Mr. Rae: Big deal, as the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) said. The key point is that the outflow of dividends will continue to be as big a problem in 1990 as it is now. It will be even bigger, because the amounts we are talking about will be so much bigger than they are at the moment. It means that the multinationals will be allowed to increase their market share. It means a few wealthy Canadians will benefit from this phony nationalism and that there will be continued foreign domination and outflow of dividends. The goal of 50 per cent ownership is meaningless unless one talks about control. It is a meaningless figure, it is a meaningless idea. It is so meaningless that it was stated by the Prime Minister in 1974 as one of his key objectives of the next six years. In the national energy policy released last night the minister said, "We do not know how we will get there, we have no method of enforcing it, but it continues to be a very important objective of the government."

The hard fact of the matter is that we are charging $16.75 for a barrel of oil right now. Imperial Oil, the largest oil company in Canada, has total assets worth $4.6 billion and an annual revenue of $6.6 billion. The province of Manitoba has revenues of $1.7 billion. That is the size and kind of institution about which we are talking when we are charging $16.75 for a barrel of oil. Imagine what revenues will flow and what the assets side of Imperial Oil will be by 1990. Imagine how big, how mammoth it will be, all of it subsidized by the phony policy of this government.

It is just amazing the press is able to say that it represents a tremendous advance to Canadianization and that we in the NDP must be really worried because the Liberals are moving in on our ground. We were shaking in our boots last night as the minister read his statement. We felt that the two ministers combined had come up with a real radical document. Imperial Oil will only own all of Canada by 1990, and we can take satisfaction from the fact that 50 per cent of it will be owned by the wealthiest people in Canada! That gives us a lot of worry.

Mr. Rose: It is a fake to the left.

Mr. Rae: As the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) has so aptly described it, it is the biggest fake to the left since the last fake to the left of the Liberal party.

Finally, this is a profoundly damaging budget because it continues to apply the same unsuccessful phony remedies as have been applied by Liberal and Conservative governments to our basic economic problems for too long. It is damaging in another sense, because it is an admission of defeat. It is a declaration of intellectual bankruptcy because it does by stealth what the Tories tried to do openly, but it does exactly the same thing and has exactly the same effect.

I should like to refer to just two matters because I know my colleagues will be referring to others.

The projections that are contained in this budget for the social services provided to the people of Canada by the Government of Canada indicate that those basic services will be under the most severe attack since they were established. There is no getting around that fact. There is no getting around the fact, for example, that the rate of growth in this so-called envelope will be 10.6 per cent in 1981, 6.3 per cent in 1982 and 6.9 per cent in 1983. I see that the minister would like to argue that this matter should be taken care of by the provinces. Will eight Tory provincial governments provide social services to the people of Canada? That is a statement coming from a government which is supposed to care about the provision of services for the people.

I say to the minister quite honestly, and I know his role personally in the introduction of medicare, that if this was the attitude of the Pearson government in the 1960s, we would never have had medical care for all Canadians; never. It is a guarantee that we will never take on the new challenge of providing daycare so that women can have a genuine choice between whether they want to stay at home and whether they want to go to work. We will never have a national co-ordinated system which guarantees that women in Newfoundland have the same rights in this vital field as the people of Manitoba or Saskatchewan. It is a guarantee that the over-all level of social spending and the provision of social services for all our people will go down.

That is not an abstraction. It means, quite simply, poorer people, more poorly clothed people, more poorly housed people, more poorly fed people and more poorly educated people. It is a tragic abdication of even the minister's professed interest in being progressive. I was reminded of the ultimate statement of bankruptcy when the minister said that the concept of sharing seems to be close to the distinctive fibre of the Canadian tradition, and that he does not think the state should do it all. What are we going to rely on, the United Way? Is that the answer, that we go back to the United Way and the handouts of lady dowagers who come down to the poor people of Broadview-Greenwood and say, "Here is a handout. I am sharing with you by bringing you a turkey at Christmas and a cake on your birthday."? Is that the kind of sharing about which the minister is talking?

The return to private charity is an abdication of the fundamental social rights of the Canadian people. The notion that we should return to some kind of private sharing is worthy of the rotarian that the Minister of Finance has now become.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, France had a socialist government 45 years ago. The premier of that government was a great socialist of democratic tradition, Léon Blum. At the end of his life someone asked him: Are you satisfied with what you have accomplished with your government, that popular government during the 1930s, those very difficult years? He replied: Well, yes, because I received a letter from a grandfather who wrote to me: "Thanks to you and to your government I was able to see the beach and the sea before dying."

[English]

There is not one Canadian, be he in Broadview-Greenwood, or be he anywhere else who will be able to write the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister and say, "As the result of this budget, thanks to you, I will finally be able to see the sea and the beach", because the seas and the beaches are reserved to exactly those people for whom they have been reserved for far too long in our society and nothing has been done to change that.

That is the simple reason why it gives me the greatest pride to move the amendment that I have moved to stand as firmly and as resolutely opposed to this phony budget, a mile wide and an inch deep, with its statement of intellectual bankruptcy and its condemnation of the Canadian people to a future far less bright, far less generous, far less hopeful and far less compassionate than the one they deserve.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): After consultation, the Chair has found the subamendment put by the hon. member to be in order. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can see that the NDP is disappearing, but I hope it is only physically. It is my privilege to speak today in this debate about the national energy program and what it will do for Canada and for Canadians. Before getting into the more substantive elements of my remarks, I would like to spend a minute on the long rumination of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) on the, as it was called, "budget of a dead government".

The hon. member referred last night to a 30 per cent cubic foot increase in the price of gas. I am not surprised that he had so much trouble as the minister of finance because he cannot tell the difference between one cubic foot and 1,000 cubic feet. The hon. member cited many figures today. For the record, I would like to put a certain number of figures in Hansard and before the Canadian public so that they may judge what the Conservative budget of last year may have meant in terms of their prices for gasoline, home heating oil and natural gas. I will satisfy myself by putting the figures on the record. I think they speak for themselves. According to our estimation the 1979 budget, the so-called "Crosbie budget", would have meant that the per gallon price of gasoline would have gone up to $1.56 in 1981; $1.75 in 1982; $2.32 in 1983 and $2.63 in 1984. If these figures are compared with the present budget with its per gallon price of $1.36 in 1981; $1.53 in 1982; $1.71 in 1983 and $1.95 in 1984 there is a difference of over 60 cents in the price of a gallon of gasoline between our budget and the budget proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West last year.

The difference in the figures on natural gas prices is even more telling. If one were to take the price of natural gas at the Toronto city gate in terms of dollars per 1,000 cubic feet, not per cubic foot, the 1979 budget proposal meant the following prices: 1980, $2.75; 1981, $3.45; 1982, $4.10; 1983, $6.55 and 1984, $7.90. Our program will mean the following prices for those years: $2.90 for 1980, $3.05 for 1981, $3.50 for 1982, $3.95 for 1983 and $4.60 for 1984.

The difference between $7.90 and $4.60 per thousand cubic feet in 1984 means a difference of over $3.30 between the so-called "Crosbie budget" and the budget presented by the government last night.

The hon. member made a lot of references to heating oil. He was crying about the fate reserved to people who are going to heat their homes with oil in the next few years. I would remind the hon. member, and the Canadian public at large, that the 1979 "Crosbie budget" would have meant, under the present assumptions and assuming no substantial and large increases in the international price of oil, $1.96 per gallon. Under our proposal there will be a maximum of $1.51, a difference of about 45 cents for every gallon of heating oil. Yet the hon. member for St. John's West dares to shed tears, though he was trying to do this to the Canadian public last year. I think the Canadian public saw through this last February so I do not intend to spend more time talking about the consequences of that dead budget—dead, fortunately for the country.

In energy, as in other things, the essence of good politics is to make sensible promises to the electorate and the essence of good government is to keep those promises. In the budget of last night and in our national energy program, we have done both. And I believe Canadians everywhere in this country will agree with us in the weeks to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: In the election campaign, we offered an explicit alternative to the Conservative view of energy policy. We offered a "made-in-Canada" oil price, not one determined by the whims of OPEC, or the vagaries of a turbulent oil market. We were very specific in our commitment—oil price rises less than $4 a barrel in 1980, and no more than $4.50 a barrel in 1981, 1982 and 1983. We offered a revitalized Petro-Canada. We offered major initiatives to increase Canadian ownership of the petroleum sector.

We won the election. We received a clear mandate from the electorate to develop energy policies and programs consistent with our principles. In the Speech from the Throne, we made it clear to the people of Canada that we intended to fulfil our election commitments; that we would resolve the nation's energy problem, in all of its dimensions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne we promised that oil prices would be set by Canada, not by OPEC. We promised that there would be no 18-cent excise tax increase on gas. We promised that we would renew our efforts to conserve energy in Canada. We promised that we would speed up implementation of programs to substitute plentiful energy sources for the petroleum which is now getting scarce. We promised new incentives for renewable energy. We promised to double our efforts to promote the discovery of new petroleum supplies in Canada. We promised to expand Petro-Canada, not to destroy it as the Tory government wanted to do last year. And we promised to give every Canadian a greater opportunity to take part in this huge industry everywhere in Canada, an industry which is ever growing, to participate directly in our rich energy legacy, particularly petroleum and natural gas. We made those promises in the Speech from the Throne. In earlier speeches I had the occasion to define certain of those elements and I stated in particular that our policy has three great objectives: the security of supplies, the opportunity for Canadians to participate in the benefits of that industry, and fairness.

[English]

No one who heard or read the Speech from the Throne or read my remarks since should be surprised by "The national energy program" tabled Tuesday night. It addresses each of these principles with a vigour and determination never before attempted by a Canadian government. It does exactly what we said we would do. It delivers on all of our promises.

The document tabled by my colleague last night is very significant in two respects. First, it represents what is probably the largest and most fundamental set of economic initiatives taken by the Government of Canada in this generation. Second, it is the most comprehensive government enunciation of energy policy in our country's history. I know of no other energy-rich nation that has taken its energy challenges and obligations so seriously.

The national energy program means energy security. It means becoming independent of foreign oil supplies well within this decade. It provides the price and incentive basis for accelerated exploration efforts so that new supplies will come on stream to replace imports. The program will stimulate the process of substituting other domestic fuels for scarce oil. It will foster more vigorous efforts to conserve oil and other fuels. Oil demand will be reduced dramatically, and the growth of over-all energy demand will be held below 2 per cent per year. In this way, we will achieve a more efficient energy-using structure, and bring demand in line with available domestic supplies.

But the program is more than a single-minded thrust toward oil security. It assigns high priority to other goals. One of these is energy opportunity—Canadians everywhere will be able to participate in the management and benefits of the energy sector. This means, obviously, a greater role for Canadian companies. We have three principal goals for the petroleum sector: First, at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of oil and gas production by 1990. Contrary to what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) said earlier, this does not necessarily mean only the better-off in our society. We have had fruitful negotiations with people in the credit unions, the caisses populaires and wheat pools who have expressed interest in investing in the Canadian oil and gas industry and in participating in this big movement to patriate the oil and gas industry in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Second, our policy means Canadian control of a significant number of the larger oil and gas firms, and, finally, an early increase in the share of the oil and gas sector owned by the Government of Canada.

Our opportunity theme has another, broader aspect. We intend to ensure that the benefits of the energy boom already under way in this country are enjoyed by Canadians in the west, as the petroleum boom takes on new momentum stimulated by our initiatives; in Atlantic Canada, as the offshore begins to deliver on its promise and new electricity sources are developed, and in central Canada, as the spin-off business stimulated by the national energy program creates new jobs and new prosperity.

And we are talking about real opportunities—for jobs and growth and new industry. There are offshore drilling rigs to be built. Canadians should build more of them, and they will. Given a real fair chance, we can compete with the best of them. The national energy program will provide that chance. Canadians can provide more of the equipment needed for oil sands plants. And they will. Consider, too, the dramatic off-oil effort. Equipment and installation will be needed meaning more activity, more industry, more jobs. We set the stage; we provide the stimulus. Thousands of jobs, Mr. Speaker, for Canadians—thousands of jobs across the country, not just in the oil producing provinces. Helping to meet our energy goals means meeting our economic and social goals as well.

Let me now turn to a central challenge that faced us as we developed the national energy program: I mean, fairness. Is the energy program tabled with the budget last night fair? The answer is emphatically and undeniably, yes. It is fair to the oil and gas producing provinces, fair to the consumer, and fair to the national government. Moreover, it is fair to the petroleum industry, which will continue to enjoy the same prosperous outlook most other industries do as it becomes more Canadian in its ownership and control.

First, the producing provinces. There has been hard bargaining with the producing provinces. The provinces brought strongly-held principles and objectives to the table. So did we. Both sides communicated their views to the Canadian public in clear and forceful terms. That was to be expected.

But now it is time for compromise and for conciliation. On our side, broad principles and concerns must override our negotiating objectives on revenue shares and revenue-raising objectives, for example. So we have adapted. We have yielded some ground, as a matter of fact, a lot of ground, and we have searched for a common ground. This is essential for the unity we all want. We have adapted our energy principles seeking a renewed, strengthened harmony between this government and those of the producing provinces.

When I began these negotiations, I said I was prepared to walk an extra mile to get an amicable agreement, to get a deal responsive to the position taken by the governments of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Any objective observer will agree that we have walked several extra miles. Let me explain.

As we all know, there was a near-agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government in the December 11 budget speech. The terms then being discussed would have brought the producing provinces some $40 billion in oil and gas revenues in the period 1980-83. In our negotiations, the provinces took the view that they should get the "same benefits" from any arrangement with us.

The producing provinces, especially British Columbia and Alberta, placed other constraints upon our negotiating position. They wanted no gas export tax and no federal tax at the wellhead.

It was almost impossible for us to accommodate these provincial concerns and restrictions. I still believe that an export tax on natural gas would have been fair, and that it represents no intrusion upon provincial rights. Nevertheless, we accommodated the provincial positions. And let us see how.

First the $40 billion. Under the national energy program, the producing provinces will receive $38 billion directly from oil and gas revenues and a further $2 billion, with $2 billion more to come in the form of the western development fund. So we have met their target. In the case of British Columbia and Saskatchewan, we have made them even better off than under the December 11 budget proposals. As well, we have spread the benefits to Manitoba, which will share in the growth resulting from the western development fund.

The percentage shares of revenue are also important. Over the past several years, the governments of the oil and gas producing provinces have received approximately 45 per cent and the federal government about 10 per cent of petroleum production revenues. What does the national energy program do to this revenue-sharing relationship? It raises the federal share to 24 per cent, and reduces the provincial share from 45 per cent to 43 per cent. The producing provinces, under the national energy program, would see their aggregate share drop by two percentage points. But the total tie would be much larger and their total revenue would be much larger than ever before.

Surely this is reasonable and fair, by any standard. The Canadian provinces will continue to enjoy a higher share than is the case in any other state in the world, more than double the share that would go to a U.S. state such as Texas, and triple the share going to Victoria state in Australia. Both of these states own their resources, just as the Canadian provinces do. In short, our package yields provinces a share much greater than the international norm. That is what I mean by going the extra mile to get an amicable deal.

Let me be more specific about the Alberta government's position under the national energy program. Its revenues in 1983, $9.7 billion—that is to the government of Alberta—will be more than double those it enjoyed in 1979. Over the period 1980-1983, its revenues will be over $31 billion. In per capita terms, the province's oil and gas revenues, about $1,600 in 1977, will be $4,300 in 1983. No other province can expect this sort of growth in its revenues and no other province in our history has ever known such a fantastically rapid growth under any regime. This outlook is in a province which already enjoys massive budgetary surpluses. Indeed, Alberta has a greater fiscal capacity than the average Canadian province, even without its oil and gas revenues.

Under our proposals, the government of Alberta will obtain more than $100 billion over the decade from oil and gas. It will go on earning large revenues in the foreseeable future. Alberta's vast energy endowment will ensure prosperity to its government and its people well beyond this decade. We are not talking about a short-term boom of a few years. We are talking about a new financial and economic presence in Canada, a new centre of gravity for our economy. Our policies, as indicated by the national energy program, will encourage that new wave of prosperity.

In our negotiations with the producing provinces, we sought a system which would give the Government of Canada a more reasonable share in the windfall revenues accruing from increases in the world oil price. I refer mainly to the increases in natural gas export prices. We have repeatedly noted the basic unfairness of a system that gives the gas-producing provinces all of the upside gain, while we are saddled, as the national government, with the financial and economic burden of higher oil prices. We wanted to change that; we wanted to share in the upside potential. How? Through an export tax similar to the one we have had on oil since 1974, and the one we have had on electricity for over 35 years up to 1963 and which was affecting essentially central Canada.

But the provincial governments were adamant on this point. No amicable deal could ever have been struck, had we insisted on a system that satisfied this basic principle. So, Mr. Speaker, again we yielded. There is no export tax on gas as was planned. Moreover, we will henceforth share 50-50 revenues from the oil export charge, in place since 1973, rather than keeping it all as we have up to now.

As far as British Columbia is concerned, the B.C. government is not losing today one penny of the money it was collecting yesterday either from B.C. citizens or from its exports. It is a total fabrication to pretend otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I am sure the provinces realize the importance of our concession on the export tax point. They know what upside potential means. It means that if world oil prices rise again the next few years as they did in the past couple of years, the provinces will derive a huge gain from export sales. Under such circumstances, with no federal export tax, again the provinces would be the chief beneficiaries.

We yielded most reluctantly on this point. I hope this gesture will remove the barriers to the concerted effort needed to get new supplies on stream. So here we have given ground in terms of both principle and revenues, now and in the future. Our projected revenue share—24 per cent—is smaller than that enjoyed by any national government I know of. Moreover, our methods of raising new revenues have been carefully chosen to avoid conflict with publicly stated provincial positions. There is no gas export tax, no wellhead tax. We have been conciliatory; we have bent over backward in a search for harmony. Our efforts will be richly rewarded, if they create a new basis for us all to work together.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INCREASE IN PREMIUMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The unemployment insurance program has long ceased to be an insurance program and is, in reality, a payroll tax scheme. The other night, the Minister of Finance increased this payroll tax from $3.24 to $4.32 per $100 of earnings.

This tax increase on working people represents a hidden billion dollars of revenue to the government. It represents to the ordinary working person, people earning $290 a week or less, over two weeks pay to the government over and above income taxes, sales tax, duties and now new taxes on their home heating costs.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration justify on motions the seizure of over two weeks' pay from the working people of this country, justify this additional billion dollars taken out of the pockets of working people, and justify his inefficient and inept handling of unemployment insurance.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF FEDERAL TAXES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the federal government appears to be exceeding its constitutional authority and transgressing the constitutional powers of the provinces in imposing a federal tax and royalty on provincial resources in contradiction of section 109 and section 125 of the BNA Act, I move, seconded by the member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the federal government immediately refer to the Supreme Court, for a constitutional opinion and ruling, both its budgetary 8 per cent tax on net revenues from oil and gas and its domestic and export tax of 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet on natural gas and liquefied petroleum products.

I am certain that in the interest of constitutional correctness the government would not hesitate to make such a reference.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CALL FOR CONDEMNATION OF VIOLATIONS IN U.S.S.R.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The motion has been drafted in consultation with groups such as Amnesty International.

In view of the fact that over 300 dissenters in the Soviet Union have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment, exile or have been forcibly confined to psychiatric hospitals since 1975, and in view of the increase in the arrests of dissenters in the Soviet Union which now exceeds 100 since October, 1979, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House condemns the Soviet Union for its widespread harassment, imprisonment and physical ill-treatment of people such as the well known Anatoly Shcharansky; the Russian human rights campaigner, Malva Larda; the well known Russian orthodox activist, Viktor Kapitanchuk; and Zinovy Krasivsky and Olha Matusevych, who are members of the Ukrainian Helsinki monitoring group, as well as others ill-treated for their non-violent exercise of their human rights, and urges the Canadian delegation to the Madrid Conference in November to make these views known to the delegates from the U.S.S.R.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED USE OF EMPLOYEES' SUPERANNUATION FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of urgent importance to the public service employees of Canada. Given that Tuesday's depression budget shows a cash requirement some $2 billion less than the projected deficit of over $14 billion, largely because the pension funds of government employees are plundered each year to finance a substantial portion of the national debt, and whereas the public service pension contributions are not secured by any form of investment in equity, as they ought to be, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the government be directed to stop using dishonestly the pension contributions of public service employees, RCMP and armed forces employees to help pay for the extravagantly wasteful excesses of the Liberal government and, furthermore, that a royal commission be called now to investigate the scandalous mismanagement and misuse of the government superannuation accounts.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CALL FOR REMOVAL OF TAX ON NATURAL GAS PRODUCED ON RESERVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the authority of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent importance. Whereas a number of Indian band councils in western Canada and perhaps in other parts of our country are endeavouring to get off welfare and raise their standard of living through the development of their natural resources, and whereas the Indian Act exempts our Indian reservations and the Indians from taxation directly or indirectly, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That this House urges the government to desist from imposing the natural gas tax on natural gas produced on the reserves and thus give our Indian people an opportunity to get out of poverty.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PARTICIPATION OF CANADIANS IN FUTURE DEVELOPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the special considerations in the budget for all Atlantic Canadians with respect to regional development, and in view of the hundreds of millions of dollars allocated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to the Quebec-maritime natural gas pipeline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant):

That this House should applaud the efforts of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for finally giving Canadians a real stake in their energy future.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CALL FOR CREATION OF MERCHANT FLEET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which has been presented by most members in this House from time to time. I hope there might be unanimous consent. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the members of this House affirm their support for the creation of an economically viable Canadian deep sea merchant fleet and recognize that this fleet would further encourage development of a full range of Canadian marine industries, including a world class shipbuilding industry, so that Canadians would have the opportunity to obtain a greater share of the economic and employment benefits of this industry.

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The embargo on grain sales to Russia has cost Canadian grain producers an average of $1,200 per farmer. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this government take immediate steps to make necessary payment to western farmers.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WILDLIFE

FUR RANCHERS—DANGER POSED BY JAPANESE FOXES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Nature conservationists have strongly criticized the federal government for permitting fur ranchers in Canada to import from Europe so-called "raccoon dogs" or Japanese foxes, as they are sometimes called, which could devastate domestic farm crops and wildlife in this country if they escaped or were released. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House urge the government to require fur ranchers to send all Japanese foxes or raccoon dogs back to Europe; to compensate the ranchers for their losses; and to pass strict laws to prevent the importation of all exotic animals except those proven to be harmless and over which complete control can be exercised.

Madam Speaker: For presentation this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED EXCISION OF ALBERTA FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT MAP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to seek redress from a news item and map which appeared in this morning's Ottawa Citizen and dealt with a Canadian government map which excised the province of Alberta out of confederation in favour of Saskatchewan. It is quite one thing for my province to be excised at the wellhead, but it is quite another thing to be excised out of existence.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That the Prime Minister:
Woo the socialists if you must,
Bed them down in common-law lust,
Rush after them their favour to curry,
Because, after all, they're Liberals in a hurry;

But don't get caught in the Broad-Blake snare,
And leave Albertans tearing their hair.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

PATRIATION—REPORTED POSITION OF UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs that flows out of the possibility that new difficulties have arisen in the government's attempt to have Britain decide constitutional questions which Canada should decide here in Canada. The Secretary of State will know from British news reports that the British government does not want to become the arbitrator between the Canadian federal government and the provincial governments on amendments to the British North America Act. The reports relate both to alleged communications between the British government and Canadian representatives and to more recent statements by British government spokesmen.

My first question is: Has there been any suggestion, in correspondence or conversation involving ministers or representatives of the two governments, to the effect that the British government wants basic Canadian disagreements to be resolved in Canada before Ottawa asks Britain to resolve them?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there has been no such request made by the government of the United Kingdom. There was a news story published this morning with which I am acquainted—it was also denied at 10 Downing Street this morning—to the effect that no message had been sent to the Canadian government as that earlier communiqué suggested.

There was also a news report stating that my colleague the Minister of the Environment and I, while in England, were told that the British government would not accommodate a request to patriate the constitution in the face of violent provincial disagreement during this year's parliamentary session. That report is entirely false.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I understand, as does this House, that the minister's department earlier denied the report in The Times as it was written. That was not my question. My question was: Has there been any suggestion communicated, in conversation or in any other communication, between British government ministers or representatives and Canadian government ministers or representatives suggesting that the British would want basic Canadian disagreements to be resolved in Canada before Ottawa asks Britain to resolve them? I am not asking for paragraph by paragraph verification of The Times story; I am asking the question whether or not there has been any suggestion to that effect conveyed in any way by any representatives of the British government to the Canadian government.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there has certainly been no proposal or request of that kind in our discussions with the British government. We had a free-flowing discussion, and while many possibilities were canvassed, as happens in a discussion of this nature, certainly that was not the way in which the conversation ended. There was no request, suggestion or proposal of that kind.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I believe that the minister has now said that there was no suggestion of that kind at any time. If that is what he intended to say, I would like him to verify his statement. Since the government strategy document anticipated provincial and parliamentary opposition to certain parts of the Liberal proposal, will the minister tell the House of Commons whether Canadian ministers or representatives raised with the British government or representatives the possibility of disagreement here in Canada and the possibility that Britain might have to decide questions that are deeply contentious in Canada?

Mr. MacGuigan: We certainly acquainted the British government and its representatives with the fact that there would be disagreement in Canada. That was already apparent at the time we saw them but, of course, there was a common assumption on both sides that the normal constitutional convention in the United Kingdom would be followed, namely, that the advice of the Canadian government would be the advice heard by the British government and that a joint resolution of the Canadian Parliament would be what is accepted by the British Parliament.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister and the rest of the House will know that detailed memoranda of conversations of this kind are kept. In light of the extraordinary circumstances, it being important that all members of Parliament know exactly what was discussed between ministers and, indeed, between officials on this question, and in light of the extraordinary situation of the government seeking a joint address on a matter that is contentious in Parliament and a matter of disagreement among the provinces and under challenge in the courts, I wonder if the minister would agree to publish the Canadian memoranda of the conversations in which he and his colleague, the minister responsible for the environment and other things, participated. In these extraordinary circumstances I wonder if there would be a willingness to publish those memoranda.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I do not think that would be in accord with the precedents nor with the practice, because it would remove the sense of confidentiality all sides have in discussions of this kind.

As I mentioned to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, there was free-flowing discussion with various representatives of the British government. We have stated here the conclusions of that discussion. I do not think it would be appropriate to go through the discussion here in Parliament.

PATRIATION—POSSIBILITY OF DISAGREEMENT—POSITION OF UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. I want to reiterate that it is our belief that this is a Canadian matter, that we should patriate the constitution with an amending formula which has widespread support here in Canada and that all future amendments should be made in Canada.

In view of the at best very weak denial he issued this morning—his press release says that he denies the story as written, so the minister is obviously leaving a fair amount of doubt that there was veracity to the story in The Times this morning—just on this narrow point, what would be the position of the government of the United Kingdom if there was widespread disagreement in Canada, including among the provinces? Can the minister answer that specific question?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I do not know to what communication this morning the hon. member is referring. I issued no press release this morning. In fact, my view was that the matter should await the House this afternoon where I assumed there would be questions. It may be that some answers were given by spokesmen for the department, but they were not intended to express our total reaction to the proposals or the comments which were being made by some British and Canadian media.

With respect to the precise question the hon. member asks, as I said, the common assumption on both sides during the discussion, which was never questioned by anyone and in fact has been expressly affirmed both in public and in private by the United Kingdom government, is that what the United Kingdom parliament looks to is a joint resolution of both Houses of this Parliament and nothing else.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister and it flows out of his answer. It obviously raises the question of who is responsible in his department for press releases. More importantly, in view of the difficulty in which this minister has now put this House and in view of the various reports he has given, will he assure the House that he will make a statement on motions to explain clearly what happened.

Further, in view of the requests of a number of Canadians, notwithstanding also the premiers at the first ministers' conference, would the minister recommend to his cabinet colleagues that an early meeting be convened between the Prime Minister and the premiers to discuss one agenda item only, namely, an amending formula, so that the joint address could then go forward with regard to patriation with an amending formula that would then have the widespread support all of us seek?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I will certainly give consideration to the hon. member's request for a statement on motions, but I will not accede to his request to change the policy of the government, which I fully support. There has been no ambiguity whatsoever in the statements made by me and the Minister of the Environment. We have stated with no ambiguity since our return—and, indeed, in the United Kingdom before our return—that the United Kingdom would follow the traditional convention that a joint resolution of this House would be followed by the British parliament and honoured by the British government, and that the only adviser to the British government on Canadian constitutional matters is the Canadian government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT IN BUDGET RESPECTING "FULLY EMPLOYED SOCIETY"

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The figures which have been released by the minister in his budget indicate that he himself anticipates that unemployment will rise by over 100,000 this year, and indeed it is projected that over the next five years there will be on average one million unemployed Canadians and perhaps as many as 1.5 million if one includes the real unemployed.

In light of those figures, which I am sure the minister would agree are pretty shocking, I should like to ask him what he means when he says, on page 3 of his budget statement, that the budget which he has brought down is intended to restore, over time, among other things, a fully employed society. What does he mean by "a fully employed society", and what does he mean by "over time"?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the context of the budget anticipates for the short-term higher unemployment. The hon. member can have a dialectical argument, like we used to have ten or 15 years ago, as to what the concept of full employment would be. In this case I am talking about reduced unemployment over the time period forecast in the budget.

Mr. Rae: I am not a dialectician but I could describe the government's recipe as short-term pain for long-term pain. Because if the minister looks at his own projections, he will see that the unemployment figures at the end of the five-year period are just as high as they are now, and that the average over the five-year period is higher than now. That is not dialectics, those are straight facts. Can the minister please confirm that, on the facts which are contained both in the budget and in the medium-term prospects which are described in his budget papers, if you look at the real number of unemployed in Newfoundland, for example, in the early 1980s through to 1985 one out of every four or five Canadians will be unemployed and that the average for all of Canada will be one out of every ten Canadians unemployed over the next four or five years?

Mr. MacEachen: So?

Mr. Rae: I am asking the minister to confirm those figures, and he is saying "so".

An hon. Member: What do you mean by "so"?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the figures in the document are accurate. The hon. member's interpretation of them is a bit suspect.

Mr. Rae: If my interpretation is suspect, I think the minister's complacency is nothing short of unbelievable.

My final supplementary concerns an article written in 1962 by someone describing himself as an economist by the name of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. The article is entitled "Economic Rights". At the end of this article the author writes:

> —our laws . . . recognize as proprietors of an enterprise men who today hold a few shares . . . whereas workers who may have invested the better part of their lives and of their hopes in a job have no proprietary right to that job, and may be expropriated . . . whenever they grow old, whenever Capital decides to disinvest.

He describes that as an "erroneous concept of property". In light of all the statements that have been made by the minister in his document about the importance of labour mobility—and in fact he has turned the country into a nation of backpackers thanks to the levels of unemployment that he is expecting in many parts of our country—can he point specifically in his budget to any steps which have been taken which guarantee, not simply labour mobility, but the importance of providing some job protection, some pension guarantees and some economic security for those people who are affected by the 1,000 lay-offs per day that have been taking place over the past year and that we can be sure will be taking place over the next five years, thanks to this stand-pat-and-do-nothing budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member's rhetoric is about as outdated as the amendment which he proposed yesterday in the House which looked to me like a warmed over edition of the Regina manifesto.

Mr. Rae: A million unemployed is outdated?

Mr. MacEachen: He talked about intellectual bankruptcy. It was demonstrated clearly yesterday in his amendment and again in his questions.

● (1430)

May I indicate to the hon. member, if he is serious about the question of growth and unemployment in the economy, that I have acknowledged in the budget my view about the medium-term economic situation as one which does not give any cause for satisfaction. The solution proposed by the New Democratic Party is to inject a "stimulus" into the economy by increasing the deficit at this particular time. In my view, that prescription is likely to fail and will prevent this country from participating fully in an economic recovery which will likely take place in the second quarter of next year. That is why there has not been an effort in this budget to run up a deficit, which is very large already, and make our problems in the medium term more difficult. That is the stance taken by the government in the budget.

The hon. member talks about jobs. Apparently he is interested in jobs, but he has not understood the impact of the budget. In the economic development envelope this particular year we are increasing expenditures by 22 per cent in order to support activities in the economy which we think will make a long-term contribution to improved productivity and growth. In addition to that, we have provided a special amount of $350 million in order to deal with the important problems of restructuring and manpower adjustments.

Finally, the hon. member talked yesterday about industrial strategy. His concept of industrial strategy or development is very limited.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

An hon. Member: He is not answering today's question, he is answering yesterday's.

THE BUDGET

CONSIDERATION OF TAX CREDIT FOR COST OF HEATING FUEL

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I sat through the budget on Tuesday night and a 50-minute—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): It is coming, it is coming. We had a 50-minute "question period" yesterday and another 17 minutes of gobbledygook from the minister today—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): —and never was a meaningful word heard on behalf of the Canadian consumer. This budget leaves the consumer far worse off than the previous budget of my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Since this budget potentially permits a 75-cent per gallon increase in home heating fuel by 1983, why did the Minister of Finance not consider a tax credit for home heating fuel or at least an increase in CHIP?

Mr. Lalonde: What about GIS?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to repeat a statement I made yesterday. It throws a good deal of light upon the difference between the impact of this particular budget on Canadian consumers of oil and gas in comparison with the impact of the budget which my hon. friend supported last December. The schedule of price increases of oil and gas over the period up to and including 1984 saves Canadian consumers $40 billion in comparison with the budget presented last December.

Some hon. Members: That is not true.

Mr. MacEachen: If my hon. friend wants to get some facts, I would ask him to read the speech given yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Crosbie: Pinocchio.

Mr. MacEachen: In it he demonstrated very clearly that the price of gasoline, natural gas and home heating oil will be considerably lower under this budget than the one the hon. member supported last December, and that is why we are not providing an energy tax credit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY RESPECTING INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, it just proves the point I was trying to make, that obviously the government cares nothing about the average consumer.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I have read enough speeches by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I think other Canadians have read enough too.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs wearing his hat as the Postmaster General. The budget indicates that there is no planned deficit in the Post Office. His own estimates show a deficit of $400 million which will require a minimum 10-cent increase to consumers in the price of first-class mail.

Mr. Crosbie: At least.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): When does the minister plan to introduce this postage tax? How much will it cost us?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, as it turns out, I answered that very question this morning before a parliamentary committee. Obviously the estimates introduced by the Minister of Finance cover the next four years and what we must keep in mind, therefore, is the fact that, whether a Crown corporation is set up or not, the Post Office Department will have to boost postal rates in 1981. That is nothing new, it has been said several times before. My predecessor as Postmaster General, the hon. member for Vancouver South, stated himself this morning that when he was minister he had plans to raise postal rates; he never did get around to it because of the change in government. Besides, and after two years without higher rates, it is only natural that they go up in 1981.

SOCIAL SECURITY

IMPACT OF BUDGET ON POOR AND ELDERLY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Given the impact of the budget on the elderly and those on fixed incomes, has the minister examined the budget with that fact in mind? For example, almost 40 per cent of the $35 increase in the GIS will be taken up with increases in the cost of heating oil in the months ahead. Has the minister examined the impact of the budget on the poor and the elderly? After one finishes reading through what the minister said in his budget, the bottom line is that the burden has shifted to the poor and the elderly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, in my opinion the analysis of the hon. member is altogether erroneous. If he examines the budget he will see that it definitely includes the notion of indexation of social programs geared to the full cost of living, which has always been one of our priorities. It is obvious that the Minister of Finance has decided to act as firmly as possible to boost growth and productivity. These extra costs will be offset by automatic indexation and the suggestion of the hon. member is false and contrary to the budget his government itself introduced last December.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I stand behind what I said. The poor and the elderly of this country will experience what I am saying this winter. Given the fact that the energy and food portions of the consumer basket of the poor and the elderly is disoriented toward that fact—in other words, it is disproportionate—and that the consumer price index is the weighting scale for indexing, will the minister examine the consumer price index to see if it is relevant to the disproportionately high amount of the cost of living which must be paid out for food and fuel oil costs by the poor, the elderly and those on fixed incomes? If so, will she change it?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I have just returned from a fact-finding mission in a few European countries and I wish my colleague would have had the chance to join us. He would have seen in the discussions we had—and I am thinking in particular of Sweden—although that government, like many others, has decided to take the cost of oil and energy out of the consumer basket, out of the indexing indicator which will be used for the pensions of seniors, we have refused that approach in this country. We will keep the full consumer price index as the method of ensuring that, despite the unpleasant increases of different components of the consumer price index, our senior citizens and people under social programs, including families, will be fully protected.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF REDUCTION IN PURCHASING POWER

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is somewhat related to the question asked by my colleague. The minister speaks of economic recovery taking place in the second quarter of next year and the industrial redevelopment which he hopes will occur as a result of the budget initiatives.

Would the minister agree that the reduction in purchasing power which results from the increases that have taken place in costs in all the major areas of consumer spending can do nothing but reduce manufacturing, create higher unemployment levels, reduce the tax payable to the federal government and, in the final analysis, create an even larger deficit? What has the government done to reverse the trend which automatically flows from inflicting higher and higher costs on people in the essential areas, thereby causing this continual domino effect on the economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): With respect to the first point, the hon. member has asked what the government has tried to do to support the economy. The hon. member will understand that at the present time the deficit is $14.2 billion, which is an amount we are putting into the economy in order to give it support and stimulate activity.

Now hon. members in that party want me to do more in that direction, to run up the deficit in order to undertake the kinds of projects which have been enumerated. Yesterday the hon. member for St. John's West spent a good part of his speech denouncing the budget because the deficit was too high. I believe that the deficit at the moment is appropriate to the weak output of the economy and that any greater effort to increase it would be counter-productive. That is the general posture of the government.

My hon. friend asks about—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. MacEachen: Thank you.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. If we have an increase in unemployment of 100,000 persons this coming year, that will surely mean 100,000 people who will purchase less. If we reduce the consumer purchasing power of the balance of the population with the increases which the government has inflicted upon them in this budget, that will mean they will buy even less in the consumer marketplace, which will in itself result in even higher unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Supplementary questions should be even shorter than the first question asked, but the question of the hon. member looks as if it might be longer. Would the hon. member please ask his question now.

Mr. Deans: What specific measure is there in this budget that will put an end to the domino effect which results from unemployment compounded on unemployment?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am not sure I fully understand the hon. member's question, but I want to make one point to him. There is no way that I or the government can fully protect the Canadian consumer or citizen from increased energy or food prices. Most European countries and almost all of the OECD countries are fully absorbing world energy prices immediately. We have not done that. We have protected the Canadian consumer from the full impact of world price increases. But we have increased prices and there will be increased costs in the economy. Nothing I or the hon. member can say will change that if we want to face reality, one which is not only a Canadian reality but a worldwide reality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

EFFECTS OF BUDGET ON MARKET AND HOME OWNERS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. He has said he believes his deficit is appropriate. However, that does not appear to be what the marketplace is saying, with the Toronto Stock Exchange index down 74 points since Tuesday, the oil and gas index down 600 points, federal government bonds, which were bought only four months ago, down 15 per cent, the dollar into the 84-cent range once again, and hundreds of millions of dollars going out of the country. Now it has been announced the bank rate is up four-tenths of a point over last week.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister indicate, now that we have had the energy statement, when do we get his budget in the hope that it might steady the market?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the forces in the market which have accounted for the increased bank rate today were quite evident before the budget was brought down.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The same is true of the slight weakening of the Canadian dollar. So the hon. member is drawing a very long bow if he is attempting to relate one to the other.

Mr. Stevens: Surely it is unforgivable that a Minister of Finance would say that the forces which are driving up interest rates in this country were evident before he brought in his budget, yet in that budget he did nothing to correct that trend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact that federal rates are now near 14 per cent for long-term bonds—that is the rates on Canada bonds—which indicates that mortgage rates are likely going to the 15 per cent or 16 per cent level, would the minister indicate what he intends to do to help the home owners in this country who have to renew mortgages, or those people who would like to buy houses in the future?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if he shares the view his deskmate expressed yesterday that the deficit is too large, even as it presently exists, then he would be the first to urge me not to undertake another new major spending program to add to that already high deficit.

INQUIRY RESPECTING DEFICIT REDUCTION

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Can he give us the reasons he chose to effect a somewhat smaller deficit reduction in this budget than his predecessor did in his budget?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it is an important question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I would make a clarifying observation, namely, that the former minister of finance was projecting a decrease of the existing deficit, over the time-frame, of about $2 billion, and that is exactly what I am doing, effective at the end of 1984. The hon. member for York-Peel said the deficit went up this year, which is absolutely right. It increased because of increased payments on the debt as a result of higher interest payments, interest rates which had run up even more explosively under the former government than under the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It went up because of increased payments on oil compensation, which hon. members opposite would have had to pay in any event. I accepted those increased expenditures because of weak economic performance.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES TO ASSIST AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the largest group of energy users in our society is those engaged in agriculture, and more specifically farmers, and in order to stop farm costs from absolutely skyrocketing under the added burden of the energy price increases that the minister announced on Tuesday night, there will have to be either a tax credit or some other kind of assistance given to agriculture or we will see absolutely skyrocketing farm prices. There was no indication of agricultural measures in the budget at all. What is the government considering doing for agriculture?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Sending Whelan to the Senate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we took action in the budget on Tuesday night to assist the agricultural industry by not proceeding with an 18-cent tax on gasoline and by bringing in a much lower cost structure for the agricultural industry.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. The increased costs vary but there are some estimates that grain farmers, for example, will experience as much as a 15 or 20 cents per bushel increase because of additional energy requirements, since agriculture is such a high component in the use of energy. May I ask if any special consideration is going to be given to the agricultural sector? I would remind the minister that the answer he just gave me is not satisfactory.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I cannot understand why the answer should be unsatisfactory when the budget on Tuesday night provided a lower cost structure for the agricultural industry than the budget of last December, which the hon. member supported.

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS TO MEET MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): My question is also for the Minister of Finance. Surely the minister is aware of hardships in the construction industry, not only in the province I represent but throughout the country as well. The Minister of Finance also knows about the difficulties facing small home owners and other prospective buyers. Given these circumstances, having failed to provide anything in the budget to cope with staggering interest costs, would the Minister of Finance, despite all his pious arguments about the budget, be prepared to reassure those thousands of Canadians and promise very special assistance to small home owners to help them face interest costs?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, I cannot give the assurance that there will be a special program. I could not give the assurance earlier in the year, when interest rates were higher than they are at present, that the treasury could support an additional program of that size and expenditure magnitude. We made clear during the election campaign that we would not proceed with the mortgage interest deductibility program that had been part of the policy of the last government, and we do not propose to proceed with that program or any other program at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: A supplementary, Madam Speaker. If I heard correctly, the Minister of Finance has no intention of helping small home owners who are facing enormous difficulties and who are not yet at the end of their rope if we keep in mind that the minister did say the inflation spiral would continue at roughly 10 per cent. That being so, would the minister not show a little more sympathy for those small owners and tell us that in the near future he will introduce a measure, first to save those who already have homes and then to enable other Canadians to become home owners?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I recall that earlier in the year I examined this question very carefully in the light of the considerable interest rate increases that had occurred in relation to home owners who had undertaken the obligation of paying increased mortgage rates. After an examination of that problem I concluded, based upon the objective facts, that a very, very high proportion of those home owners, because of their increased incomes since mortgages had been taken out, and taking into account the normal relationship between income and payments for housing, could manage on their own resources.

We did undertake at that time to consider a program, not a financial program but a rearrangement of mortgages that would assist a group that might be affected. That seems to have worked very well and up to this point has made unnecessary a very large expenditure program which is obviously being advocated by my hon. friend. I just do not have the resources at the present time to finance any other new programs.

Mr. Wilson: Why?

Mr. MacEachen: If I take the advice of the hon. member for St. John's West, I should be cutting down the current expenditures listed for the government.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

QUEBEC-MARITIMES EXTENSION—SUPPLY OF PIPE BY CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the minister stated it was the government's intention to complete a Quebec-Maritimes pipeline. In view of the fact that 100 per cent of the pipe for the western pipeline is being made in Canada, could the minister tell the House whether he has ascertained if the industries in Canada will have the capability of producing the pipe which will be necessary for the completion of the Quebec-Maritimes pipeline in the desired time?

An hon. Member: Of course they will.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think there is no reason to doubt that the pipe provided for that pipeline will come from Canadian steel companies.

INQUIRY RESPECTING REINTRODUCTION OF MURB TAX WRITE-OFFS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Since it is well documented by the Canadian Council on Social Development that MURB tax write-offs in the past did absolutely nothing to help build affordable rental accommodation for families, for native people or for pensioners, and that in fact family homes were often demolished in order to build fancy, expensive luxury bachelor apartments, why did the minister respond to the pressures from the real estate lobby to reintroduce MURB tax write-offs for the wealthy instead of investing in social housing to try to deal directly with Canada's most desperate housing problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is distorting the purpose of the program, which is to increase rental accommodation through a tax shelter which may indeed apply to persons in high income brackets. That is acknowledged. The impact will be on increasing rental accommodation. I responded to representations not only from persons in the construction business but also to representations made at the recent ministers of finance meeting and representations made to me by members of the House of Commons, as well as by the minister who advised me that at the present time this would be the most appropriate way to provide additional stimulus. I noticed yesterday in one of the Toronto papers that it was stated the impact would be to create about 10,000 additional jobs, and I think that is rather important.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, social housing would create just as many jobs. I wonder if the minister talked to tenants. Does the minister realize that from 1974 to 1979, the MURB period, over $315 million was added to our national debt because of MURB tax write-offs, yet during the same period, construction of rental units dropped by 41 per cent? Since MURBs cost so much, benefited only the rich, I repeat, and made no impact on priority housing problems of Canadians, will the minister reconsider his decision or at least invest a similar amount in non-profit and co-op housing for those who most need it?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, there has been consistent support by this government for co-operative housing and non-profit housing. One just has to travel the country to see the impact of the housing program. I believe that the introduction of this particular tax problem will have a beneficial effect on increasing rental accommodation in cities especially, where the vacancy rate is very very low. It will also have the substantial effect of creating jobs in the construction agency whose unions, I understand, are very much in support of this particular policy.

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY—REDUCTION IN FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the intent of the policy announced in the budget to increase Canadian ownership in the oil and gas industry. The budget states that one objective is to achieve at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of production by 1990, down from the current level of foreign ownership of about 70 per cent. In order to achieve this, exploration and development incentives will be phased out by the end of 1983 for all companies more than 50 per cent foreign owned.

My question is this. Is it the policy of the government to reduce the ownership level of all companies within the industry to the 50 per cent level, or is the policy related to the industry in the aggregate; in other words, to reduce the level of ownership to 50 per cent in the aggregate? As well, could the minister answer in what time-frame he is trying to achieve this? Is it related to the phasing out of the incentives?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the objective of the government is to reduce foreign ownership to less than 50 per cent in the industry as an aggregate. We do not foresee, for instance, the elimination of any oil or gas company in Canada that would be more than 50 per cent owned. But what we are concerned about is that overall there would be at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership, and that in the larger companies there would be a significant increase in Canadian controlled companies, that is, companies actually managed and controlled by Canadians. This is a very strong part of our policy and we have announced a number of steps to achieve it.

As far as Canadian ownership is concerned, we have indicated that it will be before 1990 and we have announced steps that I hope will achieve this objective well within this decade. We have not set a specific year within the decade, but we want to make sure that by 1990, at least, this objective will have been achieved, while the other objectives I have mentioned—greater control and a few acquisitions by the Government of Canada—are to be achieved in the early part of this decade.

As to the second part of the question asked by the hon. member with regard to the phasing out of some of the incentives, these are spelled out in detail in "The National Energy Program", and I would refer him to the tables published with that program.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am aware of the phasing out of incentives. It is the concern I have which prompts the question. The primary objective, as stated by the government, was to achieve self-sufficiency during this period of time. Since the foreign-owned companies are a major element in achieving self-sufficiency, my question to the minister is this. Since the incentives for the foreign-owned companies—those companies which own more than 50 per cent offshore—are phased out, is there any intention of introducing at some time within the next ten-year period a change in the incentives to give encouragement to companies which bring in some degree of Canadian ownership but not the full 50 per cent, which would qualify them for the incentives?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his supplementary question. The phasing out of the incentives to the foreign-owned companies was put in the energy program to allow those companies to turn around and find Canadian partners and to bring Canadian ownership into their companies as they exist at the present time. We believe that the time lag we have provided for should allow those companies that want to achieve Canadian ownership. For those not wanting to open their companies to Canadians, we have stated that we are ready to buy them out. We will ensure that they will continue to work for Canada in order to achieve our self-sufficiency goal.

Our purpose is not to drive out all foreign companies by any means. As a matter of fact, and as the hon. member knows, the incentives for tar sands and heavy oil continue, including incentives for foreign companies. There are still incentives for foreign companies, but we would like them to concentrate their efforts in areas where there is most need to help us meet our goal of self-sufficiency.

POINTS OF ORDER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43 MOVED BY MR. SIDDON

Madam Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) rising on a point of order.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, Standing Order 43 is to be used for matters of urgent and pressing necessity and is to be based on facts. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), dealing with the use of pension funds, suggested that the government was plundering these pension funds. He made allegations intended, I suggest, to frighten public service employees. These allegations are not based on any facts whatever. He made references to figures set forth in the statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to the financial position taken over a multi-year perspective, which is the same as that in last December's statement by the then minister of finance. If this had been a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, I suggest the hon. member should have raised it at that time.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I have been raising questions with respect to the state of the public service superannuation accounts with this minister, in committee and in this House, for several months. I have not been getting any answers. Therefore it has become a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Madam Speaker: I understand the two hon. members do not have the same interpretation of these facts. Each is entitled to expose them as he sees fit. That is why we have debate in the House of Commons so facts can be refuted from time to time.

As I was saying before that point of order was raised, I have a notice of a question of privilege by the hon. member for Skeena. I require an hour's notice for questions of privilege, and I have not had quite that hour's notice. However, I could close my eyes to that. But when there is notice, if the hon. member looks at the Standing Order, he will see that he should give me a brief statement as to what his question of privilege is all about. He did not do that. The idea is to save the time of the House so that the Speaker, in advance, can look into the situation to be evoked during the course of the question of privilege.

Since the question of privilege does not flow from the deliberations of the House today, I will take his notice now, and ask him to raise it tomorrow.

Point of Order—Mr. Hnatyshyn

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING PROGRAMS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my point of order flows from an answer given by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) who has responsibility for the government's advertising programs, in response to a question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson), last Monday.

This point of order has to do with the address given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last night in Regina and the advertising which took place in advance of that particular function. I have in my hand, and I will present to you, Madam Speaker, a photocopy of some of the advertising that was placed in various newspapers in Saskatchewan before the Prime Minister's speech. By a scrutiny of this particular advertisement, Madam Speaker, you will be able to see that it is authorized by the Government of Canada, with the official Canada logo affixed to that particular advertisement.

These advertisements are very expensive. The difficulty I have, in terms of the response which was given to the question raised by my colleague from Assiniboia, is that I think the minister unintentionally misled the House to indicate that there was no government expenditure with respect to this particular program in the advertising for the dinner.

To compound this situation, the information in the advertisement under the logo of the Government of Canada is false, incorrect, and misleading. Listed in this advertisement are a number of organizations and associations, such as the Saskatchewan Stock Growers Association, and the Palliser Wheat Growers Association purporting to be "hosting organizations". That is false, and incorrect. It is not true. These organizations were not hosting. They had withdrawn. I do not know how many other organizations in Saskatchewan were listed as hosting organizations that would have withdrawn prior to this meeting.

I have copies of press reports which verify the fact that even though this was known to whomever put the ad in the paper, that the organizations had withdrawn their support, they went ahead and published this misleading advertisement for the Prime Minister's visit to Regina. For example, I quote from the Palliser Wheat Growers Association press release of October 27 wherein president George Fletcher advised that for "The Prime Minister's Evening with the People of Saskatchewan" on Wednesday, October 29, their association had been invited to have their members buy tickets and attend as guests.

The difficulty I have in connection with this point of order is that the minister indicated in his response that the government had not contributed financially to this advertising campaign for the dinner. Today in the media across Saskatchewan, Mr. Ralph Langdale, the executive assistant to Senator Hazen Argue, reaffirmed that the government spent no money—this is, one way or the other. Either there has been an expenditure of public funds on misleading information, wrong, incorrect, a public lie in the newspapers of Saskatchewan, or they have not contributed financially, whereupon it is incumbent upon the minister or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to launch an investigation to determine who is using the logo of the Government of Canada unlawfully, and misrepresenting the position of this government.

My point of order is this. The minister was either incorrect in his answer on Monday with respect to the support and funding of this so-called extravaganza, "The Prime Minister's Evening with the People of Saskatchewan", or not. The Prime Minister's evening was terminated after television coverage was cut off. The Prime Minister abruptly quit his speech and left the people of Saskatchewan. I can assure hon. members that in terms of the crowd that received the Prime Minister there were bigger crowds at executions during the French revolution.

The minister has a duty to stand in this House and explain his answer, to admit it was false, or undertake to make an investigation with respect to the use of the logo of the Government of Canada in this connection.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I am not sure how that rates as a point of order, but I want to respond to the hon. member. I will leave aside all the foofaraw about the attendance of various groups and so on. I obviously played no role with regard to who was invited, who was not invited, who came and who did not.

When I responded, as memory serves me, because I had no notice of this until a few moments ago when it was waved at me from across the floor, in the question the other day I was asked if the Government of Canada or the taxpayers of Canada were paying for a broadcast of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I said I had no knowledge of any such payment. I do know the broadcast was paid for by the Liberal Party of Canada. I know in fact that no time had been bought at that point. It was purchased later, although arrangements were under way. It was paid for. The ad I had not seen and had not approved, and I will look into it.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, may I just respond to what my colleague from Saskatoon West mentioned about the reply the minister gave to our colleague from Assiniboia.

In obtaining tickets for the centennial auditorium or the Centre of the Arts in Regina, when they requested the purchase of tickets the telephone number of Senator Hazen Argue's office was given out. The person responsible, the contact person in that office, was a Mr. Bob Lyster, who happens to be an employee of the people of Canada, not of the Liberal Party of Canada. At the same time, another defeated Liberal candidate from Saskatchewan, also listed as an employee of the Government of Canada, was soliciting purchases for the same tickets from a government office in Regina. It was a government office, not the office of the Liberal Party of Canada. The point about the logo of the Government of Canada being used for a fund raising dinner for the Liberal party in Saskatchewan is that this is a misuse, and there was misinformation contained in the advertisement.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members might have a complaint about the particular question that was raised as a point of order. It deals with something which took place outside this House. I fail to see how it can be the subject of a point of order since there is nothing in it which contravenes our Standing Orders. It seems to be a complaint, perhaps a legitimate complaint. I have had to listen to it, but I do not see it as a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. YURKO—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF OIL AND GAS TAXES

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I hope you will give me several minutes to expand my question of privilege. Today I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 which asked that the federal government immediately refer to the Supreme Court, for a constitutional opinion and ruling, both its budgetary 8 per cent tax on net revenues from oil and gas and its domestic and export tax of 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet on natural gas and liquefied petroleum products. You put the motion, Madam Speaker. Obviously you must have heard some "noes" from the government side because the motion was not accepted.

I would like to come to my question of privilege as a result of the motion. These taxes on the provincial royalty share of oil and gas from Crown-owned corporations are, among some experts, contrary to sections 109 and 125 of the British North America Act. The constitutionality of these taxes has been questioned by several provincial governments. As a member of Parliament, I believe it is incumbent upon the Chair and the House to ensure that the actions of this House are constitutionally correct in accordance with the rules of this House.

It is a basic privilege of the members of this House that we not only act correct constitutionally, but know that we are acting correctly. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I look to you to advise me and all members of this House that we are not involved in any actions which breach the existing Canadian constitution. Such action by me or any member of this House breaches the privileges of each member of this House in that they are or would be compromised in their actions by virtue of the fact that they may unwillingly or unknowingly be acting beyond the constitutional capacity of this House.

To circumvent such breaches, it is incumbent upon the government to assure us that it has unimpeachable legal advice and an opinion that the taxes it has imposed are within the constitutional capacity of this House or else the government will immediately undertake in the interim to refer these taxes for an opinion and a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada.

My question of privilege is simply this. All members of this House should be apprised at the earliest opportunity as to whether we are acting constitutionally correctly in this matter. If not, then a reference should be made to the Supreme Court of Canada at the earliest opportunity. If this is not done and the question is left up in the air, then I look to you, Madam Speaker, to advise me as to whether my privileges of this House in acting unconstitutionally are in fact effective.

Madam Speaker: I suspect the hon. member knows that the Chair is in no position to interpret either the law or the constitution. Whether something which takes place in this House is constitutional or legal is not for the Chair to decide. The Chair only decides whether we are following our own rules. That is spelled out in article 12(1) of the Standing Orders which reads:

> Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order.

● (1520)

That is the scope of my responsibility. That is sufficient. At any rate, I am sure that I would be unable to fulfil the request that is being made by the hon. member through a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, today is Thursday. The government House leader earlier allocated Friday as an allotted day, and it is his intention, I understand, to carry the budget debate through to its completion next Thursday. Would he tell us now, well in advance, his legislative priorities. I am interested in knowing whereabouts in the scale of priorities the freedom of information bill stands. If he could tell me that, I would be grateful.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague is correct. Friday will be an allotted day, and on Monday we will continue with the budget debate. The freedom of information bill would have been introduced last Tuesday if the post office bill had been sent to committee on time. Since it was not, it is difficult for me to say at this time when we will be in a position to deal with the freedom of information bill.

Following the budget debate, high priority will be given to the Bank Act since it must be adopted and receive royal assent before November 30, as my colleague well knows. So following the budget debate, we will deal with the Bank Act. I understand that at the time we table the proclamations an hon. member for the NDP would like to have a special debate on the matter. This will also take up some time of the House. Excluding Fridays, there are seven allotted days before December 10. Generally speaking, this is the House business we will have to deal with before December 10.

[Later:]

Also, with regard to the discussion among House leaders about Remembrance Day, which falls on a Tuesday this year, as to whether or not the House would sit on the previous Monday, November 10, I think I can say now that we on this side agree not to sit on the Monday preceding Remembrance Day. However, I would like to have further consultations with my colleagues as to when we will recoup the four hours of government time which will be lost if we do not sit on Monday. We would like to recoup those four hours in the following week or weeks. Hopefully, we will be in a position sometime next week to agree to a House order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there has been this discussion, and it is my understanding that there are four hours of government time to be recouped. We can certainly agree with respect to that.

Mr. Paproski: What about December 25?

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I also indicate our agreement so that hon. members will know that the House will not be sitting on November 10. That includes an agreement later on to decide when to recover the four hours of government time that will be lost.

MR. MANLY—WEST COAST OIL TANKER TRAFFIC

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my constituents in Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands and other concerned residents of British Columbia, I wish to present a petition to this House. The petition expresses our great concern about the growing threat of oil tanker traffic on Canada's Pacific coast. It calls upon Parliament to oppose this threat to the Canadian environment and to ask the National Energy Board to hold local hearings in communities directly threatened by any oil port or oil route proposals.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 306, 1,212, 1,484, 1,485, 1,488 and 1,502.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Question No. 306—Mr. Herbert:

1. During the past five years, what amount was contributed by Canada to the Organization of American States and for what purpose?

2. Is the government considering a membership in the OAS?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. As Canada is not a member of the OAS, Canada has not contributed to the budget of the OAS. Through CIDA, Canada has contributed $778,000 toward a rural co-operative development project managed by the OAS. Canada is a full member of, and does contribute to, some specialized inter-american agencies, such as the Pan-American Health Organization, the Inter-American Development Bank, Pan American Institute of Geography and History and the Inter-American Indian Institute. However, these organizations are independent of the OAS.

2. The government has considered the question of becoming a full member of the OAS and has decided at this time not to apply for full membership. However, Canada maintains a permanent observer mission to the Organization of American States.

STATISTICS—CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 1,212—Mr. MacKay:

How many of the enumerators and commissioners to be employed pursuant to subsection 5(1) of the Statistics Act, for the taking of the 1981 census, will be selected through the process commonly referred to as the Political or Ministerial Referral System in the constituency of (a) Blainville-Deux-Montagnes (b) Windsor West (c) Egmont (d) Saint-Henri-Westmount (e) Beauharnois-Salaberry (f) Westmorland-Kent (g) Stormont-Dundas (h) Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (i) Ottawa West (j) Restigouche (k) Mercier (l) Rosemont (m) Charlevoix (n) Verchères (o) Cardigan?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: Only candidates for census commissioner positions are identified through the ministerial referral system. Selection is based on an interview and test administered by Statistics Canada. The numbers of census commissioners to be employed under subsection 5(1) of the Statistics Act, for the constituencies named, are as follows:

	Census Commissioners
(a) Blainville-Deux Montagnes	6
(b) Windsor West	6
(c) Egmont	3
(d) Saint-Henri-Westmount	14
(e) Beauharnois-Salaberry	6

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 29, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment thereto of Mr. Crosbie (p. 4231) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Rae (p. 4235).

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in the few minutes that I have left, I would like to deal with another aspect of our energy policy. I indicated yesterday that our policy would ensure energy self-sufficiency in Canada by 1990, that it would afford all Canadians the opportunity to share in the benefits of the oil industry and that this policy was fair to all provinces. I also want to emphasize that this policy is fair to all citizens of Canada.

Yesterday, I heard Mr. Parizeau, the Quebec minister of finance, claim that low-income families would have been better off with the Progressive Conservative government budget. Having heard that statement, I am not surprised he overlooked a $500 million hole, under the Department of Education, in his budget last year. Now, let us take the case of a Montreal family that uses oil heating and runs an ordinary car about 12,000 miles a year. That I think is a good average for the typical family in Montreal. Under the Progressive Conservative budget, oil heating would have cost $1,760 in 1984, and running the car, including the 18-cent tax, $1,260 a year, for a total of $3,020 in that year. Under our program, it will cost the same family $1,350 for heating and $940 for the car, that is, a total of $2,290; this means a difference of at least $730 between the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Progressive Conservative budget of last year. Moreover, if the family goes along with the energy conservation and substitution programs we are proposing, with the almost $3 billion subsidy program to that end, the same family, by insulating its house and using gas or electricity, can reduce the cost of its heating to about $740 instead of $940.

For this year that amounts to a total saving of $940.

The former Progressive Conservative finance minister (Mr. Crosbie) makes a lot of waves about his famous tax credits. Well, to bring our budget up to par with the Conservative budget, that family would have had to include not only the father and the mother but at least 16 children as well. And here I am not talking about the annual compensation of $420 which we have granted for each individual, that is the income supplement, thanks to the higher income supplement of $35 a month which we adopted early in this session. Indeed I must say that if we had been forced to adopt the PQ proposal, namely, bring prices up to international levels, well the poor Montreal family would have seen its bills jump to $3,000 in 1984, as advocated by the Tories, but the bills would probably have run closer to $4,000. So I think the facts are there to show that our budget is fair.

[English]

I have said that this budget is fair to citizens all over the country. I have just given the example of a family in Montreal. I could use the example of a family in Vancouver where, despite the ready availability of natural gas and electricity, fuel oil use is still quite high. Over the period 1980 to 1984 an oil-using household would have spent a total of $4,100 on home heat under the December, 1979, proposals. Under our program the total cost would be $3,450, some $650 less than under the Conservative budget. That is if the household stays on oil. If it were to use the conservation programs we have proposed, its heating costs to 1984 would be roughly $2,300. That is $1,150 less than if it continued to use oil.

Mr. Siddon: We burn natural gas.

Mr. Lalonde: I can give the same example for natural gas instead and, indeed, electricity. I could use the same example for any family across Canada. I could give the example of a family in Halifax where again the savings would be very substantial and would amount to several hundreds of dollars between now and 1984.

In closing, let me repeat my opening theme. We promised decisions and actions to respond to Canada's energy problems and opportunities and to achieve energy security, opportunity and fairness. This, I submit, we have done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I was interested to note that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) responded with his usual Pavlovian reflex to a statement by Jacques Parizeau. This House will be interested in his response to the statements made by the Hon. John Turner on his budget and his energy policy which Mr. Turner believes are disasters not only in the economic sense but will, as we believe, drive energy investment out of this country and help OPEC much more than they help Canada.

One of the remarkable aspects of this budget is that the minister who presumably wrote it—at least the minister who read it—had less to do with this document than at least three other members of this House. One of those, of course, is my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who is now in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and whose budget last December included most of the positive measures which were subsequently adopted by this government. For example, I cite the small business development bond on which this Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has fiddled away an entire year, the tax deductibility for working spouses which was an innovation in our budget, ignored and resisted for literally decades by the Liberal government, and the tax incentives to spur new manufacturing investment in our less developed regions.

The second more important influence was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has just left the House, because this is not a budget establishing economic policy. This is an energy polemic creating division in Canada and dependence on OPEC.

The other hon. member to whom this budget owes more than it owes the Minister of Finance is the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), the silver-spoon socialist who, having been nurtured all his life at the rich bosom of privilege, presumes to lecture the rest of us about equality and poverty. I think it is interesting to compare the two budget amendments that member introduced because they indicate the clear loyalties and purpose of what the New Democratic Party has now become. His amendment in December was drafted to seek Liberal support to defeat our budget. This amendment is drafted to prevent Progressive Conservative support and thus to protect the Liberals, as the NDP and his Ontario troika have sought to protect the Liberals in constitutional policy. The NDP posture now, as it has been a posture in election campaigns and in debate, is to stand sternly on principle but then to collapse in any crunch, going over to the Liberals.

To maintain their pose of independence their sub-amendment links our name with the Liberal name, but the NDP links its arm with the Liberals in any important vote, whether on the budget last year or the constitution this year.

Some of us remember the NDP when it was a party of principle which stood with its word and stood with its workers. Now the leadership of that party says to every NDP voter in western Canada that an NDP vote in February was a vote to give western provinces second-class constitutional status and to give Pierre Trudeau a blank cheque. I think it is well for the traditional supporters of the New Democratic Party to ask what the NDP represents today, apart from the Liberal party and the London School of Economics.

Speaking of reputations and other times brings one naturally to the Minister of Finance, the man who signed the minister of energy's budget. There was a time, I am told, when this minister was known for his compassion and for his conviction. Today he is celebrated only for his guile. He has a lot of that, but what the country needs rather more is a Minister of Finance with the courage and honesty to face and to try to solve Canada's economic problems, and not simply to be clever in avoiding those problems.

We may disagree about the details of those economic problems, but I think all in this House know their magnitude. We know—and the people who sent us here know—that we cannot wish our economic problems away, and we cannot continue to avoid dealing with them. Last year our government tried to deal directly with those problems, but we lacked the majority necessary to carry our program through the House. This government has a majority, but it lacks the courage to use that majority to deal with the economic problems of Canada.

Budgets demonstrate the heart and mind of a government. This document is mindless in economic policy and heartless in responding to the needs of the average Canadian. What is offered here as this government's clarion call to the 1980s is a message of despair. It says to Canadians first that even more Canadians will be out of work, 1,023,000 next year by the minister's own figures. The only response of the government is to slam the working people of Canada with $1 billion more in unemployment insurance taxes.

Second, living costs will continue to rise. The minister says the rate of inflation will be 10.2 per cent next year. We believe 12 per cent would be a more honest estimate. This government offers not a penny of support and not a dime of assistance to low and middle-income Canadians who will pay more for food, more for shelter and more for energy, thanks to this government.

Third, despite all the election promises of several months ago this government is socking it to Canadians on energy prices, the equivalent of a dollar a gallon more over the next four years, and what Canadians get for that is more confrontation, more uncertainty, and a virtual guarantee that Canada will continue to fritter away our energy potential and our opportunity to be energy self-sufficient within the decade.

Finally, the message of this document is that this Liberal government intends to grab more and more tax revenues, $4 billion more next year alone, and for those higher taxes Canadians will get less help from their national government to pay for basic social services. Those are the messages of this non-budget.

● (1540)

The minister said his purpose was to set a direction for the eighties. His direction is down—less growth, more unemployment, more inflation, more taxes and fewer services. Welcome indeed to the 1980s, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this budget does absolutely nothing for the economic policy, but its impact on the Canadian population will be hard felt. It is a budget which punishes, a pitiless budget, a budget which is not sensitive to the average Canadians, a budget which makes their energy more expensive, a budget which adds to their tax burden, finally a budget which widens their chances of being unemployed and which does not offer, even to the poorest Canadians, a single cent to counter the effects of this heavier load.

As a result of this budget, between now and 1983 the average Canadian will shell out $500 more annually to keep his house warm and $400 more annually to keep his car on the road. We all believe that energy prices must go up and that most Canadians should pay more to use energy. But what will happen to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who just do not have $900 to spare to heat their homes and drive their cars? We offered them significant assistance through the energy tax credit. This budget does not offer them anything.

Because of this budget, if we base ourselves on the figures given by the minister himself, 1,023,000 Canadians will be out of work next year. We have offered incentives to create jobs in the home building and ship building industries and to promote regional expansion. And now this budget sets aside the ridiculous amount of $45 million a year to improve manpower training, and an 8.6 per cent increase in benefits paid to Canadians who are jobless and who have to cope with double-digit inflation.

[English]

For Canadians who still have jobs next year, this budget proposes a $1 billion increase in unemployment insurance taxes, a 33 per cent increase on a tax which charges the working poor the same rate as the working rich. For Canadians who want to own a home or who want to work in the housing industry, this budget offers nothing. When we proposed mortgage tax credits, the Liberals said that was not enough, we had to help renters too. This budget does not help anyone own or rent a home. Its only housing policy is to provide a haven for the rich, to bring back MURBs so that wealthy Canadians can avoid paying taxes. We tried to help ordinary Canadians own a home; this budget helps rich Canadians dodge taxes.

That is not all that this budget does to punish the average Canadian. Because this minister refuses to take restraint seriously, because he is adding, over four years, $12.7 billion to the cash requirements of last December's budget, he is guaranteeing that interest rates will remain high, that Canadians will continue to pay exorbitant rates for their home mortgages and their consumer loans.

Finally, the minister says that, despite millions of dollars in new federal taxes, he intends to pay less to supporting basic social services in Canada. Let me quote him. He wants "significant savings here", savings he will get either by forcing services to be cut or by forcing the poorer provinces to carry even more of the burden. This is one more trick in his budget. They promise that social services will be cut; they do not say by how much, they do not say where, they do not say which services, but the people of Canada who have grown dependent upon social services from this government know that it is the intention of the Liberal Government of Canada to cause a reduction in the standard and availability of social services across this country. But the government does not have the courage to spell out the details.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister faced two challenges in putting together this budget. The first was economic. Canadians desperately need a strong and purposeful statement of economic direction to break through the malaise which existed through a series of years in which, owing to various circumstances, there has not been an accepted statement of government economic policy. We need a statement of economic direction to restore confidence among our people that there can be jobs for them and their children and that the vicious inflationary cycle can be broken. That was the economic challenge facing the minister and he failed it completely. Indeed, he did not even try to meet it.

The second challenge was a political one. This budget was brought forth at a time when the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) personal determination to ram his constitutional package down the throats of Canadians has created serious tensions in this country, especially in western Canada. The minister had an opportunity to use this budget as a healing document, as a way to bring Canadians together in common economic cause, as a chance to show western Canadians in particular that at least someone in this government understood their frustrations and was sympathetic to their genuine aspirations.

That was the minister's political challenge, and again he failed. Instead of healing wounds he chose to deepen them with energy measures which can only be seen by western Canadians as a singular, deliberate assault on their region.

Mr. Speaker, the ultimate tragedy, the ultimate condemnation of this budget, is not just that the minister failed to meet those economic and political challenges. It is that a man who was elected here, presumably on the basis of principle, a man in the tradition of Father Coady, chose not even to try. There he was with a majority behind him, a majority that will shove through anything he wants. He had a mandate and he had a majority to act for Canada, but all he could produce was another federal revenue grab so the ministers opposite could indulge in the 1980s the spending appetites they whetted in the 1970s.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Since this is not an economic statement but an energy statement, I want to deal for a moment with energy matters. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has now left the House, talked about the purpose of his energy program. He said the purpose of the energy program is fairness. Well, fairness is an unassailable principle and we all believe in it. Certainly it is a worthy goal of the economic policy. As my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, pointed out yesterday, the journal "Canadian Taxation" indicates that, while Liberal budgets of the 1970s served the comfortable, the Crosbie budget actually honoured the principle of fairness by helping Canadians at the bottom of the income scale. Fairness is also the purpose of the equalization program, which this Liberal government is apparently allowing to lapse without any significant effort at renewal or modernization on the basis of agreement with the other partners in confederation.

Fairness is fine as a principle, unassailable as a principle, but surely the first purpose of an energy program should be energy. Surely before you focus on distributing energy, or distributing the proceeds of energy, you ensure there will be energy to distribute and energy proceeds to distribute. This policy, instead of ensuring energy, drives away the people who produce and find energy in Canada.

I am not talking here about the multinationals which have feasted for so long on Liberal tax policies. Ironically, they are the least likely to move out of Canada because their parent corporations already occupy the ground in the United States and elsewhere in the energy producing world. The companies, the investors, the energy entrepreneurs whom this budget will drive out of Canada are Canadians who already are comparing the higher returns and the more certain atmosphere south of the border and moving their dollars and their expertise out of this country to create jobs and growth somewhere else.

One of the ironies of this budget is that there is one region which this budget will undeniably help. This budget does a great deal to help the economies of Texas, Colorado, Oklahoma, and of other American states which will take advantage of the investment money we are driving out of Canada and which will welcome the technicians, the experts and the investors, who would be happier staying at home and staying at work in Canada if there were a Canadian energy policy whose purpose was to find energy.

This document represents the triumph of ideology over common sense. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his advisers live in a dream world—they believe if you talk fast and wave a flag, oil will miraculously appear. Well, the real world does not work that way. It does not always conform to economists' projections or intellectual theories. A similar approach nearly crippled the Canadian energy industry in 1974 when rigs and experts flooded out of Canada and, coincidentally, this nation began a slide into the arms of OPEC. We will see what happens now in this highly mobile industry, whether it stays in Canada or moves away, a rig at a time, an expert at a time, to make some other nation energy strong while Canada becomes more and more dependent upon foreign energy sources we cannot control.

One result out of this package is already evident. It has added to anger and to alienation in the west. It has struck another blow against Canadian unity. Already two of the energy producing provinces have announced their reactions. British Columbia is taking Ottawa to court, Saskatchewan is considering the same action. Alberta, the province against whose interest this package has been deliberately aimed, has not yet responded. But one can expect that province will respond. I think all of us recognize that it would be foolish to assume the province of Alberta would accept such deliberate federal provocation quietly.

Ten months ago we in this country had an energy policy to which the federal government and the provinces agreed, accepted by the industry, and designed to make Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990. It was an agreement on which Canadians could plan with certainty and build with confidence. It would have produced more Canadian energy, more Canadian wealth, more Canadian jobs and more Canadian security. Today we have no energy agreement. Instead, we have a federal policy which has all the producing provinces angry and all of the industry upset. In place of certainty we have confrontation and potential chaos. Instead of building for the future we risk tearing down what we have and frittering away the unique energy potential of this country.

The government now has a clear choice to make. It can bull through the measures set forth in this budget. We all know from last week's closure that the silent majority over there will do anything their ministers tell them. The government can do that, but I stress that they will do it knowing these measures are seen by western Canadian as a direct attack on their resources and that they will be responded to in that way. Knowing all that, the government can persist on its course, realizing confrontation is inevitable, realizing serious disruption on the energy front and on questions relating to national unity. Serious disruption is a strong possibility. That is one choice before the government.

The other choice has been sitting on the desk of the Prime Minister for ten days now. It is an offer from the Premier of Alberta to sit down with him and try one last time to reach agreement. The Prime Minister has not met the premier on the subject since July 25. A lot has happened since then, including this budget. It is not asking too much of the Prime Minister of Canada to inconvenience himself, to use his word, and meet with the Premier of Alberta now. I do not know whether agreement is possible. Certainly attitudes are hardening by the hour and the atmosphere has soured dramatically since July. But the consequences of not even talking, not even trying to agree, are dangerously clear. They are conflict, confrontation, disruption, all caused by the federal government, and they are not good for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Talk about Canadians.

Mr. Clark: I hear from the back benches of the Liberal party someone saying that I should start talking about Canadians. It is my view that Albertans are Canadians, British Columbians are Canadians, and the citizens of Saskatchewan are Canadians. It is my view that there is an obligation upon the government to start treating them like Canadians and to stop building in policies which give advantages to Texans, Oklahomans and the citizens of OPEC countries, advantages which should be given to the citizens of this country so that we can get on with building Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One of the matters which is most troubling to us here is that it would be absolutely unthinkable, as I have had occasion to say outside the House, for any government deliberately to fashion a policy against the basic interests of the province of Quebec. That would be unthinkable anywhere in this House by any party here, but it should be equally unthinkable for the Government of Canada to design a policy directly against the basic interests of any other province or region of this country. Yet, that is what this policy does. This is not a Canadian policy; this is an anti-Alberta policy, an anti-British Columbia policy, an anti-Saskatchewan policy. This is not a policy designed to build on the strengths of this country. This is a policy designed to cause division in the country, perhaps for political reasons, perhaps for constitutional reasons, but certainly not for reasons of accomplishing our economic goals or realizing our energy potential.

In the budget speech the Minister of Finance, reading what was written for him by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, indicated that his government had the magnanimity to change positions on two questions of principle. One was indexing. He admitted that he listened to the protests against his plan to take indexing away from the poor of Canada, protests which came from this party. He said he listened to those, so he has delayed his plan for a year. He has amended his budget, he has amended his plan by leaving indexing in for at least one more year. The other is his claim that because of the protests of western provinces, particularly British Columbia, he has changed the export tax on natural gas. All he has changed is the name of the export tax on natural gas. The point is that if the Minister of Finance was prepared to change his position on indexing, if he was prepared to change at least the language which he used to describe an export tax on natural gas, why would he not now be prepared to sit down and seriously consider—and have his Prime Minister seriously consider—the offer by the Premier of Alberta before we proceed to the next stage in confrontation orchestrated by the federal government, to sit down premier-to-Prime Minister—"don't take Marc Lalonde"—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Clark: —to sit down premier-to-Prime Minister to see if some new agreement could be worked out. That was the proposal put by the Premier of Alberta. One has to wonder, if it was put by another premier, whether it would have been more warmly responded to. In any event it was put by the Premier of Alberta, and the Prime Minister of Canada rejected it, saying it would be inconvenient for him to sit down with the premier to try to avoid a confrontation which could be deeply damaging to this country. The Prime Minister has put his personal convenience to the fore far too long. It would be convenient to Canada to get on with developing our energy potential. It would be convenient to Canada to stop these federally-orchestrated feuds with the provinces. It would be convenient to Canada to make this nation work, and I suggest that is the obligation of the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Yesterday I told the Minister of Finance I would be pleased to show him and the people of Canada how the government had betrayed its election promise to keep energy prices to the consumers of Canada lower than we proposed last December. Let me start with the current year. We proposed an increase of $4 per barrel in wellhead prices. On Tuesday night the minister added 80 cents per barrel to the $3 per barrel increase already in place and to the 75-cent increase already made in the Syncrude levy. That means for the year 1980 the government is increasing the wellhead price of oil by $4.55 per barrel, more than 10 per cent higher than the $4 increase we proposed. I remember, as I am sure the people of Canada will, the promises of the Prime Minister that the price would not rise above $4 per barrel. At that time we said that that promise was worth as much as his earlier promise never to bring in wage and price controls. Now we have the proof that he is as trustworthy in 1980 as he was in 1974, because the Liberal government, having promised solemnly not to raise prices higher than $4 per barrel, has raised them $4.55 per barrel; another broken promise.

Mr. Clark: In the next three years the minister is proposing $4.50 a barrel, the same rate that we set out ten months ago. And what is their ultimate ceiling on prices? It is 85 per cent of world or U.S. prices, which is precisely the same ceiling which we set ten months ago. In fact it is a full 10 per cent higher than the ceiling which the Premier of Alberta offered this government in July. That is a question for this government. In energy negotiations it is one area in which they succeeded more than we. They got the government of Alberta down to a 75 per cent level, but then they threw it away.

The province of Alberta was prepared to agree to a lower ceiling. This government insist on a higher ceiling. Why do they want to expose the industries of Ontario, Quebec and all of Canada to higher energy costs than those which could have been achieved? Why do they insist on a higher ceiling than the government of Alberta was prepared to agree to? What sense does it make? I hope the ministers and members opposite will respond to this question, particularly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who is here and who represents low-income constituents. He represents them at least for the time being.

I hope that they will indicate to this House why it was that this government insist upon a higher ceiling than the government of Alberta was prepared to accept. Why is there that determination to add extra costs to the industries of Canada and the individual taxpayers? Why would they not settle for the lower cost of oil? Why did they insist on a higher price for oil and a higher ceiling than the province of Alberta was seeking?

In any event, that is what they have done. Alberta said 75 per cent and the Liberal government said, "Oh, no, Canadian industries and Canadian individuals can stand a higher price. Kick it up to 85 per cent." That is the comparison with wellhead prices. By 1983 under this budget those prices will be slightly higher than we proposed—55 cents a barrel. But that does not include the so-called Canadian ownership charge, the open-ended invitation to tax Canadians which this government is giving to a Crown corporation—Petro-Canada.

The minister's own officials talked in terms of a tax as high as $4 a barrel. If that tax is used to that level over the next four years—and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if anyone in Canada has ever known this government not to use a tax to the legal maximum—then by 1983 MacEachen oil will cost $4.55 a barrel more than Crosbie oil would have cost.

If you applied that, plus the proposed natural gas tax increases, to the average Canadian consumer, here is what you will find. By 1983, under our budget, the average consumer would have been paying $983 more a year for heating oil and gasoline, with his or her net cost being $763, if he or she qualified for the full energy tax credit. We proposed this tax credit to help low-income Canadians, and this government, because of its disinterest in low income Canadians, has written it out of its budget. In contrast, under this budget, by 1983 the average Canadian consumer will be paying $1,100 more a year for heating oil and gasoline. That is $337 more than he or she would have paid with our energy tax credit, and $117 more than he or she would have paid even if he or she did not qualify for that tax credit.

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker. That is what the Liberal promise of lower energy costs means to Canada. To the Liberal party "lower" means "higher", "no controls" means "more controls" and "below $4" means "above $4". This is the party of duplicity. This is the party which, instead of dealing directly with the economic problems of this country and instead of dealing directly even with the energy and economic potential of this country, has chosen here to avoid those problems and to undermine and erode that potential.

This budget could have given Canada direction—it did not. It could have contributed to Canadian unity—it did the opposite. This budget could have moved this country toward energy self-sufficiency. Instead it is moving this country away from energy self-sufficiency and toward more activity by Canadian money and experts in other countries, toward a greater reliance by the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and the people of all of Canada upon the insecure sources of supply from OPEC nations. This budget could have helped low-income Canadians, as the Crosbie budget did. But this budget ignored low income Canadians. This budget could have been courageous and honest, because there is a majority government to back it up. Instead this budget is divisive and creates illusions for the people of Canada.

It is a budget which missed the opportunity to provide economic leadership for the country. It is a budget which will drive energy investment and energy expertise out of Canada and put Canadians back into the situation of relying more upon foreign sources of supply. These are foreign sources of petroleum which we cannot control. It is a budget which deserves rejection by this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I do so with some distress at the inaccurate statements made by the right hon. gentleman with reference to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I will turn to those in just a moment.

I say once again, as I have said in the past, that I have a very considerable respect for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). In honesty, I cannot say that my respect has been heightened as a consequence of his remarks in the last few minutes. Indeed, his speech can only be characterized as a sour grapes speech based on the fact that they could not do it and it pains him terribly to see that someone else was able to bring in a successful budget, one which can help the economy and the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: The Minister of Finance, to whom the right hon. gentleman referred, has a most distinguished career with respect to helping the people behind him. Over the years in this House he has been known always to follow the high road of helping those who need help. He has done this for many years, long before the Leader of the Opposition himself was here. The sadness of the position of the right hon. gentleman opposite is that even though, in his heart of hearts he knew better, he caved in to the Baron of Water Street last November when he went along with the 18-cent excise tax on top of the oil price increases. He now conveniently and totally forgets this and does not mention it at any point in his comments when he compares the two budgets. Of course, that is a very convenient lapse of memory.

What distresses me most is that one would have thought that the Leader of the Opposition would have learned a new trick since last year. He is still trying to fool the people with last year's trick, which did not work then. Does he now feel he has perfected it to the point at which he is now going to con them and get them to change their minds, after this passage of time, by defending last year's budget which was rejected by the people across the country?

If the right hon. gentleman, who says that the budget was an energy statement and not a budget, had a better understanding of the connection between energy and the economy, he might still be in office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: If he had had the strength to stand up to his minister of finance he might still be in office. If he had stopped to realize, when that 18-cent excise tax was proposed on a commodity which was going to rise in price tremendously anyhow, how punitive that was, he might still be in office. If he had stopped to realize that his minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), came from a group of merchants in Water Street, St. John's, who are not noted for their compassion, which is something my ancestors in rural Newfoundland could well attest to, then he might have stood up to him. The cold hard fact is different. For him to say that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance was mindless and heartless, when he had supported and condoned a budget that put a special tax on a commodity that was rising in cost at any time shows that he takes a very unusual position.

● (1610)

I want to make two or three more remarks about his comments, Mr. Speaker. First of all, he makes an effort to link the NDP with the Liberals. He does this at a time when his friends in the Conservative party, like Mr. Buchanan, the Premier of Nova Scotia, have just appointed the leader of the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia to one of the top civil service positions in the province—the sensitive position of director of intergovernmental affairs and deputy minister.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How could he have overlooked you?

Mr. McDermid: He took care of you, too.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is one job you won't get.

Mr. Regan: Well, you win some and you lose some,—and some are rained out.

I was distressed by the essence of what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition said when he talked about the rigs probably going south as a result of the financing policies outlined in the budget. The stark statement he makes is that we should pay more to the multinationals—that we should bribe them with this nation's destiny in order to have them remain here rather than develop policies on the basis that we are using at the present time.

An hon. Member: That is not what he said.

Mr. Regan: Oh, there were other things too. No wonder they are squealing over there, Mr. Speaker, because that hurts. When they start squealing, you know it hurts.

An hon. Member: That is not what he said.

Mr. Regan: Let them continue to squeal, but preferably not so loud.

The other thing he talks about is prices. The two biggest distortions that they have practised over the past ten months with great energy are, first, that there was something in their budget that was going to contribute to self-sufficiency which does not exist in the Liberal platform. They are unable to say what it is. The distinction is that they were going to pay vast rewards to the multinational companies to take the money out of this country for oil that has already been discovered and is already being produced. There are still incentives for new oil—just as good and even better incentives for Canadians, but they turn their backs on that.

The other distortion is that prices are comparable. Every time he tries to compare prices, he compares apples and oranges. He does not add the 18-cent excise tax nor does he say anything at all about the fact that under the previous minister of finance who came from St. John's West, at the end of the third year they would move to 75 per cent of world price—a $10 hike or in all probability more by that time—and by 1984 they would move to 85 per cent of world price. He seems to forget those footnotes.

On this general subject, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I thought the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition might have something new to say. Instead, he spoke—and it was not a question of speaking as an Albertan or a Canadian but more like a man who was speaking as an Albertan first rather than as a Canadian first.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Come on now; that is awful.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are going to need help from Buchanan.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I want to say something about the Liberal budget and then I will have something more to say that may be of interest to my squealing friends.

This budget signifies our commitment to fiscal responsibility, and it calls upon those who have reaped the most from the Canadian economic society to make the greatest contribution.

It indicates our determination to make the most of our energy opportunities, and it fulfils the promises the Liberal party made in the election campaign.

The next point is that energy questions are integral to the economic performance and industrial development of this country. To ignore this fact is to be out of touch with reality.

Budget making is the most difficult part of the art of governing. The pleasure of governing is spending on worthwhile programs for the benefit of our people and the improvement of our country. The pain of governing is the difficult chore of collecting the money to carry out the programs; the arbitrary task of deciding who pays and how much. The necessity of government is doing this. The responsibility of government is doing it as equitably as possible with recognition of the burdens of individuals and industries; of protecting those who must be protected and, at the same time, of maintaining employment and incentive.

None of these goals is absolute; none can be achieved to the extent that all representatives of the people would wish. In our imperfect society, the art of governing is that of reaching those goals to the greatest degree that the resources of a country will allow. The wisest minister of finance who ever lived cannot provide the benefits that Swedes receive, from the limited resources of a country like Bangladesh. In meeting these goals as well as this budget does, the Minister of Finance has performed an admirable feat and he has done incredibly better than his predecessor.

The opposition parties say the budget is not good. They say it is bad, for very different reasons. If you discount a certain amount of what each says, you end up in the middle of the budget, and the provisions it makes. It is a heck of a good budget.

This budget must be regarded with the recognition that the western world is in an ever-deepening energy crisis, a crisis that has aborted the normal economic cycles. This crisis has brought inevitable burdens to people in many countries of the western world in vastly increased energy costs—and beyond the western world. It poses special problems to those who live, as we do, in northern climes and who have the added cost of energy for heating. It has affected trade and comparative standards of living. It is a crisis that requires extraordinary response.

This is not just a budget to deal with the country's financial affairs for a year. It is a new direction, bold undertaking to plot a secure Canadian future in an uncertain world.

For countries without resources, this international crisis is bringing disaster and comparative declining standards of living—hence the need for the provision in the budget for greater Third World aid. Some Third World countries are the hardest hit by the increased energy costs. That is what it brings for countries that do not have natural resources. For countries with resources, like Canada, it brings a difficult challenge but exciting opportunities.

Canada has resources, undeveloped resources. We have opportunities, and to fail to seize the emerging options would be an abandonment of the responsibility of government and would carry long term penalties for our people.

To seize those opportunities comprehensively is to reach for an attainable far horizon where Canadians, almost alone in the western world, can enjoy energy self-sufficiency at the minimum price that will bring the maximum development and therefore a dominant economic position for this country to carry into the twenty-first century.

The budget outlined by the Minister of Finance for the first time presents us with more than a one-year goal. It provides a comprehensive reaction to today's realities. The opportunity that exists for Canada is being seized by this budget. What does it provide? It provides an opportunity to combat a lagging economy by spurring industrial growth and job creation. The energy package in the budget is a vast industrial strategy made possible by the crisis that affects the world today.

Some people say that there is not an industrial strategy. We are not only increasing the economic development envelope, Mr. Speaker, and we are not only undertaking new industrial strategies not related to energy, but the energy related industrial strategy is perhaps the most exciting thing that has happened in this country for a long time.

A review of the budget shows vast assistance to the development of the Lower Churchill in Labrador. It shows the construction of the Q and M Pipe Lines all the way to Halifax. You find incentives, placing money and jobs in every region of the country, for conversion from oil furnaces to gas furnaces. That alone will have a profound effect on employment.

What about the $4 billion western initiatives package? Will that not create jobs? I come now to the frontier development. What about the steel that will be needed, the roads, the equipment as a result of the energy development? With something like $11.8 billion to be spent on projects of an energy-related nature, in the next several years, I suggest that that activity will bring about economic activity far beyond the direct projects themselves and will help employment tremendously.

When this government announced the pre-build of the pipeline in southern Alberta, Stuart Cook, Ontario regional director of the United Steelworkers of America gave his full support and the support of the steelworkers to this project. These people knew that it meant jobs and economic activity. If it did, think of how much greater this is in relation to all of the vast projects involved in this job-oriented budget.

Let me move on and tell hon. members what else this budget provides. It provides an opportunity to halt and reverse the growing dominance of our economy by several multinational foreign-owned oil corporations. The increase in the value of oil, at the stroke of a pen each time the price of oil goes up, vastly increases the value of foreign holdings in this country. It increases the value on their books, the value to them of American holdings in this country of the vast reservoirs of oil which they have already discovered and are producing.

Our current deficit is affected to a very adverse degree by a flight of interest and dividend payments from this country to shareholders of those multinational companies in the United States. There is also the enhancement of the foreign equity holdings. As the value of their holdings and reservoirs goes up, their stock values go up. Similarly the cost to Canada of ever buying out those shares from American owners becomes more and more remote.

Even if you were to prevent the foreign oil corporations in this country from taking the money out of Canada, then they could not possibly invest the vast earnings they are getting with the higher prices from oil production alone. What they will do, as some of them already have been doing with buy-outs, is to move to other aspects of the economy. Therefore over the next few years as their cash flow vastly increases, their holdings will be increased an incredible amount. Our answer is greater Canadian ownership through acquisitions and special incentives to Canadian owned oil and gas corporations, as well as the intervention by PetroCan. That is the direction in which Canada must move if we are ever to repatriate our economy.

I must remind hon. members that Petro-Canada is the corporation which the hon. member for St. John's West and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition just last year were determined to destroy, and judging from their statements a week or two ago they still take that position. I am sure they will not be heartened by the Gallup poll which showed in yesterday's Toronto Star that today 82 per cent of Canadians—up some 8 per cent since last year—recognize the value of Petro-Canada and want PetroCan to continue to do the sorts of things it is doing which are so vital to the Canadian economy.

Petro-Canada is the company which made Hibernia and Sable Island possible by participating in the cost of those drilling programs when the multinationals had backed off. These projects would not have gone ahead if Petro-Canada had not participated. PetroCan also helped in the Beaufort Sea. Petro-Canada is the company the Conservatives would have done away with. We have to decide in this House, in considering this budget, whether we want to salvage our destiny or become hewers of wood and drawers of water as the Conservative pattern of playing into the hands of those multinationals would have us do.

My time is short, and I want to move on. The budget also offers a plan to shelter our people, to an extent possible, from higher prices. We recognize that there must be higher prices, but only those necessary higher prices that contribute to the well-being of our people.

The budget of a former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, had three defects. First, it raised the price on old as well as on new oil, thus unnecessarily enriching foreigners, and it placed those foreign oil companies ahead of the Canadian working people. Instead, we provide the incentive for new oil while keeping some sense in the escalation of the price of the old, and guaranteeing greater Canadian ownership in the new production. I say to hon. members, decide which you prefer of the two budgets in that regard.

The second defect is that it proposed to raise prices, which we recognize must go up, but the proposed rate of increase would have placed impossible burdens on our consumers. The Tories pursued one goal, that of raising the prices to move toward sufficiency, but they forgot the other one, that of sheltering our people—a Tory tendency, I might say. I think when you consider that the Tory budget contributed no more to self-sufficiency than does ours, then the error of their ways can readily be seen. Our budget is less burdensome to the consumers. Before bringing down the budget we recognized the problems of our senior citizens and increased the guaranteed income supplement.

The third defect in the Tory budget placed an excise tax on gasoline. Heaven knows why. This 18-cent excise tax was on top of all the other increases which, in themselves, are larger than ours for oil and gas.

I want to recommend that Conservative members study the table published in yesterday's Toronto Star on gasoline prices, entitled Crosbie versus MacEachen. I tell hon. members to take a look at the comparisons. It shows for 1981 under the MacEachen budget $1.36 per gallon; under the Crosbie budget $1.56. In 1984 under the Liberal budget the cost is $1.95 per gallon, yet under the Conservative budget the cost would be $2.63 per gallon.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Paproski: That is how much the Toronto Star knows.

Mr. Regan: That is how much the hon. member knows.

Mr. Kempling: It is the "Trudeau Star".

Mr. Regan: No one in Canada, perhaps other than the Leader of the Opposition, is more sensitive to the success of the Minister of Finance's budget then the member for St. John's West. I notice that he used the word in his remarks yesterday or the day before, of "lemmings"—that little animal. I thought that that was an unfortunate example when you consider their suicidal trek to the sea caused by their budget last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: Unfortunately the hon. member is unrepentant in his desire to solve energy prices on the backs of working people. Let me say this: some people say that our program is unfair to the west. Let us return to basics. Does the existence of an international cartel to multiply oil prices artificially justify to Canadians that we automatically impose the same havoc on our own people? Only if the answer is yes, only if our producers join in the looting of society can it be said that the producers are being punished by this budget.

If you regard the vast increase in the Canadian price of oil and gas products, you recognize no hardship in the national necessity of taking a very small part of the current price enhancement for the noble national purpose of repatriating our economy, meeting the costs of sheltering our consumers from unreasonable cost burdens.

To do that, if more funds are required for such purposes for government, do you tax industries with expanding revenue and profits, or do you expand those that are in trouble? Remember, this is a crisis situation. We have in this country a tradition of sharing. In the past, when its relative wealth to the rest of Canada was small compared to Alberta today, Ontario had to assume that burden. In my own province, and in other provinces, great benefits were received as a result of taxes paid in Ontario and the equalization which followed from that. I am sure the majority of the people of Alberta recognize that with their sudden increased wealth they have some role in Canadian sharing today.

We have in Canada an economic and fiscal crisis. This crisis is contemporaneously warping the fiscal and economic fibre of our country. The imbalance of revenue, if unredressed, will mean serious consequences for minimum national standards which must be maintained. I am sure hon. members will agree that they cannot picture Ethiopia and Switzerland as both being states in one federation without some cash transfers. There must be some relationships between the standards of living and the level of public service in different parts of the country.

Those provinces which from time to time happen to have great wealth have to help provide that sharing in the country. Some say, however, that we are depressing the price of Alberta's depleting resource. I love that province very much. It is a blessed province. However, after oil they have gas, after gas they have coal, after coal, far on into the twenty-second century, they have tar sands. With their incisive entrepreneurship you can be sure that Albertans will play a key role in the development of the north and northern resources, and bring back further wealth from that.

The most important thing we can do is repatriate our economy. The hon. member for St. John's West said that in buying out the American multinational corporations we use up our resources for nothing, that we do not bring about the production of one extra barrel of oil. I say no. I want the people of Canada to know that what we will be doing as oil companies are purchased is that we will replace American equity capital by foreign debt capital. It would have been much better if our country had been developed in that way in the first place. The United States development was financed by debt financing from Europe rather than equity financing.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who was in power when that happened?

Mr. Regan: I recognize the flat earthers will have difficulty seeing that, but I believe, and I think most Canadians believe, that it is extremely vital that we patriate our constitution and our economy.

This budget clearly shows that this government is as determined to restore our economic sovereignty as it is to assure our political sovereignty. In our constitutional package there is provision to make our constitution Canadian, and now, in our budget, there is provision to make the oil industry Canadian. On both counts, the Tories stand opposed to the Liberal government. Both issues show clearly the differences between the Liberal and Conservative parties. It is the Liberal party that wants to move ahead, to seize the moment, and it is the Tory party that is determined to hold back the clock. I believe they stopped the one on the Tower. I believe with regard to that comparison, the position of the Liberal and Conservative parties, that the people and history will be kind to the Liberal party.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean)—Industry—Application to FIRA by Finnish Tire Company—Reason for government approval; the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly)—Indian Affairs—Consultation on proposed financing agreements; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—The constitution—Consultations with Indian groups.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government and the amendment thereto of Mr. Crosbie (p. 4231) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Rae (p. 4235).

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words today about probably the highest cost area in the entire country, that of my riding. It is an area where fuel costs constitute one of the major components of the average householder's budget. Fuel costs in the city of Whitehorse for stove oil are $1.61 a gallon. Regular gasoline sells for $1.32 a gallon, plus 14 cents tax, and unleaded gasoline costs $1.49, plus the 14 cents tax. These costs become even more astronomical as we move north.

In Dawson city we find that furnace oil costs $1.49 a gallon, whereas in Mayo furnace oil is $1.74 a gallon. At Beaver Creek, furnace oil costs $1.26 a gallon. In other communities it goes as high as $2.30 a gallon. Gasoline, essential for native trapping in that part of Canada, costs $2.50 a gallon in some communities. Indeed, a cord of cheap wood costs $115. Fuel costs in these areas are even higher when one gets into the Northwest Territories and the more northerly portions of that jurisdiction.

During the last election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a few speeches, not too many, in the south. He was kept a little too closely wrapped up by his handlers. He made one speech in Halifax setting forth several promises, promises which have been broken in the short time these rascals have been back.

Mr. Knowles: Honourable rascals.

Mr. Nielsen: He made a promise in Toronto, a five-point platform, that was shattered. He also made some very interesting speeches in the north during that campaign. One was made in Whitehorse and the other in Yellowknife. By coincidence, I just happen to have a transcript of the speech he made in Whitehorse on January 21, 1980, at a rally being held for the Yukon Liberal candidate.

Hon. members will recall that in the Crosbie budget of last December the taxation which was being suggested on fuels was confined to transportation fuels. There was no tax suggested in the Crosbie budget to be imposed on home heating fuels. Quite apart from the offsets in the form of energy tax credits which were contained in the budget, the defeat of which was engineered by our friends to the left, the Prime Minister on January 21, 1980, said in Whitehorse, and I quote his words:

> The climate, more extreme than southern Canada, your communications, your transportation, are more difficult, and your costs are considerably higher than they are in the south, but what you need is a national government which is practical and which is sensible, that's consistent—and what you had with the Joe Clark government is a giant double-cross.

Those are strong words. And he goes on to say on what he bases his opinion:

> The last thing you need in the north is an 18-cent per gallon tax on gasoline and on diesel and which I repeat will serve entirely to pay for that mortgage plan, and nowhere will that Joe Clark tax hurt more than here in the north, because under the energy plan every household here in Whitehorse—every household will be paying nearly five hundred dollars . . . more for home heating oil by 1982.

Those are the words of the Prime Minister. When he uttered them he knew full well that there was no tax on home heating fuel. So much for the integrity of the man who now occupies the highest office in this country. He deliberately, in public on a public platform, told a deliberate falsehood to the people of Yukon. It was reported in the press. And he has the gall, and I do not intend a pun on that word, to refer to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the then prime minister, as being guilty of a double-cross.

We have the $500 increase in Whitehorse now, and it is no thanks to the Crosbie budget, but thanks to a Prime Minister who deliberately lied to the people at that meeting in Whitehorse. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) was not here when I quoted from the speech of the Prime Minister. I am prepared to stand by those words because they are there in black and white.

A tax has been levied by this government which will double the heating bills of every household in Yukon. Indeed, it will double heating bills throughout this country. As the Prime Minister himself said in the speech from which I just quoted, it is more costly to live in the north. I have given out some of the costs of fuel oil in that part of the country.

There was another benefit to which the then minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), agreed before the budget was defeated and before the necessary resolution could be brought in, and that was the introduction of further benefits to ease the burden of fuel consumers in the more remote parts of the north. I believe it was yesterday that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) challenged the Leader of the Opposition to prove that the new taxes on gas, oil and heating fuel will prove more costly to the consumer than those of the Clark budget. The issue has now become one of the credibility of the minister and the government.

I just alluded to the crumbling of the credibility of a Prime Minister who went into a public meeting and stated the things that he did, knowing full well that they were absolutely false. During the election campaign, the Liberal party promised not to raise the price of oil and gas to the consumer. That was the promise.

Mr. Evans: That is not true.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre says that that is not true. It is true. The Liberals promised not to raise the price of gasoline in this country. That was their election promise. That was their whole campaign. The election promise was that prices would not rise.

Mr. Evans: That is not true.

Mr. Nielsen: They were just as deceitful then as they are in the wording of this budget which is just as craftily put together and just as full of guile. I repeat, the election promise was that gas and oil prices would not rise. Now enters the question of credibility. Beginning in January Canadian motorists and tourists will be paying 15 cents more for a gallon of gasoline. In 1981 Canadian householders will face fuel costs that are double those of last year. That is just a beginning. There is no question, in spite of the way the minister juggled the figures, that in 1982 and in 1983 across-the-board fuel costs will have surpassed those projected in the Crosbie budget. Let the hon. member for Ottawa Centre tell me that the very least that is true is that his party promised to hold prices below the price increases in the Crosbie budget. I see that he is nodding his head in the affirmative.

Mr. Evans: And the facts prove that that is correct.

Mr. Nielsen: The government went well beyond the Crosbie price proposals. The Minister of Finance indulged in what I believe is fiscal legerdemain to try to prove a point. In spite of his word and wonderful permutations and computations, the facts are there. The figures of the Crosbie budget are available. The hon. member for St. John's West went into them to some extent yesterday. Clearly, the Liberal government of today has not in any way adhered to its promise of holding prices down. The hon. member for St. John's West also reminded us yesterday of the famous promise made by the Prime Minister in Toronto, that spending would be held down.

Today, the government is following the same tortuous course it followed in wage and price controls by ramming down the throats of Canadians arbitrary constitutional provisions in spite of provincial resistance. The credibility of this government is in rags and tatters once again. It is no wonder. It is the same old bunch with no imagination, the same tired old bunch that has been over there for 12 years. They have no new ideas except a Machiavellian approach to expressing the same things that were in the Crosbie budget, but adding to the burdens of the very people whom we tried to shelter in the Crosbie budget.

For the Minister of Finance to come before this House at this stage of the proceedings and talk about credibility, is the final absurdity. The minister's budget performance was one of the most impressive in recent history. His suiting was as impeccable as was his phraseology, as he carefully explained why, beginning in the new year, Canadians will be paying more for gasoline and oil than they would have paid in the budget which we brought down a few months ago. He has managed to postpone the day of reckoning by a few short months, but when it comes it will hit harder than the budgetary changes which we had contemplated.

This budget doubles the heating bill of every Canadian family. This is from a government which campaigned on the promise not to raise the price of gas and oil and which campaigned in 1974 against wage and price controls but then turned around and brought them in. Credibility? Hon. members must not forget that this takes place in the context of the enormous subsidies paid by the Liberal government to keep down the price of gas and oil. Now those prices will go up, as I have said, well beyond those predicted in the Crosbie budget of last year. The enormous subsidies which the government has paid out over these years have been wasted on the desert air.

The most insidious feature of the budget is the creeping control that the federal government plans to assert over the extractive industries. We are now embarking—and this is just the tip of the iceberg, as I assess their antics over there—on the same course down which the Labour government took British industry in its nationalization program. I reject that, even though my friends to the left will be happy with it but perhaps not with its speed. This government, which has run the country into the hole to the tune of $14 billion, now attempts to compound this malfeasance by taking for its own purposes some 24 per cent of the oil income. There is no question here of cutting back. They have done nothing.

An hon. Member: You didn't learn.

Mr. Nielsen: There is an interjection from over there, sir, that we did not learn. We do not want to learn to function in that deceitful, underhanded and wily way. If that is what it has come to in this country, that in order to find ourselves across the way once again we must learn to be as deceitful as that government over there, then we have come to a sorry pass indeed in this country.

I do not blame the general voting population of this country for having as low an opinion of politicians as they do. I point out to them, though, that it is those people over there who have been in office the major portion of the last half century.

For members of this government to come to the House and demand the right to tax the oil industry up to a quarter of that industry's revenues as a cure for the economic malaise they themselves have created, is exactly like a drunk demanding to be cured of his habit by being handed a quart bottle of whiskey. That is exactly the parallel of the cure they are trying to find. There is no question of any repentance on their part, nor even is there any question of an acknowledgment that they are the authors of the greatest spending spree in the country's history, a debt which has ballooned some eight to eight and a half times in the short 12 years they have been over there, and a deficit which was $1 billion when they took office and is now—it will be before this fiscal year is ended—approaching $16 billion, in my estimation, and not $14 billion. They are the biggest spenders in the country's history.

We have the highest rate of unemployment in the country's history, the highest interest rates in the country's history, and now the highest fuel costs in the country's history, and that after a campaign in which they said that they would not allow fuel costs to rise. You do not cure the kind of extravaganzas on which this government has embarked by handing those irresponsible people over there billions of dollars to play around with. That is what they are asking for here, billions of dollars more. They are asking for a billion here and a billion there. It is of little moment to the present Minister of Finance. A few hundred thousand unemployed here, a few hundred thousand there, perhaps a million—what does he care? Put on another shift at the mint. That is the answer from this Disneyland government.

Technically Canada has been bankrupt for something like three years. What else can we call it when a country is in the hole for an amount representing some 20 per cent of its annual revenues. That is why the Canadian dollar has been in difficulty and is down again. I hear one of those economic pundits over there. That is why it is in difficulty. That is why our U.S. reserves have dropped below salutary levels. That is why our export picture and our balance of trade have been unhealthy. A spendthrift and prolifigate government has been running hog wild with the patrimony of the Canadian people, passing on the accumulation of their created debts to as yet unborn generations. It is robbing Peter, not to pay Paul but simply in order to carry on with its spendthrift policies.

We saw the present Minister of Finance prior to the election running around Cape Breton—if it is possible to conceive of that spectacle—promising $50 million to SYSCO in order to buy votes. That is ethics for you. What a sad and degrading spectacle. A man apparently of high principles was reduced to buying votes in a blatant and extravagant fashion. None of this appears in the budget because they were running scared then. Now they expect to remain in power for a few years.

So, the iron fist of Liberalism and the iron fist of the Prime Minister once again appear. His answer is to crush. This budget does not represent the cost of running this country. It represents the cost of keeping the Liberals in power, and that is the real meaning of this situation. It is an example of political inflation of the worst kind.

The minister rose on budget night looking like a man who had pulled a rabbit out of a hat. What came out of it was not a rabbit. It was more like a boa constrictor!

Tom Gould, a commentator noted for sincerity and honesty, said this morning that the minister had avoided antagonizing the oil companies and avoided a head-on confrontation with Alberta and at the same time had added billions to federal revenues while asserting the federal government's intention to get into the marketplace, or words to that effect. Presumably the minister would agree with that favourable analysis, but let us have a look at the cost. He has staked out a claim to 24 per cent of national oil revenues, a claim to which it is extremely doubtful that the federal government has any clear entitlement. It is a claim which will be disputed by the provinces by every means at their command, further worsening relations between the federal government and all levels of government. The fact that these huge revenues are being sought, not in pursuance of a policy of economizing and cutting out waste, renders the situation even more subject to criticism.

There is no sign in this budget that the government intends to follow a policy of sensible and stable reduction of costs. Quite the contrary, every indication is to the contrary. Expenditures are up, not down. Programs are increased, not being cut back. We hear the empty words of the Minister of Finance saying he will embark on no new programs, yet that is precisely what he is doing. Hon. members opposite are even talking about more Crown agencies to move into oil field to compete with private industry to try to wrest control of resources from the provinces by this device. Why does this government proliferate Crown corporations in the manner that the walnut tree grows new walnuts? One reason is simply that the expenditures of Crown corporations are not subject to the same direct scrutiny which affects government departments. That is another thing we lost here. We have lost the ability to scrutinize any of these expenditures in a meaningful way. Through the device of spawning Crown corporations the Liberal party has removed from parliamentary control or scrutiny vast areas of activity in a number of vital domains including petroleum, transportation, and others.

In each case we have witnessed the burgeoning of fiefdoms of Liberal patronage growing and swelling at the taxpayers' expense, and now this budget proposes another such entity to conceal from the gaze of the Canadian taxpayer—if he is still breathing when that time comes—the application of Liberal policies in the field of petroleum.

On top of all this we must advert to the manipulation engaged in by the minister prior to the release of his budget when, for a period of ten days, he let fall little tidbits from his table about the way he was going to crack down on registered pension plans, the way he was going to raise individual income taxes, and so forth. He was deliberately manipulating the slavish media to create a climate of despair so that, when this make-shift budget finally appeared, it would grow and sparkle by comparison with the advance warnings. If it was a plot, it succeeded admirably as the media fell in line with the carefully calculated leaks administered by Liberal party flacks—

An hon. Member: Sucked in.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, sucked in, in spades.

Perhaps it is this kind of unprincipled manipulation by a minister who is a past master at the game which represents the most sordid aspect of the whole sleazy, deceitful performance.

As Canadians pay an additional 18 cents a gallon for gasoline in the new year, with more and steeper rises to come, and as householders find their fuel costs doubling through the winter months, Mr. Speaker, I hope they will pause and reflect on the duplicity of a political party which won an election on the promise made over and over again that they would not do precisely what they have now done in this budget. As hundreds of small businesses in the trucking industry and in transportation of all kinds, as well as those which depend on transportation, find themselves with their backs to the wall—because there are no compensating factors in this budget—they too may reflect on the morality of a party which has broken its solemn engagements, solemn commitments.

Our budget raised fuel prices as a modest and realistic way of coping with the problem. Anyone is free to examine our proposals and compare them with the Draconian measures brought down last night.

An hon. Member: Read the Toronto Star.

Mr. Nielsen: The Toronto Star? That bastion of impartial, unbiased journalism, compared them last night.

An hon. Member: How about The Toronto Sun?

Mr. Nielsen: I invite hon. members opposite to do the comparing for themselves. I do not have the time in my remarks.

An hon. Member: Ask Blakeney or Turner.

Mr. Nielsen: See your Prime Minister about the statement he made on January 21, 1980, and compare.

Our budget provided compensatory provisions. We tempered the wind, quite literally, for householders and small businesses. The minister has kept the negative aspects and thrown out the positive approach which we recommended and which alone made the others feasible and palatable.

It is, of course, traditional for the Liberal party, to decry what an opposing party does and then to adopt it holus-bolus—the NDP is familiar with that kind of conduct, they have been living with it for years—but with no understanding of the philosophy behind the recommendations.

Our budget presented balanced and reasonable proposals. The budget before us now presents many of the same proposals but without the other proposals required to compensate and counterbalance the measures which we suggested. In other words, it is a picture of fiscal imbalance and fiscal bias being perpetrated for political advantage. This is what Canadians are being asked to accept and, like the constitutional proposals, it shows the true face of Liberalism.

In the constitutional proposals they placed the provinces in a strait-jacket. With the budget they have placed small business and the householder in that strait-jacket. All that remains is for the voters, at the next election—and it cannot come too soon—to place the Liberal party in a strait-jacket from which it will not wriggle free for a long time to come.

I want to close by quoting, for the benefit of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, the words that he missed because he was taking umbrage, in a very agitated way, because they are strong words. To accuse any hon. member of deliberately lying is to use strong words. But I am doing that tonight with respect to the Prime Minister and I am doing it on the basis of a speech that he made in Whitehorse on January 21, 1980. I have a transcript of the words he used on that occasion. Here it is in black and white. The hon. member will recall that the Crosbie budget did not tax home heating fuels, only transportation fuels. I see him nodding his assent to that.

An hon. Member: The excise tax only.

Mr. Nielsen: It did not apply to home heating fuels.

An hon. Member: That is correct.

Mr. Nielsen: That is my point. He agrees it is correct. The Prime Minister was speaking about the north, and he said:

> The climate, more extreme than southern Canada, your communications, your transportation, are more difficult, and your costs are considerably higher than they are in the south, but what you need is a national government which is practical and which is sensible, that's consistent—and what you had with the Joe Clark government is a giant doublecross. The last thing you need in the north—

Pay attention to that.

> —is an eighteen cent per gallon tax on gasoline and on diesel and I repeat will serve entirely to pay for that mortgage plan, and nowhere will that Joe Clark tax hurt more than here in the north, because under that energy plan, every household here in Whitehorse—every household will be paying nearly five hundred dollars a year more for home heating oil by 1982.

Nothing could be clearer than this outright, deliberate falsehood by the Prime Minister. He directly stated there what he would not say in Toronto or Halifax for the sake of gaining a seat which he has been after for a good many years. If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre wants to try to explain to me—

Mr. Evans: I can.

Mr. Nielsen: —and to the people of the Yukon, that that did not mean a promise by the Prime Minister that the Clark budget would mean an additional $500 fuel cost to them as a result of those taxes, if he can turn that around, he would be even more of a magician than the Minister of Finance. It is very clear.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I ran out of time, but I am glad I had the opportunity to put that on the record for the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski), in endeavouring to introduce Leslie Nielsen as one of Canada's outstanding actors, by a slip of the tongue said "Erik Nielsen, one of Canada's most outstanding actors".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Cullen: I think we have had a demonstration of that today because it is hard to believe that the hon. member for Yukon believed everything he was reading. He had his lines down pretty well, but I do not really think he felt that what he was saying was in accord with what the policies and what the promises of this party were during the last election campaign. I have to give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt. Possibly he was not listening when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), in concluding his remarks, stated quite clearly what our promises were during that election campaign, namely, that we will keep price increases to less than $4 a barrel in 1980 and $4.50 a barrel in 1981, 1982 and 1983, and thereafter prices will rise more steeply. Then he illustrated his point by reference to the December 11 budget proposals. He said that under those proposals the wellhead price of conventional oil would have been $52 a barrel on January 1, 1984, but under the national energy program, it will be $25 a barrel, enough to get the oil supply job done but also fair to the consumer.

That is what the Liberal party was talking about during the election campaign, and we heard about the made-in-Canada price and the blended price. No Liberal during that campaign ever suggested that the prices would not go up. What we did indicate is that we would not put the 18-cent excise tax on and that our increases on the per barrel level would be lower than those provided for in the ill-fated budget of 1979.

It is a particular pleasure for me, Mr. Speaker, to be here today to participate in this debate. It is somewhat ironic that, because of the last budget which was introduced in the House, I am now back in the House of Commons and able to participate in a budget debate, on a budget which, I guarantee, will help me to stay in this party on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: It was my privilege to serve as parliamentary secretary to a former minister of finance when the indexing element was introduced. When I hear members opposite say that there is nothing in this budget for the ordinary Canadian, I wonder if they are trying once again to underestimate, or if they are underestimating the intelligence of the Canadian public. The Canadian public knew what indexing was all about, and they have been reading that it represents a saving of $1.6 billion in one year alone. That is revenue the government is forgoing so that it will be in the hands of ordinary taxpayers. At that time the opposition indicated how wonderful the indexing system was, how great it was, and that it had a most beneficial impact on the ordinary Canadian taxpayer. So, the indexing program was left in, it was not taken out, and the ordinary consumer and taxpayer of Canada has received a magnificent bonus as a result of the indexing system being introduced and continued by this party.

I think it is significant to point out as well that, since the inception of this particular program, $11 billion has gone into the pockets of taxpayers which otherwise would have been government revenues if we did not have the indexing system. The deficit at the present time would have been somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3 billion or $4 billion if we had seen fit not to introduce the indexing system. But we felt it was necessary "to help the ordinary taxpayer".

They suggest that there is nothing here for the ordinary Canadian. I suggest that people living in areas of high unemployment, those areas designated under DREE, will be very happy to know about the 50 per cent investment tax credit which will be available to manufacturers who locate their operations in those areas of the country and create jobs there. The fact that people will be given an incentive to switch from oil to cheaper priced gas can be laid as a benefit to the ordinary Canadian, the ordinary taxpayer.

When the opposition does not have too much to attack, it tries to make something out of it. It reminds me of the story of the lawyer who indicated when he had the facts on his side that he pounded them into the jury, and when he had the law on his side he pounded it into the judge. When asked what he did when he had neither facts nor law on his side, he said, "I pound the table". That is what we are hearing. With all this rhetoric from opposition members and western premiers, we are hearing a lot of noise and a lot of pounding of desks because they cannot, in all conscience, fault what has made Canada the strong country it is today, that is, sharing the assets and benefits of one part of the country with another when help is needed.

Of course there is a tendency on the opposite side to say that everything should be covered in the budget, and a tendency to ignore what is already in place, such as the fact that we have increased the guaranteed income supplement and the old age security and Canada Pension Plan are in place. The fact that UIC premiums have been increased seems to bother members opposite, but the point of fact they do not look at is that also the benefits have been increased. Self-employed fishermen, a unique group under the unemployment insurance program, are the only self-employed people who will be allowed to benefit from unemployment insurance. Their benefits will cost the program something like $100 million to $125 million a year. The ordinary fisherman is benefiting from programs already in place—family allowance, medicare, and a myriad of programs already in place to help the average Canadian. As I said earlier the tradition which has helped this country become the great country it is, is that one region of the country helps another when help is needed.

The minister of finance for the province of Manitoba stated that the budget will have a stabilizing effect on the economy and reduce the national debt. Later on he had some less complimentary remarks to make about the budget. Of course, that is the nature of the beast, but he grudgingly conceded that that in fact will be the impact of this particular budget—helping areas that need it.

I doubt whether there is anyone in Ontario over a particular age who does not remember the time when Alberta needed help when it was endeavouring to establish its oil economy and Canadians had to pay higher than the world price to help in that particular area. We did that without complaint, we did that without rhetoric, and we did that without crying foul because we recognized it was a necessity in order to help the oil industry of Alberta. Then we hear the counter-argument, "Yes, but you put that higher-priced oil into your manufactured products and ship them back to Alberta and, in the final analysis, we pay that increased cost anyway." In so far as manufacturing and businesses operating with this higher-priced oil are concerned, we have to concede that they might very well have passed on that particular cost. But the average Canadian living in the eastern part of the country could not pass on that additional cost, the person heating his home or driving his automobile. They were prepared to do it because it was their contribution to help the province of Alberta develop its oil industry.

What do we hear when we look to Alberta and the producing provinces for some help? We hear rhetoric and hysteria. "It is like a declaration of war", said one of the premiers out there. Another minister said, "We feel as though we have been abandoned by the federal government". The comments of Mr. Hyndman from Alberta were "swift", "harsh" and "a massive discrimination against Alberta". What is to be gained with that kind of rhetoric? We are trying to work out a system of sharing, of fairness. Various overtures were made to western Canada, particularly the one to help with the tar sands. We were prepared to say, "You will get the $38 per barrel for the oil produced in this particular operation, plus a built-in indexing system in order to enable this particular operation to develop." That was rejected because they wanted the whole package. They did not want this in sawdust piecemeal. To suggest that the government was out there and not preparing to negotiate, or "not giving any indication of negotiation" as Mr. Leitch of Alberta apparently said, is just not in accordance with the facts.

I should like to get back for a moment to basics. Quebec and the Atlantic provinces would have had to pay the world price for their oil. The government said that it was unfair, came up with the one-price oil system right across Canada and endeavoured to find a means by which to bring it about. I do not think anyone seriously objected to it, nothwithstanding the fact that it would cost a considerable amount of money, a massive amount of dollars. We found one way, through the export tax on oil, to give some of that money to the project, and, of course, the ordinary taxpayer had to pay his proportionate share out of income taxes. Given the fact that in developing the oil industry in Alberta Canadians had to pay more than the world price, that we allowed depletion allowances so that these operations could develop, is it fair that the federal government's share of the production of a barrel of oil should only be 10 per cent? Is it a massive infusion or a massive intervention with Alberta to say that rather than getting 45 per cent they will get 43 per cent? Is it fair for oil companies that were making 45 per cent of $3, $4 and $5 per barrel for oil, thus enabling them to operate, work in the north, build islands in lakes and rivers and do exploratory work, to tell me now that they cannot get enough cash to explore, develop and produce at 43 per cent of the price which will be paid for oil? This, to me, stretches credibility a little too far.

There was a suggestion that federal government policies led to the fact that the Atlantic provinces had to rely on offshore. It is rather interesting to have the genius of hindsight. I know when I first came here, Mr. Speaker, and we were talking about exporting to the United States something like 350,000 to 400,000 barrels of oil a day and the pressure was on every day to do everything we could to increase that from 350,000, we looked upon it as a victory if we were able to do that. Had we possessed the value of foresight we would not have taken that action.

I heard the former minister of finance yesterday castigating this government for its Canadianizing procedures, and knocking Petro-Canada. I must say that when I first came here I was not all that sold on the idea of Petro-Canada or a Canadian national oil corporation. But when I found out that we had been misled by the oil companies back in 1971 and 1972, when they told us we had all the oil we would require for the next hundred years, and then almost overnight there was a shortage, it was then I knew, and became convinced, that we needed a national oil company—and so did the majority of Canadians.

Thank heaven for the former minister of energy, mines and resources, the Hon. Alastair Gillespie. I think he left us a tremendous legacy. Petro-Canada is going to evolve into Canada's national oil company and it is to his credit that he stood fast and saw to it that this operation was very much involved and had the kind of funding it needed so that it could be successful. What did we hear from the Conservatives? The government was going to dismantle Petro-Canada despite the obvious need for this particular Crown corporation. I understand that as recently as two years ago they were still talking about that, that Petro-Canada should be dismantled. I wonder if they will really ever learn that Canadians want a national oil company.

I listened very carefully to the former minister of finance yesterday. He is always entertaining but he is not always very accurate. He suggested that eventually they might very well erect a couple of statues, the Clark-Crosbie statues. It seemed to me that if they were going to construct statues they would have to put them on a much firmer base than the Conservative party has for the particular platforms they are advocating. I think after a while you would find the two statues leaning on one another and the only ones appreciating the statues would be the pigeons.

I was really concerned with the position taken by the New Democratic Party, who were talking about spending more money in the interest of creating jobs—a stimulative deficit, is what they called it. That has a nice ring to it. The only problem is that it probably would not work. If it did not work we would have an even bigger deficit than at the present time. The one we have now is too high and barely manageable, but it is manageable. The constant pressure from the NDP to spend more money to increase the deficit is a counter-productive idea, in so far as it relates to average Canadians.

I listened to their criticism when I was the minister of employment and immigration and they told me to stop using band-aid solutions, to stop the Canada Works program and to get into something which would be more permanent. That is exactly what we endeavoured to do with the economic growth component of Canada Works. We worked with the provinces and we created longer-term jobs. Today the emphasis is on more permanent job creation and not on Canada Works projects. I think that at a time of high unemployment there is a place for Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs. It gives people an opportunity to do a bit of work, earn some money and make a contribution to the economy. Obviously the impact is short term, but it does give people a sense of accomplishment, of making a contribution. And most assuredly they were getting experience which was required. To suggest there is no job creation at the present time is just ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. We know the investment which has to be made.

The new energy program which has been introduced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources screams out with the promise of jobs which will be made for Canadians. The fact is that funding will be made available for apprenticeship training for the young people who are looking for and who need the jobs. They should be the ones to fill them as a result of training received in Canada. These jobs should not be filled as a result of immigration.

Examining the unemployment figures we see that for the adult male over 25 the unemployment rate is 4.8 per cent. The rate for unemployed females over 25 is 6.2 per cent. This is definitely too high, but the Leader of the New Democratic Party himself has used a figure that full employment in Canada means about 3 per cent unemployment. We heard the Hon. Darcy McKeough suggesting that something like 5.5 per cent unemployment was full employment because of the benefits which accrue, whether they are negotiated through union contracts or benefits which accrue as a result of government action. This is an area where we have high unemployment but where there are means available to help people in particularly difficult circumstances.

Where the emphasis must be is where the unemployment is tragically high—among our young people between the ages of 14 and 25. And that is why I welcome the large amount of money which will be spent on energy projects, on counselling and guidance work, hopefully. We will say to the provinces, "Please honour and respect and give more training to your guidance counsellors at your high schools because they will have a bigger and more important role to play in the future."

At the present time the government has the Adult Occupational Training Act and we do not wish to move into the educational field, but the creation of jobs is everyone's responsibility. Here is an area where the federal government co-operates with the provinces and negotiates three-year agreements so that training programs can take place right across Canada. So, Mr. Speaker, the training opportunities are there. We know that the jobs will be available and I think that what must take place is more meetings between the federal minister and the provincial ministers to see to it that we dovetail this work in order that the young people are trained for the jobs which will obviously be available in the future.

One of the difficulties we have in this party and in this part of the country is getting the message across to Alberta. The Alberta Chamber of Commerce seem to think that Canadians in this part of the country do not appreciate that when Alberta is successful and pipelines are built there are spin-off benefits for Ontario. We do understand that and we do appreciate it. We also appreciate the contribution which Alberta has made with the export tax on oil helping toward the one-price oil system. That is a significant contribution, and nobody denies it. But when the message is spread out west that we do not have that appreciation and that we expect all of the manufacturing and development should take place in Ontario, it is just not in accordance with the facts.

Some years ago, in approximately 1968 or 1969, the petrochemical industry was in some difficulty. The then minister of industry, trade and commerce, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), brought together a group of government and business people and, without recrimination, asked what was wrong with the petrochemical industry and what could be done to make it work. There was a whole series of suggestions made by industry and by government. But the main thing that emerged was that we did not have the economies of scale here and we did not have the needed access to American markets. We needed to build world-scale plants. But if every company got involved in building a world-scale plant that would be counter-productive and, down the road, we would have to rationalize. So the determination was made, as early as 1968, 1969 and 1970, to build three world-scale plants. This was not a government decision, it was an economic, business decision that the first one be built in Ontario. The intention at that time was to build the second one in Alberta and the third one in the Montreal area. That prediction has proven to be true.

But the feeling is that Ontario got the Petrosar plant and that this has worked to the detriment of the Alberta petrochemical industry. In fact nothing could be further from the truth because, with a strong petrochemical industry, be it in Ontario, Alberta or Quebec, it will be beneficial to all of Canada. It will help with the balance of payments. Just as one indicator, I believe the Petrosar balance of payments picture represents a difference of about $1.5 billion and Alberta is now embarked upon the construction of a world-scale plant and other petrochemical operations in that great province. So, Mr. Speaker, it is not that we are unaware.

I see the hon. member from Calgary is here. I must tell him the story that was going around when we were endeavouring to get our message out there to The Calgary Herald, the Edmonton Journal or to our good friend Ron Collister who, we understand, has an open line show. There was a suggestion made that if an earthquake struck Calgary the headline would be: "Harvie Andre's House Slightly Damaged in Earthquake". It is very difficult for us to get our message across in face of that kind of rhetoric in Alberta.

I want to make the point again, Mr. Speaker; we appreciate that the Albertan people are generous. We appreciate what has been done, not only in Ontario with the tremendous benefit it has derived from the petrochemical industry, but also in Quebec and the Atlantic regions which have the benefit of the export tax which keeps the price of oil down to at least a manageable level.

There is room for all in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and there is money enough for everyone. All we are asking is for a proper sharing. I do not think the production from a barrel of oil divided on a 45-33-24 basis is out of line. It is appropriate, given the involvement and investment that all Canadians have contributed to make the oil industry the success it is today. I think it is appropriate to set the price of $38 per barrel to help with Syncrude and the heavy oil operations.

There is an opportunity for us to develop, but we have to work things out together in the traditional Canadian way of sharing the benefits, of helping one another, so that when we are down, other provinces and the federal government will come to our aid. They will help us over the hurdle and then go on to help whatever other area of the country needs assistance.

I can support this budget without qualm or concern. It does not cover all subjects and it was not meant to, but many of the areas the opposition would like to see covered are already taken care of.

The energy package is the most dynamic energy policy ever introduced in this country. The companies asked for ground rules and now we have ground rules as suggested by the federal government. On a radio or television program I heard Mr. Daniels asked if he was going to sell out and get out in view of the budget and its detrimental effect on the industry. He said he was not and that he could operate within this regime. It would certainly be nicer to have 45 per cent than 33 per cent but we should not forget that the 33 per cent will be based on a much higher price per barrel of oil.

We can make this country work, Mr. Speaker, if we stop the rhetoric and the use of words like "declaration of war", "rape of resources", "unconscionable", "not thinking", "not caring" or "not appreciating". That is what is going to kill it, Mr. Speaker, not a budget like this or an energy policy like this. They are good for Canada. If there is more negotiating to be done, then let us do it. At least we now have good ground work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have been waiting for the Government of Canada to show leadership with an energy policy for a long time. On Tuesday night we watched the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) closely as we did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in this House yesterday and today. I think people did so feeling that the energy policy would be a blueprint for the future, at least to the year 2000—that this was to be the financial and energy policy of our generation. As a Vancouver musician friend of mine would say, "This is it, baby, and it had better be good."

Pericles who is not a Vancouverite but an Athenian, once said that only a few people may originate a policy, but we are all able to judge it. This afternoon I want to judge the government's policy, not so much from the point of view of a member of Parliament but from that of a typical family in my constituency. I do so in reply to the last speaker for the Liberal party. I will call these people the family from Renfrew Street because that is a street which runs through the middle of my riding. Similar families live in all the regions of Canada. They care little for the constitutional debate which has so preoccupied this House. They are insecure about their jobs, about the price of a litre of milk and, now, about the price of a litre of gasoline. They want the federal government to show leadership and to help them. In short, they are concerned about the bread and butter issues. Who can blame them?

Let me discuss the budget in terms of these headings or concerns, Mr. Speaker—prices, taxes, jobs, western development, off-oil policy, Canada's north, Canadianization and further public control of the oil industry.

Let me deal with prices. Yesterday in this House the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made a rather remarkable statement. He said that in energy the essence of good government is to make good promises to the people. You will note he did not say good actions, but good promises. Mr. Speaker, I suspect this Liberal government was elected on the promise of cheap energy, after the Conservative party had proposed to devastate the average family in this country with high energy prices.

I was shocked to hear the former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) attack my party for opposing their Conservative budget, that maggoty fish of a budget they brought in last December. The people promptly decided it was not good and promptly threw both the rogues out. Now they have the nerve to stand up and attack us. I noticed that the hon. member also attacked the London School of Economics. I can at least say, Mr. Speaker, that I did not flunk out of law school twice, as he did.

I want to go back to the family on Renfrew Street. Look what they get as a result of the new Conservative budget, this time called the Liberal budget. The government's own estimates show that the cost of home heating will double in three years. On page 106 of "The National Energy Program," figures show that the cost will go from $640 per year to $1280 per year. If the families on Renfrew Street heat their homes with natural gas they can expect a 30 cent per thousand cubic feet tax on their December bill. By 1984 the price of gasoline for the average family will double to $1248 per year. Those are the government's figures—$100 per month for gasoline for an average family. By 1989 it will cost $50 to fill the tank. So much for the Liberals' cheap energy prices.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the cost of heating oil for that family will double in 1984. The price of gasoline will be nearly double in 1984. In 1989 Canadians will have to pay $50 for a full tank of gas. It will cost $100 to drive from Ottawa to Quebec City and back.

[English]

In 1989 it will cost $100 to go to Quebec and back. You can bet that wages and pensions are not going to increase so fast. I say to my friends opposite that in a short time the family on Renfrew Street, when they feel the full impact of these prices are not going to want to put a tiger in their tank—they are going to want to put Trudeau in their tank. I use that as a general term, Mr. Speaker; I was not referring to the member from his particular riding.

We in the New Democratic Party have resisted the rise in oil prices. This is not because we do not believe in conservation, as there will be some conservation with these high prices, and not because we believe that the provinces should not get a proper rent from the resources. We do believe they are entitled to those rents. What we wanted, if the government brought in higher prices, was that they would bring in measures to protect the ordinary family, that it would act to cushion the impact of these higher oil prices on jobs, on prices, on people on low and fixed incomes.

The Minister of Finance has claimed there are no general tax increases in the budget. In fact, there are seven indirect tax increases. Just count them. Many of my constituents—the elderly, those on government assistance, the unemployed—do not earn enough to pay income tax, but they will certainly have to pay the increased energy costs.

I am sorry the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not in the House but I see his parliamentary secretary is. I wanted to suggest to the minister of energy—I am sorry he is not in the House tonight, although his parliamentary secretary is here—that the essence of good government is honesty, and this is not an honest energy policy.

For example, let us look at the tax on natural gas. We are told that the government has saved us from a natural gas export tax. In British Columbia we are very happy about that—at least we are supposed to be. But the truth is there will be an export tax, and the fact is there is also a domestic tax. It is easy for the minister to say that British Columbia and Alberta will get all future price increases. But I say to the government and to its members that of the last seven National Energy Board approvals last year for increased gas exports, only two have been approved by the U.S. government. So the minister knows, and he knew before the budget, that prices are not going to rise in American markets. The only realistic future gas price increases will be the tax of 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet which the federal government has now put on. British Columbia will lose $35 million in export revenues because the 30 cents per thousand cubic feet would have gone to B.C.

In British Columbia natural gas is subsidized. Yes, it is available at a low price and I do not apologize for that. The low prices should help the very people which this budget is not helping. What does this government do? It simply taxes the gas making the price higher. I have to go back to Vancouver and tell that family on Renfrew Street that social services will likely be cut in British Columbia as a result, that their gas bills will increase and that the government is not giving them a cost of living tax credit. They are not going to be entirely thrilled with this budget.

I said I would talk about jobs. Failure in this area is the second big objection we have against this budget and against this energy policy. There is no industrial strategy in place in this country. We continue to export jobs with our raw resources. Very simply, what I mean by an industrial strategy is this: we want Canadians making the finished product from our resources for Canadian markets and for export. That family on Renfrew Street knows instinctively, as we all know, that this country is the most blessed country in the world in terms of resources. We also know that we are letting the Japanese, the Europeans and just about every other country in the world beat us in manufacturing. That is where the jobs are. Jobs are not in pipelines, though I hate to say that. There are a few jobs in pipelines, such as welding, digging and so on, but the real jobs are in a new manufacturing industry in Canada. But that is not the direction in which the Liberal party is moving and that is the second objection we have.

Let me give hon. members an example about which some members opposite know. The committee on natural resources held three hearings last week on the Arctic pilot project. This is an incredible project which will take gas from Melville Island, in the north of Canada, right across the northwest passage down to either Gros Cacouna in Quebec or in the Strait of Canso. What is equally incredible is that we are going to take the gas in foreign ships and export it when it is brought down. There is the whole problem of Canada; we have no industrial strategy, and it is evidenced right there.

In the budget there is mention of a regional strategy, a western development fund. Remember, this budget is taking $20 billion out of the west. That is fine. The west should be sharing resources, but the west should be getting something back as well. What is the west getting back? We are getting a $4 billion development fund.

Mr. Andre: It is $2 billion.

Mr. Waddell: It says $4 billion but my friend points out that it is $2 billion. As a matter of fact, Senator Perrault announced this program in Vancouver a few months ago and everybody yawned. Then he went to Toronto and announced it again. Next it appeared on the front page of The Globe and Mail, that oracle of wisdom in Canada. Apparently it was read by the government, taken up and put in the budget. The problem is, and I say this sincerely to my friends opposite who might wish to understand some of our concern in western Canada, that to us in the west it seems as though this is another example of Ottawa knowing best what is good for us, because it will be administered by one cabinet minister, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), and eastern Canadians. I ask the government: would it not be better to involve western Canadians in the development? Would it not be better to do what Premier Blakeney said, by making it a joint federal-provincial program? I suggest that to the government.

Mr. Andre: They are too stupid.

Mr. Waddell: I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister shortly after the election suggesting the government should set up a committee of the House of Commons and call it the western development committee. Why cannot opposition members be brought into such a committee and an opposition member be made the chairman of it? By this method the government could get some impact from western Canada. But the government has to listen.

I made a suggestion about a gas bank. I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) took up the proposal and now a gas bank has been proposed in the budget. I congratulate the government for that. I might also suggest to the government that it try to get Ontario and Quebec to consider the concept of gas banking. These provinces will need the gas in the future for their citizens. Action on these lines now will help national unity by making an investment in Alberta, and that makes a lot of sense. I have asked the government to pursue that idea. I also asked the government to look at—I think it is called Enertech—the new Crown corporation for alternate energy mentioned in the budget. I ask the government to consider putting the head office of that corporation in Vancouver. There is no province or region more interested in alternatives than the people of British Columbia. That would be a good move toward national unity. I urge the government not to do it in the old patronage style. They should put the head office in Vancouver where there will be a real response to it.

I want to address a couple of remarks to the government's off-oil policy. It is a simple policy and it seems to make sense at first, that is to move from oil to natural gas. I bring to the attention of members opposite, the minister's words when he discussed this policy:

We would resolve the nation's energy problem in all its dimension.

I see the Minister of Finance has just entered the chamber. The words of the minister of energy I have just quoted remind me of the old Tommy Douglas story. I do not know whether the minister will recall when Mr. Douglas was first elected as premier of Saskatchewan. I think he visited a mental hospital in Weyburn. He went up to a man and said, "Hello". The fellow asked him who he was. He answered by saying, "I am the Premier of Saskatchewan". The fellow replied, "Oh, you will get over that. When I was here for the first year, I thought I was Napoleon".

It seems to me that when we hear the minister say "We would resolve the nation's energy problem in all its dimension," he has somewhat of a Napoleonic complex, especially since he is so inconsistent and hypocritical on gas policy. I have to say that. Look at the evidence. This is the government which agreed to sell out huge quantities of Canadian gas on the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline. This is the government which is negotiating with New York now about sales to the eastern states, including New Hampshire. This is the government which is prepared to encourage Dome Petroleum—and I asked a question about this in the House the other day—to sell more Canadian natural gas to Japan. Even the minister's own statement in "The National Energy Program" document talks about more and more gas exports. Yet this is the same government that says in the next breath we have to move off oil to natural gas. Is there not a fallacy there, Mr. Speaker? Is it not likely that all the good cheap gas will be gone by the time provinces such as Ontario and Quebec are ready to use Canadian gas and at that time these provinces will have to pay more? The government is inconsistent in its policy.

There is nothing in the budget about the north, not one word about it. One can see that the industrial system will ultimately require the gas of the Arctic, but we must protect the northern environment. Above all else, we must honour the legitimate claims and aspirations of the native people. There is not one word about this side of the coin, we only hear of Arctic development.

I come to Canadianization. The minister, in a remarkable statement at his press conference, said, "I wish we had done this ten years ago." But who welcomed American capital with open arms? Who established those policies? This is where one can really describe the budget as basically a fake to the left and a hard punch to the right. If you look at it, you will see it right here.

What do we get under Canadianization? We get grants and incentives for Canadian companies. Let me give an example. Under the new system, if you wish to drill an oil well in the north, and it cost $10 million, the Canadian people will pay $9 million of it and they get nothing back. Here is how it works. Eighty per cent of the $10 million will be given as a grant, which is $8 million. Then there will be 100 per cent write-off for exploration. At the nominal corporate tax rate of 10 per cent, that is an additional $1 million. So, the Canadian people are paying $9 million and Bob Blair, Jack Gallagher or Conrad Black, the Canadian capitalists, are getting the benefits. What kind of progressive system is that?

There is a new book which I am sure all members have read called "The Northern Magus" by Richard Gwyn. On page 57 he quotes the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as saying, some time ago:

> A sound economic policy must never be based on the assumption, for example, that workers would be ready to accept a drastic lowering of standards of living for the mere pleasure of seeing a national middle class replacing a foreign one at the helm of various enterprises.

What has the minister done? He has replaced one economic elite, a foreign one, with a domestic one. That will not help the ordinary family on Renfrew Street, not at all.

This Canadianization idea is not new. Here is what the Prime Minister said in Sault Ste. Marie on June 29, 1974:

> A re-elected Liberal government would set a priority objective requiring that all new major investments in resource industries have at least 50 per cent—and preferably 60 per cent—Canadian equity ownership.

That is a wonderful statement. I salute the Prime Minister of 1974. The only problem is this is 1980. What has happened is this: since 1974 we have experienced a 4 per cent increase in Canadian ownership. That is one per cent a year. At this rate, it will take until 2001 to patriate Canadian ownership. The message that comes to me and which I pass on to the government is: we simply do not believe you; you are really not going to do anything about Canadianizing the industry.

The other issue I wish to address is public ownership. There is no greater challenge in Canada to my generation and to the whole country, than the matter of taking the oil industry under public ownership. The people support this. The Toronto Star certainly does. I know the people of this country support it. That is the challenge.

What is the response from this budget? This is the fake to the left. Look at the response. There is no definition of the way in which companies are to be taken over. There are no specifics concerning which companies. And who is going to end up paying for it? The Canadian consumer. In short, there is nothing there. Maybe we will be pleasantly surprised—I leave that open to the government. However, a government that really wanted to be honest and straightforward would come right out and give a plan, as we have, to take over public ownership of the three largest companies, Imperial, Shell and Texaco.

In conclusion, there is a conventional wisdom which says the trend in North America is to the right. I think conventional wisdom is wrong in this case. The trend is toward social democracy and reindustrialization which will create jobs, stimulate exports, modernize aging industrial plants in the east and create new ones in the west besides nurturing new ideas which private enterprise is too timid to pursue.

I put this to the Minister of Finance who is sitting right across from me in the House of Commons; why couldn't the government show some real leadership and say to the people, to this family on Renfrew Street and to all similar families in Canada, yes, the price of energy will go but we will give you a cost of living tax credit or a grant to those retired or on government assistance. Why did they not say yes, we will guarantee your son or daughter a job. Also, to reassure those living in the west, why did they not say: we are prepared to see western development carried out with the active involvement of westerners. Or, to those in the east; we are prepared to ensure you will not get thrown out of a job at the next plant closure because of higher energy prices or continued difficulties with the economy. They could say to the people: yes, we are prepared to ensure that you will have relatively cheap supplies of natural gas in the future and we will not sell them all out to the Americans. That is what they should say.

They should say one more thing, and I leave this with the minister. They should say; no ads, no polls, no hype, we are just going to level with you.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of relief and pride that I rise to speak in this budget debate today. My sense of relief is perhaps a reflection of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said in his opening remarks during his budget presentation. I quote:

—the first budget of this new decade . . . is a budget which sets new directions for the economy—directions which will ensure both energy security and economic security for Canadians in the years ahead.

With those words, the Minister of Finance launched this nation on its long-term national energy policy. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When debate was interrupted at 6 p.m., the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Ferguson) had the floor.

● (2010)

[English]

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had mentioned the sense of relief I felt last Tuesday evening when the Parliament of Canada was presented with a long-term national energy policy. I referred to a sense of pride, and my sense of pride is that this budget and the national energy policy contained in it will lead to greater Canadian control over our resources and economy and fulfil the commitments made by our party during the election campaign.

It is with a further sense of pride that I serve with this government when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) bring out such a long-term policy spelling out our objectives and identifying our goals and the methodology of attainment. This budget is designed for all of Canada and to serve the long-term interests of all Canadians. It takes into consideration the need to reduce the budgetary deficit without adding undue hardships to the people of this nation, and in the long term it will provide incentives to encourage industrial expansion in designated regions.

The 50 per cent investment credit is a massive incentive for industrial expansion, and this benefit alone will provide a climate which will lead to more jobs for more Canadians.

The energy program, founded on those three basic principles—first, security of supply and ultimate independence from the world oil markets; second, the opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the energy industry and to share in the accrued benefits; and third, the fairness of the pricing and revenue-sharing regime which recognizes the needs and rights of all Canadians—is a sound program with far-reaching effects.

But perhaps the most important aspect of this policy is the gradual implementation of price increases which will not send shock waves across our economy and trigger another inflationary spiral. Another important aspect of this policy is that it will conserve oil in the precise manner in which the gas conversion process will proceed—the Montreal-Quebec pipeline, the conversion incentives to home owners to use natural gas rather than oil and the incentives to convert to other renewable fuels.

As technology advances I believe we have the potential to make both energy and food renewable Canadian resources. The stage has been set, as responsible Canadian citizens respond to the incentives provided by converting their homes to gas and wood or biomass, and as this process proceeds, the use of oil for heating purposes will diminish, thus bringing production of oil into balance with our consumption. As this transition takes place, the need for imported oil is reduced and our balance of trade position will therefore be improved.

Rather than dismantle Petro-Canada as proposed by the previous government, we intend to strengthen and expand this company, which was established in 1975 and which is 100 per cent owned by Canadians. I was proud to hear the minister say that we will be purchasing other oil companies to ensure that at least 50 per cent of our resources are owned and controlled by Canadians by 1990. Just last week I noted that oil company profits are up by 65 per cent over last year. We want to ensure that those profits stay in Canada and benefit Canadians. In addition to strengthening this Canadian company we will be establishing a new Canadian alternative energy corporation, to be called Enertech Canada, the mandate of which will be restricted to renewable energy and conservation technology.

Mr. Blenkarn: Do you really believe that?

Mr. Ferguson: I am extremely interested in renewable energy and believe that new technology will bring about an ever-increasing use of forest and biomass products which are now going to waste. For example, two young farmers in my constituency have each developed a new and highly efficient type of furnace designed to burn garbage, crop refuse or wood. These young men have risen to accept the energy challenge of the eighties, and while these furnaces were developed to provide heat for crop-drying purposes they can be used for heating institutions, schools or small factories and shops.

There are two other groups looking into the feasibility of producing ethanol. One group has access to natural gas which is being flared off from producing oil wells, but that gas is not in sufficient quantities to be of commercial value. But this gas is available in amounts sufficient to provide heat for the distillation process extracting ethanol from corn. These two farmers own beef feedlots and will be feeding the residue to their cattle. There is no waste, and this corn will be recycled to produce both food and fuel. I am delighted that the budget papers and notices of ways and means motions contain provisions to lower the bonding and licencing requirements, allowing such entrepreneurs to do their part to relieve the energy problems of this nation.

The other group to which I referred is made up of members of a co-operative which processes vegetables and potatoes. They too realize the potential fuel contained in that 20 per cent of a potato crop which normally ends up as culls and is left to rot, and are looking forward to utilizing this energy by converting it to ethanol.

I read just last night in the Ottawa Citizen that the National Alcohol Fuels Commission in the United States issued a report showing that a gallon of ethanol can actually save .83 gallons of crude oil under certain conditions. This fuel is widely used in the midwest United States and some countries in South America.

This forward-looking budget is responsible in its pricing formula. It is responsible because it does not begin with a harsh excise tax on fuels, and it is responsible because it recognizes the needs of our citizens and the generation to come by not only ensuring our energy supplies but by also providing the incentives for industry to become established in regions not ordinarily recognized as regions of potential. I would further stress that this budget ensures our industrial competitiveness across Canada yet maintains our enviable standard of living, which is among the best in the world.

I refer specifically to the made-in-Canada price which will never be allowed to exceed 85 per cent of the imported oil price or the U.S. oil price, whichever is the lower. This budget will cost the consumer $40 billion less than the budget of December, 1979, yet we are maintaining our competitive edge, ensuring our supplies for the future, bringing our industry under Canadian control and encouraging the use of alternative energy and renewable energy. Above all, this budget and energy policy will not trigger another inflationary spiral, which we all fear, because the increases will be implemented in a planned and responsible manner over a six-year period.

In comparison with the budget of December, 1979, the impact of this budget will be far less inflationary. Perhaps I should place on record the differences in relation to gasoline and diesel fuel costs to consumers. To the commuter the 1979 budget would have meant a gasoline price of about $1.56 per gallon in 1981 compared with $1.50 per gallon in our budget. By 1984 the December budget would have resulted in a price of $2.63 per gallon, while this budget will provide a price of $2.10 per gallon, or 53 cents per gallon less. This is important to a commuter, for example, if he is driving 12,000 miles per year. Our budget would result in savings of over $200 per year in 1984 based on an automobile operating at about 30 miles to the gallon.

But there is a more important comparison to be made, and that comparison is in the area of food production. In this instance we will use the differences in the costs of diesel fuel. For the purpose of comparison we will assume that a particular farm uses about 6,000 gallons of diesel fuel per year, or about 27,300 litres. In 1981, under the December budget this would cost $7,140 for the year. The cost in the budget under debate here today would be about $6,360 for that same year. By 1984 under the previous December budget, the price would amount to an annual cost of $13,620. In our budget here today the cost would be $9,780, a saving to that particular farmer of $3,840. In that four-year span the budget we are discussing tonight would result in a saving of over $8,220 over the December, 1979, budget. Just imagine the impact of this on farmers and food producers; just imagine the impact of this comparison on a small family-owned trucking firm in my own constituency which uses over 100,000 gallons of diesel fuel per year.

Even more significant is the difference in natural gas prices as they will impact upon the fertilizer industry. Natural gas is one of the main ingredients in the formulation of some nitrogen fertilizers. In this context, when we compare these two budgets, natural gas prices in the Crosbie budget would have been about 71 per cent higher in 1984 than those under the government budget we are discussing tonight. Such a drastic increase would be reflected in food prices, and this item alone would have meant a devastating increase in food production costs. I submit that the impact of our budget, as it relates to farm input costs across this nation, is far more realistic than those cruel, harsh measures presented in the House last December.

The reduction of excise tax from $3 per gallon to $1.25 per gallon on fortified wines is welcome news to the grape industry of Canada and will allow the wine industry to continue to upgrade their vineyards and products which in recent years have been recognized as among the best in the world.

This budget not only provides for Canadians to invest in their own future, but also allows a tax reduction of $248 for a family of four earning $15,000 per year, or a reduction of nearly 20 per cent. This tax saving is a result of the continuation of indexing for 1981. We can be proud that Canada is one of the few countries in the world which provides such automatic indexing adjustments.

While they may place a small additional burden on workers and employers, the changes to the unemployment insurance fund contributions are necessary if the present trend continues of increasing numbers of men and women entering the labour force. While the increase in these contributions may seem to be large, the combined contributions amount to 4.32 per cent of the insurable earnings. We must remember that only those who are working and their employers make the contributions, and ultimately it is only those workers who are laid off, either seasonally or otherwise, who are the benefactors.

As well there are provisions for exemptions related to metric conversion in the retail sector. Under these provisions kits and parts to convert retail scales to metric are exempt from federal sales tax and duty. Sales tax on purchases of new metric scales is reduced by one-half, and a 100 per cent immediate write-off for income tax purposes is provided for metric scales used in small businesses. Also, small businesses will benefit from the extension of the small business development bond issue to March 31, 1981. Technical amendments are proposed to better define the scope of the small business deduction, that special low rate applicable to the Canadian active business income of small corporations.

As I have indicated thus far, this budget is bold and responsible, securing our energy supplies and ensuring that those non-renewable resources will be controlled by Canadians. Also it recognizes the needs of the taxpayer, the home owner, the need for conservation, the need for renewable sources of energy, the needs of small business and the need for ensuring adequate unemployment benefits.

One other aspect I want to emphasize is the recognition of the needs of the handicapped and their requirement for special equipment. On last Sunday afternoon I was approached by a mother in my constituency who was asking about the possibility of removing the duty on television captioning devices for the deaf. Her son was deaf and the captioning device was not manufactured in Canada. Naturally I was very pleased to phone her last night and advise her the customs tariff on such items had been removed in this budget and that her son would be able to enjoy another of the pleasures which so many of us take for granted.

This budget is a responsive one. It is responsive to the voice of the people. The government was listening to the provinces when they said they could not accept an export tax on natural gas. We were listening when the people of this nation said they wanted a continuation of indexing. We were proven right when a poll indicated that 82 per cent of our people wanted Petro-Canada to continue as a vital and integral part of our energy system. This budget is a wide-ranging one. The implication of the industrial strategy, the provisions for railroads to upgrade their tracking systems and the provisions for extended pipelines will have spin-off effects on our economy. All these measures will provide us with a solid economic base and give us the confidence to proceed into the decade of the eighties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the figures of the hon. member were most informative. Would he entertain a brief question at this time?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: I was very interested in the hon. member's figures concerning the price of gas, what they would have been under the December budget and what they will be under the new budget. Has he allowed for the increase in gas prices in his figures? In less than a year they have increased by 40 cents per gallon. We were told in the February election that under the Liberals the price of gas would be increasing only by a very small amount, but in certain parts of Canada it has increased 40 cents a gallon. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stated in the question period this afternoon that they would not be putting on an 18-cent a gallon tax. Is the 40-cent increase in less than one year included in the figures the hon. member related to the House this evening?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, they are 1981 projected figures. Perhaps I should point out that I was very much involved in this issue during the campaign. As a matter of fact, I should give credit to my opponent in the campaign who was a previous member of the House. He realized the harshness of the excise tax being proposed. He realized the impact it would have on the rural economy across Canada. Because of those facts, in the last week of the campaign he stated publicly that he could not support the 18-cent excise tax.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson) on how well he read his speech, but I have never heard a speech read so well which contained so many inaccuracies, distortions and downright mistruths. The pathetic thing—and I say this sincerely—is that he does not recognize the impact; he believes what he read. I do not recall a time during my eight years in Parliament—and as a matter of fact it is eight years today—when I was more distressed, alarmed or concerned about the future of my country.

Since the Liberal party was re-elected last February the country has been subjected to more abuse, wrong-headed, stubborn, insane and immoral government actions than at any time in this country's history. The culmination was reached in this budget.

I want to say this as dispassionately as I can because it is not political rhetoric but rather a genuine fear on my part for the continuing integrity of our country and for our democracy as the result of the events in these few months. We have seen from this government in the last few months the most cynical, manipulative and dishonest approach to governing of which I am aware in any democratic country. Witness their advertising campaigns designed for mind management of the type I read about as a school kid in George Orwell's "1984", the cynical, Machiavellian manoeuvres of the type described in the Kirby document to pit one province against the other, one region against the other, and to accomplish goals for which no mandate was sought or received from the people of Canada, and all this in the name of national unity.

The pathetic thing about this, Mr. Speaker, is that there are sincere Canadians over there, I believe—people who genuinely do not understand what they are doing to this country. That is what is so sad. It is sad that such intelligent, dedicated people—they ran for office, so obviously they have an interest in this country, they are obviously Canadians and believe in our motto "from sea to sea"—would sit in such a sheep-like fashion and accept the drivel which comes forward under the guise of truth, and not question it one bit. For the sake of this country I beg of you, every one of you who is twinned with a western riding, to spend this weekend on the telephone and talk to the defeated Liberal candidate out there, talk to an NDP member out there, talk to anybody you can get on the telephone and try to understand what you are doing to Canada. I beg of you to learn a little bit. Go to your next caucus and when the government House leader says, "Here is our strategy for closure", or when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) says, "Here is how we are going to sock it to the west," or when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) says, "We are going to get those multinationals," understand a little about what they are really saying in terms of this country.

I was one of these who was cut off in the constitutional debate and I do not intend to bootleg a constitutional speech into this budget debate, but I wonder how the NDP feels. Their ranks in the House are empty tonight.

An hon. Member: Not quite.

Mr. Andre: I wonder how the Leader of the NDP feels tonight.

An hon. Member: We have a higher percentage of members in the House than do the Conservatives.

Mr. Andre: I wonder how they feel after that press conference where their leader said, "I have negotiated with the Prime Minister and I have secured resources for the west. I have secured a guarantee under this constitution." How do they feel now after seeing this budget and seeing what it does to Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia? I wonder when the NDP will seize control from that Ontario troika, Eddie, Bobbie and Ian, and represent the constituents who elected them here.

It is really sad to see that party deteriorate in such a way. It was a party which stood for its principles, a party with a conscience. They had a philosophy which I could not accept, but when they articulated their views, one could believe that they were set on the basis of principles and of their fundamental beliefs. It was a party which felt for the common man. That mantle does not fit them any longer. Bobbie and Eddie have taken over, they are playing these games. I suggest that members of the NDP who would like to see the party return to the days when it had principles should seize control or else have the decency to merge formally with the Liberal party instead of being the "little red rump", as the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), described them last night.

The NDP, through their chicanery and political opportunism, have not only damaged themselves but have damaged the country severely. The budget they defeated last year would have provided for Canada lower energy costs than the budget we are seeing now. It was based on an agreement with the provinces—there was no constitutional conflict—which contained the same crude oil increases as in the budget last night. There was no conflict. It was a tough agreement which took a lot of commitment and energy. There were meetings between prime minister Clark and Premier Lougheed in Ottawa, Edmonton, Saskatoon and Montreal, but we were determined to show that confederation can work. They reached an oil agreement which was the same, in terms of the impact to the consumer, as the one reached by this government, but better when combined with the budget and its tax credits in terms of lower income families. That budget provided a lower deficit than the current budget. It would have resulted in lower unemployment and lower inflation than the current budget. It was described in the Canadian tax journal as the most progressive budget in the last ten years. The NDP have helped to bring about the defeat of that budget, and now they have this budget. I hope the three stooges, Eddie, Bobbie and Ian, are happy because they sure are not funny.

It is pathetic to see what happens to people of integrity when they are associated more and more with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I remember the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) when he was a man of integrity. I remember, when I was first elected, Herb Gray was dull, bland and grey, but he was honest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Members should refer to other members by their constituency, not by name.

Mr. Andre: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. What happened was that the hon. member for Windsor West was booted out of the cabinet for being honest, principled and hard working because those are not qualities which are much admired by the Prime Minister. He sat in purgatory for a few years, saw who was occupying the front benches of his party, and learned from it. Instead of a man whom the country respected—previously he held respect—he is now sneered at. He said he would quit if the interest rates went up higher than they were under the Conservatives. They are higher now, so why does he not quit? He said he had an industrial development policy. Has he? He has no such thing.

An even more pathetic figure than the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is the minister from Alberta, the senator who is here to represent Liberal interests in Alberta in the federal cabinet. He is part of the "Bobbsey Twins" responsible for economic development, the economic minister, this great representative of the west. His twin is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Where was the minister from Alberta when the constitution was being discussed? He was at the Liberal club at the university of Alberta saying he did not think section 42 in the proposed Canadian constitution was appropriate. One wonders where he was when the matter was discussed in cabinet, or whether he is allowed to attend cabinet meetings where important matters such as the constitution are discussed. We wonder where he was when the energy policy was discussed which will bring devastation to the area of the country which he purports to represent in cabinet. Where was he in terms of his responsibility as economic development minister, and where was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

An hon. Member: Out to lunch.

Mr. Andre: This budget will take, out of the funds available for exploration and development in Canada next year, $3 billion to help make this nation self-sufficient. It would be good for the people over there to learn that Canadian companies do the bulk of the exploration in Canada. Seventy per cent of the exploration and development is done by Canadian companies. Recognize who you are hurting. It is the Canadian companies you are hurting, not the multinationals. Next year we are planning to spend $8 billion. Because of the kinds of things the minister of energy was saying earlier on, $1 billion or $2 billion has already been chopped from that budget and is headed for the U.S., to Colorado, Oklahoma, Texas and Louisiana, and they are taking another $3 billion right here. So at best you have $1 billion left for exploring for the oil and gas which we are all going to need. That will be a sixth of what was planned in terms of exploration in this country.

A study conducted some years ago by a McGill economics professor showed that for every dollar spent on exploration in western Canada the spin-out from that, if you will, the multiplier effect, was at least three to one. A third of that money is spent in eastern Canada for pipes, valves, motors and all those things which cost money when you are exploring for oil and gas. So this little budget has taken out of central Canada, Ontario, at least $2 billion in economic activity. How many jobs is that? What do the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of State for Economic Development (Mr. Olson) in the other place, propose to use to replace that? How are you going to replace those jobs? Unemployment is already horrendous and with this little act you have already added to it very substantially. And I am talking about the indirect benefit.

You know, there is a common myth in this place that the multinationals are all from the west, so you can get them. I have news for you! The multinationals are headquartered in Toronto—Imperial, Shell, Gulf, Sun and Texaco—and they are the ones who are going to be out of work because they will not need geologists, accountants, secretaries and all those people who work in their offices. They are not big bogeymen from New York or Texas, they are just honest, working citizens. They will not be needed. They will not be needed after this little budget. They will be out in the street. At least those members who cannot be brought to express any concern for the western part of this nation can express some concern from a self-interest point of view. You are going to be hurt as well. You will be hurt by future shortages of oil and gas and more immediately by increased unemployment. As a result of what this energy package has done to the oil and gas industry, record growths in every other sector of our economy will be needed just in order to stay even. The minister projected unemployment at 8.7 per cent next year based on what his friend, the minister of energy, the man who actually wrote the document, sets out in his policy. Well, I do not think the minister of energy knows what he has done. He does not know what kind of unemployment he has caused by his action. It is pathetic, but he does not know what he has done.

The estimate of the Minister of Finance of 8.7 per cent for unemployment will be much less than the reality unless some corrections are made, and are made quickly.

The Minister of State for Economic Development tells the Liberals in Alberta that he is opposed to section 42. But apparently he was not at the cabinet meeting when it was discussed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who is that?

Mr. Andre: The man from the other place, the senator. He is out around the country giving speeches about the great things they are going to do for economic development. He must not have been allowed in the cabinet room when they were discussing the energy package, or the budget either. The minister of state could not possibly have had the gall to give the speech which he gave on October 20 about the great things the government is planning if he had an inkling of what was in this budget. He talks about the need for these eight new pushers in economic development who are to get the country going.

The second item on his list is capital investment. He speaks about the need to attract this money, telling us it will be vital to create a favourable investment climate, first by reducing the inflation rate and, second, by making sure investment is used as productively as possible. How could anybody who knew about this budget make a statement like that in public? It is pathetic.

His third point was energy and he talked about their main concern being security of supply everywhere in Canada. Yet they have killed exploration and development. He talked about energy conservation and substitution for oil. We will need substitution all right because there will not be any oil. He mentioned the use of energy resources to maximize employment. There is the dilly! That little statement the other night is going to maximize unemployment!

Then he went on to talk about the importance of technology. Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister was first elected, Canada spent 1.5 per cent of its gross national product on research and development. And that was deemed very low. A special Senate study concluded we had the worst record of any of the OECD nations. It was pathetic and something had to be done. Today our expenditure on research and development, expressed as a percentage of GNP, amounts to .8 per cent. Ten years ago 1.5 per cent was deemed to be atrocious and the Prime Minister agreed and created a ministry.

I do not know what the other ministers are doing, but the minister responsible for science and technology is off seeing the Queen. He is running around the country shepherding the other minister from Windsor, who cannot be trusted completely with external affairs. He bears the title but they do not let him out alone. If you do believe that science and technology is important, as you must, when are we going to stop the rhetoric and see some action? In his speech on October 20, the Minister of State for Economic Development said this was a top priority. Yet the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) said on September 22 that we do not have any money to spend on technology. He said that in Vancouver. And the budget talks about this new great era of high technology we are approaching. It can only be described as fraud on the part of this minister. If the senator from Alberta, who is now the Minister of State for Economic Development, had a modicum of decency and self-respect he would resign forthwith.

I said earlier to the Minister of Finance that he does not understand what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has done to him. He has made a dishonest forecaster out of him. The minister of energy has no idea what makes the energy industry run in this country. He cannot understand and at the same time say in this House, as he did yesterday in response to a question by my hon. friend from Calgary South about the number of rigs which would be leaving Canada and the drop-off in exploration:

> Madam Speaker, I have not had the latest report on the stock market, but by eleven o'clock this morning I was told Canadian stocks were holding very well and that some decrease had taken place in the value of the shares of multinationals, although those decreases appeared at that time to be rather small. I think it shows that the business community has indeed examined this budget and found that it was a fair and good budget.

I assume the minister believes what he said, believes that it was a good and fair budget and that it would be so viewed by the industry. Obviously, the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex believes it. But what did the stock market do? Yesterday, starting about an hour after the minister made his response, the market in oils took a drop and plunged 363 points. That was Wednesday. And today it dropped 420 points.

It lost 800 points in two days. To find a fall as disastrous as that we have to go back to October, 1929. What is it about Octobers, Mr. Speaker? In October, 1970, the government went berserk and brought out the army. In October, 1980, they went berserk and destroyed an industry. What happens? What happens in Octobers?

An hon. Member: The full moon.

An hon. Member: Hallowe'en madness.

An hon. Member: Get your Indian blankets.

Mr. Andre: As I pointed out at the beginning of my speech, and with sincerity because I believe it—unfortunately it worries me—I do not know if this country will survive, if the integrity of this country will remain, if our democracy will remain.

On the question of democracy, Mr. Speaker, I will give the reasons I have reached that conclusion. In the budget speech, the Minister of Finance said he had heeded the representations of the provinces and so there would be no export tax. A paragraph later he said there would be a tax on the sale of gas to the United States. The pathetic thing about this is that the guardians of the public's right to know put that across the nation. Millions of Canadians saw it on television. There would be no export tax. They believed it, of course.

When the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) spoke earlier, he said the reason the west does not understand the Liberal party is because they cannot get their message across. And the Liberal member who spoke ahead of me was spouting out these blatant, dishonest statements from the budget as if they are true. The public believes it, because they saw it on television. To their credit, some economic writers were not fooled and pointed out that in fact this was a blatant, dishonest deception. A lot of the political writers, however, said, "My, isn't the minister clever. Isn't he wily. He is so wily he is able to confuse the people."

How long can a democracy carry on when the public guardians, the fifth estate who write about politics, look at chicanery, mischief, deception, advertising, polling, mind manipulation, as examples of wiliness to be applauded and cheered? How long can a democracy last under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker? Not long. This budget was a most disgusting example of political—

An hon. Member: Don't be shy.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member opposite sits there grinning. If he behaves and applauds, he will get in the cabinet too. He knows that principle is not the way in which to advance one's political fortunes. Why should he be worried about Albertans? His attitude is, "For goodness sake, they are a bunch of crazies out there—Saskatchewanians and British Columbians too. They do not vote Liberal anyway, so they must be dumb. They do not vote Liberal so how can they be Canadians? Why should we care about them?"

The minister had a choice in his budget. He had to raise money but he could have raised it across the whole country and have made everybody mad at him. He said in the House, oh no. The sun was not going to set on that minister of finance. He is too wily for that. Applause, applause. "We are going to pick our enemies. We are going to get those westerners. They did not vote for us anyway. We can form a majority government without them, so why don't we?"

I will tell you why he should not have done it, Mr. Speaker. It is because the country may not survive, that is why.

An hon. Member: Come off it!

Mr. Andre: Phone somebody in the west. Do not just sit there listening to that nonsense. Phone people in the west and ask them, if you care about Canada. Can you imagine what would happen to a government that did this to Quebec? I ask you, what price would we pay for oil and gas if it were in Ontario and Quebec?

An hon. Member: You are using Lévesque's tactics.

Mr. de Corneille: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: There is the man with the collar. What a disgrace! I was talking to a backbench member of the Liberal party and in all sincerity he said he was worried. He had been talking to his "twin" and was worried about what his twin was telling him about the mood. He said he did not understand why they are so upset. He was honest; he does not understand. This body blow is not the first one. This has been happening virtually since—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: The hon. member from Quebec should read this little story about Louis Riel and what he was asking about resources and how Ottawa reacted to that. They stomped on him. Ottawa stomped on Riel.

An hon. Member: Soak your head!

Mr. Andre: You sheik! The hon. member for Sarnia did not understand why the west was so opposed when Petrosar went to Sarnia. He thought, "We can share all across the country". He thought that Albertans were being selfish to begrudge the Petrosar plant to Sarnia and I think he was sincere. The reason he could say that is because he did not know why Alberta was so upset. Well, it was because at the Western Economics Opportunities Conference in July, 1973, "We will try to build up your economy. Yes, we will try to secure more processing of raw materials close to the source." For Alberta, that meant the development of a petrochemical industry. But five months later the government announced, "Get back in line,—Petrosar is going to Sarnia." It was not that Albertans begrudged Sarnia the Petrosar plant, but the fact is Alberta just could not understand how the Prime Minister could make a solemn promise at a conference called by him to discuss western economic opportunities and break it five months later.

He did worse than that, Mr. Speaker. Two months later he promised the fullest discussion before acting unilaterally. I am sure the Minister of Finance will remember this because he was government House leader at the time. Part of that organic understanding with that group over there was when David Lewis said, "Do something about inflation or I will bring your government down." They put a price freeze on crude oil. At the time the price was to go up from $4 to $4.10. That was six weeks after they had promised, publicly, to the producing provinces that there would be the fullest discussion before any energy policy was announced. Right then and there, when David Lewis said, "Do something," they said "We will do it—we will stomp on the west." David Lewis got his just reward. He was tossed out for that chicanery. But central Canadians said "Good for you, Pierre" and gave him a majority.

Mr. Speaker, I see you rising. I did not talk about all the things I wanted to but I will make one more plea to those hon. members opposite who care about Canada: please question what you are so quickly approving because you do more damage than you know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on October 28 last. The member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has not even taken the trouble to read the budget and, in my opinion, if he could have been a little more specific, he would not have talked so much rubbish, just as his party could have brought down a more constructive document on December 13 last, since it was defeated as a result of its budget, if one is to believe the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

I cannot refrain from feeling sorry for the Progressive Conservatives, Mr. Speaker, who, after 17 years in the opposition, have been thrown back there, because the Canadian people rejected the budget they brought down last December. I said when I made my maiden speech in the House that the Conservatives had known some hard times for 17 years. If we compare the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) with the budget of the Minister of Finance, we realize that the budget of the Clark government was devoid of ideas.

As for the new taxes contained in the Crosbie budget, they hurt as much as the spines of desert cactuses. The Crosbie budget was so bad that I suspect the Canadian people will remember it for at least another 17 years.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): The Canadian people made no mistake in bringing back the Trudeau government to power. The Crosbie budget took from the poor to give to the rich. Let us talk about social laws, Mr. Speaker: the fact remains that it was this same Liberal government which, in this country, passed 90 per cent of all our social laws.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): People should be reminded here that, had the Progressive Conservative budget been passed, it would have cost every Canadian family $800 more a year because Mr. Crosbie increased the excise tax on oil by 18 cents a gallon. It would have cost us even more for food, clothing, housing, heating our homes and driving our cars. Heating and transportation alone would have cost every Canadian family an estimated $381 more a year, had the Crosbie budget been accepted.

The argument put forward by the Progressive Conservatives to justify that excise tax increase on gas was that it would encourage Canadians to save energy; but in that case, the government could have or should have exempted public transports, city buses and trains, if the people were to use their cars less. The Progressive Conservatives were forgetting that people have to travel to get to work.

Farmers have always been exempt from the excise tax because they are producers. The farmer who is driving his tractor out in the field is not out for a pleasure ride. That tax increase meant that the Progressive Conservative government was recommending to the farm producers that they go back to oxen or draught-horses. By refusing to bring the Clark government back to power, the people were suggesting it go and reflect until at least the year 2000. The MacEachen budget provides for increasing the price of gas by 13 cents a gallon in 1980, whereas it would have gone up by 32 cents a gallon had the Clark government budget been accepted.

On the evening of October 28, while the Minister of Finance was reading his budget, we could see that the opposition was ill at ease.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to find fault with a budget which provides for practically no increase in individual or corporate income taxes. Once again, hon. members of the Progressive Conservative Party, as birds of ill omen, had predicted that the Liberal government would do away with the indexation of income tax. I could see that the rank and file were desperate when the minister announced that the indexation program was maintained. Therefore, the indexation will reduce by as much as $1.6 billion the amount Canadian taxpayers will have to pay in income taxes next year. This represents anywhere between $200 and $300 for individual taxpayers.

Following the representations made by the hon. member for the Saguenay Lac-Saint-Jean area, fortified wines with an alcoholic content of over 14 per cent will be taxed on the same basis as table wines. The excise tax on fortified wines will be reduced from $3 to $1.25 par gallon. I am pleased with this decision, for it will benefit wine producers in our area, especially those who make wine out of blueberries, a regional product.

It is, in fact, a sharing budget. Hon. members will recall that the Crosbie budget granted a tax credit for mortgage interest. The measure benefited few Canadians. Renters, those who make no mortgage payments, people with too low income to take advantage of the program, paid more taxes to favour a small category of taxpayers. The Progressive Conservative government increased the excise tax on gas to pay the cost of the mortgage interest tax credit program. On the contrary, we see that the Liberal government announced a national energy program that does not penalize taxpayers. Thus, thanks to measures announced in the budget, increased oil prices in Canada will always be below world prices. They will never exceed 85 per cent of the foreign oil prices, or, if it is lower than the oil prices in the United States, the Canadian industry will remain competitive.

Mr. Speaker, the whole package of energy measures aims at Canadianizing our oil industry. It is a measure that is part of the Liberal philosophy. Thanks to this policy, we are counting on a 50 per cent Canadian participation at least in gas and oil production by 1990.

Our proudest asset, Petro-Canada, will be instructed to take over the shares of one or several oil multinationals. Mr. Speaker, this is a real government in action, a government that looks after the interests of the taxpayers thanks to a Canadian policy under which all citizens from coast to coast will enjoy the benefits derived from our natural riches and through a fair distribution, through this sharing formula, $40 billion more will be retrieved to be distributed to all Canadian taxpayers instead of being exported by multinationals to foreign countries. This is what I call a responsible government, a government that is not afraid to legislate according to the needs of taxpayers from all regions of the country.

Another aspect of the energy policy is the announced extension of the gas pipeline to Quebec and the maritimes and the guarantee that the gas will be delivered to Quebec and Halifax as well as to Montreal and Toronto. To help conserve energy, the federal government is going to give grants to assist homeowners in converting from oil to gas, electricity or other forms of energy which we have in abundance in Canada.

Since we are on the topic of energy, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a number of facts which are worthy of consideration. In a letter addressed to all members of the House, the president of Dome Petroleum reminds us that industrialized nations want to buy their energy supplies from politically stable countries. There is oil in the Arab states but during the Israel-Egypt conflict, it stopped flowing and prices climbed. There is oil in Iran and Iraq, but because of the war between those two countries, the oil tap was shut off. Therefore, the oil and gas under Canadian soil increases in value by the sheer fact that Canada is a peaceful country. The industrialized countries of Europe are following very closely our discussions on energy. All Canadians are going to benefit from the developments which the Minister of Finance announced in his budget. According to the predictions made by the president of Dome Petroleum, our recoverable oil reserves in the tar sands and in heavy oil could keep us going for 300 years.

Our crude oil supplies total about 100 billion barrels and could meet the needs of Canada for 125 years. In view of such plentiful supplies and the strong demand from foreign countries, I wonder by what right and how long Mr. Lougheed can refuse to develop the energy potential of his province. Fortunately, there is a Parliament for all Canadians, because it is not normal for a premier to condemn thousands of Canadians to unemployment through his stubbornness. If we developed our energy potential, we would create immediately 150,000 jobs, according to the president of Dome Petroleum. This is the objective of this government, to stimulate employment while developing new energy sources, Mr. Speaker.

An article in the publication Commerce of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce states that for each job created in the primary extraction of oil and natural gas, 100 more jobs are created in the manufacturing and finished product sales sectors. Are we not right to develop policies which promote further development in the energy sector?

I believe that it is wise to conserve oil because $24 of crude oil corresponds to $35 of gasoline and $3,500 of plastic goods. I believe that our industrialists should get into plastics, Mr. Speaker. What concerns me is that not enough of our young people are aware of the potential in that field. Indeed, according to a press release of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), Canada is an important producer of petroleum products, which are the main raw material of the plastics industry. Canadians do not take enough advantage of this competitive edge, otherwise, how can we explain the fact that Canada is the largest importer of plastics in the world and still has a trade deficit of $700 million in this sector? I am happy that the Minister of Supply and Services has undertaken to rectify this situation.

On the other hand, according to the article in Commerce, there is a plastics technology institute in Edmonton. There might be others elsewhere, but if not, more should be created. The graduates of the Plastic Technology Institute of Edmonton are being offered six jobs each. So, every graduate turns down six jobs and the starting salary is $1,300 to $1,400 a month. What saddens me, Mr. Speaker, is that the Plastic Technology Institute of Edmonton can accept only 25 students every semester. Yet, how many students registered to that course for the 1980 summer session? Six, Mr. Speaker, and then you hear people complain that we admit too many immigrants.

If Canadians refuse to make an effort, if our educational system is not interested in the employment opportunities available to the students when they graduate from CEGEPs and universities, I think some individual and collective soul-searching is in order. When provincial governments are more interested in the constitution than in creating jobs for the unemployed, we say that we are fortunate to have a national government and a prime minister with both feet firmly planted on the ground and who look after the real interests of the people. And I am glad that the Minister of Finance has announced that the government intends to promote exports. Mr. Speaker, the export potential of my area is well known. We have aluminum and newsprint plants whose production is exported to other countries. However, Canada does not develop its full export potential.

In fact, according to the committee which reviewed the services to promote exports and which published a report called the Hatch report, we find that only 178 companies across Canada, are responsible for two-thirds of all Canadian exports. Canadian companies must necessarily take an interest in exports. I shall give another example, Mr. Speaker. Canada produces extraordinary farm products, renowned throughout the world. Let us take beef for instance; pork, which now enjoys a high rating, has the reputation of being the best in the world. The same goes for our grain. However, the Americans, our competitors, are travelling throughout the world visiting dynamic missions selling millions of metric tons of grain while Canadian businessmen are waiting for buyers who do not come to call. I would like to see the Export Development Corporation be a lot more dynamic and on their toes which, I think would greatly contribute to improve our balance of payments.

Furthermore, according to the Hatch report, Canada lost a share of the market for finished products in the competition for world markets. Comparison between 1967 and 1977 reveals that Canada's share of the finished products market went from 5.9 per cent down to 4.6 per cent in 1977. However, in that year it was estimated that the total export markets for finished products amounted to $650 billion. Therefore, a decrease of one percentage point in our share of the market means that we exported about $6.5 billion less than we should have.

In other words, if Canada had just kept its share of the 1970 market, which was 6 per cent, and not let it go down to 4.6 per cent, and if our imports had remained at their present level, the $7 billion deficit anticipated in our current account for the year 1979 would have been translated into a hefty surplus. On the matter of exports still, I think that we could make a better use of the aid we provide to developing countries. I do not share the view expressed by the vice-president of the CNTU, Mr. Christian Auger, who feels that Canada should increase its aid to the Third World but in a more unselfish way than we are doing at the moment.

To that statement I would like to add the following comment quoted from the Hatch report (Page 40, par. 1): "Business contends that the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) bas been far too philanthropic, as far as aid is concerned, especially since 1970.

Further on, the committee discovered the irony of Canada, one of the main benefactors to the multilateral agencies, having one of the worst records when it comes to getting contracts through those agencies. The report emphasizes that the Germans and the Japanese and others are better than we are at devising the right procedure to obtain contracts. They get far more from the contracts than they give away.

Mr. Speaker, I reject the view of the CNTU. Why should underdeveloped countries be allowed to use our Canadian dollars to purchase German or Japanese products, thereby creating jobs for their workers? I believe that the aid which is provided to the developing nations should be tied to a buy-Canadian policy, which would help the production of Canadian goods manufactured by Canadians.

Another sector which is particularly neglected is tourism. Canada should be going through an unprecedented tourist boom if only because of the lower value of our dollar. But such is not the case, and the result is that our deficit in current accounts stands at over $1 billion. We see lots of ads depicting the merits of European ski resorts. Why do we fail to exploit the potential of the Rockies? The French spend their winter vacations in their ski resorts. They enjoy winter. Why should we run away from our Canadian winters? I hope a ministry of state for tourism will be created to remedy that problem.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would say that in my opinion the Minister of Finance introduced a realistic budget on October 28. I believe it will enable us to reach the three objectives we have set for ourselves: first, security of supply and ultimate independence from the world oil market; second, opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the energy industry, particularly oil and gas, and to share in the benefits of its expansion; finally, fairness, with a pricing and revenue-sharing regime which recognizes the needs and rights of all Canadians.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope that all Canadians from coast to coast will stop nurturing sterile divisions so that all our energies may be used to develop and reinforce our economy. Living as I do in the most beautiful, the richest and the freest country in the world, I urge all people and all politicians as well to seek more harmony in our discussions for the benefit of our descendants.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne) who has just spoken. He spent a great deal of time in his speech talking about Dome Petroleum. I hope he realizes that today the stock of Dome Petroleum fell $8.50 a share as a result of this budget which he praises.

Mr. Darling: It fell $7 yesterday.

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, and trading was halted at mid-day. The trading on every single oil and gas stock in this country fell right out of bed. Is that the way to establish oil self-sufficiency? The hon. member for Chicoutimi said we should also do something for the plastics industry, the aluminum industry and the pulp and paper industry. He said that we are losing our market. What government has been in office for the last 12 years, except for a short period last year? What government? And where in this budget is there anything to satisfy the concerns of his constituents?

The hon. member also said we should not give as much help to the Third World. He said we should use our aid for ourselves because there is a lot to be done in this country. Has the hon. member read the budget at all? There is a promise by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in that budget to significantly increase foreign aid. Should I read the budget to the hon. member now? Does he not even understand the contents of the budget?

The hon. member ended his speech by saying we have a great land, a land with opportunities unparalleled in the world. He is right, but those opportunities are being destroyed. They were hampered and hurt by this budget. This budget must be described as follows: first, it is the most squirmy, deceitful and dishonest budget presented to a country for a long period of time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Don't be so mild.

Mr. Blenkarn: Second, it is the most regressive budget presented at any time in our history and, third, it is perhaps the most incompetent budget.

In the few minutes I have tonight, I would like to analyse those remarks. Dealing with the allegation that it is the most squirmy, deceitful and dishonest budget presented, I will call on Mr. Parizeau, whose comments were reported in The Globe and Mail this morning as my first witness.

Mr. Parizeau, who holds a doctorate from the London School of Economics, said it took a morning's work with a computer to figure out the two budgets' similarities since this one is 25 times more complicated and enveloped in an extraordinary cloud—

He went on to say that it will raise —consumer gasoline prices two cents a litre less and heating oil 1.2 cents a litre more——than under the Crosbie budget. So much for the householder. We can decide not to drive our cars, but this is a cold country and we cannot decide not to heat our homes.

Let us take a look at the budget itself with respect to incentives. When I said it was squirmy and deceitful, one merely needs to look at the kind of incentives it offers to the oil industry—"A petroleum incentives program will be established to provide grants up to 80 per cent of exploration expenditures in the north, offshore up to 35 per cent and in other areas grants of up to 25 per cent will also be provided for development expenditures." Grants, grants, grants, grants and loans. A FIRA study will be held.

The government wants to find out to which party the people who run the oil companies belong. If they are the right type of people it will give them a grant with public money. It is the greatest patronage government this country has ever seen. It is squirmy and deceitful, and this is the kind of thing it is talking about in terms of money for development. It is a squirmy, deceitful budget because it is a budget for Liberal carpetbaggers. It is a budget for the bureaucrats to hand out money to their favourite friends.

We know how these grants operate in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. One puts in a brief and if it is the right brief, then maybe a grant will be given out, not to everybody but to some, and more to some and less to others. It depends on who you know, who writes your bief, who is your lobbyist and who is behind your case. The government says "you will drill where we want you to drill". I can imagine a drilling operation run by a bureaucrat in an ivory tower here in Ottawa with a Liberal carpetbagger as a friend handing out grants. That is how the government will work the grant system. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) smiles because he knows how it works.

Mr. Whelan: You bet I do, but it doesn't work that way.

Mr. Blenkarn: Let us talk about indexing. The Minister of Finance says we will not have indexing, that the government will not abolish the indexing of income tax. But then, of course, down further he says that maybe we will have some indexing anyway. Why can we not get a clean statement? The reason is that this is a squirmy, deceitful, dishonest budget.

On the topic of inflation, the minister forecasts a rate of 10.2 per cent. But then we look at the energy package and find that the cost of energy will go up 21.9 per cent. We find that the cost of food will go up 12 per cent. I looked everywhere to see what was likely to go down. What is going to go down so that the figures will balance at 10 per cent? I could not find anything.

Mr. Darling: The stock market will.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says "the stock market." It surely went down. I could not find anything. I find that wages are likely to go up 10.5 per cent. I wonder what is coming down to bring the averages into line.

At the finance committee this afternoon the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) asked the governor of the Bank of Canada what was going to come down. He did not know. How do we arrive at this 10.2 per cent inflation rate? We get it because the Minister of Finance wants us to get 10.2 per cent, but there is not a single fact in this squirmy, deceitful and dishonest budget which indicates that inflation will be anything less than 12 per cent, 14 per cent or 15 per cent. There is not a single fact which indicates anything less. The Canadian people cannot believe this budget. It is squirmy, deceitful and dishonest.

Mr. Kaplan: What is your next point?

Mr. Blenkarn: I mentioned that the governor of the Bank of Canada came before the finance committee this afternoon. The governor presented a paper at that committee meeting. I want to read a portion of page 7 of that paper, which discusses inflation. He says this:

> That is why it is so important that public policy, including monetary policy, be firmly committed, and be seen to be firmly committed, to reducing the rate of inflation.

The governor was asked what he meant by public policy. Did public policy, in the main, mean the fiscal stance of the government? He said yes. He was asked whether the fiscal stance of the government did anything to help his battle to reduce inflation. He could not comment further. However, the governor did comment by saying that today the Government of Canada had to buy up almost all the 90-day treasury bills which were offered, and even at that we wound up with a Bank of Canada rate of 12.16 per cent based on the 90-day rate. Not as many 180-day bills were bought, so the 180-day rate was 12.4 per cent.

The bond market went up as of yesterday. It did not go up as of today, but as of yesterday, by at least .5 per cent across the board. So the Government of Canada is now borrowing at in excess of 13 per cent with its bills and bonds. We do not have to be surprised that this slimy, squirmy, deceitful and dishonest budget will result in interest factors to the ordinary people of this country at 14 per cent or maybe 14.5 per cent prime before a week and a half is over with mortgage rates at 15 per cent or 16 per cent before that time. That is the kind of thing this budget gives us.

We asked the governor today how much money the Government of Canada can afford to borrow. He said he supposed it could borrow any amount it wanted provided it was prepared to pay a high enough rate. We asked what could be borrowed at reasonable rates while still leaving some money for the private market. He said that if the rate is raised high enough all investors would be driven out of the market. Later tonight I want to talk about what the government has done to the private market in this squirmy, deceitful and dishonest budget.

More important, though, I think this budget is probably the most regressive budget we have seen for a long time. I refer hon. members to page 27 of the budget where there is a table of alleged taxes which are being imposed on people. That table is reasonably accurate except that it leaves some things out. The total on that table shows $2.965 billion, but then we look around. Where did the oil compensation fund go as a form of taxes? That fund is $3.47 billion. When we look around further we wonder what happened to the payroll tax increase in the unemployment insurance fund, and we find that that tax increase of $1.1 billion is not included. When we look around to find where the new postal rates are to come from, it becomes clear that a sum estimated at half a billion dollars is not included. After we add it all up, we find that this budget increases taxes on Canadians by over $8 billion.

Mr. Kaplan: Including multinationals.

Mr. Blenkarn: I want to tell my friend that this tax budget is almost entirely on the backs of ordinary working Canadians, and that, of course, is exactly the problem.

Let us deal with the unemployment insurance fund for a moment. This is clearly a payroll tax. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) mentioned as much in his speech the other day. It is a payroll tax. It does not matter whether it is charged to an employer or an employee; it comes out of the gross compensation paid to people for work, and that payroll tax has been raised by 33⅓ per cent, to $4.32 for every $100 remuneration paid up to $290 per week.

Working people of this country earning $15,000 or so a year will pay to this government, in addition to all the other taxes they pay, an amount of money which would give them two full weeks' holidays, and then some, every year. That is an additional tax, and that is the kind of regressive taxation the Minister of Finance has imposed. If we were to ask the working person whether he would rather have unemployment insurance or two weeks' extra holidays with pay, I wonder what he would say in a referendum. I wonder if that type of thing could be put into the referendum of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The Prime Minister will put capital punishment and other things into a referendum—not just constitutional changes, presumably—and I wonder what the people would say. I suggest the people of Canada have had enough of the unemployment insurance schemes run by this government as another form of taxation. They would boot the Prime Minister out.

The next regressive form of taxation has to do with the Post Office. We asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) what the increase in the stamp cost would be. He refused to say. Undoubtedly he has the figures, but he refused to say. It has been suggested by the hon. member for St. John's West that it will be 35 cents. The minister had plenty of opportunity to say he would not double postal rates, but he said nothing. Clearly he accepts the view of the hon. member for St. John's West, the former minister of finance, and that is probably what he will do. But does the Minister of Finance in this budget come clean with the people of Canada? Not at all. Does the Postmaster General come clean with the people of Canada? Not at all. The truth of the matter is that the Post Office change contemplated in this budget is a further tax burden of half a billion dollars to the people of Canada.

We talk about regressive taxation. The ordinary person pays the same for a gallon of gasoline as the millionaire. The ordinary person, the pensioner, the Indian on the reserve, pays the same for the oil that is put in his space heater or for gas to the gas company as the person who drives around in a BMW or a Rolls Royce. Yet this budget makes no difference in how these people are treated. When asked about that matter, the Minister of Finance said yes, but they gave the people $35 more in the guaranteed income supplement. Well, he gave to some people who have to qualify for the GIS $35 more, but, as was pointed out by my other colleague from St. John's, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), most of that $35, if it were applied to heating, would be used up just on heating. But what about the people who do not qualify for GIS, people who are too young to qualify or the working poor of this country? What about the income earners trying to support a family on $21,500 a year who, under the budget of last year, would have received a grant, a tax credit, toward their energy costs? Does the minister do anything for them? Not on your life because this budget is a grab it, take it, grasp it, squeeze it budget out of the poor people, the ordinary people. This is a consumption tax, it is not a tax which taxes people on their ability to pay. It taxes people regardless. It is the most regressive form of taxation you can get.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) said it goes after the oil companies. I will be damned if it does, sir, because the oil companies and the large corporations in this country have long since figured out how to pass a tax on in the price of the product. Do not think they will get stuck with the tax, they will pass it on. If the revenue tax suggested in the budget happens to be constitutional, they will pass it on, you can be sure. It will be passed on to consumers, so this is a tax on the ordinary people of the country, it is not a tax that is in any way progressive or in any way aimed at collecting from those who are able to pay.

