as a whole, and it should be possible to match some of these deficits against surpluses with participating countries in the manner already described. It is not the United Kingdom's intention to seek bilateral balance with every country or group of countries, and this appears to be a case in which multilateral settlement of surpluses and deficits can readily take place.

211. Rest of Sterling Area.—The United Kingdom normally has a heavy surplus on current account with the rest of the sterling area. For 1952–53 it is estimated at about $850 million—a much smaller figure, at present prices, than that normally ruling before the war. It has been assumed earlier that the gold production and net dollar earnings of the non-participating sterling area would cover the United Kingdom deficit of $300 million with the Western Hemisphere; these countries may have a surplus with the non-participating countries and on present indications are likely to have a tendency to surplus with the participating countries. By the normal workings of the sterling area system, these surpluses of the outer sterling area countries are matched against their current deficit with the United Kingdom. The remainder of the surplus is accounted for by the net overseas investment already discussed.

212. Participating Countries.—It appears that the tendency now developing for the United Kingdom to be in surplus with the other participating countries will persist into 1952–53. If the rest of the sterling area likewise tends to be in surplus with the other participating countries (as it is now) the latter, taken as a whole, will be confronted with a difficult sterling problem. This should to some extent be covered by multilateral use of sterling—for example by the financing of the United Kingdom's deficit with the non-dollar countries—and the possibilities of this will no doubt be fully explored. But it is perhaps likely that after taking account of all such possibilities, the participating countries as a whole will tend to be short of sterling.

213. In this balance of payments submission, it has been assumed that this is the likely state of affairs. The United Kingdom's exports to these countries have been stated at a somewhat lower figure than that which is expected in 1948–49; imports have been put some 10 per cent. above 1948–49, and tourist expenditure by United Kingdom citizens has been allowed for at a rate about a third above 1947, when a large foreign exchange ration was allowed for tourism.

214. In framing the import programme, increased supplies of essential products from the other participating countries have been assumed. It is only by making this assumption, indeed, that it has been possible to reduce the United Kingdom dollar deficit to manageable dimensions. This import programme therefore concentrates heavily upon essential supplies to the United Kingdom—cereals, oils and fats, bacon, dairy produce, iron ore, timber, &c. Allowance is made for quotas for manufactured goods substantially above those of 1947. It is, of course, possible to envisage an increase above this level in the mutual trade of the United Kingdom and the participating countries without disturbing the pattern of multilateral payments here assumed. It is to be hoped that this will take place. The vital consideration underlying the present estimates is, however, the mutual adjustment of the economies of the participating countries so as to provide sources of essential supplies which it will no longer be possible to obtain from the Western Hemisphere in 1952–3.

215. The picture which is presented of the United Kingdom balance of payments in 1952–53 is therefore one in which viability could unquestionably be secured at a very high level of production and a reasonable level of consumption—if it were possible to offset surpluses against deficits. But in fact the balance with the dollar area will be precarious, though fully possible; the extent of the difficulties which the United Kingdom will encounter in securing this balance will depend largely upon her ability to draw essential supplies from the Commonwealth and from the other participating countries.

CHAPTER VII.—CONCLUSIONS

(1) THE SCALE AND CONSEQUENCES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM'S PROGRAMME

216. The preceding chapters have described the problem before the United Kingdom, the policies it is intended to pursue, and the manner in which they may lead to a solution of the problem of the balance of payments. The productive efforts that the United Kingdom intends to make are on a huge scale, and apply to every sector of productive industry.

217. Agricultural output is to be increased above the highest point reached in the war years. It is hoped to raise coal output by a quarter, generating capacity by a half, and to double the world-wide production of the British oil industry as compared with the 1947 levels. The export of coal is to be restored to its high traditional scale. Steel output, already pressing at the limit of available capacity, is to be increased by a sixth above the present level. The engineering industries, already half as great again as before the war, are to be called upon to expand still further. Corresponding efforts are to be called for from other industries. A massive investment programme, carefully concentrated upon the vital sectors of the economy, is designed to support these targets, and to foster the production overseas of commodities essential to the recovery of Europe.

218. The following figures illustrate the proposed development of production in some major sectors of the economy :—

219. Broadly speaking this Programme provides for an expansion of output in manufacturing, mining, agriculture, building and public utilities taken as a whole to a level about one-third above pre-war and, despite a constant or slightly declining labour force, to increase manufacturing output by a quarter in the five years from 1947 to a level about 40 per cent. above 1938. This expanding output will make possible an estimated expansion of exports by nearly two-fifths above the level achieved, after two years' intensive effort, in 1947, and this in turn will support a considerable increase in raw material imports. At the same time the supply of capital equipment to home industry should increase to a level about 15 per cent. above 1947. As has been shown in paragraphs 26–28 the United Kingdom has already made substantial progress towards these objectives.

220. A growth of output and trade of this magnitude will, besides reducing the balance of payments problem to manageable dimensions, permit a distinct increase in home consumption per head beyond not only the somewhat meagre standards of 1947 but, in many respects, beyond pre-war levels. The supply of manufactured goods for the consumer should rise 15–20 per cent. above the 1947 level, with clothing and household goods somewhat above the pre-war level. There should be sufficient supplies of the chief energy-producing foods and notable increases in the 1947 levels of consumption per head of meat, eggs, oils and fats. The consumption of food as a whole would approach the pre-war volume and the more equal distribution of the national income which has been secured in recent years would imply that the standard of food consumption of a large part of the population should be markedly better than before the war.

