BANNERMAN Q. I VONICE London, 18.

New York, 19. Greeley, Brown, and Senator Harlin were both interviewed here last night. The former both interviewed here last night. The former said he would be fully well in a week, but he should not make any more speeches for the present. He thought that President Grant would not carry more than three states, though the majority of the negroes would vote for him and Mr. Hart, and said that all the negroes were for Grant, as he knew from personal observations. Grant was going in, he said for North Carolina, and would carry that state by a larger majority in November than though the election was held to morrow.

There is no Pain in Dying.

The snowy couch of the suffering boy Near the wide window was placed, And the crimson and gold of the sunset skies With the fleecy clouds were traced. His breath grew shorter—cold his brow, When, sad as wind-harp sighing, From lips fast stiff'ning came a cry: "Oh, mother, am I dying?

" I feel a presence near my bed, And lingering comes my breath-Hold my hand, Mother, hold it tight; I'm afraid, afraid of death! The grave is so dark, and cold, and damp, The clods will be heavy, lying On my weary breast. Oh, let me stay-Don't tell me I am dying!

"And I have had bright dreams of fame, Ambition has filled each thought;
I've studied so hard it paled my cheek—

Oh, say was it all for naught?

I made my plans to have ruled my life—
'Twas a useless task; my work is done; Dear mother, I am dying.

"But over my soul there comes a joy,

Fame's sweet, clear song, tempts no more Faith points above the grave, and the sod, To a beautiful, blissful shore; And angel forms are gathering 'round—
Mother, good-by—are you crying,
When I am so happy? And don't you know There is no pain in dying?"

A smile crept over his pale, cold lips, A choking gasp a faint-drawn breath, An upward look of holy trust, And we stood alone with Death. But through the tracings of fleecy white That o'er the skies were lying, There came an echo, clear and sweet-"There is no pain in dying."