Let us go on to what is happening in terms of expenditure. On page 29 of the budget the government states that its budgetary expenditures this coming year will amount to $66.6 billion. But the budget is dishonest in that representation because it fails to take into account as a principal item the oil compensation fund, that $2.50 a barrel—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 6 of Standing Order 60—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it would be appropriate if the debate were allowed to continue until ten o'clock because an arrangement has been made among the parties that the ordinary question would not be put tonight but would be put at 9.45 p.m. next Tuesday. So I think it would be appropriate if the debate were allowed to continue.

Mr. Knowles: I think, Mr. Speaker, you will find it was agreed a few days ago—in view of the fact that there is no vote to be taken tonight but that the vote will be taken on Tuesday—that the debate should continue until ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. Turner: It was agreed that there will be two votes on Tuesday and, if necessary, the following Thursday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the expenditures are shown as being $66.6 billion, but the expenditure item fails to take into account the receipt in the oil compensation fund which will be a net $3.470 billion next year. In reality, that, together with the Post Office and other matters, should be added to the true government expense. The true government expense next year will be $73.65 billion, not $66.6 billion, and that, sir, represents a rise in government expense, calculated on the same basis, of $10.15 billion in one year. In other words, this government is going to tax more and spend more than any other government in the history of the country, and its rise in expenditures this year alone is in excess of expenditures of this government when the present Prime Minister took over in 1968.

The tax impact on Canadians is simply horrendous. It is a situation where we increase the take from Canadians by $8 billion; we turn that take over to the civil service, the bureaucracy, the mandarins of this government, and we let them do what they will with it. I say to you, sir, they will not use it to reduce the deficit. They have no intention of doing that. What they will do is to spend it. So even having taken $8 billion in additional revenue, this government has decided that it will continue to run an unbelievable deficit which, right through to the foreseeable future in this budget, is in excess of $11.5 billion a year.

The Minister of Finance said in his address that he will try to reduce the budget deficit over time. The fact of the matter is that right through to the end of the projections, the budgetary deficit of the government is forecast to be nearly $12 billion.

Consider the situation had this government not been in office. The budgetary deficit next year would have been $9.7 billion, reduced to $9.2 billion, reduced to $9 billion. In other words, the effect of the activity of this government is to increase the deficit astronomically and, what is even more important, increase the amount of money which must be borrowed, printed or in some other way obtained from the people of Canada. This year alone we will pay $10.4 billion in interest. Assuming interest rates stay the same, we would pay $12.3 billion next year. But they will not stay the same, they will go up. So it will be more than that. Assuming they will stay the same, even though they will not, it will be $14.375 billion in 1982-83 and $16.2 billion the following year. But the interest rates will not stay the same, so we will pay more than that. The interest alone is forecast to continue at 4 per cent of the gross national product. Approximately one-fifth of what the government takes goes to interest. The government's share of the GNP remains, throughout the entire forecasted period, in excess of 20 per cent for the GNP.

This is a government which says that inflation is a problem. This is a government which has an adviser, the governor of the Bank of Canada, who says there must be sound fiscal policies. This is a government which does not give a darn about fiscal policies or fiscal responsibility. This is a government organized to grab more and more of the resources of the country to feed its mandarins, to feed its appetite. This is a government which does not really care about cutting back programs which have spent themselves out and are no longer required. It carries on; there is no thought of sunset in the mind of this government. It takes more and more and more. It takes more of the economy, more of the wages and incomes of Canadians, and passes them through the ivory tower.

Before the end of 1983 the net debt of the country will be in excess of $100 billion. By that time the percentage of debt will be very close to 30 per cent of the gross national product. We are getting ourselves into a debt which our children, our grandchildren and our great grandchildren will never be able to pay. Indeed, as one person commenting to me said, "They will not have to pay it because the economy will not work. It will not be there; we will have a new money system and it will be all over."

This is the most incompetent budget ever presented. I call as my first witness the governor of the Bank of Canada. Today we asked the governor about the problem concerning borrowing money. The governor has done a fine job this year. As the fiscal agent of the Government of Canada, he has managed to borrow, about $13 billion, netting out about $11 billion, in the last 12-month period. But even this week he had to finance, print or whatever, $683 million extra just to finance the government along. How he can continue to borrow and finance the government without undue "monetism", I do not know. He has managed to do it, but he cannot do it much longer. He will not be able to do it much longer unless he has some help from the Minister of Finance and this budget gives him no help.

I call as my second witness Frank Miller, the treasurer of the province of Ontario. Today in the provincial legislature he called this budget "no answer to inflation, no assistance to manufacturing industries, no assistance to tourism, no assistance for anything responsible at all", and immediately indicated he would require a new provincial budget within two weeks.

I call as my last witness the people of Canada who responding in the stock-market today drove stock prices in Canada down $3 billion. They drove the indices down so far that we had one of the worst days on the market in history. Compare that to the "Crosbie" budget of a year ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand here tonight and make some comments in reference to the budget presented by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Regardless of what has been said by hon. members opposite, I believe this budget recognizes and indeed attempts very positively to deal with the economic and social realities facing Canada in the 1980s.

If this budget had been presented by my hon. colleague's predecessor with the same feeling of compassion for the little person and concern for disadvantaged areas of the country, the seating arrangement in the House today might have been different, but that is not the case. Very simply the budget before us is one which demonstrates the government's feeling of compassion and concern for the everyday Canadian. It is a budget which will improve the economic well-being of areas of the country which have been at a considerable disadvantage for far too long.

The predictions of doom and gloom of members opposite are obviously ill-founded. As evidenced either by their own budget of December, 1979, or the "boojit", as the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) used to say, perhaps they were preconditioned to expect the worst. It is quite amazing that the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) should have claimed a distortion of the facts. I cannot find any distortion of the facts in this budget, but I submit members opposite have certainly distorted their famous budget of December, 1979.

I cannot understand how members opposite can rise in this debate and condemn the budget presented on Tuesday evening when they went along with their budget of last year in which they predicted an increase of 32 cents per gallon for gasoline by January 1, 1981. In fact, their budget ensured this 32-cent increase by a date approximately two months from now. It is a far cry from the increase of 13.3 cents evidenced by the budget of last Tuesday night.

May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—APPLICATION TO FIRA BY FINNISH TIRE COMPANY—REASON FOR GOVERNMENT APPROVAL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This evening I am hoping to receive some assurance from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) or from the government that it is truly committed to the protection of jobs in the Canadian rubber industry. I asked the minister, on both June 25 and July 3, about the decision of the Foreign Investment Review Agency, announced on March 28, 1980, concerning OY Nokia AB of Finland, and its advisability at a time when the government had announced a $50 million DREE grant to the Michelin Tire Company. Since that time Uniroyal Limited has asked its Canadian employees to accept pay and benefit cutbacks as a result of market conditions.

Since then I have received from the minister one written outline of the circumstances surrounding the FIRA decision. As well, the minister has written to Stuart Smith, the leader of the opposition in the province of Ontario. The common strain in the two responses is that with the decision of FIRA the government was afforded a bargaining position that it had not previously enjoyed. I quote from the minister's letter to me dated August 29, in which he stated:

> You may not be aware that Nokia tires have been sold in Canada for several years through existing distributors and dealers and that ... had the Nokia application to establish a new enterprise in Canada been disallowed, it is virtually certain that the importation of Nokia tires would have continued, and also that no compensating benefits for Canadians would have been obtainable.

This assertion, repeated in the minister's response to his colleague at Queen's Park, opens a number of extremely serious avenues for interrogation. In my canvass of tire manufacturers, dealers and distributors, most of whom are doing business across the country, not one has seen more than one instance of a Nokia tire being sold in Canada. That instance was a ship container of Nokia radial tires that sat in a Montreal warehouse for two years until early in 1979 when it was bought and marketed by Treadway Exports Limited of Waterloo, Ontario. No new shipment is anticipated or will be sought. If this is what the minister is referring to as an instance of the distribution of Nokia products, then will he tell this House why this valuable container sat and gathered dust for two years.

In fact, this constitutes no mere matter of bureaucratic overkill. What is far more important, and the reason I am pursuing this matter here tonight, is that the terms of the FIRA decision are exactly those given by the minister's Liberal predecessor to the Michelin application. This same innocuous form of reference gave Michelin, in effect, a duty-free holiday, unrestrained by either time or amounts. Nokia seems to be just as free as Michelin to build up its share of the domestic market for years, before actually building a manufacturing plant in Canada.

This is the case, Mr. Speaker, despite the written assurances given by the minister to both Mr. Smith and myself that there is nothing in the FIRA decision which would lead Nokia to believe that the federal government would at any time offer some sort of abnormal tariff break. What, besides a unilateral tariff exemption would possibly induce Nokia to enter an extremely competitive and hungry industry, one which by any account is running well below manufacturing potential?

Furthermore, I cannot comprehend why the minister feels that Nokia does not qualify as a foreign multinational. The FIRA decision refers to Nokia's undertaking to seek a joint venture for tire manufacturing. It is instructed to offer equity participation to Canadians of not less than 50 per cent. However, if no joint venture with Canadian participation is possible, Nokia is permitted to construct a manufacturing facility for car and truck tires which would be 100 per cent Finnish-owned. How can this possibly be construed as anything but a foreign multinational?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in his response to my questions on this matter in June and July, the minister hoped out loud that "the House will be supporting me before too long in legislation which, among other things, will enable the FIRA Act to operate with more openness." Should I presume that the minister was referring to the recently announced freedom of information legislation? Is this House to be presented with some proposed amendment to the Foreign Investment Review Act itself? In either case, I call upon the minister, through the parliamentary secretary, to take this well-documented opportunity to provide an example of openness. Will he shed a little light on a decision that seems to fly right in the face of the written purpose of the Foreign Investment Review Act? How, Mr. Speaker, is this decision concerning OY Nokia AB of Finland,—likely to be of significant benefit to Canada?"

How many jobs will it create for rubber workers across our land?

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer this question not only in my capacity as parliamentary secretary but also as a member who has in his riding a huge Goodyear factory which has known progress in recent years. The Michelin investment led me to ask questions as well, perhaps the same questions that the hon. member himself is asking.

Still I must point out to my colleague that I am replying to his question on behalf of the minister who unfortunately could not be in the House tonight. He is on an important mission in France with the France-Canada Economic Council where he will be discussing several questions related to automobiles, aeronautics, Michelin probably, state-of-the-art technology and, in any event, he is expected to sign certain agreements with the French minister of economy.

[English]

In any event, I welcome this opportunity to discuss this case and will try to provide an answer to the hon. member. I am told, and I feel, that this case is an excellent example of how a foreign investor may show significant benefit to Canada which is a basic requirement under the Foreign Investment Review Act.

The hon. member is a free enterprise politician and seems to be resisting free competition in Canada by others than those that are already in place. He has referred to some of the commitments of the Nokia AB parent company of Finland which has substantial undertakings in support of its proposals. Those proposals were contained in the press release. The hon. member has enumerated most of them. He can quarrel with them or put them in doubt but under the advice of FIRA the minister has decided that such a proposal was and could be for the benefit of the Canadian economy.

The hon. member referred to the reply of the minister. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is a gamble but at the same time, there is the possibility of job creation, there is the possibility of investment and there is the possibility of involvement of Canadians in the United States market. All these things could be beneficial to the Canadian economy.

Although the hon. member is very much interested in protecting the Canadian rubber industry, I am sure this could become a very important rubber industry, one that could bring export benefit to Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—CONSULTATION ON PROPOSED FINANCING AGREEMENTS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on April 23, I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) about the failure of the department to consult with Indian bands regarding Treasury Board policy on funding those bands. I stated that this was completely unacceptable and asked how it squared with the government's announced policy of consultation.

Since then, the government has backed down somewhat and I understand that there is now an indefinite freeze on that particular funding policy. Bands continue to face problems with funding which make it impossible for them to do any long-term planning. I should like to briefly outline three areas where these problems are most serious.

First of all, there is a problem with funds arriving late. Credit ratings of Indian bands are adversely affected because they are not able to make their payments on time. It results in the bands having to go to banks and borrow money at very high interest rates. Then the department refuses to help them pick up the extra cost of paying that interest. It also results in loss of skilled personnel who are not willing to wait around for their pay cheques. In many areas of this country where winter arrives early, it means the funds arrive too late for necessary projects to go ahead.

As one specific example, but by no means an isolated one, I would like to point to the problems faced by the Liard River band. Their first quarter funding should have arrived by April 1 of this year. Instead, part of it arrived on May 2 and part of it did not arrive until June 9. Money for a home-school co-ordinator should have arrived by April 1 but did not arrive until June 13 at the end of the school term when they were ready to lay off the co-ordinator.

A group home faced the problem of having its hydro cut off because funds had not arrived to pay necessary bills and expenditures. This fall, money should have arrived to help students who are staying in boarding homes buy their necessary clothing and school supplies. That money should have been there by September 1. Instead, it arrived last week. This kind of late funding is a disgrace. It is a direct cause of many problems that Indian people face. The department is sloppy in getting promised funds out to Indian people.

Second, the Core funding has been frozen at the 1975 level. That means Indian bands are expected to function with 1975 levels of funding. We all know how much the costs of this government have gone up in the last five years, yet we expect Indian bands to operate with 1975 funding. We discriminate against those who work for Indian bands doing jobs that used to be done by federal officials. When federal civil servants received pay increases, those increases were retroactive. When Indian people and people working for Indian bands received pay increases, they were not retroactive. This is a clear case of discrimination against those who work for Indian people.

Third, and this is most serious because this has become a widespread practice, at the present time, funds which had been allocated for band projects are being diverted and used to cover deficits in other areas of the Department of Indian Affairs. In other words, local bands which had planned necessary projects are having to cancel those projects because of cost overruns in other areas of the department's responsibility. For example, in New Brunswick $131,000 has been allocated for a hot lunch program. By the end of June some $30,000 had been spent, yet that program was cancelled at that time. This fall there are no hot lunches for Indian students in New Brunswick because that money has had to be returned and dealt with elsewhere.

In conclusion, in spite of all the rhetoric about consultation, about giving Indian people more responsibility to administer their own affairs, the government continues to keep them on a very short string. The department is sloppy in getting funds to Indian bands in time. It expects Indian bands to operate in 1980 with 1975 funding. The department diverts funds that should be available to band projects. It uses these funds to cover deficits in other parts of the department. The plain fact is that Indian bands are being made the scapegoat for the inefficiency of the department and for the government's failure to secure adequate funds so that at least some of these funds will get through the gauntlet of the bureaucracy and reach the Indian people themselves. In conclusion, I would like to read a few words from a letter a band manager wrote to the minister. I quote:

> You see Mr. Minister it's like if you made home-made beer. You and your department will drink the top part of the bottle and give the remaining to the Indians. This is exactly what's happening with the funding too.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I often think that if there is a scapegoat, it has to be the Department of Indian Affairs which quietly goes about its business, trying to do the best it can, not always to perfection but certainly not with the incompetence as suggested by the hon. member.

On April 15, 1980, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) met with the National Indian Brotherhood concerning terms and conditions for funding to Indian bands. As a result of this meeting, the minister announced an extension to July 15 to allow time for further consultation with Indian people to work out mutually acceptable financial arrangements. During that three-month period, the minister met with the chairman of the Union of New Brunswick Indians and reached an agreement on May 26.

With the understanding that bands would, as they had in the past, continue to meet information and accounting requirements through provision of a band council resolution or other appropriate instrument, the following points were agreed upon in regard to contribution arrangements.

First, an annual audit will continue to be provided to the department by bands. Second, bands will set out in their expenditure plans and by program their budget requirements for the fiscal year, for example, housing, roads, education. Another point agreed upon is that bands must indicate their cash requirements on a quarterly basis against the aforementioned expenditure plan and, in advance, their cash requirements and expenditures for subsequent quarters. Bands also have the option of continuing to be financed on a quarterly basis, which is the maximum period allowable for cash advances.

It should be mentioned that these points were agreed upon between the department and Indian bands in Canada as general guidelines. This does not, however, preclude the option of individual bands negotiating a financial arrangement with the government which better suits their own needs.

Hon. members will be aware that the Department of Indian Affairs had in the past received complaints from Parliament, the Auditor General and the Indian people themselves, alleging inadequate accounting procedures and negligence over expenditure of federal funds. Prior to April, 1979, Treasury Board submissions specified the terms and conditions relating to each contribution activity, such as education, social assistance and so on. This practice resulted in several contribution agreements for any one band and each had to be controlled, monitored and accounted for individually. As of April, 1979, however, terms and conditions are now based on classes of activities. This means that a single contribution can be made by the department to a band which covers all activities managed by the band, thereby reducing the need for the control and accounting over separate contributions.

Under these new reporting procedures approved by Treasury Board, the bands must now submit financial reports to the department on at least a quarterly basis, specifying year-to-date expenditures and forecast total annual expenditures.

There is much more I would like to say, but this is only a three-minute period. The point I want to make is that we want to do a good job. At the same time, we have a fiscal responsibility, as do the bands. After all, it is the taxpayers' money. We have to answer for it, as do the bands.

THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATIONS WITH INDIAN GROUPS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on October 17 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when the Indian and other native groups in Canada would be consulted about their constitutional proposals and whether the constitutional proposals of October 6 would be amended to entrench Indian rights. While the Prime Minister said that Indians and other native people would be consulted on constitutional matters that concern them and that he was anxious to find ways to better protect their rights, regretfully he also said that this would be done only when the constitution is patriated to Canada.

This is not acceptable. If we can entrench certain rights regarding the French and English languages, fundamental freedoms, democratic rights, mobility rights, equalization and, now, the right to resources, then surely there is no reason why we cannot entrench at this time certain basic Indian and Inuit rights as well.

Some government spokesmen have argued that article 24 of the constitutional proposals protects native rights. But that section is extremely inadequate and is the barest minimum. Francophones of this country would never tolerate a similar proposal to protect their rights, and the Indians and Inuit have no reason to accept it either. The aboriginal people of this land want their basic collective rights entrenched in the present proposed charter. If they must wait until after patriation, they may have to wait for many years and then may never get the protection they want and need.

We must recognize that it will not be easy to pass amendments under the proposed amending formula. The Indian and Inuit people are not a large minority in many parts of this country, and many provincial governments might oppose and defeat any later entrenchment. With the federal government's present unilateral action, the chances to entrench aboriginal rights are much greater, if only the federal government would agree to do what it knows must be right.

On October 23 the National Indian Brotherhood announced their opposition to any patriation and charter of rights which failed to recognize and entrench their rights. They asked for amendments to the charter which would constitutionally recognize and protect their aboriginal rights, their property rights, their treaty rights and their right within Canada's federation to Indian government. Unfortunately, many failed to understand these demands by our native people.

People often look at our Indians and Inuit as just other ethnic groups and consequently fail to acknowledge that they should have any specially entrenched rights. But this assessment results from a complete misreading of our history and a prejudiced negative perception of aboriginal civilizations. The Indians and Inuit were established in this land for thousands of years before the arrival of Europeans. They had their own governments, laws, languages and cultures.

When the Europeans came in the sixteenth and following centuries, they unilaterally took over most of these lands by larger numbers, force of arms and more advanced technologies, rarely with the consent of the aboriginal peoples. How, under any concept of a moral justice, can we justify this action? How can it be justified under our Judeo-Christian concept of justice? We think it wrong for Hitler to march into France and Holland or for the Russians to annex the Baltic states but rationalize that it was all right for the British and French to take, without legal or moral right, Indian and Inuit lands in America.

No one suggests that we completely undo 300 years of history, but we can go a long way to correct the injustices of the past. We can recognize and entrench aboriginal rights in the constitution, and we can do it now. First, aboriginal rights are all those rights that our "first nations", the aboriginal people, possessed and which they never voluntarily gave up when Europeans arrived. These are rights to certain lands, languages, cultures, and forms of government. Second, we must also entrench their treaty rights so they cannot be abrogated by ordinary federal and provincial legislation.

These treaties were agreements between nations and meant to be basic constitutional documents. Third, Indian and Inuit lands and resources should not be subject to federal and provincial expropriation without consent. And fourth, the Indian and Inuit people, the "first nations" of Canada, should have the right within confederation to determine their own form of government. They do not want separation, they want to be full partners in the new Canadian dream.

Unfortunately, I did not have an opportunity to speak in the constitutional debate which ended last week. My name was too far down the Speaker's list when closure was applied.

Unfortunately as well, I have not been chosen to serve on the constitutional committee. I am committed, however, to doing everything in my power to amend the constitutional proposals to entrench Indian and Inuit rights now, at the same time as patriation. As far as I am concerned, no cause is more clearly just than this one, and it will never be suppressed.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and share the concern for the Indian people expressed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). He has indicated that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has said, first, that the Indians would be fully consulted on the constitutional proposals and, second, that there would be protection in a new constitution. I respectfully submit that it will take at least two decades more to settle the Indian claims of Canada and decide what their rights are.

Mr. Allmand: Why?

Mr. Irwin: I will give examples. For instance in British Columbia there is a Nishga Tribal Council in the Nass Valley. All these people have claims in the process of negotiation, claims which are being litigated or being denied. There are certain bands in northern British Columbia. There is the Musqueam band of Vancouver. In the Yukon there is the Council of Yukon Indians, and Mr. Dennis O'Connor is dealing with this. In the Northwest Territories there are four separate groups making claims. There is COPE involving the Inuit. There is the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, the Indian Brotherhood of Northwest Territories and the Metis Association of Northwest Territories. In Quebec there are three bands making claims, the St. Regis Band—

Mr. Laniel: St. Regis is in my riding.

Mr. Irwin: —the Oka Band and the Caughnawaga Band. In Nova Scotia there is the Union of Nova Scotia Indians. In Newfoundland there are at least two I know of in Labrador. The Micmacs who came to Newfoundland about 150 years ago are claiming aboriginal rights. Then there is my area, northern Ontario. I do not even deal with non-status Indians, so I think it is oversimplifying the problem to think these can all be settled fairly and judiciously before a constitution can be passed. Section 24 is quite clear, and it does have a reverse declaration. I will read it:

> The guarantee in this charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada, including any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada.

In other words, if they have rights, then they will not be extinguished through the constitution.

Over and above this, we are meeting with them. We have provided them with $1,360,000 of tax money to research and put forward their claims. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) has said—my hon. friend leaves—that native rights as one of the first items on the agenda when the first ministers will meet again is a priority.

I think we have dealt fairly. We are as concerned as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, and when he talks about Nazis and whatnot, it is only rhetoric.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

COMMUNICATIONS

NORTHWEST TELEPHONE—CALL TO MEET REQUIREMENTS OF LICENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, a company called Northwest Telephone operates as a subsidiary of CN Telecommunications. It is supplying telephone service for a large area of northeastern British Columbia adjacent to the Alaska highway. The company is charging individual Canadians a $680 fee for a simple hook-up and is not in a position even to provide such service. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

That for reasons of total neglect and failure to provide even the most basic service dictated by the licence under which Northwest Telephone operates in northeastern British Columbia, the company be given six months from this day to implement a service which not only fulfils the requirement of the licence but is consistent with the company's widely advertised policy whereby their service to the public is not only a business but a responsibility; and that failing the company's compliance with this requirement, the licence will be revoked.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

SPECULATION ON BREAK-UP OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, given the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speculated the other evening in Regina that if Canada broke up under the strain of his budget and constitutional proposals, perhaps Canada deserved to die, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to put the shoe on the other foot and pass into that great MURB in the sky himself, thereby performing his greatest service ever to Canada.

IMMIGRATION

DELAY IN PROCESSING CARIBBEAN APPLICANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, in light of many reports of embarrassing delays and inefficiencies in the Caribbean immigration office in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, resulting in costly resubmissions of medical documents, since these complaints have increased dramatically since the government unilaterally introduced its foreign service consolidation program, and in light of the particular case of Mr. Seergobin of Waterloo who has waited one year and six months to have his wife join him from Guyana despite a guarantee by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) that she would join him by September, 1980, at the latest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs report to this House regarding the inexcusable failure to deliver service in the Caribbean office.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

EFFECT OF INCREASED TAXES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to propose a motion of urgent importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On this Hallowe'en day and in view of this government's trick or treat budget which brings many tricks and no treats to all the people of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That the government be directed to stop deceiving Canadians with charlatan trickery and to admit that the proposed natural gas tax is not only a tax on natural gas exports but is also a direct and discriminatory tax on every natural gas consumer in the four western provinces and Ontario; and to admit also that this tax will increase the domestic heating costs of western Canadians by at least 16 per cent effective tomorrow, with the increase doubling to 33 per cent or more than $150 per home by next winter; and finally, to admit to the government's shame that there will be no program of compensation to the thousands of low-income Canadians who will be faced with these sharply increased energy costs.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA COUNCIL

CALL FOR INCREASED FUNDING FOR THE ARTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The recently released report of the Canada Council emphasises that in constant dollar terms the resources available to the arts through the Canada Council in 1979-80 were about the same as they were in 1975. Because of inflation and increasing operating costs, even our best publishing houses, theatres, orchestras and other basic arts institutions are in danger. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

● (1110)

That during these times of culture building in Canada, this House instructs the Secretary of State to ensure that adequate funding is received by those individuals and organizations who have achieved stature in the arts community, and especially by new companies, younger artists and those working on the frontiers of arts and communications.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY

CONVERSION FROM OIL PROGRAM—EARLY AVAILABILITY OF APPLICATION FORMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provision of Standing Order 43 on a matter of particular urgency for those Canadian home owners who anticipate converting from oil to gas or electricity. In light of the fact that the office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has reported that the application forms for the new grant program will not be available until March or April 1981, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the minister make every effort to guarantee that the application forms for the new program will be available within the near future in order that persons who wish to take advantage of the program can receive payment within a reasonable period of time.

WEATHER STATION "PAPA"—SUPPORT TO CAPTAINS AND CREWS ON SPECIAL ANNIVERSARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I have taken the time to speak to a wide number of members of this House and I am sure that if they listen carefully they will support this motion.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The weather station Papa composed of the vessels Vancouver and Quadra lies 1,500 kilometres northwest of Vancouver Island. In view of the important scientific, oceanographic and meteorological work performed by these vessels on behalf of all Canadians, and also in view of the vital search and rescue role played by the Papa weather ships, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House convey its unanimous support to the captains and crews on this special anniversary occasion.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is moved by Mr. Fulton and seconded by Mr. Rose:

That this House convey its unanimous support to the captains and crews on this special anniversary occasion, the captains and crews being those of the weather station Papa.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR NATURAL GAS LINE TO VANCOUVER ISLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in light of the equivocation on page 78 in the budget energy statement about the natural gas pipeline to Vancouver Island, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House requests the appropriate minister, whichever it may be, to make a statement on motions clarifying the extent to which federal assistance will be available to the province to build that pipeline, and to explain as well why any resident of the island would want to convert to gas when the cost of heating his home with gas will double over the next three years.

SHIPBUILDING

MEASURES TO MAINTAIN VIABILITY OF CANADIAN YARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the 11 per cent reduction in the shipbuilding subsidy from 20 per cent to 9 per cent has resulted in the loss of many direct and indirect jobs in the shipbuilding industry, cancelled contracts and the loss of millions of dollars to our economy because of the cutbacks in production, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the government take immediate steps either to restore the 20 per cent subsidy or come up with other equally stimulating legislation to ensure and maintain the viability of all our shipbuilding yards in Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

STATEMENT OF PREMIER LOUGHEED ON NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Last night, in responding to the budget of the Minister of Finance, the Premier of Alberta indicated that Alberta will cut its oil production by 15 per cent, will challenge the federal tax on natural gas in the courts and put on hold the Alsands project, which is necessary if Canada is to achieve energy self-sufficiency, which all of us on all sides of the House seek.

● (1115)

Will the federal government, in the interests of all Canadians, take advantage of the three-month period before the first cutback and renew discussions with the province of Alberta?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, on the gas throughput tax we understand that Premier Lougheed does want to take the matter up in the courts. We think that is a very reasonable and rational approach, and we are anxious to see any differences as to the law on the constitution interpreted by the courts.

In so far as the tar sands are concerned, we are a bit disappointed because the budget did indicate a $38 per barrel price, which is about the world price now. It seemed to be reasonably acceptable on all sides. It did indicate that production could be financially viable, and we are disappointed that Premier Lougheed seems to have some reservations about that. But he did not indicate any precise response so, of course, we will have to wait to see what he has in mind, and we are anxious to discuss the matter further with him.

In so far as the cutbacks are concerned, as the hon. member says, they would not be effective until they begin three months from now, and we welcome this breathing space, perhaps to continue negotiations with the province of Alberta. We will see if any accommodation is possible. I hope it is and we will certainly bend every effort in that direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I gather that the Prime Minister is moving in the direction of some discussion and conciliation. If he is saying that that is in the best interests of Canada, I just want him to know that we share that view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Can the Prime Minister indicate to the House if it is possible to say today or tomorrow, given the short period of time, when those discussions might begin and whether he will involve himself in these matters?

In order that the jurisdiction can be tested with respect to the gas tax, which I agree is a matter of law pure and simple, could the Prime Minister indicate whether he, in the course of early discussions, would use his offices or whatever his legal powers are to bring those matters to court quickly so that they can be settled?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, as far as we are able we would be anxious to have the legal aspect of this matter decided as expeditiously as possible. I will be discussing with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Justice the ways in which this can be done. It presumably will involve an early contact with Alberta to establish on what it wants to base its case and how it thinks it would want to proceed.

With regard to the tar sands, I hope that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be able to contact his opposite number reasonably soon because we are not clear what Alberta has in mind when it talks about increased royalties and so forth. If it is a regime which, in effect, prevents the private sector from exploiting the tar sands, we would think it a regrettable move because, as we know, all of Canada is relying on the tar sands and the heavy oils to reach self-sufficiency by the end of the decade.

On the third point, I am afraid I cannot indicate any particular response at this time. On the matter of the interruption of oil supplies, many questions arise. The first is whether it is constitutional. Is it within the power of a province to interrupt the free flow of commodities across the country? I will want to study that at some length with the Minister of Justice and perhaps in cabinet before indicating any response.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, with regard to the last matter discussed by the Prime Minister I think there are very few Canadians who would view the courtroom as the appropriate place to settle a difference within the family, and I am talking about the Canadian family. I am talking about the last matter. I hope the Prime Minister might take an initiative in this matter with respect to those discussions.

Having regard to the history of matters, I hope the Prime Minister will consider that with respect to the tar sands it is a matter he himself might raise in initiating any discussions. The purpose of my question is to ask the Prime Minister, in the best interests of the country, to take the initiative in these discussions and to take it rather quickly.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Madam Speaker, I do not think I can add anything to the previous answer. I fail to see how the hon. member can argue that, in one case, Premier Lougheed is right in taking us to court, but in the other case we would not be right in taking him to court because it suddenly becomes a family matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I apologize if I misunderstood the hon. member. Perhaps he could repeat the question and the preface.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Just so it is absolutely clear, Madam Speaker, let me point out that there may be some areas where the courtroom would be the appropriate place. The thrust of my question is that in most areas the courtroom is not the appropriate place if one has a substitute, and that substitute, in my judgment and in my respectful submission, Madam Speaker, is the bargaining table. I am asking the Prime Minister whether he would assure the House that he will take steps immediately to take the initiative to go back to the bargaining table so that a settlement can be produced in the Canadian family with respect to a matter which must be vexing to every Canadian.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I did understand the hon. member correctly, Madam Speaker, and he did suggest that, in the case of the gas tax, the court is the proper route, but that in the case of the curtailment of production, the court was not the proper route. I am suggesting that we are examining all routes and I do not exclude either an appeal to the courts by Alberta or an appeal to the courts by us.

However, I do repeat what I said at the outset, that further negotiations are certainly appropriate and they will be embarked upon as soon as cabinet has had a chance to examine the real substance of Premier Lougheed's answer. Some of it can be ascertained by initial discussions; some may have to be ascertained in other ways.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—INQUIRY RESPECTING FEDERAL INITIATIVES WITH ALBERTA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to pursue the line of questioning of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the questions I was putting to him yesterday on the matter of security of supply.

In his document "The National Energy Program", the importance of non-conventional oils in the program is very clear. It will result in a greater degree of production than the conventional sources of supply, and that to me is the key area of concern and one on which we should be focussing our attention.

My question to the minister is, what initiatives is he proposing to take in the context of a broad energy negotiation with the province of Alberta which will result in those important projects in western Canada being brought forward, projects which will help security of supply in eastern and central Canada as well as create jobs, not just in the narrow context of the non-conventional projects but in the broad context of a total agreement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite right that the non-conventional oil is our main source of growth of supply in the coming decade. Those projects have a long lead time. The next tar sands plant could not come into operation before 1987. This does not mean that we shall not attach a very high priority to those projects. In the last two weeks I have had meetings with representatives of both the Cold Lake project and the oil sands project and I am supposed to have further discussions with them before very long. Also, my officials are in contact with them.

As the Prime Minister has just indicated, as contained in our budget and as I indicated at the last meeting I had with the minister of energy of Alberta, we put forward an offer which we felt was not only fair but also high enough to ensure that the projects would be economically viable. There have been further representations from the industry. We are still in the course of discussions, but obviously these are major investments and, quite clearly, there is need for further discussions, not only with the industry but also with the government of Alberta, particularly in light of Premier Lougheed's statement last night about his plans for the oilsands.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In the proposal which the province of Alberta put forward toward the end of July, I believe they allowed for a $7 billion investment in the next three oil sands projects, both in the debt and equity as well as the total commencement of the infrastructure. Since the province of Alberta is such a critical partner in bringing forward these projects, is it possible for the minister to broaden the sweep of these negotiations to include not just those projects themselves, but in the total concept of the energy policy to bring the province back as a willing partner in the very important developments we must have in the country?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, certainly I would have no objection to that. As a matter of fact, we have talked about those two projects because they are the ones currently on the table on which tens of millions of dollars have already been spent. But as the hon. member knows, Nova and Petro-Canada have a joint proposal for a fourth plant. Certainly we would be very interested in discussing further proposals, if there are any, with the government of Alberta, or industry, or both.

As for possible investment by the government of Alberta, obviously this is a matter for the government of Alberta to decide. At the present time, on those projects the problem does not appear to be essentially a shortage of money for investment; it is the assurance that there will be a good enough rate of return on whatever they will invest, and that is what is still being discussed.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL MEET PREMIER LOUGHEED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Many Canadians find it unacceptable that we have a confrontation and deterioration in federal-provincial relations. I think last night was just a further stage in this process. I detect in the House today a feeling that what is needed is a calm and reasoned approach by both the federal government and Alberta because the people of Canada are caught in the middle of this dispute.

The Prime Minister appeared to indicate that he would keep the door open to negotiations, and then there was some talk from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about officials meeting. Would he clarify for the House and for the country what specific plans he has in mind for further negotiations? More specifically, is he prepared to meet with Premier Lougheed personally, and when?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that that question is something of a repetition of the question asked by the opposition House leader.

Mr. Waddell: No, not quite.

Mr. Trudeau: He has my answers. They might be more enlightened if I knew the position of the hon. member on this. He seems puzzled by the whole situation, as indeed he should be. The take of the producing provinces is reduced from something like 45 per cent to 43 per cent, which is not major. The take of the federal government is considerably increased, but it is at the expense of the producing private sector. It would be interesting to know if the NDP will support our approach on this, if it thinks we are hitting the private sector and the oil companies too hard, if it thinks as a consequence that the federal government should be getting less money from them, or if it thinks we should be hitting them harder. I await some help from the hon. member who has a distinguished record of thought on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I might say to the Prime Minister that we on this side of the House feel the provinces have legitimate concerns for their vast problems and costs. If one has been to Fort McMurray, as has the Prime Minister, one will know the cost of schools, housing, social services and so on. At the same time we recognize, as do most Canadians, that we must have a national energy policy.

The Prime Minister answered my question with a question, which I know is a favourite technique. But the point which I think the country wants to know is: will he personally continue negotiations with Premier Lougheed? Will he personally meet with Premier Lougheed and, if so, when?

• (1130)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I met with Premier Lougheed for a few days last summer and I was prepared to meet with him last Monday. I am prepared to meet with him again.

Miss MacDonald: When?

Mr. Trudeau: Any time which would be useful from his point of view and mine. He can come tomorrow if he wishes. The point is that the hon. member seems to be making suggestions which do not have any substance to them. The real question is: is the sharing fair or not? If the provincial share is going down from 45 to 43 per cent, it is not a big stroke against the provinces, or against the schools in Fort McMurray, which seem to concern the hon. member. But there is a rather big take from the oil companies which is to the benefit of the consumers of Canada.

Mr. Blenkarn: Oh, come on!

Mr. Trudeau: And to the federal government. I am prepared to meet Premier Lougheed. It would be of help to me if the hon. member himself—I know his party is divided on this—could tell me if he thinks we are taking too much from the oil companies or too much from the province when we are going down to 43 per cent. I am not asking a question; I am just suggesting that he might try to get his thoughts together and be helpful to the Canadian nation on this.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister mentioned Canadian consumers, who appear to me to be the forgotten people in this dispute, if I can put my thoughts together.

I have a question for the Prime Minister. Canadian consumers are being hit by a $340 increase per family for energy costs, for the cost of heating their homes and being able to drive their cars next year as a result of the Prime Minister's budget. Would the Prime Minister consider introducing a cost of living tax credit to help these middle and low-income Canadian consumers?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member thinks the consumer is being asked to pay prices which are too high. Is he then siding with the federal government against the producing provinces and saying that, as Premier Lougheed is asking for even higher prices, I should meet him, as the hon. member suggests, and turn down his requests for higher prices? This is the kind of guidance I am asking for from the hon. member.

PATRIATION—REPORTED COMMUNICATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask him to confirm reports emanating from both London and from officials in Ottawa today that the government House leader has been in touch with his counterpart in the United Kingdom, Mr. Norman St. John-Stevas, concerning a scaling down of the Canadian government's proposals so that patriation could take place as quickly as possible, but that other constitutional amendments should be made in Canada. Would the Prime Minister comment on those reports?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I should inform the House that it is not the usual custom to divulge private conversations which take place between individuals, but I can confirm that a call was received earlier this week from the Lord Privy Seal by the President of the Privy Council which arose as a result of somewhat alarmist reports in the British press in connection with the progress of the constitutional resolution in the House of Commons. The Lord Privy Seal wanted some clarification from the President of the Privy Council.

Miss MacDonald: It is interesting to note that in connection with a matter as important and as crucial as this to the country the Prime Minister would not take the opportunity to respond to my question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PATRIATION—REPORTED VIEW OF UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the exchange in the House yesterday The Times reporter has twice reiterated that two British cabinet ministers have informed him that the position of the United Kingdom government is that they would quickly pass a request for patriation but that other constitutional amendments should be straightened out here in Canada. In other words, there was a very clear indication that Canada is a grown up, mature and independent country and should be able to handle its problems on its own rather than asking another country to resolve them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he would confirm that this is the gist of the message which he was asked to convey to Canada's government, or if perhaps this was the message which he conveniently forgot on the aircraft coming home, as other Liberal cabinet ministers have been known to do in the past?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member opposite has had the privilege of sitting in a cabinet and she knows that a variety of views are found around the cabinet table—and perhaps sometimes they are even carried out afterwards. There was a press report this morning in The Globe and Mail which quoted the official spokesman for the British government as saying:

> We will put legislation before Parliament when the Canadian government requests us to do so. There has been no change in our position for months.

That is the message we brought back and it was the message which we were given.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE DAMAGE FROM CONVERSION FROM OIL TO COAL

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He will know that his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has been lobbying very strenuously in the United States against American legislation designed to convert thermal power plants in the United States from oil to coal because of serious environmental damage which that would inflict on our country. The minister's budget now proposes to spend $175 million to encourage the conversion of electricity plants in the Atlantic provinces from oil to coal.

Will the Minister of Finance tell the House how he reconciles the government support for coal conversions in the Atlantic provinces which do not contain environmental safeguards with the government's opposition to similar measures in the United States, which would inflict very serious environmental harm not only on the United States but on Canada as well?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada in its budget has announced the spending of some $175 million, as the hon. member has indicated, for conversion of electricity generation utilities from oil to coal. I suggest that the hon. member also looks at the national energy program, where he will see that we are also allocating tens of millions of dollars for research and development on ways of improving coal combustion and reducing any pollution which may result. In particular, we have already started financing a system called fluidized bed combustion, which will result in a very substantial reduction of sulphurous content in coal burning.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of energy. As he will know, the technology is already there to include environmental safeguards in plants for the protection of the environment. So research and development is not the problem. Will the minister tell the House whether the government's funding of coal conversions in Canada is dependent upon the provinces meeting federal government environmental standards and, if so, what specific environmental conditions will be required?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious that if we are to assume the cost of those conversions, they will have to meet federal environmental standards. That seems obvious to me, and I am amazed at my colleague's question.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF RENEWABLE RESOURCES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. While this party does not support the action taken by Alberta last evening, there can be no question that Premier Lougheed demonstrated to Canadians most dramatically and perhaps even for the first time that petroleum reserves are fast running out, proving the desperate need for conservation. Since we cannot do much about the supply side, certainly in the short run, will the minister tell the House when the government intends to attempt to affect more dramatically the supply side and assume greater leadership in conservation and the development of renewable energy in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, from the national energy program which the government tabled two days ago, my hon. friend will learn that the emphasis is on conservation and substitution. Of the many billions of dollars which the government has set aside in terms of direct programs in the area of energy, a very substantial portion of those dollars is allocated to conversion to and substitution for other forms of energy. Never in the history of this country has there been such a major program of conversion to and substitution for new forms of energy than is contained in this new energy program. I believe it compares favourably with any program I have seen in any industrialized country in the world, and I can vouch for that.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that these are certain kinds of proposals and that they are not necessarily hard and budgeted facts. I have a report published by the minister's department through one of his own programs which indicates that out of $158 million to be spent this year on R and D and certain other support programs, $104 million will go for nuclear energy. Compare that to some other countries, notably Sweden which is one third the size of Canada and which is spending $1.2 billion on R and D and energy research. If the minister is satisfied, I would like him to know that some of us are not satisfied.

When does the government intend to get serious about things like rail electrification, energy-efficient housing and dozens of other things that Canada can and should do to lower oil demands? Or can Canadians expect a future either of rationing or, even worse, nuclear energy?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, again if my hon. friend will look at the program which was released by this government, rather than at studies which are already out of date—because he is referring to studies which were published a while ago, not to the most recent document which was released this week at the time of the budget—he will find that with regard to research and development the national energy program allocates an additional amount of $260 million to be used only for research and development.

Mr. Rose: Where?

Mr. Rae: You're dancing.

Mr. Lalonde: The majority of that money will be spent on non-nuclear research, new forms of energy and all kinds of research and development in alternative energy forms other than nuclear energy. This is in the national energy program. We have also announced programs in the area of conversion whereby, for instance, everybody who converts to something other than oil will be given a grant of up $800. Also, there are a number of initiatives in that program which will encourage citizens in the various regions of this country to get off oil.

I can only advise my colleague to look at the program which has been released., He will find that, indeed, at the end of this decade we foresee that Canada will be consuming less oil than it is consuming now under our proposals and programs.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO NATIONAL GAS PRODUCERS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the spirit of the motion put earlier today by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, I believe and I expect that most members of this House will support the national energy program in terms of aiding consumers to convert from the use of oil to natural gas. But as the minister realizes, there are many Canadian-owned firms that have shut-in or locked-in reserves and which are now experiencing problems. What does the minister propose to do to assist these Canadian-owned gas firms with their cash flow problems?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question which raises a very serious problem which was of great concern to us in the preparation of the national energy program. As the House knows, we intend to set up a national gas bank—

Mr. Nielsen: It is sitting on the front benches.

Mr. Lalonde: —whereby Canadian gas producers, particularly small producers, will be able to sell their gas to or become involved through joint participation with the gas bank—

Mr. Crosbie: It is a great thing for the Liberals because they have a surplus of gas.

Mr. Lalonde: —or to obtain loans from the bank to allow them to do further exploration. We will also extend the gas pipeline to the maritimes and to Vancouver Island, if British Columbia agrees, so there will be a substantial increase in gas consumption in this country. For that purpose, we have allocated about $500 million.

Also, I just referred to a very extensive conversion grant program which will encourage all Canadians who are now consuming oil for home heating to switch to other forms of energy, and to gas in particular.

HOUSING

INQUIRY RESPECTING EXTENSION OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. The government, in the document to which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources referred earlier, refers to a vigorous conservation effort. On October 20, my colleague the hon. member for Mississauga South asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when the CHIP program would be extended to those Canadians who own homes built after 1961. The minister replied on that date that my colleague would have to wait for the budget and the announcement of the government's policy which was coming the following week for an answer. We have waited and we do not have an answer. Would the minister of housing tell the House when the three million Canadians who own homes built between 1961 and 1976 can expect to enter into the CHIP program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, under the national energy program we have increased by about 300 per cent the sum of money allocated to the CHIP program. I believe it will go from an amount of $85 million to over $230 million. There has been a very large increase in the number of requests for the CHIP program over the last year and particularly over the last few months. We believe that with the new program there will be a further increase.

I would like to indicate to the hon. member that we are, indeed, concerned with extending the availability of this grant to more recent homes, but we first want obviously to concentrate our efforts on older homes which have worse insulation problems than more recent homes. We recognize that there are also many more recent homes which have inadequate insulation and that the matter should be reviewed. But in terms of priorities, we are trying to reach the larger share of older homes first. I would hope that later—and I do not know whether it will be in the course of next fiscal year or in the course of the next budget—we will be able to extend the program to more recent homes as soon as it is feasible. I can assure the hon. member that we have this problem very much in mind.

OIL EXPORT TAX REBATE

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In his budget the minister says that he will rebate Alberta and Saskatchewan 50 per cent of the revenues from the oil export tax and that he expects oil exports to be phased out by 1985. Since 50 per cent of zero is zero, could the minister please explain his arithmetic?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would rather understand the question before I explain the arithmetic.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, I am quoting from the minister's own budget. May I direct him to page 37 of the national energy statement and to pages 23 and 27 of his budget, if he cares to review the matter and give me a written answer.

CHIP—ASSISTANCE TO OWNERS OF HOMES BUILT AFTER 1961

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister said that the homes built after 1961 will have to wait until there is money available, but he obliquely promised these home owners some help. What do these people do? Will the minister tell the House what these people should do if they go ahead and insulate now, and thus save us a lot of oil? Will these people be required to pay the bill out of their own pocket and retain their receipts? These people have no assurance as to when the minister will do something for them. The minister knows that the standards for houses built in 1960 and houses built in 1970 were the same. Could the minister explain?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to say very clearly that I have given no guarantee as to when we will be in a position to extend the insulation program to more recent homes. I said earlier to another member that we were trying at present to meet as quickly as possible all the requests for insulation of homes built before 1961.

In the meantime, those with more recent homes can do a number of things, the first being to give up oil heating for gas or any other kind of heating as soon as possible. By resorting to such conversion right now, those people could save a lot of money. As for the availability of the insulation scheme at a further date, I am not in a position to predict when it will become available. There is always a cut-off date in such schemes and it happens to be 1961 in this case.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, is the minister saying to those Canadians who own homes built since 1961 that they would be wise not to insulate right now, that they could wait for a while and then perhaps they will get in on the $500 bonus a little later, and that all they can do is take advantage of a retrofit program with respect to oil? Is that the minister's attitude? Or is the minister going to end this most discriminatory program which looks after one person on a street but not the other person next door who had a house built maybe a year later? Is it the minister's proposal that those people wait and not insulate until the minister makes a grant available?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has the ability to distort the facts with the greatest ease. When it was first implemented, the program applied only to houses built up to 1946. Subsequently, it was extended to houses built up to 1961. Even at first, when the program applied only to houses built up to 1946, 10 per cent of the home owners who converted had houses built after 1946. They decided to assume these costs, because they realized that it was both advantageous and profitable for them to do so. Now, we have a program which will help people convert their home heating systems to alternate sources of energy, including gas. We are providing up to $800 to home owners who wish to convert to natural gas or wood. This extremely generous and new program is available to everybody. As to a possible extension of the deadline to apply for the grant under the home insulation program, we will wait until we have managed to process all the grant applications received for houses built before 1961.

INQUIRY WHETHER REVENUE TAX APPLIES TO PROVINCIAL CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his budget the other night, the minister referred to the imposition of a new tax of 8 per cent on net revenue from the production of oil and gas in Canada. My understanding is that this would apply to Crown corporations or Crown agencies in the production of gas and oil, companies such as Saskoil and the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, a practice in which the government has never involved itself in the past. I ask the minister whether or not he can confirm that this is a new tax that will be applied for the first time to Crown corporations owned by the people of the provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I understand that the tax would apply in the way the hon. member has described. For example, the province of Saskatchewan taxes Petro-Canada, so it seems to me that there ought to be a certain reciprocity in their approach to these matters.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, under section 125 of the British North America Act it is very clear that no lands or property belonging to Canada or any province should be liable to taxation. That has been interpreted in the past to mean Crown corporations or Crown agencies owned by the provinces. I wonder whether the minister might reconsider the imposition of this tax as it applies to provincial Crown corporations, in light of some of the chaos which may result if provinces retaliate even further by trying to impose taxes on some of the federal Crown corporations, such as Air Canada, the CNR, or, indeed, Eldorado? Would the minister reconsider this in light of the possibility that some of the provinces may take this question to court, and in light of the growing concern in this country about the evolution of federalism being determined by judges and by the courts rather than by politicians?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member may want to make a similar plea to the government of Saskatchewan to stop taxing Petro-Canada. That seems to me to be a logical outcome from his representations regarding Saskoil.

ENERGY

INCENTIVES TO QUEBECKERS TO ABANDON OIL HEATING

Mr. André Bachand (Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Minister has often said in the past that users of heating oil must be encouraged to convert to gas. Since Quebec has an abundant supply of hydroelectric power, can the minister indicate whether there are provisions in the national energy program to give Quebeckers tax incentives or some other form of aid to encourage them to convert their heating systems to electricity?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the national energy program clearly states that the government would subsidize, up to $800, home owners who would convert their existing oil heating system to an alternate source of energy. Those other forms of energy are especially natural gas and electricity.

We are quite willing to subsidize those two forms of energy and make them accessible to all. But we must do it in co-operation with the provincial authorities, and the provincial authority concerned must accept that its hydro company, Hydro-Québec in this instance, make the conversions involved. That does not depend on us; each provincial government is responsible for deciding whether or not it is willing to encourage the use of its hydroelectricity to heat homes.

As for us, and that I want to repeat, we are willing to pay the same subsidies in Quebec as in the other provinces, except the maritimes for the time being, because they are using oil to produce electricity; but as soon as they have switched to coal, the same will apply to them. So with regard to Quebec, as far as we are concerned the federal government is willing to make those funds available to home owners who convert their heating systems either to natural gas or electricity, wood or any other source of energy. Of course, the Quebec government has its say in the matter, especially where electric heating is concerned.

NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TAX—ASSISTANCE TO LOW-INCOME CANADIANS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The hon. minister knows full well that his announced natural gas tax is in fact a tax on natural gas exports, but it is also a direct and discriminatory tax on every consumer of natural gas in the four western provinces and Ontario.

An hon. Member: And Quebec.

Mr. Siddon: Does the minister realize that his natural gas tax will increase the domestic heating costs of western Canadians, who must heat their homes with gas, by about 16 per cent effective tomorrow, and that this increase will amount to about 33 per cent on next winter's heating bill or at least $150 for every home in western Canada using gas? What assistance does the minister propose for those low-income Canadians in the west, in Ontario—and, yes, to some degree in Quebec—who can ill afford a $100 to $300 jump in their heating bill this winter and next?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am fully aware of the impact of the tax which will apply to consumers in western Canada, in Ontario and in Quebec. It is not discriminatory in any way because it applies to all. Of course, I never thought anyone would argue in the House of Commons that we ought to tax a commodity which is used in Canada and not tax the commodity when it is used in the United States. That is what the intent of this tax is.

I should add for the hon. member's information that the increased tax is in lieu of an increase in price which is not to take place and that the increases in gas prices that will take place over the next several years will be lower than those projected in the December budget.

Mr. Crosbie: Nonsense. Try and be honest.

Mr. MacEachen: For example, next year the increase will be 45 cents per 1,000 cubic feet rather than 67½ cents per 1,000 cubic feet projected last December. So the hon. member ought to give me a little hand for that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I am not sure I can extract much sense out of that muddle. In fact, effective tomorrow the 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet tax is being levied on the residents who consume natural gas in their homes. To suggest a tax on exported natural gas is not a natural gas export tax is a childish form of deceit which insults the intelligence of every Canadian.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that this tax is clearly discriminatory to home owners using natural gas both in Ontario and in the western provinces? Has he calculated the tremendous inflationary impact which this tax will have on the production costs for many building materials, including concrete, wood products, plastics, paper and steel, all of which are manufactured in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have given consideration to all the questions the hon. member has raised and have gone ahead with this federal tax on gas in order to meet the wishes primarily of the producing provinces which objected to an exclusive tax on exports. If the hon. member will reflect on the difference in the potential and the application of these two taxes, he will know that there is a very considerable difference indeed. Anyway, I want him to reflect on that. I will not make any further observations.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INQUIRY RESPECTING COVERAGE FOR SPOUSES WORKING IN THE HOME

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It relates to a report attributed to her a while ago to the effect that the government would be bringing in amendments to the Canada Pension Plan so as to provide pension coverage for certain persons not now covered, including women who work in their homes. I want to ask the minister if she will make a statement at an early date concerning this legislation, and will she make it clear that any coverage for spouses, women who work in their homes, will be universal, not just a case of something made available to those who can afford to pay the premiums?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member underlines the challenge we are facing, which is to open up the Canada Pension Plan to housewives who want to contribute on a voluntary basis. The consequence is that if they have to pay at the maximum rate, which would be about $35 a month, only women in a certain social economic group will be able to participate. That is not bad and it is why we are going towards that route.

However, it does not cover the problem of those women in families with low or no income. Because of that problem, I will not be able to come to the House in the near future, and by that I mean in the coming months, with any proposal. We are still working on it. On our trip to Europe we checked all pension schemes known to European countries to cover housewives.

As to the other point, the amendments to the CPP regarding women who are partners of their husbands in small family enterprises, we will be bringing a proposal before the House very soon.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister. In view of what I take to be her commitment not to discriminate against those who cannot afford to pay premiums, and I refer to women in their homes, when the minister works on that problem, will she also try to do something to end the discrimination against single, divorced and widowed women between 60 and 65 who are denied pensions in that age bracket, even though they may need them, because they do not have a spouse?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I will certainly look into that question which was part of a general discussion we had in recent days and which is part of the mandate that I gave to my officials.

BILINGUALISM

INQUIRY WHETHER DEADLINES RESPECTING QUEBEC AIR SPACE WILL BE OBSERVED

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. A few years ago the Canadian government set up a commission of inquiry on the languages used in the nation's air space. One of the recommendations of the commission chaired by Messrs. Sinclair, Chouinard and Heald was to extend bilingualism in Quebec air space. Now, in the October 27 issue of the newspaper Le Devoir Mr. Pierre Pourchelle of the Association des Gens de l'air du Québec stated that the proposed schedule aimed at establishing bilingual services in Transport Canada in Quebec has been or would be delayed. So my question is this: first, will there really be a delay in the schedule proposed by the commission headed by Messrs. Sinclair, Chouinard and Heald, second, to what is this delay due and, if such is not the case, can the Minister of Transport confirm whether or not the deadlines for implementing bilingual services will be respected in Quebec air space?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the answer is yes. The program is being implemented according to a schedule which had been set after the previous government endorsed the Chouinard report. Phase I is now complete and concerns the airports at Dorval, Mirabel and Quebec City. Phase II covers the northern part of the province and is now under way. Phase III on eastern Quebec will come later. The Association des Gens de l'air would like to change the program which, of course, is very difficult, but we are trying to accommodate them as much as possible.

BANKRUPTCIES

ASTRA TRUST—RE-MOR—INQUIRY WHETHER CIRCUMSTANCES WILL BE EXAMINED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Finance). On October 10 I asked the minister two questions regarding the bankruptcy and winding up of Re-Mor and Astra Trust. The minister did not answer the questions at that time; he skated all around them. Has he now had a chance to look at my questions and reflect on them? Will he advise if the government will undertake an investigation and inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the bankruptcy and winding up of Re-Mor and Astra Trust, in view of the substantial losses suffered by innocent victims who were misled by questionable advertising and by bait and switch tactics?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I continued to study the Astra Trust and Re-Mor case after the question put to me by the hon. member. As I told him the first time, I would like to point out to him that from a legal standpoint we ought not to link unconditionally, as he seems to be doing, the cases of Astra Trust and Re-Mor. As he knows, and it would seem that I have to remind him of this, Astra Trust comes under federal jurisdiction whereas Re-Mor comes under provincial jurisdiction. In the case of Astra Trust the hon. member knows that the Superintendent of Insurance has launched bankruptcy proceedings so that the people who have filed claims will be paid up to $20,000 through the federal mechanism. As for Re-Mor, which is under provincial responsibility, claims must be filed with federal authorities. In his question the hon. member said something about an inquiry. He ought to know that last August the Superintendent of Insurance had already asked the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to inquire into the administrative procedures and the way the Astra board of directors managed the company. I understand that the Ontario Provincial Police is doing the same thing as regards Re-Mor. I am convinced therefore that if the police inquiries into one or the other of these two companies uncover administrative irregularities, proceedings will be taken before the courts.

● (1210)

[English]

Mr. Kempling: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Will the minister inquire into the quality of communications between the Department of Insurance and the Ontario provincial authorities? Because the view persists that had the quality of communications between the federal government and the provincial government been of a higher level, most of the losses, if not all of the losses, on the Re-Mor side could have been avoided.

Would he at the same time look into the allegations that are being made in the street of political interference and pressure applied to the approval of the Astra Trust application after it had been turned down three times within the department?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, in the first part of my reply I took time to indicate clearly and categorically the nature of the inquiries being made into each company: the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is investigating Astra, the Ontario Provincial Police is investigating Remor. I am convinced that these very serious investigators will cover all angles and all aspects referred to by the hon. member.

PETITIONS

WEST COAST OIL TANKER TRAFFIC

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the twenty-third report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Order, please. I have a notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

MR. FULTON—ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—MINISTERS' STATEMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I shall be very brief. My question of privilege arises from question period last Tuesday, October 21, when I put questions to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I shall quote briefly from pages 3870 and 3871 of Hansard. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans indicated that he had received the report that I was questioning him about and that he would "—have a fuller answer for the hon. member early next week." In my view, Madam Speaker, that would be Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said, within the text, that he was seriously considering a public inquiry and that "—discussions will be going on before I will be required to make any decision of that kind."

The Right Hon. Prime Minister said "—we asked for a review—".

I will give a very brief preamble, Madam Speaker, to the concerns that I have in my question of privilege. In 1977 the effluent mining liquid regulations were passed by this House. In mid-election last year, when Parliament was not sitting, regulations which strayed dramatically from legislation passed by this House, were made by order in council. These regulations are disputed by independent scientists, lawyers, fishermen, native people, the Anglican and Catholic Churches of Canada, environmental groups, the public, and members of this House. The passage of this special order in council infringes on the rights and privileges of myself and, in my view, of all members of this House.

Yesterday I gave the minister 24 hours' notice of this question of privilege, precisely where it was in Hansard, and the nature of it.

I believe that you should rule on two specific things, Madam Speaker, the first being in relation to orders that are passed when this House is not in session that give extraordinary rights or unique rights, as in this case, to major industrial developments. Part and parcel of that is whether the privileges of this House have been tampered with by the special order in council.

The second part of my question of privilege, and I believe the minister is prepared to respond to it today, is whether the statements made on October 21 in this House by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, are misleading to this House. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans indicated that a statement would be forthcoming regarding a full public inquiry into the dumping of toxic tailings into Alice Arm, British Columbia. In my view that statement should be made in this House, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I tried to take notes as the hon. member was speaking, so I hope that I did not mix up the dates he used.

I remember when the hon. member asked me about a report but I think I misunderstood. He was referring to the McCart report; I was referring to the report of my officials, of whom I had asked a review of the recommendations that had come forward in April, 1979.

Be that as it may, Madam Speaker, the officials in the Pacific region did make a review as I requested. They have now made it clear that nothing has emerged from their re-examination to lead them to change the recommendations they had made and which were eventually put into the order in council which was passed. The recommendations were that the tailings would be more safely stored at a very deep part of the Alice Arm bay and, in fact, in their judgment this was a safer approach than locating the tailings in a land-locked or land-based site where there would be very considerable bleaching.

I discussed the report with my officials at the beginning of this week when I was in British Columbia. The conclusion is the same as that arrived at some year and a half ago.

The new information is that I have written to the company stating exactly what monitoring devices would be required and what monitoring plan would be required before final approval was given.

In one of his questions the hon. member referred to the McCart report. A preliminary examination of that report seems to indicate that no substantive new information is provided. I am of the view, however, that the only way that the fears which exist can be contained or alleviated is by clear participation in the monitoring process. I have started discussions with my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to see how we can involve the Nishga tribe, which is worried about this issue, in a monitoring operation, and also how we can make information fully available. That has always been my approach.

In this case, my review of the situation leads me to think that this was a matter of what was, on balance, the best judgment. Until I have been given further information I think that would still be my position.

Obviously, Madam Speaker, I would like to see the situation where there is participation and full knowledge of the monitoring operation that would be required to make sure how these tailings are being disposed of and how the situation evolved. I hope I have answered some of the hon. member's worries.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that this exchange between the two hon. members has allowed both of them either to seek or to obtain further information, but certainly, even if there is a question of orders in council that are passed outside of sessions, that being a matter of government administration, I cannot see a question of privilege in the matter raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I merely wish, with your permission, to indicate my intention to raise a question of privilege when I have checked the blues, following a reply given by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to a question put by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) which, by my hearing, left the misleading impression that PetroCan pays taxes. I should like to check the blues and some other material which is in Hansard so that I may determine whether there is a question of privilege. If there is, I shall raise it.

MR. ROSE—INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise to give notice that I intend to raise a question of privilege in greater detail at another time. It concerns a reply I received from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to the effect that Canada was among world leaders in renewables and conservation. Intentionally or not, I think the minister misled the House, because while Canada is spending a great deal of money on the supply side, it certainly is not a world leader on the demand side or the conservation side.

• (1220)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I want to remind hon. members—and this is also for the hon. member for Mission-

Port Moody (Mr. Rose)—that they should give me written notice with a brief statement of what their question of privilege is about. It is not sufficient to raise it in the House.

IMMIGRATION ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) indicated to my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), that he intended to table today a document concerning the annual report to Parliament of immigration levels for 1981.

First, I am a little surprised that he did not table the document. Second, I am surprised that he would choose to table the document rather than answer questions in the House.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. For the information of the hon. member, that report has been sent to the Clerk's office. As he knows, there are two ways of tabling these documents. They are either tabled in the House or sent directly to the Clerk, and my information is that this document has been sent in.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, if I might just make my point of order, when a minister of the Crown does not even table in a direct manner, on a matter as fundamental as what the future or projected level of immigration will be for 1981, and when that minister does not choose to answer a few questions in the House of Commons but chooses instead simply to call a press conference and be questioned by members of the press but not by members of this House, I think it is a disgraceful performance, and I think it is something to be commented upon.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 41(1) allows the minister to do exactly what he has done. There is nothing in the procedure used by the minister which contravenes our standing orders, so I fail to see that there is a point of order.

MR. LESLIE JAMES BENNETT

Question No. 58—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, did Mr. Leslie James Bennett, formerly with the security services of the RCMP, arrive in Toronto from Australia on or about February, 1979, and did he testify at an Examination for Discovery in connection with a civil action against novelist Ian Adams?

2. To the knowledge of the government, did Mr. Bennett state in his testimony that in 1972 he was taken by RCMP personnel headed by then superintendent and now assistant commissioner Murray Sexsmith to an apartment in an Ottawa highrise commonly referred to by the security services as a "safe house"?

3. Was he questioned for a period of four days at the location by Mr. Sexsmith and/or others on the subject of whether or not he was a double agent and, if so (a) what was the conclusion drawn by the RCMP (b) did the RCMP suggest that he leave his RCMP post and depart from Canada as quickly as possible and, if so, what arrangements were made, if any, for such departure, financial or otherwise?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. It is a matter of public knowledge that Mr. Leslie James Bennett was in Canada in February, 1979, and that he participated in an Examination for Discovery in connection with a civil action against Mr. Ian Adams. Newspaper reports of November 15, 1979, reflect that libel action hearings did take place in Toronto last spring.

2. Yes.

3. Mr. Bennett was debriefed by the RCMP in line with the normal procedures of all western intelligence services. It would be inappropriate to comment further on the results of that debriefing as the issues involved are now before the courts in a civil action.

STATISTICS CANADA—QUESTIONNAIRE—"SURVEY OF THE OFFICES OF ARCHITECTS, 1977"

Question No. 225—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did Statistics Canada issue the questionnaire "Survey of the Offices of Architects, 1977" and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what is the object of the questionnaire (c) what will be done with the information received in response to the questionnaire (d) was the questionnaire sent to all architects (e) how many were sent out?

2. Are (a) all architects in a partnership (b) salaried architects employed by governments, required to complete the questionnaire?

3. How many replies (a) were received (b) included an unanswered question?

4. What is the penalty for not returning the questionnaire and is there a penalty if one or more of the questions are unanswered?

5. Have any fines been imposed in the past two years, on professional persons, for not completing similar questionnaires and, if so, how many?

6. What was the cost of producing the questionnaire?

7. What will be the cost of (a) processing (b) reporting on the questionnaire?

8. How many man-months of employment will be created by this project?

9. Will a report be produced and, if so (a) on what date (b) to whom will it be sent (c) by what means will the architects completing the questionnaire become aware of the availability of the report (d) who will distribute it (e) will it be listed in the daily checklist of Canadian government publications?

10. Approximately how many items are listed per annum in the daily checklist and what is the annual cost of a subscription to the checklist?

11. Were all (a) provincial governments (b) provincial associations of architects, contacted before the form was compiled?

12. Did all provincial governments and associations agree to the production of the questionnaire?

13. Is any part of the control of the conduct or activity of the profession of architecture that is unique to this profession, considered a responsibility of the government?

14. Is Alberta the only province in which architects are protected from completing such questionnaires by provincial legislation?

15. Did any person in the profession request the indepth knowledge of the expertise available in Canada and, if so, by whom was the request made and what was the capacity of that person?

16. Is an architect allowed to report his expenditures in the same groupings in which they are recorded in his accounts?

17. How many returns did not have question five completed in precisely the form requested?

18. Was there any prior warning to architects that they might be expected to complete such a form?

19. Was there any letter of explanation sent to architects to advise them for what reason such a form was considered necessary?

20. Will Statistics Canada have access to the individual tax returns of architects and, if so (a) on what date (b) will architects be made aware of such a request?

21. In what manner was the language of the architect determined?

22. Were English language forms, without accompanying French language forms, sent to architects in the province of Quebec and, if so, for what reason?

23. What professional groups received similar questionnaires in 1977?

24. What professional groups received similar questionnaires in 1978?

25. What professional groups will be questioned in 1979?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics Canada and the Department of Justice as follows: Statistics Canada reports the following:

1. Yes, the "Survey of the Offices of Architects, 1977" was issued by Statistics Canada.

(a) This profession forms one of the survey responsibilities of the merchandising and services division at Statistics Canada.

(b) This survey is made in order to provide the profession as well as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce with more detailed information. There are also requirements for this information for the system of national accounts division at Statistics Canada.

(c) Once the information is received it is aggregated, analysed and published.

(d) The questionnaire was sent to all architectural practices.

(e) 1,707.

2. (a) No. One questionnaire per partnership had to be completed.

(b) No.

3. (a) At the close of the survey, 1,648 responses had been received.

(b) Less than 10 per cent included an unanswered question.

4. The penalty for not returning the questionnaire (i.e., 'refusing or neglecting to answer') is a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or both. No penalty is imposed if one or more of the questions is unanswered.

5. No.

6. The cost of producing the questionnaire was approximately $2,000.

7. (a) and (b) The estimated cost of processing and reporting on the questionnaire was $43,000.

8. The number of person-months created by this project was 12.

9. (a), (b), (c) A report was produced in June, 1979. Reports were sent to the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, L'Ordre des Architectes and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Architects who had completed the questionnaire were notified of the availability of the report through their associations. It also may be requested directly from Statistics Canada.

(d) and (e) The distribution was made by Statistics Canada. The report was listed in the Statistics Canada Daily Bulletin.

10. The checklist is a Department of Supply and Services publication. Due to budgetary cutbacks the checklist is now produced weekly. Approximately 4,000 items are listed per annum and the cost is $52 per year per subscription.

11. (a) Provincial governments were not contacted directly before the form was compiled but representatives of provincial governments in attendance at the federal-provincial conference in May, 1977, were informed that the survey was planned for 1978. Subsequently, an agreement was arranged to exchange information with the Alberta Bureau of Statistics.

(b) Yes.

12. (a) See answer to 11(a).

(b) All provincial associations of architects agreed to the production of the questionnaire.

13. See Justice's reply.

14. Statistics Canada is not aware of the existence of such provincial legislation. The agreement with Alberta stipulates that any firm which does not wish Statistics Canada to share information with the province of Alberta concerning that firm, must say so in writing to Statistics Canada. No details of this firm would then be released to the Alberta Bureau of Statistics. (This information is printed on the questionnaire).

15. The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, L'Ordre des Architectes du Québec and the Ontario Architect Association expressed interest in the extent of architectural expertise available in Canada. Requests were not received from individuals.

16. Yes.

17. Less than 10 per cent of returns did not have question 5 completed in precisely the form requested.

18. The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada contacted all component associations in December, 1977, to announce the forthcoming survey. Associations were informed of the mail-our date in March, 1978, and were requested to inform their members. In addition, 32 firms randomly selected across the country were advised of the proposed survey and sent an early draft questionnaire for their comments.

19. No. The objectives of the survey were printed directly on the form.

20. (a) The Statistics Act, 1971, section 23, provides Statistics Canada access to income tax returns. For the calendar year 1977, returns are available from September, 1978, onwards.

(b) Architects will be informed only on request.

21. The language of the architect was determined by matching the list supplied by the associations against the business register. Where a language indicator was available on the register, it was used.

22. No. When a language indicator was not available, firms in Quebec were sent both a French and an English form, as were firms in Quebec which appeared either on the association's list or the business register but not on both.

23. In so far as Statistics Canada is concerned: none.

24. In so far as Statistics Canada is concerned: none.

25. Engineering and scientific services.

Department of Justice reports the following: 13. No.

FRENCH LANGUAGE INSTRUCTION

Question No. 890—Mr. Flis:

1. What amount was spent by the government for the school year (a) September, 1977 to June, 1978 (b) September, 1978 to June, 1979 for (i) French language instruction (ii) heritage language instruction (iii) teacher training (iv) elementary education (v) secondary education (vi) post secondary education?

2. What percentage of the funds allocated towards education were spent for the purpose intended?

3. What accountability do the provinces give to the government as to the expenditure of such moneys?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

NOTE: All amounts in the following text are provided by federal fiscal year (April 1, 1977 to March 31, 1978, and April 1, 1978, to March 31, 1979) which is the basis of accounting for such expenditures.

1. (i) The amounts contributed by the Government of Canada to the provinces in support of French under official languages in education excluding teacher training were:

	French as a second language	French as a minority language	Total
1977-78	$17,587,909	$43,839,327	61,427,236

In addition, the sums of $18,300,950 and $19,925,362 were contributed for programs of support towards French as a second language, French as a minority language, and English as a second language in 1977-78 and 1978-79 respectively. These figures cannot be broken down into separate categories of minority language education and second language instruction.

(ii) The amounts contributed by the Government of Canada to voluntary ethno-cultural organizations for heritage language instruction including expenditures for learning aids were:

These expenditures were essentially made at the elementary level.

(iii) The amounts contributed by the Government of Canada to the province under the official languages in education programs and to voluntary ethno-cultural organizations under the multiculturalism programs for teacher training were:

(iv) (v) Statistics for official languages in education are not maintained in a manner which would enable the department to provide data on contributions to the provinces in respect of elementary and secondary levels separately without an inordinate amount of work, time, and cost. Total combined contributions to provinces for elementary and secondary levels of education under official language in education were:

1977-78	$160,312,451

See (ii) for heritage language training.

(vi) The amounts contributed by the Government of Canada to the provinces at the post-secondary level under the official languages in education program were:

1978-79	50,091,519

The amounts transferred to the provinces for post secondary education under established programs financing in tax and cash were:

1977-78	$2,114,870,000
1978-79	2,422,097,000

NOTE 1: For parts IV, V, VI of question 1 the following amounts were contributed under official languages in education for minority official language education and second language instruction but cannot be attributed to any specific level of the education system.

2. It is judged that 100 per cent of the funds provided to the provinces by the Government of Canada under official languages in education was spent for the purposes intended. The formula payments contributions, which are based upon information provided by Statistics Canada regarding student enrolments and provincial costs of education, in fact, constitute partial reimbursements for costs already incurred by the provincial governments. Contributions for non-formula programs take the form of reimbursements for provincial claims which are submitted in accordance with predetermined guidelines for expenses paid for the programs involved. Similarly it is judged that 100 per cent of the funds provided to voluntary ethno-cultural organizations by the Government of Canada under the multiculturalism programs was spent for the purposes intended. This information is not available for transfers under established programs financing.

3. As stated in question 2, for official languages in education, the formula payment contributions were paid to the provinces, based upon information provided by Statistics Canada. More specifically, data regarding student enrolments in minority and second official language programs and the provincial per student costs of education at the elementary and secondary levels, and the actual provincial operating grant to eligible institutions at the post-secondary level are used to calculate payments. The federal contributions represent a proportion of costs already incurred by the provincial governments in providing minority official language education and second language instruction, and no further accountability is provided. Payments for non-formula programs are paid on a reimbursement basis based on provincial claims for costs incurred. Payments under the multiculturalism program are made on a grant basis and are not further accountable. The legislation governing the transfers under the established programs financing arrangements does not require provincial governments to account to the federal government concerning the expenditure of funds.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Question No. 1,433—Mr. Crosby:

Was the study and master plan for the port of Halifax commissioned by the Canadian Marine Transportation Administration in September-October of 1979 completed and (a) if so, on what date will it be made available to persons interested in the port (b) if not, on what date will it be completed?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): As far as the National Harbours Board is concerned: No.

(b) Early November, 1980.

SECRETARY OF STATE—ADMINISTRATION AND POLICY CONSULTANTS

Question No. 765—Mr. Shields:

Since August 1, 1978, how many (a) administrative (b) policy consultants were under contract to the Department of the Secretary of State and/or any boards, commissions or corporations reporting to the minister and, in each case, what amount was paid to them?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the other questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE IN INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East) moved:

That this House condemns the government for having failed to harness the energies and talents of Canada's scientific and technological community in the development of an industrial strategy which would draw on Canada's traditional resource base, on our manufacturing strength, and on our new high technology industries.

He said: Madam Speaker, when preparing this motion our caucus stood back and had an over-all look at the ups and downs of the Canadian economy over the last decade or so, and the dismal inability of the budget which was presented earlier this week to come to terms effectively with the problems with which the people of this country have been trying to wrestle and find solutions. Surely we do have one of the best endowed countries in terms of resources and wealth in the world today. Surely we have a country which, compared with most other countries in the world, is one of the least developed.

We have a very young population. Our development is only 100 or less years, and we have a very thin population. There is still very, very much to be done. Yet what we have found in the last decade or so is an unemployment level which is unacceptable. It is even higher than those in more developed countries with larger populations and fewer resources. I think of the Scandinavian countries, Great Britain, Holland, Germany, etc. We must wonder how it is possible that a country with so much going for it can find itself in such a crippled, weak, and second-class position. Obviously the government seated opposite, which is the party which has dominated this country for the last two decades, must surely accept the major responsibility for the fact that the strength of this country has been drained and has not been utilized, co-ordinated, or brought together to bring solutions to the problems we face.

One of the important areas of the failure of this government is that of research and development, and the failure to utilize the technological know-how of our trained university graduates. In fact, over the last decade or so we have seen continuous erosion as young people, not being able to find employment in this country, leave it and go mainly to the United States. That represents a loss of our public investment in their education. If we are going to stop the erosion of Canada's manufacturing base and improve our competitive position in the international high technological market, it is essential that we have a coherent policy on research and development.

The benefits of research and development have been well documented. They include increased employment, greater output of growth in that particular sector of the economy, improved market penetration, and lower costs to the consumer for goods with high research and development components. In a study of the performance of Canadian manufacturing industries between 1961 and 1974 the Ministry of State for Science and Technology found that research and development intensive industries had almost triple the growth rate, twice the productivity, significantly greater rates of employment and less inflation in prices than industries not engaged in research and development. It has been shown as well that for every dollar spent on research and development a return of at least $30 is produced.

Yet despite the fact that even government studies have shown the effectiveness and importance of research and development, the record of this government in that area is dismal. It is cynical. If I were a little more paranoid and thought in terms of international espionage, I would come to the conclusion that this government has deliberately sabotaged research and development in this country and weakened this country's position. How cynical this government is!

In 1968 the federal cabinet set a goal for expenditure on research and development of 2 per cent of the gross national product. The Lamontagne Senate committee in 1972 recommended that 2.5 per cent of the gross national product go to research and development by 1978. In actual fact, in that decade research and development in this country fell by some 36 per cent. Again we find that in June of 1978, the then minister in charge, Judd Buchanan, set a goal of 1.5 per cent by 1983, and this year, lo and behold, in the Speech from the Throne we have another great Liberal promise that by 1985 we will achieve the goal of 1.5 per cent. Consistently the government has paid lip service, and that is about it. That is in fact what the Liberals are known for, their lips. It is all promises and no action. The present budget is a great example of this.

What is it in the present budget that was presented to us which would bring us one step closer to the stated goal? There are no plans in place, there is no strategy outlined. It is a continuation of the same policies that this government has followed for years and years—that is, the policy of 'do nothing', to allow the resources of this country to be shipped out, to allow the continuation of high industry and high technology being imported into this country, and to allow the continued weakening of this country, deepening our inability to make it on our own.

An hon. Member: And they call themselves Canadians.

Mr. de Jong: All we have is the trappings. Yes, we have a flag, and yes, we are going to have the constitution, but the guts of the country have been sold, shipped out and drained off. We do not have the ability to determine our own economic destiny. We do not have the ability to train and employ our young people in the field of technology. All we have is lip service.

The major problem in our country today, in terms of achieving the goal of 1.5 per cent of the gross national product for research and development—which I think is even too low—is our industrial make-up. The fact is that most of the important industries in this country are nothing but branch plants, that most of the important industry in this country, such as the manufacturing industry, is controlled from outside this country. The multinationals in this country have a dismal record of research and development. It is not necessarily the fact that we have not had sufficient public funds going into this area that has caused the problem. In fact on that score we do relatively the same as other countries. But the fact is that the private sector has not been able to pull its weight in terms of research and development.

It is not the Canadian owned public sector, it is the multinational sector of the private industry that has not pulled its weight. This was admitted this year in June by the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) when he spoke to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and said that if we are to meet our medium-term objective in research and development it will have to be through the efforts of foreign-controlled companies in this country. He went on to suggest that it will require a $2.4 billion increase in outlays on research and development, most of which will have to come from the foreign private sector. Foreign ownership is highest in Canada's research intensive industries, and it is these industries that have the highest profits. In other words, the industries which show the highest profits in this country are foreign owned and make the least contribution to research and development.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. de Jong: If we had a proper research and development program we would not have the unemployment problem or the inflation problem we have in this country. For example, Mr. Pocock, who was research director of the Lamontagne Senate Committee on Research and Development, suggested that if Canada had a research and development figure of 1.5 per cent of the gross national product in 1978,—and assuming that in order to reach that figure, 85 per cent of it would have come from the private industry—there would have been an extra 10,600 jobs for scientists and engineers, we would have had a total of 1.52 million new jobs created in the new industrial activities, and we would have had an extra $15.4 billion in exports. It would have solved our balance of payments problems and our unemployment problems.

Government studies have shown this, so why the inaction? Why not look at the obvious facts that all the highly paid mandarins and research people whom the government has hired have been telling it over all these years? Yet there has been no action, no results. Indeed, there has been a continuation of the 'do nothing' government. If anything, the Trudeau years will be remembered as the years when the essence of this country was drained, when the strength of this country was drained, making Canada more and more impotent.

There is nothing in the budget on how to deal with multinationals, how to force them to invest a decent amount of money in research and development in this country. There is talk, as there is always from across the benches. It is always being studied, it is always being considered. We have another committee, most probably a parliamentary committee or a royal commission, but no further action. There is talk about some tax incentives to industry. Already we have some very decent tax incentives for industry in order to encourage research and development, but they have not worked. The main reason is that the multinationals do not need them. They have access to cheap technology from their mother company and from their head office. The Canadian companies, the smaller businesses, which need it, very often do not have the income to benefit from the tax deductions.

What this party suggests is that more direct grants be made to Canadian industry and Canadian business and that the government and private industry make a deal, saying, "We will give you X amount of money to develop new technologies, provided that you guarantee that the jobs remain in this country." In other words, this party suggests that the government stop handing out the money, as they all too often do, and start making public money useful and working for the benefit of this country. All the money that has gone down the drain in this area, if used in an enlightened way, could have produced a much stronger research and development component in this country.

We object to tax incentives for research and development. I think there are wiser and better ways of doing it. Also, studies have shown that tax incentives will not work and have not worked in the past. It is shown as well that when you create tax incentives, essentially employment is created for lawyers and tax experts, and in too many cases employees, who would normally be doing other work in the company such as quality control, all at once are put on the payroll of the research and development section. In other words, there are too many loopholes and you do not achieve the desired affect.

We are suggesting, first, that direct grants be made to industries; and second, that we use a little bit of coercive power on the multinationals, in other words, that the government put into place an over-all tax and use that money in a special fund for research and development. Any company should be able to draw on that fund, provided again that they do the research and development in Canada and keep it here.

It is often asked: what can we do? We are such a small country, we just do not have the resources or the population base to produce effectively in this country a proper research and development component. Let me cite again from the research study by Mr. Pocock of the Lamontagne committee. He compared us with a group of countries which he called Norden—consisting of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Finland—in 1975. The total population of the northern group was 27.4 million. Canada's population at the time was 23.3 million which was relatively comparable. They have the same topography, the same climate, and some of the same resources as we do here. Yet the industries in the Norden countries in 1975 spent $1.26 billion in U.S. dollars on research and development. What private industry in Canada spent at that time was only $681 million, roughly half of what was spent in those countries. The labour force employed in those countries in industry was some 33.4 per cent. Here it was only 26.6 per cent of our labour force. Smaller countries like Norway, Sweden and Denmark are able to do it. Why can we not do it here?

Mr. Deans: There is a lack of initiative.

Mr. de Jong: There is a lack of initiative, foresight and imagination.

Mr. Deans: There is a lack of caring.

Mr. de Jong: There is nothing in the budget which deals with how we will force the multinationals to do proper research and development in the country. The budget totally ignores the fact that any viable national economic strategy must emphasize two closely related objectives. The first would be the policies which must be formulated to channel capital and human resources together so that we can start tackling the technological problems this country faces, to channel capital and human resources together to bring business, labour, universities and government together to work out and develop coherent research and development policies and initiatives. Second, in order to fulfil the competitive requirements for improving Canada's industrial productivity, efficiency and employment, the federal government must through its policies vigorously promote the expansion of indigenous high technology manufacturing and the research efforts of our universities.

Specifically, the budget fails to address three key questions. What physical incentives are most likely to increase industrial research and development and technological innovation in Canada? How can government procurement be utilized more effectively to increase the demand for Canada's technology? How can we increase the export sales of Canadian made technology and reduce our traditional and very costly dependence on foreign imported technology?

I have been in touch with the Canadian Medical Research Council and it is very concerned about the implications of the budget. The council would like to know if the government will adopt the medical research proposals for support of biomedical research in Canada, and if so, what level of support will the MRC receive, particularly in view of the proposed spending restraints in the social affairs envelope. There were some ominous noises by the Minister of Finance about the social affairs envelope. There were suggestions of moneys being saved.

Concerning the agreements with the provinces on cost-sharing, especially of higher education in the universities, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1976 promised that these programs were permanent, and if they were to be changed, they would only be changed subject to three years' notice. No three years' notice has been given, but it sounds from the budget as if these agreements will be changed and that the universities will end up with the short end of the stick. We cannot afford this any more. We have had too much of a brain drain already. Our universities are at the end of their ropes. They cannot continue with further cutbacks and slashes in their budgets. Young Canadians going into universities see no promise for employment at the end of the road. That is why they are now either not doing postgraduate studies, or are leaving the country. This drain must be stopped and stopped fast, if we are to meet the requirements five or ten years down the line, if we are to meet the requirements for trained people. The budget gives no assurances whatsoever that the drain will be stopped, that the government is prepared to tackle this problem and come up with some decent solutions. There is no hope in the budget at all. Throughout the universities across the country there is uncertainty.

It is not that we do not need trained people coming out of the universities. For example, I have been quite concerned with the whole area of pesticides and the testing thereof. Recently it has come to light that a number of the major American chemical testing firms that test our pesticides have deliberately falsified their results. There is a tremendous need for trained toxicologists in this particular field. I brought this matter to the attention of the government and they said, "Oh, no, we cannot do it. It will cost at least $8 million in core funding for the next five years; it is an impossible task". What a phony answer; what a phony answer!

There are decent programs throughout the country which are starving for funds. They are not asking for $8 million. Scientists at the University of Ottawa are trying to get a centre of toxicology together. They have their building, yet they have spent the last year or so scraping here and there for funding. They need some $30,000 to $40,000 to hire a director. There is no money for this, so the program is idle. It is not that we do not need toxicologists. Hundreds of new chemicals enter the market every year. We know a lot of these chemicals are not properly tested. We do not know what effects they are having on the health and welfare of Canadians. They must definitely be tested, yet the government opposite will not give the University of Ottawa some $30,000 to go on with the job of training toxicologists so that, five or six years down the road, there will be some trained toxicologists in the country who can at least deal with the amount of chemicals entering the market. It is not that we will not pay the price. Of course we will pay the price. Every time there is Love Canal, or a thalidomide enters the market, somebody must pay. Generally it ends up that the government opposite is quite willing to hand out public funds to pay for mistakes, as it has done over and over again.

It is the insanity of the government opposite that it is not willing to spend a dollar today in order to save some $40 and $50 down the road. It is crazy thinking. It is thinking which arises because there is no coherent plan or policy. There is no coherent five-year projection in terms of what is needed and what is coming down the road. It is a government that reacts, reacts all the time.

I remember sitting in the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture when the estimates were before it. I indicated to the minister in charge that there were various new technologies coming down the road. I indicated that they would have a tremendous impact on the work force and on Canadian people generally. I asked him what was being done in order to direct this type of technological innovation and make certain that it benefited people rather than people simply reacting to it and it creating havoc in our society. The minister said—and I think it sums up the philosophy of the whole Liberal party and the Liberal government—"our role is not to initiate, our role is but to react". In other words, those particular technological innovations will come down the line, they will affect people, they will disrupt the work force and people's lives, and then the government will try to pick up the pieces. Surely in these times an ounce of prevention is what is needed.

An hon. Member: They would rather have beaver and goose ads.

Mr. de Jong: Yes, they would rather have beaver and goose ads. Indeed, that is their notion of prevention, a little bit of propaganda and saying to the folks out there, "Everything is all right, Charlie; just keep on whistling and the great Liberal party will make certain the sun rises tomorrow and we will all be happy." What a lip service job!

We need a coherent policy. This country can do it. We have trained, intelligent people. They should not have to go to the United States. In fact most of them do not want to go there. They want to be employed here and raise their families. Yet, somehow we always seem crippled, not quite capable or big enough. How stupid of me to think we can do these things ourselves, that we are big enough and strong enough to do these things ourselves. We are just a small little country in the shadow of this big giant. All we can do is a bit of fiddling here and there. We can never take control over our destiny and determine what type of future we will have. Oh, no, we should just react and pick up the pieces and shelter ourselves a bit from the slings and arrows which emanate from the south and other parts of the world. Surely there is no other country in the world more capable, especially with resources such as ours, of determining and shaping its own destiny. We need a national science and industrial policy.

We must put some of the things together and develop some coherent planning. We need a Department of Science and Technology with a full-time minister. I congratulate the Conservatives, at least they had a full-time minister. We do not, or at least the present government does not.

An hon. Member: Watch those Freudian slips.

Mr. de Jong: When I said "we" I meant this country. We do not have a full-time minister. He is running off to England and doing other things. We need a Department of Science and Technology which can begin to co-ordinate all the research done in various government departments. We do not have a minister who is on top of it. We do not have a department which is on top of it. Some research gets done in health, agriculture, and some here and some there. There is duplication and wastage.

● (1250)

Mr. Knowles: And some not at all.

Mr. de Jong: Then there are other times when the budget is cut and, of course, research is one of the first things which gets cut. There is no priority and no sense of wholeness.

I would like to quote from Dr. B. Cinader, who is from the University of Toronto. He describes what is really needed in the area of research and development. He says:

> In short, one needs to initiate a process by which industrial innovation and applied research are defined by long-term national objectives, and in which strategy can be refined through processes of model building and of projections of future supplies in raw materials and international and national demands for them. The process of determining attainability of objectives and of choosing, ultimately, the paths by which the scientific components of national objectives is to be reached, will clearly have an important formative effect on our vision of Canada and will help us develop our national aspiration for the future.

That is what a national policy should be. It should have some notion of the future, some objectives regarding what we can be and how to get there, instead of floundering around as the members opposite do all too often.

I am reminded of a little verse by Melanie, who was one of the popular singers of the seventies. She had a very nice line, which was "You only pay a nickel, but you want a dollar song." That sums up the government opposite.

In closing I would like to quote T. S. Eliot's somewhat pessimistic but I think very accurate poem, "The Hollow Men." It aptly describes the record of the government. Here are a few of the key verses:

We are the hollow men
We are the stuffed men
Leaning together
Headpiece filled with straw. Alas!
Our dried voices, when
We whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless
As wind in dry grass
Or rats' feet over broken glass
In our dry cellar
Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralysed force, gesture without motion;
Those who have crossed
With direct eyes, to death's other Kingdom
Remember us—if at all—not as lost
Violent souls, but only
As the hollow men
The stuffed men.

Mr. Speaker, the way in which T. S. Eliot ends his poem is again very apt when applied to the government opposite. It calls attention to the difference between the lip service and the promises, the fancy dancing, which the members opposite want to do, and the actual product—the end results. He ends the poem this way:

Between the idea
And the reality
Between the motion
And the act
Falls the Shadow

Maybe instead of "Falls the Shadow" we should say "Falls the Liberal party".

The poem continues:

Between the conception
And the creation
Between the emotion
And the response
Falls the Shadow
Between the desire
And the spasm
Between the potency
And the existence
Between the essence
And the descent
Falls the Shadow

There falls ten, 20—how many years of Liberal governments' wasted opportunities, and with it the sapping of our strength. Mr. Speaker, we have moved this motion because of what we feel has been a total neglect of our strength, our human strength, our manufacturing and resource strength. It is a motion which condemns this government and it must surely stand and be held accountable for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties with respect to allowing the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) to speak a little later this afternoon. He is now on his way back to Ottawa. So we have agreed to call it one o'clock now.

Mr. Knowles: One o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is so ordered.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 12.56 p.m. the House took recess.

• (1400)

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition is, of course, very pleased to participate in the debate today on research and development. I would like to say debate, but perhaps the word "charade" would be more appropriate. We welcome any opportunity to prod, push and shove a reluctant government closer to the realization of the vital need to overhaul its attitude to research and development drastically and its priorities in spending and investing in technological upgrading.

I say investing rather than spending because there is a vast difference between spending massive amounts, multimillions of dollars on ongoing support programs, schemes and make-work situations, as opposed to heavily investing in legitimate job creation of an ongoing nature. By legitimate job-creating programs, I refer to those that result in lifelong career opportunities for young Canadians and long-term job opportunities for all Canadians in an industrial society which can take its place among the high technology, industrial societies of the world and not be gunned down by the Japanese, Germans, French and Americans, our industrial competitors who can out-produce us and undercut us in price and innovativeness.

Recent newspapers indicate the high priority that research is getting with such headlines as "Medical Researchers Issue Urgent Call for Funds", "Scientists Urged to Fight", "Ottawa Plans to Move Soon to Spur Research and Development", and "It's High Noon for High Technology". All these articles urge the government to get with it and develop our industrial capability. But what is happening to Canada today is what has been happening to Canada for years. This government has been warned for over a decade, by extremely knowledgeable and concerned scientists and industrialists, that our resource export strategy, if I could call it a strategy, unreinforced by higher technology processing, would cost us dearly in future years. At best we would become laminaters of wood and pumpers of water. That is one step up from the hewers of wood and drawers of water. One step up is about where we are.

Have you ever visited, Mr. Speaker, Upper Canada Village? Many Canadians visit Upper Canada Village each year to view the grain mills grinding wheat, the spinning wheels spinning yarn, and the saw mills cutting logs into rough boards. We go there to see how things were done in Canada 100 or 200 years ago. Things were simple and straightforward then, and we chuckle to ourselves and marvel at the slowness of the operations and the patience of the craftspeople of the day. We also recognize that such operations could not exist and compete with the much faster and more efficient operations of today in milling, spinning, and lumber. But I wonder how many of us realize that if we walked into many of Canada's manufacturing plants today we would be looking at operations designed and carried on 50 or 100 years ago. Some of the equipment is bigger and faster, but the processes themselves are technologies of the past century. They are technologies which would be better passed on to Third World countries with their lower labour rates. Like the spinners and weavers of Upper Canada Village, these technologies are the slow and obsolete processes of the nineteenth century in a world which has almost passed out of the twentieth century.

And how do we get away with such obsolete planning and processing, backed up by obsolete government thinking? Why is there not a demand by Canadians for action to make Canada the most resource rich country in the world, the world leader in technology? Certainly Canada's scientists have spelled it out for us, both the pitfalls and the benefits.

It is very clear that Canadians do not realize that their high standard of living, bought with money raised through the sale of natural resources, is declining and will continue to decline as the world passes, in fact, rockets by us, with technological development of new products and processes which will make Canadian industry obsolete and deprive us of jobs.

Now this is not long-range future stuff. This is the stuff of the 1990s, the 1980s and even today. It is the provable, urgent message which industrialists, scientists, economists and researchers from all facets of Canadian industry have been telling this government for over a decade. To enjoy the benefits of higher technological manufacturing, you must be prepared to invest in research. From research comes design, invention, and innovation. From these come useful products and processes which will not only benefit Canadians through job creation, but which can be sold to other nations for other benefits. This means fewer imported goods, more exported goods; improved balance of payments for Canada, investment opportunities for Canadians, and career opportunities for young Canadians entering the work force. High technology companies do all these things. They have a higher rate of growth in employment than low research industries. They have higher productivity and they have annual price increases about half as great as those of low technology companies, so they benefit the consumers as well.

Knowing all these facts, what has the Trudeau government done about leading Canada forward through the decade of the seventies to world leadership in technology? Surely Canada's all-time biggest spender would be able to invest handsomely in vital research? For a man who claims to have a vision for Canada, perhaps a socialist one, but a vision nevertheless, surely his vision would include funding the most obvious and necessary component for national and social benefit, namely, research.

But instead, let us look at the record. In 1967 Canada invested 1.4 per cent of its gross national product in research and development. In 1968 the new Trudeau government established a goal of 2 per cent GNP, definitely good news. But a decade later where has all the talk led us? We now have a new low of less than 1 per cent, .9 per cent to be exact, and we find ourselves on a par with other non-industrial nations like Ireland, Italy, and Iceland.

Now what is the government saying? The new minister of state for science, technology, environmental and constitutional affairs is once again talking sweet talk about new and high goals. By 1985, he says, we will be spending 1.5 per cent of GNP on research. But the federal government accounts for less than one third of total research spending in Canada. Provincial governments do some, but it is the private sector which must carry the load, and foreign firms, which used to do more research than Canadian firms, since 1975 do less. They are not treating us as sales opportunities for their foreign bases and they do not do research in Canada to a sufficient degree. How will the government encourage them or force them to do their fair share of research and grant world product mandate to Canada?

And even if we did reach 1.5 per cent by 1985, and I say to the minister we will not, where will that put us relative to our international competitors? Already our biggest competitor to the south is at 2.4 per cent. West Germany is at about 2.2 per cent, and Japan the world leader in technology is over 2 per cent and aiming to double that by 1985. So you see, Mr. Speaker, even if this government did reach its target—and I repeat that it will not—it will be too little and too late.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the ill-fated Conservative government—by that I mean ill-fated for Canada—had set a target of 2.5 per cent research spending. With the serious commitment of government, backed by tax incentives, grants and strong government purchasing policies, that figure could be reached. It requires the understanding and the will of government to do it, not just to talk about it.

Take, for example, the massive contribution which research has made to the petroleum industry in enhanced recovery techniques. Instead of being able to extract about 20 per cent from an average oil well, we can now get about 35 per cent. It leaves a lot of oil in the ground, but it gets a lot more out, and all of that as a result of research. Think what that does for Canada's energy future, and think what such an increase in wealth accrues to Canada as a result of direct research.

Earlier I mentioned Japan's 1985 objective of 4 per cent research investing. Let us look at that country's progress over the past 35 years since its devastation by military defeat. Let me cite some examples given to a high technology conference here in Ottawa—a conference which, unfortunately, the minister did not attend—where 200 of the country's highest technology presidents and chief executives talked about the problems of technology in Canada. At that conference the minister might have learned something about the desperate need for technology in Canada. Mr. Walter Light, President of Northern Telecom, Canada's largest private research and development establishment, spoke at that conference. He is a man who, for years, has been trying to get this government to see the errors of its ways and its attitudes toward research. He gave us some very good examples of Japanese programs.

Japan, rising from the depths of almost total industrial devastation, is in the process of surpassing the United States as an industrial power. Think about that. Japan, a nation virtually without natural resources, a nation no bigger than the state of Montana and with only half the population of the U.S. is, because of determination and technological development, about to surpass the world's industrial leader.

Even though Japan's unionized labour costs have risen to par with those of the U.S., Japanese companies have consistently raised productivity and expanded their ability to produce quality products at the most competitive prices in the world, using our natural resources.

So, all you trade unionists in the NDP take note. We are selling our coal, steel, nickel and aluminum to Japan at an average price of about 50 cents a pound, and we are buying back Toyotas and Datsuns at about $3 a pound and more. It is that six, seven and eight times multiplier which is the job-creation program of the present government. That is what this government is doing in job creation. It is creating many jobs, jobs in Japan, Germany, Sweden and the United States. That is not just illogical, it is not just lack of direction and leadership, it is just plain stupid. It is bungling and inept government. It is a government which is selling Canada short.

Japan is now producing ten million cars annually, about 100 times what it produced 20 years ago and the equal of a good year in the United States.

What country do you think of, Mr. Speaker, when you think of precision tools and equipment, or watches? Switzerland, I suggest. Well, last year Japan produced ten million more watches than the Swiss. This is a classic example of how quickly a country can lose its world leadership if it ignores the new electronic technologies. The Japanese have long since overtaken and replaced the United States as the world leader in television and radio production. Japanese steel plants have the same capacity as the U.S. and almost as much as the entire European common market, and they are so technologically sophisticated that the U.S. uses Japanese standards as the base for measuring its trigger price for dumping.

In 1978, Japanese investment in new plant and equipment equalled that of the United States, but remember, with half the population the investment per capita was twice that of the U.S., and in the early 1980s it will surpass the U.S. in total research and development.

Very soon Japan will be a world leader in computers as it is in motorcycles, machine tools, copying machines, semi-conductors and even, perish the thought, snowmobiles.

What do we have to do to get this government to listen, to think and to discharge its duty and responsibility to lead Canada back into the technological age, to make Canada technologically competent, competitive, independent and capable of developing its own vast resources in order to sell finished products to the world and lower its dependence and vulnerability to world prices?

Will we forever maintain a back seat in the growth technologies of electronics and biotechnologies? These are not mysterious mumbo-jumbo words and unattainable objectives for a land such as Canada. They do not require large industrial complexes and vast populations. What they do call for is commitment; long-term, steady, determined commitment and large investments in money, as well as trained people and specialized industrialized resources. They are perfect for a resource rich, educated and skilled population such as Canada's.

In order to obtain large quantities of investment dollars, Canada should employ the same techniques it has used so effectively on frontier oil drilling and film making. Why should there not be a "super depletion" type of tax incentive for people willing to invest in high risk high technology companies just as in high risk drilling and high risk movie making? Certainly many films have recently been made in Canada, and not even this government could be so blind as to see the far greater benefits to Canada in having its citizens invest in high technology companies rather than in movie making.

Biotechnology is another new buzz word, a research field pregnant with possibilities for energy development, new manufacturing processes and greatly increased agricultural production. Canada should be getting in on the ground floor in order to enjoy the excellent returns just a few years down the road. Unlike unemployment insurance funds spent this year, next year and every year as an ongoing cost and burden to taxpayers of the future, biotechnology investment will return the money invested 20, 30 and 50-fold, while providing ongoing jobs to coming generations of Canadians.

Is this too much to ask of government? Is it too much to ask of the members opposite to take the time to acquaint themselves with the facts, the appalling record of Liberal government performance to date and the unquestioned opportunities which lie ahead, if we have the will and the resolve to grasp them? Well, regrettably, Mr. Speaker, it probably is too much to ask. This government is too involved with constitutional bickering, resource stealing and land grabbing, in between rounds of fighting with all the provinces and regions of Canada.

If we look at the record of the past Liberal decade we can read clearly of the decline of a once dynamic nation which could have had the world by the tail as far as economic prosperity is concerned. Instead, thanks to non-leadership, Canada is going backwards in technology, productivity, and relative standard of living. We are going upwards, boy are we going upwards, in government wasted spending, in annual deficits and in national indebtedness. All of these problems could be greatly aided by a serious effort to raise our level of technological competence.

We could start by having a full-time minister of science and technology, a full-time senior minister who understood, believed in, and would fight to convince a tired and unimaginative cabinet of the desperate need for greatly increased funding of vitally needed research. The economic and social benefits to Canada would be just a few short years down the road, and they would be big benefits.

It is true they would come just too late to help this governmnent survive the next election because research opportunities in Canada, when clearly plotted, show that a research company operates for five to eight years at a break even or loss position. However, the benefits beyond the eight years are clearly in the many times multiplier in profit generation for this nation.

If the government could see its way clear to fund past the next election, to give research and scientists a long-range opportunity to launch into these vitally needed long-term scientific projects, there would be great benefits down the road. While the government may not win the next election, it would certainly have the respect of the nation in that area, something which it does not have today.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I obviously welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. I am pleased to see the motion put down. It gives us a chance to discuss matters which are of very considerable importance to this country and which are not discussed sufficiently in the House.

I was going to congratulate, and I still will congratulate, the hon. member who spoke before me for the generally serious tone with which he treated the issue until the last few moments of his speech. He knows full well we have not been distracted by our constitutional concern and other matters that are of importance in this government's policies, matters which are of concern and importance to this country. He knows we have not been distracted by those necessary efforts from moving ahead to meet the kinds of concerns which he has rightly expressed, the need to move towards a well based, long-ranging long-term economic, technological and science policy. He knows full well there are before cabinet for its consideration proposals from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and myself to reach those objectives. He knows we are not distracted and, indeed, knows our record is one of considerable action.

I was a bit surprised when the hon. member suggested that the problem was not in defining the challenges, but in acting. He knows this government has acted. It has acted in expenditure terms far beyond the levels which the previous government, the Conservative government, had envisaged for this period. When he talks about inaction, if he thinks we have not responded, what must he think of the record of the previous government which, in comparison to ours, was a record of inaction and not providing sufficient funds for what is necessary to achieve? In a few moments I will detail in both absolute terms and percentage terms some of those expenditures.

I am sorry to say to my hon. friend opposite that I was not able to be here for his speech this morning. I was in the city of Quebec meeting with the provincial minister of the environment. I hurried back as soon as I could.

I know that on Fridays we often wax poetical in this House. I gather there was a lot of poetry this morning, and he referred to us as hollow men. When I look at my colleagues, the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), I find it hard to believe that they are hollow men. When he refers to me as a hollow man, I accept it as a compliment.

Mr. de Jong: Especially just after lunch.

Mr. Roberts: I was going to say that if we are poetical, I could have characterized his speech as one of "sound and fury signifying nothing". I gather I cannot say that. While there was considerable sound, there was not much fury. I look forward to reading his speech in Hansard. I have already been told some of the details of it.

I would say this to the hon. member, and to the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist). There is common ground among us. There is a recognition of the importance of the problems. There is no doubt about the need for the definition of a long-term science industrial policy. There is no doubt that the present commitments in gross national product terms of the Canadian economy, to the support of research and development, are inadequate. There is no doubt in my mind that the private sector—both opposition parties mentioned that the multinationals are not pulling their weight in the area of research and development, and that is true—the private sector is not doing as much as we think it should.

The problem is not the definition of the problem; the problem is whether we are acting and whether we are responding. It is in that area that I differ with the arguments put forward by my two hon. friends opposite. They say, "Let's look at the facts", and that is exactly what I want to do this afternoon—look at the facts to see how we are responding. As I said earlier, our response far outpaces that of our predecessors so briefly in office.

We are firmly committed to raising the level of research and development in Canada and to using science and technology in the furtherance of our social and economic objectives. The target we have set for ourselves is 1.5 per cent of the gross national product. The hon. member for Scarborough East said that his party's target was 2.5 per cent at the end of the decade. The critical path for reaching that target at the end of the decade is the same as the critical path for reaching 1.5 per cent by mid-decade. That is our objective.

In judging the success of our policy it seems to me that two fairly objective tests can be applied. The first is to ask what has been happening in the economy generally as it relates to research and development and, more particularly, to technology-intensive industries. The second is to ask what the government has done to encourage and support those developments.

There is evidence to suggest that the downwind trend in research and development expenditures as a percentage of gross national product has been arrested.

The Financial Post in its recent special report on science and technology estimates that spending for research and development by major Canadian firms will increase 17.5 per cent this year compared to 1979. Between 1977 and 1980, the Financial Post, although its data is partial, found an increase of 33.6 per cent in research and development employment and a 91 per cent increase in spending for research and development.

Developments in a variety of aircraft sectors where high technology is important are very encouraging. In the aircraft section, employment in Canadair since 1975 has risen from 1,800 to 6,300 persons, sales from $37 million to $135 million, and there are 183 firm orders for the Challenger aircraft.

At de Havilland, sales have increased from $29 million to $280 million, and employment has risen from 2,700 to over 5,000 people. The Dash-7 has found a steady market.

The next generation of STOL aircraft—the Dash-8—is being developed, and there are already over 100 orders for it. The government is supporting and will support the development of the Dash-8.

In the space sector, which not so long ago was non-existent in Canada, employment now amounts to 2,500 and output to $140 million. Both of these areas are expected to grow over the next several years.

The creation of a whole new service industry dedicated to the provision of resource management data based on remote sensing via satellite has been created. This industry is spread right across the country from Newfoundland to Vancouver.

The Telidon program has led to the creation of a whole new service industry for the provision of information for the Telidon system. Companies such as Infomart and Hempton have invested more than $6 million in the research and development necessary to develop and market the data base essential to the Telidon concept. These companies are also beginning to achieve export sales of expertise. It has encouraged established electronics companies such as Microtel Pacific, Bell Canada, Electrohome, Norpak and SED to invest several million dollars in the expansion of their product lines to include Telidon hardware and software. It has helped Canadian cable system companies to get franchises in United States cities.

Telidon is being tested in Europe and the United States by such agencies as the Smithsonian Institute and the Public Broadcasting System. Over 150 new direct high technology jobs have been created already, and this is just the start. All of this has occurred with a government investment so far of about $5 million.

Recent surveys show a very high level of employment for applied scientists, engineers, technologists and technicians. For university and college graduates, the rate of employment of recent graduates is very close to 100 per cent in the applied fields of study including business, computer science, engineering, health, earth sciences, and the applied physical sciences.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I would not claim for the government all the credit for the major trends and developments which I have mentioned and which are but a sampling of everything that is happening in this country in the field of high technology. But there is every reason to believe that the policies and programs of the government have had a generally beneficial influence and, in some case, a decisive one.

The remarks of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) this morning notwithstanding, tax incentives for industrial research and development have been successful. Canada has very generous measures compared to other OECD countries, and from what Statistics Canada and Revenue Canada have reported, compared to the United States. Canadian industry is taking good advantage of them. Our most recent data is for 1978, showing that 468 companies claimed research and development tax incentives whose total value we estimate to be about $28 million. Bear in mind that new tax incentives had only been introduced in 1977 and 1978, and industry was only beginning to respond at this point. A late 1978 tax incentive was also introduced but its effect does not show in these numbers, although I am confident it will have a significant impact. I expect that when the returns for 1979 and 1980 are available, the total claims will exceed $100 million.

I want to dwell on the expenditure side because the hon. member for Scarborough East denounced us for not acting strongly enough. I announced, on June 5 of this year, that the federal government expenditures on research and development in the natural sciences and engineering were slated to grow by 14 per cent over the previous year, an increase of $155 million. Since that time research and development spending plans have been approved for this year which will add a further $56 million to that total. I expect the year-over-year increase will be in excess of $200 million, representing an annual growth rate of more than 19 per cent. The hon. member accused me of using sweet words. That is flattering, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, but 19 per cent is much more than sweet words; it is action.

The 1980-81 increase of over 19 per cent shows that this government takes its commitment to the target very seriously and is prepared to put up its share of the target and to set the example for private industry, provincial governments and Canada's universities.

These expenditures, Mr. Speaker, cover a wide range of government activities. They include the mission-oriented research of departments such as the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and the Department of the Environment. They include support for university research. And they include support for industry through agencies such as the National Research Council and departments such as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Within this wide range of scientific activities I should like to point to some specific program increases—increases that effectively rebut the contention that we are not harnessing the energy and talents of our scientific and technological community.

I gather that the hon. member for Regina East who spoke this morning was critical of our efforts to help high technology through the universities, with our funding for universities. He should know that among the increases included in the main estimates there is a major increase of $44 million for university support through the programs of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and the Medical Research Council, $30 million for industrial research and development support through the Enterprise Development Program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and $13 million for energy research and development.

With respect to the supplementary estimates which will shortly be placed before the House, these contain a further increase in research and development expenditures of approximately $47 million above the $1,242 million contained in the main estimates. Included in this increase are such items as $13 million for space science and satellite development; $17 million for industrial research and development under the Enterprise Development and DIP programs; $12 million for a low head hydroelectric demonstration; about $4.5 million for communications research and development, and $2 million for the Medical Research Council.

In addition to these increases, Mr. Speaker, it is anticipated that a further $9 million will be spent this year as part of the national energy plan presented in the House this week by my colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). As a consequence, the estimated expenditures on research and development by the government this year are now forecast at $1,298 billion, just under $1.3 billion, or 19 per cent higher than in 1979-80.

To some extent I apologize to hon. members for having gone on with statistics at such length, but the fact is that we should look at the facts, and the facts do not bear out the contentions of the two opposition members who have spoken before me.

Equally, I should draw the attention of hon. members to the research and development implications of the national energy program. That program fully recognized the importance of energy research and development in meeting our energy situation and the need to have more support for energy research and development measures at both the provincial and federal levels of government and in industry. Moreover, the program contains important new initiatives in research and development which will be undertaken to provide the technological base for long-term energy options.

The over-all research and development emphasis, however, must shift toward new energy priorities. The three priorities for this increased effort are, first, alternatives to gasoline as fuel; second, increased efficiency of energy use in all sectors of the economy; and third, new energy sources ranging from coal to hydrogen. In this regard the federal government will undertake new energy research and development initiatives totalling $260 million over the period 1980 to 1983. This will be a significant commitment in energy research and development expenditures in addition to the $160 million spent in 1979-80 under the panel on energy research and development.

The government has a genuine concern about large-scale and efficient energy development in Canada. Yesterday the government announced the creation of a new Crown corporation, Enertech Canada, to enhance further Canada's energy position by giving a boost to renewable energy development. Enertech will operate under the guidance of Petro-Canada initially and will incorporate the Solar Energy Society of Canada and the Biomass Energy Institute. Petro-Canada will provide initial funding of $20 million to Enertech, which will be located at Winnipeg.

Canada is rich in a variety of energy resources. More and more emphasis will be placed on renewable energy resources and on public education to appreciate and wisely use this important national asset.

The government considers the large intellectual resource base within our universities as a major and basic building block of any vigorous and soundly based industrial policy. That is one of the main reasons why the government has increased the budget of NSERC by 35 per cent this year.

Mr. Siddon: That was a Conservative initiative; you know that.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, to correct the hon. member, we recognize there was vastly increased funding for NSERC in the 1980-81 estimates which had been provided on the initiative of the Conservative government of which the hon. member seems to be so proud.

Mr. Siddon: No, sir.

Mr. Roberts: We greatly increased it, and we did so because we are intent on ensuring that the council is able to attract and train more young, high calibre talent for research careers in Canada.

The council has provided some 1,000 awards to third and fourth-year undergraduates for summer jobs in research, and 100 new senior research fellowships. This latter program has brought highly experienced researchers back to Canada from abroad.

The council has directed an increasing proportion of university research and development into areas of national need. Its strategic grants program has stimulated research in energy, environmental toxicology, oceans, communications, and food and agriculture. Particular priority in those programs is given to the transfer of research results to industry.

The government is also sponsoring new industrial innovation centres at the École Polytechnique and at the University of Waterloo. These centres will aid industry, particularly small business and inventors, in the development of new products.

I have described the ways in which we have harnassed—and harnassed effectively—the energy and talents of our scientific and technological community. I have pointed to a number of developments taking place across the country which have moved Canada into the forefront of international developments in space, in communications, in aeronautics, in electronics, and in energy, to name only a few.

Some of these developments have taken place entirely in the private sector; others have been fostered or encouraged by the federal government. All are not only contributing now to our economic growth but they are also laying the groundwork for a healthy, competitive and high technology economy in the future.

I have also pointed to some of the key developments taking place in government. We have fixed a research and development target of 1.5 per cent of gross national product, including both public and private sector spending, as the objective for the research expenditures of our economy by the mid-eighties. We fully expect to meet what we feel is a reasonable share of that target this year. We are on track toward meeting that target. I am hopeful that we will do the same next year. The additional resources which we have received have enabled us to provide selective increases in some government research through the granting councils, and additional support for research and development in industry. That pattern embodies the main elements of our approach. They are maintaining a healthy scientific capability with government departments and agencies to permit them to carry out their missions, undertaking the kind of research which cannot readily be done in the private sector, or it is too expensive to be done in the private sector, or the returns are too long-term to be done easily within the private sector.

Our approach includes providing assistance to research at the university level, trying to ensure that curiosity oriented research will be supported, and training and developing in human resources the capacity to meet our objectives. Basically that support flows through the granting councils to ensure, among other things, as I have said, a flow of highly trained individuals to support science and research. Finally, our approach includes providing increased support directly and indirectly to industry, which clearly has a major role to play. We are counting upon greatly increased expenditures in the private sector to bring us to the 1.5 per cent objective.

These elements are in place, and the essence of my remarks this afternoon is that, contrary to the assertions of hon. gentlemen opposite, we are making considerable progress. We are devoting increased resources to these efforts, and we are moving in the right direction.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take part in this debate. I want to try to broaden the look at the problem just a little bit and to take it from the research and development area just a little further into the entire area of industrial strategy, because I think it is important that we take a look at what is happening to Canada and what is happening to our industry and the value that we will hopefully derive from the kind of program my colleague, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), put forward if in fact the government were ever to get around to adopting that kind of program.

I listened with interest to the minister as he outlined the number of projects, project areas and companies involved in research and development of one kind or another and, without getting into a battle of semantics, there is the question of whether they are doing pure research or product research, or in fact in many instances market research.

There are serious questions in that regard, and I think that in order to break it down it might be useful to have a breakdown of the statistics to show where the research was done and what kind of research is being done. However, I am not going to play the game of trading in statistics. I will not do so because I think that the measure of the government's success is not whether I can come up with a statistic which shows that it is spending less, or the government can come up with a statistic which shows that it is spending more. The measure of government success can be found in the unemployment figures which come out every week and which show dramatic increases. The measure of the government's success can be found in the bankruptcy courts as more and more small industries, small companies, and not so small companies, are being faced with situations in which they are no longer competitive in world terms for one reason or another, or they are unable to meet their commitments because of an economy which has been allowed to get out of hand, and costs which are too large for them to bear.

The measure of success can be found in family courts as people try to find solutions to purely personal problems which are the direct result of the government's failure to move to rationalize this economy and come to grips with the problem areas.

It can be found in the social welfare offices as people who have been unemployed and looking for work, any kind of work, in almost every community all across the country, finally find themselves with no unemployment insurance benefits and forced to do what they in their own minds thought they would never have to do, and that is to go down to the welfare office to ask for help.

So I do not think that you can measure the success, in terms of the definition of the new economic strategy or the new industrial strategy, the appropriateness of the amounts made available for research and development, in statistics, not in financial statistics anyway. I think they can be found in human experiences, young people who walk out of universities or community colleges, young people who come out of high schools with diplomas which, not so many years ago, meant something, diplomas which gave them a reason to believe that there would be something for them if they applied themselves, young people who walk out today with a diploma in their hand and wonder what it is worth, where do they go, what value does it have.

The other night I listened as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) explained to the House of Commons and to the nation the government's new approach to managing the economy of Canada, and I could not help thinking how wrong-headed it was, how this approach can do nothing but be counterproductive, and how this approach can do nothing but create more of the same kinds of problems with which we have been confronted over the course of the last half dozen years. What the Minister of Finance did was to make it more expensive to do business in Canada. What the Minister of Finance did was to make it more expensive to provide the essential things for your family. What the Minister of Finance did was to reduce the amount of discretionary income for the majority of people. What he did, in fact, was to undermine an already imperilled economic sector by adding to the burden, a burden which even now is almost unbearable.

I want to suggest today that it is, therefore, not easy to talk about industrial strategy without talking about the budgetary measures that must be put in place in order for this industrial strategy to have any meaning, to have any direction, to have any substance. What the Minister of Finance did was to say that much of what people are talking about, in terms of a new and dynamic Canada with a changed economy, a new manufacturing sector, new and better means of better production, could not be achieved. What he did in that budget was to determine effectively that our manufacturing sector would not be able to undergo the massive change that would have to be undergone if we are going to be competitive in this world's marketplaces.

Canadian industry is, in the main, quite small. It was set up for the purpose of meeting the domestic market of eight million or nine million households, and that is not a very large market. This means, therefore, that if the Canadian industry, small in scale as it is, is going to be successful, it has to be both very efficient and also be able to rely on a stable domestic market as the basis for its growth, so that it can then, with that sense of stability, go out into the world and seek the world's markets and thereby take advantage of additional dollars to provide for Canadians opportunities which until now have not been provided.

I want to suggest to you that if you were to stop and analyse this budget, you would have to come to the conclusion that the discussion we are having today, important though it is, pales into insignificance when you realize that all the goals and the directions we are trying to achieve are being undermined. They are being undermined by the actions of the financial advisers to the government. God knows why. I cannot understand it at all. I sat for two days puzzling, trying to see the rationale.

Here we are with resources in abundance; you name it, we have it. Here we are with natural resources, depletable and non-depletable, with energy resources sufficient to meet our needs if properly used, with manufacturing capacity and an infrastructure in place, although desperately needing to be updated, with perhaps the most highly educated work force in the world, with the ability to produce our own food, with a stable banking system, with stability in government, except for the last few years. And yet we have to ask ourselves what it is that we do not have, what is holding us back, why are we not in the forefront, why do we look to Japan, to Germany, to other parts of the world with envy when they have to come to us to get the very things they need? Why do we have to look to them? One of the reasons is the kind of budgetary measures that were brought in this week and that are not too much unlike the kind of budgetary measures that were brought in last year by the Conservative government.

If you reduce the number of discretionary dollars available in the consumer marketplace, that can do nothing other than reduce the amount of purchasing that will take place. If you reduce the amount of purchasing that will take place, it automatically follows that you will reduce the number of products required to be manufactured, and if you reduce the number of products required to be manufactured, you will no doubt reduce the number of people required to manufacture the products, and they will be unemployed.

If you create more unemployment, you will have fewer people paying taxes, and as you have fewer people paying taxes, those who are paying taxes will have to pay more, and as those paying taxes have to pay more, you will begin again the cycle because they will not have as many discretionary dollars, and the manufacturers who are desperately seeking ways to improve their productivity, to build up their manufacturing capacity, and to embark on product line research and pure research necessary to be competitive, not only in Canada but in the world, will not have a sufficient cash flow to put aside the dollars they must have in order to do the research, in order to undertake the engineering, and in order to do the work. Therefore, the whole process becomes self-defeating, and then becomes a major problem because it becomes in itself a destructive process.

It amazed me, therefore, when I listened to the government speaking, and remembered the time when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray)—he is now in Paris, as I understand it, and I hope he is enjoying himself—God, I am glad he is not here.

Mr. Knowles: So is he.

Mr. Deans: I remember him talking about his industrial strategy. It was to put $2.7 billion into the rebuilding of the Canadian manufacturing sector. He was right. It will take a lot of money. What does the government come up with? It comes up with $44 million a year over four years. I am going to be honest with you. For most of the people whom I represent, $44 million is a sizeable sum, and I agree, although these days it is 44 Loto winners. Anyway, $44 million is allowed by this government to restructure Canada's manufacturing sector. That would not even be enough to undertake the redevelopment which must be undertaken at the Sydney steel plant. It would hardly pay for what must be done at Donkin Mines. It would be barely enough for a handout to Michelin. It would not quite match what we have to give to Ford. Certainly it would be only a quarter of what we guaranteed Chrysler. It would do nothing to help Massey-Ferguson. That is the measure of the government's commitment, that is what is available from the Manitoba border to the east coast for redevelopment.

I understand there is $2 billion for the western development fund. That should have been spent years ago. It is desperately needed, but for the balance of the country all we have is $44 million. That is a way of measuring the commitment of the government and deciding whether the country is in good hands with or without Allstate.

In essence what I am saying is that we have a problem not unlike those faced by many other nations in the world, but in Canada we have a different approach. Our approach is to sit back and hope it goes away. Their approach was to meet it head on, to try to find solutions to the difficulties, to recognize where the weaknesses in their economies lay and to try to straighten out the problems.

I do not deprecate for a moment the importance of the constitution. The minister said we were wrong, those of us who think that perhaps a little too much time and effort went there and a little less time and effort than was necessary went into the other measures. Be that as it may, the fact is that we cannot correct now what was not done six months ago. There is no mechanism now to do it. The budget has come and gone. The process I have described will without question undermine Canada's economy and make it even more difficult to do what must be done. It has already been put in place. I do not doubt for a moment that it was put in place by well-meaning people. I do not question the integrity of the Minister of Finance. I am sure he believes what he is saying. I do not know how he can, but I know he must. I cannot understand how he expects to solve the real problems, the ones of which I spoke, the problems of the people of Canada, with this kind of budgetary measure.

One need only look at the statistics over the course of the last couple of years. I did some comparisons for the purposes of my speech this afternoon. I looked at external trade and took some of the figures of Statistics Canada for comparison purposes. I compared the first quarter of 1978 with the first quarter of 1980. Our exports in wood and paper are up 37 per cent, our imports are up 20 per cent. In iron and steel our exports are up 34 per cent, our imports are up 50 per cent. In non-ferrous metals, 74 per cent more were being exported but 364 per cent more were being imported. Industrial machinery was up 24 per cent over 1978, but in the same period for this year our imports are up 61 per cent. In agricultural machinery, our exports are up this year over two years ago by 70 per cent, but our imports are up by 52 per cent. In other words, in the overall we are not doing very well at all. A great deal of the export increase is attributable directly to the decrease in the value of the Canadian dollar, because these are dollar figures about which we are talking. So, it is an illusionary increase. It does not really exist in terms of product development and manufacture. We are in serious straits and, of course, the budget undermines our position even more.

One of my concerns about the province of Ontario—and I believe it is one of the concerns of the minister—has to do with this area. Exports of unprocessed or semi-processed crude materials are up in the first six months of 1980 over the first six months of 1978 by 54 per cent. That looks not bad. But imports are up 148 per cent, and that looks terrible. In end products in Ontario exports in the same period are up 2 per cent but imports are up 18 per cent. This reflects a weakness in our manufacturing sector, in our ability to meet the world demand, in our ability to utilize research and development capacity and in our ability to be competitive. Ontario faces extremely difficult times, and we still do not have in place any kind of strategy to deal with it.

I gather from the eagerness with which Mr. Speaker sits on the edge of his chair that I have reached a point where I should stop, but I want to say that the kinds of measures being proposed are not really good enough. In fact, they are counter-productive. The government had better get up off its collective butt and do something before there is no country left to save.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this debate this afternoon on the motion presented by the New Democratic Party. Its justification for any changes in economic policy or anything it ever suggests is that there is a strategy written somewhere. Because some thesis is written in a university or in the caucus research bureau of the NDP, it becomes a proposal of that party. It suggests that whatever needs to be done to prop up industrial sectors of the economy can be done in Parliament just because a group of politicians in Ottawa decides to do something which they believe will automatically solve every industrial development problem in the country.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Breau: The member should read his own motion to which he did not refer when he made his speech. When one looks at the motion, listens to the speeches members over there made today and the ones they made in the budget debate, as well as other speeches made before, one draws that conclusion. I am not suggesting they are being dishonest or insincere. They just do not know any better. They believe it is possible for the government to do everything. They begin with their political aspirations and believe it is possible to repair everything that is wrong in the Canadian economy. That is just not the way it works.

It was interesting to hear a spokesman of the Conservative party earlier today advocating more government spending as a way of solving problems in the industrial sectors of the country. That party, whenever they had a chance to govern—thank God it did not last very long—immediately went on a rampage to cut every possible productive program which the federal government had. I see the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is in the House. He must recall the humiliation he went through last year at about this time because the president of the treasury board at that time had cut back on every good program there was, including those in the Department of Fisheries. Of course he disagreed with that but there was not much he could do. The collective ideology of the Conservative party took priority. So to hear somebody from the Conservative party advocating more spending in order to prop up more research in our industrial sectors is really funny to somebody who sits on this side of the House. Last year, for a period of a few months, we saw them slash every possible program which was productive. I say, "Thank God it didn't last very long". Now we are back in power. We won the election in February, and a lot of those programs are back onstream. They will help to develop sectors in the economy which are important and have a positive impact on people. The fisheries sector is one of these programs.

Now when members come out and say there are bankruptcies in the economy, lay-offs and some slow-downs they blame it on the fact that the government does not have another program. It is an indication that they are either not being honest with themselves or the House or that they do not understand any better. There is an awful lot of innovation happening in the economy now. Some of it is helped by government and sometimes it is helped through the taxation system. We have investment tax credits in place particularly for research and development. When some hon. members speak about the budget which was tabled this week they say every possible negative thing they can about it; they do not look at its positive aspects. The New Democratic Party does not look into certain designated areas of the country where there is a more urgent need for industrial development. For these areas we have provided a special investment tax credit of 50 per cent. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) shakes his head. He referred to the investment of Michelin as a handout when he spoke earlier.

Mr. Deans: That is exactly what it is.

Mr. Breau: He expects us to believe he is balanced and honest in his views and is not distorting the facts though he himself is advocating that the government should do more in the area of industrial development. Because Michelin happens to create competition in his area—they are a very aggressive company who go for the best products in the world, not only in Canada—

Mr. Deans: Ask the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) does not condemn it. The hon. member for Hamilton West can ask questions but I have not heard him refer to the Michelin investment.

Mr. Deans: He was almost sick about it.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member should make up his mind. He should advocate policies which the government should accept in order to create investment where research is done and where it is sound. Michelin has the best products in the world and here is the hon. member ridiculing it. He says it is a handout to Michelin. He should make up his mind. He should not object just because it creates competition in the Hamilton area and in southwestern Ontario. It does create competition, but it is healthy competition.

Mr. Deans: It is going to defeat you in the next election.

Mr. Breau: If there is to be industrial development in this country you must expect that there will be some healthy competition.

Mr. Deans: What is healthy about that?

Mr. Guilbault: Why don't you be quiet? We heard you out earlier.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Breau: I was addressing my remarks to the Chair, Mr. Speaker. I was saying to you, sir, that I do not mind those interjections. As a matter of fact, they do not make any more sense than when the hon. member is on his feet making a speech, so I have no problem in responding to them. He has been here for a little while and he has many shortcomings in proposing all sorts of programs. He says we should do this for the auto industry and we should do that for the other industries. In some cases he is right. The government should be attentive to some of those problems. But then when the government does do something which is productive and positive, he ridicules it, he says it is just a handout to Michelin or a handout to another company. He has to make up his mind and when he does his speeches will be a little more coherent.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP talk about an industrial strategy as if, in a country like Canada, you could have a blueprint, a strategy written somewhere by bureaucrats, academics or theoreticians. He seems to think something like that is possible in a country where there are at least five different economies—some people think there are even more different economies than that. At one end of the country we have a shortage of workers and at the other there is between 15 and 20 per cent unemployment. In some parts of the country we depend on resources only and in other parts we have a very productive manufacturing sector. There just cannot be a blueprint which will be adaptable to the whole country when there are these kinds of diverse economies. I can give some examples.

Mr. Speaker, here is an example of something which occurred in New Brunswick a few years ago. Everyone knows that the Saskatchewan government took special action concerning the potash industry, probably in the interest of the province, and I make no judgment on this issue. The authorities decided to get tougher with the companies and said: You will have to do certain things for the good of Saskatchewan, or else we shall take over these companies. In some cases, they did so. On the other hand, in New Brunswick, which also has a potash industry, the government decided not to follow the same development strategy nor to apply the same criteria as the Saskatchewan government because it wanted to see development in this area. Could the federal government and all the provincial governments agree on a strategy for potash development in this case? This would be impossible because one area would say that it prefers to have development under such terms or such conditions, while another area has decided that it does not want the same things. I respect these decisions. I make no judgment about this matter. It is up to the Saskatchewan government, with the people of the province, to decide what type of development policy it wants to apply.

In my constituency near Bathurst, for instance, there is a zinc mine and several other mines which are amongst the most productive in North America and probably the world and which belong to Brunswick Mining & Smelting. This is now a subsidiary of Noranda Mines Limited. At the present time, there is a zinc refinery, and in the last few years, the federal government and the government of New Brunswick have been trying through all sorts of incentives to help this company. The tax credit of 50 per cent announced Tuesday night by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will apply to this area, and it might very well encourage the company to build a second zinc refinery. Moreover, under the programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the agreement concerning northeastern New Brunswick, there are other means through which the federal government could contribute to this project.

But ten years ago, if we had had taken a leaf out of the New Democratic Party's book, if we had said we needed an industrial strategy in Canada, someone somewhere must draft a paper that says it will be a coherent policy, coherent is a nice word, we would probably have said: Canada as a whole must ensure that resources be processed right where they are taken out of the ground. That is one of the objectives of the federal government. That is the objective that has been followed in the case of uranium, for instance, when it was said that the refinery would be established in northern Ontario, very close to the uranium mines.

We can say that in some areas of the country, but if that was what had been said in my area some seven or eight years ago, the mine would be closed. Economically, the company had no reason to build a second refinery at that time, because opening the mine required the conclusion of an investment agreement with people who owned refineries in Belgium and used to get their supply from mines in the Congo when the Congo belonged to Belgium. So then we would have had to close the mine if we had wanted to follow the national strategy, which would have meant that the 1,800 people who have been working there since would have been unemployed. Therefore a national strategy is not possible, unless we say we are going to draft a national strategy, be dishonest and not follow it.

A country such as Canada needs sectorial and regional industrial development policies, and the same applies to the provinces themselves. It is impossible to have what might be called a coherent policy or strategy unless one was dishonest and outlined such a strategy which would simply set goals for the whole country, and then failed to pursue them. So, Mr. Speaker, I would rather be honest with the people and tell them that what we need are sectorial regional policies.

To pretend like the Conservative member and the NDP member that the federal government has not been very active or enterprising, even with respect to regional development policies in the past 12 to 15 years, is to ignore the situation. I understand that the member is a newcomer from the Ontario legislature; that he is not used to sitting in the House of Commons, but if he cares to ask members who have been sitting here longer than him, such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that member will be able to tell him that the federal government has had regional development policies for a long time and that they are sectorial and promote development in various areas of the country. There are examples, and I just gave one, Michelin Tires, there are some in my own riding. There is a corporation—

I observe that the hon. member does not listen when I give examples. Another example is a company in my constituency called SMI Industries which makes snowplow equipment, snow-clearing equipment, crash rescue trucks and the Zamboni ice machines which are sold all over the world. This was only possible through federal-provincial development policies. It was only possible because this government has departments such as DREE, Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Transport. These departments were interested in making sure that that particular sector became equal with the best in the world. It was all done by government encouragement through incentive programs.

Because there is no written document called an industrial strategy, it does not mean there is no industrial strategy. Perhaps the researcher who helps the hon. member would, from an academic point of view, like to see everything written down like a thesis. I do not suggest that the hon. member uses a researcher all the time.

Mr. Deans: Don't get sidetracked, finish your speech.

Mr. Breau: I am suggesting that it is possible to approach these problems from an academic point of view rather than from a practical point of view.

Mr. Deans: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: The hon. member talks about real people, but his party has been advocating an industrial strategy for Canada for some time.

Mr. Deans: So has Herb Gray.

Mr. Breau: The NDP say that because there is no document or piece of paper on which is written our industrial strategy, it means nothing is being done to promote industrial development in the country. What I am saying is that we have policies which are sectoral and regional in nature and which promote industrial development in this country.

Mr. Deans: We'll talk again.

Mr. Breau: Sure, we will talk again.

So, Mr. Speaker, coming back to the budget which was introduced on Tuesday, for the Maritime provinces, for areas in my constituency, it is a favourable budget because we are in an area which depends to a large extent on the power the federal government will have to develop not only energy but the whole Canadian economy. Because all eastern Canada, all the province of New Brunswick for instance, depends on a strong federal government and the federal government can only be strong if it retains a major part of the revenues produced by the economy of Canada. Unless the federal government has enough money it is no use saying that it will be strong enough to take care of the welfare of all Canadians, and that it will be able to deal with the interests and the economic development of the weakest parts of our country.

For my region it is important to emphasize that the philosophy underlying the government budget is favourable to us. In addition, the government is not following a fiscal policy which might be described as being regressive because it does not seek to slash overly drastically into government projects. So our region will be able to continue to progress without being subjected to a direct impact which might be disastrous because, when the federal government cuts expenditures, it means that regions whose growth depends on the federal government will suffer a lot more than other regions which have less urgent need for these expenditures. Then there is the fact that oil prices will not go up as rapidly as they would have if the December budget of the Progressive Conservatives had been adopted. Indeed, between now and 1984 there will be a striking difference between what the price of petroleum would have been under the Conservative budget of December and what it will be under the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on Tuesday. In fact, according to the Tory budget the price of gasoline would have been $1.56 in 1981 and, I conclude on this, Mr. Speaker, $2.63 in 1984, against $1.36 in 1981 and $1.95 in 1984 as provided in the budget we are now considering. So there is a difference of 60 cents a gallon in the price of gasoline, not to mention the 18-cent excise tax which the Progressive Conservatives were suggesting last year.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the government is introducing dynamic, active and positive measures in the field of industrial development and, in my opinion, the budget unveiled last Tuesday evening faithfully reflects that philosophy and that approach of the government, and that they will continue, I am sure, to meet the requirements of the regions which need them.

[English]

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is not with pleasure, but with discomfort that I rise to support my colleagues on this side of the House, including those in the NDP, who put this motion forward condemning the government for having failed to harness the energies and talents of Canada's scientific and technological community. I say it is with some discomfort because I have heard two speakers from the opposite side, most recently the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), using slick rhetoric and simple examples, picked selectively, to make a case which is very, very difficult to defend.

I would like to put a couple of over-all figures on the record which members of the government have failed to address. The minister's departmental estimates for this year show that for science and technology the government will spend, over all, $400 million this year. That compares with a budget of $577 million for the CBC and with a budget of $2.3 billion for the operation of the Department of the Secretary of State. Science and technology is receiving 20 per cent as much attention as the Department of the Secretary of State. In fact the total science and technology research effort in Canada consumes about $2.3 billion out of a gross national product of $250 billion, or less than 1 per cent. That $2.3 billion spent by all industry and all governments in Canada is the same as the budget for the Department of the Secretary of State of this government.

I believe that this is atrocious. The future opportunity for our children, as they grow up, will depend primarily on jobs created by the technological advancement of our country. I speak with some authority on this matter because I grew up in a small prairie town in Alberta, and I make no apologies for that. We were without paved roads, natural gas and many of the conveniences which those who were raised in this more affluent, central part of Canada have enjoyed for decades.

My parents wanted to see that I got an education. They did everything to ensure that I got that education. They even went so far as to sacrifice a family car so that my brothers, sisters and I could have an education. I found a way to work for that education. I went to the University of Alberta where I studied mechanical engineering and to the University of Toronto where I studied aerospace engineering. I spent nine years in university obtaining advanced degrees to put myself in a position where I could be employed in a high technology area in this country. Then I looked around for a job. I had the choice of five jobs in the United States of America at 60 per cent higher salary than would be offered in Canada, where there were few jobs in the private sector in aerospace industries. I had the alternative of going into a Canadian university, to teach which I did, in 1969, at a much lower salary. I felt the future of this country was important. Teaching in that university and in my work over ten years I built a research program. I used the benefits of the National Research Council and the other aid programs of this country. However, I found to my great distress that the greatest support for my research effort came from American companies to whom I also provided consulting services. These were companies such as General Electric, General Motors, Douglas and Grumman. Those companies were willing to invest in the work I was doing in Canada at magnitudes five times as large as the Canadian government was willing to provide. Over that ten-year period at the University of British Columbia, the relative amount of money available for research was gradually in decline because of the policies of the government. This government has been under the leadership of one Prime Minister for 11 years. It has allowed research and development to deteriorate to a criminal state in Canada. I found that the graduate students that I trained had to leave Canada. Some of them are working in California today. There was no private sector opportunity for them in Canada upon their graduation.

I found I had to go to the United States for research contracts and support, and that there were no Canadian industries particularly interested in hiring the products of our program. In spite of the high-sounding rhetoric from former ministers of state for science and technology I must say that, as a consequence of the Lamontagne committee report of the early 1970s, the government has perpetrated the greatest charade of all times on this country by establishing a ministry of state for science and technology which is absolutely toothless.

I want to give some examples to illustrate that contention. I am here today helping to preside over the collapse of our scientific and technological base. I hope it will not collapse. But from what I have seen and heard from the minister today, I am afraid that is the direction in which this country is going.

I want to read a letter from a former colleague of mine at the University of British Columbia. It is a letter to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) written in September, 1980. This individual is a plasma scientist. He has been active in Canada for many years working on fusion research and plasma research. He now sits on the selection committee for the National Science and Engineering Research Council grants committee on energy. This gentleman said in his letter:

> I attended my first meeting recently and came to realize that the resources of this agency,—

The agency he is referring to is the selection committee.

> —are insufficient to maintain the fusion research of this country at its present awareness level, let alone raise it to a level comparable to other developed countries of similar size.

He went on to say:

> Research and development for fusion energy requires a long lead time but it probably has a huge energy pay-off.

He continued:

> The question comes down to this: Does Canada want to forfeit its hold on research in fusion, squander its expertise in the field and isolate itself from the technology which may provide the only inexhaustible and acceptable energy source in the long run? This question must be faced immediately and is far too important to be answered by default.

He says that he is faced with a choice and that physics researchers in Canada are faced with the choice of getting out of fusion research because Canada is not prepared to keep the fusion energy option open for the next generation.

That is only one of the selective examples I will use today. There are many others.

Forestry research in this country enjoys the grand sum of $30 million of support. That product returns $18 billion to the people of Canada. So the sum I mentioned is less than 0.2 per cent of the value of that product. That is all this government is willing to reinvest in the area of science and technology. Total spending on forestry, including reforestation by provincial and federal governments, is somewhat less than 1 per cent of the $18 billion which that product returns to the nation much of which comes from my province of British Columbia.

I would like to put on record some other gross figures which are astonishing and appalling in their impact. I am quoting from a MOSST report of 1978. It is known that industries in other industrial countries are more heavily supported in research costs by their respective governments. In the United States, the U.S. government foots the bill for 37 per cent of research costs. In Canada the figure is 11 per cent, only one-third as much, and that is appalling.

In terms of percentage of research and development activity, we find that total expenditures on R and D in Canada are at the present time a little more than 0.9 per cent of GNP—that is, less than 1 per cent. By comparison, in Switzerland the figure is 2.2 per cent; in Germany 2.1 per cent, and in the United States 2.3 per cent. Canada is heading into an intellectual tomb if we keep this up. Expenditures by sector of performance show that in Canada business puts up only 40 per cent of the investment in research and the government puts up more, whereas in Germany business puts up 66 per cent. The private sector is somehow induced to put 60 per cent more of its revenue into research than is being done in Canada. Switzerland, the United States and Sweden all have more than 70 per cent of the revenue in research coming from the private sector. In Canada that figure is only 40 per cent. We are top-heavy in industrial laboratories and university establishments and far too light in the area of industrial research dollars.

I have one final figure. This deals with the number of Canadians employed in research per 1,000 persons employed. In Canada, 3.5 Canadians in every 1,000 are employed in research and development. In the United Kingdom the figure is 10 persons per 1,000. In Sweden the figure is 8.4 persons per 1,000; in France the figure is 7.5 persons per 1,000 and in Germany, 9.5 persons per 1,000.

We cannot have this minister standing hypocritically opposite telling us that everything is well in Canada, whereas in fact he is spending his time travelling to see the Queen and giving speeches prepared by bureaucrats to conferences and offending the scientific community. I know that for a fact, and in a few moments I will read for the record some of the choice selections from a recent speech he has given. He is not even here in the House; he does not have the courtesy to stay this afternoon for the rest of this debate.

In our short term in office, and under the leadership of the hon. former member for Brome-Mississquoi, the Conservative government took a number of positive initiatives. I will not sit here and hear the present Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) trying to take credit for a substantial increase in funding to the universities of Canada, because this was an initiative of our government under the leadership of that member from Brome-Mississquoi. Last November he announced an increase of some 33 per cent—some $40 million annually—of funding to research and development through the science and engineering research council. That amount is shown in this government's very estimates. It is an increase to a level of support of $160 million which was approved by our cabinet and our government, and they stand over there and attempt to take credit for it.

The Conservative government also approved the five-year plan which the present minister talks a lot about. It also commissioned and received the report on "opportunities for Canadian research and development directed toward the needs of the North American auto market". These are specific initiatives compared with the gobbledygook we get from the present minister, as reflected in his speech which he gave on October 21, 1980, to the first Canadian conference on astronautics. That, in a way of speaking, is my alma mater because that is the profession in which I was trained. The minister went before those scholarly gentlemen, well trained at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer and told them that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had given him two very important tasks. First of all, he had been given the responsibility for space R and D, the first time a single minister had been given this role. His second important task was to aid in implementing the government's policy mandate, he says he is now responsible for co-ordinating all of the government's space activities. The minister then listed off a whole series of programs and studies that he was supposed to embark upon given those first steps. It is more programs, more talk, but no action. That is the record of this government over the past ten years which has brought this country to its knees in technological advancement.

I could get more incensed, but I will move to a slightly less intensive topic. I want to talk for a few moments about the federal budget. There is nothing in this budget for science and technology. There is only more deficit. In fact, there is $4 billion more deficit than we projected when the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) presented his budget last December. If we are even going to get Canada up to the level of 1½ per cent of GNP in research and development, let alone 2½ per cent, we will need to get over a billion dollars injected into research and technology in this country, right now. There were not even any scraps in the budget to come anywhere close to the billion dollar injection we need.

There were no tax policies which would encourage Canadian research investment by Canadian industries; no policies on foreign investment, including the implementation of world product mandates, and no incentives for foreign companies to reinvest a portion of their earnings in research and development in Canada, building laboratories and providing employment opportunities in this country. There was no direct injection of capital to serve the needs of industry and our universities. There was no recognition of the fact that the moneys which universities have available for the pure sciences, engineering and social sciences, and medical science, is way out of proportion to what is required. Canada is slipping ever further into the levels of effort characteristic of Third World countries.

I wish to read a couple of quotations with regard to the budget—statements made by representatives of the high technology industry. They appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, October 29, under the heading "High Technology Industry Angry". I am angry too, Mr. Speaker, I quote:

> Spokesmen for Canada's fledgling high-technology industry reacted with anger and frustration Tuesday night after learning that the federal budget contained virtually nothing to help them catch up with the rest of the world . . . Canada, spending less than one per cent of the gross national product (GNP) on research and development, is already lagging behind almost all other industrialized countries—and the gap is growing.
> "All these other countries have some sort of an industrial game plan," said Robert Long, executive director of the Canadian Advanced Technology Association, which represents 78 companies.

Jack Davies, president of Ottawa's Systemhouse Ltd., a computer consulting firm, said:

> "It's truly a Canadian problem that the government just cannot see the inventiveness, the creativity and the technical ability of the people in this country," said a disappointed Davies—
> "The government is nervous, so basically they've decided to do nothing for now," said Larry Clarke, chairman of Spar Aerospace in Toronto.
> "But I get concerned as time passes because it's very expensive to stay on the treadmill."

There are thousands of opportunities in this country from which this government is abdicating. We have a quarter of a million dollar noise-monitoring system at Toronto international airport which does not work. Some bureaucrat went to Texas, was wined and dined, and decided an American company should get the contract even though four Canadian scientific firms put in competitive bids. That is not right.

We have satellite antenna receiving equipment being manufactured in this country and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) is going around taking them down; this is equipment manufactured by Canadian technological firms. If he is not prepared to change the law to give people the right to freedom of speech and freedom of the press, then our country is headed for censorship and utter disaster. We are destroying our own technological and electronic industry by not allowing Canadian firms to manufacture these receiving stations and to sell them for use by Canadians.

I have seen applications for research projects, such as using crushed wood fibres to build a substitute for plywood, turned down by the Department of the Environment, the Department of Supply and Services and the Minister for Science and Technology. They did not want to take a $200,000 risk on a project conducted by Canadians who knew their business.

Fusion technology is something to which this government is oblivious. A gentleman in Winnipeg has designed a new automotive cycle called the K-engine cycle. I am a technical person and I say that that cycle may have tremendous benefits in potential energy savings. It has a potential to produce a whole new industry for Canada which the government has neglected. There is also a potential particularly attractive in the province of Quebec to manufacture electric cars for commuter use and sell them to every city in North America. Who is picking up the ball? We are certainly not getting any leadership from this government.

Getting back to the budget, we are destroying the incentives of the energy industry. We are driving billions of investment dollars out of this country. That is going to mean lost jobs for our young people and lost opportunities in the future. Now we are going to nationalize the oil industry, or 25 per cent of it. What will happen to the auto industry? Are they going to get nervous next? If the government intends to nationalize the oil industry, why not nationalize General Motors, Safeway Stores, IBM, Xerox and General Electric? This government is destroying the instinct of the private sector and the freedom it has always enjoyed in this country to advance and prosper and employ our young people in jobs which are rewarding, and which allow them to earn in proportion to their individual efforts.

Now there is to be another Crown corporation to add to the list of some 440. We are to have Enertech. I have no objection to government laboratories, but until we redress the balance and get more funding for R and D by private sector corporations, why are we building more government Crown corporations to whittle and diddle and fiddle away with the taxpayers' money?

Before closing, I would just like to ask why we cannot afford R and D in this country? I believe it is a matter which involves waste by this government. I have two examples. The other day one of my constituents received a padded bag containing a whole lot of bumper stickers and buttons, bilingual, printed both sides, imploring him to come and get more of these free goodies to put up in his plant and on the bumper of his automobile. They would be free. He could get as many as he wanted—to promote metric conversion! I wish to read the note which came back with this envelope, written by my constituent. He said:

> As a taxpayer in this country I find this disgusting and immoral, the way you so freely spend our tax dollars on such garbage.

That is why we cannot afford to pay for science and technology. Metric advertising, bilingual games, wasteful double printing of government documents in both official languages, funny flags and all kinds of gismos are being purchased when we should be using that money to support scientific initiatives and to put our country back on the right track.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, although the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has indeed replied to the criticisms of the New Democratic Party and of the official opposition on this resolution, the motion contains statements which, I believe, lead nowhere. I know the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) would have wanted to be in the House himself this afternoon to refute again and doubly so these statements made by opposition members.

I want to remind the House that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is presently in Paris where he is heading a delegation on trade co-operation between France and Canada and discussing such important issues as energy, raw materials, the automotive industry, aeronautics, telecommunications and other high technology industries. I will nonetheless do my best, Mr. Speaker, to show the House that the government's action in the areas of research and development and industrial strategy has been effective.

[English]

The government's record speaks for itself in harnessing the energy and talents of Canada's scientific community. We are indeed fortunate in possessing human resources in this country which are capable of undertaking research and development activities for the benefit of Canadian industry. However, when talking about research and development and its important role in the industrial development of the country, it is important to realize that research and development by themselves are not sufficient to create high technology companies which can face the competition which prevails in the international marketplace. It is important to view these issues in the full context of industrial innovation, including marketing and financing, which leads to the successful commercial exploitation of technology.

● (1550)

In many cases, Mr. Speaker, technological initiatives are bound to fail, not because of the technology itself or for lack of it, but rather because its marketing and financing aspects have been overlooked. Consequently, government programs and incentives must take into account the real possibilities of the market while encouraging technological development in Canada.

[English]

The federal government in general and the department which I represent, have long recognized this and over the past 20 years have introduced a range of incentive programs to encourage and support industrial innovation. I think it is fair to say that these programs are equal to, and probably better than and more generous than, those in many other developed countries. I wish to put before the House a few examples of programs that have benefited Canadian industry, most of which have been backed up at least at some time by government funding.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the facts are eloquent, they speak for themselves. What we have heard to date, and what we still hear often from the New Democratic Party in this House and across the country, is what we call "parlage" in Quebec, or "just talk". The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) spoke of the "failure of the government". He also spoke of "lip service", of a policy of pious wishes, of a "do-nothing government", of the government inertia. But, what do they do? All in all, not much to convince the Quebec electorate that their proposals, which are supposed to be serious, can fit into the context of a stable and solid development of the Canadian economy.

[English]

I should like to give a few examples of the results of good government policies. I am speaking first of AES Data—

—a Montreal company launched five years ago whose sales now reach $140 million. The CDC is its major shareholder and it spends over 8 percent of its sales revenue for research and development. I attended in person the inauguration of a new plant of the company Neeco Circuits System Ltd. of Montreal, last May, a company which now holds, or is starting to hold, an important rank in the field of electronic and printed circuits in Canada.

[English]

I want to speak also of other companies. MICOM, recently purchased by Phillips of the Netherlands, has had similar results in microelectronics, a critical area of expertise where Canada's capabilities are small but growing. Mitel, a company in this region, is undertaking a multi-year investment program which will raise its annual sales from under $10 million at the present time to some $90 million by 1984. Northern Telecom Limited, another example, is expected to bring its annual Ottawa production to $20 million in custom integrated circuits.

In the transportation sector the results are even more impressive. Government support for de Havilland, for example, has given this country an outstanding lead in the STOL technology.

[Translation]

The Pratt & Whitney Company of Longueil is the world leader as a manufacturer of small gas turbine engines for small aircrafts. The Bombardier Company is presently making expertise in the area of urban and semi-urban transportation. They manufacture trains for subways, LRC trains for export and it is developing new technologies in the area of railway transportation. They are also talking about manufacturing tramways for some canadian and North American cities again.

And what about the great results of Canadair and Petro-Canada, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

Canada is a world leader in heavy water nuclear reactors, Mr. Speaker, and in the production of radioactive isotopes and devices for use in medical and industrial application.

Dome Petroleum has developed the capability to carry out exploration in ice-infested waters and Panarctic to drill in ice islands in the far north. Development of recovery and refining of heavy oils is another area of Canadian expertise.

That expertise did not come alone, Mr. Speaker. It is the result of a mixture of Canadian support with private enterprise. Many of these Canadian companies are part of a welcome phenomena involving the start up and growth of a variety of high technology concerns which has already transformed the Ottawa area into a kind of "silicon valley" of the north. The companies range from the biggest private laboratory in Canada, Bell-Northern Research Ltd. with 2,500 employees to Dipix Systems Limited which is involved in satellite data systems and has sales of about $1 million.

Ottawa's many high technology companies already employ 15,000 people, have a payroll of $200 million and estimated revenues of $500 million. If the present growth rate continues, by the end of this decade there will be more people employed by these industries in the Ottawa-Hull area than by the federal government.

The bulk of these skills was created in the fifties and sixties with the setting up of a number of high technology companies to serve government defence markets. Much of the original research in these areas was transferred from government labs. The increased emphasis in the sixties and seventies to contract out government research and development to industry, later supplemented by the location of Bell-Northern Research Ltd. and other companies in Ottawa, has allowed a critical mass of technical, scientific, entrepreneurial and managerial skills to develop which has been able to take advantage of the opportunities in the new technology fields. This, in turn, has attracted investor interest and what appears to be growing supply of venture capital to finance existing and new companies in the Ottawa area.

We often speak of government money, government grants or government monetary policy, Mr. Speaker. Last week I was present at the official opening of the second research centre of Xerox in Mississauga where I was told that the establishment of that multimillion-dollar centre was due to the convincing actions of the Hon. Alastair Gillespie, a former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, coupled with the good monetary policy of the government. That centre will serve Xerox all over the world and will undertake research which has previously been spread over other locations.

The federal government contributed some $221 million in grants and contracts to industry in 1979-80 for industrially initiated research and development and that figure is expected to increase to $243 million in 1980-81. In terms of specific programs, such as the Enterprise Development Program of the department, some 225 product development projects were supported in 1979-80 for a total commitment of government funds of $58.1 million. From this commitment we estimate product sales of 2.55 billion will result over a period of five years.

In addition to providing assistance to Canadian companies, the federal government, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, of which I am parliamentary secretary to the minister, has a program to utilize more fully the scientific and technological capabilities in universities and to strengthen the technological infrastructure in Canada through the establishment of industrial research institutes, centres of advanced technologies and industrial research associations. Parenthetically I might mention that next week I will represent the minister at the official opening of the Canadian Welding Institute in Toronto where advanced technology is carried out. This technology is in the field of weldings, and it is done with the help of private enterprise—Alberta private enterprise and also, I believe the Alberta government and the Canadian government. The institute has the support of the well-qualified people we can find in this country.

This program has been highly successful in establishing financially self-supporting organizations which contribute significantly to industrial development by providing expert research and development, testing and technical training services to industry on a contract basis. These services are especially useful to small and medium-sized companies. Of the 25 organizations established under this program, 15 are now financially self-sustaining and are no longer receiving government grants. One of these organizations is the one whose opening I will attend next Tuesday, The Canadian Welding Institute.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has also financed the start-up of two industrial innovation centres. These centres are associated with universities with the objective of stimulating an increase in technological innovation and assisting private inventors and small and medium-sized technology-based companies to develop and commercialize inventions and technical ideas. Hon. members would be surprised how many people come to my office from different organizations who benefit from government programs or policies and who are very grateful for what we provide as a possible potential for development for the future not only for their associations but also for the industries they represent.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment has clearly shown the determination of the federal government in the field of research and development. He reiterated the commitment to raise to 1.5 per cent of the gross national product Canada's contribution to research and development. Of course it is not the federal government contribution alone, it is combined with the private sector's contribution. Research and development lead nowhere unless they are carried out with the involvement of private industry. The budget provides for increases in the economic development envelope and the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead) will dwell on that in a few minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I think we can be proud of past accomplishments. There is still a long way to go. Industrial innovation will continue to be one of the key elements in developing and drafting future economic policies, although the details of these new policies are still in the preparatory stages, an aspect on new policies are still in the preparatory stages, an aspect on which the minister insisted here in the House recently when answering questions.

Funds have been earmarked for that purpose and it can be stated that these programs and these measures will be used at the right place, on the technological capacity of Canadian enterprise, on the availability of risk capital, particularly for small businesses, and finally on incentives to foreign subsidiaries to assume more autonomy and responsibility in developing operations on world markets for their new products.

[English]

This will involve an increased level of financial support for industry, including the possibility of increased support for major research and development projects. The emphasis will be on closer co-ordination with industry in order that Canadian companies can fully participate in the growing demand for the technological products of the 1980s.

It is clear that the federal government recognizes the need for Canadian industry to increase substantially its efforts in the development and commercial application of new Canadian technology. Industrial innovation will have an increasingly important impact on many of the critical decisions companies will be required to make not only regarding the design of products and services or the choice of equipment and processes but also in the planning of future operating facilities, distribution activities and information systems. The impact of new technology in Canada is of fundamental importance to the future of virtually every company, and those companies which are not dynamic will not be successful. This will be taken fully into account in the strategic planning process of this government, which has put forward not only in its budget but also in its energy policy programs which look to the future and not to the past as we have heard in much of the criticism this afternoon.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am glad this afternoon to have the opportunity to join in this debate on the motion presented by the New Democratic Party, which reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for having failed to harness the energies and talents of Canada's scientific and technological community in the development of an industrial strategy which would draw on Canada's traditional resource base, on our manufacturing strength, and on our new high technology industries.

I was surprised and delighted to see that motion. I was surprised that the New Democratic Party would condemn the government, and I was delighted that its members would choose this very appropriate way to call attention to their dislike of the way the government is behaving.

I strongly support this motion. Examples of the ways in which technologies have been advanced by governments have been brought forward very well by other members this afternoon. Examples of technologies which have helped this country are Mitel, Spar Aerospace, heavy water plants and nuclear power facilities.

All these are areas in which the government has helped and in which through science and technology we have helped to advance our country and our industrial base. The problem is that too little has been done and without any sustained, programmed, controlled and organized approach.

I would like to address this problem in a very specific way this afternoon by referring to the area of energy research and development. In this way I can give the best single example of the difficulties we experience in our research and development programs in Canada. I think this is the best single example to illustrate the absence of technical understanding on the part of the government, the best single example to show the squandering of our natural resources and the best single example to show the wasting of our human potential.

Our energy resource base has proved a magnificent endowment. We have tremendous potentials not only in renewable energy resources like hydroelectric power, and fossil fuels, but also in biomass that is renewable. We have uranium deposits which give us an almost inexhaustible resource, if we choose to tap it.

Even at this time we are a net exporter of energy. All the time we have been addressing our energy resources, and we have proved that we can consume, but to this point we have not shown that we can effectively reduce the consumption for which we are responsible.

Back in the 1960s about the time of the Sputnik there was a tremendous resurgence of interest in the technological field, and at that time the economy was very healthy. There was a glow about the technological community which was expressed by people cultivating scientific interests, going to university and taking scientific courses with the result that we were developing a research base in this country. It was a weak base, but it was developing at that time.

But then something happened. Back in about 1967 or 1968 things started to change and the resource and research base, which had been developing, started to diminish and dwindle. We started to experience increased costs for social programs and development of that type. Our economy, which was outwardly healthy in the 1960s, started to fail and people stopped going to universities and entering into scientific programs which would give them the ability to undertake scientific endeavours in the country. At the same time, the Medical Council of Canada, the Canada Council and the National Research Council decreased their level of funding to universities.

One of the other consistent problems we have had in Canada, in addition to the lack of opportunities we have with our human resource base and our energy resource base, is a very low capital situation. Not much capital is available for investment. This has been a consistent problem through the 1960s, 1970s and on into the 1980s. This is something with which we have to live. We do not have the capital we need to invest in large energy developments and in our energy resources.

I would like to quote a passage which I think is relevant. It goes like this:

"Would you tell me please which way I ought to go from here?" asked Alice. "That depends a good deal on where you want to get to" said the cat.

Some of my hon. friends may recognize that. Alice, I think, was addressing a problem which governments have to address. I have no way of telling where this government wanted to get to, but there is no question about the course of action that was followed. It is expressed simply by the percentage of the gross national product devoted to energy research and development. In 1967, it was 1.4 per cent; in 1980, it was 0.9 per cent of the gross national product. We have been maintaining an unearned lifestyle on the base of the natural resources of our country.

Back in the early 1970s, the National Energy Board predicted that this country had an oil surplus. We found out, to our regret, back in about 1973, that that was not the case. Then came the oil imports. Instead of responding to the technological challenges, our philosophical wizard leaders either through neglect or ignorance, continued to shelter us from the realities of rising energy costs and, at the same unfortunate moment, kept our alternate energy resources and conservation technology from competing. The burst of federal research and development effort and scientific achievement which led to Candu and oil sands extraction was short-lived and it has been a long, dry decade since any major energy technological achievement.

In 1967, the Science Council recognized the importance of technological sovereignty and also, called for the development of sound programs for the use of conservation and the replenishing of resources. I would just like to quote briefly from its annual report:

We in Canada must extend, and, even more important, apply our advantages and overcome our special difficulties or even turn them into assets. Our resources of money and manpower are limited; therefore we must apportion them wisely, concentrating them in areas that are important to the nation, socially, economically and scientifically.

The folly of not appreciating the importance of these concepts demonstrates vividly the technological gap that has existed in the heads of successive governments. Where we stand today with energy developments is vivid evidence of the flaws in our political leadership.

Today, in energy research and development, conventional fuels research and development is done largely by provincial governments, with only $10 million in 1980 contributed by the federal government. The recent renewable energy agreements with the provinces seemed to be of some help, but they were late, and even with these we can expect to achieve only about 5 per cent of our energy resources in the renewable area, excluding hydro by the 2,000. So in spite of this immense potential, we are not developing our energy resources. In fact, we now have shortfalls in energy supply that would indicate rationing.

PERD is the panel for energy research and development which co-ordinates all the energy research and development in the country under EMR. There are five separate areas. I will not go through them now, Mr. Speaker, because of lack of time, but they include conservation, fossil fuel, nuclear energy, renewable energy, energy transmission, and transportation. They each have their own budgets. In six years they have spent a total of $760 million. That is their total investment, even though back in 1974 we had a pretty good idea of what was happening, both in terms of our oil supplies, the OPEC countries, and the oil embargo situation.

The long-term energy supply potential of this and every other nation rests either in solar, nuclear fission, or nuclear fusion. Only in one area, in the area of nuclear fission, have we in any way been able to achieve what we should have achieved in the area of research and development to help our energy supply situation. The National Research Council, with a total budget in six years of $44 million, has been expected to do the research and development in hydraulics, solar, biomass and wind. The National Research Council has a very special problem. It is a problem of management, and this is not a unique problem in terms of scientific communities in Canada. As a Crown corporation, NRC has been expected both to manage and to do the research with the funds it has available. At one and the same time, the scientists are expected to be managers. We have to appreciate now that this is a very important aspect of the difficulties we are having with research and development in this country because what has happened is that people who are normal scientific people have been thrown into a milieu where they are required both to manage the resources and do the research. There are very few people who have this double capacity.

One of the other problems which the NRC is facing is a lack of enthusiasm. This lack of enthusiasm stems from a number of causes. Funding is one part of it because it has been inconsistent; it has been up and down, programs have been switched and people have lost heart because of the difficulties in maintaining an effective program. People are unenthusiastic because there has been no understanding, at the level of government, of their problems and of the importance of the work they are doing. Finally, they are losing enthusiasm because even when the funding is available, because of regulatory restraints they are not able to engage people to take advantage of the funding. They cannot hire people when necessary even though the funding is there.

The final point, which has to do with political control, presents the National Research Council with a particular problem because of the technological gap which exists between their level of activity and people in the government, people at the ministerial level and at all government levels. This gap is widening today. The minister and the people in charge do not understand the technological achievements and therefore cannot keep up in terms of dealing effectively with management problems. So we end up with a situation where the technocrats are in control of science and there is very little relationship between scientists and the government.

Fusion is an example I am going to use in terms of the difficulties of NRC because it is a subject on which the minister made a statement. I should like to quote his comment before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates of July 8 of this year. He said at that time, talking about fusion:

When I say skeptical, I mean that literally—it does not mean I have taken a decision one way or the other. I think the case still has to be made that Canada should be involved in fusion research in a major way.

The history of fusion research in Canada is very interesting, but in the short time available to me I would just like to say that we have at least three separate areas in Canada which are competent in fusion research. We have people such as Dr. Skarsgard at the university of Saskatchewan who is respected in the international community as a very prominent fusion researcher. We have people in Canada in different provinces who have been very interested in trying to bring the INTOR project to this country; that project, I understand, may well be cancelled because of the situation in Afghanistan and the international climate. But that situation need not prevail indefinitely. It is a situation which may not, in fact, stop INTOR. We can still be involved in an international program if we have the desire. Hydro Quebec is another good example. They have a fusion project and a research reactor which they would like to develop and use. They are very concerned now, because of federal attitude, that they will no longer be able to do this.

In 1979 the National Research Council dedicated $3.1 million to fusion research. In 1980 the commitment was only $2.9 million. The International Energy Agency commented on this. It was concerned about the low level of funding to fusion research in Canada. We are concerned about fusion research because we will not be able to keep up with the international community. We will not be able to keep our hand in at the table when we are talking about technological advances which can help the country.

I should like to try to explain the importance of this. Look at some of the advantages of the fusion research program. Quite short of actually producing the electrical power of fusion, we have the advantage of development technology in a number of ways. Indeed it is a potential energy source, both at home and abroad. It is a potential complement to the Candu system—and this is something which is poorly understood—because it can help develop fuels for the Candu system. It can help with other technologies from electronics to the programs trying to achieve direct electrical energy conversion. It can help in developing special materials for use in reactors. Finally, it can help in the area of international co-operation.

I should like to refer to the Science Council of Canada Report of June 1979 which reads as follows:

International co-operation is essential to ensure that Canada remains at the leading edge of scientific and technological research, to avoid unnecessary duplication of work done by others, and to develop the capacity to adopt and adapt foreign technology to its own advantage. In selected instances, especially when dealing with complex technologies, Canada need not "go it alone" because of concern that co-operation would result in a secondary role. On the contrary, Canadians should systematically assure equity in international developments through practical and responsible sharing, and through comparative strenghts based on unique high leverage opportunities.

For whatever reasons, the Minister of State of Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) does not understand.

The United States has a permanent science and technology committee with a number of subcommittees. It has a support staff of 80 permanent people for the committee and subcommittees. It dedicates 2.5 per cent of its gross national product to science and technology. It is surpassing us in all energy technologies with the exception of the Candu fission reactor and tar sands and heavy oil developments. It uses private enterprise management systems to manage the research and development effectively.

The government must identify the importance of science and technology to the country. As each year passes, we see there is an increase in societal dependence on technology, an increasing dependence on foreign technology with a branch plant mentality for technology being adopted and imports of technology into this country instead of developing them here. Each year there is an increasing gap between politicians and technology. In the end we are leaving our destinities in the hands of technocrats.

As each year passes, shrinking geographical boundaries and population expansion come close to the limits. If needs in energy and other resources are not met in the global sense, we run an increasing risk of global conflict. We can help meet many of these needs as well as provide important improvements in our own country. We can provide improvements in employment, in our balance of trade payments, environmental control and national self-sufficiency in energy.

I personally believe we can start this procedure by establishing an effective energy R and D program and an effective over-all R and D program. This effort would be significantly assisted by several measures. First, by providing independent private enterprise management systems for bodies such as the National Research Council. Second, by relieving R and D functions from any restrictive regulatory controls on personnel. Third, by aiming for continued research and development funding of at least 2.5 per cent or more of the gross national product. Fourth, by developing interacting effective liaison for business, university and government. Fifth, by expanding and maintaining international involvement and co-operation where appropriate. Sixth, by establishing tax and government financial assistance and procurement practices to assist private enterprise research and development and to provide markets for the purchase of first products. Seventh, by re-establishing the credibility of the scientific university community through financial support, project grants and constant co-operation. Eighth, by the establishment of a parliamentary standing committee on R and D. Ninth, by providing political leadership which is sensitive, informed and committed. Tenth, by providing a permanent full-time R and D minister.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today. I listened with some interest to members on the government side and I must say I have not been convinced of one single matter relating to either the budget or their position in relation to science and technology. This afternoon I intend to support, particularly in relation to the inherent problems of the forest sector, some of the statements made by members opposite and explain why our motion is inherently correct.

Canada's scientific and technological sector is Canada's first industry. The forest industry is now in a rapid decline. The universities of this country are not producing anywhere near the number or level of experts required in the forest industry, and the low level of funds delivered by the federal and provincial governments is the reason.

This week's budget did not contain one word about Canada's largest single economic sector. By not placing a single word in the budget about the forest sector, it totally justifies the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong). In my view the government condemned itself on Tuesday.

I should like to outline exactly what is happening in the forest sector before getting into some of my specific recommendations relating to R and D. Not many Canadians are aware that only 35 per cent of Canada is treed and that only a fraction of that area is still harvestable first growth. Forest products in Canada are the largest single net source of revenue, particularly to the federal government, with approximately $20 billion in exports this year. I must point out that it provides a livelihood for slightly over 10 per cent of the labour force in Canada and employs in excess of 1.3 million Canadian men and women.

Both the yield and supply of forest products are dwindling. For example, British Columbia produces about 80 per cent of the softwood lumber for Canada, 50 per cent of the pulp, and 30 per cent of the softwood lumber for United States market. Supplies are declining particularly in the province of British Columbia which is the largest single geographic region producing forest products. There will be shortages in every region of British Columbia within 5 to 20 years. Most of the largest, most productive areas will face shortages by the middle of this decade. By the turn of the century another 25 per cent of the forest land will have been shaved away for such uses as agriculture, urban and rural sprawl, rights of way and parks. Most of that land will be prime valley bottom, the most important and productive area for the growth of forests.

The public are the true stewards of forest lands, yet neither Ottawa nor any of the provinces have really accepted that challenge and set up public advisory committees to deal with the very serious question of what uses forest lands should be put to. Rather than accepting that challenge at the government level and allowing the public to become involved, they are allowing an increasing number of conflicts to arise. Rather than achieving some kind of resolution of these problems in advance, we will see conflicts between fishermen and loggers, between miners and foresters. Inaction will create serious social problems which really do not need to occur.

One serious question we have to face—and certainly the government has never faced it—is how to maintain volume without entering further into the regime of bad forest practices in which we are presently involved. The budget gouges western and northern Canada to the benefit of Liberal patronage programs in the United States. I do not make either of those statements lightly. The funds for research and development in the following areas are examples of where I feel a considerable number of dollars should have been placed. I am speaking of hundreds of millions of dollars. I think, for example, of the harvesting and utilization of trees down to the size of ten centimetres. Right now in Canada there simply is not the development, either at the university level or within the industry, for the types of technology required for harvesting and utilization. On the northern Pacific coast one of our most serious problems is the leaving of small trees in the bush under nine inches in diameter at the butt. A lot of the timber slightly larger than that, particularly hemlock and species such as that, are simply dumped into the ocean after being brought out because the industry finds it cheaper to allow those trees to go to waste. So they drift up on the beach where they have a very serious and damaging impact. This is another area where the federal government has clear jurisdiction and should be involved. As these trees wash in and out with the tide they break off the kelp, disturb intertidal life, break the barnacles and that type of life off the rocks, and cause a serious decline of the inner beach areas. This has an impact on fisheries on the Pacific coast and a general impact on our whole biological system in British Columbia. I would say a similar situation exists in the maritimes as well.

It is in these areas that research and development and forward-looking policies would benefit us all rather than allowing these problems to accumulate until very serious damage has been done. A government which had any sort of progressive or imaginative policies would be dealing with these things now.

A crucial problem which we have experienced this year, perhaps more than in most years, has been the serious forest fire problem. An area about six times larger than the area which will be cut this year was burned, particularly in Ontario and Manitoba. The government is doing nothing in terms of research and development to utilize and harvest those burned trees so that they can be put to a wide variety of uses, as has been demonstrated in other areas of the world. The national allowable cut in Canada is now 200 million cubic metres per year with about 150 million cubic metres per year actually being harvested.

The area that was burned this year was larger in size than Great Britain. It consisted of some 240,000 square kilometres. Interestingly enough, that is almost exactly the same size as the area which has been left. It is an area which was cut in the past several decades; it was formerly productive land and now it lies unsatisfactorily restocked. I think we should take a close look at that. The industry harvested generally the valley bottoms and heavy rainfall areas that had been cut. There are washouts, the soil disappears and the companies are not forced to go back in to do proper reforestation and silviculture. Those areas lie idle. History speaks for itself in relation to issues such as this. We can see enormous, barren areas, for example, in northern Africa and other parts of the world which were improperly harvested and never restocked and have turned into desert.

Where is the federal government? Where are the funds for R and D, for such things as hog fuel, briquettes and development for industrial use? Certainly the forests will become one of our major areas of energy production and we simply are not moving into that area at all.

Cutting, milling trades and training in the use of hardwoods are classic examples of small, almost cottage-sized industries which could be utilized in the maritimes, throughout Quebec, Ontario and very much so in western Canada for such products as furniture, wall and floor coverings. The reason you do not see a lot of cottage or small hand-logging operations in these areas is that the R and D has not been done and is not being done for that type of utilization, for providing practical small kiln operations, small milling operations for the individual tradesman and producer. Twenty per cent of the merchandisable volume of timber in Canada right now is hardwood. Yet it is only 5 per cent of the harvest. That is a shameful thing for a country to be admitting when such woods as we see here in the House of Commons may never be seen again in this country if we do not get some decent silvicultural practices under way. Basic efficiency is what research and development should encourage.

In relation to milling, for example, some of the small countries which have no indigenous forest population are the ones which are moving the most quickly. In the area of laser and sonar the Japanese have moved very quickly. Last year, 30 per cent of the cypress or yellow cedar which was moved from British Columbia and sent directly to Japan was milled in Japan. There they make full use of laser and sonar production whereby the log is actually sized by sonar; they know where the knots, tapers and cracks are and they know where the bark is. It is completely sized, it is computerized and it is cut with almost no sawdust and almost no waste.

For a country like Canada to be simply mining our forests at a time when that kind of technology is being created is just not good enough. If we simply had the R and D to bring some of that fundamental technology here so we could expand it and make full use of the products we have here in Canada, making not only more jobs in R and D but more jobs within the industry, it would avoid the conflicts we are likely to see in terms of multiple resource use. The complexity of the situation is compounded by a government that simply will not act in an imaginative fashion and get the R and D money moving.

The great grab of prime first-growth in Canada is almost over, yet the forest sector still accounts for over 18 per cent of our exports. I am sure there are not many members sitting in the House today who recognize that it makes a larger contribution to the Canadian economy than agriculture, mining, fishing and petroleum put together.

Federal funds available last year were less than $130 million. I differ from my friends to the right here who say they made a dramatic expansion in last year's budget. They did make a number of progressive moves, certainly in relation to putting in place an assistant deputy minister to deal with forestry at the national level. I certainly compliment them for that move, and not the members on the opposite side.

Less than $200 million will be spent this year on R and D in the forest industry. I would point out that this amount is exactly half of what was put aside for R and D in relation to forestry ten years ago. A decade ago we were putting in twice as much in terms of real dollars. I think that is a pretty shameful comment on the minister who rose in the House earlier today and indicated that he really was going to move hard in the field of research and development. Out of the $20 billion in relation to the export of products in the forest industry, only $35 million, as was pointed out earlier today, will be spent on research and development in this industry. This is less than two-tenths of one per cent of the economic value and is a shameful comment in relation to this industry, not only in Canada but anywhere in the world.

There is nothing in the budget, even with a national economic and unemployment disaster on our horizon. It is quite clear that the shaving away of forest land and the serious problems which are occurring now are caused by prime cuts which have come off and are being replaced by much smaller second growth. Quite frequently, for example, when red cedar or Sitka spruce or Douglas firs are cut down, the second growth you naturally get back is composed of alder or some of the less valuable species such as hemlock. This certainly happens in the province of British Columbia for which I can speak, knowing the forest industry in that region quite well. Yet such simple techniques as better reforestation—and when I say that I mean the entirety of silviculture from the collection of the seeds, to the growing of the small seedling, to planting it and caring for it, in terms of thinning processes and so on—is good investment. As my hon. friend from Regina East pointed out, investments of that sort are good investments. You invest a few pennies today and you collect many dollars down the line. It is only a very shortsighted government, interested in clutching and grabbing straws close at hand, which would overlook the importance of reforestation in Canada today. To invest a few million dollars in the next few years would create billions of dollars over the next 20 years. Forest management on the east slope of the Rockies in Alberta would do a number of very profound things, not only in relation to wildlife, the aesthetics of the area and the potential forest harvesting; it would allow more water to drain into the river systems, which provide Canada with its very strong and important agricultural base. But nothing is being done either in the budget or in policies of the government to deal with this very serious and pressing problem. Better processing would save a minimum of 20 per cent of the product yield.

Earlier I mentioned laser and sonar technology. It is an area in which Canada, of all the countries in the world, should be moving ahead the fastest, but we are not. At least 1.5 per cent of the forest industry gross product should be allocated to research and development. As I said earlier, the figure is presently only .2 per cent. We must move ahead by at least a multiple of 7 per cent or 8 per cent before we will even be on a standing with some of the very small countries which have no indigenous forest populations.

Increased expenditures on research and development will not only give us a better, more saleable, less expensive product, but will give us faster growing trees and more jobs. Again, it comes back to the energy sector. I recognize that the Canadian Forest Service and Federal Research Service are doing something in the area of small, rapid growth tree harvesting in their investigations of methanol production for possible replacement. I think it is an excellent idea. One of these days members of this House will wake up and realize that gas and petroleum were produced tens of thousands of years ago from growing plants. Ultimately, the light will go on in our minds and we will recognize that we will be required to obtain our energy from the sun, through plants and biomass. Research and development is an investment that would pay off handsomely. Instead, what we have is a Liberal policy, that, rather than pay-off, gives us lay-off, in excess of 1,000 people a day.

The staff decrease in the forest service is 138 this year at a time when we are not even approaching sustained yield. The forests of this nation are being mined, particularly by federal forest policy. Less than five cents of each dollar of tax revenue going to the federal-provincial coffers is being spent on silviculture. The Canadian Forestry Association, for example, estimates that 20 per cent of the land is receiving little or inadequate regeneration at the present time, and that is a 1980 figure.

That figure is quite different from the figure given by the minister earlier today. He said that 12 per cent of our prime forest land is inadequately stocked. We can quibble over the difference between the word "little" and the word "inadequate", but certainly he estimates about half of what is estimated by the Canadian Forestry Association. However, he does admit that we are falling back in restocking our forest lands by at least 500,000 acres a year. I took these figures from a recent speech made by the minister. Yet he wants to increase the cut by 50 per cent by the year 2000. In my opinion that is total, irresponsible Liberal hypocrisy. When one sees the figures on what is happening in the forest sector, to propose to increase the cut by 50 per cent without investing any R and D money is absolutely hypocritical. The Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment once said:

> Knowledgeable opinion is unanimous that Canadians must spend more money to maintain our country's forests.

Then he went on to say that Canadian forest service has 50 per cent fewer staff than in 1968 when the Prime Minister came to office, and that the purchasing value of the budget this year is less than half of what it was nine years ago. It is a very shameful comment on R and D in the forest service in this country. The minister also said:

> It is my intention to strengthen federal involvement in forestry.

That is an absolutely ludicrous statement. How can he strengthen investment by cutting research and development, cutting staff and cutting the budget in half? It is the ultimate in double talk and attempted public deception. It is time we matched the annual cut with annual production on those lands which have been and are being cut. Is that not sustained yield? For example, 13 per cent of our pulp now goes to newsprint and 30 per cent to wrapping paper. Where is the research and development in this country on recycling that paper or the government input to see that recycling becomes a real part of conservation in Canada? Think of the impact on jobs and conservation if the money used for the goose and beaver ads were used for conservation purposes instead of for sheer political propaganda.

This brings me to my concluding remarks concerning what I call the fall-down effect. First, the forest base is shrinking, as is demonstrated by scientific evidence. Second, second growth which is smaller in diameter and smaller in volume of wood will create an impact on the industry. Third, there are fewer R and D dollars coming from the federal government. Fourth, there are fewer innovations in silviculture, pest control and enhanced growth. Fifth, there are fewer new products for local and international markets—this, again, will have an impact on our balance of payments and industry within Canada. Sixth, there is less education for conservation and product recycling, and this comes at the same time as the government is cutting back funds to post-secondary education in the R and D field of forestry.

There are fewer scientists being produced due to the lack of these funds and there are fewer staff due to the Liberal cutbacks which I have already outlined and can be confirmed in this year's main estimates. There are lost jobs due to the economics of scale in the industry, and this, too, is creating a very serious problem. None of my information has been disputed in this House, nor do I expect that it will be in the near future unless the government completely changes its policies.

The Liberals are eager to get into the profits of gas and oil in western Canada. In my view there lies the true nature of that party. In relation to the forest industry and to R and D, it has put nothing into these areas even when they are on the decline. But because prices are beginning to move up in the oil and gas industry, the Liberal hand goes in to grab.

Today's message is not new. In 1871 Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> We are recklessly destroying the timber of Canada and there is scarcely the possibility of replacing it.

That was said well over 100 years ago. I will conclude with two very short statements. In one area of my riding a Crown corporation ordered five million seedlings from Victoria this year, but only one million will be delivered and by no means will all those seedlings survive. A totally new, totally Canadian-owned operation to make pressboard in Smithers, in my riding, was turned down by this government through DREE in favour of a foreign-owned eastern Canadian operation. Those two statements speak for themselves, as does today's motion, and it is all because of the budget introduced on Tuesday.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts), described earlier this afternoon the action of the government in spurring greater research and development in Canadian industry. Innovation and technical change are central to Canada's future manufacturing performance. They have and will continue to receive very strong government support. In addition there were excellent examples of practical results of the government's recent programs outlined earlier today by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Laniel).

But greater effort in R and D and innovation, however critical to our industrial strength, is by itself, not a sufficient response to the competitive pressures that Canada faces in the 1980s and beyond. Drastically higher prices for energy and changes in the international trading environment are only two of the most obvious of these pressures. Exposure to ever more aggressive competition and import penetration from the newly industrialized countries, in standard technology products, and from a number of developing countries in low technology, labour-intensive products and resource commodities are also extremely significant factors in the new economic environment that confronts the traditional industrialized world.

A successful response to this environment will call for imaginative government action and leadership on a broad front. Without such a government commitment, there is no assurance that Canadian economic performance will be maximized or that we can even keep pace. I want to take a few moments to sketch out the dimensions of this commitment.

An overriding government task is to seek to maximize efficient activity in all regions of Canada based on economic strengths and, especially, the resource strengths that can spearhead development in the west and Atlantic regions, although with benefits accruing to all of Canada. To achieve this, the government has recognized a need for developmental assistance to ensure that major growth opportunities, for instance, in advanced technology industries and in resource supply and further processing sectors, are captured, and measures to ensure that Canadian firms are able to participate competitively in supplying the engineering expertise, the equipment and the new technology required for the expected massive energy and resource development in the coming years.

These are necessary because it is far from assured that the development of our energy supplies will bring significant long-term industrial benefits.

Another overriding consideration, closely related to the constitutional reform process, concerns the strengthening and maintenance of the Canadian common market. In a world characterized by economic entities five to ten times more populated than our own, such as the United States, Japan and the European economic community, the last thing Canada needs is fragmentation of its own domestic market. On the contrary, we need to find the means for establishing and maintaining the largest possible domestic market as an essential prerequisite of a more efficient, more productive and more internationally competitive economy. This is one of the fundamental objectives of constitutional reform, yet it is an objective on which we have just begun to make progress.

The government is also committed to, first, adjustment policies focussing on productive investment rather than subsidy to encourage the movement of resources to strong and potentially strong industries and potentially strong subsectors in less dynamic industries at a rate sensitive to social considerations.

Second, it is committed to influencing firms with a significant impact on the economy to pursue innovation and product development in Canada, expansion of exports and sourcing of equipment, components and services on a competitive basis from Canadian suppliers.

Third, this government is committed to encouraging Canadian ownership and control of this country's productive assets and ensuring that foreign investment, to the extent that we require it, adds to our ability to take full advantage of the opportunities that are opened up to us. Fourth, the government is committed to assistance to firms to obtain access to and develop markets abroad, including the development of a concept for a national trading corporation and of more effective export financing programs.

These measures in industrial development, all of which, by the way, are consistent with the government's campaign and throne speech commitments, are not an exhaustive accounting of the elements of a national industrial policy. Nevertheless, they demonstrate the wide range of needs and problems which the government is addressing, and addressing imaginatively, flexibly and co-operatively with business and labour to stimulate the maximum realization of the country's economic potential.

The federal budget of last Tuesday states that the total increase in the economic envelope expenditures over a three-year period, from 1980-1981 to 1983-1984 will amount to $6.49 billion. Of the $6.49 billion, approximately $4 billion will be spent on new western initiatives. Particular attention in the western initiatives program will be directed to infrastructure development, such as grain handling and transportation, which is intrinsic to economic development in the west and also to industrial diversification in the west.

Over the three years, in addition to the $4 billion on the western initiatives program, there will be at least $2.49 billion allocated to research and development, expansion and modernization of industrial capacity, and other elements of the government's economic development plans.

The budget also pays special attention to the economic development problems of less developed areas. The speech announced a special allocation of $350 million to deal with the industrial restructuring and labour adjustment problems in regions of particular need. There is also a new investment tax credit which will pay to investors 50 per cent of manufacturing investments made in high unemployment and low income regions of the country.

The energy package is particularly important to the promotion of economic development. The made-in-Canada pricing schedule will ensure maintenance of a strong competitive edge for domestic manufacturers. The energy package also envisions the expenditure of enormous sums of money which will have multiplying economic development impacts. For example, the oil substitution component will comprise $1.6 billion of expenditures on things such as conversion grants and conversion of federal buildings, which imply great opportunities for industries suppling conversion equipment. Similarly, the $1.15 billion that will be spent on conservation and renewables will involve industrial development opportunities and government assistance to improve energy efficiency and so modernize and enhance productivity of a great number of industrial plants throughout the country.

Finally, the greater control the federal government is obtaining over the development of the energy sector through new regulations and the new regulations and the new treatment of Canada lands will ensure that Canadian industries in all parts of the country can share in the industrial benefits of energy development. For example, the new oil and gas act will ensure that a high level of Canadian goods and services is employed in oil and gas activities carried out on Canada lands. Applicants for exploration and production rights will have to demonstrate how their operations will bring industrial and employment benefits to Canada, both in the region of interest, and elsewhere in the country. Where applicable, companies will be expected to put in place special training and employment measures, particularly for native Canadians.

I want to stress that in the task of putting together the complex of policies and programs necessary to ensure a bright industrial future for Canada, the government has and will continue to rely on the advice and co-operation from the Canadian public, especially groups representing business and labour. Recent examples, such as the Tier I and Tier II committees and the Hatch committee, indicate that when business and government focus on specific problems or actions, wide areas of agreement can be found. Currently there is the important work of the Blair major projects task force which is examining the long-term contribution of major capital projects to the growth of the Canadian industrial and technological base. Mentioned as well should be the important but less visible contacts of ministers and government officials on an ongoing basis with government and labour.

We are now moving from agreement to action on many fronts. I expect that my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) will be in a position to announce some of these measures to the House in the near future. I am encouraged by the new interest expressed by the opposition parties in industrial policy and hope that when the government announces these measures it will have their full co-operation and support.

May I say again that I was pleased to take part in this debate. May we call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), that the proceedings on the motion have expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HIGHWAYS

PAVING OF MACKENZIE HIGHWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Whereas the government of the province of Alberta has offered to loan funds to pave the Mackenzie highway from the Alberta border to the port of Hay River in the Northwest Territories, and whereas the federal government has neither responded to this offer nor is prepared to undertake this badly needed project itself, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the Government of Canada put narrow partisan considerations aside and work co-operatively with the governments of Alberta and the Northwest Territories in order to expedite the early paving of the Mackenzie highway.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

PUBLICIZING OF MAJOR ACQUISITION PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is my understanding that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has an obligation to be more than a rubber stamp to FIRA recommendations to cabinet. In view of 300 jobs being lost at the Canadian General Electric plant in Peterborough as a result of the minister's approval of a FIRA decision, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce reaffirm his government's pledge in the Speech from the Throne that "amendments will be introduced to ensure that major acquisition proposals by foreign companies will be publicized prior to a government decision on their acceptability", and that this government be censured for approving this CGE transaction without allowing adequate representation from, or maintaining effective communication with, the people of Peterborough.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CHURCHILL, MAN.—INCREASED USE OF PORT FOR SHIPMENT OF GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the port of Churchill is an economic benefit to many farmers who wish to ship their grain through Churchill and that under the existing disastrous mismanagement only 300,000 tonnes were shipped through Churchill this year, and since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has refused to set up a separate committee to study the improved use of Churchill for shipment of grains and other products, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to establish immediately a committee that will make recommendations to improve grain transportation through Churchill for next year, and that this same committee will be asked to make recommendations for the expanded use of the port in the future.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister's self-proclaimed expertise on western separatist sentiment has recently been put to lie by a poll published Saturday showing one in four Albertans wanting to separate from Canada, and in order to establish fairer treatment for Canada west, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

S.O. 43

That the Prime Minister renew energy negotiations not only with Alberta but also with other energy exporting provinces, such as British Columbia, before western alienation increases to a similar pitch in the other three provinces of the west.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WOMEN

EQUAL RIGHTS—CALL FOR ACTION ON GOVERNMENT COMMITMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House takes note of repeated commitments to equal rights for women, and therefore calls on the government to act on these commitments in terms of job opportunities and equal pay for work of equal value, as well as in providing pension coverage on a universal basis, equivalent to the Canada Pension Plan, for women who work in their homes, and also by eliminating forthwith the discrimination against women between 60 and 65 who are without spouses, it being the view of this House that all women in that age bracket should be entitled to the equivalent of the spouse's allowance, regardless of marital status.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

CALL FOR LOANS PROGRAM FOR NORTHEAST ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas many small businesses in northeast Alberta face not only economic hardship but bankruptcy as a result of delays in oil sands and heavy oil projects going ahead in the area, caused directly by the failure of the Liberal government to reach an energy pricing agreement with Alberta, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

● (1410)

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to implement immediately a loans guarantee program to small business in that area as he has to larger businesses elsewhere in Canada.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

INCLUSION OF "MAGIC MUSHROOMS" AS PROHIBITED ITEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, because of the importance of this matter for the future of many young Canadians I have some grounds for hope that this House will give unanimous consent to my urgent and pressing motion under Standing Order 43.