(2) THE ROLE OF EXTERNAL ASSISTANCE

221. This strenuous effort by the United Kingdom would be impossible without the continuance of external assistance during the period of recovery. Aid is necessary to enable the United Kingdom to continue to acquire essential supplies from the Western Hemisphere on a scale which otherwise could not be afforded. In the revised estimate of United Kingdom expenditures of just over $2,000 million on dollar goods and shipping services submitted by United Kingdom to O.E.E.C. and E.C.A., food and tobacco accounted for nearly $600 million, raw materials for $650 million, oil, tanker services and oil equipment nearly $400 million, machinery and manufactures $150 million and shipping services over $200 million. This programme was based on the assumption of aid, as recommended by O.E.E.C., of $1,263 million. As the United Kingdom's long-term programme develops, the need for aid to finance dollar area imports will decline for two reasons : the replacement of dollar supplies from non-dollar sources, and the increase of dollar earnings. Aid is essentially required to give time for these fundamental adjustments.

222. The absence or the inadequacy of aid would, in the first instance, show itself in a reduction in the years before 1952 in the supplies of food, raw materials, machinery or oil presupposed in the programme set out in the preceding chapters. The implications of such a deficiency are clear. A reduction in the supplies of food would endanger first the nutrition of the British people and thus in time undermine the drive for increased productivity on which so much of the United Kingdom's hopes for the future depend. Without this assistance it would be necessary for the United Kingdom to devote more of its resources to meeting its essential food needs, so reducing correspondingly the home investment programme and the exports of capital goods required for the development of the participating countries and the associated overseas territories. More directly, any substantial cut in raw material supplies would inevitably imply a corresponding cut in home investment and in exports of capital goods—in the rate of industrial re-equipment at home and in the contribution which the United Kingdom can make to development overseas. Hope would have to be abandoned of carrying through the great developments in the United Kingdom economy which are the basis of this programme.

223. It is thus seen that the assistance of the United States plays a vital part in the United Kingdom's recovery plans. But it also strengthens the United Kingdom's capacity to co-operate with the other countries of O.E.E.C. in the pursuit of joint recovery plans. It contributes to the stability of their currencies thus enabling the gradual strengthening of multilateral trade. The position of the United Kingdom as the centre of a large group of nations trading in sterling is such that any setback in its recovery would have widespread repercussions that would spread throughout the economic systems of the world. The immediate measures of self-protection enforced by such a setback might start a downward spiral that could not easily be halted.

(3) THE IMPORTANCE OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

224. Co-operation with the other countries of the British Commonwealth and the participating nations has an importance no less decisive than that of external assistance in this programme. It is needed not only in order that the United Kingdom can surmount the problems before it, but still more in order that it can play its full part in the joint endeavour of European recovery. The programme presented in the foregoing chapters is provisional. It is in its present form no more than one nation's contribution to discussions from which a joint programme is to emerge. It can within limits be modified to conform with the needs of such a joint and integrated plan.

225. The development of trade with other countries of the British Commonwealth, based on the steady expansion of their production and that of the United Kingdom, is vital to the recovery of the United Kingdom. It will be of parallel importance to the programmes of the other participating countries. The Commonwealth countries are a great source of supplies of imported food and raw materials which are essential to the development of the participating countries and the United Kingdom proposes to initiate discussions with the other Commonwealth countries about the possibilities of developing their resources to the mutual advantage of themselves and the O.E.E.C. countries.

226. These proposals as they stand already imply a high degree of co-operation between the United Kingdom, its associated overseas territories, and the other participating countries. In the first place the United Kingdom is making a major contribution to the solution of the European economic problem as a whole by surmounting the United Kingdom dollar problem. Of the aid allocated for this year one-quarter is for the United Kingdom. By the operation of the policies indicated in this Programme the need for aid will entirely disappear and with it one-quarter of the total European problem. The production and export programmes of the United Kingdom, as outlined above, contemplate the supply of vital products—for example, oil, coal, agricultural and other machinery—in great quantities and, in some cases at least, at no small expense in dollar resources and in restrictions on the United Kingdom economy. From the participating countries, on the other hand, the foregoing plans presuppose increased imports of essentials, both raw materials and foodstuffs. The plans outlined here for reducing the United Kingdom dollar deficit to manageable dimensions are dependent upon the realisation of this changed pattern of imports from the participating countries.

227. It is the United Kingdom's hope that, in its examination of the programme presented in this document side by side with those of the other participating countries, the Organisation for European Economic Co-operation will find scope for developing joint plans in many particular sectors that will hasten still more the attainment of European recovery. The United Kingdom has already tabled with the O.E.E.C. a list of fields of activity for intensive study, leading, it is hoped, to early and profitable results. The examination of the national plans of the participating countries may point to dangers of wasteful duplication or opportunities for further expansion. Further types of co-operation among the Governments of overseas territories may suggest themselves. The scrutiny of the balance of payments estimates may indicate to each participating country types of output, the expansion of which would in the long run serve both to assist the difficult balance of intra-European trade and thereby the smooth working of a multilateral system of trade and payments. Studies of this kind will, it is hoped, lead the participating countries towards a joint programme that will provide the basis both of short and of long-term co-operation. Just as a long-term programme for a particular nation is needed to guide the preparation of its annual programme, so a joint strategy for European recovery is needed to guide the development of particular measures of co-operation.

228. In this programme much emphasis has been laid on the necessity for removing obstacles to increased production. In equal measure it is necessary to remove the barriers to increased trade. The United Kingdom has worked, and will continue to work for the reduction and elimination of these obstacles on a mutually advantageous basis and towards the goal of full convertibility of currencies and a freer flow of international trade.

229. The preparation and execution of a Joint Recovery Programme, in which full account is taken of these objectives, calls for a common effort in the whole field of administrative and productive endeavour unprecedented in its scope and urgency. The United Kingdom is prepared and anxious to make its full contribution to the success of this enterprise.