Because of the damage to mental and physical health caused by the ingestion of the hallucinogenic so-called "magic mushrooms" now coming to maturity and being harvested in large quantities on Vancouver Island and in the Fraser Valley, and in view of the legal difficulties confronting the police and farm owners to control the situation because these hallucinogens are not considered prohibited items under the Food and Drugs Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare be required to indicate on motions when she plans to bring forward a measure to have these fungi included in the list of natural products whose possession is unlawful under the Food and Drugs Act.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF GUN LAWS TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the authority of Standing Order 43. Whereas section 101 of the Criminal Code of Canada allows a police officer to search a person's home without a warrant and to seize any firearm when no crime has been committed and no charge has been laid, whereas a judge has ruled that this section is ultra vires and that the implications of this section are "frightening", and whereas such searches and seizures are contrary to the Canadian Bill of Rights, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the gun laws of Canada be referred for review and amendments to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at the earliest possible time.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

CALL FOR ABOLITION OF METRIC COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which is both pressing and urgent. As reported in Hansard for May 22 at page 1305, the Metric Commission has already spent over $25 million promoting the metric methodology, and $27 million more have been earmarked for the next three fiscal years. However, given that there has been a decision made to follow the Tory lead and to delay imposing metric conversion on the retail food sector for at least another year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House urge the government to abolish the Metric Commission until a firm decision is taken on the viability of metric at the retail level, thereby saving the poor Canadian taxpayer further financial and emotional grief.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR REPLACEMENT OF MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to underline the very serious rift which has been allowed to develop in the relationship between the federal government and Alberta. In energy matters the present minister has the same effect as a flame thrower in an ammunition dump. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the Prime Minister remove this person from the sensitive energy portfolio and replace him with one who is conciliatory and who has a proven track record in getting along with people in negotiations, such as any member of the gang of five: Mackasey, Reid, Cullen, Buchanan or Allmand.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARTER OF RIGHTS—PROHIBITION OF DISCRIMINATION AGAINST DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the special committee on the disabled and handicapped has recommended in its interim report that any charter of rights include provisions to prohibit discrimination against the disabled and the handicapped, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That the Minister of Justice be instructed to bring forward amendments to the proposed charter of rights to include the disabled and to prohibit discrimination against the disabled and the handicapped in all areas, not just in the area of employment.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PATRIATION—COMMUNICATION WITH UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. He will know that last Friday, in response to a question posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the minister's parliamentary secretary indicated that a call had been received by the minister last week from the Lord Privy Seal of the government of Great Britain. I wonder if the minister can confirm that such a call was received and that it was from the Lord Privy Seal. Can he also tell us the date on which that call was received and the conversation occurred?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I received a phone call last Monday between eleven o'clock and 12.30 or so from the government House leader in London. I looked at the answer given by my parliamentary secretary to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands last Friday afternoon and I found the answer to be accurate.

Mr. Clark: Well, it was accurate, except that the parliamentary secretary and the minister were speaking of the wrong minister in Great Britain. As the government House leader now knows, it was not the Lord Privy Seal, who is Sir Ian Gilmour. However, I am sure they will get it straight as to which was the minister in Great Britain to whom he spoke.

Let me ask the government House leader if he can tell the House of Commons both the purpose of the call from his opposite number in Great Britain and the information that was conveyed by his opposite number in Great Britain to the government House leader.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the British House leader inquired about parliamentary procedure and the progress made by the constitutional question in this House. I gave him a factual report. Such was the nature of my conversation with my British counterpart.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Did the representative of the British government, who obviously had some reason for initiating that call, indicate that there was any change in the attitude of the British government toward receiving recommendations of the Canadian House of Commons in Great Britain, and did he suggest that there might be some difficulty on the British side in receiving a recommendation which, while it was approved by a majority in Parliament, was nonetheless the subject of controversy in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I can confirm to my colleague opposite that as a result of my conversation with the Right Hon. Norman St. John-Stevas, I was pleased to note that nothing justified a change in our policy, in our attitude or in our constitutional action here in Canada. Indeed, I have found no difference at all, except for a five or six hour time difference during our conversation.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and simply ask him if, at the time when he replied to my question last Thursday in this House, he was fully and in detail aware of the conversation between his House leader and the House leader of the British government?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I was so aware.

PATRIATION—INQUIRY RESPECTING QUICK PASSAGE BY UNITED KINGDOM PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the government House leader. The government and the House leader have asserted that quick passage of any Canadian request to the British parliament would take place. Does the government still hold that view in light of the statements now made by Norman St. John-Stevas, the government leader in the British House of Commons, when he was quoted as saying: "We want an address agreed in Canada." Does the government still hold to its original view?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if my counterpart said what the hon. member claims he has said, I am unaware of it, and it is certainly not what he told me during our telephone conversation. The allegation made by my colleague opposite and my conversation with Sir St. John-Stevas are completely and clearly contradictory.

[English]

PATRIATION—POSITION OF UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It is based on the statement made by the Minister of Transport when participating in the debate to set up a joint committee to study the constitutional proposals that the result of following convention has been that we have not been able to patriate the constitution over the last 53 years, as the Prime Minister is so fond of saying.

● (1420)

In view of the fact his minister said that it was time now to end convention in Canada and to patriate without general agreement, does the Prime Minister hold the view that the British, on the other hand, once receiving the joint address, should still follow convention?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would not want to comment upon the excellent speech made by the minister. It seems to me the question can be answered without reference to the speech. I think the natural thing to do would be for the British government and parliament not to meddle in any way in Canadian internal affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

REQUEST INTEREST RATES BE LOWERED FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Several months ago, the minister stated that the spectacular rise in interest rates was a temporary phenomenon. As this temporary phenomenon has turned into a permanent one, does the minister intend to intervene on behalf of less fortunate small business, farmers and home owners who are more hard pressed than others by interest rates which have now reached 16 per cent, 17 per cent and even 18 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member realizes—

Mr. Knowles: En français!

Mr. MacEachen: —this year interest rates have had three major swings. The first was a very rapid increase, then a rapid decrease and a further rapid increase. As was mentioned before the committee by the governor of the Bank of Canada, all these changes have to do with the expectations which exist in the market with respect to the onrush of inflation.

Mr. Fraser: Can you explain that to Herb Gray?

Mr. MacEachen: As I said on Friday in reply to a question from the official opposition, at the present time there is no intention to bring in a new program for home owners, though I believe the extension of the small business development bond will have a favourable impact upon the requirements of small business over the period in which the bond is in effect.

INQUIRY WHETHER INCOME TAX CREDITS WILL BE GRANTED

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I had hoped that by putting a question in French to the minister, I would get a more direct reply, but I realize now that it was in vain.

However, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the government has committed itself in its last budget to help the have-nots, that is, low and middle-income Canadians, and following the report which was published today by the Canadian Council on Social Development, could the minister indicate today whether he intends to grant income tax credits, so that Canadians may cope with rising interest rates and inflation, the inflation caused by the government itself in the field of energy?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker. As I have indicated already, it is not the intention of the government to bring in a special program of tax credits at this time. There are a number of reasons why that is not possible. It seems to me the chief reason is that the costs which will be borne by consumers of energy over the next several years will be considerable, but will be considerably less than those brought forward last December. To me that is of major assistance to all consumers of Canada.

● (1425)

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, in a speech the minister made in September, one of the few which he has ever given and from which I am able to quote, he said that one of the reasons he became finance minister was to improve living standards and promote greater equity. I find it odd that the minister would respond to the report of the Canadian Council on Social Development, in the way which he has. They point out that the cost of the budget will be $500 to the average Canadian family, that it will have a dramatic effect on those who are least well off, and that it will cause problems in the housing field, the energy field and throughout the economy for lower-income Canadians.

In light of their estimate that over the next three years the government will be taking $14.3 billion out of the economy and only putting back $345 million as a form of recycling to senior citizens by an increase in the guaranteed income supplement, I would like to ask the minister how he can possibly justify these changes, which will have such a serious effect on lower and middle-income Canadians without the benefit of equitable tax policies, which he has spoken of in his speeches and again in his budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member referred to the important step which we took earlier in the session to increase substantially the support for needy pensioners. That was quite an important step. I think that the hon. member's analysis confirms clearly that there is a very fundamental difference of opinion between himself and myself as to how the current situation ought to be approached. I believe that the most equitable solution for all Canadians, including those in lower-income groups, is to strengthen and improve the operation of the over-all economy. All the proposals which the hon. gentleman has suggested today would have an opposite effect and in the long run would damage the people for whom, in his own mind, he is becoming the spokesman.

ENERGY

OIL IMPORTS—INQUIRY RESPECTING MEXICAN HEAVY CRUDE

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As a result of an agreement signed with Mexico earlier this year will the minister state the number of barrels of oil per day classed as heavy crude oil which are being purchased at world prices as part of that agreement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not have the exact figure at my fingertips. I will inquire and give the hon. member an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Shields: My supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Recognizing the very limited refining capacity which Canada has for this type of oil which is thick and difficult to refine, will the minister guarantee that this imported and very costly heavy crude oil will not displace the heavy oil produced in western Canada and normally sent to eastern refineries at $17 a barrel, as compared with Mexican heavy crude at over $35 a barrel?

Mr. Lalonde: I can give that assurance to the hon. member without any problem.

Oral Questions

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY RESPECTING JUICE APPLE SURPLUS IN ONTARIO

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. According to the minister's departmental officials the minister has refused to help the Apple Marketing Commission deal with the 5,000-ton juice apple surplus which exists in Ontario. Can the minister tell the House, firstly, why he refused; and, second, in light of the fact that for most of the smaller apple farmers this loss represents the loss of primary income, not secondary income as the department would have us believe, why would he not offer the same assistance to the apple farmers as he has to the cherry and grape growers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the answer is quite clear. There is no place to put the apples. There is nothing to be done with them. There is no method of processing we can find which can process them into juice or other alternatives, according to the information I have. I understand some of these apples are being moved into other markets in Quebec and Nova Scotia where the apple crop is not as heavy.

The information I have is contrary to what the member gives the House and myself. These apples are secondary apples, apples which have fallen and are bruised. They normally go into cider and there are 5,000 tons that they want me to buy. If the member can find a place where they can be processed I will reconsider the decision I made, but I just cannot see buying apples and dumping them on the ground.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, would the minister tell the House why he is allowing so much concentrate to be dumped into Canada from countries such as Chile, Argentina and South Africa? Approximately 17.98 million pounds were dumped in 1979, and this has a serious effect on our domestic industry.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member can find a healthier industry in the entire horticultural industry than the apple industry, I would like him to tell me. The apple industry has had a very good year economically. There is a very good apple marketing commission in Ontario. The tremendous crop this year will benefit the entire industry.

Also, the government has given the industry assistance up to one-third of the cost of storage, up to $500,000 for controlled atmospheric temperature storage. There is more storage now than ever before for all Canadian apples. For instance, this year British Columbia is exporting apples to approximately 40 different countries around the world, and this is because of the programs which we have initiated. Naturally, sometimes we take in produce from other parts of the world.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY APPLICATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. It is with regard to the very serious discrimination which exists in the area of taxation on equipment used to haul wood-converting products, particularly logs. As the minister knows, there is an investment tax credit for such equipment as it applies to larger companies, but private trucking loggers—in other words, small independent operators—are not benefiting from the investment tax credit. The minister is aware of this fact because he has been dealing with the problem since he became the minister and it has been referred to the department before.

Why does this anomaly exist and what does the minister intend to do about it? When can we expect the necessary changes which will remove this discrimination against private operators?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, generally speaking the people who haul the logs are not connected with the forest products industry, and we make that distinction. However, the situation is under review at the present time. I am taking a look at the situation to determine if we can accommodate the small businessmen who haul the logs, but generally speaking it is the lack of integration with the forest products industry which creates the problem.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I am glad to hear that the minister will review the matter once again. However, the people and the association concerned are directly related to the logging industry because they do nothing else but haul logs. How closer can one be connected to the logging industry? Will the minister respond to these people by letter and invite them to make their presentation to him? This situation did not exist previously and the bureaucrats are not responding to the legitimate concerns of these people.

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, I will be glad to receive representations from the industry affected.

INDUSTRY

FUNDING OF PROPOSED DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce; I am happy to see him back in the House, as we all are. By the way, what a fine mess Bud Olson has put him in now. I would like the minister to respond to a problem which developed in his absence. He may well be aware that Canada's gross national product has registered a 1.7 per cent negative growth in the first half of 1980, that industrial production has declined in four of the last five quarters and that the second quarter of 1980 industrial production was down 3.2 per cent from the autumn of 1979. The minister has indicated that the strategy—

Mr. Paproski: Question.

Mr. Deans: —required demands strong government leadership. How does the minister propose to provide that strong government leadership for the industrial restructuring that is so obviously necessary with only $44 million per year for the next four years?

Mr. Lawrence: Yes or no.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has totally overlooked the budget, which spoke of the western initiatives program, the national energy program as well as the 22 per cent increase in the economic development envelope. What is involved there are the potential and, in fact, the actual expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars to build Canadian industry and to provide thousands of jobs for Canadians in every part of this country. When will my hon. friend recognize the positive aspects of this budget instead of circling around in an ideological miasma?

Mr. Lawrence: Privilege!

Mr. Rae: He is the only man in Canada who believes Allan MacEachen.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is as aware as I am that out of the total number of dollars allocated for industrial redevelopment, only $44 million can be used outside western Canada. How does the minister propose to restructure the industry of Ontario and east to the maritimes with only $44 million per year in order that it will be competitive and active in world markets?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is totally mistaken in his suggestion that only $44 million will be available for the restructuring of Ontario and eastern Canadian industry.

Mr. Rae: Tell us how much you are getting?

Mr. Gray: The effect of the 22 per cent increase in the economic development envelope together with the effects of the western initiative programs and the national energy program, in fact means hundreds of millions of dollars for Ontario and eastern Canada development.

Mr. Rae: How much?

Mr. Gray: In fact, I would go further and say that I estimate that the amount involved for industrial development in Ontario and eastern Canada would certainly be in excess of $1 billion at the very least because of the very important flow-through effects of these programs and their positive impact on all of Canada, particularly Ontario and the eastern part of our country.

COMMUNICATIONS

EARTH STATIONS—INQUIRY WHETHER CHARGES LAID AGAINST UNLICENSED OPERATORS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Will the minister tell the House in how many instances the government has ordered that charges be laid against the owners and operators of unlicensed earth stations, and is he contemplating laying further charges?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, there are a number of instances in which we have been in touch with cable operators or people operating illegal stations and asked them to cease and desist their operations. Indeed, most of them have stopped their illegal operations. To my knowledge, there are two cases respecting which we are in the process of laying charges.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that it appears to be the government's policy to ask the police to disable unlicensed earth stations found on the tops of apartment buildings and which are hooked in by MATV systems, is the minister prepared instead to give licences to those unlicensed television receiver stations to receive signals from Canadian satellites, such as the broadcasts of the House of Commons proceedings?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, in the cases to which the hon. member has referred, these people have access already to the House of Commons signals. I indicated quite clearly in my speech last week in Toronto that we were interested in bringing to an end the reception of illegal signals in the urban centres of Canada. Our operations have been centred essentially on densely populated areas of Canada where there are already a high number of channels available.

FRENCH PROGRAM TRANSMISSION IN NORTHERN AREAS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, by now the minister has had time to look into the matter which I brought to his attention with respect to the order by CRTC to cease and desist French programming in Yukon. Will the minister now assure us that we will be able to continue this day-long French language programming in Yukon?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to see the hon. member's interest in extending French language programming across this country. I think it meets some of the desires which we have indicated in our constitutional position.

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Mr. Fox: I have made the hon. member's representations known to the CRTC, and I would hope that the CRTC will be able to regulate the situation in the immediate future.

Mr. Nielsen: Rectify, you mean.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—INQUIRY WHETHER INTEREST RATE WILL BE INCREASED

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that he is presently paying 12.4 per cent interest on the 180-day treasury bills and over 13 per cent interest on the one-year to five-year bonds. The minister's budget indicated a rate of inflation of 10.2 per cent. Therefore, with respect to Canada Savings Bonds, the government is barely meeting, at 10.5 per cent interest, the rate of inflation, yet that is not the tenor of the advertising. Will the minister at this point increase the rate paid on Canada Savings Bonds to be more in step with the rate he pays the big banks and financial institutions for treasury bills and bonds so that the ordinary people will have at least a rate of return on their bonds equal to, or better than, the rate of inflation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will give careful consideration to the hon. member's suggestion that I should increase the rate of return on Canada Savings Bonds, despite the fact that at the present time it is a very attractive investment; it is high quality and can be cashed at any time. Quite apart from these positive features, however, I will consider what he has to suggest.

Mr. Blenkarn: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. If the minister is going to do that, I think a rate of at least 11.5 per cent would be appropriate. On this side of the House we know the cost of selling bonds, we know the redeeming features of them and all the rest. The minister would not even be paying a rate equal to the 90-day treasury bill rate, which is essentially an instant cash instrument, if he increased the rate on those bonds to 11.5 per cent.

Would the minister give the House a commitment that, before the time limit for the sale of the bonds expires, he will be fair to the people who have bought them and will stand behind his advertising which indicates that they are a good deal, when in fact he knows they are not?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, when we set the rate for Canada Savings Bonds our objective was not only to make the bonds attractive for prospective purchasers but also to reduce to the lowest possible amount the burden on the public treasury. My hon. friend knows that even a 1 per cent increase in the rate of return involves a very substantial increased burden upon the treasury and upon future payments on the national debt. It was in order to reduce that impact as much as possible, and at the same time to provide for a sale, that we set the rate at 10.5 per cent. I am aware of the points the hon. member has made and I will be giving consideration to them at an early moment.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF INVESTIGATION INTO CONDITIONS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General who has been receiving letters and questions for weeks about the conditions at Dorchester penitentiary in New Brunswick. I wonder if the minister is now in a position to give a statement to the House indicating what progress has been made in investigating and, we hope, coping with the very difficult circumstances. Specifically, is he able to give us a little more concrete information about the precise circumstances that led to the death of William Morrison, the guard who was killed during the hostage incident some weeks ago?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the House earlier, three inquiries into this matter are under way. One is being conducted by the RCMP under the provincial contract. That has resulted in charges being laid and I understand that investigation may be continuing. There is another, the special inquiry being conducted by the inspector general's division within the correctional service of Canada, to which had been added, for the first time that I am aware of, an independent outsider to sit as one of the inquiring officers. I will receive that report in the next day or two and, of course, will look at it with great interest to make sure that the recommendations contained in it for improving the security for the institution are implemented. Third, the independent provincial coroner of New Brunswick has indicated that he will be conducting a public inquest in the latter half of November into the death and into the circumstances surrounding it.

In view of all of those inquiries, I do not think that for the time being any statement of facts or official version of facts coming from me would be helpful or that any further action by way of inquiry would be justified until the results of these three investigations or inquiries are available.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's complete answer. I would ask, however, whether he will give an undertaking of two things. If, at the conclusion of these various investigations, it appears that there is any conflict of interest or lack of full and unequivocal disclosure, will he consider an independent judicial inquiry into a situation which is causing so much concern and has for so long in this institution.

Second, will he at the first opportunity, if he has not already done so, make a disclosure, on a private basis if he wishes, to the family of William Morrison whose grief has been compounded by the fact that they are convinced they have not received a full and accurate account of what actually happened to their son that coincides with the conclusions they have drawn as a result of their own private inquiries?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, on the first part of the question, I indicated to the justice committee of this House that a judicial inquiry had not been excluded as a possibility but that nothing I had seen so far justified it. I will certainly keep that available as an option of something that could be done if the inquiries that I have already referred to do not lead to a full explanation of what had happened and a satisfactory plan to make sure that the possibility of that recurring is minimized.

Second, regarding the representations about the Morrison family, I was not aware that they were dissatisfied with the explanations they had received or had been able to obtain about what had happened at Dorchester. To the extent that I could satisfy them or that the correctional service could before the results of the public inquiry are known, I will be glad to look into it and attempt to do so.

TRANSPORT

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND MAINE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Some years ago Bowater Mersey Paper Company of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, established a substantially growing market in the northeastern United States for newsprint and lumber via the Yarmouth, Nova Scotia to Portland, Maine ferry service—a service that was subsequently withdrawn, leaving the company with no competitive alternatives to service their customers in that area.

In view of the fact that Nova Scotia has a natural market in the northeastern United States which can be reached by truck-trailer over the vital Nova Scotia to Portland, Maine ferry service, will the minister take steps to provide a reliable cost-competitive year-round link to northeastern U.S. markets for Nova Scotia products?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there must be confusion somewhere. It is my understanding that two ferries operate from Yarmouth to Portland, Maine. One is a tourist-oriented ferry which operates only in the summertime and actually comes to the end of its operation at this time of the year. The other is a freight-oriented ferry which operates year round. Hence my confusion, because this one is still in operation. It presents difficulty because it operates only at 30 per cent of capacity and costs the federal government $4 million to $5 million per year.

I have brought this problem to the attention of the provincial ministers concerned during my recent trip to the maritimes in the hope that we could look at all these matters in a multimodal fashion. I fail to see, however, where the immediate problem is for the pulp and paper company mentioned.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. As the minister has stated, one ferry service only operates for part of the year and provides accommodation only for passengers. The CN ferry service is the one to which I refer, and since it operates at less than a 30 per cent load factor due to the fact that present ferry rates are simply too high to attract business, would the minister encourage CN officials to reduce the rate presently charged in order to encourage more use of this ferry? CN could thereby increase revenues somewhat in the manner of Laker with the service provided from Britain.

Will the minister also encourage CN to show some interest and flexibility in the development of business, especially in western Nova Scotia, which could lead to the ferry being used to full capacity?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I will certainly do that as it seems to make sense. However, occasionally when I have done something like that I have been reminded that simply lowering rates does not necessarily increase the loading. This might be one of those instances. I will check, however, and do my utmost to help.

SMALL BUSINESS

INQUIRY RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY FOR DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Last week one sector of Canadian society that was very distressed and dejected at the budget was the very crucial small business community. That community has been especially hit by the high and increasing interest rates and, of course, the high and increasing inflation rate across the country. I think the small business community had the impression that the government had done something for it and that legislation would be forthcoming to offset these high interest rates.

Would the minister tell the House, when he brings in the small business development bond and extends the program for an additional three months into 1981, what percentage of the small business community will actually be eligible for relief under this program?

• (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will be glad to provide the hon. member with the information he has requested, maybe before we proceed with the debate on that particular measure and the extension of that measure. I have decided to extend the measure for an additional three months, not only for the reasons that the hon. member has given but also because of the uncertainty which prevailed for several months this year as to whether that bond would come into effect. It offers very substantial aid to the small business community. Indeed, if it were not for the rather large expenditures involved, I would be tempted to extend it for a longer period of time; but the three-month extension, in addition to the period in effect already, will cost the treasury about an additional $50 million.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I think the minister's response was somewhat off the track. My research indicates that of the 930,000 small businesses in Canada, about 95 per cent will not be eligible because of the restrictions, qualifications, exclusions and limitations that have now been placed on this legislation. The program does not include the funding of working capital. It does not recognize sole proprietorships. Does the minister really say to this House that the majority of Canada's small business people will be positively affected by this proposed legislation?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, it is obvious that small business welcomes this measure and regards it as a very important and substantial way of assisting small business. I cannot tell the hon. member offhand the proportion of small business which is affected, but it is quite substantial. The program has been requested by the representatives on behalf of small businesses in Canada. Even though there have been some exclusions in order to reduce the cost, the cost is still very substantial. To finance that program for a single year will cost $200 million, and that is a very substantial assistance to small business in Canada.

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING REGULATIONS AND REDUCTION IN PAPER BURDEN

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses. Since there are over 640,000 small businesses in Canada and small business is a very important part of our economy, can the minister tell us what has happened to the much-touted recommendations designed to reduce the red tape, paper burden and regulations with respect to small business?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, since the inception of the Bureau for the reduction of paper burden, we have been able, with the co-operation of all departments involved, to reduce the paper burden for businesses by some $300 million a year. Recently, I had the honour to announce that 58 new measures were put forward in order to reduce this burden even more. All departments, particularly Statistics Canada, have willingly co-operated by abolishing a number of forms and integrating them to other forms in various departments, and even by using the telephone on a much more regular basis than before, in an attempt to really reduce that cost. With the announced measures, it is believed we can reduce by some 20 per cent the paper burden now required by federal regulations. Also, as you are aware, Madam Speaker, there is a House committee which is now working on the matter and trying to find the best means to deregulate as much as possible various areas of our industry.

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In the first part of last week the minister made a speech in Vancouver to the Canada Grains Council, in which he said, and I quote:

> —probably a decision will be made in early 1981 to raise the rates paid to the railways for transporting grain . . . Although some system must be devised to raise (grain) freight rates, the Crowsnest rate cannot be wiped out immediately . . . But a subsidy on grain transportation is necessary in some form.

What form was the minister talking about? Was he talking about wiping out the Crowsnest Pass rate over some period of time or a gradual change that will be made to the freight rates?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has read the notes I used for a speech in Vancouver to the Canada Grains Council. I said that some form must be developed to compensate for the rates. I understand the hon. member had a suggestion and was reprimanded for it, intimating that it is a luxury we cannot afford. We have received many suggestions about what should be done concerning the Crowsnest Pass rates. We are all anxious to bring this to a conclusion and hope to be able to do that in early 1981, which is what I said.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CROWSNEST PASS RATES WILL CONTINUE TO BENEFIT FARMERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, it is obvious the Minister of Agriculture did not know what he was talking about when he made the statement, if that is the only answer he can give me on this very important issue. I will direct my supplementary question to the the Minister of Transport. With regard to any change that is being contemplated, can the minister enlighten the House as to when we may see a position paper put forward by the government? Also, will he assure the House that the Crow benefit being given to western grain farmers at the present time will remain, regardless of any change that takes place in the grain transportation area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I read some press reports of what the distinguished Minister of Agriculture said in Vancouver. He was addressing the Canada Grains Council, which is the think tank of the grain industry. As usual, the minister was challenging, explosive and informative. The fact is that the policy with regard to the Crow rate is presently in the decision-making pipeline. I hope the government will be in a position to indicate its views in the coming months. With regard to the Crow benefit, I would think this would be one of the foundations of the policy to be announced.

INQUIRY RESPECTING MANDATE OF PROPOSED ENERTECH CORPORATION

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the formation of the new Crown corporation, Enertech. Can the minister advise the House what exactly its mandate will be and how it will relate to the many other areas of energy, research and development and conservation that are now being looked after by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the National Research Council and so on?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): First, Madam Speaker, I am happy to repeat that Enertech Canada will have its headquarters in the nice city of Winnipeg.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I hope that this corporation will be a significant and positive contributor to the economic development of Manitoba in general and of Winnipeg in particular.

As far as the mandate is concerned, the corporation is going to be responsible for development of new forms of energy and renewable energy. It is not going to embark upon the area of conservation per se. That is already part of government programs under the responsibility of my department. Rather, it will be engaged in research and development and in the marketing of new forms of energy, renewable energy in particular. It will work with existing corporations in the field. It will consider the possibility of joint ventures, and support of existing corporations as well as conduct its own activities. It will start as a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, but as soon as possible it will be set up as an independent Crown corporation.

Mr. Gurbin: Can the minister tell us when he expects this Crown corporation to begin to function? Specifically in an area where we have $20 million for funding and a $70,000 position for a manager, or president if you will, who does the minister expect to get to perform this function for that kind of money?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am happy to know that my friend is supportive of increasing the salary to more than $70,000. I would hope we could get outstanding candidates to apply for such a position. We have been looking for and interviewing people for the last few months. I must say, however, that it is disappointing to find there are a number of individuals who consider that $70,000 is not good enough.

● (1500)

Mr. Paproski: Not if they were working for you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I see that some of my NDP friends are eager to jump at the job. We will see if they have the qualifications, which is another question, however.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: It is you, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: At the present time we are interviewing possible candidates, and I hope to get this corporation into operation very soon indeed.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

NATURAL GAS LINE TO MARITIMES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Further to the announcement made by the Minister of Finance to the effect that the federal government was going to support the construction of a gas pipeline to the maritime provinces, the Quebec government indicated that that decision on our part would jeopardize the Gros-Cacouna project and favour that of Canso. To throw light on those attacks, can the minister tell us where plans stand on the regasification project, and also exactly when a final decision will be reached in that regard?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker. I must say, first of all, that the decision to extend the gas pipeline to the maritime provinces was taken independently from the regasification project. To our mind, it is imperative that the gas pipeline be extended to the Maritimes without any delay, as quickly as possible, to reduce the dependence of those provinces on oil imports. With regard to bringing gas down from the Arctic to eastern Canada, that project will be submitted by Petro-Canada to the National Energy Board which will be studying it next year; I expect we should have the decision of the Board by the end of 1981.

With regard to the possibility of building a plant either in Quebec or in the Strait of Canso, that decision will be made by Petro-Canada and the National Energy Board. The cabinet will examine the recommendation of the National Energy Board in due course; but I do want to stress that we are dealing here with a project that depends on the Government of Canada, on Petro-Canada and not the Quebec Government, naturally. In addition, as far as we are concerned, we will see to it that the decision reached will really be in the interest of all Canadians as well as economically sound.

Point of Order—Mr. Clark

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—CONSTITUTIONAL DRAFT RESOLUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to government business concerning what I gather is going to be a change in the approach which the government is taking to the constitutional resolution. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated during the question period that he does not want Britain meddling in Canada's affairs, which is the position we have been urging upon the government for some time. May I ask the government House leader whether that statement is a demonstration that the government intends to amend the draft resolution so that the British will not be deciding Canadian questions of rights and freedoms?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in answer to his question, I should like to point out to the Leader of the Opposition that our constitutional endeavour entails a proposed resolution that will be studied by a committee of the House in coming days. It will be up to members of the House of Commons of Canada to approve or reject the text of the resolution. This document will be considered in a third stage by the House of Commons after the committee has submitted its report, and then again, members of Parliament from all areas of Canada will have the opportunity to debate the issue and to approve or reject the provisions contained in our constitutional package.

What parliamentarians in London will have to approve finally is simply the wish expressed by Canadian members of parliament after discussion and debate in Canada of each and every proposal included in our constitutional package.

So what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said today does not clash in any way with the very nature of the action we are taking, which requires the participation and approval of all the members of the Parliament of Canada before London ratifies, as a matter of form, what will be decided here in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I do not intend to prolong this discussion, but I gather from what the government House leader said that it remains the intention of the Government of Canada to have the parliament of Great Britain decide questions relating to Canadian rights and freedoms.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, because of the present system we want change for reasons of dignity and self respect. Several times in the past when we wanted to amend our constitution we have had to go through this humiliating procedure of asking for Westminster's permission. We want to put an end to that situation and get rid of the last traces of colonialism. Why then should the opposition leader get upset about such a noble course of action?

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 424 to 435 inclusively, 753 and 859.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): See charts below.

NOTE: There is no information available on Indians' average age at death as the present information system does not record deaths by single years of age. A statistical breakdown of male and female deaths by age grouping compiled in 1978, including the total number of deaths with comparative rates for Indians and the Canadian population as a whole is below.

Please see the list below giving the required national and provincial breakdown of ages at death for male and female Canadians who are not status Indians.

POLICY AND MANAGEMENT CONSULTANTS

Question No. 753—Mr. Shields:

Since August 1, 1978, how many (a) administrative (b) policy consultants were under contract to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and/or any boards, commissions or corporations reporting to the minister and, in each case, what amount was paid to them?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): We do not have any records of consultants under that specific title; however, we do have contracts issued under management consultants as follows:

Number of contracts—117

Total costs —$1,806,434.64

See reports below.

In so far as the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is concerned: none.

In so far as the Canadian Saltfish Corporation is concerned: none.

In so far as the Fisheries Prices Support Board is concerned: none.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 30, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, the amendment thereto of Mr. Crosbie (p. 4231) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Rae (p. 4235).

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, when ten o'clock was called last Thursday evening I was in the process of saying that the 32-cent a gallon increase for gasoline, which would have affected Canadians by the end of this year under the Tory budget of 1979, is a far cry from the 13.3-cent a gallon increase which will affect consumers with our government's budget.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. Henderson: To continue, hon. members opposite who predicted that this government would deindex personal income tax were also proved wrong. This government and this Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) realized that to do away with indexing of personal income taxes would adversely affect the low and middle-income wage earners in Canada.

It is not now, nor has it ever been the intent of the Liberal government to have the little guy bear the brunt of providing the necessary revenues to ensure the economic viability of this country. The government did not intend to overburden poor Canadians from every province in this country. Make no mistake about it, there are many poor Canadians in the western provinces. Not everyone in the western provinces owns his own home or drives a big car or, indeed, has a summer cottage.

This government will look for the necessary revenue where the money is, in excess of oil and gas industry profits. It will collect additional taxes from the oil and gas industry. This does not seem unrealistic to me nor to a great many other Canadians. A number of members, including myself, when speaking of the constitution, have said that Canadians by their very nature are willing to share. This willingness to share is one of the traits in true Canadians which is to be admired. If this great country of ours, this Canada, is to continue to grow and prosper from sea to sea, I believe that willingness to share must be evident from sea to sea.

In the interests of the social and economic well-being of all Canadians, but more important of poor Canadians, and in the interests of the national unity of this great country, we must all be prepared to share. Every province in this country throughout our history at one point in time has required the understanding, compassion, and assistance of other provinces. This is a fact which no doubt will be a reality for the next 113 years of our history.

Many positive steps have been taken by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, which will have a beneficial effect on the national scene, but I would like to comment, if I may, on some of the more positive steps taken to alleviate regional disparity or, perhaps to be a little more specific, disparity in Atlantic Canada and, in particular, my province of Prince Edward Island.

The extension of the natural gas pipeline system to Quebec City and the maritimes is very welcome news indeed. Portions of Quebec and the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia being afforded the opportunity to switch from oil to natural gas will lessen the dependency of the Atlantic region on offshore oil. This offshore oil that the Atlantic region must depend on is unreliable at this point in time, and continues to escalate in price.

The fund which will support the conversion of the Atlantic region's oil-fired electrical plants to coal will have a direct and very positive effect. A positive impact on my province of Prince Edward Island, because its requirement is totally electrical energy from oil-fired plants, will also be felt. A consequence of this requirement is that Prince Edward Island has the highest electrical rates of any province in Canada. I speak of provinces. I realize that the Northwest Territories and Yukon probably had, and have, higher oil prices.

This government, realizing that neither Newfoundland nor Prince Edward Island have access to western natural gas, has initiated a program which provides for a major housing retrofit program which includes energy audits, oil furnace retrofits, and additional insulation. This grant will cover 50 per cent of the costs involved, up to a maximum of $800. That is the cost of the retrofits. This program will also be made available in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I was pleased that the Prince Edward Island conservation and renewable energy agreement will be extended. The four-year cost of this conservation and renewable energy agreement will be $9 million.

The special emphasis on renewables development in Prince Edward Island, where alternate energies are concerned, reflect the support given to conservation and renewable energies by public action and public policy in my province. In fact, my province is considered to be leading the way in Canada in research of renewable energies.

I am also extremely pleased that the 9 per cent excise tax on the packaging of farm produce will be removed as of January 1, 1981. This was, of course, very welcome news for the potato producers of Prince Edward Island. I had considerable communication about this tax with the hon. Minister of Finance, and obviously the minister has listened and responded not only to the farmers of Prince Edward Island but also, indeed, to farmers right across the country.

Another very important announcement in the budget which affects my constituency perhaps to a greater extent than others was the full indexing of personal income taxes for 1981. In my constituency there is a large percentage of low and middle-income families, and they very definitely would have felt the full effect of any de-indexing program. The rationale used by the Minister of Finance was sound indeed.

Indexing of personal income tax ensures that increases in income which just keep pace with inflation will not force higher income tax burdens on low-income people. Certainly of major importance is that low and middle-income families will receive the refundable tax child credit. The indexing of that child tax credit ensures that its real value to families is maintained.

Opposition members have been quoted as saying that this budget does nothing for the unemployment situation facing Canada. The investment tax credits for new capital investments made in selective regions is being increased from its present 20 per cent maximum rate to 50 per cent in selected regions. These selected regions will be determined on the basis of criteria such as high unemployment and low income levels. Again I say that we should be trying to attract business in areas where there are low income levels. By attracting industries to these regions, quite obviously jobs will be created and fewer people will be unemployed.

I suggest also that the reintroduction of the MURB program will provide a stimulus to the construction industry which will provide employment for large numbers of qualified workers in the construction trades.

Further, the energy policy of this government, if analysed with some degree of intelligence, indicates vast potential for job creation. As a matter of fact this energy policy could, I believe, be accurately described as a job creation energy policy. Just one of the many projects outlined in our energy policy is the extension of the natural gas pipeline to the maritimes.

Mr. Lambert: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Henderson: Does the hon. member over there believe that a project of this magnitude would require any less than thousands of workers not only in the manufacturing of the pipe but also the laying of the pipe and so forth? A project of this magnitude would produce obvious spin-off effects. This is fact.

This government has reserved $350 million for manpower retraining programs. As hon. members know, there is a large number of people who lack the necessary skills to enter a very competitive labour force. This $350 million will finance manpower retraining programs which will provide people all over the country with marketable skills. It would appear to me that members of the opposition, because their own budget sank with their Jolly Roger, Captain Crosbie, are now grasping at straws and trying desperately to create troubled waters for this government's budget. I can assure hon. members opposite that this budget will not sink. It will steam straight ahead, and Canadians from one coast to the other will enjoy the benefits from it.

In my opening remarks I made reference to the increase of 32 cents a gallon on gasoline in the Crosbie budget of December of last year. I compared that with the 13.3 cents in my colleague's budget. Perhaps we can carry that comparison just a little further. By the end of 1981 the cost of a gallon of gasoline at the pumps in Toronto, with this government's budget, will be $1.36. The Conservative budget of 1979 would have meant a price at the pump in Toronto of $1.56 a gallon, a difference of 20 cents a gallon.

By the end of 1982, again using Toronto as a mean average, the government's budget will mean $1.53 a gallon at the pumps, while the Conservative budget of 1979 would mean $1.75 a gallon, or a difference of 22 cents a gallon.

As we go on, the comparison becomes even more dramatic, Mr. Speaker. By the end of 1983 our budget will mean that the cost of a gallon of gasoline at the pump in Toronto will be $1.71 a gallon. The ill-fated Tory budget of 1979 would mean we would be paying $2.32 a gallon, or a difference of 61 cents a gallon.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, because I know hon. members opposite are becoming somewhat embarrassed—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Henderson: —by the end of 1984, under my honourable colleague's budget, a gallon of gasoline at the pump in Toronto will cost $1.95. Under the previous budget introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), a gallon of gasoline would cost $2.63, or a difference of 68 cents a gallon.

While comparing the relative costs of gasoline as a result of the budget presented by the hon. member for St. John's West who, by the way, made quite a speech here the other day—

An hon. Member: A great speech.

Mr. Henderson: Yes, a great speech. Every now and then he would blow, he would take a drink of water. It was the first time that I saw a windmill run by water.

An hon. Member: What are you run by?

Mr. Henderson: While I am comparing the relative costs of gasoline under the budget presented by the hon. member for St. John's West and that of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, I believe it would be appropriate to respond to statements made to the effect that this budget has nothing in it for the farmers and fishermen in this country. This is one of the statements which has been made. It seems ironic that the hon. member for St. John's West should make such a statement, because it was the farmers and fishermen in my riding who could have least afforded the very dramatic forecasted rapid increases in the cost of gasoline suggested by the hon. gentleman opposite.

We have heard statements from the other side of the House about the flight of the wild geese, the plucking of the goose with its wings flapping, and so on. Well, Mr. Speaker, the ill-fated budget of December 11, 1979, the Christmas budget which was brought down just 14 days, not 12 days, before Christmas, was I submit, a turkey budget, a budget which would have had my farmers and fishermen in Prince Edward Island flocking from the sea and the land like a flock of turkeys. I believe that almost every one can live with and benefit from this government's budget. The farmers and the fishermen will feel the effects of this budget because it is designed to ensure the economic stability of this country.

We have also heard from hon. members on the other side of the House statements to the effect that members on this side of the House do not understand the west. I think there is a need for a better understanding of all parts of Canada by all of us in the House, and indeed not only but us in this House but by all Canadians. When I was last out west I heard statements to the effect that we were probably not aware of what was going on out there. But when I got a little deeper into the conversation I found that when they were talking about the east they meant mainly Montreal and Toronto.

When I explained to them—these were mainly working people—that there are four provinces east of Montreal, they began to think and to understand a little bit better what the east really is. When I told them that we in the maritimes rely on industries such as agriculture, fisheries, tourism, small business, and so on, all of them high energy consuming industries, they understood immediately why we could not take rapid increases in oil prices. I believe that is very, very important, because a country can be compared to a chain—it is only as strong as its weakest link. Therefore, if we are to have a strong country, we have to grow and develop together and we have to look after one and other, as provinces have over the last number of years.

When confederation was formed, Atlantic Canada was composed of the "have" provinces, but then the emphasis shifted to central Canada. Of course now, undoubtedly, the emphasis is shifting to western Canada. We must keep this country united and we must ensure that, by allowing a rapid increase in the wealth of one area, we will not allow another area to deteriorate. I submit that we must not allow this to happen.

Before my time runs out, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the government's objectives to achieve at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the oil and gas industries by 1990. I have had a number of comments from my constituents in this regard and I have found that, without exception, the general feeling is that natural resources in Canada should be owned and controlled by Canadians. I submit that this general feeling is felt right across this country in all constituencies.

I know that my time is up, Mr. Speaker, so in conclusion I should like to congratulate once again my colleague, the Minister of Finance, for presenting a budget which I think is as fair and equitable to Canadians as we could expect in such difficult times experienced not only in this country but, indeed, in the world.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the debate today on the budget and the energy statement of last Tuesday is one of the most important we have seen and will see in the Thirty-second Parliament. It is very significant that it should have followed so soon after the historic debate on the constitutional resolution. The energy policy sets out in very real terms that we have been debating in somewhat abstract terms in the constitutional debate. It shows vividly how, in its greedy and self-centred view of Canada, the federal government is attempting to capture significantly greater power and ever-increasing tax dollars in a unilateral way without regard for the history and the constitutional position of the regions of this country.

The constitutional proposals of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would allow the federal government to bypass the legislatures of Canada. The energy proposals show clearly how it would do so. The objectives of the energy proposals show clearly how it would do so. The objectives of the energy proposals are very noble in intent, but the means to achieve these objectives as laid out in the national program are incompatible with the over-all objectives.

As we have said on many occasions, self-sufficiency should be our primary objective, our overriding objective in the energy policy. The precarious position of the Middle East with the current Iran-Iraq war should tell us that. We should be attempting to protect ourselves from shortages in the Middle East and gain from having the increased energy dollars spent here in Canada promoting new investment, new jobs, and new technology, from which all Canadians can benefit.

The government sets out self-sufficiency as the first objective of the energy policy, but the other two objectives, namely, revenue sharing and increasing Canadianization, totally undermine this policy objective. It was generally recognized that the Clark government energy policy could achieve energy self-sufficiency by 1990.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: It is doubtful whether this dog's breakfast masquerading as an energy policy with all its inconsistencies will ever achieve that important goal. It takes direct aim at the two chief partners of energy policy, the producing provinces and the industry. Canadian consumers, many in central Canada and Atlantic Canada, are being asked to pay the equivalent of $1 more for a gallon of gasoline by 1984. Huge amounts of money are being provided by consumers, but for what purpose? The consumer wants to be absolutely sure that the result will justify the cost. Will Canada achieve energy self-sufficiency by 1990? I am afraid not, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: No way under this budget.

Mr. Wilson: The Clark government proposals were costly, I will not deny that, but they had a purpose, a clear goal, namely, energy self-sufficiency. The new Liberal policy has one clear objective, not nearly so clearly stated, namely, more revenues for the federal government. It is a mammoth tax grab to pay for their profligate spending of the past 12 years.

Mr. Wilson: These words may sound somewhat familiar to Mr. Speaker. On December 11, 1979, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), when he was the finance critic, said that "this Conservative energy package was really a disguised tax increase, a mammoth tax grab from the Canadian people." But let us compare the two proposals, because they are very, very different.

The Conservative budget called for an 18-cent excise tax, a 50 per cent federal share in price increases over $2 per barrel, offset by an energy tax to help those hit hardest by rising energy prices. Net revenues to the federal government for the three years ending March 31, 1984, were projected at $12.8 billion, a large figure. The Liberal budget proposes an 8 per cent production tax, an increasing natural gas excise tax, an increasing petroleum compensation charge, and a Canadian ownership charge. That will produce a monstrous $37.5 billion tax grab for the federal government, about three times "the mammoth tax grab" to which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce objected. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) goes hunting with an elephant gun.

Let us put that into perspective because there has been some discussion about the shares taken by different levels of government. With all the increased taxes layered on each other, the cost of a barrel of oil in 1983 will be $32.80, out of which the federal government will take $17.38, or 53 per cent. The House should not let the minister fool it about the petroleum compensation charge.

In 1975 when the Hon. John Turner imposed the 10-cent excise tax on gasoline, which subsequently was reduced to 7 cents as part of an election bribe, he said that it was to offset the growing cost of imported oil. That tax followed an export tax on oil and oil products. Together these two taxes produce today about $1.4 billion in revenue with the clear purpose of paying the oil import subsidy. But we do not hear that any more these days; it has been forgotten. It has been blended into government revenues so that now we have the compensation charge which is the only apparent tax used to offset import costs. As indicated on page 32 of the budget papers, this charge is producing even more revenue than is necessary to meet import costs—a total of $885 million in the years 1982 and 1983 more than is required to offset the cost of imports. Clearly the government is using the energy situation to increase its slice of the economic pie at the expense of the consumer. In that three-year period we will have about a $4 billion increased tax. Initially set out as being to offset the cost of imports, it will go straight into government revenues, and it is not mentioned at all by the Minister of Finance.

Also let me respond to the challenge of the Minister of Finance to my leader to show that the government has placed a greater burden on the Canadian consumer in its budget than would have been the case in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). In spite of claims to the contrary, Liberals have broken their campaign promise not to increase the cost of oil over $4 per barrel. The increase up until this budget was $3, there was the 75-cent Syncrude levy and now there is a further 80-cent tax as a result of the budget, for a total of $4.55, against the increase of $4 of the hon. member for St. John's West.

The increased cost of driving a car under both budgets would be about the same, but because the petroleum compensation charge and the Canadian ownership charge are very regressive and pervasive, the costs of oil heating are up by a total of $128 a year over the cost provided in the "Crosbie" budget. For low and middle-income earners the difference is almost three times that because of the energy tax credit, $337 billion a year. So much for the toothless challenge of the Minister of Finance. The burden on the consumer is clearly greater and the beneficiary is the tax department here in Ottawa, the piranha which attacks the savings of Canadian individuals.

What has happened to the industry? Why is it that oil and gas shares have dropped close to 9 per cent in the immediate aftermath of the budget? Share values are directly related to profitability, but what is profitability? Profitability is the measure of the cash flow, the money which oil companies use to pay for their exploration, development, and production activity. To most Canadians the decline in the stock market signalled a reduction in the ability of oil companies, the Canadian ones too, to find and produce oil and natural gas to free us from dependence on Middle East and other foreign producers.

The budget set out a most burdensome program to reduce cash flows. Natural gas revenues are frozen for a year; consumers will pay more but the increased amount will go to the federal treasury. Oil prices will be lower than those proposed this summer by the Prime Minister. A major portion of the industry, the 70 per cent controlled by foreign companies, will lose all conventional oil and natural gas exploration and development incentives. These will be phased out by the end of 1983. In addition to that there will be the 8 per cent production tax.

Against this background the United States embarked upon an ambitious incentive program to reduce its dependence on imported oil. Prior to the budget of last Tuesday, that was a major incentive for drilling rigs and crews to move south of the border. That incentive has now increased markedly. Prior to the budget the U.S. netback was about $25—that is the netback to the producer—and in Canada it was about $9.70. That would have been partially offset by a windfall profits tax in the United States of about 15 per cent. But the incentive has now increased markedly to move south of the border, thus removing an important element in our battle to achieve self-sufficiency. The multinationals will not be moving south. Their territory is in Canada. The companies which will be moving capital, equipment and men into the United States will be Canadian companies, the companies the government wants to strengthen, the companies the government wants to play a bigger role in our industry.

Canadianization of the oil and gas industry is a very laudable goal. It is a goal we support and were moving toward last December. But our approach was to do it with the carrot, not the stick. Whatever we think of multinationals, we must recognize one fact: they play an important role in the oil and gas industry. They have brought the expertise, technology and capital resources which have been important elements in our success in Canada. To embark upon such an abrupt change in the rules, as proposed in the budget, will undoubtedly set back our ability to achieve the number one objective—energy self-sufficiency. The reason is that all drilling incentives for conventional oil will be phased out for companies 50 per cent or more foreign-owned by 1983. That represents 70 per cent of our industry.

There is a hidden casualty in this program—the many smaller Canadian oil and gas companies that have encountered increasing costs because of their inability to sell one of their products, natural gas. With no increase in the wellhead price for natural gas until January 1, 1982, a number of these companies will now face the prospect of selling out, perhaps but not necessarily to Petro-Canada.

We want to see more Canadian ownership in this industry, but first and foremost we want our security of supply maintained and improved. The means of achieving that Canadianization goal seem to be designed to undercut the ability of the industry to achieve security of supply. The goal seems to be to force more companies into state ownership, a nationalization of the industry.

What would be the role of Petro-Canada in this plan and what would its mandate be? How much of the industry will it be told to acquire? How much will it spend on the program? To Canadians this was previously a somewhat academic question. But now to buy out Gulf, Shell or Imperial it will cost Canadians 15 cents a gallon for a minimum of a year, and most likely longer. Canadians have a right to know how much it is going to cost them, since they will be paying for it right at the pump.

The differences between the Clark government's approach to Petro-Canada and this government's approach are quite startling. The Conservative plan gave Canadians the option of participating and of directly sharing in the profits. Last year the Clark government proposed to offer Canadians shares in Petro-Canada, partially through a gift of shares and partially through the cash purchase of shares. The cash received would be used to strengthen Petro-Canada and to allow it to acquire one or more multinational oil companies, to quote our press release. The Liberal plan forces Canadians to participate and it gives them no opportunity for sharing in the profits. The Minister of Finance wants to save all that for himself.

The other major partners in achieving self-sufficiency are the producing provinces. In a unilateral, sometimes confrontationist, sometimes devious way, the federal government has moved to exert greater control and to extract considerably more revenues from an asset which, after all, is owned by the provinces. The response has been swift and not unexpected. The provinces of Saskatchewan and British Columbia have proposed court action to oppose the tax on natural gas and the 8 per cent production tax. Alberta has indicated its intention to extend the life of its oil reserves by cutting production by 15 per cent. Let us not forget that the established reserves of Alberta are on a clear declining trend, having declined each year for the past ten years. Alberta has also put a hold on new oil sands projects.

Who is the winner in this conflict? There is no winner—not the Alberta government, not the federal government, not the industry, which is clearly caught in the middle of a squeeze play between two levels of government. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, the last time this happened was 1973-74 when we lost a lot of ground in developing our resources in this country. And certainly the Canadian consumer is not the winner.

The province of Alberta has been a tough bargainer, which we found out last year and which the federal government has found out over the past few months. But an agreement is surely possible, as it was for us last December and should be for the federal government now. I do not see how the federal government can possibly expect Alberta to accept this policy, which is less attractive than the one offered by the Prime Minister this summer.

Since the Lougheed statement on Thursday night the government's first response was conciliatory, it was positive, and encouraging to us on this side of the House. We strongly urged the government not to escalate this conflict further and to negotiate in good faith. How then can they justify the remarks of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that price is non-negotiable? It appears that the government is trying to undermine these negotiations before they get started. So the big loser is Canada—our country. There is tremendous vitality and energy in the west which can be directed to the benefit of all Canada. The Clark government had moved to harness that energy and strength. This government, whether out of greed, jealousy or envy, has chosen to try to conquer that strength and to force it to submit to the will of Ottawa. That is no way to deal with a partner in confederation who can make such a powerful contribution to our future.

One of the initial responses to this policy is an almost doubling of the support for separatism in western Canada. So I ask you, Mr. Speaker, who benefits from this attack which could lead to a further division within this country?

I move to the area of economic development because there is a close link between energy policy and our economic development. While the budget does promise some welcome, though small, addition to economic development funding, the energy policy may well nullify that.

Non-conventional sources of oil—mainly the major oil sands projects—are projected in the new policy to provide more oil production in 1990 than through conventional sources. These non-conventional sources will provide roughly 50 per cent of our source of supply, which is up from less than 10 per cent last year. These projects therefore are critical to our success in achieving self-sufficiency in oil. They are huge projects and require about seven years to complete. So we must move quickly to bring them onstream.

There are other reasons for moving quickly. These projects will provide tremendous economic development opportunities throughout Canada, not just in Alberta but right here in central Canada. it is estimated that about 42 per cent of the over-all economic benefit will be felt in Alberta. About 38 per cent of the activity will come to Ontario and Quebec through the purchase of steel, metal products, machinery, transportation equipment, and other manufactured goods and various services. We have all seen pictures of the huge scoops used in the Syncrude project. These scoops can now be made in Dundas, Ontario. This translates into many jobs. With an 8.7 per cent projected unemployment rate and over one million people out of work this winter, we must move quickly to bring these projects forward. For every ten people directly involved in the Alsands project it is estimated that ten more will be employed in Alberta and six more in other parts of Canada.

Consumers in other parts of Canada must understand the tremendous benefits to the whole country of these projects. If we are to be asked to pay one dollar more for a gallon of gasoline we want to receive some benefits, both in security of supply and increased economic activity. We want to bring these projects forward. But because so much of that dollar goes to the federal government—and because of its confrontationist tactics—the dollar is not buying us energy security or economic development.

For some years we have been concerned with the importance of developing our talents in areas where we have natural strengths. One of these areas is clearly oil sands development. It will be a tragedy for Canada if these projects are delayed because of the tremendous opportunities there are internationally. The United States and other countries are embarked upon huge programs to upgrade refineries and bring in new energy-producing processes. The availability of process engineers, the engineers who understand how to bring these new processes into production, is critical to do this job. These people are in demand throughout the world because their skills are essential in keeping the huge costs of these megaprojects under control. A grave shortage of these skills is now a real possibility.

If these oil sands projects are delayed further, consumers in all parts of Canada will suffer in two key ways. First, the efforts to reduce our dependence on offshore oil will be delayed. Second, because of these delays we may be forced to rely on less than the best talents. The best talents will have been hired away. We stand a good chance of seeing the costs for these projects climb out of control. That happened before in 1974 and it could easily happen again. It would hit us all directly in the pocketbook.

A side effect of the delay is that other countries will develop their technology in this area faster than we do. Today we are world leaders. The Venezuelans want to involve us in the development of their giant Orinoco sands. Delays will cause them to shift to others who will have developed their skills faster than we have.

There are some nice words in the budget statement on economic development. The envelope will be increased by 22 per cent next year. But in cutting through it all, the impact is either minimal or misplaced. First, we have the western development fund, which is an attempt to buy western votes with the money the federal government has taken away in the energy tax grab. Significantly, only 50 per cent of the fund will be spent before the next election. One wonders if western Canadian voters at the next election will have a gun put to their heads—vote Liberal or risk losing the balance of the fund. Lloyd, I think you should get it in writing.

Without this fund the increases in spending for economic development in the next three years are 15 per cent, 8 per cent, and 8 per cent respectively, less than the projected inflation rate in the final two years. The result is that there is very little left for the three important areas, research and development, export promotion, and industrial expansion. One hiccup from either Chrysler or Massey-Ferguson and it is all gone. I urge the minister to get in there and fight for these worthy projects. More funding is required.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has spoken recently of his desire to increase the funding for the defence industry productivity program, DIPP, and of the need for a similar program for non-defence industries. If the money available in the economic development budget is not sufficient to provide for this, the minister will have been badly let down by his cabinet colleagues.

We on this side are also worried about the minister's ability to meet the needs of all parts of this country on such a tight budget. Canadians have many worthy social objectives, many of which have been translated into programs in recent years. We must devote much attention and funding toward our manufacturing industry which is facing major challenges in expanding its marketplace to be able to afford those social programs. Last year Canada had a $17 billion trade deficit on manufactured products. The $175 million increase in the minister's budget is small comfort to the manufacturing community.

The real weakness of the budget, however, is that it does nothing to improve the environment for industry in Canada. Inflation will continue at a high rate. The federal budget deficit is projected at $14.2 billion, $3.6 billion higher than under our administration. Interest rates are likely to rise and the Canadian dollar will be under further downward pressure. The consensus from economists is that the budget will have a slightly negative impact on an already declining economy.

The results are obvious. Next year unemployment will soar. The rate is 8.7 per cent. Consumers will be hard hit by the increased cost of living and we will be no further ahead in developing this country's resource and labour potential. The province of Ontario has found it necessary to introduce a mini-budget to provide some stimulus to their economy, and if the energy megaprojects do not soon proceed, this sad picture will deteriorate even further. It is interesting to note that the Ontario government has the room to introduce a mini-budget because it has in recent years taken much tighter control of its own spending programs, thus it has this flexibility and the room in which to move at a time like this when such programs are really needed.

To sum up, we have a budget which adopts a stand-pat, do-nothing position. It extends the sorry state of the economy for at least another year. In those areas where there is some sign of positive initiatives, the budget proposals are, at the same time, too vague to judge, and too small to have any impact.

The main thrust of the budget statement is in the area of energy. The stated directions of the energy proposals are good, self-sufficiency, more Canadian ownership and fairness, but the means chosen to achieve these goals are contradictory, punitive and, in fact, will lead away from greater security of supply for Canadians. The proposals will result only in increased taxes to the federal government, less economic development, and to a seriously weakened partnership between Canadians across this great country.

Canadian people are being asked to provide enormous amounts of money, and they are expecting to see security of supply and economic development opportunities. But I am afraid to say that, when they look back in 1985 or in 1990, they will feel a great sense of frustration and anger at the result of this huge tax grab in the name of self-sufficiency which never occurred.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of participating in the debate on the budget to bring to the attention of hon. members the viewpoint as it were of the Treasury Board and the President of the Treasury Board, and to focus on some aspects of the budget which are particularly important from the Treasury Board perspective and from the over-all management aspect of the finances of the federal government.

Hon. members will recall that in 1976 the Liberal government of the day established the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability, headed by Allan Lambert who, at the time, was chairman of the Toronto Dominion Bank. The Lambert commission, as it is commonly known, had very broad terms of reference, and its objective was to improve the over-all management and accountability of the federal government. It was asked to examine and recommend a mutually compatible management system appropriate to government in the interrelated areas of financial management, control and accountability, including accountability of deputy ministers and heads of Crown agencies.

[Translation]

The commission's mandate was also to examine interdepartmental structures, the organization of central agencies serving departments and Crown corporations and related procedures, as well as the financial management policy, rules, guidelines and procedures applied by central agencies to determine whether accountability, both within government and to Parliament, is ensured.

[English]

As we all know, the Lambert commission produced its final report, containing some 165 recommendations, in March, 1979. The report was well received by all parties in this House. It is a credit to the commissioners and their staff that this was the case.

In April, 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked me to co-ordinate the government's response to the Lambert report. I am pleased to report to hon. members that we have made considerable progress in this regard and are currently working on a target date of the end of the year in terms of a comprehensive response to the Lambert recommendations. I would like to point out that I have been very ably assisted in this work by Mr. W. A. B. Anderson, who was formerly a senior deputy minister of the province of Ontario, and for that I would like to give credit to the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) who, while minister of state for the Treasury Board, had the foresight to appoint Mr. Anderson to this most important post.

I said that we have made considerable progress in reviewing and implementing the recommendations of the Lambert report and, indeed, we have. Very tangible evidence of this was contained in the budget presented by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), last Tuesday, October 28, 1980. The expenditure plan contained in the budget is very much consistent with the recommendations of the Lambert commission. For the first time we have been able to set out the agreed planning levels for each major category of expenditure or envelope with a multi-year horizon.

Under the new policy and expenditure management system the policy committees of cabinet will plan their activities over an extended period of years and, within the framework of that plan, will make policy and related financial decisions together.

Policy committees will have to fund new, high priority initiatives from their envelopes, so they will be demanding and will be critical in their evaluation of existing programs within the federal government. In turn, I believe, this will create an increased onus on managers to develop full information and cost implications of their policy proposals and to manage efficiently and effectively within their established limits.

Unlike my predecessor, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), who kept trying to assume the responsibilities, in my judgment, of the Minister of Finance, I readily acknowledge the lead role of the Minister of Finance in developing the fiscal plan. I recognize, too, the primary and critical role that the Treasury Board of Canada has in supporting the policy and expenditure management system which has come of age with this budget. Let me highlight briefly for you a number of recent initiatives taken by the government which are complementary and, indeed, essential to the success of this new top-down, multi-year system.

● (1600)

The first area is what I would call the process of departmental improvement. In 1978 the government appointed a Comptroller General of Canada. The first Comptroller General, Mr. Harry Rogers, very quickly took some significant steps to define problems and plan improvements in the management processes of the many departments of the federal government. In particular, I refer to the IMPAC surveys with which many hon. members are familiar, and the departmental action plans which have emerged from it. The IMPAC action plan has become the prime executive tool for strengthening management practices in many departments.

Most of us are aware of the fact that the IMPAC study was initially concerned with the management pratices of 29 major federal departments. This initial phase lead to a memorandum of agreement between deputy ministers and the Comptroller General on the improvements to be made. The study has now reached the phase at which action plans are being developed and the focus of attention is on the identification of means necessary to bring about the required changes.

The action plans the departments have developed within the study cover several factors such as the establishment of a strict planning process, the development and integration of operational and financial information systems, the monitoring of activities according to plans, the establishment of program evaluation functions and the broadening of internal auditing activities. All these sectors to be improved upon are compatible with the requests made to the departments in the context of the reforms I have just mentioned.

[English]

The second element would be regarded as improved reporting to Parliament, which is particularly significant for the members of this chamber.

The government has recognized the importance of providing Parliament and the public with high quality information to assess the major decisions which will emerge from the new policy and expenditure management program. The proposed legislation on access to information, and the project to revise the estimates and the public accounts, are evidence of the effort this government is making to improve the information available to Parliament and to the public.

It is not easy, Mr. Speaker, to decide the way in which information is to be submitted. A quick glance at the blue book will show the complexity of the government's programs and activities. At the moment, the office of the Comptroller General is examining a general model for submitting estimates, which is being tried by five departments. The first results of this experiment should be known in the near future.

[English]

Another aspect of this approach is program evaluation. As I mentioned earlier, and as the Minister of Finance emphasized in his budget speech, the new policy and expenditure management system creates an incentive to find ways of saving money in existing programs in order to finance new high priority activities. Basically, in program evaluation, the government must answer fundamental questions about a program:

[Translation]

Has the program met its objectives? Did it have unforeseen, positive or negative, effects? Could those objectives be reached with the same resources but with different means? Should the program be pursued in its present form?

[English]

I am pleased to report that under the guidance of the office of the Comptroller General, departments are well on the way to setting up organizations for the conduct of program evaluation.

Another aspect which must not be forgotten is personnel management for the eighties. I am sure that hon. members will agree that the new policy and expenditure management system, or any system for that matter, will only be as good as the people who run it. At the very foundation of the system is good personnel management—the hiring, training, and development of good people. In this regard I have said publicly on several occasions, and believe strongly, that we are building on strengths within our public service. I have been much impressed by the high degree of competence, willingness, and dedication that I have found in the public service. With this as a strong starting base, I have recently taken several steps in Treasury Board toward better personnel management in the federal government.

[Translation]

The federal government is now creating a separate category for senior managers in the federal public service. This innovation has as its main component an integrated evaluation system which provides for rewards or penalties according to the accountability for effective realization of government program objectives.

[English]

At the same time we are implementing a staff training and development policy which strengthens the assessment of training needs, improves the content and conduct of training courses within the public service, and ensures post-training evaluation and feedback.

Just last week, I announced a landmark new part-time employment policy designed to foster the use of employees on a part-time basis and draw into the public service much of this unused talent, particularly working mothers. This program will, I believe, be of particular benefit to those who wish to combine a meaningful professional career with important family responsibilities.

Mr. Murphy: Tell that to the translators.

Mr. Johnston: In his budget address the Minister of Finance reaffirmed, as I do, the commitment of this government to keep the general operating expenses of the federal government and person years under close control. This will require the achievement of further increases in productivity. Hon. members will know that it was for this reason that we have resisted demands in some cases for a shorter work week in the public service. Increased productivity is essential for a strong economic recovery and the federal government must take the lead in this regard.

As I just said, this government will, as a priority, continue to keep its general operating expenses under close control. But I would not want to leave the impression with hon. members or with the public that the direct operating expenses of the government, per se, will offer a dramatic source of savings in the coming years. I emphasize the term "dramatic". Over the past five years, as the House is aware, the federal government has done commendably well in controlling its operating expenses, to the extent that there is relatively very little room left for improvement in this component of federal expenditures. Consider the following breakdown of our expenditures:

[Translation]

More than half of the expenditures in the main estimates, or about $30 million for the 1980-81 fiscal year, is made up of transfers to other government levels or individuals or of grants.

[English]

The two major components of federal transfers, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, consist of transfers to other governments, being equalization payments under federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and established programs financing. The latter, often known as EPF, covers hospital insurance, medical care, and post-secondary education. These three major programs are administered by the provinces but are financed in part by the federal government.

The largest single element of federal subsidies is payments under the oil import compensation program, first introduced in 1973-74, to provide compensation to importers of crude oil in order to ensure a uniform domestic price of oil that is below the international price. Any unexpected jump in international prices or an unforeseen fall in the exchange rate, entails an increase in the level of expenditures under the OICP program. Roughly, a $1 per barrel rise in international prices, or a three-cent decline in the Canadian dollar, if sustained under that existing regime, would raise outlays by some $200 million. Understandably, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, found it necessary to meet this issue head on in his budget. The major component of federal transfers to persons is payment of benefits to the aged under the old age security, guaranteed income supplement, and spouse's allowances programs. Family allowance payments are another major element of federal transfers to individuals.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the interests on the public debt are expected to reach $10.3 billion in 1980-81, which represent 17.7 per cent of total budgetary expenditures.

Third, the payments to public corporations will reach $2.4 billion in 1980-81, or 4.1 per cent of total budgetary expenditures.

Fourth, the government operating and capital expenditures will amount to $15.5 billion in 1980-81, which represents 26.8 per cent of the public expenditures. This is a reduction of 1.4 per cent compared with the percentage for goods and services last year.

All in all, more than 83 per cent of the increase in budgetary expenditures for the present fiscal year will be used for transfer payments to other governments, individuals and Canadian companies, or for public debt charges. Government operating costs, with the exception of national defence, represent only 7 per cent of the total increase in budgetary expenditures for the fiscal year 1980-81.

[English]

It seems clear from what I have said that if further significant reductions in federal expenditures are required, they will not be in the area of direct government operations. That does not mean we will not continue to seek out more efficient means of delivering services to the public, but major dramatic savings will not be effected in those areas.

In conclusion, as President of the Treasury Board and member of Parliament for St. Henri-Westmount, I would like to commend the Minister of Finance for the very fine budget delivered last week. All Canadians will welcome the frank and open way in which he has presented his expenditure plan and his medium term economic assumptions.

Also, I am sure that all Canadians will welcome the continuing commitment of this government to expenditure restraint and to further increases in productivity.

While much of the attention during this debate will focus on the issue of energy and other areas of the budget, I hope this milestone will not escape the attention of members, the publication of a multiyear fiscal plan envelope by envelope, which indeed is a landmark in the history of financial management in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie)—Pensions Review Board—Inquiry respecting increase in staff; the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby)—Air Transport—Decision on Toronto-Halifax route; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Privacy—Opening of mail by RCMP.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, the amendment thereto of Mr. Crosbie (p. 4231) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Rae (p. 4235).

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I found it somewhat amusing in these few days of budget debate to hear members from the government side and the official opposition criticizing one another for bringing in the same kind of budget. Neither one has learned anything from experience or history when it comes to the financial management of this country.

The Tory budget of last year predicted higher inflation and higher unemployment. It predicted it would be giving another $33 billion to multinational oil companies. It could not afford to bring pensioners up to at least the poverty line. It even eliminated the gasoline excise tax rebate to handicapped people.

The Liberals said that was terrible, that the then minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), was prepared to fight inflation on the backs of the pensioners, the handicapped and farmers. In my opinion the single most important item in the last campaign was the Conservative budget. The hon. member for St. John's West can huff and puff and try to blow this House down, but his proposed budget was rejected by the people of Canada.

What have they got since? They got more of the same, a budget which predicts higher inflation, higher unemployment, housing for wealthy Canadians, more gifts for the CPR, nothing more for pensioners, and funding for social programs that will not keep up anywhere close to the higher inflation rate which the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) predicts. There is a sleeper in this budget which bothers my colleagues and me, and, I am sure, the provinces.

The Minister of Finance said the government intends to achieve net savings in social affairs and help finance initiatives in other envelopes. He said that savings are expected to include reductions in federal transfers to provinces relating to areas coming under provincial jurisdiction. The provinces should be warned that, as and when shared cost programs and social affairs come up for renewal, the federal government will expect them to pay more, and it less.

There is another sleeper in this budget. While I am no legal expert, I believe it violates section 125 of the British North America Act. I refer to the taxing of Crown corporations. I presume the Minister of Finance will have another look at that in light of comments he will receive from many of the provinces.

This is mainly an energy budget. There was great talk in the budget papers. I quote from "The National Energy Program":

> Rapid substitution from oil to more plentiful energy sources . . . To reduce the use of oil in each of the residential, commercial and industrial sectors in every province to no more than 10 per cent of total energy used in those sectors.

I want to dwell on how the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have missed the boat. They forgot transportation. I am sorry the Minister of Finance has left. Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) will point this out to him. I would like to remind the minister that in government you have to differentiate between what is the cost to government and the taxpayer and what is an investment. Public investment in productive national assets is self-financing. We should be investing now to create jobs today that will save energy tomorrow, to renew and redirect the industrial structure of our country. That kind of investment is not a cost or deficit to government.

I remind hon. members that in 1944 in the bankrupt province of Saskatchewan a newly elected CCF government established the books of the province on the basis of what was deadweight debt and what was self-liquidating debt. The self-liquidating debt in the 20-year period from 1944 to 1964 amounted to borrowings in excess of $1 million for power, telephones, and several other projects. Those were the kinds of investments that were made through borrowings, much of it foreign capital, but it was loan capital not ownership capital.

In that 20 years we put something over $700 million into power and telephones alone, all of which has since been repaid. We own our power and telephone systems. They were self-liquidating debts. Moreover, we provide one of the best and lowest cost power and telephone services anywhere in Canada. That is what we mean by an investment program that should be included in this budget.

We should be investing in increased research and development. We should be electrifying transportation. We should be retooling for small cars as well. We should have a massive increase in investment in housing, particularly low cost housing for lower-income families. That is an investment. It is not a cost. It is not a deficit to the taxpayers. Instead of relying on foreign shipping we should be investing in a Canadian merchant marine and in Canadian coastal services, which are either non-existent or totally inadequate. We can build and own our own ships which can fly the Canadian flag.

We import 91 per cent of our farm machinery when we should be building most of it here. Our trade deficit of $16 billion in finished goods is not a sign of a healthy economy or of a Minister of Finance who has learned a damned thing from the history of budgets in this country.

Can we afford to do this? But the real question is can we afford not to? In the 1930s, up to the beginning of the war, we showed modest deficits, although in proportion to today's moneys they would be horrendous. During the dirty thirties $100 million, $200 million or $300 million a year deficits were shown by all governments. During the seven years of wartime budgets there was then what was called a total of something in excess of $8 billion in government deficits. However, most of this $8 billion went into investments to rebuild and expand an economy which had just come through the great depression. We mobilized this country into industrial production with a capacity unimaginable prior to that. The result of that investment was more than repaid because, in the years following the war, with the rebuilt productive capacity, surpluses of governments—federal and provincial in Canada—amounted to the same $8 billion. Taxpayers were more than repaid for money expended during wartime to make guns and bullets. We submit the same kind of thing can take place now—not a declaration of war, but a declaration of peace.

I want to outline an area where I have said the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) have missed the boat. The transportation share of Canadian oil consumption under this budget will grow from 47.6 per cent to 58.6 by 1990. Transportation under this budget would remain almost 100 per cent dependent on liquid fuel. Residential and business net oil consumption is to be reduced. But the biggest user of oil, transportation, is projected to roll merrily along, gobbling up 870,000 barrels a day, which is the status quo—do nothing, in other words. This is a serious threat to our mobility and to our trade. The budget does not even pay lip service to electrification and upgrading railway lines. It does not even mention—that I can find—urban transit systems.

Buses and trains are twice as energy efficient as sub-compact cars, and they are six times as energy efficient as a fully loaded 767 jet, the brand new economy jet which is coming on-stream. Buses, subways and streetcars are twice as efficient as a fully loaded subcompact car in a city. I suggest that massive investment is needed to electrify urban transit, for railway systems, in addition to transit diesel buses. Our public transportation systems carry 3.5 per cent of our passenger traffic compared to 6 per cent 12 years ago. Unless we start to reverse that trend, transportation will still continue to gobble up those depleting or more expensive liquid fuel requirements.

We suggest that over the next 15 years, and we should start with this budget, we must electrify 250 miles of rapid transit lines and 160 miles of trolley bus lines. We also suggest that 10,000 miles of railway track in Canada, which is less than 20 per cent of our miles of railway lines, be electrified. This 10,000 miles of main line trackage carries 75 per cent of rail traffic. The cost would be $2.5 billion in 1979-80 dollars. By doing those things; we would save more oil than the Alsands plant will produce for a $6.7 billion investment.

I am not suggesting the Alsands plant not proceed. But in terms of shifting our energy requirements from diesel fuel to an alternative source of energy, surely this is a much wiser investment and will cost a heck of a lot less money. If we were to electrify that amount of rail line, which handles 75 per cent of our traffic, we would save 11 million barrels of oil a year. That is enough diesel fuel to seed and harvest two crops in the three prairie provinces.

If, during the course of that 15 years, only 20 per cent of the increasing volume of traffic, freight, express and passenger, were transferred to rail and bus from highways and airlines—just 20 per cent—to diesel buses and electrified railway lines, there would be a saving amounting to a total of 58 million barrels of oil each year thereafter. Think what that would do, Mr. Speaker. It would produce all of Canada's food for 2.4 years; or it would plant and harvest ten prairie crops; or it would provide for a nine-month demand for all home heating requirements in Canada; or it would run all of the diesel buses in Canada for 25 years; or it would be the equivalent of four Mexican oil deals.

What a fuss about deficits when there is no distinction made as to what portions of these deficits are self-liquidating debts and which are not. We submit that the budget should make a fundamental change in the practice of old line party governments which we have had over the past 113 years. Those kinds of investments would require a national investment policy, both public and private. Private investors would have to be encouraged and asked to agree that for certain periods of time we do not need any more luxury hotels, A & W's or McDonald's. They would have to be persuaded that the return on their investment would be reasonable—it would be a good return—and that it should go into projects other than some of the fluff on which billions of dollars are invested in Canada today when all these other things in our economy are so badly needed.

If we are to have an industrial strategy of any kind, Liberal, Tory or New Democratic, and if we do not have a transportation system which is functioning efficiently, the industrial strategy will not get off the ground very well, if at all. Surely it is time to take a leaf out of the books of many other nations in the world. This is not socialist dogma I am providing to the House. Countries of all political stripes in the industrial world, both free and communist, have been investing in transportation systems at a startling rate since the end of the Second World War. For example, the Soviet Union has electrified over 100,000 kilometres of railway lines. Every country in western Europe and Japan has been doing the same thing. For that $2.5 billion we put into a 50,000-volt overhead catenary system, the beauty of that kind of system is that it can be run either by electric or diesel locomotive over the same track.

For openers this budget should call for the beginnings of a 400-mile section or 500-mile section of line from, let us say, Winnipeg to Calgary, Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, or Edmonton to Kamloops. It could be done not as a way of experimenting, because the technology is already there. Canada has the technology and the expertise. We sell electric and diesel locomotives to other countries. The Canadian Institute for Ground Transportation suggests a 30-year period, and I submit that it is at least twice too long. I think the objective should be a maximum of 15 years. We might be able to do it in ten. Perhaps by the time we get to the end of the 15 years, inflation taken into consideration, that $2.5 billion might end up to be a total of $3.5 billion, but I repeat that the amount of liquid fossil fuel which would divert to other needed purposes from transportation for half the investment of one Alsands project surely makes the investment worthwhile.

I know both our publicly-owned and privately-owned railroads resist this kind of fundamental change in their operations, but it seems to me that they have to be given one of two choices: it is either compulsory, or they have to. Similarly, if this budget began this year with $100 million in it for urban transit and $100 million for each of the succeeding four years to our urban municipalities to get into electrification of rail lines, trolley buses, trolley streetcars, electric streetcars and diesel buses, that would be a substantial investment, the return on which could be seen in the savings of oil and the diverting of oil to other uses like food production.

I notice that the budget says: "to extend eventually the natural gas pipeline to the Atlantic provinces". We agree with that. I do not think there is any disagreement or ever has been. It has been talked about for years. What I find degrading is that, as a nation, we continue to allow increases in exports of natural gas outside Canada to the United States when we have not seen to it that we have properly supplied our own fellow citizens first. The mythology which is continually peddled by this government, the previous government, and by private petroleum corporations, is that we have a surplus of natural gas. That is a myth. Whether we are talking about 25 years or 125 years, we need all of that natural gas. We will need it all ourselves.

The new additional exports approved by a Liberal government and a Tory government of 3.4 trillion cubic feet over and above what we were exporting before, would heat one million homes in Atlantic Canada and eastern Quebec for 25 years. Surely that is something to be ashamed of if you are a Liberal or a Conservative. Surely that is neglect of our fellow citizens in eastern Canada. Surely it is not a proper priority to go out for extra quick, fast bucks from exported natural gas. Our grandchildren in 25 years, or our great-grandchildren 50 years down the road, will pay the price. Surely the priority should be to begin the investment now. The cost of the pipeline would be a self-liquidating debt. There should be a massive and urgent project carried out in a minimum period of time.

All these suggestions we have made for investment would not be costs to the taxpayer. The return to the people of Canada and the national and provincial treasuries would more than cover them. The return would be excellent. Let us think about the jobs this proposal would create.

Electrifying and expanding urban transit over five years with a $500 million investment would mean 70,000 jobs. Those 10,000 miles of railway lines over a period of 15 years would mean 300,000 jobs. If we were to implement the balance of the Hall commission report, we would be looking at another 70,000 jobs.

Let us consider a Canadian shipbuilding industry, a Canadian merchant marine, a coastal service, ferry services on our coasts which are worthy of the name, and heavy oil upgrading plants. I am glad to see there is one mentioned in the budget. That is a priority and a commitment of the national government. We will need three or four more of those, not just one. Let us think about massive housing construction and home insulation and what they mean in jobs. If we had all that, we would not have a budget from either one of the old-line parties which continues to forecast higher inflation and higher unemployment. Surely this fundamental change in the way we finance and direct our financial affairs has to come about if we are going to get away from this continual cycle of minor booms and major busts which have been going on since confederation.

We believe the things we are suggesting and proposing would be a challenge to the Canadian people and would excite them to produce more. Revenues from taxes and royalties to governments and revenues to the private sector would more than compensate for those investments. Through the initiative of national and provincial governments and our Crown corporations we would achieve immense benefits not only for ordinary citizens but also for the private sector, which has to do the manufacturing, contracting, construction and distribution, and provide the transportation. Surely this is the kind of priority which should be in a budget today. We should not have a 1930-31 budget of R. B. Bennett. We should not have the budget of Charlie Dunning, who said that money does not grow on gooseberry bushes. We need a budget for the eighties.

We should not have a budget based on the conventional wisdom of the traditional old-line parties. It should be a budget for the modern times. It should be a budget that takes into account what is required in our industry, in transportation and in housing, what is really required by low income families, pensioners and veterans. These are typical old line parties, eighteenth century Tories and nineteenth century Liberals who continue to use the same ideas, the same philosophy and the same ideology in planning—if you want to call it that—further destruction and further busts. This is all I can say for it. It has not been democratic socialism that has brought to this country the difficulties it is facing now, and it has not been a balanced economy that has done it. It has been the laissez-faire free enterprise, so called—as Tommy Douglas said, neither free nor enterprising.

They are the first ones to have cried "too much government interference", "leave us alone", "let us make a profit", "we will do the job for you", "we will put people to work", etc., but the minute they are in the slightest bit of trouble, who are in the front end of the line with their hand out? It is the same old free enterprisers. They are working hard to prove that Karl Marx was right, that capitalism will destroy itself. I suppose that in some respects that would put democratic socialism in the position of trying to save at least the better parts of free enterprise. But the way the old parties have operated in this country over the last 100 years or so in carrying out these outmoded, obsolete theories of private enterprise, is what has caused us all this trouble.

Who has caused the high unemployment? It was not the socialists. Who is seeing to it that our veterans and old age pensioners have an income lower or just at the poverty line? It is not the socialists, it is the free enterprisers.

Canada is a country of forests and of hydroelectric power, of vast resources. It is only the organizational genius of the Liberals and Tories that could have ensured that none of them is properly distributed to the people of this country. They have the imagination of a doorknob, and they are afraid. They sit in their little towers worrying about little things; they are men of little minds working with little ideas. Surely they could change if they took a look at the experience and at the results of what they have been doing, if they took a look at what this country could do when there was a declaration of war.

Prior to the war they said, "There is no money so there are no jobs", but as soon as war was declared and it was time to kill people, money was found, and so were jobs. I was paid a dollar a day, but they gave me a uniform and a gun. Why not then do the same thing in terms of a declaration of peace with the same kind of energy and marshalling of our people, our resources and our financial capacity to turn this economy around and make it into a much better nation, to bring about real co-operative federalism, to bring about unity in this country, and cease this mindless, incoherent babble coming from 20 directions in the Tory ranks, and the mindless confrontation of Liberals who think they are the only ones fit to govern and to sit down with the premiers and talk with the Canadian people? Why not come up with projects that will turn this nation around and make it the kind of country it can be?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have this opportunity to take part in the budget debate, more especially since, as everyone knows, I work in close co-operation with my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I would say I am in complete agreement with the Quebec finance minister, Mr. Parizeau, who noted the remarkable cleverness shown by the finance minister in his budget.

To me this is more than a clever budget. It is in fact a responsible budget, a realistic budget. The tax measures it contains are the answers to the present economic situation, to this period of economic recession as well as to the challenge we face in this new decade. The Minister of Finance avoided the traps of short-term vision of cyclical economic events, into which the opposition parties fall. He is avoiding the pitfalls that await the right-wing and left-wing experts for whom the consequences on low-income wage earners have little importance.

The Minister of Finance did not indulge in any sleight of hand to make the people believe that the unemployment and inflation rates could be reduced overnight. This is a responsible and realistic budget, because in avoiding those pitfalls the Minister of Finance paves the way for medium and long-term economic development while minimizing the impact of a short-term recession. In acting in this way, he not only gives our country an industrial strategy, but he enables us to free ourselves from our dependency on foreign oil supplies and gives us, Canadians, control over the important sector of oil and gas exploration and development. It would have been quite irresponsible to adopt extreme attitudes in the field of taxation. It would also have been irresponsible to try to play the magician and, as I said earlier, the minister chose the path of responsibility and realism.

The economic difficulties that have arisen during the last decade clearly show that we must adapt a long term rather than a short term economic strategy if we want to meet successfully the challenge of the eighties. The problems linked to the objective of energy self-sufficiency, those linked to the reduction of the rates of unemployment and inflation, the need to regain a more satisfactory rate of growth in production and productivity as well as the increased competition on international markets for products of current technology are as many challenges which compel us to a search for durable, efficient, medium-term and long-term solutions. The possible solutions to these problems will not be recognized as such so easily. The desirable solutions require a judicious combination of structural, industrial, regional and also well-oriented fiscal and monetary policies. This medium term economic development is based on the critical energy sector which will occupy a more important part of our industrial base and will help us achieve our goal of energy self-sufficiency.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with the components of the energy strategy which will contribute to the economic development in the 1980s. I do not wish to run again over each and every measure in the national energy program. The budget speech itself and the most interesting remarks made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) have fully explained this national program. This energy policy to which the government and all Canadians involved in this area of our economy are committed will contribute fully to industrial development as well as research and development, increase demand for skilled labour, and provide extremely important capital over the next decade.

The government makes known clearly and in no uncertain terms its intention not to forgo this opportunity to develop our resources. Therefore, the government is contemplating the possibility of getting involved more and more in the development of oil and gas through Petro-Canada, a corporation which belongs to all of us as Canadians. The government will also make sure that the private sector and more, particularly, Canadian private corporations are encouraged to work more in this sensitive area of our economy. The fiscal incentives which will be made available to them through subsidies amounting to up to 80 per cent of their development costs are proof of the government's wish to secure the the private sector's successful participation.

It is the government's intention to change the energy consumption habits of Canadians and to this end it will improve the distribution system for alternate forms of energy and encourage the consumption of natural gas by a wise pricing policy. The extension of the gas pipeline from Montreal to the maritimes will make western natural gas available to those regions along the pipeline, from Montreal to the Maritimes, and will allow them, for instance, to change from heating oil to natural gas. I want to indicate that according to the pricing policy there will be one price only for gas for consumers in Montreal, Quebec City or Halifax, and that that price will be 65 per cent of the blended price for oil. That price will therefore make gas particularly attractive to the consumer who will want to convert his oil heating system to that form of energy.

The energy pricing policy is the crucial aspect of this energy strategy. The energy revenue-sharing aspect does not have unanimous support. However, this revenue sharing, as proposed by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, is quite fair. Previously, the federal government found itself in an unbearable situation. It had to assume its national responsibilities and carry the better part of the financial burden tied with the increase in energy prices while, on the other hand, receiving but a small share of the oil income.

The new formula will increase the share of the federal government from 10 per cent now to 24 per cent. The provinces, on the other hand, will receive roughly the same amount they did before. In fact, the losers are the industries that explore and develop oil and gas resources, since their share is reduced from 45 to 33 per cent; it is in that difference that the central government will find the funds needed to guarantee the national good which manifests itself, first of all, in the objective of achieving self-sufficiency by 1990, and then, in that of greater Canadianization of the industry that operates in the fields of oil and gas exploration and development.

This brings me to the last, but not least, of the aspects of the energy policy I want to deal with. It concerns the security of supplies and long term prices of oil and gas. Contrary to the Progressive Conservative approach, ours is specific about what oil and gas price increases are planned until 1983 and the rest of the decade. Moreover, the diversity and abundance of our energy resources will enable us to achieve self-sufficiency by 1990. Those elements of certainty are of considerable advantage in planning, and Canada is one of the very few industrialized countries that can offer firm energy guarantees to both its citizens and businesses. Obviously, that advantage will give an edge to our competitiveness and will encourage diversification of our industrial structure.

This budget has been criticized for failing to meet the challenge of reducing unemployment. The creation of better paid jobs and the maintenance of existing jobs have always been a major concern of this government, and this budget shows that this concern is still present. This budget contains many job-creation proposals. I shall only mention the fact that the Minister of Finance has accepted a much higher deficit than he would have wished for and that he has given priority to the growth of economic development programs. The government thus reasserts its will to reduce the deficit in an orderly manner. The economy is now showing signs of recovery. However, it is too early to assess the importance of this recovery. It is therefore necessary to maintain the deficit at its present level and to avoid as much as possible an increase in unemployment. Spending cutbacks or tax increases would only weaken the total demand for goods and services and increase unemployment proportionately. We are not the ones who should be criticized for being inactive in the fight against unemployment, but rather the Progressive Conservatives.

The budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) forecast higher unemployment than what we have had, because he gave way to the temptation of reducing the deficit by cutting back arbitrarily public spending without any regard for the capacity of our economy and without considering the needs of the population. As I have just said, the economic development envelope will increase by 22 per cent in 1981-82. This rate of increase is by far the highest compared with the other budgetary envelopes. This is a clear indication of the will of the Minister of Finance to create an environment which should promote economic recovery.

Among the new expenditures, I would like to emphasize the investment tax credit of 50 per cent which was developed in co-operation with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané). This program covers new manufacturing investments in the designated areas of the country characterized by high unemployment and an underdeveloped manufacturing sector. In Quebec, for instance, the entire region north of the 50th parallel will be able to benefit from this 50 per cent tax credit.

And a while ago, I heard the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) emphasize the importance of this 50 per cent tax credit which will apply to the whole of the Gaspé peninsula and the lower St. Lawrence area, which will be east of Notre-Dame-du-Portage, if my memory serves me well, Mr. Speaker.

Now, if you look at those regions where tax credits will be granted on investments, they are areas with a high rate of unemployment, and with a tax credit of such magnitude and unprecedented generosity, new manufacturing jobs will be created, so that the people from the Magdalen Islands, the Gaspé peninsula, the Matapédia valley, the lower St. Lawrence or the north shore instead of flocking to Montreal or Quebec City in search of employment, thereby increasing the unemployment rate in those communities which have already been highly urbanized, will be able to stay home, find a local job, reinforce the local economy and boost the economy of those villages which unfortunately have been dwindling over the last thirty or forty years.

And I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the judgment passed by the hon. member for Gaspé on this measure, namely, that it would bring significant benefits to his area, is very realistic.

The new funds allocated to economic development will encourage new investments from the small business sector. These new funds will promote housing starts and in particular with regard to the so-called MURBs. It is to be hoped that in the regional centres of the country where the needs are being felt the most the promoters will use this approach in order to provide housing for those who need it. There is also the special allocation of $350 million over four years to promote industrial restructuring, manpower retraining as well as the qualification of our manpower, especially the young workers coming on the labour market, so that they may rise to the challenge of the energy development.

With regard to inflation, a flare up would be disastrous in terms of the sacrifices which would become necessary some day to reach an acceptable level of inflation. The government is deeply concerned with this aspect of inflation because its high cost at this time is somewhat slowing down the economic recovery and its satisfactory level of real growth which is what we all want. Obviously, the present rate of inflation is unacceptable and that is why the government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) does not intend to put forward tax measures which might cause inflation to flare up again.

The basic cause of inflation, Mr. Speaker, still remains a rate of growth of the money supply higher than the rate of growth of production over a continuing period. In this respect, the Minister of Finance has already announced that he supports the Bank of Canada in its effort to restrict the growth of the money supply. So far this policy has proven to be the most effective in fighting against the basic causes of inflation.

However, there remain several other factors which in some way contribute to inflation. Examples are numerous: the increase in the world oil prices, the faster increase in the cost of some food products and periods where the total demand for goods and services produced is growing faster than the normal production capacity of these same goods and services.

There are also other factors which are not inflationary per se, but result in slowing down the decline of prices and production costs, and this decline is necessary to reduce the rate of inflation. In this regard, growing salary demands play a major part. Inflation is now deeply rooted in the behaviour of all economic agents, and people quite normally try to protect themselves against inflation, which results in growing salary demands to maintain the purchasing power and escalating prices of goods and services by the whole business community. All these attitudes combined have the effect of maintaining high inflation rates and of delaying the return to an acceptable rate of inflation. Given these circumstances, as was indicated by the minister of Finance, the government alone cannot reduce the rate of inflation without help from the private sector, without a sense of discipline and of responsibility on the part of every economic agent.

It will be through consultations among governments, unions and the business world that inflation will definitely be controlled. The example of the Federal Republic of Germany should guide us in this endeavour. Having fewer natural resources than us, yet undergoing the same external pressures, that country has been able to achieve through the discipline and co-operation of all its citizens a rate of inflation that is quite inferior to those of its European neighbours and even ours.

Moreover, in its budget, the government reaffirms its intention to limit the growth of over-all public spending below the tendency growth rate of the gross national product. This is a firm commitment on the part of the Minister of Finance and the government. This commitment indicates to the people that the government is assuming its responsibilities in the area of governmental fiscal management and by reducing the growth of its spending rate in a responsible and realistic manner. There is no intention of reducing the rate of spending by a few hundred million dollars just to please a few specialists. Too drastic spending cuts would have baneful effects on employment, and in that respect, the government does not intend to sacrifice employment to satisfy the experts. On the other hand, massive spending cuts would not solve the problem of inflation this year. Inflation control requires sustained policies and a concerted effort of all economic agents, as I explained earlier.

The orderly reduction of government spending should therefore be extended over a longer period than the coming year.

The policy on energy pricing plays a key role in that fight against inflation. One has only to point out the inflation rates anticipated by the Progressive Conservatives last December. Our policy on energy pricing reduces the anticipated inflation rate in 1980 and 1981 by at least 1.2 per cent yearly compared to the Progressive Conservative inflation rate.

The government is not in favour of a further inflationary tendency, and if it occurred as a result of excessive demands in the private sector under the form of wage demands, abusive price increases of goods, the government would then consider enforcing stricter policies. I will now deal with the challenges to increase real development and productivity. I sincerely believe that the energy program and the fact that the government firmly intends to prevent further inflation are the guarantees of a more satisfactory economic prosperity.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the ineffective criticisms of the official opposition about the solutions suggested in the budget to cope with the economic problem are wasted efforts. The Progressive Conservatives failed last year in their attempt to bring down a realistic and responsible budget. At all levels, the energy policy, the fight against inflation and the creation of jobs, the challenge for the future and for an economic recovery through an industrial strategy based on the backbone of the economy, the development of our oil and gas resources, make of this budget introduced by the Minister of Finance a far better budget than the one brought down last year by the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a privilege for me to say a few words on this budget, whether or not it is, in the eyes of many, a budget. I read with interest an article in The Globe and Mail of November 1, by Hugh Anderson. The heading on the article is "Clever Budget is an Exercise in the Politics of Wilful Deceit". It goes on to say:

> Federal Finance Minister Allan MacEachen received much praise from some quarters on budget night for what was seen as political cleverness. If politics is merely the art of fraudulently misleading one's listeners, which is a doctrine dangerously in vogue, the praise is justified.
> But, if some fleeting glimpse of honesty is to be preached in the financial management of Canada, it is necessary to demonstrate just how far such political practitioners as Mr. MacEachen have gone—with their use of smoke and mirrors to confuse rather than illuminate.

I am sure that many hon. members are aware of the Biblical quotation, "Let us now praise famous men". Certainly, I cannot dispute the fact that the Minister of Finance is, at times, a famous man and, at other times, probably infamous.

Mr. Blenkarn: Most of the time.

Mr. Darling: The article goes on to say:

> But the figures from 1982 onward all give the balance of the doubt to the government. In some areas they verge on fantasy. Notably, a merchandise trade surplus of more than $12 billion is forecast for 1985.

I wonder what seers or magical sorcerers helped the government. With a figure like that, it was probably the northern magus.

Mr. Blenkarn: Not magus, maggot.

Mr. Darling: I have heard that expression and I have also heard the expression "The northern magpie". The article goes on:

> —Mr. MacEachen's promise to support the Bank of Canada's monetary policy. Perhaps this is not too surprising, though, seeing that the government has not responded to the central bank's appeals for greater restraint in spending policies.
> Such cynically misleading exercises hardly seem likely to restore credibility to the federal government's handling of its financial affairs.

This government has been in office for eight months. I cannot help but wonder when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will bring down a real budget. His so-called budget of October 28 was more on energy policy than a budget. This has been pointed out not only by people on our side of the House but by knowledgeable people in the fields of finance, energy, and so on. I do not wish to imply that everything in the budget was bad. There were a few worthwhile recommendations.

We on this side of the House were particularly pleased that the government chose not to deindex personal income tax. This is a topic upon which we on this side have been hounding the government for a number of months, and we are pleased that the government made no changes with regard to the Registered Retirement Savings Plan and the Registered Home Owners Savings Plan. However, there was very little else in the budget for the average Canadian consumer. Certainly there was nothing in the budget to force those in the higher income brackets to pay more taxes. The tax loopholes are still there.

Clearly, the budget discriminates against people in the lower income brackets. It is a known fact that people in the lower tax brackets spend twice as much of their income on heat as they do on transportation. Many of the people in this bracket do not even drive an automobile. The 18-cent gasoline tax proposed by our minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), in his budget last December, would have only collected money from the users of automobiles, trucks and so on, but the present Minister of Finance will collect a great deal more from a great many more people.

In the Crosbie budget the energy tax credit for those people earning under $21,000 a year was $80 per adult and $30 per child. It would have meant a saving of $220 for a family of four. Certainly there is nothing, as I mentioned earlier, in the minister's budget to assist those people, excluding the fact that he did nothing to the deindexing program. One choice item in the budget is the reactivation of the Multiple Unit Residential Buildings program. It means the return of tax incentives for MURBs, a program which had been phased out last year, and it becomes effective for all construction which started after the budget date, October 28, up to 1982; so it will have a two-year run. The objective is to reduce the shortage of rental units and introduces a scheme that will offer tax write-offs against other income for investments in rental units. Whether it will be any great boost by providing additional housing remains to be seen.

Mr. Blenkarn: It will really help the rich guys, though.

Mr. Darling: That is right; them that has gets, and them that do not have, loses what they already have.

• (1720)

The small business development bond program has been extended for three months until March 31, 1981. Money was also available for the CHIP program and I commend the government for this—but with reservations. The increase in the budget was from $80 million to $265 million to assist the program to reach its objective of upgrading 70 per cent of Canadian homes by the year 1987. Let me point out, however, that this grant is not free, because it is added to the taxpayer's income. The only places where it is an outright grant are in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia where it is tax-free. In my view the government should give serious consideration to extending this generosity to the rest of Canada. There are many old homes in other parts of Canada where the climate is colder that could benefit from such a grant, and I feel that the CHIP program is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

The other item that I should like to comment on is the Multiple Unit Residential Buildings program, MURBs. I spoke of this previously.

Another item is the mandatory mileage standards for new cars. I understand this will provide standards for mileage efficiency in cars. These have been voluntary until the present time. Measures will be enforced which are expected to reduce fuel consumption of passenger vehicles by 20 per cent between now and 1984. In contrast, the United States has had mandatory controls since 1975.

One of many major criticisms of the budget is that it has done nothing about the real economic problems that currently face the country. What is the purpose of a budget if it is not to address the economic problems currently plaguing the nation? This budget has ignored the unemployment problem in the country. Despite the figures issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, I am sure, counting the people who are no longer in receipt of benefits and a great many who want to work but cannot find jobs, that we will face this winter with at least one million people unemployed. That is an absolute disgrace.

The budget has done nothing to bring down government expenditures, which was one of the things that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised before the February 18 election. We know now what a misstatement that was.

The budget has done nothing about the horrendous inflation problem. Again, we should remember the words of the Prime Minister—I am not sure whether it was in 1974, but several years ago he said, "We will wrestle inflation to the ground." He is not much of a wrestler because he has had little success with that! Yet the Canadian people accepted that and many other promises made in February, 1980.

An hon. Member: He also said that separatism was dead in Quebec.

Mr. Darling: That is another of his wise statements. A great many people say that the Prime Minister speaks ex cathedra—absolutely infallible. Some years ago he stated that separatism was dead in Quebec. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it died, it certainly had a resurrection.

An hon. Member: He also says it is now dead in the west.

Mr. Darling: It is far from dead in the west, thanks to the Prime Minister and the budget presented by the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance has admitted that federal spending will rise this year by 13.2 per cent to nearly $60 billion. He stated that unemployment will continue to get worse before it gets better. That is a great and profound statement. Another thing he said is that inflation will continue in the 10 per cent range next year and that the massive $14.2 billion deficit will be reduced only slightly in 1981. This is not acceptable, Mr. Speaker. It is abundantly clear that the record of this government is a record of failure.

What is even worse, Mr. Speaker, is that the government refuses to come to grips with these problems. This is a majority government, so there will not be an election for at least another four years. The way the Prime Minister operates, however, he will probably hang in until the last minute, so it could be five years before there is an election. Why would the government not be courageous and tackle these problems head on? The longer the problems are shoved under the carpet, the worse they will get. There is no excuse for the government not endeavouring to do something to diminish the severity of these problems.

It is interesting to note what the Prime Minister had to say during the last election campaign. He promised energy prices below those proposed in the Progressive Conservative government's budget. It is estimated that over four years the difference will be five cents per gallon. Of course the Prime Minister would have Canadians believe this government's increase is considerably less than that which would have occurred under the Progressive Conservative budget last December.

Since this government took office eight months ago, there have been no less than five increases in the price of gasoline. This is the government that promised to keep energy prices down. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that in the few short months the Liberals have been in office they have presided over price increases at the gasoline pump totalling, in central and western Canada, 14.8 cents per gallon, and in eastern Canada 15.5 cents per gallon. I think that is ironic, because I recall very well that a year ago gasoline cost $1 or slightly under. Just yesterday I bought unleaded gasoline in my riding and paid $1.42 for it. Gasoline has gone up in price by 50 cents per gallon. I should like to hear the government refute that. It is well and good to come up with fancy figures, but when taxpayers see today's prices at the gasoline pumps they realize they were sucked in to vote us out of office on February 18.

An hon. Member: Power at any cost.

Mr. Darling: On January 12 at the Liberal campaign college in Toronto the Prime Minister promised to hold the line on government spending. He stated emphatically that under a Liberal administration growth in government expenditure would not exceed the rate of the gross national product. We know what a lot of baloney that was, and that is being charitable.

Over the next four years the Liberals will have total cash requirements of $12.7 billion more than was projected in the Conservative budget. To meet these requirements the government will have to either borrow more, thus driving up interest rates, or print more money, thus driving up the rate of inflation. By 1983-84, government spending will be $6.2 billion per year higher under the Liberals than it would have been under a Conservative government.

Mr. Jarvis: Ten billion.

Mr. Darling: My colleague, who is a financial expert and an outstanding lawyer, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), says $10 billion. I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) paying attention but I do not know whether he is agreeing or not.

Mr. Jarvis: He agrees.

Mr. Darling: The Prime Minister promised that the government deficit would be reduced in a phased and orderly fashion. The deficit in 1983-84 will be $500 million larger than last year's deficit, and $2.7 billion larger than the deficit projected in the Conservative budget.

The Prime Minister promised to enhance the security of the individual by helping those who need assistance. By the end of 1984, Canadians will have been hit with increases in the price of oil and gas equivalent to over $1 per gallon. Is this enhancing the security of the poor? Is this assisting those who need assistance? What is the government doing to bring down the rate of inflation so that home owners will not be forced out of their homes because they cannot meet the mortgage payments? What is the government doing to assist small business in this country? Just last week the Minister of Finance told this House there was nothing the government could do about high inflation. The government did not have the resources to initiate any more new programs. Despite the shortage of cash, they are now talking about buying oil companies. One of the suggested companies is Imperial Oil. A recent article in one of the foremost daily papers indicates what it would cost to buy Imperial Oil. I quote:

> Analysts put the shares, based on asset value, at $64 each. If we bid for all of them (and our security law says we must) and got them, it would cost $10.5 billion. Accountants Touche Ross and Co. figure that we would have to pay $4 a barrel for all oil reserves to gain control of any company. That would add $4 a barrel to the cost to consumers of oil, it would add not a single barrel to our oil reserves—

This money, if we have such money hidden under the carpet, should be spent to find new supplies of oil and gas.

Permit me to say something about the new grant program for the conversion from oil to gas or electricity. I commend this idea. It is a good idea. It is the hope of the government that this new program will contribute towards a meaningful reduction in oil consumption in this country over the next few years. The amount of the grant is to equal one-half of the cost of conversion up to $800, and the program went into effect on October 28, 1980. Regrettably, many of the details of the program have not yet been worked out. Listen to this, for example. The office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources informed me that application forms for this new program are not presently available for distribution and will not be available until March or April of 1981. Isn't that wonderful?

Home owners who expect to take advantage of this program are asked to retain all the receipts of costs directly related to the cost of conversion. When the application forms are available, they can then apply for the grant. Some will probably have to borrow money from the bank in order to proceed. One would have expected the government to have ensured that application forms were available within a reasonable time.

With regard to retroactivity, there seems to be a great deal of confusion about the program being retroactive. Evidently this is one of the details the government has not worked out yet. I was informed by the minister's office that the program is not retroactive, that anyone who started the conversion process prior to midnight, October 28, is not eligible to apply for the grant. I have been informed by the office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the program is retroactive. Who is right and who is wrong? The persons who began to convert from oil to gas or electricity prior to the announcement of the introduction of the program by the Minister of Finance in his budget will be eligible to apply for the grant, provided the final safety inspection did not take place prior to midnight, October 28, 1980. Who does one believe—the office of the Minister of Finance or the office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

The government has had eight months in which to work out these details. This is just another illustration of the ineptitude of ministers opposite. There is absolutely no question that unless the government makes a concerted effort to have the application forms available within the next few weeks there is no way anyone will receive payment before the end of next summer. It is conceivable that the grant could end up costing people money, particularly if they have to borrow to pay for the conversion.

There is another aspect of the program that is disturbing. It appears the government is so eager to encourage home owners to switch from oil to gas or electricity that it has offered to pay one half the cost of the conversion bill, up to $800. However, the government goes on to say, and this is the kicker, that, the grant, whatever the amount is, will have to be declared on income tax for income tax purposes. Again they will get their greedy claws on a good bit of that grant money.

What is the government doing? It is giving with one hand and taking away with the other. As the Bible says, the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away. In this case, it is MacEachen who giveth and MacEachen who taketh away and continues to take away.

Also, the government is going to impose an excise tax on natural gas which will be equivalent to 12½ cents a gallon by the year 1984. Talk about deceptiveness and trickery. This government certainly gains full marks for that. On the subject of trickery, I am reminded of one of our cabinet ministers who attended a gala event. An outstanding comedian was present. The cabinet minister said to him, "If you are a comedian, make me laugh." The comedian looked at him and said, "You are a politician, tell me a lie."

I also want to bring to the attention of the House the 50 per cent tax credit for new manufacturing. This investment tax credit program sounds wonderful. It will help certain industries by allowing a 50 per cent write-off of the tax credit against liability. As I understand the program, the object is to promote industrial development in those parts of the country most adversely affected by economic disparity. The 50 per cent investment tax credit applies to eligible capital costs on assets acquired for manufacturing. Certain of them are eligible such as fish, sawmilling and metal fabrication. A great many more are not eligible. There is no limit to the project size.

The eligible period is a five-year period commencing October 28, 1980. A building started before the eligible period may qualify for those costs incurred after October 28. Eligible assets are those devised under the Regional Development Incentives Act. The point I want to stress is that it is no help to the constituency of Parry Sound-Muskoka.

I see a former minister from the last Liberal government here. I do not think it will be a hell of a lot of good to him, either, because it applies only to north of the 50th parallel. I ask the President of the Treasury Board to pay special attention—he represents the province of Quebec. Ontario has a population of 8,576,000. This will only benefit .29 per cent or 24,271 people in the province of Ontario. Where does the 50th parallel go? It is north of Timmins, Cochrane and Moose Factory. The only town shown on the map is Fort Hope—not Port Hope, my illustrious friend. Isn't that a great benefit to the people of Ontario? In a lot of the western provinces it covers quite a bit.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the hon. member that in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, which I represent, there are a number of communities which will be able to take advantage of this provision, in addition to a number of Indian reserves; towns like Sioux Lookout, Hudson, Pickle Lake, Deer Falls, Red Lake, Balmerstown, Madsen—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Darling: Therefore, you are part of the 24,000 people. I did not say specifically who they were. I am delighted to know that at least one riding will benefit. I presume there will be many factories in that northern area to help my friend from Kenora-Rainy River.

● (1740)

There is no question that there has been a great deal of uproar over the energy items in the budget. The government has slapped a tax on the export sales of natural and domestic gas, in fact, on all gas. The government imposed a new oil and gas pricing regime on the producing provinces. As we are well aware, the price of gasoline has gone up under this government and it will continue to go up in the future. The cost of this Liberal energy plan will be a major drain on every family and individual income in this country. Canadians should be under no illusions about that.

I might mention that a prominent member of the Ontario legislature represents the riding of Muskoka in my area. He is certainly well known, because he is the treasurer for the Ontario government, the Hon. Frank Miller. As I recall, during the election in February and prior to that time, Mr. Miller made some comments about our budget. Many of his comments were quoted at length by my Liberal opponent. However, the minister has looked at last week's budget and found considerable fault this time with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). In retrospect, I think he is wishing that he had been listening instead of talking last December.

An article in the Citizen for Friday, October 31, 1980 reads in part:

> Provincial Treasurer Frank Miller accused Finance Minister Allan MacEachen of ignoring Ontario's ailing economy, while pumping billions of dollars into the West.

The article continues:

> Miller said he was "deeply concerned" the budget will only worsen Ontario's growing recession by treating unemployment as a low priority.
> Increasing unemployment insurance premiums by 33 per cent will cost the provincial economy $300 million next year.

These are additional premiums.

I was listening to the remarks of my distinguished colleague from Mississauga who said the additional cost in unemployment insurance premiums will cost Canadians over $1.1 billion next year. However, speaking outside of the Ontario Legislature, according to the Citizen article:

> —Miller estimated an average Ontario household will pay up to $2,500 more in energy costs over the next five years.

Imagine what that amount will be over the tenure of this government. The Lord have mercy upon us is all I can say about that.

It was also pointed out that all these costs will cost Ontario an extra $10 billion a year. There are about 2.5 million households in Ontario, so that is a reasonable figure. This statement of $2,500 a year or more gives a lot of us a great deal of worry.

Mr. Miller delivered a paper at a finance meeting on September 19 and it was known then that MacEachen had oil problems to face but he had to worry about two things—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Darling: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank my colleagues also. In closing, let me point out to the good people of Ontario, and in particular to the people in the riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, that the electors of Ontario who voted for the northern magus—or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—got a government which flies in the face of massive public opinion. For example, it rammed through the metric system when a great percentage of the population was against such a system. Second, was its measure concerning gun control; we know what the great majority of Canadians feel about that. Third is the unpopular bilingual program. This has cost literally hundreds of millions of dollars and a great many people are still unhappy about it. Fourth, the unilaterally shoving through of the constitution over objections by seven of the ten provinces with certain of the Prime Minister's "pet" amendments to be added before it comes to Canada.

Little or no help for small business is forthcoming from the present government. I heard the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) commenting on what has been done for small business. I can tell you that small business is being throttled by red tape, and government bureaucracy until small business people are almost ready to shoot I do not know how many of the civil servants. There is not too much in the budget to help small business.

With one-third of the total population, the people of Ontario should take special note of the amount of money which comes into the province of Ontario as compared to what the province of Ontario pays. This way people could see what grants are paid to Ontario. Assistance has been requested for the tourist industry through several departments, particularly the small harbours branch. DREE payments to Ontario amount to $20 million a year compared to over $100 million a year to the province of Quebec.

I have mentioned the great increase in gas prices. The Prime Minister said in 1974 that there would be no wage controls. He said he was absolutely against that. He told us he was resigning, but he was resurrected from the political grave thanks to the wily Cape Bretoner. The CN tracks were going to be twinned from Winnipeg to the coast. Have we seen or heard anything about that? Next we might hear the ridiculous statement that the post office is self-sustaining.

So I come to the Post Office, which does hot have a nickel for its deficit shown in the budget. It is just as if it were on its own and self-sustaining. That is the stupidest thing I have ever come across. The Post Office deficit last year was $400 million. Will we now be faced with a charge of a dollar for a stamp? This is just another example that comes to mind.

I can see a great scenario unfolding. Certainly the wily, prince Machiavelli from Cape Breton has done a masterful job. I say to every Liberal member that he or she should get down on his or her knees every night and thank God that he is on that side of the House. But the Cape Bretoner will have to be repaid in some way. I forecast that he will be the next prime minister when the northern magus retires. Mind you, it will be for a short period of time. He will probably look across to the NDP who are going to lose their seats next time. Probably righteous Robbie might be put in the Senate and made minister of finance for a period of time. Then I foresee a leadership convention and the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) will become the next prime minister. But I can tell you that this side of the House will be moving over there. A Conservative government will be the next government, and I am looking forward to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate and to follow such a distinguished speaker as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). He is an entertaining speaker but I do not put much faith in his crystal ball gazing.

An hon. Member: You are against MacEachen, are you?

Mr. McCauley: This is an historic moment in our country's life. Canada runs the risk of becoming the most highly educated third world country in the world. Our energy bills are strangling us. Our work force lacks technical skills. Our economy is largely controlled by foreign interests.

This budget is making the right moves to alter those trends and to put us back on the track. By concentrating on our energy problems, the budget will help solve other problems. If we develop our national energy potential, we will no longer be in debt to, or at the mercy of, OPEC. We will create thousands of jobs and train workers in valuable skills at the same time. In addition, we will develop new energy technology and expertise that can be exported. Thanks to Petro-Canada, more of the money that goes for energy will be kept right here in Canada.

Despite what we hear from opposition benches, this is a good budget. It is fair to people, to industry and to the provinces. Obviously there are some who disagree with that assertion. I am afraid they are inclined to use political rhetoric to encourage divisive forces in various regions of the country.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and his colleagues in this debate so far have been spending a lot of time taking us all on a verbal stroll through the graveyard of Tory budget proposals laid to rest by Canadians last February. The hon. member and his colleagues are arguing over tombstones. In his doomed December budget the ex-finance minister tried to bludgeon the people of Canada into conserving energy with an 18-cent excise tax on gasoline. Even now the hon. member does not seem to think that tax on transportation fuel would have hurt low-income Canadians very much. That is nonsense. Low-income Canadians still have to get to work somehow. They have to be able to get around, to shop and to pick up the kids. They would have been hurt—and hurt badly—by that tax. To add insult to injury, that tax would have shown up in the cost of goods transported to the regions of the country. That would have meant a further chunk out of the pay cheques of Canadians.

With their holier-than-thou act the Conservatives are now glorifying their December proposal to give low-income earners an energy tax credit. It was a scheme to help cover the cost of heating oil, but how would Canadians have paid for this scheme of tax credits? Well, very simply, with the money paid into the Tory treasury through the excise tax. What a sham, giving the poor people of Canada their own money back to heat their homes, taking money with the left hand and giving the same money back with the right hand. Yet this government is accused of playing a shell game.

The hon. member for St. John's West has been giving nicknames to various other members of this House ever since he arrived here. We on this side of the House have been having a little contest so that we can return the compliment. So far the best suggestion is the "Nervy Newfie" because of the gall he has in this debate to complain about heating oil costs. He did not mention what the family breadwinner would have paid for heating oil under his budget in 1984, $1.96 a gallon. Under our government's proposal by 1984 it will cost a maximum of $1.51 a gallon. That is difference of 45 cents. There are similar differences between our prices and Tory prices for natural gas and for gasoline.

Instead of sly manoeuvring between excise taxes and energy tax credits, this government has taken a long range look at ways in which we can become independent of the OPEC robber-barons. We want to be off imported oil, and we will be off imported oil by 1990. But no government can do that alone. We have to signal to consumers that they too have to work toward this end.

It is no secret that Canadians were receiving conflicting signals during the past decade. We were told about wastefulness. We heard dire predictions about rationing and about how short supplies were getting. But oil was so cheap. Rare things are expensive, so oil could not have been getting as rare as governments were trying to tell us. Well, it is rare, and it is getting harder, to find, particularly in terms of conventional sources. Therefore, it will be, and must be, more expensive in the future. So no more conflicting signals.

Oil costs money, so we will have to pay for it, and in paying more we will think about conservation more. We will turn down the thermostat, take the bus and wear a sweater.

We must also take the initiative to insulate our homes and convert to wood or natural gas or other alternatives. The government has provided programs of assistance in these areas which will have lasting effects in terms of conservation. There are $800 grants to cover up to 50 per cent of the cost of moving from oil use to gas or wood or other alternatives, and the budget for the home insulation program has grown by 300 per cent, to $230 million.

We recognize that even with all these programs some segments of the population will be hard pressed to pay for heating oil, so the Department of National Health and Welfare of this government has increased by $35 the Guaranteed Income Supplement and spouses' allowance for seniors. The same people who will receive an additional $420 under these increases would only have received about $160 under the Tory tax credit scheme. That is a big difference and one well worth pointing out. We have provided for these low-income Canadians much better with the $35 per month increase than the Conservatives would have given through their heating oil tax credit.

We could have offered subsidies for heating oil, but in doing so we would have defeated our purpose of trying to get people to kick the energy habit, and we would have had to pay such subsidies each winter. This way, consumers only have to insulate once. They only have to convert their furnaces once. And let us not forget that in 1985 gas will cost the equivalent of oil costs this year.

This honest, effective and long-term approach realizes that we are going to have to tough it out until we are independent of imported oil, but the way we are toughing it out means we will develop our own national resources, invest in our country, create jobs here and develop technology here which can be exported.

So this is not just an energy strategy. This is an industrial strategy. Energy caused our economic woes. Let it provide the solutions as well.

The Atlantic region of this country in particular will benefit from the national energy program, contrary to remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) in this debate. He accused the government of using regional expansion programs to increase regional disparities. Not only is that a ridiculous contradiction but it is also irresponsible.

In this budget we have a $500 million commitment to building a natural gas pipeline for the maritimes and Quebec, which means we in Atlantic Canada will have an alternative to imported oil.

Should we find enough gas off our shores to justify tapping it and passing it on to the rest of the country, we will have the transmission lines in place to do so. The beauty of this project, and of the whole national energy program, is that it will create jobs, rev up our industry and use a vast source of fuel. Extending the pipeline was the object of one motion made at the Liberal convention in Winnipeg last summer which received the full support of the New Brunswick delegation. Our action proves that this government listens to the grassroots of the party.

Although the pipeline proposal has not yet been finalized, we can get an indication of how it will benefit the maritimes from an earlier proposal by Q & M Pipe Lines. The total net income which would have been generated for New Brunwick, Nova Scotia and Quebec under that proposal would have been $1.7 billion in 1979 terms. Average annual employment for the three provinces would have been over 4,000 jobs. Most benefits would have gone to New Brunswick. The total increase in income to the province from the transmission line alone would have been $601 million. Another $220 million would have come from the pipeline distribution system. That is a total of $821 million in income increases to New Brunswick, not to mention the 2,000 jobs which would have been created in that province.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at 6 p.m., the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Postmaster General (Mr. McCauley) had the floor.

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned, I was discussing the benefits to the provinces of New Brunswick and Atlantic Canada of the building of the natural gas pipeline to that part of the country. I want to pick up on that and to talk about the problems which Newfoundland or P.E.I. will have, because they will not have access to western natural gas but they will benefit from yet another conservation program which will allow for energy audits, oil furnace retrofitting and additional insulation.

This program will operate in much the same way as the $800 off oil conversion grants and will apply to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories as well. Other federal energy initiatives, such as research, conservation and industry incentives, will total over $290 million in New Brunswick over the next four years. That is almost $400 per person in that province alone. Yet the opposition critic for the Atlantic development program says there is nothing in the budget to strengthen the economies of the region.

We on this side of the House put greater stock in the opinions of such august bodies as the Atlantic chamber of commerce which reacted favourably to the budget. They are particularly pleased with the 50 per cent tax credit for certain new capital investments in disadvantaged areas. Business people will also benefit from programs like the small business development bonds. As we all know, they have been extended for three months into 1981.

But, speaking of energy, ultimately we have to get away from non-renewable sources. Even coal and natural gas will run out one day. Realizing this, the government has set up a new Crown corporation called Enertech Canada. As a member of the special parliamentary task force on alternate energy and oil substitution, I am especially pleased by this move.

Enertech Canada will be a subsidiary of Petro-Canada and will focus on supporting commercial production of renewable energy and conservation technology. Also, since 1978, there have been a number of programs operating in this area. The use of wood and other biomass fuels has been encouraged, as has research and development in wind and solar technology, all part of a $380 million package which was started in 1978 and will run for another five years.

All these alternatives hold real promise for Atlantic Canada which, at least for now, has no domestic source of oil and gas. But the program which can benefit us the most is the conservation program. Again, as a member of the alternate energy committee, I have heard it said innumerable times that the most valuable barrel of oil is the one we save.

To help industry improve energy efficiency, there is a $30 million fund which has been set up exclusively for the Atlantic provinces. It will cover up to half the cost of conservation measures. If we succeed in this program, we will be less vulnerable to energy price increases and we will be more competitive in national and international markets.

People who use electric heat in the maritimes will be relieved to hear that utilities are being encouraged to change from burning oil to burning coal for generating power. One hundred and seventy-five million dollars has been set aside for this task. Coleson Cove, New Brunswick and Tufts Cove, Nova Scotia, should be two of the first utilities to benefit from this fund.

Conversion projects involving coal must be environmentally acceptable to be eligible for the grants. We do not want to worsen the acid rain problem. Technology for using coal efficiently and in a way that is environmentally benign will be encouraged with a $50 million three-year program. Another $100 million may be added to the fund in 1984-85.

This is yet another example of how the government will use solutions to our energy problems to solve our economic problems as well. There will be jobs in Cape Breton coal mines once again. We will be tapping a vast source of energy there and we will be developing new coal utilization technology. Other nations are also turning to coal. Our new-found expertise will be exportable and our energy dollars will stay in Canada. Despite opposition criticisms I think most Canadians see that this budget will benefit all regions of Canada. I think people in Atlantic Canada will use the opportunities given them through the budget to become more self-sufficient, not only in energy but also economically. I believe deep in my heart that the people of western Canada are really willing to contribute to the total country's welfare, contrary to what certain politicians are saying. If we stop listening to politicians and start listening to people, we may get a few surprises in terms of western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCauley: For example, The Calgary Herald polled Albertans and found that most expected a gas price hike and did not think it was excessive. The president of the Alberta Chamber of Commerce said that converting from oil to gas should be beneficial to Alberta and all of Canada. The Edmonton Journal carried an editorial which said the budget would not reduce Alberta's income in the immediate future. It predicted faster growth after 1984. The Journal also predicted the heritage fund would continue to grow at a healthy rate, oil sands plants could go ahead, conventional oil and gas would flourish, and the over-all economy would grow. Also deep in my heart I believe Albertans appreciate that being part of Canada is something like being subject to progressive income tax—"The more you make, the more you contribute". They feel more allegiance to confederation, the Canadian experience and national welfare than certain members of the Conservative opposition give them credit for. The dark mutterings of the Tories about western separation are in many instances attempts to play off one region against the other.

The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) said in a recent speech:

> The nation can stand considerable stress and strain. It is constantly proving this. It is a durable nation and will survive the constricted wisdom and political demagoguery of those who will rave and subtly give credence and substance to national cleavage and dismemberment.

The hon. member was participating in the debate on the constitution when he made those remarks, but I am sure he would agree his words apply equally to this debate. Certainly there is western alienation, not only political and economic, but even geographical and physical. By the time British Columbians get up in the morning, the stock markets in Toronto and New York have been open for hours. Decisions affecting them have already been made half a continent away. Even during an election, the results have usually been decided long before the polls close on the west coast. No wonder westerners feel everything is decided for them in some mythical place called central Canada. But they are not the only ones who feel that way. The people of Atlantic Canada have the original patent on alienation. For years they have felt they are just drifting along behind the rest of the country. Whether we live in Atlantic Canada, Ontario, Quebec or the west, we know from time to time that all of us have contributed to the growth of this great country. John Diefenbaker from the west gave us a bill of rights; Tommy Douglas from the west introduced the first provincial medicare plan. The west has a fine tradition of grass-roots politics which has made their governments very sensitive to how the little guy on the street feels, until now. Now certain politicians for their own political purposes are trying to appeal to the worst in westerners, saying the east and central Canada are robbing them of their resources.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) estimated that British Columbia will lose $30 million annually on exports of natural gas because of a tax on that fuel. She did not mention the $4 billion that will be heading west from the federal government to help that region diversify its economy. If western Canadian companies cannot sell their gas south of the border, the federal government will buy it. These measures, plus the provincial share of the export tax on oil, should more than compensate the region for any ill effects that may be felt in the export market. Westerners are reasonable people; the federal government is taking heed of the region's aspirations and is sharing the nation's wealth with it and all other parts of Canada. That is the task of a truly national government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCauley: It hurts me to hear irresponsible statements like those of opposition members who say this government has declared war on the west. As I said, irresponsible statements just encourage the worst in people.

The New Democratic Party has shown it can put its constituents' interests in the west before its political interest. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said our actions on this side of the House on the natural gas tax show we sincerely hope to gain support in the west. Certainly westerners have gripes. Don't we all? But westerners have not been ignored by the federal government to the extent that some of their representatives would have them believe.

Take resource benefits, for example. The Canadian provinces get a higher share of resource revenue than any other state in the world: more than double the share Texas gets from its federal government; more than triple the share which goes to the state of Victoria in Australia. What about all the money the federal government has passed up in favour of tax incentives for oil and gas exploration in the west? The provincial governments have earned a considerable sum in royalties from projects which might never have begun without federal tax incentives. As for the weeping and wailing of the oil industry, let us remember that federal price and tax policies have provided the industry with the cash flow necessary to finance its expenditures. This means the oil consumer and the Canadian taxpayer have financed virtually all the substantial expansion of this industry. Surely Canadians have the right to be more involved in the energy industry, which has realized such fabulous growth in the past few years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCauley: After-tax profits in the industry reached $4.7 billion last year, up 53.8 per cent from 1978. We have a good thing going in the energy sector, and it is time Canadians as a whole began to profit from it. The multinationals are not likely to throw in the towel tomorrow and quit investing in Canada because of the national energy program. Where else can they go? To Britain, where the government has first claim on over half the offshore oil production? Compare that to Petro-Canada's new claim to only 25 per cent of energy finds in the Arctic and offshore. The multinationals will not be too interested in going south to Mexico because the state gets 100 per cent of the finds there, and Norway claims 50 per cent to 70 per cent of the share in its jurisdiction. It is not as though we are buying assets from them which Canadians do not deserve or have not contributed to; not at all.

As for the NDP notion that we are pushing Canadianization of the oil industry for the benefit of those who are already rich, let me repeat what the energy minister said. His department has had talks with credit unions, caisses populaires and wheat pools that want to diversify their investments.

The NDP had a similar argument against extending the MURB program. It is the Multiple Unit Residential Buildings incentive plan that will get the construction industry out of the doldrums. The New Democrats have branded it as merely a tax haven for the rich, and some members of the official opposition have used the same language. This program, like any other, is for those who want to take advantage of it. It will create about 10,000 jobs. It will alleviate the housing shortage in cities like Vancouver where zero vacancy rates have been recorded.

Creating jobs, training workers and developing our economy—we will do it all and at the same time find some answers to our energy problems. This is not the big, bad budget everyone was expecting. We did not de-index personal income tax. We did not raise those taxes or corporate taxes. Registered Home Ownership Savings Plans are still available. There is a whole raft of things we were expected to do but they would have been contrary to our Liberal philosophy. We are encouraging business but we are not going to let multinational oil companies continue to take us to the cleaners. This is a many-faceted budget which looks far into the future. It makes that future look very bright for all Canadians, no matter where they live—east, west, north or south. This is a budget of which we can all be proud.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for members to begin a speech of this nature by saying it is a pleasure to rise and speak on the subject before them. I must say that when I look at this budget I can hardly say it is a pleasure to speak on it. I listened with some attention to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. McCauley) who has been sharing his views with regard to the budget and the reaction to it. He kept referring to what he called the irresponsible criticism of the opposition.

Anticipating that kind of reaction on the part of the government I thought I would go to the newspapers of the land and look at the headlines the day after the budget had been laid before us in the House. These newspapers are really not promoters of the Tory party so I think that may serve to make their comments a little more objective. One newspaper says the budget is the "Biggest move since Second World War" and "Energy policy is massive nationalist intervention". One columnist says: "Mackenzie King lurks in MacEachen budget". I do not think that headline would be thought to be too complimentary. Another one in the Gazette says of the budget: "Taxing the energy firms a curve ball to the taxpayer". Geoff Stevens talks about "The cunning of MacEachen". Another columnist talks about "New natural gas levy slap in the face for the west". Another one said, "Budget worse than appears". "Slick and sly MacEachen left 'em gasping", says one newspaper, while another says it was "Imprudent, insulting". Finally, one columnist said, "Tone of reason is deceptive".

The two adjectives which I found sadly missing in the descriptions of the budget in the national press were "good" and "honest". Nowhere does the press say it was an honest budget designed to meet the needs of Canadians. As a result, we have a budget which evokes those epithets thrown at the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and we see a reaction which cultivates cynicism in the land and distrust of the government by the public. And we do not need any more of that.

I noted with interest that the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) rose in his place last Wednesday during the question period and put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in which he was throwing back to the minister the line the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) uses all the time about the need to be sharing in Canada.

An hon. Member: Redistributing the wealth.

Mr. Friesen: Redistributing the wealth, the hon. member says. I would like to ask the hon. member for Longueuil to examine the concept of federalism in the way the government defines "sharing". In his question he was asking about investment in Quebec. But the Prime Minister has always talked about sharing the energy resources of the west with the rest of the country.

And since we are talking about those kinds of investments I would like to ask the hon. member if he has asked about the way Quebec Hydro shares the wealth it gets from the investment that Newfoundland has made in the development of hydro electric energy Quebec sells it to the United States. I understand that the contract the province of Quebec has with the province of Newfoundland is somewhere in the range of a 65-year contract. It was made by the former premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Smallwood, because he could not get a better deal with Quebec. He had to sell that energy at fire sale prices to the province of Quebec which in turn, having no investment in the project at all and being nothing but a broker, re-sells that energy to New York State at world prices. And that is a 65-year contract. I ask you: is that sharing?

I am wondering about sharing in terms of Ontario's gold mines. I know that the energy resources in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia are attractive because the value is now inflated because of petro-dollars, but so is the price of gold. Just a few years ago gold was valued at $35 an ounce and now it is valued at between $600 and $700 an ounce. I would say the price of gold has been inflated. What about the price of gold and its value to the province of Ontario? Since Ontario and the federal government want Alberta to sell their oil to the rest of the country at one-half the world price I wonder if the province of Ontario would sell its gold or its uranium at half the world price.

I am wondering about the protective tariffs and the quota system which is in effect. It has been here for the past hundred years and people across Canada have accepted it. It was put in place to protect the industry of central Canada in order that it might thrive because the economies of scale are just non-existent in Canada. Nevertheless, those same tariffs have increased the price to the consumer by an average of 30 per cent.

Hon. members will remember that several years ago this government put a quota system on the shoe and textile industries so that those retailers in Canada would have to buy Canadian products first. But those same industries could not supply goods to western Canada. It meant that shoe stores in British Columbia went out of business because of a policy designed to support industry in central Canada. We do not quarrel with this but it drove businesses into bankruptcy in western Canada. I ask members opposite; where is the concept of sharing when it comes to the quota and the tariff system in Canada? I say flat out to members opposite that sharing is not sharing if it is compulsory.

When the Prime Minister talks about sharing and then imposes a budget which forces the provinces to sell their product at below world prices, that is not sharing. That is the work of a stick-up artist of the highest calibre. When Alberta lends to other provinces at favourable interest rates or when it agrees to build port facilities in Prince Rupert, that is sharing. When Alberta sells energy at half the world market price when it could just as easily transport that petroleum to the port of Vancouver and ship it overseas to be sold at the world price, that is sharing.

On the other hand, the energy which Quebec Hydro purchases from the province of Alberta is used to generate electricity in the province of Quebec, which then sells that electricity at the world price to the United States. Is that sharing? The budget introduced by the Minister of Finance has put further strains on confederation. The hon. member for Moncton just said that westerners are reasonable people, and I agree. We have been reasonable for 100 years in the face of some very unreasonable demands. The time has come to ask ourselves how long we ought to be reasonable, how long we should pay 30 per cent more for the products and the privilege of buying Canadian while at the same time we receive 50 per cent less for our raw resources for the privilege of being Canadian.

How long should we pay higher freight rates to send raw materials east so that the products can be manufactured there and so that we can buy them back again? Yes, westerners are reasonable. If it were turned around and easterners moved west for one year, they would see how long they could be reasonable living out west. The hon. member for Moncton over the dinner hour graciously sent everybody a copy of his "Householder." I found on pages six and seven a short constitutional dictionary. It is somewhat more convoluted than Webster's. In fact, the definitions are a series of questions. There is a whole paragraph written to define the amending formula, but it never defines the amending forumla. I wonder what his constituents will say six months from now when they find out that New Brunswick has been snookered out of an equal share in confederation and been made a second-class province by the amending formula imposed by the Prime Minister.

The people of the west know that the Prime Minister believes that the western provinces are second-class provinces. We found that out. We have also found out how much the New Democratic Party sold out in the famous deal. I notice that members from the House of Commons have been appointed to the joint committee and that there are two members of the New Democratic Party on that committee. The people of British Columbia sent more members of the New Democratic Party to Ottawa than any other province, 12 members, yet there is not one New Democratic member on that committee from British Columbia.

The great New Democratic Party has dealt the people of British Columbia out. I can understand why they did not send the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson); it is because they cannot trust him to vote the way the leader wants him to vote. I can understand why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) insisted that he be a member of that committee. Of course, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is a member of the committee because he is the party critic on federal-provincial relations. I suppose the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will sit next to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville to instruct him to say the right things and to vote the right way when it comes to the constitutional proposal, particularly section 42.

Why is it there are no members of the NDP party from British Columbia on that committee? Does British Columbia not count? The master for western Canada, the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), arranged with the Prime Minister to make sure that resources were permanently entrenched in the charter of rights in the constitution, but he could not arrange for a member of his party from British Columbia to be on that committee. That really shows his interest in western Canada.

I have followed the debate on the constitution very carefully. In fact, until closure was invoked, in my estimation, it achieved probably the highest level of debate I have ever heard in this House. Two weeks ago we struck a new low. I can recall very clearly sitting here listening to the speech of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who was giving a very emotional and impassioned description of the problems we face in western Canada and Newfoundland with regard to separation. And what did he receive that night? He received one of the loudest guffaws from members opposite I have ever heard in this House. I remember the hon. members for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel), Champlain (Mr. Veillette), and another hon. member, among others, laughing.

I said to myself that night that the problem of confederation is not a problem of sharing. I recalled the concern which members opposite felt for the referendum debate in the province of Quebec. We all shared that concern. Party leaders were pairing wherever possible so that members of government could campaign for the No forces. We passed a unanimous resolution in this House urging Quebec to stay in confederation. The combined forces of all parties won the day. But just six months later when concern is expressed with regard to the same kind of feeling in western Canada and Newfoundland, members opposite laugh. That is the problem of confederation.

Hon. members opposite wonder why there is this feeling of separation in western Canada.

Mr. Laniel: In Quebec it is not a question of wealth.

An hon. Member: Get serious, Benno!

Mr. Friesen: I welcome the hon. member's participation, but whether it is a matter of wealth or not, we do not deserve to be laughed at.

Mr. Laniel: I did not laugh at you.

Mr. Friesen: If the hon. member wishes to hear who was laughing, he can listen to the tapes. He will hear the laughter all over the House, and I make no bones about the matter. When the west is taxed, supposedly, equally with the rest of the country, we can accept that situation. Let me read an article from one of our western papers, the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper which is not one of the staunchest supporters of the Tory party—It has been moving toward the Liberal party lately. The article was in the October 31 issue in the form of an editorial entitled, "Billions Down the Drain", and it reads in part:

Lloyd Axworthy, western Canada's minister of everything else, paused in his most recent round of announcing parks and defending constitutional initiatives, to set things straight about energy policy.

It goes on to say, in the closing paragraph:

The real objection to the federal government's oil policy is not that it proposes to take wealth from the west and spend it in the east. Resources revenues, like those from any other source, ought to be used to benefit all of Canada. It is that the government proposes to take money from the west and pour it down the drain where it will help no one and, in the long run, will make all areas of Canada economically weaker and more vulnerable to the uncertainties of the world oil market.

That is what the Liberal newspaper in Winnipeg has to say. It is not that people object to paying tax; that is part of the family arrangement and taxation ought to be equal and it ought to be fair. But when there is overtaxation there is trouble. That means trouble for the consumer.

I might add, parenthetically, Mr. Speaker, that I happened to pick up a copy of today's Globe and Mail. In the business section there is an article which quotes a gentleman named Denis Ouellet, who is an analyst with Lévesque, Beaubien Inc. of Montreal. The article quotes him, comparing the budget before us with last year's budget, as follows:

'I see one irony in the budget,' he said. 'Consumers may have voted against the Clark budget, but they will find that collectively they will have about $2.5 billion less to spend in 1981 under the Trudeau budget last week.'

I did not say that, Mr. Speaker; the Tory party did not say that; our research office did not say that. A consultant firm in Montreal said that; consumers will have over $2 billion less to spend this year as a result of this budget. The government will soon know all about that. Overtaxation of the consumer means he cannot save money for retirement. It means that when he reaches retirement he will be totally dependent on the government. That robs him of a sense of dignity to which he is entitled in his senior years and of the ability to look after himself rather than depending on the government for support.

A couple of months ago a widow came to my office. She had moved to British Columbia from Montreal. Her husband had invested in an annuity which she found was not paying very good dividends so she cashed it in. According to the Income Tax Act the proceeds became part of her income for that year and she was liable for income tax on the lump sum. She had to pay something like $700 in extra tax—except that she did not have $700. What was she to do?

Mr. Blenkarn: Go to jail.

Mr. Friesen: That is about it, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me there is a conscious understanding on the part of people that a government is entitled to a legitimate share of their earnings in order to undertake legitimate government services. But when the government moves into areas that are either unnecessary or extravagant, the people will find a way to rebel. When a government taxes beyond the level that citizens feel is fair and right, they will find ways of rebelling. By overtaxation, the government invites dodging and people find ways to get around paying the taxes. It irritates me and infuriates me that the government spends so much time revising the Criminal Code but seems to forget about white collar crime which is not covered in the code. The Bank Act will soon come before us but there is precious little in it to protect the consumer against fraud. The government is very busy with the Criminal Code, however.

When there is overtaxation, Mr. Speaker, there is a reduction in labour. I recall going to one of the sawmills in my community where the manager told me that he found it very difficult to keep a full crew on Friday evenings. The men knew that one day's earnings per week was simply turned over to the government and felt it did not pay them to work on Friday as it would increase their tax. As a result, productivity was reduced.

Overtaxation also has an adverse effect on business by inhibiting expansion. A few nights ago in this House one of my colleagues told us about an oil company in Alberta which found at the end of the year it had $19 million to invest in exploration and expansion. When it ran the budget through the computer and applied it to the financial picture of the company, it found that rather than having $19 million to invest it was left with $2 million. If hon. members found that their disposable earnings available for reinvestment were reduced to that degree, I wonder if they would consider working worthwhile?

A grocery in my constituency complained to me about tariffs. He is charged 15 per cent or 16 per cent tariff on some items he imports. His mark-up on resale is only 14 per cent and he did not see why the government should make more than he does. That seems to me a fairly reasonable rule of thumb, because the government is at no risk. It has not invested anything except man hours so why should it make more money than the entrepreneur? What we have is a disincentive because of overtaxation.

There is a final aspect of this situation that bothers me, Mr. Speaker. The government ought to know by now that the taxpayer's willingness to pay is directly related to the way the money is spent. If he is called upon to be prudent in handling his resources then he feels he can call upon the government to be prudent as well. When he sees a budget of $60 billion this year, a deficit of something like $16 billion and interest on the deficit amounting to about $1 billion, he feels justified in asking whether the government is prudent in the way it is using that money. The taxpayer cannot look kindly on a government that is guilty of such extravagance; he wants a return on investment.

This budget does not solve the country's problems, Mr. Speaker. It is a budget which attacks the consumer, a budget which calls on the consumer to pay. It is an attack on the reinvestment possibilities for companies, which in turn means a reduction in job opportunities. It will be seen as an attack on the rights of citizens to save for themselves, to invest for themselves and to plan for their own future rather than having the government do it for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour for me to take part in such an important debate.

As I was listening to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) deliver the budget speech on Tuesday, I was reminded of how fortunate Canadians were to live in a country endowed with so many human and natural resources. Throughout our history, Canada has managed to respond and adapt to worldwide economic and political developments like no other industrialized nation in the world.

Developments such as the world oil crisis which have severely handicapped some of our closest allies, have only inflicted a minor wound on our economic performance. Canadians today are fortunate to have before them a budget which does not in any way severely affect their lifestyles, such as would have been the case with the ill-fated Tory budget of 1979. Over the next few years Canadians will have to make only modest sacrifices in the way of higher domestic oil prices. When one considers the price of oil in the United States, and especially in the western European countries, these sacrifices will appear insignificant.

What we have before us tonight is a very sound and realistic budget which will provide us with the right ammunition to deal with our economic problems in the short term and, at the same time, provide us with some of the key policy objectives for the complete implementation of our national energy program in the longer term. The budget in itself is non-discriminatory and very selective. What we are attempting to do is to concentrate on those sectors and industries which, on the one hand, can best support tax increases and which, on the other, can be the most equitably taxed to benefit all Canadians. These are the industries and resources which for the moment, and in the foreseeable future, figure more prominently both internationally and domestically, and also assume socioeconomic proportions of national significance.

We are not, as some members opposite have accused us of doing, picking on certain provinces or on certain industries and resources. If today we are taking steps to collect more revenues from oil and natural gas production, it is not because we want to fill up our coffers at the expense of certain provincial governments. It is because we, as a national government, must participate more actively in developing and protecting these valuable instruments of national growth and progress.

The opposition has argued many times that, regardless of their value in the world markets, oil and gas resources should be treated no differently than any other resource; that they are provincial property and should be treated as such, in much the same way, for instance, as is potash, iron ore, or hydroelectric power. Our government respects the provinces' rights to levy direct taxes and collect royalties on natural resources found within their borders. In fact, we offered the provinces the right to levy indirect taxes on resource production, as well as the right to engage in interprovincial trade. However, we must, as a federal government, resort to the use of our own powers by way of indirect taxation to carry out our national responsibilities.

By imposing a tax on natural gas, applicable to Canadian consumers and foreign customers alike, we are not in any way intruding into provincial jurisdiction. Our taking action in this field is completely within the established constitutional powers of the federal government.

Provincial politicians have, it appears, historically taken a position against our using this, one of our rights, to tax their natural resources. Premier Lougheed has accused us of singling out oil and gas resources unjustly for taxation. However, he must not forget that there was an export tax on hydroelectric energy in the years from 1926 to 1968 when the federal government considered such a tax to be in the national interest. The truth of the matter is that the federal government has exercised this right to indirect taxation on natural resources on previous occasions in our country.

From 1947 when a major oil find was made in Leduc until the mid-1970s, imported oil was cheaper than domestic oil from Alberta. It was the national government which, through its policies and its construction of a TransCanada Pipeline, helped and encouraged the growth of this vital western Canadian industry.

Mr. Speaker, when natural resources or any other sector of the economy takes on a national significance, and when the well-being of all Canadians depends on a single natural resource, it is then important for the federal government to intervene in a positive manner in the economy. The federal government must ensure that the cost and benefits related to the development of that resource be shared by all Canadians. The national government of any country must get an adequate share of the revenues generated by the most prosperous sectors of the economy. It must play a more direct role in the economy so that its citizens are not threatened by forces they cannot tolerate.

[English]

Canadians must realize that we could not wait any longer before going ahead with our national energy program. We have attempted over the years to arrive at a just and fair agreement with the producing provinces over the price of oil and gas. These talks have always ended in failure, because at the negotiating table, the provincial premiers could not understand that we, as a national government were representing the interests of all Canadians, not simply the interests of the non-producing provinces. If the roles were reversed and oil and gas reserves had been found in Ontario and Quebec, for instance, rather than in Alberta, westerners would expect us to move in exactly the same way to provide for and guarantee their energy security.

Because of geographical and geological factors, major hydrocarbon reserves are located within the territorial boundaries of the three westernmost provinces, and because of external developments, beyond the control of Canadians, petroleum, in international markets, has assumed such political and economic significance that we today must develop these resources with the national interest in mind.

The question is: should Canadians have to pay the world price for oil, or bear the burden of energy insecurity, when we as a nation are fortunate enough to have massive conventional and non-conventional oil and gas reserves. We can achieve energy self-sufficiency without at the same time having to make an enormous sacrifice in order to meet this end. So, therefore, what is our government proposing in the budget before the House?

We are, on the one hand, attempting to ensure that Canadians across the country benefit from our wealth in both conventional and non-conventional oil and gas resources. On the other, we are putting forward a scheme to "Canadianize" our petroleum industry, so that we can all reap more of the benefits from the development of these resources.

Obviously, we cannot expect to fulfil these national objectives under the present revenue sharing arrangements between the federal government, the producing provinces, and the petroleum industry. The federal government must obtain a larger share of petroleum revenues in order to implement its national energy program. We are therefore proposing to increase our stake in total production revenues from a modest 10 per cent to a more equitable 24 per cent, drawing from the oil companies, not the provinces.

To increase its revenues from energy our government will levy taxes on production. Alternately, we could have passed the cost of this energy program on to the Canadian citizen by imposing a massive tax on the consumption of petroleum, as would have been the case with the budget drawn up by the Conservatives last December. Such a move would have been both socially regressive and economically unwise. We took a decision against such a move when it was introduced in the House last December, and we are abiding by it in this budget.

The government of Alberta insists that oil prices in Canada must rise rapidly to near world prices and that they, together with the multinationals, should continue to collect the lion's share of the revenues from petroleum resources.

Our government realizes that conventional oil is indeed a rapidly depleting resource and that measures should be taken to divert Canadians away from oil consumption to other forms of energy. Alberta is suggesting that rapidly increasing prices is the only route to take. We feel that such a move would not be in the best interests of Canadians. It would result in sudden price increases which would severely handicap both the Canadian consumer and the economy as a whole.

We have proposed phased-in price increases which would allow Canadians enough time to convert to other forms of energy consumption. Given a larger share of petroleum revenues, our government could introduce programs aimed at developing new sources of energy to offset these phased-in price increases and help Canadians convert to more abundant sources of energy, such as natural gas.

What we are actually doing now is approaching this problem from two sides. Canadians can continue to consume oil at realistically set prices and we can work to develop other sources of energy without having to impose harsh taxes on the consumer. It is understood, of course, that we can only hope to achieve this if we manage to garner a larger share of the revenues from the production of oil and gas.

Let us not fool ourselves for one instant by thinking that energy self-sufficiency and a just pricing policy for all Canadians can be achieved simultaneously without the federal government taking a more active role in the energy sector.

When the federal government indicated it would increase its share of revenue collecting to 24 per cent, some provinces took offence at the proposal. The Premier of Alberta retaliated by announcing that his province would cut back oil and gas production to fellow Canadians forcing them to turn more and more to foreign suppliers. It is indeed a shame when one stops to consider the implications of such a move, Mr. Speaker. Here we have a provincial premier who is attempting to disrupt the federal government's national energy program. This premier has taken it upon himself to dictate the terms of a new energy package which will adversely affect all Canadians.

I do not think the government of Alberta has the right to dictate the terms of the federal government's national policy under any circumstances. The Premier of Alberta appears to have taken upon himself the task of speaking for western Canadian interests. I cannot honestly find anything in Mr. Lougheed's statements of last Thursday night to convince me that Alberta's proposed actions to curtail production will benefit Manitobans, who have very limited gas and oil resources of their own and must depend on the federal government for their energy security.

In fact, Manitoba's natural resource income was only $23 per capita in 1978 compared to Alberta's $1,874 per capita. Last week, the Manitoba finance minister openly condemned the federal budget as being an "energy grab" by the federal government at the expense of the western provinces. All I can suggest is that the Manitoba minister consult his economic advisers because there are no energy resources being grabbed—or to grab—in Manitoba. On the contrary, the federal budget will benefit Manitoba which, because of its lack of fossil fuel resources, is lagging behind the other western Canadian provinces.

I will now go over some of the benefits which will accrue to Manitobans through the federal budget. Under the national energy program, grants will be provided for conversion or replacement of oil-fired heating systems to enable homes and businesses to convert to other forms of energy. Some 60,000 homes in Manitoba are currently oil heated. The program target is the conversion of around 23,900 homes by 1990, all of which are eligible for 50 per cent of the costs incurred, up to a maximum of $800.

Under a federal-provincial agreement, Manitoba will also be eligible for a share of the funds which the federal government will make available over the next four years to assist in the financing of expanded distribution systems for propane, natural gas, electricity and perhaps other forms of energy.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) announced last week the establishment in Winnipeg of a new Crown energy corporation called Enertech, which will promote and participate in business ventures; producing, distributing and marketing renewable energy, and developing new energy sources. This new corporation will be a definite asset to Manitobans, and to all Canadians. It will greatly assist Canadian businesses in shifting to new forms of energy sources.

In addition, there is the $4 billion western development fund which will be used to fund a series of economic development initiatives in the four western provinces. Such a fund will particularly benefit Manitoba which does not have enormous revenues flowing into its treasury from petroleum, as is the case in the other three western provinces. Manitoba will be able to use its share of this development fund for infrastructure improvements, to promote and encourage industrial development and diversification; to upgrade rail lines in the west and to introduce new agriculture and water programs.

The proposals contained in the federal budget certainly attest to our government's concern for western Canadian development. The revenues collected as a result of our levying taxes will be poured back into the energy sector, a large part of which will be used to diversify western Canada's energy base. In short, the budget will add a new dimension to western Canadian development.

In September of this year members of the Standing Committee on Transport travelled from coast to coast to familiarize themselves with the needs of all of the provinces. In each province we visited we were told that over and above all the functions of the various ministries of government, over and above unemployment insurance, national pension programs, medicare, social services, national defence, etc., it was up to the federal government to provide national transportation linking our country from coast to coast by land, water and air. We met representatives from governments, municipal offices and so forth. We were told that better railways, better passenger and freight trains were needed; that new rails or heavier rail lines should be constructed; rail lines must be retained and relocated and rail lines that are to be maintained in the system were to be rehabilitated. New intermodal stations were needed and better rolling stock, engines, hopper cars and so forth were to be provided. When it came to marine centres, we were told that container terminals, wharves, search and rescue facilities, coast guards, ports and port development were all needed. We were told we had to look after the port of Churchill and the St. Lawrence Seaway. When it came to cities which required airports, we were told better runways, more runways, cargo facilities, terminal buildings, traffic control centres, radar equipment and instrument landing service were all needed. They wanted assistance for their urban transportation program. They wanted assistance for the transportation of the disabled. I could go on and on. The Ministry of Transport has an expenditure budget per year of $1.2 billion, but the demands by the various provinces for all these facilities, which would be administered by the federal government, would run into the billions of dollars. When we look at the other side of the coin, at our ability to provide our nation with these facilities, it becomes evident that income is required. But when we turn around and say to the provinces that it is their turn to give something so that we can attempt to meet the needs of the nation, they say, "Yes, but you cannot have it from us; we are keeping ours; what is ours is ours". We cannot build a nation on those grounds.

In the budget before us the federal government is proposing to enter into a partnership with the provinces which will, it is hoped, help us improve the political and economic balance of Canada. The budget will indeed give us the opportunity as Canadians to pull together in times of insecurity and demonstrate our ability to shape our destiny as a nation.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, when I awoke on the morning of October 29 I, along with several million other Canadians, was suffering from what I refer to as the yo-yo syndrome. I felt tremendously relieved that the horrible things which had been forecast to happen to us actually never came to pass. I refer to such things as the phasing out of the indexing of personal income tax, the elimination of the $1,000 income tax deduction for interest income, the ending of the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan, the reduction of tax deduction limits for contributions to registered retirement plans, the reduction in the dividend tax credit scheme, the reduction of capital gains, the increase in the 33.3 per cent small business rate to the standard corporate rate of 50 per cent and many other things which had been leaked, "reliably", from the Department of Finance to the pundits in this country, who reported them. It was a little like the wife who came home with a piece of the cheque her husband had given to her saying, "Look at all the money I saved you, dear; I did not buy that new hat or that new bird cage", and so forth. That was the relief part of it.

However, on the other hand, after I had an opportunity to analyse what actually had taken place, I was filled with a kind of disgust at the blatant contradiction we had witnessed. I was disgusted at the contradiction of the terror tactics the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) had imposed secretively on this country during the previous few weeks in anticipation of things which were supposed to be very bad. I felt sickened by all of this. It was a slick, sadistic scenario.

Along with many people in this nation, I feel this budget has done more to polarize the nation and more to harm honest efforts toward constitutional change than any other documentation we have seen put before this House, with the exception of the constitutional matter. Debate on the constitutional matter on the floor of this House was denied to the majority of us here. There is an unhealthy correlation between the budget of the Minister of Finance and the attempts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to redefine and reshape this country in his own image.

If indeed we are ever to have constitutional reform in this country, it will be much more difficult because of the budget of the Minister of Finance. There are those who believe, with justification, that there has been a deliberate attempt through the introduction of this budget on the part of the Minister of Finance and his cohort the Prime Minister to alienate the east from the west. After all, if the issue can be clouded, what difference do the votes in the west mean to the party which sits opposite? The answer is only too obvious.

It has become apparent that there has been a dramatic increase in talk of separation in the western parts of the country, and with good reason. A few short months ago it was said that only a handful of people in the west were talking about separation. A poll in the last few days showed that because of the alienation the west now feels that number has increased to about 25 per cent—and this is in the early stages. It does not bode well for constitutional talks.

The west is not the only region where there is talk of separation or fear of separation. I heard talk of separation in the east as recently as this morning at the airport where people were seriously talking about where we as eastern Canadians are going to turn for our political affiliations. The British North America Act of 1867 assured co-operation between the partners of this affiliation or confederation. Co-operation was the byword and the foundation upon which the British North America Act was based. The Prime Minister, the first minister of this land, should not act unilaterally to bring that constitution back from Britain without agreement on an amending formula and without agreement generally between the provinces, the partners of this confederation which, after all, have a substantial stake in the nation.

I speak as a Canadian and as an Atlantic Canadian. I speak as a New Brunswicker when I say that the Prime Minister is wrong in his approach to patriation of the constitution. It is wrong that one man can dictate to this country to satisfy his ego and an obsession caused by his own fanaticism. He is determined to change the course of the history of this nation whether it be for better or worse, as long as it is changed in his image, as he envisions it and without consultation.

The Minister of Finance has brought in a budget which, in the opinion of many of us, will again act to alienate the regions of this country more than to bring them together. Will he, too, act unilaterally? Will he force an end to this debate? Of course, the procedure of the House demands that the debate end, but on an issue as vital to the nation as this and in view of the fact that a good number of people in this House have been denied the opportunity to speak on the constitutional matter, I believe the period of debate on this budget should be extended so that all of those who wish an opportunity to speak on a matter which is so vital to the future of the nation may have that opportunity.

History will show that neither the Minister of Finance nor the Prime Minister, contrary to what they may think at this time, will go down in the pages of Canadian history books as great men. This House of Commons has been betrayed, its members have been betrayed, the future of the country has been betrayed and, most of all, those Canadians who voted last February for this government have been betrayed. They are, for the most part, good, honest Canadians who believed that the constitutional issue was fundamental to the future of this nation. They were people who believed that those they had elected should have the opportunity to rise in their places in the House and speak on this issue. The people who elected me expected that I would have the opportunity to rise in the House and to speak on this fundamental issue. But I was denied the opportunity, along with a good many other members. I believe history will show that to have been wrong.

Let us look at the budget. Let us consider the terrible things that did not happen to us. Deindexing was the big issue which we had talked about for so long. Thanks to the Minister of Finance, Canadians were spared deindexing. But the minister left the door open. He stated in part that if continued indexing is interpreted as a readiness to accommodate unlimited inflation rates, he might be "faced with no alternative but to impose some limit on the indexing factor." He said to the people in Canada that if they cannot hold down their inflationary ways, then they should watch out because next year they might be subjected to the sort of thing with which he had been threatening them this year. However, apparently it is not going to be this year, and I am sure the people of Canada are grateful.

There are no new taxes in this budget, according to the Minister of Finance, but we see, on examination, an increase in employer-employee premiums for unemployment insurance. That will raise $1.1 billion for the federal coffers, which is more than twice the amount contained in the Crosbie budget for an increase in UIC payments. Yet the minister says there are no new taxes. Who is going to pay for this increase in the payroll of this country? It sure as heck is not going to come from the government. Or is it? We shall have to wait and see.

What about the immediate and future increases in the taxes on liquor and tobacco products? There are no new taxes, according to the Minister of Finance, but somehow or other he slipped up because there are to be some future taxes on liquor and tobacco products. There is a sales tax on advertising and an extension of the manufacturers' sales tax on certain marginal manufacturing operations. If there are no new taxes, who is going to pay for this? We know where the money will come from. It is going to be raised on the backs of the little guys, the same as the bulk of the UIC payments, the $1.1 billion. It is going to be raised by the working people of this country.

And where are the offsets, where are the benefits, where are the easing measures in this budget to help the little fellow cope with these additional taxes? We should be asking this of our friends to the left, the NDP. Where are the offsets? It is the party to the left which made it possible for all these wonderful things to happen to Canadians that we have recently witnessed in the Minister of Finance's budget. We do not hear too much from them these days. They are all huddled together rereading "The thoughts of the Chairman" and muttering to themselves "but this is not the way it was supposed to have happened."

Let us examine briefly the energy package, Mr. Speaker. You will recall what brought these people to power after the NDP made it possible for them to run the election. They came to power on an energy package by condemning the 18-cent tax which was included in the Crosbie budget, and they said, "No, we will not raise our price of energy as much as the Tories intend to do because we do not believe you can afford to pay 18 cents for your power and fuel." What do we find in the package of goodies of the Minister of Finance? According to the Crosbie budget, a barrel of oil was going to increase by $4 by the end of 1980. According to the budget of the Minister of Finance, it is going to increase by $3.80, a difference of 20 cents. That translates into about half a cent difference per gallon. My soul, how fortunate we are as Canadians to have such a compassionate group over yonder looking after the welfare of the Canadian car owner and driver!

Take a look at what is going to happen to us all. Under the Tory program, by the end of 1983 we would be paying $23.80 more for a barrel of crude oil. Under the Liberal program, we would be paying $22.05. What does that $2 a barrel translate into so far as a gallon of gasoline is concerned? This also includes the terrible 18-cent excise tax. It translates into approximately two cents a gallon, or a little less, but I will give them the benefit of the doubt. The taxpayers of this nation spent $60 million on a two-cent election! It is not the 18-cent election any more.

What about the energy tax package? What about the other things we were talking about prior to the defeat of the last government? What about that program which was called—

Mr. Cullen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was listening to the hon. member very carefully. He mentioned the figure of $79 a barrel in 1977. Was he misreading his notes or was that the figure he meant?

Mr. Corbett: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not misreading my notes at all. It is very clear here. One thing I do quite well is print.

Mr. Cullen: I was not wondering how you read.

Mr. Corbett: The refundable energy tax credit was a very important part of the Crosbie budget. What that would have meant to Canadians earning under $21,380 is that an average family with two children would have had a tax rebate cash credit of $220. The two cents a gallon more in the cost of gasoline under the past government's program would have worked out to about 600 gallons a year at 12,000 miles per year, assuming your automobile gets 20 miles to the gallon, which works out to about $12 a year, give or take a few miles. The fact of the matter is that an average family of four would have been the recipients of about $220 in a cash credit under the old program. This means that under the Crosbie budget, the average Canadian family, at the end of 1983, would have been $208 better off per year than under the present minister's budget.

What else do we have in that package? We also have those nefarious little goodies which were referred to as the Canadian ownership charge. We have not been told much about the Canadian ownership charge, except that it is one to which we will all contribute so that we all end up owning some grandiose multinational oil company, getting into the oil business in a big way and becoming real social democrats. There are one or two other programs which are not defined as well. It is hard to say just exactly what it will mean. Before it is all over, I suspect that the 18-cent excise tax which defeated the Conservative government last February 18 will look like a Sunday school picnic in comparison to what we will have to pay under the present government.

Does anyone in the House of Commons recall the present government telling the people during the last campaign that it would increase the taxes on heating oil? I did not hear them, and no one I talked to on the street heard them either. But it is a fact of life. The fact is there has been an annual tax on heating oil which by the end of 1983 will amount to 36 cents per gallon more than would have been imposed under the Crosbie budget. It will mean an additional increase of approximately $286 per annum for the average family. Do hon. members opposite realize that? I bet it did not appear anywhere in their campaign material. Certainly it did not appear in any newspaper advertisement which I read. No, they did not mention that type of thing, but we are used to that approach by the government.

What has happened to the program for the conversion of oil to gas? This is probably one of the more positive points of the budget, one I would like to take a few minutes to address. It is outlined in the book entitled: "The National Energy Program". Page 56 reads in part as follows:

> For conversions from oil to gas, electricity, renewable, and other energy sources, a grant of 50 per cent of the conversion cost, up to a maximum of $800.

It goes on to say:

> However, the program will take account of special situations in individual provinces. For example, the dependence of the Atlantic provinces on oil for electrical generation, although declining, precludes financial assistance for conversion to electricity at this time.

The last sentence of the third paragraph on page 57 tell us:

> No one should delay action to convert away from oil.

I can only presume from this that even maritimers in this particular instance are not being regarded by the government as second-class citizens. I am very thankful for that. The sentence before that one reads as follows:

> When the program is operational, compensation will be paid.

I think that is a positive step. I look forward to many maritimers, many New Brunswickers, taking advantage of the program.

Under the section dealing with the Atlantic provinces, we read on page 86:

> Assistance will be provided to consumers, as in other provinces, to switch from oil to other fuels. Assistance for conversions to electric heating will not be immediately available in the Atlantic region, however.

In the province of New Brunswick more than half of its generated power comes from sources other than oil. Yet, according to this, for some reason or another New Brunswickers will be denied this program to convert to electricity from oil, despite the fact that less than half the electricity produced in the province of New Brunswick comes from oil. I should like the minister to take notice of this.

I understand that over the weekend there was a Liberal rally in my constituency of Fundy-Royal, at which time the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) attended as the guest speaker. A resolution was passed at that particular rally asking that the Minister of Public Works contact the Minister of Finance and implore him to allow the Atlantic region access to the same program as the rest of Canada. Obviously the implications were that they had not taken the time or bothered to read the national energy program to determine that Atlantic Canadians are indeed entitled to compensation for switching to other forms of energy with the exception of electricity. Perhaps the good minister would like to take their suggestion under advisement. I hope he will allow Atlantic Canadians the same opportunities in this nation as other Canadians. But I doubt that this will actually be a fact of life.

The minister represents a part of the country which is very rich in coal. Apparently he has lots of money to deal out and has become very generous with the part of the country he represents, Cape Breton. I think that is laudable, it is very noble of the minister. It has been a hard pressed area in the past, and I am thankful and pleased for the people of Cape Breton that the minister has taken cognizance of the fact their coal reserves should be developed. But there are other regions in the maritime provinces which have coal as well.

In my constituency the regions of Minto and Chipman have coal reserves. Last May 2 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) if it was his intention or the government's intention to aid in the extraction, production and/or marketing of coal from the Minto and Chipman areas. The answer was no, that the department had no plans to aid in the extraction, production and/or marketing of coal from those areas of New Brunswick at that time. I can assure the minister that the miners and their families in the Minto and Chipman areas of New Brunswick like to eat just as well as the miners of Cape Breton. I think they should be given the same opportunities and favouritism as the minister has shown to the people residing in his constituency.

There are energy resources in New Brunswick besides coal. In Albert county there is oil shale which has been producing oil since 1922. Also there are gas reserves in that county which have produced natural gas for use in the Hillsborough area for a good number of years. Where is this mentioned in the budget or in the national energy program developed by the Minister of Finance for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? It is conveniently forgotten, like the commitment to DREE. The government was committed to eliminating regional disparities, but it did not take into consideration doing anything additional for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. He talked about the manufacturers' investment tax credit. This was done in consultation with his good friend and old crony, the minister. This was for specifically designated areas. Indeed, it will be interesting to see where those specifically designated areas are.

There was no mention of the national parks in this country. We have a beautiful park in Fundy-Royal, which is suffering from a lack of attendance and has been over the last few years. I would have liked to have seen some attention brought to the plight of parks such as Fundy in order to increase attendance. But, no, not a word about it. Today it is appropriate to bring up the subject of national parks because we have park superintendents from all across this land visiting us here in the nation's capital. I would have liked to have seen some thought addressed to the plight of parks such as Fundy, but there was nothing.

What about the farmers of this country? There was hardly a mention made of farmers. The farmers are one of the most maligned groups of individuals in the nation. Yet there was hardly a word. The same thing can be said of fishermen.

And what about all of the poor people of this country? We do have them, in case the minister is not aware. There are poor people in this country who find it difficult to make ends meet and to get a meal. Where are the breaks for the little guys? Again, I should be asking the NDP who made all the rest of this possible for the people of Canada.

Where are the programs such as the mortgage interest and property tax credit plan which was included in the Crosbie budget? Where is the energy tax credit plan that would have helped the little guy absorb his new taxes? No, they are not there, Mr. Speaker. What about the heating fuel increases? These are the types of things we should be considering. We have only the assurance of higher inflation, higher taxes and more government spending. It is a one-man medicine show and a poor one at that. It is a spoof on professional quackery and this government, this minister, should not be allowed to get away with it.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to participate in this debate, which is on the first budget of the 1980s. This budget is the first of its kind in that it combines two priorities which are of increasing importance to this country. They are finances and energy. The link between has become such that it is impossible nowadays to separate them. Energy and finances will dominate the 1980s and our ability to effectively deal with them will have a direct bearing on whether or not we survive this century as a united federation.

This budget is the logical conclusion of our election campaign of last winter. Unlike some of the opposition members, who believe in instant cures to complex problems, we did not go charging off around the country making empty promises to the people of Canada which we could not keep. Rather, we anticipated the future. We realized that the people of Canada sought and demanded a government that could put the country of Canada back on its feet. We are a government which realized that election promises were just like any other promises made in good faith—they are made to be kept.

Just what did we promise the people of Canada? We promised them three things. First, we promised energy security at a fair price to all Canadians. Second, we promised to keep government expenditures within the rate of growth of the economy. Finally, we promised an orderly reduction of the deficit. Well, Mr. Speaker, we delivered on each and every one of those promises. This budget is a Liberal budget in every sense of the word. It is fair to all Canadians. It sets forth an energy program that will help Canadians reach energy self-sufficiency at a fair, made-in-Canada price. It holds the line on government expenditures while providing aid in those areas that need it most. In short, it lends direction to Canada at a time when it is crucial that this country should realize where it is going and the best way to get there. This budget calls to mind something which was said over a hundred years ago by Thomas D'Arcy McGee. He said:

> The government must lead as well as save; it must march as well as fortify; it must originate plans for the future, as well as correct the errors of the past.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that quotation describes as well as any what this budget does for Canada.

It is important to realize that it is virtually impossible to separate energy policies from fiscal policies when constructing a budget. Perhaps this is the case in Canada more than in any other western country. Economics and energy are the meat and potatoes issues of the 1980s. By dealing with both at the same time the government is prescribing a complete comprehensive remedy for the country's current malaise. During the previous election we campaigned on these fiscal reforms and we were elected to this House as a majority. To fail to present this type of budget would be to shirk our responsibilities to ourselves and, most important, to the people of Canada.

As I said earlier, the government's expenditures program will be aimed at helping those who need help most. They are the senior citizens of Canada. To this end we have already raised the guaranteed income supplement by some $35 per household. That is what we promised in the last campaign. That is what we delivered in the first session of this Parliament.

Another group which desperately needs help is the small businessman. In the past we have been dedicated to helping the small businessman in various ways, one example of this being the ceiling raised on the small loans legislation from $75,000 to $100,000. In this budget the small business development bonds program has been extended. This will help reduce the costs of small business corporations. In all sectors of the industry I cannot think of any that is more important, more fundamental or more vital to Canada than the small business sector. It is the backbone of our economy, the birthplace of innovation and the focal point of industrial ingenuity. We, as Liberals, are aware of the important function the small business entrepreneur plays in Canadian society. We are committed to providing a healthy environment in which small business can grow and flourish.

In the field of economic development we have allocated some $350 million, a 22 per cent increase, to aid research and development and to supplement industrial restructuring. Also, a program designed to increase Canada's pool of domestic skilled tradesmen will be implemented. I might add that these training programs could have been avoided had the provinces recognized Canada's needs for a skilled labour force instead of encouraging all of their young people to attend university.

With respect to research and development I am happy we are allocating some funds to deal specifically with that issue. It is very interesting to note that Canada leads her economic summit partners in terms of government sponsored R and D expenditures as a percentage of gross national product. However, she lags behind in industry-sponsored research and development. In my view, this should be changed. Canada needs more research and development, whether it be government or privately sponsored. This helps Canada maintain her international competitive edge in terms of manufacturing. However, we must not allow ourselves to become complacent about our commitment to research and development. Germany and Japan have become considerably more successful in their conquest of world markets. Our high technology, communications and nuclear industries must continue to strive for excellence if we are to maintain our already prestigious international reputation. I look forward to the increased co-operation between government and industry to achieve this goal in the future.

We, in Canada, cannot forget the fact that we are, in many ways, one of the most fortunate peoples on the globe. We are not starving, as they are in southeast Asia. We are not living in the shadow of communism, as are the peoples of Afghanistan and Sweden. Nor are we subjected to the tyranny of a dictatorial regime, as are people in other parts of the world. It is important that we do not forget our international duties in terms of aid to countries which are less fortunate than we. Accordingly, this government is committed to increase our foreign aid to .5 per cent of our GNP by the end of fiscal 1984.

In the field of national defence, we will be increasing our expenditures by 3 per cent in real terms and this will apply directly to our NATO commitments. I heartily embrace this policy. I, for one, do not believe in starting a war with anyone. Neither am I of the opinion that we in the free world should let our defences crumble and decay at a time when Soviet aggression has never been so flagrant. Our western defence capabilities must not become suspect.

Through these programs, Mr. Speaker, we have shown Canada a path to economic recovery; a path that balances fiscal restraint with industrial incentives which will, if combined with our energy program, guarantee a stronger Canada in the future.

The new energy policy will, when fully implemented, ensure that, indeed, Canada will no longer have to depend on a foreign cartel for our oil. Allow me to quote from the national energy program highlights:

> Three basic objectives guide our decisions:
> (1) Security of supply and ultimate energy independence;
> (2) Opportunity for Canadians to participate in energy industries, especially oil and gas;
> (3) Fairness in pricing and the sharing of revenues among governments and industry.

This is just what we told the Canadian people we would do. Through such existing government agencies as PetroCan, and other new ones, we will be able to provide Canada and Canadians with both economic stimulus and petroleum products that have a made-in-Canada price. This is a bold, courageous new program and one that most suits Canadian requirements. It is the type of program that promises to leave Canada in a good position to become self-sufficient in oil in the foreseeable future.

This debate is designed to present, in a logical manner, the goals of our national energy program. In doing so, it is hoped we will alleviate the reluctance of the western provinces to go along with our proposals. Basically, we believe that Canadians should be treated fairly and equally across the land and that it is the federal government's responsibility to make sure that this happens. Until 1973 there was no problem in maintaining this equality and fairness. When there was a world surplus of oil between 1957 and 1970, the federal government pursued policies that required industry to increase their use of domestic, higher cost crude oil even though cheaper imported oil was readily available. For this and other reasons, the pipeline from the west to Ontario was built.

In 1973 when the price of imported oil skyrocketed, the federal government concluded a new oil pricing agreement witht he producing provinces and undertook to compensate non-producing provinces for more expensive imported oil. During this time, the producing provinces amassed huge revenues as the Canadian government went deeper and deeper into debt through equalization payments. At the same time the foreign multinationals also increased their revenues. The old formula of revenue sharing, which saw the provinces and oil companies each take 45 per cent of the revenues, left the federal government with a meager 10 per cent to support the non-producing provinces.

At present the system is nearing complete breakdown. Without wanting to intrude on provincial revenues, the federal government must find new sources of revenues if the equalization system is to continue. This brings us to the present. The multinationals control a disproportionate amount of the revenues. Through the sale of Canadian petroleum products and through various tax shelters, they are shipping $4 of every $5 out of the country at Canada's expense. The profits that they are reaping are truly incredible. For example, the six largest oil companies in Canada, all foreign controlled, represent 71.7 per cent of the Canadian petroleum industry. Internal cash flow for these companies rose 43.6 per cent in 1979. After tax profits were up 53.8 per cent from the previous year.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mind a pig, but I hate a hog. We must stop this flow of capital out of the country and start back on the road to recovery. Through PetroCan and other government agencies we can commence an orderly Canadianization program for the petroleum industry. Such a program is not unknown in the world today. In Norway, Statoil controls from 50 per cent to 70 per cent of that country's petroleum industry and in Australia at least 25 per cent of the industry is domestically owned. The list continues.

It is important to keep in mind the fact that by Canadianizing the industry, the provinces have little to lose. We propose a new split of 43 per cent to the producing provinces, 33 per cent to industry, and 24 per cent to the federal government. On top of this the producing provinces will receive many economic benefits to help diversify their economies and prepare for the future when oil and natural gas reserves are depleted.

The western development fund is a program aimed at achieving this goal. Four billion dollars, of which $2 billion will be allocated between now and 1983, will be set aside to fund projects selected jointly by the federal government and the governments of the producing provinces. Another commitment made by the federal government is the creation of a natural gas bank. This will provide smaller, Canadian-owned companies, with an early market for their natural gas. As well, it will help generate their cash flow in order that they may continue exploration and development. Coupled with this is the promotion of a conversion program to help Canada move off oil to natural gas.

In order to provide the producing provinces with new markets for their natural gas while stimulating Canada's economy at the same time, a network of pipeline construction will be initiated by the federal government. Most notable of these is the Q & M pipeline which will ultimately bring western natural gas to the maritime provinces. I would suggest that if eastern reserves are proven, as they are, this pipeline be designed to bring eastern oil westward.

In putting together this comprehensive energy package, it becomes glaringly evident that the producing provinces, indeed all of Canada, will benefit considerably. The producing provinces stand to gain $38 billion, with Alberta receiving $31 billion. The petroleum industry will collect $30 billion and the federal government will collect $24 billion. Canadians will no longer be subjected to OPEC price shocks and we will be able to plot a course towards oil independence.

Through the expansion of PetroCan we will progress from a country dominated by foreign multinationals to a nation that is both self-reliant in energy and self-assured in the future. The Canadian energy industry will be more responsive to Canadian realities and requirements. The decision to implement this bold, new energy fiscal policy is the culmination of many months of careful planning and analysis. If successful, it will provide Canadians with substantially less-than-world energy prices and lend a tremendous edge to our other industries. Once implemented, it will then be up to Canadians to grasp the ball and run with it; without the co-operation from every citizen in the land, Canada runs the risk of squandering this unique opportunity to fashion her own destiny. This would be most unfortunate.

We are entering a new era, a time when opportunities such as this rarely present themselves. I urge all Canadians whether they be from the west, the east or the centre of Canada, to put down their regional barriers and come together under this plan for the future. Together we are stronger; united we cannot be subjugated by external economic forces. Let us embrace each other as brothers in this blessed country called Canada and become that for which our forefathers toiled so hard; one nation, rich in our diversity, but ever cognizant of the mutual goals that bind us.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

PENSIONS REVIEW BOARD—INQUIRY RESPECTING INCREASE IN STAFF

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, on October 17 of this year I requested that the acting Minister of Veterans Affairs bring the Pensions Review Board up to strength. I am happy to say that the minister took immediate action after I raised the matter in the House. I hope he will take such swift action in regard to the Bureau of Pensions Advocates which is also understaffed.

In a letter to the chief executive officer of The War Amputations of Canada regarding the Pensions Review Board the minister stated, in part, as follows:

—the board is now at full strength. With extensive training for the next two months, Mr. Jutras expects to have all members fully operative. By late fall the board should be in a position to do better than meet the current demand.

I should like to quote from the Veterans Affairs Annual Report 1978-79. Under the heading "Years Activities" there appears the following:

During the fiscal year the board received 1,374 appeal applications (including 24 applications to vary previous decisions), compared with 1,286 the previous year. It heard a total of 1,076 cases, including two interpretation hearings. The total for the previous year was 874. It rendered 1,071 decisions (in 1978, 878). Approximately 86 per cent of its decisions confirmed the decisions of the commission, about the same percentage as in the previous year. The decisions dealt with a total of 2,115 disabilities—

This means, Mr. Speaker, that the board is approximately 27 per cent behind in its work of reviewing applications. That being the case, the two additional board members will certainly help the situation. As it takes about two years to train a board member, I should like to suggest to the minister that the Pension Act be amended to permit the appointment of two additional temporary board members for a period of years until the time taken to process appeals is back to normal. These two members would be in addition to the seven provided for in the act.

The Canadian Legion, army, navy and air force veterans, and The War Amputations of Canada are deeply concerned about the delays in processing claims. In a recent letter to the late minister of veterans affairs, The War Amputations of Canada pointed out that a large number of war amputees died before their pension appeals could be reviewed. Over the past eight years 370 applicants died before their applications could be processed.

There were also delays in Ontario in the processing of claims for increased pension benefits. District DVA offices throughout Ontario are encountering problems in securing departmental files from the regional office in Toronto. The Royal Canadian Legion has discussed this matter with the deputy minister. For months, assurances have been given that everyone is trying to correct the staffing problem which is seemingly the root of the situation at the regional office in Toronto. I hope the minister will take steps to see that appropriate action is taken. I am presently working on a case where the veteran has been waiting seven months for a review of his claim.

I hope the minister has good news for us tonight regarding these very lengthy delays in the processing of veterans claims, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member from Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) for the opportunity to clarify the staff situation at the Pensions Review Board.

As hon. members may know, the board was established under the 1971 amendments to the Pension Act. It is exclusively an independent appeal tribunal reporting directly to Parliament through the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The Pensions Review Board has authority to determine any question of law or fact as to whether a person is entitled to an award under the act, and the amount of any such award, and the decision of the board is final and binding for all purposes of the act.

In a letter dated October 17, 1980, I informed the chief executive officer of The War Amputations of Canada that the Pensions Review Board is now at full strength. With extensive training for the next few months, the chairman of the Pensions Review Board expects to have all members fully operative. By late fall the board should be in a position to meet the current demand of cases. Hon. members may recall that in 1977 the Pension Act was amended to provide an additional two members to the board. The board presently hears five to seven cases per day and this number is expected to rise slightly when all members are fully trained and operative. I can assure all members that the board will work as quickly as possible, keeping in mind the necessity to ensure each veteran appealing a claim the best service possible.

● (2205)

The Bureau of Pensions Advocates provides a free legal aid service to persons seeking to establish claims under the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pension and Allowances Acts. Presently the bureau is operating at full strength with the possibility of one vacancy occurring in one of the bureau's field offices early next year. With the known and anticipated claims for pensions from veterans and widows, the chief pensions advocate is confident that the work load will be handled with the same degree of care as the bureau has consistently demonstrated over the years. If delays are still experienced in spite of what I just mentioned, we will take steps to correct the situation as soon as we can.

AIR TRANSPORT—DECISION ON TORONTO-HALIFAX ROUTE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on June 27, 1980, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to conduct an inquiry into regional air policy. My reason for requesting a review by the minister was that the cabinet had just that day announced a decision whereby it had overruled a decision of the Canadian Transport Commission in respect of the right of CP Air to fly between Halifax and Toronto. The result of the cabinet decision permitted Eastern Provincial Airways to fly direct on the Halifax-Toronto route.

While I agree with the substance of that decision, I was concerned, as were others, that the whole difficulty arose from confusion about regional air policy. It is very important that such an inquiry be made and that the minister review all aspects of the regional air policy.

The minister indicated in the House on June 27, 1980, that he did not propose to make a specific and formal investigation. He subsequently indicated he was asking government departments involved, the air carriers and others involved in the air industry, to express their views on regional air policy. I would like to take a few moments to outline some of the concerns that must be related to a new regional air transport policy.

The importance of the regional air transport industry to Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada should not be underestimated. Let us start with the Halifax international airport which today has 75 daily commercial flights. It handles on an annual basis about 1.5 million passengers. It is equal in that respect to Mirabel, but I hope it is not the same in other respects. There are 1,700 employees who work at the Halifax international airport and the work force is building on a daily basis as new inquiries come in.

A recent report by the task force on airport management recommended more local autonomy for airports. This is a big factor in the future expansion of our airport business across Canada, that there be more local autonomy—not that the federal Department of Transport be allowed to escape its responsibilities in the air transport field. In Halifax we have a great port which is promoted by locals. It involves trade sojourns across the world to attract business. We could use this kind of activity in relation to our airport.

I want to take a moment to commend Eastern Provincial Airways on the work they are doing and the contribution they are making to the local economy, employing over 900 employees in Atlantic Canada and spending $10 million in the Halifax area alone. One of their ambitions is to be involved in the takeover of Nordair which is now controlled by Air Canada and which has a $30 million price tag on it. Others in the bidding include Quebec and Ontario interests.

The Minister of Transport said there must be a balance of interest. I hope he will see his way clear in the future to give complete consideration to the bid made by Eastern Provincial Airways because this could be a big contribution to the air transport business in Atlantic Canada and put it on a firm base.

CP Air has now decided to take up the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission and exercise its right to land in Halifax. We welcome CP Air to the east coast. We hope it will make a real contribution. They should be reminded that what we require is employment and local-based activity, not just simply flights from Toronto and Montreal with landings in Halifax. I know they will take this into consideration. I hope they will be able to expand into the international markets. In that connection also we welcome British Airways to Halifax and Halifax International Airport. It was announced in September, 1980, that British Airways had been granted landing rights in Halifax and we hope that this will expand international trade.

Of great importance to our air transport economy in Atlantic Canada is Air Canada. We are proud of the contribution made by Air Canada and its local employees in Halifax West. We are proud that the dedicated staff at the airport provide such good service. We welcome the recent addition to the airport facility and staff of over 180 flight attendants. We hope that within the near future Air Canada will see fit to locate pilots and other flight crew members in the Halifax area.

However, something is happening nationally to Air Canada which is of great concern to all of us. International, Air Canada is slipping in rank. It is ranked fourteenth by North American passengers. Many complain that Air Canada's service is deteriorating. Evidence before the Dubin inquiry indicated that air safety is sometimes compromised and many of us are concerned as to how Air Canada is being operated. There are those who even suggest that language qualifications take precedence over skills in some areas. I fear that Air Canada's request for greater revenue and a reduction of expenses is at the root of these complaints. I warn Air Canada that if it compromises passenger safety by cost-cutting measures, Canadians will rise up and complain as a group, and action will have to be taken.

We want Air Canada to play a role in the regional air transport service. We want Air Canada to be successful as a national and an international carrier. However, it will have to clean up its act, give better service and contribute more in the future.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question in the House on June 27 appeared to indicate that he was not dissatisfied with the minister's announcement that EPA would be granted the Halifax-Toronto route. He confirmed that this evening.

In announcing the decision, the minister stressed the need to improve EPA's economic potential by allowing it to broaden its route structure. He also noted that CP Air would have access to Halifax from any point on its transcontinental licence, except Toronto. Those features would benefit Atlantic Canada by providing better access and promoting tourist traffic in the region.

As the hon. member knows the decision was well received in the east. Furthermore, as he indicated this evening, after an initial hesitation, CP Air has decided to take advantage of the opportunity and recently announced a Montreal-Halifax service to begin in March 1981.

In his question, the hon. member mentioned the current review of regional air carrier policy. The review was undertaken as a result of fundamental changes in the structure of the domestic air carrier industry, for instance, the merger of PWA and Transair, the extension of Nordair services to Winnipeg and the potential effects of the resale of Nordair to the private sector, just to mention a few. Such a review can be a lengthy process. The decision on the Halifax-Toronto route obviously could not be put off indefinitely. It is the minister's hope that the review can be completed in the coming months so that uncertainties of this kind can be minimized in the future.

I will relay to the minister the concerns which the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) has expressed this evening. I can assure him that it is the policy of the Ministry of Transport and of Air Canada never to reduce concern for the safety of passengers for economic reasons.

PRIVACY—OPENING OF MAIL BY RCMP

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to follow up a question I asked in this House on April 28 last of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) with respect to the question of mail opening by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In doing so I referred to yet an earlier question, at which time the Solicitor General indicated that there would be a report forthcoming with respect to certain evidence as to the advisability of permitting the RCMP to engage in the opening of the mail of Canadians.

I might say that, unfortunately, I believe, we witnessed undue haste on the part of the Solicitor General in stating that in his view the RCMP did need this particular power. It was within a few days of being sworn in as Solicitor General that the present Solicitor General stated he was convinced that the mail of Canadians should be subject to opening by the RCMP, a practice which, as we have seen through evidence at the McDonald commission, has been taking place on an illegal scale for some considerable length of time. The Solicitor General said he believed that on the basis of his conversations, limited as they were, with the commissioner of the RCMP and others this power was warranted.

At that time, I and others asked what evidence there was to warrant the granting of permission for this invasion of the fundamental privacy of Canadians? We were told at that point that a report would be forthcoming. We were told that the RCMP had been requested to provide a full and comprehensive report to the Solicitor General outlining the grounds for their request that the RCMP have the right to open the first-class private mail of Canadians. I should also point out that when the representatives of the RCMP were asked before the McDonald commission why they felt it was necessary to break the law of the land and intercept the first-class mail of Canadians, and when they were asked to produce evidence as to why they broke the law in that respect, members of the security service came up with nothing.

They came up with an excuse which, as it later turned out, was totally spurious. They were able to give but a single example of the use of mail opening to detect and prevent a possible crime. That example was the detection of possible terrorist activity on the part of a certain "Japanese Red Army" member in Canada. It was with great pride that this example was flourished before the McDonald commission by an RCMP member. There was rather subdued silence, though, when it was learned that mail opening had had nothing whatsoever to do with the apprehending of that particular potential criminal and that it was because of wire tap evidence that that possible crime was uncovered. So before the McDonald Commission not a scintilla of evidence was produced to justify the request of the RCMP for legal mail opening powers or to justify actions they have been pursuing for some considerable time in this country on a illegal basis.

We suggested to the Solicitor General that since no evidence was presented before the McDonald commission, he must surely have some grounds to warrant his enthusiasm for this sweeping power to be granted to the RCMP. The Solicitor General said he expected a report to reach him soon. We finally asked him where that report was. Lo and behold, a report had been submitted to the Solicitor General, but he did not like what he saw. In fact, what he saw was so inconsequential and so weak that he had to send it back to the RCMP saying, "This is not good enough; I cannot in all conscience bring this to the Parliament of Canada as a justification for asking for mail opening powers". He sent it back to the RCMP and assured Parliament that there would be another report forthcoming in the very near future. That was in April of this year. Since that time what have we heard to justify the zealous request for mail opening powers by the RCMP? Silence. Where is this much-heralded report of the RCMP which would justify the powers for which the Solicitor General has asked? It is nowhere.

We were told that this fundamental invasion of the privacy of Canadians would have to await a report. We were also told—and this is very important—that no legislative action would be taken on mail opening until such time as the McDonald commission has reported on this and certain other investigative techniques.

One would have hoped that the government would have stuck to that commitment. But no. In fact, before any report from the RCMP or from the McDonald commission, we see an attempt to legitimize through the back door mail opening in certain circumstances. I refer to an amendment to the Post Office Act which would change the absolute prohibition, which exists at present on mail opening in this country, of first-class mail in the first case. At present it is quite clear that first-class mail cannot be opened under any circumstances in this country and it is an indictable offence if it is done. In the bill put forward by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), we see that that fundamental principle has been altered and there is now a section there which would permit mail to be opened when there is a lawful excuse, whatever that means. Even if that section is violated, no longer is it an indictable offence but only a summary conviction offence.

The commitment we were given by the Solicitor General not to take any action on this until, first, there was a report from the RCMP and, second, there was a report from the McDonald commission, has indeed been violated, and I call upon the Solicitor General to urge his colleague, the Postmaster General, to withdraw that section, at least until such time as the evidence upon which it is based is forthcoming.

I should like to conclude by urging that before action is taken to justify this violation of the rights of privacy of Canadians—one of the most fundamental and precious rights in terms of first-class mail—much more evidence be provided.

I would note, of course, that the Conservative party has been quick to sanction this violation of privacy. The Conservative party supported the concept of mail opening by the RCMP in 1979 by voting in favour of Bill C-26. Finally, I would note that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) appears to have had a welcome conversion from his earlier support of that bill.

I thank the House for listening and I hope that before any action is taken on this matter far more evidence will be proposed and put before Parliament than has been the case so far.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): As my good friend knows, Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in answer to the hon. member's questioning, set out the criteria. He said:

I am sure the hon. member would not want the government to take action and prosecute somebody on partial evidence. We have always said that we would not comment on the evidence as it came out in a piecemeal fashion; that we were waiting for the whole report. That remains our position.

The hon. member had asked if prosecutions were laid. He asked:

What action does the government intend to take to prosecute those persons who have been shown clearly to have violated the Post Office Act.

We spent over $11 million on the McDonald report. I know it is quite fashionable these days to pick out excerpts from the report and bring them before the House, but I do not consider that responsible. I respectfully submit that we should wait, especially in view of the fact that our police force wants to protect us, until all evidence is in to ascertain what should be done. From month to month we hear excerpts from the McDonald commission and from month to month we provide the same answer: Let us wait until we have the report. The Solicitor General has stated that he hopes the report will be in by early 1981, but we have been told that this might not be possible. At present, the Post Office legislation prohibits the opening of mail by anyone except in the presence of the addressee or for limited purposes. Evidence was produced at the McDonald commission hearings that this was being done illegally by members of the RCMP in spite of that legislation, and that was one of the major considerations for the establishment of the McDonald commission,

The Solicitor General has indicated to the commission, and they have agreed, that even if they are opposed to legislation which provides for mail opening, they should still make recommendations suggesting safeguards if Parliament should provide the necessary legislation. When we have received those recommendations, it is Parliament which will decide within which framework opening of mail will be or will not be permitted, and, if it is permitted, under what conditions.

It is a fine balance. If crimes are being committed through the mail, I suggest to the hon. member that it is incumbent upon the RCMP to look at what is being done. For instance, heroin with a street value of $80,000 can be sent in an ordinary letter. I am not suggesting $80,000 worth of heroin is being sent, but I am suggesting that history has shown the mails are being used fraudulently and we can reasonably assume that the mails will be used fraudulently again. It is not only expected, it is incumbent upon the RCMP to find the balance between the privacy of an individual and the safeguard of the country. When the McDonald commission brings in its report, Parliament will decide. We can take apart the evidence as it comes in from the McDonald commission month by month, or I suggest we can do the responsible thing and wait until we get the report of the commission and then decide.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

PENSIONS

BENEFITS TO WIDOWS AND CHILDREN OF VETERANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the authority of Standing Order 43. Whereas more than 10,000 widows of deceased veterans and some 9,000 of their children were promised pension benefits over the next six years under Bill C-40, whereas many of these widows are left below the poverty line and may not survive until 1986 or 1987 and since the care of veterans and their widows and children is a national obligation and not just another piece of social legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That this House request the government to find the money this year to pay these widows and children their proper pension benefits.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY TAX CREDIT

REQUEST THAT CONSERVATIVE BUDGET PROPOSAL BE IMPLEMENTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of circumstances which menace and undermine the comfort and financial security of millions of Canadians living on low and fixed incomes, in view of the fact that since this government assumed office there have been six gas and home heating oil price increases, and that the government's action has added 20 cents per gallon at my home gas pump, not 18 cents, since December last, and because there is the threat of another 70 cents increase coming up, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the government act immediately to implement those provisions of the Crosbie budget which would bring energy tax credits—immediate softening tax relief—of $80 per adult and $30 per child which would have the effect of negating gas hikes for a family of four earning $21,380 or less annually and driving 20,000 miles per year, and also remove the tax on home heating oil which so adversely affects the 20 per cent of Canadians who can least afford it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INQUIRY RESPECTING RELEASE FROM U.S.S.R. OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order to move a motion on an urgent matter.

In view of the fact that the U.S.S.R. is committed to enforce the Helsinki agreements and taking into account the discrimination Mr. Anatoly Shcharansky is subjected to by that country and the fact that he cannot emigrate in spite of promises made by the Soviet government for more than six years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the House ask the government to appeal to the signatories to the Helsinki agreements at their next meeting in Madrid, so that Mr. Shcharansky may be allowed to join his wife.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CALL FOR REJECTION OF INCREASED PREMIUMS FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, in light of the devastating social impact of the budget and the increasing social unrest about high inflation and unemployment, including escalating child abuse, in light of the fact that this heartless budget provides no relief for those on fixed incomes, women aged 60 to 65 and single parent families and that women who earn only 58 per cent of men's wages are further discriminated against, and in light of the fact that increased unemployment insurance contributions constitute a large part of the more than $500 cost per family, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That this House reject the imposition of increased UIC premiums for women and those on fixed incomes until the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the minister responsible for the status of women, has tabled the promised UIC review.

EXCISE TAX ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENTS TO EXEMPT HEALTH UNITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, whereas hospitals, orphanages, old age homes and health units in most provinces receive a blanket tax exemption under the Excise Tax Act, whereas 29 health units in Alberta are still required to pay sales tax on equipment and supplies essential to their services and that this tax is passed on to low-income families who use health units the most, and recognizing that these units have the potential to reduce federal spending on health through early intervention, preventive measures, alternate home care and therapy programs which operate outside hospitals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That this House direct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to certify immediately the health units in Alberta and propose amendments to the Excise Tax Act so that health units in that province may become exempt from this discriminatory tax.

SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—OPPOSITION TO FLOODING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that governments and the public have only until December 17 of this year to comment to the International Joint Commission on the controversial proposal to flood the Skagit Valley in southern British Columbia, and since the B.C. government has asked the IJC to rescind the 1942 agreement to raise the Ross dam in Washington occasioning that flooding, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and hope I will get the unanimous consent of the House in this matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the increased cost, including taxes forecast in the budget, for both gas and oil, even for domestic heating, contrary to the exemption of domestic heating fuels forecast in the Crosbie budget, because of the additional burden that these charges will have on those on low and fixed incomes, and in light of the offer in the energy proposal issued at the time of the budget to assist in building a gas pipeline to Vancouver Island, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the government give serious consideration to transferring the offered assistance to the improvement of the transmission to Vancouver Island of additional hydroelectrically generated electrical power which, being still untaxed, would be a more economical heating source to which residents of the island could convert, to the greater benefit, furthermore, of those on low and fixed incomes.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EFFECT OF MEASURES ON ELDERLY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance who will know that the Canadian Council on Social Development has concluded that the major social impact of the minister's budget will be a "significant drop in the standard of living" of millions of disadvantaged Canadians. The council concluded that many elderly people, single pensioners and widows living in their own homes will be forced by this budget to move into high-cost public and private institutions. I assume the government took account of this effect of its budget.

I wonder if the minister has prepared and would table the government's estimates as to the number of elderly couples, single pensioners and widows who will be driven out of their homes by the budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have had a preliminary look at the analysis provided by the council to which the hon. member has referred. I find in a number of instances that its estimates are clearly overstated and its conclusions distorted.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance indicated that he found the estimates of the council distorted, which indicates that he has some estimates of his own. My question stands, and this House would like to know what the minister's own estimates are as to the number of low-income Canadians, pensioners, widows and others who will be forced out of their homes by the budget.

Let me ask him a question relating to the impact of energy costs. Last year the Liberal party criticized our energy tax credit for not going far enough; now they discontinue it altogether. Will the minister tell the House whether he intends any new help, anything that is not in the budget, to ease the burden of energy costs upon Canadians, particularly low and middle-income Canadians?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as I have mentioned in the House several times, earlier this year Parliament was asked to approve a very substantial increase in the guaranteed income supplement to support that particular group in our society which needed help most. That particular measure of assistance was $35 a month, which is considerably greater than the $80 a year provided by the former minister of finance who brought in a package of price increases which placed, on the average, a much higher burden on the consumers of Canada, including the groups which the right hon. gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister seems unable or unwilling to answer questions directly. I assume his answer indicates that the government does not plan any new help to low-income Canadians who are saddled with significant new energy costs.

Let me ask him a question about another conclusion of the Canadian Council on Social Development. The council concluded that for many low-income Canadians the budget "would be enough to tip the scale and make it more advantageous for those families to go on welfare". Why has the government decided to tax the working poor of Canada so heavily that many of them will find it advantageous to go on welfare?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, this is one of the conclusions made by the group referred to by my right hon. friend to which I take strong exception. I believe that when the budget is criticized on the grounds that it will lead to abused and neglected children, it robs considerable credibility from the source of that criticism.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY RESPECTING REDUCTIONS IN PROGRAMS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Social Development. The minister will know from reading yesterday's criticism by the Canadian Council on Social Development that the budget forecast with respect to inflation, unemployment and energy costs will place a heavy reliance on income support programs, social assistance and social service programs. In light of the criticism yesterday from the council that rather than having these programs diminished they ought to be increased, what justification can the minister offer this House, indeed the Canadian public, for reductions in the very social programs they are going to need to look after the social conditions outlined in the finance minister's budget?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the government is not considering any cutbacks in the social affairs envelope. At the beginning of the session we increased by more than $500 million our contribution to fixed income pensioners and we foresee meeting our obligations with regard to social programs in the year ahead.

[English]

Mr. Crombie: My supplementary question is addressed to the same minister. He will know that on page 33 of the budget statement the review of social programs requires that there be a reduction. I would like to ask the minister whether he can indicate to the House if there has been any consultation with either the provinces or municipalities upon whom now the cost of those social programs will fall?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, it is our intention, when the existing programs are being revised, to consult with the provinces. As you know, some of the agreements are signed for several years, but some will be up for renewal soon and before deciding our course of action as far as these programs are concerned we will consult with the provinces. Naturally, some of the programs which will expire will not be renewed, but the provinces will be informed in due course.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ENERGY POLICY SURVEYS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns a subject which I have raised with him in the House in the past, and this morning in committee, concerning the government's use of polls paid for by the people of Canada. Both in the past in the House and in the committee this morning the Prime Minister has indicated his willingness to have such information provided to the opposition and to the people of Canada. Regrettably, his ministers have not acted upon this principle.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister now if he will have the Minister of Justice table surveys on energy policy, which he said in the House on October 10 were to be used by the Liberal party in formulating its energy policy, as was revealed in the budget recently.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot understand how the Leader of the New Democratic Party can say that ministers have not abided by this policy when just a few weeks ago the Minister of Justice made public the results of some 130 polls. There were some eight or ten exceptions to this, I cannot remember, but obviously the minister has abided by the policy which I stated.

Mr. Broadbent: Obviously, Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister did not hear the question. One of the dozen results which he did not provide to the House was specifically on energy policy. He said at the time this energy survey was requested that in order to be able to develop energy policy it would be made public soon. Well, the people have known for a long time that the Liberal government governs according to public opinion polls and surveys, but the issue at stake here is whether or not the people of Canada should finance them.

Since the Prime Minister has said in the past, and repeated this morning, that policy polls which have partisan implications are wrong in principle but that, specifically, one like that referred to by the Minister of Justice, which he refused to give us, ought to be made available to the public, will he now ensure that that specific poll is produced for members of the House of Commons?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked that very question this morning and I dealt with it. I would ask him to refer to the statement I made this morning in his presence.

• (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, a final supplementary. The government has copped out on freedom of information. The Prime Minister said this morning that he would accept certain guidelines. Approximately one month ago, on behalf of my colleagues, I proposed specific guidelines, namely, that when a government department conducts a poll, the date of the poll be given, the House be informed when the results come in, and the results be made available to the opposition parties. Will the Prime Minister now accept these guidelines, instead of making big promises and using public funds for his own partisan purposes?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member talks of partisan purposes. We had this discussion this morning in a rather calm environment. Obviously, the hon. member is remaking his point, without taking into account my answers, for the purpose of getting on television.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Hit him with your purse, Ed.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR SUPPLEMENT TO ASSIST LOW-INCOME CANADIANS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Canadian Council on Social Development, of which hon. members opposite approved highly last year when they commented on the budget, has pointed out that the various tax increases in the budget will yield an additional $14.3 billion in federal government revenue in the next three years, and that not one penny of that increased $14 billion revenue will be used to shelter low-income Canadians from the impact of rising energy costs, the cost of living and so on.

Will the minister consider introducing a refundable, income-tested energy tax credit, similar to that proposed by my party, which would benefit the lower income people of Canada? Seventy per cent of the benefits of such a tax credit would go to those families earning less than $20,000 a year and would average $220 for every family of four in this country to help them meet these increased costs. Will he consider introducing—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Crosbie: The NDP does not like to hear this because they defeated it; they stopped it from being implemented.

Mr. Corbett: Take a bow, boys.

Mr. Crosbie: They cut the throats of low-income Canadians.

Mr. Broadbent: Go on back to the seventeenth century, John.

Mr. Crosbie: Would the minister now bring in a supplement to his budget which will benefit lower-income Canadians to the tune of $500 million this year and $1 billion next year? Will he consider such a proposal, or does he even realize the enormity of what he has done?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do realize the enormity of what I have done—

Mr. Nielsen: Hideous, isn't it?

Mr. MacEachen: —in providing very strong support through the social development expenditures of the Government of Canada. Over the next several years expenditures on social development and social support by the government will increase to $33 billion. Each year will record a very substantial increase, in large part attributable to our policy of indexing benefits to all recipients in Canada. In 1973-74 the expenditures on these particular programs amounted to $11 billion. Just three years down the road the expenditures will amount to $33 billion, a 300 per cent increase. That is the enormity of what has been done in this budget.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the minister's malarkey will not put another cent into a household suffering from these higher costs in Canada. Would the minister introduce a program similar to the mortgage interest and property tax credit which would help 4,425,000 household in Canada? These 4,425,000 families would receive excess of $250 per year assistance beginning next year, and $2,015 million in the fiscal year 1982-83 with a tax credit, a total of $3 billion over two years if this program were introduced. Would the minister introduce this program, because householders are suffering from increased costs for heating oil, interest rates—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: —which is up another half a per cent—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: —as a result of the budget.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: Will the minister show that he has a heart?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I will not do as the hon. member has suggested, and I will tell him why.

Mr. Siddon: Because you're Scrooge.

Mr. MacEachen: The budget which was brought down contains price increases or pricing schedules for oil and gas. The burden on the Canadian consumer up to 1984 is $40 billion less than the budget of the hon. member. Yet he has the nerve to get up in this House and suggest that we revert to that misguided policy that was so completely rejected by the Canadian people.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NATIONAL GAS EXPORT TAX ON PRODUCING RESERVES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Because the budget adversely affects producing Indian bands, does the minister not feel that he is breaking faith with those bands by allowing the Minister of Finance to collect the export tax regardless whether his legal opinion is in the affirmative?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, I do not, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Schellenberger: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. If he would just lean over and speak to the hon. "Chief White Owl", his seatmate and chief of a producing band, he might get some information on that.

Because Indian bands have made some long-term commitments and planned for this revenue, will the minister make representations to the Minister of Finance against collecting that tax or will he at least make a commitment to the Indian bands that this revenue will be returned, because they drastically need it?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I have talked to many Indian leaders concerning this matter and they are examining the implications of the budget themselves. They wish to meet with me in order to reveal their findings, and I have said I will indicate my position to them. They have not yet reached their conclusions so obviously the hon. member is way ahead of them.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCE AND DISABILITY PENSIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. The minister must be aware of the fact that recipients of war veterans' allowance have been particularly hard hit by the cruel and devastating budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, in contrast to measures proposed by this party which would have protected these veterans. Will the minister recommend to cabinet that the war veterans' allowance and disability pensions be increased, in view of the fact that any benefit from the veterans affairs bill passed in July has now been wiped out?

An hon. Member: That is wrong.

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, first of all, I take exception to the preamble of the question which suggests that our government has acted unreasonably with regard to veterans. This morning I met with the management committee of the Department of Veterans Affairs and we discussed this very question. Furthermore, we will soon be announcing a new program to help veterans. I also want to add that pensions were increased last year and that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance provides the means necessary to help war veterans.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Never mind defending the Simon Legree finance minister. I should like to ask the acting minister if the government will incorporate in the Pension Act on a permanent basis a formula to keep the basic rate of disability pension adjusted to increases in the pay scales of the five selected categories of public service workers in order to offset the harmful effects of this harsh budget?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, this same question or a similar one was just asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would refer this question to the management committee of veterans affairs and it will be discussed accordingly.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CHEMICAL TESTING—AVAILABILITY OF STUDIES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It refers to the material that I sent to her office earlier today which came from the United States environmental protection agency.

In view of the recent information revealing that 99 per cent of the chronic—that is, long term—studies done by Industrial Biotest Laboratories have been found to be flawed, and considering the minister's stated objective of providing all information on possible hazards to human health, will she now make public all information regarding the flawed testing done by IBT which causes concern about the long term safety hazards of the chemicals tested? Second, would the minister inform the House what alternative sources are available to determine the safety of these chemicals; that is, are there any back-up studies to support the continued registration of these chemicals, pesticides and herbicides?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member will accept the first part of my answer. While in a meeting this morning, I received the 200-page document from him, which I have not had time to review.

To answer the second part of his question, however, I assume that its thrust is about open government or releasing or not releasing information. In answer to that question I want to assure the House that we have been and are releasing information from the United States or from our own sources as soon as it becomes available to us. I have done this publicly and I will continue to do it au fur et à mesure, according to the pace of the release to me. I also continue to have close contacts with my provincial counterparts.

Mr. de Jong: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I welcome the minister's remarks and I hope that officials in her department will read and understand the directives that she will be giving them.

My supplementary question concerns the number of chemicals. What we have had in the past is, if anything, misinformation. The department has stated that there were 97 chemicals involved, later the number was given as 100 and later still it was given as 112. Now we have received this information from the U.S. environmental protection agency that there are over 202 chemicals involved. When will the department come clean and give the public the information they have a right to?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, for a few minutes I have been searching for the name that identifies the role in which the hon. member has cast himself. It has to do with being more pure than everybody else and more knowledgeable than everybody else. That has been his role ever since his election to this House.

I repeat, all the information available has been made public. There is no intention of hiding things in the way that he suggests, as far as I know. I have very responsible officials working to protect the public, and that is the ultimate objective of the department.

ENERGY

CONVERSION FROM OIL—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF SUBSIDIES

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and is meant to clarify a point concerning the program providing subsidies to those who convert their oil heating systems to gas or electricity. As that program will of course help the needy, and especially widows and veterans which our friends of the opposition mentioned, can the minister tell the House whether the eligibility to that financial assistance program applies as of the night of the budget or is it retroactive to some date prior to the tabling of the budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out that this extremely important program providing subsidies of up to $800 per family to allow the conversion of oil heating systems to gas, electricity, or even wood, went into effect when the budget was brought down, that is, on October 28 last. Eligible for those subsidies will be all those who convert their systems from October 28 on or those who, having started the conversions before October 28, received the final inspection certificate only after that date for the work performed immediately before that date. The people who are converting their systems right now, or who started the conversion immediately prior to October 28 but were not given their final inspection report before then, are therefore asked to keep their receipts in order to be able to present their claims to the government later on.

INQUIRY RESPECTING STEPS TO OFFSET INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Canadian Council on Social Development in its report yesterday, which I presume the minister has read, estimated that those who live at home and depend upon old age security and the guaranteed income supplement will see their living costs rise by $200 this year, which is about half the increase in the GIS that the government gave earlier this year.

Given the fact that people in this category have already fallen 22 per cent below the poverty line estimated by Statistics Canada, which is significant, what steps does the government propose to take to offset this very serious and drastic increase in the cost of living for those who have no protection other than the compassion of the minister?

● (1440)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, upon receipt I read the document prepared by the Canadian Council on Social Development and I was very worried by the contents. The press releases and work of the CCSD have always been of help. Maybe the purpose of this document was to be a voice for the poor, but surely that is not the fact because I observed many important errors, and this is one of them. Of course, the cost of living will affect pensioners, especially those living on GIS. But the universal pension as well as the GIS supplementary pension are indexed fully to the cost of living every three months and these people will be protected fully against these increases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the minister knows that what she is saying is not in fact true; it is not in accordance with the facts. Notwithstanding indexing to the the consumer price index, old age pensioners and people on GIS, or those who depend on GIS, have been falling further and further behind in terms of the poverty level in Canada. That is a fact and the facts speak for themselves. Now these people will fall still further behind because of the budget of the Minister of Finance; they are going to have to pay an extra $200 in heating costs, not to mention additional food costs.

My question to the minister is this: What steps does she propose to take—unless she wants to dispute the facts, which I have laid out for her and which have been laid out by the Canadian Council on Social Development—to offset the very drastic consequences on old age pensioners and people on fixed incomes of the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance? Or does she subscribe to the view of the Minister of Finance that this document put out by the Canadian Council on Social Development is without any credibility?

Miss Bégin: I will choose to discuss the facts, Madam Speaker. The facts just presented by my hon. colleague are completely wrong and misleading to the public if put that way. I hope that I am very clear in the spirit in which I use the word "misleading" and that another point of privilege will not be raised after question period. Unless we discuss the budget on facts and figures, we cannot draw these conclusions because people will panic when they watch their TV at home tonight.

What my hon. colleague says is wrong and not true. Pensioners in this country are better off than ever before and we are winning the fight against poverty for that particular group.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Twenty per cent of Canadians were living in poverty. That figure has now dropped to 12 per cent. However, the figure is still too high but poverty is on the decline in this country under this government and it will continue to do so. There is only one item of expenditure missing to take the pensioners out of poverty. All others have been brought above the poverty line by the government.

ENERGY

CONVERSION FROM OIL—EXCLUSION FROM PROGRAM OF NEW BRUNSWICK HOME OWNERS

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister tell the House why the budget discriminates against New Brunswick home owners by denying them the right to participate in the $800 grant program to assist in switching from oil to electricity as an alternate fuel for home heating? Is the minister not aware that 70 per cent of New Brunswick's electric energy is now generated from hydro and coal plants and that in addition a nuclear fired plant is scheduled to come on line within a year? Could the minister not answer the question?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker, I will answer it with great pleasure.

An hon. Member: The fellow who wrote the budget is answering.

Mr. Lalonde: As the national energy program has indicated, and as the—

Mr. Clark: Who speaks for Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: I hope the Leader of the Opposition will calm himself so we can proceed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Poor Marc!

Mr. Clark: Poor old Marc!

Mr. Lalonde: The national energy program provides grants for conversion from fuel oil heating to other forms of heating. We have announced that we are going to proceed with the gas pipeline to the maritimes. We have also indicated that the conversion grants for electricity will be delayed until arrangements have been made to ensure we are not using fuel oil in the maritimes to produce electricity, because that would encourage double wasting of scarce oil. In that sense the government's decision is the right one. We have indicated that as soon as the conversion from oil to produce electricity takes place, we will proceed with the grants.

At the present time we are having discussions with the government of New Brunswick. The situation will be examined province by province. As soon as there is enough indication that conversions are taking place, we will consider conversion to electricity also. Obviously, gas and wood are still the best buy for citizens of New Brunswick in terms of the conservation of energy.

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, the minister is obviously not aware that in New Brunswick already 70 per cent of the electrical plants are fired other than by oil.

ALLEVIATION OF IMPACT OF RISING ENERGY COSTS

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): My supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Finance, or to whomever he wants to designate to answer it, Madam Speaker. In the absence of energy tax rebates for lower-income Canadians, which were provided in the Crosbie budget, will the minister reflect on additional means to alleviate the devastating impact high and rising energy costs have on lower-income people in the Atlantic provinces, and tell us what, if anything, he is going to do about it, other than amending the guaranteed income supplement and indexing social programs which the minister alluded to a few moments ago?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that last weekend I travelled in the Atlantic provinces and quite a number of citizens congratulated the government for not imposing upon them the heavy burdens which were imposed by his colleague.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Name one.

An hon. Member: That is what Gerry Regan said.

Mr. MacEachen: I am very surprised the hon. member would complain about a program which is much lighter and more generous than the one he supported so strongly last December when he was a member of the former government.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER INCREASE IN PREMIUMS WILL SUPPORT FUTURE UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister is from the west and he may or may not be aware of the fact that by yesterday there was an industry-wide hiring freeze within the oil industry. Today the oil industry is examining planned projects with a view to cancellation of better than half of them. That will be followed by lay-offs within the industry and with suppliers. Our estimate is that 3 per cent of the potential GNP was lost by the budget. That translates into 300,000 lost jobs in the coming year. Can the minister assure the House that his 33 per cent rise in premiums for unemployment insurance will cover the cost required to provide income support to the 1,300,000 Canadians who will be unemployed a year from now?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I regret very much, as does the hon. member, that some of those projects have been frozen because of the very drastic action taken by the Premier of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: It is certainly our hope that the climate of compromise in negotiation, which we are trying to establish, will encourage the premier to reintroduce many of those projects.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Under those circumstances I would want to assure—

Mr. Clark: You are sounding hysterical, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: —members of the House that the figures used by the hon. member are as exaggerated as the statements he usually makes in this House.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, it is a shame when income support for people who have families is treated in such a cavalier fashion by the minister. A power struggle is not worth it, sir.

May I bring hon. members' attention to a recent study prepared by Dr. Brenner of Johns Hopkins University which indicates that a 1 per cent rise in unemployment is accompanied by a 1.9 per cent rise in the death rate, a 5.7 per cent increase in homicides, a 4.1 per cent increase in suicides, plus significant increases in child mortality and first admissions to mental hospitals and prisons.

● (1450)

In the light of a budget dedicated to increasing employment by somewhere near a half million people, can we have the minister's assurance that he will use his good offices with the Minister of Finance to make sure that spending in the social envelope goes up, and not down, as promised by the minister on page 13 of his budget address.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, when you have unemployment, it is never very happy for the people who experience it. That is one reason why we reintroduced the direct employment program which the hon. member's government cancelled last year, which has the highest impact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: That is why we have substantial amounts of money for those programs. It is also why the Minister of Finance in his generosity added $350 million to additional manpower training mobility and industrial adjustment programs so that we can help those areas which are experiencing some degree of industrial disruption.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

RENEWAL OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that in the second last paragraph of page 13 of the budget, for those who want to look at it, the Minister of Finance states that he expects significant savings out of the upcoming renewal of federal-provincial funding arrangements for health and social development, can the minister tell us whether or not she approves of this goal and, if she does, how she reconciles this goal with the recommendation, among others, of the Hall report that more federal money should be available, not less, particularly to the poorer provinces, for cost-sharing of important health services that are not yet available to many Canadians in what is supposed to be a national health care plan. Can the minister tell us where she expects the savings to come from?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I expect the savings to come as a result of discussions with those provinces which presently have a surplus in order to benefit the very social programs the hon. member tries to suggest we are cutting, but are not. He talked of medicare and touched on the CAP program of welfare and social services. These programs are targeted toward those in need. That is our purpose. We are committed to that, and I am not nervous about any allegations the hon. member wants to make.

Mr. Blaikie: It would be nice if we got an answer sometimes instead of a lecture about the righteousness of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On the same page of the budget it says that the federal government expects a clearer division of federal-provincial responsibilities in the social development area. My question to the minister is this. Does this mean that the government is planning not only to emulate the provinces that they have been so critical of lately by using this crucial area as an avenue of restraint, but at the same time plans to hand over further responsibility to the provinces by moving to block funding in social services as well as health care? What is the intention of the government?

Miss Bégin: My answer to the last part of the hon. member's question is that we do not intend to do that. We do not intend to go to block funding on social services. If the hon. member will clarify what else he wants to know, I will answer with pleasure.

EFFECT OF ENERGY TAXES ON ELDERLY WIDOWS AND SINGLE WOMEN

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, having listened to the answers of the Minister of Finance earlier today, I would like to address his attention to a specific group of Canadians. There are some 78,000 single and widowed women in Canada between the ages of 60 and 65 who have to get by on less than $4,200 a year, less than $350 a month. They now face in the vicinity of $160 additional pay-outs for home heating fuel because of the energy taxes in the budget. Is the minister providing any relief whatsoever for this specific group of Canadian women who do not have access to the old age pension or the guaranteed income supplement and who probably are the group hardest hit by the minister's energy tax?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it might be easier for the government to respond to these needs if the hon. member's colleagues did not take such a hard line in the course of debate and denounce the government for increased spending and for its failure to reduce the deficit further. In the present difficult circumstances, we have produced a budget which has attempted to reconcile a number of different objectives, including reducing the burden on consumers, which includes the group which the hon. member mentions. That burden has been reduced considerably in comparison with the punitive budget which she did not support last December.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: My supplementary is to the Minister of Finance, whose only reconciliation in the budget is to reconcile this group that I mentioned to continuing poverty. That is all he is doing. Has he given any consideration whatsoever to this particular group of people who simply do not know how they are going to get through the winter? Because of their age, they do not have the opportunity to get jobs or to earn additional income. They do not know how they are going to find an additional $160 for home heating fuel. Has the minister given any thought whatsoever to their plight, or is it that nobody over there cares at all?

Mr. MacEachen: Of course, Madam Speaker, we have given consideration to that group. We have not waited for the hon. member's interest in order to give attention to that group because we have engaged in programs with the provinces to assist all Canadians who are in need, in addition to the universal programs administered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If there are additional requirements for any particular group, there is a mechanism in place. We will do our part in co-operation with provincial governments, which have to take the initiative in the first instance. If the hon. member is concerned, she might join with the rest of us in asking various provinces to take a more accommodating attitude toward these particular groups.

ENERGY

CONVERSION FROM OIL—APPLICATION OF PROGRAM TO NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The energy policy tabled in this House states that the conversion program for homes and businesses will be tailored to the priorities and objectives of the provincial governments. Is that the case with the application of the conversion program to the province of New Brunswick? Will it apply to the conversion from oil—

Mr. Nielsen: You are a little late with that one.

Mr. Paproski: It has already been asked.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —conversion from oil to such fuels as wood, coal and natural gas where it is available? Is the minister's department looking into the possibility of the use of peat as a fuel?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker, I believe we have made reference to peat as a source of fuel. I know there is a considerable quantity of it available in New Brunswick. The conversion program is available to the citizens of New Brunswick. We are embarking upon discussions with the province as to the best way of administering the program. I will have more to say later about the specific aspects of it as far as New Brunswick is concerned, but the citizens of New Brunswick can avail themselves of this program.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

INCREASED RENTS FOR MARRIED QUARTERS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of Finance has by his increase in gasoline and heating fuel costs added about $500 to $600 to the annual cost of living for low and medium-income families. On top of this the Minister of National Defence has this week raised the rent for services married quarters, for those in Ottawa $50 per month for corporals and $35 per month for privates. For the first time rents are being raised with no accompanying pay raise. What is the minister going to do about this terrible situation?

● (1500)

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, there is no terrible situation. I saw the study that was made concerning rent increases in the armed forces. I also asked that, considering the rent increase of November last, there be no other increase before a task force had looked into the problem and reported to me. No member of the armed forces pays more than 25 per cent of his income in rent, in addition to which, the lower the salary of a member of the armed forces, the lower his rent increase is. I feel that so far this has been fair. Future increases will be watched more closely after the task force has handed in its report.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the two ministers now require, for instance, a corporal stationed in Ottawa to spend more than $1,000 more on transportation and shelter costs this year than he did last year. The minister has it within his authority to stop the heavy rent increase. In the case of a corporal this rent increase is 22 per cent. That is compared with ceiling imposed by the Ontario rent control commission of 6 per cent per annum. This is the second rent increase this year. The last one was in April. Is the minister going to sit there and do nothing while good men are leaving the services for this very reason?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think the information of the hon. member is definitely wrong. I would like to know how many left the service because of high rent.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Lamontagne: As far as what we are going to do about it, it is not a question of doing nothing. I just mentioned to the hon. member that a special group is looking into this, and I am aware of discrepancies. I even went to Calgary to meet a group of wives who had grievances about their rent. They understood the good sense of our position, and they said they would accept this one and would see what happens in the future. As I said, we have a group working on this, and we will try to provide justice for all in the armed forces.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DE JONG—STATEMENT MADE BY MISS BÉGIN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege as a result of the answer I received from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) earlier in the question period. The minister suggested that I had sent her a document of some 200 pages. It was actually only 75 pages.

However, more important is the type of motive the minister imputed in suggesting to me that I really had no right to raise this matter at all. I suppose the suggestion was that I was a knight in shining armour trying to create undue publicity and fear among the Canadian people. I resent the imputation of such a motive to me. Various groups in this country, various provincial governments, various news media and various environmental groups have been trying to get answers to the types of questions I have been posing to the minister throughout this year. I believe it was in 1978 that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) tried to raise some of these questions with the Department of Agriculture.

As early as March of this year the Saskatchewan government tried to ask exactly the same type of question I have been asking the minister. A reply was not received until June 23 of this year. It took several months for that reply. The reply received is now shown to have been incomplete. In fact, throughout the summer more and more chemicals have been added to the list. I was asking the minister to supply the information to the public and to the House. There was no motive other than a public disclosure of some very important information. I therefore ask that the minister be asked to stop forthwith imputing these types of motives to my questions.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not know whether there is ground for a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. The hon. member feels morally indignant about a given situation. Since he has been sitting in this House, since we came back to power after the election, he has been putting equivocal questions which do not allow me to give definite answers, once and for all. I repeat that the net result of such a series of questions is to create suspicion in the public mind, to imply reasons for concern which do not exist, all under the cover of information I would be keeping from the public. Such a situation is not true and does not exist. I cannot let it go unchallenged. If there is any ground for a question of privilege, I leave it up to you to sort it out.

Madam Speaker: I am indeed under the impression that under the cover of this question of privilege it is the debate between the minister and the hon. member that has been reopened. The hon. member is not happy with the answer the minister gave him. That is his right. If he is still not satisfied, he can again put the question to the minister some other day in terms that will please him most and that will allow him best to express himself. The minister does not appreciate the kind of questions that are put to her but that is also her right. So it is plain that on both sides it is simply a debate that is getting under way, and unfortunately I cannot consider this matter as a question of privilege.

[English]

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—FAILURE TO PROVIDE INTERPRETERS FOR COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 17(2) I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given the required notice.

This morning, during proceedings in the Standing Committee on Transport in room 307 of the West Block, it was discovered that interpreters did not come to our meeting as we had a right to expect they would. We realize that there are labour-management problems involving government translators, but sufficient positions have been designated to serve Parliament.

As standing committees are an integral part of Parliament, we find this situation intolerable. What is even more intolerable is that neither I, as chairman of the committee, nor the clerk of our committee was notified that interpreters were not available. I understand that this has happened with regard to other committees as well.

Upon the discovery that our proceedings were not being interpreted, our clerk, upon my instructions, contacted the interpretation service, only to be told that no interpreters were available.

This situation is a direct violation of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons and of the Official Languages Act. As chairman of the committee I speak on behalf of the members of the committee in expressing the view that our privileges as members have been breached, not only by the absence of interpreters but also by the failure of the interpretation service to give us notice of their inability to fulfil their responsibility.

Madam Speaker, if you find there are sufficient grounds to show a breach of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is bringing to light a situation which I knew existed. The hon. member says that there is a sufficient number of translators who have been designated for the House of Commons in situations such as the one which has arisen. Obviously, the number is not sufficient because we are having difficulty at the present time with regard to the number of interpreters required. I think there is a sufficient number of translators but not enough interpreters to allow us to have interpretation at all of the committee meetings.

If this situation continues, there certainly will be a serious problem because the main estimates have to be studied and brought back to the House in a very short time. I suppose that will have to be done in some way or another. On the other hand, some hon. members object, and rightly so in some cases, to sitting when there are not sufficient interpretation services at those committees.

I do not think this is a question of privilege. There is very little I can do in the present situation except to offer to discuss the matter with the leaders of the parties in the House, to see whether there is anything we can do in order to alleviate the situation. I do not see what else I can offer in this circumstance. I know it is difficult for committees to meet without interpretation services, but we have a strike situation on our hands, and I personally cannot intervene in any way to deal with that situation. However, perhaps we could get together to discuss this matter and to see whether we can devise something which might alleviate the situation.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I listened to what you said. We have a problem which seems to be a continuing one. I know Your Honour cannot intervene, in the sense one might use that word. But the strike, as you know, has been going on for a period of time. The translators have been without a contract for a long period of time. I understand that discussions are still going ahead now, that discussions were renewed.

I do not think there would be any objection if, in anticipation of a meeting of House leaders, you would have a word with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), under whose jurisdiction the negotiation of this matter falls, to see how that negotiation is proceeding. I think that would be quite appropriate and I am sure there would be agreement of the House to it, because the disposition in the House is that the Standing Orders must be observed, privilege or not. If you did that, I think there would be support. As for the meeting itself, there would certainly be agreement to meet.

It is becoming a very difficult problem for committees. Indeed, the constitutional committee is to meet fairly soon, I assume, and the same thing will apply there. Estimates will be coming forward, and the same thing will apply there. I think we will have a hopeless pile-up if something is not done. So, if you feel you would like to speak to the President of the Treasury Board directly in anticipation of a meeting, I just want you to know that this will be perfectly agreeable to us.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it might be a good idea for you to discuss this matter with the House leaders. It might also be an excellent idea, should you feel it is necessary to use free lance interpreters, to talk the matter over with the members of the Internal Economy Commission. I am sure that they would prove to be very openminded on this matter.

Madam Speaker: Since it is the wish of the House, I could take up the suggestion made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and see if there is any possibility of some progress being achieved in the ongoing negotiations or at least see what progress has been made and if there is hope for a settlement in the near future. In any event, I will very shortly call a meeting of House leaders so that we can discuss the means at our disposal to solve this problem.

[English]

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, on the same point on which you ruled there was not point of privilege, I wonder if you could make a ruling on whether the meetings which are taking place without translators or interpreters are legal, or whether they contravene the Official Languages Act, because the same problem was experienced by the Special Committee on the National Trading Corporation. We had two interpretations of the law. One was that it was not legal to hold such meetings without translators, and the other was that it was legal. Under the circumstances I wonder if you would bring a ruling to the House as to whether or not such committee meetings are legal.

Madam Speaker: I certainly cannot determine whether or not they are legal. I know what our Standing Orders say, and I can tell the hon. member that I cannot bring in a new ruling or a new Standing Order because of these particular circumstances. I am in the hands of the House. If the House wishes to determine something that can be done, it might be achieved. However, I will meet with the House leaders of the parties. I think that is the better way to proceed in order to solve the matter.

FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONSUMER ACCESS TO CREDIT RATING REPORTS

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-619, respecting disclosure of credit rating records.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Madam Speaker, this bill will permit individuals who have been investigated by consumer reporting agencies to have access to those reports. In addition, it also imposes limitations on the circumstances under which those reports could be made available to clients.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member knows, of course, that he should have risen earlier to give his brief explanation, but I will allow that.

When shall this bill be read a second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STATISTICS CANADA—POPULATION ESTIMATES—EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Question No. 222—Mr. Herbert:

Has the government of Quebec disputed the population estimates of Statistics Canada and, if so, what effect could such a difference of opinion have on equalization payments for the province?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): The Quebec government has made representations concerning use by the Department of Finance of official Statistics Canada population data for purposes of calculating provincial entitlements to fiscal equalization. The Statistics Canada population data used in calculating equalization are the June 1 census count for each province in a census year, and the most recent official estimates of provincial population as of June 1 for each year that is not a census year.

The government of Quebec has requested the Department of Finance to calculate equalization, commencing with the 1980-81 fiscal year, on a basis that would take account of the number of persons missed in the 1981 census. In every census, there are always people who are not enumerated. Statistics Canada has undertaken special surveys following recent censuses to estimate the number of persons missed. The survey made following the 1976 census was done on a province-by-province basis. It indicated that the number of persons missed relative to the number counted was high in the province of Quebec. A similar survey will be made following the 1981 census.

Quebec has made representations that the population figures used in calculating equalization for 1981-82 should be based upon the official census count as of June 1, 1981, adjusted upward for each province to take account of the estimate of persons missed. They have also requested that comparable adjustments be made for years other than census years, commencing with 1980-81.

The effect on equalization of adjusting official population data for the number of persons missed in a census would be to increase entitlements in eligible provinces where the number of persons missed relative to the number of persons counted is high, and to reduce entitlements in eligible provinces where the number of persons missed relative to the number of persons counted is low. It is not possible to quantify such differences with respect to the 1981 census until the count has been tabulated, and the estimate of persons missed derived from the special survey that will follow that census. The results will not likely become available before October, 1982. Until that time, it will not be known whether Quebec would gain or lose, or by how much, from the methodology they have suggested.

MEMBER FOR SAINT-MAURICE—GIFTS—ESKIMO CARVINGS

Question No. 874—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Did the honourable member for Saint-Maurice, when he was minister of Indian affairs and northern development, receive Eskimo carvings as gifts and, if so (a) what is their commercial dollar value (b) how many did he receive (c) on what dates did he receive the carvings?

2. Did he receive other gifts since he entered the cabinet and, if so (a) what were they (b) what is their commercial dollar value (c) how many?

3. Did he inform the Prime Minister when he received (a) the Eskimo carvings (b) other gifts since he entered cabinet and, if so, in each case, on what dates?

4. (a) What are the guidelines governing the receipt of gifts by ministers of the Crown (b) do they require that such gifts must be reported to the prime minister?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development):

1. (a), (b) and (c):

During his six years as minister of Indian affairs and northern development, the member for Saint-Maurice received nine Eskimo carvings as gifts; they were presented to him in public and the minister never asked his hosts their commercial value.

2. (a), (b) and (c):

The minister has not received any souvenirs since being sworn in as Minister of Justice.

3. (a) and (b):

The minister has followed the Prime Minister's guidelines in all circumstances.

4. (a) The conflict of interest guidelines for ministers, in effect since April 28, 1980, require that ministers shall disclose in the public registry maintained by the assistant deputy registrar general " . . . any personal gift or other benefit or a value exceeding two hundred dollars which they receive from any person not connected with them by blood relationship, marriage or adoption, together with the name and address of the donor". Official gifts received from other governments are not subject to this rule.

(b) The conflict of interest guidelines for ministers, in effect since April 28, 1980, require that "all gifts or benefits exceeding two hundred dollars in value, other than official gifts or benefits, are to be declared to the ADRG within 30 days of their receipt for disclosure in the public registry". The assistant deputy registrar general administers the guidelines on behalf of the Prime Minister.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,207—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many temporary or casual employees were employed by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation in each of the past five years including persons from employment supply agencies and persons under contract?

2. What was the percentage turnover of such persons?

3. What are the names of the employment agencies and the amount of funds they received?

4. What is a list of any persons who worked under contract and the dates involved?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

1. The corporation does not keep records in a manner which would permit the production of such information without considerable expenditure from personnel resources. However, for the purpose of this question, the corporation has surveyed fiscal years 1978/79 and 1979/80

(a) 1978/79: 90 temporary and casual employees (equivalent in person-years to 3.5)

(b) 1979/80: 190 temporary and casual employees (equivalent in person-years to 4.3)

2. Not applicable. The objective of hiring temporary or casual employees is to fill temporary staffing needs only (e.g. maternity leave, retail store operations, etc.)

3. The corporation does not keep records in a manner which would permit the production of such information without considerable expenditure from personnel resources. However, for the purpose of this question, the corporation has surveyed fiscal years 1978/79 and 1979/80.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—CANNES FILM FESTIVAL—CHARTER OF YACHT

Question No. 1,326—Mr. Friesen:

Did CFDC charter the yacht "Don Juan" at the Cannes Film Festival in 1980 and, if so (a) on what authority and for what reason (b) who was invited on board the vessel and for what reason (c) what was the total cost of chartering the vessel (d) what other costs were involved?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: The Canadian Film Development Corporation did charter the yacht "Don Juan" at a cost of $500 per day, for two half-days.

(a) With the authorization of Canadian Film Development Corporation administration, 25 foreign journalists and 55 Canadian journalists were invited with a view to publicizing Canadian films.

(c) $500.

(d) $4,400 for food and drink.

SOVIET UNION—IMMIGRANTS—TOP TEN ETHNO-CULTURAL GROUPS

Question No. 1,507—Mr. Flis:

1. To the knowledge of the government, what is the ethnic breakdown of the top ten ethno-cultural groups in the Soviet Union in terms of population?

2. What is the number of total immigrants who have left the U.S.S.R. during the past five years and what ethno-cultural groups did they come from?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics

Canada and the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission as follows: Statistics Canada reports:

1. According to the most recent information published by the statistical office of the United Nations, the population in the top ten classes of "ethnic nationality" in the Soviet Union, as of January 15, 1970, was as follows:

Ethnic Nationality	Population
1. Russian	129,015,140
2. Ukrainian	40,753,246
3. Uzbek	9,195,093
4. Byelorussian	9,051,755

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, November 3, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Crosbie (p. 4231), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Rae (p. 4235).

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) rising on a point of order?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): No, Madam Speaker, I am rising to speak in this debate.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is not a world-shaking point, but it was completely understood that the next speaker was to be the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). That was the understanding last night, and I understood from the people up front this afternoon that he would be called first.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Tough bananas.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but the first member who rose after orders of the day were announced was the hon. member for York-Peel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have no other knowledge that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) was to speak at this time, and the member who rose first was the hon. member for York-Peel.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Surely it is not necessary for me to rise in advance of the order being called, in order to be recognized. I rose simultaneously with the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) but, because he stands in front of me, it was impossible for you to see through him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: The understanding was perfectly clear, and it shows a bias which is quite unnecessary.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Madam Speaker: There is no understanding of which I am aware. I am awfully sorry if the hon. member feels that he was rising at the same time as the other hon. member. However, I was looking in that direction and it was quite clear to me that the hon. member for York-Peel rose first. It is my responsibility to recognize hon. members in the order in which they rise. Therefore, I am afraid I have no other choice but to recognize the hon. member for York-Peel. The only thing that stopped me was when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rose and I realized he was rising on a point of order. I had no idea what it was about. So I have to recognize the hon. member for York-Peel.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order again. It is not my wish to spin it out and to make a big issue of it, but it so happens that I myself went up early this afternoon and consulted with one of the deputy occupants of the chair and was told that Your Honour would call first on the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain. Later, our whip, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), went up and got the same message. Both of us informed the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain that Your Honour would be calling him. I recite that so that you know why I said there was an understanding.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, may I point out that in the exchange which took place involving the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans)—you might want to examine the "blues" with respect to that—

Mr. Deans: Please do.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —I think the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain indicated quite clearly that the Chair was biased. I think that is unparliamentary, and upon examination of the "blues" I think it should be dealt with. That is the kind of thing which should not be allowed to pass in this chamber, especially when it comes from someone who has had a tremendous amount of experience in another chamber. He should know better, and you should not allow it to stand.

Some hon. Members: Shameful.

Madam Speaker: I repeat that I had no knowledge of an agreement having been reached between the whips of the different parties as to whom was supposed to be speaking first after we announced orders of the day. If by some means this agreement was transmitted to someone occupying the chair when I was not here, I can assure the hon. member that it was not transmitted to me. Therefore I have tried to be fair in recognizing the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), just following the normal usage of this House of the first member who rises being recognized.

● (1520)

As for the language which the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) allegedly used with respect to the Chair, I did not hear it. I am willing to look at the "blues", but some of these things are often said in the excitement of the moment, and I am sure the hon. member did not mean any disrespect to the Chair, if he in fact said that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He should withdraw.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, after the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has heard my remarks, it may well be that he will feel that all which needs to be said has been said with respect to the budget, and it will not be necessary for him to take up his ten or 20 minutes in the debate.

Just prior to orders of the day being called, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was over here. I asked him what he felt I should say about his budget, and he said, "Sinc, say something nice". Frankly I have thought hard and long since he made that comment to think of something nice about the budget, and I think the House will understand when I say I cannot think of anything. If he had stayed a little longer with me, perhaps he could have made some suggestions.

As Hugh Anderson of The Globe and Mail said last weekend, the truth is that this budget may be a clever one but it is an exercise in the politics of wilful deceit. I say that because I feel the budget is not only deceitful, in its method of presentation, but I believe it is deceitful in that it is only half a budget. I suggest that perhaps this is the most significant matter which is being forgotten by members of the House and the public at large. We have heard only half the story from the Minister of Finance. In effect he presented what he feels, up to this stage, he can get away with, namely, an expenditure plan, an energy policy, the appearance that somehow taxes will not go up, and that is it.

Let me assure the House that the second boot will fall. It may take the form of another financial statement, it may take the form of some new budget, but the fact is that the figures put before us if analysed, indicate only one thing, that a responsible government in this country cannot continue to allow the expenditure and revenue levels to continue as projected in the budget without the inevitable happening, that is, rampant inflation, rising interest rates, low productivity in industry, in short, utter chaos.

I say this in all sincerity. On behalf of Canada I ask, particularly those on the far left and on the rear left of the government benches, to come to their senses. They may be concerned about such things as the form, as to whether the constitution happens to be in this form or that form, but the time has come for the government of the day, on behalf of Canadians, to make some of the hard decisions and to put in place some of the measures needed to restore confidence in the country. Certainly that was not forthcoming in the budget brought in a week ago tonight.

It is truly odd that we in a country such as Canada must relive history which has been proven repeatedly to be wrong in other countries. I cannot understand that. The British tried this type of approach 20 years ago, this governmental intervention approach such as was displayed in the budget and the actions of the government. We know it did not work in Britain, and in fact they are in a massive reprivatization program in that country to try to right their economic ship. The people of that country were misled by the socialists in the Labour party. We in this country have been misled by the socialists in the NDP. Those pragmatists, those people on the government benches who say they will do anything if it means power, have let the country down by virtually introducing us to a socialistic state such as the one we in Canada are falling into.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The thing which disturbed me as much as anything since the return of Parliament has been to witness the absolute decline and eclipse of the Treasury Board as an effective arm of government in the present government of the country. I say that because we have known for some time that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is merely a token. In no way is he a man of restraint. He is a man with little clout within the cabinet ranks. He is simply filling a post with no say, but I never thought we would witness the day when a president of the treasury board would have the nerve—or perhaps he does not even know what he is saying—to walk into the House and make the statements he made yesterday. As reported at page 4362 of yesterday's Hansard, the minister said:

> Unlike my predecessor, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), who kept trying to assume the responsibilities, in my judgment, of the Minister of Finance, I readily acknowledge the lead role of the Minister of Finance in developing the fiscal plan.

Near the conclusion of his remarks he referred to the Minister of Finance when he said:

> All Canadians will welcome the frank and open way in which he has presented his expenditure plan and his medium-term economic assumptions.

What is the President of the Treasury Board saying? In effect he is saying that they have capitulated over at the Treasury Board; they have surrendered. This was a fight which we waged with the big spending bureaucracy while we were in government. Essentially it boiled down to the simple fact that there were those who simply said, "You in the Treasury Board should do nothing but monitor. We at the lofty Privy Council level, overlapping the finance level and departmental levels, will come up with the expenditure plan which we think, in a macroeconomic sense, is needed in the country. You simply watch that the figures are spent the way we feel they should be spent." I know this may sound complicated, as if it is hard to understand, but let me assure the House that it is not.

There are two approaches to governmental expenditures. One is the academic approach, or the Keynesian approach, where those on high within the bureaucracy deem what a proper expenditure level is to be. Once that level is set, they simply sit down with those who might do the spending to figure out where it will be spent. I suggest that is what is now in vogue through the Michael Pitfields, through the Ian Stewarts, through their respective ministers. In short, we do not have an expenditure plan in the sense that this is the least the government can spend. We have an expenditure plan which has been dictated by those who believe in big spending for the sake of big spending.

Here is the significance of what I am saying. Once this has been set and it becomes the fiscal plan, as the President of the Treasury Board says, or the expenditure plan, to use the words of the Minister of Finance, there is really no role for the Treasury Board. All the Treasury Board then does is add up the figures periodically and figure out whether they are under or over those expenditure levels which somebody else deemed are proper.

I have seen memos with respect to the previous government's handling of our affairs that indicate, for example, wastage is no longer to be criticized because wastage means simply that the expenditure plan, which is deemed to be proper, is perhaps not being met in the way it was originally intended, but at least it is getting the funds out there. That is what is going on. We are being told in the budget, which has been placed before us, that rather than spend $57.3 billion, as was our proposal in the Crosbie budget, that it is better to spend $59,350 million. Most important, we are being told that rather than spend $75,700 million by the fiscal year 1984, it is deemed better to spend $81,815 million.

Mr. Speaker, let me make one thing clear. I know it is commonplace for people to say, "Oh, well, he is simply trying to make a point but how does he substantiate it?" I invite hon. members, members of the press and the public, to take a look at a release that was put out by the Treasury Board on January 22, 1980. It is release No. 80-3. In that they will find we came up with figures comparing what would be the ongoing spending levels in government without the Crosbie budget, and what, in fact, those spending levels would be with the Crosbie budget. In short, we tried to translate to the public what the ongoing expenditures in government were going to lead to if the Crosbie budget was not put in place.

I think what will be found to be most revealing now is that expenditure level is literally within millions of dollars each year—that is the ongoing trend line—it is literally within millions of dollars each year to what we were presented with Tuesday night here in the House of Commons. Thus, there is no restraint. All we have is rhetoric and verbiage on the part of that expert in verbiage, the Minister of Finance. What we have is the appearance of expenditures that are simply the trend line indicated by those who keep track of projections for ongoing programs and expenditures in government—no cutbacks. However, in contrast we had the courage through our budget to anticipate that those expenditures could be cut back by $7 billion by 1984. That was the approach that we took. We did not allow the ongoing trend line to take the Canadian public to a $82 billion expenditure level by 1984. We said that that was excessively high and must be reduced. We were able to propose that it be reduced by $7 billion.

Let me deal with the next point. So far I have simply been dealing with the figures that were brought into this House last Tuesday night by the Minister of Finance. But that is only the beginning. We find they have been doctoring the books. I understand the minister has an honorary degree, he is Dr. MacEachen. I did not realize that he got his doctor's degree for doctoring books. Let us take a look at a few of the examples. On page 32 of the budget papers you will find that it is revealed that they are setting up a new fund, if you like, called a petroleum compensation fund. Payments will be made out of that fund. The fund will be paid for this year in part, and in future years entirely, out of a petroleum compensation charge. Is it not interesting that in effect what they are doing—and after questioning the President of the Treasury Board last night he finally admitted that it was true—is giving the appearance of reducing expenditures by this little dodge alone to the tune of $1.2 billion this year, and up to over $6 billion by 1984.

Expressed in the simplest of language, what these artful dodgers are up to is simply that rather than follow normal accounting policies of this year, and saying they have to make payments with respect to oil compensation in the amount of $3,950 million, and record that in the blue book—while on the other side showing wherever they are going to get the revenue from—they have come up with a dodge, saying, "We are going to set up a separate fund which will be outside of the blue book. That fund is anticipated to need $3,950 million, but we anticipate we can sock it to the Canadian public to the tune of $1,215 million in the form of a new charge." That revenue will go directly into the fund leaving a net petroleum compensation payment of $2,735 million. And that is all that gets recorded in the accounts we have before us.

On that one item, Mr. Speaker, they have reduced the expenditure level by $1.2 billion in a most deceptive way. Taken through to 1984 we find that the total fudging of the books, if you like, will be $5.78 billion by 1984. With all sincerity I say that the Canadian public do not deserve that type of treatment. How can you expect the Canadian public to have confidence in a government, or to have the proper attitude toward it, when government themselves are presenting figures in a way that, if you were in the private sector filing prospectuses with respect to share issues, you would literally be convicted of contravening the securities legislation on disclosure? That is only one example, Mr. Speaker.

I can add up totals of evasive types of presentations and non-disclosures totalling $10 billion by 1984. We have heard the Minister of Finance previously, and again today, come up with this figure of some $40 billion that he has saved the Canadian public. If he believes that, he is being fooled by his own fool figures. The fact is that the only reason he can pretend that he has saved anybody any money is simply that he is not disclosing it. He is simply not disclosing, to the tune of almost $16 billion in payment charges, the amount he is going to lift from the Canadian public in the charge for oil compensation to which I have been referring. For example his debt is another $13 billion higher in the aggregate than that proposed in the Crosbie budget. If you add those two things alone you have $29 billion of his so-called $40 billion saving. The reason I mention this type of thing is because I think it is so unfortunate that we have a Minister of Finance, in Canada's time of need, who stoops so low as to start cooking the books in that fashion.

Mr. Speaker, let me give you other examples of what I am referring to here. I say that there is $10 billion you can identify there by 1984 which would normally be considered expenditures, or amounts we have to allow for, that somehow or other they are shuffling off to the side—the Post Office approach. You will remember his cute little trick there. The Minister of Finance says, "Of course, I have assumed that the revenue from the Post Office will be sufficient to meet the expenditures and there will be no deficit during my projection." Expressed in another way, he is saying, "If we are able to roll onto the Canadian public directly the deficits of the Post Office through increased postage and other charges, then, lo and behold, we will have no deficit." He then has the nerve to say, "Of course, since we will have no deficit, and since I assume we will have no deficit, I will not show it in my figures."

There is the unemployment insurance dodge. What the minister is doing is taking it out of the general accounts, the estimates, and rolling it on to the employees and employers, and saying, "You will pick up another $1 billion between now and the end of the year", because it will allow him to show a more favourable budgetary presentation.

Mr. Evans: It is required by the legislation, and you know it.

Mr. Stevens: If we read between the lines, we must wonder what this budget will do to the agreements which now exist between the federal government and the provincial governments. The figures mean only one thing, that the government proposes to rewrite those agreements to put a greater load on the provinces. There can be no doubt about that. That is another way the government will pick up what it thinks will be a $2 billion saving, and it will not be done in the federal name but simply picked up at the provincial level.

I mentioned these points because they show the mentality of the people who are now governing this country. Rather than face the hard realities, that expenditures are out of control and, that we need the strongest president of the treasury board possible, instead of a weak one, we are finding that the government is trying to disguise the figures. The government is in the lap of its public relations people who simply say, "It is perception that counts, not reality. Do whatever you have to do but do not tell the truth, and you will see how we will muddle through."

Let me put it another way. What we have received from the budget is an increase of 12.5 cents per gallon in the oil compensation charge, and an increase of 5 cents per gallon in the oil and gas revenue tax. Those figures total 17.5 cents per gallon, which compares to the 18-cent excise tax for which we were voted out. For half a cent on that item alone, the country changed from responsible government to irresponsible government.

As far as oil pricing is concerned, we are told that the increase will be $3.80 per barrel compared to our price of $4 a barrel. Of course, the 75 cents increase per barrel which the government ran up earlier in the year was not added to the $3.80 because it would put the price at over $4.50. The public relations people did not want to hear that on budget night so they said, "Let's forget that for the time being, and talk about $3.80." In truth that is what we have bought.

An hon. Member: Deception.

Mr. Stevens: Clearly, it is deception. In the words of Hugh Anderson, it is "wilful deceit" on the part of the government. The fact that the government has maintained the ongoing spending levels will have the effect of softening up and conditioning Canadian consumers to the concept that perhaps they should spend even more.

Last night the President of the Treasury Board startled myself and other members of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates by stating that he felt that 49 per cent of the people at the deputy minister's level in the public service were underpaid in this country. I do not know whether he based that comment on fact, or whether it was just a wish. But when the government is facing a deficit of $14 billion and serious doubts in the financial community as to whether the country can handle this debt load which the federal government proposes over the coming years, one of the last things it should be saying is that its employees, who presumably are partly responsible for the position which the government is in, should be paid more.

As a rule one pays for results. If the government were running at a surplus, or relatively close to a surplus, then I could see, if it were felt that somebody was underpaid, it as an opportunity to suggest a bonus or some other type of increase in pay. However, that is not the situation in this country today.

In short, we are in a very serious economic position which is not being dealt with in a prudent way by the government.

I mentioned my feeling that we have only received half a budget. The tax increases are yet to come, and let there be no doubt about that fact because it is just a question of form. What we have received so far is the energy aspect. I suggest that the reason energy has been singled out in the budget, and in the document entitled "The National Energy Program" is because the government feels that this field is an easy target. It looks upon the oil industry as predominantly foreign, as very profitable and as an industry which is mainly located in one province which represents only 10 per cent of the population of the country. In the thinking of this government, that industry is a fair target because it can arouse public opinion against that industry.

I hope that those people who read the budget and say, "Well, at least they didn't tax us too heavily," and those in industry who say, "Well, it's not hitting me, so somehow or other I am not concerned", do not smile too broadly, because I can assure them their time is coming should this government continue in office beyond its present mandate. The government intends to intervene, to socialize, to take over, to cannibalize, to Canadianize, to nationalize, call it what you want, until the Canadian public finally does what happened in Jamaica, Britain, and what will happen tomorrow in the United States, turn out the big spenders and bring in responsible government once again.

Approximately a week ago I attended a seminar in this city which dealt with public corporations. Various comments were made to rationalize the government's position on Crown corporations. The speaker just ahead of me made the comment that when the government wants to take over parts of the private sector, and the private sector resists because it does not want to be taken out, it should be remembered that the government has some very effective tools at its disposal. It can regulate the industry and it can bring in onerous taxation to sober it up. In short, the government can bring the industry to its knees so that it is willing to be bought out.

To show how much the government has accepted this theory, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) states at page 52 in "The National Energy Program":

> The Government of Canada recognizes that the National Energy Program represents a fundamental departure, in many instances, from the current policy environment. Despite the fact that the policies will maintain, even enhance the relative position of the oil and gas industry, some firms may regard the new conditions as unsatisfactory. The government's acquisition program provides an answer for them. The Government of Canada is a willing buyer at fair and reasonable prices.

I thought that godfathers existed only in the United States, but clearly we have a godfather in the form of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is that not contemptible? Did anyone ever think that in Canada we would reach the position where the government, which is supposed to be the servant of the people, rather than trying to respond to criticism would say, "If you don't like it we are going to buy you out on", presumably, "fair terms." I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that with the power the government possesses, those terms would be virtually confiscation.

I mention this because I believe that if we in this House do not stand up and be counted, starting tonight, to show our distaste for this type of budgetary presentation, this type of spending, this type of deficit, this high infrastructure that will lead to greater unemployment in the country and unsatisfactory real growth in the economy, we will not have done our duty as representatives of our constituents.

I have spoken of some of the ways the government has deceived the people in this budget. Perhaps the worst deceit of all is the suggestion made during the election campaign that the government would control expenditures to the level of economic growth in the country. What is meant by that is not what you and I would mean, Mr. Speaker, that if the economy increases by 9 per cent this year we would try to keep spending down to 9 per cent instead of the 15 per cent the government project. The government means it will be kept to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Stevens: —you lose before 1984.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to say how much I enjoyed the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). It is nice that we are able to see the full epitome of the real Tory finally speaking up in this House. During question period we were treated to the exhibition of that sham Tory who shed great crocodile tears about the plight of the poor. He charged that this government was ignoring them and had not provided enough money in the budget to deal with the problems of those on low income. Now, however, we have the real voice of the Tory party speaking—no money for the poor—cut back—end the deficits. That is the pristine pure voice of the niggardly mean-minded sort of Tory who says, "No money for anybody; let's cut back."

I enjoyed that, Mr. Speaker. I think it was useful to have that point of view expressed in this House—no more sham, no more charade, none of the posturing for the cameras. The hon. member has once again lived up to his reputation of being the true voice of the hard rockbed of Canadian Conservativism which holds, basically, that government should do nothing at all.

On this side of the House we appreciate all this, Mr. Speaker, because it shows what the differences are between us. I just wish, however, that the hon. member had been a little more accurate with some of the facts he put on record. I know that when he was a minister of the Crown he did not want to be confused by facts, but I would have thought that these past months in opposition would have changed his behaviour. Having occupied a cabinet post, I should have thought he would have been more careful about what he presented as facts.

He said that he is tired of mythology and wants to get down to the real facts. Yet he was prepared to say in this House that the burden of unemployment insurance premiums was being hidden by this government, and he charged that this was an act of deception. What he failed to mention, however, was that the measure was introduced by his government in the December 13 budget—that the Crosbie budget introduced the principle that a greater share of the unemployment insurance program should be carried through the premium base. That budget recommended that the premium be increased to $1.60. When this government took office last winter, the premiums were frozen at $1.35 as it was felt it would have been awkward to continue with the plan of the previous government. Contributors were given a full year's respite.

It is a little unfair for the hon. member to suggest that the proposal to increase the unemployment insurance premium is an act of this government when, in fact, it was supported by members of his own caucus at the time the legislation was introduced. It was supported with a great deal of enthusiasm on the quite legitimate grounds that, over a period of time, the burden of the unemployment insurance fund had to be carried more equitably. The percentage of funds carried by the public sector had risen to 40 per cent, instead of the 20 per cent formula that the public sector had normally carried. We agreed the public sector was carrying a great burden. The hon. member forgot to mention, however, that his government introduced the measure and his caucus supported it.

While dealing with misstatements and errors or sins of omission, I think the hon. member would be the first to admit his own serious sin of omission. When dealing with oil pricing, he suggested that the formula we put forward included a Syncrude levy which would take it to above $4, and that the Tories would never have done that. We know that is not true, Mr. Speaker, because the Syncrude levy is a statutory requirement that every government would have to impose. Thus the Crosbie $4 increase would have become $4.75. In fairness, the former president of the treasury board should have acknowledged that.

If this debate is to be conducted with fairness, it would have been in the interest of honest observation and reporting for the hon. member to have been more accurate in the statements he made.

That brings me to the need for a more accurate and honest appraisal of the budget. Opposition spokesmen have raised cries of alarm up and down this country in the last week or so about the dastardly effect the budget will have on western Canada. Just this past weekend in my home city of Winnipeg, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested that this budget rang the death bell of federalism—that the Liberals will bring about separatism. Of course, he was prepared to say that he did not believe in separatism, but still most of his speech dealt with it. He implied that the budget discriminated against western Canadians.

The Premier of Alberta has suggested the budget discriminates against his province, that the government is moving into his living room to take over his furniture and all his services and resources.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) suggested that we would be embarked upon the slippery slopes of separatism if we follow the "made in Ottawa", central Canadian type of policy. Mr. Speaker, I am a western Canadian, and I do not think I take a backseat to anyone in this House when it comes to concern for my region and the type of development that should occur there. I take strong exception, however, to the fear tactics being parlayed by certain opposition spokesmen who suggest that there is a dichotomy—that the national government is not national at all but represents "them" and not "us". In a subtle manner they try to create a division in this country. They are employing the tactics of division for whatever cynical, political reasons they may have. I know what the reasons are, Mr. Speaker.

As Minister of Employment and Immigration I will have to offer my services to the Leader of the Opposition within a few months. As an equal opportunity employer, the government is quite prepared to make sure that all the facilities of counselling and job placement are available to him when he needs them.

The tactics being employed by the opposition are very dangerous. They are playing with fire. They are taking the honest concerns and grievances that are felt in my region of the country, and in others, and fanning the flames into a conflagration, and then suggesting that there is a sweep of separatism emerging in the west when, in fact, the only separatism is in the minds of those who talk about it.

Sure, there are differences of opinion and there are honest criticisms about what we have done, but we are prepared to argue those criticisms and differences. However, we should not fall into the trap of this kind of fear-mongering which is simply trying to exploit those concerns and anxieties and turn them into something sour and distorted. That is mythology which is being parlayed in Canada at the present time is setting up a false distinction and a false dichotomy, trying to create divisions in Canada by employing the most exaggerated hyperbolic misstatements of facts that have ever been expressed in the history of this Parliament. We had some good examples in question period. We heard some absurd outlandish extrapolation of figures and ideas, which simply boggle the imagination until you know the people who expressed them, and then you understand why.

I am going to make a case this afternoon that the budget put forward last Tuesday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) does far more for western Canada, is far more in its best interests, than anything that was put forward by the previous government—those great paragons and defenders of the west. No matter how members on the other side try to cut it or try to divide it, when you compare those two documents, as members on the other side are fond of doing, and add up the list of benefits that will accrue to western Canada, this budget comes out far more on the plus side than the one put forward by the former minister of finance and flabbergab last December 13. It is important that western Canadians understand that because western Canada will in large part be setting the agenda for discussion for debate over the next several years. It is the area where the dynamic growth in Canada will take place, and where much of the employment will occur, even though the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), in one of his flights of fancy this afternoon during question period, suggested that perhaps half of the province of Alberta was going to be unemployed. That was one of the most absurd statements that have ever been expressed in this House. It is in western Canada where the employment will continue to be.

I returned from western Canada last night. While I was there I met with representatives of the business community and the oil, gas and mining communities. Their concerns were not that of the member for Calgary West. Their concern was getting more people out to western Canada because they need skilled workers. Their concern was not the unemployment problem but to get more people from the other parts of Canada to work in the mines, the gas fields, and in natural gas exploration.

I would suggest it is about time the hon. member for Calgary West went home and talked to those people and understood what their concerns are, and not suggest something which is being manufactured or generated in his own very fertile imagination.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member opposite is making statements about what I said earlier in the House. I think the record should be corrected. I am implying considerable job loss in eastern Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member's remarks do not constitute a point of order.

Mr. Axworthy: Let me indicate what the budget said. Let me point out, first and foremost, that we were responsive to the issues in western Canada by not putting in the budget many of the things being speculated about. There was a great sort of campaign being carried out. We heard such things as, "Look what these Liberals are going to do in western Canada. We will have an export tax". The battle flags were waving and the trenches were being dug purely on the idea of fighting this discriminatory tax. It was a legitimate concern to be raised, and one to which we responded by not bringing in an export tax. I am suggesting that we were prepared to respond to those concerns. We did not totally abdicate the need to get additional revenues for the federal government but we got those revenues in a different kind of way, through a different kind of mechanism.

Also introduced in that budget was a very clear strategy and program for ensuring that the major benefits of the revenues derived and developed out of the new resource boom of western Canada would be recycled back into the west. These revenues would be used for new energy supplies and sources, for the industrialization of western Canada and to provide for conversion from oil to natural gas and electricity. These are energy sources in ample supply. So any suggestion that this budget ignores the concerns of the west simply means the provisions of this budget have been ignored.

The major beneficiaries of this budget—contrary to the point of view that was being put forward earlier in this House—are the consumers of western Canada and the consumers right across the country. A great deal of heartfelt anguish was being expressed on the part of some members about what was going to happen to the consumer. I will tell you what will happen to the consumers in my province. In 1984 they will be paying $400 to $500 a year less to heat their homes and drive their cars under this budget than under the previous Tory budget. That is the difference, Mr. Speaker. That is the real message of this budget. The Canadian consumer will find he is not paying the kind of inflated prices which were being put forward in the December 13 document of last year. It is that money which will stay in the hands of the consumer to buy other goods and services and which will keep the economy going.

Similarly, the farmers of western Canada will not have an excise tax on their fuel oil. They, too, are being saved by this budget. They will not have that kind of burden to carry which would add to their costs and, therefore, to the cost of food and agricultural products. That was avoided by this budget as compared to the document put forward by the so-called defenders of the west.

There are a series of major stimulants in the budget for the growth of industry in western Canada. I find it hard to understand why the Tories persist in assuming that the only agencies for the development of our energy fields must be multinational corporations. Why is it the Tories assume that it is impossible for Canadian-owned companies to become the major shareholders, the major entrepreneurs, the major enterprisers in the development of our oil and gas and our energy resources? What they are doing basically is defending the corporate system, instead of defending what should be the real opportunity, which is to develop new businesses in western Canada to provide for a whole new network of enterprise and activity through the incentive grant program. This is something that was not offered in the previous budget.

So, if we are comparing budgets and comparing measures, the opportunity for Canadian businessmen in western Canada to get an advantage and a step up in developing those resources, is in this budget. There are nothing of that kind in the previous one. It is out of that kind of incentive program, based around the idea that it is far more effective in our energy system to have Canadian-owned enterprises and companies, that we can avoid the massive transfusion of funds out of Canada which amounted to $3.5 billion in the past two years. That money could be kept in Canada working to develop new energy supplies and resources.

Mr. Hawkes: One-fifth of the interest paid on the public debt is paid to foreign countries.

Mr. Axworthy: I think the hon. member for Calgary West has missed cheerleading practice, or something.

We are talking about a budget which is designed as a blueprint to encourage and develop western industry; to develop the very growth, jobs and opportunities that we think are so important to fuel growth throughout the rest of Canada. We should not be listening to the doomsayers and those preaching the gloom of depression and recession in the west, because this gives us an enormous opportunity, even for those companies I have talked about which are saying, "My goodness, we have had cutbacks and we have had our livelihood taken away from us". That is true, their percentage of revenues has been reduced, but the volume of money has doubled.

The amount of capital available to the oil and gas companies will double in the next three years compared to the last three years. There will be far more capital going in through private hands than there was up until last Thursday night. If hon. members opposite cannot read that in the budget, we suggest they take a Braille course because it is very clear that the full and necessary capital to provide for all the exploration and development is available.

Furthermore, we are prepared to take on this issue. We feel that that in itself is not enough. There must be more than that. There must be a very clear public role and responsibility in the development of our energy supplies. We make no apologies not only for maintaining Petro-Canada as an effective vehicle for energy development, but for enhancing its role. I will tell you one reason, as a westerner, because Petro-Canada is a western based company. It now provides jobs for over 2,000 people in the city of Calgary alone. It is a major sponsor of research and development, of new exploration and development projects right across Canada and in the international sphere.

As a western Canadian I take pride in the fact that this government was responsible for putting in place a brand new company which is now one of the major leaders and innovators in the energy field in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: What were our friends opposite doing? They were cannibalizing it. They were going to dismantle it. They were going to take it apart. Those great defenders of the west were going to subtract and eliminate one of the most important and effective agencies of energy development which this country has, a western agency of development.

To make the case further, I would point out it was just in the last week that we have taken the same model of Petro-Canada in the oil and gas field and applied it to the area of renewable energy and conservation technology. If members opposite ask what is in it for the west, I will say that in my own city of Winnipeg the new Enertech corporation is to be located. We have the opportunity of developing a brand new high technology there which will serve this country for the next 100 years. It is again a western Canadian city that will become the centre of new skills, development, and innovation. It will put in place a brand new industrial base in western Canada.

Of course members opposite are going to vote against it because they do not believe in those kinds of things. They do not believe in enabling and assisting western Canadians to develop new technology, to develop new industries within their area, because they really are the friends of the multicorporations. That is their primary purpose. That is where their ambitions and concerns lie, not in developing Canadian companies, not with developing institutions that will be located in western Canada and will provide jobs and opportunities in the west. They are more interested in their friends in the boardrooms of Toronto. That is where their interest lies.

I will not accept this kind of mythology that is being expressed that somehow separatism will emerge because the west is being ignored. If there is anyone who has been guilty of ignoring the interests of western Canada, it is many of the members opposite who were prepared to support a budget last December that had nothing in it for western Canada, except a sell-out.

Further, we would like to point to the introduction in the budget of the western development fund. It is designed to take the proper profits and revenues deriving from resources and recycle them back into western Canada to provide a much more diversified economic base. There is not a westerner in this chamber who has not learned, as part of his history, the whole boom and bust cycle of the west based upon the erratic behaviour of commodity or resource markets.

One of the great ambitions of western Canadians has been to develop a broadly based economy with a wide variety of components of industry, processing and manufacturing, so that we can even out that boom and bust cycle and have a proper system of economic development which does not rely upon that uneven, bumpy road. That has been a ligitimate concern. It has not been met that well in the past.

I agree full well with all of the spokesmen from western Canada, provincial or not, who believe we should be using our resources and the revenues from them to provide for better economic development in western Canada. Where I take issue is with the way they chose to do it. Their choice is to leave all the control, responsibility and decision-making in the hands of individual provincial governments. They assume that will result in the kind of goal and ambition that we all share, which is the proper economic development of the west.

That flies in the face of the history of western Canada. Throughout the history of our region the federal government has always played an important and influential role in ensuring that the west world be developed. It was not the provincial governments which bailed out western farmers during the depression. It was the federal government that had to come to their rescue, based upon taxes drawn from other parts of the country.

It was the federal government which had to put the Wheat Board into place against the opposition of several provincial governments in order to provide for the orderly marketing of grain. When the issue of the 1940s and 1950s was the whole dry land farming problem, it was the federal government through the PFRA that came to the rescue of the prairies. It put in place the irrigation ditches and dug holes that provided proper watering resources for the west, oftentimes paid for by the tax dollars of Canadians from other parts of this country.

There is nothing wrong with that. That is what a federal government is for. It is to share the benefits and share the wealth. That is where we do take issue. That is where we divide, myself and those opposite, because we believe there is an important and necessary role for a central government to play in the development of western Canada, to its benefit and the benefit of the entire country. It is not to retreat and shrink our horizons, not to rely solely upon a provincial government because its own electoral mandate is only to serve the people within its narrow range of boundaries 400 miles wide. I would not expect them to do anything more.

I was a provincial member for seven or eight years. Your mandate is to serve a provincial constituency and jurisdiction. However, there is a fundamental difference when one becomes a member of the federal House and federal government. You realize there are choices that have to be made to serve one end of the country or the other.

It saddens me that so many spokesmen from the west are taking on that kind of parochialism. They say they do not care about the rest of Canada. They are not interested in sharing the wealth. They do not want to see a proper distribution of the benefits. They want to keep everything for themselves.

The fundamental flaw in that kind of reasoning is that, if we allow it to happen, not only does the west suffer in terms of its economic development, but so does the entire country. That is the central issue in this budget. That is where this budget differs fundamentally from the one we had on December 13. It does incorporate the basic idea of sharing and distribution.

The idea of the western fund is to use the federal jurisdiction which cuts across regional and provincial boundaries to put into place the kind of infrastructure that will help make the west grow. We from the west well know that one of the most serious concerns we have is in the area of transportation. We could be selling far more of our grain, potash, coal and other commodities, if we could move them to world markets.

The railways tell us that by this year their carrying capacity will be fully used, and in two years from now we will be 30 per cent short. We will all be losers if that takes place. Western Canada loses and so does the country. Therefore we must put in place a transportation program to modernize our entire distribution system for the western region. It must be not for one province, but for the entire region.

Who has the jurisdiction to do that? It is not the provincial governments but the federal government. The provincial governments are not in the business of trying to develop a full regional network of linking one part of the country with the other. That takes money. You do not wave a wand or snap your fingers and get the $6 billion, $7 billion or $8 billion it will take to modernize our railroad system in the west.

The money must be recycled. It must come from the fastest growing revenue source, which is the resource boom of western Canada. The benefits which flow out of that kind of investment are changing the tariffs, the rates and the Crow, and putting money into new tracks, terminals and ports. It means we all benefit from it. It is not a zero-sum game. It is not the "we" and "us" that the Leader of the Opposition was talking about on Saturday.

● (1620)

That is the kind of investment which will benefit all Canadians because, if we modernize our railroads, and the tracks are built in London, and the cars in Trenton, Nova Scotia, the entire country receives the full benefits of that kind of economic boom. That is what we are arguing about in this budget. The hon. member for York-Peel said that this is not a budget because it talks just about energy. No, we are not talking just about energy. We are talking about a fundamental question of how this country is going to be governed. Is it going to be governed in the interests of a few, or in the interests of the many? That is the difference, and that is the issue which is really joined in this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: We must concentrate on the energy area because it is fundamental to our economy. As we said during the election campaign, we must use the energy issue for the full development of the entire industrial base of Canada. We must look at the benefits of major investments in energy.

On Thursday night Mr. Lougheed appeared on the television screen and pleaded poverty. He said that the federal government is going to come in and take his money away from him. I read the figures, and what we are leaving Mr. Lougheed is $100 billion in revenue over the next ten years. The per capita revenues of the people of Alberta will be ten times those of the people of British Columbia, and 20 times those of the people of my province. That is hardly a case for poverty. One can hardly say that we are impoverishing the west. I do not gainsay that money. It should stay there and be working there, but we also should not gainsay the benefits for other parts and regions of the west and the rest of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, if I might conclude with one sentence by saying that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This will have to be done with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, although I appreciate the opportunity to speak this afternoon, I must say that it gives me very little pleasure to speak on this first Liberal government budget of the 1980s. I say that because this motion more than any which will come before this House, with the possible exception of the constitutional question, provides a dim glimmer of light into the future showing where this government is taking this country. It is an omen not only in what it says but also in what it fails to tell the Canadian people.

In introducing this budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) reminded us, and I quote:

> Only ten years ago, the world was riding high on the long wave of postwar economic expansion . . . While inflation was beginning to creep up in many industrial countries, we all felt confident in our collective abilities to manage growth as the world economies expanded in concert.

It was in this atmosphere of optimism that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his commitment to build a "Just Society" for Canada. To reinforce this commitment the current Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) reiterated his fundamental belief in people oriented government, on February 26, 1973. He said:

> 'Policies for people' is a motto to which I wholeheartedly subscribe. It is a motto which ensures our responsiveness to the aspirations of the Canadian people—

The desire to build a more just and equitable Canadian society is, I am sure, an aspiration shared by every member of this House. But a commitment can either be real and sincere, or deceptive and fraudulent. The ultimate measure of our commitments depends on the actions or policies we adopt and the results achieved. In spite of all the rhetoric, the net effect of Liberal policy in the 1970s has been systematically to undermine Canada's prospects for the future. In 1970 the rate of inflation in Canada was 3.3 per cent, and today, after years of "wrestling inflation to the ground," prices are increasing at a rate of 10.7 per cent.

In 1970 we enjoyed a $1.1 billion surplus in our balance of payments. Today, after ten years of gross mismanagement of the economy, our balance of payments position has deteriorated to an unprecedented $6 billion deficit.

At the beginning of the last decade the Canadian dollar traded at par with the U.S. dollar. Today it is worth 85 cents U.S., and by the end of this decade, if the budget is any indication of where this government is taking Canada, we will be lucky if it is worth 60 cents U.S.

In 1969 the share of national income going to the 20 per cent of Canadians with the lowest incomes stood at only 4.3 per cent. By 1978, the last year for which data is available, this government's policies had managed to cut their share back even further, to 4.1 per cent.

In 1969 the unemployment rate in Canada was only 4.4 per cent. The legacy of Liberal economic policies in the 1970s is that today we have more people out of work in Canada than were unemployed during the Great Depression. The unemployment rate is nearly 8 per cent. In reality the unemployment rate is certainly in excess of 8 per cent, with one million Canadians unemployed.

In the early 1970s our gross national product in constant dollars was growing at respectable rates, around 6 per cent and 7 per cent. By the end of the decade this had been cut back sharply, and according to the Minister of Finance's own budget statement the other night, we will experience an absolute decline in real output this year.

This budget has the dubious distinction of heralding that Liberal tradition into the 1980s. It represents a renewed commitment to the politics of opportunism, the politics of resource dependency, the politics of social injustice, and the politics of wilful deceit, all at the expense of the Canadian public.

There currently is a real controversy over the proper role of government in our society. Should we have more government or less government? I venture to say that one thing is clear, and that is that the Canadian people would definitely be better off without this government.

However, the controversy follows from the failure of government to provide the leadership this country presently so desperately needs. There is a sense of despair and uncertainty across Canada. There is no clear consensus on what we as a people are trying to achieve. There are no plans. There are no goals. I suggest that people across Canada from the Atlantic provinces to the north, throughout central Canada and into the west, are puzzled today. They are confused today, and the voices we have heard referred to as the voices of western separatism are simply reflections of that.

I for one do not for a moment believe that westerners are prepared to separate from this fine country, but they are upset. Western Canadians, like Canadians everywhere, are concerned that there is no direction for this country and no indication of the goals and aspirations of this government. Their feelings of frustration are vented through this avenue of separatism.

To some extent this despair and uncertainty we find across Canada are reflected in the constitutional debate, but nowhere is this better illustrated than in this budget. Here, in the first budget of the 1980s, there is no statement of clearly defined national objectives. We have no idea where this government thinks our country should be in 1985, let alone in 1990. There are no visions, no goals, no objectives, and no direction. Who would begin to develop a family without any idea of where it is going in the future? What businessman would consider operating a business with no objective, no clearly stated goal, and no vision? To my mind it is this lack of vision and direction which is causing the despair and concern in Canadians everywhere.

Is this government concerned about social justice? Then what should the distribution of income look like in 1985 and 1990? Is this government concerned about our mushrooming balance of trade deficit in manufactured goods? Then what should our balance of trade in end products be in 1985 and 1990? What percentage of the domestic market should be supplied by domestic production by 1985 and 1990? Is the government concerned about the level of unemployment in Canada? Then what is our target unemployment rate for 1985? This government has coerced Canadians into accepting unemployment rates of 7 per cent and 8 per cent. In a country as rich as Canada, with the possibilities which exist here, to accept rates of 7 per cent and 8 per cent is a disgrace. Many western industrialized nations would not consider these rates to be acceptable for a moment, yet the Liberal government has been able to convince Canadians that this is just fine.

Is the government concerned about the quality and the quantity of houses in Canada? Then what should be our target for the national housing stock in 1985 and 1990? Is the government concerned about the government deficit? Then what should be the size of the deficit in 1985, or ten years from now?

One could go on and on, but the message is abundantly clear. This government has failed for 12 years to place before the Canadian people a set of clearly defined national objectives upon which sound development and sound policies could be based. Without clearly defined medium and long-term goals and objectives, the formulation of government policy becomes an exercise in the politics of expedience and short-term political gain. Not only are such policies difficult to evaluate, but in the long-term they are certainly doomed to failure.

Let me illustrate what I am talking about with a few simple examples drawn from the record of Liberal policy initiatives taken in the 1970s. The throne speech of 1970 stated:

As Canada moves into the seventies, we are all invited to join in this bold enterprise—to share the excitement—to face the challenge, to pursue the distant ideal of the just society.

Later in the same speech we find:

—legislation will be introduced incorporating policies designed to make more equitable the economic burden shared by our fellow dwellers in this complex and varied land.

While presenting the budget for 1973 to the House, the Hon. John Turner, the then minister of finance, stated that his budget was —aimed at balanced economic expansion so that all regions share equitably in our growing wealth, because national unity demands fair shares in the national prosperity.

In spite of all the rhetoric, the net effect of Liberal policy in the 1970s has been to lower the share of our national income going to the 40 per cent of Canadian families and unattached individuals as the bottom of our income distribution, and raise the share going to the 40 per cent of families and unattached individuals at the high end of income distribution. In addition, regional disparities in Canada as measured by unemployment rates and per capita incomes have grown progressively worse over the course of the decade. So much for the "Just Society".

What of this budget, Mr. Speaker? The Minister of Finance tells us that the policies of his predecessors have created a tax system which allows numerous profitable corporations and wealthy individuals to pay little or no tax. That is what he is telling us! My colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), has pointed out that there are hundreds of Canadians who, last year, earned in excess of $100,000 each and paid not a nickel in income tax. I wonder how many working Canadians last year paid not a nickel in income tax, who are making substantially less than $100,000 annually.

What does the minister propose to do in this budget about these inequities? Absolutely nothing. There is not even a commitment to increase the share of national income going to the poorest 20 per cent of Canadian families by even one hundredth of one per cent by 1985. Again, there are no plans, no objectives, and no stated goals.

No problem better illustrates or brings together the many dimensions of what we might call the Canadian crisis than the growth and structure of our balance of payments deficit. We opened the last decade with a surplus of $1.1 billion in our current account. In 1972 we began importing more from the rest of the world than we exported, and only seven years later our balance of payments deficit has grown to a record $5 billion. Today we enjoy the dubious distinction of having the largest current account deficit, both in absolute terms and relative to GNP, among western industrial nations.

Our merchandise trade surplus of $4 billion last year only results from our increased willingness and growing dependence on exports of raw materials and semi-processed goods to earn foreign exchange. It hides our massive deficit of $16 billion in fully manufactured goods.

Because manufacturing is more labour intensive than our resource industries, it is this sector of the economy that holds out the greatest potential for solving the unemployment problem in Canada. Let us look at how this sector has fared under Liberal and Conservative stewardship. Taking imports as a percentage of the Canadian market, imports of agricultural equipment in 1965 amounted to 85 per cent. Ten years later they were 95 per cent. In forest equipment in 1965 they were 30 per cent, and in 1975 they were 47 per cent. In mining machinery, very important in my own riding, imports as a percentage of the Canadian market were 59 per cent in 1965, and in 1975 they had increased to nearly 80 per cent. Construction equipment, so crucial to western development at this time, in 1965 was 77 per cent, and in 1975 it was nearly 85 per cent.

If one looks at the entire machinery sector as a whole, in 1965 we exported $365 million and imported $1.7 billion worth of machinery and equipment. By 1975 our machinery exports had increased to $1.7 billion, but imports had jumped to $5.5 billion. This growing deficit in our trade in finished machinery and equipment meant that more production and employment were being created abroad than in Canada.

However, the machinery industry is not unique. Similar stories can be told about the Canadian autoparts industry, the electronics industry, the household appliance industry, etc. What does the Minister of Finance offer in this budget to deal directly with our growing balance of trade crisis in finished manufactured goods? Absolutely nothing.

The biggest gains to be made in employment and production in the 1980s will be through import substitution in our own domestic market. This is why an industrial strategy for Canada is so important. We must produce more of the goods Canadians buy.

To give you an idea of how powerful import substitution can be in Canada, let me point out that if Canadians would spend the equivalent of only one day's pay more a year on Canadian-made goods instead of imports, it would create more than 26,000 jobs in Canada. A few weeks ago, when I introduced in the House a recommendation that the government implement, immediately, a "Buy Canadian" program similar to the one we have seen in the United States where they have a "Buy American" program, it was soundly rejected by the Liberal government. Have they some other strategy? What does this budget offer in the way of any industrial strategy? Nothing.

Let us now turn to import substitution in manufactured goods. What do we hear in the budget on this? Complete silence.

It gets worse, Mr. Speaker. The small benefit we derived from our $4 billion merchandise trade surplus is more than cancelled by the $9.5 billion deficit on our service account. There is virtual hemorrhaging of capital out of this country in the form of profits, dividends, royalties, consulting and engineering fees, interest payments, and tourist expenditures. This amounts to more than $168 million flowing out to the foreign creditors of this country every week. What does the minister offer the Canadian people in this budget to begin the long and difficult process of correcting this imbalance? Nothing, Mr. Speaker. In fact his projection is that the service account deficit will grow by $6.2 billion by 1985, an increase of 55 per cent.

As our balance of payments further deteriorates, we become increasingly dependent upon foreign investors and creditors to bridge the gap between our stagnating production and our growing consumption.

This budget, both in what it does and in what it fails to do, will make a major contribution to increasing the level of uncertainty surrounding future government policy in Canada. The failure to define clear national economic and social objectives, and the continued use of monetary policy to pursue often conflicting goals, will all contribute to undermining further the ability of business, especially small business, to plan and carry out investment projects with long-run pay-offs in employment and production.

Despite the introduction of small business development bonds, this budget's net impact on small business will, very likely, be negative. The minister has failed to recognize the growing social and economic significance of small businesses to Canadians. Every sector of our economy is represented in the more than 900,000 small enterprises representing well over 90 per cent of all business conducted in Canada. Small businesses employ 2.5 million Canadians, or about 42 per cent of the entire labour force. They account for significant portions of all business sales in Canada. The economic significance of small business is illustrated further by job creation, which is something all of us in Canada are particularly interested in at this point in time.

Small businesses often generate more direct and indirect jobs per unit on invested capital than larger firms. During 1977, for example, firms employing fewer than 20 persons created 97 per cent of all new jobs in Canada. If we are to overcome our unemployment problem we must ensure that we encourage the growth of a healthy, vigorous small business sector.

It is generally recognized that high interest rates impose a relatively greater burden on small enterprises than on large corporations. In part this is because small businesses rely heavily on the chartered banks and other financial intermediaries for credit and do not have access to the range of financial alternatives available to larger corporations. As record high interest rates began to take their toll in 1979 by pushing small business bankruptcies to post-war record levels, the former Conservative government proposed interest rate relief through the small business development bond introduced in the tragic budget of last December.

The Liberals promised lower interest rates during the 1980 election campaign and, true to their word, once elected, raised interest rates even higher than had the Conservatives. Small business bankruptcies in the first nine months of 1980 rose 18 per cent over the corresponding period last year, but the value of liabilities involved in these bankruptcies increased by 28 per cent to $560 million. However, this is only part of the story. Official bankruptcy figures do not account for the thousands of businesses which are no longer able to make ends meet, quietly close their doors, and go out of business without going through the formal bankruptcy process.

The official statistics also fail to account for the social strain business failures place on the general well-being of our communities across Canada. There is a human side to this question. When we are talking about business failures and business closures, we are talking about the dashed dreams, hopes, aspirations of Canadian individuals and families. Their visions for the future, their creativity and willingness to participate in the future of Canada are dashed.

Under increased pressure from the business community, and lacking any coherent policy of his own, the Minister of Finance dusted off the SBDB proposal of the former Conservative government for his April 21 economic statement. The small business development bond is a classic example of a poorly thought-out set of objectives leading an inept government to formulate ad hoc, band-aid legislation which has absolutely no hope of achieving one tenth of its original vague promise. It was ill-conceived by the Conservatives who pride themselves on being fiscally responsible but had no idea what it would have cost the federal treasury in lost revenue.

When the Department of Finance began formulating the details of the SBDB, they discovered that in June of this year financial institutions held approximately $16 billion in existing small business debt which could have qualified for interest rate subsidies under the new program. If these debts were rolled into SBDBs, this alone would have meant a loss of $500 million to $600 million to the federal treasury. With the federal deficit running at over $14 billion, the Department of Finance could hardly view with enthusiasm a further massive loss of revenue. So they began to impose qualifications, limitations and exclusions.

For example, small business development bond loans cannot be granted to unincorporated small businesses, the family businesses or the single proprietorships. They cannot be used to provide working capital, the most important capital requirement of almost every small business. They cannot be used to buy second-hand capital equipment and machinery.

The House will recall that the purpose of this legislation was to provide interest rate relief to small businesses. The effect of these restrictions on excluding the great majority of Canadian small businesses from benefiting under this legislation is absolutely staggering. Of the approximate 930,000 active small businesses in Canada, the first restriction excludes over 625,000 firms which are unincorporated small businesses from receiving interest rate relief under the SBDB program.

Small businesses in the wholesale, retail, construction and manufacturing sectors are required to carry and finance relatively large amounts of inventory and goods in process, compared with service industries, for example. Inflation and high interest rates raise dramatically the operating costs of these businesses. The great majority will not benefit from the SBDB legislation because the second limitation expressly restricts the use of SBDB loans from providing working or operating capital.

Many small businesses are able to hold their start-up or expansion costs down by purchasing used machinery and equipment. If this second-hand capital stock has been idle or underutilized, its purchase will have contributed to increased productivity and over-all capacity utilization in the economy. Under the proposed legislation SBDB loans cannot be used to purchase second-hand and used equipment. This restriction will exclude many small businesses which simply cannot afford the high cost of new plant and machinery.

Finally, the SBDB program expires on March 31 of this year. The exceptionally short lead time and failure of the Department of Finance to communicate effectively the details of the program to financial institutions, and the virtually hopeless task of the head and regional offices of those financial institutions in communicating the details to their branches, dooms this program to failure before it even gets through Parliament. At best I am afraid it will be a program catering almost exclusively to the metropolitan parts of Canada, at the expense of small communities in rural sectors.

Our best and most optimistic estimate of the number of Canadian small businesses which will actually benefit from the SBDB is approximately 40,000. This means that 95 per cent of small businesses will be excluded from this legislation, that only 5 per cent of small businesses in Canada will benefit from this so-called great measure introduced in the budget.

Who benefits from SBDB? Under the legislation, interest payments on a qualifying small business loan entered into after December 11, 1979, will be treated for tax purposes as dividends. As a result the interest will not be taxable to the corporate lender, nor deductible as a business expense to the small business borrower. Because corporate lenders incur no tax liability on the interest received, they will be able to reduce the rate of interest charged. In essence the legislation not only provides interest rate relief to qualifying small businesses, but also it provides a tax shelter to corporate lenders, in particular the hard-pressed chartered banks. The real beneficiaries of this particular legislation will be the chartered banks and lending institutions of Canada. They will benefit from this.

This ill-conceived measure which is part of the hopeless budget is ad hoc, band-aid, Liberal legislation at its very worst. It does nothing to ease the burden of high interest rates on 95 per cent of Canadian small businesses. It will subsidize the chartered banks of Canada. At a time when the federal budget is running a record $14 billion deficit, unemployment is rising, and the economy is in a recession, it is not only fiscally irresponsible but socially irresponsible to require Canadian taxpayers to make up an additional $250 million shortfall in revenue when chartered banks and other corporate lending agencies are earning near record levels.

There are a number of proposals that the government could have introduced quite easily which would have provided high interest rate relief to small businesses across Canada, and to lead one to expect the lending agencies of Canada to carry some of the burden of combatting the cost of inflation and the cost of money during these times. But, no, the Liberal government is asking the Canadian taxpayers to provide that.

In this discussion on the budget today one could comment on the lack of encouragement given to the housing industry in order to meet our housing crisis. One could comment on the serious cutbacks in social programs at a time when culture building in Canada is very important. Yet the kind of funding and encouragement some of the more crucial culture builders in our country need has been eliminated from the budget. It has certainly not been expanded. Consequently, that is the kind of leadership which is recognized as being provided by the Liberal government in Canada. As one of the richest countries in the world with unlimited possibilities, when optimism should be running extremely high, it is a time when this government has given the Canadian people little to be encouraged about.

The small business community are shrugging their shoulders in disbelief at the lack of direction in our economy. The housing crisis one finds in every sector of Canada looks toward the federal government for some leadership and finds that it is not forthcoming. More and more of the responsibility is being thrown into the private sector through programs such as the MURB program. Yet we see that this is a very simplistic and elementary way to approach a very complex and serious problem. We have made rental citizens in Canada second-class citizens.

We have made our cultural institutions second rate. Artists across Canada have been given little encouragement to develop the arts and their specialties. This is a time when optimism should be running at an all-time high, when people should be looking forward to a positive future, when there should be a definite direction given in the fields of agriculture, housing, and in the construction and fishing industries, and one could go on and on. Yet we find absolutely nothing. Although times have never been better, citizens across the country are looking for some direction, looking for a vision of the future. In a country which has not had a vision for nearly a decade, yet the government presents a budget which is disappointing to Canadians. That is a travesty.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed very happy to be given this opportunity to contribute to the budget debate. It is a debate on a budget which is clearly of great importance to all Canadians. We in the government are confident that the implementation of the provisions of this budget will ensure both economic and energy security for Canadians in the years ahead.

The government faced an economic environment which saw unemployment and inflation at unacceptable levels, and a rate of growth in the economy which was dramatically reduced due to a worldwide economic slowdown in general, and an expanding U.S. recession in particular. In an effort to counteract these various pressures the federal government brought forward what has been referred to as an energy budget. It is a package that realistically attacks the problems of Canada's current economic malaise at its source. It abandons the short term solutions of the past for longer-term structural realignments.

In this regard I refer to the major initiatives with respect to the Canadianization of the oil and gas industry, and other energy-related initiatives, which will guarantee Canada's energy security and the place of individual Canadians and Canadian corporations in the energy field.

In a world economy increasingly dependent upon the stability of oil supplies, the emergence of Canadians as their own energy masters is fundamental. I know that it is far too obvious to the hon. members opposite that this budget is first and foremost a good budget for average Canadians. The howls of indignation from the members of the official opposition are ample evidence that we have succeeded where they have failed. I regret that the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) has left the chamber.

I had an opportunity over the weekend to speak to a great many average Canadians in my riding. They agreed with me that it was a good budget and were pleased that de-indexing did not take place, that RRSPs and, more important for those who wish at some time to own their own homes and save realistically for them, that the RHOSPs were also left in place.

A quick glance at the price components of the Crosbie budget of last December will indicate clearly that this government has the interests of low and medium-income Canadians very much in mind. During the term 1980-1984 there is a difference of over 60 cents in the price of a gallon of gasoline between our budget and that of the December Crosbie budget. The difference in the cost of home heating oil during the same period will amount to about 45 cents a gallon. The difference between our budget and the Crosbie budget in the figures on natural gas prices is a whopping $3.30 per thousand cubic feet.

In 1980 a typical Canadian consumer will spend $1,375 to heat his home with fuel oil and to purchase gasoline for his car. This would cost $3,700 in 1984 if domestic oil prices were at international levels. However, under the price schedule of the national energy program the cost will be $2,520. That is $1,180 less than the world price—clearly a real saving.

These savings can be significantly increased if consumers take advantage of the assistance offered under the national energy program to reduce their energy costs by switching from oil to some alternate source of energy such as electricity, natural gas, or other fuel. Not only will the consumer benefit from the federal government's conversion grant, which may be as high as $800 with the federal government matching individual investment dollar for dollar, but the consumer will also benefit in the years that follow conversion from a reduction in energy costs.

Given the extent of savings on energy bills these expenditures are probably the best private investment opportunity in Canada. The pay-back will be quick, and the investment will continue to pay dividends in energy savings long into the future. I am sure if hon. members check with their constituency offices they will find out that requests for applications are pouring in.

To reinforce the conversion program the government is stipulating that no new residential unit built after July 1, 1981, will qualify for federal financial assistance or guarantees if it is heated by oil, unless no reasonable alternative is available. If the consumer takes advantage of the expanded Canadian Home Insulation Program under which the government will pay up to $500 toward the cost of insulating a home, then savings will be even further increased.

In my own region of Nickel Belt we are making advances in our utilization of alternate energy technology. The provincial government's 12-storey office building in Sudbury has been designed for very low energy consumption in an area of quite rigorous climatic conditions. Some 56 solar collectors on the roof will provide about 35 per cent of the domestic water heating requirements of the building. This is particularly appropriate in light of Sudbury's reputation—and I say this with some pride—as being the sunshine capital of northern Ontario.

Canadian consumers will also benefit from the creation of a Canadian alternate energy corporation, Enertech Canada, that has been established to support the commercial production of renewable energy and conservation technologies. Enertech Canada will support the work of Canadian firms engaged in the development and commercialization of these technologies by entering joint ventures, making equity investments, and offering marketing assistance. Initially it will be set up as a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, but after that period it will become an independent Crown corporation.

One option for conversion away from oil that is particularly important to me is that of wood, because in my region of northern Ontario wood does indeed play an important role. I might add that it has presented us with a major problem, that of the wood rustler, but that is a problem for the law. To be eligible for a conversion grant from oil to wood, the new wood stove or furnace must displace at least 50 per cent of the previous oil heating capacity.

Work in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been ongoing and has concentrated on the general area of efficiency and design of wood stoves and furnaces. The work has been conducted for the past two and a half years at the Canada Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology, known more popularly as CANMET. I would recommend to hon. members that they apply to the CANMET for further information on wood stoves and furnaces. We have quite an ambitious program. Also, they have done work with the Canadian Wood Energy Institute in an effort to standardize codes and building designs.

This government is committed to the principle of Canadian control in the Canadian industry, and its Canadianization measures are designed to bring this about without excessively overburdening the Canadian consumer. As stated in our national energy policy, Petro-Canada will be charged initially with the task of acquiring the Canadian operations of one or more multinational oil companies. As in the past the financing for such acquisitions will be obtained in large part by borrowing in the foreign capital market.

But additional infusions of equity capital may be required. To provide that capital the government will establish a Canadian ownership account. Revenue for the account will be provided by a Canadian ownership charge imposed on all oil and gas consumption in Canada, which will come into operation as the acquisition program progresses, and set at a level to ensure that the program will be totally self-financing and in no way affect the government deficit.

We have already heard the gloom and doom predictions of the possible repercussions of our Canadianization proposals. The industry is proclaiming that it will not have enough capital to finance expansion, and there is the muffled threat that the industry would indeed flee Canada. Well, I for one remain optimistic that the industry will remain. Canada offers very significant investment opportunities for all of the major oil companies, opportunities that are not available elsewhere in the industrialized world.

Clearly, Canada is late to arrive at the idea of national control over such a nationally vital industry as that of petroleum. Most OPEC countries have state-owned oil firms which are the main, if not sole oil producers. Most European countries have established state corporations of mixed ownership companies that are engaged in the entire spectrum of oil activities. In Norway, for example, Statoil now dominates oil production, and BNOC in Britain is of growing importance.

The potential of significant new finds on "Canada lands" in the north and on the north shore are very promising, but we must not place our future on a promise. Action must be taken now. The fact that the Canadian government has not been an active participant in the petroleum industry has had a detrimental effect on our economic vitality. Indeed, in the past the effect of OPEC price increases was to create a massive transfer of wealth from consumers to producers.

In our case most of these producers were foreign owned and, therefore, the wealth transfer was away from Canadians. In general, Canada's tax and pricing policies have provided the industry with the cash flow necessary to finance its expenditures. This means that the oil consumer and the Canadian taxpayer have financed virtually all of the substantial expansion of the industry, and the industry has been expanding into many diverse fields, most notably that of the mining sector.

The Canadianization initiative of the petroleum incentives program will reduce the relative cash flow of the foreign owned multinationals and will therefore place a constraint on their capacity to take over other firms. Thus, the spread of foreign ownership in Canada and in Canadian mining will be restrained by the measures in the national energy program aimed specifically at the oil and gas sectors. By placing Petro-Canada in the forefront of the Canadian petroleum industry and by instituting the provisions of our Canadianization package and our Canada lands provisions, we will be better able to control our own energy future.

Of primary concern to all Canadians is, of course, the fact that they will continue to enjoy a Canadian price for oil and gas that is substantially below that of international pricing. We have given the assurance that at no time will the Canadian price be allowed to rise above 85 per cent of that of world price. From my perspective, as the Minister of Mines, the national energy program, by maintaining this lower domestic price for oil, will support a generally higher level of economic activity and, consequently, will benefit the mineral sector.

While there has been some concern that activity in the energy sector will tend to put upward pressure on the external value of the Canadian dollar, a development that would hurt export oriented industries such as mining, there are indications that countervailing pressures will be at work. On the one hand the inflow of financial capital for the energy sector will tend to raise the exchange rate. On the other hand much of the machinery and equipment for new energy projects will be imported, and this will act to depress the external value of the Canadian dollar. Most forecasters think that the net effect will be a slight upward pressure, but a gradual one with the Canadian dollar rising to about 90 cents U.S. by 1984-1985, and stabilizing around that level.

However, over the next year or two the national energy program will tend to hold back this rise. It is agreed that foreign investors will be cautious about energy investment in Canada due both to the lower energy price under the national energy program and to the continuing energy debate between the federal government and the provinces. Moreover, the national energy program's Canadianization measure will involve acquisition of several large, foreign owned petroleum companies by the government, and this will exert downward pressure on the exchange rate.

The purchase of foreign oil and gas firms will have a direct, downward impact on the external value of the dollar, and there will be the further psychological effect that nationalization usually has on foreign investors. But since the Canadian mineral industry is essentially geared to world prices, the cost advantage from low energy costs can be substantial. Energy intensive mining for iron, coal, nickel, asbestos, salt, gravel and sand is particularly advantaged by the made-in-Canada blended price.

The Canadian oil policy provides an opportunity to innovate and to establish new processes to penetrate new mineral markets. The Canadian mineral industry has been presented with an opportunity which it would not have if it were paying the same world oil prices as its foreign competitors. Clearly, the lower Canadian energy costs will offer Canadian exporters a very real competitive edge. Specifically in the mineral sector, the future looks bright indeed.

The vital signs for the continued growth of the mineral sector in the 1980s are very encouraging. My officials are forecasting an over-all rate of growth of between 2 per cent and 2.5 per cent per annum over the next decade in the non-fuel, mineral industry. This growth will require a total capital expenditure over the ten-year period of more than $42 billion in 1979 dollars, which will be twice that which was required in the previous decade. In current dollar terms, assuming an average rate of price increase of 6.2 per cent per year over the 1980-1990 period, this $42 billion capital requirement mushrooms to $63.5 billion. So we can easily surmise that activity in the mineral sector will provide significant stimulus to the Canadian economy in general. I am happy to report, after a visit with the ministers of mines of the provinces in Halifax last weekend, that their forecasts are just about the same.

In the immediate future there are a number of large projects which have been announced involving new mine development or mine expansion. To give just a few examples, there is a $300 million Texas Gulf expansion near Timmins, which is now nearing completion. There is the $62 million Noranda Gold Stream, copper zinc mine near Revelstoke, British Columbia, which is scheduled to start production in 1982; Billiton Canada Limited's $80 million Mount Pleasant tungsten venture in New Brunswick is also stated to be in production in 1982. After meeting with the New Brunswick minister I have learned that the $130 million Potash Corporation of America plant is now firm, and the $150 million Denison Mines Limited potash developments are on stream. To the west and to the north, Cyprus-Anvil's $240 million eight-year development and expansion program at the Vangorda and Grum deposit in the Yukon is firm. In addition, field work for the Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan's $600 million mine development at Brendenbury has begun. Furthermore, a number of smaller gold mining operations have been announced in Ontario.

In general, the pace of exploration in 1980 has been high across the country and I think that this bodes well for the rest of the decade.

Of course, as Minister of State for Mines I am especially pleased with the coal initiatives outlined in "The National Energy Program". The Government of Canada will increase its support of studies to determine how best to mine and use this coal, both on the east and west coasts. Sufficient funds will be made available for exploratory tunnelling and assessment of the technical and economic feasibility of the Donkin Mine. Decisions on subsequent steps will be taken once uncertainties have been resolved concerning quality, characteristics, and market opportunities for this coal. The Government of Canada will see to it that development of this mine and other viable local coal sources is not delayed for lack of funding. Moreover, it will play its full part in overcoming the technical challenges confronting these developments.

In support of expanded coal mining ir. utilization activities, there will be a need for an additional $4 million during the next four years for coal research and development. Priorities include health and mine safety, coal beneficiation, combustion and utilization research, establishment of a coal testing institute and establishment of a continuing program in mining technology.

Cape Breton coal can make an important contribution to the energy supply of Nova Scotia and the maritimes. The challenge is to develop technologies to utilize that coal in more efficient and, I must stress, environmentally benign ways. To further that development the federal government will provide $50 million over the period 1980-1983, with provision for a further $100 million in 1984-1985 to support the development commercialization of new coal utilization technology. It is envisaged that the bulk of this funding will go to demonstrating fluidized bed combustion in a commercial scale generating station in Cape Breton which would directly displace oil-fired capacity. I would invite members of the House to visit our CANMET Research facility to examine the demonstration of fluidized bed combustion which is taking place there. Alternative means to use coal in the production of liquid fuel will also be actively pursued. At present, that is being done at Bells Corners.

The crucial concern of the national energy program is with supplying Canadian requirements and reducing import dependence. Unlike nickel, copper, iron ore, asbestos, potash, zinc, lead, uranium and coal, there are no apparent long term exportable surpluses, and certainly not in the case of crude oil. It is therefore important that decisions to invest and explore, and the rights to economic rents, be vested largely in Canadian hands in the energy industry.

The evolution of the Canadian mining industry has witnessed a substantial Canadianization of reserves and production facilities. The domestic corporate giants in copper, lead, zinc and nickel have substantial Canadian ownership interests; for example, Inco-Cominco; Noranda and Placer. However, there is growing concern that the decline of the junior exploration section in Canada will ultimately cause a reversal of this favourable trend. The grass roots exploration and discovery process has become increasingly dominated by major resource corporations, and the large Canadian junior sector has been discouraged by what I and others consider to be inequitable tax incentives and toughened securities market regulations.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was careful to point out that the elimination of depletion allowances for development expenditures or exploration would not—I repeat, would not—have an affect on the mining companies.

Of significant benefit to the mineral sector is the decision to provide a 50 per cent investment tax credit for investments in new plants and equipment for manufacturing or processing as defined under the Regional Development Incentives Act. The regions that will qualify will be determined on the basis of criteria such as high unemployment and low income levels by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané). Clearly, this will have a significant effect in qualifying areas, such as the northern territories where much new exploration and development is taking place, and in Atlantic Canada. Also worthy of note is the decision to extend the moratorium on northern benefits; indeed, it was obvious to me during my travels throughout the Arctic this summer that special consideration should and must be given to consumers north of the 60th parallel. Recognizing that this was the case, the government acted swiftly.

Indeed, the future looks very bright for the minerals sector in the coming decade, and there is every indication to assume that the same will hold true for the rest of the economy once we come out of the current recession. The Canadianization measures will doubtless have an effect on certain investors, but the positive image of Canada as a stable country for investment opportunity will remain intact. The stock market experienced downward movement last week immediately following the budget announcement, but as of yesterday the market was again gaining strength.

The budget was an energy budget because Canada needed to face up to its energy security needs. The Canadian government did not shy away from the tough decisions that were needed, and all Canadians will be better off as a result. I am optimistic that if we give the budget measures a chance to take root in our economy, they will provide the needed stimulus for continuous growth well into the next decade.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) on a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. minister would permit a question with regard to some of the comments she has just made. It was a very interesting speech.

Mrs. Erola: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the minister is a very prominent member of the cabinet and she too has used the terms "blended price" and "Canada made blended price for petroleum". For the edification of all hon. members I wonder if she could tell us what that means. We all understand that there are different price structures. There is the domestic price which emanates from Alberta which is now $16.75, and there is the tar sands price, and then there is the price of imported oil. There is control of the domestic price and that price will be increased occasionally. We have control over the tar sands price, but no control over the imported price. I should like the minister to explain the difference between the 85 per cent of a blended Canadian price, one component of which is imported oil over which we have no control, and the price in the Crosbie budget which was 85 per cent of the world price.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member could get to the question.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to define the difference between the Canada made blended price and the 85 per cent of world price in the Crosbie budget.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member left out one component. There are a number of prices included in this. There is the $30 per barrel price, the $38 for the tar sands oil, and the $16.75 which the hon. member mentioned. Of course this will all have to respond to the price of the oil being imported.

Mr. Oberle: But you have no control over it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) on a point of order.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a very brief question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I permitted the previous member to ask a question and the minister to give an answer because it was within her allotted time. We are past the time which has been given to the minister for purposes of the debate. I need unanimous consent of the House now to permit a question. Is there unanimous consent?

• (1720)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deans: No.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak in the chamber today as an Albertan, I do so in the sense that the people in my riding feel even more alienated than they did a few weeks ago.

As we look at the history of the native people, education was passed down by direct conversation from father to son from one generation to another. The same is true in western Canada. People from the west who have lived through many direct impositions placed by the federal government or the central establishment upon western Canadian development have also passed this information down through the generations, so that we who are third and fourth generations are very aware of it. It is interesting to note as other people move in from other parts of Canada or other parts of the world that it does not take many months before they, too, get that same feeling.

I can take you through the history, and other members have, about when we were trying to establish our own plants for barbed wire and milk pails in the early part of this century. Prices were lowered by those in eastern Canada until our plants were driven out of business. The prices were then raised to recoup their losses, and we had to put up with that.

The minister for manpower said the federal government had helped us through during the depression. We do not remember that. We remember how the eastern banks seized our lands when many farmers had only one year, or, even in some cases, one month's payment left. We remember that. After that came the period of the freight rate problems and the tariff arguments which continued for years for years. These are all things which are embedded deeply in the feelings of western Canadians.

In 1949 we discovered oil in Leduc. Westerners attempted to develop those fields. We came to this part of Canada with our hat in hand asking for capital to develop our industry. Our premier was turned down because oil could be purchased cheaper offshore than it would cost to develop the industry in Canada. We had no alternative but to go to the United States because we wanted to develop the industry. We now get the feeling over here that for some reason we westerners have no choice in the matter of foreign ownership. We lament that fact now because we had no choice at that time. However, as we develop funds to buy back our industry, we find a direct federal imposition on our capital that we, as Albertans or western provinces, could build up.

In the western opportunity conference, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at that time said that a plant such as Petrosar would not be built because we had a comparative advantage in the west to develop petrochemicals from natural gas feedstock which is abundant in western Canada. Six months later Petrosar was developed and built. It uses 120,000 barrels a day of western oil, which is a commodity in very limited quantity. We find that large quantities of propane and barrels of oil which cannot be used, are being sold off at world prices, which almost allows the plant to buy the oil from western Canada for nothing. This is difficult to understand when we have an abundance of natural gas in plants in Alberta that were not allowed to produce and to start because of that very plant. For instance, there are plants in Medicine Hat, and Fort Saskatchewan, and one is opening its doors in Joffre in my area. That sketch of history brings us to the present time. I have missed a lot, but I do not want to use this as the central theme of my remarks.

Without the consent of any of the provinces in the west, the constitution is proceeding and, among other things, an amending formula is being suggested which will allow us to be a second-class province in this society for a long time, unless we change it by a referendum or by the consent of the two central provinces.

Now we come to this budget which, again without the consent of any of the people in the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, B.C. or Saskatchewan, directly imposes taxes and takes wealth away from the only growth industry in this country. If you ask me why western Canadians, and particularly people in my riding, feel more alienated than ever before, Mr. Speaker, that is the reason. The impact of this budget on the individual in Alberta is tremendous. In a sense it is an expropriation of a resource and the wealth from that resource rather than the sharing of it. Those are words often used by others on the other side. Sharing means you have the consent of the people of that area to share. We would willingly do that.

For a government to say it has run out to Alberta with proposal after proposal for an energy agreement, all of which were turned down, does that mean all are totally unacceptable thus giving the government the ability to impose its will on a province or an area of this country, Canada?

I want to take hon. members through the four areas of the budget which are offensive to people in my area, and I am sure they are offensive to people in most of western Canada. What is the export tax? The export tax was put on oil in western Canada in 1973 and 1974, a surprise that our government knew nothing about, and we as members in this chamber knew nothing about either. After much argument and discussion, most of the money was returned to the province. Now we find once more, with great objection from the people of the provinces of the west and the premiers of those areas, an export tax is imposed upon western Canadians.

The Alberta treasurer stated a week ago that an export tax would be totally unacceptable and wrong in principle. He said that it would amount to a confiscation of a provincial resource. Often it is not clear why we in the west are so upset about an export tax but our premier stated, and I think he stated it very clearly in a speech in Edmonton on August 16:

> What are the commitments we look for on the other side? We look for respect for the ownership rights of our province by not imposing an export tax upon natural gas, or any other punitive taxation on an industry.
> I want to say a word about the natural gas export tax because I think it is misunderstood. It is the very heart of the difference between the Ottawa government and ourselves. Why do we feel so strongly? Section 109 of the BNA Act leaves the resources to the provinces. Section 125 precludes Her Majesty in right of Canada from taxing a province. How does a natural gas export tax work? Many hon. members probably think, unless they have studied the question, that the tax is simply added on and the buyer pays. That is not so. The buyer does not have to pay. The United States is not buying now. In British Columbia sales of natural gas have gone down this past year by approximately 45 per cent because we have priced ourselves out of the market. The United States does have alternate supplies when prices increase. The result of the federal export tax is a definite and significant reduction in provincial returns from the sale of a depleting asset. That is what a natural gas export tax is. That is why we feel so strongly about it.

Not only that, but it means that when a tax is imposed without the consent of a province there is the feeling that that revenue is confiscated from the people of that province who, I believe, have an ability to decide in what direction they want to spend that revenue: in our province and in the west. We have in the budget a revenue policy. The budget basically established a revenue policy for this government of direct take from one province. As you look at the taxes and add them up across the country, almost 80 per cent of the revenues coming to the federal government in this budget come directly from one province and the industry that has been established there.

● (1730)

The second area that we find offensive about this budget is the oil pricing formula. Again, it has been imposed upon the people of Alberta and the west without their consent. As I said before, the federal government claims to have repeatedly gone to the west with proposals. When we were the government, we did the same.

Through a series of meetings, we were able to work out a pricing agreement which was almost signed. That means the feasibility of it was there. It was proved that it was possible for two governments, federal and provincial, to sit down and work out a pricing arrangement that was acceptable to both.

We now find the Petroleum Administration Act imposed upon us and a price set without our agreement. We are not opposed to sharing the wealth of a resource. We have done it graciously in the past. Billions and billions of dollars from oil and gas which could have been a part of the sharing agreement between the provinces and the federal government were given up because we kept our prices so low. Now the price is established. We have a new government in power, a government that was not prepared to take an agreement that had been worked out, even though the province of Alberta was prepared to make some changes and drop the price from 85 per cent to 75 per cent of world price. It rejected that agreement which was worked out and imposed its will upon the people of that area.

I want to refer to the oil export tax and the natural gas export tax as it applies to native people. I am very familiar with that. I have watched what it can do to Indian reserves in my area. They are the innocents in this pricing arrangement. They finally found some revenue that might be used to establish priorities for their future. They found, as in 1974 when the oil export tax was imposed upon them, that the revenues were not returned. For some reason, it was different than with provincial governments.

That money is still sitting in the federal treasury and the provincial treasury in Alberta. It has never been returned to the native people of the producing bands. I asked many questions of the ministers. They never refused, but they never agreed. Some $9 million could be put to excellent use by native people in three western provinces, but has been sitting in the treasury since 1974 and not made available to those people. They have the highest rate of unemployment of any group in Canada. They suffer tremendously socially across this country. When they have a resource they can develop in the future, a good deal is taken away by the federal government.

The same is true of the natural gas export tax now being placed upon these reserves. Under the present revenue-sharing agreement this coming year, producing bands in western Canada, some 19 of them, can see between $43 million and $47 million. They made plans for that. They set those plans out very specifically based on that revenue and revenue they could receive as the price was to increase for oil and gas. They now see one-sixth of that revenue being taken away from them by the federal export tax.

I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) whether he thought he was honouring his faith with the Indian people under sections 87 and 90 which state that native people or bands are exempt from direct or indirect taxation. He said no. I asked him whether he felt they should desist from imposing this tax on native people because in addition to being illegal, this group above all others needs this revenue and the pride of using their own revenue to establish programs in future. He said he had to study that further.

The history is there from the oil export tax right up to the present time. Producing bands and those supporting them, and I believe that is everyone in the 500 native bands in this country, believe this form of taxation on native people is wrong and should not be used. If it is, they believe the money should be returned. There will be tremendous pressure on the government in future from native people and members on this side of the House who sit on the Indian affairs committee.

I want to get back to the oil pricing formula I spoke about before. I know many figures have been quoted from the Crosbie budget and the MacEachen budget. As we look at the wellhead pricing formula in our budget and the pricing formula of the Liberal budget, in 1984-86 the amount is basically about the same. The difference is, as we increased the price in our formula, the amount that was scheduled for the provinces, the companies and the federal government under the $4.50 per barrel increase by 1981 with our budget, the provinces would have received what they believe is rightfully theirs on the first $2 and 50 per cent of the next $2.50 by agreement under the ownership requirements of our constitution, a direct share of the royalties on the total amount.

Under this budget, they receive that on the first $2 and nothing on the next $2.50 which is a direct tax to be used for these great schemes which are being developed, such as the $4-billion trust fund or development fund for western Canada. It smacks in our face. It basically says that the people of a province do not have the ability to use their money to develop western Canada, that the federal government can recycle it in a better fashion for them. It will take a long time before you can convince the people of Alberta that that is the case.

The third area is the tar sands and heavy oil proposals. These plants are essential for energy self-sufficiency in Canada. Under this budget, the feeling now being perpetrated in Canada between the federal government and the producing provinces is such that it is doubtful whether these projects will go ahead.

The suggestion by this government was that $38 plus the CPI was significant to get the Alsands and the heavy oil plant at Cold Lake to go ahead. Representatives of both these companies appeared before the natural resources committee and both said it was not sufficient to start up. The basic reason they gave was that the CPI was not a satisfactory figure as far as inflation in the north is concerned.

My friend from Peace River put together an excellent paper which gives some of the reasons for that. When we were in government we recognized that we had to pay our employees in the north extra living costs because inflation is higher there. No company will sign an agreement when their costs are going up faster than their return based on an inflationary factor that they know from experience through Suncor and Syncrude is not adequate in the north.

That is just one reason. When I am building a fence with my neighbour, if we co-operate, we build that fence very quickly. We help each other. We put in the posts and string the wire. However, when there is not co-operation but confrontation, it is a great deal more difficult to get anything done. That is what has happened with regard to heavy oil development. There is no co-operation. Under the last budget or the pricing formula which was worked out, there was co-operation. Things were going ahead, and would have gone ahead if the signature had been put on the dotted line. I regret that we had to be involved in an election before we were able to do that because those plants are essential to energy self-sufficiency. In addition to that, tremendous employment can be generated by these plants, not just in Alberta but right across this country. That employment is desperately needed at this time. These projects cost $8 billion plus apiece. When we apply a multiplier of 1.9—which is an accepted one—to that, we get $6.2 billion accruing to Ontario in direct investment and $6.7 billion to other provinces including $2.9 billion to Quebec.

The reason is that most of the steel, trucks, cars, valves and pipe is developed in industrial central Canada. The impact on industry in Ontario—and I am using figures from the Alsands proposal put before the committee—would be as follows: $800 million for iron and steel; $370 million for metal fabrication and machinery; $325 million for transportation equipment; $740 million for manufacturing and processing; $370 million for finance—I expect it is interest—and $750 million for trades and services. There would be 10,000 construction jobs at the Cold Lake project which could go to Canadians. Most of them would be residents of other provinces because we simply do not have in Alberta or Saskatchewan the manpower to meet those needs. Those are figures just for the Cold Lake project. Similar figures could be applied to the Alsands plant.

As I see it, we need that investment and that employment today, but those plants could very well be shut down for a number of years.

I could not believe what I was seeing when I looked at the provisions in this budget which apply to the Suncor plant. Suncor was the first company or group of people prepared to take the risk of developing the tar sands. That risk was taken. The company was almost jeopardized. It lost millions and millions of dollars year after year establishing the technology which is now being used by Syncrude, which will be used by the Alsands people and which we are now attempting to sell to Venezuela and other countries. Suncor pioneered that, and now what is the reward? Instead of the same prices offered to other companies under this budget Suncor will get $16.75, which puts the company at a marginal level again. It cannot even recoup the losses in the profit picture. Last year was the first year it broke even and made a few dollars profit.

If one understands the area at all, one knows that they are mining the most feasible area at the present time. As the operation gets to the outskirts of the mine, the cost of bringing the tar and sand to the plant goes up. I spoke with representatives of the company, and they told me that some 90 million barrels of synthetic crude could be lost to Canada because they simply cannot mine for this price of $16.75.

Instead of rewarding initiative and allowing that company to develop its mine, the clamps are being put on by a federal government which, I believe, does not understand and never has understood the development of tar sands and the development of the heavy oil industry in western Canada.

The last policy we find offensive in this budget is public ownership. We Albertans over the years have felt comfortable with the private sector developing our oil and gas industry, our processing industry and many other industries in the province. Our farmers worked hard for every dollar they made for years and years. In the 1950s we asked for Canadian capital to develop our industry, but now that we finally have some dollars from the Alberta Energy Company and others so that we can get involved in tar sands plants and so forth, we have all these taxes taking away our revenue in order to allow Petro-Canada in because it has some great plan to take away the slack from the private sector or gather up the slack from the private sector and provide all this energy self-sufficiency in the future. It will be a number of years before that takes place. In the meantime, energy self-sufficiency may go out the window.

The technology and expertise which have been developed in our province over many years will be attracted away by the many megaprojects around the world which are asking for people who are in short supply. They are bound to leave the province. We will lose them. The bottom line is that we would rather have development by the private sector, as was the case with Alberta Gas Trunk Line. Albertans and westerners were allowed to buy shares, and they lined up at the treasury branches to buy them.

There is another example where the Alberta Energy Company offered shares to Albertans so that they could participate in the development of the industry. They were bought up within days. We would rather buy off these companies through incentives to the individual to buy than through Petro-Canada. We would be much happier with that kind of program. So I get down to the bottom line. Westerners would rather have the opportunity to use the money from their resource, or a fair share of it, to develop western Canada rather than having the federal government develop it.

When we worked out that agreement a few months ago, the province of Alberta offered from its share of the revenue to commit $2 billion in unconditional funding over five years to improve substantially the capacity and efficiency of the rail transportation system in the west. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) said a little while ago that Alberta cannot do that. He would rather take that money and recycle it through the federal government because he thinks it has a better idea as to how it should be done.

Alberta's commitment also includes the commitments which were made to promote the substitution of natural gas and oil, to invest in the equity and debt in oil sands plants, to put in the infrastructures for those plants, which costs billions of dollars for each plant which is developed, to continue exploration and development and enhanced recovery and to provide equity and debt financing for the Quebec and maritime portions of the Q & M pipeline. This is over and above the loans to provinces, the amounts of money which are put into housing in Alberta and so forth through the Heritage Trust Fund.

I am running out of time. I think I have indicated for the record why the constituents of my riding feel so frustrated about what has gone on here in the past two weeks. Now they must face the uncertainty of this budget. At the weekends, truck drivers telephone me about losing their jobs and about not looking forward to making their payments this winter. This is because of the downslide of the oil industry. When we cut off half the budget, even if it is that of a multinational company, it takes years to recover. No grants scheme can move those small companies which have been farming out to international companies up to major developments in drilling within a matter of months. It is impossible. So the jobs go out the window this winter, and people will suffer. Surely if the government is going to put in this program, even though I disagree with it, an orderly plan could have been developed so that people would not have to suffer as they will under this plan.

The only thing I found in this budget with which I could agree is that antique cars, of which I happen to be a buff, will be allowed in free.

[Translation]

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank you for this opportunity to take part in the budget debate in the House of Commons. I would like to begin by saying, if I may, how grateful I am to all those who helped me to become the new member of Parliament for Beauce.

I also wish to thank sincerely and pay homage to all my colleagues who have been of great assistance to me in learning the ropes of parliamentary work. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am determined to continue to learn so that I may give full satisfaction to those who were willing to have confidence in me.

I was very proud to arrive in the House of Commons last February as I had the honour to represent Beauce at a difficult time for our economy.

I would not want to begin my speech, Mr. Speaker, without saying a few words about a constituency which, only 30 years ago, was nearly exclusively agricultural and which has now become a very important economic development sector in Quebec.

The monthly financial and economic periodical Finance devoted several pages to this area in its edition of August 18. In an article entitled "Beauce: A very human miracle", it said the following: "In the last few years, Beauce has become the favorite of the Quebec economic world." Indeed, the Japan of Quebec now has over 400 small and medium businesses and a new business is established nearly every week.

The people of Beauce have set themselves to the task and have been able to develop a centre with many economic activities of which they are very proud.

The unemployment rate is lower than in other areas of Quebec, as it was about 8.8 per cent in 1979 while the rate for Quebec as a whole increased from 8.1 per cent to 9.5 per cent during the same period. However, I can assure you that this did not come easily.

We succeeded, I think, in keeping an undaunted spirit of solidarity, and unmatched spirit of enterprise and a remarkable sense of entrepreneurship. I was born in Beauce county where I still live at the present time. There I have seen spring up several prosperous businesses typical of our area. Just to give you an example of the business acumen of the Beauce people, ever since its establishment in 1969 until August 30 of this year, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion studied 199 files. It allocated $19 million in direct grants. To appreciate the over-all picture of the investments during that time, $81 million in private investments must be added to that figure. In other words, by itself the DREE contribution amounted to 23.37 per cent of the investments in question. This resulted in about 3900 new jobs. The Beauce area enjoyed a significant economic development as well a net increase in the standard of living of its people during the past few years because of the takeover by the Beauce businessmen, farmers and workers. All the economic factors regarding available income, retail sales, industrial production and employment went up considerably in relation to the national average. Surely, these advances were the result of the effort of those directly involved in the Beauce economic process. However, the concerns about the high rates of inflation, interest and unemployment, do remain. People are still concerned.

In view of the over-all situation of the Canadian economy, I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to direct my remarks to the various components of the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) a budget that we were all waiting for, especially the press which had predicted doom and gloom. On the contrary, the Minister of Finance showed realism and common sense. Without delusions he gave us a realistic analysis of the economic situation of which all the indicators had been carefully reviewed, in order to submit to the Canadian people an assessment which although perhaps a little on the dark side was not on the other hand deceptive. The minister made us quite aware of the present difficult economic climate from which we hope to see a recovery after 1981.

As a former insurance agent I have always tried to help people take precautions even though some people find it funny, but it is a fact that in the field of insurance we help people take precautions in order to be able to face many eventualities just as the Liberal government has made itself the sponsor of a set of measures which will reassure Canadians. In order to reach energy stability, an ambitious energy program has been devised. I hope the hon. member who had the floor before me will be pleased to hear that because he was asking for a government policy based on energy needs and said as reported at page 2333 of Hansard for December 13, 1979 and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, what we needed was a budget which would have helped us fight against unemployment and inflation, improve our deficit in the balance of payments and provide a true energy program.

● (1800)

In that respect, I am happy to indicate that some of his wishes have been answered. The Liberal government has indeed embarked on a plan where the focus will be on satisfying the prerequisites for self-sufficiency, to be achieved by the end of the decade. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock? With your permission I would like to continue at eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate my total endorsement of this direction because it reminds me of the Beauce region. I have seen hundreds of industries "made in Beauce" develop and I would be truly proud if Canadians could take over at least 50 per cent of the oil and gas production by 1990.

Secondly, the former member for Beauce will be glad to learn, in light of his heavy criticism of the budget deficit, that my government made a formal commitment to progressively decrease the deficit over a three to four-year period, which will help to reduce inflation. The deficit will go from $14.2 billion to $11.8 billion in 1983 and 1984, which will allow for economic recovery.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak of the liberal energy program. This is an extremely attractive program, in my opinion, because it is the first true effort made by a government to secure guarantees for supplies and a fair distribution of energy resources in order to withstand the instability of world prices. Canadians can equip themselves with the necessary tools. Our government is taking a first step towards reducing our dependence on foreign oil and thus toward reducing the danger of economic upheavals in our country. My government has also kept its promise in deciding wisely not to push Canadian prices to world levels, in order to avoid constant increases in those prices.

The Liberals are acutely aware of the fact that succeeding price increases will not make the "Beaucerons", for instance, become aware that a new era is starting, one in which substitutes for oil are seriously considered; instead, a budget providing for fixed but moderate increases will allow the people to adapt in a less radical but more desirable way.

The energy problem is now of concern to all Canadians. We are all aware, as our government is, that we will have to pay more for oil and natural gas. But, at least, thanks to the sensible policy of this government, we will be paying prices that are clearly lower than those paid by consumers in other industrial countries, and lower than those advocated by the Crosbie budget.

Through their principles of justice and equity, the Liberals are also promising to grant all Canadians an equal share in the revenue and benefits through a price system that divides them equitably. We find the very essence of that principle of sharing in the following excerpt from "The National Energy Program" as given on page 13, and I quote:

> The citizens of Canada and their national government, have played a major role in fostering the development of the oil and gas industry, and deserve to share in its benefits,

Mr. Speaker, thanks to those various energy measures such as moderately high prices, a fiscal policy, a spending plan and federal action, I am sure that we will succeed in instilling in our constituents a new philosophy, if I may say so, dealing with our natural resources which are still quite numerous in some sectors but rather scarce in others as is the case for oil.

The gradual price increases of oil, that is less than $4 a barrel for 1980 and $4.50 for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984 matched with moderate steps are an indication that the government has abided with its commitment of the last election campaign.

When I ran last February as a candidate under the Liberal banner in Beauce riding, I was intimately convinced that the Liberal party was the most equitable party. It has demonstrated that it is indeed the most equitable party by increasing the price of gas by 13 cents a gallon instead of 32 cents a gallon, as would have been the case under the Progressive Conservative budget.

An hon. Member: That is social justice!

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am not disappointed with this budget, and I think that numbers of my Beauce constituents feel exactly the way I do. The Liberal party has not hurt low-income Canadians. I am no tax expert, but I have enough critical sense to realize that this budget speech benefits our less fortunate taxpayers. Mr. Speaker, before the budget was presented, the people I met in my constituency would ask me whether the tax increases would be significant. I must say that I am happy to report to them that the Minister of Finance has thought of them, that he has ordered no income tax increase, and that he has maintained the indexation system, contrary to what a great many opposition members had predicted.

An hon. Member: It is a tax reduction.

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): Among the various types of fiscal means used, the Liberal government provided several, such as the tax reductions for multiple unit residential buildings, the extension of the small business development bond program, which will bring happiness to the small and medium-sized businesses in my riding who will use them to finance their equipment at a reasonable cost. As far as my riding is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it will surely make everybody happy, because, as I said at the beginning, Beauce still is, and I do not want to repeat myself, the riding with the greater number of small and medium-sized businesses.

Another proposal about which I am enthusiastic, even though it does not concern my area where small business dominates, is the investment tax credit of up to 50 per cent for industries wishing to establish themselves in the poorer areas in Canada and where there is high unemployment and low income families. I recognize here the good work of my friend, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), to whom I give credit for his spirit of fairness. His smooth collaboration with the Minister of Finance proved that the national government was particularly concerned with the regional disparities in this country.

An hon. Member: Liberal policy!

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): On the other hand, some farmers in my riding complained to me, last weekend, that the government had not included any measure to help them. It is true that the farming community has not received particular attention in this budget, but we must realize that by dealing primarily with the middle-term energy problem, the government will ease the lot of farmers who will be able to take advantage of lower energy costs.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding this first speech of mine, I would like to say how proud I am to belong to a party which has seriously dealt with our first priority nowadays, which is energy, while giving middle and low-income families a breathing spell, because they will not have to face higher oil prices or major tax increases. My government has also devised efficient economic assistance programs to provide Canadians with the necessary means to withstand the effects of the present economic conditions.

● (2010)

[English]

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, in a few moments I will address some of the points made by the hon. member for the Liberal Party who spoke earlier. I will deal with his contentions that 'farmers will benefit', 'people will accept moderate price hikes' and 'there are no massive increases in taxes'.

What I am most concerned about in this session of Parliament is that the Liberal government is attempting to put into place the means to create a socialist republic of Canada. It intends to impose this plan initially through the budget and in concert with the national energy plan and the patriation of the constitution. Its primary short-term goal is to remove from the oil producing provinces their principal source of revenue, their energy royalties and transfer them to the federal government. It is transferring exploration and recovery incentives to Canada lands, which, significantly, include offshore regions, and more revenue from oil and gas will thus accrue to the federal government. It is reducing by 12 per cent the share of the oil companies, who are already leaving for the United States and other parts of the world. This is in the Liberal government's interests. Indeed, they propose to decrease incentives and subsidies to companies that have minority Canadian ownership interests, which will lower their market value and thus make a takeover bid by the federal government through the Canadian ownership account easier in the future. At the same time the Liberal government, through these measures, seeks to increase its proportion of oil and gas revenue by taking revenue away from the provinces.

As nationalization of oil companies located, for example, in Alberta, increases, provincial revenues decrease because federal oil companies do not have to pay provincial royalties no matter where they are located. Consequently, the federal Liberal government is determined to nationalize the Canadian oil industry by 1990. The immense price to pay for this—it will cost about $10.5 billion to buy just one firm—will be borne directly by the people through the Canadian ownership account.

The proposals contained in this budget seek to change the fundamental nature of our entire country. They seek to perpetrate an irrevocable shift in the relationship between the two levels of government in Canada. They seek to take advantage of the westward economic and demographic trends in this country in two ways. First, by removing the initiatives and awards of such shifts from the western centres to the benefit of the central government and, second, by disowning the promise made to the province of Quebec and to the rest of this country of a new federation. That promise did not include the molding of a socialist republic. This is not the true destiny of Canada, despite the socialist conversion we have undergone under successive Liberal governments which have imposed socialist programs upon the people and have caused the people to pay for them without having the courage to call them such in election campaigns.

An obvious example is the increase in unemployment insurance premiums. Call it what you will, it is, in fact, a tax hike to finance another abortive social program. Instead of fighting to increase employment through strong, stimulative measures, the Liberal government merely puts a salve on the completely unacceptable unemployment situation by guaranteeing UIC cheque payments.

This increase of one-third in unemployment insurance premiums to be paid by every single worker in Canada will not only directly increase taxation but will have a direct and adverse effect on the economy by markedly reducing the real disposable income of Canadians. The increases to be paid by the employers will, of course, be passed on yet again to the Canadian consumer through higher prices of goods and services. In addition, it further weakens the international competitiveness of Canadian manufacturers.

There has been a shift in recent years of the needless burden of UIC payments from the government to the payroll deductions of employees. The workers who can least afford to pay are, therefore, supporting the masses of unemployed who are themselves out of work because of the failure of this government to take measures to stimulate the economy. In short, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) with his increases in UIC premiums has shifted financial responsibility for the maintenance of the unemployed from the government, whose problem and program it was, to the working people whose program it has become, whether they like it or not.

What consequences can the working people of Canada expect from this measure introduced by the Liberal government? This is distorted and aborted socialism making the poor pay to subsidize those who are even poorer. How does the government propose to stimulate the economy and protect and create jobs? Would the Minister of Finance care to ask the workers in Windsor who lined up in their thousands three weeks ago in the hope of a few hundred jobs, or the few maritimers of Sydney Steel who were recruited by Fargo in the Yukon, whether they would rather receive their UIC cheques from their working brothers and sisters or whether they would prefer a stimulative economy, an economy that attracts investment, not drives it away, an economy that seeks to encourage and not to restrict Canadians?

What is happening here is that the unholy Liberal triumvirate in charge of finance, energy and the constitution is attempting to snatch financial power and constitutional power from its traditional seat in the provincial legislatures. It is doing this, or at least it will seek to do this at the expense of the unity of this country. And for what? For the sake of a grand design born in the presumptuous mind of one man who, aided by his loyal and partisan engineers, is determined to alter the basic and fundamental historic association of this country, of this constitutional federation, of this democratic union of co-operative levels of government.

Already, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has caused seven of our ten provincial governments to express opposition to his plans in the courts. Already he has caused a cutback in oil production in our most energy-productive province. This is not the Middle East. We are not accustomed here to wielding economic sticks to secure territorial rights, to enhance wounded egos or build insensitive sheikdoms. We are not accustomed to creeping, disastrous socialism which promises to bankrupt this country, impoverish our people and alienate the industries of the world from our shores. We are not accustomed to a central government requiring our people to pay for nationalized industries which they neither want, need, nor have coveted.

Where the Liberal budget bases belief on an illusion, the Conservative budget based belief on a specified energy tax credit worth $200 or more to an eligible family. The only thing families are eligible for now will be to pay by 1983 $350 more per year to heat their homes as a direct result of these newly imposed taxes; to pay $1.09 more per gallon to fuel their cars, to pay $70 per year to heat their homes with gas—an excellent example of the government's giving with one hand and taking away with the other.

We must not forget that natural gas is itself a non-renewable energy source. Mr. Speaker, the people of Britain will be pleased to tell you how all through the 1960s they were encouraged through grants to convert to gas and how, just last spring, they suffered a 60 per cent overnight increase in the price of their gas which, by this time, was virtually in every British home. Beware!

Mr. Deans: Was that a Tory government?

Mr. Domm: Several provincial governments have already taken steps to combat the damage done to the provincial economies by this government. Ministers over there attempt to rewrite the constitutional arrangement, not only on the patriation front, but through these insidious attempts to rob the provinces of their economic initiatives, thereby negating the strength, importance and rightful influence of regional self-determination, a concept deeply held and hard fought for in this country's history.

Where in all this does Ontario lie, if that is not too obvious a question for the Liberals? If this is a true budget, if it purports to address the totality of the Canadian economy, if it is not a thinly veiled attempt at political and economic dominance, what does it do to advance the interests of the country as a whole? How does it address the non-transitory needs of a central Canada or the permanent and enduring needs of one third of Canada's population within Ontario's borders? Given the immense resource riches of Ontario, which differ only in kind and not in quality or quantity from those of other provinces, how can the Minister of Finance justify his marshalling of revenue from one particular resource?

We in Ontario, particularly the members of Parliament from the province, should ask ourselves when will he be instituting a hydro export tax, a coal export tax, a uranium export tax, ownership funds to nationalize our copper, iron ore, zinc, silver, gold, platinum, and indeed, all the other resources Ontario claims—or rather has no need to claim as they are constitutionally protected to develop and market as Ontario sees fit. Why does the minister not penalize Ontario's resource markets by adopting punitive measures against her foreign ventures and her development capital?

Why does the Minister of Finance not reduce Inco's net profits overnight by 12 per cent? Why does he not scoff with his colleague's bravado at the possibility of the mineral companies leaving our borders for more hospitable political atmospheres elsewhere? Watch out, Ontario! Perhaps consideration is even now being given to pegging the selling price for nickel at 85 per cent of the world price.

Ontario, beware of the socialistic trends clearly evident in this Liberal budget. What is happening in the west could be the forerunner of things to happen in Ontario. The government is charting a dangerous course in this respect. The people of Canada must realize that this is a punitive exercise, not only upon them through their tax dollars, but against their futures. We may be witnessing not only the perpetration of irrevocable damage to our oil industry—for it is our oil industry one way or the other—but we may also become horrified observers of the destruction of our dearly held and highly valued constitutional system, our economic freedom and our liberty to pursue prosperity through personal determination, not through the high-handed interference of a God-like central government.

The Conservative budget was a reasonable, straight-forward, honest and compassionate document. It was a realistic program for the 1980s. But how the Liberals vilified it! How passionately they cried foul against the excise tax of 18 cents on gasoline. They appealed to the electorate saying they could not specify the exact price of gasoline "until negotiations with the provinces have taken place". The so-called "made-in-Canada" price or, should I say, "made-in-Ottawa" price would result in a lower price to consumers than the one proposed in the defeated Conservative budget because it would not include, as members opposite said, an 18-cent excise tax on gasoline. The ironic mockery of that phrase haunts every Canadian householder who cares to admit that they have been bamboozled and befuddled by the backroom subterfuge and the absolute self-interest of this Liberal government. "A lower price to consumers." Let us see how substantive that a phrase is. The Minister of Finance states in his budget:

> The blended price will never exceed 85 per cent of the international price or the average price in the U.S. whichever is lower.

And what did the Crosbie budget say? It said:

> All increases in the domestic price of oil would be subject to the condition that the average delivered price in Toronto would not exceed 85 per cent of the lower of the Chicago price or the international price.

What is the sum difference between this budget and the Crosbie commitment to 85 per cent in that much maligned budget? There is no difference whatsoever. This is the consumer protectionism with which ministers opposite have befuddled the people.

It pains me that the Minister of Finance obliges me to point out such an obvious and logical fact to him and to this House—but then, they all know it perfectly well. Certainly everyone in this country now knows that they have been "had" by the Liberals with their broken election commitments to lower oil prices.

Confronted by the expected resistance from the producing provinces to a tax on natural gas exports, the Minister of Finance did the obvious thing. He did not tax natural gas exports—he taxed natural gas. He taxed all natural gas—domestic, exported, still in the ground—any gas that is obviously around. Now there is an obvious man. And Canadians are seeing how obvious he is.

He knew that the modern, sophisticated voter is far too aware, far too smart to be taken in by the clever ploy of calling a spade a spade—and calling an excise tax an excise tax. He called it, therefore, and logically, by another name, or, rather, by several other names. The Crosbie excise tax was changed, to the more aristocratic sounding "Canadian ownership account", "wellhead price", "petroleum compensation charge", and the "oil export tax". Through these new energy taxes, the government will take an extra $3 billion in revenue from the pockets of consumers. As the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) mentioned this weekend, this amount will not be spread equally and fairly across the whole country but will be focused like a penalty on those who are now at the centre of the drive for an energy and industrial base in Canada—the energy producing provinces.

When these budget measures are combined with the new taxes imposed last April, they will raise taxes by $3.5 billion more than the Crosbie budget which, as the hon. members opposite will remember, was condemned utterly for uncontrolled spending.

The budget raises the price of oil this year by a total of $4.55 per barrel. The Crosbie budget raised it by $4 per barrel yet the former Liberal opposition condemned it for that. Now the government has increased the price by $4.55 at the wellhead—made up of $3 at the wellhead, 75 cents for Syncrude and 80 cents in the current budget. The Crosbie budget would have increased oil prices by $4.50 per barrel every year until 1985 but the present budget will increase them by a greater amount. In all logic, Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister of Finance claim he is not increasing prices more than was the case in the Crosbie budget? There is one big reason, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian electorate made a mistake in February. The minister proposes to increase the price of oil at the wellhead in 1986 by $7 per barrel.

The new petroleum and gas revenue tax and the natural gas and gas liquids tax will, together, raise $2.7 billion. Now, $2.7 billion rings a bell. It is the amount that the discredited Crosbie budget was to collect with the excise tax. But then, the Crosbie budget had also offered relief, on the same amount of revenue, to the tune of $650 million through the mortgage and property tax credit and the program to allow deductions of the salaries of the wives of entrepreneurs and businessmen. But no doubt a crafty trick lurked in these apparently helpful programs, and the present finance minister did right to ignore them. Tax credits are to be ignored in the Liberal regime.

That is, except for MURBs. These offer tax relief to needy millionaires who are struggling to put up more highrises but are being prevented from doing so by the thoughtless inability of the people to pay their rents! In an increasingly cold and alienating urban environment, more highrises are just what we are looking for.

Mr. Speaker, like Hansel and Gretel, the Canadian taxpayer has been led into the woods by this government, and they will find out that it is they who are to be cooked, not the goose of the oil companies and other corporate interests.

The Crosbie budget of last year would have resulted in lower expenditures, lower domestic financial requirements, a lower rate of spending growth, and a lower deficit on both a public accounts and cash basis, in this and in each succeeding year until 1984, and our revenue for this year would have been greater by $105 million, while our deficit would have been lower by almost $4 billion.

What have the Liberals offered in return? Their budget reminds me of the man who was sentenced by Queen Elizabeth I to be hung, drawn and quartered. At the last minute, his sentence was commuted to hanging. They primed Canadians to prepare for the worst, but instead used the subsequent relief to pioneer astonishing schemes whose implications had not even been dreamt of. The significance of these schemes may not be felt as sharply as deindexing or the abolition of tax shelters, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that they are even more significant and hurtful to all sectors of the economy—including the taxpayer.

This is a distorted and abortive socialism, Mr. Speaker, making the poor pay to subsidize the even poorer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren), some hon. members, through their duty to the House, may not be aware of the most recent news from the United States. I hope they will not mind this interruption. I understand that news reports indicate that Governor Reagan has acquired 51 per cent of the vote and President Carter, 44 per cent to date.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is a hard act to follow.

In speaking this evening on the budget, I want to direct my remarks largely to the energy policy which is such a significant part of the total budget presented last Tuesday evening. It is a major part of that budget because energy is such a pervasive element in our total economy. The development of the energy industry, as the budget forecasts, will in effect be a motor of both economic growth and industrial strategy in this country in the years ahead. Hence, it must necessarily be a substantial part of the budget.

We are all familiar with the international energy problem. Total consumption of oil has tripled over the past three decades and, since 1973, world oil prices have also tripled. For some countries the impact of those major and sharp increases in petroleum prices have brought near financial disaster and, certainly, widespread hardship. Even with our own substantial petroleum resources, prices in this country have increased significantly bringing in their train more inflation and higher unemployment.

Canada, however, is particularly well placed to meet the challenges of the 1990s, the energy decade. In fact, energy opportunities will be transformed into energy advantages which will propel Canada into the 1990s from a position of national strength. The vehicle will be our new and ambitious energy program. We are, of course, already less vulnerable to the caprices of an international petroleum cartel than almost any other nation. Under the new program, we shall become totally independent. We are fortunate in having a variety of energy options. We shall expand those options. We already have an impressive record of achievement and accomplishment. Indeed, we shall lead the world, as we do already in many respects, in petroleum techniques and organization required for further exploration and development of our energy resources.

The new energy program promises every Canadian improvement on our already substantial record of achievement. It also promises opportunities for every province of our country benefiting every Canadian. Few countries are so fortunate as Canada. Few countries enter the energy decade with our domestic resources and our ability to insulate ourselves from foreign, unstable sources of oil. Nevertheless, even with our own vast energy resources, we had to make hard decisions in the budget.

There has been the matter of supply. There have been questions of price. There have been problems of subsidies and incentives. There is the matter of revenues to assist in developing the energy projects which Canadians rightly demand. All these are difficult questions, but they can and will be resolved within our own boundaries as the new energy program outlines. In that new program, we offer stability to petroleum industry in Canada. Canadian consumers are assured fairness, and all Canadians are offered great new opportunities of participation.

We have a job to do, a job that will put tens of thousands of Canadians to work, call for billions of dollars in investment and allow us to gain greater experience of working within our own fragile environment, especially in the north and offshore. It will enable us to acquire the skills and technology required for massive projects, so that we can sell those Canadians skills and technology to the world.

Previous Liberal governments and the previous Conservative government both recognized the dangers of dependence on foreign oil. The previous government largely ignored the problem inherent in depending on foreign-owned and controlled oil corporations here at home. It offered various contradictory policy positions, but some of their spokesmen, certainly, wished to disband Petro-Canada, and others wished to render it a caricature of its former healthy self.

Other nations, similar to ours, have moved faster to ensure a more active national presence in their petroleum industry. In Britain, for example, the national oil corporation has had first claim on a 51 per cent share of North Sea oil production. In Norway, the public oil corporation called Statoil is authorized to take up to a 50 per cent interest in any field it does not already hold. It makes no payment for past exploration. It has the option to increase its interest to 70 per cent at its own discretion. In Australia, to take another example, only naturalized foreign oil companies can produce oil. A naturalized company in Australia must have 25 per cent of its equity owned by Australians. The board of directors must comprise a majority of Australians, and the company must commit itself to increase its Australian equity to 51 per cent within a given period.

What has been the situation in Canada where the industry has been dominated by foreign-owned corporations? Net oil and gas revenues have risen from $1.2 billion in 1970 to over $11 billion in 1979. Since the volume of oil and gas production has increased about 30 per cent over that same period, price increases have provided the industry with generous profits, largely on reserves discovered before the OPEC cartel inflated world price.

In the first six months of this year, the profits of the five largest oil companies jumped to just over $1 billion. That is a 92 per cent increase over their combined profits of $500 million in the first six months of last year. Moreover, that increase follows a 72 per cent profit increase for the same companies last year to $1.5 billion, compared with something over $800 million in 1978. All companies earning these enormous profits are at least two-thirds controlled by a foreign parent.

What are these companies doing with their Canadian dollars? Last year alone, over $650 million left the top seven foreign-controlled corporations in the petroleum industry in the form of dividend payments and equity reductions. Foreign-controlled firms dominate our energy sector, a sector which is bound in turn to dominate the Canadian economy by the end of this energy decade. In 1979, foreign-controlled firms reported sales of $6.1 billion. A comparable figure for Canadian companies was merely $1.6 billion. In other words, almost three-quarters of industry sales accrued to foreign-controlled firms.

Let me give you another example, Mr. Speaker. Many of the most promising exploration activities occur on "Canada lands", that is, in the north, the high Arctic, and offshore. But of the 290 million acres held by companies under permit, only 110 million are held by Canadian-controlled companies. Without the presence of Petro-Canada, the Canadian role would have been altogether negligible.

In total, there are 19 major oil and gas companies which are 100 per cent foreign-owned. In the last four years alone, the amount of Canadian capital exported by the petroleum industry, including dividends and interest and return of capital, exceeded inflows by $3.7 billion.

Clearly this foreign-dominated sector, the essential sector of our economy today, is healthy. But why has it been so profitable? Internal cash flow in the industry rose in 1979 to more than $7 billion, a yearly gain of some 43 per cent. Total funds available to the industry last year rose to almost $12 billion. After-tax profits in the industry reached $4.7 billion, an increase of more than one-half over the previous year. A remarkably generous regime of resource taxation provided the industry with such profits, and in a significant way contributed to the current federal deficit.

For the purposes of calculating federal income tax, resource income, after operating costs and capital cost allowance, is reduced by a 25 per cent resource allowance. This is a provision which gave recognition to the fact that royalties paid to governments were not deductible for income tax purposes. The most important deductions included exploration costs, which were written off at 100 per cent in the year in which the expense occurred. Development expenses were written off at a 30 per cent rate, and land bonus payments were written off at a 10 per cent rate. In addition to all of those major incentives which were, in effect, tax expenditures by the national government, resource firms could deduct a further one-third of their exploration costs, most of their development costs and certain capital costs, as well as one-half of the costs of enhanced recovery equipment by virtue of the earned depletion allowance. This deduction was claimed against resource income, up to 25 per cent of that income.

This preferential treatment to the energy industry in Canada was paid for in the form of lost revenue by the federal government and ultimately by the taxpayers of Canada. It was done to encourage active exploration and the development of a secure, energy supply. An estimate of the magnitude of the national government's efforts at promotion may be obtained from the tax expenditures account which was published by the previous government in December, 1979, and issued with the budget papers of the previous government. Let us assume that the tax provisions designed to aid the energy industry were eliminated. What additional revenue would accrue to the federal government? The fast write-off for exploration expenses, the fast write-off for development expenses and the earned depletion allowance cost the federal government $425 million in foregone revenue last year. With other deductions, the federal tax expenditure in 1979 for mining, gas and oil amounted to more than $2 billion. While this is an estimate and subject to further clarification, it indicates the magnitude of the contribution the Canadian taxpayer has made to the development of the petroleum industry and to those regions of Canada which have benefited directly from petroleum development.

Perhaps our former practices were too generous. As the previous finance minister, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) noted last year, "under the current system, high income Canadians can receive tax benefits that are actually larger than the cost of their investment. This is not tolerable." So in some respects was the previous system when it favoured particular regions over the national good or favoured, as I shall point out in a moment, foreign-controlled corporations over Canadian-controlled.

The previous system of tax incentives for the petroleum industry tended to favour foreign-controlled companies because the incentives were in form of write-offs against current profits. Most Canadian companies did not have the necessary large profits to benefit. This has meant that the major oil companies have frequently been able to outbid small Canadian companies at land auctions, farm-ins or on the takeovers of other companies.

We, the national government, and ultimately the Canadian taxpayer have paid 94 per cent of the cost of wells over $5 million. We have paid two-thirds of others costs involved for drilling such as in the case of the Beaufort Sea. We, the national government, and accordingly the taxpayers, have paid over one-half, over 50 cents of every dollar spent on oil sands development.

I cite these statistics to underline the fact that the unwelcome results have occurred. While the big companies, the foreign-controlled companies, have had to spend about 37 cents of every dollar for exploration costs, a small company, typically a small Canadian company, has had to spend about 60 cents for the same exploration effort. Clearly, the time had come for a change.

In the case of federal expenditures, I want to point out that the expenses I have described as write-offs have not been the only claim on federal tax resources. Allow me to develop the argument further. As oil prices rise, the fiscal position of the federal government deteriorated under the previous revenue regime. Why? Because we are committed to maintain a once-price system for oil, whether imported or domestic, so that no Canadian is discriminated against by regional pricing variations.

To maintain this one-price system, we must of course subsidize the price of imported oil at a very great expense. Second, resource revenues distort regional equality. Since the federal government is ultimately responsible for ensuring regional economic equality, we must transfer more directly to the have-not provinces, by way of transfer payments or indirectly, through the efforts, for example, of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

I have not mentioned our other important federal government commitments to, for example, medicare, hospital insurance and post-secondary education. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) indicated in summing up this approach to our national economy, the federal government receives only about one-third of total government revenue, but is responsible for about one-half the expenditure. Canadians today rightly call upon the national government to promote and stimulate our total economy through a new energy program.

I have touched on the question of supply. I have said a word about the major role of foreign-controlled corporations in our petroleum industry. I have said something about the revenues foregone by the national government, a practice intended to promote the development of the Canadian petroleum industry.

It is our view that the time has come when all Canadians should enjoy the economic benefits accruing from our energy resources, including the technical and industrial benefit spin-offs. But first, before we can obtain the full benefits, we must gain the ownership and control of our total energy sector. The federal government is accordingly committed to a significant shift in the structure of the oil and gas industry. The government has three goals which have been briefly summarized as, first, 50 per cent Canadian ownership of oil and gas production by 1990, second, Canadian control of a significant number of the larger oil and gas firms and, third, an early increase in the share of the oil and gas sector owned by the Government of Canada.

The specific measures designed to meet both our supply requirements and Canadianization goals include incentive programs to encourage all firms, but especially Canadian firms, to grow and expand and play a more active role in our oil and gas sectors.

Over the next three years, the oil and gas industry in Canada will gain more from the petroleum incentive program outlined in the budget than it will lose from the reduction in depletion allowance and changes in the definition of exploration and development expenses. The incentive system in our new program is more generous than the previous one. It is accessible in a meaningful way for the first time to smaller companies which, as I have noted, tend to be Canadian.

Producers will, of course, have to pay the petroleum and gas revenue tax, but even with this tax, the netback before corporate taxes will increase rapidly, from 94 cents per million cubic feet in 1979 to $2.49 per million cubic feet in 1985 for gas and from $6.29 per barrel in 1979 to $11.73 per barrel in 1985 for oil. Over all, the industry's net income, including incentive payments, will double between 1979 and 1983. The phasing out of the depletion allowance for exploration outside Canada lands will give time to oil and gas companies to increase the level of their Canadian ownership and benefit from the incentive program.

The impact on oil and gas companies will vary with the level of their Canadian ownership. Canadian companies will definitely benefit from the new program presented in the budget. A company at least 75 per cent Canadian owned with one dollar in cash will be able to spend $5 on Canada lands, $4 coming from the government as incentive payments. Such a company will have to pay only 7 cents of each dollar spent on exploration on Canada lands. The cost of exploration on provincial lands will amount to only 34 cents for each dollar when the program is fully implemented in 1984. This compares with a cost of 37 cents for each dollar under the past system.

Incentives, as has become evident to all those who have read the new energy program, will be less attractive for foreign companies. For example, their net cost on Canada lands will be 28 cents for each dollar. Nevertheless, the total system will remain highly attractive by international standards.

The incentive program will be very attractive to individual Canadians and will help oil and gas companies to raise money through drilling funds. Individuals will get the same incentive payments as Canadian companies. Net cost of exploration for an individual with a marginal tax rate of 40 per cent will be only 39 cents for each dollar spent on provincial lands and 12 cents for each dollar spent on Canada lands. These are indeed major incentives for Canadians to invest in the fastest growing and most prosperous segment of our economy.

I have already said a word about Canada lands. I want to expand for a moment on that particular aspect of our policy affecting those lands in the high Arctic and offshore. A new Canadian oil and gas act will enable the government to direct development on these lands more effectively, to share more equitably in profits from future production and to increase Canadian ownership. Starting in 1981, the government will make incentive payments from 25 per cent up to 80 per cent of all exploration costs on Canada lands. It is only normal that the government would then share in both costs and revenues. The 25 per cent interest reserved for the Crown, which has led to some discussion in the House, must be evaluated in the context of the overall system on Canada lands, taking into account the royalty system which could have been used to increase the government's share. Looking at the system as a whole, it appears attractive by any world standard.

The new policy provides for a carried interest for the Crown in the Canada lands. When it is converted to a working interest, the Crown corporation involved will have to pay its share of the costs. Development costs being much higher than exploration costs, the government will have to pay a larger share of total cost to receive a share of revenues. The application of this clause to existing interests is justified since the government and the taxpayer paid a large share of the exploration costs incurred previously.

There are various other aspects of the incentive program for greater Canadianization in the petroleum industry which I could touch on, for example, the natural gas bank, the role of the Foreign Investment Review Agency or the acquisition policy which will be carried out by Petro-Canada. But I think it will be sufficient if this evening I simply note that contrary to what some have suggested, the Canadianization objective of this government will be no deterrent to our energy security. Quite the contrary, our program will reinforce an existing tendency by aggressive Canadian firms to expand both by acquisition and by new discoveries.

When acquisition is by a public company, that company can be expected to follow the tradition already established by Petro-Canada as a leader and as a catalyst in such ventures as offshore exploration, energy transport and oil upgrading. Our program is intended to reduce the profits of firms which are not now investing adequately and to divert those funds to firms which are willing to explore more aggressively. In the case of acquisitions, it is to be expected that the firms to be acquired will be predominantly those with less than average reinvestment track records and that the acquiring firm will have a better than average record. In this way a process of Canadianization is one which enhances our energy security.

In summary, the new energy program builds on Canadian energy strengths. We already produce more energy than we consume. We offset our deficit in oil with our surpluses of electricity, natural gas, uranium and other fuels. Oil prices will, of course, be increased substantially, but they will increase gradually and predictably, remaining below the international prices while being high enough to encourage new supplies and to act as an additional inducement to conservation.

Natural gas prices will rise slower than oil prices. Gas distribution will be expanded, and we shall encourage households across Canada to switch from heating oil to gas and encourage businesses to move toward a greater use of natural gas. Through stimulation by federal grants to consumers and other methods, we shall encourage the substitution to forms of energy other than oil.

The principal feature of the new energy policy is one of sharing. That aspect is important if all Canadians are to receive the full benefit of our new energy policies and to share in the total energy industry which is the greatest stimulus of our economy today.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much this opportunity to participate in the budget debate, in view of the fact that we faced closure on the constitution issue, an issue which is possibly the most important issue which could be before this House of Commons as far as the future of Canada is concerned.

In his press conference on October 23 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that we as members of Parliament would have the opportunity to debate the very important issue of our constitution in this House of Commons, but it is obvious that he reneged on that promise. When we review the record of the Prime Minister, we find that this is nothing new. He is very often willing to make statements but not to live up to his commitments once he is in government.

What we in western Canada resent so much with regard to the constitutional package is that it makes us second-class citizens. Two provinces are guaranteed a veto right under the constitution whether they have 25 per cent of the population or not. We feel the same privilege should be offered to all provinces. That is why we have endorsed the Vancouver consensus, to which all provinces agreed. I understand that the Prime Minister even gave it consideration and was willing to agree to it in the event that he could receive concessions from the provinces.

We on this side wish to develop a constitution with proposals which will reflect the needs and desires of all Canadians. More important we wish to ensure that the provinces will have a meaningful role to play in our Canadian way of life. It is a sad day when individual members of Parliament are choked off as far as their participation in debate is concerned when it comes to the constitutional issue.

I love Canada, I love Alberta and I wish to have an opportunity to contribute to the growth of both. However, when we consider what our Prime Minister has done in his short period in this Parliament, we see that he has brought forward a constitutional proposal which has aggravated not just western Canadians but the far eastern provinces as well. He has brought in an energy package which has aggravated the situation existing in western Canada.

The sad part of it is that he wishes to raise our oil prices higher than the level at which Alberta had offered oil to the federal government. Alberta had given an indication that they only wished to raise them to 75 per cent of the world or the U.S. price, whichever is lesser, but under the present Liberal administration, we will see the levels rise to some 85 per cent of the world or the U.S. price, whichever is lesser.

I wish to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Edmonton Journal on Saturday, August 23 entitled "You the people." It reads:

> It is with profound despair that our worst fears about the Liberal government in Ottawa are confirmed.
> Ottawa's negotiations with the provinces on the constitution are a sham. Its negotiations with Alberta on energy were a sham. To the Liberals, Canadian federalism in a sham. No Canadian should find comfort in these awful conclusions—
>
> At stake here is the very integrity of Canadian federalism as a living process. At stake is the good faith on which federalism must operate, the honesty and goodwill on which it depends to survive.
> The Liberals are discounting constitutional negotiations with the provinces even as they occur—just as they did in the case of energy talks with Alberta. We do not have a federal system; we have a unitary state parading as a federal system.

This pretty well outlines the thoughts of many individuals in Alberta on the present Liberal government. As I said, it has taken a series of action which western Canadians have interpreted as being hostile to their region. I cannot help but be somewhat puzzled when I see a government which indicates it is sensitive to the province of Quebec—which I support—demonstrating that when it comes to showing any sensitivity to western Canada, it has none whatsoever.

Let us review some of the items that are not contained in the Liberal budget. There is absolutely nothing in the budget for farmers throughout Canada, except added fuel costs. There is nothing in the budget for individuals on fixed incomes or for senior citizens. When we review the Liberal government's record of the past ten years, we find that the Prime Minister has been successful in nothing except in being re-elected.

Let us review the record and the legacy which the Liberals have left us. They have given us record high government spending, record high unemployment, record high inflation and record high interest rates. Under this administration, our dollar has fallen to its lowest levels. When we compare this with some of the initiatives we took during the short period of time we were in government, we find that measures were introduced to reduce government spending. We were in the process of bringing down the huge budgetary deficit. We introduced a realistic freedom of information package. We promised parliamentary reform whereby individual members of Parliament would have a more meaningful role to play in determining the course which our nation would take. In our budget we introduced capital gains relief for farmers. We offered deductibility to working spouses in the farming sector and in small business. We were in the process of introducing a meat import law. We committed ourselves to some $34 million for the development of Prince Rupert, and under our transport minister at that time, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), western grain transportation system was being improved.

These policies reflected our belief in the individual Canadian, in the individual worth of each Canadian; we wanted to develop that potential within each Canadian. We have here the greatest country in the world with an abundance of natural resources and, what is even more important, an abundance of human potential, potential which this government is stifling. We wanted to develop that potential but we were in office only for a short period of time, and now it is rather sad to see what is happening under the administration opposite. I ask what my friends opposite are going to do for the farming sector in view of the disastrously high interest rates. What will they do for the home owners? In our program we outlined specifically what we were going to do for those two sectors of the population. This budget simply contains statements dealing with energy. The sad part of it is that because of this energy statement, we will be deprived in Canada of energy self-sufficiency and, more important, we will be deprived of jobs because of the slowdown in the energy sector.

The Alberta Chamber of Commerce presented an excellent submission regarding the benefits gained by all Canadians from the development of our resources in Alberta. It is not only Albertans who will benefit from the development of these resources. All Canadians will benefit from energy self-sufficiency and from the spin-off jobs which will be provided in the development of these resources.

It is interesting to note that since 1973, Canada reserves have been declining under this administration. We hear hon. members opposite stating that we have an abundance of resources, yet under the administration opposite we have become a net importer rather than a net exporter of resources.

We pay twice as much for foreign oil and development of foreign wells as we pay for Canadian energy to create Canadian wealth. My friends opposite have created a hopeless climate throughout this land and it is rather sad to see. The hon. member over there may smile, but let him look at the polls and he will find that one in four Albertans wishes to separate from Canada. It breaks my heart to see something like this develop. It is developing simply because of the attitude of hon. members opposite.

I promised hon. members to my left that I would keep my comments very brief. Let me just leave you with a few thoughts, Mr. Speaker. I should like to reiterate that the majority of us want to stay as part of this country and the majority of us wish to contribute to this country, but if the continuous policy of the government opposite is to push us out of confederation, what will happen to this country is obvious. I love Canada and I love Alberta, but the government opposite is depriving me of the opportunity to contribute to both. I cannot help but be sad when I witness the policies being implemented by this Liberal regime.

Let me conclude on a lighter note which I should like to share with hon. members opposite. What we will do in Alberta is to erect a statue of the Prime Minister. We believe it will provide shade in the summer, shelter in the winter, and allow the sparrows to speak for all Albertans.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, like some of my colleagues, I too, welcome the opportunity to speak on the budget. I cannot support the proposals outlined by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), because he has failed to perform the duty of providing economic leadership to Canada or to any of its regions. Other members of Parliament have criticized this budget and I concur with that criticism. This budget is full of politics but it is silly putty when it comes to economics. It ignores the need for comprehensive social programs.

Whether I choose to speak as the member for Churchill, as the chairman of our Atlantic committee or as an individual Canadian, I cannot believe that this budget will solve the problems facing this nation. As the hon. member for Churchill I represent a constituency containing two-thirds of the land mass of Manitoba. There are a number of native communities where unemployment exceeds 80 per cent, white communities with youths and women who lack trade and skills training, yet the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is talking about importing 30,000 skilled workmen. As a representative of the people of northern Manitoba, I cannot support a budget which does nothing for these native people, for women and young people.

We are told there will be a 22 per cent increase in the economic envelope, whatever that means. Mr. Speaker, we do not know what that money will be used for. Past government performance would indicate that we got another grab bag of hit and miss programs and unemployment programs which will offer nothing substantial to Canadians who really need help and which will do nothing to meet the drastic shortage of skilled trades people. We were introduced in this budget to a program which in effect will be a slush fund for revitalizing the Liberal party in western Canada. That goal is as likely to be achieved as the return of the dinosaurs which once roamed the riding of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). The Liberals are dinosaurs when it comes to western Canada; they are extinct and will remain so.

The western development fund is advertised as being worth $4 billion, but on examination it is only a commitment for $2 billion over the next three years. The Minister of Finance has described this program as some kind of retribution for the grab on western resources. In its own Liberal way it is of little substance, it shows little planning, and consequently it will do little to diversify the economy of the western provinces. This fund may be used to effect some transportation improvements. It may actually provide funds for that great Liberal election promise of double-tracking, suitably subtitled "there and back again". But it will do little for the people of western Canada.

There is need for western economic growth, diversification, and programs to assist native people and others in regions which do not have huge granaries and oil drills sitting in their backyard. But this will not happen unless the Liberal government starts planning and stops playing regional politics.

I am concerned about the effect of the budget on the over-all Canadian economy, on the individual Canadian family, and on the underdeveloped regions of this country, in particular the Atlantic provinces to which I will address my next few remarks. The Atlantic region has always been hit the hardest by measures decided in Ottawa. When prices are high, they are higher in the Atlantic provinces. When wages are low, they are lower in that region. When these are few jobs, there are still fewer jobs in the Atlantic region. This has become a Canadian fact of life. So it is of little surprise to me, although I expected a little more from a minister of finance who comes from Cape Breton, to find that the Atlantic provinces will once more get it in the teeth because of the federal budget of a week ago.

I said I expected more from the Minister of Finance because he is a home-grown boy from the region, but after all there is another side to the story. He is a Liberal Minister of Finance and for the last 20 years his party has done nothing to help the people of that region. It has done nothing to remove the regional disparities which exist in the country.

Perhaps one problem of the Minister of Finance is that he does not look beyond his statistics, charts, numbers, forecasts and profiles to see what the lack of planning has done to the average Canadian. For example, would he forecast that this will be the highest rate of unemployment since the great depression? I wonder what the word "unemployment" means to the minister. Is the word nothing more to him than cold hard statistics? Does it have a magical effect on his heart and his mind, or does it turn him away from the problems facing Canadians? Is unemployment becoming a term synonymous with participation rates, seasonally adjusted rates, numbered regions, or does he see beyond all that? Does he see that the lack of action on the part of his government will severely hurt people and regions which simply cannot afford to be hurt one more time?

What about the increase in premiums for unemployment insurance? The Minister of Finance announced in the budget that employee contributions will increase from a rate of $1.35 per $100 of insurable earnings, to a rate of $1.80 per $100 of insurable earnings, a 33 per cent rise. Does he look at these black and white figures and think to himself that 45 cents per week for $100 is not very much? Does he think it is not too bad, or does he see that the change in the contribution scheme is really a regressive tax and an extra burden on working people, especially on those who can afford it less?

One would hope the Minister of Employment and Immigration would have been able to supply his colleague with better advice as to how to increase revenues from the unemployment insurance program. But he has received bad advice from that minister. The government should be getting better advice, especially at this point in history, so that it can spend those millions of dollars on public relations advertising good programs instead of the useless and sometimes harmful programs introduced in the last few years.

I should like to look at some other factors in the budget. The Liberal government realized ten years ago that the economic direction in which they were taking the country would ultimately mean that certain regions would become increasingly disadvantaged. Since it evidently realized the injustice which would be created by the existence of a federation with such great disparities of wealth, it decided to create the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This would be the flagship of the government's concern for regional disparities. After all, in a country as wealthy and prosperous as Canada, it would be nothing but an embarrassment for those inequities to continue to exist.

We all had great optimism at the time the program was announced, a program with a specific mandate to ensure that individual Canadians in disadvantaged regions would not fall too far behind. Unfortunately the department was an optimistic child of the late sixties. Now that child is middle aged and cynical. It is well known that the DREE budget has dropped dramatically since its inception as a proportion of total federal spending. It has dropped from 2 per cent of the budget to less than 1 per cent. I will not push this point because it is a fact that the government has lost any concern for regional disparity.

The real tragedy of DREE is that in the last ten years it has failed in its mission to enlighten budgetmakers and Treasury Board presidents. It has failed to convince these decision makers that economic policy must be a policy for all areas of the country. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has in many ways played an advocate role. It has fought for disadvantaged regions both inside and outside the cabinet room with some success. However, in the final analysis there has been little progress in the last ten years, especially when it comes to the economic development of the regions concerned, most of all because what DREE gives with the one hand, other federal policies take away with the other.

I have seen very little co-operation and co-ordination between DREE and other departments. One problem is that the government does not know what it wants to do in eastern Canada. In the budget there is a special investment tax credit program provided for areas of greatest disparity. The program announced within the body of the budget a week ago was designed specifically to combat regional disparities. It was supposed to increase investment in areas of Canada suffering from high unemployment and low income levels. The 50 per cent investment tax credit will apply to investments in new plants and equipment for processing and manufacturing. My first glance at this proposal made me think it was something I had seen in the Conservative budget but packaged slightly different by Liberal budget writers. At first I was optimistic about the program, but once I looked at it, I found that it was watered down and would not provide the types of assistance the Atlantic region needs. Most notably, the other departments are still not co-ordinated with this program. The increase in energy costs in eastern Canada will probably dilute the effect of this program. Moreover, the new program will not create the types of jobs eastern Canadians need. This program is also most notable for the kind of activities which the government is not going to encourage through the 50 per cent investment tax credit. The exclusions are pulp and newspaper production, petroleum refining, farming, fishing, logging and mining, which work against Atlantic Canada due to the area's dependence on those resource-based industries. They need these industries in order to stabilize their economies and create jobs; excluding them from the program cannot help eastern Canadians.

A further concern I have about this tax credit program is one I have in general about DREE funding. There is little evidence that the companies which locate in the Atlantic region, subsidized by government funds, do so because of the incentive programs. In many cases these companies have little commitment to the region or its population and the subsidies do nothing more than add to private profits, with little regard for continuity. I fail to understand why these incentives are being offered immediately effective budget night. They are supposed to encourage companies to relocate or to invest in eastern Canada. If it is an incentive to bring these companies to eastern Canada, why is it being backdated in such a way that companies which are already planning to relocate there are to receive this 50 per cent credit? You do not encourage companies that are planning to build or companies that are already building there. You encourage companies that may be induced to move there two or three years down the road, companies which are making their plans at this time. In other words, this measure, like so many other measures, will just be another tax rip-off for the companies. If the government were really concerned it would be making plans for the future by offering incentives for the future and not just giving tax write-offs to companies that are already building in those regions.

I am constantly amazed at how much energy the Liberal Party devotes in trying to mollify certain regions of this country—with little success. The reason is that they ignore some of the obvious solutions which have been sitting in front of their noses for some time. Let me use the infamous SYSCO example. This is not the first time my party has brought this matter up in the House. Why should the residents of the Atlantic region believe Liberal promises about an extension of the natural gas pipeline to the maritimes, a coal conversion program or a DREE program targeted at underdeveloped regions when the Liberals cannot even make good on the promises they have made to provide funds to the ailing Sydney Steel Corporation? It is a company which is already operating in this region, and one which would like to continue operating there. It is a company which is providing employment for a lot of people in Cape Breton. Althouth the Minister of Finance himself comes from that region they cannot get money from the Liberal government. They have been given promises year after year. These are promises which the parliamentary secretary to the DREE minister, a member of Parliament from that region, has called peanuts. But even those peanuts will not be delivered. They have gone the same way as the peanut farmer from the United States.

It is time now for the government to keep that particular election promise. They have to modernize Sysco in order to produce the jobs needed there and to give Atlantic Canadians the feeling that this government does care—not just at election time but throughout the year. There is nothing in this budget to indicates that there is any care. Again, there is no promise for Sysco. There is no promise for the people of Sydney.

There are other issues of concern to the Atlantic region which should be discussed during this budget debate. However, I recognize that there is little time left and there is one further item I would like to mention at this time. This budget has failed to make any provisions for the re-establishment of the strong and viable Canadian merchant marine. I had the opportunity to visit Saint John, New Brunswick recently in company with a committee of the NDP caucus concerned with occupational health and safety. I visited the drydocks in Saint John and I was impressed with what can be done in Canada. We, in Canada, need ships to carry our goods to other countries. I use as an example the port of Churchill in my own riding. Grain leaves the port of Churchill in foreign ships. They are mostly Polish ships. Yet sometimes we have had to wait three or four weeks after the season opens for one of those ships to arrive. If we were building our ships in Canada for a Canadian merchant marine this would not be a problem. Again, examining the budget, we find there is nothing there to establish a merchant marine. The Liberal government has failed to provide any economic leadership for Canada or, specifically, for the Atlantic region. We need those ships. We can build them here. The budget does nothing to assist the development of this very important industry.

In the few minutes which remain for me to speak I would like to address the members opposite, the rubber stamps of the House of Commons. I ask them to consider this budget quite seriously and look beyond the words of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso and his budget. Look beyond the press releases which the Liberal party has put out. Look at the budget and the decline of Canada's economy. Look at what Liberal governments have done to Canada. Year after year we have had promises from this government. Year after year they have come up with new, improved brands of soap. When you take a look at it, it is really no different from the Crosbie budget. It is in a much better package. It is new and improved; the soap looks better on the outside but it is the same old suds underneath.

If members opposite, especially those from Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario and the two lonely Liberals from the west, have any concern for what is happening in Canada, then they will not support the budget when the vote is taken in a few minutes. They will vote with their conscience on an issue of this nature so that ten years down the road we will not have another bunch of Liberals in government saying that if they had done it back then we would not face these problems today.

The energy minister has said that a partly nationalized oil industry would not have been acceptable to many Canadians ten years ago. So successive Liberal governments waited until the oil was gone, then they moved in, or announced that they would move in some day.

A number of private corporations in our country, especially in the resource extraction industry, have received government help through the provision of generous tax loopholes. Will the same thing happen with those industries once the nickel and iron is gone? Will the government step in then, or will they make announcements at that time of intention to step in and provide aid? By then, of course, they might do so. By the time the resources and jobs have gone, the Liberal government will make its move. Or it will put out the propaganda and the fancy hoopla saying they are going to move against these multinationals some time in the future.

In the cases of Sysco, Devco, Chrysler, de Havilland, Massey-Ferguson and others the government has allowed the privateers to take profits. But the government rushes to the rescue when problems get serious. If the government intends to act in these areas let it act now. Let the backbenchers at their caucus meeting tomorrow make the government act. Do not sit back and say that because those who sit in front are the ministers, the government, you will do what they say—stamp, stamp. Make your government work!

In every election campaign across this country Liberal candidates say the voters need somebody on the government side to make sure things will happen. They say, maybe you will et a DREE grant or some other grant. Mr. Speaker, they cannot do anything to make this cabinet act in a more responsible manner than the members of the official opposition. But we have the advantage of being able to get up here and point out the errors of the party opposite and the problems this country faces. We can suggest alternatives and members across the way can say nothing. Of course, when the vote is taken tonight they will get up in turn, nod in agreement and baa like sheep.

The Liberals have lost all hope of regaining power in the west because they have ignored the problems of the west for too long. Today, they are continuing to ignore the problems in western Canada but they are also ignoring the problems of eastern areas, of native people and of women. The Liberals use token gestures to get support from the various groups at election time and to prove that they have a progressive image. But when we get right down to it, whether, for example, it is in the Treasury Board which talks about giving rights to women, or somewhere else, nothing happens when it comes to affirmative action within the various departments of government.

An hon. Member: All talk!

Mr. Murphy: It is all talk. What happens, of course, is that time after time employees of the government have had to drag their employer through the courts and through the human rights tribunals to enforce the laws of Canada. The worst employer in this country is the Government of Canada. If a private corporation which came under federal legislation were ignoring the human rights code it would be prosecuted by the federal government, instead of the administration being the defender and dragged through the courts.

The other day during the budget debate the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) said that one of the reasons he was moving to provide benefits for part-time employees was so that women could have the benefit of a home life and a job. Right now there is a translators' strike, the main outstanding issue of which is paid maternity leave. We cannot believe the government. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), who is responsible for the status of women speaks of affirmative action programs within the government. What has the Liberal government introduced? What has that great new minister from the west introduced?

Mr. Murphy: Band-aids.

Miss Jewett: A lousy charter.

Mr. Murphy: A lousy charter and more studies. He is now taking the great initial step of studying four departments, not for the sake of action or to see what can be done, but to see whether there is a problem. It does not matter what the Public Service Commission has been telling them for years or what the various advisory councils have been telling them for years; they get up and say, "Is there a problem? We will send out a survey".

Miss Jewett: Another study.

Mr. Kristiansen: Take a poll.

Mr. Murphy: Take a poll, that is what they will do. If this government had any commitment to women, it would act not talk. If this government had any commitment to human rights, it would not be introducing a charter, it would be acting with the powers it now holds. When it comes to the budget, we would not see this piece of litter, we would see a budget which would be meeting the needs of Canadians, helping all the regions of this country and helping the fishermen, the miners and the unemployed.

Mr. Paproski: Small business.

Mr. Murphy: And the small businessmen across this country. I would like to thank the hon. member from the agricultural belt for his assistance.

Mr. Paproski: Edmonton North, please.

Mr. Murphy: I realize, Mr. Speaker, that in a few minutes you will be calling for the vote, and I see that the Liberal sheep are entering the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Baa!

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): One thing you have not yet learned, is to be polite.

Mr. Paproski: Here come the turkeys.

Mr. Murphy: The problem is that as the sheep come in for the vote, they have not heard the advice they have been given. They have not been listening to the budget debate. Of course, hon. members opposite will come in and stand up one after the other because they have been told that they should vote for the government. Those members from Atlantic Canada and those members of the constituencies which the NDP visited in the last couple of weeks, listened to complaints and heard about phony sod-turning ceremonies, will have trouble in the next election because they do not have the respect of their constituents, because they do not vote for the interests of their constituency.

Mr. Lefebvre: You know when to vote with us.

Mr. Broadbent: About twice a year.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the debate and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the subamendment and the amendment now before the House, in accordance with the order passed on Tuesday, October 28, 1980.

[English]

The question is on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Rae). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed to the amendment to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Rae) which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

MORE AFFORDABLE HOUSING UNITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that Statistics Canada yesterday reported that the number of people filing unemployment insurance claims was up 10 per cent over a year ago and that benefits paid were 12 per cent higher than a year ago, and in light of the budget's almost total lack of action to stimulate activity in the labour-intensive Canadian-owned housing sector, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the government immediately bring in measures to enable more affordable family housing units to be built to fill the estimated required 47,000 units over 1980-81, thus simultaneously meeting both social and economic needs.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXEMPTION OF CHIP GRANTS FROM TAXATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the authority of Standing Order 43 to present a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the homes of thousands of low and middle-income families require insulation to keep out the cold and to conserve energy, whereas the price of home insulating materials continues to increase while the grants remain constant, and whereas the government makes a good fellow of itself by providing funds to insulate such homes and then takes back a chunk of the money by making the said grants taxable, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the members of this House request the government to desist from this hyprocrisy and exempt the funds from income tax provisions.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR PROGRAM TO ALLEVIATE MORTGAGE INTEREST COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent necessity. As a result of the inept fiscal policies of this government bidding out other borrowers in the financial markets, interest rates have started to rise dramatically. Increased interest costs are particularly damaging to young people and people with low and moderate incomes trying to pay for a home. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to produce forthwith a program to alleviate mortgage interest costs in excess of 12 per cent, payable by people with low and moderate incomes.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR DISPUTES

RADIO-CANADA—CALL FOR GOOD FAITH BARGAINING WITH UNION OF JOURNALISTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that journalists of Radio-Canada are now on strike, and given the fact that this strike has deprived Francophones across Canada of national news for more than a week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Secretary of State use his good offices to urge the board of directors of Radio-Canada to bargain in good faith with the union of journalists.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CALL FOR NATIONAL TASK FORCE TO EVOLVE POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This nation is facing a serious supply and affordability housing crisis, particularly in western Canada, as a result of the national government's devastating industrial, energy, fiscal and budgetary policies. Reinitiation of the MURB program is hardly sufficient to deal with the developing housing problems. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the government initiate a national housing task force which, working in co-operation with the provinces, will evolve appropriate and needed housing policies to meet the needs and demands of the next decade.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY TAX CREDIT

CALL FOR PLAN TO OFFSET INCREASED GASOLINE PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that the Liberals stated in the last election that they would provide cheap gas for Canadians but this has not materialized because the cost of gas at the pumps has increased as much as 40 cents a gallon since December, 1979, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to bring in a tax credit plan needed to offset these increases which would place an unnecessary burden on farmers, fishermen, commuters and low income groups.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

INCREASED OIL PRICES FOR NORTHERN RESIDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On October 18 the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) gave assurances to the Western Arctic Liberal Association that he would safeguard energy supplies in the north. Just a few days later in his budget, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) announced heating oil price increases which could see residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, where there is no alternative source of domestic heating fuel, paying in excess of $2 per gallon in the near future. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

• (1410)

That this House demands that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development apologize for misleading those few poor credulous souls in the Western Arctic Liberal Association who might have made the mistake of actually believing what the minister had to say.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

PROGRAM FOR RURAL AND NORTHERN AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion regarding the fact that it is now virtually impossible for the poorest of the poor in Canada who live in rural, remote and northern areas of the country to afford even the most minimum standard home. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House requires the government to arrange immediately its spending priorities to accommodate a program for housing designed to serve the chronic and now crucial needs of Canadians who live in rural and northern areas of our country, and that such a program include a measure whereby the heavy penalties imposed on the poor and northern Canadians by the recent budget be offset through a subsidy of a blended payment, which includes the cost of heating and other utilities and is limited to a percentage of income.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

YEAR OF THE DISABLED

CALL FOR TRANSPORTATION AND SPECIAL HOUSING PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of great urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that 1981, the Year of the Disabled, is fast approaching and the Government of Canada is delaying in getting its programs for the disabled under way, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Minister of Transport act immediately on the program of transportation for the disabled which has been awaiting his decision since July, and that the Minister of Public Works responsible for housing proceed to amend regulations under the National Housing Act making it possible for non-government organizations to provide group homes and special housing for the physically and mentally disabled as a vital part of the movement toward independent living.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AND ECONOMIC INSECURITY—ALLEGED DOUBLE STANDARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the government be condemned for a grotesque double standard in its handling of the problem of lay-offs and economic insecurity, in that as a result of the politicization of the federal service, Michael Pitfield was laid off with severance pay of over $100,000 on which he has, on his rehiring, paid back less than $10,000, at the same time as hundreds of thousands of Canadians, including many federal employees, have been fired or laid off without their security rights being recognized in law or compensated by either their employers or the federal government.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROJECTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The minister will know that on Monday of this week the Canadian Council on Social Development indicated that "the budget can only have a devastating impact on the standard of living of millions of disadvantaged Canadians". Also he will know that this morning, Leonard Shifrin, a social policy analyst in Ottawa, said that this budget is "socking it to the little guy". Finally, the minister will know that the root of the growing discontent with this budget lies in the fact that it is a projection for one million Canadians to be unemployed. I would like to ask the minister how he can justify an increase in the unemployment rolls next year of 150,000 Canadians, and what does he intend to do about it?

● (1415)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, no one is justifying additions to the unemployment rolls. As the hon. member well knows, the question of unemployment in this country is a product of a number of factors, many of which are beyond our control. Certainly developments in the international economy and the basic questions of oil prices are significant problems. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member that, contrary to the position taken by his government, which was to introduce severe cutbacks and restraints in government spending that would create further recession and more unemployment—higher than was predicted in our budget—we maintained a balance of our deficit and provided a high degree of economic stimulation through the incentives to the oil and gas industry.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I think people are going to get very tired of hearing the government blame other people. I think what Canadians are looking for are some answers. In the past the minister has indicated that a program which involves $350 million will solve the problems. He neatly forgets that that program, which he has touted as being able to solve the problems, amounts to about 12,000 person-years of employment. That is about 1 per cent of the projected unemployment rate. What I want to know is what new programs the minister has to offer to the other 99 per cent of Canadians who are going to be unemployed as a consequence of his colleague's budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, nobody has ever claimed that that particular program will solve the problem. It is simply a response to the problem. There is a great difference between the two. The hon. member might do well to recognize that it is not the only measure that has been taken to respond to the problem of unemployment. For example, when I took over this ministry I was required to reintroduce a number of direct job creation programs, which the hon. member, as a member of the previous government, had cancelled. In fact, those programs were the ones which hit most heavily in the areas of highest unemployment. We had to put people back to work as a result of the cancellation of those programs, which cancellation took work away from them.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, the problem of one million unemployed in this country is not to be dealt with in such a light fashion. I would like to ask the minister another question. If he has also read the report of the council, he will know they say that "the budget is antagonistic towards the unemployed, most of whom are women, youth and the handicapped". I would like to know, as would the people, what the minister intends to do with those groups now and in the future. When will he quit trying to blame other people for his failure to meet his responsibilities?

Mr. Axworthy: As the hon. member well knows, in the job creation programs which we introduced this summer to replace the ones the previous government had cancelled—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —we put the priority on the hiring of women. We established the affirmative action principle so that priority would be given to the hiring of women, young people and minority groups.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROJECTED INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I do not know what the minister knows about the fiscal management of families, but most members in this House know that a family's fiscal and financial management shows up at the check-out counter of the grocery store. The minister projected food prices to rise 12 per cent next year. With the depreciation in the current value of our dollar from the minister's projections, and bearing in mind that food prices are really affected by exchange rates, will the minister confirm that on the basis of the depreciation of the dollar the increase in food prices next year is likely to be more like 15 per cent or 16 per cent?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the minister made all sorts of other projections. He projected that the exchange value of the dollar would be 86 cents this year and 87½ cents next year. My supplementary question is in connection with fuel oil. The minister knows, as a result of his inept budget, that he will have to pay more for imported oil next year than he anticipated. Would the minister tell the House how much more it will cost people to purchase heating oil as a result of depreciation in the value of the dollar? I would remind him that he has already spent—

● (1420)

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: —over $250 million to prop up the dollar.

Madam Speaker: Order. The question has been asked.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I would like to hear the question, if I may.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, due to the depreciation of our dollar we will have to pay more for foreign oil. Will the cost of that foreign oil be reflected in the price people will have to pay for heating oil, and so on, as a result of this problem?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that a large number of projections were made in the budget, and especially in the budget papers extending over a period of four years. He knows as well as I that it is very risky business indeed to make projections for six months in an uncertain economy and an uncertain world, let alone for four years. I put forward those projections in order to give the fullest possible information to the Canadian public and in accordance with the useful precedent established by my predecessor. But I believe that at this stage to regard the projections as hard reality is a bit risky. For that reason I do not intend to be drawn into making long-term cost estimates on the basis of long-term projections except where necessary.

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you just say 36 cents a gallon?

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—ASSURANCE OF U.S. FINANCIAL GUARANTEES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week the minister expressed his serious concern that the $23 billion Alaska highway natural gas pipeline might not be completed. He at last recognized that reality. He said that "activity must be increased. There has already been too much delay."

Since President Carter failed to obtain from Congress any financial guarantees for the northern pipeline and provided instead simply a personal letter of endorsation to the Government of Canada at the last minute—which certainly is quite worthless now—will the minister ensure that representatives of the Canadian government contact president-elect Reagan early (a) to obtain his personal commitment to this project, and (b), more importantly, to obtain his assurance that he will request the newly-elected Congress to provide the iron-clad financial guarantees which the minister himself said were so essential to this project?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, contrary to what the Leader of the New Democratic Party has just said, I have not raised doubts as to the construction of the pipeline. I indicated quite clearly in a speech which I made in Vancouver that there was no justification or reason for doubting that Congress and the President would continue to be completely committed to the construction of that pipeline. However, I said that since the signing of the treaty several years ago there has been too much delay, and that we were following developments very closely. In the last few weeks developments have been very encouraging in terms of commitments from firms and new participants in the project.

I would remind the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party that not only President Carter but Congress unanimously indicated that the Alaska gas pipeline was of the highest priority to the United States. Therefore, there is no reason to doubt that the new Congress or that the new President would put in jeopardy this strong commitment. I can assure the hon. member that as soon as the new administration takes office in January, we will be in touch with it in order to ensure that the commitment will continue to be as firm as it ever was.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. First, the minister himself said last week that there has been, and I quote, "too much delay already"—referring to the present activity. Second, the minister knows that the pious wish expressed by the U.S. Congress was precisely that—a pious wish that contained no guarantees.

Finally, since president-elect Reagan is already on record as favouring a continental energy policy, which is a marked shift from the Carter administration, I should like to ask the minister why he is expressing no concern at all about Canadian interests in this vital matter.

Mr. Lalonde: On the contrary, Madam Speaker, this government and myself have the interests of Canada very much at heart in all these developments. I should like to remind the hon. member again that he has not reported accurately what I said. The best example is that he said I said this last week, when actually I said it two weeks ago in Vancouver. I could go on to the other aspects which are all on the record. There is a speech on the record and I would recommend that the hon. member refer to it.

As far as the supposed commitment of Governor Reagan to a continental energy policy, I have found in many discussions with United States elected officials that they have a very different concept of the phrase "continental energy" as they use it and as we perceive it. We have indicated repeatedly to them—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Lalonde: —that there is no question about our support for an integrated continental policy.

An hon. Member: Speech.

Mr. Lalonde: There is no question about that at all; this government does not favour that.

Mr. Broadbent: A further supplementary question, Madam Speaker. We are witnessing the same, typical lack of concern from the government which will last until we are faced with a disaster coming from the United States.

An hon. Member: Get up in caucus, Ed.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the president-elect has expressed different views on controlling the environment, on the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement and on fisheries treaties, to name just a few—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Broadbent: —from the President who now holds office, is the minister telling the House that his government is not concerned at all that there is going to be any departure in American policy as it affects Canadians?

Mr. Paproski: Say yes, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I do not know how much I can repeat the same answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Don't bother. It is too long.

Mr. Lalonde: This government is indeed very concerned about ensuring that Canadian interests come first and are protected under this government. This is what we have been elected to do and this is what we will continue to do. At the same time we have to wait for the president-elect to come into office. Contrary again to what the hon. member said, he is not in office yet, he will be in office only in January.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Lalonde: We will certainly make sure that the views of the Canadian government are well known to the new government of the United States when it comes into office.

SOCIAL SECURITY

EFFECT OF BUDGET MEASURES ON POOR AND ELDERLY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare accused me of misleading the House and presenting wrong facts in terms of the comments made by the Canadian Council on Social Development. Yet according to Statistics Canada, those who were forced to live on old age pensions and the guaranteed income supplement have, in fact, fallen behind.

For example, in 1971, they were 22.75 per cent below the poverty line, yet for 1980 they were 21.32 per cent below the poverty line, in a period when indexing was in place. Given the budget which calls for a 22 per cent increase in energy pricess, which includes fuel oil, and for a 12 per cent increase in food prices, it is obvious that indexing will not even bring the poor and elderly of this country up to the poverty level.

My question to the minister is this. In face of the budget presented by her colleague, what does she propose to do, given her statutory responsibility, to protect the poor and elderly of this country?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member just played a dangerous game by again quoting statistics absolutely out of context and without any particular reference, thus not permitting me to understand exactly what he is talking about. I repeat that the first responsibility for a minister in charge of social security and social affairs is to make sure that we are fighting poverty and getting people out of it altogether. The best mechanism of protection—and we reassessed it in the discussions that led to this budget—is to keep the full indexation to the cost of living the way we have it in Canada.

I resented what the hon. member said yesterday because it does create panic among people who do not have access to a copy of this budget. The hon. member quoted from the top of page 2 of the CCSD document, which says that no program exists to counter-attack the increased cost of living. There is such a program; it is the GIS. I have the statistics here from Statistics Canada. I said that 20 per cent of Canadians were living in poverty and that percentage had dropped to 12 per cent. The figure was 11.2 per cent in 1978, and that figure will continue to decrease.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, it is the minister who is playing games by shamefully misleading this House and the Canadian public. I would say that that is not in keeping with the social responsibilities of the minister's portfolio. I have demonstrated, and I stand by my facts, that the elderly of this country who are forced to live on the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement have consistently fallen behind since 1971, indexing notwithstanding. Now we are facing energy increases which will increase the price of fuel oil by at least 75 cents a gallon. We know the price of food will go up yet the minister has the gall to stand in her place and say I am playing games. What is she going to do about it?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that we did not live through a full mandate of a Conservative government and its social policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I wish we knew what the former minister responsible for pensions meant in September a year ago when he announced in Montreal that old age pensions would be changed and the GIS might be changed as well. That is what I call a destabilizing factor for the elderly. The CCSD report says that as a result of the budget many seniors may be forced to move into high-cost public and private institutions. This is false. It is not true that people—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: I am sorry, but hon. members must listen to facts if they want to help those most in need.

Mr. Clark: Do you believe anyone but yourself?

Miss Bégin: It is true that if we keep indexation to the exact cost of living, inclusive of the energy factor, as we do in Canada, the help people receive will reflect the cost of living and that will permit people to stay in their own homes.

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE TO MEET HIGH INTEREST COSTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind that minister that had we still been in office, the people of Canada would be getting an energy tax allowance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. members opposite hate to hear the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: My question is for the minister of uneasy projections, the Minister of Finance. The minister will be aware that the Bank of Canada rate went up .40 per cent; the prime bank rate is up .5 per cent to 13.25 per cent and now the bank mortgage rates are ranging from 14.75 per cent to 15.25 per cent. This is a very heavy expense for home owners and those who want to buy homes in this country.

Will the minister tell the House what programs he will introduce to help these home owners or would-be home owners meet these high interest costs, which are forecast, I might remind him, to go up in excess of 18 per cent during the coming year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I dealt with that question yesterday when I advised the hon. member that it was not my intention to renew or bring in the mortgage deductibility program which he had brought forward. One of the reasons which led me to reach that conclusion is that his program, as it was designed, would have benefited only 10 per cent of the low-income families, which he and his party have suddenly discovered but forgot about when they designed this program last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I never asked the minister whether he was going to bring in my programs. He has brought in most of them already, but this one he will not bring in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Might I remind the minister that the refundable energy tax credit has been found to be a very progressive measure that would help the lower income people in this country and no one but the lower income people. So I want to remind him of that.

REQUEST THAT CONSERVATIVE BUDGET PROPOSAL BE IMPLEMENTED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My supplementary question to the minister is this: Dian Cohen and other observers have pointed out that home heating oil costs are going to increase something like $8 a month as a result of the minister's budget, unemployment insurance contributions $7 a month and the average driver will have to face an increase of $7 a month. Miss Cohen estimates the tax bite at around $300 a year for the average taxpayer and home owner. Could I also remind the minister that more and more families are going to run into credit difficulties in this period of high interest rates.

In view of these facts, will the minister forget the mortgage interest and property tax program—he is not going to help home owners—and will he bring in an energy tax credit, similar to the one we proposed last year to help the low and middle income people of this country, 70 per cent of which would go to people who earn under $20,000 a year. Will the minister do that? Can the minister bring himself to do that and help these people upon whom he has imposed high taxes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is obviously worth repeating what I have stated on earlier occasions, namely, that it is not my intention to bring in an energy tax credit.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. MacEachen: It is not because the government did not consider the impact of increased energy prices on all groups in the country.

Mr. McGrath: That is to your discredit, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: We decided not to bring it in because over the four-year period the burden of increased energy prices put forward in the budget will be about $1,200 less per family than was the case in the Tory budget, including the energy tax credit.

An hon. Member: That is a lie.

An hon. Member: Treat us seriously, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: They will be better off by $1,200 over the next period of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is my belief and that is why I did not bring in an energy tax credit. If hon. members want to attack those statistics and prove them wrong, then, of course, they are free to do so. But it is on the basis of those facts that the energy tax credit was not brought in.

INDUSTRY

WHITE FARM EQUIPMENT—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO AVERT CLOSURE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that White Motor Company in the United States is about to close out its Canadian subsidiary, White Farm Equipment of Brantford, Ontario, throwing 1,200 employees out of work, in view of the fact that this will cause grave financial and psychological strain on the workers and their families in an already depressed community, and in view of the further fact that the employees and retirees may lose all or part of their pension benefits, what specifically, and in concrete terms, is the federal government going to do to save this very viable farm implement company which is yet another victim of a foreign-owned multinational?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we are keeping in very close touch with developments connected with the White Motor Company.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: We are very much aware of the importance of the company in terms of the over-all viability of the farm machinery sector. We certainly want to see what can be done to ensure the viability of the sector as a whole, including the White Motor component.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, I am getting rather tired of these answers from the minister which mean absolutely nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Bring it up in caucus.

Mr. Blackburn: My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Given that White Farm Equipment already owes Massey-Ferguson about $2 million, and in view of the fact that White Farm has developed and produced the 9700 combine, largely at public expense through research and development grants from the federal government, which could greatly assist Massey-Ferguson in its own recovery, would the minister assist in the present discussions between Massey-Ferguson and White Farm Equipment with a view to having Massey-Ferguson take over the White Farm operation in Brantford to rationalize the two industries and save 1,200 Canadian jobs?

An hon. Member: Wall to wall socialism.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we are very much aware of the possibilities connected with White Motor and White Farm Equipment. This is certainly something which can be looked at in terms of a potential over-all solution.

An hon. Member: What about Petro-Canada?

Mr. Gray: I want to say to my hon. friends that if my answers had meant nothing, there would be no possibility today for the survival of Massey-Ferguson and the 6,000 jobs there, and no possibility in turn for any assistance for White Motor.

Fortunately for my hon. friend, my answer and those of the government with respect to the farm machinery industry have meant a lot more than nothing. They have meant the potential for the survival of jobs in this important industry in the interests of the entire Canadian economy.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY WHETHER AMENDMENTS WILL BE INTRODUCED

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Could the minister inform the House whether there are any proposed measures to strengthen anti-combines legislation and, in particular, whether freedom of the press can be protected from monopolistic takeovers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes, Madam Speaker. Indeed, the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act are long overdue. I hope to be in a position to bring forward appropriate legislation early next year.

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE FOR STUDENTS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. We all know that his budget did not help the low and middle-income Canadian, and believe it or not there are low and middle-income Canadians under the age of 65 who are not provided for by the $35 a month increase that this government likes to pretend is the panacea to all the problems of low and middle-income Canadians. I want to ask the minister why he did not listen to the pleas and representations made to him by students, young people from low and moderate income families, who need help to continue their education or retraining. Why did he turn a deaf ear to them and provide nothing in this budget that would help?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): In direct reply to the question, Madam Speaker, I have listened to all the representations and have attempted to put together a budget that is in the interests of the broad community, including all sectors in Canada.

Mr. McDermid: The minister stated in his budget that significant savings will be achieved when the transfer agreements come up for renewal with the provinces, which I believe is in 1982. Will the minister assure this House and the young people of Canada that any action the government takes in this area will not place additional burdens on the youth of Canada by causing drastic increases in tuition fees by cutbacks of moneys for post-secondary education?

Mr. MacEachen: What I provided in the budget, Madam Speaker, was that before the agreements with the provinces expire we would, as is customary, enter into negotiations with the provinces, and that it was my intention to secure savings in the renegotiation of these broad transfers to the provinces. That is a declaration of intent and that is my purpose. Until the negotiations begin and until some results are achieved, it will not be my intention to indicate in advance the results of those negotiations, except to say that I intend to be very respectful of the progress that has been made in this country as a result of very substantial federal support to a variety of programs supported through transfers. Having said that, I do not intend to deal specifically with, and forecast an attitude on, every item that might come up in the negotiations.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WHETHER NATIVE AND RURAL HOUSING PROGRAM WILL BE REVIVED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of housing. It is with regard to a program which the government implemented in 1974 to deliver 50,000 homes to the poorest of poor in Canada who live away from the conventional delivery systems of fuel and home heating oils in remote and northern areas of the country. It was known as the native and rural housing program and when it expired in 1979, it had delivered less than 3,000 homes instead of the 50,000. It failed miserably. In addition, many families in the north are having to leave their homes because they cannot cope with the incredibly high fuel costs which are not included in the blended payment that is being charged and which is indexed to their income.

What does the minister intend to do with this program? Is he going to revive it? Is he going to pay any attention to the poor people in the north and remote areas, or is he, like the Minister of National Health and Welfare, going to say that there really is not a housing crisis in this country, that it is just a rumour started by people who do not have a place to live?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, with regard to the people the hon. member is concerned about, I would advise that yes, the program will continue. The program is being reviewed with a view to improving and increasing the amount of funds that are available to this particular segment. One of the objectives of the program and a very important aspect of it was to involve people in native and rural areas in the actual production of that type of housing. That has not been an easy task. The people who are involved in this delivery program are meeting with our officials, CMHC officials, and with officials of the ministry of Indian affairs. We are actively reviewing the program, which continues to have a high priority, indeed a higher priority with this government.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, in light of the death blow which has been dealt this program as a result of the budget, putting an extraordinary burden on people in northern areas who need more fuel and have no alternative but to drive their cars, will the minister give serious consideration to including in the blended payment figure, which is interest and all the other components of a house payment, a component for energy and other utilities? That is the only way these people will ever be able to live in a house. Also, will he undertake to negotiate with the provinces and territorial governments to improve on the delivery system, which has failed so miserably over the last five years?

Mr. Cosgrove: Those are two questions, Madam Speaker. I think I have already touched upon the question of delivery. We hope that through engaging these people in the actual production and delivery, and in education, in conjunction with the minister of manpower, that program will be improved. In so far as the allowance and how we calculate what benefits are available to people who fall under the native and rural program, I would first of all point out that in the budget provisions with regard to energy, there is already an $800 credit for conversion. Those benefits are directed to areas which will specifically impact on the group we are talking about. Secondly, yes, the program is under review.

WOMEN

CANCELLATION OF PROGRAMS

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women. It relates to the expectations which were raised in the throne speech in relation to women's programs and the statements made by the minister in this House and before women's groups. I draw the minister's attention to the fact that funding for 1980-81 for all women's programs through the Department of Secretary of State amounted to only $700,000, compared to $2.5 million in 1975. By comparison, I draw his attention to the fact that native peoples are funded to a level of $25 million, multiculturalism $6 million and bilingualism $11 million. This lack of support for women has resulted in the cancelling of many programs.

In light of this devastating budget and its impact on women, why is the minister not putting money where his mouth has been?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct some of the statements the hon. member has made. We in fact have been putting a large amount of money into new women's programs. We have just introduced a new program for the training of women in non-traditional work, which is becoming highly successful in providing major opportunities for women, and in developing employment opportunities in new areas. We took a very major step this summer when we introduced affirmative action principles into the federal public service. This is a major step in removing the barriers of discrimination, and we have put substantial resources of the government toward implementing that kind of program.

Furthermore, the hon. member was wrong in saying that there have been no increases. We have increased the amount of money going into the Outreach programs for women's employment, and additional resources have gone to the Department of the Secretary of State. I suggest that before the hon. member asks a question it would be helpful if he got the right facts.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, the minister should communicate the facts to groups such as the National Action Committee, because we are talking about funds directed to women's groups across Canada and not about the other support mechanisms which are not in dispute. This minister is supposedly the champion of women's rights in terms of funding, and he cannot deliver in that regard. The minister has not been able to deliver in terms of the human rights package in the proposed constitution.

Will the minister now use his good offices to ensure that the joint constitutional committee is covered by television so that women, who are most affected and least able to travel to the committee, are able to see and hear those proceedings?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that the entrenchment of non-discriminatory rights in the constitution is one of the most significant and important steps toward the advancement of women's rights in this country.

Miss Jewett: Garbage.

Mr. McGrath: Tell that to Indian women.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact that there will be entrenched non-discriminatory and guaranteed rights for all women across the country will mean that every provincial government and the federal government will be required to eliminate from their statutes all known discriminatory aspects. These provisions will also give women a much better opportunity to go to the courts and test their rights. I do not think women in this country need television in the committee. I think they are fully informed and well aware of what an important step forward that really is.

STEPS TO INCREASE EMPLOYMENT TRAINING OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As a result of the government's budget, it is estimated that the yearly unemployment average for 1981 will be the highest since the depression years. Given that fact and the fact that increasing numbers of women will be working in order to keep their families above the poverty line, what is the minister doing to increase employment training opportunities for women besides the cosmetic amount he allocated earlier this year?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I pointed out in an answer to a previous question, we have taken a very important step forward in the development of affirmative action programs.

An hon. Member: Studies.

Mr. Axworthy: They are designed to eliminate barriers of discrimination in the workplace. Over many generations we have allowed a number of barriers to develop which have prevented women from getting access to normal or non-traditional work. We in the government have taken the step we said in the throne speech we would take to eliminate those barriers, and we took the first important step this summer in introducing it into our own public service.

Beyond that we are offering a number of incentives in our job creation programs and in our training programs and well over 40 per cent of the enrollees in our training programs are women. We have taken a special measure to provide an incentive to private employers by giving them 75 per cent of all training allowances to bring women into non-traditional areas of employment.

I will say finally that we are also awaiting with a great deal of interest the discussions of the parliamentary committee chaired by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce which will give us further recommendations as to steps we can take to improve the employability of women in this country. In the last seven months I think we have taken a number of important steps, and we will see the results of those steps.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I hear the minister talk about steps, but what women in this country want to hear more about is commitment from the minister.

In a recent speech the minister announced that employment growth areas in the future will be in business services, manufacturing and construction, all of which are traditionally male-dominated industries. He also announced that he will encourage skilled workers from other countries to take these jobs. Why does the minister not increase funding for programs which would allow women to take these jobs?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I tried to point out in the previous answer that this government presently spends $800 million on training programs right across Canada. In addition to that, we have added special programs like the Outreach programs to provide special recruitment and placement services for women, for minorities and for disadvantaged groups. We have offered a special program to provide an incentive for employers to provide on the job industrial training for women in non-traditional work.

If that program is taken up by the private sector and succeeds, we will add to it next year, but we must first see how it works and whether the private sector will co-operate. We must also get the co-operation of the provinces, which have on their books a number of regulations preventing the advancement of women because they do not agree with the affirmative action principles we have established.

ENERGY

OIL GENERATED ELECTRICITY—PROTECTION OF NORTHERN CONSUMERS FROM PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. My question concerns the Crown Corporation NCPC, which has a virtual monopoly on the generation of electricity in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and which has the already doubtful distinction of charging its customers probably the highest rates in the whole world. How does the minister propose to prevent additional horrendous burdens on northern consumers in areas which are dependent on electricity generated from oil resulting from the extremely high increases in oil prices caused by the Liberal budget?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I met with Mr. Smith, the chairman of the NCPC, yesterday. One of the areas we covered was this very subject matter of what the future plans would be with respect to energy costs in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. We are going to have further discussions on this within the next ten days. Hopefully I will be able after those meetings are over to give some indication which might alleviate the hon. member's concern.

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, that is what I would call a non-answer. Just before the budget came down the minister's own office put out a press release. When he was asked by northerners about what they suspected might well be in the budget, increases in the prices of heating oil and oil used for the generation of electricity, he said that he was going to talk to his colleague the Minister of Finance about it. I would like to know whether he neglected to speak to his colleague the Minister of Finance, or was it just that when he did he was ignored by that gentleman?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, Madam Speaker, I was not ignored. I had discussions not only with the Minister of Finance but also with the Minister of National Revenue. The hon. member may have noticed that there was a decision to extend the moratorium for a further year in terms of taxation of certain benefits. I believe that was designed to alleviate the type of condition the hon. member is talking about. Might I say that it received a good deal of approbation from residents in the north.

EMPLOYMENT

PROGRAMS TO ENCOURAGE INDUSTRIES TO HIRE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is a follow-up from yesterday, and it is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. By now he should be aware of the fact that Amoco Corporation and other companies are cancelling their entire campus recruiting programs as a consequence of the devastating budget. The job situation for university students and graduates will be very bad next year.

Can the minister tell us what programs he will have in place by April and May which will encourage industries to hire the graduates of our technical institutes, community colleges and universities?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I will begin by saying that I hope the hon. member will use his good offices with the Premier of Alberta to ask him to withdraw his decision to freeze the development of tar sands projects. It was not this government which froze those projects but the Premier of Alberta. I suggest that the hon. member would be using his time much more fruitfully if he encouraged a much greater degree of openness in negotiations on the part of his friends in the province of Alberta instead of worrying about this government.

Point of Order—Mr. Clark

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I repeat what I said yesterday. Unemployment is a serious situation. The minister indicated in the House yesterday that he recently returned from the west and that he was told by oil industry people that there was a shortage of trained workers. I suspect that either he is dead wrong, he cannot listen, or his information is out of date. A week ago the budget changed the situation from a shortage of skilled workers to a surplus of skilled workers. Can the minister tell us to whom he has talked this week in western Canada who would give him information on the effect that this budget has had on the economy of Canada?

• (1500)

An hon. Member: He has not been out there for months.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, unlike the hon. member, I try to talk to a wide variety of people, not simply to people within one company in the oil and gas industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member has finished his cheer-leading practice, we can get on with the answer to the question. The fact of the matter is that within that budget there is well over $1 billion of grants and incentives to the Canadian-owned oil and gas industry to provide major new developments for exploration and development in that province alone. It is one of the most important incentives offered for the development and expansion of the Canadian-owned oil and gas industry in western Canada.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION—SENATE REPRESENTATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with the business of the House and the committees of the House. The government House leader will know that fully two nights ago the other place agreed to refer the constitutional resolution to a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. There has been some difficulty in the government party in finding senators who would serve as its representatives on the committee, and I wonder if the government House leader could tell us which senators will be representing the government party on the joint committee and when that joint committee will begin its sessions. I ask that because not long ago the government was arguing that this matter was so urgent that it had to use closure to cut off debate in the House of Commons. Could the government House leader answer that question about House business?

Point of Order—Mr. Clark

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, this enables me to remind the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) that we have shown every regard for Parliament because we could have introduced a resolution before the House without the committee stage. Instead we gave the House of Commons an opportunity to debate a preliminary formal motion aimed at referring the proposed resolution to a committee. We spent three weeks of the House's time on the formal debate. The committee is now being struck and we do not want to get involved in the business of the Senate. Here in the House of Commons we have selected our own members to sit on that committee. The Senate is doing the same thing. I presume that the final make-up of the joint committee will be known shortly later today or tomorrow morning. But I think the committee has enough maturity and is fully cognizant of parliamentary practices to realize that it is up to the members to set their rules, schedule their hours and sittings, and I have every confidence in hon. members on both sides of the House who sit on the committee as well as in the senators who will be designated, if that has not already been done earlier today. I am sure they will dutifully carry out the work of the committee. Now then, as the Leader of the Official Opposition knows, between now and December 9 the committee's task will be to scrutinize the technical aspects of the bill, hear a few witnesses and consider any serious amendments.

Madam Speaker, the government has indicated its willingness to entertain constructive amendments and once the committee reports on December 9 there will be a third stage, and this shows just how courteous we are, and Parliament will have every opportunity to launch a serious but non-dilatory debate on the report drafted by the committee. Again today we have extended every courtesy by replying to a question of the Leader of the Official Opposition, a query which he could have raised during question period but which cannot in any way be regarded as a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise again further to my point of order having to do with the business of the House.

An hon. Member: That is no point of order.

Mr. Clark: I notice, and this is a matter of great concern to all members of the House who are interested in a genuine debate on the constitutional question, that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), presuming to speak for women in the country, said that women do not want television in the committee hearings. I wonder if the minister was also speaking for the government and whether the government has taken a decision to instruct its members—once it can find some members in the Senate to participate in the joint committee—not to support the televising and live radio broadcasting of the sessions.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, not so long ago, I had occasion to explain to the Leader of the Opposition our attitude and the procedure with regard to the televising of the sittings of committees. I did so, and can do so again: we leave it to that committee to make recommendations to us. We have no instructions to give to it on whether or not its debates should be televised or not. The members of the committee—and again, we cannot speak on behalf of the Senate—will decide whether or not it must be done. I say this: they now have the power to so decide under the terms of the decision reached by this House in January of 1977, subject, of course, to the agreement of the Senate, on the one hand, and that of the Speaker and the commissioners of internal economy with regard to costs, on the other. I can assure the House that I, for one, will not oppose televising the debates just because of the cost involved.

Now, I do not want to anticipate the decision of the committee in that regard. It is entirely free to consider whether, first, it can do so while respecting the concept of the electronic Hansard; second, it is desirable, under the circumstances; and, third, it wants, without being influenced by anyone, to televise its sittings. Madam Speaker, in reply to the questions of the Leader of the Opposition, I have no intention, as government House leader, to tell the committee what to do in the matter of televising its hearings. The committee has enough experience to make its own decisions on any procedure, including that of televising its debates, if it so decides.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order concerning the timing of the committee's activities and the House business. The government House leader has referred to the December 9 deadline and the fact that there will be a few witnesses called before that committee. I should like to ask him whether or not he would consider extending the deadline of that committee now because of what has happened in the other place, given the fact that we have many dozens of witnesses who want to appear, many dozens of groups which want to appear before that committee, and especially in light of his statement that the committee should determine its own timetable in terms of broadcasting. Would he also give the same undertaking to us that the committee can determine its own timetable as to when we will hear witnesses and when we will complete the report? We have allowed here in the House some four years for the public to make representations on the Bank Act. Surely to goodness we must allow more than one month for the public to make representations on the constitution of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder whether or not the minister can give us a positive response to this. He said the committee should control its own rules so far as broadcasting of its deliberations by radio and television is concerned. Will he not exhibit the same generosity and let the committee determine the pace at which we want to hear witnesses and the amount of time we need to present a proper resolution to the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the NDP member has repeated the answer I just gave to the Progressive Conservative leader. The committee is master of its own procedure, but it must act within the confines of the mandate given to it by the House. It is not my intention to go against the decision taken by the House to ask a joint committee to consider the proposed resolution and to report back by December 9. I certainly do not intend to ask the committee to disregard the wishes expressed by the House and also by the Senate. In the meantime, that is until December 9, the committee is free to set the dates at which it will hear witnesses. The hon. member is well aware of the parliamentary procedure and practice as well as of the terms of reference given to the committee and under which it can create subcommittees with various duties. Indeed, under the circumstances, it might not be a bad idea for the committee to divide itself into subcommittees to hear various groups of witnesses.

But I also remind him, in that respect, that in the last few years, there have been other commissions which travelled across the country. The constitutional issue has been discussed across Canada during commission hearings as well as by members of the House during election campaigns and the recent referendum campaign in Quebec. Therefore, this is not a new issue which the committee will consider. It is a national concern, an issue which has been the subject of in-depth study and on which several witnesses have been heard in the past.

The specific task of the committee will mainly be to discuss the amendements to the bill, to refine it in a technical sense and to hear some witnesses. In answer to the NDP member, I want to make it clear that we have no intention of going against the decision made by the House of Commons and by the Senate asking that the committee consider the matter as quickly as possible and report back by December 9. Moreover, it is not our intention to meddle in the affairs of the committee. According to parliamentary practice, we will leave it free to decide its procedure.

• (1510)

[English]

Madam Speaker: Quite obviously this is not a point of order. It is an extension of the question period.

Mr. Clark: Not at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Point of Order—Mr. Clark

Madam Speaker: Order, please. In the beginning a question was asked about the business of the House. I can allow questions on the business of the House, and if hon. members who are now seeking the floor want to ask questions about the business of the House, I can allow that.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, arising from comments made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard)—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I just said that I did not feel this was a point of order. If the hon. member has a question on the business of the House, I can allow that.

Mr. Epp: Well, on the business of the House, Madam Speaker, the President of the Privy Council indicated in his remarks that the government would hear "a few witnesses".

Mr. Chrétien: No, he never said that.

Mr. Epp: That is what he said.

Mr. Pinard: No.

Some hon. Members: He said that.

Mr. Chrétien: "Many".

Mr. Clark: Perhaps he meants "plusieurs".

Mr. Epp: We have had assurances in this House, and hon. senators in the other place have had assurances from the Senate leader over there, that in fact witnesses would be heard. Surely it is a point which must be clarified now, whether instructions were given to the members of the committee on the government side. Not only was the House stopped from speaking through closure, but now Canadians who want to appear as witnesses will not have that opportunity. In fact they are to be stifled even before they have a chance to appear.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Epp: That is the point. Also on this point of business I want to ask the President of the Privy Council a question. He said that this question has been asked before and that there have been joint committees and royal commissions travelling across the country. The point of the matter is that on this proposed resolution that has not taken place.

Mr. Chrétien: That is not what he said.

Mr. Clark: Read the record.

Mr. Epp: That is not what has taken place, and this has not been before the Canadian people. So, it needs clarification before the committee sits, whether the President of the Privy Council in fact has now instructed that there will be only a limited number of witnesses heard, and also that he has no intention to follow up what was said in the other place by the Senate leader there that in fact consideration would be given to the extension of the time of the committee.

Point of Order—Mr. Hnatyshyn

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have not given any instruction to the committee, I trust it entirely.

[English]

MR. HNATYSHYN—COMPOSITION OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) rising on a point of order?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, It is on a point of order with respect to business of the House and a matter directly under the jurisdiction of the government House leader. There has developed, in the course of the selection process in terms of this particular joint committee, a precedent which the government House leader has direct authority to curtail. It is contrary to every principle of parliamentary tradition which we have in the country. It is the nomination of a member of cabinet as a member of this committee. I refer to Senator Argue being promoted by the other place to be a member of this committee.

We have a number of other senators from Saskatchewan, Senator Balfour, Senator Buckwold, and Senator Steuart, who are all known and can participate in a meaningful way on this particular committee.

In terms of the membership of this committee and in accordance with our parliamentary traditions, will the government House leader undertake not to introduce and allow the introduction of a colleague of his as a member of this committee, so that the average rank and file member of the House of Commons in fact can participate in that committee without direct government intervention?

Madam Speaker: It seems to me I cannot allow the hon. member to raise a point of order on something which is taking place in the other chamber.

Mr. Epp: It is on the joint committee.

Madam Speaker: Probably the minister cannot answer about what is going on in the other chamber.

Some hon. Members: Yes he can.

Madam Speaker: At any rate, I have given him the floor so that he might answer, but I just warn hon. members that questions about what is going on in the Senate should be asked in the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I did not give any instruction to the senators about the election of the members of the committee and I do not intend to do so. The comments of the hon. member does not affect me at all because once again I do not intend to intervene in the selection of the members of the committee, especially those appointed by the Senate. I have not been involved in any manner whatever in the appointment of the members of the committee and I do not intend to be.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) seeking the floor on a point of order?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, it is on a question of House business. The business of the House is very directly affected by the date of reporting of that committee, in that the report will have to be considered by the House. Was Senator Perrault, the government House leader in the Senate, speaking on behalf of the government when he indicated on Monday night in the Senate—

Miss Bégin: Ask him.

Mr. Beatty: —that the government would entertain seriously an interim report by the committee asking for an extension of the December 9 deadline?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the question could perhaps be put in the Senate but I do not know how I could comment on Senator Perrault's reply with which I am not acquainted. Anyhow I do not intend to comment on what Senator Perrault said in the other place. If he has a question to put in the Senate, he has colleagues there who could do it.

[English]

Madam Speaker: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MR. CLARK—STATEMENTS MADE IN SENATE BY GOVERNMENT MINISTERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this raises an entirely new question of order and entirely new question of the practices of the House of Commons. We have now, as we had in the last Parliament, a situation where, as a result of electoral return, it was necessary for the Government of Canada to reach beyond this House for ministers and to have senators sit as full ministers, carrying full ministerial responsibility and carrying the limitations of ministers as members of the cabinet of Canada. That is the situation in the House.

As was stated frequently last year, it raises some difficulties and perhaps infringes on our privileges. At least it raises some difficulties for members of the House of Commons who might want to put questions directly to cabinet ministers who do not sit here in the House of Commons.

We all regret the electoral situation which causes cabinet ministers to be drawn from the other place. All of us would prefer to have cabinet ministers directly elected and reporting here in the House of Commons. But what has happened here is that we have a situation where a minister of the Crown has been nominated by the government party to serve on a parliamentary joint committee. This is a breach of all traditions and practices of the House of Commons because that minister, by virtue of his oath and by virtue of being a member of the cabinet of Canada, is not able to participate in that committee discussion with the same freedom of action as other members of the House of Commons or of the Senate who are members of that committee. There is a clear change in the practice of the House.

Obviously it must have been taken with the knowledge of the government House leader who is a member of cabinet and is a colleague of not only the minister who was named but of the other ministers in that place who, presumably, took part in that decision. What troubles me and causes me to rise at this time is that this marks at least the second time in, I think, ten days where the minister responsible to the House of Commons on government business has declined to accept responsibility for statements of a ministerial colleague in the House of Commons or has declined to tell the House of Commons whether a statement made in the other place in fact represents the position of the Government of Canada. Why has he declined that? It is because the other minister is not here. That is simply not acceptable to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Clark: It is simply not acceptable that we are denied an indication or a statement from the mouth of the government House leader here in the House of Commons as to what is the position of the Government of Canada when a position has been stated by a cabinet colleague in the other place, and it is neither confirmed nor denied by the government House leader here. There is a dangerous new practice which is developing here. First of all, it is dangerous in its attempt to smuggle a person to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, who is not free to act independently in the way other members are. Secondly, it is a dangerous practice in that the repeated refusals of this government House leader to accept the principle of government solidarity, to accept the principle of cabinet solidarity, and to accept that ministerial responsibility means that a statement made by one of his colleagues must bind the government, or, if it does not, it must be specifically rejected and disclaimed by the responsible government House leader here in the House of Commons.

● (1520)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Before recognizing another member, I should remind those who have risen on this point of order that I find myself in an absolutely impossible situation because I cannot rule on this matter since I am bound only by the rules of this House. What goes on in the Senate is therefore the affair of the Speaker of that assembly.

Point of Order—Mr. Clark

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has initiated a discussion because he has not had an answer from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) about something which was discussed in the Senate. He may quite legitimately try to obtain an answer to his question, but this is a debate and we are in fact having a debate. This is not a point of order. Therefore, since it is not a point of order, I admit that there can be a debate, but there are other occasions when we have such debates in the House of Commons and I am certain that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition will take the first opportunity to have one. I shall now recognize the President of the Privy Council as he has been asked a direct question, but I cannot recognize other members on this point of order.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, there is no reason for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to panic. In fact, I do not know whether there will be a minister among the members of the joint committee, but it would not be the first time that this has happened. I can give him a list of members of a committee and even of chairmen of committees who were ministers at the time. Not so long ago, in 1976-77, Madam Speaker, Mr. Sharp was the chairman of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. The present Minister of Finance has served as chairman of a committee, as did Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir John A. Macdonald.

I therefore do not see why the right hon. member should be shocked by what happened in the Senate yesterday or by the attempt to have a minister appointed to a joint committee. I do not see how this can go against all the precedents. I believe that the right hon. member should check on his facts and perhaps learn a bit more about parliamentary procedure and the practices of this House and of this noble institiution for which we all have the highest respect. Therefore, there is no reason to panic. If it did happen, it would not be the first time. That would not be a precedent because it has happened before that a minister has been appointed to sit on a committee. I am not saying that one would be appointed again this time, for I do not intend to interfere with the senators' choice. I leave them entirely free to appoint whomever they please to sit on this joint committee. I repeat, Madam Speaker, on what senators may say in the other place, I assume that there are Progressive Conservative senators there to ask relevant questions.

As far as our position is concerned—I can repeat to the Leader of the Opposition what I said earlier to the NDP member—it is clearly that we want to honour the decision which has been reached by both the House of Commons and the Senate concerning the mandate entrusted to the Joint Committee: first, to consider the joint resolution, and second, to submit its report not later than December 9. I suggest that things could not be clearer, and if the Leader of the Opposition does not understand, I am sorry, but there is nothing I can add. I repeat, therefore, what I have just said, Madam Speaker, namely, that the effect of the resolution which has been accepted by both the House of Commons and the Senate is to compel the committee to submit its report not later than December 9, 1980, and as far as I am concerned, such is the position of the government at this time, and we have no intention of changing it.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if I remember correctly, in your remarks you indicated there was a dilemma for the Chair in that you do not have the power to decide on a matter that was raised in the other place, the Senate. That other place is now occupied by three ministers of the Crown who are making statements of government policy on which they cannot be questioned here, and on which government ministers opposite will not provide either response or clarification. You have indicated there is a dilemma.

I am rising at this time simply to reserve my right tomorrow, or at some later time, to file and raise a question of privilege relating to the limitation upon the privileges of members of the House of Commons to obtain information relating to the business of the Government of Canada confirmed by ministers of the Crown who are members of this House. I think this is a very real question which I have raised with respect to our ability to deal with answers which are given in another chamber by responsible ministers—ministers who are not accountable in any way to us. That breach of our privilege, or the potential breach of it, is further aggravated by the persistent reaction and response of the government House leader, who says he does not know what his cabinet colleague has been saying, and his persistent refusal to respond to questions in this House. So, I simply rise at this time to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege at a later time.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I only wish to remind the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that I did not mention a dilemma. I categorically stated that I was not in a position to rule on anything going on in the Senate, as the Standing Orders only give me the authority to make rulings pertaining to procedure in the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, with respect to this issue it seems to me it has been made unnecessarily complicated by dragging in the Senate. Let us forget about the Senate altogether. The fact is that a minister of the government, whose name is Hon. Raymond Perrault, has made a statement somewhere other than in this House. It does not matter where he made it. Traditionally we have the right in this House to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if a statement made by a minister represents government policy. Therefore in the absence of the Prime Minister I submit that we have the right to ask the government House leader whether the Hon. Raymond Perrault, who is a member of the cabinet and a minister of the Crown, was uttering government policy when he said that the government would entertain the idea of a change in the final date assigned to the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: There are two things, Madam Speaker. First, a question of that nature should be asked during the oral question period and not through a point of order. Second, in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I said earlier, responding to a question put by the Progressive Conservative Party that I was not aware of the remark that Senator Perrault was alleged to have made. And I do not know any more now than I did five minutes ago. Hence I cannot make any comment. All I can say is that government policy is in keeping with the answer that I gave earlier to the hon. member from his party and to the Leader of the Opposition. Consequently, Madam Speaker, I do not think I could have a more open or frank attitude.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I would like to add something to this point of order which has come up.

Madam Speaker: No, I am sorry, it is not a point of order. I have said I would not recognize any more speakers on this subject, which is not a point of order. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has spoken but he had another purpose in rising and taking the floor.

Mr. Kilgour: It is not a point of order, Madam Speaker, it is with respect to the business of the House. It is my understanding of Parliament that traditionally the only member of the government in the Senate is the government leader there. We now have a situation where Canada has gone beyond that. I admit that our government went beyond that last year for electoral reasons as well. I submit it is a convention of this House that matters concerning government ministers which are raised in that House are replied to by the President of the Privy Council. Therefore, the very fundamental question which Your Honour has to answer is whether or not the government House leader can decide whether he will tell us if an answer made in the other place is valid here. That was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I submit that unless our system of parliamentary government is to be changed fundamentally—in which case we might have ten cabinet ministers appointed in the other place who do not have to answer any questions in this House—the Chair should decide what will be the future convention on this point in this House.

• (1530)

Madam Speaker: Ministers are free to answer in any way they wish, and the Chair has no authority to force them to answer questions or to tell them in what way they should answer questions. My feeling today is that the minister did answer the question. The hon. member is not satisfied with the answer and does not like it, but that is not for me to decide.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) concerning the business of the House, if I may have his attention for just a moment. It concerns an important piece of legislation, Bill C-43, the Freedom of Information Act. Would the government House leader give some indication of when this important piece of legislation will be brought before the House for second reading? He is aware of the fact that my party has indicated its desire to have the legislation expedited at second reading. We are prepared to co-operate as we did on the previous bill to see this legislation get into committee quickly for a full and comprehensive study. It is an important bill. Would the government House leader indicate when the freedom of information legislation will be brought forward for second reading?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I welcome very much the offer of co-operation from the hon. member on this particular bill. I can assure him that at the first opportunity I will make sure that this bill is brought forward for discussion at second reading. The hon. member knows that during the coming days we must deal with the Bank Act before November 30. In order to cope with the parliamentary calendar for this month, I held a House leaders' meeting last night, and I will hold a meeting tonight. I indicated to the House leaders last night that it would be possible, if we have collaboration from both opposition parties, to be in a position to deal with the second reading stage of both the legislation on the access to information and on the Post Office. However, there will be further consultation and discussion with the House leaders. In so far as we are concerned, we are very keen to deal with this bill and to send it to committee. But it all depends on the co-operation we receive from the party of the hon. member and from the Conservative party.

Estimates

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1980-81

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1981, was presented by Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Madam Speaker to the House.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, by leave, I should like to table a copy of Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I wish to move the following motion pursuant to Standing Order 59:

That the Supplementary Estimates (B), 1980-81, tabled this day, be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows:

Because the list is rather long, and there is detailed allocation of the estimates to the committees, if it is agreeable with the House, Madam Speaker, I ask that the list be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 725, 1,045, 1,321, 1,562 and 1,569.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GASOHOL

Question No. 725—Mr. Greenaway:

1. Did the government or any of its departments or agencies undertake cost analysis studies to determine the viability of "gasohol" as a substitute for gasoline in the (a) short (b) long term and, if so, what were the results?

2. Did the government or any of its departments or agencies investigate and/or consider (a) exemption of excise tax on gasohol (b) financial assistance of any kind to encourage research and/or development of gasohol (c) benefits which may accrue to the agriculture industry and/or other industries arising from the manufacture of gasohol (d) benefits to the Canadian consumer arising from the development of gasohol and, if so, what (i) was the nature of such investigations or considerations (ii) were the results and/or decisions taken (iii) were the names of any companies and/or agencies which have been involved?

3. If the government or any of its departments or agencies did not undertake such studies or investigations, what is the reason?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture, Energy, Mines and Resources and Finance as follows: 1. The government has undertaken several studies during the last three years regarding the economic viability of gasohol in Canada. The findings of these investigations suggest that we can make very limited quantities of alcohol suitable for gasohol blends at costs approximately those of equivalent imported oil. The sources of such alcohol would be the waste streams of certain plants and substandard crops. Larger quantities of fermentation alcohol can be made from grains at substantially higher costs.

2. (a) The Minister of Finance in his April 21, 1980, economic statement announced amendments to the Excise Act to permit easing of licensing requirements for researchers who wish to manufacture denatured spirits for use in experimentation and development of fuels. Among other changes the bonding requirement will be reduced to $10,000. Persons holding this license are also made exempt from the excise duties levied on spirits. There are no provisions currently in the Excise Tax Act which would impose a special excise tax on gasohol analogous to the excise tax currently levied on gasoline. A decision pertaining to the tax treatment of gasohol will be made in the event that gasohol becomes available for sale in commercial quantities.

2. (b), (c) and (d) The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, in co-operation with other government departments, is reviewing the alcohol fuels issues facing Canada. This review is well advanced and input from the provinces will be sought in the next few weeks. In addition to fermentation type alcohol (ethanol), Canada has the potential to produce large quantities of methanol (wood alcohol) from natural gas, coal and biomass. The issues involved relate to both production of use of alcohols. When the analysis and consultations are completed, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will announce the government decisions in the House of Commons.

2. (c) The Canadian Dairy Commission financed two research projects in this area. The benefits that may accrue to the agricultural industry are:

(1) Positive use of a product considered to be a waste and environmental problem.

(2) Production of energy, and considerations regarding improved use.

(i) These projects consisted in studying:

(1) The fermentation of whey for the manufacture of alcohol.

(2) The fermentation of whey for the manufacture of gas.

(ii) Conclusion of research by ACP Marketing and Sodispro:

(1) Technically, there is no particular problem in obtaining alcohol through the fermentation of lactose (sugar in dairy products).

(2) Alcohol obtained from whey is suitable for use in alcoholic beverages and in mixtures of 10 per cent alcohol to gasoline.

(3) Present distillers are not very interested in stocking up with whey because of market uncertainties.

(4) Alcohol manufacture is attractive at first sight in that it offers interesting profits.

(5) The authors make a comparison between lactose and alcohol manufacture.

(6) The production of alcohol through the fermentation of whey would be profitable only if co-operation is obtained from Canada's various liquor boards.

(7) For the following reasons, it was recommended (1978) that attempts not be made to use whey as a source of alcohol for the beverage market:

7.1 The market is highly controlled and the rules of the game are often changed very quickly.

7.2 The potential production of a plant like Sodispro represents 20 per cent of the present Canadian market.

7.3 Possible consumer reactions.

7.4 Uncertainty of the market and uneconomical returns at current prices.

7.5 A decision of this nature could cause an increase in the price of powdered whey.

(8) The production of alcohol from whey was considered possible but not very profitable under existing economic conditions (1977).

(9) This report includes an analysis of the possibility of fermenting the ultrafiltrate of concentrated whey (through ultrafiltration) and the ultrafiltrate of skim milk, and an analysis of the effect of temperature on the rate of fermentation of the ultrafiltrate. Certain parameters (pH, temperature, total solids) are also determined.

(iii) This research was carried out by:

(1) ACP Marketing, Montreal.

(2) Sodispro, Saint-Hyacinthe.

3. Not applicable.

SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—TRAVEL

Question No. 1,045—Miss MacDonald:

1. When and for what occasions has the present Secretary of State for External Affairs used (a) commercial transportation (b) ministerial aircraft?

2. For each occasion, who accompanied the minister from his (a) non-departmental (b) departmental staff and what was the cost?

3. Did the minister use regularly scheduled DND flights, and, if so (a) on what dates (b) for what reason or occasion (c) was the regular schedule altered (d) were any DND personnel bumped by the minister or his staff?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned the reply is as follows: the answers to the first two questions and to parts (a) and (b) of the third question are attached. Regarding parts (c) and (d) of the third question, the minister travelled aboard a DND flight to attend the NATO ministerial meeting in Brussels on May 11, and returned on a DND flight May 14. The schedule was altered for the Minister and the Deputy Minister of National Defence to allow them to land directly in Brussels, the site of the NATO Conference. No DND personnel were bumped. The above answer does not include information about regular trips to and from the minister's constituency on the House of Commons account.

CIDA—TRAVEL AGENTS

Question No. 1,569—Mr. Lewis:

During the year (a) 1979 (b) 1980 to date, how many different travel agents did CIDA utilize for the purpose of airline tickets and (i) what were their names (ii) in which city and province were they located (iii) what was the amount spent with each agent?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): None.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have two questions, No. 810 and No. 811, which have been on the order paper now for six months. In view of the fact that they deal with the expenditures of the Metric Commission I was wondering if the parliamentary secretary would see fit to have these questions answered as soon as possible.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I have made a note of the two questions. I should say that we have answered 1,165 questions of the approximately 1,600 questions on the order paper, which is not a bad performance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, as soon as I can catch the attention of the government House leader, I believe that there is a disposition to carry on the budget debate today with the regular length of speeches, and that tomorrow the time for speeches will be limited for all members of the House to 20 minutes. If this is the disposition, we are prepared to agree to that arrangement.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, the remark just made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) does represent the discussions which have been held. We would be willing to agree that all speeches tomorrow be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we agree.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps that can be made an order of the House today.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 4, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I am indeed enormously proud of and grateful for the continued support of the voters in the Laprairie riding, which is made up of the cities of Saint-Lambert, LeMoyne, Greenfield Park, Brossard, Laprairie and Candiac, as I rise this afternoon to take part in this most important debate on the budget which was presented last week by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

Madam Speaker, I should like to mention first of all how difficult it is to govern in 1980 at whatever level in such an immense territory as the northern hemisphere. In my opinion, regionalism has never been promoted so intensely in Canada, thereby limiting a Canadian dimension which is nevertheless so necessary for a proper analysis of the national budget.

In a budget for all Canadians, is it possible to please the ten provincial leaders? I do not think so. However, I think you can please all the Canadians. They have in fact a reason to be proud of their Minister of Finance and of their Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), because this fiscal policy accompanied by a national energy policy based on security, sharing and fairness will benefit them, Madam Speaker. Let us be realistic. Canada has a deficit of $14 billion.

With all its national responsibilities, the government will simply no longer have the means to continue the implementation of its various programs such as unemployment insurance, family allowances, old age security pensions, equalization payments and various tranfers of funds from the federal to provincial governments while still subsidizing oil imports in the east, if we do not increase income or reduce expenditures. Obviously, Madam Speaker, oil imports, or rather the funds we give to subsidize oil imports in the east are draining our economy. We must take the bull by the horns without delay and face the music, Madam Speaker, and that is what is proposed in this budget. Rising prices of oil and natural gas are beefing up provincial treasuries. And in order to ensure uniform energy prices throughout Canada, the government had to compensate eastern Canada consumers.

In my view, it would have been quite immoral to penalize the eastern provinces by preventing them benefiting from a resource which, for the time being, seems to be vested in the west. Obviously, this new source of income has had the effect of widening the gap between rich provinces and less fortunate ones, resulting in a 50 per cent raise in the federal equalization payments between 1977 and 1980. Moreover, the existing equalization formula had to be changed since Ontario was now eligible by virtue of this formula, based on 29 sources of income, including oil and gas. It would have been rather difficult to explain to the maritime provinces that from now on Ontario would be eligible for these payments. So the formula was changed with the agreement of this province. Before the 1979 election, the Progressive Conservative caucus was divided on the keystone of any energy policy, that is the price.

The Ontario Conservative members wanted to keep the price as low as possible and, of course, the members from Alberta wanted it the other way around. And yet, Mr. Speaker, the former prime minister was congratulating himself for his alleged success during a conference in Kingston where, closeted with a few premiers, he ratified a certain protocol of agreement. But the former prime minister, now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), realized quickly enough that once in power he was caught indeed between two Conservative premiers, Mr. Davis and Mr. Lougheed, that the Kingston conference automatically amounted to a series of pious wishes and that the premiers could not see much further than their noses when the interests of their province were at stake.

That is not a rebuke, far from it, Mr. Speaker, but I can only describe reality as I see it. Besides, even Liberal members recall the conflicts between Mr. Lesage and Mr. Pearson or Mr. Hepburn and Mr. King, and realize that unfortunately that is the nature of federal-provincial relations. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative leader ought to get Kingston off his mind, or has he already forgotten that he himself was prime minister once and that he failed to achieve unanimity when more than one province was involved?

Canada's energy shortage is very simple. Canada right now is suffering from a shortage of petroleum and, in my opinion, it is not an incurable illness since our country produces more energy than it consumes. Canada will therefore have to bank on its surpluses of electricity, natural gas and any other fuel to alleviate this oil shortage. Petroleum imports are rising rapidly at a time when Canadian supplies are shrinking, and the gap between the world price and the Canadian price, which was only $3 in 1977-78, has now widened to nearly $17.

There is very little that can be done quickly to increase our Canadian supplies. There are huge quantities of oil in the tar sands of Alberta, in the Beaufort Sea and perhaps even in the Atlantic ocean. But it will take a very long while before we can make full use of these Canadian resources. At the present time, even our foreign supplies are threatened as a result of the unstable situation in the Middle East. What is the solution? There are only two possible solutions, either a firm commitment to reduce the demand through conservation and substitution of other forms of energy combined with periodic increases spread over a four-year period according to the studies which have been made, or a drastic increase in the Canadian price of oil to match the world price.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the oil companies are concerned, those multinational corporations whose interests are well looked after in this House by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), their position is quite clear: They tell us: give us enough money and enough tax benefits and we will find all your oil.

To accept such a proposal would be to refuse to recognize all the ancillary aspects of a national energy policy, that is to say the distribution of income among governments and companies, the impact and the already exorbitant profits of these oil companies. On this subject I should like to refer to a press release which Premier Davis of Ontario communicated to the legislature on November 12, 1979, following the Provincial Premiers' Conference on Energy. And I quote:

[English]

No appreciation on our part of the desire of the federal government to share its intentions on national energy policy can constrain our intense frustration and alarm about what appears to be a seemingly unrelenting commitment to chase an artificial, erratic and soaring world price—a price set by interests and circumstances foreign to Canada and our economic realities. I must also say, in frankness, that the oil pricing proposal which is being negotiated between Clark's government and the province of Alberta appears, from what we now know, to be an excessive and imprudent response to the claims of the producing provinces and the petroleum industry.

[Translation]

Therefore there never was an agreement between the Conservatives on a national energy policy although the former prime minister has tried to make us believe that. Besides, the comments of Alberta legislature Conservative member, Mr. Thomas Sindlinger, would seem to confirm that there never was an agreement between the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and Mr. Lougheed.

Mr. Speaker we have rather chosen a step by step solution, if you will pardon me the expression, which would hold as ultimate goal an assured prosperity as well as the certainty for all Canadians of the following points; first, secure supplies and ultimately energy self-sufficiency of Canada. Second, the access of Canadians to an increased participation in the energy industries and particularly in those of oil and gas resources and, third, fair prices and a fair sharing of the revenues between the governments and the industry.

[English]

We must look at the price increases in the context of the government's overriding concern to achieve energy security, through encouraging, first, the development of new supplies, and, second, conservation of oil.

This is a policy which, by the way, will enhance Alberta's long-term prospects for prosperity through its effect in curbing the rate of depletion of this most valuable resource. Why should the federal government rely solely on sudden, unpredictable price increases in achieving its energy security goals, and, in particular, in encouraging conservation? Would the shock, the burden, that such a move entails, be fair to Canadian consumers all across the nation, particularly to those low-income Canadians for whom my Tory friends are expressing such concern?

Is it not much more reasonable to launch a wide variety of new initiatives, and couple these initiatives with a steady, gradual, predictable increase in the price of oil in the years to come? These are measures which will not only encourage the development of new supplies, but will, in addition, make conversion to other energy sources both feasible and economically attractive.

We have been accused in this House of ignoring the west, of tossing it aside, in our refusal to link Canadian oil prices to international levels. But what of other, less prosperous provinces and regions in this country—provinces and regions which will be subject to an alarming increase in income disparities in the event prices rise to world levels? Albertans are the first to admit they are Canadians. I ask, not in a belligerent manner, but because I am truly puzzled, how can their position on oil prices be reconciled with their deep commitment to the principles of equity and parity? Why, one must ask, should we continue to play into the hands of the petroleum industry, at present consisting primarily of foreign-owned multinational corporations which earn excessive profits as it is?

It has been said by industry spokesmen, by Premier Lougheed and by others, that the impact on industry of our scheduled price increases and new energy taxes will be to reduce the cash flows needed for further exploration of new supplies. The government has been fully aware of the billions the industry needs for exploration and development. I believe it has taken great pains to ensure that its proposals in no way impoverish our oil giants. First, under the new pricing schedule, a fourfold increase will accrue by the end of the decade in producer netbacks per barrel of conventional oil. Surely such an increase provides generous incentives to develop and invest in new oil and gas supplies.

Second, we are convinced that company profits are sufficiently high to warrant subtantial, albeit gradual as opposed to excessive, increases in domestic oil prices. For example, in a survey carried out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, it was found that the internal cash flow generated by the petroleum industry exceeded $7.1 billion last year, an increase of 44 per cent from 1978. In 1979 profits were $4.7 billion, up 54 per cent.

Given these figures, surely it is evident that a rapid increase in domestic crude prices will merely serve to fuel further increases in the windfdall profits enjoyed by the petroleum industry, to say nothing of increasing the over-all inflationary pressures in our economy. I might add this is a move which would be in direct contradiction of this government's commitment, in co-operation with the Bank of Canada, to curb inflation by appropriate monetary and fiscal policy.

I fully appreciate and sympathize with Premier Lougheed's concern that Alberta is being forced to sell its rapidly depleting oil resources at less than half their world value, resources which have been developed and tended only, in the words of Premier Lougheed "because of the efforts and the imaginations of Albertans". To this very legitimate concern, I would like to respond in two ways.

First, I do not for a moment doubt that Albertans have worked very hard to develop this resource for all of Canada. But I doubt in all fairness whether this development and exploration carried out over the past number of years, development and exploration which has enabled the people of Alberta to grow, to prosper and to improve their standard of living would have reached such an enviable plateau in the absence of the contributions made by our federal government. These amounted to 63 per cent of every exploration dollar in the oil and gas industry by means of tax incentives compared with 35 cents contributed by the province of Alberta. The point I am trying to make is that it has not, in the final analysis, been a one-way street. Alberta has had its "ups and downs", to use the words of its premier, as have all the provinces of this nation. All I ask is that Alberta not, in its good times, overlook the help it has had in its bad times.

Second, I must plead with Albertans to understand that the federal government's energy proposals, including the scheduling of price increases, in no way denies the producing provinces the opportunity—the financial wherewithal, if you like—to reap the benefits of what is indeed a depleting, non-renewable resource.

If one wishes to make comparisons among the provinces, and Premier Lougheed seems to be so inclined, clearly it is Alberta which stands to gain the most from the new energy proposals. Indeed, it is somewhat ironic in light of Premier Lougheed's statements that it is the province of Ontario which will be adversely affected by last week's federal budget. As the provincial treasurer of Ontario has painstakingly pointed out, higher energy prices will "cost Ontario residents an additional $2 billion next year", a figure which will increase to $5 billion by 1983-1984.

Every $1 a barrel increase in oil will cost Ontario about $300 million, says Frank Miller. Strangely enough, Ontario, the ostensibly favoured province, will get in return only $1 billion in new federal initiatives, while the west will receive development funds to the tune of $4 billion. It is all a very sad, if somewhat amusing, scenario when Premier Lougheed charges he is not receiving a fair deal, while Ontario cries that the western development fund ignores similar eastern priorities. But perhaps Albertans may say—indeed their premier has hinted as much—we understand the price increases, revenue-sharing formula, and so on are fair to Alberta; the proposals do not deny us the means to ensure in terms of financial flows that the basis for an enduring prosperity is protected and maintained. What is at issue is something which is essentially non-negotiable, namely, differing visions of Canada as a federal state and, consequently, differences of opinion regarding the respective "weight" jurisdictional claims should have, for example, between provincial ownership of resources on the one hand and federal paramountcy in interprovincial and international trade on the other.

It is perhaps sad that it is divergent visions of federalism which provide the foundation, if you like, upon which our current disputes are based. In the final analysis, there is no right or wrong vision of Canada. There is no set of absolute criteria with which we can say, "No, Alberta, you are wrong in believing what you believe, or in feeling what you feel, that, in the words of your premier, 'What we are facing here is a situation where more and more decision-making, more and more control, will be in the hands of decision-makers in Ottawa and your provincial government will become less and less able to influence your future." Personally, I do not agree with that vision of Canada, perhaps because I do not believe that a strong central government entails a priorily weak provincial counterparts. I cannot say that vision is wrong, but I can say I do not think it is the vision best suited to our current economic and political situation, both domestically and internationally.

I suppose for me the key words in this debate over powers, for that is what the budget debate is fundamentally all about, are balance and equity. Resource taxes, to cite one case in point, are merely one of the tools our national government is utilizing in its attempt to restore balance and equity to our political system, to correct the fiscal imbalance currently in effect between our central government and our provinces, simultaneously enabling Ottawa to carry out its responsibilities in redistributing Canada's wealth equitably among all Canadians.

Do not get me wrong. I am not accusing Albertans of being greedy and selfish. As their premier has pointed out, they have paid their price in confederation, whether it be through tariffs, freight rates, or equalization payments. This is as it should be, and, more importrant, as Alberta wishes it to be. But we must ask ourselves the following question: Does Alberta wish for a Canada which confers upon the remaining "have-nots" that very position of inferiority Albertans themselves found so humiliating and so inequitable? I personally do not think the west wants such a Canada. Yet this is precisely where its utilitarian ethics lead it, consciously or not.

It is one thing to feel, deep in your heart, that you, or your province working through you, are the best guardian of your own, very specific, very regionally unique interests. But it is quite another thing to assume that this pursuit of ones own interests somehow results in the greatest good for the greatest number or, in practical terms, results in what is best for Canada as a whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during a public affairs program last weekend, the interviewer tried two or three times to bring his guest, the President of the National Bank, to say that the budget did nothing for Quebec. Mr. Bélanger then explained very carefully to the interviewer that a budget must be analysed as a whole and that, in his opinion, we were all treated equally. However, in view of the insistence of this interviewer, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should make a few comments about the impact of the Canadian energy program on Quebec.

Under the national energy program developed by our government, consumer oil prices will be much lower than those set by the previous government which involved a relationship between domestic and international prices. Because of our program, Mr. Speaker, Quebec, like other areas in the country, will pay much less for its oil since our policy is aimed at minimizing the unfavourable impact of price increases on the economic growth of these areas and reducing at the same time inflationary pressures. As for the price of gas, Mr. Speaker, the yearly increase of 45 cents per thousand cubic feet over a period of three years will cause a slower increase for consumer gas prices than for heating oil prices. Under this program, our government also wants to take new energy initiatives in Quebec by stimulating certain areas, including research. These initiatives will cost $1.8 million in the next four years, which is about $280 per capita.

In short, Mr. Speaker, if we look forward to 1984, we can see that, because of our program, the annual costs for the average family in Quebec will be clearly lower than what they would have been if the price of Canadian oil were related to world prices. Through its policy of establishing a better balance between the provinces, our government also intends to encourage Canadians to switch from oil to other energy sources wherever possible. In this optic, grants will be given to replace heating oil systems by systems using natural gas, electricity, solar energy and other more natural fuels in some areas. Assistance of up to 50 per cent of transformation costs up to a maximum of $800 will be given to any individual who wants to take advantage of our program. The national energy program therefore aims at following the trend already started in Quebec where 82 per cent of all new housing built uses electricity instead of oil for heating.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, our program enables us to assist the taxpayer to improve his residence or its insulation. Logically, if our program replaces oil by other energy sources, it is necessary to provide for Quebec an effective supply of natural gas. This is why some proper and direct steps have been taken to ensure that the construction of a gas line is undertaken as soon as possible. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind members that the national energy program advocated by our Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources fully respects the principle of equity and balance among the provinces. All recognize that our government should increase its revenues.

A corporate income tax on gas and petroleum has been levied rather than resorting to the deindexation of personal income tax. Instead of an excise tax between 18 to 25 cents a gallon on gas in addition to a 14-cent increase, the government has chosen to increase the tax burden of refineries. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the government has decided to tax where the money is in order to distribute it among Canadians, as it had done previously when it levied more taxes in Ontario and Quebec and as it will surely do in the future, because Canadian federalism is based on one concept—sharing.

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have some sympathy for my colleagues opposite, reading prepared speeches prepared for them by departmental officials. It is very difficult—

Mr. Deniger: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Central Nova will realize that my speech came from no one but me and my staff. It is quite unfair for him to imply that the words I uttered are words that I do not sincerely believe. Believe me, I am concerned about our future and the present situation. Not one word of my speech came from anyone outside of my office. I hope the hon. member has some respect for this institution and for me as an individual. I think he is a fine member of Parliament. I am sure he did not mean to imply I had a prepared speech. I worked very hard on my speech and firmly believe everything I said. He was being most unfair. It is not like him to imply that my speech could have been prepared by anyone except my staff and myself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member has such a fine opinion of his authorship. I do not wish to cast any aspersions on his speech. He did not let me finish. I was about to say that I felt rather sorry for members opposite who had to read from prepared texts, prepared by departmental officials, defending this budget. The last speaker indicated that is not the case. I am glad to hear that. I am glad to hear that by implication he would dissociate himself from those kinds of speeches prepared by departmental officials because if there were less of those and more speeches prepared—

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I object very strenuously to the words that have just been uttered by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). I too have great respect for the member. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, I can tell him that the departmental officials, in conjunction with the minister, prepared the minister's speech and, in conjunction with the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), also prepared his speech. They have not prepared any other speeches that have been given by any member on this side of the House during this budget debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: We are getting more information about some of these speeches at this point than we have been able to get all during the budget debate. I thank the hon. member for giving me that kind of assurance. It certainly helps.

At this point in our budget debate, I think it is interesting to note that we have just witnessed an historic election in the United States of America. I believe it would be worth while to refer to that election in passing. As all of us know, what happens in this House as the policies or lack of policies unfold which affect the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and so on, will be determined greatly by the success that president-elect Ronald Reagan and his new administration have in coping with the difficulties that face the free world and face their country.

I hope members of this House of Parliament will join with me in wishing president-elect Reagan and his new administration every success. Obviously there are many, many matters of common interest that we share with our neighbour to the south. I remember it being said in this House at one time, I believe by the then leader of the Social Credit party, that the United States was the best friend we had whether we liked it or not. I think he was being facetious. That is precisely what the United States is not. The Soviet Union may have that particular distinction when people talk about their captive satellites.

We in this country are very fortunate to share a common border with the United States of America. I believe that President Kennedy said—perhaps in this House of Commons, certainly in this country when he visited here—that geography has made us neighbours, history has made us friends, and economics have made us partners. I hope in the months ahead, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated, there will be immediate contact made with the new administration of the United States in order to address some of the very serious irritants and mutual matters of concern between ourselves and that country—a northern pipeline, the fisheries treaties which have not been ratified, and the "Buy America" program. There are many areas of concern. I only mention that today because we are given a fair amount of latitude. I believe hon. members would agree that it is very important we get off to a positive start in making initial approaches to the new administration of our good friends to the south, and I am depending upon hon. members, and members of the cabinet opposite, to do that very thing.

It is obvious that this budget debate has revealed a great many divisive and tense matters which are troubling our country. The last speaker referred to some of them. The positive aspects of this budget, which it would be intellectually dishonest to deny exist, have, I am sure to the disappointment of hon. members opposite and the Minister of Finance, not stilled the criticism which has come in unusual severity from columnists and, indeed, every part of this country.

The movement toward more emphasis on economic development, the movement to close some loopholes permitting foreign vehicles or foreign ships to come in and tank up with cheap Canadian fuel are along with the postponement of deindexing, positive aspects of the budget, but they have not to any noticeable degree affected the blasts of criticism which have come from practically all quarters of this country.

Without going into too much detail one need only recall what was said by Terry Hunsley, the executive director of the Canadian Council of Social Development, when he expressed the view that this budget would have a devastating effect on low income Canadians.

Don McGillivray, a respected writer for Southam News called it a cheerless document and a gloomy and deceptive document forecasting a gloomy future for Canadians and doing nothing to change things.

Finally, on the distaff side, we hear from Dian Cohen. I see the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell) approves of Dian Cohen. She is a good economist, and I am sure the hon. member would agree.

Miss Campbell: I do not approve of Southam.

Mr. MacKay: Dian Cohen is a very perceptive economic analyst. She condemns the energy aspects and points out that this time next year both our balance of payments deficit and our budgetary deficit will be higher than they are today.

What can the government do about it? In fact, what can any of us do about it? I think we must first, as Confucius said, begin our longest journey with one small step. I think we as federal members of Parliament must try—and I ask the members of the government to try—to change the kind of attitude which has developed in this country during the past few years and, indeed, during the past few months. The federal government is the only body which has the responsibility and the capacity to mediate and to try to mitigate the differences, the rivalries and the suspicions which exist among different regions of this country and particularly between the federal government and different regions and provinces of this country.

We must replace confrontation with conciliation and induce the provinces to stop bickering over some of their parochial matters. By doing this they are hurting everyone in the country and especially themselves. If our Parliament and our government do not do this, we will continue to project to the international community the image of being on the way to becoming a second-class and unstable country. The only thing which is keeping this country right now from plunging toward the status of a Third World economy is the abundance of our natural resources and the ready market for them. Unfortunately, they are being exported, to too large an extent, in an unfinished state.

Mr. Waddell: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I hear some support coming from our friends in the New Democratic Party. I will come back to that party's role in recent months in Parliament later. Perhaps they will not be as willing to support me when they hear what I have to say.

Mr. Waddell: We are talking about resources.

Mr. MacKay: The hon. member says they are talking about resources, and I agree that to a large extent their policies on resources have some merit except when they try to undermine the status of the resources in the various provinces by trading the existing status under the BNA Act, that of ownership of those resources, and substituting something much less—management and control.

Mr. Waddell: That is not true.

Mr. MacKay: It is very difficult to manage and control something you do not own. It makes it very unstable.

In looking at what is happening to our country, we could do worse than examine what happened to the United States as the political and economic centre of gravity changed in that country. There was a time, in the lifetime of our parents particularly, when the northwestern part of the United States was the manufacturing centre. Gradually, a change came and the impetus moved into Ohio and to the west coast. Now it is moving down into the sun belt in the southwest United States. In its wake the economic and social disruptions do not appear to have caused the kind of agony, the kind of bickering and the lack of management to prevent the exodus of industry which has characterized conditions in our country.

I think we can learn something about that and from that. As the economic and political centre of gravity, which has long since left the east coast of our country—the east coast once was the linchpin of confederation and once provided the possibility and, indeed, the very raison d'être for the nation as we now know it—left the maritimes and moved into Ontario and is now moving out to the west, the government has not come to grips with the proper economic measures to remedy the situation which this shift in economic movement has left behind.

Without going into the historical reasons for the union of this country, before confederation, when the province of Canada seemed bound for dissolution because both the English and French component in that province were dissatisfied, the Montreal traders feared western expansion, backed, as we know, by business interests in Toronto. Does that not sound familiar today? The gaps widened.

There was trouble out west with the Hudson's Bay Company. There were links developing between the Mississippi valley and the Red River valley. The Yankees were coming into the Fraser River valley for gold. All these things were threatening to disintegrate that part of British North America. This was complicated by the Fenian raids and the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty. All these things we remember, if we look at our history. However, the fact is that we did get a country together, and at that time it was a very sound country. It still is, despite the strains which have been caused in recent years by these economic shifts.

As far as the particular responsibilities I used to exercise in our government are concerned, I look across at my friends—I do not see them here at the moment—in economic development and housing, and I feel sorry for them because in the thrust of this budget, despite their undoubted good intentions, they were not able to focus some of the resources of the budget on their departments, and on the areas of Canada which need them. I am particularly disappointed in the actions of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Harquail), but I will come back to that again in a few moments.

As far as the housing needs of this country are concerned, whether hon. members opposite agree or disagree, a large number of Canadians—over four million of them—would have benefited from the measures we intended to bring in to relieve property owners and taxpayers of this country who qualified for the mortgage interest and tax payment credits.

We also had every intention—and I was disappointed that we were not able to bring in a shelter allowance—to help those people who did not own homes but who were renting, and I am confident that this would have been done. This particular type of assistance, which would have brought relief to several million Canadians and which involved co-operation between our minister of finance and I, never occurred, and I was hoping very much, if hon. members opposite felt constrained about it because of the fact that this program of ours was a matter of controversy, that the housing minister would have had the clout and there would have been enough wisdom to have brought in a shelter allowance which would have done a great deal to help many Canadians. However, that was not done. Instead of that we get the MURBs.

The MURBs provisions are not entirely regressive. They are useful to people who want to invest money as a tax relief dodge. They are useful in an indirect way to stimulate some housing, but they are almost a pitiful gesture of any meaningful assistance with respect to housing problems.

Then we look at the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. There is not a more sincere or dedicated minister in the House than the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané). What does he get in this budget to help disadvantaged areas of Canada? He gets one positive measure. He gets the tax credit of 50 per cent for industries which meet certain criteria in parts of Canada which are particularly needy. That is better than nothing, there is no doubt about that, but again it is a far cry from taking into account the need to do something meaningful to make up for the kind of economic shift to which I referred earlier.

One of the reasons I am disappointed in the Deputy Prime Minister—and there are many reasons—is that when I hear him speak, I think that perhaps he has forgotten he comes from the maritimes. I think he speaks for the Quebec-Ontario axis of the Liberal party. He mentioned yesterday that he was down home travelling in the Atlantic region, as if that were a rare event. I hope it is not, because a member whom you and I know very well, Mr. Speaker, a former member of our party in Nova Scotia, Donald MacInnis—"fighting Donnie" they used to call him—who used to fight very hard for his people, used to say, "Just because you get where you're going, you don't forget where you're from." I think the Deputy Prime Minister should pay a little more attention to that kind of philosophy.

I have in my hand—I referred to it earlier in the House—a speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The former premier of Nova Scotia who is now Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) was with him. They entertained the Halifax board of trade on January 25, 1980, and on that occasion the Prime Minister made some very definite promises. One promise in particular will soon be a year old come January. These promises have been referred to often, and obfuscated. I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about them a few months ago, and a few weeks ago and he said that nothing could be done because the NEB is holding things up. I am referring to the oft-promised natural gas pipeline in Nova Scotia. Here is what the Prime Minister said as it appears on page 10 of his speech, if any hon. members opposite want to refer to it. He was speaking about the virtues of switching to natural gas, an alternate energy source, and he said:

> But in order to switch, people must have access to gas. Nowhere is access needed more than in eastern Canada. I am announcing today—

Remember, that was last January:

> —as part of our program, that a Liberal government will take immediate action to ensure the full co-operation of all parties in the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes.

It was only a few days ago that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave the undertaking that, pursuant to this latest promise in the budget, he would, if necessary, bring in a bill to carry out that undertaking. So months and months have been wasted. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> The pipeline will have reversible capacity so that maritimers will have the opportunity, both to use western natural gas now and to send offshore gas to central Canada later. Like the railroad in the 1880s, energy pipelines in the 1980s have the potential to be a steel link uniting the nation.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is trying to close some of the railways in Nova Scotia that were built as fulfilment of a direct promise to induce Nova Scotia to come into confederation. We will go into that on another day.

Are we forgetting, because of the lack of clout or lack or attention of the Deputy Prime Minister—perhaps he is more concerned with aspiring to be the prime minister for a few months than he is in taking care of his own people—are we forgetting that we are going to be deprived of the opportunity to develop a petrochemical industry in Atlantic Canada—I hope in Nova Scotia, in the Strait of Canso area—if we do not do something soon to get that pipeline which has been promised so many times? Are we going to see the natural gas from the high Arctic and, the Sable Island shelf, and from Newfoundland, transported by ship up to central Canada? Are we going to be keepers of pipelines only? Will we not have an opportunity to use that feedstock in an LNG terminal, that natural gas we have, to develop a petrochemical industry and target it for export offshore? I see the hon. member for South West Nova is concerned, as she should be, because I know she wants to see Nova Scotia—

Miss Campbell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. All I was concerned about, as the hon. member should be, is that I do not see Premier Buchanan doing anything about commencing a petrochemical industry.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how a provincial premier can possibly do the kind of thing the hon. member for South West Nova is suggesting. What would she have him do? Would she have him start building a petrochemical complex when there is no source of gas and no way to transport it? Just imagine the ridicule the Premier of Nova Scotia would face.

That is not the only thing that concerns me about the attitude of the Deputy Prime Minister. Nowhere in Canada is there a greater need for housing than in Cape Breton because of the history of that part of the country. I remember when the former NDP member from that area, Father Hogan, was in the House. He was always after me, when I was minister of housing, to urge CMHC to do something. That is why I again take the opportunity to remind the House that I cannot understand the lack of concern for Nova Scotia that is being exhibited by this government, especially the lack of concern for housing for low income people.

I realize you cannot have it both ways and that there is only so much income available from which to do these socially necessary and responsible things. In this budget there is a proposed expenditure of $66.6 billion, and if there is not enough money to do some of these things, then I firmly believe in other measures than just socking it to the west to raise this money in its entirety. If the Minister of Finance wants to restore confidence in this country and if he wants to start reducing the deficit, as we were prepared to do, and if he wants to show the international community that the Canadian dollar can become more valuable in the future by reducing our deficit, why does he not put another surtax on top of the 5 per cent surtax which he extended on the corporate side? Or why does he not raise the corporation tax rate a little? Sure, big business will not like him, but, as Samuel Gompers used to say "you back the masses against the classes. " You know, Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to see from the answers given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he has considered raising corporate taxes.

When I was thinking about this problem, I happened to see in the Ottawa Citizen of October 29 of this year—not really a strong supporter of the Conservative party—an article which makes a lot of sense. It reads:

> There are obviously several ways in which the deficit could be reduced. One is through a major revision of social spending—

I do not go for that. I do not think it is equitable under these circumstances. The editorial goes on to read:

> Another is to reduce the level of corporate welfare in this country.

That might not be a bad idea in certain cases. Corporate taxes, which are nominally at 46 per cent in this country, in the last three years have been, on the average, about 18 per cent.

I would like to see, as a matter of policy, this government able to obtain more revenue from other tax sources, but I would not like to see this money wasted as it is being wasted by the Department of Employment and Immigration. Today the minister bragged about the $800 million for training. I would like to see some of that money go to my friend, the Minister of DREE (Mr. De Bané), to create some real jobs and for development. The much touted $800 conversion is a sham because in the Atlantic region electricity, which is priced out of all reasonable proportion, is not an option and we do not have any natural gas either thanks to the procrastination of the Prime Minister and his government. I believe that up in the Yukon they cannot convert to natural gas either.

Mr. Nielsen: Not unless you take the cabinet up there.

Mr. MacKay: That is about it. What should we put this money into? One of the basic responsibilities imposed on leaders, right since the time nation states were first created, was to protect the sovereignty of a nation and to keep its currency from being debased. As a start, looking at our sovereignty and the territory issues, we should put a little more money into our defence because we cannot even effectively patrol the greatest treasure house any nation in the world has, that is our north. Our militia is using equipment that is older than they are. There are more people in the Russian KGB alone than there are in our entire armed forces. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) tries to do his best, but again he is the victim of lack of proper priorities and planning. Surely we can put a little more money into ensuring that we meet our NATO commitments because with the projected rate of inflation, using the figures of the Department of National Defence own model, there is no way in which we will be able to keep our promises to that organization. So, I would like to see another billion dollars or two raised by some increase in corporate taxes, supposing the Minister of Finance does it by way of a supplementary budget measure. Also I would like to see a portion of that money placed directly towards the reduction of our deficit, either the money we owe abroad or the budget on which we are overspending at home.

● (1630)

I know the corporate sector and Canadians who have to pay the tax would not be particularly happy to have to pay more taxes. But if they could see that their tax moneys were going to increase the stature of their country by reducing its deficit, by improving its stature in the international community, by increasing its respectability in the eyes of its allies by letting it meet its military commitments, then I do not think there would be any complaints if the Minister of Finance sought to raise a billion or two dollars by raising the rate of corporate tax, particularly if he showed a little ingenuity about doing it.

I have a particular interest down in the constituency of the Deputy Prime Minister—I do not want to pick on him today—but it used to trouble me when I was the minister responsible for Devco and was involved with some things concerning Sysco. Those of us who have been following this know the much touted business plan, which has been used as an excuse for not proceeding with the needed aid for Sysco, has been around in the hands of the department and available to the minister and his parliamentary secretary for weeks. All this three-phase plan does in its first phase is exactly what the plan by R. B. Cameron did when he first began to rehabilitate this Crown corporation. It is designed to improve the basic operations, reduce its operational costs and improve its productivity.

It is disgraceful every time Massey-Ferguson hiccups or Chrysler needs help that something is done. Now we hear about the White Equipment company, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is most sympathetic; he is looking into it. But the "coal dust twins", the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), had over ten years in office to do something about Sysco. At one time they talked about the Gabarouse project. They were going to build a whole new steel plant down there, a Greenfields project. In steel industry argot, they "ate off that" for a long time. I remember the then hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, now Senator Muir, questioning the Deputy Prime Minister about it. It is almost criminal negligence that they have to reinvent the wheel after all this time and still there is nothing done. Despite that, thanks to the improved management and certain other factors—I like to think partly because of the aid they received last year to some extent—Sysco is making progress.

Now, what about Devco? It is a corporation which needs a little shaking up. It is not a bad corporation, but it has been a retreat operation for far too long. It is time that Devco began to fill its primary function—that is, to mine coal more efficiently—and concentrate less on collateral activities. One trivial example is the Holiday Inn down there. The building is owned by Devco. That inn could be expanded, I know it could. There could be more employment, more jobs, but they are not interested in it. Also, recently they hired a professor from York University to do corporate planning. Is there no one in Cape Breton who can do that?

I say the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion should look at Devco because it is something which can be used much more effectively than it is being used now to create the kind of economic assistance which is so appropriate in that part of Canada passed by temporarily by economic events and which has been so slow in recovering partly because the government has not taken any imaginative or meaningful steps to let it do what it does best.

The imprimatur of this budget must begin and end with the Prime Minister. He is the man who sets the priorities, and the Deputy Prime Minister helps. The attitude which has been created in the country puzzles me. I am not a student of political science, I do not have any great parliamentary or historical expertise, but I wondered why the Prime Minister in many cases seemed to take such a personal acerbic approach. Anyone who does not agree with him somehow is alienated—they are not Canadian or they are somehow against the national interest. That may not be true, but it is the way I perceive it. I wondered why. Then I began to remember some of the terrible things he said about the party he now leads. I do not know whether or not that gives one any insight into the attitude which seems to be causing trouble all over the country.

I have looked at some of his writings. I looked at sort of an anthology, it is interesting reading. It was published when he was minister of justice. It is entitled: "Federalism and the French Canadians". It is an interesting book, but I do not have time to read a lot of it into the record. One thing which has troubled me and many politicians in the country is polarization in Canada; far better that the Liberal party had some members in Alberta, far better that the Conservative party had some members in Quebec. However, the NDP do not have a hope of getting members anywhere. They will be like the Creditistes after the next election; they will be gone.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I will tell the House why they will be gone. Look at this country from coast to coast—

Mr. Waddell: Tell us what great things you did for the maritimes.

Mr. MacKay: The member talks about the great things we did for the maritimes. For years the Conservative party was the poor man's socialist in Nova Scotia when Bob Stanfield was premier.

In his book the present Prime Minister talked about the history of the Liberal party in Quebec. This article was entitled: "Some Obstacles to Democracy in Quebec". Page 119 reads in part as follows:

> But power entails responsibilities; and there is no doubt that the Liberals tragically failed to shoulder theirs. A party cannot have the approval of a majority of the electorate for well over half a century without accepting much of the blame for that electorate's political immaturity. If French Canadians even today have learnt so little about democracy, if they twist its rules so shockingly, if they are constantly tempted by authoritarianism, it is to a large degree because the Liberal party has been miserably remiss in its simple political duty. Instead of educating the French-speaking electorate to believe in democracy, the Liberals seem content to cultivate the ignorance and prejudice of the electorate.

I think that is shocking. I do not agree with it, but that is what he wrote. The book continues:

> But the fact remains that throughout most of its existence the federal Liberal party was overwhelmingly an English-speaking party. And that majority in my view should bear the blame for serious faults of omission with respect to the backwardness of democracy in Quebec . . . the shameful incompetence of the average Liberal MP from Quebec was a welcome asset to a government that needed little more than a herd of—

I do not understand this, I cannot translate this word.

> —ânes savants to file in when the division bell rang. The party strategists had but to find an acceptable stable master—

And he called them "donkeys". If he would say that about the party he now leads, then it is more clear to me now why he takes that attitude toward some provincial governments which disagree with him.

My time is about up, but I should like to refer briefly to the constitutional debate which will be coming back into the House. I would like to emphasize that I hope the quality of the debate, which has been very high, will be allowed to continue in the House of Commons. I came across a piece of literature the other day by a writer, James Russell Lowell, which I hope summed up the attitude of members of Parliament of all parties in responding to the needs of their constituents. He talked about the man who was willing to sink half his present repute for the freedom to think. There was more to the effect that this same man, be his cause strong or weak, would gladly risk the rest for the freedom to speak. That is exactly what members of Parliament want to do—have the freedom to speak—and if the government co-operates they will do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1640)

Mr. Waddell: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Waddell: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) when he was speaking because he is such a fine speaker. I have admired him for a long time, even before I came to Parliament. For one thing, he was always accurate with his information. I know the hon. member did not intend to mislead the House, but he and some of his colleagues, especially from British Columbia, have been misleading the House. He did so today by stating the New Democratic Party's position falsely with respect to a resource control amendment to the constitution. The hon. member must know that the position is quite clear—it adds to the ownership of provincial resources by dealing with interprovincial trade and other matters.

The hon. member must also know that it is just illogical for a party to advocate an amendment which is less than the existing situation. So he should not mislead the House by indicating that the New Democratic Party is pressing for an amendment which would result in less than the existing constitution allows the provinces. Indeed, it is more. I ask the hon. member not to mislead the House in that way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) because the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has indicated to the Chair and to the House that this is a matter of privilege. The absence of a motion and of argument to that effect lead me to believe that we are into a matter of debate rather than of privilege. The Chair does not have the right to reach a conclusion before any input is made on the subject. My current inclination is to advise the hon. member that he does not appear to have a question of privilege. I will now hear the hon. member for Central Nova. I want to emphasize that what I have said to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway applies equally to the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention made by the hon. member for the New Democratic Party. He is quite right. In some policy matters, such as the environment and civil rights, there is a certain amount of agreement between our parties although we have disagreed in other areas. I welcome his assurance that he is saying now that what he really supports is ownership and he does not want to see the resource base of the provinces undermined by the federal government. He does not want to see the provinces lose what they now have. I welcome his correction, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to misstate the NDP position but that was the way I understood it. I understood that having lost their chance of any leverage they now find themselves like a eunuch. They are a minority party in a majority parliament which they probably went too far and too fast trying to accommodate.

Mr. Waddell: We want something for our region.

Mr. MacKay: I very much respect the NDP members who come and came from British Columbia, particularly my good friend Stuart Leggatt. I think it is terrible that with 40 per cent of their caucus from British Columbia, including the fine justice critic from Burnaby, they are not being given an opportunity to sit on the constitution committee.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to participate in this debate. First, I want to convey my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on behalf of my constituents on the presentation of his first budget to the Parliament of Canada. The budget will clearly establish a sound basis for the economy over the long term by taking the necessary steps to deal with the problems in the area of energy. This includes Canada's reliance on oil imports, the deficit, productivity, employment, and inflation. Furthermore, the budget introduced and tabled by the Minister of Finance will continue to strengthen the stronger regions of the country, like Alberta, and assist those other regions which are somewhat less fortunate.

I also want to congratulate the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) for introducing a national energy program which allows Canadians throughout the country to participate in and benefit from this prudent and responsible national energy program.

I represent an area in this country which, over the years, has experienced more than its fair share of what I would deem to be economic casualties, these casualties being exceptionally high unemployment, slow economic growth, sky-rocketing energy costs and, yes, a high rate of migration of young people who have had to leave their communities in search of economic security and go elsewhere to pursue their careers. But despite these setbacks my constituents from the towns of New Waterford, Glace Bay, Dominion and the counties of Cape Breton and Richmond remain loyal to Canada. In remaining loyal to Canada I suggest they are good Canadians. In being good Canadians I believe they are excited about their future and they are very eager to play a meaningful part in realizing the potential of our region and, indeed, our country.

Notwithstanding this sense of optimism, we are aware of those problems. We are aware that the solutions to those problems will not be easy to find. This budget, unlike the previous one, attempts to address those issues in very specific ways. But before I go on to this particular budget I would like to review the previous budget introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). In introducing his budget he placed before the people of Canada an energy plan which, in my opinion, he did not really understand. He could not conclude an agreement with the producing provinces which prior to the election would have been very easy to accomplish. The energy tax proposed in that budget was not fully enumerated. The proposed national energy bank's objectives were vague at best.

Of course, when it came to research and development across this country we had the hon. member from St. John's West indicating that his plan of action was to engage in further studies of tax incentives. The Crosbie way—if I may call it that—to increase employment opportunities was to reduce the deficit or, better yet, to provide more incentives to the private sector and, particularly, to his good friends the multinationals. His best move, which every member of this House recalls very well, was the imposition of an 18-cent excise tax on gasoline. We know what the people of Canada thought about that.

The budget before us addresses these questions very clearly. On behalf of my constituents I would indicate what the differences are, particularly as they affect the farmers and fishermen in my constituency. For instance, under the Crosbie budget diesel fuel in 1981 would cost $1.19 per gallon, while under our budget it will cost $1.06 per gallon. In 1982 the cost under the Crosbie budget would have been $1.36 as compared to $1.23 under our budget. In 1983, the cost under the Crosbie budget would have been $1.88 as compared to $1.41 under our budget. In 1984 the price per gallon for diesel fuel under the Crosbie budget—

Mr. Gustafson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I will permit a question at the end of my remarks, if there is time.

In 1984 the price per gallon of diesel fuel under the Crosbie budget would have been $2.27, and under our national energy program it will be $1.63. That is a difference of 64 cents.

With respect to gasoline, the price per gallon under the Crosbie budget, back in 1979, was $1.56, and under our program it will be $1.36 in 1981. The figures for 1982 are $1.75 under the Crosbie budget and $1.53 under ours, for 1983 under the Crosbie budget $2.32, and $1.71 under ours. For 1984, under the great paragon and defender of the little guy, the price was to be $2.63 as compared to our $1.95, a 68-cent difference.

● (1650)

The fiasco does not end there, it goes on to the price of natural gas at the Toronto city gate. Under the 1979 budget introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West, in 1980 the price would be $2.75 while our price is, unfortunately, $2.90. But when we come to 1981 the price under the Conservative budget would be $3.45 whereas our price will be $3.05. Then we go on to 1984 when the price under the Crosbie budget would be $7.90 while our price under the national energy program is $4.60. There is a difference of $3.30. Shame on the hon. member for St. John's West!

Mr. Siddon: Full of deceit.

Mr. Dingwall: Of course this endless barrage on the Canadian public continues with crude oil prices. In 1981 the Conservatives proposed under their budget a price of $25.20 per barrel. Our price is $24.90. For 1983 their proposed price was $46.70, whereas our price is $34 per barrel, a substantial difference. Of course for 1984, the hon. member for St. John's West who talks about defending the little guy and who worries about the low-income Canadian, set the price of crude oil per barrel at $55.30. Under our proposal the price in 1984 will be $40.50 per barrel. There is a difference of $15.20.

Mr. Siddon: You are misleading the public.

Mr. Dingwall: That is the price of the great defender of the little guy.

Mr. McDermid: That will be thrown back at you in the next election, my friend. Be very careful.

Mr. Dingwall: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I have shaken a few nerves of members on the opposite side.

The national energy program is of particular importance to the economy of Nova Scotia. The Government of Canada will act to resolve regulatory issues so that the construction of the natural gas pipeline extension through Quebec into the maritimes may begin as soon as possible. The pipeline will be reversible. The government will involve itself in the construction of the main line if necessary. The Government of Canada has provided a sum of $500 million to be set aside for that particular purpose.

I was interested to hear the comments of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) who has now left the chamber. However, he did not refer to the comments and the position taken by the Premier of New Brunswick on this particular pipeline. The hon. member talked about his own premier, John Buchanan, but he made no mention of the Premier of New Brunswick or of his comments on this particular pipeline.

Under the national energy program, grants will be provided for conversion or replacement of oil fired heating systems to enable home owners and businesses to use natural gas, propane, wood, solar or other regional appropriate fuels. At least initially conversions to electricity will not be eligible, since much of it is generated from oil.

Mr. McDermid: Not in Ontario.

Mr. Dingwall: The taxable grants will cover 50 per cent of conversion costs up to a maximum grant of $800. Some 200,000 homes in Nova Scotia are currently oil heated. The program target is the conversion of at least 171,000 homes by the year 1990. In the transportation sector grants of $400 per vehicle will be available to commercial fleet operators to assist in the conversion of motor vehicles from gasoline to propane fuel systems.

This budget, unlike the previous budget, has particular significance to the economy of industrial Cape Breton.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, it finishes it off. That is the end of it.

Mr. Dingwall: I was hoping that the hon. member for Central Nova would have remained in the chamber so that we could have an interchange of some of the facts which he so eloquently tried to put before the House. Nova Scotia will be eligible for $175 million in federal funds to help finance the conversion of oil fired electrical generating plants to coal. Coleson Cove in New Brunswick is one example, and Tufts Cove in Nova Scotia is another example. Nova Scotians will also be eligible for federal funds for the demonstration of advanced coal use technologies. This will include the development of fluidized-bed combustion at a utility-scale power plant in Cape Breton. The new technology allows the use of high-sulphur coals with minimal environmental impact.

When I heard the hon. member for Central Nova talk about the wonderful things that he and his party could do for this country, I wondered where he was as the junior minister of DREE for six months. Where was he?

Mr. Crosbie: Where were you?

Mr. Dingwall: Did he provide any moneys for the Donkin Mines? Not one copper under the Tories! The federal government has provided $14 million for tunnelling at the Donkin Mine, while the Tories, the paragons and defenders of the little guy, have done nothing. This government has also provided $50 million for the period 1980-83, and another $100 million for the period 1984-85 for coal technologies.

Also, the coal testing institute will be established in Cape Breton with $4 million of federal funding for research to support development of regional coal reserves. We do not need to study any further tax incentives for research and development, because we do it.

Mr. McDermid: That is why R and D dropped down to below 1 per cent of the GNP.

Mr. Dingwall: These measures, when taken collectively, will enable many residents of industrial Cape Breton to participate in a real way in the expansion of the coal industry. It is my belief that employment will increase, and when one uses the multiplier effect, these measures will have a dramatic impact on our local economies.

The hon. member for Central Nova indicated in his remarks that the government was doing very little relative to the requests of Sydney Steel Corporation. I would remind him that this government has made a commitment of $50 million. When the same request was made of his government, it took absolutely no decision and made no decision whatsoever to provide that money.

The hon. member for Central Nova also suggested that there should be a major shake-up in the Cape Breton Development Corporation. We had a big shake-up in the Cape Breton Development Corporation by getting rid of that junior minister, whom they call, in the coal mines of my constituency, "Elmer Fub".

In relation to these particular projects in my area of Canada, conservation measures have also been introduced. While encouraging conversion from oil, the national energy program will give increased support for the upgrading of home insulation. Under the Canadian Home Insulation Program, approximately $61 million has been provided to about 156,000 households in Nova Scotia and, I would add, it is tax deductible. A $30 million industrial conservation program which is unique to the Atlantic provinces will fund up to 50 per cent of the cost of energy efficiency improvement in industry. This will reduce vulnerability to energy price increases and enhance its competitiveness in national and international markets.

In addition to these particular measures, my government has not increased personal income taxes. There is no de-indexing of pensions, a possibility suggested by members opposite. There has been an extension of the small business development bonds—

Mr. Crosbie: Those are my bonds. Give me credit.

Mr. Dingwall: —for three months at a cost of $50 million. Petro-Canada's mandate will be expanded to play a bigger role in the oil and gas industry. And, of course, one of the major boosts to the economies of the Atlantic region is a special 50 per cent investment tax credit to promote industrial development in those parts of Canada most adversely affected by economic disparities. Most manufacturing and processing activities will qualify for this tax credit, which includes such things as buildings, machinery and equipment.

The Registered Retirement Savings Plan and the Registered Home Owners Savings Plan have been kept intact.

I have highlighted some of the major things which will take place in Atlantic Canada as a result of this very prudent and reasonable budget and far-reaching national energy program. But it does not stop in Atlantic Canada. It also helps western Canada. Under the national energy program the natural gas bank will bolster the cash flow and viability of the small Canadian natural gas producers. The national energy program will encourage diversification of the western economy, and hence ensure continued prosperity to this rich part of our country by supporting the establishment of a petrochemical industry based on natural gas rather than oil, which will serve to concentrate in Alberta, as it ought to.

• (1700)

The national energy program provides a new pricing formula for oil and gas that will stimulate oilsands and heavy oil development and expand domestic markets for Alberta natural gas producers by making natural gas a more attractive alternative to oil in Canada.

One of the most important measures announced in the national energy program is a $4 billion economic development fund for the west. The Government of Canada recognizes that all of Canada benefits when its regions prosper, and since the west has the resource base to support unprecedented prosperity, one objective of the national energy program is to help transform this potential into reality.

It is anticipated that this money will be used for a number of infrastructure improvements, in particular for the early upgrading of the railroad system and for the improvement of ports to enhance the access of western Canadian products to world markets. The details of these expenditures, Mr. Speaker, will be worked out by the federal government in consultation with the four western provinces in recognition of the need to foster a harmonious, co-operative relationship between all governments in Canada.

In conclusion, I should like to return to a comment I made earlier with respect to the people of Cape Breton. I said that they were good Canadians. What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? These are not words that I use lightly. Fundamental to the concept of being a good Canadian, I believe, is the idea of sharing. What, after all, has held this country together for the last 113 years, if not a generosity of spirit and a willingness to share? It has been said many times that Canada is composed of a diversity of peoples, with differing ideas, aspirations, and needs. Throughout our history we have witnessed the difficulty with which such a wonderful mixture becomes, and remains, one nation. It is testimony to the generosity of spirit and good will of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached the state we enjoy today—one of undoubted prosperity and tremendous prospects for the future.

This is not to gloss over the strains that are evident in recent years in confederation; it is, however, to call attention to the positive side of being Canadian—that about which we can be very proud but that which is rarely mentioned nowadays—our national characteristic of sharing.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the strength of this budget is the fact that it embodies the concept of sharing. It is fitting that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance introduced this particular budget at this time in our history. It recognizes that Canada needs strong regions; therefore, policies directed toward those regions are designed to ensure that they remain strong. But it also recognizes, Mr. Speaker, that our ultimate goal and aim as Canadians are to have all regions strong. It therefore contains so many commendable policies—some of which I have outlined—that I urge all hon. members from all political parties to support this budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of the opportunity to participate in this budget debate, particularly since I was among those members denied an opportunity to speak when the constitution was being discussed. The budget brought down last Tuesday, like the constitutional measure debated the week before, is an enormous deception launched upon the public to the accompaniment of great advertising—paid for by the taxpayers who are being deceived, with their own money. It distorts the true nature and impact of both the constitutional plans and the budgetary plans of the government. I want to take the opportunity now, Mr. Speaker, to speak for the concerns of my own riding, and to register dismay at the measures this House is being asked to approve.

I would note at the outset that my riding rejected the campaign promises of the Liberal party last February, wisely, as it turns out, because almost every promise of substance has been betrayed in this House in the past two weeks. I do not suppose for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that the voters of my riding elected me solely on my own account. I campaigned on the Crosbie budget. The voters of Huron-Bruce knew it and voted for it. We do not like high energy prices, but we accepted that they were necessary and we understood that the Crosbie budget had faced necessity honestly and squarely.

Huron-Bruce, Mr. Speaker, is a largely rural constituency lying along the shores of Lake Huron in southwestern Ontario. At one time the finest wheat in the world was grown in this part of Ontario; it was the breadbasket of the British empire. We no longer grow wheat in such a significant way because the enormous plains of western Canada have opened up new and bountiful wheatlands which contribute to the wealth of all Canadians. But we have no resentment that the west is now Canada's leading wheat region, for we have adapted and moved with the times. We now produce other crops and we have, by and large, thrived.

Our largest single crop now is corn for livestock feed, because Bruce county is Ontario's largest producer of beef, and Huron county is second. These two counties also are the largest producers of barley in Ontario, and among the leading producers of mixed grains. Apart from producing our own calves, we also use our excellent grasslands to finish western cattle for market, producing the distinctive flavour in beef for which the grasslands of this part of Ontario are particularly suited, and supplying Canadian tables with the lowest priced beef in the world.

But our agricultural economy is very mixed. Over half a million hogs were marketed from this area last year, as well as some $20 million worth of poultry, and $40 million worth of dairy produce. We also have our specialty crops. This year, Huron county, which is Canada's largest grower of white beans, produced about $40 million worth of these beans, the vast majority of the crop being exported and thus contributing to Canada's balance of trade.

There are also many vigorous towns in Huron-Bruce: Hensall, in the south, with its large elevator complexes, is a shipping centre for produce of many sorts. Brussels, in the centre, is the home of stockyards which are among the liveliest in the province. In the northeast the village of Formosa, famous for a century as the home of the famous Formosa springs and still remembered in Ontario for the quality of the beer produced using its waters, is now home to a new trout farming industry which will serve the restaurant industry of Ontario and its homes.

Just to the east of Formosa lie large gravel deposits that will in future make the village of Mildmay a major shipment centre and supplier of central Ontario's sand and gravel. In the northwest the riding rubs up against Kincardine and the Douglas Point nuclear power station. This area is now growing a new energy-efficient greenhousing industry, using the waste heat from the power plant, and in future the same location will attract other energy-consuming industries. In the southwest lies the Great Lakes port of Goderich, which not only ships grain to the world but is also a producer of widely exported road machinery, and is home to a mining operation that exports salt to the central markets of the United States through Chicago. This mine is now undergoing an expansion worth some $37 million, without a penny of federal assistance.

Elsewhere, in other small towns of the riding, small businesses struggle to survive or to become big businesses, producing farm equipment, auto parts, earthmoving machinery, textiles, and sailing craft. For these industries the federal government has done little. They survive, if they do, by the personal initiative of the people who work in them.

The federal government's most notable initiative since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office was to close down the Clinton airbase, which had been of major importance to the local economy, leaving behind nothing but empty buildings which now house some of the small businesses that have sprung from the people of the district.

The point I am making, Mr. Speaker, is that although the economy of my riding has prospered on its agricultural base, we have paid a price. We have been unable to develop and maintain a level of industry which could keep all our sons and daughters employed, and over the years a great many of them have gone elsewhere seeking a livelihood. As one result we in Huron-Bruce have always had strong links of kinship with the west. There have been migrations from our area to the west since the 1880s, first to open up the farmlands, and more recently to work in the cities and in the oil and gas fields.

We still have a vigorous economy, but we have remained vigorous by adapting and by exporting our surplus population to the cities of Ontario and to the west. This is our history. This government has not made it easy for us to develop our own industrial base, but we have never expected to thrive because the federal government grabbed someone else's resources for us. It would be far better for us if this government concentrated on helping us develop what we have so we can continue to flourish.

A couple of weeks ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stood in this House and told us about his own trip west long ago on the harvest excursion. That was a feature of life for which many of our farmers were grateful during the lean times. In cash-hungry times the west was a source of money by which many Ontario farming families survived. More recently, many of our sons and daughters have turned to the west and found a new home there without forgetting their old one. It is this kind of movement and link which helps create Canada's identity and strength. The links between farmers in Ontario and the west are strong. In the beef industry they get progressively stronger. No farmer who has seen his sons grow up and set up on their own believes you can have a happy family by trying to run your sons' operations as if they were yours.

We recognize that the west has never seriously asked the rest of Canada to pay world prices for oil and gas, as our American customers do. What the west has asked for is serious negotiation of fair prices and a chance to promote its own development. Westerners do not want a federal fund for western development because it is just an attempt to use their own money to tell them how to run their own development.

I do not suggest for a moment that people in my riding, or anywhere else in Ontario, like large increases in oil and gas prices. But they accept increases as necessary to promote conservation, industrial efficiency, and further development of our own resources. What they do not like, and what I hope they will not accept, is a federal government grab for the resources of any province or combination of provinces, so that the federal government can save itself from its own spending disasters.

Let me be clear on this, Mr. Speaker. All Canadians know by now what the people of my riding knew when they voted to accept the program of the Crosbie budget, namely, that the price of our fuels must rise. I think the vast majority of Canadians agree on the principle that Canadians should not have to pay world prices. I believe the great majority of westerners agree with that principle. But before the federal government tries to grab the resources of any province, I think most Canadians would like to see the government get its own financial house in order, without dropping a billion dollars here, and adding $2.7 billion to the debt there, resulting in a national debt now totalling $107 billion, with this year's interest alone at $1,390 per taxpayer.

In this budget we are presented with the picture of a federal government which has shown no clear evidence that it intended to negotiate seriously with the producing provinces on energy pricing. Instead, it is attempting to take matters into its own hands, deepening the divisions within the country. After all its efforts, energy prices are higher than those contained in the Crosbie budget, which hon. members over there said were too high. For utter bungling, Mr. Speaker, the government's management of energy pricing is equalled only by the cynicism of the constitutional resolution it rammed through the House two weeks ago. That measure so angered the provinces that six of them are taking the government to court. So that the Canadian people would not find out how far the government's constitutional proposal differed from what they said it was, the government made sure the constitutional proposals could not be amended in this House. They invoked closure so that the elected representatives of the people were prevented from discussing it here in the Parliament of Canada, before the debate had scarcely begun. All of this was accompanied by a manipulative advertising campaign designed to make Canadians believe the government was bringing home our constitution, instead of this weird concoction of the Prime Minister's, which is not our constitution but a bundle of new principles that he wants the British Parliament to pass for us so Canadians will not get a clear sense of what is happening.

The same kind of thinking underlies this budget, Mr. Speaker. The government campaigned on a promise to keep energy costs lower than those in the Crosbie budget, and it has the gall to suggest that it has kept those promises. I would like to draw attention to certain aspects of the budget where the government has broken its promises and betrayed the faith of those who were asked to elect it.

There are many issues I would like to touch on in this budget but one area I do not want to neglect is agriculture. Agriculture should not be neglected by any government in Canada, considering that fully one-quarter of our jobs comes from the food production sector. Yet agriculture is neglected by this government and this budget. Even worse, the very promises upon which this government campaigned for the votes of farmers in Canada have been betrayed. Let me quote the words of the present Minister of Agriculture when he sat in opposition last year. He said, as reported in Hansard at page 238, for October 16, 1979, the following:

—I say that in any country you want to check in the world—

And the hon. member continued:

—those who neglect agriculture make the rest of society suffer for that.

These words are wise and true. Everyone eats, and pays increased prices when the cost of food production rises. Yet this government has neglected agriculture, that very sector which the minister said we should not neglect.

Farmers are not fools. They noted the Liberal campaign promise to exempt fuels used in food production from excise tax. They will also note that the main effect of that exemption will be not so much to protect them as to protect consumers from the increase in food costs that would have been passed on. When farmers look at what this budget means to their own pocketbooks, they will see that over the next three of four years farmers will be paying the same increases for fuels for their personal use that all other Canadians are paying. For reasons I shall come to, farmers may well find themselves at a disadvantage compared with urban Canadians because they live beyond the range of natural gas lines.

The Minister of Agriculture when he was in opposition, as reported in Hansard for October 16, 1979, said that the cost of land had risen by 14 per cent the previous year, and he added, referring to the Clark government:

This, in itself, underscores the tremendous need for increased funding of the Farm Credit Corporation. This government should practise what it preaches and put up the money for an industry which benefits all Canadians. It is ripe for expansion.

The minister is back in office, Mr. Speaker, and the industry is still ripe for expansion. The minister was right when he said that if agriculture is neglected the whole of society suffers. But the minister has apparently had no effect in trying to convince his cabinet colleagues not to neglect agriculture.

Where is the extra money for the Farm Credit Corporation which the minister urged our government to find? The legislation to increase funding was ready two years ago when the minister was last in office. He helped defeat our government before we could bring it in, though he demanded it be brought in. Where is it now? Young farmers who would like to keep on farming are finding themselves unable to get credit to buy land. The minister takes pride in the favourable rates offered under the Farm Credit Act, but favourable rates mean nothing if the money is not there to lend.

This leads me to another point. In the Crosbie budget provision was made to allow small businesses to issue development bonds which would cut their cost of borrowing in half. Small business creates the vast majority of jobs in Canada. Both small business and the hundreds of thousands of Canadians unemployed need this provision. After defeating the Crosbie budget the present government reintroduced this provision in the April 21 mini-budget which was sneaked into the throne speech debate. This measure, after all, made sense, and was necessary if small business was to go on creating jobs. But legislation to give legal effect to this provision has never been introduced in this House. As a result, banks are unwilling to take up such bonds without a guarantee from the small business issuing them that they will pay the full commercial lending rates, or even more, if the government reneges on its commitment.

Therefore, small businesses are afraid to issue these bonds, for no business can afford to operate in that climate of risk under a government which has broken so many other promises. If the government were really serious about making this provision of the Crosbie budget available and usable, it would bring in the legislation giving it effect. Instead, it has announced a three-month extension of the period within which bonds can be issued. Thus a measure which is presently hampered by a lack of the confirming legislation is going to be hampered for a longer time than originally announced. The question is: when is it going to be made effective? This is the same kind of window-dressing and illusion as the Minister of Agriculture's farm credit, which is advertised at a favourable rate but is not available and usable.

Let me touch briefly on another aspect of the budget which will affect all Canadians when they buy their food, heat their own homes or rent heated homes, when they drive their cars, and when they take buses or trains. That is the aspect of fuel prices. Most Canadians accept the fact that fuel prices must rise. Of course, the price of everything dependent on fuel will rise too.

This budget does two things which will make it more difficult for a great many Canadians to cope with increased fuel costs than the Crosbie budget did. First of all, it eliminates the energy tax credit which would have amounted to $220 a year for the typical low or middle-income earner in my riding. Second, it builds in a number of incentives to encourage a switch from heating with oil to heating with natural gas, but it gives no help to those who cannot get access to that gas.

● (1720)

A strong penalty price is imposed on heating oil to make people want to switch away from it, and there are incentives to gas companies to extend their lines so that people can switch. But we have had natural gas for years in parts of my riding, and many small towns have wished the lines would be extended to them. Does the minister really believe that the small towns and farms of my riding, or for that matter, the small towns and farms of his own area in Cape Breton, will be served by gas in the near future? His attitude seems to be, "Let them chop wood", or in the case of his own riding, "Let them dig coal." While the lucky Canadians with gas wake up to warm houses, the unlucky in my riding and his will tumble out of bed shivering all winter to make their coal or wood fire. That seems to be the minister's attitude, for he has made oil prohibitively expensive and has given no tax credit to shield those who cannot get gas.

It would have been far better if the minister had phased in his penalty price for heating oil as and when gas became available, or had revived the Crosbie energy tax credit for those with no access to gas. But the minister has given us a budget that will raise heating oil by 77 cents a gallon by 1983, 16 cents a gallon more than the Crosbie budget, and with no tax relief.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me note how this budget has broken the government's promise to all Canadians that oil would rise this year less than $4 a barrel. The wellhead price of oil has risen by $3 a barrel this year, but in July the government added 75 cents a barrel at the refinery, and now in this budget another 80 cents a barrel, bringing the total price increase this year to $4.55 a barrel. That is not only greater than the $4 the Prime Minister promised to be below, but also greater than the increase announced in the Crosbie budget that the Prime Minister voted against. The Prime Minister's promise was not merely to keep the wellhead increase below $4 but to keep the total price increase below $4. My colleague, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), asked the Prime Minister this on May 1, and the Prime Minister repeated the member's question as he answered it. He said:

> He wants to know, when we say our price will be less than $4 a barrel increase, if we will try and make up for that "less" by some other taxes elsewhere. The answer to that is "no".

Well, now the answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. Despite the Prime Minister's repeated commitment, a barrel of oil now costs $4.55 more than at the end of last year. Gasoline, of course, has risen even more.

To conclude then, Mr. Speaker, this government has broken its promise to Canadians on oil prices, it has made a mockery of the small business development bonds, and it has introduced natural gas incentives that leave many Canadians penalized because they cannot switch to gas and they cannot get an energy tax credit. The Canadian Council on Social Development has said that this budget will have a devastating effect on low-income Canadians. Its executive director said, and I quote:

> Essentially they are having the same increase in energy costs, but they are not receiving the benefit of the energy tax rebate which was included in the previous budget, which would have off-set the energy cost by about $220 per year.

This council speaks from a position that cannot be accused of partisan bias, and it estimates that this budget will increase the cost burden on average Canadian families by $500 more a year than the Crosbie budget. In rural areas where gas is not available, the costs, I would add, may be even higher.

This is not what we were promised, Mr. Speaker, when this government sought election. It is a sad reminder of the many times in the past when Canadians have been deceived by this government, which seeks power at all costs, through manipulation of public opinion, and now through an undermining of Canada's provinces which stand out against this kind of manipulation.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on a passing note before I start, I wonder if the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Cardiff) has explained to his farmers about whom he spoke so eloquently during the last few minutes, that a farmer using 6,000 gallons of diesel fuel a year over a four-year period would pay over $8,000 more for that diesel fuel under the Crosbie budget than he is going to pay under our budget. I wonder if he told his farmers that.

I rise today, not only to speak in support of this budget but to address myself to some of the more basic principles that have become part of this debate. This budget, and the accompanying national energy policy in particular, are much more than a mere accounting exercise or a simple statement of how government intends to raise money and how government intends to spend money. What we have before this House is a revolutionary gutsy plan of action to break the stranglehold that a small number of powerful foreign multinational oil companies have had on the collective throats of the Canadian people for too long.

Oil and gas energy is as fundamental and as basic to our individual existence or collective existence as is oxygen or water. Without an assured and a reasonably priced supply of energy, we as a society, whether it be as a farmer, fisherman in my riding, housewife or businessman, simply cannot function. Simply put, energy is too important a commodity to be placed today solely in the self-serving hands of foreign, powerful multinational oil and gas companies. The people of this country recognize that. They have known it for years. They have grown impatient waiting for the government to act.

In the last election my party promised to Canadianize to a substantial degree our oil and gas industry. We promised the taxpayers that they, through Petro-Canada, would have a substantially bigger share in this country's oil and gas reserves. We are delivering on those promises, not only because we gave our word but because to do anything less during these troubled times, these times of great turmoil in the Middle East, would be an historic and dramatic betrayal of the people of this country. We have it within our power today to be self-sufficient in energy if we plan now to be no longer at the mercy of the oil companies in the Middle East whose only concerns are profits.

There are a number of schools of thought on how Canada can obtain self-sufficiency. One line of thought proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the Conservative party is that the Government of Canada should continue to give untold millions of dollars to foreign-owned and controlled oil and gas companies. We are told we should trust those foreigners to spend that money wisely to look for new supplies of oil and gas.

Better still, or worse still, however you look at it, we are told we should trust those foreign oil companies to charge Canadians a fair and just price for gasoline and home heating fuel. Frankly, I do not for one second trust those foreign oil and gas companies as far as I can throw them, and that is not very far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: They have demonstrated time and time again that the concern of one lonely Canadian like myself is but water off their backs. I have two questions for the hon. member for St. John's West, for members opposite or anyone else in this House or in this land who would be naive enough to suggest that we, as Canadians, should leave our energy future in the hands of the multinationals. Whose interests will they serve in the crunch? Yours and mine, or the board of directors?

Second, where do Canadian consumers stand in their list of priorities? The answers are obvious, or should be obvious to all reasonable men, at least. Their priorities are profits, and when it comes to the crunch they will not be thinking about the people of Canada, those in Newfoundland, British Columbia or Alberta.

Here are just a few of the positive measures contained in the national energy program tabled in this House by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on October 28. Our policy is based on three sound and fundamental principles. We will ensure security of supply and ultimately energy independence for this country. Our target date is 1990. We will provide the opportunity for Canadians to participate in energy industries, especially in the oil and gas sector, and we will ensure fairness in pricing and sharing of revenues not only among governments but also within the industry.

● (1730)

I will be specific about some of our goals. While we recognize that oil imports may rise somewhat for the next few years, our plan would see those imports of oil from the Middle East dramatically decrease, and by 1990 our imports would reach zero.

Mr. King: Do you want to bet?

Mr. Tobin: We would ensure Canadianization. That is the plan. Certainly no man is fool enough, as some would suggest, to try to know everything which can possibly happen in this world, but we are man enough and we care enough at least to have a plan, at least to try, and at least not to lie down and die nor to be the trained parrots of foreign multinationals. That we will not do. I can assure the hon. member of that.

Second, our goal is Canadianization of the petroleum industry which is now dominated by foreign interests, and that goal will be actively pursued through programs designed to achieve at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990. We will provide direct incentive payments for oil and gas exploration, and that development program will be structured to favour investment by Canadian companies and Canadians who live anywhere in this country.

A final and important aspect of our policy is that producing provinces will continue to have a share of oil and gas revenues.

Mr. King: You are all heart.

Mr. Tobin: Listen carefully. That share is higher than in any other state or province in any other petroleum-producing nation in this world. I will give one example. Under our formula the province of Alberta will have revenues of $100 billion between 1980 and 1990.

Mr. McDermid: It should; it owns the resources.

Mr. Tobin: As a young lad from Newfoundland I cannot find any way to say that that is not reasonable nor fair. It appears perfectly reasonable to me. I think about our $2.5 billion debt, and this looks very reasonable. I do not begrudge Alberta that revenue. It is right and proper, and I certainly feel it is fair, and as a Newfoundlander I too look forward to the day when my province can maximize the benefits of offshore oil and gas.

As I said earlier, these measures are gutsy and revolutionary as far as the oil and gas industry in Canada is concerned. Because this government is in effect taking power out of the hands of the multinational oil and gas companies and giving that power back to the people of Canada, we expected a strong reaction from those powerful multinationals which would rather carry on as they always have, answerable and accountable to nobody but their shareholders and their boards of directors. Can it possibly be a surprise to anybody in this House that the big oil giants, whether they be Gulf, Shell, Imperial or Mobil, one after another have been muttering their displeasure at this government for our new initiatives on behalf of the people of Canada? Does it surprise anybody that these same companies could be brazen-faced enough, as we say in Newfoundland, to try to convince the people of Canada that it is not in Canada's best interests for Canadians to control Canadian oil and gas companies?

As incredible as that sounds, that is exactly what they are trying to convince the people of Canada. They are trying to convince us that it is not in our best interests to take control of our own oil and gas resources. We expected that kind of reaction, and I can assure hon. members that the people of Canada expected that kind of reaction, but what we did not expect was to witness the unholy spectacle of the hon. member for St. John's West standing in his place in this House—

Mr. McDermid: And being honest with the Canadian people.

Mr. Tobin: —and spouting off the line, the arguments, the concerns and the fears of foreign oil and gas companies. He did so like a trained parrot. I have always felt that the mouth of the hon. member for St. John's West was somewhat like an unguided missile. Neither he nor anyone else in this House ever knows what he is going to say next. I suggest he is still shell-shocked by the bomb he dropped on December 13.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Because of the wit and unpredictability of the hon. member for St. John's West we have all enjoyed his humour on occasion in this House. He is a funny man, but this is no laughing matter. I want to tell hon. members that the hon. member for St. John's West said on October 29 in this House, and I quote from Hansard:

> This is an interventionist budget on a massive scale. Now they are going to take power from the private sector. The oil and gas sector is no longer to be called private. If it is private, its privacy has been vastly interfered with.

I regret that the hon. member for St. John's West feels that the privacy of his powerful, foreign, bosom buddies may be interfered with, but we on this side of the House are more concerned about the privacy, the dignity and the way of life of the Canadian people than we are about maintaining the immoral profit levels of the foreign multinational oil and gas companies operating in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: In case there is any doubt left in the mind of the hon. member for St. John's West, let me confirm what he already suspects. This is indeed an interventionist budget. It is a budget which intervenes on behalf of and for the benefit of the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: It is a budget which tips the balance of power in favour of the people of this country. It is a budget and a national energy program which break the stranglehold which foreign multinationals have had on the throats of the people of this country. It is an energy policy made in Canada for Canadians by Canadians, and not dictated to us by some board room in the United States or Europe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: In case hon. members opposite have not already figured it out, we on this side of the House are proud of that budget, and we are proud of that energy program.

Mr. McDermid: Talk about Norcen.

Mr. Tobin: The hon. member for St. John's West, his colleague on the back bench who is hollering to himself, the Conservative party or its buddies in the oil industry would not understand that kind of pride. No, in their fanatic dedication to free enterprise, at any cost, hon. members opposite would sell this country's future down the river in order to ensure that some foreign company's books in the United States or Europe or somewhere else in the world, balance at the end of the year. It was that same kind of fanaticism which led members of the Conservative party to the brilliant conclusion when they were in government that the right thing to do was not to increase Canadian ownership and control of our natural resources but to wipe out totally the little control and ownership we had. Yes, the hon. member for St. John's West and the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) were going to sell Petro-Canada and pass its assets over to their foreign bosom buddies.

Mr. McDermid: That is a lie.

Mr. Tobin: However, we on this side of the House and, I am sure, the people of Canada, thank our lucky stars that their visit to this side of the House was so short that no serious damage was done.

What do the people of Canada think about Petro-Canada? A recent Gallup poll indicated that Canadian support of Petro-Canada is not only still very strong but also that that support is growing dramatically. Today more than 82 per cent of Canadians want Petro-Canada involved in exploration for oil and gas. That is up seven percentage points from last year. A solid majority of our people would like to see Petro-Canada continue buying oil and gas internationally. That percentage is 61 per cent today versus 57 per cent a year ago. And 62 per cent of the people of this country want to see Petro-Canada sell oil and gas at the retail level.

What does the Conservative party say about the feelings of the people of Canada? Hon. members opposite respond by putting forward trained parrots, one after another, who come to the defence not of the Canadian people but of the poor, helpless, foreign multinationals. The head trained parrot, the hon. member for St. John's West, predicted in his speech on October 29 that the people of Canada would, and I quote, "erect statues throughout Canada to Clark and Crosbie". Well, if there ever is a monument erected to "foot and mouth disease", I can assure the hon. member that statues will be erected, but not until somebody gets that bright idea! I hope someone in this vast country—I know many are listening to me now—will take up that suggestion. I will be the first to donate to that monument.

We have delivered, in our budget and in our energy program, what we promised in the election. It may bring some comfort to the hon. member for St. John's West in particular to know that it was not only the budget he produced that caused their defeat. No, it was the callous and cynical approach that hon. members opposite took with regard to the Canadian people that caused their downfall.

People's memories are not short, Mr. Speaker. Some people in the House, I am sure, particularly on that side, would like to believe that is so but people's memories are not short. They remember that it was the party opposite which promised decreased taxes, low unemployment, a stimulative deficit and other goodies while in opposition, only to deliver just the opposite after they formed the government on May 22, 1979.

The party opposite is the party whose finance minister explained to the Canadian people that surely no one expected the PC party to live up to its election campaign promises. "Surely", explained the hon. member for St. John's West, once he had the heady taste of power—my God, I am beginning to sound like the Leader of the Opposition—"you did not honestly expect us to deliver on our promises and to keep our word." Well, hon. members opposite received the collective answer of the Canadian people on February 18. The people expected the Conservatives to keep their word. They trusted them once, but no more. The Canadian people made a wise choice on February 18, and the numbers show that.

Let us compare the so-called Crosbie budget to the MacEachen budget with respect to gasoline prices. The prices vary, of course, from province to province in accordance with provincial sales taxes. However, for this comparison I will use the base rate. At the end of 1981 the people of Canada would have been paying $1.56 a gallon for gas under the Crosbie budget. Under the new budget they will only pay $1.36 a gallon That is a saving of 20 cents a gallon in the first year alone. In the second year, at the end of 1982, the Crosbie budget would have pushed the price up to $1.75 a gallon. Our projections now show that price at only $1.53 a gallon That is a saving of 22 cents a gallon. But in 1983 the savings become even more dramatic. By the end of 1983 the Crosbie price for a gallon of gas would have risen to $2.32 a gallon, and our projected price shows the price to be only $1.71, that is, our price will save the people of Canada 61 cents a gallon. By the end of 1984 the Canadian people will be paying 68 cents less per gallon because of the MacEachen budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Under your budget we will be walking.

Mr. Tobin: My, oh my! Somebody throw some peanuts, please. I would much appreciate it because it would occupy the monkeys on the other side.

There will also be dramatic savings for the people of Canada in home heating oil prices. The projected base price for the consumer, under the Crosbie budget in 1984, would have been $1.96 a gallon. Our proposal will see home heating oil cost at a maximum of $1.51 a gallon, or a saving of 45 cents per gallon for the people of this country.

Under our budget and the national energy program, several programs and initiatives are introduced which will greatly benefit the people in my constituency, the people of Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe, and the people of Newfoundland in general. In terms of their personal taxes, the people of Newfoundland and Labrador welcome the announcement of the Minister of Finance of full indexing on their 1981 income tax. This indexing of 9.8 per cent on the personal exemptions and tax bracket limits will ensure that lower and middle-income families will not be forced into higher tax brackets. This measure will provide substantial savings to all Canadian taxpayers and will allow them to keep pace with the rise in the cost of living.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the full indexing will mean that in 1981 the basic personal exemption will increase by an additional $280 to $3,170, and the allowable exemptions for a typical family of four with two children under 18 will rise by $630 to $7,130. For example, a married person with two dependants under 18, with an income of $11,000 in 1981, will save approximately $179 because of full indexing, as opposed to an unindexed income.

I notice that hon. members opposite have become quiet. I can only assume that for the first time they cut out the rhetoric and are learning something. Perhaps they have acquired some appreciation of this budget which does as we promised. It helps those first who need help most.

In 1981 as well, Mr. Speaker, the child tax credit will provide even greater savings for Newfoundlanders. It will rise from $238 per child in 1980 to $261 per child in 1981. And, good news for all, the income threshold above which the child tax credit benefits are reduced also will rise from $21,380 to $23,470.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: This increase will ensure that a greater number of families in Newfoundland and elsewhere who need the tax credit most will continue to benefit. In Newfoundland, in 1978 for example, there were 81,113 claims for the child tax credit and the average claim was approximately $433. In 1981, with the increases provided in our budget, the average claim in Newfoundland will rise to over $500.

The national energy program introduced by our government will benefit Canadians right across the country, but it provides some special initiatives for the people in Newfoundland. Recognizing my province's dependence on oil, the government is attempting to lower consumption in the province by ensuring that oil is used in the most efficient way. Newfoundlanders will be eligible to apply for grants under the new super-retrofit program. By providing grants up to a maximum of $800 to cover 50 per cent of the eligible costs, the government is urging Newfoundlanders to ensure that their homes are energy efficient. The moneys from this grant can be used to retrofit oil furnaces with devices which will mean lower consumption, and encourage further conservation with the use of additional insulation. In fact simply by retrofitting their oil furnaces with nozzles, retention heads and solenoid valves, the people of Newfoundland will be able to achieve 20 per cent savings in fuel.

On top of this Newfoundlanders will also be eligible for further grants under CHIP, providing them with grants of up to $500 to assist them in insulating their homes. This government has ensured that more Canadians will benefit from CHIP by increasing the budget for the program from $80 million annually to $265 million annually.

As you can see, contrary to what hon. members opposite would like the people of Canada to believe, our budget does help first those who need most. Our gas prices will be lower than those proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West, and so will home heating costs. Further savings in home heating costs will be experienced by those who take advantage of the government's grants under both the super-retrofit program and CHIP. As well, Canadians will be able to keep pace with inflation because of full indexing. We have stuck to our commitments.

I should like to add as well that we have introduced a measure in particular for my part of the world, and for all parts of Canada where unemployment is high. It will create jobs in this country. Our budget introduces the 50 per cent investment tax credit for selected capital projects in areas of high unemployment. This is a dramatic step taken by the government to provide more jobs in those areas most in need. The program has been highly praised, for example, by Mr. Harvey Webber, president of the Atlantic Canada Plus Association. He views the tax credit as:

An important step to self-reliance and a chance in a lifetime to expand our manufacturing and processing industries.

I am happy to say that, from all indications, practically my whole riding will be eligible for this 50 per cent tax investment credit.

● (1750)

As well, the government is providing—and this is an important measure for Newfoundland—an equity contribution of up to $200 million to support hydro development on the lower Churchill River in Labrador. As well, the government will provide credit support to ensure that debt financing for the development can be obtained at acceptable rates. The hydro development in Labrador means a great deal to the people of my riding, the people of Newfoundland, and particularly the people of Labrador.

At the present time 40 per cent of Newfoundland's electric power comes from expensive oil-fired electricity plants. Oil consumption by the Holyrood power plant near St. John's will cost the people of Newfoundland $50 million this year at the subsidized rate. When the lower Churchill hydro development comes on stream, Newfoundland will immediately be able to shut down the oil-fired plant and will no longer be dependent upon costly oil for the generation of electricity. That power is brought down to help, first, the people of Newfoundland. Also Newfoundland will benefit financially from the exporting of some of the power generated from the lower Churchill development. But I say again that the power should be developed first for the benefit of Labradorians and Newfoundlanders. I realize the details will have to be worked out by the premier of our province, Premier Peckford, in consultation with the federal government.

Following on that line of thought there is another matter on which I want to set the record straight before taking my seat. The government and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) have said time and time again that the Government of Canada will take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that when new Labrador hydro power comes on stream, my province will be able to move that power across the province of Quebec to our markets. Despite what some provincial politicians are saying, that is the commitment of the government, the commitment of the Prime Minister of Canada, and the commitment I give to my constituents in Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe. The ball is now in Premier Peckford's court. It is up the Premier of Newfoundland and his government, with the financial assistance of the federal government, to find markets for Labrador power in our own province and elsewhere, and to bring a solid proposal to the Government of Canada. The people of Newfoundland have had enough words and constant partisan political bickering. I say in good conscience to Premier Peckford, it is time to show some good will; let us cut out the rhetoric and get on with the job together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, listening to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat reminded me of the preacher who happened to leave his notes on the pulpit after the service was over. Someone glanced at them and saw the words, "argument weak, yell loudly". That is what came to my mind when I listened to the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin). Apparently he believes what he said because he endeavoured in the best way possible to substantiate his arguments, but in actual fact I think they leave a great deal to be desired.

In preparing for participation in this debate I was reminded of the opening words of a delgate from Samoa to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Conference in Jamaica some years ago. He opened his speech with these words:

Following the custom in my country, I would first want to thank our heavenly Father for His goodness.

Perhaps it would be well for us to realize and acknowledge that, in comparison to the needs of many, many people around the world, Canada has been signally blessed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: I am sure many people who have come to us from other parts of the world would give witness to that fact as well.

Just a few days ago I noticed on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen a reference to one of the families brought into this country because of the serious problems in southeast Asia. This family was hardly able to grasp the fact that there could be so much to enjoy in a country. They could hardly believe the goods available as they walked up and down the streets. The friendliness of the people was such that it caused them to stand in amazement and wonderment that there was a place in the world as good as Canada.

The fact we are now discussing serious and urgent problems cannot be blamed upon an unkind providence. But I believe they are the result of our inability to devise a system which would enable society to develop and utilize our abundance for the common good. Canada is uniquely blessed and endowed with vast reservoirs of natural resources, manpower which is critically underutilized, and the energies, skills, will and enterprise to transform those resources into needed and desired products for the benefit of Canadians, and also a significant surplus to assist in meeting the requirements of others around the world.

We all remember the spirit of 1967 when Canadians were urged to let down their hair and celebrate 100 years of history. As we remember, the result was a great program all across the country, a promotional program which resulted in demonstrations, building projects, excitement, concerts, and a new awareness of what Canada was all about. At that time the satisfaction was real; the expectations were high as we faced the second century. But the question now is: what has happened? Instead of a buoyant and vibrant economy and happy, optimistic and enthusiastic people, we have a no-growth economy and a population which is uncertain, apprehensive and disturbed.

In addition, instead of having a spirit of unity and harmony in this nation from sea to sea, the country is divided and struggling to maintain its equilibrium. What has happened over those few years?

Perhaps when I resume the debate tomorrow we will be able to consider this further.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CALL FOR INCREASE IN PRICE OF WHEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. With the substantial increase in the price of hard wheat and durum on the world market, and given the cost-price squeeze with which farmers are faced, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the initial price of wheat be increased to $6.25 a bushel on hard wheat and $8 a bushel on durum wheat.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

MEASURES TO CONSERVE SALMON STOCKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent necessity. Whereas the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has announced stringent new fishing regulations which affect commercial salmon fishermen on the west coast of Canada, yet for undisclosed reasons he has failed to place corresponding limitations on the large unlicensed charter boat operators who provide a fisherman's paradise for hundreds of well-to-do foreign tourists, allowing them to take hundreds of thousands of pounds of salmon from British Columbia waters each year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That, in the interest of conserving our fast-dwindling stocks of Pacific coast salmon and in the interest of equity, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans be required to implement measures immediately which will restrain the impact of recreational charter boat operations on salmon stocks; such measures to include a system of licensing, gear restrictions, seasonal closures and catch limits commensurate with the restrictions which have already been placed upon other persons who earn their income through fishing.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LOUIS RIEL

CALL FOR POSTHUMOUS PARDON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the trial and execution of Louis Riel has been condemned and damned by scholars throughout Canada, and whereas he was a fighter for the Métis and led the protest against indifference toward the western provinces on the part of the Canadian government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House do justice to Louis Riel and all Métis throughout Canada by granting him a posthumous pardon, settling this matter once and for all.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

FUNDING OF TRIDENT AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and hope I will receive unanimous consent for my resolution. Because of the promise of the Liberal party during the last election, with the help of the NDP, to refinance the Trident Aircraft company of Sidney, British Columbia, a commitment obviously intended to unseat the incumbent Progressive Conservative in the riding of Esquimalt-Saanich, an effort which obviously failed, and because the company has now closed its doors again for lack of economic viability, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

S.O. 43

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce be required to make a statement on motions explaining why, aside from bare-faced political chicanery and expediency, the government decided to go on financing from public funds a project which long since had shown itself to lack economic viability.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

CALL FOR REVIEW OF POSITION ON CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of positions taken by some premiers and the Leader of the Opposition that the original idea behind confederation was to ensure a double majority for constitutional changes which, if followed to its logical conclusion, would undermine the concept of parliamentary supremacy which has been accepted as a principle by Canadians for 113 years and would lead to a system of government akin to that of the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni):

That this House urges the official opposition to review immediately its constitutional position so as to ensure that it is not advocating for Canada creeping republicanism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: There is unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is moved by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters), seconded by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni):

That this House urges the official opposition to review immediately its constitutional position so as to ensure that it is not advocating for Canada creeping republicanism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

● (1410)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, thank you for recognizing me—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am not familiar with this situation and I am wondering if the hon. member who proposed the motion—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Madam Speaker. You had recognized the Leader of the Opposition.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I want to ascertain who has the first right to speak.

Mr. Clark: Surely it is the person who has been recognized.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member who moved the motion sat down and did not seek the floor to speak. I therefore recognize the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We will not have much time to debate this motion now but there are some very important matters which should be put before the House and the people of Canada.

The motion suggests that there should be a review of the constitutional position taken by one party in this House. I would devoutly hope that there will be a review taken by the Liberal party of the policy they are forcing on many of their members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I say this particularly since the motion was apparently motivated by a desire to protect the parliamentary principle. What we are interested in here is the defence of the principle of the supremacy of Parliament in two ways. One way, of course, is to have the Parliament of Canada and our partner parliaments in the legislative assemblies across the country maintain their right to make decisions in the spirit of the partnership upon which this federalism is based and not to have those rights eroded and run around by use of the instrument of a national referendum. This could undermine the essence of Canadian federalism by writing out of any agreement on constitutional change the elected legislatures and governments of any of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The second matter which deeply concerns us here is in relation to the rights of Parliament and our ability particularly to deal with constitutional change—

[Translation]

—and the determination of the Liberal government and party to deny Parliament, here in the House of Commons and in committees, the right to hold public meetings, the opportunity to have a full discussion on all options dealing with the constitution, the basic Canadian legislation. The joint committee on the constitution has advised us today, as we know, Madam Speaker, of a decision to deny Canadians the right of stating their own views on the Canadian Constitution, on the constitutional resolution introduced by the Canadian government.

In the first place, closure was imposed by the Canadian Parliament. We have now double closure in the joint committee. Secondly, an impossible schedule has been set for the committee. Thirdly, the Liberal party has shown today that it is determined to deny Canadians the right to see directly on television or hear directly on radio the proceedings of a joint committee dealing with the most basic and essential issue in our country, that is, the constitution. This, Madam Speaker, is unacceptable to our party as champion of the rights of the Parliament of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Under Standing Order 15(2), as it is now 2.15 p.m. I must interrupt the debate.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—TELEVISING AND BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will know of the publication today, apparently for the first time, of a letter dated August 13, 1980, from Madam Speaker to the chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, a committee of this House, stating explicitly, that "the committees are without authority to broadcast their proceedings". The Prime Minister will recall that he told this House and I, apparently based on error, the contrary not many days ago in this House when he said that the committees were masters of their own proceedings.

Madam Speaker has ruled that in the matter of broadcasting, the committees are not the masters of their own proceedings. Clearly, then, the only way in which the people of Canada can have an opportunity to see and hear the discussion on the Constitution of Canada is for the government to take a decision in policy to initiate an amendment to a motion of this House, which my party, and I am sure the NDP, would accept and approve without debate, that would allow the full televising and full radio coverage of the joint committee proceedings on the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the Prime Minister, therefore, relates to the policy of the government. Will the government initiate action immediately to ensure that the proceedings of the constitutional committee will be televised and broadcast?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not want to presume to intervene in the matter that has been raised relating to a letter you allegedly wrote to one of the members. But I submit for your consideration and, perhaps, conveyance to the Leader of the Opposition that that is not a ruling of the House, that the doctrine of this House, as I understand it and as has been explained to me by the President of the Privy Council, is that, indeed, the committee is master of its proceedings. As far as I know it is against the rules to discuss matters which have been discussed in committee while they are pending until the report is made.

Mr. Kempling: Another gag.

Mr. Trudeau: I hear the whip of the Conservative party saying "another gag". I am prepared to hear argument on this matter. I am not an expert in procedure and I doubt whether the whip who is opposite me is an expert. But the point, as I stated, Madam Speaker, is that perhaps the Leader of the Opposition should address to you the question: Was that a ruling that you conveyed to a private member in a letter, or is the rule of this House that committees are masters of their own procedures?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, you and I both know that it is outside the rules of this House to put a question to you on this matter, although you will probably have an opportunity to decide later. We have here a clear difference in the interpretation in the rules of Parliament between the Speaker of the House of Commons, writing in an official capacity to the chairman of a special committee of the House of Commons, and the government House leader.

Let me ask a question of the Prime Minister which is, admittedly, hypothetical. In the event that it is determined that Madam Speaker is right and the government House leader is wrong, will the Government of Canada agree to initiate immediately proceedings that will ensure that the deliberations of the joint committee on the constitution will be televised and broadcast live, so that Canadians can know what is going on with regard to their constitution in a committee of this House and the Senate?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, the question is hypothetical, and I think it is also somewhat offensive since it presumes on a ruling which you have not yet given. As to the substance of the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, I point out to him that one can hardly say that a committee has been gagged when the entire press of the country can be present. The matter of televising or not televising is certainly not one which involves freedom of speech or freedom of the press. It is a matter that I understand the committee has decided in one way after I, at this place in the House, indicated last week that I had no preference one way or the other, and that I thought that the committee should be left free to decide.

• (1420)

An hon. Member: Don't weasel around; make a decision.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think the facts will show that I am not a member of that committee, that I have in no way influenced it in one direction or another—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear a lot of "oh's" from the other side. If any single member had even the inkling of a clue to the fact that I had indicated any preference to any committee member, I wish he would stand in his place and contradict me.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated that the committee had decided. The House and the country know that the Liberal party had decided to vote against television and radio coverage of the committee proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the Prime Minister another question. Could he tell me and this House of Commons on what date he, or the government House leader, or the Minister of Justice, or any other minister, first became aware of the contents of the letter dated August 13 to the Liberal member of Parliament for Don Valley East, the chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped? On what date did the knowledge of the contents of this letter dated August 13 become known to any minister of the Crown?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition in the preamble to his question indicated that the Liberal party had decided, if I had not. I fail to see how the Leader of the Opposition can draw that inference if I tell this House that there was no decision on my part and certainly none on the part of cabinet. Members, of course, are free to indicate their preference, but I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition and to every member opposite that it is the Liberal party as a government, after, I would say, years of dragging their feet by the Tories, which moved to bring television to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What date did you say—

Mr. Trudeau: As to the—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: I was going to remind the Prime Minister of the question, but perhaps he is going to answer it. What I want to know is—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Two people cannot have the floor at the same time.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Did the Right Hon. Prime Minister have something to add to that answer?

Mr. Trudeau: I had, Madam Speaker, but if he prefers—

Madam Speaker: Then I will recognize the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: My question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister is, on what date did he or any minister of the Crown become aware for the first time of the contents of the letter dated August 13, 1980, to the Liberal member of Parliament for Don Valley East, the chairman of the Special Committee of this House on the Disabled and the Handicapped?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I cannot speak for every member of cabinet but I can be quite precise in my answer to the Leader of the Opposition. It was exactly at 2.20 on November 6, 1980.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—PRESENTATION OF INTERIM REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council, and indicate to him that the entire press is not allowed into that committee; television and radio are not allowed in but, more importantly, Canadians are not allowed to view the proceedings of that committee either.

On October 29, 1980, at page 4214 of Hansard, in reply to my question about the proceedings of the committee the President of the Privy Council said the following:

> —and that in this House we cannot decide any procedural question concerning the committee, unless we get a report from committees.

I should like to ask the minister if it is his interpretation that, should an interim report have been presented requesting the permission of the House to broadcast the proceedings of the committee on television and radio, that that, in fact, would have ended the life of the joint committee?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the question has two faults: first, it is hypothetical and, second, it requests an opinion. I wonder how I could possibly answer a question that is so much out of order.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, a supplementary question for the President of the Privy Council. This is not hypothetical. The matter did come up and it would obviously influence the work of the committee. Because of that interpretation, I should like to quote from Beauchesne, at page 193, citation 591:

> A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House.

My question relates to an interim report. Is it the policy of this government that, had a report been tabled in this House, in fact its members would be instructed to vote against it on the basis that the committee would end?

• (1425)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, obviously, the question being the same, it would be ridiculous of me to contradict myself and give a reply other than the one I just gave. But may I be allowed, through the question, to indicate to the Leader of the Opposition who questioned the Right Hon. Prime Minister about the matter that, as far as I am concerned, since he mentioned my name in his question, I have never read the letter he referred to; I only learned of it at two o'clock on November 6, 1980.

[English]

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PROCEEDINGS WILL BE TELEVISED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The government House leader said in this House on October 24 that the committee would have the right to decide whether or not to have television, and the Speaker has ruled that she does not have the authority to authorize the use of television unless the House gives her that authority. Therefore, considering the historical importance of this constitutional debate and the right of the people of Canada, through television, to witness this debate, will the Prime Minister assure the House that the government will bring in a motion later today authorizing that committee to televise its proceedings?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that seems to be an exact repetition of the question asked by the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is referring to what the Leader of the New Democratic Party calls a ruling, which I have stated is not a ruling in my view. Perhaps the hon. member's seatmate can tell us if it is a ruling when the Speaker writes a letter, of which none of us seems to have any knowledge on this side, or very few of us anyhow that I see around me. Therefore, I do not conceive how the official opposition can seriously maintain that a ruling has been brought down when just about nobody on this side of the House knows of its existence.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Here it is.

Mr. Clark: Is Smith a nobody too?

Mr. Trudeau: I see the bearded one over there wanting to get the floor, and maybe you should give him the floor, Madam Speaker, if he wants to ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that that answer is not only nonsense, but it was pedantic nonsense of the worst kind.

Since the referendum some of us in the country representing all three political parties across the land have been prepared to put aside petty politics to create a package for constitutional change which might unite this country. Would the Prime Minister not agree, apart from substance in effecting constitutional change, process in a democracy is just as important?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If the Prime Minister agrees with that, why is he refusing now to say the people of Canada are going to be permitted the right to see one of the most important debates in the history of our country on television?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I find it objectionable that the hon. member asked his first question in terms of a so-called ruling that has not been given and asked me to base a position of the government on a ruling that does not exist. If he wants to term that pedantic, that is his right. But it would have been less pedantic on his part if he had asked a question without prefacing it with a falsehood.

In so far as my position and that of the government is concerned, it is that the committee can decide what it wants. If hon. members feel very strongly about it, they have representatives on this committee. I am sure they can reopen the question if they want. I am not a member of it. I am abiding by the rules of this House—

An hon. Member: You gag your own gang.

Mr. Trudeau: —in not giving instructions to that committee.

Mr. Clark: Not as the Speaker interprets them.

Mr. Trudeau: I believe that in every other circumstance members opposite would want me to conduct myself in that way.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, we have just witnessed at this time, the complete abdication of national leadership, which is so important in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that only one Liberal on that committee, the hon. member for Lincoln, who was widely reported to have been considered to be named chairman of the committee, favoured television and public debate, will the Prime Minister at last admit the truth that it was his government and his Liberal party which decided that television is not to be used, and that the people of Canada are going to be shut out from this important debate?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman suggests that I admit the truth. I have been telling the truth on this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I really find that offensive.

Mr. Clark: You find the truth offensive?

Mr. Trudeau: No, I find the small and petty attitude of the Leader of the Opposition offensive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Lincoln is as loyal a Liberal as can be found in this House at any time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I can tell the House that the fact that he voted contrary to other Liberal members on that committee is proof of two things; first, that the members are not gagged and, second, that the members were free to vote in the way they wanted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Baa, baa!

AIR TRANSPORT

GENERAL AVIATION SERVICES LTD.—LANDING FEES AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, while I am loth to change the subject, my question is for the Minister of Transport. For the past five to ten years the Department of Transport has adopted an adversary position with regard to General Aviation. Can the minister tell me whether it is his policy or only that of his director of aviation administration when a $5 landing fee is applied to General Aviation landings at major airports, obviously as a deterrent; when no program of support is available for important secondary airports such as Boundary Bay and Toronto Island; when General Aviation aircraft are prevented from landing on available parallel strips to reduce congestion when the practice is common elsewhere in North America; when no formal appeal procedure is allowed when a pilot is given a medical rejection; when DOT regulations are so prohibitive that the U.S. has 60 times as many instrument-rated pilots per capita as Canada and all are allowed to fly in Canadian airspace; when DOT requires encoding altimeters above 14,000 feet, but to put them in is maddeningly unreasonable; and finally when important safety items such as ELTs are treated so casually as to cost lives?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously the head of the department is the minister, and I am responsible for the decisions.

Mr. Ellis: Will the minister tell me why he allows all of these things to take place when, by consultation with available and knowledgeable associations in the aviation field, he could be a support to General Aviation rather than an adversary?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I can only take one of these questions. It has to do with landing fees. I presume that was the first question I was asked. It has to do with landing fees for General Aviation in four of the larger airports in Canada. The purpose is simply to have everyone make a proper contribution to the maintenance of these airports. I looked into this in depth and I found that this is the first increase in the last two years. I also found in similar instances in the United States, for example, that the cost of landing fees goes up to $50 as opposed to the $5 my department charges. Therefore, it was a judgment call and the minister made it.

INCREASED SERVICE DEMANDS IN WESTERN AND PACIFIC AIR REGIONS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the very serious difficulties being experienced by the management of the western air region and, indeed, the Pacific air region as a result of increased service demands caused by a very dramatic increase in traffic. Traffic has increased by some 32 per cent over the last two years, generated revenues from these two regions have increased 100 per cent, yet the region is hampered by its inability to provide adequate services and parking facilities because of inadequate financial resources and centralized bureaucratic control. Is the minister aware of this serious situation that has developed, and what is he doing or contemplating doing about it?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am very much aware of this. The Minister of Finance stated the other day that I had asked him to raise the air transport tax. In return, he promised he would add that revenue to my budget for that particular responsibility in my department. I am now asking cabinet for more money for investment in airports. I will be very pleased to send the hon. member the list of expenditures made in western airports—Edmonton, Calgary, Regina and so on.

Mr. Mazankowski: While I appreciate the good intentions of the minister, there are some very immediate and urgent problems which require attention, such as basic maintenance, snow removal and parking. Plans were laid for these some time ago, but for some reason or other they have been withdrawn. Can the minister undertake if he intends any relaxation, that he will provide the respective regions with more leeway with regard to making decisions within their own regions? Also, will he provide commensurate funding to meet the demands that are required because of the increased traffic?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I said a moment ago that I agreed with that. There has been no relaxation and no accentuated centralization as far as I know, and certainly will not be as long as I am minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister and his officials cancelled a program to enlarge parking facilities at Edmonton International Airport. Why was that program withdrawn? It is a revenue-generating proposition which is self-liquidating, yet the minister saw fit to withdraw that program.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, there will be an opportunity in a few minutes to talk about that specifically because my estimates are before the committee this afternoon. Edmonton has been well treated.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: We will get the figures in a few minutes. Edmonton has three airports. The international airport has been growing; substantial amounts of money have been spent on it. The municipal one is thriving and efforts are being made to assist the Villeneuve airport.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

ARMAMENTS—SOCIAL PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PRIORITY

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The budget announced that Canada will increase its defence spending by 3 per cent in real terms, which represents an increase of $649 million over and above the effects of inflation during the next three years. At the same time, expenditures in the social affairs envelope will fall $1.4 billion behind the projected increases in the CPI; dollars that could and should go to social programs will be spent on expensive armaments. Is it the government's position that over the next three years spending for guns and weapons of war will have a greater priority than spending on programs which will help people very much in need of assistance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government expenditure plan has provided for a real growth in defence expenditures over the next several years in accordance with the commitments which it has made to its allies and in accordance with the desirability of maintaining Canadian defence capabilities. I believe that decision is widely accepted in Canada. It does not represent in any way a change in or a downgrading of our priorities in the social field. The fact is that expenditures on social development remain a basic priority, constitute the largest single element in our budget and have increased over the past ten years by 300 per cent. I think the hon. member ought to keep those figures in mind as well.

• (1440)

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, this morning the Canadian Council on Social Development reported that this government's budget will have a severe negative impact on the cost of living of lower income Canadians and that it will push both unemployment and inflation higher. Further, in light of the fact that four of our NATO allies, West Germany, Belgium, The Netherlands and Denmark, have all announced that they will restrain their defence spending rather than increase it by 3 per cent, will the minister give an undertaking to this House that he will review our country's commitment in this area with regard to seeing whether we too, like our European allies, can restrain our defence spending in order that social programs will not suffer?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to review the commitment we have made to essential defence expenditure. I would be inclined to review that commitment if the hon. member could show that there is any downgrading of our commitment to social development. That is not the case. It still remains a basic priority, and each year there is an annual increase in the total amount spent on social development.

The hon. member talked about inflation. That is, of course, an important consideration, but the universal programs in the social development category, as was pointed out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, are fully indexed against inflation, which adds substantially to the total cost of these programs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CANADA AND NEW ADMINISTRATION IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. There has been a great deal of speculation in the media in the last few days since the presidential election in the United States regarding the future relationship between Canada and the United States. In view of the fact that this is the fifth U.S. president to be elected since the Prime Minister has been in power, could he indicate to this House what he anticipates will be the relationship with our largest trading partner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: Take it easy now.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not sure why the opposition is nervous. This is a perfectly legitimate question. I suppose hon. members opposite are frustrated that they have not thought of asking the question themselves. I can assure them that the press has asked me this question many times. Generally I have deferred to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but since he is not here I just want to repeat with emphasis that his view is that of the government, to wit, that we expect to have and entertain very good relations with the new administration of the United States when it takes over.

I wrote to the president-elect the night of the election returns not only congratulating him and expressing our desire to continue improving our relations, but also asking him to seek to visit Canada at a very early occasion in his mandate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CROWN CORPORATIONS

AIR CANADA—CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALARIES OF RESPECTIVE CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and is about a matter which has interested me for some time. I refer to the discrepancy between the salaries of the chief executive officers of Air Canada and CNR. I am wondering when this very large discrepancy, which I believe still exists, will be adjusted and whether the failure of the government to do so is related to reported hostility by the Prime Minister to the president of Air Canada as a result of his not buying the airplane the Prime Minister wanted him to buy a while ago, the air bus.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the salaries of both the president of CN and the president of Air Canada have been decided upon. The decision has been made. Is there a connotation that they should have the same amount of money? I could not hear that question. If there is such an implication, this is the first time I have heard about it.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, the hon. minister asked me if there is a connotation that they should have the same amount of money. Since he asked my opinion, I think there ought to be some reasonable parity between the two positions. I think Mr. Taylor is doing at least as good a job as Mr. Bandeen, but let me ask a question on one further point. Can the minister confirm or is he aware of reported moves by the board of Air Canada to increase quite substantially on an unaccountable basis the expense account of Mr. Taylor, perhaps to take into account the period of time when Mr. Taylor's salary was not adjusted while Mr. Bandeen's received a very substantial boost?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Madam Speaker, I have heard the representations of the members of those two boards. The salaries have been decided upon, and there is a degree of retroactivity in them.

AIR SAFETY

DUBIN COMMISSION—EVIDENCE OF POTENTIAL FOR ACCIDENT—INQUIRY AS TO CORRECTIVE MEASURES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker I also have a question for the Minister of Transport. It is with regard to the alarming statements coming out of the Dubin inquiry into air safety. It has been stated that pilot-controller friction is nearing the danger level, and that the relationship between air traffic controllers and pilots has deteriorated to the point where there could be an incident and that the potential is there for an accident. What action has the minister taken to correct this situation? Has he met with his officials, and can he fill the House in as to what corrective measures he will take in this very serious situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, when my predecessor appointed Mr. Justice Dubin to the commission, I understand that there was an informal agreement between them that the department would not make substantial changes to its modus operandi without the consent of the judge. That is my understanding, so consequently each time a subject is brought to the commission it is fully studied by the department. Occasionally the views of the department are put to the judge. A number of actions have been taken, and we might talk about that this afternoon in the committee at which I will be present.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, charges have also been made at the Dubin inquiry that Air Canada is flying unsafe planes, that Air Canada maintenance supervisors routinely allow passenger jets needing vital repairs to fly, and that many times on-time departures come ahead of safety. Are those statements true or false, and has the minister met with Mr. Taylor to discuss this very serious problem in the maintenance of these planes?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, that is exactly why a commission was created, to receive all these views. Justice Dubin is there to present a report in due course and to decide what is right, what is not as right or what is wrong in what he has heard. This is really the purpose of the commission, and I think it would be illogical for me to comment on allegations made before this commission. I call it the "Parliament of the air". It receives views pro and con, and sooner or later, as Madam Speaker does, Justice Dubin will have to say what he thinks of what has been said before him.

IMPROVEMENT IN FACILITIES IN METROPOLITAN TORONTO AREA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Transport who, as far as Toronto is concerned, does not seem to exist. In view of the fact that the potential solutions to air traffic related problems in and around metropolitan Toronto have been about as dormant as the minister's own activities, could the minister tell this House when decisions will be made and actions taken on such matters as the SOMPS report, which is long overdue, the over-crowded facilities at Toronto International Airport, the disposal of lands at Pickering, Toronto Island and the STOL situation, the expansion of Mount Hope, the Buttonville satellite airport and so forth?

In other words, why the delay in dealing with these long-lasting problems, particularly since his predecessor, the hon. member for Vegreville, made decisions and found solutions to these problems some time ago?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I note that my hon. friend is asking the same question he asked some months ago. The SOMPS report is known. It has been useful in the planning for railway development, airport development and so forth. A decision on the third terminal at Malton will be coming up in the next few months. The decision on the Hamilton airport has already been announced. I do not remember what other elements there were in the question, but I will be pleased to try to answer if I can be reminded of them.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, the minister says that my question was similar to one I asked several months ago, and he is indeed right. I did ask that question, no action was taken then, and no action has been taken since.

● (1450)

Since the minister seems to be confused about a variety of questions on air transport in Toronto put together in one question, I will simplify my supplementary question and ask him specifically about the Toronto International Airport situation where, as the minister should know, aircraft movement has increased to over 10,500 aircraft in the last four years, now reaching 59,637 aircraft movements and increasing very rapidly. In view of the fact that the SOMPS report recommended the construction of a third terminal, and because the existing facilities, particularly at terminal 1, are now at times over-crowded and inadequate, will the minister stop stalling and tell us when he will make a decision as to what actions and decisions will be taken at the Toronto International Airport?

Mr. Pepin: I am quite sure, Madam Speaker, that if the hon. member would look at the question he asked me, he would realize that some months ago I gave an answer on the Hamilton airport.

Mr. Jelinek: I was talking about Toronto.

Mr. Pepin: With regard to the third terminal at Toronto International, I gave an answer a moment ago. I said that this was in the course of being decided now and an announcement will be made in the coming months. What else can I do?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: You have not been the minister during the last three years; another gentleman was for one.

GRAIN

INQUIRY RESPECTING DISCONTINUANCE OF EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport, who sometimes is responsible for the Wheat Board.

An hon. Member: Sometimes.

Mr. Hovdebo: In view of the fact that the United States has moved rather aggressively into our traditional market of China for the sale of wheat, even though they asked us to respect their embargo on wheat to the Soviet Union, and in view of the fact that the Reagan administration is unlikely to favour the continuation of the embargo, would the minister now assure the House and the farmers of Canada that we will ignore the embargo and sell all the grain we possibly can to the Soviet Union?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board has been saying for a number of weeks now that we will continue to export grain to the Soviet Union along normal and traditional lines. We no longer agree that there should be a maximum or a ceiling on our exports. He has been saying that for a number of weeks now.

Mr. Hovdebo: That statement by the minister has been contrary to the stated policy of the government.

I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In view of the shortage of cash on the prairies and since the University of Saskatchewan agricultural economics department has identified losses of $9 million due to the embargo on barley sales, and earlier identified losses of over $120 million on wheat sales, will the government continue to dither over the calculations, or will they establish the payments as quickly as possible and, if so, how much and when?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Agriculture said a number of days ago that he would come up with an answer to this question within a few weeks. I think he mentioned November, if I remember well. So this situation is being attended to.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

REQUEST FOR PAROLE FOR PAUL ROSE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Recently, and more specifically in Quebec, much has been made in the newpapers of the request for parole for the terrorist member of the FLQ, Paul Rose, and the fact that a specific request to that effect may be addressed to the Solicitor General. Can the minister tell the House whether in fact he has had such a request and, if so, what the stand of his department is on it?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, might I underline first of all that the government does not make those types of decisions; they fall within the independent responsibility of the Parole Board. I have been advised by that board that it has not yet reached a decision in the matter of Paul Rose.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—RECEIPT OF LETTER BY JOINT CHAIRMAN

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, in his capacity as one of the joint chairmen of the committee on the constitution, with respect to the business before the committee. As the matter of the televising and broadcasting of the committee's proceedings is not closed, can the joint chairman of the committee tell me when he received the letter of August 13, 1980, from whom was that letter received, and what did he do with it after he received it and before it was produced to the committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): If Madam Speaker allows me, of course I will answer the question put to me by the opposition House leader. The letter was brought to my knowledge this morning by the clerk of the House attached to the committee at the time when I heard of a suggestion originating from a colleague of the hon. member asking committee members to study the possibility of televising and broadcasting the debates of the committee.

That was the first time I read the letter, although during previous discussions about gathering the necessary information on procedures I had already met the clerk, but he did not raise with me the point contained in the letter from Madam Speaker. It was this morning, therefore, that I learned of the existence of that letter. Having received and read the letter I asked that it be photocopied for distribution to members of the committee. Having read it and heard comments from various members of the committee I came to the conclusion that the interpretation given by Madam Speaker to the Standing Orders of the House was that broadcasting and televising the debates of a committee fell within the purview of the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I have a supplementary question for the hon. member for Don Valley East—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: He is chairman of the committee.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —with respect to the business of his committee. Could he tell the House when he delivered the letter to his colleague, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, when he received it, whether he gave it to any minister and, if so, to whom?

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, may I say through you to the hon. member that I never forwarded the reply to the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): To anybody else?

Mr. Smith: The seven members of the committee were aware of the reply from Madam Speaker. I do not recall that any other person was sent a copy of it.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There are seven Liberal members.

Mr. Smith: No, there are two Conservative members and one NDP member.

TORONTO ISLAND—IMPROVED FACILITIES FOR STOL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister will know that his department has prepared detailed costs for improving facilities at Toronto Island Airport so that they could be used for STOL aviation to Ottawa and other points in Ontario, that the cost of this improvement is only $5 million and that the revenue would indicate a pay-back in four years. Will the minister set aside the money immediately to allow that work to be done at the Toronto Island Airport so that the public can take advantage of STOL aircraft service from Toronto?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, with regard to the cost of preparing the Toronto airport for STOL, I do not share the certainty of my hon. friend. I have seen estimates that are not as clear as the figures indicated here. What I intend to do on STOL is, first, to meet, as soon as circumstances will allow, the committee which is constituted of federal participants, officials of my department, members of the regional municipal council, members of the Toronto municipal council and officials of the government of Ontario. I will be meeting them in the coming days to assess what degree of enthusiasm there is on their part for this project. That is one of the first things I will do.

The second thing—and I am doing it now—is finding out if in the estimates of my own department there could be some money allocated for that purpose, but obviously other levels of government would have to do their share.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, I think we all want to know whether the minister is in favour of STOL transport, because his seatmate, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, certainly is supporting research into STOL at de Havilland with the Dash-7 and other planes like it. We would like to know where the minister stands on this. If the minister is in favour of STOL, will he use his best efforts to change the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission to enable Canadians generally to take advantage of pretty excellent technology produced in Canada and demonstrate to people throughout the world that Canadian air technology is first class, so that we have some method of selling and exhibiting it?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the decision of the CTC was a rather intriguing one, as my hon. friend knows. The decision was a favourable one but "not a strong one". So my own support for the project depends, in good part, on what extent the project will be demonstrated to be a viable one. That is why I indicated a moment ago that I would be in touch with others interested in the same project to see what extent of enthusiasm and money they would allocate to it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE OF SECURITY GUARDS BEHIND CURTAINS IN CHAMBER

Madam Speaker: I wish to advise hon. members that I have received from the Sergeant-at-Arms a report relating to the presence of members of the protective staff behind the curtains during the sitting of the House on Thursday, October 23, 1980, just prior to the vote.

When it became apparent that the Chair was having certain difficulties in putting the question on that occasion, normal precautionary measures were taken. Members of the protective staff placed themselves in the opposition lobby to be available should the Sergeant-at-Arms require their assistance. The guards moved behind the curtains when it became impossible for them to hear the Speaker or to observe proceedings from the lobby, and they left as soon as the vote was called.

While I am satisfied that the actions of the security guards on that occasion were taken in good faith, in understanding of their duty, and the past practice of the protective service, I have asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to review the procedures to find the most appropriate way in which the protective staff could discharge their important responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, under the condition that you will cause and bring forward such a report out of your office as Speaker of this House, I am prepared to withdraw my question of privilege on this subject.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARK—STATEMENTS MADE IN SENATE BY GOVERNMENT MINISTERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, yesterday I gave notice orally, and again this morning in writing, of a question of privilege which I believe affects the rights of members of the House. I argued a large part of that question yesterday and will not impose upon the time of the House to repeat those arguments, except I want to draw the attention of the Chair, in coming to its decision, to page 4460 of Hansard. In replying to questions from myself and the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) said:

> Anyhow I do not intend to comment on what Senator Perrault said in the other place. If he has a question to put in the Senate, he has colleagues there who could do it.

He was referring to me, my colleagues, or any member of this House of Commons. Clearly the purport of it was that the President of the Privy Council did not intend to answer questions relating to government policy in this House which were raised as a consequence of statements made by his colleague in cabinet, the government leader in the other place.

I think the House has a very clear right to know if a new policy is being put forward here by the President of the Privy Council. The general policy followed—and indeed a policy repeated again today by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in replying to a question relating to the Wheat Board—has been that there will be ministers in this House who are prepared to answer to members in this House relating to questions of public policy. That practice is distinctly different from the policy outlined by the President of the Privy Council when he said that if we had questions to put to ministers who serve in the other place, then we should be denied the right as members of Parliament to put them here and, indeed, should pass those questions off to senators or members of the other place.

We have a right to know whether a new policy is being put forward here. Will ministers of the government sitting in the House of Commons be refusing to clarify statements of ministers in the other place, as the President of the Privy Council has now done on two occasions? Will they pretend that they are ignorant of any policy stated on behalf of the Government of Canada by ministers who sit in the other place? Will we now have to arrange, as elected members of the House of Commons, to have questions put by appointed Senators to ministers of the Crown that cannot be put by elected members of the House of Commons to ministers of the Crown? Obviously it would not be an acceptable procedure for us.

Recently, and this was what gave rise to this question, the government House leader in the other place, when asked a question about the possibility of extending the reporting date of the joint committee on the constitution, said the following:

> —it is conceivable that the committee may say, "Because of the vast public interest in the work of the committee, we recommend to both the Senate and the Commons that we be given an additional period of time in which to hear other witnesses from across the country."

In other words, there was a clear indication by the government House leader in the other place that there would be a willingness on the part of the government to consider extending the date of report of the joint committee on constitutional matters which, as Madam Speaker knows, has been a matter of active debate in the House of Commons. We could not get any confirmation from the President of the Privy Council as to whether or not his colleague in cabinet was speaking for the government when he gave that answer.

We all know that the government House leader, and indeed any minister, has a right to decline a question. There is no obligation upon them to answer, and often they do not answer. They have that right to decline a question, that is well-established, but I do not believe that any minister of the Crown has the right to decline categories of questions and to define categories of questions to which no response will be given. In my judgment, what has been done by the President of the Privy Council in this House is that he has defined a category of questions on which, I gather under no circumstances under his control, does he, at least, intend to reply for the government. That is a category of question relating to statements of government policy made on behalf of the government by ministers in the other place.

Also, I believe it is implicit in what the President of the Privy Council said that his position and the position of the Government of Canada is that elected members of the House of Commons—people who have stood for election and have been elected to this place—are not to be permitted to get answers from elected ministers. Instead we have to go to appointed ministers and ask appointed senators to pose questions to them if we are to have either clarification of public policy or statements of public policy.

The government is responsible collectively for policy enunciated in either this House or the other place. It must be able to respond to either House. Particularly, if I may say so, there is an obligation upon this government to respond to questions put in this elected House by elected members to elected ministers. I am fearful that in the statements and conduct of the President of the Privy Council we have seen a departure from that point.

If Madam Speaker finds a question of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

> That the failure of the government to take seriously the right of the opposition to put questions to ministers in this House respecting any statement by any minister on a matter of government policy, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, very briefly and very succinctly, I would like to raise two points. First, I was asked if the statement made by Senator Perrault was government policy. That transpires from comments made before and after my reply and I would like to emphasize that only the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can decide and declare in the House whether a statement made outside the House by a minister represents government policy or not. Therefore as minister, as President of the Privy Council and as government House leader I had neither the right nor the power to say whether or not such a statement represented government policy.

Be that as it may—and I am getting to my second point, Madam Speaker—the member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), the Leader of the Opposition, referred to part of my statement but he should have read it in full. I spoke clearly, and this is important because those are the facts on which he wants to rest his alleged question of privilege.

This is what I said, and this is my reply which is found on page 4460:

> Madam Speaker, the question could perhaps be put in the Senate but I do not know how I could comment on Senator Perrault's reply—

And this is important, I also said:

> —with which I am not acquainted. Anyhow I do not intend to comment on what Senator Perrault said in the other place.

Madam Speaker, had I been stupid enough, I would have attempted to comment upon something with which I was not acquainted. However, Madam Speaker, I do not possess the same good qualities and the same faults as the Leader of the Opposition. I could certainly not comment upon a statement with which I was not acquainted, of which I was not aware, and that I did not have the right to comment upon in this House. In any event, Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the Leader of the Opposition, instead of attacking the substance of our constitutional proposal, would rather resort to technicalities and procedural arguments, founded or unfounded, and in this case obviously unfounded, to waste the time of the House and to avoid discussing the substantial issue. Therefore, Madam Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member for Yellowhead, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, is groundless because first, I do not have the right to comment on whether or not a statement made by a minister outside the House is government policy and second, I certainly could not comment upon a statement with which I was not acquainted and of which I was not aware.

● (1510)

[English]

Madam Speaker: With respect to the question of privilege raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), it is quite legitimate that members in this House should insist on receiving answers to the questions which they ask of ministers. That is quite legitimate, but it certainly is not a question of privilege. It is a matter of debate, and quite legitimate, and perhaps it is a very important matter of debate. But it certainly is not a question of privilege.

The Leader of the Opposition further insisted that the minister was introducing categories of questions to which he might or might not answer. I remind him, and all members in the House, that there are no categories of questions to which one might or might not answer. Ministers can choose not to answer questions though, which is their right. In support of this I cite Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 181(3):

A minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and insistence on an answer is out of order, no debate being allowed. A refusal to answer cannot be raised as a question of privilege, nor is it regular to comment upon such refusal. A member can put a question, but has no right to insist upon an answer.

So this has been a matter of debate but, certainly, not a question of privilege.

I have written notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

MR. KNOWLES—BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me the floor in response to the notice which I sent to you about an hour ago. I raise a point of privilege having to do with the performance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House today, in which I feel he is grossly misleading this House, and in which he is also reflecting on Your Honour. He is also compounding the difficulties that we, as members of this House, have in doing our work.

First, may I flesh out the point that I made about the Prime Minister reflecting on Your Honour. As we all now know, you wrote a letter on August 13, 1980, not to a private member of Parliament, not a letter which was a piece of social correspondence, but an official letter in reply to a letter that the chairman of the Special Committee on the Handicapped and Disabled had written to you on July 11. I have a copy of that letter before me. It is a very interesting two-page letter about the desire, not just of the chairman, but of the committee, to have the facilities of broadcasting coverage for that committee.

As I say, that letter was written to you on July 11. It is obvious that you gave it very thorough consideration, as your reply was dated August 13. Again, your reply was written not just to "Mr. David Smith, MP," but to "Mr. David Smith, MP, Chairman, Special Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped, House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario." In the letter you dealt with his request, which he made on behalf of the committee on July 11, for the right of that committee to have television and radio coverage.

In your letter you recounted how television came into being in the House of Commons, but you made the point that when the matter was settled in the House of Commons it was on very clear terms. This is spelled out in the last sentence of your second paragraph, which I quote:

With regard to standing and special committees, the committee submitted a report to the House which, among other matters, stated that it would be contrary to the order of the House for any radio and television coverage to take place in any standing or special committee on TV and radio broadcasting.

You developed that point further in the last paragraph of your letter and I like the first part in particular—in which you said:

Although I am personally very sympathetic to the endeavours of your Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, it is my opinion that any committee seeking to televise its proceedings must first get the authorization of the House.

I submit that is your opinion as the Speaker of the House of Commons. You stated that any committee seeking radio and television coverage would have to get the authorization of the House first. I resent very much the Prime Minister standing up today and saying that that might not be an opinion. He said, "How do we know it is an opinion? It is just a letter that the Speaker wrote to a private member of this House." We all know that we cannot ask you questions on the floor of the House. But we also know that the rule is that if any member puts a direct question to Your Honour, you are obligated to reply. I submit that the reply you made in that letter is an opinion. It is a firm ruling that, in your view, no committee could have authorization from you to institute radio and television coverage but would have to get the authorization of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister stood up today and said, "Oh, that was just a personal letter. It was a hypothetical position which members opposite are putting up."

Mr. Broadbent: Sheer rubbish!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, that is bad enough in itself. But bearing in mind that a question of privilege, to be valid, has to relate to something which is interfering with the capacity of the members of this House to do their job, I recount for you what we have had to endure in this respect when we have asked, from this side of the House, for television and radio coverage of the committee on the constitution. The answer has been that "it is up to the committee", "the committee can do it", "the committee is free", "the Prime Minister has no opinion", and so on. But when we get to the committee and we try to make a motion—the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) this morning presented a motion that we have radio and television coverage—we are met with the statement by the chairman of the committee that he has learned that there is a letter from Your Honour which deals with this matter which says that the committee cannot do so.

● (1520)

At that point I am satisfied that the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) had not even seen the letter. I know that he had not seen it because he said things about it which turned out to be incorrect. He said that he understood that there was a letter from you, Madam Speaker, saying that it would be illegal—or at least that it would not be legal—to authorize the coverage of our committee. I pointed out that the Speaker never gives a legal or constitutional opinion, that the Speaker can only give opinions on points of order. The hon. member accepted that.

At the end of that procedural discussion the chairman agreed that it was possible for the committee to broadcast its proceedings if it received the authority of the House. So the next thing, of course, was that there was a debate on that motion. And then, all of a sudden, some other member turns up with a point or order that because the motion which set up our committee did not have in it the phrase, "the right to report from time to time", we could not make a report requesting television coverage without running the risk of that bringing on the end of our committee.

I believe that we on that committee have the right to say that this frustration has gone a little bit too far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: We come back to the House and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) raises the point with the Prime Minister that it has been established that the committee cannot be televised unless it receives the authority of the House on the basis of your ruling. Then the Prime Minister stands up and says that that is just a private letter Madam Speaker wrote to a member of the House.

Surely things are a little more firm, a little clearer than that. This is a run-around and it is a case of being pushed from pillar to post. I say that if ever there was a case of members of Parliament being denied the opportunity to do their job as members of Parliament, it is on this issue of the right even to request radio and television coverage of the proceedings of that joint committee.

I am doing my best to stick to the procedural point. I am not getting into the substance of the debate in the committee, although I am tempted to do so after the things which I heard this morning in the committee as to the reasons why it should not be broadcast or televised, such as, "the lights would be too hot", "some people won't want to come", and "too many would come." We had the silliest arguments I have ever heard.

An hon. Member: All by Liberals.

Mr. Knowles: Do not condemn all the Liberals. There was one Liberal there who voted our way. Everyone was present, for the vote and even the non-presiding chairman voted. It was a clear gang-up. You may say, Madam Speaker, that that is up to the committee, and one cannot deny that the committee has the right to make the decision by a majority, but it comes only after we have been pushed from one position to another. First we are told the committee can make its own decision, and then we get into the committee we are told, first of all, that we cannot, then we are told that we can only have broadcasting if we get the authority of the House, and then we are told that we cannot even ask the authority of the House without causing the committee to die.

It makes one wonder if the drafting of the motion to set up the committee was not done so carefully as to leave out the right to submit reports from time to time. I submit that the authority of the members of the House to do their job is being frustrated and challenged by this position taken by the side opposite. The Prime Minister said that it is up to the committee, and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has said the same thing. I suppose that the President of the Privy Council will now say that the committee has decided by a vote of 13 to 11 that it does not want coverage of the proceedings.

Even if the motion had carried, there was still the other point of order as to how we may submit a report without bringing about the demise of the committee. Some Conservative said, "Let's submit it and get the committee over with." But surely this is not the way to run a free Parliament or a committee system. My leader said in the question period today that since the days of the referendum some of us have been doing everything possible on the side of redrafting our constitution and making headway in that area. My leader and the rest of us in this party have taken a certain amount of flak because we have found some good things in the proposition before us. I do not know how much longer we can take that flak from one side and take this kind of abusive treatment from the government of the day.

Just this afternoon my leader suggested that the Prime Minister might put a motion, today, to give the committee authority to have its proceedings covered by radio and television. The Prime Minister wondered why he should put such a motion when the letter written by the Speaker to the chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped was only a personal, private letter, not an opinion.

Mr. Lalonde: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: I believe that the co-chairman of the joint committee did not see the letter until some time around 11.30 or twelve o'clock this morning in the middle of the committee meeting. He had been told that there was such a letter. As I have said, on the basis of that letter the hon. member first of all said it was illegal, then he backed away from that once he received the letter and said that the motion was in order but it was clear that we could not proceed by ourselves, that we must go to the House. Surely this matter must be straightened out.

The Prime Minister could have straightened everything out today in a very few seconds by simply saying, "All right, the government will bring in the necessary motion giving the committee the power to have radio and television coverage." Your letter, Madam Speaker, made it quite clear that it is not determined for all time that television and radio are to be only in the House of Commons. Your letter makes it clear that, as the order now stands, coverage can be only of the House, but that it can be extended to the committees if the House so orders that a committee can have permission to have radio and television coverage.

Some of us feel that, in view of the importance of this issue, the Prime Minister should have grabbed at the opportunity today, but he failed to do so. Perhaps I am a little more worked up about this matter than I sometimes am on these issues, but it is because I sat through most of that committee meeting this morning. I was at a committee meeting chaired by you, Madam Speaker, for a while. Then I left it to go to the other, then I left that one and went to another, then I went back to it, and it was only an organizational meeting called for 9.30. I thought it would last for 15 or 20 minutes, but it was still going at approximately 12.45, and even then it adjourned to meet again at 3.30, and I do not know how long it will last.

There is a lot of good will around here. Even my friends to the right, who sometimes sound as thought they are contentious and cantankerous over the issue, I believe are approaching this matter with a degree of good will, certainly good faith. But the good will is being dried up by virtue of the kind of performance we had at a simple organization meeting of that committee which is still not over. I think it is a serious matter which should be gone into.

If the matter cannot be resolved in any other way and you find that I have a prima facie case of privilege, Madam Speaker, related to the misleading statements made by the Prime Minister, I would be prepared to make the appropriate motion to the effect that the question of the way in which a committee can get radio and television coverage, in light of the motion which is on the books of the House of Commons, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has advanced a case for Parliament. In supporting him in that case, I think it is important that we recount the history of this matter. First, there has been a history of stifling of debate and discussion in this House of Commons. That has been the underpinning of the history of this matter. Standing Order 33, closure was invoked before all members of Parliament had a chance to answer the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that all members should have an opportunity to speak.

Second, there was a refusal to increase the time during which the committee could respond to the matter. Third, we now have the issue that was raised today, namely, that the Prime Minister is further attempting to stifle, submerge, hide under the rug, put away or put aside the right of the public to view what is happening in this House of Commons, by playing games with the rules. If ever the government House leader had a duty as a parliamentarian, it is to rise in his place now and say, as a member of the government, that if that is the opinion of the Chair—and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has correctly characterized that opinion— then the government accedes to it on the grounds of openness. If it is necessary for this House to move, then the government House leader ought to bring in such a motion.

● (1530)

I say to him, Madam Speaker, and I repeat what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said, that if such a motion is brought in today—and apparently that is what is required according to your ruling on the question of procedure—it will go through without debate.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre agrees with me. The government knows, therefore, that it is not going to lose precious time.

I ask the government House leader, through you, Madam Speaker, in support of the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and in an effort to preserve something of respectability and the sense of openness in this institution, given the importance of the discussion before that committee, to stand in his place now and say that he will bring forward the appropriate motion in light of the assurances that I have given.

I think this is important, Madam Speaker. I think it is very relevant to the operation of this place that he, as leader of the House of Commons, clear up this mess, a mess created by his leader and a situation that is absolutely intolerable to the appropriate operation of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, as someone who was at that committee this morning, I should like to say a few words on the subject.

Earlier the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that your letter does not really mean that a ruling was made. I want to say to you very clearly, Madam Speaker, that the feeling of all members at that committee this morning was that a ruling had been made. The letter was hanging over the heads of the members of the committee and was taken as a ruling by all those present.

Someone has already said that we had an indication by the Prime Minister on an earlier occasion in the House that we would be free to choose whichever path we wanted in regard to broadcasting the proceedings of the committee on radio and television.

We also had the statement of the government House leader that the committee was free to determine its own course and make its own decision. That is the understanding we had in committee this morning. The co-chairman of the committee is my good friend, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal)—

[Translation]

—and I have a great deal of admiration for him. He has, for a very long time, been one of my best friends in the House. I find he deals honestly with all hon. members.

[English]

He had drawn to his attention during the proceedings, I gather—and perhaps he could enlighten the House on this in detail for a few moments—the letter from yourself to the chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped. He had to read that letter to the members of the committee. It was our clear impression at that time that if we were to decide that the committee's proceedings should be televised, that would go against your ruling, Madam Speaker. With that type of information before the committee, I am sure that a number of members felt somewhat intimidated.

An hon. member from New Brunswick said that if we were to report back to the House with a request that the committee's proceedings be televised, that would terminate the committee; it would be the end of that committee. He quoted to that effect from some books on procedure. It was a double whammy, Madam Speaker—not only were we perhaps doing the wrong thing, but if we came back to the House with a request for permission to televise the committee hearings, that would be the end of the constitutional committee. At that I noticed some members who were sitting opposite me wilt like flowers on a hot July day—except for the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey).

I think it is very important, Madam Speaker, that you understand that the impression left with that committee was that this was a ruling. The interpretation given by the Prime Minister today may be valid in his own mind and in the minds of some others who were not there, but it was not the impression of those of us who were at the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, you will note that I submitted to you in writing a notice of motion on the same question prior to the calling of orders of the day this afternoon.

I intend to raise one or two matters, possibly for clarification, regarding what I believe has resulted in the violation of the rights of individuals and members of Parliament.

I support the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I could wish that he had been a little more vigilant about the protection of the rights of members when the motion was passed, however.

Mr. Clark: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that the government House leader has said on a number of occasions that the committee is master of its own proceedings. For instance, at page 4162 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> I am of the opinion that the joint committee which will be established will have the power to determine whether or not it wishes its deliberations or proceedings to be broadcast.

That is quite clear. On October 24, as reported at page 4074 of Hansard, he said:

> It will be up to the committee to decide whether the debates should be televised. As to the material organization that would be involved that aspect would come under the responsibility of Madam Speaker.

So it has been very clearly stated in this House by the government House leader that the committee had the right and the power to establish whether television and radio broadcasting should be used by the joint committee studying the constitution.

During the debate on that motion that I placed before the committee, the co-chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal), made committee members aware of a letter that he had received regarding your ruling, set out in the letter dated August 13, 1980, to the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith). I want to say to the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, through you, Madam Speaker, that members on this side who sit on that committee, fully accept his assurance when he said he had not had knowledge of this letter prior to raising the matter in committee. There is no doubt in my mind that such is the case. I think the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, if he were asked, would accept the proposition that your letter of August 13 had a considerable effect on the determination and on the discussion that ensued after the information was made known to the committee.

I should just like to read one additional sentence from your letter, Madam Speaker, that has not been read as yet. In the third paragraph there appears the following:

> Failing such a decision of the House—

Namely, on television broadcasting.

> —the committees are without authority to broadcast their proceedings.

I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that your letter was interpreted by the co-chairman as a ruling that even if the committees had passed a motion to permit television and/or radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the joint committee, in fact the committee was not empowered to do so on the basis of your ruling as expressed in the letter of August 13, 1980, to the hon. member for Don Valley East. Possibly the entire work of the committee, in terms of moving motions for the right to have the proceedings broadcast on television and radio, was futile as the decision had been taken some months earlier by yourself, Madam Speaker, that such was not possible.

I think we find ourselves in a "Catch 22" situation now, Madam Speaker, regarding our privileges. On the one hand we have your ruling, while on the other hand we have the assurances of the government House leader and the assurances of the Prime Minister today. On October 29, however, as reported at page 4214 of Hansard, when reaffirming that the committee was master of its own procedure, the government House leader said:

> Madam Speaker, as Liberals we respect the freedom of our members and I must say to the hon. member that the committee is master of its own procedure, that it is not parliamentary tradition for the House of Commons to get involved in organizing the work of the committee—

● (1540)

Here are the pertinent words:

> —and that in this House we cannot decide any procedural question concerning the committee, unless we get a report from committees.

That question as to whether or not television and radio broadcasting should be allowed in the committee was raised by a Liberal hon. member from New Brunswick. The reference was to page 193 of the current edition of Beauchesne, section 591, which reads:

> A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House.

It was the interpretation of our members, and I believe it was also the general interpretation, that we had to refer back to the House for permission in order to have broadcasting. Yet the interpretation given was that if the interim report was made to this House, the joint committee would also cease to exist. Not only is it a difficulty in a "Catch 22" situation for members of the committee in terms of broadcasting, but it also raises serious doubts as to whether there arises any other need for clarification of assurances given by the government leader in the other place that the date was also a matter which could be examined by committee members and a report could come back to Parliament. On that issue as well members are now caught in a dilemma because should such a report be brought forward, the committee would end. I do not interpret Section 591 in that way at all because it refers to a final report, not an interim report. I believe that the interpretation as well is wrong.

What I am saying to you, Madam Speaker, is that these interpretations were given, quite apart from the assurances we have from the government House leader (Mr. Pinard) from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and from the government leader in the other place that in fact this committee had the right to determine the presence of radio and television broadcasting.

With those assurances, and in view of the developments which have now taken place, I believe that my privileges as a member of that committee have not been respected. I believe that, before the committee can continue, this matter should be clarified. If not, the good will of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks, which was resident in the committee and which I believe is still there, will be eroded. I would think it is incumbent upon this House to clarify the matter now.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, since in any procedural debate, the letter and the spirit of the rules as well as the precedents must be considered, in order to be consistent with the position I have always taken in this House concerning the televising of committee proceedings, I wish to say immediately that I accept the request to reconsider the situation and that I hope to be able to report to my colleagues before the adjournment today on the position of the government, pursuant, however, to the Standing Orders of this House and to parliamentary practice.

Having said this, and without binding the government at this stage concerning the decision which might be made on this matter, I would still like to comment on the procedure to be followed if the government decides to abstain from getting involved in the decision of the committee.

Once again, I emphasize that these comments will be subject to the action that I will take in the next few minutes and the report which will be made later today, I hope, to the House of Commons.

First of all, Madam Speaker, reference has been made to a letter that you wrote to the chairman of a special committee of the House. As I said earlier during the question period, I was informed of this letter at two o'clock today. Before that, I was not aware of its existence and even less of its contents. I read it while the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking.

I should inform you that the Prime Minister specified in his reply to the House a little earlier that he had read this letter and had been informed of its existence only around 2.20 this afternoon.

So it is undeniable, Madam Speaker, that cabinet members—and I give the benefit of the doubt to opposition members. I presume that the Leader of the Opposition and his House leader, as well as the House leader of the New Democratic Party and his leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent)—I give them all the benefit of the doubt and I take their word that they were not aware either before this morning of this letter. However, in spite of the answer given by the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) to the effect that a copy of this letter had been handed some time ago to the committee members, to some backbenchers—

Mr. Lalonde: They had been informed.

Mr. Pinard: In any event, what I am saying should not upset my colleagues opposite since I say that I give them the benefit of the doubt as to whether or not they were aware of the existence of this letter. So as far as we are concerned, we were not aware of it. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition nor the Leader of the NDP was aware of it. Whatever the nature of this letter, Madam Speaker, and also in keeping with the reservations I expressed earlier regarding the openmindedness that we want to demonstrate, as the Prime Minister said so clearly, this letter does not constitute a ruling because it is just an opinion. It is so true that in the very text of the letter, the last two lines of the conclusion read as follows:

[English]

—it is my opinion that any committee seeking to televise—

And so on.

[Translation]

That is an opinion, Madam Speaker, which was expressed in light of advice given to you at the request of a member, and an opinion voiced without the benefit of arguments from either side of the House. So it is not a decision of the House after a procedural debate and, in my humble opinion, I do not consider that the opinion contained in that letter amounts to any kind of precedent whatever on which to base arguments in this instance.

In addition, and I say so with respect, Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the person who offered you that advice and, as I said earlier, it is obvious that my opinion on the subject is known. I have always considered that a decision of the House, the one taken in January, 1977, and approved by the House, did allow the televising of debates in the House and in committees, it is clear from that decision. I have always maintained and I still maintain that that decision of the House, which was voted on and accepted by the House, must have precedence over any report from a subcommittee or from special committees which has not been endorsed by the House. What your adviser told you in that opinion, Madam Speaker, is that the special committee responsible for supervising the advent of television in the House had tabled a report some time in November, 1977. But one significant fact he forgot, or even if he did mention it—and no one seems to have taken that into consideration—is that that report is worth absolutely nothing from a legal standpoint, from a procedural standpoint, because the House never did concur with it. I feel it would be the height of stupidity to pretend that a report which has not been approved by the House must gain precedence over a decision or an order of the House. I am convinced that no hon. member would argue the contrary.

So, Madam Speaker, with respect I would suggest that the opinion given to you by your adviser in this instance does not take into account the fact that the report of the committee responsible for conducting that experiment has never been approved by the House. Therefore the decision of the House takes priority and that decision is explicit and very clear. We agreed that Parliament, that the House and the committees had the right to televise their debates. If at a given moment the special committee which no longer exists had deemed advisable to submit a report it would have done so. Its mission, and I was a member of the committee as was the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), was to supervise the experiment. We wanted to be certain that the introduction of television in the House, that this experience would show that it could be done while respecting the principle of electronic Hansard. This took place in 1977. I am convinced that if the special committee were still in existence in 1980, its recommendation would probably be different because, in the light of experience, experience which the committee did not have back in 1977 when it submitted its report which was not accepted by the House, it is obvious that the concept of an electronic Hansard can be respected when our proceedings are televised.

On this first point of the content of the letter, which is not an order of the House but simply an opinion, I say that the letter does not bind anybody, that the adviser who gave you his opinion on the subject forgot to attach enough importance to the fact that the report of the committee was never approved by the House and that he did not recognize the fact that we have a three-year experience of televising our proceedings, which can be of some benefit to the members of the committee, which makes them experienced enough to make their decision to televise their own proceedings. There is also, Madam Speaker, the fact we should face, namely, that this morning the committee decided against broadcasting the proceedings on television and on radio by 13 votes against 11. That is a fact.

Thus, the situation in which we find ourselves following the request made by my hon. colleague, the House leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, if we are to meet his request, is the following: on the one hand, we have to decide whether we may, without offending the committee members and without any disregard to that institution which is a committee of the House, intervene and say that your decision is not right and, on the other hand, we on the government side have to decide whether the committee proceedings will be televised. It can also be done by negotiation with the members of the committee in light of the new development, that is, the letter in question. Though we do not agree with its contents, and despite the fact the opinion it expressed at the very last minute, and the persons involved and concerned were advised of it a bit later, they can be consulted, as well as the House of Commons, and negotiations can be held with the House leaders. So, what I mentioned at the start of my remarks is this: subject to new developments or those consultations, Madam Speaker, which could lead to an agreement on televising those proceedings, I still wanted to dot the i's with regard to the lack of legal or parliamentary basis of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and those who spoke after him.

However, there is more. I said a while ago that we were, that I was willing to take steps in an attempt to try to give an answer in this regard to the House later on today, but I referred at that time to the attitude that has always been mine, as well as that of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), with regard to the televising of those proceedings. That attitude is this—I even remember the very words used then by the Right Hon. Prime Minister, specifically, that he was neither for nor against it, and that strictly from a procedural point of view he felt, as I still do, that it was up to the committee to decide on its procedure, including the televising of its proceedings.

For my part, I said that if it were only a matter of cost, in the case where the committee should decide or had decided on televising its hearings, two additional formalities would have to be respected. First, it would not suffice for the committee to decide that its hearings are to be televised; its decision would have to be ratified by the Senate since we are dealing here with a joint committee; and, second, I said that the commission of internal economy, under your chairmanship, Madam Speaker, would have to approve the expenditure. I have always maintained in this House that money would not be an issue, as far as I was concerned, that would prevent the hearings of the committee from being televised. Let that be clear. The stand I have always taken with regard to the televising of debates has always been the one I have just outlined, just as it has also been that of the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

So, in view of the circumstances, we have never said that the House of Commons was against their being televised: we said it was up to the committee to decide, the cost being subject to the approval of the Senate and the commission of internal economy. And there was one condition, that the televising of the proceedings, apart from not being contrary to the concept of an electronic Hansard, was not to result in delaying the report of the committee. That was the only condition I had put on the televising of this committee's proceedings. The fact the proceedings would be televised was not, for any consideration, to allow the committee to report later than December 9.

Having said that, Madam Speaker, I conclude by repeating that in the next few minutes I shall take steps and consult in order to determine whether, without limiting the rights of anyone, we can come to an amicable agreement about the televising of those proceedings as quickly as possible, provided the fact the debates will be televised does not result, first, in delaying the report of the committee and, second, in hindering the work of the committee. Even if the televising should start in a few days, that should not prevent the committee from pursuing the work it has started. Third, I would not want either to prejudge the decision of the Senate which will necessarily have to be consulted regarding that matter, because it is a joint committee. I would not want to place the Chair or the other commissioner of internal economy under any obligation, but I do not see that this would be a major problem, since I am one of the commissioners of internal economy and have already mentioned this issue to some of the others, and they do not see any problem in this regard. That takes care for now of the issue of televising the committee proceedings.

There is a second issue involved in the comments made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). Concerning the report of the committee, he read, in the English version of Beauchesne, section 591, on page 193, which says the following:

● (1550)

[English]

A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House.

[Translation]

It is interesting to note, Madam Speaker, that the French version is more explicit. If you look at the fifth edition of the French version of Beauchesne, on page 197, you will find the following under section 591—and the wording is so different in the French edition that section 591 contains two numbered subsections, while the English version has only one paragraph:

(1) Il importe que la motion proposant l'institution d'un Comité mentionne que celui-ci doit faire rapport de temps à autre, car s'il le faisait une fois sans autorisation, il cesserait d'exister.

It is therefore quite obvious that when the House considered the motion, it knew or should have known that the wording of the motion did not authorize the committee to report occasionally. In this case, the procedure seems to me relatively clear. There is a difference between the English and French versions of Beauchesne, but no contradiction. The French text is much more explicit and much more complete, and I thought it my duty to inform the House of this difference because it is always a good idea to have a complete picture rather than half-truths.

Madam Speaker, this is what I had to say about these questions which, essentially, are not questions of privilege, but we are willing in this case, as we have always been, to co-operate and show our good faith.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I am pleased to learn from the government House leader that his government is prepared to reconsider its position which, to this point, has been one of refusing to allow television and radio coverage of the discussions on Canada's constitution. I do not know in what position the comments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) in relation to a decision of yours leaves the Chair. That is a matter you will have to decide as, indeed, you will have to decide what interpretation it would be appropriate to place upon the comments offered by the President of the Privy Council in relation to certain of your advisers. That is a matter for you to consider as you review his remarks.

For my part and that of my party, I can simply say that on many occasions we have learned to interpret your opinion as a ruling. That is probably the position that is held by most members of this House of Commons. I regret that it should be put into some question by the government House leader, but that is a matter you will have to consider.

I want to make one or two points. One is certainly that a decision by the government to reconsider its refusal to let television and radio into the committee should not be seen as disposing of the question of privilege because, if they continue to persist in that refusal and not let the public know what is going on, the question of privilege will be very much alive.

● (1600)

I think it is also obvious to all of us, since there appears to be some doubt on the other side as to whether Your Honour's decision is a decision in the letter to the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith), that it is going to be important for all of us to have clarified exactly what is the capacity of a committee of this House of Commons in relation to having television and radio coverage of its proceedings.

If I might, I would like for the benefit of the House—I know Your Honour needs no reminding of it—to review the elements upon which Your Honour based your decision in your letter to the chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped. You were referring to the deliberations of the Special Committee on Television and Radio Broadcasting of the Proceedings of the House and its Committees, and you went on to say, and I quote from your letter:

With regard to standing and special committees, the committee submitted a report to the House which, among other matters, stated that it would be contrary to the order of the House for any radio and television coverage to take place in any standing or special committee on TV and radio broadcasting.

A motion on the order paper, during the 31st Parliament, which would have appointed a special committee to supervise the implementation of radio and television broadcasting in committees was not debated before that Parliament dissolved. To date, during the current Parliament, no further action has been taken in respect to the broadcasting of the proceedings of committees. Failing such a decision of the House, the committees are without authority to broadcast their proceedings.

You concluded with the following:

Although I am personally very sympathetic to the endeavours of your Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, it is my opinion that any committee seeking to televise its proceedings must first get the authorization of the House.

I refer to those reasons given in your capacity as Speaker of the House of Commons in response to a formal request for a ruling by a chairman of a special committee of this House, because I think it important that it be understood that your decision was not related to the nature of the committee from which the request came, nor to the nature of the request. Your decision was based, as your letter makes clear, upon the deliberations of the special committee which had looked into television and radio broadcasting, and its conclusions and the fact that there had not been an opportunity for a successor committee to consider any of those matters. I think it is important that that be borne in mind and what we in this party regard as a clear ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons on a question on which her decision has been requested in a formal way by the chairman of a special committee of this House.

I think it will be useful for the whole House to know just how this letter came into the possession of the committee. Indeed, I was not clear from the response of the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal)—and I am sure it was my fault and not his—as to whether the letter was presented to him by the clerk of his committee. He indicates it was the clerk of his committee. It was not clear whether it was the clerk of his committee or the clerk of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped.

I think there will be some lively interest in this House as to how the clerk of that committee came into possession of that letter, a letter which had not been generally known about or generally circulated either to the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), to myself or—we have the word of the government—any ministers of the Crown. I think that will be something which we will all want to be informed about.

The government House leader made reference to the fact that the committee has itself taken a decision on this matter. I want to make only two, I hope, non-contentious points. The first is that that was very much a party decision. The vote was 13 to 11.

An hon. Member: Twelve.

Mr. Clark: Excuse me, 12 to 11? Thirteen to 11. I am reminded by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) that I should not be referring to votes. I apologize for falling into the habit which has been practised by his government House leader. My colleague tells me that there is nothing improper with that, and I am sure you would interrupt me if there was, Madam Speaker. The point is that it was a party vote. The representatives of the Progressive Conservative Party and New Democratic Party on that committee voted for the right of the people to see and hear what was going on. With the one exception of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), the members of the Liberal party of that committee voted against the right of the people to see and hear what was going on.

The other matter which is important to note is that the vote was taken in that committee after there had been a ruling offered by the chairman, then in the chair the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, indicating that the committee did not have the power to do what the motion was asking it to do. I think we can assume that there was at least the possibility that some of the members who voted against the motion did so because they thought they were being asked to do something which would violate one of Your Honour's rulings. I think it probable that on their minds was the fact that they would not want to violate a ruling Your Honour had made in your official capacity as Speaker in response to an official request by a chairman of a special committee of the House of Commons.

The government House leader made reference to decisions which have to be taken in the Senate and by the commission of internal economy. We naturally do not dispute the necessity of the other place's agreeing to this change in the procedures and the reference to the special joint committee, just as it has agreed to other terms of reference of that committee. That is obvious, and I hope that could be achieved speedily. Indeed, I have been impressed by the independence of thought of Liberal members in the other place and hope that that proves contagious in this House.

In relation to the commissioners of internal economy I simply want to remind the government House leader of his own words as reported at page 4162 of Hansard. He said, and I quote:

If the committee wishes to be broadcast, then all that needs to be considered is the financing. The financing will be allowed if it is requested through the commission of internal economy at this level.

The financing absolutely "will be allowed". In other words, there was no objection on October 28 on the basis of financing, in the words of the government House leader. I am sure that in the interest of consistency, since he had no objection then, he will have no objection now or later.

I think what is clear is that the decision is the decision which has to be taken by the government itself. It is a decision this House of Commons must take, and I am pleased that the government is pulling back from secrecy and is prepared to consider at least giving the people of Canada the right to see and hear the discussion on the Constitution of Canada.

I must comment quickly on the suggestion of the government House leader in relation to the interim report and the capacity of the joint committee to make an interim report. He is arguing that the terms of reference are either ambiguous on the question of preventing the special joint committee from making such a request. If that is so, I am sure that is an oversight. I would not want to believe, nor would the people of Canada, that that joint committee was deliberately denied by this government the right to make interim reports on matters important to it.

I am sure if that is the interpretation the government House leader places upon the matter, since he is now prepared to reconsider the question of televising and radio broadcasting of the proposals, he would also be prepared to submit a change in the terms of reference which would allow interim reports to be made if it was found necessary for them to be made.

I think what is at issue here is a fundamental principle. We are in a situation where there have been two gags applied to Parliament so far, one in closure which cut off the right of this House of Commons to debate the Constitution of Canada, and a second in the insistence of all of the government, with the exception of the government House leader in the other place, on the December 9 deadline. We hope that the government House leader in the other place will prove to be persuasive and bring members of the government to his point of view so that there will in fact not be an artificial limitation on the right of Canadians to be heard on this important question. That is a two-piece gag. We hope there will not be a three-piece gag by also refusing the people of Canada the right to see and hear discussions by their Parliament about their constitution.

What is at issue here is the principle that the public of Canada has a right to know about the Constitution of Canada. That is a position that is upheld universally here. I am pleased to see that as a result of frequent pressure there is now at least some willingness to reconsider the refusal to let the people of Canada see and hear what is being said about their constitution by their elected and appointed representatives. I hope that decision will result in a reversal of the position that the government has taken to shut the public out of constitutional discussions.

I repeat my point that even a decision of that kind, if it is taken by the government, may not necessarily dispose of the question of privilege which is before us, nor will it of itself clarify the question as to whether a committee of this House has the right to decide on its own whether to have its proceedings covered live by radio and television.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, on this question of privilege I want to augment what my leader was saying with regard to comments by the government House leader a few minutes ago when he read from the French version of Beauchesne as to the ability of the committee to make interim reports. There are a number of matters which are before the committee at present which may require the committee, so that it may conduct its affairs properly, to make reports to both Houses.

Before you make your ruling on this question of privilege, Madam Speaker, it would be useful to bring to your attention the fact that on Monday night in the Senate a motion was moved to amend the main motion. The amendment was moved by Senator Smith, and in it he asked that the time given to the committee be extended before it makes its report. While that debate was taking place, Senator Ray Perrault, Leader of the Government in the Senate and a member of the cabinet, intervened to explain why he felt it was unnecessary for the Senate to amend the motion and to lengthen the time available to the committee before making its report. Senator Perrault said this as the government House leader in the Senate, as reported at page 1146 of the Senate Hansard of November 3:

> As far as the proposal to extend the time of the hearings is concerned, I have received advice from the Clerk of the Senate because advice was sought on this point, that it would be possible for the joint committee to recommend extended hearings. The joint committee in an interim report to both Houses could ask for an extension of the reporting date. Both Houses, of course, would have to adopt such a report simultaneously. The possibility exists, then, according to our Senate procedural advisers, that an extension of time could be considered by the joint committee, and I want to assure honourable senators on that point.

On the basis of that assurance from the government House leader in the Senate that it would be possible for the committee to make an interim report to request that the time limit be extended, the Senate then proceeded to vote against the proposed amendment.

I would request from you, Madam Speaker, a ruling on the matter raised by the government House leader when he said that any report made by that committee would result in the termination of that committee, because clearly the information given by his counterpart in the Senate was completely contrary to that. It was given to the Senate on November 3. We saw yesterday and today that the government House leader in this House refuses to feel bound in any way by commitments made by the government House leader in the Senate, but clearly a joint committee is in existence, the membership of which is drawn from both the Senate and the House of Commons. It is incumbent upon the government to speak with one voice and to make it clear whether or not members of a committee ought to have their hands tied, or whether they will be able to report to both Houses to request that important changes be made to the terms of reference. This is essential, and I do not see how the committee can continue its work unless it knows the rules under which it is operating.

So I would request from you that when you give your ruling on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) you also clarify, for the benefit of the House, the point raised by the government House leader in contradiction of the explicit undertaking made by the government House leader in the Senate.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, there is a very important element to this and I hope that the Chair will not lose sight of it. It is one that causes me considerable concern. I say to the Chair with great respect, and to those who advise the Chair, that I am not at all satisfied that there was no knowledge on the government Treasury benches of this ruling by the Special Committee on Television and Radio Proceedings of the House of 1977 or by your immediate and distinguished predecessor. It seems to me that Mr. Speaker Jerome ruled on this matter as well. I find it passing strange that when the government House leader was giving me an assurance on October 24, as reported at page 4074 of Hansard of that day, that:

> It will be up to the committee to decide whether the debates should be televised.

—the existence of this letter, or the report of the Special Committee on Radio and Television Proceedings of the House and its subsequent adoption by the House, or the subsequent ruling by Mr. Speaker Jerome, would not be known to any single member of the government and would not be known, for example, to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) who was the government House leader when these rulings were made. Yet the Deputy Prime Minister, the former government House leader, did not intervene when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was giving the House an assurance that the committees were "masters of their own destiny", or when the government House leader was giving us the assurance that the committees had the right to decide whether or not their proceedings should be televised.

What concerns me, Madam Speaker, is that I believe the House has been seriously and, in my view, deliberately misled. I can come to no other conclusion. I accept the word of the government House leader, as obviously I have to do under the rules, and I accept the word of the Prime Minister, but we have not heard from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) as yet. Did he know of the existence of this letter? We have not heard from the Deputy Prime Minister. Did he know of the existence of the letter?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member should know that I did not know of it until around 2.20 this afternoon.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the minister wants to rise on a point of order, he can do so, but he cannot raise a question of privilege while someone else is speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, obviously I will accept the intervention of the minister and I will withdraw without equivocation—

Mr. Lalonde: Disgusting. You are casting aspersions right and left.

Mr. McGrath: It would be interesting to know whether the hon. gentleman who now intervenes from his seat knows of the existence of this letter because he is obviously the author of the face-saving compromise which the government House leader brought before the House this afternoon to try to save face.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have rarely seen in this House behaviour as disgusting as the one shown by the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Watch yourself.

Mr. Lalonde: It is quite clear that just as no one on the front benches on the other side was aware of your letter, no one on the front benches on this side knew of this letter. The way in which the hon. member is casting aspersions right and left is reprehensible, and he should be ashamed of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, what I find reprehensible is the fact that the Prime Minister and the government House leader could stand on their feet in the House, time and time again, and tell the House, without equivocation, that the committee had the right to decide whether or not it should televise its proceedings, notwithstanding the fact that there had been rulings on record, and that these rulings were not known to either the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister or the government House leader. That boggles the mind; it stretches credibility. I am informed that one of the rulings was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) who was then chairman of the Special Committee on the Constitution.

The fact remains that we are now told we may be able to reach agreement, if we can find money through the commissioners of internal economy and if it does not delay the proceedings of the committee. We are told these things now, but we were not told these things last week. Last week there was no suggestion that there would be any strain on the finances of the House or on the commissioners of internal economy, or that the televising of the proceedings of the committee might unduly delay the committee. No, on the contrary, we were told without equivocation that the committee had the power and the authority to decide whether or not to televise its proceedings and that the money was available.

I want to point out to Your Honour, in the strongest possible terms, that I feel aggrieved as a member of this House. I believe that I have been misled. Whether or not I have been deliberately misled is a question for Your Honour and subsequently, we hope, for the committee to decide. But the fact is that there is a serious prima facie case of privilege before the House right now and I submit that Your Honour should so rule.

Madam Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). I am sorry he was disappointed that I did not recognize him before, but I recognize members in the order in which they rise. It is the turn now of the hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I want to deal with this very important question of privilege. I do so in replying to what I regard as a logically absurd and, beyond that, morally offensive argument put forward by the government House leader, and I choose my words with care.

First of all I shall speak with regard to his question about a letter written by you, Madam Speaker, dated August 13, containing the following words in the last paragraph:

> Although I am personally very sympathetic to the endeavours of your Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, it is my opinion that any committee seeking to televise its proceedings must first get the authorization of the House.

● (1620)

The government House leader is a lawyer and I am not, but I have spent a little time studying legal theory, as a matter of fact. I know enough, when the Speaker of the House of Commons writes a letter in her official capacity to the chairman of a committee saying that it is her opinion that such is the case, whatever the government House leader may say, that that is the case. It is not simply an idle opinion; it is a judgment coming from the Speaker of the House of Commons.

It is a specious argument of the worst kind for the government House leader to come before us and try to pass off the view that a letter written by the Speaker of the House of Commons saying that it is her opinion simply means an informal suggestion.

A person sentenced to jail for five years should try that when the judge says, "It is my opinion that you should go to jail for five years." A person receiving such a sentence would not, to understate it a wee bit, have very sound legal grounds for appealing the case by saying that the judge was merely expressing an opinion. That is exactly analogous to the kind of phony argument the government House leader tried to pass off in the House of Commons today. That is my first point.

The people in the committee clearly understood when they received this letter which mysteriously appeared from some interesting source. We do not know the ultimate source. I am not questioning at all the honesty of the chairman of the committee as to the time he got the letter and who actually put it in his hands, but certainly I am dubious about the person who originally had the letter transmitted. We would like to know very much who had that letter sent on. The argument of the government House leader that this letter constituted a mere passing judgment without significance, is totally spurious. It was a sound, considered judgment, and the government House leader knows it very well.

My second point deals directly with the phony arguments we have heard in the House of Commons for the past ten days that somehow members of committees do not vote as their parties wish them to vote. The committees of the House of Commons are structured in party terms because it is well understood that members of a committee will not vote as isolated individuals, somehow making up their own minds independently of their considered party positions. It is quite the contrary. In a parliamentary democracy the committees are structured by party members because party members are expected to vote, as a rule, as their party caucuses decide is appropriate for them to vote. That is a well-understood and well-accepted democratic practice in the parliamentary system.

What do we have on the substance of the issue? I will be interested in hearing what the government announces later today. On this issue, and even after a ruling was made about the letter, a motion was put forward requesting the House of Commons, based on the decision of Madam Speaker, to authorize this committee to establish televising. What arguments did Liberal members make, not as isolated individuals making up their own minds, but reflecting government policy? Some said the lights would be too strong.

Mr. Lalonde: Oh, come on.

Mr. Broadbent: "Come on" is right, but these are the arguments used against television. The lights would bother members. Some said there would be grandstanding.

An hon. Member: What are you doing now?

Mr. Broadbent: Some said the people would use the opportunity to grandstand. The third argument was that some people would be afraid to appear, some members of Parliament would be afraid to be here because of the television cameras.

Mr. Knowles: Members of the public.

Mr. Broadbent: Excuse me, members of the public would be afraid.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) is quoting quite extensively from proceedings of that committee. I think he knows the rule that the proceedings of another committee should not be discussed in the House. I would remind him of that rule, and allow him to continue.

Mr. Broadbent: That is a fair comment, Madam Speaker. I was just making passing comment about what was going on in the committee which showed the intellectual levels reflected by Liberal members.

Some hon. Members: It was just an opinion.

Mr. Broadbent: I will be watching if the government shifts its policy, as it seems about to do. For a week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) were evasive on this. Suddenly they are under heat, they feel some pressure. The only time a Liberal acts with any sense of justice is if he is forced into it. Perhaps that is what we will see this afternoon. I wonder whether all those Liberal members who voted against this in committee, when there is a resolution before the House, will stand up and vote against it now. It will be interesting to see, or will they act with the same degree of independence in the House as they acted in committee?

In conclusion, this is not a light matter. The matter before us is one of great concern. We are debating a measure in this Parliament. It is a resolution which, if it carries, will change the Constitution of Canada. It will bring the constitution home to Canada. The matters are of profound importance. Therefore, in the view of both parties in the opposition, at least, they are matters which the people of Canada ought to have the right to witness through television.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Let there be no illusion. For a week the government, the Liberal party, decided that the people were to be shut out. Then they voted that way in committee and they thought they had their way. But today they felt some heat in the House, so perhaps they are about to change their minds. They had better change their minds, if they want to have any support and reasonable consideration by members of all parties in the committee; that is all I can say. If they continue with their anti-democratic attitude in the process of constitutional change, they will do irreparable harm to the country, which is something members on this side will not tolerate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. Particularly in light of the very interesting remarks and submissions made by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), I think Madam Speaker could take judicial notice, in your capacity as Speaker of the House, of the fact that there is unanimity with respect to the position being put forward in support of this particular motion by both opposition parties.

I think it is very interesting to note that the unanimity extends to the NDP which supported the government in moving this matter out of the House quickly to committee and are now expressing very serious concern with respect to the activities of the government vis-à-vis this particular operation of its committee. When we talk about fundamental rights, and rights of individuals and members of Parliament, nothing could be clearer than the position taken by the government House leader. On October 24, 1980—and this was understood—he said that it was up to the committee to decide whether the debate should be televised, and as to the material organization which would be involved that aspect would come under the responsibility of Madam Speaker.

Clearly Madam Speaker's ruling in the letter to the chairman of the Special Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped is a ruling. It is a ruling on your part. If it is not certain in the mind of the government House leader what is the situation now, and in view of his undertaking that there would be no problems with respect to financing, I think he will find himself in a new situation. If I can be permitted to speculate on what the New Democratic Party will do in this situation, they will lose the support of the NDP for the cozy deal entered into between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

It is a serious matter. The government should give very serious consideration to what position it takes if it wants to proceed in an orderly fashion on this particular motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1630)

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to participate briefly in this debate. I wish to indicate to the member for Saskatoon-West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that I think he misspoke himself, to be polite, when he suggested that our party supported the quick removal of debate on the constitution from the floor of the House of Commons. Our party opposed closure when it was moved by the Liberal party. We supported the extension of time for the debate. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has just spoken up and said that we supported the reference to the committee. That is absolutely correct. We have taken a position, which I know the Leader of the Opposition disagrees with, but it happens to be a position which is one of principle.

There are a number of principles contained in the resolution of which we are in favour. There are a number of amendments and improvements which we intend to make in a constructive way. That is the manner in which our party has approached the debate. That is the manner in which we have approached the question of the constitution. It is the manner in which we intend to continue to try to remove from petty, partisan politics the question of the patriation of the constitution as far as possible and the manner in which it will be patriated. It is because of that commitment, Madam Speaker, that I want it to be made perfectly clear what the position of the New Democratic Party is with respect to the process. As my leader has stated today, it is not simply a question of the proposals themselves, it is a question of the process under which the government works and the way in which it works in presenting this package to the Parliament of Canada and the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Closure, in our view, was a mistake. It was a very serious mistake, one which damages the credibility of the government when it says it wants to develop as broad a consensus as possible. In our view the attitude which has been expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with respect to the attitudes and the positions of western Canadians is a very serious mistake.

Finally, the way in which the government has treated this committee and the attitude it has taken with respect to the question of the extension of time—

Mr. Clark: Was your deal a mistake?

Mr. Broadbent: No, our deal was not a mistake.

Mr. Rae: The question of time, the question of the treatment of the committee and the way in which we deal with television have been serious mistakes on their part. The Leader of the Opposition has raised a question. He asks if the treatment with respect to the general package was a mistake. My answer to him is, no, sir.

I have no hesitation in saying, and my leader has no hesitation in saying there is a time to state certain principles and there is a time to take a position as a federal party. The Leader of the Opposition can take a position—I am not entirely clear what it is, but he is entitled to take a position. I do not begrudge him that position. But I think there is a very fundamental point which the government has to recognize. It is that the Prime Minister cannot come before the House of Commons and say it is up to the committee to decide what to do, and then have Your Honour make a decision.

I might add it is not simply a decision out of the blue. As a member of the finance committee last fall, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), we looked into the question of whether or not it would be possible for us to televise the proceedings of the finance committee when we were discussing the question of interest rates. At that point we were informed by the legal officers of Parliament that it would not be possible for the committee itself to decide to have televised hearings. We were required to obtain the approval of Parliament. When we requested the unanimous approval of Parliament under Standing Order 43, unanimous consent was not forthcoming. That was the reason we did not have televised hearings.

It is not good enough for the Prime Minister and the government House leader to say that your opinion, Madam Speaker, is simply a matter of opinion and that the committees have this power. It is a fact that parliamentary committees have been told consistently by the law officers of Parliament that it requires authorization from the House before the proceedings of a committee can be televised. So it is not simply your own ruling, Your Honour, but a matter of consistent rulings by the law officers, which have been expressed to a number of committee chairmen.

What the Prime Minister is doing is putting the Chair, the House and himself in an impossible position because he is saying it is not up to us, it is up to the committee. Then, lo and behold, in an act of totally spontaneous animation, the members of the committee suddenly agree that there will not be television. The reason for that is obvious. It is the policy of the Liberal party that this matter, rather than be handled in a tripartisan way will be changed from what was a positive package, which was an attempt to appeal to most people, into the policy and attitudes of one party at one particular time in our history. Only the Liberals could do this. When that happens, Madam Speaker, it is a very sad moment for Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I think I have a right to make a contribution in this matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government House leader have made statements to the effect that it was up to the committee to decide about television coverage. This was a fatuous suggestion. It was totally and utterly misleading insofar as the House was concerned.

The question of television coverage of committees was before a committee and it was decided at that time that it should be a decision of the House. Anybody with any serious intention of passing on information knew that it was not possible for any committee to decide to televise its hearings; they knew that the permission of the House was required.

There has been a question raised with respect to the funding of coverage. Under Vote 5, that funding is within the control of the Speaker. The cost of televising and of reporting committee proceedings all comes under Vote No. 5. Also under Vote 5 are moneys which have been voted upon and allocated to interparliamentary relations. Some of the allocations which have been made have not been spent. As treasurer of one particular group I know that there is a quarter of a million dollars not expended from this year's allocation. There was a change in the nature of a conference early in September which was held here, rather than in the Conference Centre, and we were able to save close to a quarter million dollars. That money is available. It does not require an item in any supplementary estimate to transfer it.

There is also the question of whether Room 200, which is the present site of the committee, is not suitable for television coverage as it does not have the facilities. There is the Conference Centre, which is all set up for television and broadcasting. I would like someone to suggest that the first ministers' conference, which dealt with the subject of the constitution, is more important than a joint committee of the Parliament of Canada considering actual changes to the constitution. Therefore, to me it is just as important that the joint committee meetings be held, for example, in the Conference Centre where there are the facilities, rather than being faced with the objection that Room 200 is not set up for television, which therefore would cause a delay in the time that is available to the committee before the guillotine falls upon the date of reporting. I suggest that if a diligent search is made in those other compartments in the Speaker's purse, sufficient money will be found for the proceedings to be televised and broadcast, because we have the proper locale.

The objections which have been raised are merely a smoke screen. It seems to me that it is now up to the government to put forward a motion which would permit the committee to televise its proceedings. It is as simple as that.

Madam Speaker: After hearing the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), I think it would be reasonable to cut off the debate, unless there is someone on the government side who wishes to have the floor, because I have not recognized many hon. members on that side.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to refer briefly to a debate which took place during the summer of 1978 in the committee which was dealing with Bill C-60. It was a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, and it was examining the government's then proposals on the constitution.

At that time it was felt by that joint committee that it was imperative that its meetings and sessions be televised and broadcast to the country. At the time these committee meetings took place there was much debate on the subject, and motions were put forward to the effect that the proceedings should indeed be televised and broadcast. The difficulty which that committee found, and which it ultimately decided upon, was that it was in somewhat of a bind because, unlike the committee itself, the House of Commons and the Senate were not sitting throughout the summer. It was noted that it would be impossible at that point in the proceedings of the committee to go back to the House and the Senate for permission to televise and broadcast the proceedings.

There were some informal discussions between the committee and Mr. Speaker Jerome at that time. I believe that he personally was in agreement with the importance of the debate which was taking place in committee and felt that it was a very critical and crucial debate. Indeed, he suggested that it could be a pilot project for all committee hearings to be televised and broadcast, but that it would have to await the resumption of the House in the autumn to receive its approval to proceed with the broadcasting and the televising of the committee proceedings.

If the committee did receive the approval of the House, Mr. Speaker Jerome felt that committee was the logical committee to undertake the initiative to show what broadcasting and televising of such proceedings would bring about and how it would benefit Canadian people as a whole. Unfortunately, in order to set that precedent, the committee would have had to continue sitting into the autumn. It did not. It completed its deliberations in August and reported back to the House when it resumed in the autumn.

I wanted to point out that there had been discussions, that, indeed, a way had been foreseen as to how the proceedings of such a committee could be telecast and broadcast. It would be by reference to the House, as you pointed out in your letter, Madam Speaker. I believe that it is one of the matters which you should keep in mind in making your ruling later today.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, I would like to say very briefly, as a member of the committee, that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) referred to me earlier as a member from New Brunswick. My riding is, of course, Madawaska-Victoria. It is I who in committee this morning called the attention of all members of the joint committee on the constitution to the interpretation of Beauchesne about the order of reference which says clearly that we cannot make a report. We are not authorized to make any interim reports.

I thought it was my duty to draw this interpretation of Beauchesne to the attention of the co-chairmen of the committee. I do not want to impute motives to anyone, but listening to the debate today, I feel things are put in such a way as to make believe—and if it is not the case I apologize—that there had been some kind of collusion between the government, and the government House leader. I must say, Madam Speaker, that it is the duty of every member of any committee to see to it that the rules are followed. And my concern, as a member of that committee, was to make sure that by coming back to the House to request permission to televise its meetings, the committee would not automatically cease to exist. My motivation was quite honest and justified. We have the duty not only to seriously consider all the matters which are presented to us, but all committee members, in co-operation with the chairman, have the responsibility to make sure that the rules are properly interpreted and that the orders of reference are also obeyed and that our work is being done within the framework which has been approved by Parliament, in this instance by both Houses. That is what we did this morning.

The fact that the committee reached a conclusion disturbs me. This morning, the majority of its membership decided not to give radio and television coverage to its proceedings. It has been repeated time and time again and it has been the ruling of all past Speakers, all your predecessors, Madam Speaker, that the committees are free to make up their own mind. In so doing, this morning we operated within the framework of that authority given to us by both Houses of Parliament. Furthermore, I find it unbelievable that opposition members quite often accuse the government, and especially the government House leader, rightly or wrongly and without any justification, of always wanting to dictate to the members of the committee. As the hon. member for Provencher said this morning, we will have to get the litmus test before we can sit on the committees. I find it very hard to believe that he should come back today to the same point through a legitimate argument, I must admit, rising on a matter or privilege and on a point of order.

Today hon. members bring to the floor of this House a question which we should have been allowed to bring back to the House as a report, otherwise the committee would have ceased to exist. Today, they want the government to impose a decision upon the committee, they want the government to ask the House to allow the committee to reconsider the decision it reached this morning. This disturbs me because the decision was reached in due form, in good faith by all the members who were attending the meeting and, what I do not understand and what I do not accept, is the fact that the government House Leader is now being asked to impose a decision upon the membership of the committee. That is beyond all understanding.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to be involved any further in this debate but I mentioned in my remarks a while ago that I would be taking some action, that I would consult, and consider the matter, and that I would advise the House as to our position, if needed. If hon. members are interested in whatever I have to say, I am prepared to report right now. If the House would rather hear from you instead, I will resume my seat.

Madam Speaker: Do hon. members agree to listen to the President of the Privy Council who would like to report on the negotiations being held and on any information he might have received on the matter now before us?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The President of the Privy Council has the floor.

● (1650)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I want it to be very clear that the government has never taken a stand either for or against the broadcasting of committee proceedings and especially those of this joint committee. The position of the Right Hon. Prime Minister and myself in this House, as I said earlier, has always been that it was up to the committee to make this decision.

You, Madam Speaker, are now faced with a question of privilege. I shall respect your ruling, but I imagine that you might wish to refer to the comments which have been made and to do some research before giving your ruling and I imagine that you will defer your decision. If this is so, since the opposition members seem to consent to my doing so—and if they object, I shall abstain—I shall inform them that I intend to speak to the two co-chairmen of the committee to tell them simply that if, in the light of what has been discussed in this House, their committee wishes to reconsider its decision, the government for its part will not object to their doing so, but whatever their decision, we shall respect it. We want to be consistent with the position that we have always held until now, namely that we should not interfere in the affairs of the committee nor give it any instructions.

What I shall do, Madam Speaker, is simply to be consistent with the procedural arguments that I held earlier today in this debate and with the position that the government has taken until now concerning the committee, and I shall not give any instructions to the committee on behalf of the government. No one can say, therefore, that we are for and against televising the proceedings.

We shall not take a stand on this issue and we shall let the committee decide for itself. I am simply going to speak to both co-chairmen and ask them if in the light of these new facts—if they judge that today's debate has brought up new facts—they want to take another vote or reconsider the matter. For our part, as a government, we have no instruction to give them; they may do as they wish. We respect the decision which has already been made and if they want to make another one, we shall respect it also whatever it may be. We want to keep our distances, as we have done since the beginning. Madam Speaker, we shall maintain firmly our position in this debate, but if you make a ruling, whatever it may be, we shall respect it as we have always done in the past and we shall act accordingly.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise in response to the point of order raised by the government House leader, and perhaps he can correct me if I am being unfair. He knows I would not want to be unfair to his position.

I believe he has said that if it is the decision that the committee has the power to decide itself to seek radio and television coverage, the government would not act in any way to stop the committee from doing that. I am not sure that that reflects a great deal of reconsideration because, at least in words, that appears to be the position the government has been putting forward for some time.

We would like to be assured that Liberal party members on that committee will not be operating under a whip which urges them to vote against radio and television in the House. That assurance would be very helpful to us and, indeed, would serve the interest of the people of the country.

The question before the House remains: does the committee have the power to make that decision? We would not want the minister's statement today to be taken as the final indication that that power does rest with the committee. We have an abundance of rulings, including your own, Madam Speaker, that the committee does not have that power.

What we would like to have from the government House leader, as a result of the reconsideration he says he has undertaken this afternoon, is a very clear statement—in light of the fact that we have a ruling from Your Honour—that the government will introduce a motion to ensure that this House can vote as a full House upon the amendment of that motion to allow the people of Canada to see and hear the constitutional deliberations on television and radio.

It is clear to us, although Your Honour has yet to decide and still has to respond to the question of privilege—that you have decided on the question of the competence of the committee that it does not have that competence, as you have stated in a formal decision.

The question before the House, then, is whether the government is going to accept its responsibility and bring in a resolution, or motion, that will permit the committee to have radio and television coverage of its proceedings. We would like to have an undertaking from the minister that such is the intention of the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I shall explain it very briefly to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). There are five possibilities. First, that the committee refuses to reconsider its decision, in which case the government will not intervene. Second, that the committee reconsider its decision, take another vote and reach the same decision, in which case the government will not intervene. Third, that the committee decide to review its decision and, in fact, by way of a vote, change it, in which case the government will not intervene. Four, that you, Madam Speaker, give a ruling to the effect that the argument is founded according to which it is up to the committee to decide, in which case again the government will not intervene. And, five, that you rule that the House of Commons alone can authorize the televising of the committee hearings. As I indicated earlier, we have always respected the decisions of the Speaker of the House.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, if what we heard earlier in the day was absurd, the Liberal government has just outdone itself.

If I understand the logic of the government House leader, he is saying that after great deliberation the government has not reached a decision. He is saying to backbench members—and I do not say that in any critical sense—to the regular members of the Liberal party on this committee, that they ought to humiliate themselves. That is the position—if it means anything. He is saying to members of that committee, "You deliberated carefully today. You came in with one decision and recommended it."

Mr. Knowles: Thirteen to 11.

Mr. Broadbent: "With a 13 to 11 vote, but now we think you have the right"—big deal—"to reconsider the decision."

I find that incredible, Madam Speaker. If the government is changing its mind on the question of televising the proceedings of this committee, as it ought to, then surely it ought not to humiliate its members of Parliament who sit on that committee. I am not cricitizing the members for this, Madam Speaker. If this was a caucus decision of the Liberal party, or a government decision, then I do not criticize members, as individuals, for voting as they did in committee. In this House of Commons we act as parties so I do not criticize members of that committee who voted as they did. I criticize the caucus, or the government, for deciding that members ought to vote that way. That is the way we work in the House of Commons. On crucial matters the Conservative caucus decides how their members on a committee should vote, as does the Conservative party.

The government puts forth a hypocritical argument, suggesting that somehow its members are autonomous, that they voted one way this morning and that now they may reconsider.

If the government had any integrity at all on this point, Madam Speaker, surely it would admit it is wrong and ought to have made the decision to televise the committee proceedings in the first place. It would say that the Government of Canada intends to introduce a resolution to this House to permit the committee proceedings to be televised. That would be the honourable course of action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Instead of admitting it is wrong, and among other matters, that is the Liberal party's great historical failure, never admitting that it is wrong, instead of saying it made a mistake and has now changed its mind, it is going to force ordinary members of Parliament to reverse themselves as individuals. What an uncharitable, dastardly, despicable course of action that is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I just want the government House leader to know that I listened to him very quietly. I gave him the opportunity to take the only position which is acceptable in these circumstances. There is no other acceptable decision in this House today except for the government House leader to stand on his feet in this place and move a motion in amendment of the resolution that stands in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). There is nothing else acceptable in this Parliament. I give the government House leader another chance.

● (1700)

I did not speak idly at the outset of the debate. I have been in the hon. member's position, and I did not speak idly with respect to it. Quite frankly, I expected a more acceptable response. I expected the government House leader, not just as the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, but as leader of the House of Commons, to take his responsibilities with respect to that very seriously. I want to tell him now that I am sadly disappointed and I say that to him directly. Our relationship in this House of Commons has been a good one, notwithstanding differences of opinion that have arisen. I do not like to see a good man being made a tool of a bad government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Look who is talking.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But that is what has happened to my hon. friend. Nothing occurred during the course of these events that gave me any idea that that kind of response would come from the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, indeed from the leader of the House of Commons. In the best interests of this place I say to him that nothing else is acceptable. Nothing else is acceptable to us with respect to the operation of this place than for my hon. friend later today to seek the permission of the House of Commons to revert to motions, and introduce an amendment to the motion in the way discussed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), so as to take the responsibility which is implicit in the ruling given by Madam Speaker. This is a responsibility which lies on the shoulders of the government, led in this House by my friend, the government House leader. Nothing else is acceptable. He should understand that, and so should his colleagues.

There have been some discussions in this House about the importance of the motion of closure to the operations of the House. That matter is important, but this is important too. We have been fed nothing but double talk. The issue is a clear one. As a government does it want this done or not? It is its responsibility. The government cannot hang the backbenchers and private members out to dry to evade their responsibility but that is what the government is doing.

Mr. Chénier: Just worry about your guys.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My friends over there say "Do not worry about us". I am not worried too much about them. But I am worried about what the people of Canada are going to see, what they are going to think of this Parliament, and what they are going to think of the process which is as important as the resolution. I am worried about the operation of this place in the face of a government which has become so arrogant that it would fly in the face of a request to televise a committee. Is that what the minister of communications wants? Is that the kind of openness which the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) responsible for freedom of information wants? Is that what the government wants? My friends say this is pompous indignation. I tell you it is righteous indignation, and hon. members opposite are going to feel the effects of this for a long, long time.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I attempt to sum up in just a sentence or two what has been said over here. If it is true that the government has had second thoughts and has decided to permit radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the committee, I tell the government to do it directly. Do not do it in the contrived way of asking the 13 Liberals to cast a different vote tonight than they cast this morning. I say to the government House leader to do it directly, and bring in the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Be a man.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I regret the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has left the chamber because I wanted to give an answer. The hon. member asked us not to humiliate our members on the committee. That is exactly why I would not ask them to vote again on the issue. Because we respect our members on the committee, I would not make that move, and because we respect the parliamentary procedure and practice we will not interfere in the committee's right to deal with its own procedure.

That being said, I want to give the House leader of the Tory party an answer, who in my view is also a good man and a tool for a better position. He has asked me to move a motion to ask a legally constituted committee to change its mind. I will not do that. I will do what I said I would do, and that is to respect this parliamentary committee which has rendered a decision. If it wants to reconsider that decision, it may do so, but we will not interfere.

We could have chosen the route of doing nothing.

An hon. Member: That is exactly what you are doing.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we could have chosen to let you rule on this matter, waited for your ruling and allowed the decision to stand. I have offered to talk to the co-chairmen to let them know that if they want to reconsider their decision, we will not object because the government has no position on this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: We are not against television and we are not for television in the committee. We have always said it was up to the committee to decide on its own procedure. A decision has been made and we respect the membership of that committee. If they reconsider, we will accept their decision, whatever it is. That is what I intend to do unless the opposition objects. If the opposition objects, we will act as good parliamentarians and wait for your decision on this issue, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the government House leader has said that the government is not going to interfere with the committee but he will talk to the co-chairman.

Mr. Pinard: If you wish.

Mr. Clark: He has said the government could have chosen the route of doing nothing. What troubles us, Madam Speaker, is that the government has chosen the route of doing nothing. One question that is open to this House is this: what will be the reaction of the Government of Canada if you persist in the decision you issued to the chairman of the special committee on the handicapped and ruled that the committee was not competent to make a decision to request radio and television coverage of that committee? That has been your ruling, Madam Speaker. If you persist in that ruling, the question then becomes, will the government act? The House leader listed five points. The fifth one had to do with whether the government would act in those circumstances, and the House leader did not answer that.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, I did.

Mr. Clark: What he said was they would respect that situation. He did not say what the government would do. He said earlier that the government does not intend to interfere. A failure to act on this question, where only the government can act, is to express an opinion. It has expressed an opinion against the right of the people of Canada to see and to hear what is going on in the constitutional committee in the discussion of the Constitution of Canada.

I rise to make that last point, and I apologize for the heat in making it, but I do it simply because I think there has been an attempt to suggest that a change of position has occurred when no change of position has occurred at all on the part of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I did say I would not recognize any more speakers, and then I had a series of points of order and answers to those points of order. However, I think it is time now to put an end to this debate. I will try to do my best to allow the House to come to a normal conclusion of what everyone will recognize has been a very lively debate.

On several occasions the opinion I expressed in this letter, which is referred to, has been mentioned as being a ruling, by many hon. members. I have some doubt as to whether that should be considered a ruling. I base that doubt on very common sense arguments. If I write a letter to an hon. member, I might expect that member to reply to me and disagree with some of the words I put in my letter. There could be an exchange of correspondence between myself and a member, or even the chairman of a committee. It is on that common sense argument that I am not prepared to affirm that what I wrote in that letter is a ruling. It is an opinion. If it were a ruling, nobody could refute it. Therefore, rulings have to be dealt with extremely carefully. Writing a letter is a different matter from making a ruling in the solemn House of Commons.

I did express an opinion; that is quite clear. I have the letter before me. I can read from it as hon. members have done. I expressed an opinion "that any committee seeking to televise its proceedings must first get the authorization of the House". I will certainly try to be consistent and stick by that opinion, but only after having considered the context and the background against which I expressed that opinion, namely, that I was answering a letter regarding a request from a committee of Parliament dealing with the handicapped and disabled, which was travelling across the country. They were asking me whether the proceedings could be televised through the device of certain hook-ups of community channels, or possibly the bicycling of tapes from that committee. There could be a context or background against which this opinion would have to be interpreted. I want to take time to do just that. I repeat, I will be consistent with the meaning, after second thought and careful reading of that letter, and of the opinion which I expressed in the last paragraph of the letter.

Notwithstanding that opinion which was expressed, I want to remind the members that the matter of deciding if broadcasting is to take place lies with all sorts of people, but not with me. I cannot decide whether the proceedings will be broadcast. I might express an opinion on how that can happen. If a decision is taken in respect of that, in the committee or in the House, there are proceedings to allow that to happen. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to how these things can happen. Therefore, the decision will not be made by me. I want to make it quite clear that that is not my responsibility.

With regard to the interpretation the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) put on the third paragraph in my letter, he said that I had affirmed that the committees are without authority to broadcast their proceedings. Later on in the debate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) read that paragraph in its entirety. I just want to warn the hon. member for Provencher that he should not take it to mean that these committees have definitely not been endowed with authority to take those decisions. "To date", in this Parliament, "no further action has been taken" with regard to "the broadcasting of the proceedings of committees. Failing such a decision of the House, the committees are without authority to broadcast their proceedings." They were thus not consciously deprived of that authority. The matter, and I will check into the record, simply has not been resolved.

The intention might have been to give those committees that authority. I will have to refer back, and this is precisely what I want to do, to the minutes and the resolution, and look in greater detail at the context in which my opinion was expressed. I repeat, I will do my best to be consistent with the opinion I expressed and to ascertain whether that opinion is in reference to certain circumstances which cannot be paralleled with the circumstances that we are now discussing. I will take this matter which has been raised as a question of privilege, under advisement.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BEATTY—INTERIM REPORTS BY SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could we also have an explicit ruling from you as to whether the committee is empowered to issue interim reports to the House or whether that will result in the termination of the life of the committee, as suggested by the government House leader this afternoon? This is critical to the whole conduct of the committee's activities.

Madam Speaker: That was not raised in the question of privilege. I will base my ruling on what was raised in the House in the course of the exchanges on the question of privilege.

Mr. Beatty: Could I get some clarification from you, Madam Speaker. I apologize, Madam Speaker, I am genuinely confused. What I would like is to request from you at this time a ruling as to whether the committee on the constitution has the authority to issue interim reports, or whether the issuing of a report to both Houses would result in the termination of the committee under the terms of reference granted to the committee.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has asked me to interpret the order of reference of that committee. It is not for me to interpret it.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Victoria-Madawaska (Mr. Corbin) quoted Beauchesne. Also, the government House leader this afternoon read from the French version of Beauchesne, which I do not have before me, in support of an argument that any issuance of an interim report by the committee would result in the termination of the life of that committee. That quotation was read into the record by the government House leader. It leaves the House in a very difficult situation.

An explicit assurance was given in the Senate by the government House leader in the Senate that interim reports would be legal and proper. In the House of Commons this afternoon his counterpart, the government House leader here, indicated his firm belief, quoting Beauchesne, that the issuance of any report by that committee would lead to the termination of that committee.

What we need from you, Madam Speaker, is a judgment on the basis of Beauchesne, citation 591, as to whether an interim report by that committee would lead to the termination of that committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it is getting late and I do not intend to go on at length. I shall simply refer you to the text of the motion passed by the House and the citations from Beauchesne mentioned by my learned colleague. I believe that you will find there all that you need to make a ruling.

[English]

Madam Speaker: I will not render a decision. I will only tell the hon. member that I will look at that problem if and when it arises, but not at the present time.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, perhaps the government House leader would simplify matters if he would tell us whether it was his intention and the intention of the government in drafting that reference to preclude and prevent the special joint committee from making interim reports.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is trying to make me say something that probably did not cross my mind. All that I have said is that the resolution or motion is there. It has been passed. A question of privilege has been raised and you must look at the facts.

What were the motives of the government? I could spend a lot of time replying to the right hon. member because, without any context, this element could lead to false conclusions. I do not want to spend too much time on this issue, but since I have been asked what could have motivated us in the wording of the motion passed by the House and debated, for too long in my opinion, I shall note that I could say quite a lot on this issue. The right hon. member is well aware that we could easily have avoided the committee stage and not have referred the matter to a committee. He is very lucky that we have not done so, but he still complains. He is not even complaining about the substance, but about the form.

We decided to go to a committee, and we chose to do this so that the opposition would have more time to look at the technical aspects of the proposal, Madam Speaker. If the right hon. member wants to know the motives of the action taken by the government, I could spend a lot of time explaining why we wanted to extend this courtesy to the opposition and decided on a three-stage debate when we could very well have chosen a single-stage debate.

● (1720)

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker what I am interested in determining is whether it will be possible for the joint committee on the constitution to make interim reports to this House and to the Senate of Canada without, by the very fact of making such reports, terminating the existence of the committee. I suppose the reason we ask that question is that there has been an explicit assurance given by the minister's colleague in cabinet, the House leader of the government in the Senate, that there would be the possibility of interim reports. The government House leader in this chamber has now given us a version of his reading of Beauchesne which would suggest that what his colleague said in the Senate is not true in the House of Commons. We obviously cannot have a situation where that prevails.

Perhaps we could simplify matters—if the government House leader does not want to speak of motives relating to what we have done in the past—if he would tell us whether he is prepared to join with us now in expressing the view and acting on the view, if that is necessary, that the special joint committee on the constitution should have the right to make interim reports. It would also simplify matters if the government House leader expressed the view that the action of making interim reports would not stop the life of the joint committee. Would he agree to join with the House of Commons to take such action as is necessary—and the Senate—to ensure that the life of that committee would not be jeopardized by its reporting back to the two Houses which gave it birth?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking me to render a decision in your stead. His own colleague has raised a question of privilege. You have a ruling to make and he puts the question to me; in other words they want to know what I think. Before you take your decision I am expected to give him a legal opinion as to whether your ruling is going to be right or wrong. As I see it, Madam Speaker, that approach is ridiculous. Then the hon. member will be seeking the floor to ask me whether the committee will be allowed to travel. Then again, can the committee not wait to report only in February? And again he will rise to ask me: can we take your place and govern? Well, my answer to that one is no, our party was returned to power in the last election. We assume our responsibilities, we show respect for Parliament and we have agreed to three stages in a debate which could very well have been limited to only one. The Leader of the Opposition undermines the character of this institution when he attempts to restrict the debate to questions of procedure rather than deal with the substance of the proposition which is aimed at turning Canada into a new country, a modern country with a renewed federalism.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I put the same question to the government House leader in another way? What is the point of his offering to speak to the two co-chairmen of the committee and telling them that the government would not mind their reconsidering the matter of radio and television broadcasting unless—if perchance the committee changes its mind and votes for it—it has the authority to make a report to this House? Should that not be cleared up, or would it not be better for the government to bring in the motion itself?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: It is much simpler than that, Madam Speaker. For me, the usefulness of speaking to the two co-chairmen, if the opposition parties do not object, is that it will give them an opportunity to review all the comments made on that question by members of the House today. Should they feel that those comments bring to light new facts which would warrant reconsideration on their part, the decision is theirs. They will base their decision on that. They will settle the issue in committee, not here in the House of Commons. They do not need to report to the House of Commons to have that permission. The committee can very well review the question and change its decision. As I said earlier to the Leader of the Opposition, should the Chair rule that the House of Commons must decide, then we will respect the ruling. He has sought to cast some doubt on my comments, but again I repeat that we will abide by the ruling. Abiding by your ruling, Madam Speaker, means that we will act accordingly.

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I will be brief. On this point the government House leader keeps referring to the three stages the government has chosen for the manner in which the proposed resolution should be dealt with. He says that the government was forthcoming in the matter of the three stages. No matter what his view or interpretation is on whether the government was forthcoming or not, the fact is that the matter is before a committee, so that committee has to function.

There are a number of motions which I intend to move this evening in terms of the working of the committee which might result in committee members making the decision to come back to this House and ask for permission along certain lines. The way the matter stands now, before we go to that committee at eight o'clock tonight, it is still that if we do not get a ruling prior to that time, the point will be made that if the committee makes those requests, by the very fact that its requests will be made in a report to this House the committee ceases to operate. I suggest, with all respect, that the matter should be clarified before that committee reconvenes its sittings at eight o'clock tonight because those issues will be before it at that time.

Madam Speaker: I am afraid hon. members are asking me to rule on something which is quite hypothetical. I now have Beauchesne citation 591 which says, and I quote:

> A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House. The report cannot afterwards be sent back to the committee with instructions to amend it in any particular way unless the House agrees to revive the committee by adding the following words—

Obviously, if and when that report comes back to the House, the House can agree to something else, and it is not for me to determine in advance, not knowing what that committee will report back to the House, what is going to happen. Therefore, there is no need for me to rule on this particular point, and I would like to proceed with the routine proceedings of the day, if I have the permission of the House.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, this has been a detailed and confusing day for all of us. Perhaps the point has not been made as clearly as it should have been.

We are not concerned at this stage about the final report, although that is an important matter. What we are concerned about is the right of the committee to make an interim report because there may well be an interim report, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has suggested, recommending that there be an amendment in the reference to allow televising and radio broadcasting of proceedings. There may be an amendment allowing the committee to travel. There may well be an amendment allowing certain groups of people to be paid to come to give their views on the constitution. Those would be interim reports, and the argument put forward by the government House leader is that once an interim report is issued, the committee is dead. Naturally, if that is the case—Your Honour is shaking your head, and we shook our heads too, but that is what the government House leader said—the committee will be meeting tonight on other questions in the same circumstances in which it met this morning on the question in relation to television.

The members of the committee will be meeting under what they take to be an edict as to what they are not free to do. They met today and believed they were not free to ask for radio and television coverage, so they did not. Unless this question is resolved, they may meet tonight believing they are not free to make an interim report, and they will consequently not make an interim report. That is why it is urgent that the question of interim reports—not of final reports—be resolved.

Madam Speaker: If I may answer the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on the point, as I read the citation, it seems to me that the special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final—not interim—report is presented. As I understand the rules, that committee can decide that it is making an interim report to this House. Therefore, if the report is an interim report, the committee still exists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, I respect your interpretation of the English version of Beauchesne, but for those of us who use the French text there is ambiguity. It is not clear, it is far from being clear. If I read the reference of the House—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I did not read the French text, but the logic of the English version is absolutely impeccable and I would be surprised if the translation were that far off. Still I take note of the comments of the hon. member but I cannot accept his intervention because I have already said that the question is closed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton would not like to be reminded that today is Thursday.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to thank my hon. friend for his reminder of the calendar. The government House leader may have some announcements in mind with respect to the business of the House for the next little while. Perhaps he could make them.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, today is the last day of debate on the budget. There will be a vote this evening at 9.45. Tomorrow we will begin study of the report stage of Bill C-6, an Act to revise the Bank Act. Next week, beginning Monday, we will continue with the Bank Act revision until adoption on third reading.

Some hon. Members: Wednesday!

Mr. Pinard: Sorry, hon. members are right, beginning Wednesday since the House will not sit on Monday. An order has already been made to that effect. As specified in the motion adopted by the House yesterday, the hours lost on Monday will be recuperated but they will have to be spent on the banking legislation and that is why I say, Madam Speaker, that we will consider that bill until adoption on third reading. As a result of a meeting with parliamentary leaders it has been decided that if there is to be a debate on the proclamations which are to be tabled shortly after the budget debate and which concern the energy policy that debate will not begin before November 21. That was the agreement among parliamentary leaders. Since that has been agreed to by all parties we are now free to begin the uninterrupted study of the banking legislation with the hope that it will pass third reading as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Will the government House leader indicate to the House when he will be calling the continuation of the second reading debate of Bill C-42, the Post Office Crown corporation bill? Could he also tell the House whether, in keeping with the recommendations made in the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, tabled in the House in July, the regulation-enabling clauses of the bill will be sent to the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments? Is the government prepared to send the regulation-enabling clauses of the bill to that committee?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as to the last question of the hon. member, I understand—and this is the agreement I had with the House leader of the hon. member's party—that there is a notice of motion for concurrence in those reports on the order paper. Such motions would not be put before consultation with me, according to the understanding we have, since there are at least two other groups looking at the same matter, namely, the task force on regulations, the special committee of the House, and the Economic Council of Canada which is supposed to report some time in January or February on the same subject. So I would not like to deal with these reports at this stage before those two groups at least have had a chance to report.

In so far as Bill C-42, the Post Office Act, is concerned I intend to call that bill for second reading. We had hoped it would have been sent to committee much earlier, but there are more speeches to come from the hon. member's party than were expected. We hope that after we conclude our debate on the Bank Act, this bill will be sent quickly to the committee so that we can go on to deal with the bill on access to information and send that to committee with the least delay possible before we deal with the last seven allotted days before December 10.

Mr. Beatty: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I might have confused the government House leader. The question I asked relates expressly to Bill C-42. It would certainly facilitate passage of that bill in terms of debate on second reading if the government House leader were prepared to send the regulation-enabling clauses of Bill C-42 to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for study following second reading debate. Is he prepared to do that?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will consult with the Postmaster General as soon as possible. But in any case we would much prefer the bill to be sent to committee right away, if possible.

PETITIONS

MR. GREENAWAY—PETITIONS RESPECTING NATURAL GAS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of my constituents in British Columbia and those of my colleagues, the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), who strongly express their opposition to a federal excise tax on natural gas.

The petitions presented herein contain in excess of 6,000 signatures of British Columbia residents and are in addition to the over 26,000 tabled by my colleagues last October 24. As this is the last day of the debate on the budget which imposes this unjust and unconstitutional export tax, as well as a crippling tax on domestic users of natural gas, I appeal to all hon. members to reject this deceitful and destructive budget. I respectfully submit these petitions on behalf of my five colleagues and myself to you, Madam Speaker, and I ask for their serious consideration.

SOVIET UNION—NEWS MEDIA IN CANADA

Question No. 80—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names and addresses of all members of the news media from the Soviet Union who have been granted visas to operate in Canada and, in each case (a) what was the date that they came to Canada (b) who did they replace, if this information is available?

2. What are the names and addresses of former members of the Russian news media granted visas to operate in Canada over the past six years and, if any are no longer in Canada, to the knowledge of the government, what is the reason?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration):

1. N. Y. Bragin (a) October 8, 1974 (b)K. Y. Gevyandov

   V. N. Osetrov (a) September 29, 1976(b) V. K. Kurnikov

   V. R. Polonskiy (a) October 30, 1976 (b) I. I. Mironov

   A. V. Sandakov (a) March 1, 1979 (b) A. A. Palladin

2. K. Y. Gevyandov (left Canada September 27, 1973)

   V. K. Kurnikov (left Canada October 9, 1976)

   I. I. Mironov (left Canada September 8, 1976)

   A. A. Palladin (left Canada March 8, 1979)

In so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is concerned, we are not aware of their reasons for departing Canada.

NOTE: The government does possess the addresses, however, they are not given since departmental policy in keeping with the spirit of the Canadian Human Rights Act is not to provide such personal information.

LOANS TO JAMAICA

Question No. 1,417—Mr. Blenkarn:

Has the government made any loans to Jamaica and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what are the repayment terms (c) has Jamaica defaulted on any payments?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Finance, the Export Development Corporation and the Canadian International Development Agency as follows: On November 9, 1976, Canada entered into a loan agreement with the Government of Jamaica to provide a Canadian $25 million loan from the Department of Finance, with repayment in full six months thereafter and interest payable at the average annual rate of interest on six-month Treasury bills, namely 8.93 per cent. Principal on the loan was rolled over three times due to Jamaica's financial difficulties, but interest was kept current. On August 9, 1978, the loan was converted to a three-year loan at the Crown corporation rate of interest on three-year money, namely 8.875 per cent, with the entire principal due at term, subject to interest being paid annually and to maintenance of a standby arrangement with the IMF. Jamaica has been current with respect to interest payments since conversion of the loan into a medium-term instrument. The Export Development Corporation has extended six loans to Jamaica, two under government account (section 31) and the remainder under corporate account (section 29). Total value of these loans was Canadian $8.1 million under section 31 and Canadian $42.6 million under Section 29. There are no arrears in payments to EDC. Because of commercial confidentiality, EDC cannot disclose its rates of interest. Attached is a detailed schedule of these loans indicating dates signed, amounts of financing and principal outstanding, and purpose of each loan.

75/76	248
76/77	368
77/78	341
78/79	405
79/80	498

*Records for fiscal years 1970/71 to 1972/73 are not available. However, it is known that average strength during that period was less than 7, the strength in 1973/74.

GRAIN HOPPER CARS

Question No. 1,582—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many grain hopper cars were provided by the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba under the agreement reached with the previous Progressive Conservative government?

2. How many new hopper cars were provided by the government in the fiscal year (a) 1979-80 (b) 1980-81?

3. Did the CNR and CPR provide new hopper cars in (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 (d) 1980 and, if so, in each case, how many?

4. Did the Liberal government proceed with the lease arrangement for providing hopper cars advocated by the Progressive Conservative government and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No formal agreement was reached with the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba concerning the supply of grain cars. However, in accordance with verbal commitments Alberta and Saskatchewan have each ordered 1,000 cars for grain service; Manitoba agreed to lease 450 cars for up to one year and in fact leased 653 cars for a shorter peak period. (500 March-September, 1980; 153 May, 1980—January, 1981).

2. (a) None;

(b) 2,000 (currently being delivered).

3. No.

4. Yes.

*INQUIRY WHETHER CMHC WILL REHABILITATE THE AHOP HOMES IN THE VIRGINIA PARK AREA OF ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,424—Mr. McGrath:

Will CMHC rehabilitate the AHOP homes in the Virginia Park area of St. John's, Newfoundland and, if so (a) what is the total to be spent (b) how many units are involved (c) what amount has been paid in legal fees and to whom and in what amounts (d) what is the estimated total in legal fees to be paid (e) on what date will the project be completed?

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, concerning question No. 1,424, CMHC is currently rehabilitating 151 units in the Virginia Park area of St. John's, Newfoundland, which were built by Brenjay Construction Company Limited in 1974-75 under the Assisted Home Ownership Program.

(a) $3,800,000 is the current estimate which includes repair costs, legal and consulting engineering fees, administration and children recreation program costs.

Part (b) 151 units.

Part (c) As of July 29, 1980, $27,036.16 has been invoiced and paid to date; a further $63,000 has been committed.

T. Williams of the firm Williams, Williams and Buffett, paid as of July 29, 1980 — nil
Committed — $31,500
Total — $31,500

N. Whalen, of the firm Martin, Whalen and Hennebury, paid as of July 29 — $27,036.16
Committed — $31,500.00

Total — $58,536.16

Part (d) Estimated total legal fees: budget of $100,000.

Part (e) Contract completion date is December 1, 1980, for exterior shell of all dwelling units and July 31, 1981, for the complete work. The contractor is currently ahead of schedule and subtantial completion of all works is expected by the end of October, 1980.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 5, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, when six o'clock was called last evening, I was drawing a brief verbal picture of the contrast between the conditions which led up to the celebrations on our one hundredth anniversary, the attitude of the people at that time, and the attitude and feelings of the nation at present. Perhaps I can enlarge on that comparison and point out the reasons for this change of attitude on the part of the people.

● (1740)

A reference to the first two paragraphs of the statement of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) given in the House on October 28 might provide some relevant information. The first paragraph reads as follows:

It is a budget which sets new directions for the economy—directions which will ensure both energy security and economic security for Canadians in the years ahead.

The second paragraph reads:

—we have inherited many difficulties from the decade of the 70s.

I call the attention of the House to those statements because a great deal of the blame for the deterioration of economic conditions and a deterioration in the feelings and expectations of the people lies directly at the feet of the present government. My assumption or declaration is substantiated in those two paragraphs. The first paragraph points out new directions, which implies that the directions of the past have been inadequate and have not accomplished anything as far as the country is concerned. The second paragraph indicates that we have inherited many difficulties from the decade of the seventies. The first nine years of that decade were under the guidance and control of the Liberal government. Therefore, as far as this is concerned, the blame lies on their doorstep as well.

One big problem in the Canadian political system is the widespread cynicism with which the public views politicians, political parties and elections. When the Liberals were in opposition last year, they capitalized on that cynicism. Through lack of the full truth, sometimes through untruths and sometimes through deception, they misrepresented the policies of the Conservative government and encouraged the public to believe they were the defenders of integrity, in the hopes of being re-elected. Part of the country re-elected the Liberals, and now, they are in office, we find just how much integrity the government possesses. I suggest that it is practically nil.

If a government had set out deliberately to promote cynicism in the public of Canada, it could not have done a better job than the Minister of Finance did in introducing his budget last week. The government promised to keep oil prices down, and it is raising prices higher than those projected in the Conservative budget. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised to protect the needy against inevitable energy price increases, and the budget does nothing for them. The Liberals promised fiscal responsibility, and the budget shows that they are planning a 15.2 per cent increase in government spending. The Prime Minister crossed back and forth across the country decrying the 18 cents per gallon excise tax of the Conservative party. In one breath the Minister of Finance announced there would be no excise tax, and in the next he slapped on what he called a Canadian ownership charge which could easily be 30 cents per gallon next year. Depending upon what oil company Petro-Canada decides to buy, it could be 60 cents per gallon or $1. Who knows what the limit will be?

The minister announced in one paragraph that the government had abandoned the export tax on natural gas, and in the next he announced an export tax on natural gas. How cynical can a person be. He said, "We have abandoned our decision to impose an excise tax on the export of gas", and then he turned around and said, "Yes, we have done that, but we have decided to put the tax on foreign and Canadian purchasers". Instead of abandoning it, he doubled its effect by making it applicable not only to the users abroad but to Canadians. How magnificently generous the minister is. I say this with some degree of skepticism and perhaps worse than that.

The Prime Minister promised he would work at bringing down the budgetary deficit, yet the budget increases the deficit by $3.6 billion this year. I will come back to some of these items in a few moments, but first I want to say a few words about the condition of the country as a result of 12 years of Trudeau administration.

I and many of my colleagues in the House were deprived of the right to speak in the Parliament of our country by the high-handed, dictatorial imposition of closure by the government. The government has no comprehension of the aspirations of western Canada. There is no appreciation of the western point of view. Instead, there seems to be a deliberate attempt by the Prime Minister to isolate western Canada.

We are all aware of the actions of the Prime Minister and his government during their first term of office from 1968 to 1972. They were typified by his classic statement, "Why should I sell your wheat?" Promises have been made to western Canada to come to grips with the sources of western discontent, to rectify the discriminatory freight rates. The promises were made but they were never kept.

After introducing a constitutional amendment act which strikes at the very heart of the federal system, making the provinces second class citizens and the western and Atlantic provinces third class, we are presented with a budget that is essentially a massive confiscation of western economic power.

When westerners voice their disapproval of these actions, the Prime Minister goes out of his way to add insult to injury and calls us "hysterical", "irrational" and "lacking in reason". It has a very familiar ring. In the spring of 1976 the Prime Minister proclaimed that Quebec separatism was dead. In the fall of 1976 René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois were elected to office in Quebec. So much for the views of the Prime Minister as to when discontent becomes separatism. Late last week surveys were taken which showed that one out of four Albertans believed Alberta should separate. It is frightening that 25 per cent of the population wishes to separate and the Prime Minister says that the feeling for separatism is nil in western Canada.

I should like to refer to a meeting held in my riding approximately two weeks ago at which the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) was the guest speaker. The feelings that were vented at that meeting were such as to cause tremendous concern. They represented a reaction to the government's policies and attitude toward western Canada. One businessman said afterwards, "I travel around all the time and I talk to a lot of people in this community. What I hear scares me. I am afraid, I am afraid". Yet the Prime Minister said the feeling of alienation and separatism in western Canada was nil. I say he does not know what he is talking about; he does not know how the people feel. We in western Canada are not hysterical; we are not lacking in intelligence or reason; we are not irrational. For the benefit of the Prime Minister and everyone else involved in this regionally-based central Canadian Liberal government, I must state categorically that I do not appreciate certain things and I reject them. I reject the unilateral constitutional proposal of the Prime Minister. I reject his unilaterally and federally imposed charter of human rights and its eroding of parliamentary supremacy by transferring legislative powers, including those concerning the natural resources dealt with in the budget, to the federally appointed supreme court. I reject the proposal of the Prime Minister to turn British Columbia and the other western provinces into second and third-class citizens. I want no part of colonial status. I reject the concept of having another nation amend our constitution in a way which would never be approved by Canadians. These things were all tied up, not only with the constitutional debate, but with the budget debate as well. We reject the massive transfers of jurisdiction over property and civil rights and education to the federal government under the constitutional proposal.

● (1750)

We have talked about the rights that were supposed to be enshrined in the constitution. With this in mind I want to quote the words of Harold Laski—at least my friends in the New Democratic Party will realize who he is. He said:

> A vigilant legislature and the existence of a citizen body which is conscious that rights do matter and is willing if need be to fight for those rights is the best guarantee of human rights.

Mr. Speaker, I hope to have the opportunity to speak some time later in the constitution debate. I wish to reiterate what several of my colleagues from the west have said in their own way and I advise the Prime Minister and his cabinet to withdraw the suggestions and proposals which are before us and start over again so as to bring something back which will be acceptable right across the country.

I move on, now, to the catalogue of broken promises which have become evident in this budget. I suggest that the budget is the epitome of hypocrisy. In his press conference a week ago the Prime Minister in the same statement in which he said separatism in the west was nil, went on to admonish western Canadians for not electing members of Parliament to the national government. I was amazed that none of the reporters challenged him on that point. I remind the House that a little earlier he had said there were no members elected. But there had been members elected in the previous government. It was not satisfactory as far as he was concerned.

The Prime Minister promised there would be no excise tax on gasoline. The Minister of Finance makes provision for what he calls a Canadian ownership charge of up to an extra $4.50 per barrel. During the election campaign last February the Liberals were promising some form of assistance to lower income Canadians. The budget has done nothing at all in this area of assistance. It provides that the cost of oil will be 85 per cent of the world price by 1984. That is exactly what our budget provided. In addition, the minister neglected to add his Canadian ownership charge, which all Canadians will have to pay on home heating oil, gasoline and oil products.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. I believe he is nearing the end of his speech but if he is to continue, unanimous consent would be required.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Patterson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A major part of our policy when we were in government was to cut deficit and we directed a good deal of our effort toward that end. We felt we could have cut the budgetary deficit in half by 1983-84. This government, which promised to work on cutting the deficit, has broken that promise again. The deficit is up by $3.6 billion. It now costs some $12 billion per year in interest payments alone on the national debt—more than the total federal government budget when the Prime Minister took office in 1968. Canada cannot go on in this way.

In conclusion, I would like to quote a statement made by Mr. William Simon, former secretary of the treasury of the United States of America to a committee:

> You asked, Mr. Chairman, about the consequences of deficits. But we all know what they are. We know that neither man nor business nor government can spend more than is taken in for very long. If it continues, the result must be bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, we as a nation will become bankrupt. We already have a bankrupt government.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As suggested by the Minister for Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) the Chair will call it six o'clock.

Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.57 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at six o'clock, the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) had been given the floor.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased to have an opportunity to take part in the debate on the budget brought down by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) because it is surely one of the most complete statements on a policy which will certainly surely characterize the various aspects of the Canadian economy during the next decade, not only at the energy, fiscal and budgetary levels, but also at the industrial, technological and regional levels.

If Canada has a special characteristic compared with other countries it is because implicitly or explicitly as a result of its size and its space since 1867, the federal government has recognized that it should assume a responsibility to enable all Canadians to take advantage of the opportunities available in this country. And what is more remarkable in the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance is perhaps that for the first time it had such a regional character.

Several of the measures proposed by the Minister of Finance are directed to specific areas, whether the centre, the north, the west, the province of Quebec or the maritimes. Personally, as the minister in charge of regional development, I mean to alleviate regional inequalities, for I know as well as any other hon. member to what extent one's quality of life and standard of living are largely conditioned by the area in which one lives. And if one resides away from the areas where most of the economic activities are concentrated, one, more often than not, is very likely to get fewer advantages and benefits than one would be otherwise entitled as a Canadian.

As an MP who comes from one of the less-favoured areas, the riding of Matapédia-Matane, I know what disastrous effects the problems of unemployment, of per capita incomes that are lower than the national average, can have on the morale of the men, women and children who live there.

If there is anything that is obvious to every one of us, it certainly is that the opportunities for development, for growth and employment, are, to a large extent determined by the area where one lives. There are several areas where the opportunity to earn about as much as the average fellow-citizen is just about non-existent.

That is why I am so pleased with the measures introduced by the Minister of Finance in his budget: several of them are designed specifically to reduce regional disparities.

I do not want to spend time on all those measures, but may I be allowed to say that, generally speaking, the economy and the principles on which this budget is built, to my mind are based on common sense, courage and justice; in addition, they avoid all sorts of solutions that are as erroneous as they are simplistic. As I said at the beginning, this budget represents the gigantic effort of undertaking a new policy whose magnitude in the field of energy will mean, not only security of supplies for Canadians, not only justice for Canadians, regardless of whether they live in the producing or the consuming provinces, but also the opportunity for Canadian industry to get off to a fresh start.

• (2010)

[English]

For many months I have been speaking with my colleagues on both sides of the House about the great and immediate need for their ideas and assistance in improving the federal response to the economic development needs and goals of the people of Canada. There is a need for concerted action by the Government of Canada to respond to the diverse opportunities open to Canadians across the country. Such action requires more than the attention and efforts of one agency or department. It must be the result of the efforts of all members of the House and of all the agencies and departments of the federal government in concert—I emphasize in concert—with the people and other governments of the country.

[Translation]

The economic strategy and specific budgetary measures proposed by my colleague support the point that I want to make. These proposals reflect a very cohesive federal policy which was greatly needed. Such proposals will enable us to take corrective action and develop in each area of Canada a solid economic and energy base in full recognition of both our energy dependency and our development potential related to this dependency.

[English]

In my opinion, Madam Speaker, the most important aspect of our strength as a nation lies in our diversity from region to region, combined with our willingness to share with each other the benefits, both economic and social, which this diversity brings.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance stated that the concept of sharing was for him close to the very fibre of the Canadian tradition. I share his vision of our tradition and I strongly support his view, and indeed the government's view, that Canada's economic and social destiny will depend upon the continued effort and commitment of every Canadian to share the wealth and economic opportunities which we have together made possible.

[Translation]

It is this concept of sharing, coupled with the sad realization that poverty and inequality still persist in the way of life of many Canadians, which have brought me to suggest the new special program of a 50 per cent investment tax credit. This program, which I shall describe in detail in a few moments—and I am very grateful to the Minister of Finance for having accepted what I suggested to him in co-operation with other members of my party—recognizes clearly the existence of disparities, not only among the vast regions of this country, but also within the same areas, and even, Mr. Speaker, within the richest provinces.

[English]

The special investment tax credit of 50 per cent which is under the broad direction of my department, is intended to stimulate investment, employment and economic growth in the areas of Canada where development is most desperately needed. In these specially designated regions, the federal government will offer eligible industries an investment tax credit of 50 per cent against federal taxes, payable for eligible capital costs.

[Translation]

This is certainly a very generous fiscal incentive. I would add that it is without precedent in Canadian history. No federal government and no provincial government has had the audacity to go as far in the past as granting a 50 per cent tax credit. And what should be noted is that there will be no minimum. The smallest investment in the authorized sectors will be eligible for the tax credit. There will be no useless paperwork. This will be an automatic tax credit, which will therefore be very simple to administer. There will be no paperwork, no authorization is necessary, and the tax credit will apply to even the smallest investments, whether to purchase a machine or to enlarge the facilities of a small manufacturing industry.

[English]

Madam Speaker, as you and the business community are no doubt aware, there is a system of investment tax credits already in place which was stated in 1975 and amended in 1978. Under this program the amount of credit varies from region to region in three tiers. In the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé it is 20 per cent; in other regions designated under the Regional Development Incentives Act it is 10 per cent; in the rest of Canada it is 7 per cent. To this, the government has now added a fourth tier—the specially designated areas to which I have referred, areas which by national standards are most in need of assistance to overcome their problems of low income and lack of meaningful employment opportunities.

[Translation]

Consequently we are proposing a fourth level tax credit of 50 per cent. This measure is unprecedented as no government, as I have said, whether federal or provincial, has ever gone that far. For example, a few years ago, Quebec and Ontario had a special program of tax credit as an incentive to small and medium businesses. The tax credit to investors was in that case of 25 per cent only. Now, the tax credit—I see that Madam Speaker has returned to the chair—will be limited to $15,000, plus half of the taxes to be paid over that amount. For instance, if a company invests $100,000 eligible for tax credit and its federal taxes are $25,000, the tax credit will bring down the taxes thus: $15,000 plus half the taxes for the year, which is $12,500. Therefore, the tax credit will amount to $27,500. As the tax due was $25,000, the tax credit cancels out the federal taxes. It is interesting to note, Madam Speaker, that the manufacturing industry has already, in some cases, the privilege to claim, as a deduction from their income, an allowance on the capital cost called amortization, which may reach 50 per cent of the cost of acquisition of the eligible goods. This new tax credit formula will, in effect, substitute a tax rebate for the amortization deduction, which is, of course, much more advantageous.

When goods subject to depreciation are sold, the income tax law stipulates that, in some cases, the total amount of depreciation claimed over the years, becomes taxable. Whereas in the case of tax credit, there is no such taxation; moreover, the amount of credit which has not been claimed one year may be carried over other taxation years. In a word, Madam Speaker, a company which, for example, owed $15,000 in taxes can completely cancel this out simply by making an eligible investment of $30,000.

[English]

Let me offer another brief illustration of how this fourth tier tax credit would work. Suppose a small manufacturing company acquires $20,000 worth of new machinery for an expansion in 1981. It would be able to claim $10,000 against its federal tax payable when it filed its income tax return for the year, giving it a gross gain of $10,000.

However, the company would not be able to claim the regular capital cost allowance on the whole $20,000. To be absolutely precise, I would say that the gross benefit would have to be reduced by 20 per cent, that is, $2,000, which would give the company a net benefit of $8,000. Of course, if the firm does not have any federal tax payable it can defer the benefit for up to five years. Similarly, if it has less tax payable than the $10,000, it would be able to take the remainder in a following year.

● (2020)

Business people may well ask how this special investment tax credit will relate to my department's other industrial incentives, such as those under the Regional Development Incentives Act. Firms which establish, expand or modernize operations in the specially designated areas may still apply for these incentives.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I realize that our colleagues from the New Democratic Party are not interested in this measure which seems to me extremely generous. We must no doubt forgive those high priests of parliamentarianism for showing us tonight they don't have any interest in a totally revolutionary measure that no NDP government has ever dared present in any of the provinces where they were in power.

One of the reasons, Madam Speaker, which motivated the government to propose an investment tax credit of 50 per cent—and as I said before, no government in Canada ever dared go so far in helping disadvantaged areas—is because the subsidy program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion does exist. The purpose of those subsidies is to help those who want to start new businesses, therefore we had to come up with a system to help those already in business and who, instead of paying taxes, will be able to invest in new businesses in areas of Canada with greatest inequalities, which are far away, and where job opportunities are few.

[English]

Most manufacturing and processing industries, as classified under the Regional Development Incentives Act, will be eligible for the 50 per cent tax credit if they establish, expand or modernize in the specially designated areas.

With this special investment tax credit program, I believe we are widening the arsenal of weapons to fight disparities in Canada. This one will prove a very useful tool, one involving a minimum of administrative requirements and one with a special appeal for small local business.

An hon. Member: A tax write-off.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I notice that once again the hon. member shows the same prejudice he demonstrated yesterday in the House—

[English]

An hon. Member: You are repeating a speech from ten years ago.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: —and I can tell him that I am sorry, I am talking about a new program, a revolutionary program that several provincial ministers of finance in their comments a few weeks ago had to recognize as being extremely generous. An investment tax credit of 50 per cent will allow every Canadian who wants to do so, to invest his savings in the most disadvantaged area and especially those who live in those areas because there is one thing I have learned since I became a member of this House that the development which occurs is due to the contribution of the people who are living in those disadvantaged areas and the government must make sure to provide them with the necessary programs. We are talking here about a very powerful tax measure which will show those people that we are going to be, as well as all the other Canadians, their partners because every one of them, instead of paying tax to the government in Ottawa, will be able to invest in those most disadvantaged areas.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. minister's allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we have heard many speakers criticizing this budget in the last few days. I think that most Canadians will agree with these criticisms whether they support Crosbie, the stand-up comic or Rae, the rational radical.

Our Liberal friends over there may admire the slick deception of their finance minister's style. However, I must say in plain English that this is a sneaky, dishonest and disgusting budget. Because of its inhumanity, this budget will put enormous hardships on Canadians and their children in future years.

I want to concentrate tonight on the effect this budget will have on the ordinary people; in particular, on what this budget means in relation to housing problems which face millions of Canadians from east to west.

First, I want to deal with unemployment. Unemployment will increase to 8.5 per cent, which means that over one million people will be unemployed, the highest percentage since the depression. Yet, when we hear these statistics, I wonder if anyone in this House feels any remorse right inside his or her gut. I would like to think of the young people whom we know personally. There are many young people who cannot get jobs, perhaps even children of members here. There are many young people who are unable to get experience or training, the things which are essential to making them employable. Young people, therefore, are really being deprived of a future. It means also that many women are affected, women who have been the last hired and the first fired. We must not forget those women who raise children. They, too, will probably have no chance of getting into the labour market in the future. Native people will continue in a lifetime welfare trap, as will many others, again including many women who are raising children on their own. Not only will there be fewer jobs but those who are working will have to pay a higher proportion of unemployment insurance, as will their employers, under the new budget. Perhaps this would not be so bad if they were sure they would be eligible for unemployment insurance if and when they become unemployed.

I must say, God help the poor fishermen in Vancouver East because they were able to work only about 14 weeks this year. They have high payments to meet on vessels and homes and they will simply not be eligible for unemployment insurance, although they have contributed for many years. These are only some examples of how unemployment and hardship will grow because of the recent budget.

Next I want to say something about the cost of living. The minister has forecast that food costs will go up 12 per cent. Many project a higher rate. Every family will pay up to $500 more per year for transportation, home heating and other tax increases. People with the least resources will suffer most. Pensioners will pay over 40 per cent of the increased guaranteed income supplement on the increased cost of their heating fuel. The average real wages of those working will grow only about 1 per cent because of rising inflation. There was nothing in this budget, even though it was supposedly an energy budget, for money-saving transportation methods, for example, a rapid transit system which is so much needed in areas such as the B.C. lower mainland. Incidentally, this was promised in 1974. Nor is there any indication in the budget that there will be a Canadian food policy. Nothing is said about a cost of living credit, a program we have advocated very strongly, to assist families who are most affected by the high cost of living.

It is not only the poor and the unemployed who are being penalized by this budget. Some of my friends to the right have been stressing the point in recent days that the people on an average income are struggling and it needs two people in the family working to survive. They, too, will also feel the pain of this budget.

I want to refer briefly to cuts in social programs. Today, the Canadian Council on Social Development again documented the trend from this budget which they proved will mean a major reduction in social program expenditures. Along with that, they predicted there would be a shift of responsibility from the federal government to the provinces. This is a very serious matter. It may well be a worse disaster than medicare, and we know what block funding did to that program. There will be absolutely no guarantee that essential services will be maintained if this responsibility is turned over completely to the provinces.

I now want to deal with the cost of shelter. Most tenants and home owners can expect in the future to pay far in excess of 25 per cent of their incomes for shelter. In fact, before this budget I knew of pensioners who were paying 60 per cent of their incomes for an apartment. Those lucky enough to afford a down payment to buy a home, will face mortgage payments that are phenomenal.

The same applies to rapidly rising rents. The average one bedroom apartment in most cities with low vacancy rates is now well over $300 a month. In my city of Vancouver that means it is exempted from rent controls. There is no mortgage interest assistance down to 9 per cent for low-income families. There is nothing to stabilize interest rates to make homes more affordable.

Before I mention the mysterious MURB myth, I want to refer to a couple of items in the energy proposals with regard to home owners and households. First is the home heating conversion. Some households will benefit from this up to $800 on the cost of converting from oil to other methods of heating. However, I understand that the Enersave program which was introduced in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island in 1977 shows that the amount being allocated is most inadequate for low-income households. The Canadian Council on Social Development reports the following:

> From the beginning, the home heating conversion experiment has been undercapitalized and the new budget unfortunately follows this same pattern. The federal government estimates that many households will have to incur costs of $1,000 or more to replace oil burning furnaces but the proposed grant will cover only 50 per cent conversion cost up to a maximum of $800.

From this we can see that most families with a low or average income cannot afford to buy a new furnace and pay the difference using the provision in this budget. I hope there will be some reconsideration of the finance pattern.

With regard to home insulation, the budget for home insulation programs is raised from $195 million to $265 million. This allows for very little expansion of this program which needs to be extended to those homes built after 1961. Even more important is the need for the government to protect consumers from fly-by-night insulation outfits which have exploited the home insulation program, often providing inadequate, costly and irresponsible service.

An hon. Member: They don't care.

Mrs. Mitchell: In connection with federal subsidies for home insulation programs, there are really no standards required by the federal government. We even find companies putting in insulation that is a hazard to health. There must be no more $30 specials which use urea formaldehyde, risking the health of home owners.

Now on to the mysterious MURB program. MURB tax shelters announced in this budget may tempt a few more developers to build luxury rental apartments. However, they will do nothing to encourage the building of affordable rental accommodation, accommodation for families.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is that MURB?

Mrs. Mitchell: That's MURB and, to their credit, the Tories did away with it. There is no increase in the budget for non-profit housing, which the Tories, too, did nothing about; nothing for co-operatives. There is no increase in RRAP, home repairs or native and northern housing. We heard several speakers from the Conservative party describe the desperate housing situation in the maritimes and northern British Columbia. Repeated evidence coming before the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation of the need and demand for social programs of the kind I have described has been completely ignored by this budget and by this finance minister.

It is well established that such programs would provide a needed stimulus to the housing and home repair industry and would create many construction jos. MURBs are tax shelters for the greedy which provide no shelter for the needy. Of all the possible alternatives which this budget could have produced to help alleviate the housing crisis in Canada, why did the minister choose the MURB approach? Why did he decide to increase our net deficit by giving away $15 million in tax write-offs to wealthy people to invest in multiple unit residential buildings which will produce only high cost bachelor or one bedroom apartments? The rents will be far higher than most average tenants can afford. We are subsidizing this program with our taxes.

Why did the minister not research the past history of the MURB-ARP program of the seventies? There are some excellent reports available from the Canadian Council on Social Development. He did not consult tenants and housing groups which are authorities on the need from the consumer point of view. When I questioned him recently in the House, the finance minister admitted that MURBs were a response to pressure from the real estate industry. He also admitted it was primarily a tax shelter for investors.

Let me review a few facts about the impact of past MURB-ARP shelters. In the seventies when developers and investors rushed to invest in rental construction to avoid taxes, they did so at the expense of family homes and family neighbourhoods. I would like to give an example in the Grandview neighbourhood of Vancouver, a family neighbourhood for many medium-income and working-class families.

Over 200 homes were torn down, fine homes that had been subdivided to accommodate two and three families. They were demolished to establish MURB-ARP bachelor apartments. Some 600 families who had been living in these homes were displaced. As a result, the population of children under the age of 14 went down by 40 per cent. That proves how little family accommodation there was. One wonders where these families went in Vancouver because we have a minus zero vacancy rate. No new public housing is being built.

Blocks of MURB apartments built by developers were sold under strata title arrangements—no longer rental, they were sold outright—to provide small investors with tax shelters. The investors received assisted rental grants as well as tax write-offs and wrote off extensive depreciation costs each year. Rents were high and suites often remained vacant. They did not care, because this was another bonanza. From the province of British Columbia they received more credits for losing money because of vacant suites. Within a few years when the depreciation write-off privileges were finished, these buildings were sold outright and profits were reinvested in a rollover kind of operation to avoid capital gains taxes.

You can imagine how much that cost, Mr. Speaker. It was not just the MURB; it was everything else that went with it. This MURB-ARP game is a very well-known Liberal rip-off, and now we are being ripped off again. It produced no social programs and no social benefits. It increased our national debt by over $300 million. That was just for the MURB part of it. Forget about the capital gains and all the other tax writeoffs. During this same period rental housing stock declined. Let me remind the House that this was a program which was to develop rental stock, but rental housing stock actually declined by 41 per cent, proof enough that this rental construction program failed. And it will fail even more now.

Mr. Deans: They still support it.

Mrs. Mitchell: However, this is what they put in their new budget.

Planners, developers and, I understand, even the HUDAC group are very skeptical now that this new MURB program will do anything to help investment in rental housing since it will take much longer for approval than an ordinary mortgage project, and the sunset date for the new MURB tax write-offs is 1981, so it hardly gives time to get started, and perhaps that is just as well.

There are reports which show that the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation was very pessimistic that this plan would work, but our finance minister apparently did not bother to consult the corporation. This history of failure in the past has made small investors wary. Manipulators of large consortia who exploited this program to build, sell and double investments were aided by government grants, tax writeoffs and rollover investments. That is a horror story of the seventies.

I would like to refer to the November 3 statement by the Canadian Council on Social Development which substantiates and enlarges everything I have been saying. The council also said that a program of this kind encourages absentee landlords, something which from a community point of view is a very undermining development.

I would like to refer again to Vancouver as an example because it is the city which has the greatest housing crisis in Canada and, as such, forewarns other centres across our land of troubled times to come. In Vancouver one-quarter of the population must put up with inadequate or unaffordable housing. Students are crowded into very inadequate suites or are sleeping in cars. Yet our federal and provincial governments are doing nothing about this. In our downtown area thousands of people are sleeping in terrible rooming houses and hotels. No public housing is being built and very little social housing is being funded. The housing crisis is going to be just as bad in Victoria, Calgary, Toronto and St. John's, Newfoundland. It will get worse, because this government refuses to work positively with the provinces to find joint solutions.

What Canada needs is a comprehensive housing program targeted to the needs of people whose earnings are under $30,000. Perhaps we should enshrine in the constitution the right of every Canadian to decent, affordable accommodation which costs no more than 25 per cent of family income.

The budget should have included an industrial strategy with emphasis on housing investment for the future. It should have included mortgage assistance payments plans. It should have included far more for social housing.

We know this country faces a very serious deficit and that we must invest wisely for the future. Surely an investment which would contribute to adequate housing for our population in the ways I have outlined, one which would strengthen families and communities, should be a high priority for any federal government. What better way to unite east and west and north and south in this great country than to ensure equality for all Canadians?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, in this first budget of the new Liberal government I believe Canadians have been presented with a solid and comprehensive foundation for meeting the central challenges of economic performance.

Mr. Deans: How can you say that without choking, you hypocrite?

Mr. Gray: What are these challenges? They involve the need to bring about strong increases in the growth of output, increased employment, improved productivity performance and a reduction in the rate of inflation. These are the economic challenges facing us as we enter the 1980s.

Mr. Deans: You have never lived up to a promise in your life.

Mr. Gray: In addressing them the budget makes a strong beginning toward implementing the government's major themes of industrial development policy which were enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the recent election. I speak in particular of the themes of building industrial capacity on our resource base, strengthening Canada's research and technological capacity and encouraging independent Canadian-owned enterprise.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the minister, but I think the House is expecting me to make a ruling and, with the permission of the House, I would like to proceed with it now.

We had this afternoon an interesting debate on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Many hon. members contributed to that debate, and I want to thank them for their contributions.

It appears to me that the issue the House expects me to decide is not whether the privileges of the House have been breached or whether a contempt has been committed but whether a committee, in this case the special joint committee on the constitutional resolution, has the power to authorize the televising of its proceedings. On the one hand, it was argued that I had already ruled on this matter when I replied in August to the chairman of the special committee on the handicapped and the disabled to the effect that only the House could authorize the televising of committee proceedings. On the other hand, it was pointed out that my letter simply expressed an opinion and did not make a definite ruling.

At the conclusion of debate I expressed myself to the effect that I had given an opinion to the chairman on the basis of his specific request which involved, among other things, the taping of committee proceedings for distribution to cable outlets. I do not feel, therefore, that I have actually ruled on the question of the power of the committee to authorize the televising of its proceedings, which seems to me to be the point at issue now.

This matter has been raised in the House on a number of occasions, but until now it has never come before the Chair for a decision. Even now it has come indirectly, but I think the House expects me to rule. I shall do so, but I shall immediately set aside the question of privilege.

The basis of my ruling must be the original resolution of the House respecting the introduction of television, which reads as follows:

> That this House approves the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its committee on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates; and
> That a special committee, consisting of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named at a later date, be appointed to supervise the implementation of this resolution.

Obviously, the House has approved the televising of proceedings in the House and in committees. Just as obviously, the House has adopted the principle that the implementation of this proposal be supervised by a special committee. A special committee was established and made a number of reports to the House including a report to the following effect, and I quote:

Privilege—Mr. Knowles

1. The concept of an "electronic Hansard", which is central to radio and television coverage of the proceedings of the House, may not be applicable in the same way to standing or special committees.

2. Consideration of some procedures for coverage of committees has special urgency because of the evident anomaly of present coverage of the House but not of committees. Your committee, therefore, has arranged special meetings to hear representations from members of the press and our own technical advisers.

3. Since the order of reference of this committee includes coverage of the standing and special committees, it would be contrary to that order of the House for any radio or television coverage to take place in any such committee prior to consideration and authorization by this committee.

4. While the conditions are different, the same care must be applied to the introduction of radio and television coverage in the committees as was taken in ensuring the highest standards of coverage of the proceedings of the House.

● (2050)

While it is true that this report was not adopted by the House, clearly it reflected the original intention to introduce television only under the supervision of a committee.

Admittedly, there exists a hiatus in these proceedings, since the House has not seen fit to reconstitute a supervisory committee. Nevertheless, I cannot ignore the original intent of the House.

It was on this basis that the chairman of the Standing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs ruled on October 25, 1979, that his committee did not have the power to authorize the televising of its proceedings. It was on this basis also that I wrote to the chairman of the Special Committee on the Handicapped and Disabled.

After listening very carefully to the debate this afternoon, I have not been persuaded to change my opinion, or to reverse the opinion of my predecessor, and I must hold the view that the televising of proceedings of standing and special committees of the House may be authorized only by the House itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Therefore, it seems to me that there are two possibilities open to the Special Joint Committee on the constitution in this regard. Either the committee should make a special or interim report requesting such an authorization, or the House itself could give a permissive instruction to the committee, always bearing in mind the proprieties applicable to joint committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have no question actually on your ruling but I do have, by way of a point of order, a question for the government House leader. Is he prepared now to consult with respect to the doctrine that will relieve the committee of any obligation it may feel to the contrary with respect to televising? Will he move a motion, and if he will not move a motion tonight, is he prepared to consult tonight so that we can have a motion tomorrow? I undertake that if we can agree, and I am sure we can, such a motion would go through without debate.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All I need to say, Madam Speaker, is the obvious. If such a motion is made—and we have been asking for it for a long time—as far as we are concerned, it will be passed immediately without debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, as I said this afternoon, we bow to your ruling. As suggested by my hon. colleagues, I shall seek further advice. We should be able to adopt a position on this within the next few days.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, as I was saying, the budget makes a strong beginning toward implementing the government's major themes of industrial development policy.

Let us take the field of energy, for example. In the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen):

To fail to solve our energy dilemmas would be to fail to realize our greatest source of opportunity in this decade.

Putting this in another way, energy and the various issues related to energy, including price, security of supply and the manner and pace of energy source development, can be seen to pose, at one and the same time, both the greatest potential stimulus to growth and prosperity in our economy and, ironically, a most important potential constraint to that same growth and prosperity. Thus, there are enormous opportunities for industrial development arising out of our energy situation. Yet if, for example, the price of energy to Canadian users rises swiftly in line with the international price, the effects would be very disruptive.

With so much at stake, it is essential that we as a nation deal effectively with the problems and opportunities that energy and the energy sector present. This, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has done with the announcement in the budget of an extraordinarily far reaching and coherent national energy program. It is a program which will make energy a major factor in the solution of our broader challenges. It will provide Canadians with energy security, with the opportunity to participate, as owners, workers and business people, in energy development, and with fairness in the manner in which the benefits of our nation's rich resources are shared.

As Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I want to emphasize particularly the substantial and numerous positive industrial development implications of the new national energy program, implications which, in a real and complete sense, make good on one of the primary pledges made by the Prime Minister in the industrial policy statement of last February 12 in Toronto during the election campaign. That commitment was to:

—capitalize on Canada's energy base in order to build a world competitive industrial sector.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Let me take a few minutes to describe some of the ways in which the national energy program will accomplish this objective. First, in rejecting the international cartel price for oil and in implementing a made-in-Canada blended price for oil, we have ensured that Canada's industries, as well as household consumers, will be able to adjust gradually to higher energy prices to the extent they are required to bring about Canadian energy security. We have acted to minimize the inflationary effects of rising energy costs, effects which could prove very disruptive to needed new business investment throughout the economy. Above all, we have guaranteed that businesses in every region of the country will have a permanent competitive edge, in both foreign and domestic markets, based on lower than world level energy costs.

Second, the Canadianization measures which are among the prominent features of the national energy program will not only increase the percentage of Canada's oil and gas industry which is owned by Canadians from 25 per cent to 50 per cent within this decade, it is my belief that they can also have some major secondary benefits for Canada's over-all industrial development. This Canadianization program will retain in our country for Canadian use a larger share of the profits of the oil and gas industry. Additionally, to the extent that our oil and gas sector comes under Canadian control, traditional linkages between multinational petroleum companies and their customary foreign suppliers of machinery, equipment and technology can be altered. In this way, the Canadianization measures, together with other means which we plan to implement to ensure that Canadian suppliers benefit from energy developments, will contribute to eliminating a potential obstacle to this country's industrial development and diversification based on our resource strengths.

Third, with the budget, the Government of Canada has begun to put in place a comprehensive energy development-energy conservation plan which promises multiple industrial benefits throughout Canada. For instance, with incremental expenditures of over $2.5 billion over three years on oil substitution and conservation and renewable energy programs, the federal government's plan will offer opportunities which will mean jobs in every part of Canada, opportunities for new industries to develop and existing industries to expand to supply the many new products and services needed as part of the national effort to reduce oil consumption to 10 per cent of over-all energy use. Also, there are mega-projects planned in non-conventional oil extraction, heavy crude oil upgrading, and energy delivery system, projects made feasible by innovative systems of incentive prices and tax allowances. They will open up enormous opportunities for Canadians to supply the equipment and technology and to fill the jobs which will make these projects happen. Finally, the energy independence plan will have yet another positive effect upon the health of our industrial economy for it will ultimately free us from the risks and the costs of unpredictable disruptions of foreign energy supplies.

There is a fourth element of the national energy program to which I want to draw particular attention, for it very clearly signifies the determination of the federal government to ensure that energy and activities related to energy provide the basis for a major, sustained economic upsurge. Specifically, in the new legal framework which will govern oil and gas exploration and development on the Canada lands, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, the Arctic and offshore, there will be provisions to guarantee that a high level of Canadian goods and services is employed in these activities. Applicants for exploration and production rights will have to demonstrate how their operations will bring industrial and employment benefits to Canadians both in the region of interest and elsewhere in Canada. Right now the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce are working closely together to put in place the mechanisms for administering these provisions in a way which brings maximum employment and industrial benefits.

Of course there is a precedent for including industrial benefits requirements in energy legislation in the act which created the Northern Pipeline Agency. The success of that regulatory regime, and especially of similar regimes in existence in the United Kingdom and Norway, shows why we believe using the government's authority over the Canada lands for national industrial development purposes will bring substantial benefits to all Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: It is also why the government has currently under serious study ways and means for applying industrial benefits requirements to other areas of resource and non-resource related development, for this is success which is measured in terms of thousands of new jobs, new businesses for existing domestic suppliers and the exploitation by Canadians of new industrial opportunities. Therefore, to quote again from the February 12 speech of the Prime Minister, we are "using Canada's resource base as the fundamental building block of a vigorous industrial sector."

There are a number of additional elements in the energy program introduced in the budget of last week where the thrust is industrial development, development with potential spill-overs or flow-through benefits for all of Canada's regions. I am talking about elements such as a Canadian alternative energy corporation which will work with Canadian businesses in the commercial production and marketing of renewable energy and conservation technology, elements such as new energy research and development initiatives totalling $260 million over the next three years. These and other parts of the energy program offer very exciting industrial prospects which I believe all Canadians welcome.

More broadly, the national energy program will involve incremental direct expenditures by the federal government of more than $8 billion over the next three years on new and expanded programs, and that is quite apart from the allocations made to continue existing energy programs. It will involve many millions more in tax expenditures. It should be clear from what I have said about the impact of the elements of the energy program on industrial development that a substantial portion of these amounts will have direct and meaningful effects in strengthening and expanding the industrial base throughout Canada. Particularly in combination with the new government policy measures already announced, as well as those under development in the area of industrial strategy, the new expenditures on energy will go a long way toward ensuring that the benefits of Canada's energy development boom can be shared by Canadians in every region.

I have been talking in some detail about the industrial development implications of the new national energy program, in part because I wanted to deal with any misunderstandings which may have arisen as to the extent of the government's commitment to industrial development as expressed by the budget. That there is such a commitment and that it is a priority commitment is fully demonstrated in my view by the over-all approach of the budget which devotes very significant new resources for industrial development purposes. I have just spoken about the very substantial sums in the energy package which are industrial development and industrial assistance oriented, but in addition the budget presents other details about the expenditure plans of the federal government in regard to helping Canada's industrial sector meet the challenge of heightened international competition as well as our own requirements for strong, regionally-balanced economic growth.

The economic development envelope is increased by 22 per cent, that is, over the next three years there will be new money totalling $6.5 billion available for economic purposes in order to improve existing programs and to launch new initiatives in support of industrial expansion, research and development, and export development. All these program initiatives will involve not only the manufacturing and processing sectors, but also the primary industries which are so important to Canada's economy. A new western development fund within the economic development envelope is created, from which it is expected that $2 billion will be spent over the next three years. Particular attention in the western development program will be directed to infrastructure development such as grain handling and transportation which is essential to optimizing economic development opportunities throughout western Canada. Also industrial diversification and trade policies are priority targets for the planned western development expenditures. It should be obvious that these expenditures, given the existing regional distribution of industry in the country, should generate significant flow-through benefits to industries in eastern and central Canada.

In addition to the $8 billion in new expenditures in the energy program and the $6.5 billion which represents new money available to foster expanded industrial activity and industrial restructuring to promote productivity improvement, there is another special $350 million fund created to help industries, workers and communities where the effects of industrial adjustments are particularly serious. As well, complementing the direct expenditure program, the budget introduced a new investment tax credit which is established for five years to offer significant encouragement to new manufacturing investment in especially designated areas of the country characterized by high unemployment and low income.

Over all, I believe this list of new and increased allocations of funds by the federal government to industrial development, adjustment and expansion throughout the country is impressive enough to have led the Toronto Star economic editor, Dave Crane, to conclude in a recent article that there are "significant new opportunities for Canadian entrepreneurs over the next few years."

In coming weeks and months, my colleagues and I will be making announcements which will explain in further detail the ways in which the very substantial amounts made available by the government and announced in the budget will be expended in order to strengthen and broaden Canada's industrial base and to create and sustain jobs throughout the country. With these announcements the government will be fulfilling the commitment made by the Prime Minister during the election to the Canadian people to "revitalize Canada's industrial capacity so that our industrial sector is better able to create jobs at home and be competitive abroad".

This is a budget which lays the foundation for carrying out our specific pledges on industrial policy. As well it is a budget which lives up to our other commitments on energy, on government expenditures, on gradual reduction of the deficit, and on helping those first who need help most. Also it is a budget which provides the basis for the renewed growth and vitality of our nation's economy. For all these reasons, I urge the House to support this budget. To do so in the interest of all Canadians and all of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) seeking the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Deans: Since the minister did not use his time entirely, I was wondering whether he could accept a question.

Mr. Gray: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

• (2110)

Mr. Deans: In a reasonably friendly way, I would like to ask the minister whether in the preparation of his budget speech he considered two things. One, how much of the $44 million available during this year for assistance to workers will be made available under a TAB program for workers in the auto industry in the Windsor area? Second, does the minister feel that the interest rates which have now reached a fairly substantial level, as of today's announcement, are sufficient to justify that he might fulfil his own promise and resign?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to stick around and not run away, as he did from the Ontario legislature after he was rejected by his own party, and listen to our announcements about expenditure to help workers in Windsor and throughout Canada, not of $44 million but of $14 billion. This will do a lot more than will the empty blather of the hon. member on interest rates or any other subject.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the commercial as much as you did.

The essential guideline which permeates the budget is a direction to avoid an 18-cent per gallon excise tax increase at all costs. The minister has been faithful to his mandate and the costs have been tremendous. The cost of gasoline will go up about the same as it would under the Crosbie budget but the cost of home heating oil, not taxed by the Crosbie budget, will rise more rapidly under this budget.

In the final analysis, the government will extract $500 million more under this budget than was contemplated under the Crosbie budget. Under this budget the energy price increase will impact more severely on lower and middle-income Canadians because the budget provides no energy tax credits to shelter lower and middle-income people earning under $21,000, as was provided in the Crosbie budget. That budget provided a tax credit of $80 for adults and $30 for children. To illustrate the impact this would have as a tax shelter, consider a car getting 20 miles to a gallon, travelling 12,000 miles a year. It would use approximately 600 gallons of gasoline. At 18-cents per gallon that would cost $108 in one year. For an average family of four, a mother, father and two children, the tax credit would amount to $220. That would go a long way toward defraying the $108. This triple tax on energy constitutes, in my view, a tax regime with a vengeance and without mercy because no shelter for lower-income Canadians who use motor vehicles prudently is provided.

The most serious cost cannot be estimated. There is no way that the fragmentation of this nation may be measured in dollars. It should be said at this time that while western alienation began some time ago the fragmenting process began with the election of the present government and has continued to this day, despite great efforts by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his government to heal the wounds of the nation, particularly those of the west.

The energy package, which is the cornerstone of this budget, projects a natural gas pipeline to the maritime provinces. I think this is a good measure. It will improve the energy mix in Atlantic Canada and it will provide greater security of supply. The construction of the pipeline will provide employment and will require support industries, which in turn will also stimulate employment by way of spin-off. But it is an intermediate measure for an intermediate term because natural gas is a fossil fuel, like oil. It is finite in supply and its end is predictable. Its end is in sight.

The province of New Brunswick has expressed environmental concerns which should be addressed and which, in my opinion, can be resolved. I would like to see the introduction of this new energy form managed so there is no dislocation in the operation of the large oil refinery located in New Brunswick, which directly or indirectly employs more than 1,000 persons. We need those jobs desperately in New Brunswick as well as those to be created. I believe that if we phase in the new energy form we can keep the old and add the new, which would provide a great economic stimulus to our province. Offshore exploration for natural gas and oil should be accelerated along the Atlantic coast. I am hoping that the gas pipeline will be reversible in nature so that in the days to come the people of Atlantic Canada can make their contribution to this nation by seeing that gas from the Atlantic coast flows inland to serve the people who are now serving us.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) explained tonight the 50 per cent tax investment credit, which I think is a major step forward in the battle against regional disparity. It is not as generous as a similar provision in the Crosbie budget, nor is it the 100 per cent recommended by the prestigious New Brunswick Development Institute. But it is a giant stride in the right direction and I am pleased to see that it is going to be in place.

DREE should also direct its attention to the problems of regional disparity and focus upon a development dimension. The only way this can happen, in my view, is for the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) to personally give that direction or to invest the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion with the authority to bring it about.

Shipbuilding has been neglected in this budget. It has not even been mentioned. In the Crosbie budget there was an impetus provided for the construction of new fishing vessels. This would be reflected by more employment in the shipyards of Saint John, New Brunswick, Halifax, Nova Scotia and St. John's Newfoundland. A program to create more employment in those shipyards would be a tremendous bonanza to the dozens of shipyards along the Atlantic coastline. I regret very much that it has been omitted from this budget.

CAST, which is one of the largest international ship companies in the world, is Canadian-owned and a principal owner is Canadian National Railways. This company recently ordered from Yugoslavia two container bulk carriers worth $27 million each. They have also placed a similarly large order with Korea. Canadian shipyards, which are underemployed, find it difficult to compete with subsidized foreign yards. This budget contains no enlightened tax policy to assist them in this competition or provide them with the incentive to put more Canadians to work. I find that a regrettable omission also.

The frigate program which would provide badly needed frigates for the Department of National Defence appears to be bogged down, if it has not completely sunk. Earlier this year changes were announced with regard to the evaluation method which has attracted intense scrutiny by the members in my party. Now there are rumours of more delays. I hope the minister will take the first opportunity to put these rumours to rest and to announce on a specific date that the best tender, based on merit, will be accepted and awarded so that we may have confidence that this program will go forward and that these shipbuilding contracts will provide work for Canada shipyards.

The Department of National Defence has seen the armed forces understaffed, underequipped and, as far as the lower ranks are concerned, underpaid. Their slender pay packages have been eroded by ever-increasing charges imposed by the Department of National Defence for shelter and utilities.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has indicated in this House, in response to questions, that he is not able to take a decision. He does not know whether the government will close the Arctic to all but Canadian-built vessels by 1985—which was the policy of my party—or at all. I suggest that the valuable wealth of the Arctic should be mined by Canadians, transported in Canadian ships and processed in Canada by Canadians. The wealth should be used for the benefit of this nation, not carted offshore to be processed where the good jobs will be performed by people in distant lands.

Also, I would like to see a decision taken soon on moving forward dramatically and constantly with the development of a Canadian merchant marine. I believe this would provide badly-needed jobs for Canadians with a seafaring inclination. It would create a real, dynamic growth in the Canadian economy. Neither of these subjects were mentioned in the budget but I would like to see the government give them the best consideration it possibly can.

The conversion program from heating oil to electric heat has been denied the province of New Brunswick despite the fact that that province now has electric energy generated by hydro dams and by coal-fired thermal plants to the extent of 70 per cent of its capacity. Within one year it will bring on live Atlantic Canada's first nuclear reactor to produce 640 megawatts of electric power. This omission is based on misconception, poor homework and poor judgment exercised by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I hope the minister will at the earliest possible moment institute the remedial steps which are desirable if this oversight is to be corrected.

At the same time, I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not, of my own knowledge, familiar with the economies involved in conversion from oil to electric heat—whether it is desirable now, next year, or when, or even if. But I would like Canadians who live in New Brunswick to have the same right to make that judgment as Canadians who live elsewhere in this country. I also believe, and I am sorry that the budget did not touch on this matter, that alternate energy research should be focused to the extent possible in areas of Canada which suffer from regional disparity. Research, too, should be given a development dimension.

New Brunswick has, on its own, experimented with a solar-heated building presently in operation in Shediac. Prince Edward Island has made rapid advancements in harnessing the wind to produce electric energy. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have all that is necessary in terms of coal supply to carry out experimentation in the gasification and liquefaction of coal. All the Atlantic provinces have made progress in the use of biomass and wood waste. New Brunswick leads the country in research in the use of thermal peat moss, and has also done some work in the field of geothermal research.

Albert county in New Brunswick has an abundance of oil shale which has not been tapped. The Bay of Fundy has the highest tides in the world. We in the maritime provinces have the technology and the ability to harness them and produce over 4,000 megawatts of power if we operate the Fundy tidal power plants in conjunction or in tandem with the development of Gull Island which has the most spectacular hydro electric potential available to man. And below Gull Island is Muskrat Falls on the Churchill River which also has tremendous potential. If these two giant sources of energy are operated in tandem, Atlantic Canada can become the power house of the nation and displace millions of barrels of imported oil. But we do not have the dollars to do it.

The budget mentioned $25 million, which is a lot of money, but a drop in the bucket when one looks at what is needed for funding. There is an equity of $200 million in Gull Island, and that is a much better step forward but it still leaves a long way to go. I would like to see the government consider developing this tremendous potential.

In my own riding in terms of energy conservation the small town of Oromocto has announced its intention to heat its public buildings with wood and is moving in that direction without any subsidy. Mr. Lester Hull at Millville in my riding has developed a technique of blowing sawdust into a furnace so as to obtain almost 100 per cent combustion, and he uses this method to heat his home. Mr. Bernard Hargrove of Bath in Carleton County, which is represented in this House by one of our most able parliamentarians, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), has built a hydro dam to harness a stream which flows across his property. From this dam he generates electric energy for about 35 families and sells the surplus to the New Brunswick Electric Power Corporation. In Nackawic in my riding the Ste. Anne Nackawic Pulp and Paper Mill burns waste wood to displace the use of expensive oil for the purposes of generating steam for the plup and paper mill and providing electric energy for its use. Mr. Peter Chalmers, one of my constituents, has built a solar heating unit which supplies part of his domestic needs. All these people have demonstrated ingenuity in the field and advanced the knowledge of this technology. I would like to see them and other Canadians have the opportunity to share their knowledge in this important field.

If I might make a few general comments, the budget itself appears to continue the centralizing process. In many cases it is a sleight-of-hand budget where what you see is not what you get. It projects spending $66 billion. The interest on our national debt is $12.3 billion, which works out to $1,390 per taxpayer. The projected deficit is $13.7 billion, and there appears to be no attempt to deal with it, though I detect an attempt to manage the increase. Despite the generation of such huge debts, the government does not seem to be doing as much for the people as was contemplated under the Crosbie budget. The immediate visible results are an increase in the bank rate. We see confusion in the stock market and an undoubted reluctance on the part of Canadian and United States exploration teams to look for further energy sources. This is coupled with a decline in the value of the dollar.

My criticisms and my constructive suggestions are intended to complement the remarks of my colleagues who have participated in this debate. While I have been critical of some areas, I have not been critical of the hon. gentleman who presented the budget, because I have for the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) nothing but respect.

[Translation]

Mr. Alain Garant (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I feel quite privileged to have today the pleasure of closing the debate on the first budget introduced in this decade, a budget which, I am quite certain now, will help the Canadian people to make a giant stride towards their security in energy and economic matters. This conviction, Mr. Speaker, has come to me as a result of a serious consideration of the budget and the energy measures introduced last week. It came to me also as a result of a comparison, as unbiased as possible, with the measures introduced in the sadly remembered, the dead and gone, Progressive Conservative budget. It came to me finally as a result of the comments of the Canadian people and in particular those from the beautiful Bellechasse area which I am honoured to represent in this House.

Mr. Speaker, after weighing the pros and cons of a number of possibilities this government has followed the course of reason and common sense, a course which took into account our present limitations while leading us without any doubt on the path of this unlimited potential which fate seems to have bestowed upon us.

Although during the seventies we were faced with many problems which we overcame with less difficulty than the great majority of other industrialized nations, I know that the Canadian people are convinced that the eighties will provide extraordinary opportunities for them as long as their leaders have a better understanding of the depth and complexity of the problems which affect our economy and the world economy, and as long as those leaders suggest solutions in keeping with our Canadian tradition which has always been a tradition of sharing and which so far has allowed us to face the greatest challenges of our history.

I am happy to see that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) decided to stay with that Canadian tradition which is to share our rich national heritage. I am also happy to notice that our problems are not just a matter of management of the demand but that they require a combination of structural, industrial and original policies with properly oriented monetary and fiscal policies. We are committed to implement those policies with all the determination we can muster, because they agree with that greater and therefore more realistic vision of the problems facing our Canadian economy.

On the other hand they are also in keeping with the best liberal tradition which is to avoid extreme positions and rather to resort to practical solutions which will serve our common interests while preserving our individual freedoms.

I can only approve the economic strategy of this government which is perfectly in line with our commitments to the Canadians at the last election and in the throne speech, commitments which have undoubtedly contributed to the re-election of the government. This economic strategy will, Mr. Speaker, I am sure enable inflation to decrease gradually and also give a gradual impetus to investment and productivity thus encouraging despite a sensible but unavoidable delay, the full employment which we are all anticipating. The history of every country in the world, especially those which are filthy rich, has made us realize that there is no unique and easy solution, but that patience and orderly and conscientious work give the best chance of success. It is the direction which we have courageously decided to follow.

All hon. members probably agree that the reduction of the federal deficit at a more moderate level is advisable if we wish to decrease the present rate of the debt charge. The government must be given again enough margin of operation to take up the challenges of the future and to stop inflation without increasing taxes accordingly. Moved, however, by this realistic attitude which has always been our party's most distinctive attribute and which has been the basis for the Canadian people's nearly uninterrupted support of our party over the past 20 years, we have opted for a reduction of the deficit consistent with the current economic growth. Which means that we will strive for a moderate reduction of the deficit during the forthcoming year, for, in view of the fairly slow economic growth which has been forecast, we would not want to increase the burden carried by Canadian taxpayers.

As soon as the economic situation improves, however—and there are already signs of a quick recovery—there will be changes in our budgetary policies as well as further deficit reductions, which will in turn allow us to meet our commitments in this area. We are not shying away from our commitments, however. We only want to fulfil our promises in an orderly and reasonable fashion, and it is the reason why the government has decided not to increase its expenses more quickly than the economic growth.

This will allow us to reduce the federal deficit to more moderate proportions without having to apportion ourselves a greater share of the total revenues namely without having to decide a general raise in taxation.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people will certainly be grateful one day for the fact that we have been able to avoid resorting to easy solutions, for deciding against a general raise in taxation and for preserving the indexation of the tax base of the individuals. No matter how easy they are these solutions would have presented serious inconvenience given the present economic situation where growth is rather slow. They could have easely stumped the beginning of the economic recovery that we can now clearly perceive ahead.

Mr. Speaker, we shall never stress enough for Canadian taxpayers and above all for all those who are most in need the importance of general indexation of the individual tax basis. Indexation will reduce by some $1.6 billion federal income tax that individuals would otherwise have had to pay next year and this tax reduction benefits Canadians every year without them being asked anything in return. In the United States, this was made a discretionary measure that is always widely publicized. We, the taxpayers of the province of Quebec, recognize the value of indexing the tax rate for individuals. If our fiscal burden is 23 per cent higher than the average tax burden of Canadians, it is precisely because the Quebec government, which raises its own provincial income tax, has neglected to index in a general way the individual tax system. They only did so on an incomplete basis in the last two years. Hence, we realize in a more conscious way the priceless value of the federal indexation program in terms of tax savings.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I will say a word about our continuing and renewed support of the Bank of Canada's efforts to limit the expansion of the money supply. We have given top priority to economic development by providing sufficient funds to finance such strategic activities as industrial development, research and development, the promotion of exports, the improvement of the transportation system and the retraining of manpower. We have always concerned ourselves with encouraging a healthy competition and decreasing the burden of public regulation; we have been committed to increasing the aid to developing countries, as we are conscious of the interdependence of all economic performances. Finally, it has always been our firm intention to support social and economic relief measures aimed at the disadvantaged, as we promised during the last election campaign and in the Throne speech. This package of budgetary and economic measures, all equally important, should, through their combined effect, help curb inflation, encourage investment, increase productivity, get closer to full employment and also ensure, in the meantime, a minimum protection against the two evils of inflation and unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to speak about the energy issue. Some people were surprised that the national energy program should occupy such an important part of this budget. Some went so far as to say that this was not a budgetary policy statement, but rather a statement on energy policy. I fail to understand such a reaction because it denotes a serious lack of understanding of the Canadian economic problem as well as of the world economic problem. Indeed, the double problem of inflation and unemployment which has confronted western economies originated with the oil crisis of 1973 and its many after effects.

Mr. Speaker, now that the worst of the effects on our economy of the drastic price increases dictated by OPEC seem to be over, now that Canada is a net exporter of energy and is therefore in a position of strength, now that, with the latest and forthcoming increases in domestic prices, the energy tax base is getting increasingly larger, now that our partial dependency on imported oil becomes increasingly more costly for the federal state in its efforts to ensure identical treatment of all Canadians, whether from the east or from the west, it is quite reasonable for the federal government to feel that it has to put some order in the Canadian energy sector and to have decided to do so through budgetary measures in view of the colossal revenues involved in the Canadian energy industry and the nature of the problem, which is essentially a question of sharing these colossal revenues amongst the various groups concerned, namely the producers, who are entitled to a just return on their investment that can stimulate them to re-invest in the development of our incomparable energy potential, the consumers, who are entitled to a made-in-Canada price which takes into account the development conditions in Canada and which protect them against the disastrous effects of the drastic and unforeseeable price increases dictated by OPEC and conditioned by a most unstable international policy, and finally, the various government levels, which are entitled to the budgetary resources which they need to meet their respective energy commitments, which are certainly interrelated, but also essentially different.

Mr. Speaker, the national energy program announced in the budget is undoubtedly the most complete and ambitious energy program to have been developed throughout Canadian history.

● (2140)

I am quite sure that the basic principles which underlie this program, that is security, ownership and fairness, meet the aspirations of all the Canadian people; those people who surely want the security of supplies and gradual independency as regards the world oil market; those people who also wish that all Canadians wherever they come from, have the opportunity, to take part in the energy industry and benefit from its expansion and, finally, those people who wish a fair revenue sharing which allows for the most genuine Canadian tradition, namely the pooling of our national wealth.

Mr. Speaker, the new energy policy, for economical and fairness reasons, limits the increase in oil and gas prices for Canadian consumers and thus goes on alleviating the adverse effect of sudden and unpredictable increases in OPEC prices. I cannot understand the theoretical or practical justification of those who would like to impose world oil and gas prices upon Canadian consumers. How can a totally artificially established price by an international trust be desirable from an economic point of view when applied to the domestic consumption of a domestically produced good?

Should the economic value of a good produced and consumed in the country not be more in line with domestic production costs rather than with the ups and downs of international politics? This is precisely what the national energy program tries to take into account through a blended price for oil consumed in Canada which will represent an average of offshore and domestic oil prices, and by establishing the price of natural gas based on domestic development costs. This policy, Mr. Speaker, results in an increase in oil prices in Canada which will be phased in and predictable, in shifting the burden of subsidizing costly oil imports, from taxpayers to consumers, which should promote our economy and finally, in the Canadian industry maintaining a substantial competitive advantage.

This competitive advantage of Canadian industry as regards oil prices is essential to offset the disadvantages that our hard climate and long distances might represent for our economy as regards energy costs. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the people of a rural area like Bellechasse, far from domestic markets, are really anxious that the Canadian industry should keep its competitive advantage as regards oil prices. All the more so, Mr. Speaker, since no country which produces 75 per cent of the petroleum products it needs, such as Canada, has so far found justification for selling to its own people at international prices.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, the issue of petroleum and gas prices is of course linked to the question of sharing revenues. To the same extent as a ceiling on prices, sharing the petroleum tax dollars is an equitable measure which fully reflects Canadian tradition. Those who object to the new energy program and its sharing provisions never fail to argue that the federal government is trying to take over provincial natural resources through budgetary measures.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, the federal perspective contains nothing about property rights but only income sharing. The arguments of those who are against the new energy program do not hold before the extraordinary powers which some of them claim to discredit the program. And to do that they must certainly enjoy mighty powerful property rights which have not been whittled down. But, Mr. Speaker, we in the federal government are convinced that no matter how powerful they may be property rights do not immunize against the obligation to share which is inherent in federalism. We are convinced that all Canadians without exception, wherever they live in Canada, are entitled to their share of Canada's rich energy inheritance regardless of where the natural resources are located. We are convinced that it is a national inheritance from which each and every one must benefit in keeping with the sharing principle so essential to federalism. We are convinced that all Canadians, not only those who reside in the producing provinces, have worked as a team to develop their oil industry. Capital, technology and manpower have flowed from all parts of Canada toward the producing provinces.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9:45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to order made Tuesday, October 28, 1980, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question on the motion now before the House.

The question is on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. MacEachen) which was agreed to on the following division:

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CALL FOR STEPS TO RESTORE CONFIDENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, since the budget was introduced the prime interest rate at Canadian banks has risen to 14 per cent. The dollar has dropped to its lowest level in relation to the American dollar in over a year, despite massive government intervention in the money markets. There is despair in the stock market as investors sell Canadian issues to take advantage of better opportunities in the United States. Therefore, as a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government take immediate steps to restore some confidence in the Canadian economy and reverse its ill-conceived economic measures set out in the budget.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CALL FOR BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in light of your ruling yesterday, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls on the government to announce today its intention to bring in a resolution which would authorize the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the constitution to be covered by both radio and television.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

FLEXIBILITY IN APPLICATION OF MATERNITY BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the commitment of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to amend the so-called magic ten rule, which presently operates as a prerequisite to qualify for maternity benefits under unemployment insurance, and in light of the demeaning effect of this rule and its rigid application, as seen in the case of Mrs. Katherine Edwards of Kitchener, Waterloo, who has been denied maternity benefits because she is 53 minutes short of the mandatory ten-week insurable employment period—a decision taken without regard for the significant overtime she worked—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House asks the minister to instruct his officials to be flexible and sensitive in such borderline cases until changes to maternity benefit legislation are enacted, as promised.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITIES TO EXPAND USE OF NATURAL GAS FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that there is a drastic need to reduce the consumption of oil in this country, and in light of the fact that the government is apparently eager to encourage Canadian home owners and businesses to switch from oil-fired furnaces to gas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government give serious consideration to providing financial assistance to municipalities and/or gas companies to allow for the expansion of gas facilities to regions of the country now on oil where it would not be feasible ordinarily to provide such service.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONFERENCE FOR SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

ENCOURAGEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN REACHING OBJECTIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canadians have a deep interest in international security, human rights and co-operation among nations, and in view of the fact that the Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe, known as CSCE, begins officially on November 11, 1980, in Madrid, Spain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That this House urge the representatives of each nation to work in a spirit of co-operation to achieve the objectives of security, disarmament, trade, human contacts, free flow of information and human rights.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

RESTRUCTURING OF OIL SANDS PRICING POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The federal government has structured its oil sands pricing policies to aid its policy of nationalization and confiscation of segments of the oil industry. This is an unacceptable policy. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the federal government should undertake immediately to restructure its oil sands energy pricing policies to provide uniform, consistent and fair pricing for all tar sands oil being produced and commercial terms for all new tar sands projects which would permit rapid capital recovery and accelerated development of this major resource.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CONTROL OF POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise as a result of the appearance of officials of the CBC this week before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. Considering the fact that a Conservative "heavy" has recently charged that the CBC has been infiltrated by "NDP moles", while the NDP believes the corporation is dominated equally by Liberals and Tories, and Quebec Liberals frequently express alarm that Radio-Canada is under the influence of separatists, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Secretary of State inform this House exactly which political party actually runs the CBC and whether or not that party might be the Rhinoceros Party and, if so, why the Rhinoceros Party has been denied its legitimate right to control the CBC.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CALL FOR MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT TERMS OF RESOLUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the many fears respecting entrenchment of language rights in the constitution as they apply to public servants, and that the resolution entitled "A Declaration of certain Principles respecting Employment in the Public Service of Canada", passed in June of 1973, is not law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House instruct the government to bring forth the necessary legislation so that paragraph 7 of the resolution of June, 1973, will be made law as part of the Official Languages Act, and that paragraph 7 of the resolution be expanded to include Crown corporations, so that unilingual public servants will not feel stifled in their jobs or denied promotion because they are not bilingual.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CASE OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On Tuesday of this week the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) put forward a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding the release of Soviet dissident, Anatoly Shcharansky. Regrettably, that motion did not receive unanimous consent.

Since, however, the House has in the past unanimously agreed to resolutions concerning Mr. Shcharansky's freedom, and since it might be construed by certain countries that what happened on Tuesday was a weakening of the resolve of this House that Mr. Shcharansky be freed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) and the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

● (1115)

That Mr. Shcharansky's case in particular, and that of Soviet dissidents in general, be brought to the attention of the signatories to the Helsinki Agreement, and particularly to the attention of the Soviet Union at the Madrid Conference next week, by the Canadian delegation.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Moved by Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands) and seconded by Miss Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam):

That Mr. Shcharansky's case in particular, and that of Soviet dissidents in general, be brought to the attention of the signatories, especially the Soviet Union, to the Helsinki Agreement at the Madrid Conference next week by the Canadian delegation.

Motion agreed to.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

TRIBUTES TO MEMBERS OF CANADIAN FORCES WHO SERVED IN WARTIME

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am proud to remind all hon. members of the House as well as all Canadians that next Tuesday, November 11, is Remembrance Day. As required by tradition, I should like to say a few words.

Most of us will return to our respective ridings to take part in official ceremonies commemorating Armistice Day, the purpose of which is to remind us that during two World Wars and the Korean conflict a great many men and women from every corner of the land put on Canadian military uniforms and wore them with the utmost distinction.

[English]

As usual, the Government of Canada will be holding a ceremony thousands of miles away at Vimy Ridge. It was there at Easter, 1917, that Canada showed the world what it was all about. The Canadian fighting in France came together for the first time as a single force and in less than a week performed a deed which other armies could not accomplish in three years. Successive generations of Canadians built on that reputation. Few gained the glory of Billy Bishop. It was sufficient to serve, enough to do one's duty to Canada. We owe our prosperity and freedom to those hundreds of thousands of unsung heroes.

These men and women fought, not for personal gain, not for glory of conquest; they fought for their homeland. This was their love. Duty was their creed. Truly they are Canada's heroes. I ask all Canadians to pause on November 11 and remember the thousands of our fellow countrymen and women who fell during the holocausts of the two World Wars and the Korean conflict to preserve our peace and our country.

[Translation]

Next Tuesday, when we pause with pride, let us reinforce our determination to emulate them in their generous deeds for Canada. Let us demonstrate on that day and in our way how proud we are of them. Let us demonstrate also, each and every one of us, that the faith they had in future generations was not unfounded, and that their sacrifices and sufferings were not in vain. We owe them that much.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, as Progressive Conservative spokesman for veterans affairs, it is once again an honour for me to join in the tribute to our fallen comrades.

This is the sixty-second anniversary of the date on which the battle ceased on the western front. At that point in history, 62 years ago, people thought they had experienced the "war to end all wars", but as we know now, 21 years later war broke out again, to be followed by the Korean war and a series of smaller conflicts around the globe. Today we remember 100,000 war dead and they live again in the hearts and minds of Canadians everywhere.

I feel we should also bring to mind the veterans who returned from those wars and who are now suffering under the weight of rising prices and falling pensions.

We can do no more than pause and remember our war dead, but we have a wonderful opportunity in this country to do something positive for our returned veterans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1120)

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may we never fail to pause on Remembrance Day to recall how great is our debt to those who served our country on the field of battle in World War I, in World War II, in Korea and in the other conflicts in which we have been participants.

Indeed, we of the New Democratic Party join with all the rest of the members of this House in remembering those who served, particularly those who gave their lives. Let us also remember those who survived but came back to live their lives under difficulty. We think in particular today of the late minister of veterans affairs who spent the rest of his life still fighting for his comrades-in-arms. We remember also the families and the survivors of those who served.

Let us pay tribute to all of them at this time of the year by renewing our determination to do the best we can for our veterans and for their families. Let us also renew our determination to put in place the kind of economy that will help us pursue the dream of that day when men shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks and, please God, learn war no more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MR. GORDIE HOWE

Madam Speaker: I know the House will have already noticed the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished athlete and gentleman, Mr. Gordie Howe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY WHETHER CERTAIN MEASURES WILL BE RESCINDED

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, perhaps I could put my initial question to the Prime Minister. It relates to the budget. In view of the fact that this has been the worst received budget, certainly in Canadian history—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: —back to the time of Walter Gordon, with rising interest rates, with the dollar falling 1.5 cents since the budget was introduced, with our reserves pouring out of the country, with the Toronto Stock Exchange index having fallen over 4 per cent, and with the oil and gas industry index having fallen over 17 per cent, would the Prime Minister—instead of fluffing the question off on to somebody else—give serious consideration to a review of the budget to see whether certain measures cannot be rescinded, similar to what happened after the Walter Gordon episode in this House?

Mr. Lalonde: Joe Clark was not even there to vote against it last night.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not understand why the hon. member wants to discuss his nightmares originating from this experience last year which ended in a defeat in the House and in the elections.

I would like to indicate to the hon. member that most Canadians understood on budget night that they would get more through indexation, that is $1.6 billion of purchasing power.

Canadians also understood on budget night that the government has maintained the indexation of social measures such as family allowances, old age pension, the guaranteed income supplement which we had increased by $35.

Canadians understood that the 22 per cent increase in the economic development envelope indicated the priority of this government in the next few years, that it was a new start for the Canadian economy and would stimulate employment.

And finally, they accepted the great challenge offered in that budget, that is, to make the country self-sufficient as far as energy is concerned and to control the development of and exploration for oil and gas in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister, and I hope this time he will answer it. Obviously his Acting Minister of Finance is simply dreaming. My question to the Prime Minister is this. If there is no intention to right some of the wrongs that are in this budget, will he indicate to the House why this is, in view of the fact that at one time he said he had wrestled inflation to the ground? At another time he stated we were on a program to reduce inflation from 10 per cent to 8 per cent to 6 per cent to 4 per cent. Incidentally, Madam Speaker, that 4 per cent was to be in effect two years ago. If they have been so wise over these years, will the Prime Minister indicate what has gone wrong, or has he simply now abandoned his thought of getting inflation down to a reasonable level as he at one time told the Canadian public he intended to do?

● (1125)

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the intention of the government to fight inflation has been asserted very clearly, not only during the election campaign and in the Speech from the Throne, but it was reaffirmed in the budget: all the measures then announced by the government were directed towards that goal. However, the government has always indicated that reducing the inflation rate cannot be achieved solely by government action: it must be done through the united effort of all agents or elements of the economy. It must also be achieved through the conviction of the members of this House that the agents of the economy must fight inflation together. Consequently, stirring up a climate of panic, as would the hon. member through his groundless remarks, does not help in encouraging a common effort on the part of the agents of the economy toward a real victory over inflation.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Again I have a question for the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. The Canadian public do not care whether inflation is linked in isolation or in combination or what measures the government takes as long as we start getting some results. Will the Prime Minister at least show some compassion for the consumers and home owners in this country by indicating whether, in these budgetary bills yet to come before the House, there is any hope that some steps will be taken to relieve the effect of rising interest rates in this country, mortgage rates alone having gone up 2 per cent per annum since he took power last March?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the matter of interest rates and the hardships they inflict upon some people has been debated repeatedly in this House. It was even discussed when the hon. member was in government. Until now, we have maintained that a measure to protect one group against high interest rates could be unfair to others because home owners are not the only ones who suffer from them. So that builders, businessmen and home owners should have to absorb the cost of higher interest rates is all part of that effort all citizens must be willing to make, in order to weather through this period of economic difficulties. That is part of the united effort, the common will progressively to restore our economy and achieve the objectives of higher production in the next five years.

HOUSING

RISING MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. Now that we have had that dissertation on mortgage interest rates, perhaps I can ask the minister this. In view of the fact that mortgage interest rates are rising, and we have a two-point mortgage interest rise which on a $40,000 mortgage means an extra $60 a month, can the minister advise what he is suggesting is a course of action for the low and middle-income Canadian family who are looking at renewing their mortgages in the next six months?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am happy to indicate that figures for starts in the last month indicate a strengthening in the industry as a result of additional starts. I hope that is a signal that the industry is showing a trend toward strengthening and that that strengthening will be reflected in other sectors of the economy.

In terms of assistance to people, specifically as to the roll-over situation, the hon. member will recall that the government, faced with the prospect earlier in the year when interest rates were higher than they are today, responded with the objective of assisting those people who would be seriously hurt by the rise in rates. So we introduced under AHOP the level of a 30 per cent protection, that is, interest, taxes, principal etc., and directed our attention toward those people who would need help the most. That remains the objective of the government. Our response to those people who would be hurt seriously is to look, on an individual basis, at those who find that circumstances make it very difficult for them to renew their mortgage. As the Minister of Finance authorized and said of the government, we will watch that situation and if, indeed, it is one that would warrant government action, we certainly would be on top of it and supportive of individual requests.

● (1130)

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I suggest to the minister that someone who is renewing a mortgage is not interested in housing starts. Under our plan last year, the average Canadian home owner with a $40,000 mortgage would have received a credit of $94 a month in 1981. That amount would be paid to them. Does the Liberal government have any plan to assist the low and middle-income earner who is faced with these sky-high interest rates and he, she or they consider that to be serious?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, as I have indicated, our response is, first, to the needy, to those who need help the most. I should like to point out that under the plan of the government opposite, at least 50 per cent of Canadians who were renters were ignored by that plan. There are people who, at present, pay on average 35 per cent of their gross income toward shelter costs. Where is the equity in the response of a program which ignores those people who are in need?

SMALL BUSINESS

INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES OF ASSISTANCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister as the man responsible for over-all government policy. Considering that the Bank of Canada rate has gone up once again, continuing this upward spiral, which will mean that the largest corporations in Canada will be able to borrow at 14 per cent but small business will have to pay between 16 per cent to 17 per cent, and as everyone knows most of the new jobs which are being created in the Canadian economy as well as in the U.S. economy are in the small business sector, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what specifically the government has in mind to help out these small businesses which are hit in a way that makes it totally impossible for them to expand and create the kinds of jobs we need in the economy now?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): I should like to remind the hon. member that the budget already features a measure for small businesses, the bonds, which will bring temporary relief to small businesses which are in need; and that applies particularly to the type of preoccupation expressed by the hon. member.

[English]

EFFECT OF U.S. "BUY-AMERICA" POLICY ON CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, even the minister should know that the so-called program for small business assistance that he is talking about will aid only 5 per cent of small businesses and that 95 per cent will be excluded.

I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister which perhaps he will answer, since it concerns our direct relations with the United States. The Bombardier Corporation of Montreal has just announced that it is opening a new plant in Barrie, Vermont, creating 200 new American jobs instead of jobs in Canada, and it is doing this as a direct result of the "buy-America" legislation which exists in the United States. Considering that the president-elect has indicated very clearly that he wants to strengthen this "buy-America" legislation, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what the government intends to do about getting the U.S. government to change this legislation which so adversely affects employment in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Pierre does not want to answer.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we had been holding very active and urgent discussions with the previous U.S. administration. Just before the adjournment of the House, we had been holding discussions with the present U.S. secretary of commerce, Mr. Klutznick, and we intend to open discussions with the new U.S. administration as soon as possible after their cabinet is in place.

I might also point out that while this plant will mean some 200 jobs in Vermont, it was established there to enable the creation of some 400 jobs in La Pocatière in Quebec through the carrying out of this contract. I hope my hon. friend does not oppose that.

Madam Speaker: A further supplementary, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie).

Mr. Broadbent: Only the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could see the loss of 200 jobs as providing some kind of benefits to Canadians—

Madam Speaker: Order please. I am sorry but I was confused. I meant to recognize the hon. member for Oshawa but I did call the hon. member for Rosedale.

Mr. Broadbent: I do not know, Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order please. I think I owe the House an explanation. I was writing down the name of the hon. member for Rosedale because I saw him rising for a question later on. The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I do not know which of us should rise on a question of privilege!

My last question is to the incomparable Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I said "incomparable" with just a tinge of irony!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Having failed to produce jobs for people at Massey, having failed the auto industry, having failed the steel industry because of its problems with the buy America act, and having lost out in the cabinet in his attempts to get an industrial strategy, will the minister finally fulfil at least one promise he made to the people of Canada, that unless he obtained what he promised for them, he would submit his resignation now?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we should ask the Leader of the NDP why he has not resigned as a result of his efforts which lost his party all its seats in northern Ontario and brought about an absolute failure to get the support of industrial workers in Ontario and in the rest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: On the other hand, Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Government of Canada we took action which has created the basis for the preservation of the 40,000 jobs connected, directly and indirectly, with Chrysler Canada. We have shown our willingness to make a commitment, if the private sector does its job, which will preserve and increase jobs at Massey. This is a demonstration of our achievement and our commitment to preserve jobs and increase jobs for working people across Canada, something which, on the basis of comparison, the NDP and its leader have shown themselves to be totally incompetent, and incapable of doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON WORKING POOR

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister will know that on Monday the Canadian Council on Social Development condemned the government's budget as having, and I use their words, "a devastating effect on millions of disadvantaged Canadians". The Minister of Finance attacked the council, which has served this country for 60 years. They had to come back yesterday with a public statement defending their position and indicating that their concerns needed to be dealt with. In particular, they were concerned about the 500,000 Canadians, the so-called working poor, and I quote their words on page 3.

It is these people, the working poor, who will suffer most from the recent budget.

I should like to ask the minister what she intends to do to offer relief to these people?

• (1140)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, it is with regret that I have to make the following remarks on yesterday's press release by, and press conference of, the Canadian Council on Social Development. I say "with regret" because the council has played the role of advocate for the poor in our country which is unique and essential.

However, yesterday the council focused away from the work it did at the beginning of the week and toward the so-called working poor. I have to tell the hon. member that the criticism made by the Minister of Finance and the qualifications I made regarding the council's first document I now have to bring to its second document. The council's table 1, which is called appendix 1, for instance, includes in the incomes of families on welfare the child tax credit and family allowances. They do not include those for working poor families.

I am not saying life is not difficult for the working poor, but I am saying that for a family of four there is an annual, indexed, non-taxable sum of about $960 missing in each of the tables. This is quite a serious distortion. That is all we are saying. We can only applaud the work the council does in trying to remind all Canadians of the poverty in our society, but serious mistakes were made in that document.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I am certain that the minister would not want to mislead the House. The table she refers to clearly differentiates between the working poor who make money as a consequence of low-paying jobs and how much money they get on welfare. The council is dealing with the fact that this budget forces those Canadians onto welfare. That is why the table is there.

There are many other concerns raised in the second report, which is some 14 to 15 pages long. Will the minister meet with the council? The council is supported by her own government. Will she meet with the council and see what she can do to resolve the conflicts among herself, her government and the council so that the people who are affected by this budget are aided?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I think it is a false battle which is being discussed. The council does receive quite an important sum of money from my department; I think the amount is close to half a million dollars. It does its work completely at arm's length from the government, and it must remain that way. There is no doubt that the council's role of advocate is essential, and I will not interfere in its work.

There is no need to point out that we meet regularly. I had meetings very recently with the council. However, I have not had a meeting since the new executive director was appointed, for the obvious reason that I think he is a former employee of my department. I think people have to settle into their jobs and find their style of work, and I respect that.

However, my fights will continue to be with people on this side of the House to make sure that the portion of money going to social development remains the biggest amount spent by this government. I will fight to make sure that it continues to be indexed to the full cost of living. That is my fight, and that is the way I intend to continue my work.

There is no point comparing two kinds of poor. I have, however, said that the council has made a serious mistake in its figures, and that does not help the debate.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

COMPARATIVE COST OF CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES PROGRAMS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism who is responsible for the co-ordination of the government's advertising program. Figures released indicate per capita government expenditure on advertising in Canada of $6.66, and the federal government is by far the largest single advertiser in the country, up from seventeenth place in just ten years, with an outlay of three times that of General Foods, the second largest. In view of the comparison with the United States where the federal government is the twenty-eighth largest advertiser, with a per capita expenditure of only 65 cents, can the minister explain the rationale of the government's deeming it necessary to spend ten times per capita the amount spent in the United States for advertising?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I believe it is important that the Government of Canada, especially in a country with such a small population and such a large geographic area, communicate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: I hear "oh, oh!" from the other side. All I know is that since I assumed these responsibilities I have tried to take the system put in place by the Conservatives and improve it to have better evaluation of programs, to be sure that taxpayers' money is being well spent and that the various regions of the country are being properly communicated with. I think that anybody who is thoughtful about the state of our country would probably agree that we have a real problem in communicating with each other and making Canadians well aware of how their federal tax dollars are spent.

We are a major participant in the Canadian economy. Collectively the provincial governments spend far more than we do, but I make no apology, and I certainly did not see any indication that the previous government would act any differently from the way we have.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, what precipitated my question was my looking at Supplementary Estimates B which were tabled by the government. Those estimates reveal an increase at least of $26,925,000 on advertising this year alone, and an increase, for example, for the Canadian Unity Information Office of $15,172,000. That is more than the dominion spent in the first year of confederation totally. There is an increase of $9,555,000 for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. There is a threefold increase in each of the instances I have mentioned.

Is it the position of the government that the press gallery here is simply doing an incompetent job of explaining to the Canadian people what is happening, or does the government take the position that the Canadian people are a little slow and have to have this kind of direction from the government? What is the reason for this Orwellian increase and the 1984 mentality of this government?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, there is a certain element of hypocrisy in the hon. member's question. At the moment we have two out-front Conservative governments and one pseudo-Conservative government at the provincial level advocating positions of their governments, not endorsed by their legislatures largely, spending taxpayers' money in putting forward positions, which is something I pledged we would not do.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Precipitated by you.

Mr. Fleming: That is not true. What we are doing is what I said we would do when I was questioned some weeks ago, and that is communicate to the Canadian public the programs of the Government of Canada endorsed by this Parliament. That is all we are doing, and that is what we should be doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER LETTER RECEIVED FROM NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD REQUESTING DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the Prime Minister's repeated assurance that native people would be participants in the process of constitutional change in all matters affecting them, and given the government's failure to involve native people prior to drafting the proposed resolution on the constitution, could the Prime Minister confirm that he has received a letter from the president of the National Indian Brotherhood requesting an early meeting to discuss the constitution, and would the Prime Minister indicate whether he has agreed to such a meeting and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, according to the information I have received from the responsible minister, the government has offered the native groups some $1.4 million to research their constitutional claims. There have been repeated meetings with officials and with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and very recently there have been meetings at the official level. I have in correspondence with the native leaders indicated that I would be prepared to meet with them at some point when in their own preparation they felt they had some specific proposal to put to the government.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, the government's position always seems to be that it is willing to throw money to the native people so that they can hold a meeting among themselves. They would like to have a meeting before the end of November at which time their all-chiefs conference is being held so that they can discuss the constitution now during this first stage.

• (1150)

Could the Prime Minister indicate whether he is aware of the anger and the frustration of Indian, Métis and Inuit people because their rights have been completely ignored in the proposed charter of rights? How does he think native people can be effective participants in this first stage of constitutional change which directly affects their basic rights?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it is not correct to say that they have been completely ignored. The resolution before the committee refers to their rights not being changed in any way. The precise definition of those rights in a written constitutional document is something, I repeat, that we have assisted the Indians, native people, Métis and Inuit to research for themselves. If they come up with some form of amendment which is acceptable to all parties in this House—and I should say hopefully to several of the provincial governments—we are prepared to accept amendments on this as on other things.

I would merely want to point out to the hon. member that I think the simple claim of aboriginal rights, without anyone knowing exactly what it means, is not a matter which one can convincingly argue should be put in the constitution at this time. First of all, the courts would be called upon to interpret such a constitutional amendment, and I think everyone would want to know what aboriginal rights are, what are their extent, to whom they apply, and so on.

ENERGY

REQUEST DEPARTMENT UNDERTAKE RESEARCH INTO GASOHOL

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who has just given our country an efficient energy strategy for the next ten years. Knowing the government objectives aimed at energy self-sufficiency within the shortest delay, can the minister tell the House if his department intends to intensify research into gasohol and, if so, how?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we have set aside a huge amount to develop new energy sources. Several hundred million dollars have been earmarked for research and development over the coming years. In fact we have allocated some $240 million more for the ongoing research program to promote research and development, particularly in the field of new energy sources. I said $240 million but the exact figure is $260 million. Obviously gasohol is one of the new forms of energy which will be eligible for subsidies for research and development.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

PROGRAMS RESPECTING ENERGY EFFICIENT APARTMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Just on that last point and by way of clarification, I wonder if he could check those figures again. My understanding is that the figure of $260 million is for the total research and development of energy, which would include also nuclear, not just renewables.

My question concerns what appears to be a gap in the national energy program which might affect tenants of both small and large apartment buildings who are forced to pay their own heating bills. Can the minister tell the House whether he has in mind any way that landlords might be encouraged to develop programs for retrofitting or to do things to their buildings to make them more energy efficient? Because they have no incentive now when indeed the tenants are paying their own heating bills.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, on the first point I want to stress that the $260 million for research and development over the next three years will be additional to, or over and above, the hundreds of millions of dollars already spent by the federal government, the largest share of it having gone into nuclear. That additional $260 million, the overwhelming share of it, will be in the non-nuclear field and in new forms of energy, renewable forms of energy, particularly.

As far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned, our program for insulation obviously is one which is available to all forms of houses. While it is true that in many instances the heating bill is paid by the tenant, it is also true that in many instances the owner-landlord is also contributing to that cost. I think it would be extremely difficult to devise a scheme whereby we could start differentiating between landlords or between landlords and tenants. This program is of a general nature. It is one that is of benefit to all Canadians. We encourage all landlords and tenants to support this particular program and to make use of it. I think any home owner, whether it is his own house which he occupies or whether he is the landlord, will find that he will benefit from insulating the house and reducing heating costs.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to ask the minister how far he thinks $500 will go to insulate a 100-unit apartment building? Because that is the limit of the available resources for those landlords. I am quite happy to see research and development in nuclear continue, but as far as I can understand from the national energy program, that $260 million includes $100 million for research into nuclear energy and waste disposal. I think that is appropriate, but I think we need more in renewables.

Finally, would the minister consider extending the provisions for retrofitting and insulation which go beyond CHIP in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, so that other areas in the country which do not have the opportunity to switch to natural gas, areas where electricity costs are very high, or indeed areas where people are already on natural gas but have very poor housing, can take advantage of this extra money?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that we are eagerly awaiting the report of the parliamentary task force on renewable energy. What I have seen and heard of the work of that task force seems to be very positive and we are looking forward to receiving that report. Once we have received it and if additional funds are required in this area, we will be very happy to allocate the necessary funds to answer any new worth-while initiatives which are not specifically mentioned in the program. We have set aside some money in order to answer the proposals which might come from this parliamentary task force.

As to the suggestion of the hon. member, it is a worth-while one. Certainly I will take it into consideration to see whether we can make further adjustments to our program later on, bearing in mind his representation.

ENERGY

GASIFICATION PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Everyone knows about the interest shown both by Nova Scotia and Quebec toward the regasification project. Last Friday, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion told some reporters before the Chamber of Commerce in Quebec that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had informed him that it would be completely ridiculous to choose Canso as a site for this project, which has obviously greatly encouraged Quebeckers to try to get it for themselves. Can the minister now tell the House whether he has indeed examined this project and whether he considers it ridiculous, as indicated by his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in Quebec last Friday?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, not only is the hon. member misquoting the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, but I believe he is even misquoting the newspaper article to which he has referred.

Mr. La Salle: I must repeat, Madam Speaker, that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion told reporters in Quebec that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources considered that it would be absolutely ridiculous to choose Canso as a site for this project. I would like to ask the minister whether he can now confirm that the statements of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion were well founded, in contradiction to what the minister has been saying for some time in the House to the effect that this project was still under consideration. I believe that it is important for the population to understand the significance of the statement made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, it goes without saying that such a question should be put to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion himself, to find out what he did or did not say. What I wish to stress is the fact that the hon. member does not even properly quote the newspaper article to which he is supposed to be referring.

HEALTH CARE

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO DENTAL FACULTY—LOSS OF FULL ACCREDITATION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The faculty of dentistry at the University of Toronto, which is Canada's largest dental school, has recently lost its full accreditation to that of provisional accreditation. Since this is an indication of weakness in the teaching program and has a significant impact on the quality of dental care which is available to Canadians, is the minister aware of this problem and what is being done about it?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am aware of this problem in a relatively superficial way. It does not fall at all under the responsibility or the jurisdiction of the federal government. If the hon. member is interested, I can inquire and obtain more information, which I will forward to him.

Mr. Halliday: Madam Speaker, I assume that the minister is concerned about the over-all health care of Canadians. With that in mind, and the fact that she is committed to preventive health care, is it true that she has no dentist in her health services directorate? If that is so, does she have any plans to rectify this major deficiency in her staff?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, this is one of those days when I wish I was a provincial health minister. I am the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare. Within these parameters I try to make sure we have the best medicare in the country and the best health services. The direct delivery of services does not fall under the jurisdiction of my department but is the full responsibility of the provinces.

SOCIAL SECURITY

RUMOURS CONCERNING CUTS IN CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is supplemental to the one asked earlier today by the hon. member for Rosedale. It is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There are rumours—and this government seems to thrive on floating rumours and balloons of one kind or another—that the minister's next attack on the poor will be by way of taking an axe to the Canada Assistance Plan. That is to say she intends not only to place a limit on the provincial payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, but that she intends to reduce it considerably. Since she has already managed to upset senior citizens and the working poor, and it is now a question of welfare recipients, she has the opportunity today to stand in the House, as I would ask her to do, and put an end to this rumour that her next move will be to attack the Canada Assistance Plan and welfare recipients.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's description is like the wording in a cartoon, and I suppose I must stand up and answer although I am not sure I fit her description.

The purpose of the government's objective, which was expressed through the budget, my role and the role of the team in my department, and of the standing committee on which the hon. member does not sit and to which she could come—that would be appreciated since there are not enough people in this country fighting poverty—is to make sure that our program's target with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan, which is a program providing billions of dollars of federal moneys to those in need, to social services and welfare, will remain the way it is. Of that the member can be sure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, the minister will remember that she would come before a committee only to fight against the extension of spouse's allowance. That is what she would do in committee.

I ask the minister, since she has refused to meet with the Canadian Council on Social Development, and since she has refused to do anything to satisfy concerns with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan, if she would meet with her cabinet colleagues—the people who are supposed to exhibit compassion—and ask them if they would stop pressuring her to cut back on the welfare recipients of this country, something we know the cabinet has in mind to do.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I think this debate in no way helps anybody, especially those to whom I thought the hon. member was committed. She speaks of my being against increasing the extension of the spouse's allowance. She knows that is not true. I choose my priorities differently and I chose to find hundreds of millions of dollars to increase the GIS by $20 a month in 1979.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: When the opposition came to power for a short time, to my knowledge they brought in one baby social measure which amounted to $4 million. We were in opposition and had to fight them to raise it to $10 million. That is what we did for the spouse's allowance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: With respect to the other accusations she makes, they do not make much sense nor are they helpful. As a matter of fact, I have forgotten what they were about. I simply repeat that I have never refused to meet with the Canadian Council on Social Development. I would like to say that is pure rumour. At the beginning of her question, the hon. member said she was operating on the basis of rumour. I do not do that. I fight on the basis of fact and reality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE

BILINGUAL BONUS FOR SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I realize he has a personal commitment to the Official Languages Act, but I am concerned about two actions which his government has taken lately which have hurt the implementation of that act. As we know, the translators have been without a contract for the last 19 months. This has resulted in services, programs and documents not being available to citizens in both official languages.

My question is really with regard to another negotiation with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. All members of that employee group are bilingual—and I congratulate them for that. What I am upset about is that, in the round of negotiations which is continuing at this time, the government has refused to pay that group a bilingual bonus. It is the only group which does not receive the bilingual bonus. I think if the government is committed they should be acting on that.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, with respect to the hon. member's first question, I am not clear what stage of negotiation the parties have reached.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are still carrying on.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand they are still carrying on. I know the hon. member would not want me to intervene in this dispute at this stage, on one side or the other.

As far as the second question is concerned, I will take it as notice. I am not aware of the facts the hon. member has brought to my attention.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister for that commitment. In fact, negotiations with both groups have broken down and this is something else the Prime Minister can look into. In both cases the problem is the government's refusal to accept the conciliation board report. I would ask the Prime Minister, when he is doing his research into this matter, that he ask the ministers responsible to take a much more positive attitude toward conciliation board reports and to stop making the public service more militant.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it seems to me that we are now talking about two management-labour disputes, which have nothing to do with the government's policy on bilingualism; it is a matter of dispute between two contending parties. I fail to see how the hon. gentleman could find that we are not following up on our bilingualism policy because there is a labour dispute with a particular union. It does not seem to follow at all, Madam Speaker.

TRANSLATORS' DISPUTE—STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Madam Speaker, my question follows along much the same lines. It was intended for the President of the Treasury Board but, in his absence, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could answer it. It also pertains to the translators' strike, which is now starting to affect our committee activities. While it is understood that there is a broad area of agreement in the settlement, I wonder if I can be advised whether negotiations have broken off, and whether the point of contention is the alleged refusal of Treasury Board officials to permit the Department of the Secretary of State to predetermine the amounts of the salary deductions that will be applied during the slowdown period?

● (1210)

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member asked that question, as it will partly answer the question of the hon. member who spoke previously.

It is not true to say that there has been a breakdown in negotiations between translators and their employers. Hon. members are aware that the Treasury Board has already accepted the conclusions of the mediator's report. A qualification has been made by the union representatives to the effect that the discussions which were supposed to go on to determine salary adjustments following last summer's work slowdown be resumed. This morning they requested through the spokesman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board than an independent mediator be immediately appointed to settle this minor point which still stands in the way of a collective agreement. Consequently, at this stage the Treasury Board is awaiting the recommendation of the staff relations board to resolve that minor point and put an end to this most troublesome dispute. I am sure all hon. members from all parties in this House are equally committed to linguistic equality and to the fulfilment of that goal.

AIRPORTS

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING PRE-CUSTOMS CLEARANCE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. With respect to direct air service between Ottawa and New York, I understand that the government has approved the concept of at least two applicants before the board. Would the minister tell the House whether or not within the government there are discussions going on to allow customs pre-clearance, a service which would be of benefit to international passengers whether they be leaving or entering Ottawa? Are those discussions continuing?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as the question implies, the discussion is going on at two levels. It is going on firstly at the Canada-U.S. level. As my hon. friend knows, Eastern Airlines has not used its Ottawa-New York licence. Therefore, through different channels in the United States, we are looking at the possibility of using airlines other than Eastern Airlines.

At the other level, Air Atonabee and First Air are also candidates for approval by both regulatory bodies in Canada and the United States. The first effort is toward getting a direct airline service which we tried to get on its own without the pre-clearance facility. That is the first line of effort and, of course, the second will follow.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EUTHANASIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, but he has left the House. Perhaps I could address it to his parliamentary secretary or to whomever represents the Prime Minister in his absence from the House. Is the government planning to introduce amendments to the Criminal Code permitting euthanasia along the lines of the 1969 amendments which permitted therapeutic abortions?

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, there are at least 12 priorities involving the Criminal Code at which we are presently looking. They range from the Judges Act to the omnibus act. The issue of euthanasia is not a major priority, but we will take cognizance of the issue and deal with it in due course.

Mr. Dinsdale: Madam Speaker, arising from that answer—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but we must end the question period; we have already gone beyond the time allotted. Since the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton did not ask a second question, I thought I would end after one question by the hon. member. We must now go to the routine proceedings of the House.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DEANS—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Madam Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). While I did receive his written notice of the question of privilege, I must say that procedurally it is not very explicit. The idea of the written notice, I would remind hon. members, is so that I can be informed of what the question of privilege will be about, so that the Chair can try to find out in advance the facts leading to the question of privilege. The notice is not very specific, but I will hear the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, if it is your wish, I am prepared to delay discussion of my question of privilege until Wednesday in order that you may be given more information.

Madam Speaker: I think that is a very good idea, and I thank the hon. member for his co-operation.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. LEWIS—HOUSE OF COMMONS—PRESENCE OF SECURITY GUARDS BEHIND CURTAINS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise to ask you to consider a point of order which flows out of the report you made to this House yesterday on the presence of security guards in the chamber on October 24, 1980. The reason that I am asking that you rule on this point of order is that I seek direction for this House as to whether or not a Speaker's report is the same as a ruling by the Speaker. Does the Speaker's report become a precedent which then goes into Beauchesne's and Hansard and then is looked to in the future for guidance by people who are seeking to apply a new set of facts to a report of the Speaker?

I would like to know how a member of this House can have input into a report made by the Speaker, if it does have the same effect and force as a ruling. Such input would assist your office and give you as Speaker the benefit of some of the experiences in which we participated on that particular evening. In the future people will be looking for guidance from whatever is said by Madam Speaker. I think that it is very important that we decide whether or not a report becomes a ruling. I reviewed Beauchesne's and I cannot find anything which states that a report becomes a ruling. I am concerned, because I have very serious reservations about what was stated in the report delivered by you yesterday, Madam Speaker.

Also, as part of my point of order, I would ask you to consider something which is in Beauchesne's. It is suggested in Beauchesne's that the Speaker may request the Sergeant-at-Arms to prepare a report on a disturbance in the House. I would suggest that perhaps this has not come up too often. I would suggest, Madam Speaker, that you have an opportunity to bring Beauchesne's up to date on what is happening in the world today in that the practice of administrative bodies investigating their own acts is rapidly disappearing in Canada.

When the Sergeant-at-Arms is asked to investigate a disturbance in the gallery or in the corridors, that is an entirely different matter than when the Sergeant-at-Arms is asked to investigate a disturbance which involves his staff.

Lastly, Madam Speaker, and I say this with the utmost of respect and dignity, there are facts in that report which are simply not accurate. I refer to the last portion of the report where it is suggested that the vote was called and the guards left the House. The vote was called, I pulled the curtains while the bells were ringing and the Acting Speaker, the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker), who was sitting in the chair, immediately ordered the guards to leave. That is what concerns me. We will not set history in 1980 but in years to come when people refer to Hansard and to your report to determine what happened, they will weigh what was said yesterday. I am concerned that they will apply that report to a new set of facts and, quite frankly, that particular part of the report is not accurate.

Mr. McDermid: That's right.

Madam Speaker: To begin with, the statement I made in the House the other day was certainly not a ruling. It was merely a statement, a report on a situation on which I promised the House I would report. I think that is clear. The hon. member then proceeded to ask me how members can have some input into investigations, or a report of that nature. I would suggest that he could speak to the Sergeant-at-Arms and give his version of what happened so that the Sergeant-at-Arms would investigate the facts as the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) saw them, and compare that to what he is being told in the course of the investigation, by the security staff.

• (1220)

I would point out that I am asking the Sergeant-at-Arms to review the procedures and the type of general instructions which the security staff has in case there is a disturbance in the House.

The report that I received from the Sergeant-at-Arms suggested that the staff was carrying out its normal instructions in the circumstances. I have asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to review the whole matter, however, because if some members found the positioning of the security guards offensive on the night of October 24 or October 25—I am not sure if that is the right date but at any rate we know exactly what we are referring to—in case some members found that offensive and not in the spirit of our Standing Orders, I have asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to review that and make recommendations to me as to changes that might be made in the practices and the instructions which the security staff receive in order to deal with this kind of situation.

I shall inform hon. members, when the Sergeant-at-Arms gives me a report, of that review of the instructions given to the security guards. If hon. members are not satisfied at that stage that it fully covers the grievance they might have in this respect, then—and the hon. member referred to people on the staff making their own inquiries into things that they themselves had done—if hon. members are not satisfied, perhaps we can devise some other way of getting advice about how these instructions could be carried out and how they could be defined. I shall endeavour to do that if it is the case that hon. members are not satisfied.

There is another point in the last paragraph—and I would want to check it against what the hon. member just said—which refers to timing. When did the security guards leave the House? Immediately, when the bells stopped ringing? There is the matter of the bells there and I would need to have the report in front of me. I shall get it and see whether there is some discrepancy in the wording of the statement that I made in the House with regard to what actually happened according to witnesses. I think that is all we can do—get witnesses and the opinions of people who were close by and saw what happened.

I retain this, that whoever was in the chair ordered the security guards to leave, and I think he was probably right in doing that. He was well aware of what was going on and acted in accordance with what he should do to protect the privileges of this House.

If this statement satisfies the hon. member at this point, and if he will bear with me and wait until I get the recommendations from the Sergeant-at-Arms, I think we can leave it at that for the time being.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would just say that I think it is important that you have clarified the difference between a report and a ruling, and to compliment you on the rest of your statement.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, may I draw your attention to Standing Order 65(13) of the Rules and Standing Orders of this House, which reads as follows:

All matters relating to the administration of the House and the provisions of services and facilities to members shall be deemed to have been referred to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services on the first day of each session.

In other words, the language of that section is quite clear: this is a matter to be referred also to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order and perhaps I should deal with the last point first, since the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has raised it.

I would submit that what occurred on that evening a couple of weeks ago when the incident took place, was a matter of the privileges of the House. I would say that it would be my view that if any committee were to look into the activities of that evening, it should be the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. What we are dealing with here is the administration of the House as it impinged upon or affected the privileges of members of the House.

I want to comment on something in the statement of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis). He said that many bodies around the world—and I guess he was referring to governing bodies, administrative bodies or parliaments—do not police themselves. I would ask you to look at the statement of the hon. member very carefully, Madam Speaker. You did not refer to it exactly, but it is a time-honoured tradition in British parliamentary democracy that the rights and privileges of all members of the House are upheld by those members, through the Speaker, as the first among equals in the House.

I am not speaking for the government on this matter, Madam Speaker, but for myself. I would certainly consult with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I would be very wary of any move to adjudicate the rights and privileges of members of this House by an outside body, an outside police force.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He didn't say that.

Mr. Collenette: I do not want to get into a prolonged debate, Madam Speaker. Certain things were said by the hon. member for Simcoe North. Perhaps I misunderstood him.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You sure did.

Mr. Collenette: I am sorry that his House leader is so irate, but this is a legitimate point that we should all consider and perhaps have further discussions on.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. There is disagreement about which committee this matter should be referred to, if it is referred. I think that is hypothetical because the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) who raised the question is satisfied that I will inform hon. members after further inquiry by the Sergeant-at-Arms, with his recommendations on how we can best ensure security measures in this House.

I take the point raised by the parliamentary secretary. I do not remember the expression that I used, but I was a bit leary of suggesting that someone outside the House of Commons might tell us how to do things and I used an expression, quite purposely, that did not say exactly that, because I am not sure. I am sure that we can get advice from a lot of people but I am not sure whether we can invite people to come in and determine what we should be doing.

LOANS TO CUBA

Question No. 1,027—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 45 which stated in part, that Cuba has not made all interest payments on the Canadian $10 million 3 per cent interest loan on time and is presently two semi-annual payments in arrears (a) what steps has the government taken to obtain the overdue funds (b) if the funds are obtained by the time this question is answered, what are the names and job designations of all Canadian officials who contacted Cuba directly or indirectly and who did they contact?

2. If payments are up to date, what are the exact dates that payments were received and the amounts involved?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): 1. Cuba was sent payment notices prior to the due dates for each payment by the Canadian government through our embassy in Havana. Reminder notices were subsequently sent in September, 1979, and March, 1980, when payments were not made on these due dates. All collection efforts were made by the diplomatic staff from the Canadian embassy in Havana. Canadian officials believe that the delays in payments were due primarily to administrative problems within the Cuban government. After duplicate disbursement statements and a financial status report were sent to the Cuban government, payments were made immediately. Cuba is not in arrears at the present time.

2. The three payments in arrears were paid as follows:

$385,267.74 in May, 1980

$298,732.82 in May, 1980

$150,300.62 in May, 1980

TASK FORCE ON THE CANADIAN AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Questions Nos. 1,254 to 1,265 incl.—Mr. Herbert:

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government should establish a policy for the Department of National Defence to earmark a fixed portion of its budget to be spent in Canadian industry for advanced technology equipment and research and development so as to provide a reasonable stimulus to its technology similar to that enjoyed by Canada's NATO partners and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the future human resource needs of the industry be audited and that urgent steps be taken to ensure that they can be primarily sourced in Canada and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that restrictions which have developed to technology transfer, primarily with the U.S., should be eliminated by negotiating a return to the spirit of free exchange of technology in international co-operative agreements and an enhanced development of technology in Canadian industry, as a basis for sharing knowledge and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the modernization of the industry's production capability should be increased with government support and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that government procurement should be used as a tool to support the industry and to assist in demonstrating its products to world markets and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government should institute a policy of spending a fixed minimum portion of its defence capital budget for direct procurement of Canadian designed and manufactured advanced technology products, by reducing any hazard to the defence production sharing agreement, inter alia, by specially selecting work for sourcing in Canadian industry which can meet special Canadian sovereignty needs, e.g., provision of special Canadian operational systems and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government should provide Canadian industry with funds and/or tax incentives and the opportunity to more directly perform R & D in support of future Canadian defence needs, by spending a meaningful fixed portion of its total budget on R & D in Canadian industry and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government and industry should take special measures to develop a comprehensive operational support and maintenance engineering competence in Canadian industry, by the Department of National Defence defining and arranging Canadian based life cycle support capabilities at the start of its procurement cycle for new equipment and the government being ready to pay the front end costs to establish the Canadian sources and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government should give consideration to increasing the allocation of funds for industry modernization assistance and, exceptionally, to extend defence industry productivity program and industry modernization for defence establishments program to routine equipment where more advanced equipment is inappropriate and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government should seek a renegotiation of the defence production sharing agreement to remove impediments to technology transfer which have developed in recent years and which are against the spirit of the original understandings and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government should review and reduce restrictions to the export of Canadian aerospace products and services, by seeking to eliminate through MTN foreign tariffs on aerospace products and services and, as a quid pro quo to permanently eliminate the Canadian import duties which are effectively waived on an annual basis and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry recommend to the government in June, 1978, that the government assist industry in reducing the financial risk of entry to major international aerospace programs where this is identified to be in the long-term national economic interest and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The question is derived directly from the report of the Consultative Task Force on the Aerospace Manufacturing Sector. This report was released on June 30, 1978, and its contents are available to the general public. The reaction by the federal government to each of these points was published in "Response of the Federal Government to the Recommendations of the Consultative Task Force on the Canadian Aerospace Industry". This report was made public May 29, 1979.

PASQUA-MUSCOWPETUNG—SCHOOL-PROJECT

Question No. 1,399—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the school at Pasqua/Muscowpetung?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps presently being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $345,000.

2. Yes.

3. The project has been completed.

MOSQUITO RESERVE—SCHOOL-PROJECT

Question No. 1,400—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the school at Mosquito Reserve?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps presently being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $124,000.

2. Yes.

3. The project has been completed.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

• (1230)

Madam Speaker: As hon. members are aware, there are 59 motions standing on the order paper at the report stage of Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof. The Chair has had a cursory look at all of the motions. However, it is my intention to deal only with a few motions for the time being, since some of them were filed as recently as yesterday.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 could be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 6 will be debated separately and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 5, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20 and 21 could be grouped for debate. However, motions Nos. 5 and 16 will be voted on separately. The question on motion No. 13 will be put to the House and this will dispose of motions Nos. 12, 19, 20 and 21 which are consequential motions.

Motions Nos. 7, 8 and 9 shall be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 10 and 11 could be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 14, 15 and 18 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 17, 52, 55 and 59, all in the name of the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) can be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 35 and 36 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

" 'bank' means

(a) any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money and accepting deposit liabilities transferable by cheque or other instrument, or

(b) any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money raised in Canada through the acceptance of deposit liabilities or the issuance of debt securities but does not include

(c) any financial institution incorporated as a credit union or caisse populaire and federations of such or any other co-operative credit society

(d) any financial institution subject to the Quebec Savings Banks Act

(e) any financial institution wholly owned by the federal or provincial governments or treasury branches or offices thereof

(f) any financial institution incorporated as an insurance company within the meaning of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act

(g) any financial institution incorporated either federally or provincially as a trust company, mortgage and loan company or finance company with more than 75 per cent Canadian ownership and where no foreign individual or associated individuals or groups own more than 10 per cent of the voting shares

(h) any other financial institution not mentioned in (c), (d), (e), (f) or (g) which is an investment company within the meaning of the Investment Companies Act or a loan company within the meaning of the Loans Company Act and in which there is more than 75 per cent Canadian ownership and where no foreign individual or associated individuals or groups own more than 10 per cent of the voting shares."

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by adding immediately after line 12 at page 3 the following:

" 'business of banking' means that business carried on in whole or in part by a bank within the meaning of the act."

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I report initially that I have consulted with the hon. minister in charge of financial institutions and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), and we have agreed that considering the nature of the debate today on the calling of the first items, motion No. 1 and motion No. 2 are quite rightly joined together for debate. A general review will take place today as well as participation by any and all hon. members who wish to say something about the Bank Act, whether there is provision in the amendments or otherwise, within the 20 minutes allotted to any intervention. But then we come to the specifics of motions Nos. 1 and 2, which are grouped in this debate. The minister, myself, as proposer, and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood shall have a second turn so that we can particularize our attention on these items. That is the way we propose to proceed. Therefore, in that spirit I am quite prepared at the present time to yield my position on the floor to the minister who may wish to give a general report on proceedings to date, and to give a report on the attitude of the government in general with regard to this. He can, as well, reply to any questions and comment upon any other points. I will do the same, to be followed by our colleague from Toronto.

Other hon. members can then join the debate in the House this afternoon until four o'clock. On Wednesday next week we will get into the heart and soul of these amendments, unless the general debate contribution dies before that time. I think we can get along quite well and make ready progress on reasonably quick passage of this stage of the legislation.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to remove any ambiguity whatsoever about the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) which seems to have the support of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and which I am prepared to endorse. We might begin the study of this first motion in a general debate where each member would explain his views as a result of the work of the standing committee.

Once that stage is over, the member for Edmonton West, who moved motions 1 and 2, the member for Broadview-Greenwood and myself might draw the appropriate conclusions which would be strictly restricted to the nature of and comments on the motion. Then we might continue to examine these motions while demonstrating much moderation and temperance and limiting our remarks to the substance of the question with a view to proceeding as expeditiously as possible in the study of this bill. If my understanding is correct I am prepared to agree.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with the arrangements that have been worked out. It is my understanding that the minister will speak now to be followed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and then myself. Other members can then participate in a general way for 20 minutes at the report stage. Following that procedure we will be able to return to the particularities of the amendments which have been put forward with respect to motion No. 1 and motion No. 2. That is my understanding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. please. The Chair understands that the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), will be seeking the floor a second time. This can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I commend the hon. member for Edmonton West for his initiative and I also thank the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood for accepting this arrangement. I think this procedure will enable us to shed more light on this massive bill reported by the committee which we are now considering at the report stage.

I express special thanks to the members of the standing committee who studied this bill. I would not want to go over the background and the maze through which the bill went, but I would simply recall the work stages we have experienced since this Parliament took over the bill. Personally I must confess that I felt all committee members had a common will to reach three objectives. The first objective was to recognize the urgency of this legislation and to study it rapidly without, however, neglecting any aspect whatever. The second objective was to keep in mind that as a standing committee we had to provide the people of Canada with the best possible legislation to govern banking institutions and practices in Canada, the one which would most contribute to improve banking operations in the interests of all Canadians.

Of course, we also aimed at ensuring through this legislation mechanisms which would allow these institutions to continue to work in the interests of Canadians, mechanisms which would continue to develop in the interests of economic growth in our country, mechanisms which would continue to be extremely competitive to ensure that the Canadian financial institutions remain healthy.

Of course, the bill has come back with some amendments at the report stage, but its basic philosophy and underlying principles are still the same. We have added a few amendments, mainly to accommodate special concerns which are shared by the great majority of the members who worked on the standing committee, and I firmly believe that these amendments were made in the spirit that I described earlier, that is, that they aim at improving the bill in the interests of Canadians, the financial institutions and the banking institutions themselves. I am convinced that the amendments made in the committee meet both objectives.

The first amendment which I want to discuss concerns the incorporation of banks. Hon. members will recall that this bill provides a new formula for obtaining the status of bank. This formula will expedite the process. It provides that letters patent can be applied for to be able to use the designation of bank and be subject to the Canadian banking legislation. As I recall, this provision was discussed at length, and our colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West can correct me if I am wrong since he followed this process much more closely than I did. The Senate committee had already suggested this amendment and the hon. member for Edmonton West brought it up several times in the committee. According to this amendment, public hearings must be held when a financial institution applies to become a bank either by obtaining letters patent or by incorporation. The House will recall that our objective of promoting competition and having more institutions in the field of banking motivated the search for an easier process to be used by institutions wishing to become banks. Some had objected that absence of any public hearing could eventually go against the public interests.

The Senate committee which studied the bill came to the conclusion that some sort of an examination was appropriate. The government therefore accepted an amendment, which was supported by a large majority of committee members, and which provides a mechanism through which the Inspector General of Banks has the discretionary power to hold an inquiry on the issue of letters patent if he believes that such an inquiry is desirable. The inspector general will report to the Minister of Finance if he deems that the objections put forward during this inquiry are justified and deserve a very particular attention from the minister.

There is a second amendment to which I wish to draw honourable members' attention, and which is found in the revised version of Bill C-6 as reported by the committee. It deals with the issuance of licences to foreign banks. The provisions of clause 28 have been lightly changed. During the first five years of operation of a foreign bank in Canada, it will have to have its licence renewed every year. After five yearly renewals, its licence will be renewed for a three-year period. The spirit in which this amendment was put forward, as committee members will remember, was that it would enable the government to implement better both the spirit and the letter of those provisions which relate to foreign bank subsidiaries carrying on business in Canada according to the provisions of the new legislation.

There is a third amendment with which I would like to deal and which was reviewed in committee, that is the provision concerning the claims of particular agricultural producers' groups, the Canadian Agricultural Federation, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, which can be found in clause 178 of the legisation before us, that is section 88 of the present statute, in order to grant priority rights to all agricultural products. Obviously, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association was making representations so that herds are covered. We have widened this provision to meet the request of the Canadian Agricultural Federation and at present the provision of clause 178 reads as follows: all agricultural products. Moreover, we have ensured greater protection by adding to the money limit or ceiling a priority protection which is insured up to $100,000. And those honourable members who have followed the debate in committee will recall that this $100,000 ceiling is related to some kind of indexing formula of farm products. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this is a most important improvement and I am very pleased to say, as a government member, that we are meeting formal commitments which we made as Liberal members during the electoral campaign.

Another amendment deals with the financial leasing for household effects. And I would be remiss in not reminding honourable members that the debate in committee as regards leasing went to the very heart of the matter and dealt with the very nature of leasing and banking institutions. The debate was a long and serious one and it really dealt with the heart of the matter. We were really concerned that the banks might conclude leasing arrangements as regards household appliances or goods, whether refrigerators, TV sets and so on.

● (1250)

Hon. members considered the impact that such a practice would have on the new commercial habits of the small businessmen and also on the use of consumer credit. If I remember correctly, and members of the committee will correct me if I am wrong, this was one of the basic concerns of the members. If hon. members who did not attend the committee proceedings, were to read the minutes of the Votes and proceedings they would be convinced of the merit of the concern expressed by committee members in view of the competition which could result for small businesses and in view also of the changes in the fundamental habits of consumers.

In order to lay those concerns to rest, the government amended section 173(1)(j) in order to prevent a bank from engaging in financial leasing of personal property. I believe that the great majority of the committee members were in favour of this amendment. Another aspect of financial leasing which was discussed extensively, once again in principle, is the matter of financial leasing of cars. Therefore, in this instance also the government proposed an amendment to the act in order to prevent banks from engaging directly in the financial leasing of motor vehicles designed to be used primarily on public highways. Clause 173 of the act was amended to prevent banks from directly engaging in financial leasing of motor vehicles holding a permit to be used on public highways and whose gross weight is under 21 metric tons. In this instance again this amendment was introduced as a result of the governments concern over the impact on this market of the participation of the banks. It is quite obvious that in the next few years, major changes will occur in the sale and financing of passenger vehicles or light trucks. However, banks should be authorized to accept these leases as collateral or to buy them or to accept their transfer. Otherwise this would prevent the small and medium-sized car dealers from resorting to a source of financing which they are using at the present time. That is, Mr. Speaker, the significance of the amendment to clause 173 brought in the standing committee.

As a result of the work done by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, we have learned recently that the contents of Bill C-6 as amended could prevent banks from renting items such as farm, forestry, mining mobile equipment and others, because even if those items are not usually sold by automobile dealers, they may have to be registered in some provinces to travel on public roads.

The amendment which I introduced, and the members of the committee will remember that it was briefly discussed during the last meeting of the committee in October, I believe, is aimed at preventing banks from renting the kinds of vehicles sold by automobile dealers without going through credit facilities which can be convenient for both the manufacturers and purchasers of special vehicles that are not distributed through automobile and truck dealers.

I have carefully considered the content and meaning of this amendment so there be no doubt as to its restrictive nature and the fact that whatever opportunities it provides are only intended to deal with specific situations, groups and businessmen who, had banks been denied that kind of financing, would have had serious trouble meeting instalments on their trucks or heavy equipment for lumbering or other types of work.

The amendement takes out the following phrase "which may require licence plates on public roads—"

The phrasing of subparagraph (c)(2), the definition of bank credit company on page 208, paragraph 193(1) in the October new reimpression, which is the one which came out of the committee, adds a definition of motorized vehicles, specifying what types banks will not be allowed to rent out.

The definition of the motorized vehicle includes "used mainly on public roads for the transportation of persons and goods", to the exclusion of such articles as farm equipment which are not primarily used for the conveyance of persons. Specialized equipment is used for felling trees and moving timber rather than to transport people. Heavy construction equipment, for example, is not generally used along public ways or distributed by car agencies but it may have to carry licence plates on public highways, pursuant to the law in effect in various provinces.

Besides a particular exclusion is made for vehicles which are essentially used on public highways but which are not distributed through car agencies.

This exclusion, Mr. Speaker, deals with trucks used for a particular purpose, for example, fire engines, utility trucks which may be used by such companies as Bell Canada, Hydro Ontario or Hydro Quebec, etc—

Miss Bégin: —municipalities.

Mr. Bussières: —municipalities, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) says, school buses and others, which are assembled by small independent manufacturers, who buy the frame through an agent, of course, mount the equipment, special or otherwise, and then sell the completed vehicle. Those who buy them need the banks to finance that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. Was the Chair advised a while ago that each speaker would be allowed only 20 minutes, if I understood correctly?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to start off this debate this afternoon. Seeing that for the next four, five or possibly six days I will have the opportunity to take the floor on a number of occasions, and in view of the increased numbers of members in this House, I have deliberately forgone any opportunities I might have had to speak in the constitutional debate and in the budget debate, because it is just nonsense to think that anyone here can speak as often as he might wish or as he should.

● (1410)

Some years ago we made a stupid mistake—and I underline the word "stupid"—when we increased the size of this House to 282. It should have been reduced rather than increased at that time because there is quite ample opportunity now for members, with the help of their staffs, to take care of their constituency requirements. The communications are much better, and in so far as the chamber is concerned the biggest problem is that more and more people are seeking the floor. That is why every stage of legislation takes longer. All members are equal and, if I may say so, this increased the number of frustrated members on the government backbenches who suffer from ministerial muzzle. I know; I was there. No minister wants backbenchers taking more time speaking on second and third reading or committee stage if it will delay the passage of legislation. Those are the practicalities of the matter, and ministerial muzzle is the biggest disease on the government backbenches.

On May 13 the contents of Bill C-6 were referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the members of that committee got down to work. They did not hear additional witnesses to any extent, because the great hearing of witnesses had taken place on Bill C-15 in the period from late 1978 to early 1979. I find it passing strange that we hear comments from the outside, and read comments in the press, that the review of the Bank Act has been interminable. For one thing, this is written and spoken by people who did not see or experience the previous change.

I went through the government paper which flowed from the Porter commission on banking and the two bills brought forward by the government, the second one of which ultimately passed. Longer public hearings occurred on that occasion, and in so far as the members of the committee were concerned the first series of hearings was educative. The banking system is a very complicated matter, and the act at that time was only half the size of the present one. Unfortunately a lot of this so-called criticism comes from an ignorance of the facts as they exist. I am the only member of the finance committee who had previous experience with the Bank Act. I am referring to the members who actively participated in the hearings and in the process from A to Z. I am not referring to the debate, because there were some other members who had experience.

At that time I warned the government that it was setting too short a time, that the deliberative process would take a certain time. That has happened, and as a result we have a better act. Also we have a better understanding between the government and the opposition. We in the opposition have been able to convince the government to accept certain amendments, and the government has had a better opportunity of perhaps imposing its views upon us. We would say, "Well, we think we were right, but we must reconcile the fact that there is a majority, and get on with it."

We must try to convince the Canadian Bankers' Association that it cannot have everything. My good friend, Bob MacIntosh, the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, seems to be irreconciled to the fact that he cannot get everything the association wants. There is a competing interest in the system of financial institutions in the country and we must do the best we can to see that there is a fair shake for consumers, borrowers, depositers, and shareholders in banks and other financial institutions.

We have seen a tremendous growth in the credit union and caisse populaire movement from the position they occupied back in 1966 when we considered the previous Bank Act. We have seen some changes since that time. In some ways I am disappointed at the whole process. As I have indicated before, notwithstanding that Mr. MacIntosh says the process started six years ago—it may have started for him then—over eight years ago, in 1972, I suggested to the then minister of finance, Hon. John Turner, that the government should appoint a royal commission to study the question of banking and financial services in this country to provide for our requirements over the next 25 years. That was not done, and the question limped along until a government white paper was produced in 1976. But that white paper on banking was effectively kept away from any committee of the House or any debate in the House until 1978 when it surfaced as Bill C-15. Then we started hearings. At that point we were a year late, according to the requirements of the decennial revision.

As I have said before, we were being asked merely to patch up the holes and possibly open a little door here and a little door there. Fundamentally that is still my view about this act. It deals with yesterday and today, but not with tomorrow.

As other hon. members have done, I have seen fundamental changes in banking in the last 12 years. I am not referring to the mere processes, because we are only a short time away from the electronic transferring of funds. The government will become convinced of this, as soon as the Post Office converts into a Crown corporation and the government has to pay the real fee for mailing old age security cheques, pension cheques and various payments. Immediately the government will run to the banks and say, "Please, we need electronic transfer of funds as quickly as possible". The banks have been able to do this in part, but it will be much easier and more effective now that we have the Canadian Payments Association. If the major trust companies so desire, they can become members of the association. They will find it economically possible to participate as full members. Of course the caisse populaire and credit union movement, among their federations and what-have-you, are also able to participate in this payments association. I do not think many of them will have very grave difficulty getting into the electronic transfer of funds. Le mouvement Desjardins is well into the area of electronic equipment at the present time, as are major credit unions. Therefore we will see this.

I spoke in the same way 12 years ago and I castigated the government for their refusal to define a bank in the act. The net result is we have the biggest running sore in Canada at the present time because of the lack of control we have over foreign banks operating in Canada. They operate under provincial charters of one sort or another, or as representative offices, or they are operating out of a suitcase—God knows what. They did not have the courage to face up to the situation and say that money and banking was an exclusive federal jurisdiction. If you can define bank you will define the business of banking, and therefore control over it will exist. I do not know that the stable door will ever be locked again; the horses have all been stolen. The net result is that the amendments to this particular act and all the provisions with regard to foreign banking are sort of trying to catch up, to reach out and get hold of it and see if we cannot bring it under control. We hope that we can.

The most important question which faces us is that of reciprocity. Will the countries of the foreign banks involved permit Canadian banks to operate in their countries under reciprocal conditions? We may end up saying that their banks will not be able to operate in our country unless our banks can operate in their countries. What are the conditions of reciprocity?

What will we do with the great number of well-established organizations that are here in Canada? Some of these institutions have been in operation for over ten years. For instance, the Bank of America has some 39 branches in Canada, if my memory serves me correctly. Those branches do not operate under that name but under another operating name. There are a number of French, Swiss, British and other American banks operating here in Canada, under the control of two or three foreign operations. It is similar to the way in which Canadian banks operate in foreign countries. To try to untangle that pot of spaghetti and sort out the relationships between some of these organizations is proving to be very difficult.

I think we have a rocky road ahead of us. I invite the minister to consult with the opposition and the parliamentary committee. I ask him not to act on his own, not to go off and rely on the wisdom of the bureaucracy, but to come and consult the committee about some of the changes in the regulations which may be required. I think the minister will be satisfied, especially after this summer's exercise, that the wisdom does not necessarily reside entirely within the bureaucracy of the Department of Finance nor in the inspector general's branch. Even though some of the members at the beginning did not have a detailed knowledge of the Bank Act they were able to make some worth-while contributions toward the solution of some of the problems.

The control of policy resides with the parliamentarians. Policy is the prerogative of Parliament. Parliament has nothing to do with administration. Government establishes what its policy shall be, but it comes before Parliament for approval. So the ultimate approval of policy resides with Parliament. When parliamentarians make decisions and recommendations with respect to policy, I find it lies very ill on the part of bureaucracy, on its own, to change it.

For purposes of demonstration I have some amendments to put before you. I have had close to 25 years of experience in this House and I am convinced that, for the benefit of Canada as a whole, Parliament must resume more control of policy. We have got a mammoth problem in Canada concerning control by the bureaucracy. My hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands has an article in The Globe and Mail today in this connection. How right she is. Government ministers have told me privately that they feel the same about this, and my colleagues who were in the last government talked ruefully about it. This is the point I want to reinforce. It is Parliament that determines policy in the end. Even if the policy is formulated and proposed to Parliament by the government, it is Parliament in the end which will sanction it.

I see that my time is at an end on this stage of the measure. I think the committee did a very good job and I commend the minister. I know he found me a little tough to start with, but once we established our working liaison, shall we say, and were able to understand one another, I appreciated his performance during the committee hearings. As I say, I was a little tough to start with and I think he found that a bit difficult. But this shows the value of a standing committee of this House where the membership is kept constant. We do not have visiting firemen who descend upon us from time to time trying to reinvent the wheel. As the membership is kept constant we are given an opportunity to get to know one another and are thus able to come up with a piece of legislation which we think, although not perfect, is pretty good.

On that basis I have some amendments which I want to put before the House. The government has some amendments with which I agree. These have been negotiated. We will have some views with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). Some of his amendments have got too much, shall we say, of their ideology. But on the whole I think we will come up with a fairly good end. I trust our counterparts in the Senate will be working toward the same direction and that we will avoid any violent clashes or differences. If they do arise I hope they will be readily negotiable so that we can arrive at what will be the passage of this act within maybe five or six days.

● (1430)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to have the opportunity this afternoon to speak on this very important piece of legislation. I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). His summary of the process was extremely accurate. Although I have only spent a few sessions with the committee as of late, I appreciate the way in which the witnesses were welcomed and the way in which the entire committee was handled.

As the previous speaker indicated that he will be bringing forward a number of amendments about which he feels strongly, we in the New Democratic Party also have a number of amendments we plan to bring forward on a wide variety of areas in which we feel there are serious problems and limitations with regard to this legislation. Although we are not hesitant to say that our ideology is perhaps reflected in some of the proposed amendments—we are quite proud of that ideology and feel that we are putting the interests of Canadians before the interests of any other groups—we intend to approach this matter in a very serious, positive and vigorous way.

If one peruses this extremely detailed document, one question emerges from the papers. One recognizes that the banks of Canada are a part of a much larger system and are to be seen in a national context, but the fundamental question which emerges from the pages of the Bank Act is: just what is the Bank Act attempting to achieve or accomplish? I suspect that if one were to carry out one of the government's infamous polls across the country, one would find that the responses to that question as to just what the Bank Act is attempting to accomplish would be varied.

The reason, of course, is that the act is set within the context of the country, and the country lacks an over-all industrial strategy and development strategy. It begs such questions as, where do the banks fit into the over-all economic development structure of Canada, what role should they play in Canada, what role do the banks have within our industrial strategy, what role should the banks be playing in the patriation of our economy, what is the job of the banks in terms of the rationalization of Canadian industry, what should the banks be doing to improve our balance of payments, what is the role of the banks in ensuring that the small business sector of Canada becomes a vital and vigorous sector of our economy, and what is the role of the banks in this developmental process?

I would be the first one to agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West in his comment that this legislation is not for the future of Canada, that at best it is legislation for the present. Certainly it is legislation of the past. When one considers the tremendous dynamic changes occurring in the financial institutions of our country today, this particular act will be a handicap and will retard the meaningful development of those new structures, new approaches and new techniques. Certainly it will not address the needs of the financial community of Canada over the next decade because of a number of very serious omissions, which the New Democratic Party will be bringing to the attention of the House in the form of amendments over the next number of days.

Also, I must agree with the previous speaker's point that it is still unclear what a bank is in Canada. What is a bank in Canada? As a result of this confusion and the inability to define accurately and adequately what the banks are in the best interests of Canadians, we have foreign banks and a number of subsidiaries coming into the financial picture which will severely restrict the development of a meaningful banking policy for this country.

The objectives of the bill are rather vague. First, the bill says that its objective is to increase competition in Canada. That objective was very clearly stated back in 1967. Another objective is to increase the efficiency of the banking system and to improve the allocation of financial capital to achieve long-range economic development for our country. I suspect that this particular bill will not accomplish any of those objectives.

We can predict with considerable confidence that the process of the concentration of financial power in Canada which has been going on since the 1950s, will continue. Is that in the best interests of nurturing and encouraging a competitive environment? We do not suggest that for a moment. The present system will become less and less competitive. What do we mean by the word "competition"? It is a word which is used in the act and which has certainly been used countless times in committee. Competition means better service and that more services will be provided by the banks to the borrowers.

If competition were real it would mean that the services would be provided at lower costs to the consumer or the borrower. If it were real, it would mean that interest rates would be held down in the competitive environment of our banking system. Competition would be the mechanism which would retard the higher costs of increasing and spiralling interest rates. If competition were real, it would also mean that the profits of the chartered banks would be kept at reasonable levels.

We can probably predict with little question that this legislation will result in increased profits to the banks. My party is not against fair profits, although it is often accused of that prejudice. We like to see people being successful in their entrepreneurial ventures, including the banks of Canada as they exist today, but what is a reasonable profit? I do not think that the competition which is the objective of the Bank Act will achieve reasonable profits.

Just today the The Globe and Mail published an article based on a report by Wood Gundy Limited to the effect that the passage of the Bank Act would improve the price earnings ratio of bank stocks by about 100 basic points. The financial community per se is predicting, because of this Bank Act, increases of at least 12 per cent in bank profits. Some agencies are predicting increases as high as 20 per cent, and some are venturing that they could be as high as 30 per cent. Is this what results from increased competition in the bank and financial communities? I suggest that it certainly does not.

One of the things which must be made clear as we enter into this debate over the next number of days is the recognition that chartered banks in Canada exist in a very privileged position, that they are a handful of institutions which make the decisions regarding the future of Canada. The banks decide who will have access to funds for investment, the kinds of investments which they will support, and the kinds of entrepreneurial ventures which they will encourage, nurture and support financially. The banks decide where they will invest their money and where development will occur in Canada. The banks decide whether small business all across the country will be successful or whether they will experience failure, through the kinds of policies which they introduce to assist the small business community.

Because of their privileged position, I suggest that the banks have a responsibility to Canadians; that the banks of Canada have an obligation to be more responsive to the needs of the small business community. To my mind, the legislation before the House today is an excellent example of how the monopoly power of our banks subverts the objectives of the Government of Canada—and I emphasize that, Mr. Speaker—subverts the objectives of our government.

Under the Small Business Development Bond program outlined in the October budget, interest payments on a qualifying small business loan entered into after December 11, 1979, will be treated, for tax purposes, as dividends. As a result, the interest will not be taxable to the corporate lender, nor will it be deductible as a business expense to the small business borrower. Because corporate lenders incur no tax liability on the interest received, they will be able to reduce the rate of interest charged.

The legislation not only provides interest rate relief to qualifying small businesses, but also provides a tax shelter to corporate lenders, in particular the hard pressed chartered banks.

In analysing the relative benefits accruing to small business borrowers and corporate lenders with the proposed SBDB program under different interest rate regimes, I have been able to make the following observations.

First, if the conventional loan rate formula is prime plus 1 per cent or 2 per cent, then banks charging a risk-administrative premium of 2 per cent or less above one half prime on SBDBs will increase their after tax interest income by a slightly smaller percentage than the small business borrower will have reduced his after tax cost of credit.

Second, if the conventional loan rate formula is prime plus 2 per cent, then banks charging a risk-administrative premium of one half prime plus 2.5 per cent or more on SBDBs, will increase their after tax income by a larger percentage than the small business borrower will have reduced his after tax cost of credit. Or, put another way, the corporate lender will derive relatively more benefit from the use of SBDBs than the small business.

In order to get a better idea of how benefits from the SBDB program are likely to be distributed between small businesses and corporate lenders, I surveyed the average conventional small business loan rates and SBDB rate currently offered by a representative sample of corporate lenders in Ottawa. On the basis of this survey there is every indication that the chartered banks will be charging rates on SBDBs of at least one half prime plus 2.5 per cent or higher in many cases. This will ensure that the distribution of benefits under this program will favour the banks relatively more than the small business borrower. Under this legislation the government has no power to limit the rates charged on SBDBs. The government has no power under this legislation to reduce these rates. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) should change the name of this program to the chartered bank development bond.

When one considers the difficulties faced by the small business community as they attempt to provide leadership in so many ways, one sees that they have extreme difficulties in dealing with the chartered banks of Canada. Recent figures have shown that the major employer in the last few years in Canada was the small business sector with 930,000 small businesses interested in expanding and fulfilling their dreams, interested in developing a better Canada.

In my discussions with this community in the last few months, both in my own constituency and across Canada, one thing has become very clear, that is, when they approach the chartered banks of Canada they feel that they are discriminated against both with the rates offered to them for borrowing and in the way they are treated. I suspect that this is simply an extension of the attitude of the present government toward small business, and that after all the rhetoric is put aside and one looks at the record and the legislation of the country to see who benefits from it—the large corporation or the small businessman—when one looks at the financial structures of the country to see who benefits, one finds that it is almost exclusively the small entrepreneur who gets the short end of the stick.

When one studies the Bank Act that is before the House today, one finds that things have not changed very much; that the consumer is still not adequately protected and that the small business sector will still not receive the support and service from the banking community that it so justly deserves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say how glad I am this afternoon to take part in the debate on Bill C-6 because the banking legislation is certainly one of the basic statutes of any country. I want to echo the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and say how much I appreciated my experience in committee. As a young member who did not enjoy the opportunity of sitting on the various commissions which studied the banking legislation, I learned a lot from the questions, debates and discussions the member for Edmonton West had with the various witnesses and with the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières). Mr. Speaker, as a newcomer in the House who happens to be interested in our country's financial and economic affairs I have indeed gained a lot of experience during the endless hours we spent on Bill C-6, the Bank Act.

As a parliamentarian I am reassured by my experience with Bill C-6 because when we were returned to power last February many people thought that hon. members, at least on this side of the House, would simply rubber-stamp Bill C-6. People were telling us that every aspect of Bill C-6 had been discussed for years and years and that in fact we had nothing to do except endorse it blindly. Mr. Speaker, as a member I was really reassured to see to what extent a committee such as the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs could be non-partisan and so efficient. In light of the very challenging representations made by my colleague from Mississauga South, the hon. member for Edmonton West, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and all the others, I can say that in all the experiences I had since being elected never did a committee seem to me so useful and so efficient. Mr. Speaker, that, of course, does not rule out the ideological quarrels we may have within a committee. I think that the previous speaker made an ideological speech with which I cannot agree of course, but I can certainly admire the conduct of the Minister of State for Finance who did go to the trouble of listening to and approving several amendments, whether from the hon. member for Mississauga South, from the hon. member for Edmonton West or even from myself, Mr. Speaker. That is indeed what the parliamentary system is all about. The member for Edmonton West said a moment ago that perhaps the best solution for Parliament might be to reduce the number of members. If that were the case, obviously I would probably not be here because mine is a new riding. So I cannot really endorse that suggestion but I can say, however, that if we had more committees like the finance, trade and economic affairs committee I think the House of Commons and Parliament would be enhanced.

I was particularly active in the debate on the question of car leasing to which the Minister of State for Finance referred and I must say how disappointed I was by the attitude of the Canadian Bankers' Association which, as the hon. member for Edmonton West so aptly put it, took offence because it did not succeed in obtaining everything it wanted. Mr. Speaker, in the society in which we live and given our role as parliamentarians, I think that when people express their concerns and make representations they have the right to do so and that is exactly what we have done as members of Parliament. Some people did come to see me and told me their worries. I listened to their stories, I heard the arguments of the bankers and I thought advisable to suggest to the Minister of State for Finance certain amendments about the car leasing provisions.

All members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs agreed with those amendments. Then the Minister of State for Finance, with the support of the committee members, was successful in convincing cabinet so that we now have amendments which I feel certain will be approved by members on both sides of the House. I find that reassuring, Mr. Speaker. Indeed I believe we are doing an efficient job as parliamentarians and I felt somewhat slighted and insulted when I read in The Globe and Mail of October 28, 1980, that what matters most for a committee in reaching a final decision is the effort made by lobbyists.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what can I say? When someone has a worthy cause to defend I am not influenced by the fact that I may or may not have to face lobbyists. Nor am I influenced by the fact that one side is richer or more important than the other. I think that as parliamentarians we all have an active and effective role to play.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I again congratulate the Minister of State for Finance and all members who sat on the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. As a young member I have gained some insight into the Bank Act and the hon. member for Edmonton West will surely say that people are taking a long time to get to know this legislation. I hope to continue along this line and that all committees and ministers will have the necessary openmindedness and will continue to be as friendly, as sincere and as devoted to the parliamentary and committee systems as is the Minister of State for Finance.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this act we now have before us has been before three Parliaments. It has had five sets of revisions, including the revision that is now before us. There has been much public discussion, not only from the Bankers' Association but others. It has been mentioned here today they were not entirely successful because the number of changes that have been made, as far as that group is concerned, are a bit restrictive. We have had a number of public representations from all across Canada and the input has been most appropriate to the statute.

What we have now before us is a fairly good act. I notice we have 59 amendments presently on the order paper, which indicates the complexity of the statute, and some things must be changed before the act is passed. The 59 amendments we have are nothing compared to the many hundreds of amendments which were dealt with by committee in this Parliament, and by the previous committee in the Thirtieth Parliament. What we have done is taken a statute and refined it again and again. This bill is at report stage now for final refinement, if you want to put it that way. But by comparison what we have done on the constitution is unfair. Public input was limited; debate in this House was limited; the chances of doing something and getting proper public input were definitely limited. If the constitutional debate had had the discussion and the input which this act has had, then I think one would find a great deal of consensus. In fact one would probably find a majority consensus, but without that one gets dissension, distrust, and division.

I spoke on second reading of this debate. Most of the problems I spoke about in committee have been solved, with one or two principal exceptions. For a moment I want to speak about motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3. Those motions go to the very essence of the problems that we still have before us in dealing with the banking system.

The act as now before us does not define what a bank is. Nor does this act define what the business of banking is. It does not define, as suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) in his amendment No. 3, what a cheque is. Those are fundamental things.

I am concerned when we do not define what a bank is in a bank act. This is an act to define the business of banking, which is supposed to be dealing, controlling and directing what banks are to do in our society. Whenever we speak about the transferring of money from one institution to another or from one person to another through a simple instrument as a cheque, we do not even define what a cheque is. It seems to me almost ridiculous that such definitions are not included. Even at this final stage I implore the minister to reconsider amendments to the act that would go to this essential problem as proposed by the hon. member from Edmonton and the hon. member for Comox-Powell River.

The problem is great because we have found over the past 12 or 14 years that the business of banking and of what the banks do keeps changing. There was no thought 12 or 14 years ago that the banks would be involved in leasing. We had enormous problems in the committee trying to cut down the banks' activity in these areas. We found the banks were almost becoming the merchants of automobiles, in particular the Royal Bank, at one point in time. We were afraid the banks would become merchants of every form of household goods that one might have. The banks would do that by owning the goods and leasing them out. Therefore, we had to be very careful. We drew up amendments to the proposed legislation. They carried in committee and seriously restricted the banks in these fields.

We had representations from companies involved in data processing. It became clear through those representations that the banking business had all of a sudden decided that computer programming and data processing were the kind of thing they would like to get into. So the banks were on the verge of deciding they would become the big data processors for all of Canada. The existing data processing industry would be swallowed up and be part of what they would call "their business".

At second reading I read a little lyric or poem, which I will read again as follows:

Through the open window's space
Behold, a camel thrust his face.
'My nose is cold,' he meekly cried,
'Oh, let me warm it by thy side'.

The camel has been getting into far too many activities. That is what has happened. It is also one of the concerns we have. That is why we want banking and the business of banking defined. The camel wants to get into other things and become a merchant and a manufacturer. Somewhere along the line we have to restrict the activities of banks to the field which they are in traditionally, namely, that of facilitating the movement of goods between people through the medium of exchange of money. I am speaking of the savers, the lenders, and the commercial money in our society. That is what the banks are there for. The banks are not there to do whatever comes into their minds or become as big as their minds would allow. As my hon. friend from Edmonton West says:

'bank' means

(a) any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money and accepting deposit liabilities transferable by cheque or other instrument, or

(b) any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money raised in Canada through the acceptance of deposit liabilities—

● (1500)

He goes on to exempt certain financial institutions from the restrictions of the Bank Act. I call to the attention of the House paragraph (g) of the amendment which would restrict financial companies to 75 per cent Canadian ownership.

There are a number of interesting concepts in this bill. In view of the foreign ownership of banks in our country, it was decided to make some sort of arrangement for reciprocal banking privileges, largely, I suppose, on the basis that it is in the interest of Canada that our national banks become international banks and this so requires some sort of reciprocation with foreign companies wishing to operate here. That is fine, but it must be controlled, and there is an attempt in the bill to control it to 8 per cent. If it can be controlled at 8 per cent of domestic assets or domestic business of foreign banks in our country, I would applaud that. We have suggested, however, that perhaps this is not realistic. There is an amendment before the House which suggests that perhaps it could be 10 per cent. But if the government thinks that it can control the banking business at 8 per cent, that is appropriate.

A number of the amendments before us deal with consumer and corporate matters. Amendments on consumer matters have been introduced by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). These amendments tend to seek to control the activities of banks in particular. It is my feeling and, I think, the feeling of this party, that such provisions should not be in the Bank Act but rather should be contained in general commercial legislation and that we should have a new interest act in Canada which would control all lending institutions with respect to how they make disclosure, how they calculate their interest, and the like. There is a need for such legislation largely because there are other financial institutions in this country apart from banks. The calculation of interest and the disclosure of contract terms should be introduced in other legislation and not be inserted into the legislation we are considering at this time. These matters should specifically be dealt with in this new act, matters pertinent only to banks and to a broad range of corporations which are in the money business.

A number of representations have been made since the conclusion of the committee's sittings. Representations were made by the Continental Bank, and I commend to the minister motion No. 42 on the order paper which would give relief to the Continental Bank, the Northland Bank, the Bank of British Columbia and the Consumer and Commercial Bank from the strictures which we sought from the minister concerning the reserve requirements for those smaller banks. The minister will recall that reserve requirements were eliminated and that as a result of the study of the whole matter of trust companies, an amendment was made to section 208(d). It may well be that for the smaller banks, the ones under $3 billion, some relief should be given with respect to reserves.

It is important also that at this stage of the debate the minister give us a commitment, as he did to the committee, that he would introduce a new loan and trust companies act and that in accordance with our suggestion regarding reserve requirements he would amend the Bank Act and change the reserve requirements. All of us here know how long it takes for new legislation to be introduced. Indeed, the minister suggested in the committee back in June that he would have a loan and trust companies act before the House in the fall. Well, fall is fast going; it is just about gone with the snow flakes we see around us, and we have not seen that legislation introduced as yet. I suspect it is not yet in shape to be introduced. Perhaps the minister might comment on that aspect but it is an important piece of legislation which should be introduced and studied to ensure that the trust companies, those engaged in mortgage lending and so on, have their powers broadened or changed so that the kind of competition which should exist in our financial institutions is retained in view of its importance for the commercial health of Canada.

We have before us also an amendment of my good friend, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) with respect to a matter involving what I would call the Grindley Bank amendment in motion 51. I would commend this to the minister as well. It is a motion which would solve a problem which I understand is a unique one, much the same as the problem which the minister had in his amendment concerning the amalgamation of the Continental Bank and IAC Limited. Those are special amendments which perhaps only help one institution, but in a complex banking system, a system which we want to improve, problems were caused by reason of the fact that we did not define the business of banking with respect to foreign banks operating here; we did not prevent people from using the word "bank" in their provincial incorporations, and so on. These problems have arisen over the last 12 or 14 years, and the amendment in motion 51 might well solve the problems which bringing all foreign banks into the act would present.

Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, we have before us an excellent piece of legislation. With some of the amendments that are here and which I would recommend to the minister, and further amendments which the minister and his staff have added, this legislation should be passed quickly. I was unhappy when my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) suggested six days, though certainly he has been around bank acts longer than any of us. It would be gratifying if this legislation could be passed faster than that.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say a few words in introduction to the number of motions which our party has put forward with respect to the Bank Act. I would like to say, in introducing these remarks, how much I appreciate the efforts of the minister to take the time to consider the proposals we have put forward. I cannot say that I am happy with the substance of his acceptance, but when it comes to the process, I must say I have been impressed by the minister's willingness to deal seriously with the proposals we have put forward and to attempt to recognize the merits of what we have had to say. I hope that something of the minister's spirit and character will also be a characteristic of the government's attitude with respect to a number of other items which are currently being discussed.

• (1510)

With respect to the Bank Act I think the position of our party is clearly on the record. We have had a number of discussions in this House and in committee with respect to this act and the extension of other acts, so I do not think there is any need for me either to recite the same poems I recited before or the same examples I recited before. I think it is sufficient simply to say that in my view, and as expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), the difficulty with this kind of legislation is that it suffers from what Marshall McLuhan has described as the rear view mirror syndrome many of us have. Instead of looking forward to the problems which in a sense are simply here today in a very small and growing form and seeing where these tendencies will take us, there has been a tremendous tendency in this legislation to look at problems which grew up in the early 1970s and late 1960s and to respond immediately to those rather than to look at the broad framework for the future.

I think there is an illusion that our banking system is competitive. It is one of the great organizing myths of our time that we have a competitive banking system. The fact is, we have an intensely monopolistic banking system with a very few large and powerful institutions dominating the marketplace. We have the illusion that somehow our banking system is a kind of bazaar where there is relative equality between borrowers and lenders. That is one of the great illusions of our time. Because we are convinced that that is an illusion, the thrust of the amendments we have put forward is, on the one hand, to recognize the necessity of direct public involvement and regulation of what has become a highly concentrated industry and, on the other hand, to provide for competition wherever that is possible. I refer to competition in the sense of providing protection for those industries, individuals and competing institutions who do not have the market power of the banks and protection for those consumers, small businessmen and farmers, who when dealing with banks do not deal with them in a relationship of equality. In a sense that is the philosophical basis on which we approach the question of the Bank Act.

Mr. MacIntosh is the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association and former vice-president of the Bank of Nova Scotia. He is a very articulate and capable spokesman for the banking community. He has been engaged in a program of organized sour grapes about the Bank Act. He has been saying that somehow the House of Commons finance committee has simply responded to the loudest voices, that we have not heard the voice of the banks, that he now has to resort to going to the Senate in order to get the kind of hearing he thinks the banks deserve. One can only say to those like Mr. MacIntosh that the largest, the most persistent, the loudest, the most aggressive, the most omnipresent and the most persuasive lobby in this country is that of the Canadian Bankers' Association.

On his retirement, President McLaughlin gave an interview in which he said proudly that he could pick up a telephone and get hold of any member of Parliament he wants at any time, that all he has to do is look down the list to get access to information and that at the flick of a finger he knows any member of Parliament's banker, his local bank manager, where he banks and how he banks. These are the defenceless virgins who are coming before us and saying, for example, that the Federation of Automobile Dealers has taken unfair advantage of the House of Commons finance committee, that the Cattlemen's Association has somehow bludgeoned 21 members of the finance committee into accepting its amendments, that the data processors had somehow managed to thrust themselves upon the finance committee and that the Canadian Bankers' Association has retreated because of the power of those lobbies. Who is Mr. MacIntosh trying to kid? No entreaties have been more persistent, no group has been more constantly present at every single meeting of the finance committee and no one group has been more persistently on the telephone than the Canadian Bankers' Association. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stated last spring, the association was so desperate that it even invited me to lunch last spring to discuss the Bank Act.

My job requires me to do many things—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And eating is one of them.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) points out that eating is one of them. Let us be under no illusions. This is not a Bank Act, unfortunately, which is antithetical to the interests of the banks. This is a Bank Act in a sense which simply in the mildest way possible attempts to say to the banks that they cannot have absolutely everything they are asking for; there are some limitations on the market power the banks are going to be allowed to exercise. In our view the limitations are very important but not as large as we would have liked them to be. Nevertheless, they are necessary.

In the case of automobile dealers, as has been pointed out by other speakers, why in the name of goodness should we allow the banks to get into the business of leasing cars? Why should that become a part of the business of banking? I feel equally strongly, as do other members of my party, about a very successful, growing—I am speaking of what it will be like ten years down the road—and increasingly important sector, the data processing sector and the computer industry dealing with payroll, accounting and a number of financial services which are provided to business. In our view the banks must be very carefully and strictly regulated in that field.

Mr. MacIntosh mentions it as being one of the most important sectors, and he urges that they be allowed to continue to stay in this field. We are not happy with the regulations which have been put forward by the Department of Finance because we feel that those regulations give too broad a power to the banks and do not give sufficient protection to a growing Canadian industry. The answer always given by the banks to these criticisms is that they can provide the best and most competitive system and that all that we are doing by giving an advantage to credit unions or to the automobile dealers or to the data processors is subsidizing inefficiency. That is their argument. Their argument is that the wider public interest will be served by the provision of the most efficient and least expensive service. On many occasions when Mr. MacIntosh has presented this argument before the committee—and I would like to leave this argument on the record in terms of our perspective—I have said that the public interest is not simply defined by having one, two or three large and extremely powerful financial institutions providing every single kind of financial and economic service to the consumer. In the short run that may provide a cheaper service, but one also has to ask whether the elimination of whole sectors of our economy, the takeover of smaller financial institutions and the removal of all the market power and ability of small businessmen in the car-dealing field and in the data processing field is really in the public interest. Would it not be in the greater public interest to have a diversity of institutions providing information and services to the consumer, and should we not be striving in our Bank Act, as I have said, to provide for a degree of government involvement and regulation which guarantees the protection of the consumer in one instance and a genuinely competitive system with trust companies, caisses populaires and credit unions providing competition with the banks on the other? With regard to this last point, I think there is another major illusion. Introducing the foreign bank provisions of this act, as hon. members know, allows foreign banks up to 8 per cent of the total assets of Canada's banking system. The argument has been made that this is one key way of allowing for greater competition in the system. We can look at the difficulties faced by the Continental Bank and we can look at the amendments presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) with respect to small banks and their reserve requirements. We agree with those amendments, because if we are to provide for a genuinely competitive system and in fact encourage the growth of smaller Canadian banks, then in a sense we must give some market advantage to those groups. If we are genuinely concerned with this problem, then it may well be that the government reserve policy will have to be sufficiently lenient and discriminating—I am not saying discriminatory, I am saying discriminating—to allow for the growth of banking institutions which will provide for perhaps more specialized services to particular sectors of the economy, but subject to federal control and regulation, with guarantees of at least ownership being fairly widely dispersed and so on.

As we know, foreign banks will very quickly get to the 8 per cent limit. Indeed, to my regret I predict the House will be requested by the government to increase that limit during the life of this act. The implication is that foreign banks will come in and take over the business of foreign subsidiaries of companies working overseas. In a sense they will skim off that business from current Canadian banks. Having, in a sense, occupied that 8 per cent, we will not be in a position to encourage the formation of smaller Canadian banks, whether they be the Crown banks which our party discussed in committee, trust companies or other financial institutions which decide to become banks.

In summary, there are two main problems with the Bank Act before us. It does not recognize the need to increase the power of the government to regulate the banking industry, and, to be polite, it provides for insufficient protection of the public interest. For example, it indicates that there will never be Crown banks, that no public servants can serve on the boards of directors of banks, and that banks will continue to be allowed to set whatever interest rates they wish without any intervention by government. Those are all examples of inadequate protection of the public interest. Also the act fails to provide for real and genuine competition, from the points of view of other institutions, other industries and consumers.

In closing I should like to refer to one amendment—I know the minister has stepped out of the House for a moment, but I have spoken to him about this many times. I know there are other members of the House who are equally concerned with the principle contained in the amendment. If the government rejects all the principles of consumer protection and financial disclosure—they have accepted some but rejected others—they should think again about the following item. I am referring to the fact that we do not require banks which are engaged in over 35 per cent of their business overseas, in substantive and major dealings with foreign countries and the agencies of foreign countries to inform the Canadian public on an annual basis as to the number and size of their loans. The principle of confidentiality has been abused to prevent consumers and other various interested groups from knowing exactly the foreign policy of our banks. We have many examples of where it would be useful to know the domestic policy of our banks. For example, if the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce lent the amount it is reported to have lent to Massey-Ferguson, it is no longer a matter of confidentiality. It becomes a matter of concern to the governments involved in the negotiations, to consumers concerned about where they will bank, how they will bank and the wisdom of carrying out policies where such a large share of assets is tied up by one company. If the domestic policy is unsatisfactory, the foreign policy implications are tremendous.

All our banks are engaged on a day-to-day basis with loans of a huge size to countries all over the world. When this happens it has implications for Canada's foreign policy and those people who are deeply concerned about the internal policies of those governments. I am referring, for example, to the governments of South Africa, Chile, Eastern Europe and cases where internationally syndicated loans are arranged through large companies.

I see Mr. Speaker about to rise to his feet. This is one amendment which the government could well accept without for a moment moving away from the basic principles contained in the act. In fact it would merely extend principles already accepted in committee, in other words that, there is a right to know on the part of every consumer and an obligation on the part of these companies to divulge all their financial information on as full and fair a basis as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is consulting with the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières).

• (1530)

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, in my confusion I thought the minister would speak before me but if he wishes to close the debate, that is fine.

I wish to turn to the second half of my stint this afternoon and deal with amendments 1 and 2. I think it is quite clear that the House should have a clarification of what I have in mind for motion No. 1, which is the definition of a bank.

I have been astounded over the past many years, first of all during the revision in 1966 when the then minister of finance, Mitchell Sharp, and the then Inspector General of Banks refused an invitation to define the business of banking. At that time the act did not use the phrase "business of banking" as it does in this present version. As a lawyer it seemed to me incongruous that here was an act containing prohibitions against anybody setting up as a bank, yet they refused to define a bank in that act. In commercial practice as a lawyer, when clients came in and asked what they could or could not do under a statute, I took one look at the statute and told them that the limitations on the business contemplated was this or that. That is the purpose of a statute. Now we have one of the most important statutes in this country before us, one that is singular in that it has a sunset period. It is an act that defines what can and cannot be done. But it refuses to define what a bank is. It merely says that a bank is a bank under the act. Perhaps it is a secret among the bureaucracy. I cannot understand it, nor can my lawyer friends, whether they were members of the committee or witnesses before it.

I have a whole series of references to testimony given by those appearing on behalf of the Canadian Bankers' Association and many others. I know the governor of the Bank of Canada privately would love to have the definition. He says: Well, we are getting along without it, so why rock the boat? Of course, the governor of the Bank of Canada could not criticize the government on this point.

When clients come in to see a Canadian firm of lawyers and say they want to carry on a business and want to know if we will be deemed to be a foreign bank, they set out their operations. Then we look to the definition of what is a foreign bank. On page 4, at line 39, we find the definition of "foreign bank". It says:

"foreign bank" means a corporation, association, partnership or other institution incorporated or established by, pursuant to or in accordance with the laws of a country other than Canada, or a department or agency of the government of a country other than Canada or a political subdivision of such a country, that

(a) is a bank according to the laws of any country other than Canada where it carries on business.

Presumably the law of that country of incorporation will be sensible enough to determine what a bank is. We, in Canada, cannot do it. The definition, under (b), continues:

(b) carries on a business in a country other than Canada that, if carried on in Canada, would be wholly, or to a significant extent, the business of banking,

We ask: what is the business of banking? At present in Canada a lawyer would have to say to his client: I cannot tell you because there is no business of banking defined in this act. As Canadians, we cannot tell you what our Canadian Bank Act defines as the business of banking. I find that extraordinary, Mr. Speaker.

I now move to section 6 of the act, in which the government compounds the nonsense of the absence of a definition of the business of banking in the clause which extends the life of this act. Section 6 appears at line 21 on page 13 and says:

6. (1) Subject to this act,

(a) if Parliament sits on at least 20 days during the month of March, 1991, each bank may carry on the business of banking until the first day of April, 1991, and no longer;

In subparagraph (b) there appears the phrase "business of banking" but there is still no definition. Then we go to section 302, which deals with foreign banks. I am reading from page 306 at line 4:

302. (1) A foreign bank shall not, directly or indirectly,

(a) undertake any banking business in Canada,

Mr. Speaker, I invite you to enlighten me and to tell me what that means when there is no definition provided as to the business of banking. I suppose one could resort to that Solomon-like statement attributed to a judge of the Court of Appeal in Manitoba who was reported to have said: Banking? Is that what bankers do? The Supreme Court of Canada in a recent case involving the Canada Labour Code and a trust company decided that since the trust company was not a bank it did not fall under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code—banks come under the Canada Labour Code but trust companies do not. That is the sole distinction as to the business of banking.

I do not know how many times I have done this, but again I am moved to refine it further—and I am not wedded to the words themselves. If anybody can come up with better phraseology they are welcome to try. I would submit to hon. members that we can get around this problem here by defining what is meant by a bank. I am susceptible to all of the political weak-kneeism and wet-noodle-backbone attitudes that may have been expressed by the federal government in the past, and at the present time, when they refuse to face up to the proposition that money and banking is under their exclusive federal jurisdiction. But some provincial governments, because they have incorporated trust companies or financial companies—just merely incorporated them—say they have jurisdiction over their operations. My foot, they have! Provincial governments incorporate aircraft companies, broadcasting companies, grain companies, but they do not have a thing to say about their operations. Therefore, these provincial governments should have nothing to say about near banks and their operations within the field of money and banking. The provinces have waltzed in and, shall we say, by default on the part of the federal government, have gone into the field of money and banking to the extent that chartered banks now only have 65 per cent of their money on deposit. Thirty-five per cent of the money on deposit is outside the purview of the bank, when the constitution says that 100 per cent should be within its purview.

Credit unions are incorporated. They can be incorporated under provincial legislation, but once they step into the business of banking they are in the area of federal control. Similarly, if a co-operative engaged in the business of aircraft wanted to fly its own plane, it would have to apply to the federal government for licences for the aircraft, for its air worthiness, for radio transmission and all the other purposes of operating that aircraft. So why should a credit union engaged in the business of banking not be subject to the same regulations or similar regulations under the Inspector General of Banks?

Although the credit unions do not share that view, it is my view. The credit unions have a number of advantages. When the credit unions began, they were not nearly as strong as they are now. One of their strongest pleas for some of the advantages they now hold was that they were the small man's bank, that they were there in lieu of mortgage companies, trust companies and banks. Strangely enough, credit unions now have their own mortgage company, trust company, and I hear they have now formed their own auto leasing company.

Now that the banks have been pushed out of auto leasing, the credit unions have stepped in. The whole point of removing the banks from that industry was to protect the automobile dealers because it attacked the heart and soul of their business. It was not for the benefit of credit unions. I am sure hon. members on the government side have never heard of this development. Certainly there was no letter written or word given to any member in the official opposition with regard to that particular development. I am not trying to fault the credit unions, I am merely trying to illustrate the lack of logic.

I say that a bank means, (a) any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money and accepting deposit liabilities transferable by cheque or other instrument or, (b) any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money raised in Canada through the acceptance of deposit liabilities or the issuance of securities, but does not include any financial institution incorporated as a credit union, caisse populaire and federations of such or any other co-operative credit society. So I have grandfathered them. That should satisfy those people who feel credit unions should operate under exclusive provincial control even though they are engaged in the business of banking.

A bank also means, (c) any financial institution subject to the Quebec Savings Banks Act. That is perfectly right because we have an act to cover that situation. Next, a bank is any financial institution wholly owned by the federal or provincial governments or treasury branches or offices thereof. There is the Ontario Savings and Loan Association and there are the Alberta Treasury Branches. There may be some other institutions of which I am not aware which would be covered under this particular exception.

A bank is any financial institution incorporated as an insurance company within the meaning of the Canada and British Insurance Companies Act. Again, that is just to make sure that somebody inadvertently does not get caught up as a bank. Finally, I say that a bank is any financial institution incorporated either federally or provincially as a trust company, mortgage and loan company or a finance company with more than 75 per cent Canadian ownership and where no foreign individual or associate individuals or groups own more than 10 per cent of the voting shares.

I made that particular exemption deliberately because that last paragraph would catch foreign banks operating in the country in a great number of cases because the only exemption is for companies or institutions incorporated federally or provincially as a trust company, mortgage and loan company or finance company. There are a number of trust companies which are subsidiaries to American banks as well as banks of other countries. The finance company Finance America is a subsidiary of the Bank of America. I refer to companies which have more than 75 per cent of Canadian ownership because that is what we insist on for our Canadian banks. There would be a limitation of 10 per cent for any individual or associated shareholder.

That is what we require of the Canadian banks and, yet, I find an inexplicable reluctance on the part of the government to accept this amendment. Logically, the minister does not have a leg to stand on because there is no lawyer who will say that this is a sound piece of legislation. The legislation insists on using the term "bank" and "business of banking" but refuses to define that term. I have defined it and I am satisfied with the definition. I invented the definition with a number of groups and they themselves say the language is good. Somebody may find something better, but I defy any lawyer or any member of the government side to tell me that in an act like the Bank Act one does not require a definition of the "business of banking".

How would the government advise a client as to what is permissible to a bank and what is not permissible to a bank? This is a point upon which I insist that I am right. I know some people say I get pretty tenacious about some of my own opinions, but this has been consistent, and many of the members of the committee privately share my point of view. I also know that this point of view, that one must define banking, is shared by many people on the outside.

● (1550)

One has to define banking. How are we going to assist the federal court or the Supreme Court of Canada in deciding matters under the Canada Labour Code if we refuse to define banking, if we refuse to define what institutions are banks and which are not banks? Therein lies the jurisdiction.

Then there is the matter of the case in Manitoba. Does the minister feel the judgment of the court there resolved the problem in any way when the judge said that the business of banking is what bankers do?

I most earnestly urge the House to consider this amendment and that which follows. One says what a bank is, and the other one says that the business of banking is that carried on within the meaning of this act as defined.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, there are two views of what we can do, one of which has been stated by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in his amendments. The other is the view of the government.

The view of the government is that basically, we define the general field of banking by virtue of the act but, because of the difficulties of attempting to find a definition of a bank which is under federal legislation—and this is the whole constitutional problem which lies behind this difficulty—beyond that, there is no need to set out a precise definition of banking and that in fact to have a precise definition would cause more problems than it would solve.

I simply want to refer the minister to the case to which the hon. member for Edmonton West refers, Computer Services Limited and Comcheq Services Limited versus the Toronto Dominion Bank which was decided by Mr. Justice Monnin in the decision for the majority of the Court of Appeal on November 22, 1979. I am afraid I do not have any other citation for that case. I only have the original of the decision. As the minister is no doubt aware, this case is under appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The difficulty that I think Mr. Justice Monnin's decision gives rise to is a very real one—and this perhaps speaks directly to motion No. 2 proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. The judgment of the trial court was that banking is what banking activity is described as in section 75 of the old act. But Mr. Justice Monnin is saying, no, that is not true. The judgment reads in part:

I do not think that this is a correct statement of the law. Parliament never intended to establish a fixed or restricted definition of banking by enumerating clauses (a) to (d) of section 75. Banking must have a much broader meaning.

It goes on to say:

All the textbook writers on banking confirm this statement that there is no exact definition of a banker or a bank. In fact and in practice, banking is what banks do for the carrying on of their business; what they do can vary from decade to decade and from century to century.

He goes on to find that the computer payroll service and something called the "compucount" which is a kind of accounting service provided by the Toronto Dominion Bank in the city of Winnipeg, is something that banks do, and therefore is part and parcel of the business of banking.

The amendment, motion No. 2 proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West, may seem unnecessary. Some members may ask, what is the big deal? Because it simply reads as follows:

'business of banking' means that business carried on in whole or in part by a bank within the meaning of the act.'

There is a real difference between that concept of the business of banking, the concept contained in the judgment of Mr. Justice Monnin, and, if I understand the position of the government, the philosophy that in a sense underlies the new act; that is, that banking is what bankers do; that there are specific prohibitions contained in the act which prevent bankers from doing certain kinds of things but apart from those specific prohibitions there is no limitation on what a bank can do.

For the reasons which I outlined earlier with respect to the market power of the banks, the effect of new technologies on smaller companies and the banks' tremendous ability to use these new technologies and introduce them in ways that might not have been anticipated, I think it is better for this Parliament to err on the side of limitation. In other words, it is better to have a specific prohibition in the beginning of the act which says that banking is what bankers are allowed to do under this act and nothing else, rather than to follow the broader concept of banking contained in the judgment of Mr. Justice Monnin and contained, I think, in the general thrust of the legislation.

The hon. member for Edmonton West mentioned a number of examples. I want to refer to clause 174(2)(j) which deals with data processing services. It seems to me that unless we have a definition at the beginning of the act which limits banks to specific services provided for in the act and nothing else, that it is precisely in a field such as data processing that we will find the banks, judging from speeches as the one made in Toronto on November 3, by Mr. MacIntosh, becoming active.

I want to indicate in a general way that we are in favour of the principles of the amendments presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West because unless we restrict the definition of banking to what is specifically allowed in this act on a ten-year basis, we are giving a blank cheque to the banks to engage in all sorts of activities which we may not anticipate in this year, 1980.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I should like to find out whether there is unanimous consent, for I would require not more than four or five minutes to complete my remarks. Perhaps we could dispose at the same time of motions Nos. 1 and 2, should hon. members unanimously so decide.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House to allow the minister four or five minutes in which to make his comments on these items before proceeding to private members' hour?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I assume that if it is necessary, that a provision would be made for the private member to have time added past six o'clock so that he would have the full hour for his bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1600)

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. It is clear that when considering a definition, one could see it from various perspectives. The first one, I suggest, is that of universality, which establishes a definition under the strictest principles by indicating the type and specific difference.

I believe every hon. member in the House can see that attempting to define banks and banking activities in generic and specific terms would condemn us to entering the constitutional imbroglio of the various jurisdictions in the field of financial institutions. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) pointed that out, and the many exceptions the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) added to his own definition, indicate clearly that he wanted to avoid the trap a rigourous definition would set and in which we would inevitably fall.

Another type of definition. May I be allowed to point out that one of the rules of definition demands that the definition be clearer than the defined. On examining the list of exceptions in the definition, we find more confusion in the "defined" than in the object to be defined or in the nature of what is to be defined. I see Professor Pepin smiling; I trust I am not stretching my sophisms to the extent of troubling his Thomistic mind.

We have adopted the aspect of the definition that is functional. We say: a bank is an institution which, either through letters patent or incorporation, can operate within a specific framework. That framework is defined by the legislative text known as the Bank Act. Banking activities are the activities of the institution defined as a financial institution operating under this act. In part V, on page 164 of the bill, banking business is said to be the operations and powers of the financial institution known as a bank under the first definition. I feel "therefore" that the object of the concerns of the hon. member for Edmonton West is covered, though not covered in the same way. It is not done as rigorously as the hon. member would have it, precisely to avoid the obvious pitfalls on the constitutional level. That is why I move that the House reject motions Nos. 1 and 2.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Four o'clock!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 16, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 17, standing in the name of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 18, standing in the name of the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 19, standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 22, standing in the name of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 23, standing in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BROADCASTING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine) moved that Bill C-224, to amend the Broadcasting Act, (Educational use of programs) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable school boards to tape radio and television broadcasts for use in schools at a cost that is not prohibitive without incurring liability for copyright infringement.

To this end, the bill would empower the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission to require the necessary contractual arrangements to be worked out between stations and networks on the one hand and authors and artists on the other.

We have had considerable correspondence over the last eight years with regard to this bill. We have had federal government support for allowing schools to obtain these educational films, but we have met with very limited success.

I have had correspondence from the following schools, universities and others across Canada supporting this bill and asking the federal government for help: The Prince Edward Island Teachers' Federation; the St. James-Assiniboine School Div. No. 2 of Winnipeg; The Board of Education for the city of North York; the River East School Division of Winnipeg; the Manitoba Teachers' Society; the Canadian School Trustees' Association; the Niagara South Board of Education; School District No. 63 (Saanich) Sidney, B.C.; the Separate School Board of Metropolitan Toronto; The Manitoba Association of School Superintendents; Brock University, St. Catharines, Ontario; the Canadian Teachers' Federation; the School Trustees' of Greater Victoria, and the University of Alberta. As well, individual teachers and school trustees have asked for assistance in having the subject matter passed to committee. The Canadian School Trustees' Association has written to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) asking that this bill or the subject matter be referred to committee.

After years and years of discussion about the use of television programs in our schools and universities, it is time interested groups, such as the Canadian Schools Trustees' Association, teachers associations and other groups be permitted to come to the committee where the problems on all sides can be ironed out.

In a letter from the Canadian School Trustees' Association to the President of the Privy Council, it is stated:

> For eight years, the bill has been considered and always voted out; but only because of the usual procedures of the House with respect to private members' bills that originate outside of the government. The bill has never had real consideration before a committee of the House, even though we have good reason to believe that members of all parties in the House would normally be prepared to support the bill. Seven years ago, there was an opportunity made available; but even though we brought people from across the country to appear before the committee, the meeting of the committee lacked a quorum because of traumatic events in the House; and we were never heard, including others, such as representatives from the Canadian Teachers' Federation.

The government said that if I withdrew the bill, it would allow the subject matter to go to committee. It went to committee. School teachers and school trustees from across Canada came to the meeting, but no Liberal members showed up, which I found most insulting. I hope we are not going to have similar treatment here this afternoon for Canada's educational system.

We are now making a special appeal to have the bill go before the committee again so that all concerned can make their views known to members of Parliament for a judgment based on more information.

The letter from the Canadian School Trustees' Association continues:

> Progress has been made in Great Britain and the United States toward off-air taping of programs for educational, non-profit use; but here in Canada, we are still at square one. Students in the classrooms are the real people affected; and this is regrettable at a time when taping off-air privileges could have a significant impact on making students more aware of their own country.

It seems very little to ask to have the bill or the subject matter go to committee. Also, the executive director of the Canadian School Trustees' Association, Mr. C. H. Witney, has written a letter to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) in support of the bill or the subject matter to being referred to committee. He has pointed out that in the United States representative Kastenmeir, chairman of the judiciary subcommittee of the House of Representatives, held hearings to discuss the off-air taping issue. On April 3, 1979, and ad hoc committee was created to set fair use guidelines. This committee in the United States consisted of representatives from the major networks, unions, guilds and education. That is what we are asking for in Canada but we are at a standstill.

I have further comments from interested parties. The advisory committee of the Toronto Metropolitan Separate School Board, in a brief prepared for the director of education, says the bill "would bring a welcome extension to the use of video tape recordings in our school system." In their brief they state:

> —"radio or television program intended as part of the curriculum of elementary or secondary schools . . ." may eliminate some excellent programs. The program "Man Alive" would be excluded by this definition and yet it is the program most frequently requested for video taping. Also, to deny the video taping of newscasts would restrict teachers who could use this as part of the curriculum. For example, in the grade 9 history course the topic of French-English relations is taught and there would be useful information contained in newscasts.

Serious legal problems have arisen for some schools across Canada and proceedings have been instituted against 14 CEGEPs, that is post-secondary educational facilities in the province of Quebec. They are being sued by a group representing artists and producers. The suit attempts to recover $990,000 for the illegal reproduction of audio-visual tapes. The CEGEPs are being sued for institutionalized fraud, and it is obvious that changes to the copyright legislation are necessary. The best place to discuss these changes would be in committee.

I see we have the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) here this afternoon who, I understand, will be bringing in some changes to the copyright legislation. I hope he will be introducing this legislation shortly as it would certainly assist our schools in obtaining educational films. School divisions in British Columbia and Manitoba have also been threatened with lawsuits, Mr. Speaker, so you can see that it is time we came to their rescue.

In July, 1975, in Britain the BBC and the ITCA permitted schools and other educational institutions to record educational programs off-air for later use in schools. It was necessary for these two agencies to make appropriate arrangements with certain performers, unions and holders of other relevant rights. This was not thought to be an insurmountable problem for the networks, school authorities and the government of the United Kingdom. I think it is a problem we in Canada can solve with just a little effort, the first step being the referral of this bill to committee for further study. I hope we will receive a favourable response from the government this afternoon.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, my party and I tend to support the bill in principle. We would like to see it go to committee for further discussion, and we hope members on the other side will not see fit to talk it out, for a very good reason.

First, it is a very important piece of legislation which could potentially improve the scope of education in the schools and colleges of our country. Second, I do not know how many members realize how greatly the use of video tape recorders has spread. I have some statistics here which show the proliferation of these machines. They are not really confined to homes, radio stations or television stations. They will be used in schools and other institutions, and they are already. So what I am saying about the hon. member's bill is simply that the use of apparatus of this kind is going to spread and copies are going to be made of intellectual properties anyway. They are being made at present and there is nothing that we or anyone else can do to stop this technological advance. It is unstoppable. It is somewhat akin to the technology associated with satellites and earth stations, and we will have to adjust our legal system to become more consonant with the new technology. If we do not do that, what will happen is that we will see a tremendous growth in this kind of under-the-table illegality which already has occurred with print material where you have a vast amount of copyright material of "someone's intellectual property", either that of the creator or of the publisher. At the moment, schools and colleges are running these off by the hundreds on Xerox machines and on various types of ditto machines, and publishers and various other companies which have some rights so far as these properties are concerned are at a loss to know what to do.

Certainly there is occasionally an attempt to bring a suit, to make an example of some institution or of some individual, some school teacher or high school bandmaster who wants another second flute part and Xerox's copies from the original. It is precisely the same thing as will occur now with different material in the video taping. The recorded form, for that matter, is also something that has been going on for some years. People have been taping recordings for years. With this sort of bootlegging or private taping, nobody, neither the publisher nor the composer or creator, gets any kind of benefit.

Surely if it is done in other countries, it is not beyond our intellectual capacity to make some kind of arrangement, as we have with the radio stations through CAPAC and BMI, for a performing rights fee based on the volume of the radio station or the percentage of his gross. It does not seem to me to be impossible to work out a system of fees and charges which could apply to institutions so that the publishers or the owners of those rights could get something out of it. You might as well legalize it and organize it rather than allow it to go on and proliferate in an illegal, pirate way as it is today.

Certainly it is complex, extremely complex. Although this bill mentions only the Broadcasting Act, what is involved more deeply and more intimately is the copyright aspect. The hon. member did mention that. The Copyright Act amendments are something we tried to bring in here in 1971 when the present Madam Speaker was not yet a member of Parliament. I recall first meeting her at the deliberations of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs when it was studying Bill S-9 which was attempting to ask for copyright amendments so that performance fees could apply to the replay of records on radio stations. The idea was that the money would go to the composer and the publisher, but the performer himself on a "hit" record, if he was a back-stop musician, would get some benefit. That attempt failed ultimately, and the minister then became minister of state partially responsible for the Copyright Act, or closely associated with the minister who was responsible at that time. Nothing has happened since in that regard. There are complexities here, but if other countries could solve this problem, it seems to me it would not be beyond Canada's ability to do the same thing. I therefore support the hon. member's representation and hope that it goes to committee so that it can be thoroughly examined. I do not think there is any threat to anybody's ministry or anybody's ego in this thing. There should be more of this kind of non-partisan examination of issues such as this, which are not associated with any political party, in an attempt to solve a particular problem faced by groups of institutions and hundreds, if not thousands, of young people.

Let me give the House some indication of the growth in the past four years of these video tape recorders or cassette recorders. There are many of them. There are different types, but that is not important at the moment. I am quoting from The New York Times Magazine of August, 1979. It says the following:

> But in the past four years, hundreds of thousands of viewers have acquired video cassette recorders (VCRs). By plugging a VCR into their television sets, people can record any program they choose for later viewing. Firms such as Sony and Matsushita (which distributes its VCRs through (RCA) dominate the American market, and their cassette machines are being exported from Japan—

And get this, Mr. Speaker.

> —at the rate of 100,000 a month.

It goes on to say how these things are used. Sure, they are used in homes. They are going to be used in schools. They are used in schools. Video casette players are available to schools, colleges and individuals, and they are now down to the price of $400 each. It is estimated that by 1988 there will be a penetration in the homes of the United States to the extent of 40 per cent.

We are dealing with this matter now, and no amount of stalling or foot-dragging will change anything at all. All we will do is make criminals or illegals out of many people who through their own honest efforts will attempt to use the new material and technology. I really do not want to become involved with some sort of conflict with the law.

I congratulate the hon. member for putting this motion forward. I congratulate members of the government and the minister for listening so attentively and politely. I hope I have made some contribution. I hope I have given the House a glimpse of the immensity of the problem and also the immensity of the challenge. I support wholeheartedly the hon. member's bill as well as his request that we have a look at this in committee, because it needs to be done.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the two previous speakers, and I am happy to add my contribution to this debate. The two previous speeches seemed to be practical, detailed and down to earth, but I have spent the past 12 years of my life in book publishing, and I have heard all these ideas before. They are old ideas recycled around new machinery, and they are ideas which have been debated thoroughly, and thrown out, in other areas.

In effect, what we are looking at here is a threat to individual property. We are looking at a bill which asks us to consider theft which is a little more difficult because it is intellectual theft and not the actual removal of physical property.

Let us look at the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). He gave us a long list of people who support his ideas. Included in the list were teachers, college professors—all consumers. There were no writers, no artists, no producers, no designers and no publishers. Just consumers. I could put together the same kind of list for free food, but I would have a hard time getting a farmer to sign the list.

Mr. Rose: Read the bill.

Mr. Fisher: Copyright exists for very specific reasons. It exists to protect property and to ensure that people will get recognition and payment. The book industry, newspapers, the music industry, arts and films take copyright laws very seriously because all these people own their material, and they want payment for it. They want protection against its misuse, and they want recognition of their own artistic and creative inputs. When we come along and try to exempt people from copyright laws, we are taking away from the creators of those materials the rights they quite properly now enjoy.

As I mentioned, I have experience in book publishing, and I have seen this happen time and again. I remember a case in British Columbia in which the teacher's federation Xeroxed an entire book and then sent copies to the publisher. I remember in my own publishing company specifically putting on a map the information that the customer could Xerox the map but that the rest of the book was protected from such reproduction. As we look at the arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, we find the same ideas being discussed around more and more sophisticated technology.

The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) was quite right in saying that this technology is spreading, but he was wrong when he inferred that we should condone the practice that is spreading with the technology. Because the bootlegging is happening, in his opinion we should okay it. Car theft is happening as well. Should we okay that? We did not okay horse theft, and when the technology improved we did not okay car theft. We could use the same parallels here. In this bill we are asking artists and writers to subsidize municipal taxpayers. We are saying that schools and colleges do not have enough money to afford materials which they somehow justifiably deserve, and so the writers, publishers and designers, those who spent their time, their thought, their intellect, their money and their labour, are the people who should subsidize the taxpayers. And that harsh fact is hidden by dragging in legions of small children and earnest teachers who somehow deserve access to this material free or cheap.

I am sympathetic to the idea that we need more money for educational materials at all levels of our school system. I am also sympathetic with people who succumb to temptation because the technology is there and it is easy to reproduce the material. But I also know, despite my sympathy, that these are quite separate issues, and I feel determined that we should be protecting the people who give us the materials in the first place.

It should be clear that the right to take away property is not the correct route to raise cash for our school systems. I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine would voluntarily give away half his back yard because somebody wanted to build a new school next door and did not have quite enough room. He probably would not give away his car if the school needed a new bus. And we should not ask people to give away their films, their newspapers, their paintings or their books just because enough cash cannot be raised this year from local taxpayers.

In fact, if we look at the consequences of the sympathetic approach the hon. member has taken, we will see that it is actually counterproductive. Perhaps in the short term he would have more materials than he could reproduce on his VTR or on his Xerox, but in the long term he would have fewer materials. Who would do anything remotely useful for a school if it was likely to be stolen from him at the school? We would find—and this pattern has been occurring in book publishing and it would occur again in films and television—that people would somehow just avoid servicing the school market because they would not be getting a proper return for their labour, their investment and their thought.

• (1630)

I congratulate the hon. member. Everyone wants good schools. In fact, I have a niece and a nephew who attend schools in his riding, and I am most anxious that they be good schools. We all want ample materials in those schools, and again, because of my family ties, I want very good materials in the schools in his riding. The people to whom we should be talking are not the artists or the producers. We should talk to Mr. Sterling Lyon and tell him to quit cutting taxes and to supply the schools properly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: That is where the money comes from, not from the producers. If the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine takes the long-term view and does some homework, he will find out that it is really an old argument. He can go all the way back to the days of Mark Twain and find that some of his books were actually pirated and published in Canada before they appeared in the United States. The fact that it was done in the days of Mark Twain was a strong enough argument for Canada eventually to set up good copyright laws. I do not think we should start backing away from that now just because we have new machines and it is easier to infringe. We should remind people that if they will not steal a physical piece of property, they should not steal an idea. Instead, we should take the sentiment in this bill and redirect it.

When the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) comes here and asks for more money for some of his good programs to help creative people, we should give him that money. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) comes here and asks for more money to create markets, we should give him those opportunities. When our artists and producers come to us asking for protection and recognition, we should respond to their requests as well. When we and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine start doing this, we will find in the long run that there are cheaper and better materials in the schools.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I am pleased Mr. Speaker did not recognize me before the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), he added a dimension to this discussion which has not hitherto been presented on eight occasions since the motion first appeared on the order paper and went through its annual pilgrimage in the House. Obviously the hon. member is a lobbyist for the book publishing business. We have not had the benefit of that interesting viewpoint until now.

We are faced with a real problem, and I do not think any perspective should be accepted as the only one. I express admiration for the manner in which the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) sponsored this bill. He introduced it reasonably and has persisted over eight years in bringing it before the House. I have had a similar experience in sponsoring a private member's motion for almost as long to set up a committee on the disabled. Finally we have achieved our goal in that regard. We are working very constructively and creatively in a non-partisan manner to deal with the problems of the disabled community.

Mr. Pepin: You will get the report from Transport Canada next week.

Mr. Dinsdale: Oh, good.

Mr. Knowles: Do not say "good" until you have seen the report.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is something we were not able to obtain before. I hope hon. members heard the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). We have been attempting to get some action in the area of transportation for the disabled. This is good news that we have received this afternoon.

The sponsor of this motion is only asking that it be referred to a committee. It must be referred to a committee. We have heard the viewpoint of publishers expressed by the hon. member for Mississauga North, the viewpoint of the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) who is a teacher with many years of experience, and the very constructive presentation of the mover of the bill.

The tragedy is that this matter was referred to committee on a previous occasion, but because of the exigencies of the business of this House, there was no quorum in the committee and it could not proceed with its business. As the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine said, there were no Liberal members present at the committee. Whether that was deliberate or due to circumstances, we do not know. But, he received the approval of the House and of the government, and let us hope it is renewed before we finish our discussion this afternoon.

We are living in a time when information is expanding explosively. This phenomenon has been occurring for the last 30 or 40 years. Actually we were much better off in making audio-visual information available to educational institutions a couple of decades ago than we are now. In the past two decades we moved into the area of television communication and now we are moving toward Telidon communication. In the not too distant future everyone will have a machine in their homes through which they will be able to communicate with the community and the world at large. This invention is sponsored by the Government of Canada. The government has not yet sorted out the politics arising from this new magnificent technology, and what we are discussing today is a step in the right direction, if the subject is allowed to go to committee.

What will we do when Telidon is developed by the Government of Canada in collaboration with the private sector, Northern Telecom? We will be able to sit in our homes and bring in information of all kinds. What will the book publishers do about it? Telidon will have access to library resources all over the country, to satellite information, to electronic funds transmission, to electronic mail transmission and the whole business. This technology will require major changes in existing legislation and will result in the implementation of various new pieces of legislation. The bill before us is only asking for a reference to committee where we can grapple with one small segment of the total picture.

Obviously the hon. member for Mississauga North has not read the bill; his speech must have been prepared for him. If he had read the bill, he would have realized that clause 1(vii) on line 26 reads:

—provisions respecting royalties payable to such authors or performers—

The whole idea is to make contractual arrangements. This is the emphasis of the bill. It would make it possible for royalty provisions to be payable to authors and performers. There is no desire to steal, as the hon. member for Mississauga North implied. There is no desire to steal or to avoid the necessity of making a reasonable contribution. This is what is being done now, as the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody told us. When Telidon comes on-stream it will be done in every home. It is to regularize and legalize what is already being done.

● (1640)

I say we have gone backwards in this regard. When I was in the educational field there used to be some interesting activities designed to inform the citizens of Canada, through audio-visual means, of some of the great events that were taking place at that time. This kept Canadians informed on current affairs. The two programs of which I speak were "Citizens Forum" and "Farm Forum". These were sponsored by the CBC and excellent information was published by them and distributed. The National Film Board supported this educational activity by establishing a network of film councils across the country. These films were available free of charge. They were films on all sorts of topics of educational value to the schools, colleges and universities of this country. This service is no longer available because of the advent of television. Canada has not come to grips with that problem. As a result, our students and our citizens are being deprived of a very important and necessary source of information. The United States are ahead of us in this regard. They have the Public Broadcasting Service which is privately-funded and doing an excellent job of providing educational programming. It makes the programs available to schools and educational institutions. The CBC could do this, as it used to do with "Citizens Forum" and with "Farm Forum", backed up by the audio-visual services of the NFB.

I want to make one further point. I have already made reference to the fact that it took eight years to get some action on behalf of the disabled community by bringing a motion repeatedly before this House. I hope we will have the same response from the government spokesmen this afternoon who will rise and say: Yes, let it go to committee because we have a real problem here.

I also hope that the government will move quickly in the area of copyright because copyright provisions at the present time make it impossible to serve our schools and universities with audio-visual material. This also applies in the area of the disabled. Some radio stations have tried to provide a reading service for the blind and visually impaired. They cannot provide such service. They are willing to provide the service but they cannot do so because they are prevented by antiquated copyright legislation. Let us move forward in this direction. Let us see what can be done to change our out-dated copyright regulations so that urgently-needed services of the audio-visual educational kind can be provided to our schools. I mention this particularly for the benefit of the member for Mississauga North, so that publishers, writers and creators can be adequately compensated. I am sure there is no one, no author, no creative person in this country who wants to deny the young people of Canada in the schools the benefit of what they have created.

This bill is asking for amendments to the legislation which will make it possible to provide the royalties. Let us move forward in that area. Let us move forward in the area of copyright. Hon. members know that the government has, in the past decade or so, been talking about this for almost as long as amendments to the Bank Act have been talked about. Let us do it. Let us move this excellent piece of legislation into committee and get on with solving this urgent problem. New situations, new circumstances and new legislation will be required in order to come to grips with the impact of the revolution in technology—as Alvin Toffler calls it, the "new wave".

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I take the floor, first, as the member for Mercier and, second, as former chairman of a regional school board and present trustee of the same school board. I would remind my hon. colleague from Winnipeg-Assiniboine that I shall be meeting my colleagues tomorrow at which time I shall have the opportunity of consulting them in that regard.

However, after having been active in the school system for five years, this is the sixth year of my term, I must say that this bill in no way meets the needs of Quebec school boards, and I am surprised that a Manitoba colleague can introduce a bill that trespasses on so many rights, individuals and bodies. In any event, I think this bill, as we say in French, is "stuffed" with good intentions, but as hell is also, "stuffed" with good intentions, I doubt that is the purpose of this bill.

I must also remind the House that, in this bill, we deal with a matter that falls under the jurisdiction of the Superior Council of the Ministers of Education, which means that we are dealing directly with a matter of provincial jurisdiction. As far as I know, and with regard to the allegations of my colleague for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, I have not heard that the ministers of the superior council made any request to the effect of changing our federal laws to authorize them to glean so-called educational programs from both public and private television networks. However, I see that my colleague extends the matter to television programs in section 3(2), which I quote:

—and any television program dealing primarily with history, science, the arts and current affairs, but does not include a newscast.

In other words, almost 90 per cent of all television programs produced can be used and taped by the minister of education network.

I believe my colleague and other hon. members would be well advised to see just what is now available to the ministers of education in the field of educational films. With this in mind, I brought my colleague for Winnipeg-Assiniboine a repertory of films on the penal code, published by the department I represent as Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada.

Now it would have access to hundreds of films and refer the said document to the Manitoba Department of Education and make available to thousands of young people an extremely well prepared documentation from various sources at some ridiculously low prices and often free of charge. However, I do not intend obviously to give a lecture on the excellent films produced by the National Film Board of Canada which come under the jurisdiction of the federal government and which also make available to school boards some high quality films also at set prices or even free of charge. Therefore, I think that school boards are very well served by the Canadian government as far as the production of educational films is concerned.

I wonder about the basic subject matter of Bill C-224, a bill practically authorizing the broadcast of all television programs throughout Canada. The member did not put any limitation in his bill about the programs originating in the United States since it is rather easy to gain access to the American production in Canada. Therefore, in my opinion, while the bill is full of good intentions, it does not surely attain the objectives sought by the member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie).

● (1650)

Furthermore, as a school trustee and as a member sitting on a school board in my riding and accountable in another riding for another school board to which I have sent the reference book I mentioned earlier, I must say that I am surprised that there could be so much interference with the rights of all the people involved.

In fact, I am thinking of the authors, namely, the people who created those television programs; I am thinking of the producers and all the teams who participated in the production of those programs. I am not questioning the judgment of school boards in selecting programs which could be of some interest for those students. However, I believe it is not within the federal government's jurisdiction to initiate such action and to make available to the provinces material qualified as school and educational material, without their specific request.

Besides, I find it rather strange that a Progressive Conservative colleague normally so concerned with the welfare of private enterprise should propose now an almost socialist oriented bill. In fact, mention is made in this bill to cover rights which have been respected and if they have not been respected as they should, as mentionned by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) I do not see why we should try to make legal things which are being done illegally at the present time and if there is any need for putting teeth in the law I think that would be the right course to follow rather than making things legal by interfering with the basic rights of artists and authors. In fact, Mr. Speaker, in the arts, as you no doubt know, it is extremely difficult for an artist to become known, to earn a living, to have a decent income in order to feed a family and in the long run to enjoy a decent living as a Canadian citizen.

What the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine suggests, is for a federal control over television broadcasts and to offer them at a reasonable cost. I am sorry, but I do not think that it is the responsibility of the Canadian government to set a reasonable price for those broadcasts. At the present time, I believe that most of the programs shown on televison networks are available to all provincial governments which may, if they wish, obtain copyrights in order to show these programs in educational broadcasts. Therefore, I do not see how a member of the Progressive Conservative Party could allow such government interference in private business or in matters which come under the jurisdiction of another level of government. In fact, although I have not inquired about the situation in Manitoba, I know very well what services are offered in Quebec and in Ontario with regard to educational broadcasting and I must say that in Ontario the programs are of excellent quality. Not only does that province have access to Canadian productions but there are exchanges with countries of the European community, on a regular basis. Furthermore, beside those exchanges, the Ontario and Quebec governments have made joint efforts to produce educational programs, to which quite often participate our national radio and television network, but which are initiated by the provincial governments and which come under their own jurisdiction.

So, I do not see why my colleagues are up in arms on a constitutional motion which does not temper with provincial jurisdictions and I do not understand how a bill may be brought to the floor of this House, and have such an impact in a field which is strictly under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, coming back to article 2(4) which states: "Notwithstanding the provisions of the act on copyright, copy, retention and utilization of a broadcast in the expected way, are deemed not to constitute infringements on copyright".

I protest, Mr. Speaker, such a clause which makes it possible to infringe upon copyrights. We know, as my colleague from Mission-Port Moody said earlier, that protecting copyright is no easy task and since that problem is to be tackled, I think the government will not hesitate to adopt such a measure. However, I think it is rather strange that a party so concerned with individual rights, a party which loathes social legislation, a party whose philosophy has always been based on the individual, should deny this very individual, who is the author, the opportunity to discuss his own copyrights, to set up his rights himself to negotiate them freely with television stations as well as denying him the opportunity to pass contracts involving retransmission.

By the way, the provinces can now have access to the whole Canadian government production through the educational network, for a nominal cost or for an amount which covers only the technical cost of production. Therefore, it seems very odd that such a provision be included in a bill which is supposed to aim at child education.

I must say that if my colleague is so concerned with the education of his children in his province, I offer him to share with the director of educational services of Le Gardeur School Board, on which I still sit, as a matter of fact, all resources which we have as regards bibliographies and films which could be put to the disposal of school-boards. Besides, I must say that as productions are made both in English and French in Quebec, his province would surely benefit from their use.

In addition, I have not heard the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine say in his speech that he had consulted organizations as important as the Union des artistes or any other union concerned by the matter, and I believe that in such an important area, this is one of the basic things which must be introduced if we want such a legislation to take form and become statute.

On the other hand, I turn to the assertions of my colleague who was speaking earlier about Telidon, advanced technology, the opportunity to broadcast all kinds of documents through television. I do not think this government which has precisely presided over in the technological innovation in the telecommunication field, which, finally, has spent for many years huge amounts on research in this area, should deny the opportunity to use such advanced technological tools.

However, in spite of gossips and scandal-mongers, I must say that this government is anxious to respect members of the education superior board, their needs, their viewpoints, and if the latter make application to acquire such aids, I suggest the Liberal government could sit down and discuss the matter. But I believe that this legislation, as a matter of fact, represents a considerable infringement not only in the right of provinces, not only on the right of individuals, but it doesn't trust those who assume responsibility in this area.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if I had to sum up the matter, I would say that this legislation is paternalistic in a way. As a matter of fact, it would like to dictate conduct to school-boards and tell them how to use their educational aids and where to find them. Finally, credit would certainly be last where credit would be due. Personally, speaking this time as a mother of three children, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the findings of Statistics Canada, namely, that children are spending by far too many hours watching TV, and that all those who are interested in the issue, whether as teachers, psychologists or associated specialists, are indeed very concerned about this situation.

Before introducing such a bill and instead of allowing the students to have access to more hours of television under the pretext of education, we should perhaps look for innovations more in agreement with personalized education, with a type of education where the child is no longer treated as an object, but rather as a human being.

Mr. Speaker, the technology of television can be used well, and I believe that certain provincial governments—since I cannot give a summary of the situation throughout Canada—are now putting educational television to very good use. However, it is not by making available hundreds of hours more of programs that we can solve the problem of education for Canadian children. I believe that, at the present time—and my colleague can correct me if I am wrong—we have all the technical material that we need and the problem of education is not related to a lack of educational books or of technological aids available to school boards, but rather to the values and the system itself, to the children in our schools who have been ignored in the last few years and treated as numbers.

Mr. Speaker, we have tried in our school-board to give back to our students a quality of school life which is concerned less with the teaching environment and the quality of the building itself than with the quality of the teachers and personal contacts with each student, which aspect has been somewhat ignored in recent educational reforms.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-224 pretends to be aimed at education but, in fact, it only represents interference by the federal government in an area which comes nearly completely under provincial jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker, I cannot support such a bill since I believe that by restricting this action to educational television, we would be opening the door to much greater dangers. Indeed, my colleague must know that we have throughout Canada community television stations which could also claim the same rights and say that, to educate the public in general, they want to take over these programs, and this would provoke a chaos which would benefit no one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being after five o'clock, pursuant to an order passed on Wednesday, November 5, 1980, the House stands adjourned until next Wednesday at 2 p.m., in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

NATIONAL PARKS

CALL FOR CONSULTATION WITH LEASEHOLDERS IN WESTERN PARKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. A notice from the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) appeared in The Globe and Mail on Saturday, November 8, 1980, addressed to the cottage and home leaseholders in Yoho, Banff, Jasper, Waterton Lakes, Prince Albert and Riding Mountain national parks, all located in western Canada. Inasmuch as the announcement continues the harassment of western Canadians using these parks, harassment which has included attempts to cancel arbitrarily federal leases which now take the form of sudden exorbitant land rental increases up to 1,400 per cent, creating hardships on pioneers and senior citizens in particular, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the Minister of the Environment announce immediately that he will consult, as originally promised, with leaseholders in the western national parks in an effort to arrive at a fair and equitable increase, thereby easing the growing feeling of alienation in the west arising from the many arbitrary actions of the Government of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE BUDGET

SALES TAX ON GLAZED WINDOWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the sales tax on double-glazed and triple-glazed windows was cancelled in the November, 1978 budget, and whereas the stated goal of this government is energy conservation, and it is well known that the installation of double and triple-glazed windows can significantly reduce building heat loss, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House instruct the government to reinstate the exemption from sales tax for double and triple-glazed windows.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

MEASURES TO ASSIST NORTHERN RESIDENTS MEET HIGH ENERGY COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, who are totally dependent on oil as an energy source, are now paying upwards of $2 a gallon for fuel oil in some communities, and whereas there are no provisions in the budget to cushion the impact of escalating oil prices on northern residents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper):

That the government introduce measures, similar to those presently in effect in the Atlantic provinces, which would help northern residents cope with disproportionately high energy costs.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

CONTROL OF POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, there seems to be a basic contradiction between the government's policy and the government's action in the area of foreign investment. The commissioner of the Foreign Investment Review Agency has just completed a trip to Germany to encourage European investment in Canada. This is in direct contradiction of the government's policy of putting all foreign investment proposals under stringent control and review. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce make a statement on motions defining more clearly the separation between his control over the policy of FIRA and the apparent independence of action which the commissioner of FIRA enjoys, even to the extent of encouraging German investment in Canada, contrary to the stated government policy of corporate takeovers.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It was reported over the weekend that a senior member of the Prime Minister's staff was called upon to draft the NDP amendment to the government's constitutional resolution because the NDP party has no obvious understanding of the constitutional resolution. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government reveal whether they are now drafting speeches, amendments and policies for the NDP, whether an NDP vote is just another Liberal vote, and that the government reveal the full extent of their relationship with the NDP since the Canadian people are entitled to an explanation whether there will be a full consummation of their relationship.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ATTITUDE OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Parti Québécois is trying untiringly to attain its separatist aim by circulating a petition whose avowed purpose is to impede any attempt to renew Canadian federalism.

Whereas the Parti Québécois is using some associations to circulate that petition.

Whereas the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition signed that petition when he came to my constituency on November 10 last, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel):

That the Leader of the Conservative party explain to the House his invitation to Quebeckers to take part in the referendum, which implied a commitment of the federalist forces to amend the Canadian Constitution, and his support now for the separatist party, which implies the rejection of any opportunity for the renewal of Canadian federalism.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, is there consent—

Madam Speaker: No.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—ENDORSATION BY "PRAVDA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Pravda has expressed endorsation of the Prime Minister's constitutional resolution and in light of the fact that six provincial premiers are to challenge this constitutional package in the courts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That the Prime Minister not follow in the footsteps of his new ally and banish the six dissident premiers to the frozen wastelands of Siberia.

ENERGY

SITE FOR METHANE TERMINAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Last week, I visited Gros-Cacouna, the site which had been originally proposed for the LNG methane terminal for the Arctic pilot project near Rivière-du-Loup. While there I met some people from the area. Shortly before the proposal was made by Petro-Canada to the NEB, this proposal was amended to include Canso in Nova Scotia, another possible site for the terminal. It is clear, Madam Speaker, that there is a conflict here between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) concerning this site. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

That the choice of the terminal site be referred to the Commons national resources committee in order to ascertain the pros and cons. I beg of both ministers to put an end to their chess game.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR INCREASED BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), I move:

That this House notes the frequent references made by the government to the $35 a month increase in the Guaranteed Income Supplement provided earlier this year, but this House points out that this increase has been completely absorbed by increased rents, increased fuel and other costs, and this House therefore calls on the government to bring in a measure that will provide a further pension increase, it being clear that such a measure will be passed in time for the increase to be included in the cheques our pensioners will receive just before Christmas.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—INSTRUCTION TO COMMITTEE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the capacity of the joint committee of Parliament which is considering the constitution to have its proceedings televised. The Prime Minister will know that Madam Speaker has ruled that that decision can be taken only by this House in so far as the House of Commons is concerned. Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is the intention of his government to take an initiative which would allow Parliament to give what Madam Speaker has called a permissive instruction to the joint committee which would allow full coverage by radio and television of the proceedings of that committee?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I had occasion this morning to listen to the views of various caucus members on this subject. It was concluded that the government House leader would be willing to meet the House leaders of the other parties, as soon as they are ready, to discuss ways in which television might be brought into that committee if agreement can be obtained all around on the way in which it can be done.

● (1415)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I am pleased that we have moved that far, although I think that was a conditional answer given by the Prime Minister. Is it the position of the government that there should be live radio and television coverage of the proceedings of the joint committee?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I believe that is a repetition of the same question, and I can only answer in the same terms, perhaps more elaborate if necessary. The position of this party has been for a long while, in spite of the foot dragging by the official opposition, that television should come into the House. The Leader of the Opposition will recall that television coverage in the House be done under very specified circumstances, that there be certain kinds of electronic Hansard, and so on. The answer I gave earlier indicates that our caucus is willing to go in the direction of televising this particular committee if the proper conditions, safeguards and framework are worked out between the House leaders.

Mr. Epp: What conditions?

Mr. McDermid: Before December 9?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, again we do not have an indication yet that it is the intention of the Government of Canada to recommend full radio and television coverage. The Prime Minister says that their agreement would be conditional. Would the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons what his conditions are?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have indicated that our House leader is prepared to meet his House leader and the House leader of the New Democratic Party to discuss these conditions.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, to discuss what conditions?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition surely remembers that when television was brought into the House, it was after a long series of negotiations on many conditions. Some conditions were put forth by his own party. We want objective coverage, something in the nature of an electronic Hansard. We do not want spots. We want to have the equivalent of what takes place in the full House. There are other conditions to be discussed which the House leaders will be able to look at.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

McDONALD COMMISSION—POSSIBLE CONFLICT REGARDING RELEASE OF INFORMATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister also relates to a question of constitutional responsibility which needs public airing.

Where there may be a conflict regarding the release of information before a royal commission in this country and the very clear duty and responsibility of a provincial attorney general to prosecute or, at the very least, to have an investigation where serious allegations of a criminal nature have been made, which in the view of the Prime Minister and the government takes paramountcy? Is it the right of a royal commission to decline to release information to a provincial attorney general, or is it the right and responsibility of a provincial attorney general to prosecute?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the question oversimplifies the problem. There are two sovereign governments involved and each has its own responsibility. Speaking for this government, a royal commission was established which has been asked to get to the bottom of the incidents involving the RCMP. The work of the commission is proceeding on course. It will report by next March 31, and as has been indicated many times in this House, the government will take its responsibility with that report.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am curious as to why the Prime Minister, who claims to have a very serious knowledge of the law of this country and constitutional questions, would not answer that question.

My supplementary question to the Prime Minister relates, of course, to the long letter sent to the Minister of Justice by the attorney general of Ontario. Other attorneys general across this country are also seriously concerned about the absence of full and complete disclosure, contrary to an undertaking given by the Clark administration to those attorneys general, of information relating to very serious allegations of a criminal nature which would be given to them before the release of that information to the public.

● (1420)

I come back to the Prime Minister. Which in his mind has paramountcy when he, his Solicitor General, his Minister of Justice and I know that, in relation to the Checkmate matter in any event, in November, 1980, there is very little in those files which relates to national security matters.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member wants to know why I did not answer the first question. The answer is obvious. It was because the Solicitor General had the answer, and it was a perfectly satisfactory answer. We are faced with the problem of two levels of government having different areas of jurisdiction.

I repeat his words. As far as we are concerned as a government, we established a royal commission. We always, both in this House and outside the House, took the position that we would not intervene in the work of that commission, that we would not prejudge issues until the commission had reported, that we would not prosecute witnesses until the evidence was completely in or until the commission itself said that it was prepared to release the evidence. I think that is a perfectly acceptable and justifiable procedure, all the more justifiable, as the House knows, when the Solicitor General a very few days ago tabled an order in council indicating that we wanted the royal commission to bring in its final report by the end of March of next year, five months from now.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—METHODOLOGY OF BROADCASTING PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader. I want to get a little more detail on what I now take it the government has accepted in principle, that is, the notion that there will be both radio and television coverage of the proceedings of the special joint committee on the constitution. Will the House leader confirm that the kind of detail the government has in mind simply refers, for example, to the method of covering the proceedings of the House—that everything that is said by a speaker in the House has to be included, that there be no editing; and, second, that cameras or radio microphones will not be focused on people who are not being formally recognized by the Chair. Is that the kind of detail the government has in mind?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Those are good suggestions, Madam Speaker, and might I point out to the leader of the NDP that last week, when the members of the committee opposed their proceedings being televised, certain concerns were expressed. Some dealt with what the hon. member has just mentioned; others pertained to the application of certain principles such as, respecting the electronic Hanzard, bilingualism and simultaneous translation.

Other matters will also have to be discussed, such as how the proceedings will be televised, the problems of setting up subcommittees. The hon. member will understand that for the sake of efficiency the committee might well decide to break up into various groups with a view to hearing the largest possible number of witnesses; the question might well come up then of which of those groups should have its proceedings televised. That is the type of practical, real problems, which we are not making up, and which will have to be faced. I feel it might be wise for the House leaders to try to avoid them and, ultimately, find an arbitrator who could make the decisions should problems arise.

In concluding, might I say that our favouring, at this time, the televising of the proceedings of the joint committee should in no way be interpreted as a means of delaying, in any way, the work or the report of the committee.

[English]

INQUIRY WHETHER REPORTING DEADLINE WILL BE EXTENDED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I am certainly glad the government has discovered that the degree of lighting in the committee will not be too strong to drive out witnesses and has decided to open up the process.

With that aside, I would now like to ask the Prime Minister an important question on the democratic process of constitutional change that is so integral to gaining acceptability in the federal state, not merely the substance of the program. Considering the delay, but not simply the delay, in getting the committee proceedings underway as a result of what happened in the other place, and considering the large number of people and organizations who want to present testimony to the committee, will the government be prepared to extend the deadline for the report of the committee by at least two weeks?

● (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I remind the leader of the New Democratic Party of conversations which were held by the House leaders of the three parties early in October. They were to the effect that the dates were flexible. The issue then was—and it remains—how long does this total issue remain before Parliament, before Parliament makes a final decision? My recollection of the negotiations then was that our House leader was flexible as to the number of days or weeks the resolution would stay at second stage before committee, providing we had some view of what would happen at the end. Would there be some agreement to vote on the whole issue within some reasonable time? I remember the conversation I had with the Leader of the Conservative party and the Leader of the New Democratic Party in my office the day before cabinet made its final decision as to timing, procedure and content. The problem was discussed at that point too—that we should deal with this matter not in haste but with some sense of urgency. The argument I used then and use again was the commitment we made during the Quebec referendum.

An hon. Member: Were all members heard?

Mr. Trudeau: I recall the answers of both my interlocutors at the time. If they want to go into it further, I will indicate what was said at that time.

An hon. Member: Will all members be heard at least once?

Mr. Broadbent: If I understood the Prime Minister correctly—and I was listening with care—he said that he was prepared to extend in principle the time limit for the committee, but he wanted to link that in some way to the final time which would be taken both at committee stage and back in the House in terms of completing the bill. In particular, given the number of people who want to be heard at this time and the importance of us, as a parliamentary group, showing that we are interested in hearing the people of Canada, especially particular interest groups of central concern, is the Prime Minister prepared to say more precisely today what he has in mind, or is he saying that it is something which must be negotiated by House leaders?

Mr. Trudeau: I am saying the latter, Madam Speaker. I believe the Leader of the New Democratic Party, at least on this point, is agreed with our party that the matter must be dealt with within a certain framework. We discussed that last May and again in early October. I make no secret of the fact that we discussed timing also when I met the Leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. Clark: Very generally.

Mr. Trudeau: Very generally. I indicated to them then, and I indicate to them now that we want sufficient time to be devoted to this matter, to the hearing of witnesses and so on. That is why we were flexible in early October, and that is why the House leader is prepared to be flexible now. We are not flexible in the sense that we would prolong committee stage—

Mr. Andre: Flexible closure.

Mr. Trudeau: —if we had some reason to believe that when we reached the final stage we would still be faced with filibusters, bringing us into an indefinite amount of time. I believe that is the position of the New Democratic Party, as I understood it, in a general sense. There was no date agreed upon, but certainly there was an indication on their part which shared our part, that Canada must get on and settle this matter within some reasonable time. This is the context in which the House leader of our party will discuss with his opposite numbers.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McDermid: The minister has stated in this House that the most severe difficulties are faced by those young people who cannot get their first entry into the job market and that he has to tackle that problem immediately. With unemployment in the 15 to 24-year-old age bracket now at 13.4 per cent, up dramatically since the minister decided to tackle the problem, and with 15,000 more unemployed in September—as a matter of fact, 2,000 fewer employed than a year ago—can the minister tell us how much longer the young people of Canada have to wait for action from this obviously uncaring government?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that since this time last year well over 230,000 jobs have been created in this country. That is a very important fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Furthermore, because of the number of cancellations and cutbacks the hon. member's government instituted, opportunities for young people, women and others to work in direct employment were cut back. We have had to put those programs back into effect, as we have now done, and they are now being implemented and providing a number of new work opportunities.

I further point out to the hon. member that we have initiated a major task force chaired by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, and a number of assessments are going on in our department to provide the kinds of changes which we all recognize must take place in order to respond to new work conditions in the 1980s. So I think we are a caring government. We are concerned about unemployment but, unlike our predecessors, we are doing something about it.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister, who likes to put forward his programs as the panacea for all our problems but which provided only 12¼ jobs in my riding where there are 5,000 on unemployment insurance. Hon. members opposite are really doing a great job!

The minister is hanging everything on this committee. Is he telling this House that he is not going to take any action at all until that committee reports but that he will take action on that committee's report and follow its recommendations?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, unlike the hon. member opposite, I would like to have the facts before I make decisions. I think it is important when we establish a committee of Parliament made up of members on both sides of the House that we pay them the proper respect and wait for them to bring forward their findings before going ahead and taking major action. That was the purpose of having the committee.

However, in the meantime we have started a number of programs this year which are providing employment opportunities. There are special programs for women in training, a special native training program, and the community development program which replaces the one cancelled by the hon. member's government.

Mr. McDermid: Twelve jobs in my riding.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact is that these programs are providing close to 50,000 jobs across this country, which is a very important step forward. We believe it is very essential at this time that we make a very careful assessment of the job market as it will appear in the years ahead and respond to it properly.

I also suggest to the hon. member that in the budget presented by the Minister of Finance two weeks ago an additional $350 million was allocated to deal with job problems and industrial problems in this country, and we intend to be making announcements on that very soon.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ROLE OF CANADIAN-OWNED OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the position of Canadian-owned, independent oil companies under the new energy program of the government. One of the objectives of this program is to increase the degree of Canadian ownership of the oil and gas industry in Canada, which is an objective we on this side of the House fully support.

However, one of the things which has become quite clear since the announcement of the report is that these companies have stated that their cash flows will be reduced by 25 per cent to 35 per cent, that they will be financially weaker. Many of them are cutting back operations. Some have stated their clear intention to move to the United States and spend their money developing energy resources in the United States.

In view of this, what role does the minister see the Canadian-owned, independent oil company playing in the Canadianization program which has been announced under the national energy program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Canadian energy program is attaching the utmost importance to the role of Canadian independent petroleum companies. Those who have complained have looked at the taxation side of the budget, but I submit that they have not examined very carefully the very substantial incentive program this budget contains for Canadian-owned companies. We have met with several of those companies and their spokesmen. We are reviewing with them the impact of the budget on their operations, and for those companies which are going to explore and carry on activities in Canada I submit that this budget and the national energy program are indeed very much to the advantage of Canadian companies.

Mr. Andre: They don't think so.

Mr. Lalonde: I add only that one of the most vociferous opponents of the program, after the hon. member for Calgary Centre who is always speaking, is a man who has been in this country 30 years but has not bothered to take Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Andre: Jim Gray was born in this country. He is more of a Canadian than you will ever be.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, many articles have come out in the newspapers since the announcement of this program calling for lay-offs, redirection of budgets to the United States, cutting budgets within Canada and hiring freezes. These people are not taking these actions without studying the impact of the energy program on their operations. The minister says he has met with a number of these companies and listened to their concerns. When does the minister propose to announce specific action which will take account of and redress the adverse affects of the energy program on the operations of these companies?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the measures announced by the government were contained in the budget. They were approved by this House during the course of last week. I have had meetings with a number of representatives of Canadian companies about certain detailed aspects.

Mr. Paproski: What did they say?

Mr. Lalonde: Many of them said privately that there were many things they liked in the program, but they do not dare say it publicly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED VIEW OF CANADIAN COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, it is hard to top that one! I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The unemployment figures released today show that there was more unemployment this month than last month and more unemployment this year than last year. It is clear that the government is well on its way to keeping its promise to add over 100,000 to the unemployment rolls in the next year. In light of the minister's statement last week in the House of Commons that the report of the Canadian Council on Social Development was—and I am using his word—"distorted", I wonder if the minister could also tells us whether he feels that the council's documented view that increased unemployment also means an increase in marriage breakdown, crime, and suicide is also distorted.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not making any further comment about that particular report. I said at the time that I thought it was a bit far-fetched to relate the budget, as I thought had been done, to a whole series of social disorders. We all recognize the impact of unemployment, but the hon. gentleman ought to keep that problem in perspective, in fairness not only to the country but also to the unemployed themselves. Because as my colleague has pointed out, the total number of jobs in Canada has increased quite markedly over the past year.

Mr. McDermid: For young people?

Mr. MacEachen: In fact, the increase has been about 2.2 per cent year to year. The unadjusted unemployment level is precisely the same this month as it was a year ago. Furthermore, the performance of the Canadian economy is better than that of the United States. These are a number of encouraging signs which I invite the hon. member to place against the concern we all feel about increased unemployed at whatever level.

Mr. Rae: I invite the minister to go to downtown ridings and to areas of high unemployment—there is over 25 per cent unemployment among young people in my riding—and give that kind of complacent statement to young people hanging around and looking for jobs.

● (1440)

My supplementary question is for the same minister. In light of the announcement made today by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the community services program of CMHC will be cancelled entirely, and in light of the fact that the minister in his budget statement announced an increase in taxation by way of an increase in unemployment insurance contributions of $1 billion, thereby, in the words of his colleague, the hon. member for Lincoln, shifting the tax burden from one group of taxpayers to another, those least able to afford it, I should like to ask the minister what is the logic of this at a time when unemployment is increasing?

In the case of the community services program the minister is taking hundreds of millions of dollars—indeed, considering the multiplier effect, taking billions of dollars—out of the economy of our inner cities, and in the case of unemployment insurance taking $1 billion out of the economy at the present time. What is the logic of simply shifting the burden in the case of the community services program on to the provinces and on to taxpayers in another form, and in the case of the unemployment insurance away from one group of taxpayers, those best able to pay, to a group of taxpayers who are least able to pay, that is to say, employees?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, first of all I would tell the hon. member that I do not intend to go to him to secure lessons about dealing with the unemployed and understanding their problems. I think if the hon. member took the view that there are others in this House who had as much interest and as much concern about the unemployed as he does, the discussion might become more rational and more logical.

The hon. member asked what the logic is about increasing contributions from both employers and employees. This Parliament adopted a principle that the unemployment insurance fund should be self-financing with respect to most of its activities. That is part of the law, and it was pursuant to that law passed by Parliament that the increased contributions were made, both from employees and employers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is the simple logic, Madam Speaker, that I ask the hon. member to consider.

ENERGY

DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF TAR SANDS PLANTS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the urgency of moving ahead with the construction of tar sands and heavy oil plants in western Canada due to the tremendous capital costs and long lead time required for their development, will the minister be seeking an agreement with the Alberta minister of energy to have the province's hold on these plants lifted and this issue separated from the over-all disagreement on oil pricing and revenue sharing from conventional oil, so that these projects can go forward without delay?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we have indicated our willingness to undertake further negotiations and we are certainly quite willing to undertake those negotiations under any format. The one suggested by the hon. member is indeed one we would welcome. I have had discussions over the telephone this morning with my colleague from Alberta—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Lalonde: —and I hope that the discussions will start at the level of officials in the near future.

ENERGY SUPPLIES ALLOCATION BOARD

EXCLUSION OF FOOD PROCESSING FROM PRIORITIES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since rationing plans have been drawn up by the Energy Supplies Allocation Board which sets up priorities for supply in the event of a shortage, apparently food production and food processing have not been included in the priorities but are still under review. Given the fact that agriculture, food processing and food supplies are such important items in the economy, this admission is somewhat shocking. My question to the minister is: where does agricultural food processing fit into the whole supply question, and why was it not included?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Energy Supplies Allocation Board is in the process of drafting regulations. Those have yet to be submitted to cabinet, to the government; I have not seen them either. However, I can indicate to the hon. member that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and his provincial counterparts have indicated that they feel agricultural products should be included in the very top category as being of the highest priority. I understand the board is now studying the question. There have been consultations and, as soon as I have received the recommendations of the board, I shall submit them for consideration to my colleagues, after which cabinet will be called upon to reach a decision. For the time being, cabinet has not done so.

[English]

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is simply this. Many categories have already been defined, down to garbage collection in some cases. Why has agriculture been left out? Is it an indication of the priority that agriculture has with this government? It is inconceivable that agriculture should have been totally left out. I ask the minister again, why?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that agriculture has not been left out, far from it. The board is now preparing, as I have said before, draft regulations with various categories. I doubt that all those have been published. I shall check with the board to see if other regulations are being planned. But, in any event, those regulations have not been adopted by cabinet. The opportunity must be given to discuss those regulations with representatives of the various industries concerned, including agriculture. When the board has had those consultations, it will be in a position to make proposals to cabinet which in turn will have to study them. In the meantime, those regulations are but proposals. Once again, agriculture will not be ignored, I am sure.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of housing. Today the government cancelled the community services contribution program which affects many communities in Canada. The minister is on record as suggesting that his objective was to have it extended and he promised to find some other way to assist municipalities. Having failed the municipalities of Canada, which will result in a rise in municipal taxes and will create unemployment, not only in the construction industry, which is already in trouble, but in service industries such as sewerage, pipes, etc., just how will the minister meet the commitment and the promise he gave in the House?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I hasten to point out to the hon. member and to other members who have spoken on the subject today that the program, although not renewed for 1981, still carries the commitment of the federal government to pay the sum of $400 million to the end of March, 1982. So that although there is a concern that the impact is immediate, in fact there is a commitment of $400 million to complete the government's program to that point in time.

Secondly, I have indicated in a letter to every member of the House today that the government is concerned about the deficit. The Minister of Finance, in tabling the budget papers, gave members of Parliament the priority system of the government in its response to control the deficit. Within that and within the area of responsibility for housing, I have to make certain choices. My choices are that this program, 50 per cent of which goes to soft services such as recreation centres, etc., probably has to stand down in place of some more urgent and better ways of expending federal funds. So in answer to the last question, I am looking at new priorities and new ways in which the federal government can carry out its responsibility to ensure adequate housing for Canadians across the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I have another question for the same minister. It involves the delivery of 282 letters, all of them with the date written in. Is it not true that this announcement was held off until after Monday's civic election so that it would not affect any candidate with Liberal party connections?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

● (1450)

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the short answer to the question is no. The longer answer is that it was with some difficulty that I was able to have some 280-odd letters delivered even this afternoon.

POST OFFICE

CLOSURE OF RURAL OFFICES—INQUIRY WHETHER REVIEW COMPLETED

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It has to do with the Saturday closing of small rural post offices. In March of this year the Postmaster General sent me a letter which indicated a current review was taking place under the auspices of the deputy postmaster general, and that consultations would take place with the Canadian Association of Postmasters and Assistants before a decision would be made. Has this review been completed and has he met with the Canadian Association of Postmasters and Assistants?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the deputy postmaster general has not yet completed his review. However, I can indicate to the House that discussions have been held with the Canadian Association of Postmasters, but that no final decision has yet been reached, which means that Saturday service will continue.

[English]

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Postmaster General. I believe he must be aware of the impact that the closure of these post offices on Saturday would have on small rural communities. Would he give an understanding to this House that he will recommend that the post offices in the small rural areas will remain open on Saturdays?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, that commitment has already been made in the House. In reply to a question from a member on this side of the House, I have already stated that no post office would be closed on Saturdays, unless it is the wish of the people, and never without prior consultation. The general rule then is that post offices, especially in rural areas, will remain open on Saturdays.

EMPLOYMENT

EFFECT OF TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last Tuesday in this House he accused me of using exaggerated figures. I think that is sometimes a matter of definition.

Earlier today the minister indicated that his employment-creation programs provided 50,000 jobs. Debates in this House in June showed that was 7,000 man-years of employment. Would the minister confirm that his employment creation-programs in this fiscal year will create only 7,000 man-years of employment for the whole nation, apart from the employment tax credit?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that the department has a wide variety of employment training programs. They include not only the ones which were announced this spring and summer but those which are already in existence, such as the LEAP program and a variety of training programs. What we indicated to this House was that the combination of tax credit programs and direct employment programs now and in the future are creating upwards of 50,000 jobs for Canadians.

Mr. Hawkes: Will the minister share with the House the figures he uses in planning? There is some relationship between the performance of gross national product and the creation of jobs. I would like the minister to tell us what figure he uses in manpower planning to translate performance in GNP to jobs. For example, if the GNP is 1 per cent greater than expected, will the minister tell us how many jobs will result in the Canadian economy? Will it be 75,000, 100,000 or 125,000? What figure does he use in planning?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked a question which would require a very detailed and technical answer. It is an answer which we gave on many occasions during the discussion of estimates and previous bills to engage in a mutual exchange upon. I would like to point out that the philosophy of this government is to target our employment programs toward those who have the greatest need. That is why, in the direct employment program, the largest percentage of money goes to those regions where the unemployment rate is the highest. That is why we think that we get the most use of our resources by helping those areas which have the toughest employment problems to face. That is the basis of the planning we use in our employment activities.

NATIONAL GALLERY

RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR—ACTION TO INCREASE FUNDING

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State and it is with regard to the resignation yesterday of Dr. Shih, the Director of the National Gallery of Canada, who resigned in protest against the failure of the Liberal government to restore a budget cut of $1 million which the previous Tory government had introduced. In light of the fact that the minister plans another budget cut of over $200,000 for next year, and also considering that the National Gallery has lost two directors in less than five years because of this issue, will the Acting Secretary of State please inform the House what action the government plans to take to prevent the collapse of one of our most important cultural institutions as a result of organizational confusion and a lack of funding?

Hon. John Roberts (Acting Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, the factual basis upon which the hon. member based his question is incorrect. The cut which was made by the previous Conservative government, as the hon. member correctly stated, was restored by this government a week ago.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, I am left in amazement that Dr. Shih has quit because of the budget cuts, yet the Acting Secretary of State has just now informed us that that particular budget cut has been rescinded. Perhaps my question should have been asked of the Secretary of State and we would have received a more up-to-date answer.

I would ask the hon. gentleman this. Since various governments have promised that the National Gallery will be relocated in new premises—a promise which was made 25 years ago, I believe—and because the National Gallery is over 100 years old and is known and respected throughout the world, will the present Liberal government make good its promise and inform the House when the National Gallery can expect to move into a decent and adequate facility?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I am not at all surprised that the hon. member is confused. The fact is that that matter is under consideration at the present time by the Minister of Public Works.

ENERGY

CANSO, N.S.—POSITION OF MINISTER ON LNG TERMINAL

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It relates to a question which was asked on Friday by the member for Joliette. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion ought to be asked a question about what he said to some reporters recently with respect to the LNG terminal at Canso, Nova Scotia. I thought perhaps the minister would like to put his answer on record at this point.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I have indeed been questioned by reporters who suggested that since the Canadian government had decided to extend the gas pipeline to the maritimes, Gros-Cacouna would necessarily be put aside as a possible site; Petro-Canada had indeed in the past, indicated its interest in the Gros-Cacouna project and its possible site. The reply I gave them was that this was sheer nonsense since this whole issue would be reviewed in a few months by the National Energy Board and that we would have to wait for the hearings to be held and for the board to make its decision.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

PUBLIC OPINION SURVEYS ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, unfortunately the Minister of Justice appears to have given us the slip, so I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Justice, who will be appearing before the constitution committee this afternoon, has previously indicated that he will withhold from Parliament and from the Canadian people the results of three publicly-funded public opinion surveys on the constitution conducted by the Canadian Unity Information Office. Will the Prime Minister of Canada, in the name of freedom of information, be prepared to make available to the Canadian people and to Parliament those three publicly-funded public opinion surveys?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe this is a question which has already been answered several times, but I will be happy to take notice of the question on behalf of the minister.

ENERGY SUPPLIES ALLOCATION BOARD

CATEGORIZATION OF FOOD AND FOOD PROCESSING

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I wish to go back to the minister of energy with regard to the government's rationing program and the proposal published in the November 8 edition of The Canada Gazette by the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. Every sector of the economy is identified by priority of use, either A, B or C, except food and food processing. Supplementary to the questions put by my colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar, one is hard put to understand why garbage collection is in category B if there is no food to collect. Is the review of food and food processing a review as to whether it should be in the top category A or in category B, or is there a consideration, even a remote consideration, for a lower category for food and food processing?

• (1500)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. As he knows, these regulations have been put as proposals. At the present time the Energy Supplies Allocation Board is reviewing the whole situation and has been in touch with the agriculture industry. It will hear further representations on the proposals before it comes to the government and to me as the minister with the final proposal.

In the meantime it should be remembered that these are merely proposals and that any area which has not been mentioned is indeed under discussion and review by the board. I expect that in the next few months I will have a report from this board to take to cabinet. In the meantime these discussions should continue.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, surely the minister must be as concerned as some of us on this side of the House that, after months and months, agriculture has not been dealt with despite the fact, I presume, that agriculturalists were lobbying that board just as much as any other sector of the economy. Can the minister explain the reason why agriculture and food and food processing is the only sector which requires review out of perhaps 30 or 40 different segments of our economy?

Mr. Lalonde: At my last meeting with the chairman of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, I indicated the representations which I had received from several members on this side of the House and from the Minister of Agriculture on this very subject. I hope the board will review this subject very carefully. The chairman indicated that indeed the board was having consultations with representatives of the agriculture industry and that, indeed, it was attaching a very high priority and importance to this matter.

The food industry is a huge industry. It covers foods from basic staple foods to lollypops. It is a question of determining whether or not all food items should not be considered on an equal basis or whether or not there is justification for different classifications for different food items. As I understand it, at the present time the board is examining and reviewing this subject. I hope that it will come up with recommendations with which this government and the agriculture industry will be very happy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KEEPER—WITHDRAWAL OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the letter which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, placed on our desks. My question of privilege relates to the fact that I feel very strongly that this matter should have been dealt with as a statement on motions. A statement on motions would allow the opposition to respond and ask questions, and I feel the matter should have been dealt with in this manner.

Obviously, there is a great need for this program across the country as indicated by the many resolutions which municipalities have taken the trouble to send to the federal government and to members of Parliament. This matter involves a major shift of financial burden from the federal level to the local community level, the level with the weakest tax base. I feel the matter is sufficiently important because it cuts a major subsidy to the construction industry and jobs in this country.

I feel the subject is one which demands a full debate in this House. It is a matter of information in the sense that we as parliamentarians must know what is going on. It is beginning to appear that what is occurring is simply a shell game in which the government takes money away with one hand by withdrawing the community services contribution program and gives out money in the other hand in the form of promises, such as the economic development fund for the west.

I feel I have a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. This government is playing games with dollars and with Parliament. This matter should have been dealt with by way of a statement on motions to give hon. members an opportunity to respond and ask questions to determine what is happening.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member is unaware of the fact that two representatives of his party had ample opportunity in committee when the estimates of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation were presented last week. I spent the better part of an hour explaining this particular program.

Mr. Rae: Did you announce the program last week?

Mr. Cosgrove: Also, hon. members of the official opposition party made inquiries. I believe the matter was fully canvassed and that both parties had an opportunity of which they took full advantage.

Although I have had little experience with the procedures of the House, I understand that it is a courtesy if a minister makes the material available to each member, as I have done here today. The material outlines the impact of the program in the various constituencies. It should come as no surprise to members opposite or to members over here that I have discussed this matter with many hon. members as it was being considered within the government, during the past two or three months, and received their suggestions.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my comments relate to certain remarks which were just made by the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As the minister is aware, I entered into correspondence with him on behalf of the municipality of Burnaby, the council of which unanimously urged that this worth-while program continue. The minister indicated to me very recently that in fact the government was considering very seriously the continuation of this program.

Had there been any indication that this program might be threatened in any way, I and other members of my party who support this worth-while program would certainly have been in attendance at the committee meeting last week. For the minister to suggest that somehow everything is in order because the committee met and had opportunity to consider this matter and other matters though we had no notice whatsoever that this particular program would be chopped by the government, is completely irresponsible. I suggest and I hope that the minister will take the opportunity to stand up in this House and make a statement explaining why this important program has been chopped and permit members of the opposition to fully question him on the matter.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to comment briefly on the implications of the minister's answers in the House today and his answer to the question of privilege raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper). In answer to a question by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), the minister said there was no reason why this decision was withheld from the House until this time, which implied that in fact no decision had been made until very recently and that it would not have been possible for the government to have released this information before the municipal elections held on Monday right across the province of Ontario.

Now the minister is telling us that in fact he had this information last week and would have released it had he been asked. The minister should clarify his remarks right away because he is indicating that he withheld information from the committee which he had in his possession at the time and that he withheld it until today for purely political reasons.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the House is obviously engaged in a debate. May I draw to your attention Standing Order 15(3) which clearly provides that the minister is not obliged to make a statement.

Madam Speaker: Indeed, now that I have heard a few speakers about this matter I am convinced that there is no ground for a question of privilege. The matter which has been raised certainly has great importance in the eyes of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), but he has started a debate and would like to force the minister to make a statement. I must remind him that the minister is not obliged to make one. He can if he so wishes; that is, if he chooses to use that means to inform the House and other people. But he is not obliged to make a statement. Therefore, I see no prima facie case of privilege here.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS IN CHAMBER

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my point of order has to do with whether the minister received your permission to distribute these documents in the House of Commons prior to the question period. If so, did you give him that permission?

● (1510)

Madam Speaker: In answer to the hon. member's inquiry I must say that I saw these envelopes as I entered the House and I wondered why they were there. I understand an inquiry was made of the clerk's staff by a member of the minister's staff who was directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is responsible for pages and in particular for the distribution of documents.

The request was not properly routed. I think it should have been referred to the clerk who usually examines documents before giving such permission. I am sorry about this breakdown in communications, but that is exactly what took place. Had the inquiry not been routed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, I am sure it would have been considered, perhaps in the same manner. However, I must tell the hon. member that we did not have a chance to consider it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FORRESTALL—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, some of us have been in this chamber for a number of years. I, too, am quite aware of what constitutes debate in this chamber. I am aware of the appropriate Standing Orders with respect to the rights and wishes of ministers and "demands" upon positions they take in this chamber or elsewhere, or whether or not they may choose this chamber in which to respond.

I am also aware, first of my right to be heard. Second, I am aware that when a minister of the Crown chooses to respond, he must accept responsibility for what he says.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member. I determined there was no question of privilege in the matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper). Is the hon. member speaking about the same question of privilege? It seems to me that he is. I thought he was rising on a different question of privilege.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, you have quite successfully interrupted my question of privilege. You know that it is an entirely different question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Forrestall: The argument I am using is the point I want to make. When a minister does rise in his place, he has the responsibility to be honest or to accept responsibility for what he says.

In recent weeks there have been a number of statements. In a recent newspaper article the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), as I understand it, repeated an assurance given to him by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to the effect that the chances of the Strait of Canso becoming the eastern terminus for Arctic LNG movements are ridiculous and absurd. Indeed, as I understand it the language was much more colourful than that.

My question of privilege arises out of a question directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion by my hon. friend from Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). In responding not only did the minister evade the matter, but now through the press he has misled the Canadian people. I cannot question him any further, because he has said that this whole conversation did not happen. On Friday last, as reported in Hansard, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did not go as far as that but he said "If you want to find out whether I told the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that—." In this connection, I refer to the words of my hon. friend the member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

My question is simply this: if I cannot question the veracity, how am I to make proper representations on behalf of my province and my constituency? How am I to respond to the veiled threats—not so thinly veiled—of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who, in fact, said that if we opened our mouths about this question and pursued it, we would stand a good chance of not even being considered for a liquefied natural gas terminal?

You may easily find that I do not have a substantive question of privilege in this regard, Madam Speaker. If you do, I am prepared to reserve my right tomorrow to move a motion. My question of privilege, again, is my right to question statements made in this House by ministers. It is my right to receive an honest and truthful answer. If it is politically evasive and I am not intelligent enough to get around it, that is my fault. In this case, I have been misled.

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, what I would like is some honesty in this House. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) misquoted me and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) reminded him of that. The hon. member for Joliette said that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources informed me that it would be completely ridiculous to choose Canso.

Mr. Forrestall: We cannot believe you any more, Pierre?

Mr. De Bané: This is what the hon. member for Joliette said. I am happy that you agree the hon. member from Joliette misled the House when he made such a statement. It is so easy to read from newspapers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. De Bané: The hon. member has just said that.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) on a point of order.

[English]

An hon. Member: You are rocking the boat.

Mr. Forrestall: I will rock the boat.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I shall simply say a couple of words, Madam Speaker. The minister refers to a ridiculous project. I think I said in French last Friday that it was completely ridiculous, according to the words I could recall from the newspapers. I just might raise this point again later.

[English]

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, what I said is in the paper but the hon. member for Joliette has misquoted me.

I never said that it would be utterly ridiculous to have the LNG terminal in Canso and I have the paper here to prove it. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources reminded the hon. member of that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. De Bané: I would like some honesty in this House. I never said that. The hon. member for Joliette has misquoted me and has misled the House. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources quite properly corrected him.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to speak on the same question of privilege or on another point of order.

Mr. La Salle: Very well, Madam Speaker. In that case, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) whether he is prepared to confirm that he told reporters that his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) had informed him that the theory of choosing Canso was sheer nonsense. Is the minister in a position to tell us today whether his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did say that, as reported by newsmen?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. No, I do not want to hear the hon. minister twice on the same question of privilege. I think the exchange which has just taken place enabled both sides to specify what was said.

• (1520)

[English]

The question raised by the hon. member is obviously not a question of privilege; it is debate; it is expressing dissatisfaction with an answer received in the House. The hon. member can pursue his questioning at question period or at another time. I know he has not been recognized today. I have a list here of those who were not been recognized on Friday when we last sat and the hon. member's name is not on that list. Perhaps he rose earlier than that. At any rate, I will be glad to recognize the hon. member if he rises soon enough in the question period and he will have his turn like anyone else.

I am sorry, but I cannot find a prima facie case of privilege.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

TABLING OF ORDINANCES

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table the following documents, in both official languages:

1. Order in council PC 1980-2915 issued pursuant to subsection 35(1) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as well as the proclamation declaring the coming into force of division II of part II of the said act;

2. Order in council PC 1980-2916 issued under section 36 of the Petroleum Administration Act, as well as the regulations prescribing maximum prices for crude oil;

3. Order in council PC 1980-2917 issued pursuant to section 52(2) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as well as the proclamation declaring that subsection 52(1) of the said act shall come into force on November 1, 1980;

4. Order in council PC 1980-2918 issued pursuant to subsection 52(1) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as well as the 1980 regulations prescribing prices for natural gas;

5. Order in council PC 1980-2919 issued pursuant to section 62 of the Petroleum Administration Act, as well as the amendment to part III regulations of the Petroleum Administration Act;

6. Order in council PC 1980-2920 issued pursuant to subsection 72(4) of the Petroleum Administration Act.

In order to give members of the House easy access to those documents, I would be willing, if it is agreeable to the House, to move that the orders be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. minister. Is it agreed that the documents in question be printed in Hansard?

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I trust it will have been observed by Your Honour that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has already been to the table with notices of motion to revoke two of these orders.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I also wish to advise that we are tabling a notice of motion seeking debate on the proclamation announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). We wish to have this debate and I presume this will follow in the normal course of business, because of the profound impact this action has on both producers and consumers of energy in this country, and also the severe conflict that has been brought about between the federal government and the province of Alberta.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,017, 1,430 and 1,581.

INDIAN CULTURE AND ART

Question No. 1,017—Mr. Greenaway:

1. In each year from the inception of the program to date, by province, what amount was designated for the purpose of (a) perpetuating (b) developing Indian culture and art?

2. In each province, what is the Indian per capita ratio total involved?

3. For each year, since the inception of the program to date, by province, what was the method of disposition of the artifacts created and what revenue was derived therefrom?

4. What is the total monetary value of any such artifacts on inventory at the present time and where is such inventory stored?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) and (b)—See list A for funding by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of Indian cultural and artistic activities. Although the department's Indian Arts and Crafts program does serve to perpetuate and develop Indian cultural art, the program's emphasis is, in fact, on the development of business opportunities through the sales of Indian arts and crafts. It would be difficult to attempt a calculation of the total amount of funds expended on this program, as Indian Affairs does not aggregate its various payments relating to Indian arts and crafts in its financial reports. Similarly, other government agencies supporting this program do not maintain separate records of these expenditures. Since the inception of the program in 1969, up to and including fiscal year 1974-75, the following expenditures are estimated to have been made by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development both at headquarters and in regions:

	Total ($000)
1969-70	910
1970-71	809
1971-72	1,425
1972-73	997
1973-74	1,384
1974-75	1,501

Commencing in 1975-76 fiscal year, management of the program was centralized to Ottawa and capital and operational funds disbursed in the following manner:

	Total ($000)	Headquarters Disbursements	Regional Disbursements
1975-76	2,495	974,000	737,200
1976-77	2,908	1,267,600	1,640,800
1977-78*	3,200	1,091,450	2,108,550
1978-79*	3,360	900,000	2,460,000
1979-80*	3,360	629,588	2,730,412
1980-81*	3,360	218,419	3,141,581

*Program under direct control of Indian management, through National Indian Arts and Crafts Corporation (NIACC)

Headquarters disbursement to NIACC

2. See list B for per capita breakdown of cultural grants. The actual number of Indian persons, and therefore the Indian per capita ratios involved in the Indian Arts and Crafts program, is presently unavailable. This information, however, is to be provided to the department by NIACC later this fiscal year under the terms of their contribution arrangement.

3. The method of disposition of the artifacts created under the Indian Arts and Crafts program was as follows:

(a) Direct from producer to consumer;

(b) Sale to retailers;

(c) Sale to wholesalers, both Indian and non-Indian

The department has records only of the revenue produced by the central marketing service which later became the Canadian Indian Marketing Service. Sales by the CIMS until its closing in 1978 were as follows: $2,275,000.

4. The only inventory of Indian art the Department of IAND holds is the departmental contemporary Canadian Indian Art Collection, which is presently stored on the 17th floor, Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, 10 Wellington Street, Hull, Quebec. The department is presently undertaking a complete inventory of the collection and will have a total monetary value of the collection by the end of the 1980-81 fiscal year.

GROS-CACOUNA—ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Question No. 1,430—Mr. Crosby:

1. Have any undertakings or commitments been made by the government or the National Harbours Board in respect of the development of Gros-Cacouna on the St. Lawrence River and, if so, what are they?

2. Have any proposals been made by or to the government or the National Harbours Board whereby Gross-Cacouna will become a terminal or transshipment point for petroleum, gas or bulk products?

3. What control does the government exercise, directly or through an agency, over the development of Gros-Cacouna and who owns the facilities now in place?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. A general cargo terminal is under construction at Gros-Cacouna. The terminal will provide year-round shipping facilities to accommodate local and regional industries. Dredging of berth approach and turning basin is completed, as well as the construction of the wharf and storage area. A 25,000 square foot shed is being built and should be completed by December, 1980. Transport Canada will assume the administration of the facilities upon acceptance of the certificate of completion. The facilities are owned by the Federal Government and the Department of Public Works has responsibility for the realization of this project.

2. Following a proposal by Misener Holdings Limited to develop a dry bulk deep water terminal at Gros-Cacouna, Transport Canada, Misener Holdings Limited, Havre Champlain Incorporated and the provincial government entered into an agreement and signed leases on January 31, 1980. Misener Holdings Limited and Havre Champlain Incorporated have proposed a three-phase development program for a dry bulk terminal. A conceptual plan must be completed and submitted to Transport Canada within 12 months of the execution of the agreement. For the purpose of the signature of a lease with the province of Quebec, Phase III has been divided and is now referred to as phase III and phase IV. Gros-Cacouna figures among ports of the maritime region and lower St. Lawrence River under consideration by Trans-Canada Pipeline and Petro-Canada for developing a liquefied national gas terminal. The project is still being studied by the companies.

3. The Government of Canada, under authority of the Canada Shipping Act and the Government Harbours and Piers Act has control over the development of Gros-Cacouna. Pursuant to order in council No. AC 644 of April 5, 1966, and No. 1852 of June 27, 1979, land and water lots have been transferred to Canada by Quebec and Quebec has authorized Canada to lease such land and water lots to Misener Holdings Limited and Havre Champlain Incorporated. Canada is also leasing to Misener Holdings Limited and Havre Champlain Incorporated, certain federal land and water lots for this development, and is committed to dredge the approach channel and turning basin to a depth of forty feet. The cost of the dredging, estimated at $6.9 million, will be recovered from the company over a period of years.

HIGH SCHOOL LIBRARIES—COMPLIMENTARY COPIES OF HANSARD

Question No. 1,581—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Since 1965, by year, how many high school libraries in Canada were supplied with complimentary copies of the daily Hansard?

2. Are copies of Hansard being supplied on a complimentary basis to high schools at present, to ensure that Canada's young people have ready access to the official record of parliamentary proceedings and, if not (a) on what date did the policy change and for what reason (b) what is the present policy?

3. (a) Are depository public libraries across Canada provided with the daily Hansard on a complimentary basis (b) can high school libraries be classified as depository libraries and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Not available. Copies of outdated subscription lists are not maintained.

2. No. (a) There was no policy change. In 1979, a review of the free subscription lists resulted in the deletion of all ineligible persons and institutions.

(b) The present policy is that only persons and institutions listed in appendix F, chapter 335, administrative policy manual issued by Treasury Board Canada, are eligible to apply for depository status.

3. (a) Yes, when requested.

(b) No. High school libraries do not appear on the list of persons and institutions eligible to apply for depository status, which is contained in appendix F, chapter 335, administrative policy manual, issued by Treasury Board Canada.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed from Friday, November 7, consideration of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 2 (Mr. Lambert).

Madam Speaker: The question is upon motion No. 1 of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Collenette: A point of order, Madam Speaker. I understood we would be deferring all the final votes on these—

Mr. Knowles: That is in the rule book.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Madam Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Madam Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The question is on motion No. 2 of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Madam Speaker: All those opposed, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

I have three other motions to put to the House.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments

Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by adding immediately after line 21 at page 3 the following:

" 'cheque' means a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, savings bank, trust company, credit union, payable on demand;"

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 39 at page 13 and lines 1 and 2 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"varied as this act provides"

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 26 to 43 at page 18 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Where the Inspector has received an objection pursuant to subsection (2),

(a) the Inspector shall conduct a public enquiry into the objection as it relates to the application;

(b) upon completion of the enquiry, he shall report his findings thereon to the minister; and

(c) the minister shall upon receiving the report make such report available to the public within thirty days."

He said: Madam Speaker, I was a little slow with my response but I should like to address some remarks to the amendment standing in my name in motion No. 3, and perhaps broaden the situation covered by this amendment.

First of all, I should like to compare what the government has proposed as a way of dealing with this particular dilemma which arises, basically, from the definition of a cheque. A cheque is basically an instrument drawn on a bank. The government in its amendments has broadened this definition and attempted to rectify the very limited definition already provided for a cheque. The major objection we put forward in committee is that the definition does not extend to "credit unions and other financial institutions" which are now providing financial services to consumers in Canada. We are concerned that the definition be broadened to allow those other financial institutions, including credit unions, to be involved in the process of issuing and handling cheques. Within the present legislation, the government has suggested it can remedy this problem. It does recognize there is a problem. Their suggestion is simply to amend the Bills of Exchange Act. In the proposed legislation, they have included a section 92, and I quote:

● (1530)

Part III of the Bills of Exchange Act is amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 165 thereof, the following section.

"164.1 In this part, 'bank' includes every member of the Canadian Payments Association established under the Canadian Payments Association Act and every credit union, as defined in that act, that is a member of a central, as defined in that Act and that is a member of the Canadian Payments Association."

Our proposal would broaden the definition of a cheque. We have put forward the suggestion that it means a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, savings bank, trust company, credit union, payable on demand. It is our feeling this would be a more comprehensive definition. We would like this definition mentioned in the Bank Act and have it apply to trust companies and credit unions.

In general terms the proposed Bank Act, as it is now constituted, has as one of its major objectives to improve competition. Items were placed within this legislation whereby the government suggested their main objective was to increase competition within the banks. We certainly recognize that the big five, in terms of the banks, control the financial lifeblood of this country.

Out of that recognition came certain proposals from the government side—that competition with the chartered banks in Canada was indeed important and that they would move in the legislation to deal with the problem of tremendous concentration, the problem of interlocking directorates among some of the most powerful companies in this country which literally control our financial development and economy.

We profoundly disagree with what has been done in terms of opening up the competition. Instead of undertaking to provide competition from our own native, home grown financial institutions, they have opted to allow foreign banks to come in and provide competition for Canadian banks. We feel this is very wrong.

We resisted this legislation at both the second reading and committee stages. We made a very determined effort to halt it. It was one of our main concerns that competition should come from Canadian financial institutions. The bill did open up the incorporation procedure to allow Canadian organizations to incorporate more readily. On the other side of the coin, we felt it was premature to allow the foreign banks to come in, become chartered banks in this country and carry on business to compete with Canadian organizations.

What we would like to see in the long haul is more emphasis on, and more capability for, competition among Canadian institutions which are accountable to Canadian shareholders and which therefore have the interests of this country at heart. That is why we come down to this very menial definition that a cheque means a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, savings banks, trust company or credit union. If that were placed in the legislation, it would be a sign from the government that we are very serious about these organizations being allowed to compete.

I wish to outline several approaches that I feel would assist native Canadian financial institutions to compete more effectively with the banks and, in that process, force banks and other financial institutions to provide more effective service at cheaper cost. One of those might involve the credit union movement.

There is some concern about government cheques. On a government cheque it is stated that the cheque is negotiable at no charge at any chartered bank in Canada. This is a very small matter, but it amounts to a tremendous amount of free advertising. We would like to see those words removed. A government cheque should be negotiable free of charge at any financial institution or credit union in Canada. The situation will, of course, change if the Canadian payments association goes through, but at the present time the shareholders of credit unions must pay to cash government cheques. Therefore, we would prefer to have the free advertising item removed. I hope that will come about.

There are other problems. We are attempting to make Canadian institutions more competitive. It concerns me that there is now a procedure for a registered retirement income fund which is almost the exclusive preserve of the insurance companies. We would like to see other Canadian financial institutions have a greater capability of handling these items. I am sure there was a clear intent on the part of the government to create an opportunity allowing Canadians who had purchased registered retirement savings programs after 1978 to convert them into a Registered Retirement Income Fund.

At present, a person who has entered one of these programs winds up purchasing a fund which at age 70 allows only a very small payment out of that fund. It increases toward age 90. Unfortunately, credit unions, other financial institutions and trust companies are not given equal opportunity with the life insurance companies. This should be changed so that people have an opportunity to purchase more realistic programs. The credit unions and other Canadian financial institutions would be stronger if they were allowed to provide greater service and thereby compete more fully with the banks. Again we are back to the business of a cheque. A new definition of "cheque" would amount to a statement that the government in principle is in favour of these institutions being strengthened and competing effectively with the banks.

The small business development bond is another example of bias. I do not know whether it is deliberate or not. The government is biased against credit unions and other financial institutions in favour of the banks. From examination of the Small Business Development Bond, it appears the banks do not have to pay income tax on income earned. They provide the funds at a reduced interest rate to small businessmen. That is very desirable. They do not pay tax on it. Not only is small business benefiting but also the banking community. We are giving up our taxation capability in order to benefit the chartered banks. Unfortunately the credit union movement does not benefit in the same manner. In the first $500,000 given out, the banks are offered a better deal because of government regulation and legislation which unfortunately attracts customers inside the doors of chartered banks, and for the balance of any funds required they stay with the banks.

There must be an opportunity for credit unions and other financial institutions to compete in that sphere. Again the definition of "cheque" applies here. We want a statement from the government that this very important instrument in the whole financial procedure will recognize the equality between banks and the other very important financial institutions in the country which the government asked to compete with the banks. Yet, the government has provided no mechanism.

I have mentioned the Registered Retirement Income Fund mechanism in which there is discrimination. I have mentioned the Small Business Development Bond. The government says it wants the other institutions to participate, but it builds a bias in favour of the banks. The simple writing on the bottom of government cheques indicating that they are negotiable without charge at chartered banks is free advertising. Naturally it draws people to the banks. The bias is built into the system.

With the indulgence of Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to another couple of examples. Hopefully the government will recognize this bias and give us some assurance when responding. If it is intended to create more opportunities in this legislation for other financial institutions to compete with chartered banks, hopefully the government will be prepared to give us a sign so that we in turn can give them a sign.

I should like to refer to the Financial Administration Act and the prohibitions built into it. These are fairly important. For example, we are concerned that the Government of Canada prohibits itself under the Financial Administration Act from placing deposits with credit unions and other financial institutions. If those associations and organizations provide services to people who deal with the government, the government should be required to remove that very prohibitive section and to place deposits with those organizations. This would allow those organizations to work and to benefit from the same kind of return as the banks now obtain from funds deposited by the Canadian government.

Basically I am suggesting we should amend this legislation and put clear signals in it indicating that we want equality with respect to the credit unions, banks and other financial institutions so that we are not specifically biasing competition in favour of foreign banks. It is my feeling that this item, just a simple definition of "cheque", would help make clearer the statement within the legislation. I see that my time has run its course.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, not in any way for the reasons outlined by the proposal of this amendment, I wish to argue that a definition of the word "cheque" should be included at this point in the Bank Act.

I used the word "cheque" in my amendment in the definition of a bank. It seems to me that it follows logically the amendment of the hon. member which we are discussing now. The definition of the word "cheque" follows logically and in sequence within this bill. I find extraordinary the mental contortions of the draftsmen who have said that they will put in the definition of a bank. They have broadened the definition of a bank contained in the Bills of Exchange Act by saying that a bank within the meaning of the Canadian Payments Association Act will include a credit union. I invite the minister, who is not a lawyer, to say that part of good law and well-prepared law is that it shall appear clearly. If a person, other than a person who has been exhaustively briefed, were asked by a client for the legal definition of the word "cheque",

I defy the minister to tell me that that person could turn to the Bills of Exchange Act to find a definition of it.

We are dealing with the Bank Act and its very exhaustive definitions clause, which is where I tried to put in the word "bank" and the business of banking. What does agricultural equipment mean? What about agricultural implements, beneficial interest, beneficial ownership, a bill of lading, a branch, a central co-operative credit society, a corporation, a court, crops, farms? Everything in connection with the Bank Act has a legal definition, except the business of banking which is its heart and core.

In my definition of a bank, I used the word "cheque". As the minister can readily understand, my definition, on which we will vote in due course, indicates that "bank" means any financial institution engaged in the business of lending money and accepting deposit liabilities transferable by cheque or other instrument. Any trained lawyer will say that is fine, but first of all he would like to know what are deposit liabilities and what is a cheque. The hon. member who spoke before me satisfied that lacuna by his definition of "cheque" in the definitions clause within the Bank Act. For that reason I support it, not for some of the reasons he suggested, but in the logical development of the Bank Act.

In committee I agreed with him that we should have a definition. I supported this idea in committee. But I find it strange that we must go to the Bills of Exchange Act in order to find some reference to what is a bank. It includes every member of the Canadian Payments Association established under the Canadian Payments Association act. What a horse's neck way of defining a bank! Anyone belonging to the Canadian Payments Association is a bank. It is not so.

That is the most convoluted thinking possible, and I will say without any equivocation that it is firmly fixed in my mind that as a result of the discussions and arguments I have had both in committee and in private with regard to this question of a definition of a bank within the Bank Act every effort has been used by government draftsmen to try to get around the logic and the necessity of responding to my arguments.

The actions of the government with regard to this just do not hold water. The government has some idea that somewhere, somehow, some court may some day establish a definition for a bank or what should be the business of banking. We get a half-hearted definition of a bank or a partial definition of a bank in clause 92, which appears at page 447 of Bill C-6, so a credit union is used or brought in to answer the very logical problem put forward by the proposer of this amendment. But it would have been much simpler to have accepted the amendment in its place in the definitions clause without having to go to this convoluted language of clause 92 when no one will really go and look to find whether any definition exists for what is a cheque and whether a cheque is an order for payment drawn on a credit union.

Now that the credit unions can appear within the Canadian payments association, certainly the document which is drawn by a credit union member and which is a cheque, since it transfers funds from the account of the depositor to a third party, must be defined as a cheque, and therefore the logic in the requirement is quite right. But why do it this way? It is merely, I think, because to do it in the way which would be the shortest and the most logical would be to admit to the logic I have been putting forward to the government for these many long months with regard to the definition of a bank and the business of banking.

I am going to support this amendment. Of course, it follows through, because if the amendments which are the subject of my motions Nos. 1 and 2 hopefully carry, then No. 3 must carry. They are complementary, and they would make for a much more intelligent bill than the one before us at the present time. For that reason I wish to support the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I would like to go over some of the arguments that I have used before the standing committee to explain why the government is against the proposal made by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) to include the definition of "cheque" in the list of definitions found in the first part of this bill to revise the Bank Act. First, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River used some arguments which, I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), are not really relevant to the definition or to the usefulness of including such a definition in that part of the legislation.

The hon. member for Edmonton West suggested that for the sake of logic, we should try to establish a sort of continuity at the beginning of the bill between the definitions of bank, banking activity and cheques. I should like to tell him that I am inclined to agree with him, but that in addition to logic, there is also a matter of method or rather of methodology involved here. But let us consider first the logic. The hon. member will doubtless recognize that the definition itself and the fact that it appears at the beginning of the bill bear witness to the fact that it belongs to the generality, that it is a generic term. One moves from the general to the particular, and the definition of cheque, as has been mentioned, appears in the Bills of Exchange Act, a legislation of wide application which therefore covers to a certain extent the definition in the Bank Act, and is limited by the Bank Act itself. In other words, as far as logic is concerned, the generality of the Bills of Exchange Act provides a general definition for the term "cheque" which applies in this case to the Bank Act, which governs certain types of institutions defined in the act.

It was said there would be a problem, from a methodological point of view, in including strict definitions of bank, banking activity, and consequently, cheque. We got around the methodological difficulty—and the hon. member for Edmonton West or the hon. member for Comox Powell might say it is a distortion, but it is a methodological detour—by borrowing from a text of general application such as the Bills of Exchange Act, where there is a definition of "cheque" and the meaning of the term "bank" is extended to members of the Canadian payments association, and we know the local credit unions, such as the caisses populaires will be covered by this amendment to section 92 of the Bills of Exchange Act.

So to get around the problem regarding powers, another method or another act is used. The caisses populaires and credit unions, being members of the Canadian payments association will meet the requirements that will enable them to have a certain type of activity or wider activities, and the term "cheque" as it appears in the Bills of Exchange Act will apply to those institutions since they belong to the Canadian payments association, which is what the amendment is seeking.

Mr. Lambert: But would the minister not agree that by using section 164.1 of the Bills of Exchange Act we are insisting on the fact that caisses populaires and credit unions are now banks? I say this because this clause states that "bank" includes the members of the Canadian payments association as well as the local co-operative credit unions. When I read that the word "bank" includes the members of the Canadian payments association, I conclude that this is a definition.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I believe that this only seems to be a problem because, as the hon. member is well aware, the Bank Act has a much more restrictive definition which includes only the institutions to which the act expressly applies, while from a methodological standpoint, to cover the opening made to caisses populaires and credit unions by the Canadian payments association, another definition is used for a very specific reason in another act.

I would like to refer to a few of the arguments made by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River which did not concern directly the matter of definition. For instance, I do not really see how a definition of the word "cheque", such as requested by the hon. member, would bring about more competition among chartered banks. I believe that, basically, this new legislation promotes competition because it makes it easier for financial institutions to become banks under the terms of the act. Second, it allows many financial institutions for instance, foreign financial institutions, to apply to become banks through letters patent. Third, this legislation creates the Canadian payments association which will enable the caisses populaires and credit unions to get fully involved in the types of activities which were previously restricted to the banks under the Canadian banking legislation or in activities in which chartered banks were more generally involved. I believe that it is basically these three elements which will promote more competition among banking institutions and within banking activities. And even though the definition proposed by the hon. member does not seem at first glance to create any problem within the legislation, it unfortunately does so.

For instance, the caisses populaires come under provincial jurisdiction. Even though they may, if they so request, become members of the Canadian payments association, they do not come directly under the federal legislation as financial institutions, and this is the type of problem that we want to avoid by implementing a different series of definitions for methodological purposes, and the hon. member will certainly understand that this takes nothing away from the competitiveness and the qualities of caisses populaires and credit unions.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) is suggesting, I think, by moving this amendment is quite simple. He is attempting to define a term which is used in the act without definition at present. I can remember in the committee when we were discussing this matter just prior to taking a vote, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) asking, "Why should we define a term in the Bank Act when that term is not in fact used in the act?" He thought he had come up with the best objection possible to adopting what I would have thought was a relatively simple and uncontroversial definition of "cheque". It was pointed out to him that the word "cheque" is, in fact, used in the Bank Act. It appears, for example, at pages 310 and 311 of Bill C-6, in clause 303, paragraphs (a) and (b). That is just one example and there are others. So what we find is the use of the word "cheque" in the act without a definition, which I would have thought was not something government draftsmen would greatly desire. The definition put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River, is quite straightforward. It simply says that "cheque" means a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, a savings bank, a trust company or a credit union, payable on demand. The reason for putting that in is partly practical and partly symbolic. The practical implications are obvious when we consider that many government cheques and so on should not, in our view, specify that they are simply cashable at a chartered bank or at any of a number of financial institutions of which chartered banks are only one. Credit unions and caisses populaires are others. In our view it makes a great deal of sense, both practical and symbolic, to admit that we have a plural financial system, that we have a Bank Act which does not discriminate against trust companies and credit unions with respect to the use of the word "cheque" and the concept of a cheque and which encourages these financial institutions in their growth. As my hon. friend from Comox-Powell River has pointed out, we are anxious to see the credit unions and caisses populaires treated fairly and not in a discriminatory fashion by the government. So I cannot for the life of me see why we do not accept the definition.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too support the amendment before us. I think it is important for some of the reasons which have been outlined by the previous speakers and also because it would make it possible for the credit unions in this country to operate more competitively. The objective of this bill when it was introduced in the House was to increase competition in the banking field. The apparent thrust of that move toward more competition seems to have been aimed at introducing foreign banks to the Canadian climate rather than increased use of the banking institutions and near banking institutions we have here. There is a great need for changes to the act so as to enable this kind of competition to be brought about. How serious is the government about introducing more competition? We look at the bill as it has come out of committee and we find there is no definition of the word "cheque" and no proper recognition of the fact that credit unions can provide a great many of the services which banks provide. Is the government really prepared to consider the institutions which have been developed in this country, namely, the credit unions and the caisses populaires? Are their needs to be considered or is it the intention only to consider the needs of the foreign banks? What changes are the government proposing to make to the existing legislation? What changes are they talking about which would bring about equality in the competition?

The competitive disadvantages for credit unions are fairly well known, but I would like to list some of them. For instance, there are the legislative restrictions under the Financial Administration Act which prevent the deposit of federal government funds in financial institutions other than chartered banks. The Canadian Wheat Board Act permits elevator and grain companies, authorized by the board, to borrow from chartered banks but not from credit unions. The Livestock and Livestock Products Act requires livestock commission agents to keep a shippers trust account in a chartered bank but not in a credit union or caisse populaire. The Bills of Exchange Act defines a cheque as a bill of exchange drawn on a bank. This is the kind of thing we are talking about with respect to the Bank Act. We want to make certain that such cheques can be drawn on credit unions and trust companies as well.

There is also the Trust Companies Act, which I understand will be amended in the next six months or so. At the same time, the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, which is really complementary legislation, should also be opened up to allow for the broadening of the definition of the powers of a credit union. We believe one of the initial steps necessary to bring that about is to broaden the definition of "cheque" and the institutions which may handle such instruments under the new definition.

As we all know, credit unions have been clearing government cheques and orders at no cost. In some provinces this amounts to a fair sum of money. For instance, in my province of Saskatchewan credit unions provide 40 per cent of the clearings. In Quebec the caisses populaires cleared approximately 13 million items worth more than $2 billion in 1977. Yet credit unions and caisses populaires received no compensation for such work. It is true that the banks do not charge for clearing government orders but, at least, they have access to government deposits. This is something that all of the acts I have mentioned have in common—to specifically prevent the deposit of government funds in credit unions. So the banks, at least, have the use of approximately $6.7 billion in deposits, which provide a considerable source of compensation in lieu of the services rendered. These are some of the reasons why we think we should begin by amending the Bank Act, to define a cheque and to include the credit unions and trust companies. We think it is an important beginning.

We also believe that further clean-up work should accompany this kind of change. We see it as an important beginning to reintroduce true competition in the made-in-Canada banking business. The credit unions and caisses populaires grew up in this country and we think that if we are to broaden and encourage competition in the banking business this is the one place we should start. We should broaden the definitions in the Bank Act so as to allow credit unions and caisses populaires to operate on the same basis as banks when it comes to clearing cheques.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will make a few comments on this particular definition. First of all, we on this side of the House have very little dispute with the hon. members' comments with respect to the credit unions and caisses populaires and their functions in the future financial system. The unfortunate thing is that much of what they have said is totally irrelevant to what we are talking about here, because this particular definition must be considered within the context of the act to which it relates. The act to which it relates is the Bank Act.

Unless hon. members opposite are willing to say that caisses populaires, credit unions, trust companies and savings banks, other than in the form of the Quebec Savings Banks, are in fact banks and therefore must be regulated under this act, then I would say that such a definition should in no way refer to institutions which are not related to the act to which the definition applies. The Bank Act relates only to banks and these other institutions are not a part of that and are not regulated by it.

The hon. member opposite said that a cheque should be defined and that credit unions, caisses populaires and trust companies should be allowed to issue cheques or have cheques drawn against their deposit liabilities. If that is the case then the proper place to do that is in a much more general statute which deals with the nature of bills of exchange. Lo and behold, on page 447 of the legislation before us this is precisely what the government proposes to do. It defines a cheque as a bill of exchange and includes, within that definition, bills of exchange drawn on and payable on demand from institutions other than banks. It does that in a direct way by simply saying for the purposes of the Bills of Exchange Act and for the purposes of this part of the Bills of Exchange Act a bank includes those institutions. That certainly does not mean that for the purposes of the Bank Act a bank includes those institutions. As a result, it is totally ludicrous to put a definition into the Bank Act which includes a reference to those very institutions that are not included as banks.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has indicated that this definition is consistent with his definition of a bank. I would suggest that it is not perfectly consistent with that definition because in that definition of a bank it says that a bank is an institution that draws or issues cheques or accepts cheques against their deposit liabilities. But below that particular portion his definition is that qualification that a bank does not include credit unions, caisses populaires, trust companies and companies covered by the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. If they are not included, then why are we saying in the definition of a cheque, which comes in earlier, that in fact they are included? So the two are totally inconsistent.

I suggest that the government's approach of using the broader statute, which is the Bills of Exchange Act, as the vehicle for defining what a cheque is, so that institutions like credit unions, caisses populaires, trust companies and others can participate in this financial system using vehicles such as cheques, is the appropriate way of going about this. It certainly makes no sense to put a definition in the Bank Act which refers to institutions which are not banks and are not covered by the Bank Act. This being said, I would suggest that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this subject. I fear that the consequence of the amendment if accepted would be something the mover of the motion does not want. If this is brought in under the Bank Act, then trust companies which are presently not charging for their cheques and giving a service that the public appreciates, would start charging for every cheque that they issue, as the banks are doing today. That is what I fear. Today the trust companies are doing very well. They are providing a very excellent service, as are the credit unions. I do not think we want to get them tied into the same organization as the banks, where they would become nothing more than banks, the result being no competition for the benefit of the working people. Mr. Speaker, I really cannot see the merit in the amendment, as proposed.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friends have mentioned, this amendment deals not only with practicalities, but with symbols. It acknowledges a principle in which I and hundreds of thousands of people in this country have believed for a long time. It is not just a case of people working for money, but of money working for people. I would like to inform the hon. member opposite who has just spoken that 60 per cent of all cheque clearing in the province of Saskatchewan is done through the credit union movement and that the other 40 per cent is divided among trust companies, chartered banks, etc.

Dealing with credit unions comes from a tradition of long, bitter experience with banks, trust companies and finance companies. In fact, there should be a law against any finance company using the word "beneficial" because it is a total contradiction when one looks at the way in which they operate. The credit unions of Saskatchewan were the first, ahead of the chartered banks, trust companies or other financial institutions, to institute computer automatic bank tellers. Since the credit unions clear 60 per cent of all the cheques, surely the definition of cheques as they are handled and printed by credit unions, should be included in the Bank Act.

I have here my cheque book. The contents are called cheques and they are printed by the Sherwood Credit Union Limited, Regina, Saskatchewan. I do not deal with banks. It seems to me that whether it is a case of my clearing a cheque or a case of half the population of Saskatchewan clearing its cheques through credit unions, they should damn well be recognized as such in the Bank Act. The story of why I now deal only with credit unions began when I was a young married man with a job and three kids, owing bills all over town and trying to raise my first loan. The banks and finance companies would not lend me a nickel unless I owned some property such as a house or a farm. They wanted to know my assets when all I had was my salary and my good name. A credit union came through and helped me out within a matter of 20 hours, and I have never been to a bank since, nor do I have any intention of ever going to a bank.

What we are talking about is money working for the people, not just people working for money. I hope the government will reconsider and accept this amendment because it will do no horrendous damage to its idea of what should be banking legislation for Canada. However, it will finally give full and proper recognition, which is long overdue, to the day-to-day practice of credit unions and what is occurring in Saskatchewan and Quebec, the provinces where most credit unions and caisses populaires are found.

In fact, I hope credit unions become so abundant that some of the chartered banks and other private financial institutions gradually disappear. What they do, and the way in which it is done, are irrelevant to the needs of people when it comes to money working for people. The introduction of automatic bank tellers means that the several thousands employees of the federal government in Saskatchewan can go down to their credit union lobby and deposit a government cheque after normal banking hours. Credit unions have made use of the latest technology and it is working marvellously well.

I do not see any reason why, when there are areas such as Saskatchewan and Quebec in which the overwhelming majority of financial transactions by ordinary people occur with credit unions and caisses populaires, there should be no recognition given to credit unions in the Bank Act. What is the government worried about? If it wishes to amend some other legislation or include the matter in some other legislation, then that is fine.

Credit unions are people's banks. We call them credit unions because we think it is a much better term. Credit unions evolved because hundreds of thousands of Canadians across this country had bitter experiences with banks in the strictest sense of the word. They were formed by the people. Credit unions did not come out of Bay Street in Toronto or James Street in Montreal; they came out of the people.

Credit unions print their own cheques. They are cheques in fact, if not in law, so why do we not provide some kind of recognition by putting in place a symbol of what is a fact in this country? People from all walks of life, small businessmen, farmers, workers, old age pensioners and so on, bank at credit unions. I invite hon. members, particularly those on the government side who have dealings with the Bank Act, to visit the approximately ten branches of credit unions which thrive in the little city of Regina. They will see what credit unions mean to the people of that city and how these institutions operate.

The amendment proposed by my colleague, does nothing more than to bring up to date what is practice and tradition for several millions of Canadians from coast to coast. It is a practice which is growing in every province and region of this country. I do not understand the reluctance of the government to recognize this reality, face up to it and include my colleague's amendment in the Bank Act. Surely, the experience of the credit union movement, which I am sure has been brought to the attention of many hon. members opposite, with regard to the clearing of cheques by central banks, the kicks in the teeth it received from the banking association over the years and the attempts of the banks to discriminate, inhibit or make more awkward the operations of credit unions and caisses populaires to deal fully and completely with every aspect of a member's financial dealings, must be recognized in an updated Bank Act.

I do not understand the obfuscation put up by the hon. gentleman across the way a few moments ago. I do not understand why he has not recognized that the Bank Act, the primary financial legislation of this country as it pertains to financial institutions, should cover the point made by my hon. friend who moved the amendment. When I use the word "symbolic", I do not mean it lightly. It is a very important and serious symbol to many people in this country. Even if in most instances it is a minor detail and means little or nothing in day to day practice, the fact that it is there means a great deal to a lot of people.

● (1630)

I hope the government will reconsider and that the minister and his colleagues will say, "What the heck, there is no harm in having this." There is no harm to whoever it is they are trying to help. There is a benefit to the credit union and the caisses populaires employees of this country contained in this amendment. We do not move the amendment lightly nor without a great deal of consultation with our friends in the credit unions and the caisse populaire movement. We would not, and we do not, move it just on our own. This is not just socialist dogma, Mr. Speaker. It comes from people across party lines—in my province anyway—who say they want this sort of thing in the Bank Act. I hope the minister will reconsider and say it is all right, that he does not think it does harm to the government's bill. They may still wish to disagree but it may not mean that much to the credit unions and caisses populaires in Canada. He might be right in that; I do not know, but surely we could agree it will not do any damage to the legislation. Its passage may or may not be helpful to the credit union movement in this country.

On those grounds alone, Mr. Speaker, if for none of the other reasons that I have illustrated, I hope the government will accept this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

All those in favour, please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion No. 3 negatived on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 4 of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is quite simple. We take a different view from that of the government with respect to the process of incorporation. One of the things this act does is to allow a process of incorporation to take place without requiring parliament itself to authorize a particular charter. I say to the minister that we would be prepared to withdraw this motion if he would be prepared to reconsider his position on motion No. 6. In other words, we made some progress in committee when we accepted the amendment from the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) dealing with the question of the right of the Inspector General of Banks to hold an inquiry concerning the incorporation process.

The minister will recall that the hon. member for Edmonton West was concerned, and we supported him, that if we are going to move from a process of parliamentary charter to a process whereby incorporation of a chartered bank would become very much like the incorporation of any other public company, there should be at least some kind of hearing process. I have said to the minister on a number of occasions that if this legislation is passed as is, it will be easier to establish a chartered bank in Canada than to obtain a liquor permit in the province of Ontario.

The process by which one incorporates under the amendments put forward by the government does not require that the inspector general hold a hearing when he receives an objection, but it gives the bureaucracy the right to decide whether the objections are of any importance and gives the inspector general the sole right, without having to hold a hearing, to determine whether the bona fides of those wishing to obtain a charter have been established.

In light of this, we would prefer a process whereby Parliament has a greater degree of control over the chartering of banks. We would prefer a continuation of the system whereby Parliament itself charters banks and each individual bank is subject to the strict scrutiny of Parliament and a parliamentary committee.

If this is not acceptable to the government, we are prepared to withdraw that motion and put forward the other motion. That is, if the government is not prepared to accept that principle, then at least require the inspector general—not to hold a hearing with regard to objections that have been made on the chartering of a bank—but to hold a public inquiry. Motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) specifies that the inquiry shall be held in public, that upon completion of the inquiry the inspector general shall report his findings to the minister and that the minister shall make such report available to the public within 30 days.

In granting a charter to those who are determined to create a bank, one is, in fact, granting an extensive licence—a licence which in my view has far more impact on the public than a liquor license permit or a television station licence or any of a number of other activities. Yet the government tells us that there is no requirement to hold a public hearing at which objections can be heard in the case of chartering our banks.

This is not astonishing, because I know the faith the Liberal party has in the bureaucracy, and I know the lack of faith the Liberal party has in the concept of due process yet it is surprising to me, having regard to the advances in administrative law we have seen over the last 15 years in Canada, during which the courts have said, for example, that there is a duty of fairness, a duty to hold a hearing by all sorts of institutions when previously there was no such requirement. For example, it is no longer possible for a police officer to be deprived of his job without the right to a hearing; hospital boards, liquor licence tribunals, rent review tribunals, workmen's compensation boards, expropriation boards or any administrative institution established under the jurisdiction of the provinces or the federal government are subject to a requirement to be fair. There is a requirement to protect the public interest. There is a requirement to allow objections to be made. Authorities planning to build a public highway in the province of Ontario go before the municipal board. Every city that is involved in putting forward an official plan knows that people can make objections to it.

Mr. Speaker, I have more right with respect to the process of objections and the requirement of a public hearing to stop my neighbour from parking his car on his lawn than I have as a citizen of this country or a financial critic of this party, to question the bona fides of those who propose to establish a chartered bank. Yet the implications of the one decision are much more vast and carry a far greater impact on the public than the question whether my neighbour can park on his lawn. It is amazing that the government can carry on in this way, just by a process of convincing themselves that there is no need to worry and that the bureaucracy can take care of everything. On other occasions the parliamentary secretary has said, "We do not want any yahoo coming in and objecting so that we will have to hold an inquiry." That is the typical Liberal attitude to objections from the public—that the public is necessarily illiterate; that the objections necessarily come from people who do not know what they are talking about and that the Government of Canada and the Liberal Party of Canada do not need to hear from those who object.

The Liberal party's attitude reminds me of the church before Vatican II. That is about the stage of their development. There is clearly a need for a Vatican II on that side of the House. There is clearly a need to let some light in, to let a little air in by having a public inquiry and not just, as the hon. member for Edmonton West has said, if the inspector general decides it might be worth while to give responsible citizens of Canada the chance to find out who the people are who want to establish a chartered bank, what their bona fides are, in which areas they plan to specialize, where they expect to gather their business and where they intend to invest in the future of Canada.

These are legitimate questions for Canadians to ask, Mr. Speaker. If we are not allowed to ask them in Parliament any more—and apparently such will be the case as a result of this act—then I think we should at least require the inspector general to hold a hearing and see that justice is done when a licence is granted to people to conduct a banking business, just as justice is required when licence is given to carry on all sorts of activities which give a substantial and substantive right to groups of individuals to engage in business in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1640)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this question of the inquiry started out as a result of representations I had made. My views were coloured, first of all, by recognizing early on that there should be an alternative procedure to the road to Calvary which incorporators of banks were made to travel under the previous procedure of a private bill. I defy anyone to devise such a tortuous, expensive and frankly unnecessary system as the incorporation by private bill. All it took was two or three members, who were ideologically opposed to banks, to totally hamstring a legitimate operation and over the years, I saw that happen. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has never been aware of the thousands upon thousands of unnecessary expenses which were piled upon incorporators of banks in the past due to frivolous, and I would say, purely ideologically and devilishy inspired interference in the normal parliamentary process.

It was scandalous the way the parliamentary process was abused on certain occasions. Therefore, that method had to be eliminated. Now comes this proposal that a bank may be incorporated, with all the other requirements, merely by letters patent. I insist also there should be some form of parliamentary control, if necessary. I have had experience of one or two incorporations, but if more light had been cast upon them in the early stages, as there was subsequently through probing questioning by members of the finance committee, the incorporations would have proceeded much more smoothly and regularly.

The amendment which appears as No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood imposes a statutory obligation upon the Inspector General in the event of any objection—he does not say any valid objection. The world's greatest kook, or the most irresponsible, could object—and we know we have them. Anyone acting on a whim or for competitive purposes who wished to stall the application would merely have to file an objection with the inspector general who would then be bound to put the process of a public inquiry under way.

On the other hand, there could be valid objections. If members of the party of the sponsor of this amendment feel that any representations they might make, for example, against the incorporation of any particular bank, were not to be treated as valid or serious, and could be passed over casually by the Inspector General of Banks, then they place themselves perhaps in the right place at the right status. However, if they are going to be serious—and I am not necessarily saying they are not—and have a valid objection, on the basis of information, on the grounds that certain incorporators of a proposed bank were not persons of the quality required, or that there was some doubt about the source of funds, or for any number of valid reasons, they would have to come up with the proof. Mind you, they would have to realize that in making such allegation they would have to put their money where their mouth is. But that happens to anyone.

Let us look at the procedure to be followed by the inspector general and the minister under those circumstances. It must be remembered that under the letters patent procedure the application is filed and there are certain statutory requirements as to capital, the number of persons, the quality of those persons, and so on. The inspector general, of course, has sources by which he can make investigations about the character and backgrounds of the persons concerned. Let us assume that the applicants meet all those requirements. The Inspector General then has to make a recommendation to the minister, after which the further steps of incorporation can take place if all conditions are met. But if there were either verbal or written objections which appeared valid, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the Inspector General and the minister would insist upon a public inquiry. Take the possible case of either the Inspector General of Banks or the minister failing to recognize the validity or the seriousness of an objection and just issuing the permit. Subsequently the fact that there were valid objections to the permit to commence business would surface. Both individuals concerned would, I think, find themselves fired for dereliction of duty.

I know very well that the minister responsible for financial institutions would under no circumstances, if there were the slightest doubt, fail to hold a public inquiry. Therefore, I feel that by granting this discretion to a responsible official, by, in fact, imposing a duty on the minister in question to really have a hard look at the circumstances, we are protecting the public. Incidentally, we are also possibly protecting the incorporators who could find themselves facing malicious charges or malicious information. We cannot understand the motives of men at all times. Let us assume in this case that an application is made and there comes into the hands of the Inspector General or of the minister in question a letter or letters making certain allegations of a spurious nature. Pray, how could the minister, the Inspector General or the individuals involved disprove these spurious allegations? They may be smears or allegations as to past criminal records or bankruptcies. Not one of those individuals would have a venue to correct the record.

● (1650)

The Inspector General cannot do those things which he is not authorized to do. Neither can the minister. How would the record be cleared except by way of a public inquiry with the persons who make the allegations put on the stand to prove what they had said. To that extent I think there should be a public inquiry of the nature I proposed. I am told that concurrently a similar proposal was made in the Senate. I had no contact with it. I am glad the government saw the value of the proposal on the basis of the arguments advanced, not only to protect the public in the appropriate case, but to protect the minister and the Inspector General of Banks as well as those who would make a proposal under the act to incorporate a bank.

Therefore, the amendment incorporated in the bills reported is far superior to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). I understand his motives, but I respectfully differ from him in that his amendment would lay the operation of the act open to a great deal of mischief.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it seems we have slipped from motion No. 5 to No. 6 in the course of general consideration of a couple of amendments which would apply to the kind of principle we are attempting to get at. The first is basically the proposal which would remove from Parliament the right to consider the incorporation of a bank. My hon. friend outlined fairly clearly some of the dilemmas there.

It concerned us in committee that this is yet another removal from Parliament of a power exercised over very strong influences in our society. It is acknowledged that banks are very powerful players in the economy of Canada. What they do will shape all our lives. We are not dealing merely with a parking fine or the implementation of a by-law respecting the running of fences in a municipality where people are accorded the benefit of a public hearing. We are dealing with the removal of yet another right from Parliament to consider and provide input on very powerful players in our economy.

I have heard members on both sides stand up and say that this is of no consequence. In fact, when the government presented its original proposal, it wanted the inspector general to look at the circumstances, make recommendations to the minister and that was all. Parliament was no longer to have the responsibility. This was to be the procedure, they said. Very quick, very neat. On behalf of those who are trying to glean information from the government and ministers opposite, I say, shame. Members across the way know the kind of record which has been established over the last year and, indeed, since the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power, yet they allow the erosion of yet another power of Parliament.

I am a new member of this institution. Since roughly 1968-69, the power to effectively control the estimates of the government has disappeared to a committee. The committees themselves have been hamstrung. Millions are spent on issues and items that cannot be properly examined because of a deliberately structured device to remove from Parliament the opportunity to consider them. Here is another example of erosion. It is being resisted by members who for more than ten years have fought against the government, the Prime Minister and some ministers about the erosion of the rights of Parliament.

The Inspector General of Banks is not responsible to the Canadian people for what goes on in the banks. It is the minister and the elected representatives here. We are responsible. We were sent to this Parliament to consider such matters. However, I see members of the official opposition allowing yet another erosion of the power of Parliament. This is of serious concern.

I mentioned our concerns about the Prime Minister. They deserve stating again. He has not played fair ball with the people of Canada in some of his actions. I call to the attention of hon. members the changes in our rules which had to be bashed home with closure. When they changed the rules, they removed the estimates and allowed Parliament to be hamstrung. I also recall the War Measures Act. In retrospect, the leader of that party stood up after it was over and stated he regretted the fact he had supported it at the time. That was a product of actions by that government, that Prime Minister and those ministers.

There is also the issue of the anti-inflation legislation. They made a commitment to the people that they would not introduce it, but once in power they jammed it through. That attitude is also reflected in the proposal before us. It is the erosion of another power of Parliament, and I am seriously concerned about it. The other day we sat through the closure motion. The government is not opposed to using closure, removing the powers of Parliament. We were seriously concerned about that. I congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for individually overcoming a very serious dilemma. The government in fact accepted it. It now lacks a single thing. Although it is a lesser solution, our amendments overcome it. The power is still largely removed from Parliament.

On the other side of the coin, the Inspector General has the discretion not to hold a public hearing "because there are kooks out there". What disturbs me is that over the years the government has said that the kooks are those who disagree with it. We all know where dissent is in a democracy. It is a very healthy procedure. It will not tie up or hamstring the business of this country to have people with serious concerns write those concerns down, submit them and have them considered at a public hearing.

Kooks are not going to be supported by large numbers of the public. People have the right to bring forward serious concerns about these powerful institutions. A major concern is that this procedure is not open enough. Second, there is an attitude which has been prevalent with this government—I do not think anyone here can deny it. They hold information very closely. They somehow feel it is not the right of Parliament and Canadians to have information. When it comes out, they feel it is politically damaging, and that is worse than providing the information. This provision still allows the basic offensive nature of the previous proposal put in by the government. Perhaps that is why it is there in only half its form, because it still gives the Inspector General of Banks the authority to do this. He can give notice to the minister involved, and the minister can say, "Do not do it". If we follow the legislation, we will realize that it has been removed now from the control of Parliament. Essentially we are faced with a continuing erosion of the powers of Parliament. Also we see a controlling of the entire process of incorporating banks by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who undoubtedly will direct the Inspector General of Banks. We are very concerned about this particular item.

Allowing the amendment we have proposed to go through will broaden the very constructive amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) so that the government cannot compel the Inspector General to put it aside and say, "No, we do not want to expose it to the public". It compels the Inspector General, upon receipt of an objection, to hold a public meeting and allow concerned individuals to express their concerns in front of the press and in front of the people. Although the matter has been removed from Parliament, it is still compelled to remain within a public forum. No one in the House would disagree that banks are among the most prominent players in the economy. Foreign banks are among the most powerful institutions in the world, especially considering the leverage they will have over us.

This incorporation procedure is one of the most important issues of this act. Acceptance of our proposal will not harm anyone. The only objection was the one raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, that perhaps a kook will submit an objection and therefore we should put a provision in the legislation giving absolute discretionary power to a public servant who in fact is manipulated—a poor choice of words—or guided by the Minister of Finance. Perhaps I will reselect that word.

If the House is prepared to accept our amendment, certainly no harm would follow. We will not see the banks hamstrung. They will not come streaming forward in droves trying to incorporate. We will not see the whole procedure hung up. In fact, there will be very few incorporations over a period of time. People will approach this new procedure very cautiously.

An hon. Member: It only takes one to go down.

Mr. Skelly: It only takes one to go down. I think we will see a very slow and easy incorporation procedure. If our amendment was adopted, these organizations would be required to go in front of the public when there was an objection. Certainly they cannot come before Parliament any more, but they could be made the subject of public scrutiny. There is no harm in that, despite the fears of the hon. member for Edmonton West.

I urge members of the House to accept this amendment. They are prepared on any municipal project to allow municipalities to hold public hearings, to allow the citizens to participate or at least to be informed about the decision-making and to register their objections so that concerned elected officials will know about them. This is not inconsistent with the legislation. The government is prepared to do it on sensitive environmental questions. I believe that on sensitive and serious economic questions affecting the way the economy will develop, who will control it and what are their objectives, we should allow the procedure to become public and not allow the government at will to suppress knowledge.

I urge members of the House to support this one small amendment which would allow the entire incorporation procedure to become a public process. If it does not happen, we shall not only be allowing the government to remove one further power from Parliament, as it has so many others, making this institution less effective in expressing the wishes of the people, but we shall also be depriving the public of the opportunity of having these powerful economic players appear before it on items of serious objection.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I have listened to the debate, to the points made both by my hon. friends and by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I was struck by the unusual position put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West. We are suggesting the provision of even a greater amount of protection for the public.

In order to understand the nature of our proposal, one must appreciate that members of the public have infinite confidence in the banking system. When they put their money in the bank, whether by way of purchasing shares or by deposit, they are confident in the belief that the banks operate under federal law which is written in such a manner that it is virtually impossible for the bank not to operate in a fiscally responsible way. When the hon. member for Edmonton West made his comments, I was struck by the confidence which he placed in the public service. He said that there may be some frivolous intervention. I draw the conclusion that because there may be some frivolous intervention, the public will get less protection than it might otherwise be entitled to. The hon. member mentioned that it might be more costly to do it the way we are suggesting; because there may be an additional cost, the public are to have less protection than it might otherwise be entitled to. Because the member has confidence in the public service of today, he is saying in essence that the public of the future will have less protection than it might otherwise expect and heretofore has been entitled to.

Turning from banks for a few moments, I should like to look at the problems within financial institutions in general. Look at what happened in the most recent Astra Trust case—I want to point something out by way of example. I see the minister shaking his head. I am not suggesting a parallel can be drawn, but I am suggesting we ought to be encouraging a far greater degree of public scrutiny within all financial institutions, rather than lessening the degree of public scrutiny. I see the minister is now shaking his head affirmatively. He can understand why I draw that comparison, he can understand what I am driving at. In the case of trust companies, at the moment they are subject to approval, albeit provincial. There is a certain amount of federal involvement, but primarily it is provincial. People who had put their life savings into something they believed was protected by law discovered the protection was not worth the paper upon which it was written. There was no public hearing process in advance of that trust company being given the authority to conduct business and no mandatory process for advertising and public participation about which we are talking. If we take that extreme case today and extrapolate it over the next ten or 15 years, we would almost assuredly come up with the thought that a similar kind of thing could well occur within the banking structure.

Mr. Rae: The Bank of Western Canada.

● (1710)

Mr. Deans: My colleague mentions the Bank of Western Canada. A similar kind of thing could well occur within the banking structure under the system which is currently being proposed by the government and supported by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

What we are talking about is a guarantee that there will be the opportunity for public participation in perhaps the single most important area of the economy a guarantee that the sort of thing which happened to Astra, Reymor and the people who put their money there could not happen within the banking system. We are suggesting that if we adopted these simple amendments to ensure a public hearing, there would be scrutiny and an opportunity for the public, and those who might have knowledge, to take part in the process, thereby taking a step toward guaranteeing that this kind of failure and consequent hardship could never occur.

I ask the minister not to be impressed by the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton West that, because on an odd accasion there might be someone with frivolous intent who would attempt to subvert the process we would put other people in jeopardy over the course of years ahead, or that just because it might cost those who are asking for incorporation a little more in terms of the dollars they would have to invest in order to go through the public hearing process we should run a risk unnecessarily. It was suggested that people might invest on the assumption that the government's guarantee stands behind a financial institution and that somehow or other, because it may cost a little more to go through that process, members of the public should have less protection in the future than that to which they are presently entitled, or, for that matter, because today's public service is working well and can be trusted with the responsibility this necessarily will always be the case in every instance.

We must write the law to protect the public, not the incorporators from a frivolous intervention, a costly hearing or from a civil service from which they need no protection. We must protect the public from situations which, at this point, we think might not occur but which, however, could well occur under the current legislation. That is what we are asking for, and it is simple. We are not talking about hearings every day of the week for the rest of our lives. We are not talking about incorporations being requested and applied for by the hundreds. We all know that this will not happen. We are talking about a reasonable number of hearings which will be held because we are committed to making sure that not just the banking structure but all of the financial institutions have to submit to the most rigorous set of requirements and present themselves before the public in order to justify the contention that they should be permitted to operate within the financial structure of Canada. That is what we are suggesting, and we are saying that this kind of amendment means further protection.

It is not just further protection; it is necessary protection. I am not suggesting for one moment that my comments are any more meaningful than those of anyone else, but in the light of these observations can the minister not see that we are courting potential danger in the future, that we are leaving a door open for failure in the banking system which we need not leave open? Rather than opening that door we should be closing other doors in an effort to protect the people of Canada who for some reason have great trust in the political system and believe that "guaranteed by the Government of Canada" means something. That is how they feel about banks. Incidentally, that is also how they felt about trust companies until fairly recently. For some reason they thought that because they were incorporated and given licences to operate by the government, the government would be looking into them with such care that there could be no way they could be ripped off by unscrupulous dealers. Unfortunately, the minister knows that has not been the case. I would have thought we would be moving to a more carefully thought out and more restrictive method of reviewing entry to the financial system of Canada rather than opening it up and leaving things to chance.

I therefore ask the minister in good conscience if he will not consider the representations made by both of my hon. friends and say, "Yes, you are right, there is, in fact, the chance that we may slip up, so let us close the loophole".

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing motions 4 and 6. I will first speak on motion No. 4 presented by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). The effect of this motion would be to block one of the two avenues now open to an institution aiming at becoming a bank in the present sense of the law, since clause 7(a) states that an institution that wants to become a bank can still proceed through incorporation by Parliament as we do now and another option is added which is to proceed through letters patent. Motion No. 4 suggested by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood would do away with this second possibility, namely, to proceed through letters patent.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) say that the bill proposes to remove completely, from the process whereby a financial institution obtains the status of a bank, the right for Parliament to examine that incorporation. In fact, we are adding one more possibility, while keeping, as I pointed out before in subclause 7(2), the possibility of incorporation by both Houses. If that procedure is chosen by an institution, it is well understood that the public parliamentary examination now in current usage would apply.

However, another means is being put at the disposal of those institutions desirous of obtaining bank status and of falling under the jurisdiction of the federal Bank Act, and that is letters patent. For the first time, the Bank Act provides truly wide possibilities, which this really is, in the procedure allowing a financial institution to accede to bank status.

Much has been made in the course of our debate of certain public examinations. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) made much of the procedure those institutions will have to follow.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware—or they will learn when they read clauses 12 and others following on page 18 of our bill—that before an application is made under subclause 7(1)(b), a notice of intention to apply for the proposed letters patent and to operate as a banking institution under the Bank Act shall be published by the applicants for a period of four consecutive weeks in The Canada Gazette and in a newspaper published at the place where the head office of the bank is to be situated. That is the first stage.

Any person, as mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton West, who has objections to the granting of letters patent to the people who have thus applied for them may write to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) or the Inspector General of Banks to advise them of his or her concern and request a public inquiry.

If we consider the procedure which appears in the text the committee submitted to the House, namely the amendment to clause 12, on page 18, which was largely based on the proposal made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, we note that the only difference between the wording of subclauses (2), (3) and (4) and motion No. 6 proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River appears in this part of the motion, and I quote:

(c) the minister shall upon receiving the report make such report available to the public within thirty days.

Already the committee, in its report to the House of clause 12, recognized the right of the Inspector General, for specific reasons, to ask for a public inquiry. Clause 12, page 18, states that on completion of the inquiry, the Inspector must report his findings to the minister. The one thing which is added is that the report must be made public. Mr. Speaker, I think that if we take a close look at clause 7, subclauses (a) and (b) and at all of clause 12, we see that there is always a possibility for Parliament to discuss the matter if an institution chooses incorporation before the two Houses of Parliament as set out in clauses 7(a) or if it chooses to proceed by way of letters patent according to the new provisions proposed by committee, then there is always the possibility of a public inquiry should it be deemed necessary by the Inspector General. I think we should keep those two mechanisms since they protect the public well and since there is to be a thorough investigation as to the integrity of the individuals who will be creating a new institution which is to function as a banking institution. We must also remember, as the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) pointed out I believe, that the purpose of the act is first and foremost to protect the common good, to ensure that the Canadian public is well served, properly served, faithfully and honestly served by the institutions operating under the Bank Act. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we reject motions Nos. 4 and 6.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 4 (Mr. Rae) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): We are now on motion No. 6. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 5, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20, and 21 are grouped for debate.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 19 to 24 at page 14.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 12

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by

(a) striking out lines 4 and 5 at page 95 and substituting the following therefor:

"each shareholder is an offi-"

(b) striking out lines 16 to 21 at page 95.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 13

That Bill C-6, An act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 18 to 32 at page 96 and substituting the following therefor:

"Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province or an agent of Her Majesty in either such right is not included within the expression 'person' as used in those sections."

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 16

That Bill C-6, An act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 7 to 10 at page 99 and substituting the following therefor:

"the government of a foreign state or".

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 19

That Bill C-6, An act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 16 to 18 at page 102 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) an".

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 20

That Bill C-6, An act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by triking out lines 30 to 32 at page 110 and substituting the following therefor:

"shares of the bank to a financial".

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 21

That Bill C-6, An act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 46 and 47 at page 110, lines 1 to 16 and lines 36 to 47 at page 111, lines 28 to 47 at page 112 and lines 1 and 2 at page 113.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motions Nos. 5, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20 and 21.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on motion No. 5. That motion deals with the section of the act which specifies to whom letters patent incorporating a bank can be issued. Clause 8 reads as follows:

Notwithstanding subsection 7(2), letters patent incorporating a bank shall not be issued

(a) to Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province, to any agent or employee of Her Majesty in either such right, or to any corporation owned or controlled by Her Majesty in either such right;

I find it ironic that the government would be taking such an ideological position with respect to the next ten years in our banking legislation. I do not see why the government should rule out of court the question as to whether or not a province should be allowed to incorporate a chartered bank—and I will come to the reasons why that may be a very good idea—or why the government should not be allowed to establish a Crown bank if it were found to be one way of increasing competition in the absence of competition coming from other sectors, or if it is found to be one way in which the government can reorganize its granting of concessionary or other special kinds of loans to a number of special interest groups, such as farmers, small businessmen, people involved in housing or others.

I want to deal with each of those two points. The first is with respect to the ability of the provinces to engage directly in the business of banking by incorporating a federally chartered bank. It is one of the realities in our country that our largest chartered banks, the "Big Five" as they are called, which have such a stranglehold on the banking business and indeed on many aspects and many parts of capital markets today, are regarded by many Canadians as the representatives of a particular part of Canada, as simply being institutions for the benefit of central Canada which, in a historic sense, have sucked up savings from Canadians right across the country and largely to the profit of those who live in central Canada. Indeed, I think it is one of the perceptions of our country which has a detrimental effect not only on our financial life but also on our political and social life. As a result of the boom in oil and natural gas in western Canada it is no longer the case that the west is without economic resources. Indeed, it is the fastest growing part of the country, economically, and the economic power of the west which is growing very rapidly. It is growing so rapidly that the province of Alberta has developed a heritage fund worth somewhere in the area of $8 billion at the present time. The value of the fund grows daily and it will be further increased by the additions to the price of oil and gas which have just been tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

● (1730)

One of the key questions is that of the fiscal imbalances which these revenues create in our economic system, the fiscal relationship between the federal and provincial governments. It is one of the intractible problems of the decade and one of the great challenges of the 1980s. It has become unrealistic to say to the government of Alberta, or to the people of Alberta: you can create your credit unions and your provincial savings offices, which function in a sense as savings banks for individual Albertans, but you're not allowed to become directly involved in the business of chartering a bank. I find it hard to understand how a party which prides itself on being pragmatic and responsive to events and on being one which does not take any ideological position, would say that under no circumstances will provincial governments be allowed to incorporate federally-chartered banks. The ironic consequence of taking this ideological position will be that the federal government will have less control over capital markets than would be the case were they to allow the provincial governments to become directly involved in the federally-controlled and legislated business of banking. I am thinking particularly of the provincial government of Alberta, but it could be the provincial governments of Saskatchewan or British Columbia. I find it ironic that the federal government, a Liberal government, is requiring that the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia—indeed, any provincial government—establish not federally-chartered institutions but provincial institutions. For example, six or seven years ago, when Mr. Barrett's government wanted to establish a financial institution which would reflect the needs and demands of the economy of British Columbia and which would be able to deal directly with the problems of small businesses and consumers—problems which were not being dealt with by the chartered banks—he was not able to establish a federally-chartered bank. Instead, he was required to establish a provincially-incorporated trust company. I find it ironic that because it is taking an ideological position with respect to the formation of Crown banks, whether they be provincial or federal, a Liberal government should be guaranteeing that the recycling process take place, which is so critical, is going to take place entirely outside federal jurisdiction. It is a phenomenon which is, indeed, passing strange.

It is also a strange phenomenon that the federal government would be tying its hands in this way by saying that under no circumstances will we consider in the next ten years the possibility of forming a federally-chartered Crown bank. I say this because ministers opposite has often said they pride themselves on their lack of ideology with respect to the formation of Crown institutions. In fact, they have nationalized whole areas of economic life. The Conservative party did precisely the same thing. It makes me smile to hear Conservative friends on my right mounting opposition to any direct federal or government involvement in the economy when it was a Conservative government which created such institutions as the Bank of Canada and the CBC.

It was the Liberal government which authorized the takeover of de Havilland and which created many Crown corporations from Polysar to Polymer and countless others. Now they are telling us that this kind of Liberalism is dead and is being replaced by a more hard line kind of Conservatism which means they are not going to become involved in the economy in this way any longer. They say this in spite of the variety of consumer services provided by our chartered banks, whether in fact the chartered banks are providing the services they could provide to small business, farmers, or consumers right across Canada or whether they are providing the services they could to fishermen in Atlantic Canada or to northern communities which are essentially isolated and without financial institutions. The federal government is saying that under no circumstances will it ever consider the possibility of creating a federally-chartered institution, at least for the life of the Bank Act. Frankly, I do not see the logic of the government's position, other than to suggest that it is a purely ideological one. Ministers over there are not prepared even to consider the possibility of allowing provinces to get involved in their banking institutions and to play as great and as active a part in the financial life of the nation as central Canadians have played for the last hundred years. I find it passing strange that they would be tying their own hands at a time when a great many Canadians are asking questions with respect to the services being provided to them by the largest chartered banks.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I must say something at this point because all the other amendments I have go further than the strictures in the act. The act does not allow a federal or provincial government to incorporate a bank under a letters patent process. That is the section which is being amended. The objective of the amendment is to delete that prohibitive clause. On the other hand, in the act there are already provisions which allow a government to participate—up to 25 per cent—in the incorporation of a bank. That is a grandfather proposition. It was a pay-off.

There was the WEOC Conference in Calgary some years ago. It pre-dated the Hon. John Turner leaving the government, so it would be about 1973. To please Mr. David Lewis and the NDP, as well as Mr. David Barrett, the Premier of British Columbia, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that the Bank Act would ultimately be amended to allow for the incorporation and establishment of a chartered bank in British Columbia. Subsequently, but without the knowledge of Mr. Turner, the Prime Minister broadened this to actually purchasing an interest in an existing chartered bank.

[Translation]

An hon. Member: You could speak—

Mr. Lambert: If a government member wishes to take part in the debate, he should also rise. He can understand me, we are in a bilingual country and since most people in my area are English-speaking it is natural for me to speak to them in English. However, if the member wants me to do so I will take up the time of the House and repeat everything I say. In that specific case, since I am dealing with a rather Anglophone issue, I will speak in English.

[English]

In an attempt to please British Columbia, the intent was to allow that province to buy into an existing bank, much to the horror of the then minister of finance. When the Bank Act came down with a white paper, fortunately reason had prevailed and the reference to purchasing an interest in an existing bank had disappeared. It was due mostly to the fact that by that time the heritage and trust fund had begun. It was obvious that if the province of Alberta were so minded, it could likely go out and buy the control of any chartered bank in the country. Economically, for all the reasons in the world—and I do not have to repeat those reasons which I put on the record at the time of the incorporation of the Bank of British Columbia and subsequently—I am unalterably opposed to the Government of Canada or to the government of any province having any interest in a charter bank.

According to this legislation, governments are allowed to become involved in new banks, not the existing banks, up to 25 per cent after a period of time. Governments would even be in better shape than any other corporate shareholders whose maximum involvement can only be to the extent of 10 per cent. There is a conflict of interest. With a holding of that size, a government as a shareholder would be entitled to one or more directors on the board. At that point, the government would have direct access to the business affairs of all the clients of that bank. Suppose the bank had interests beyond provincial boundaries and proposals were put forward by a particular client for financing an expansion either in one province or another. It would come to the attention of the government-appointed directors that a business proposed to borrow money from the bank to assist it in establishing a business in other than the province which had a share in that bank, at which point the squeeze can be put into effect—the government could insist that the development take place in that particular province, all other things being equal other than, shall we say, the location of a particular resource or raw material.

Each of the provinces has a department of industry, trade and commerce, and it is up to those departments to illustrate the advantages to industry of locating in the particular province. It is up to that government through such a department or departments to put legislation on the books which will offer to the public generally incentives to establish a business in that particular province. Certainly, it should not at any time be within the powers of any government to use the leverage which it will have on the board of directors of a bank to direct investment into or out of a particular province under a "beggar thy neighbour" policy.

I cannot for the life of me see how that could be just in any instance. Therefore, it is my view that chartered banks should continue to be allowed to move across the country without the permission of the government or the Inspector General of Banks, establish branches at their own volition without the permission of any one and move into or out of any province without interference from government.

Many people say the government should have the right to interfere. Mr. Speaker, government influence is far from benign. We have seen examples of government influence which has been wrong, punitive and damaging. The history of this country can give many illustrations. Man's motives, when he gets into government and into power, are not necessarily the most pure at all times. Power which rests within government must not, in the type of economy and society which we in Canada want, move into our financial institutions. I do not mind savings and loans associations being organized under the aegis of government. They are like a post office savings bank.

Personally, I would much rather see the Alberta treasury branches brought under the operations of the Bank Act as a private bank—I say private as opposed to being publicly owned by the province. It is only in recent years that the treasury branches have been successful, but they could be more successful given the privileges of a chartered bank. Of course, treasury branches carry on certain activities which are not allowed to chartered banks, and I agree that this is an anomaly.

However, the situation does not justify inserting into the Bank Act, the privilege of allowing governments to invest in existing banks or to participate in the creation of new banks whether by private bill or by letters patent. I have referred to this question generally, because many of the amendments under my name are frankly consequential in a number of sections. These amendments attempt to wipe the slate clean, once and for all, of government being able to enter banking. I oppose amendment No. 5 which is before us. In due course, I will commend to hon. members the amendments which I have put forward and which would eliminate entirely any government interest in any chartered bank. As far as we know, the shares in chartered banks may be owned at the present time by trustees of government pension funds, but not directly because there are disabilities on directors.

• (1750)

No government wants to own shares in a bank unless it can have directors. That is the nature of the beast. It insists that if it is going to put up some money it shall have some say. No one can gainsay that. As a matter of fact, the justification for allowing governments to invest in chartered banks is so that they may appoint directors—so that governments may have a say and influence on the direction of their affairs. I do not think that is what we want in Canada, and I would so move.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this amendment. I have the highest regard for the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), for his knowledge of banking and so on, but there are one or two points which I think are relevant.

First of all, I believe that a government, whether federal, provincial or municipal, has a responsibility to reflect in its policies the thinking of the people who elected it. If some time in the future the people of a province were to elect a government with a very definite mandate to get into the banking business, that government would be unable to do so because of the laws passed here. In my view that is not a democratic procedure.

I should also like to speak to the question of freedom of choice. I think governments should have some freedom of choice also. While there is much to be said on both sides, I feel that a strict mandate prohibiting a provincial government, for instance, from going into the banking business really amounts to the federal government telling the provinces what is or is not good for them. Provincial governments should be able to carry out the dictates of the people who elected them and not have to do what a senior government says they can or cannot do. I do not agree with this omnipotence of the federal government. I think the people are omnipotent.

If the people of a province are so dissatisfied with the chartered banking system that they ask the provincial government to go into the banking business in competition, I do not see anything wrong with that. It would be acting as a government, not just looking into people's records. There is much to be said for the remarks of the hon. member regarding directors.

I should like to mention one or two points which make me suspicious of the provision that provincial governments cannot enter the banking business under any circumstances—whether 95 per cent of the people of a province wants it to establish a bank in competition or not. That cannot be done—because an act of the federal government says it cannot be done. I do not like that type of procedure, Mr. Speaker. Surely a provincial government should be in a position to carry out the wishes of the people who elected it. It should not be subject to some other power telling it that it cannot take such action.

I remember the early depression years in Alberta, in 1935—I was not a member of the legislature at that time. The government of the day was elected on a very anti-bank feeling. The people were very unhappy with the banks because during the depression years they withdrew credit right and left. Many companies were put into bankruptcy and, as we used to say, there was hunger in the midst of plenty.

Those banks were not operating in accordance with the wishes of the people and so the people were unhappy. The result was almost a landslide victory for the party that proposed to change the banking system but, unfortunately, it could not get a charter from the federal government to form a bank. Instead, it formed what were known as the treasury branches. The reason it wanted a bank was that it could have the privilege of arranging for the expansion of credit, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West. If you hold so many dollars in the Bank of Canada you can expand that and lend, I believe, up to 14 times the amount. This gives the bank tremendous avenue for making money or for service, whichever way you want to look at it.

The treasury branches could not do that, however. They could not lend the money of the depositers under the provisions contained in the Bank Act of that time. Each customer had to sign a statement giving permission to lend their money and so the treasury branch came into being. It is a pretty profitable institution today.

Had the treasury branches been subject to the provisions of the Bank Act, however, then last year the provincial government of Alberta would not have been able to offer the tremendous benefits of reduced interest to the farmers and the developers of that province.

Sometimes people wonder why industry has prospered in Alberta. One reason is that the provincial government provided for loans to be available from the treasury branches and not at an exorbitant rate of interest. They had the freedom to do that because they did not have to abide by any rules set out by the Bank of Canada as did the chartered banks. As a result, many people left the chartered banks and went to the treasury branches.

To tell someone that they cannot form a bank is to do things by the backdoor. Had the treasury branches been formed in the same way as a chartered bank there would have been advantages and disadvantages. They would have come under the rules that apply to all other banks but they would have been able to expand their credit. Today, that expansion of credit could be a tremendous thing for any province or any country.

We have to look carefully at exactly at what we are trying to accomplish, Mr. Speaker. What harm would there be if the province of Ontario wanted to establish a bank in competition with the other banks? We say we want competition, so would it not be just as well for the people of Ontario, through their government, to form, say, the Bank of Ontario, and then expand credit in the interest of all of the people of the province instead of just those who happen to be the shareholders of a bank?

Let me give an illustration, Mr. Speaker—this is not in the banking field but it is something similar. During the depression years premiums for fire insurance on homes in Alberta became exorbitant. Hundreds of people could not take out insurance, as a result. The government of the day was not socialist but it offered to form an insurance company in competition with the other insurance companies because it thought it could be done at a reduced rate. It was done, and the Alberta Insurance Office came into being. It was swamped with hundreds of thousands of applications. It did so well that all the insurance companies had to reduce their rates in order to stay in business. It was competitive, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. May I remind hon. members that the House will be sitting tomorrow morning between the hours of 11 a.m. and 1 p.m. for further consideration of Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock pursuant to an order made Wednesday, November 5, 1980.

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

P.C. 1980-2916
28 October, 1980

Whereas no agreement has been entered into pursuant to section 22 of the Petroleum Administration Act, with the Government of the Province of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba.

Therefore, His Excellency The Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, pursuant to section 36 of the said Act, is pleased hereby to make the annexed Regulations prescribing maximum prices for the various qualities and kinds of crude oil that are produced, extracted or recovered in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and that enter into interprovincial trade or that are mixed or blended with crude oil that has been acquired for movement out of the province where it is produced.

REGULATIONS PRESCRIBING MAXIMUM PRICES FOR THE VARIOUS QUALITIES AND KINDS OF CRUDE OIL THAT ARE PRODUCED, EXTRACTED OR RECOVERED IN ALBERTA, SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA AND THAT ENTER INTO INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE OR THAT ARE MIXED OR BLENDED WITH CRUDE OIL THAT HAS BEEN ACQUIRED FOR MOVEMENT OUT OF THE PROVINCE WHERE IT IS PRODUCED

Short Title

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Crude Oil Pricing Regulations.

Maximum Prices

2. In respect of crude oil that is produced, extracted or recovered in the province of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba and that enters into interprovincial trade or is mixed or blended with crude oil that has been acquired for interprovincial movement from the province where the crude oil is produced extracted or recovered, the maximum prices set out in sections 3 to 6 or derivable from section 3 shall apply.

3. Except as provided in sections 4 and 5, the price per net clean cubic metre of crude oil having a density at 15dC of eight hundred fifteen kilograms per cubic metre or less, and containing less that one gram of sulphur per kilogram, shall not be more than $108.75 as at the Edmonton, Alberta, terminal of Interprovincial Pipe Line Limited and the prices of all crude oil that were derived or were derivable from or related to the price of the said crude oil prior to the making of these Regulations shall continue to be derived from or related to the price of that crude oil according to the practices of the trade prevailing immediately prior to the making of these Regulations, including practices related to the establishment of differences in price on account of variances in density, sulphur content, location and the establishment of prices for mixed streams of crude oil except that, where in any month after the making of these Regulations, a gathering charge or transportation toll applicable to any particular kind or quality of crude oil to which this section applies, is established or amended, the gathering charge or transportation toll as established or amended shall be added to the maximum price for that quality or kind of crude oil or shall be substituted for the charge or toll applicable to that quality or kind of crude oil immediately prior to the making of these Regulations, when calculating the maximum price for that quality or kind of crude oil.

4. The price for natural gasoline or condensate per net clean cubic metre shall not be more thatn $115.05 as at the Edmonton, Alberta, terminal of Interprovincial Pipe Line Limited.

5. The price for any hydrocarbon or mixture of hydrocarbons per net clean cubic metre that is produced by extraction from oil sands and is not a refinery oil product within the meaning of section 26 of the National Energy Board Part VI Regulations shall not be more than $111.90 as at the Edmonton, Alberta, terminal of Interprovincial Pipe Line Limited, excluding any compensation paid or payable in respect of any such hydrocarbon or mixture of hydrocarbons pursuant to Part IV of the Petroleum Administration Act.

6. The maximum price per net clean cubic metre for any crude oil not specified in section 3, 4 or 5 or derivable from section 3 shall not be more than $115.25 at the point of sale before its transmission or transportation out of the province in which it was produced, extracted or recovered, less any gathering charge or transportation toll from that point of sale to Montreal.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

(This note is not part of the Regulations, but is intended only for information purposes.)

These Regulations prescribe maximum prices for the various qualities or kinds of crude oil produced, extracted or recovered in Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba that enter into interprovincial trade or that are mixed or blended with crude oil that has been required for movement out of the province where the crude oil is produced, extracted or recovered.

Whereas an agreement with the Province of Alberta was entered into under section 50 of the Petroleum Administration Act;

And Whereas the said agreement is terminated by the declaration of the parties in the said agreement as of October 31, 1980.

Therefore, His Excellency The Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, pursuant to subsection 52(1) of the Petroleum Administration Act, is pleased hereby to make the annexed Regulations prescribing prices for natural gas produced, extracted, recovered or manufactured in the Province of Alberta that enters into interprovincial or international trade, effective November 1, 1980.

REGULATIONS PRESCRIBING PRICES FOR NATURAL GAS PRODUCED, EXTRACTED, RECOVERED OR MANUFACTURED IN THE PROVINCE OF ALBERTA THAT ENTERS INTO INTERPROVINCIAL OR INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Short Title

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Natural Gas Prices Regulations, 1980.

Interpretation

2. (1) In these Regulations,

"cost of transportation" of natural gas moved from one place to another, means the aggregate of the costs of transmission and metering and all other costs associated with such movement of natural gas;

"imputed Alberta border price" of natural gas produced, extracted or recovered in the Province of Alberta and delivered to the border of that Province means 177.565 cents per gigajoule;

"international border price" of natural gas produced, extracted or recovered in the Province of Alberta and delivered at various points on the international boundary line between Canada and the United States for consumption outside Canada means the Canadian dollar equivalent, calculated in accordance with the conditions of the applicable licence, of

(a) 417 cents in United States currency per gigajoule, with respect to natural gas exported under the authority of Licence No. GL-1, GL-3, GL-4, GL-5, GL-6, GL-16, GL-17, GL-18, GL-19, GL-20, GL-24, GL-25, GL-28, GL-35, GL-36, GL-37, GL-38, GL-39, GL-41, GL-43, GL-52, GL-54, GL-55, GL-57, GL-60 or GL-61; and

(b) 340 cents in United States currency per gigajoule, with respect to natural gas exported under the authority of Licence No. GL-29.

(2) Each zone referred to in the schedule is an area of Canada comprising a zone proposed by TransCanada PipeLines Limited in its application to the National Energy Board dated August 14, 1969 and approved with modifications by the National Energy Board by Order No. TG-1-73 of May 10, 1973.

Prescription

3. the prices for natural gas produced in the Province of Alberta that enters into interprovincial trade for sale in Canada outside Alberta are, in Canadian currency, as follows:

(a) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited for consumption in Canada in a zone set out in Column 1 of the schedule, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the transportation rates set out opposite that zone in the column of that schedule that is applicable to the type of service under which the gas is sold;

(b) for natural gas consumed by TransCanada PipeLines Limited as fuel or for other uses, including any gas lost during transmission, the imputed Alberta border price;

(c) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to ICG Transmission Limited at Spruce, in the Province of Manitoba, for export under Licence No. GL-28, the international border price less the cost of transportation on the ICG Transmission Limited pipeline from Spruce to the international boundary between Canada and the United States of America near Sprague, in the Province of Manitoba, which cost is a monthly demand charge of 3,209 dollars;

(d) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to ICG Transmission Limited at Spruce, in the Province of Manitoba, for export from Canada and re-import into Canada under Licence No. GL-30 and for subsequent re-export from Canada under Licence No. GL-29 at Fort Frances, in the Province of Ontario, the international border price less the aggregate of

(i) the cost of transportation on the ICG Transmission Limited pipeline in Canada, which cost is a monthly demand charge of 59,678 dollars,

(ii) the cost of transportation on the Inter-City Minnesota Pipelines Ltd. pipeline in the United States, which cost, in United States currency, is a monthly demand charge of 13,190 dollars, and

(iii) a commodity charge of 0.171 cents per cubic metre delivered.

(e) for natural gas sold

(i) by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to Niagara Gas Transmission Limited for export under Licence Nos. GL-6 and GL-55,

(ii) by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to The Consumers' Gas Company, which gas is subsequently sold by The Consumers' Gas Company to Niagara Gas Transmission Limited for export under Licence No. GL-6, and

(iii) by The Consumers' Gas Company to Niagara Gas Transmission Limited under an agreement dated October 31, 1975 between those two companies, the international border price for gas exported under those licences less the cost of transportation on the Niagara Gas Transmission Limited pipeline from Cornwall to the international boundary between Canada and the United States near Cornwall, such cost being the average cost of transportation calculated in accordance with the contract dated January 2, 1968 made between Niagara Gas Transmission Limited and St. Lawrence Gas Company Inc. and approved by the National Energy Board;

(f) for natural gas sold by Many Islands Pipe Lines (Canada) Limited to Saskatchewan Power Corporation at the point of interconnection of the facilities of these two companies near Beacon Hill, in the Province of Saskatchewan, which cost is a monthly demand charge of 1.959 cents per cubic metre for 1048.1 thousand cubic metres of daily demand;

(g) for natural gas sold by Many Islands Pipe Lines Limited to the Saskatchewan Power Corporation at the point of interconnection of the facilities of Mid-Continent Pipe Lines Limited and the facilities of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation near Hatton in the Province of Saskatchewan, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and 0.00088 cents per cubic metre, being the cost of transportation on that portion of the Mid-Continent pipeline in the Province of Saskatchewan;

(h) for natural gas sold by Many Islands Pipe Lines Limited and Saskatchewan Power Corporation to TransCanada Pipelines Limited at Success, in the Province of Saskatchewan, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and 0.126 cents per cubic metre, being the cost of transportation on that portion of the Mid-Continent pipeline in the Province of Saskatchewan and on the facilities of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation pipeline connecting with those of TransCanada Pipelines Limited;"

(i) for natural gas sold by Consolidated Natural Gas Limited to TransCanada PipeLines Limited at a point in the Province of Saskatchewan near Burstall, the imputed Alberta border price;

(j) for natural gas sold by Consolidated Natural Gas Limited to Greater Winnipeg Gas Company at a point in the Province of Saskatchewan near Burstall, the imputed Alberta border price;

(k) for natural gas sold by Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd., to Gaz Metropolitain, Inc. at a point in the Province of Saskatchewan near Burstall, the imputed Alberta border price;

(l) for natural gas sold by Many Islands Pipe Lines Limited to Saskatchewan Power Corporation at a point in the Province of Saskatchewan near Merid, the imputed Alberta border price;

(m) for natural gas sold by Alberta and Southern Gas Co. Ltd. to Columbia Natural Gas Limited at various points of connection between the facilities of Alberta Natural Gas Company and Columbia Natural Gas Limited in the Province of British Columbia, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the average cost of transportation in the Province of British Columbia to the various delivery points on the Alberta Natural Gas Company pipeline, incurred during the month of the sale of the gas and calculated in accordance with Order No. TG-1-80, issued by the National Energy Board;

(n) for natural gas sold by Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to Columbia Natural Gas Limited at various points of connection between the facilities of Alberta Natural Gas Company and Columbia Natural Gas Limited in the Province of British Columbia, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the average cost of transportation in the Province of British Columbia to the various delivery points on the Alberta Natural Gas Company pipeline, incurred during the month of the sale of the gas and calculated in accordance with Order No. TG-1-80, issued by the National Energy Board;

(o) for natural gas sold by Alberta and Southern Gas Co. Ltd. to Inland Natural Gas Co. Ltd at the point of connection of the facilities of Alberta Natural Gas Company and those of Inland Natural Gas Co. Ltd. in the Province of British Columbia near Yahk, the aggregate of

(i) the imputed Alberta border price,

(iii) the cost of transportation in the Province of British Columbia on the Alberta Natural Gas Company pipeline, incurred during the month of the sale of the gas and calculated in accordance with Order No. TG-1-80, issued by the National Energy Board;

(p) for natural gas sold by Alberta and Southern Gas Co. Ltd. to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited at a place on the international boundary between Canada and the United States near Kingsgate, in the Province of British Columbia, the international border price;

(q) for natural gas sold as peaking service gas by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to Niagara Gas Transmission Limited at Cornwall, in the Province of Ontario, for export under Licence No. GL-6, 15.497 cents per cubic metre plus the aggregate of the transportation commodity rate and the transportation demand rate for Contract Demand service in the Eastern Zone as specified in Schedule 1 and the imputed Alberta border price;

(r) for natural gas sold by Many Islands Pipe Lines (Canada) Limited to Saskatchewan Power Corporation at the point of interconnection of the facilities of those two companies near Smiley, in the Province of Saskatchewan, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the cost of transportation on that portion of the Many Islands Pipe Lines (Canada) Lmited pipeline between the Alberta Saskatchewan border and Smiley, Saskatchewan, which cost is a monthly demand charge of 0.035 cents per cubic metre for 481.6 thousand cubic metres of daily demand;

(s) for natural gas sold after October 31, 1976, by Many Islands Pipe Lines (Canada) Limited to Saskatchewan Power Corporation at the point of interconnection of the facilities of Many Islands Pipe Lines (Canada) Limited and the facilities of Saskatchewan Power Corporation near Unity, in the Province of Saskatchewan, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the cost of transportation on that portion of the Many Islands Pipe Lines (Canada) Limited pipeline in the Province of Saskatchewan, which cost is a monthly demand charge of 0.522 cents per cubic metre for 835.7 thousand cubic metres of daily demand;

(t) for natural gas sold by Alberta and Southern Gas Co. Ltd. to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited at the point of connection of the facilities of Alberta Natural Gas Company and those of Inland Natural Gas Co. Ltd. near Yahk, in the Province of British Columbia, for export under Licence No. GL-41, the international border price less 0.600 cents per cubic metre, being the cost of transportation on the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited and Inland Natural Gas Co. Ltd. pipelines from Yahk to the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America near Huntingdon, in the Province of British Columbia;

(u) for natural gas sold as fuel by Alberta and Southern Gas Co. Ltd. to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited under an agreement dated January 17, 1977 between those two companies for delivery at the point of connection of the facilities of Alberta Natural Gas Company and those of Inland Natural Gas Co. Ltd. near Yahk, in the Province of British Columbia, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the cost of transportation in the Province of British Columbia on the Alberta Natural Gas Company pipeline, incurred during the month of the sale of the gas and calculated in accordance with Order No. TG-1-80, issued by the National Energy Board;

(v) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to Gaz Métropolitain, Inc. at the point of connection of the facilities of those two companies near Montreal, in the Province of Quebec, for export f.o.b. Gaz Métropolitain, Inc.'s liquefaction plant in the City of Montreal, under Order No. GO-2-80 issued by the National Energy Board, the international border price for gas exported under Licence No. GL-19;

(w) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to Saskatchewan Power Corporation at Unity, in the Province of Saskatchewan, under an agreement dated the 30th day of June, 1972, as amended, between those two companies, the imputed Alberta border price;

(x) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to Gaz Métropolitain Inc. at the point of connection of the facilities of TransCanada PipeLines Limited and those of Gaz Métropolitain Inc. near Montreal, in the Province of Quebec, under an agreement dated February 15, 1977 between TransCanada PipeLines Limited and Gaz Métropolitain Inc. and approved by the National Energy Board, the aggregate of the imputed Alberta border price and the transporation commodity rate for Contract Demand service in the Eastern Zone as specified in the schedule;

(y) for natural gas sold by Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd. to Sulpetro Limited at a point in the Province of Saskatchewan near Burstall, for export under Licence No. GL-57, the international border price for gas exported under that Licence, less the cost of transportation on the TransCanada PipeLines Limited system in respect of the volumes delivered in cach month for export under that Licence, which cost shall be based on the monthly demand rate and the transportation commodity rate per cubic metre of natural gas delivered as set out in the schedule to the Sulpetro Limited Export Price Order; and (z) for natural gas sold by TransCanada PipeLines Limited to Consolidated Natural Gas Limited at a point in the Province of Saskatchewan near Burstall, for export under Licence No. GL-61, the international border price for gas exported under that Licence, less the cost of transportation on the TransCanada PipeLines Limited system in respect of the volumes delivered in each month for export under that Licence, which cost shall be based on the monthly demand rate and the transportation commodity rate per cubic metre of natural gas delivered as set out for Licence No. GL-61 in Schedule I to the TransCanada PipeLines Limited Export Price Order.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

(This note is not part of the Regulations, but is intended only for information purposes.)

These regulations prescribe the prices at which natural gas produced, extracted, recovered or manufactured in Alberta that enters into interprovincial or international trade is to be sold on or for delivery in any areas or zones in Canada and outside Alberta or at points on the international boundary of Canada.

P.C. 1980-2919
28 October, 1980

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, pursuant to section 62 of the Petroleum Administration Act, is pleased hereby to amend the Petroleum Administration Act Part III Regulations, C.R.C., c. 1261, in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE

1. (1) All that portion of subsection 3(1) of the Petroleum Administration Act Part III Regulations following paragraph (d) thereof is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"those costs and charges shall be the Alberta cost of service with respect to the gas and the movement of the gas as defined or determined in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Natural Gas Pricing Agreement Act of the Province of Alberta or the Natural Gas Price Administration Act of the Province of Alberta, whichever Act is applicable."

(2) Subsection 3(2) of the said Regulations is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) In paragraph (1)(a), "contract field price" and "regulated field price" have the meaning given those expressions in the Natural Gas Pricing Agreement Act of the Province of Alberta or the Natural Gas Price Administration Act, of the Province of Alberta, whichever Act is applicable."

EXPLANATORY NOTE

(This note is not part of the Regulations, but is intended only for information purposes.)

This amendment adds a reference to the Natural Gas Price Administration Act of Alberta.

P.C. 1980-2920
28 October, 1980

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, pursuant to subsection 72(4) of the Petroleum Administration Act is pleased hereby to revoke

(a) Petroleum Classes Designation Order No. 2 made by Order in Council P.C. 1978-3825 of 21st December, 1978;
(b) Petroleum Classes Designation Order No. 3 (Temporary) made by Order in Council P.C. 1979-2116 of 2nd August, 1979; and

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 13, 1980

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 12, consideration of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 5 (Mr. Rae), 12 (Mr. Lambert), 13 (Mr. Lambert), 16 (Mr. Rae), 19 (Mr. Lambert), 20 (Mr. Lambert), 21 (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I was making the point when I concluded yesterday afternoon that there are times when a government—

Mr. Skelly: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much interrupting the hon. member, but I would like to place a question before the Chair. I do not really comprehend what we are doing. It is my understanding that we are considering a series of motions, Nos. 5, 7, 8, 9, 12, 19,—

Mr. Bussières: And 20 and 21.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In reply to the hon. member's query I understand that we are considering motions Nos. 5, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20 and 21 which have been grouped for purposes of debate. Does that answer the question for the hon. member?

Mr. Skelly: In terms of some of the particular amendments they could be argued on their own merits. Indeed, the debate which is taking place seems to be dealing with motion No. 5. It strikes me that some of these motions should be debated on their own merits. Would the Chair entertain a motion to consider these motions in sequence, rather than simultaneously?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The purpose of the Chair, of course, is to serve the House. The Chair has made these suggestions for the convenience of hon. members in terms of the debate. It is my understanding that Madam Speaker in this place the other day made the suggestions and invited comment at that time. No comment was made. However, if it is the wish of the House to change what has been suggested by the Chair with respect to these motions, then certainly an order could be made and considered.

At this time we will proceed under the present order and, in the meantime, perhaps conferences might be held between the spokesmen of the parties of the House to determine if they wish to make any amendments. At this stage the House is following the suggestions which were made by Madam Speaker and which were accepted at the time.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, the order was made the other day. I do not know whether the hon. member was present, but certainly the leader in this debate of his party was present at the time. It is my understanding, as I believe it is that of the minister, that having made those suggestions they were then made a House order. Otherwise, there is no way in which we can proceed if, as we go along, some hon. member wishes to initiate some changes on his own.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's point is very well taken. I am now informed that it is an order of the House to proceed in this manner.

• (1110)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is some distinct advantage in doing things this way because a member may speak on a number of items that are of concern to him, as did the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) recently.

In my remarks I want to deal specifically with the prohibition against a provincial government going into the banking business. In my concluding comments yesterday I pointed out that there are times when free enterprise does not satisfy the population. I believe in free enterprise, Mr. Speaker, but if it becomes a monopoly then it is just as bad as any other type of monopoly. As an illustration of my point I used the instance of Alberta, where in the hungry thirties the insurance companies did, in reality, become a monopoly and charged prohibitive rates. At that time thousands of people could not afford to buy fire insurance on their homes. The government endeavoured to get the insurance companies to change their rates, but without success, so it went into the insurance business itself in competition with the companies. As a result, the people had free choice; they either went to the Alberta government insurance office or to one of the private companies.

The fact that the rate charged by the Alberta government was considerably lower brought thousands of applicants to its offices which did a rousing business. Within a short time the other companies found that in order to stay in business they had to lower their rates to be comparable with those charged by the government. Eventually the Alberta Insurance Office became the private insurance company which is today called the Alberta General Insurance Company, a very efficient operation which does excellent business.

I used that example to show that there are times when free enterprise is not free, but becomes a monopoly. In such circumstances, I believe that a government has an obligation to ensure that there is competition. It is the life blood of a free enterprise system; without competition there certainly is no free enterprise.

We are now dealing with competition in the banking business. This is possible. I hope it will succeed because the keener the competition, the less cost to the consumer. I also believe that the credit unions, caisses populaires, the treasury branches of Alberta and probably similar institutions in other provinces, are providing competition to the banking system, even though they are not covered by the Bank Act.

I want to emphasize two points, Mr. Speaker. First of all, there are disadvantages in the Bank Act. Had the treasury branches of Alberta been covered by the Bank Act they would not have been able to provide lower interest rates during the 1978-79 and 1980 seasons to farmers, developers, producers, and builders in the province. Because they were operating under the auspices of the Alberta government, however, their rates did not increase with the Bank of Canada rates and there was no obligation for them to do so. Consequently, they provided a service to the people. That is one of the reasons that many businesses in Alberta continued to thrive whilst there were widespread bankruptcies in other provinces.

If free enterprise gets to a point that it wants to charge all the market will bear, then I think a government has a responsibility to act, whether it be in the area of banking, insurance, transportation or anything else.

I recall another instance when competition resulted in exactly what I am trying to indicate here, and that is that a provincial government should have the right to enter the banking business if it chooses.

At one time the cost of transportation between Fort McMurray and Drumheller was exorbitant. There was only one way for freight to travel, and for most passenger traffic as well, and that was by train. The rates charged by the railway company were exorbitant. In Fort McMurray, people paid four or five times more for milk, sugar and potatoes than was charged in Edmonton. As soon as the highway to Fort McMurray was completed and truckers were able to provide competition for the railway, prices came down. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the railway was charging what the market would bear, and in my view that is not an aspect of free enterprise; it is an aspect of monopoly.

The same thing happens with our banks. If banks become a monopoly, all charging the same rates and not competing with each other, it may well be that the people of a province would approach the government to establish competition in the banking business. I cannot see why a provincial government, composed of responsible people elected by the citizens of a province, should be barred from the banking business.

There is another point that I want to make, Mr. Speaker. Originally, the banking business was handed over to private entrepreneurs by government. Since that time it has prospered, and it is not difficult to understand why. Banks provide a service, but they also have some tremendous benefits not available to trust companies, credit unions or treasury branches, such as the expansion of credit. Through this expansion of credit banks have been able to make big profits. I do not think there is any dispute about that. I have argued many times that some of that expansion of credit which comes about because of the growth of business in a community and an increase in the gross national product of the country, should be plowed back into the community through low interest loans for the building of schools and hospitals. If the banks were to adopt this suggestion they would not be subject to the criticism of making tremendous amounts of money through the privilege granted them by government of expanding credit, based on certain rules. No other business has that privilege.

The treasury branches in Alberta do a great deal of business. One of the best features is that they lend out the money of depositors. When I deposit money in a treasury branch, Mr. Speaker, I sign a paper stating that they may lend my money. They make a profit on the daily operation as a result but, Mr. Speaker, they cannot make any money on the expansion of credit because that privilege is not open to them.

A previous government in Alberta applied formally for a banking charter for the simple reason that the treasury branch could then expand credit. It was held that this would be of benefit to the people because it would mean higher payments to those on welfare, higher pensions and expanded benefits for the disabled—indeed, better service all the way around beause there would be more money available. The privilege was not granted, however. I cannot see anything wrong with that, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to ask the government to reconsider the prohibition against any provincial government entering the banking business. Surely we want this country to enjoy freedom of choice. We do not want free enterprise monopolies any more than we want government or other types of monopolies. A monopoly is a monopoly, Mr. Speaker, and the only way to break one is through competition. I suggest that monopolies can occur in the banking business; they have in the past and they can in the future. Let us keep this weapon of free enterprise. Competition is the lifeblood of the free enterprise system.

I want to conclude by repeating what I said in my opening remarks, Mr. Speaker. I believe a government, whether it be federal, provincial or municipal, has a responsibility to reflect the thinking of the greatest possible number of people who elected it. If the people of a province elect a government to create a bank in competition with the banking system, and I do not mean a monopoly, surely that provincial government should have the right to do it.

• (1120)

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part in this phase of the debate. I was pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). They reinforce many of the points made in committee and recognize a very important sphere of activity.

When looking at the series of amendments today, the one which typifies this is No. 5. By including prohibition in the act, the government is having the Crown become involved in the business of banking. That was a very serious error. Also, it is inconsistent with many of the things they are doing. The resolution before us states:

Notwithstanding subsection 7(2), letters patent incorporating a bank shall not be issued

(a) to Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province, to any agent or employee of Her Majesty in either such right, or to any corporation owned or controlled by Her Majesty in either such right;

Not only is this completely wrong, but it is inconsistent with the government's behaviour in many other areas. We have a very late but definite recognition of the need for a publicly owned oil corporation to explore, develop, refine and distribute petroleum. We have had some terrible experiences in this country with the private sector such as the monopoly control, seven sisters' approach in the oil industry. I suggest the industries which mobilize capital in this country have the same sort of concentration and control. It has worked to the disadvantage of many regions of this country.

The member from Alberta spoke with his very knowledgeable background about some of the serious problems that have occurred in that province. Until recently, the hardship in that province was extreme. The people of British Columbia have had the same experience from a very concentrated profit oriented group responsible to a small number of individuals in this country. They have not been accountable. Their goals have not been enunciated with regard to the aims and wishes of the charters that allow them to exist.

The government should not include prohibition in the act. They should leave it silent. If governments of certain provinces wish to become involved in the mobilizing of capital within their provinces, they should be allowed to do so. It will provide competition. We must recognize that in this country there is a small population and a very large area. We have the potential for tremendous economic benefits as a result of our resources and opportunities for development.

If in certain regions of this country the private sector fails, the co-operative sector has the opportunity to move in. Later I will refer to some areas where there has been a determined effort by the co-operative sector to do this. But there are areas in which the co-operative sector cannot function effectively. We must recognize that in those areas there is a very definite role for the public sector to play.

I ask the government to reconsider this. It would be a simple matter to delete those sections and allow the act to remain silent on this. If governments in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or the maritimes wish to become involved in the creation of a bank or financial institution, and mobilize capital to become involved in certain regional developments which would enhance the lives of their people, we must recognize that the public sector can be involved effectively and this should be allowed to occur.

I wish to give a couple of short examples where public sector activity might have been of assistance in the province of British Columbia with regard to the chartered banks. In the small community of Sayward, banking services were terminated because the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce felt it could no longer do business there. It simply moved away and left that logging community without banking service. The nearest banking service was over 60 miles away. The same situation occurred in Bella Bella, Ocean Falls and other areas. The bank said it could not make a profit in those areas and, therefore, would no longer provide the service. What happened? These people were left with the closest banking service some 350 miles away. The bank just up and left, telling a community to do the best it could.

In many of these communities there are not enough individuals to become involved in an effective co-operative scheme. We need a public sector banking system which can spread the profits. If one area is lucrative, profits can be used to provide service to people in other areas. This would be a benefit. If the capital can be mobilized and put to use in an underdeveloped area, that area will eventually develop. It will attract other individuals who will begin an enterprise, and the communities will develop and flourish.

Rather than taking the attitude of the chartered banks toward some of those communities and going to where they can make a fast buck, this is where we should be concentrating. The banks are not concerned about whether small communities along the coast or northern Vancouver Island wither and die. They still do what they want. This problem is not only in the remote rural areas. A bank close to Victoria was closed. It was a small branch serving a small community.

The public sector should be allowed to become involved in the banking industry. It could provide tremendous benefits for Canadians, especially in those regions where the traditional chartered banks have no interest and are not providing the benefits.

I wish to summarize those few remarks. First, by putting this prohibition in the legislation, the government has created a contradiction. It recognizes that this country is a mixed economy made up of the private, co-operative and public sectors. There are no other rational options because we have a small population spread over a large area. Ministers recognized that in oil and in other areas.

Second, the private sector is not the be all and end all. We have recognized the difficulties there. Certainly this House agonized over such matters as Chrysler and Massey-Ferguson. We see a withering shipbuilding industry in some areas of this country and the failure of the private sector to become involved constructively and thrive.

We must recognize there is a need for public sector involvement, not only in industry and transportation, but in the raising of capital for projects deemed to be desirable by the people of this country.

I would like to conclude my remarks on that aspect and open up one other. This forms part of a series of amendments to this legislation. This is a very important part. I find this difficult, especially as a result of some discussion in committee where the parties over there terminated consideration by the committee. In effect they imposed closure in support of the Liberals on the committee and, I think, left many of these questions to be discussed in the House. I would like to suggest that we look not only at this one but at the process of incorporation as being very important. It is a thing we consider to be serious. The exclusion of the public sector is a very serious error, and it is an inconsistency.

• (1130)

I think the question of financial disclosure was not properly addressed, as well as the business of consumer protection. Our opposition to foreign banking is clearly known. As well, there are some very serious questions about the operation of Canadian banks in foreign countries. These are very serious questions.

I would suggest that one of the most serious questions is that of competition. There is a feeling that this is simply pro forma debate. I caution everyone that our members feel very seriously about this. In fact, in committee we are given to understand that this would not be just pro forma debate but, in fact, would deal with these serious questions which the committee had considered long and hard. We understood they would come to the House and there would be some movement on issues which we felt were important and which the government did not seriously oppose.

One of the key areas is the area of competition between financial institutions in Canada. The government has mentioned this. There are some improvements to be made to the co-operative sector which could be easily handled and which would strengthen the process of competition and, in that process, would give a better deal to Canadians. I would urge the government to break this wall of silence. Let us sit down and hear something from their side with respect to what can be done to ease some of these concerns so we may proceed with this debate and bring it to a conclusion.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, before us is a series of amendments dealing with the government or government agencies being involved in the business of banking. The House must appreciate that under the British North America Act the control of banking, banks, interest rates, interest and so on, are all matters of federal jurisdiction. Consequently, it is important that the federal government exercise that jurisdiction.

One of the problems we face with respect to the regulation of credit, the terms of borrowing and lending, consumer protection and the rest of it, is that the federal government over the years has not bothered legislating. Ministers have not bothered to take their responsibilities seriously under the British North America Act. Consequently, we have had credit unions and trust companies develop to national size. They are totally free to do as they wish, and almost conduct the business of banking—indeed, they do conduct banking—without any control by the federal government. In other words, the federal government has abandoned its constitutional requirements. In the last 12 years we have seen an increase in the number of foreign banks coming into Canada and doing business in the banking field without any control by the federal government or the inspector of banks. We have seen them operating under provincial legislation as provincial financial management companies and the like. It is about time that the Government of Canada exercised the obligations and responsibilities it has under the British North America Act.

In the amendments we are discussing now the federal government is at least coming to grips with the problem. It is starting to do something. Specifically, it is prohibiting provincially-owned Crown corporations and provincial governments from using the device of letters patent to incorporate what amounts to a bank. In our constitution, surely the subject of banking is a matter of federal responsibility. Surely, if we are to have any separation of powers in this country it is important that this act recognizes that the provincial governments should stay out of the business of banking, regardless of whether or not they have been successful with respect to treasury board branches. They are not in that field. They have other jurisdictions to look after.

In a country there are certain responsibilities which must be handled by provincial governments, and certain responsibilities which must be handled by the federal government. In this country the federal government is responsible for banks and banking. Therefore it must be clear that provincial governments and their agencies should be excluded from banking.

If, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) says, there are requirements for government to get into the business of lending and advancing money for projects, plus handling credit in various parts of Canada, then there is no question that the Government of Canada has the authority to do so. But it should not have that authority in the Bank Act. This is really an act to control private corporations in banking. If the Government of Canada is to be in the banking business, then we should have an act from the minister which incorporates a special bank in the commercial lending field owned by the Government of Canada. If that is necessary, we will do it. In fact we have done it.

We have done it through the Federal Business Development Bank. We have done it with respect to financing export trade. We have done it in a number of locations, in a small way, through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the like. These are the kinds of activities into which the government has entered. A further example of this is the financing of wheat sales through the Bank of Canada.

The job of the Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, is to control banking and to control it properly. If there is a need for a government or government agency to go into the business of banking, then it should be a matter for the cabinet to produce legislation in order to create another banking institution. That should not be an institution under this Bank Act. If the government were to go into the business of banking, then why should it be tied up with this legislation which is really designed for private banks?

More important, we have a number of Canadian Crown corporations which have developed the habit of expanding their jurisdictions over the past many years. As a result we have companies in the railway business that all of a sudden decide to become developers. We have companies which are in the airline business that decide to become travel agents. Corporations such as these were never designed to go into those other businesses. That was never contemplated. It is about time we prohibited those Crown corporations and agencies from expanding further. Indeed, it is important that this government introduce legislation which will control the expansion of its own Crown corporations. Thus it will have some control over where those corporations go. This act and the sections which are proposed by the government specifically prevent the Crown and Crown corporations from becoming involved. I suggest the minister consider the motion by the hon. member from Edmonton that deals with further limiting the government's ability in this area. This is set out in motions Nos. 19 and 20.

It is important we treat this act for what it is. It is an act which is to operate as a charter for those people in the private banking business. It is not an act designed to extend credit, to create more banks, or to allow other government agencies into the business of banking. If that is the intention then a separate type of statute is required. Surely, if it is the intention of the Government of Canada to go into banking in a commercial way, it has the power and authority, and properly could produce a separate charter with separate powers. Perhaps much broader powers would be needed for the creation of a Government of Canada commercial bank. At this stage I would be opposed to that type of proposal.

There is nothing to prevent the Government of Canada from setting up a bank if it wants to, but surely not under the Bank Act because the government is just passing this act to control the private banking field. Let us not have this act as enabling legislation for provincial Crown corporations to apply for letters patent and so further extend provincial jurisdiction into federal jurisdiction. One of the great problems we have in our Canada is the overlapping, duplication or triplication of governments involved in the business of other governments. I commend the attitude of the minister and the government in preventing, through their amendments or this act, provincial governments and their agencies from being involved in banking.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to share some of my thinking on motion No. 5. The effect of motion No. 5 would be to delete section 8 which reads in part as follows:

> Notwithstanding subsection 7(2), letters patent incorporating a bank shall not be issued
> (a) to Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province, to any agent or employee of Her Majesty in either such right, or to any corporation owned or controlled by Her Majesty in either such right;

It seems that in some very important ways the Bank Act we are being asked to approve today in 1980 is already out of date, and yet this will form the basis of our banking system for the next ten years. Indeed, if it takes as long to revise the Bank Act the next time around as it has this time, it will be more than ten years.

We feel that the Bank Act looks to the past rather than to the future. Last Friday the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) put it this way:

> Instead of looking forward to the problems which in a sense are simply here today in a very small and growing form and seeing where these tendencies will take us, there has been a tremendous tendency in this legislation to look at problems which grew up in the early 1970s and late 1960s and to respond immediately to those rather than to look at the broad framework for the future.

The ideological framework of the present Bank Act denies the reality of Canada. The banks have been trying to create Canada in their own image, centralized and ignoring the regions, especially the growing economic needs of western Canada. This reminds me of the way in which in an earlier generation the banking system of Canada systematically drained and bled the maritime provinces, so that the present crisis in eastern Canada is to a large extent the result of the banking system which drained these areas of the necessary capital they needed to develop themselves.

One of the basic matters which the banking system should recognize and deal with is the fact that we have a mixed economy. Perhaps one of the best testimonies to our mixed economy was given by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), who is not what we might call a socialist. He explicitly pointed out that he was not a socialist, but in speaking yesterday he said, and I quote:

> Let me give an illustration, Mr. Speaker—this is not in the banking field but it is something similar. During the depression years premiums for fire insurance on homes in Alberta became exorbitant. Hundreds of people could not take out insurance, as a result. The government of the day was not socialist but it offered to form an insurance company in competition with the other insurance companies because it thought it could be done at a reduced rate. It was done, and the Alberta Insurance Office came into being. It was swamped with hundreds of thousands of applications. It did so well that all the insurance companies had to reduce their rates in order to stay in business. It was competitive, Mr. Speaker.

I submit that that points to the reality of Canada and to the fact that we do live in a mixed economy. We do not live in an economy which in any sense corresponds to the traditional free enterprise market economy about which people sometimes like to talk. In the short time I have been a member of Parliament I have seen the government called upon to intervene and to bail out corporations which thought they could do very well on their own as long as they were making profits, but as soon as there is some difficulty they come to the government with their hands outstretched, asking for money.

Very obviously we live in a mixed economy, and the present Bank Act ignores this fact. It ignores the direction in which Canada must move and the direction in which other major industrial nations of our world have been moving, that is, not just in having mixed economies but economies in which there can be public participation.

By deleting the provision which prohibits provinces or provincial corporations from incorporating or having bank charters issued to them, motion No. 5 restrains in an undue fashion the public sector. It prohibits the growth of the economies of western Canada.

A few years ago the government of British Columbia under Premier Barrett wanted to use the financial resources of the province for public goals. This provision makes that very difficult, if not impossible. It is important that the provinces have an opportunity to use their financial clout so that they can mobilize capital for regional and local goals. I pointed earlier to the fact that the present banking system is largely responsible for the draining of capital invested by the people of the maritimes, that this capital was invested in the maritimes and that it was drained off to use for resource extraction in the west. The people in the west are tired of their region being treated merely as a hinterland and they themselves as hewers of wood and drawers of water.

So I ask, why should the governments of the provinces, which are elected by the people, not have the right to be involved in the banking business to see that some of the financial institutions which operate in the provinces are serving the needs of the people of those provinces?

I urge hon. members to support this amendment. I urge that as we deal with other amendments we recognize that we have to move beyond an ideological base which is rooted in the past. We have to begin to deal with the needs of Canada as we move into the 1980s, and we have to remember that this Bank Act will be serving our needs—or not serving our needs, whichever way we choose—for the next ten or more years. I urge that we pass this amendment and not unduly restrict the provinces.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the series of motions which has been put before us with regard to government ownership, whether it be federal or provincial, of banks as a specific form of financial institution. The hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) has just indicated that the provincial governments need a vehicle, and he has selected banks as that vehicle, for stimulating and encouraging economic development in the regions. I suggest that there is a large number of good reasons why the chartered banks should not be that vehicle and also that there are a great many other financial institutions through which the provincial governments can have the effect that is desired by the hon. member opposite.

Certainly one of the most fundamental features of chartered banks, of the banking system in Canada, is that the banking system has the ability to create money as a result of the acceptance of its liability, the demand deposit as a means of payment of debt. This is also true, frankly, of other institutions, such as credit unions, caisses populaires and certain trust companies. But the fundamental feature of a bank and of banking, the reason why it is an area of federal jurisdiction, is that the banking system can create money. As a result, the Bank of Canada was established to control the degree to which money is created by the banking system.

From the perspective of the federal government, if the federal government were to become an active participant or an owner of a chartered bank, there is clearly the possibility of a fundamental conflict of interest because it is the Bank of Canada, another federal agency, which controls the reserves made available to the chartered banking system and thereby the degree to which the chartered banking system can create money. Here we could have a federal government bank amongst private sector banks. This creates the possibility of differences of treatment arising. This bank could be subsidized. For example, it might not be covering its own costs and, as a result, there could be extremely unfair competition and the possibility of conflict of interest between the Bank of Canada and one of the chartered banks, such as a federal bank.

The second area of great concern to me is that the chartered banking system under the Canadian Constitution is a federal area of jurisdiction. I know that in other parts of this act there is a provision for provincial governments to participate in the formation of new banks under very strict limitations. The concern I have about further enlarging the possibility for participation by provincial governments in the chartered banking system is that if we were to allow, for example, a provincial government to own a chartered bank, under the assumption that that chartered bank would live by the existing rules contained in the act, we could find a difficult potential situation where a provincial government might say, "Being a provincial government ourselves, a provincial agency of the Crown, it is not possible for the federal government to regulate a provincial government, and as a result we do not have to comply with the provisions of the Bank Act because that is a federal statute and federal statutes cannot regulate provincial governments per se."

Those arguments are currently being brought out with regard to the new national energy program, with respect to agencies of provincial governments in the oil industry. The question of whether or not the federal government has the power to tax those agencies could be raised also with regard to whether or not the federal government has the power to control reserve levels, through the Bank of Canada, of chartered banks owned fully by a provincial government. That could lead to some very difficult problems with the implementation of the monetary policy in this country as well as the control of the money supply in a more specific sense.

So I can see from the questions with regard to ownership of chartered banks by the federal government that there are potential major conflict of interest problems. From the point of view of provincial governments, there are not only conflict of interest problems but there are also fundamental questions of constitutional jurisdiction and the ability of the Bank of Canada to be able to continue to control monetary policy.

Finally, I should like to say quite honestly that clearly the hon. members opposite do not have a fundamental grasp of the nature of the Canadian financial system and of the nature of the range of financial intermediaries which are currently operating within our financial system, and the possibilities that arise therefrom for provincial governments to participate actively in the general area of financial intermediation.

Clearly provincial governments have had a great influence on the growth and development of the credit union and caisses populaires movement, and over the last decade credit unions and caisses populaires have grown faster than the chartered banks. Trust companies have grown at least as fast, and in some cases faster, than chartered banks, and provincial governments have a direct input into the trust company industry since certain of the trust companies are chartered by the provincial governments. Those are two vehicles that the provincial governments have available to them to stimulate the growth and development of their regions. In addition, there are provincial treasury branches. We know of them in Ontario, in Alberta, and in other provinces. So these institutions are available, and venture capital firms, such as the Canada Development Corporation at the federal level and the same thing at the provincial levels, are available.

There are any number of ways in which provincial governments can have an impact on the growth and development of the regions of the country. Certainly they do not need to have access to ownership of chartered banks to facilitate their economic goals. As I stated, there are a number of reasons for this, the last one being that it is simply not necessary to achieve the objectives which the provinces wish to achieve. There is no benefit that I can see in allowing governments, provincial or federal, under this legislation to become actively engaged in this particular area of endeavour, namely, banking from the perspective of a chartered bank.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, after the extremely serious, sound and well-founded remarks the hon. member for Ottawa Centre and Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) has just made, I shall be very brief.

In view of the group of amendments we now have before us, I feel we are confronted with two extreme positions, namely, on the one hand, the proposition of the NDP who would have governments directly involved in the activities of the financial institutions known as banks under the present act and, on the other, the proposition explained by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who would have provincial government action completely excluded from those same institutions.

In this bill, according to clause 114, our government took what could be called a half-way stance.

I presume, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) of the NDP is the spokesman for his party on the Bank Act. He will say the position of the government is timorous. I say to him that, on the contrary, it is a wise position in that it avoids the excesses and dangers pointed out by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, while at the same time being generous in that it allows the governments who may feel the need to do so to invest in up to 25 per cent of the shares of a new bank to help it get started; of course, those governments will be subject, for a period of ten years, to the same regulations as any other shareholder, that is they will have to decrease their portfolio to 10 per cent.

We reject the two extreme positions which is why we call upon hon. members in this House to reject the group of amendments now before us.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are now on motion No. 5. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We are now on motion No. 12. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Lambert: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 12 (Mr. Lambert) negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are now on motion No. 16. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Rae: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 16 (Mr. Rae) negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Now the Chair will put motion No. 13 to the House, and this may dispose of motions Nos. 12, 19, 20 and 21 which are consequential to it. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands defered.

According to a House order, motions Nos. 7, 8 and 9 shall now be grouped for debate.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 24 to 27 at page 33.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 45 to 47 at page 33.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 48 and 49 at page 33.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, we are getting to the point where some of my previous remarks bear repeating, but the question in this one is different than we have been looking at, the basic question. It was very interesting to have both government members coming on line so clearly. The arguments of the parliamentary secretary were rather circular. I wonder whether he actually accepts them as being serious but, as we have seen, they are quite prepared to put them on the record. I hope they will consider that this is a different option and relax their very narrow ideological view that the public sector be excluded.

Basically our proposal in motion No. 7 is to delete section 35(1) which reads:

The following persons are disqualified from being directors of a bank:

And subsection (j) reads as follows:

a person who is an officer or employee of a corporation owned or controlled by Her Majesty in the right of Canada or a province;

It is a somewhat interesting situation where the government will often go out into the private sector. Almost exclusively in many cases it will go into the private sector and sometimes the public service to recruit people who have expertise in certain areas in order to develop public corporations. Occasionally the government goes out to recruit retired politicians, as we have seen in one notable corporation, but by and large it recruits people to handle public enterprises who have skill in the area.

A very large number of corporations are owned by the government. I can point to Air Canada, which is a very successful Crown corporation, CN in some respects, and Petro-Canada which is developing and I hope one day will be a very strong leader in the field of energy development within the country. We have seen the government move into things like de Havilland, Canada Air and various other industries. Very definitely the government is involved in the public sector. There is no dispute.

Conservative members no longer sit on the Treasury benches because they failed to recognize that the country has a strong feeling about a mixed economy and successful public enterprises which represent the interests of people, that is, the interests of people generally instead of a very narrow group of people. By and large Canadians feel that a mixed economy is very valuable. The reason they do not sit there any longer is that PetroCan did them in. Their willingness to put that organization to the sword touched the people of this country. It probably took the Liberal members a long time to wake up to the reality that Petro-Canada was necessary, and on doing it, retouched the responsive chord and now recognize even more seriously that it must expand. We would make the same argument that this is also necessary in the sector of the economy where we want to mobilize capital. These projects are very important.

They have totally rejected the concept that our prime capital mobilizers is the banking industry, the concentrated, tightly-controlled mobilizers of capital. They say the public has no place. When one considers the matter, those are very strange and contradictory remarks. However, motion No. 7 allows for another option. It would allow us to have on boards of directors of banks people who are involved in a public corporation, and these people, albeit through a rather circuituous route, are accountable to the people of Canada, not merely to a small group of private shareholders whose interests can often be totally different from the interests of the people of Canada. There is no reason for this prohibition.

• (1210)

Many corporations within the country have surplus funds at times, and with connections and certain expertise these surplus funds could be invested through such an organization. There are also projects which require large amounts of capital which must be raised other than through the public purse. For example, let me again refer to Petro-Canada, the nemesis, in this case, of the Tory party when it was the government. That organization will need a tremendous amount of capital at some point to undertake some of the projects which have been outlined. I presume that Petro-Canada will undertake exploration and we will see drilling rigs offshore and in the frontier areas of the country, and eventually we will see the company distributing oil and natural gas in eastern Canada.

The government intends to pay for these activities from the public purse by a tax at the gas pumps. Perhaps a more effective method would be to sit one of the directors of that corporation on the board of a bank. From this position funds could be mobilized from the private sector.

I find the placement of this prohibition in the legislation a very strange contradiction. The expertise is certainly available and the philosophy is consistent. By and large, the prohibition is rigid and ideological. Perhaps a far better approach would be to allow the legislation to remain silent, or merely delete it. If it were deleted, the banks themselves would be in a position to determine whether or not it is in the interest of the institution to be informed on what certain of our key Crown corporations, such as Air Canada, CN or Petro-Canada, are doing.

It strikes me that the clause is inconsistent with the philosophy put forward by the government. It is not required in the act because the banks in appointing directors would naturally control the appointments.

Since we are dealing with motions Nos. 7, 8 and 9 simultaneously, I will comment on all of them together, although they are slightly different in their intent. Not only do we exclude directors of Crown corporations in motion No. 7, but in motion No. 8 we disqualify any agent or employee of Her Majesty in the right of Canada or the provinces. The government's position was made quite clear that it opposes public input to the boards of directors of banks and accountability to the public for the actions of some of these institutions. Instead of opening these institutions to the public and allowing some degree of opportunity for public input, the government closes the door and says, "No, the act is fine". It feels that the inspector general can handle this matter better. Of course the inspector general reports to the minister, but the minister in any cases is not obliged to report to the House or to any other body. The supervision seems to be no more than bookkeeping as opposed to policy.

This debate allows us an opportunity to let a little more light into these areas. My party would like to see this prohibition clause deleted from 35(1)(m), which reads:

Bank Act

The following persons are disqualified from being directors of a bank:

(m) a person who is an agent or an employee of Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province.

Motion No. 9 refers to a minister of the Crown. As we proceed up the ladder from Crown corporations to agents and employees and finally to ministers of the Crown, in the final analysis motion No. 9 is consistent with the government over-all philosophy and I do not feel that I need to elaborate further.

The ultimate decision as to whether or not people in these positions could make a contribution to the board of a bank should be left to that bank, particularly with regard to the areas of Crown corporations. The government should look seriously at deleting motion No. 7, but I am pessimistic. The government does not want public sector involvement or accountability in the banking system. I am pessimistic that it will see the light, but I appeal to the government to remove that prohibition.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the position taken by the government. I think it will prove to be quite shortsighted in the areas of protecting the interests of consumers and, indeed, of the public interest on the boards of directors of our corporations. It is important we remember that when the government initially considered the question of who would be qualified to be a director, many concerns were expressed about our peculiarly closed banking system and its closed brotherhood of directors. We have a system of interlocking directorships between our banks and our large corporations which gives a tremendous advantage to those corporations and a lie to the notion that we have a genuinely competitive and open system. In fact it is a highly closed system.

My party has made a number of proposals to deal with the realities of the situation. First, we suggested that the governments of Canada and of the provinces should be able to create their own financial institutions and banks, if that is the area in which they would like to get involved. It was rejected by the government. On the motion about which my friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Skelly) has just spoken, we said, "All right, if you're not prepared to allow the federal government to form a chartered Crown bank or the provinces to form federally Crown banks or chartered banks, why don't you at least give us the ability to have appointed to the boards of directors of chartered banks people who are in a sense agents of Her Majesty?" Of course it would all depend on the decision that it is something which must be done in the public interest. The government has said, "No, we are not going to do that either".

To anticipate such a reply to the suggestions we have made, we said, "Let's restrict the ability of bank directors to sit as directors of other companies and the ability of other companies to appoint directors to the boards of chartered banks. Let us attempt to break the stranglehold which the old boy network has on our banking system." Again the government has said no to every one of those amendments. The amendments deal with very fundamental principles which attempt to introduce elements of democracy into our economic and industrial system.

I read an article the other day which was written by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) before he became Prime Minister. I would recommend it to the minister, to the parliamentary secretary and to others who are interested. The title of the article is "Economic Rights", and it was published in the 1962 McGill Law Journal. The article describes the failure of our economic system to introduce any elements of democracy; it gives a graphic description of the cost to the average working person of the absence of those elements of democracy. It also describes what the author called an erroneous concept of property by which absentee directors and absentee shareholders are able to withdraw capital at any time, which withdrawal would have a drastic impact on people who are affected by plant closures and lay-offs.

● (1220)

I find it ironic that a Bank Act produced by a government headed by the Prime Minister, the author of that article, would contain absolutely no elements of economic planning, no elements of industrial or economic democracy, and nothing to ensure any of the rights of which he spoke before becoming Prime Minister. I think it is sad that the government would have so little imagination that basically it is only prepared to say that the business of banking is to be left to the bankers—to the same economic elite that has run this country for 300 years.

Any opportunity that the people have to take greater control of their financial institutions, any opportunity introduced by our party that would provide for competition from popular institutions such as caisses populaires and credit unions, has been rejected by the government, and any opportunity to provide for the protection of the public interest because of the activities of government has been consistently rejected by this government.

This is a statement, if you like, of the extent to which the party opposite has fallen prey to the embrace of the economic elite, the embrace of the economic establishment, and the extent to which it has rejected every single progressive proposal made by this party regarding the Bank Act.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I have never heard such rhetorical garbage in my life as that just put forward by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). It is absolutely the most ideological piece of information ever passed on in this House.

If the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood was interested in promoting the expansion and development of the Canadian financial system, if he was interested in promoting competition, then I think he would suggest a far different range of options than those he has proposed today. What the hon. member and his colleagues have put forward are ways in which government agencies—which some would argue are not necessarily the most representative agencies of the people from a democratic point of view, bureaucrats—would put people on the boards of banks and thus make them much more democratically representative institutions. I hear no argument to justify this contention. To say that putting members of government agencies, bureaucrats and public servants, on the boards of banks would make them more democratically representative of people, is not necessarily true.

The reason the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood put forward this amendment in the first place, I think, is because it was necessary in conjunction with his previous series of amendments which concerned the ownership of those institutions by governments. If governments could own the institutions but were precluded from having members on the boards, then who would sit on those boards? That is what this amendment was intended to accomplish and not all the other things the hon. member put forward. In fact hon. members opposite have forgotten why they proposed the amendment.

Given that the will of the House appears to be that governments will not be allowed to own financial institutions which are called banks in this country, then there is no need to allow government agents to sit on the boards. They are not going to be able to own shares or take part in the ownership of chartered banks in Canada.

The same argument that arises with respect to potential conflict of interest in the ownership of banks by governments, arises with the placing of government agents on the boards of directors of these institutions. The conflict of interest is precisely the same.

Hon. members opposite decry what they consider to be the fact that we have no control whatsoever over the behaviour of banks in this country. That is utter nonsense, Mr. Speaker. We are now debating passage of a bill that provides massive control over chartered banks in this country.

An hon. Member: Absolute rubbish.

Mr. Rae: You do not even believe that yourself.

Mr. Evans: We have an act that regulates the behaviour of these financial institutions, and at the federal level we have the office of the Inspector General of Banks established to ensure that banks operate in the public interest.

An hon. Member: What a tiger.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I hear hon. members opposite harping and screaming from their socialist prospective. I say that this is the alternative we have chosen in the past, and it is the alternative we are continuing to choose today. I am afraid they will have to put off their socialistic desires until some later date.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the real concern of this government and of this country is for the expansion, the increase in the dynamic nature of Canadian financial markets and Canadian financial institutions. This government is pursuing a course of action that will lead to the increased competition that we all want very badly.

Through the Bank Act we have provided for the entry into this country of institutions from other countries. Hon. members opposite have fought that, of course, and they will fight it again when the motions are put forward shortly. It is known, however, that these institutions will promote competition with Canadian chartered banks.

Over the last ten years we have seen the massive growth of credit unions and caisses populaires. We want to encourage that and to see it continue. There is some discussion about whether it might be appropriate to have a federal credit union act which would allow credit unions to expand beyond the borders of one province as the chartered banks may. This would expand competition.

The act provides for the chartering of banks through letters patent and makes it easier for new banks to be formed. This measure was fought by hon. members opposite but it would stimulate competition by allowing banks to be formed and to compete with the existing chartered banks' structure in a much more direct manner than has been the case in the past. The requirement in the Bank Act that chartered banks may only be formed through an act of Parliament, which in many cases has taken years, has seriously deterred the formation of new banks. That is why there is a provision to allow the creation of new banks by letters patent. This measure would increase competition but it is opposed by hon. members opposite who have absolutely no interest in competition. They want to put their fingers in everything in an attempt to exercise control from their perspective, which, in some cases and, indeed, maybe in all cases, is not necessarily in the interests of the country.

The government has made a commitment to introduce a new savings trust and loans companies act. This act would allow the Quebec Savings Banks, federally incorporated trust companies and federally incorporated loan companies a broader scope in the financial markets. It would allow them to expand and thus increase competition in the financial market. It is our perspective, and I think that of a good many members opposite, that if we can enhance competition there will be a better financial market, more competitive rates, and the best possible service to the consumer. That is how we intend to go about this, not by allowing the federal government or any government to permeate every aspect of our lives.

There are sound, logical and good long-term reasons why we do not accept these amendments, Mr. Speaker, and why this motion is not acceptable to the government.

● (1230)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans). Indeed it is unfortunate that it is not possible to get a playback of the representations which were made before the finance committee in early 1979 by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) on this particular point. If there ever was an interventionist in all sorts of business, it was by that minister.

As a matter of fact, at the time the New Democratic Party had more or less abdicated any role in the determination of the contents of this Bank Act, and the representations with regard to the so-called consumerism and all the trappings that go with it came out of the mouth of the now Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is rather remarkable that he would, in any way, approve within cabinet the acceptance of the present bill. Of course we know very well what he said when he was the finance critic in opposition regarding interest rates. He said that he would resign if they were allowed to go up. Interest rates are much higher now than they were then, and he is still holding on to the reins of office. He also wanted to put representatives of consumer associations on the boards of banks, whether they were shareholders or not. In that case certain individuals would have a right somehow or other either to engage in public snooping or do what a do-gooder does.

A very interesting section concerns officers of Crown corporations as to who may or who may not be directors of banks. In subclause (j) at page 33, the subject of amendment No. 7, it is said that an officer or an employee of a Crown corporation cannot be a director. Those are clearly defined individuals. Amendment No. 8 covers a person who is an agent or an employee of Her Majesty in the right of Canada or in the right of a province. In other words, a public servant cannot be a director of a bank. In amendment No. 9 it is the minister of the Crown in either the right of Canada or the right of a province who cannot be a director of a bank.

A few moments ago we had a debate on the question of whether a provincial government or the Government of Canada could own a bank; in other words, on whether a charter could be granted to a government for the organization of a bank, and someone said no. A government is prohibited from owning any shares in an existing chartered bank, but there is an anomaly carried forward in this act. My amendments are designed to eliminate that. I do not think the government members fully understood when they said no to my amendments in the previous debate. This act does allow a government to be a participant in a new chartered bank up to the extent of owning 25 per cent. That has never been changed and it has not been eliminated. I find it very strange that the government of a province or the Government of Canada could take part in a newly chartered bank but none of its employees, none of the employees of a Crown agency or a Crown corporation, nor could a minister, represent the government on the board as representatives of those banks. I ask hon. members then who would?

I invite the parliamentary secretary to turn his attention to this particular part. Who would represent the interests of that provincial government which is entitled to invest in the incorporation of a new bank? The parliamentary secretary will remember that during the committee hearings I moved to strike that particular part out, but the government majority blindly went ahead—I say blindly—but perhaps it was blithely went ahead in the spirit that since the government has introduced this bill it is omniscient and therefore it must be right. But in the existing dealings, there is a trap. I must say that having seen the way the government went along, if it wanted to walk into the trap it created for itself, it was fine by me. All public servants, all representatives of Crown corporations are banned from representing a provincial government which may wish to participate in the incorporation of a bank. But then, who is to represent the government on the board? It will have to have some individual, or excuse itself from the board. There is no provincial government which would invest one bent penny in a chartered bank.

Is it a case of the government, for cosmetic reasons giving into an alleged provincial demand which existed back in 1973 when Dave Barrett was the premier of British Columbia? At that time he was making loud noises about wanting to redirect the investment in his province. He did try, but with disastrous results. But on the other hand, does the government want to withdraw from the province any right of participation in the direction of the affairs of that bank? It is a cynical exercise. I think I was being far more honest myself when I just simply said, "No way." Neither will a government, provincial or federal, be entitled to own a bank or be granted a charter of incorporation, either by way of letters patent or by way of a private bill, as was attempted with the original Bank of British Columbia. No employee of a Crown corporation or public servant, whether federal or provincial, can serve as a director. In fact no provincial or federal government can buy any shares directly in any of the existing chartered banks. Nor can it nor should it be able to take any interest in a new bank.

The act now states that a provincial government can invest up to 25 per cent in a new bank, but no public servant, cabinet minister, employee of a Crown agency or corporation, can represent the bank. Who is going to represent the bank on the board of directors? Who will be the registered shareholders, nominees or agents of the bank? That is a cynical exercise. Under the act as it is going to go through, I suggest there is not one provincial government which would invest, as I said, a bent penny in any chartered bank about to be founded. I am sure there are some bank shares held by provincial government interests through pension funds, but they can have no direct influence. Nor can they invest in bank shares for purposes of conducting business activity. It is more of a passive investment for investment's sake. That is as it should be.

I do not think any pension fund should preclude its directors from making the best possible investments. In the main, bank stocks are good investments. From time to time the odd one goes for a bump and there may be some losses over a short period of time. We have seen that in the last few years. It would be more logical, and members opposite would be more honest if they supported my amendments which preclude provincial and federal governments from any interest in any chartered bank, existing or in the future. I hope the House in the majority will be persuaded to that view. I know there are some contrary views.

May I say this in passing. I recognize the views of my friend from Bow River. He is not alone in our caucus holding such views. He and I are of about the same generation. I worked in a chartered bank during the depression years. A lot of the hard-heartedness and what have you is a lot of folklore which somehow or other has gained credence.

I worked in a branch in rural Alberta. Outside of the current and savings ledgers, the thickest one we had to look after was the ODWOs, the register for overdue debts written off. Branches were amalgamated, maybe five into one, because there had been a period of rather rapid expansion and competition among the banks in the twenties, and they were a little on the shaky side. When the depression came, it obviously restricted the activity and the cost of operating a great number of branches. There was improved communication.

In the twenties there was not one gravel road north of Edmonton. They were all dirt roads. There were not many cars and they were not that efficient. Therefore, every little hamlet had a branch of a bank or agency because the farmers' grain tickets had to be cashed. There were certain cash requirements and there were savings accounts.

After 1925, we had more cars and more gravel roads. Therefore every hamlet no longer required a branch of a bank or an agency. This was given considerable impetus in the thirties with declining business and the necessity to reduce costs. Only after World War II did we see in some towns a resurgence or re-entry of a branch of a bank. We saw more competition in the towns which for decades had only one branch. We found branches of three or four banks. Mind you, there was a greater population, more money circulating, and more business being carried on.

Some of the major chartered banks are now on to a retrenchment of branches. Some will close as many as 60 or 80 branches across the country this year. Those are decisions that are being made. In some spots it has not turned out as well as anticipated. Others are better business spots. If the government wants to get into a particular funding purpose, it can pass legislation and create an agency. What is wanted in Alberta is more of a liberalized Alberta trade corporation to help small businesses, what may be called a lender of last resort. That is where the need is.

There is a need for advising agencies. We have the Federal Business Development Bank with an advising agency. However, it charges $30 to open the file and a $7 an hour consulting fee. Some small businessmen have complained that when they went to ask for advice about their business, it cost them $100 to find that out. That is not the purpose of a publicly funded business advice agency or a lender of last resort. If there is a public social purpose to be served, it should not be on a fee basis as is done at the present time.

My view is that credit unions have developed to the point today where they have their own mortgage companies, and that is an anomaly or an anachronism. Credit unions were founded to get away from mortgage companies. But now they have their own mortgage companies and their own trust companies. They were supposed to allow the little man to wriggle out from under a trust company.

• (1250)

We are preventing the banks from getting into the car leasing business, yet the credit unions are forming their own car leasing companies. There are not many needs unfulfilled at the present time. There are both federal and provincial trust companies, chartered banks, and then we will have a great number of class "B" banks offering a variety of services. It seems to me that the whole spectrum is more than filled. We do not need any government-owned banks, or even banks in which governments have an interest which would allow them some direction in the operations of those banks. I would certainly hope my amendments will receive the support of the House and that they not be defeated.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendments before the House, specifically the one which would delete the provision whereby a member of a Crown corporation could not sit on the board of directors of a banking institution or a bank.

I would like to make a few brief remarks on what the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) said this morning in the House. He referred to not wanting all these bureaucrats getting onto the boards of directors of banks and that they could not do a good job there. I am reminded of when the member for Ottawa Centre was the director of investigation and research with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to keep the record as clear as possible with respect to what is about to be said by the hon. member. I was director of research and evaluation for the consumer side of the department. I was not director for investigation and research. That position is held by Mr. Bertrand, who is the director of investigation and research.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for clearing that point up for me. The area I wish to concentrate on deals with the fact that with the hon. member himself being a bureaucrat I imagine he would say he would not be able to make any meaningful contribution to the people of Canada, just as the other bureaucrats he referred to would be unable to either. That is a point with which I disagree on behalf of the people who are employees of Crown corporations, even though I would not necessarily disagree that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is making any meaningful contributions since he has left the bureaucratic role within government. I think there are many people in Canada who could make very substantial contributions—

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a misinterpretation of what I said. If the hon. member would refer to Hansard he will see that I did not say that bureaucrats could not make a valuable contribution. I said, with reference to democracy, that there was no necessity—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This appears to be an exchange between the hon. members and it is not a point of order.

Mr. Anguish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can see that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is as confused about his remarks as I am.

As I was saying, I think there are some very important people who are involved with some of the Crown corporations, federally and provincially, who could provide meaningful input to the boards of directors of any bank within this country. I am reminded of Wilbert Hopper, who is chairman of the board of Petro-Canada. I think of Donald Harvie, who is the deputy chairman of Petro-Canada, and the Hon. John Aird of Petro-Canada. I believe they are people who could make meaningful contributions.

I would like to consider some of the other Crown corporations, for example, Canadian National. I see no reason why Mr. Spicer, who is the executive vice-president of CN, could not make a meaningful contribution as a director on the board of one of the banks. There are many others who could make meaningful contributions. I do not personally know any of the people I have just mentioned. But I certainly know some of the employees of Crown corporations in the province of Saskatchewan personally, and I believe they could make a very valid contribution to the board of directors of any bank.

I think of David Dombowski who was the president of the Saskatchewan Potash Corporation and who was involved with that great corporation from its conception until just a few months ago. He has now taken over the role as the president of Sask. Oil, which is a very important Crown corporation in the province of Saskatchewan.

I think these people have some real expertise and that they might look at the banking industry with a different perspective than the people who are there now, who are strictly profit motivated and who have very little consideration for service to the general public. Many of the Crown corporations fill both of those roles and have those mandates in mind. In some of the Crown corporations they are there to make a profit and, as well, they are there to see that there is some consistency of service provided to the people who have to deal with those Crown corporations. The people on the boards of directors of banks seem to be strictly profit motivated. They have little consideration for the type of service that the people of Canada have to put up with, who are the recipients of that service. I would like to deal with the hardships that many of the people suffer at the hands of the banks. An example of this is the interest rates, which in no real way are tied to the Bank of Canada. The people who serve on the boards of directors of many of the banks have never had to suffer the hardships caused by high interest rates because they are financially secure people. I know there are some people on the boards of directors of banks whom you could consider average, everyday individuals, but certainly the majority of the people who control the banks on the boards of directors are quite elite individuals. They have never had to borrow money from a banking institution, at least during the time that they were on the boards of directors. They have not had to meet the basic necessities of life, such as purchasing a house or buying a car or doing renovations to their homes. They do not really appreciate the service aspect of a bank, which is to make such things as providing transportation and the purchase of a home attainable for all Canadians. As I have said, consideration of some of these things would put a different perspective on the board of directors of a bank. They could provide a very meaningful contribution.

I see the time is fast approaching when we will be taking a recess, but I would like to say that the Bank Act has been going nowhere. I think the government must make a firm stab at explaining where we are going with the Bank Act. November 30 is rapidly approaching and we are still without the changes which are needed. I think the government and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance had better make some pretty substantive changes to the Bank Act, instead of a few comestic ones. I would like to say that it seems to be going nowhere, in our view. I think they should start listening to some of the things that the members from the opposition parties are putting forward. They should listen to the amendments that have been put forward. They should listen to the amendments that have been put forward by this party and other members in the House of Commons. In particular, they should consider the item which I have talked about today, that is, the deletion of the provision which prevents officers and employees of Crown corporations from holding positions on the boards of directors of banking institutions.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR DEVELOPMENT OF NEW POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In its current issue the respected magazine The Economist ridicules the government's new energy policy in an article entitled "Wildcat Canada resigns from the world". It is already clear that a number of Canadian-owned firms, the ones which are supposed to benefit from the energy policy, are moving their operations and jobs to the United States where each barrel of oil they find there now brings them four times what they can earn in Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to develop a new energy policy concerned more with creating Canadian jobs and Canadian self-sufficiency and less with his ideology and the development of energy self-sufficiency in the United States of America.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Progressive Conservative Party has made it abundantly clear several times that we want the constitution patriated based on the Vancouver formula to which ten provinces agreed last September, whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated in this House that the Progressive Conservative Party wanted the constitution patriated without the consent of the provinces, which is a complete fabrication, and whereas the position of the Progressive Conservative Party favouring the patriation of the constitution with the Vancouver formula, including the consent of a majority of the provinces, was made very clear in a debate in this House on October 28, 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House urge the Prime Minister and the Liberal party to desist from spreading this false information.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL GALLERY

CALL FOR RESTORATION OF OPERATIONS BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I also rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In a period when Canada is concerned about her national identity, one of our major cultural institutions is being eroded by budget cuts, inadequate housing and internal political struggles. The National Gallery's operational budget has been cut by some 30.7 per cent in the last two years. While we learned yesterday from the Acting Secretary of State that the gallery's acquisitions budget has been restored, this information had not been conveyed to the gallery. The autonomy of the gallery and other national museums has become seriously eroded, leading to the resignation of the director of the National Gallery. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the government restore the operations budget of the National Gallery at least to its 1978 level, that the government act quickly to find suitable permanent premises for the National Gallery and that the minister institute an immediate inquiry in the deteriorating relationship between the National Museums Board and the National Gallery and other museums.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

METRIC CONVERSION

ASSISTANCE TO FOOD RETAILERS TO CONVERT TO IMPERIAL SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On-again-off-again metric conversion in the retail food stores in Peterborough, Kamloops and Sherbrooke has caused major financial hardships to merchants in those areas. In light of the present government's flip-flop on this issue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That some of the estimated $9 million metric conversion annual budget be directed to the retail food merchants to assist them in their needless costs of purchasing metric scales and now converting these same scales back to imperial.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF PUBLIC OPINION POLL RESULTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) rejected the request for the publication of the results of the last three polls out of 16 made on behalf of the Canadian Unity Information Centre; considering that before the members of the Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, the Minister of Justice confirmed his intention to make them public when he will deemed it advisable; considering that Canadian taxpayers have subsidized those polls and that they are entitled to obtain their results, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House ask the Minister of Justice to publish immediately the results of those last three polls.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of such a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXCHANGES WITH U.S.S.R. PURSUANT TO FRIENDSHIP PROTOCOL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and hope to receive the unanimous consent of the House to the following motion. Since the Prime Minister admitted at his press conference on November 7 that he had discontinued the practice of exchanging with the Soviet Union reports on high level bilateral discussions following visits made to other countries, exchanges pursuant to the friendship protocol he signed in 1971 with the Soviet Union which has not yet been repudiated, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

That the Prime Minister provide the House with a detailed report on the nature of the exchanges he used to have with the Soviet ambassador on the "substance" of his various international discussions and "reciprocal intentions" as they applied to Canada and the U.S.S.R. in the field of international diplomacy.

EMPLOYMENT

PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the disastrous budget will create an unemployment crisis of over 1,200,000 people in this country, and in view of the fact that direct employment creation programs of this government will create only 7,000 person-years of employment this fiscal year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to reread the June debates of this House and to meet with his ministerial predecessor so he can learn how to create the maximum number of jobs for a minimum dollar amount.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR REVIEW OF UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Unemployment might be down in the Niagara peninsula according to Statistics Canada, but the social services department of the regional municipality of Niagara does not believe it. The number of persons on welfare in Niagara increased by 28 per cent in September compared to August of this year. The number on welfare in September of this year was up almost 9 per cent over that of the same month a year ago. The number of applicants for assistance so far in November compared to October has increased 42 per cent. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration review with Statistics Canada its method of calculation and determine what the real unemployment rate now is in this country and, instead of taking shelter under the Canadian community development program, he initiate programs of significance which will get the people of Canada working again.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX—CALL FOR IMPACT ASSESSMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the position taken by the Most Reverend E. W. Scott, Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, calling for the withdrawal of the special order in council permitting Amax corporation to dump its effluent into Alice Arm and to declare a moratorium upon development of the resources until technology is developed to dispose safely of the tailings, and in view of the support given to this intervention by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, chaired by the Most Reverend Remi J. De Roo and the refusal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to meet with the Primate regarding this issue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call unanimously for a comprehensive environmental impact assessment and public hearings on the Amax project and go on record as supporting the positions of the Anglican and Catholic churches of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MULTICULTURALISM

CALL FOR RECOGNITION OF DIVERSITY IN PROPOSED CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the B and B Commission report and the Pepin-Robarts commission report recognize the active presence and practice of many world cultures in Canada, and furthermore, as federal governments past and present of different partisan views have appointed ministers of state responsible for multiculturalism, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That this House officially recognize that Canada is a country in which many world cultures are actively practised and that a general statement to this effect be included in the government resolution on constitutional patriation.

I hope the government will consider seriously the need for such inclusion.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

CALL FOR AMALGAMATION OF PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The CHIP-DIPP program has been successful to some extent in conserving energy supplies used for domestic heating. The government announced in the budget the off-oil-on-gas refit programs, otherwise known as the "take gas" program, but the government has yet to figure out how to operate this program, what criteria are expected, and has delcared that it will not have regulations ready until well after the heating season. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the government amalgamate its CHIP-DIPP program and its "take gas" program into a realistic program to save oil, oil likely to be scarce because of the inability of the government to negotiate with producing provinces; and that the government produce rules and regulations for this program and the necessary legislation before December 1, 1980.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

CALL FOR REINSTATEMENT OF PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) talks about the number of new jobs created in Canada in answer to the very real concern of youth unemployment; whereas none of these new jobs went to the youth of Canada, since there are 2,000 fewer employed today than a year ago in the 15 to 24 age group; since he said that the Clark government cancelled programs which he reinstated; and since these programs for the young people of Canada do not work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to reinstate the enriched employment tax credit plan which would provide three times as many jobs in the private sector for the same price as his make-work projects and to reinstate the national youth service program which would provide meaningful work experience for the youth of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG CANADIANS AND DISABLED

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister will know that the historical average record of his department in the creation of jobs for young Canadians under the age of 25 years has been approximately 72,000 each year for about the past ten years. The minister will also know that his own record after eight months in office is the creation of between 6,000 to 10,000 jobs, the latter figure is seasonally adjusted. The minister's record amounts to about 20 per cent of the record of his predecessors—an abysmal record. The minister knows as well that, as a consequence of the budget, of the 150,000 new unemployed, many will be Canadians under the age of 25. What new programs can the minister offer young Canadians under the age of 25?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, first of all I question the data which the hon. member is using. He seems to be acquiring the magical quality of some of his colleagues, particularly the hon. member for Calgary West, of simply using figures to fit his argument. Those are not the accurate figures on the nature of youth employment in this country. As I pointed out in the House yesterday, since this time last year the government has created over 233,000 jobs in Canada. During this past decade, while the Liberals have been in office we have had the highest rate of job growth and employment of any country in the industrialized world, and it is a record we intend to keep.

We have also had to face the fact that more young people are coming into the market in Canada than in any other country. We have tried to keep pace with this influx. In particular response to the difficulties faced by young people, we introduced new programs during the spring and summer which provided opportunities in new technology so that graduates from universities and technical colleges would have an opportunity to use their skills in jobs which were applicable to their training.

We also took the basic philosophy that we had to use the resources of the government and focus those resources on areas where unemployment was most severe, areas where there was chronic high unemployment or industries were failing. We devoted our resources to the areas where the need was greatest to ensure that there were employment opportunities. We intend to keep that philosophy because we believe that the government should help those who need help the most.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, the minister, of course, knows that 10,000 jobs in relation to a record of 72,000 jobs for each of the last ten years is not a record to be proud of, and words alone will not help those people. I would like to talk about the minister's record in relation to an entirely different group of people. During the time this minister has been in office the unemployment rate for handicapped people has been 80 per cent. If the minister refers to the budget of his colleague the Minister of Finance, he will find there is no relief there for those people. What will the minister offer those people in this country who are looking for a way finally to get something from this government with regard to its promises of independent living? There is an 80 per cent unemployment rate for handicapped people in this country.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would point out that the 80 per cent rate to which the hon. member has referred is the same 80 per cent rate that was in existence when he was minister of national health and welfare and had direct responsibility for the disabled and handicapped.

Mr. McDermid: What are you going to do?

Mr. Axworthy: Before criticizing, I suggest that the hon. member look at his own record during his tenure in office and he will see the absolute failure of any action being taken on his part or on the part of his government.

The government indicated in the announcement of the job-creation programs that it would be putting forward a special employment program for the handicapped and disadvantaged. I will be making announcements to that effect in a few weeks.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, people will become very weary of constant excuses which say, "Blame the other person". I suggest the minister might turn to Hansard for December 13, 1979. At page 2342 the record sets out the intentions of the former government with respect to handicapped people.

• (1420)

I have a final question, Madam Speaker. The budget introduced by the Minister of Finance for which the Minister of Employment and Immigration was partly responsible has been condemned by almost every social planning council in this country. That includes the National Welfare Council and the Canadian Council on Social Development. The great concern of all the social planning councils of this country is this. As unemployment increases—the 150,000 that this minister has already accepted from the Minister of Finance—will the minister impress upon the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare that social programs should not diminish? We cannot have it that way. Unemployment, for which the minister is responsible, should not go up while social programs go down. Will he speak to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare and see if he can press his views upon them?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I have had a number of very useful and interesting conversations with the Minister of Finance. I think the budget that was introduced by him two weeks ago indicated his commitment to ensuring that proper attention is paid to the problems of employment in Canada. I would remind the hon. member, to begin with, that the Minister of Finance did not fall into the trap proposed by the Minister of Finance of the former government, which was to restrain and cut back on government expenditure so severely that unemployment would have been increased to well over 1,100,000 at that time. In the election campaign and in the budget we deliberately said we would not break the deficit on the backs of the unemployed.

Beyond that, the minister announced in the budget that the major emphasis of this government was in the area of economic development—to provide for permanent, long-term jobs throughout Canada, and that the major area of investment in public expenditures would be in the area of developing major projects, not short-term projects, for the unemployed.

INQUIRY RESPECTING ACTION TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister responsible for housing programs in this country yesterday did him in and increased the unemployment rate once again. According to the October labour force survey there were 45,000 fewer jobs in construction than one year ago. The construction industry has sent him a letter expressing real fear about the cutbacks in the near future.

Hidden in all that is the issue that I want him to address. The construction industry requires on-the-job training to meet our long-term need for skilled workers. They are the first to be laid off, and our training programs disappear. I would ask the minister to tell us what he intends to do to stimulate the construction industry so that we can provide this country with the trained labour force it is going to need in the 1980s?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would first point out to the hon. member that while there has been a downturn in residential construction, primarily as a consequence of the changing formation of population in this country, meaning fewer families and people in the housing market, there has been an upturn in non-residential construction. Greater investment is going into the capital goods, non-residential area. We are very sensitive to the need to ensure that there is training for the longer-term prospects in those areas.

As the hon. member will probably know, since he is a member of the parliamentary task force that is looking into the question of skill shortages, this department spends close to $800 million per year on a wide variety of training programs, many of which are operated and managed through provincial institutions. We are continuing with those programs and in fact have added money to ensure that disadvantaged groups, such as native people, will have greater opportunities in the non-residential construction area. In that way they will be able to take advantage of the major boom going on in western Canada. In those cases we are attempting to respond to the question.

As I said yesterday, we are awaiting with some degree of interest the proposals of the parliamentary task force, so that—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I must say the questions are rather long as well, and I therefore sometimes feel I have to allow for longer answers; but I should like questions to be shorter.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Madam Speaker, I shall attempt to oblige. The training program that the minister spoke about for natives provides three months of training but these people do not have the basic education to allow them to take advantage of the program. What does the minister intend to do specifically to restore the budgetary cuts for basic skill training for the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who cannot read or write adequately, as has been testified to before our committee? What does the minister intend to do about the mobility grants for trained people so they can move to where the jobs are? Two categories of people have testified that his programs do not work. We need programs that work. What will he do?

● (1425)

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has often reminded this House that he has a number of advanced degrees, and as he knows the responsibility for basic education comes under provincial jurisdiction. If there is a failure, it is in the basic provincial educational systems which do not ensure people have the skills of basic reading and writing.

I believe, Madam Speaker, the responsibility of this government is to provide for industrial and institutional training, but the provinces must recognize their responsibility as well.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for CMHC. Yesterday he informed this House, by a means which prohibited full debate, that the government was terminating the community services contribution program. On October 24 the minister assured the House that he recognized the need for this program, which generates $1.5 billion in construction each year and assists municipalities to provide essential services and rehabilitate older neighbourhoods all across Canada. In light of the minister's assurance, will he explain to this House why the government is ending a program for which there is an obvious and acknowledged need?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, the decision to terminate the program when it runs out of funding in March, 1982, is a difficult one. It is one which involved a number of hard choices. For example, what is the appropriate responsibility of this level of government? What is the appropriate level of responsibility of the provincial or municipal governments? Should the federal government be funding the construction of municipal buildings? We have to ask ourselves, does that make sense in this day and age?

In response to requests from members opposite for additional funding for such good programs as native and rural housing—

Mr. Paproski: Answer the question.

Mr. Cosgrove: —rehabilitation programs, spurring of the industry through the MURBs provision of the budget; we have to ask ourselves whether there are other programs to which the government should respond that have a higher priority. Those are some of the reasons, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, the communities will certainly feel the effects of that decision. My supplementary question is for the same minister. The federal budget reduced the government's commitment to social services, threatening health care, post-secondary education and assistance to disabled persons. It also increased costs to workers and employers under the unemployment insurance plan. Yesterday the community services contribution program was cut. Will the minister tell this House if this comprehensive assault on essential programs is part of a government strategy to relinquish its responsibility for the federal deficit and place that burden on local and provincial governments?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman is wrong on two counts in his preamble. First, there was no reduction in the budget assigned to social policies or programs of this government. That is incorrect.

Mr. Clark: There was.

Mr. Cosgrove: Second, as I indicated, the program was not cut; it was a shift in priorities. If indeed we are to respond to other expressed and urgent needs, we have to transfer funds into another area. So on both counts there was no cut.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Given the Liberal government's demonstrated mastery over the years of giving with one hand and taking away with the other, and in the light of the disappointing record of Liberal governments' long-term commitments to people, what newly discovered social priorities will he be announcing shortly to utilize the dollars he is now expropriating by breaking his commitments to local communities throughout Canada?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I do not apologize at all as a minister of this government for having taken the initiative in response to social needs by increasing 5,000 social units this year early in the life of this government. Nor do I apologize for addressing the rehabilitation program which is important to the housing industry and to the generation of jobs in that industry. Nor do I apologize for having assisted the industry in getting started with the MURBs provision which was incorporated in the budget. All of these are important considerations. All of these are important areas, such as native and rural demands for increased assistance, that I will take into account as we review the budget and look at other priorities.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO SUPPLY RENTAL ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, we have heard from the minister of housing; we know there is 10 per cent unemployment among skilled labour in the construction industry. My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister knows that his colleague, the minister of housing, cannot do very much with Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation because the corporation is broke. He had to use the money from the program he cancelled the other day, the community services contribution program, to bail himself out. What will the minister do to put to work those people who are highly skilled in the construction industry to supply the need for rental housing? The minister knows the concern—a 1 per cent vacancy rate in Toronto and two-tenths of 1 per cent in Vancouver. What is he going to do to put these people to work so he will not have to pay them unemployment insurance?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I want to resist repeating exactly what my colleague the minister of housing has already stated. He has indicated very clearly to this House that the budget introduced several measures which will stimulate housing construction. Perhaps most important is the reintroduction of the MURBs program which will provide a major incentive for the redevelopment of rental housing. Further, as the minister indicated, the proposal to cut the community services program was not to pay off other programs but to reallocate the money in a way more effective and productive than the community services program has to date. That is the responsibility of the government—to use money wisely and well.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the minister and the minister of housing talk about the MURBs program. That is a program to build high rise pads for the rich.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: In any event, that program is only a $15 million stimulus to the economy. What program is the minister going to introduce, other than the fool MURBs program, to put these people to work and build the housing which Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation in their report to the minister of housing says is necessary?

Mr. Axworthy: Again, Madam Speaker, this is a question that might more accurately be placed with the minister of housing. I remind the hon. member that while he seems to be quite exercised about MURBs, several of his colleagues from the Vancouver area campaigned on the very platform of reintroducing the MURBs program. Their caucus should get their act straight and understand what they are trying to do. They cannot divide on the same issue. Either they want them or they do not want them. If one part of the hon. member's caucus wants them and the other does not, then we as a government are at least prepared to make a decision, which obviously they are incapable of doing.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CHANGES IN ENERGY POLICY TO PROMOTE INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I draw to his attention the fact that not everybody is being critical of the energy policy he just brought out. I have an article entitled "Thank you, Canada" which states "Trudeau may inadvertently have done more for U.S. energy production than all the regulations and all the bureaucrats in the U.S. department of energy".

In view of the distinctly changed environment in the United States as a result of the election of Governor Reagan and the distinct contrast between the environment there and the environment in Canada, will the minister advise what changes in the energy policy he is proposing to make to bring the economies of our two countries closer together and encourage Canadian companies and Canadians to spend their money in Canada and help the energy supply in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, policies in Canada are determined by the government and Parliament of Canada. I submit an election in the United States should not be the criterion in determining what is in the interests of Canada.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, surely the minister understands that we have a free flow of capital between this country and the United States. When you have a substantially better environment in one country than another, capital and people move. How is the minister proposing to stop the exodus of drilling rigs, production and exploration companies from moving their money south of the border where it will help security of supply in the United States and hurt the security position in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I want to reassure the hon. member that the government is not considering any step to stop the free flow of capital or goods. As far as the policy announced by the government is concerned, we are convinced that that policy is in the interests of Canada, and that the measures that have been announced will contribute significantly to increasing ownership and control of that industry by Canadians. We are convinced it is high time that Canada should move in that direction.

SMALL LOANS ACT

BILL C-44—EFFECT OF PROVISIONS ON SMALL BORROWERS

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. In a newspaper article it is alleged that, under Bill C-44 to amend the Small Loans Act, small borrowers will be swallowed whole.

Could the minister tell the House whether the aim of this bill is indeed to slaughter small borrowers or simply to enable them to continue to borrow according to their needs, and in peace?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, hon. members will recall that they voted unanimously to repeal the so-called Small Loans Act. If the government, after consultations between several ministers, namely the minister of education and the Minister of Finance, was prompted to propose to the House to repeal the Small Loans Act, it was at the request of financial institutions which are above all concerned with and interested in consumer protection, namely the caisses populaires on one side and the credit unions on the other side. Because of the representations of those institutions which saw their financial activities jeopardized by that outdated, obsolete piece of legislation, the government proposed to repeal the Small Loans Act. Far from harming consumers, this will precisely enable institutions such as caisses populaires and credit unions to adapt their consumer loan services.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY FOR WOMEN

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, this week the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women released a report called "Women in the Public Service: Overlooked and Undervalued". My question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Since it is a fact that women constitute 60 per cent of the clerical and support staff in the public service, while only a few of them have senior management positions, and since the advisory council estimates it will take over 66 years to achieve equality in the public service at the present rate, what action is the government willing to take now to indicate that it has any commitment at all to equality in the public service?

● (1440)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may have forgotten that the affirmative action program has been instituted in at least three departments, namely, Employment and Immigration, Secretary of State and Treasury Board. I am very pleased to advise the House that substantial progress has been made. The three ministers, including myself, met earlier this week to review progress to date and we are still in stage one; the hon. member will remember there are three stages to the program. We hope that the findings which we make in terms of these departments will be useful in providing similar affirmative action programs across the public service. So I am very optimistic. I might also add that I met with Mrs. Anderson yesterday and advised her of the various steps we are taking to improve the representation of women in the public service.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I expected the minister to respond in that manner. In 1972 there was a cabinet directive encouraging managers to promote women. Nothing has really happened since then. That was eight years ago. We know that there is an affirmative action study in three departments out of 100 different departments and agencies in the federal government.

With that in mind, considering the fact that there are five outstanding complaints before the Human Rights Commission right now with regard to the public service and that at the present time there is no commitment from the government to do anything other than make a study among three departments—and only three departments—when and how will the government undertake a comparative wage study to make sure that women receive the right salaries for the work they are doing, rather than having the government drag it to the human rights tribunal in order to get action?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the hon. member said he expected me to respond in the way I did. I thought my response was very positive indeed. I think we have taken very major initiatives in this regard, and to denigrate the affirmative action program which we are instituting in these three departments is really doing a disservice to the government and the efforts that have been made in this connection.

An hon. Member: Have you met Gordon Fairweather?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, I have met with Mr. Fairweather. The hon. member will also be interested to know that in Treasury Board we are taking initiatives to seek out, through our own means, where there are infringements of the rule of equal pay for work of equal value. There are complaints. There are five complaints, as the hon. member suggests, before the Human Rights Commission. Steps have been taken between my department and the commission to settle those complaints. Those negotiations are proceeding. We are taking initiatives, I suggest, on all fronts; and I am sure that it will not be 66 years before we see very major breakthroughs in terms of representation of women in the public service.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Finance stated in his budget that the government would be spending $350 million during the next four years, divided equally between the economic development envelope and the social security envelope. This means that $44 million a year will be spent on economic development. Would the minister tell the House what happened to his "new industrial policy", which he outlined in great detail to the Toronto Star and which appeared in a very big spread on September 28? In this article the minister said the government would be spending $2.75 billion over the next four years, which means that it would be spending $687 million a year on industrial development.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is mistaken. I gave no interview to the Toronto Star in which I said there would be that level of expenditure.

Mr. Hees: It is all in here in great detail.

Mr. Gray: I think the hon. member should read the paper more carefully. It is a speculative story. I should tell the House that if the hon. member would read the budget more carefully he would find instead of $44 million a year, totalling $350 million over the next four years, the budget provides some $6.5 billion, which is a 22 per cent increase in the economic development envelope. That is quite apart from the $8.5 billion in the energy initiatives program. It is a far cry from what the hon. member is saying. It is an expenditure that will involve tens of thousands of jobs and strong industrial development right across this country, unlike the decline which would have come about if his government had stayed in office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Obviously, Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has not talked to the Minister of Finance and has not learned the very sad news that all he is going to get to spend on economic development this year is $44 million—no matter what he is trying to dream up. I ask him which of the many programs he outlined in great detail—and the Star says the minister said he would do this, this and this; it is all down in black and white, in positive terms—is he going to spend his $44 million on? Does he not think that in future it would be a good idea to sit down and talk to the Minister of Finance ahead of time before he outlines his grandiose dream schemes, so that big brother can tell him just exactly what he is going to allow him to do and what he is not going to allow him to do?

Mr. Gray: I again ask the hon. member to read the article. It is a speculative story. All the same, I think he will find that what is said in the budget indicates that I have, in fact, talked to the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: He has agreed with me that instead of the paltry amount which would have been provided for industrial development if this House had approved the Crosbie budget, he has put aside some $6.5 billion in the economic development envelope alone. This does not take into account the other $8.5 billion in the energy initiatives program. This means a very substantial increase—billions of dollars—in funds for industrial development. I want to emphasize that means tens of thousands of jobs across this country, with very substantial industrial development. This is something that would not have happened had the hon. member's government stayed in office.

EXTERNAL AID

JAMAICA—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL OFFER FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On the day of the election in Jamaica, the Leader of the New Democratic Party sent a message to the left-wing, pro-Castro prime minister Manley of Jamaica extending to him "all best wishes for today" and he signed it "Ed". In view of the Prime Minister's close friendship and personal relationship with Prime Minister Manley at the time, who through his policies has pounded the Jamaican economy into bankruptcy, in view of the fact that Canada sent Jamaica some $100 million prior to Manley's 1976 election and, since 1968, millions of dollars, in an abortive attempt to socialize that country, is the Prime Minister planning to send the same amount of aid to the new moderate prime minister of Jamaica, Mr. Seaga?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the prime minister of Jamaica wishes to address any request to this government, I am sure he will have more dignity than to address it through the mouth of a backbencher who spreads such falsehoods.

Mr. Stewart: Madam Speaker, I expected that same type of arrogant reply which the hon. gentleman has been giving for 12 years. As the Prime Minister and Mr. Manley were both with Mr. Laski at the London School of Economics, did the Prime Minister send a message of good luck to the now deposed Mr. Manley, or was it included by proxy with the message sent by the Leader of the NDP?

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Given the fact that current prices for export Canadian red spring wheat are in the vicinity of $7 and $8 and the export price for durum is in the vicinity of $8 and $9, and given the fact that the current initial price which has been prescribed by the Canadian Wheat Board is between $4.25 and $5 per bushel respectively, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport when we can expect this government to announce an adjustment in initial prices, and will it also be accompanied by an interim payment?

• (1450)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is generally considered that it is wiser first to see if a trend will last before drawing conclusions from it. Second, it is also agreed that it takes time before the money comes into the Canadian Wheat Board account. That is why the minister in charge of the Wheat Board prefers to wait before readjusting initial prices to see if the trend will last and, second, to let the money come in before he starts distributing it among farmers. That is the position.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, given the fact that this trend has continued since the last adjustment which was made in July, would the Minister of Transport prevail upon the minister in charge of the Wheat Board or do something to jolt him into action? Because the farmers are needing this money very desperately—and it is their money.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, again I have to repeat that should the Wheat Board do that now, it would have to borrow the money from the banks. The logical thing to do is to wait for the money to come in before he starts passing it around.

HOUSING

SPECULATION ON FLOATING MORTGAGE INTEREST RATE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it concerns mortgage interest rates. The minister has said on a number of occasions that he regards the high interest rates from which Canadians have been suffering—Canadians now have to pay over 15 per cent on first mortgages and 17 per cent and 18 per cent on second mortgages—to be a temporary phenomenon and that he does not anticipate having to make any changes in public policy to take account of this problem.

In light of the speculation in financial circles that in order to be able to provide five-year mortgages they will have to move to a floating mortgage system, does the minister contemplate any changes in the Interest Act which would make this possible, and is he still seriously putting forward the proposition that high mortgage rates are in fact simply a temporary phenomenon?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not recall having made a blanket statement that the current levels of interest rates are temporary. What I have said and repeat today is that as far as interest rates are concerned we have been on a roller coaster for the past several months. We had very high rates which dropped considerably, and they have risen again. Today, for example, the auction of treasury bills showed a slight decrease in the bank rate, and maybe that trend will continue in the future; but I do not think the situation is firm enough at the present time on which to base a long-term policy. It is quite uncertain, and I think that uncertainty has been reflected over the past six months. Certainly over the period I have been Minister of Finance no one has been able to predict with any accuracy the performance in the future of interest rates. If hon. members in the New Democratic Party have a better crystal ball than others, I will be glad to use it.

ASSISTANCE TO LOW AND MIDDLE-INCOME CANADIANS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I think we on this side of the House all agree that it has been extremely difficult to predict many things since the Minister of Finance has taken over as Minister of Finance. There are no crystal balls on this side.

My supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for CMHC. The minister will know that housing starts are down to the lowest level since the mid-1960s. The minister will also know that there is no certainty at all in the interest rate picture, and we can foresee rates of 15 per cent, 16 per cent and 18 per cent over the next number of months and, indeed, years. The minister has announced a cut in a program from $400 million to $250 million and now to zero. The city of Toronto housing department has just issued a report saying it cannot—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking a supplementary question, and I urge him to be more brief.

Mr. Rae: Is the minister in a position, since he is saying he is simply changing priorities, to announce any housing policy which will provide any guarantee to low and middle-income Canadians that they will in fact be able to renew their mortgages and to buy first homes over the next three or four years?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, first of all the public should be aware—and so should the hon. member if he is not—that the trend in housing starts is up. The trend for October was back to starts of 187,000. The trend since June has been upwards. The Minister of Finance has indicated, on the other hand, that the trend today for interest rates is down. We have indicated that we are watching that. We indicated in the Speech from the Throne that we are concerned that people renewing mortgages would be faced with challenges and that we would be prepared in hardship cases to take a look at them on an individual basis.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

NATURAL GAS EXPORT TAX—INSTITUTION OF LEGAL ACTION BY GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, and it follows a question I asked him on October 31 with respect to possible court action to test the validity of the natural gas tax. I note from the press that the province of Alberta has instituted proceedings in the court. According to the answer given to me by the Prime Minister, there was to have been contact between the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta with respect to the institution of action. Was there contact between the government of the right hon. gentleman and the government of Alberta prior to the institution of any legal action by the government of Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity to talk to the minister of energy of Alberta a few days ago. I tried to reach him, without success, last week, but I reached him yesterday morning. He told me at the time that the government of Alberta was considering what legal action should be taken, but that that was under the responsibility of the attorney general and minister of justice. I indicated to him that the Minister of Justice of Canada would certainly be very interested in exchanging views with his colleague from Alberta. I also indicated to him our previous declaration to the effect that we were ready to co-operate with the province of Alberta in expediting this case.

In the papers today I noted that the government of Alberta has indeed decided to refer the matter to the court of appeal, and it asked two specific questions. To my knowledge, however, there has been no consultation whatever with the Government of Canada as to the wording of those questions nor to which courts they should go.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is answering this question, and in the absence of the Minister of Justice, would the minister consider communicating with his colleague to see whether it might be appropriate for there to be some early consultation with respect not only to the questions but also to where the action may be brought? I have in mind a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, where the Alberta action would ultimately go in any event so that the question could be settled expeditiously and the matter could be out of the way in terms of the discussions which are supposed to take place between the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I will certainly act upon the representation of the hon. member. We indicated that we were ready to expedite this process, but it appears that the government of Alberta had decided on its own to go to the court of appeal with the questions which have been indicated. But if the government of Alberta would be willing to go directly to the Supreme Court, I am sure we would be quite accommodating, and I will raise the matter with the Minister of Justice.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED LAW BREAKING BY FORCE

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General, I would like to refer to a report in this morning's The Globe and Mail concerning statements attributed to that minister. On what basis did the minister make the statement that former solicitors general were never informed that the RCMP had been breaking the law since the 1960s?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have, of course, seen that article and I am glad to have the opportunity to indicate that it does not accurately reflect my views. These questions are before the McDonald commission now. Evidence is available to the McDonald commission on which it will be basing its conclusions; and the government and in particular I are awaiting the report of the McDonald commission on this and other matters.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would be grateful if the government House leader would indicate the business of the House. I am particularly interested today in having him establish for us his priorities among the freedom of information bill, the bill respecting judges' salaries and the postal corporation bill. Could he give us some indication of what is the order of his priorities with respect to those pieces of legislation?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, beginning next Friday, November 21, we shall have either one or two debates on the proclamations tabled yesterday by the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). For this purpose, as I mentioned last week, we have set aside the last six sitting days in November, which means that we can plan only for the period beginning today and ending next Friday, November 21.

If we complete consideration of the bank bill in time, that is before next Friday—and I have every reason to believe, following the consultations that I have had with the House leaders of both parties, that we can expect to get third reading of this bill probably next Monday or Tuesday—we shall have two days to complete the second reading debate on the Post Office bill, begin the second reading debate on the bill concerning the salary of judges, and to try to refer to a committee the freedom of information bill. When we have debated the proclamations, we of course plan on holding the last opposition day, and we shall then sit in committee of the whole for six consecutive days, but on this matter, my colleagues opposite know that we plan on holding these sittings in the first week of December. I shall be able to confirm this within the next few days.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, the only comment I wish to make is that I did not understand that that was the order of priority for the three bills coming between the Bank Act and the debate on the proclamations. My understanding of those three bills was that the first one was to be the Post Office Corporation Act and the second one was to be the Freedom of Information Act, leaving the judges' salaries bill at the bottom of that list. I am a little surprised to hear the government House leader put the judges' salaries measure ahead of the freedom of information bill. I hope that the understanding I have is correct, that of those three bills the order will be the post office bill and the freedom of information bill, followed by the judges' salaries bill if there is any time left for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have taken it for granted that, following the request of the New Democratic Party, there will be no second reading debate on the freedom of information bill as I thought they were in a hurry to have this bill referred to committee. I must repeat that this bill is still a priority for us and that if members opposite insist on debating it, we shall do so immediately after the debate on the Post Office bill, provided this can be done before November 21. However, I must repeat what I told the hon. member yesterday, that we also place great importance on the bill concerning the salary of judges and that, if we cannot come to an agreement with his party, we intend to call this bill within the next few days.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the House business. This time last week I asked the government House leader whether, in order to facilitate discussion in this House on second reading of Bill C-42, the postal crown corporation bill, the minister would be prepared to send clauses giving regulatory power to the Crown corporation to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, as requested in the report of that committee which was tabled in the House in July. As reported at page 4521 of Hansard, the government House leader responded to my question by saying:

> Madam Speaker, I will consult with the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) as soon as possible. But in any case we would much prefer the bill to be sent to committee right away, if possible.

Has the minister spoken to his colleague, the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), and is the government agreeable to following the request of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, namely, that the regulation-making authority be sent to that committee on second reading at the same time as the miscellaneous estimates committee looks at the substance of the crown corporation bill?

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BUSSIÈRES—CORRECTION OF ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to correct an unfortunate slip of the tongue that I made in replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant). I stated that in the discussions I have held I had consulted the minister of education, and I want it clearly understood that I meant that I had consulted our excellent colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), in preparing the bill to repeal the Small Loans Act.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I had no opportunity to obtain confirmation from the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) for the simple reason that I did not explain to him the whole problem, because I was busy planning the business of the House. My colleague knows that there has been no sitting during four days, and as soon as I came back I attempted to reach an understanding with opposition parties concerning the televising of proceedings in committee, which required all my time.

I now intend to contact the Postmaster General today about this and hope to be able to come back to my hon. colleague with an answer later today or tomorrow.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM MISSISQUOI TO BROME-MISSISQUOI

Mr. André Bachand (Missisquoi) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-620, to change the name of the electoral district of Missisquoi.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Bachand: Madam Speaker, the reason for this bill is that my constituency's name does not correspond to reality. Formerly it was Brome-Missisquoi, it was changed to Missisquoi yet all my constituents still call it Brome-Missisquoi.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION RESPECTING BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, after having had consultations with my colleagues, the House leaders on the other side, I am glad to report that we have come to an agreement with regard to the broadcasting of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. I think there is now unanimous consent to allow me to move a motion which, in accordance with our understanding, will be approved without debate. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That, further to the resolution of this House of January 25, 1977, as subsequently implemented, this House approves the television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution on the basis of the same principles and practice, mutatis mutandis, governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, including the concept of "electronic Hansard", provided that any subcommittee of the said committee, shall not be broadcast by television, but shall be broadcast by radio, except the subcommittee on agenda, which shall not be broadcast;

That it be an instruction to the committee that it undertake the aforementioned action as soon as physically possible without disturbing the proceedings of the committee now undertaken or planned;

That it be an instruction to the committee that all decisions concerning the implementation of this order shall be taken only by the committee's subcommittee on agenda; and

That a message be sent to the Senate asking their honours to unite with this House in the aforementioned actions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motion No. 7 (Mr. Rae), motion No. 8 (Mr. Rae) and motion No. 9 (Mr. Rae).

Madam Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at one o'clock, motions Nos. 7, 8 and 9 were under consideration and the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) had the floor.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I was speaking about the amendments to the Bank Act before the noon break. I referred to my support for the amendment to delete the section restricting employees of Crown corporations from being placed on the boards of directors of banking institutions. I tried to express that these people could offer a great deal to the banking institutions of the country because of their expertise in running corporations, in some instances large ones. Not only would they be profitable enterprises, but at the same time they would have some degree of service to the public.

It made me think back to the time when I first had to acquire a mortgage for myself and my wife to take over a home. At the time of the purchase, the cost of the home was approximately $38,000 and the interest rate was locked in at 12.75 per cent over a 25-year amortization period. Over that 25 years the cost of owning that home would be well in excess of $100,000. Certainly most of the cost is eaten up by the interest rates of the banks, and they have very little concern for the service they are actually providing.

I should like to go back further than that time, to a time when I was involved in adult education in the province of Alberta. At that time under some of the life skill programs we looked at budgeting for individuals and families and tried to get people involved in adult education to learn more about basic education and ways of living. When we talked to them about budgeting, we were talking about it over the lifetime of a person, that an average Canadian could expect to have an earning power of somewhere in the area of $200,000 to $250,000.

Since that time and over the last ten years, this has changed quite extraordinarily. For example, if one wants to buy a home today in the area of $60,000 to $80,000, by the time it is actually paid for it would amount, at today's interest rates and the way banks handle mortgages, to more than the expected earning power of individuals in 1970-71. Certainly it does not provide a very good picture for Canadian families who are looking at buying first homes, something which should be a very basic necessity of the people in our country.

It is time to make the banks more responsive to the needs of individuals and families. Not only should they be oriented toward maximizing their profits on the money of people who have savings accounts within their banks, but they should be able to attain some level of service similar to that provided to the Canadian public by the boards of directors and employees of Crown corporations. Also I mentioned the names of individuals who could work very effectively on the boards of directors of some banking institutions.

I think other sections should be deleted, and I support the amendment to the section which indicates that public employees cannot hold positions on the boards of directors of banks. There are some very good public employees who could provide meaningful input on the boards of directors of banks. These people have dealt with the banks and can look at them in a somewhat different perspective from the view of the usual corporate elite who control banking institutions.

Although some of the people involved on boards of directors could be considered common, average individuals, certainly the overpowering balance is not with that group. It is with a group which has not had to deal with banks in the same manner as average Canadian citizens have to deal with banking institutions. Public employees could have a meaningful input because of their training as public employees and the expertise they have acquired in working for the Government of Canada, in this instance, or for various provincial governments across the country. They could provide a scope of experience which very few people have in the private sector and in banking institutions. Their perspective is more from the point of view of the private sector; certainly that is dominant. Some input or training from the standpoint of public employees of Crown corporations could be very beneficial to the understanding of how governments operate and how organizations are structured to serve the public. This would be beneficial to our banking institutions and their boards of directors. I would not want to see the government discriminate against these people by not allowing them to have that meaningful input.

Before my time expires, I should like to reiterate what I told government members prior to the noon break. We want to see some substantial changes in the Bank Act. We have talked about a few of those changes today and others have been talked about by members of the opposition. I think they are very necessary and the government will have to pull together some of these recommendations, changes and amendments to form an effective Canadian banking community to serve the people of this country in the manner to which they are entitled. The deadline is coming very close. November 30 is not that far off; we are only a few weeks away. The government must incorporate some of these very substantive changes, not just the cosmetic ones it has proposed, in order for my party and perhaps other members of the opposition to support the Bank Act as it now stands. Before we as members of Parliament can support the Bank Act, we want to feel that Canadians are receiving what is justly due them from banking institutions and be satisfied as to the level of service they should be receiving. Unless those changes are made to the Bank Act, I think November 30 will come more rapidly than even members of the government expect.

We will propose other changes and amendments—and I imagine members of the Conservative party will propose some as well—to make the Bank Act the responsive document it should be. It should serve Canadians so that they are not dealt with harshly. The people who control the banks should be average Canadian citizens who are not interested in maximizing profits alone, so that the people who are required to deal with banks can attain the necessary level of funding they require to buy homes and purchase automobiles or other forms of transportation which are so necessary to our Canadian way of life.

• (1520)

With those comments, I would ask the government to give very careful consideration within the next couple of weeks to some of the amendments proposed by my party to the Bank Act so that we may in good conscience consider supporting the government on this act, the reform of which we have talked about in this House for many years.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I just want to point out to the previous speaker that the changes made at the committee stage were not only "cosmetic", to use his expression, but substantial changes which happened to have been suggested to us by colleagues in his party, namely the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), and by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) as well as by the Liberal members sitting on the committee.

In-depth changes have really been made in the present legislation. Indeed, the committee made the corrections needed to have an act that could best serve the common good; it proposed those amendments some of which had elements of substance. I am convinced that if the hon. member went to the trouble of reading the other motions to be put before us, he would see that the government as well is proposing amendments which are much more than mere cosmetic additions, again to use his expression, mere applications of make-up on pale cheeks or lipstick on pink lips.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am puzzled why the government is so hesitant to support this very simple amendment, which provides that officers or officials of Crown corporations be permitted to sit on the boards of directors of banks. There are many Crown corporations in this country. Many of them were established years ago by both Liberal and Conservative governments and they are now large, successful organizations. To name a few, there is Ontario Hydro, which was established more than 50 years ago by a Conservative government and which is one of the largest, most successful organizations in this country. Then there are the telephone systems of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. In Manitoba the publicly-owned telephone system was established by a Conservative government headed by Sir Rodmond Roblin, I believe, back in 1908. These are very efficient organizations and their senior officials are doing as effective a job for their companies and the people they serve as any private corporation.

Under the legislation as it exists today, the president of CNR, for example, could not be a director of a bank, but the president of CPR is, in fact, a director of a bank as well as a host of other companies. Mr. Sinclair, the president of CPR, is also the head of Canadian Pacific Investments, CP Air, Cominco, Canadian Marconi, MacMillan-Bloedel, Seagram Company, Sun Life, and I could go on and on. I see no reason why senior officials of Crown corporations which are playing an increasingly useful and vital role in the life of the provinces and the country as a whole should be discriminated against in a way in which the directors and senior officials of private corporations are not.

The only reason I can find is the one which we in this party know so well, that the disposition of both the Liberal party and the Conservative party is that anything which is done in the private sector is good and most things done in the public sector are bad. If the minister wishes to make the banking system work more effectively, I suggest he encourage the heads of some of the Crown corporations which I have mentioned, and many more which I have not mentioned, to participate in the activities of the banks which play such a major role in our country.

I know I speak for the members of my party when I say we have a good deal more faith in the objectivity, the unbiased approach, the goodwill and good thinking of officers of Crown corporations than we have in the officers of the privately-owned corporations who, quite properly, are more interested in protecting their interests and the interests of their shareholders. I urge the minister and the government to give serious and favourable consideration to permitting this amendment to be added to the bill.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on these three amendments. The amendment contained in section 35(1)(n) on page 33 of the act refers to ministers of the Crown "in right of Canada or in right of any province". Clearly, the mover of the motion should agree that it would be a conflict of interest if a minister of the Crown were to sit on the board of directors of a private bank.

As I pointed out earlier, this statute directs the control of private banks. If there is to be any effective conflict of interest legislation at all, a minister of the Crown must be prohibited from being a director of a private bank. Indeed, any sense in conflict on interest guidelines for ministers of the Crown would make that subsection unnecessary. On the other hand, if it were taken out it would indicate that the government is allowing ministers of the Crown to be directors of a private corporation, and I am sure that my friend in the New Democratic Party would not want that to be the case.

Clause 35(1)(m) deals with an agent or an employee of Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada or a province. In this case I have some sense of agreement with the NDP. But surely an employee of the Crown directly would be or could well be in conflict of interest if he or she were to take a position on the board of directors of a private bank. After all, it is the duty and obligation of government to regulate these private corporations referred to as chartered banks. It strikes me that it would be improper for a person who is an employee of the government, particularly of Her Majesty, to be also an employee of a bank. Surely, Her Majesty would require that employees who are likely to be appointed directors of banks work exclusively for Her Majesty. In all probability the type of people who are likely to be appointed directors of banks would not be junior employees. They are people who qualify, in accordance with bank charters, shares and so on in a bank, to be a director, people who would lend expertise to the directorship of the bank. Therefore, they are likely to be people in a senior position in government. It would strike me as improper that they should be directors. With respect to these two amendments, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support them as I think they are improper.

I should like to deal now with Crown corporations about which a great many sensible things have been said already. There are some major Crown corporations where the government has deliberately tried to divorce itself from the control of policy. It may be to the advantage of those Crown corporations to be represented on the board of directors of a bank much the same as any other independent business corporation might be represented.

There is a very large oil company in this country called Petro-Canada. Can we say that a senior officer of Petro-Canada may not be a director of a bank, whereas a senior officer of Imperial Oil or some competing company may? That certainly would give more rights and privileges to private companies than to Petro-Canada. As members of the New Democratic Party know, I do not greatly favour the massive development of Crown corporations but it has been the policy of this and preceding governments to impose certain large obligations on Crown corporations, some of which compete directly with the private sector. Air Canada is a corporation that the government claims it is not trying to direct. If that is so, then perhaps an officer or employee of Air Canada could be a director of a bank. That is particularly so when some Crown corporations like Air Canada or Canadian National Railways go to the marketplace to borrow fairly large sums of money. It could be to the advantage of those corporations to have representation on the board of directors of a bank and, of course, it could be to the advantage of a bank to have on its board of directors representation from a Crown corporation which may be one of its major customers. It may be advantageous to the government if it were to rethink the question of Crown corporations and this amendment, rather than just vote it out completely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 7 in the name of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 8 (Mr. Rae) negatived on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is now on motion No. 9. All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Rae) negatived on division.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 22 to 24 at page 34 and substituting the following therefor:

"director of the bank."

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 41 and 42 at page 56 and substituting the following therefor:

"corporation."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Perhaps I should indicate to the House that these two motions are grouped for debate but will be voted on separately.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important amendment, in our view, because we recognize the crucial importance of the banks in the economic life of our country. The big five banks have between them assets of over $200 billion which they themselves control or control in association with other major corporations in this country.

If we look at the corporate structure of this country and consult the Financial Post Who's Who of directors, we see how the interlocking directorships operate, how virtually all the large corporations are tied in with one or more banks and how senior officers of those corporations are also directors of the largest banks. They can use their position and influence with the banks to get the kind of financing they need to increase corporate concentration in this country.

As an illustration of this, Mr. Speaker, I would point to the Thompson interests which have expanded in recent years. It has taken over one of the oldest companies in the country, the Hudson's Bay Company and has taken over many newspapers, including the Toronto The Globe and Mail and others in the FP chain. It was able to shut down the Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper in my city which was just about as old as the city itself. It is no coincidence that Kenneth Thompson is a director of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. If he needed financing to help him in these acquisitions—which I suggest is not necessarily, to put it mildly, in the interests of the people of Canada—it would be to his advantage to be a director of the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

What we have seen in recent years because of the kind of business and financial system we have in the country and because so many of the larger corporations work together, having directors on each other's boards, is a continual increase in the acquisition of smaller Canadian-owned companies by larger companies and multinational corporations. That has not been good for the country, Mr. Speaker. We have witnessed the worsening of regional disparities, accompanied by increasingly high unemployment. In fact, at the present time we probably have the highest rate of unemployment of any of the western industrialized countries.

In his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) told us that things are going to be worse, that there will be another 1 per cent unemployment in 1981. That means another 100,000 people unemployed, Mr. Speaker. It means that the real number of unemployed people in this country will be over one million in 1981.

We have seen the percentage of the work force in Canada that is engaged in manufacturing—and there is no industrial country whose economic welfare is not very largely determined by the strength of the manufacturing sector—consistently decline year by year. In 1970, 26 per cent of the work force in Canada was engaged in manufacturing. By 1979 that figure had dropped to 19 per cent. In 1970, 21 per cent of our exports were manufactured goods; today it is just 10 per cent. In 1970, Canada had a $3 billion deficit in manufactured goods and last year that deficit was $11.5 billion.

It is not surprising why the makers and shapers of our economic life are busy gobbling up one company after another, not because it adds anything to the productivity of this country but because it gives them more power and clout. So why would they be concerned about manufacturing? I ask the minister what benefits did the people of Canada get because the Thompson interests bought the Hudson's Bay Co.? What benefits did the people of Canada get because the Bronfman interests bought Brascan? Not one per cent more in the way of increased productivity was produced by any of these acquisitions. Part of the reason for this kind of thing is because the system we have encourages top officers of Canada's largest corporations to be directors of other corporations. It particularly encourages them to be directors of banks. I have evidence here.

I know some members will just push aside my argument by saying it is just another socialist argument. But I want members to think about what I have been saying today. Even in such a prestigious newspaper as The New York Times, there was an article commenting on the recent merger activities in Canada. Regarding Canada's banks and their interlocking directorships, the article reads as follows:

> The concentration of banks is so great and the alliances of companies with specific banks so strong that a single bank can find itself financing both the suitor and the sought. Such was the case last fall for the Bank of Commerce when Brascan went after Woolworth's.
> The banks with their corps of 60 or 70 directors each and their circling clans of corporations also provide the detailed intelligency system so vital in the fraternity that is Canada's business establishment. This, and a system of interlocking directorates, provide the tips, the data, the shared experiences and, above all, the connections that smooth Canada's merger movement.
> It is no coincidence, for instance, that Consumers Gas and Hiram Walker both use Toronto-Dominion, where Hiram's chairman, H. Clifford Hatch, is a director. Many in this network grew up at the same elite schools together, such as Upper Canada College. They join the same clubs, such as the Toronto, Ontario or Albany Clubs. Their children marry within the network.

It did not take a great deal of work to look into some of the people involved in these kinds of interlocking directorships. What we see is the close connection between the banks and some of the largest corporations in this country. Some members in this House may have had an opportunity a couple of weeks ago to see a segment of the television program called "The Canadian Establishment", produced by the CBC. In Saturday Night one of the producers wrote an article in which he complained about the difficulties he had in getting people to agree to be televised. I thought as I watched the program that these people should have paid the CBC for showing them in such a favourable light.

A whole hour was spent on Ian Sinclair, chief executive officer of CPR. He is also a director of the Royal Bank. Let us take a look at some of the other corporations of which he is a director. They are as follows: Canadian Pacific Investments Ltd; Canadian Pacific Air Lines; Midland Simcoe Elevator Co; Cominco Ltd; Canadian Marconi; MacMillan Bloedel Limited; Marathon Realty Co; Sun Life Assurance Co; Union Carbide Canada; and the Chase Manhattan Corp. This latter one shows the connection with the international banking community.

Let us look at some of the other members of the board of directors of the Royal Bank of Canada. The chairman is W. Earle McLaughlin. I am not going to take more than the time I have to put the entire record in Hansard, but I will read just a few of the corporations of which Mr. McLaughlin is a director. They are as follows: Sun Alliance Insurance Company; the Algoma Steel Corporation; Allied Chemical Canada; Canadian Pacific—of course, along with his friend Mr. Sinclair—General Motors Corporation; Power Corporation; Standard Brands.

The vice-chairman of the Royal Bank, Mr. Jock Finlayson, is a director of the Royal Bank of Canada Trust Corporation; PanCanadian Petroleum Ltd; Royal Insurance Company, and Sun Life Assurance Company.

Let us look at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce whose chairman and chief executive officer is Mr. Russell Harrison. He is a director also of Canada Life Assurance Co; Dominion Realty Co; Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited and Royal Insurance Company.

Mr. Blenkarn: These are all good companies.

Mr. Orlikow: They are all good companies; that is just the point. But I would hate, Mr. Speaker, to be the head of a small company trying to compete with one of these large companies. These are the people who my friends in the Conservative party are supposed to represent, namely, the small businessmen. But what are they doing? The Tories are mocking me because I am saying that these big corporations are using their connections with the bank and taking unfair advantage of the small companies.

Mr. Blenkarn: What evidence do you have of that?

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) asks what evidence do I have.

Mr. Blenkarn: You do not have a tittle of evidence.

Mr. Orlikow: Instead of his constant asinine braying, if the hon. member would keep quiet for about 30 seconds I can tell him to look in any newspaper in Canada where he will find articles about bankruptcies. Bankruptcies are at an all-time high rate in Canada. Part of the reason why small companies are going bankrupt is because they cannot compete with the giants. The giants have the support of the banks, and that is who the member for Mississauga wants to represent instead of his constituents.

Mr. Kempling: That is all socialist rhetoric.

Mr. Orlikow: Let us take a look now at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Let us see how its directors interlock with most of the giant corporations in Canada. As I said, Russell Harrison is the chairman and chief executive officer of that bank. He is also a director of Canada Life Assurance Co; Falconbridge Nickel; Royal Insurance Company. Mr. Lawrence Greenwood, the executive vice-president, is a director of Kinross Mortgage Corp, Imperial Life Assurance, and of Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. Mr. J. D. Leitch is a director of Upper Lakes Shipping Ltd; American Airlines Inc; Dominion Foundries and Steel; Massey-Ferguson. I am not objecting to Massey-Ferguson getting the financing it needs to stay in operation—

Mr. Blenkarn: I hope not.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member says he hopes not. But I wonder how objective Mr. Leitch will be as a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce if he is asked to advance money in the form of a loan to Massey-Ferguson when he is also a director of that company. I wonder which hat he wears. I wonder how he can protect the interests of the depositors in the bank and see that their money is not advanced for a bad loan.

• (1550)

Then we have W. F. McLean, a director of Canada Packers Limited, Canadian General Electric Company, the Steel Company of Canada. From my own city, we have George Richardson of James Richardson and Sons, the Hudson's Bay Company, Green Valley Fertilizer, Marine Pipeline, Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas, and Inco Limited. Those are just a few of the directors of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Mr. Paproski: Did they donate to your campaign fund?

Mr. Orlikow: I am sure they donated more to the hon. member's than to mine. I have not seen any of that money, nor do I want to.

We now come to the Bank of Nova Scotia. Cedric Ritchie is a director of Empire Realty, Canada Life Assurance, the United International Bank and Olympic Trust. The deputy chairman, George Hitchman, is a director of Algoma Central Railway, Empire Realty and Jannock Corporation.

I do not know whether the next one has resigned or not, but the new Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, that great Liberal fund raiser, the Hon. John Aird, was a director of the Bank of Nova Scotia and also the director of Algoma Central Railway, Consolidated-Bathurst, Domglas Incorporated, the Molson companies, National Life Assurance Company and Petro-Canada. Somebody slipped. I do not know how he can be a director of Petro-Canada and a director of a bank under the provision which states that a senior officer of a Crown corporation cannot be a director of a bank.

We now go to another of the big five, the Toronto-Dominion Bank. The chairman and chief executive officer, Richard Thomson, is also a director of Cadillac Fairview, one of the largest real estate corporations, Prudential Insurance Company, Eaton's of Canada, and Texas Gulf. J. Allan Boyle is a director of Aetna Casualty, Excelsior Life and Jannock Limited.

Looking at the Bank of Montreal, we see that the chairman and chief executive officer, Fred McNeil, is a director of Canadian Canners, the Dominion Life Assurance Company, and the Seagram Company. Among his directors is Charles Bronfman who, as we all know, has tremendous interests in a whole range of corporations.

Mr. Paproski: He has a friend over on that side.

Mr. Orlikow: I am sure he has friends in most parts of this Parliament.

Mr. Paproski: Didn't he take somebody for an aeroplane ride, or was it just for a ride?

Mr. Orlikow: Let us summarize this. We see on the board of directors for Canadian Pacific the following directors of banks. From the Royal Bank we see Mr. McLaughlin, as well as Mr. Paré and Mr. Pratte. From the Bank of Nova Scotia, we see T. G. Rust, F. H. Sherman, R. D. Wolfe—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for putting on the record the simple fact that we live in a highly concentrated economic world where fewer and fewer actors control the capital markets. Over the past few years we have seen the phenomenon of far greater merger and corporate concentration activity than before.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North mentioned the relationship between Massey-Ferguson and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. It is no secret. In fact any information I have is what has been made available to us through the newspapers, to the effect that the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce has loaned hundreds of millions of dollars to Massey-Ferguson. It is no secret that when this kind of thing happens, it creates a relationship between a lending institution such as a bank and a company like Massey-Ferguson. It is an intensely close and almost dependent relationship.

It is because of our concern regarding what happens to the financial system when there are these close interlocking directorates close links, and the large loans that are involved, as well as the size of the transactions and the companies, that we have put forward these two amendments. It is not possible for us to go on in this way. The government just accepted the principle contained in motion No. 11. There was an argument from the government side two parliaments ago. They were prepared to accept the principle that bank employees should not be directors of companies incorporated under the laws of provinces and the laws of Canada. They accepted that principle.

They never dealt with the problem that directors of corporations are the directors of banks and that the presidents and chief executive officers of our largest companies are also the directing influence of our chartered banks. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North pointed out, there have been countless studies ranging from the one mentioned in the New York Times back to the studies of Professor Porter in the sixties, to Professor Wallace Clement in this decade. They document beyond a shred of a doubt the fact that we in Canada live in an economic system where there are a relatively few important actors who have tremendous economic power and the ability to control the system in a way that simply cannot be disputed any longer.

My friend mentioned the size of the chartered banks. The banks have assets of over $200 billion. The five chartered banks control almost 95 per cent of business and industry. That is what we are talking about. We are talking about companies making loans for hundreds of millions of dollars. We are talking about decisions affecting the investment future of our country which are made by a relatively small group of people, in fact far fewer in number than those who make up the House of Commons of Canada.

In that context we should not continue with the Liberal-Tory illusion. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans), in regurgitating Milton Freidman, said earlier today that government should not be directly involved, that we should not be meddling in the banking industry, and civil servants do not know anything. He said they should not be involved and bureaucrats should not be involved. That is a remarkable statement by someone whose constituency consists of the Public Service of Canada. It is astonishing that he should make that kind of attack on the public servants of Canada. That is what we heard. It is on the record. He said we do not want to have the bureaucrats and the public servants of Canada involved in these kinds of decisions. That is the view which is contained in this bill.

● (1600)

The view is that there will be no control over the ability of chartered banks to place their top officers on the boards of directors of the top Canadian companies, which are the largest companies. These are companies which get larger and larger. Just as pike get larger from eating minnows so, too, our largest companies get larger and larger by eating smaller companies. They do not get larger by creating new jobs but simply by taking over other companies. That is the state of economic activity in Canada today. There are no controls on this phenomenon. We had the government Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration.

Mr. Orlikow: That was a hoax.

Mr. Rae: As the member for Winnipeg North says, that was something of a hoax. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that even that Royal commission pointed to the problems created by having as concentrated a banking system as we have, and by having the very peculiar situation in which we find ourselves in Canada. We find the level of concentration, the degree of power and the degree of control, are so great.

I think it is remarkable that the government would choose to maintain the mythology that there is a competitive system out there and that the interests of smaller businesses are served just as well as the interests of large businesses by this system. They say there is no competitive advantage to be given to large companies, and the member from Mississauga asked us to give an example. I will give him an example. The very fact of life is that those companies which get the lowest rates of interest are the biggest companies in Canada. This is something he knows, as well as everybody else in this chamber knows.

What companies are paying the prime rate, Mr. Speaker? It is not the small companies. It is not the companies which provide for the employment of most Canadians which get prime rate or prime rate plus one. Let us not fool around. Those companies which get prime rate or prime rate plus one, or which manage to take advantage of the government's open door policy on income debentures, which existed before 1978, were the largest companies in Canada. They are the companies that are getting the advantage of close to prime rate, and not the small business communities. There is nothing in this Bank Act which protects the interests of small business to see that they have equal access and equal representation on the boards of directors.

When you talk to members from the small business communities and those groups which made representations to this finance committee, they will point out the difficulties they face because of the fact their views and their representations are not being taken seriously and their bona fides are not accepted with as much currency as those of the largest companies of Canada.

I am aware that the government has changed its mind with respect to motion No. 11. I know there were very strong representations made to it by the banking, financial and the large business communities, who said that they want to have these people on their boards. Well, if one had confidence, what would happen would be those large corporations would diversify. Those large banks would diversify their directors and they would be genuinely participating in the life of the whole community rather than simply confining themselves to the economic interests of the few and the large companies that they really serve. Then, if that were to happen, I would say it would be fine. But all the evidence which has accumulated in the last ten years points to the fact that the old boy network has replaced the consumer as king of the marketplace. That hard fact has not been recognized by the government.

I am disappointed that they moved away from the principles contained in motion 11. I am very disappointed that they are not prepared to accept motions Nos. 5 and 10. They should be prepared to put in some countermeasures to ensure that the interests of the consumer and the small businessman are protected so that we can unlock the tyranny which is caused by these interlocking directorates. Thus we can get at the problem of competition. It will not be solved by simply waiting. We have been waiting for a long time for the kind of competition legislation which has been promised. It is promised on an almost regular basis every six months by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in order to fend off the questions which inevitably follow the corporate mergers that take place at regular intervals. The problem will not simply be solved by doing that. The Bank Act has a role to play in regulating competition and in ensuring that this corporate concentration is stopped.

If the government is not prepared to accept these amendments then one would have thought that they would be prepared to put in others. But they are not prepared yet to take on the chartered banks and the kind of corporate power which they possess. I think that fact should be exposed and it should be seen for what it is.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain very briefly why we shall oppose the two motions introduced by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). If we examine these motions, we see that one of them would prevent members of the boards of major financial institutions from becoming members of the boards of banks. The other amendment has the opposite effect in so far as it states that a member of the board of directors of a bank could not become a member of the board of a Canadian business firm.

Members of the NDP have talked at length about the possibility of conflicts of interest. They have given the example of a bank linked with a well known business company. However, I should like to remind the House that when the director of a Canadian company is a member of the board of directors of a bank which is asked to consider a loan to this company, the provisions of clause 52 of the bill state clearly that this director shall abstain from attending the meetings concerning this application for a loan.

This is a provision which removes—

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: I would like to ask the minister a question. I wonder if the minister is aware of the fact that, according to an editorial which appeared a few weeks ago in The Globe and Mail, four directors of Massey-Ferguson were also directors of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, which loaned to Massey-Ferguson something in the neighbourhood of $400 million. Does the minister think that they played no part in the decision of the bank to loan that money to Massey-Ferguson? Does he think that even if they went through the charade of not voting on that loan, they did not have some influence on the other directors of the bank?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, the best reply to this question is clause 52 of the bill which states the following:

A director of a bank shall not be present or vote at a meeting of the board or any committee thereof during the time at the meeting when a loan or advance to himself or a firm of which he is a member or a corporation of which he is a director is under consideration—

The law regulates application of the Bank Act and the operations of the boards of banks in our country. Without evidence to the contrary and without confirmed charge that this is not the case, I must conclude that the laws of our country have been followed until now. I believe this is the protection we have given the public in the Bank Act. There has been a lot of talk about concentration in the Canadian banking system. Each time this argument is raised, Mr. Speaker, a great number of financial institutions are forgotten even though they are available to Canadians and even though they are very important in view of the amount they hold on deposit and invest. I need not remind hon. members of the existence of caisses populaires and credit unions. Through their various investment instruments, they participate financially in several companies and play an extremely important and leading role in our society. In my opinion, the type of caricatures that was drawn of administrators and bankers in no way reflects the realities of our society.

Increasingly, Canadians who are developing an interest in finance are people like us who have special expertise in the field of finance and banking affairs, and their work is excellent. Our purpose as MPs, in studying a bill such as this one, is first of all, to give those people the best possible tool with which to work for the common good of our society, and second, to give them clear guidelines to spare them, in the performance of their work, being faced with conflicts of interest or such situations as might harm the common interest. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood did point out that at one time the government did consider going ahead with a proposal similar to the one he is putting forward. However, at the pressing request of Canadian business—I believe the matter was brought up in committee, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) can correct me if I am wrong—in light of those requests the government came back and said: Well, listen: it would be detrimental both to Canadian businesses to deprive them of the possibility of benefiting from the expertise of bank directors, and to the development of our Canadian financial institutions to prevent Canadian business directors becoming members of the boards of directors of banks, and so enable the business community to exchange common experiences and enlighten each other. I feel, therefore, that this is in the interest of the development of both our businesses and industries, and finally for the good of our society. We have kept those provisions in the pursuit of that objective and shall therefore have to reject the amendments moved by the hon. member.

● (1610)

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with a great deal of interest to the previous comments, and there are a number of things I would like to say about them. I feel very privileged to have this opportunity to speak about this very important piece of legislation. We have waited long for it, and we recognize, as previous speakers have indicated, just how crucial this act is to directing the development of Canada economically. I must say, though, that I am quite dismayed in many respects by the lack of interest with regard to accepting what I feel are very appropriate and necessary amendments to the existing act.

It seems that we are debating an act which does not address seriously the concerns of the financial communities of the 1990s and 1980s. The other day a speaker referred to this as horse collar legislation concerning itself with the financial world of the past, recognizing, perhaps, the financial world of the present, but certainly not providing legislation for the next decade unless some very serious changes are included.

I would like to talk about some of those necessary amendments. We are presently addressing ourselves to motions Nos. 10 and 11, but I think first we should recognize the very privileged position in which our Canadian chartered banks find themselves. Our financial institutions essentially direct the economy in certain directions. They decide what types of projects will go ahead, what types of projects will be encouraged in terms of Canada's economic development, and the parts of Canada where there will be support, nurturing and development.

Because of that privileged position and because of the extremely important role the banking institutions play in the development of Canada, we in the New Democratic Party feel that there must be steps taken to ensure greater accountability on the part of our banks and to ensure that the banks are operating in the best interests of Canada and Canadians. I do not think the present legislation begins to address that seriously.

Previous speakers from the New Democratic Party have made comments about conflict of interest situations. As politicians we are very sensitive about the concept of conflict of interest. As previous speakers have indicated, we recognize that when there is a conflict of interest which is obvious, the individual involved is not permitted to vote on that particular issue. That is fine. That covers the bases. There is no question about that, but all of us in this House know—we have all been involved in the political process long enough—that one can be extremely influential in decision-making without having to participate directly in the vote. In many, many ways all of us attempt to influence legislation without perhaps even involving ourselves in a very direct way.

As a member of the New Democratic Party I reflect my party's views, and I feel that we need some public participation in the banking business. We see public participation in the banking business in some of the most progressive and dynamic countries in the world in terms of their economies. I am speaking about countries such as West Germany, which is generally held up around the world as a model of a first-class entrepreneurial economy.

We see public participation in banking institutions and so forth in France. We see public participation in banking in the United Kingdom and in the Scandinavian countries. These are not countries in which economic development is hindered or retarded by public participation. Indeed, as I indicated earlier, we are talking here about some of the most progressive and dynamic economies in the western world.

No such accountability exists in Canada. Banking institutions in Canada do not in any way adequately reflect the views of the Canadian public, nor do they satisfy the interests of the Canadian public.

Motion No. 10 is important with respect to eliminating interlocking directorates. Such interlocking directorates include George Weston Limited, Cominco, Dominion Construction, Bell Canada, Inco Limited, Canadian International Paper Company, Kaiser Resources, Mobil Oil, Westinghouse Canada, Shell Canada, and one could go on and on. When one considers and analyses just who these directors are and what they represent, there is one very serious omission. Being progressive now, we see that some of the banks have housewives on their boards. Although this is certainly a token gesture, we can say that it is a small step toward recognizing that half of the Canadian population happens to be women who have very special sets of interests.

However, there is a group which is not represented in the directorships of the banks of Canada.

An hon. Member: The NDP.

Mr. Riis: It is a small group of people who happen to account for about 42 per cent of the employment in Canada, who happen to represent about 930,000 small businesses across the country, who happen to provide the entrepreneurship which is 100 per cent Canadian and who, according to recent reports, have provided some of the most creative programs. They are developing new technologies for this country. They represent the flavour of our Canadian communities because they are part of our Canadian communities. I ask anyone in the chamber to indicate one board which includes a representative of the small business community. Small business is eliminated, and as the previous speaker indicated, one of the points of having these various individuals on boards of directors is to provide their input because they lend a certain expertise.

● (1620)

Has the small business community nothing to add during decision-making times? Once again this government has shown itself to be extremely insensitive to this crucial sector of our country. I know ministers stand up, particularly at luncheons, and tell the small business community that they are the saviours of the small entrepreneur, that they are the people who support the concept of small business in Canada. The Tories have the guts to stand up at these luncheons and make the same kind of comment, that they are the party which supports the small entrepreneur in Canada. I say to them: show me the legislation to prove that. I suggest that if you were to look at the legislation—no matter whether it is legislation of the Tory government or of the Liberal government—you would find that at present there exist 200 programs to assist business in Canada which are sponsored by the federal government. But I would ask people to reflect on how many of those programs are available to the small businessman. Out of the 200 programs, only two are designed specifically for the small entrepreneur.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Riis: That is 1 per cent of federal government programming. That is the kind of support, encouragement, and leadership that the present Liberal government and the previous Tory government were prepared to give to the small businessman in Canada! It is a sorry state of affairs. If the small business community ever wake up and look carefully at that legislation one day, look carefully at the financial structures across our country, it will become extremely clear to them who their friends really are.

I should like to turn now to the topic of competition. There is an illusion in this country that there exists competition among the banks, that interlocking directorships somehow facilitate competition in Canada. Well, we have all been introduced in the last couple of years to the infamous Canadian establishment, and anyone in this country who thinks for a moment that competition exists in our banking community, that whether you are a small or a large company your access to capital and funding is the same, is completely mistaken.

I would ask members of the House to address small businessmen in their ridings and ask them what interest rates they pay when they go to banks to borrow money. I would ask them then to examine the interest rates that large corporations pay when they borrow from our banks. I say that they would find that the large company or corporation at times borrows at prime rate plus a minute amount, if any, while the small business in this country is paying the prime rate plus 1 per cent, 2 per cent, 3 per cent or 4 per cent. Last week I spoke to a number of businessmen in my riding in central British Columbia who are having to borrow money at the rate of 21 per cent. Can you imagine the kind of productivity and the success that a new business must experience simply to be able to make those kinds of payments? Is that the kind of equality that exists in the financial marketplace? Is that the competition we are talking about?

I think we all know in this chamber that the reason the directors of large corporations are as they are is that certain people have privileged information, certain individuals and certain firms are in a privileged position when they develop. We, as members of parliament, know that in our hearts. The evidence is clear and the analysis is clear. Yet, unless we accept this amendment, we will be perpetuating this inequality.

I would ask members of Parliament when they vote on this crucial amendment to realize fully that it would enable the situation to be turned and to make this country of equal opportunity for both large and small businesses. We are interested in developing and encouraging the entrepreneurial instinct in Canada and in developing Canada as vigorously as we can. The small businessman is not treated equally at all, and all of us in this chamber know that. I would ask members of this House, when the opportunity to vote arises, to think of the small businessman, the man on the corner of your street, the small shop down the road, and to think of what the existing legislation provides for them as against the advantages provided to the large corporations.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, these two amendments basically strike at the heart of some of the problems we have in our economy and at the way in which the economy of this country develops. My colleagues have outlined our position. I was very surprised to hear the minister intimate that he thinks all is well. The government opposite keeps telling us that basically there is nothing to fear, that there are housewives among the membership of the boards, that there are everyday people with expertise who are members, such as native Indians, people who live in remote areas, and people who have priorities for development and who need capital to make them eligible for some of the programs to create opportunities for their children. It is no wonder that the government opposite was able to have only two members from western Canada elected. I am prepared to put money on the table that they will not get their deposits back the next time. I do not think this is due to maliciousness on the part of government members or to serious opposition to what is going on. Rather, I think they have their heads buried in the sand—

An hon. Member: Insensitive.

Mr. Skelly: —and they are insensitive. I do not want to be provocative. I think we can discuss the merits or otherwise of these amendments, but, speaking seriously, I say that I find it very strange that the minister can stand up and say there is no problem, because many people, including many of the members on the other side, have recognized the seriousness of the problem of corporate concentration in Canada. I have heard, in committee and in this House, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) say that one of his highest priorities is to bring forward legislation to deal with this problem, but then the government turns around and reverses this, as was done by the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) in the statement he made this afternoon. I sincerely believe that the minister does not think that, that he recognizes the fact that there are serious problems, that he is locked into this piece of legislation and is scared stiff to make any changes to it that would be appropriate. I would like to take the high road in the analysis of his statement.

At this point I think it might be worthwhile to take a look at Canadian history, since we are talking about the constitution. Many people really think that the BNA Act made Canada and that a 113-year-old document welded together four backward colonies along the St. Lawrence river and in the maritimes. There is a great argument in Canada that this country was welded together by the determination of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, the Bank of Montreal, and what was at that time known as the Liberal-Conservative party, that in fact Sir John A. Macdonald led a party which was known as the Liberal-Conservative party.

It is strange how the wheel of fortune turns, how history moves on and yet things remain the same when we listen to the arguments that both of these groups sitting in the House put forward and we find that they are the same arguments. It is of concern to us. I would suggest that, in fact, when the country was put together the strongest force within the country was the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and their political arm in the House of Commons, but I would also suggest that this country did not develop in a way which benefited many Canadians.

There has been social hardship and a single-minded concern for making a buck, to take advantage of others, instead of building this country at a pace at which people could benefit. There were some very serious problems then because of corporate concentration, interlocking directorates, and political and economic control of the country by a small group of people referred to as the old boy gang. Frankly, it has been stated before that the old boy gang still runs the country. It is time we did something about it.

Really the history has not changed much. The wheel has turned, but we have the same problem at a different level. The interlocking directorates exist and the annual reports of the Bank of Canada are sitting here. No one has to examine those to see that the most powerful corporations in Canada are represented on the boards of directors and vice versa. But an interesting article appeared in The Globe and Mail which indicated that as a result of some of today's problems with Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson, and a variety of other companies which were previously doing well and are now firmly locked on the public trough, the directors of companies should not be permitted to serve as directors of banks from which the companies borrow, nor should the banks be represented on the boards of directors of client companies. That was an editorial statement which appeared in The Globe and Mail. When I look at the amendments we propose, I realize those are the things we are proposing.

I do not want to draw this out too long, but the Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration, which I believe is called the Bryce commission, has largely been viewed as an apologist for the government and the corporations in Canada. It has come forward with recommendations which almost defy logic, yet when we look at the recommendations concerning the power of corporate directorships, it is asking for modifications which do not appear in the Bank Act. So, we have The Globe and Mail and even the Bryce commission, which bears very little credibility in the real world—even they have the timidity to come forward asking for changes in the manner in which we structure the leaders of our industrial and financial corporations. I urge the minister to review those and to take a look at the problems. Those interlocking directorates exist, the old boys exist, and really Canadian consumers or the people who depend on them suffer for that. It is not just the consumers who suffer.

For example, today we had a very interesting question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but unfortunately he did not arrive in the House until the last five minutes of oral questions. We had a question about his role in investigating the unacceptable concentration of the print media. Also we have had many questions concerning his role in investigating oil companies. Over the last seven years the ministry, through the minister, has fooled with this question and not brought it to a satisfactory resolution.

We have George Weston and food chains which control the price of food. We have a variety of organizations which control housing and availability of money for housing. We have the banking industry which is the most powerful and influential of all those groups. They fuel the engines. They make concentration tighter and tighter all the way down the line, always in the interests of a buck. Quite often it is in the interests of efficiency, but always in the interests of a buck, not in the interests of the people they serve. As they make the concentration tighter, there are fewer and fewer opportunities to serve the people.

As the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) pointed out, small businesses often get chopped in the process, but it is not just the small ones. So, the corporate concentration exists. It seriously affects our lives. It starts with interlocking directorates, and we have looked at the costs of it. There is a lack of competition and even a lack of an ability to compete, which results in high prices. People pay significantly more for the goods and services they require because of that concentration.

The points I made before also deal with the business of development in the country. There are areas of the country which are not developed because the return is not quite as high as it is in other areas. They kiss that group of people good-bye and say hello to the areas with the most profitable return. The tighter the concentration, the more deliberate that development. We have seen that with banks. As I have stated in the House before, in my particular riding there are communities such as Sayward, the Campbell River area, the central coast area, the North Island area and even Victoria where banks have withdrawn services because there is not the kind of return for which they are looking. To put up branches in downtown Vancouver, Ottawa or Montreal gives them a better volume for less investment. Unfortunately the people in rural areas suffer from the effect of strictly corporate concentration because there is no other competition.

We asked for some public input, public presence and public accountability to remedy that, and it did not happen. It was totally rejected by the government. Now we are asking for this simple thing—after making a series of retreats—which is backed by the Bryce commission, The Globe and Mail and, in fact, the electorate. There are areas in the country where the present government does not enjoy the confidence of the people, and it continues to erode confidence because of lack of action. At any rate, the costs of corporate concentration are very evident and they are growing.

No one would deny that corporate concentration movements are fueled by the banks, the Big Five. We have heard the minister say, "Yes, but the caisse populaire and credit union movements are competing with them". But it is at a much lower level. When we look at the billions in assets which they control, we are not really talking about the same thing. When we look at the concentration of control of those assets, we are not even talking in the same ball park. It is very unrealistic to say that the credit union movement is out there competing at the same level as the banks. That is just not so. Certainly I would appreciate the minister coming forward and saying, "We will unshackle the hands of the credit union movement and allow them to compete in some of the other areas". At any rate, the costs of corporate concentration are very high.

I should like to spend just a moment reflecting on what has been the government's attitude to this. Unfortunately the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is the bulwark upon which we depend to protect us from the less desirable, the evil aspects of corporate concentration. Whether it heads over into an illegal activity or whether it is just contrary to the interests of people, the government moved away rapidly from an effective competition policy and it became involved in a different process. When we look at the funding of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs over the last few years, it has been cut pretty substantially. Also the department's person-years have been cut substantially, yet we see the banks, the oil companies, the food chains growing tighter and tighter with more and more control. The people we expect to police are having resources taken away and personnel cuts. Frankly it is not a movement of a government which intends to protect people against not only illegal activities but against activities which can be viewed as not in their best interests.

That is only one aspect of where the department is being cut back. Either the minister's priority is so low in cabinet or their priorities with that department are so low that we cannot expect any action. Numerous questions referring to the newspaper situation, the oil company situation and other areas have been addressed to the minister in the House, and he says, "Yes, we are looking into it." Manana, always manana, but unfortunately we do not get any hard answer or any protection.

Either the minister's priority is very low or the whole department is a very low priority. There have been cutbacks in person-years and in the budgeting. I suspect in the final analysis they will break it up into its component parts and stick it into the Department of the Secretary of State, just as they did with the secretary of state for urban affairs. Somehow it just disappeared. I suspect that in the final analysis it will be the end route for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Members on this side believe that that is one of the highest government priorities. We look to energy, finance and a variety of other areas, but members on this side are the only members who stand for their protection. We do not receive any information from the government, and what we get is a department which has been cut back.

Mr. Evans: Tell me where you got most of your amendments.

An hon. Member: Don't be so modest.

Mr. Skelly: If most of the amendments were accepted, there would be more protection in the act for the consumers. We would like to see the government adopt some of these amendments which will provide protection to the consumer. Consumers cannot expect protection from the government through this legislation. We are sincerely hoping that the government will put controls in this legislation which will restrain the movement toward corporate concentration and prevent interlocking directorships and which will have the effect, in the final analysis, of protecting the people.

Because there is a lack of competition legislation and a lack of will on the part of the government to put protective mechanisms into this legislation, the government is merely hanging the consumers out to dry. If the government rejects our proposed amendments which take the form of protective mechanisms it will literally have the effect of hanging consumers of this country out to dry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 10. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We are now on Motion No. 11. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Again, pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 14, 15 and 18 will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 14

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by substituting the word "five" for the words "twenty-five" in lines 7, 14 and 19 at page 98.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 15

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by substituting the word "two" for the word "ten" in lines 34, 44 and 50 at page 98.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 18

Bank Act

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 36 at page 101 and substituting the following therefor:

"exceeds two per cent of the issued and".

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of motions Nos. 14, 15 and 18 follows from the amendments which have already been put forward. They require a wider degree of dispersal of the shares of our banking institutions. The first motion deals with the peculiar position occupied by the Mercantile Bank of Canada. The other motions provide for a wider dispersal of shares so that no one relatively small group of people, whether they be individuals or companies, can exercise control over one of our chartered banks.

The first motion deals with section 110 of the Bank Act which currently provides a limit on shares held by non-residents, which reads:

A bank shall refuse to register in the securities register of the bank a transfer of any share of a class of shares of the bank to a non-resident

(a) if, when the total number of shares of that class of shares held by non-residents exceeds 25 per cent of the total number of issued and outstanding shares of that class, the transfer would increase the percentage of such shares held by non-residents;

That section is designed to give a particular advantage to one bank in Canada. Our concern in this regard has been on record ever since the deal was sanctified by a previous Liberal government. It deals with the fact that Citicorp Bank of the United States is in a position where in effect it is allowed under the Bank Act basically to control at least two banks. It will continue to control the Mercantile Bank by virtue of this section, and by virtue of the section on foreign subsidiaries it would be allowed to create yet another bank which it will also directly control.

I will not go into debate on foreign banks at the present time because this topic will be discussed when the appropriate amendments are before us. However, I think it is worth pointing out something which has not really been considered by the government, that it is possible, according to most analysts of corporate affairs, for a relatively small concentration of people effectively to control the corporate activities of a company, be it a financial institution or another corporation.

It is worthwhile reiterating the fact, while the Canadian public and the Canadian government are mesmerized by this concept of ownership, that the question of ownership, as it is generally recognized by most people who are attempting to understand our economy, is much less important than the question of control. Ever since economists, social critics and others began analysing the nature of our corporate system and our corporations, and the power which accrues to people who are at the pinnacle of a corporation, they have recognized that the illusion of the sovereignty of the shareholder is just that, an illusion.

The theory that, for example, in the general provision of the act a shareholder may not hold more than 10 per cent of the shares will limit a group from effectively controlling banks, is in fact not the case. Even with only 10 per cent of the shares, provided they are controlled and provided that control is exercised in a concentrated and direct manner, that can be sufficient to gain control of a corporation, for the very simple reason that so many shareholders are purely passive in their relationship to the company. Those shareholders who chose to take a more active role by virtue of ownership of over 7 per cent or 8 per cent of the shares can and do, in fact, control corporations.

Simply to argue that 10 per cent provides for a sufficient dispersal of shares, in our view does not take sufficient account of the realities of the economic world. It is for that reason that we have argued that the dispersal requirements be changed from 10 per cent to 2 per cent and that in the case of nonresidents the requirement be changed from 25 per cent to 5 per cent. In our view, such a change would provide for a partial recognition at least of the principle that the dispersal of bank shares must be widespread.

We cannot allow small groups of people to exercise unilateral control over these corporations. In the last round of debate, we emphasized the problem caused by the banks exercising their economic control by virtue of their position as lenders. We took the example of Massey-Ferguson—and there are others—where the triumph of financial capital over industrial capital led to the dilemmas facing that particular company. This is something that must be carefully analysed in our attempt to understand the way in which the system works in Canada.

We are now considering another phenomenon and another problem, that is, the relative ease with which a small group of people can exercise control over our banks. The Mercantile Bank is in the privileged position of being allowed to own not just one bank in Canada, but two. In our view it is not in the interests of this country to have one of the largest foreign banks in the world in a sense occupying a special and peculiar place in our banking system.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, in the last debate we considered the problems caused by the ability of the banks to control the people to whom they lend and how they can do this to benefit the larger companies which happen to satisfy their criteria for loans. In the particular instance we are dealing with, the reverse is the problem in a sense but it is just as serious, that is, concentration of ownership which in turn leads to concentration of control and the fact that the government has to recognize this problem by calling for a widening of the dispersal of shares.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not have much to say on this motion. I do not find anything particularly objectionable in having a continuation of clause 110, set out on page 98 of the bill, arising out of the whole rationalization of the situation as it was at the time of the Mercantile Bank affair.

If hon. members are not aware of the case, originally this was an entirely foreign company, established by Dutch interests immediately after the war. It was then sold, first of all partly to the National Citibank and then wholly to the National Citibank. The result was the introduction of a grandfather clause which reduced the shares that Citibank owns in the Mercantile Bank to 25 per cent because its capitalization is otherwise artificially held down.

Considering that the shares in Canadian banks are so widely dispersed, I do not honestly think there can be a particular concentration of power in any one person holding 10 per cent in total, in so far as outside interests are concerned, of 25 per cent. This causes some difficulties in a limited sense, in that the bank might not register the shares in excess of these amounts and the person owning the shares unfortunately has them taken away. It is not that just one or two apples in the barrel are bad; the whole barrel is deemed to be bad. In other words, if I own 10.2 per cent of the shares in a bank, I cannot vote my entire 10.2 per cent. The bank cannot register the .2 per cent and I am unable to exercise my 10 per cent, so the strictures placed on the situation by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) have no application. They are straw men that he has erected so that he may tilt at them.

I am quite satisfied with the present situation, Mr. Speaker, and I would therefore ask the House to vote against these two amendments.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the House what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) would have us do. With respect to clause 110(1)(a) and (b), he would insist that the number of shares in a bank held by non-residents should at no time exceed five per cent. I suspect that large corporations generally have a difficult time determining the place of residence of every one of their shareholders. This is particularly so in the case of large chartered banks. To reduce the limit to five per cent so that they can certify at all times that no more than five per cent of shareholders are non-resident would put such a burden on the officers and transfer agents of the banks that the whole thing would be totally unrealistic.

Just recently the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) announced that he would award specific and high grants to companies with more than 75 per cent Canadian ownership. This is the same type of clause here, Mr. Speaker. But at no time did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources suggest that a company had to be composed 100 per cent of Canadian resident shareholders.

Shareholders could be Canadian citizens who for reasons of retirement or whatever, leave this cold climate to live in the south. Would the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood suggest that they should lose their shares because they retire and because their shares happen to put the bank over the five per cent provision? The hon. member does not know what it is about or how the system works, Mr. Speaker. Neither does the New Democratic Party. That is why they propose this amendment which does not make any business sense.

The second amendment, which also applies to page 98, Mr. Speaker, proposes to reduce the number of shares that individuals or an association of individuals could hold, from 10 per cent to 2 per cent. The minister already has a problem with the Montreal and District Savings Bank and he has filed motions No. 17 and others to deal with this. In that situation, people, in association, came to control up to 43 per cent of a bank and the minister has introduced a provision whereby they will be forced to divest.

It would be very easy for someone to gain more than 2 per cent of the shares in a bank or for an association of people by inadvertence to gain more than 2 per cent. Surely the limitation of 10 per cent is more than enough to make sure that the shareholdings of our banks are broadly distributed. It is true, of course, that holding a large number of bank shares might lead to an opportunity to be elected to the board of that bank.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty)—Freedom of Information—Directives to ministers; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Water Resources—Skagit River Valley—Reference by B.C. government of U.S. proposal to flood to International Joint Commission; and the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly)—The Constitution—Inquiry whether letter received from National Indian Brotherhood requesting discussions.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Notice of motion No. 1, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). Shall the item stand? Stand by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING HIGH TENSION LINES CROSSING OTTAWA AND ST. LAWRENCE RIVERS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all minutes of meetings, documents, telegrams and letters concerning discussions between officials of the Department of Transport and Hydro-Quebec relating to high tension electrical lines crossing the Ottawa river below Carillon and the St. Lawrence river above Beauharnois.

● (1700)

He said: Mr. Speaker, in response to my request for documents, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) told me that the documents in question were so voluminous that it would require an inordinate length of time to prepare them and it would be very costly. He then went on to say "I have, however, sent a copy to the hon. member." He did in fact send me a copy of the documents. Hon. members might ask why I am debating the issue today.

First of all, let me refer to the documents themselves which I have in my hands. It is true they number a dozen or so pages, which might be termed voluminous, but personally I do not think there would be any great problem in producing these documents for the public. However, one thing is abundantly clear. These documents are all in the French language. There is no English translation. You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that some three or four weeks ago while we were talking about western grain rates, when documents were not made available to the public, it was because they were in the English language only. The documents referred specifically to the Crowsnest Pass rates for the movement of grain out west, and I felt they should be more readily available in the French language to the people in the east, particularly to those in the province of Quebec. As I said then, there was a hidden cost to the treasury, to the people of Canada and to the two-thirds of the population who reside in the east of something in excess of one half billion dollars which was going into the pockets of the western farmers. Although I did not disagree with the particular item, I felt it should be more widely publicized.

Today, the same thing applies. We have a set of documents in French only, supposedly voluminous, but I suggest the reason they were not tabled is because they are in one language only.

Electricity is the lifeblood of modern society and without it much of our technology and prosperity would not exist. Electricity is efficient, convenient, clean and easy to transmit and distribute. By the year 2000, we can expect the demand for electricity to be more than five times the rate of the last few years. By the year 2050, about 90 per cent of all Canada's energy needs will be satisfied by electricity.

New York state saves millions of barrels of imported oil by buying 800,000 kilowatts of hydroelectric power each year from Quebec. The 765 kilovolt transmission line is 157 miles long in the United States running from Massena near Cornwall, Ontario to Marcy, which is near Utica, New York state. New York has a 20-year contract with Hydro-Quebec.

Just over a year ago, the Quebec minister of energy announced increased exports of power to New York state. The minister estimated that New York state was saving over one million barrels of oil a month, and added that the state had imported 823 million kilowatt hours of electricity from Quebec in the previous year.

In 1975, in a document sent to me by Hydro-Quebec, it was estimated that the cost to heat a typical single family, by electricity was $500, slightly more by natural gas and about $200 more by oil. One is well aware of the relative change in the cost of these three heating fuels since 1975 and the difference, particularly with respect to oil, is likely to become even more accentuated.

Initial installation costs varied very little. In fact, at that time, an all-electric installation was fractionally less expensive. About a quarter of Quebec's total energy needs are met by electricity and it is hoped to raise that percentage to 40 per cent by 1990.

Five years ago there was considerable concern that persons living in the vicinity of these high voltage electrical lines were acting as guinea pigs and that the electromagnetic fields surrounding the lines affected both the animals and the human beings within those fields. Two doctors working on a research project at the veterans hospital at Syracuse, New York, arrived at such a conclusion. The Canadian minister of the environment, in answer to a question in 1975, suggested that studies were going on with particular reference to caribou. However, since then, nothing further has been heard from this ministry on the subject.

The only other reference was in the same year when a senior official of Hydro-Quebec returned from Russia with the information that a human being should not be exposed for more than three hours in the vicinity of these high tension lines, and for not more than ten minutes close to the conductors. The minister of communications at that time, in answering a question concerning radio and television interference, stated that there should be no significant interference. However, anyone who has operated a radio or TV set in the vicinity of a line knows that there is interference and, in fact, that there is a black-out area. This significant point is a reference to distance and not to extent. The then minister of transport also indicated that there is no change to flight patterns for small aircraft in the vicinity of these lines. However, once again, anyone who has piloted a plane, as I have, will recognize the potential hazard of high tension power lines. It is apparent that the minister of transport was more concerned with the assurance of adequate clearance over federal waterways for ship navigation purposes than with the hazard created for the users of private airfields.

I might say that in the documents given to me, which were in French, about the only item I found of interest was a rather unusual point stating that the clearance over the Ottawa River was to be 80 feet whereas the clearance over the St. Lawrence River was to be 75 feet. Since I am under the impression that most of our navigation takes its course along the St. Lawrence River, I question why there should be that difference. However, that is quite a minor point. I would say, though, that this was the only point of interest in the documents handed to me, illustrating that the involvement of the federal government in these hydro lines and the potential they afford for the export of electricity is not particularly great.

It is of interest that in 1975 the then minister of energy, mines and resources stated there had been no discussions between his ministry and Hydro-Quebec concerning the export of electricity to the United States and that the only federal involvement would be the regulatory approval by the National Energy Board of the agreement between Hydro-Quebec and the power authority of the state of New York. Thus the ministry of energy, mines and resources took no interest at that time in the amount of electricity to be exported or its impact on the domestic need for energy.

It is also interesting to note that hydro generation in the province of Newfoundland, by virtue of the generation at Churchill Falls, approaches that of the province of Ontario and exceeds that of British Columbia. Approximately 84 per cent of Newfoundland's production is supplied to the province of Quebec. Power from the generating station at Churchill Falls is transmitted at 735 kilovolts to make the journey of more than 700 miles to Montreal and other cities in Quebec. A comparison of Churchill Falls and LG-2, at La Grande in Quebec, indicates a plant capacity of the former of 5,225 megawatts and of the latter, 5,328 megawatts, essentially similar capacity.

• (1710)

As a cheap source of energy, the abundant hydroelectric resources at Churchill Falls, Labrador, should be able to attract both industry and export income to Newfoundland. But at the moment, the province is locked into an agreement allowing Hydro-Quebec to buy most of the electricity generated at Churchill Falls at fixed prices over a very long period of time.

The explosion of world energy prices since the contract was negotiated has given Quebec an unexpected windfall gain on electricity produced in Newfoundland—greater in total than the equalization payments and unemployment insurance benefits Newfoundland receives as a have-not province.

A study carried out by the Economic Council of Canada indicates that profits accruing to Hydro-Quebec from the increase in the price at which electricity is sold and the fixed price paid to Newfoundland for power from Churchill Falls exceeded $600 million last year. The province of Newfoundland estimates that figure at more than $700 million. But it is not just Newfoundland that pays the price. The federal government also loses out because of the amount it must pay to that province from the equalization program, a sum of $334 million last year, and for the other costs of a "have not" province such as increased unemployment insurance payments. These two items together total more than half the total budget of the province.

The president of the Economic Council of Canada estimates that if the price of the electricity transmitted from Churchill Falls to Quebec were calculated on the basis of the word price for oil, its value would exceed $1 billion.

Thus we are faced with a situation where electricity is sold at a low price by one province to another. In turn, that receiving province sells electricity to the United States. Meantime, in the Atlantic provinces much of their electric needs is being generated by using imported oil paid for at world prices.

I thought it important to air this subject today. That is why I requested the document. I feel it would be preferable for the government in matters of interest such as those I discussed in the last few weeks regarding the grain transportation and today concerning hydroelectric lines and the sale of electricity to the United States to make these documents available to the public in both official languages. Because of that omission, I am pleased to have this opportunity to raise this subject in debate this afternoon.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene very briefly in this debate to lend some support to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) and support not only the nature of his motion and the fact he has brought this subject to the attention of the House, but the remarks he made on the matter of an adequate and versatile hydro transmission system in eastern Canada.

First, let me speak to the nature of his motion. Something that impresses me in Parliament and elsewhere is that information becomes the lifeblood of social and technical progress. Without information we cannot pursue those aims and objectives that we legitimately should pursue as members of Parliament. When the member comes to this House seeking information and that information is withheld, the administration is striking at the lifeblood of a member of Parliament. The fact the member has taken an interest in this area and has gained knowledge of the ramifications and the problems involved in a hydro transmission system indicates the extensive nature of his investigations and his knowledgeable background of these matters. With great intellectual honesty he comes with this request.

What is at the heart of all these requests for information is the basic principle of freedom of information in government. It ought to be the right of not only members of Parliament, but other people interested in public affairs to request and obtain information which they need to pursue matters they think are important. This is typical of the kind of problem which arises when, because of restrictions on the free flow of information, one is hampered in pursuing a lawful inquiry. A great many of the problems in this area could and should be resolved by proper freedom of information legislation. We all look forward to consideration of the bill now before the House respecting freedom of information.

With regard to the substance of the matter which the hon. member raised, that of a hydroelectric transmission system in eastern Canada, the hon. member honestly points out the advantages the province of Quebec has gained from a transaction with the province of Newfoundland related specifically to the transmission of hydroelectric power. These are the sorts of things that make confederation and continued co-operation among the provinces difficult. I know that when Mr. Stanfield was the Premier of Nova Scotia, steps were taken by the maritime provinces to develop an integrated grid system for the transmission of electric power. Unfortunately, this system stopped at the Quebec border. Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces were unable to gain access to vast supplies of electric power available through the Quebec transmission system and the hydroelectric system of the province of Newfoundland.

This has great and important ramifications for the future of energy in the eastern part of Canada. While we think of the great problems raised by the cost of importing oil used to generate electricity, further down the road, as we are able to overcome the problem of electrical generation with oil, we will be looking at developments like tidal power which will be totally dependent for their effective implementation on a hydroelectric grid system.

The importanee of this on development of the energy future of the maritimes cannot be underestimated. Without the kind of information which the federal government has at its disposal being circulated, and those interested being allowed to examine the kinds of information, tests and studies that have been carried out in the past, we will not be able to move in this direction. Even today it is argued in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick that the development of Fundy tidal power will be hamstrung by failure to have in place an electric grid system to carry the power which would be generated by this tremendous project.

The hon. member brought a very important matter to the attention of the House when he spoke not only of the failure to bring to public attention the information at the disposal of and in the hands of the officers of the federal government, especially when it relates to electrical transmission, resolution of the electric transmission problem being at the heart of the energy dilemma from which we suffer so much in eastern Canada. I congratulate the hon. member and support him in his endeavours. I hope all members of the House will support him as well.

● (1720)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the motion by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) because it relates to the export of electricity, a commodity which Canada has in some surplus in some of the provinces. I think the question of exports of electricity was of some special significance a few weeks ago before the budget was brought because at that time there was concern, especially by the western provinces, that a tax would be imposed on exports of natural gas. The argument went that if there was a tax imposed on the exports of natural gas from western Canada, chiefly from Alberta and British Columbia, a tax should likewise be imposed on electricity produced across the country, but especially in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which consume a very large portion of the natural gas produced. I must say that there seemed to be some logic to this argument. But in the end the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his wisdom decided not to impose a natural gas export tax and so there was no tax imposed on electricity.

He did impose a tax on all consumers of natural gas, whether in Canada or in the United States. Of course, it was a much lower tax than it would have been had it just been on the exports. It is interesting to note with respect to the tax applied to natural gas that some 44 per cent of the revenues raised come from the consumers in the province of Ontario.

Regardless of which method was used for raising these taxes, whether on electricity or on the export of natural gas, it was clear that the provincial governments were opposed to it in any event. Certainly the provinces vary in the amount of electricity that they produce and export to the United States.

It would be interesting to consider for a moment the amount of electricity which is exported to the United States. Total production in Canada in 1979 was some 335 billion kilowatt hours of electricity. Exports amounted to some 30.4 billion kilowatt hours of electricity, or 8.6 per cent of the total production. It is argued that if this export of electricity did not take place that the cost of electricity to consumers would have been higher because, in essence, it is sold at a profit and it is often consumed in the United States at a time when the demand in our domestic market is not as great.

If we look across the country at the various provinces which produce and export electricity we find that the total value of the exports to the United States in 1979 amounted to some $738 million. In New Brunswick it was $128 million, in Quebec it was $110 million, in Ontario it was $356 million, in Manitoba it was $64 million and in British Columbia $80 million of electricity was exported to the United States. The question of imposing an export tax on this, as in the years from 1925 to 1963, is a complicated one because in some provinces, like New Brunswick where the electricity is generated from oil-fired thermal plants, profitability is not nearly as high, given the increase in the price of oil, as it is in Manitoba or British Columbia where electricity is generated from hydro sources.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil makes a very important point when he suggests we should be considering using electricity more for domestic home heating. Clearly, that is what is implied in the national energy policy program, which was put before the House a few weeks ago by the minister of energy. In that paper we see that if a person switches to electricity—the initial cost of heating a home shows only a very modest increase as between 1980 and 1984, making allowance for increased conservation. For instance, in 1980 the cost of heating a home with oil in a typical Canadian city—we will take Winnipeg as an example—is estimated to be $680 per year. Based on the projected world price of oil, by 1984 the cost of heating that same home will escalate to $1,930 per year.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the budget presented by the previous government on December 11, 1979, they were proposing to move the Canadian price to 85 per cent of the world price by 1984. If we take 85 per cent of that figure we will see the cost of the average home heating bill. But if we look at what it would cost four years hence to heat with electricity—and this is the argument that the hon. member for Vaudreuil was making—we find the cost moves from $680 today, with oil, to $965 four years from now. If the person improves the insulation in the home and achieves a 25 per cent reduction in the amount of energy required to heat the home, the cost comes to $725, which is very little over the cost of heating with oil today. The important thing is that the national energy program is designed to convert a significant number of homes across the country from heating oil to electricity and, especially, natural gas.

Even staying with heating oil, the price under the national energy program is $1,280 compared to $1,930 at the world price. If the CHIP program is employed and there is a reduction in the amount of energy used then we come out under the national energy program with $960 for heating for the average home. The program was designed to switch to natural gas and to increase the supply available to homes across the country, such as those in many parts of northern Ontario which do not presently have natural gas available. The program will provide incentives to furnish that supply to many communities which are not presently served. Under the natural gas heating regime four years hence the heating costs will be some $710 for a typical home. If increased insulation is applied the cost will be $525, less, in fact, than the cost of heating a home using an oil-fired furnace. So, I think that the argument that the hon. member for Vaudreuil is making, which is that we should be considering using more electricity for space heating, is important, certainly in provinces like Ontario where we have a surplus of electricity and in the province of Quebec where vast supplies are being brought on stream and where there is such an excellent opportunity to use electric heat.

In the period from 1925 to 1963 a tax was imposed on exports of electricity. I understand it was in the realm of .03 cents per kilowatt hour of electricity. Of course, the volume was quite low then compared with what it is now, and the revenues realized were not very great, but today, as I indicated in presenting the figures earlier, some $738 million are realized by domestic utilities which, of course, has a very good effect on the cost of the electricity used in the country.

If we look at the actual production of electricity across the country and the number of exports, it is interesting to note we exported some 30 billion kilowatts of power in 1979, whereas during the same period of time we imported some 1.792 billion kilowatts of power. I understand that in the first seven months of 1980 imports rose to 2.2 billion kilowatts of power. So the question of the export of electricity is a very important matter. It seems to me that as we move to greater use of electricity, natural gas, biomass and waste from forest products for domestic heating, we will probably be exporting less electricity and using more domestically, avoiding these exports.

Such exports could in fact be displacing heating oil along with natural gas and other domestically produced fuel sources because one of the objectives of the national energy program is to reduce the amount of oil used across the country by conversion to electricity, natural gas and other sources, and renewable resources as well, to the extent that heating oil would account for some 10 per cent of the use of energy in domestic heating and commercial and industrial uses. Thus we would save some 375,000 barrels of oil a year if we were able to effect that kind of conversion and the replacement of heating oil by products like electricity and natural gas during this decade. I think that is a very important target. It is one which I hope we can meet because along with conservation it can have a very dramatic effect in moving us away from the use of oil and toward other more plentiful sources such as electricity.

So, I hope the hon. member for Vaudreuil will be given these documents which relate directly to exports of electricity from the province of Quebec to the United States, in particular to the state of New York.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today relating to high tension electrical lines crossing the Ottawa and St. Lawrence Rivers deals with a relatively technical subject which involves an element of government regulation. I am very familiar with such crossings, because in the county of Lambton, which is my home county, a similar high tension line crosses the St. Clair River into the state of Michigan, feeding into the Detroit-Edison grid network from the Lambton generating plant, which is a coal-fired generating plant in Ontario.

I am pleased to note that in this particular instance the government regulation seems to work. The two projects in question required approval by the federal government, and that approval was obtained by Hydro-Quebec in a short time with a minimum of bureaucratic effort.

The legislation which requires approval for the two power lines is consolidated in the Navigable Waters Protection Act. The NWPA, as the act is known, is administered by the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and is designed to protect the public right of navigation.

The act prohibits the construction or placing of any work in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the work and the site and plans have been approved by the minister upon such terms and conditions as the minister sees fit. Volume III of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927 first interpreted the word "work" to include telegraph or power cables or wire. Such structures from that point in time required the approval of the minister—at that time the minister of public works—where placement of same was contemplated over any navigable waterway in Canada.

In this case, Hydro-Quebec submitted two separate applications to the then minister of transport for approval of a 735 kv transmission line at two separate locations. These applications are described as follows:

Power Lines

(1) An application by Hydro-Quebec for NWPA approval of a 735 kv overhead power line, crossing the Ottawa River in front of Lot 11, Parish of St. Andrews in Argenteuil and in front of Lot 1 of the Village of Pointe-Fortune, in Vaudreuil.

(2) An application by Hydro-Quebec for NWPA approval of a 735 kv overhead power line crossing the Beauharnois Canal between Lots 83 and 84 subdivided and Lots 13, 14, and 15 subdivided, of the Parish of St.-Louis-de-Gonzague, in the County of Beauharnois.

I will attempt to summarize each case separately. In each synopsis, relevant dates and procedures pertaining to the discussions between the two parties will be listed in order to show the chain of events that led up to the Transport Canada issuance of an NWPA document, approving the Hydro-Quebec works.

In the first case, the Ottawa River crossing on January 9, 1978, Hydro-Quebec submitted an application requesting NWPA approval for the subject overhead power line.

The application was directed to the regional director, Canadian Coast Guard, Laurentian region, who had been delegated signing authority by the minister to approve overhead power lines. In keeping with the usual procedures for administration of this act, the site of the work was inspected by the NWPA investigation officer from the coastguard base at Montreal. A site investigation report dated February 21, 1978, was forwarded from the Montreal base office to the regional office. The report stated the vertical clearance between the lowest point of sag of the line and the high water line to be 92.7 feet.

Recommendations for construction of the crossing were as follows: first, that Hydro-Quebec would advise the Montreal coastguard office of the start of construction, together with a schedule of the work, two weeks in advance of construction to permit the issuance of a notice to mariners; and second, that Hydro-Quebec would be required to paint the towers red and white in accordance with the Department of Transport standards for air traffic obstructions. The requirements for marking of the towers was transmitted to Hydro-Quebec in a letter dated February 27, 1978, from the regional superintendent of airways, Department of Transport. On March 2, 1978, only seven weeks after the application, approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act was granted by the regional director, Laurentian area, acting on behalf of the then minister of transport. The approval document issued was in the form of a declaration of exemption, which is granted under section 5(2) of the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Section 5(2) of the act was utilized because, upon investigation of the site and plans, the proposed vertical clearance more than adequately provided sufficient clearance for the type of marine navigation currently utilizing the area. Consequently, the proposed work did not present a substantial interference to the public right of navigation at the site, and a declaration of exemption document was issued.

In the covering registered letter dated March 2, 1978, dispatched with the section 5(2) document, the requirement to advise the coastguard of the construction schedule was brought to the attention of the applicant.

On October 6, 1978, a report from the Laurentian region advised that a construction schedule had been established: construction of foundations for the towers, December, 1978; erection of the towers, March, 1979; and installation of the power line conductors, May, 1979. The construction schedule was later revised on October 26, 1978, to indicate that the lines would be put in place between March 15, 1979, and August 15, 1979.

● (1740)

A notice to shipping which reads as follows was issued in August, 1979:

A report dated October 17, 1979, from Laurentian Region confirmed that the overhead line has been completed as per schedule and conformed to the plans approved under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Subsequently, on November 29, 1979, the Canadian Hydrographic Service was provided with two copies of the work plans for charting action.

In the other canal crossing, on April 15, 1977, Hydro-Quebec submitted an application requesting NWPA approval for the overhead power line. The application was directed to the district manager, Canadian coastguard base, Montreal.

According to the usual practice, the site of the work was inspected by the NWPA investigation officer at the Montreal base office. A site investigation report dated April, 1977, was forwarded from the Montreal base office to the regional director, Laurentian region, to whom signing authority had been delegated by the minister to approve overhead power lines. The minimum vertical clearance of the overhead power line crossing the St. Lawrence seaway is 160 feet. Recommendations for construction of the crossing were as follows: First, that Hydro-Quebec would advise the Montreal coastguard office of the start of construction two weeks in advance of construction to permit the issuance of a notice to mariners; second, that Hydro-Quebec would mark each tower pylon situated in the water by fixed white lights; and third, that Hydro-Quebec would ensure that construction material or temporary structures used in construction of the line were removed from the waterway upon completion.

In this case, approval was obtained even faster. On May 2, 1977 approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act was granted by the regional director, Laurentian region, acting on behalf of the then minister of transport. The approval document issued was in the form of a "declaration of exemption", which is granted under section 5(2) of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. As in the case of the Ottawa river crossing, section 5(2) of the act was utilized because the vertical clearance of 160 feet was greater than the standard seaway clearance requirement of 130 feet, which is also the standard minimum vertical clearance for all commercial shipping channels or waterways in Canada. Consequently, the proposed work did not present a substantial interference to the public right of navigation at the site, and a declaration of exemption document was issued. As in the Ottawa river case, all additional requirements were covered in a separate letter to Hydro-Quebec.

On October 26, 1978, a report was received from the Laurentian region indicating that the overhead power line would be placed in position between November 1, 1978, and January 31, 1979. Subsequently, on July 17, 1979, the Laurentian region reported that the work had been completed in accordance with the plans approved under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. In a letter dated August 7, 1979, the Canadian Hydrographic Service was provided with two copies of the work plans for charting action.

In summary, in the case of the Ottawa and St. Lawrence river power line crossings to which the hon. member has referred, the application of the Navigable Waters Protection Act was carried out with relatively little dialogue necessary between Hydro-Quebec and the Department of Transport. The applicant, Hydro-Quebec, adhered to the stipulations of the requirements of the Navigable Waters Protection Act in a complete and prompt manner. This compliance was quickly followed by government approval.

I hope I have been able to clarify matters surrounding the hon. member's motion and I trust he will agree that the related events were simple and the procedures adopted were straightforward.

I might add in closing that copies of the documentation concerning these two NWPA approval cases are available from the official Transport Canada files upon request from interested parties.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, may I speak in conclusion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) will close the debate.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, my reason initially for proposing this motion was the interest which was aroused some six or seven years ago as a result of the expressed intention of Hydro-Quebec to export electricity to the United States. At that time it became apparent that these high tension lines were to cross the constituency of Vaudreuil which I represent. I received at that time many representations from interested persons, in the constituency and outside, on a variety of aspects which I have touched upon in my previous remarks, not only concerning whether or not we should be exporting electricity but also concerning environmental questions, and matters respecting the fact that in the constituency of Vaudreuil there are small airports and therefore these power lines could have some effect on the pilots of small planes. Concern was also expressed about the effect on navigation, and so on.

I put many questions on the order paper some five years ago and I received a variety of answers. Perhaps my greatest disappointment was when I heard that the then minister of energy, mines and resources had not expressed any great interest in the subject of the export of electricity to the United States. I made a request for these documents to be produced in the hope that they would contain further clarification of the position of the various government departments concerned.

When the parliamentary secretary advised us that the documents were voluminous and as a result, as he said, could be produced only at an inordinate cost and would take an inordinate length of time to prepare, I requested that the subject be transferred for debate, my reason at that time being that unless I did exactly that, I would not have the additional opportunity, as I have had today, to talk about the contents of the documents in question.

Of course, the initial reason for requesting that the documents be tabled was that these papers might be available to the public.

As I said earlier, it has become apparent in this instance, as in the previous instance, that the essential problem was one of translation, not one of the size of the documents. However, having said that, I have received the documents in question in the French language only and I have reviewed them. It has given us the opportunity this afternoon to talk a little about what we are doing in this country on a province by province basis in the field of electricity and about the problem of the province of Newfoundland which is selling 84 per cent of its electrical production to the province of Quebec at what is by today's criteria a very low price indeed, while the province of Quebec is, in turn, exporting electricity to the United States, Hydro-Quebec making in the process a fairly substantial profit. I feel that if we are to maintain a federal state an increased interest in this activity must be shown by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Having said that, there is obviously no point in pursuing this matter any further at this time. My colleagues and I have had the opportunity to air the subject, and I therefore request the consent of the House to withdraw the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the request of the hon. member for Vaudreuil. Is there agreement to allowing the hon. member to withdraw the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is ordered that motion No. 7 be withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 5.50 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, motion No. 14 (Mr. Rae), motion No. 15 (Mr. Rae) and motion No. 18 (Mr. Rae).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate on motions Nos. 14, 15 and 18 was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) had the floor.

Before recognizing the hon. member, may I take a moment to indicate that a further grouping of the remaining motions has been made—those listed on the order paper at report stage of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof. The motions seem to be procedurally acceptable and it is the intention of the Speaker to group them as follows. Motions Nos. 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 30, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 53, and 58 will be debated and voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 24 and 26 can be grouped for debate and a negative vote on motion No. 24 would dispose of motion No. 26. An affirmative vote on motion No. 24 will make it necessary to put motion No. 26. Motions Nos. 29, 31 and 32 will be grouped for debate, and the vote on motion No. 32 will dispose of motions Nos. 29 and 31. Motions Nos. 33, 34 and 35 will be grouped for debate and they will be voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 36 and 37 should be grouped for debate and a vote on motion No. 37 will dispose of motion No. 36.

Motions Nos. 45 and 54 will be grouped for debate and, if required, a vote on motion No. 45 will dispose of motion No. 54. Likewise, motions Nos. 56 and 57 will be grouped for debate and a vote on motion No. 56 will dispose of motion No. 57.

I am sure all hon. members are perfectly clear on the procedure at this moment.

Everything being perfectly clear, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure it is all clear, but I thank the Table for giving me a copy of your remarks in advance.

Prior to private members' hour, I was discussing section 110(3) found on page 98 of the bill. In that section the act provides that any group of shareholders, associated shareholders or a shareholder who holds 10 per cent is all right. But a bank will refuse to register securities where a shareholder holds more than 10 per cent of a class of shares.

The motion of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) clearly indicates that he, as the finance critic of the New Democratic Party, fails to understand how banks and large institutions, indeed, large commercial organizations, operate. He suggests that the figure of 10 per cent should be reduced to 2 per cent. Obviously we will get ourselves into enormous problems if that happens. If one is to organize a new bank, it would be necessary for the principal promoters to hold a fair block of stock, and a reasonable block of stock would have to be at least 10 per cent. To suggest that a new institution could be organized with no shareholder or associated group of shareholders holding more than 2 per cent of the stock means that it would be virtually impossible to organize such a corporation. In other words, the New Democratic Party clearly favours the creation of no further banks, no further financial institutions and no further competition in the banking industry.

Earlier today they talked about greater competition. We never could understand where that party stood with respect to financial institutions. The truth is that when it comes to a financial institution they oppose it because it is a financial institution. They do not oppose it for any reason or rationale. They oppose it because it happens to deal with money, because it happens to deal with business, because it happens to deal with some sense.

The 10 per cent is an effective limitation. Indeed it might even be increased to 15 per cent or 20 per cent, but the government has proposed 10 per cent. We are prepared to accept 10 per cent because it ensures that even in the worst situation there would have to be a minimum of ten shareholders holding 10 per cent each. In a public company like a bank that would be an impossibility. But it also ensures that no shareholder shall hold more than 10 per cent.

Turning to section 111(2) we find it deals with the registration of shares. It is found on page 101 of the bill. That section deals with the registration and the voting of shares.

• (2010)

The New Democratic Party amendment says that if a person has more than 2 per cent of the stock of a company the shares would be registered, but that shareholder could not vote even with the shares which he held. This suggestion indicates clearly to all members of this House how little the New Democratic Party understands the business of business, the business of banking, the business of financial institutions or, indeed, the workings of the total corporate organization of this country.

The suggestions made in the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood indicate his total lack of understanding of this act and of the banking industry in general. I suggest that the amendments be defeated forthwith.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I just had to get up and respond in some way to the very uncharitable remarks made by the hon. member who has just spoken and who, I know, can on occasion be charitable. I take exception to some of the things he said, particularly the statement that the New Democratic Party does not understand the affairs of business.

Mr. Blenkarn: You don't.

Mr. Skelly: As the hon. member was making his comments I was gleaning from this rather scanty article more information than from his presentation. I would like to refer to it in the context of amendment No. 15. What we are asking for in this amendment is a change in the control of large corporations. We would like to see some accountability. We have stated that representatives of the public are accountable and that there should be representation from Crown corporations, but these ideas were no good because the government cannot become involved.

Now we are recommending a provision which would broaden the shareholding base. Banks are so important that the shares should be held by Canadian citizens. There should be a broader holding of the shares of those corporations. With this amendment we are trying to place an obstacle in the way of a situation which is all too common in this country today, one in which a small group of minority shareholders can control large and powerful corporations. We would like to broaden the base of the shares and insist on ownership by Canadian citizens.

These amendments are simple requests to establish Canadian control over the chartered banks by broadening the shareholder base. So far today we have spent most of the time debating fairly important points relating to corporate concentration in the banking industry. All the resolutions introduced today deal with the question of who controls the banks, how broadly they control them and how well they serve the interests of the Canadian people.

The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) has said many times today that the banks have lots of competition. For example, he has told us that the credit union movement in Canada is in a very strong position to compete with the banks and that, in fact, it is taking business away from the banks. Credit unions are broadly co-operative organizations. Every member owns a share and can attend an annual meeting to elect a board of directors.

The credit union in my community is a very broadly-based organization which represents the feelings of the community. When I compare the board of directors of that credit union with the board of directors of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce I come up with some very enlightening facts. This article says that in 1979 Conrad Black was on the board. He was not representing a broad base of shareholders, he was representing Argus Corporation. I am learning from the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) who it is that controls the financial power in this country, and I have been working very hard to learn.

Mr. Blenkarn: You will have to work a lot harder.

Mr. Skelly: Who controls the financial power and thrust in this country? Another director on the board of the Imperial Bank of Commerce is Albert Fairley Jr. who is director of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada. It says that Mr. Fairley lives in Birmingham, Alabama. He is providing input from one major corporation to another while he lives in Birmingham, Alabama. J. P. Gallagher, another of the movers and shakers in the big corporations in Canada, is also mentioned. When I look at the board of the Courtney Savings Credit Union, I do not see a J. P. Gallagher, who represents Dome Petroleum or an A. D. Hamilton who represents Domtar or a Sydney Hermant, who represents Imperial Optical. Imperial Optical is a great little company. It is too bad that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is not here tonight because we could have a most interesting discussion about that company on the side.

What we are trying to get at in this amendment and in the whole series of amendments we have proposed today is who controls these banks. Obviously, these banks are controlled by a very exclusive group who represent very few people, and who thus wind up with interests which are not necessarily parallel with the interests of the people of Canada. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) talked about the situation in his province which is similar to the situation in my province, stressing the need for a broader base and more sensivity to the needs of the people of the western region.

The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce also has on its board a representative from LaFarge, a company based in Paris, France. I did not select the Bank of Commerce particularly; I merely wanted to make some remarks to illustrate the problem in front of us. Other members on the board include Albert Powis of Noranda Mines and Gailen Weston from the George Weston group. And here are two more, one from the Sun Life Assurance Company and one from Massey-Ferguson.

When we look at this board of directors we see that it is very exclusive and very powerful. The assets of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce amounted to $50 billion in 1979, and the company recorded an 18 per cent increase in its assets since 1978. That company is doing very well. But we are not looking at $50 billion operating in the Canadian economy, we are looking at the interrelationship between the assets of all those other corporations and the Imperial Bank of Commerce. There are even international ties.

I just do not believe that the interests of Canada necessarily dovetail with those of the Imperial Bank of Commerce. I do not believe the minister when he says that the credit union movement is competing successfully with the Imperial Bank of Commerce because they are not in the same ball game. We are talking about a group of institutions which have a budget which is greater than the budget of the Government of Canada.

I am very skeptical when the minister says that the banks are facing real competition. The Toronto-Dominion Bank has total assets of $28 billion. Again the board of directors includes representatives of the Sun Life Assurance Company. So these companies are not merely associated with one bank, they have their fingers in a couple of banks. That looks like interlocking directorships.

I am glad the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) drew attention to my lack of understanding of business. But I have some questions, Mr. Speaker. Maybe it is time we all acquired a profound understanding of business and how it affects us. One of my colleagues says that Brother Bennett in British Columbia has been teaching us lessons. He subscribes to the same school of thought as the hon. member for Mississauga South.

We are looking at this particular organization with its paltry $28 million, which is a nice increase over last year, and also at the tremendous assets of the corporations around them. I find that CPR and one of its major subsidiaries is represented, as is Imperial Oil. I have forgotten which of these corporate citizens of Canada is concerned in this, but when we are learning the lesson of business that the hon. member for Mississauga South mentions, we notice that one of the advertisements on the program "Hockey Night in Canada" shows a big globe turning around. A man walks out on stage with a brace and bit. He stops the globe, then gets up on a ladder and puts the brace and bit against Canada and screws a big hole in it. That has just got to be Imperial Oil, Mr. Speaker. He screws a big hole in the globe and says, "We are basically working for Canada." I think that is some of the most honest advertising that has ever appeared on television. I cannot really tell which is screwing Canada the worst. Imperial Oil is doing us, so is the CPR. They are in a very exclusive club with the banks.

When I look at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce I see Conrad Black of Argus Corporation and J. P. Gallagher of Dome Petroleum. They control $50 billion in assets and have interlocking arrangements through the Sun Life Assurance Company. I have to ask myself who controls the banks, Mr. Speaker. Is there a widespread representation of Canadian citizens or is it entirely Canadian citizens who influence the direction of the banks? To my own question I have to answer no, it is not.

The amendments we have introduced would ensure that Canadians control those banks, that Canadian representation on the boards of directors was much broader and that the sensitivity to Canadian issues was much increased.

I should like to pursue this avenue, Mr. Speaker. We have J. Edgar Kaiser whose daddy, down to the south, was Kaiser Steel and was also involved in oil companies. J. Edgar Kaiser was teaching British Columbia a lesson about business—along with his buddy, Bill Bennett. At one time the people of British Columbia, through their government, owned a large number of forest companies and other corporations that private enterprise had abandoned—along with the jobs and benefits to the community. The government of British Columbia picked up those companies and began to make a tremendous amount of money. The companies were extremely profitable. There were forest companies in northern British Columbia and the Kootenays; there was Westcoast Transmission and all those other beauties. When Bill Bennett was elected he decided to teach the people of British Columbia about business—just as the hon. member for Mississauga South suggests. He said, "We are going to take all those corporations that are making money and put them together in a big company called B.C. Resources Investment Corporation. Some of us had another, more affectionate, name for it, Mr. Speaker. He was going to put all the profitable companies together and sell them back to British Columbia. That was our first lesson in business. He was going to give everyone a couple of shares and let them buy the rest. People bought them up at $6 per share. The B.C. Resources Investment Corporation wound up with one of the largest piles of money there is anywhere. However, they procrastinated about what they would do with the money while the people of British Columbia waited for the value of the shares to increase, just like the bank shares.

Eventually, the corporation decided to buy the shares of young J. Edgar Kaiser's business and put in a bid at $44 for a share. It was not good enough and the bid was withdrawn. But several months later they made another bid at $55 per share. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, even the president of the B.C. Resources Investment Corporation thought it would be a good idea to buy some of the shares and he did. J. Edgar Kaiser also bought some. At $55 per share he decided it was time to let BRIC take over the shares for a tidy sum, not only for the president of that company but for himself and many of the directors of his company. They all made a tidy profit on that deal at the expense of the people of British Columbia who were being taught how the marketplace works by a fellow traveller of the hon. member for Mississauga South. Now they have a big chunk of J. Edgar's business. It was a very expensive lesson indeed.

There is more to that story, Mr. Speaker. Benefits were negotiated by Kaiser. He was allowed to buy back assets at cost; he has been given a 15-year agreement on coal, and he has a commission to sell coal that has already been sold. As a matter of fact, the people of British Columbia were taken to the cleaners by Bill Bennett and J. Edgar Kaiser, Junior.

I am frightened, Mr. Speaker, that the lessons given by companies like Imperial Oil, CPR, and J. Edgar Kaiser's coal operations in southeastern British Columbia are not the lessons the people of Canada want to learn. I suggest that the lesson of Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson and many other corporations are not the kind we need to learn either. In fact, if there was greater public accountability, a broader holding of shares involving more Canadians, there would not be some of these very sharp business deals that fill the pockets of a small number of Canadians—the old boy group that has been mentioned.

I defy the hon. member to say that it is not so; that people have not been hurt. They have been skinned, Mr. Speaker. There are many honest businesses in this country but there are some that need more direction. Some people in positions of power have harmed Canadians and we would like to see an end to that. If we were to broaden the base of shareholding, it would be a step in the right direction.

Some time earlier I mentioned what I saw as a sort of historical prospective of Canada. I mentioned the CPR link to the Bank of Montreal and the link to the Liberal-Conservative party as it was called at that time—again skinning the people of Canada. The bank was there, funding the skinning, directing the efforts. They built the CPR and certainly that benefitted the country. When we look at the political relationships between these companies, however, I think it should be on record that in most of those corporations, and in the people who sat on the boards of the banks we see a cross-referencing of individuals. Those corporations donate to the Liberal party, to the Conservative party. So they have an interest. Also, the banks donate to the Liberal party and the Conservative party. The old alliance still exists.

I hear some people across the way coming to life, Mr. Speaker. That is good. There are new questions.

An hon. Member: Don't wake them up.

Mr. Skelly: I think they have to be woken up. This is a very serious thing, Mr. Speaker. We cannot deny history. The people were skinned by a bank. There is a strong corporate connection and a political alliance. History requires some depth of thought.

The backbenchers across the way tend to drift off, Mr. Speaker, because they have no role to play. That tie does exist today. It has existed in the past and it exists today in the mind of the hon. member for Mississauga South. One of my colleagues has brought over the Hudson's Bay motto which is "Skin 'em alive!"

• (2030)

An hon. Member: That is the Liberal party motto.

Mr. Skelly: I am afraid my Latin is not quite up to scratch these days, but he was kind enough to translate the motto for me.

If we go back to Donald Smith, who was at one time a mover and shaker in the Hudson's Bay Company, we find him propped up over there in the Liberal-Conservative party when they ruled the country. We also find him listed on the board of the Bank of Montreal and the CPR. I think he was one of the people pounding the spikes.

Mr. Blenkarn: He built the country.

Mr. Skelly: He built it all right, skinning them alive.

Mr. Blenkarn: Who did he skin?

Mr. Skelly: He was busy like the member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) teaching them a lesson. Thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Speaker. I hope we will all learn some lessons from that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is on motion No. 14 in the name of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea?

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 15

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by susbstituting the word "two" for the word "ten" in lines 34, 44, and 50 at page 98.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 15 (Mr. Rae) negatived.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 18

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments

Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 36 at page 101 and substituting the following therefor:

"exceeds two per cent of the issued and"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 18 (Mr. Rae) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House will now proceed to motions numbered 17, 52, 55 and 59, all in the name of the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) which can be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance) moved:

Motion No. 17

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by adding immediately after line 9 at page 101 the following:

"110.1(1) Subject to this section, no person shall

(a) hold or beneficially own shares of a class of shares of a bank if the total number of shares of that class held or beneficially owned by such person and by other persons associated with him, if any, is more than ten per cent of the total number of the issued and outstanding shares of that class; or

(b) purchase or otherwise acquire shares of a class of shares of a bank if the total number of such shares together with the total number of shares of that class held or beneficially owned by such person and by other persons associated with him, if any, would exceed ten per cent of the total number of the issued and outstanding shares of that class.

(2) A person who, on the day this section comes into force, holds or beneficially owns shares that, but for this subsection, would be held or beneficially owned in contravention of paragraph (1)(a), may continue to do so for a period of five years after the coming into force of this section.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of any shares of a foreign bank subsidiary that are held, beneficially owned, purchased or acquired by a foreign bank.

(4) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of any shares of a bank, other than a foreign bank subsidiary, purchased or acquired by a person pursuant to section 114 or held or beneficially owned by such person as a result of any such purchase or acquisition until the date that is ten years after the day of such purchase or acquisition.

(5) The Inspector may from time to time, in writing, direct a bank to obtain from any person in whose name a share of the bank is held or beneficially owned a declaration containing information

(a) concerning the ownership or beneficial ownership of such share,

(b) whether such share is held or beneficially owned by a person who is associated with any other person and the name of that other person where applicable, and

(c) concerning such other related matters as are specified by the Inspector, and as soon as possible after the receipt of a direction from the Inspector under this subsection, the directors of the bank shall comply therewith and every person who is requested by the bank to provide a declaration containing information referred to in this subsection shall forthwith comply with the request.

(6) Where, in the opinion of the minister, a person holds or beneficially owns shares of a bank in contravention of subsection (1), the minister may, by order, require the person or other persons associated with him, or both, to divest himself or themselves of such number of those shares as is specified in the order within such time not exceeding two years from the date of the order as is specified in the order and in such proportion if any, as, between the person and those other persons, is specified in the order and the person and those other persons shall comply with such order.

(7) For the purposes of this section, a person is deemed to be associated with another person if there exists between those persons any relationship referred to in subsection 109(2) that, if both such persons were shareholders, would cause those shareholders to be deemed to be associated pursuant to that subsection."

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance) moved:

Motion No. 52

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 1 at page 315 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) Notwithstanding subsection 1101(1) and paragraph (1)(a) of this section,".

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance) moved:

Motion No. 55

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 18 by adding immediately after line 15 at page 373 the following:

"(6) Section 46 of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(8) Subject to this section, no person shall

(a) hold or beneficially own shares of a class of shares of the bank if the total number of shares of that class held or beneficially owned by such person and by other persons associated with him if any, is more than ten per cent of the total number of the issued and outstanding shares of that class; or

(b) purchase or otherwise acquire shares of a class of shares of the bank if the total number of such shares together with the total number of shares of that class held or beneficially owned by such person and by other persons associated with him, if any, would exceed ten per cent of the total number of the issued and outstanding shares of that class.

(9) A person who, on the day this subsection comes into force, holds or beneficially owns shares that, but for this subsection, would be held or beneficially owned in contravention of paragraph (8)(a), may continue to do so for a period of five years after the coming into force of this subsection.

(10) Notwithstanding subsection 47(2), a person who, on the day this subsection comes into force, holds or beneficially owns shares of a class of shares of the bank that, but for subsection (9), would be held or beneficially owned in contravention of paragraph (8)(a), may exercise the voting rights pertaining to any of those shares if the number of such shares being voted at any time by that person and by other persons associated with him, if any, does not exceed ten per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of that class.

(11) The Inspector may from time to time, in writing, direct the bank to obtain from any person in whose name a share of the bank is held or beneficially owned a declaration containing information

(a) concerning the ownership or beneficial ownership of such share,

(b) whether such share is held or beneficially owned by a person who is associated with any other person and the name of that other person where applicable, and

(c) concerning such other related matters as are specified by the Inspector, and as soon as possible after the receipt of a direction from the Inspector under this subsection, the directors of the bank shall comply therewith and every person who is requested by the bank to provide a declaration containing information referred to in this subsection shall forthwith comply with the request.

(12) Where, in the opinion of the minister, a person holds or beneficially owns shares of the bank in contravention of subsection (8), the minister may, by order, require the person or other persons associated with him, or both, to divest himself or themselves of such number of those shares as is specified in the order within such time not exceeding two years from the date of the order as is specified in the order and in such proportion, if any, as, between the person and those other persons, is specified, in the order and the person and those other persons shall comply with such order.

(13) For the purposes of this section,

(a) "beneficially own" includes own through a trustee, legal representative, agent or other intermediary; and

(b) a person is deemed to be associated with another person if there exists between those persons any relationship referred to in subsection 45(2) that, if both such persons were shareholders, would cause those shareholders to be deemed to be associated pursuant to that subsection.

(14) Everyone who, without reasonable cause, contravenes subsection (8), (11) or (12) is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both." "

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance) moved:

Motion No. 59

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 91 by striking out line 31 at page 446 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion.

(2.1) Subject to subsection (2.2), section 110.1 of the Bank Act applies to IAC Limited and in respect of the shares of IAC Limited.

(2.2) A person who immediately prior to the amalgamation under subsection (1) of this section was permitted by section 110.1 of the Bank Act to continue to hold or beneficially own shares of IAC Limited that but for subsection (2) of that section would be held or beneficially owned in contravention of paragraph (1)(a) of that section, may hold or beneficially own the shares issued to him under subsection (2) of this section after the amalgamation during the same period of time as he would have been permitted by subsection 110.1(2) of the Bank Act to continue to hold or beneficially own shares of IAC Limited had the amalgamation not occurred."

He said: Mr. Speaker, as you clearly indicated, the House is now called upon to proceed to the consideration of motions Nos. 17, 52, 55 and 59, which we shall consider together and which will be voted on later. I am convinced that, as we consider those motions, we shall recognize many concerns which were expressed this afternoon and this evening on the so-called excessive control over bank shares by particular groups or by a limited number of individuals.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to remind hon. members of this, that these amendments come from a situation described to the committee by the Inspector General of Banks following questions asked to the Inspector General and myself by members who sit on the committee. These questions clearly showed that the principle that an individual or a group must not hold more than 10 per cent of the shares of a bank could easily be evaded since the penalty attached to this provision was that these shares could not be registered and would therefore not carry a vote. We could therefore have a situation where a group or even an individual would hold 25 per cent, 30 per cent or 40 per cent of the shares of a bank.

Of course, the shares over 10 per cent were not registered and did not carry a vote. Therefore, they did not go against the letter of the law, even though they obviously exceeded the spirit of the law. Hon. members who were present at these proceedings, which were held before the House was recalled, in late September or early October as I recall, will remember that the comittee unanimously took the position that some means must be found to strengthen the provisions of the legislation so that not only the letter of the law, but also its spirit could be respected and to specify that there is truly a limit of 10 per cent placed on the shares that an individual or group can hold, and the amendments contained in these four motions meet this requirement.

The first amendment, which is contained in motion No. 17, states that it would be illegal for a person and his associates to hold or to beneficially own more then 10 per cent of the shares of a bank. Moreover, with this amendment, the Inspector General of Banks would have the power to obtain any information necessary to determine who are the true owners of the shares of a bank. This new clause provides a mechanism to require someone to divest himself of those shares exceeding the 10 per cent limit. To protect temporarily the persons or groups of persons who hold more then 10 per cent of the shares of recently established banks, subclause 110.1 of this bill would allow these people to continue to hold their shares for a period of five years, and subclause 110.1(6) would include the possibility of granting an additional period of two years to divest themselves of these shares.

● (2040)

To avoid any misunderstanding, if at the time the legislation now before us comes into force, a person or group hold more than 10 per cent of the capital stock, they would have an initial five-year period to conform to the 10 per cent limit. If after that five-year period that person or group experienced difficulties that could be reasonably explained and understood, an additional two-year exemption could be granted.

Such an approach is compatible with the special acts that were passed earlier for the incorporation of banks. Moreover, motions Nos. 52 and 56, that will come up later, protect the persons holding more than 10 per cent of the capital stock of Mercantile Bank and Continental Bank. Certainly, every member here understands that we could not enact legislation that would be unfair to institutions established under agreements that were negotiated under specific circumstances and according to specific understandings. Those understandings the government is determined to respect. The government therefore propose to amend the legislation to insert paragraph 110(1) I just referred to.

I would now like to turn briefly to motion No. 52. It is also linked to motion No. 17 limiting to 10 per cent the percentage amount of a bank's capital stock that may be held by any one person. The proposed amendment concerns paragraph 305(2) of the legislation and would allow Citicorp to detain more than 10 per cent of the capital stock of Mercantile Bank, as I referred to earlier. That provision, it will be remembered, was introduced in 1967 under the last Bank Act revision, and we have no intention of amending it. Citicorp now holds less than 25 per cent of the capital stock of Mercantile Bank, and that percentage could be possibly reduced to 10 per cent to the extent that Mercantile would issue new shares to increase their capital. And I would like to call upon hon. members to view this in light of the historical context I just explained, when the Citicorp-Mercantile understandings were negotiated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with the other amendment affecting the Quebec Savings Banks which has reached a point where one of the shareholders holds more than the 10 per cent limit of total shares, and this amendment is similar to the general amendment we are seeking to the Bank Act. There is a first period of five years which is granted to dispose of all shares in excess of the 10 per cent limit; wherever special circumstances warrant, a two-year extension could be allowed to avoid causing unduly serious prejudice to the institution.

Mr. Speaker, motion No. 59 is also consequential on the general amendment and concerns the legislation incorporating the Continental Bank of Canada. Its purpose is to make sure that the government's policy to strengthen the provisions concerning the effective holding or owning of more than 10 per cent of total shares of an individual bank are not unfair to the shareholders of IAC Limited following its amalgamation with the Continental Bank. The proposed amendment will provide IAC shareholders with the same rights to own shares and the same duties to dispose of their excess shares as those which are provided to the bank's shareholders under motion No. 17.

The government proposes to amend accordingly the act incorporating the Continental Bank of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to reconstruct the context in which we discussed in committee, the obvious difficulty of respecting in every detail the 10 per cent ownership of bank shares, in compliance with the spirit of the law. We have seen, upon examination, what consequences that amendment can have on existing institutions.

The government is proposing an amendment that is intended to be fair in that, on the one hand, it will allow financial institutions to adjust and adapt to the spirit and the letter of the law while, on the other hand, allowing those institutions which were granted a special regime on incorporation, as a result of negotiations leading up to that incorporation, to be treated fairly and reasonably without suffering undue damages. I could have added that penalties have been provided for in the bill. Suffice to say, on concluding, that the provision is strengthened which stipulates that no one person or group of persons shall hold more than 10 per cent of the shares of any given bank; this, I believe, will meet the wishes and the will of the standing committee as well as the spirit of the act as it now stands. Mr. Speaker, I urge all hon. members to support the four motions I have just dealt with.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate you for agreeing to chair our sitting this evening. Since the minister spoke in French, I shall make my few remarks on his proposals in English.

[English]

These rather long amendments, particularly motion No. 17, were actually prompted as a result of questioning that I started one morning. It took us about two to two and a half hours to get the information. I do not know what the reluctance was. Perhaps it was a lack of knowledge.

It seemed when I started questioning to try and get information about the Montreal and District Savings Bank that there was some sort of either—

Mr. Blenkarn: Cover-up.

Mr. Lambert: I would not say cover-up. There was some sort of embarrassment or reticence about giving the information.

Mr. Blenkarn: Cover-up.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have heard totally unacceptable expressions used about the way both the Inspector General and I behaved as witnesses in committee.

In no way can the Inspector General of Banks or myself be accused as witnesses of not answering the questions of the committee members as fully as possible. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to raise the question of privilege about the words used.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, it is not I who accuses. I talked about a certain reticence and I explained. Perhaps the facts were not too clear and it took a little while to show the government and the Inspector General of Banks that we were aware of what had happened. Also, I think that what we felt at that moment was a certain embarrassment, as a result of a particular situation and that, under the act as it existed, the Inspector General of Banks and the minister were powerless and it seemed in fact that the act was rather like a paper tiger. After all, we all know that when a bank shareholder has more shares than the maximum allowed, the only penalty he suffers is that he cannot vote to the full extent of his shares.

But on the other hand neither the minister nor the Inspector General of Banks could penalize the shareholder because the act simply stated that the bank did not register the transfer of such and such a share since the shareholder had already registered more than 10 per cent of the shares. That is why we say they are powerless. After all, that was the situation and it was well known that the Laurentian group held some 43 or 47 per cent of the shares, which was considerably more than the maximum allowed. So maybe they were a bit embarrassed to admit this but eventually, as the information was made public, I think that even government members of the committee expressed some reservations. So it was not only opposition members who openly criticized the situation. I am therefore very happy that the minister came up with this amendment. I was wondering if this was going to be put off indefinitely with an arrangement, with negotiations with the Laurentian group. After all, they did come to see us the day after we criticized the situation to explain their position and to say that they needed time. So I am happy that they did not choose two years, as was originally stipulated, but that they added in fact another five years.

● (2050)

[English]

However, having said that, I do wish that this amendment and its companion amendment in the Quebec Savings Banks Act had gone further. This amendment envisages that at the end of five years, if it is found that a shareholder holds in excess of the permitted number of shares, the minister may make an order that the shareholder divest himself. It is to be a direct order from the minister. That is going one step further. First of all he is given a period of grace. Then there is a ministerial order that he shall divest himself. And that is all. I would have preferred to see the minister, after having issued an order under the act, be able to sanction a penalty if that order had been frustrated or disobeyed. We give him the power to do that under the act. At the present time the only penalty is the shareholder cannot vote the shares. There are provisions in the act for an offence under the act but there is nothing in this amendment, with the greatest of respect, saying that if the minister's order is disobeyed such action shall be deemed to be an offence under the act. Therefore, the penalty is still the same.

I would have thought that in the normal progression of things the five-years' grace would allow the shareholder to hold the shares he has in excess though he could not vote. Well, that is a disability but, apparently, it is not a very serious one. Then the minister gives the offending shareholder two years to divest himself—and it is a direct order. Unfortunately, the amendment says nothing about that. It leaves the minister toothless. In effect, he is a toothless tiger. There is no way that the minister can then act further to do anything to that offending shareholder. Unless I am a poor interpreter of statutes, no offence has been created. I would have thought that just the additional phrase that the disregard of such a ministerial order after the period of two years should be an offence within the act, would bring the penalty sections into play. Perhaps that would provide the necessary whip to get an offending shareholder back in line. Unfortunately, that is something we cannot change.

Perhaps, though, there is a way to make this happen. I suggest to the minister that there is still time to bring an appropriate amendment before the other House. The other House could then accept that amendment and there could be negotiation and acceptance by this House.

I see the minister is getting awfully interested in a note which was just passed to him. Unfortunately, he cannot speak again. Perhaps one of his colleagues or the parliamentary secretary could give us the information.

If I am wrong—and I am not insisting that I am right—on first blush that is my reaction to the clause. There is no such thing as an offence simpliciter. There cannot be just a general offence under the act because in no other place are there ministerial orders.

It is an interesting point to raise at this time. I would prefer to see it cleared up as soon as possible, so I will keep talking until the minister can come back and can indicate whether the parliamentary secretary has the answer. I do not want a light opinion given by two non-lawyers that the act covers this situation. It seems to me this matter could be handled very easily through the process of the hearings in the other place, after which it could be brought back here. I trust that would provide sufficient time to have the bill go to the other place and then, if there must be conferences to negotiate any differences, that would be the way to proceed.

The last amendment, which is No. 59, deals with the IAC, as the minister indicated. But there again we have the same IAC and the Continental Bank. That in itself suffers from the same disability because all these amendments refer back to the contents of motion No. 17 which lays out the procedure with regard to an excess of shares. I certainly urge the House to accept this amendment, but perhaps my colleagues on this side would wait for the parliamentary secretary, if he is ready—or if he is not, I see that one of my colleagues is quite anxious to take over—and we can get the answer. In any event I think that this is a salutary group of amendments which show the wisdom of some co-operation in examining a complicated text.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that this intervention precludes me from speaking again on this particular motion, but I think the hon. member has a question which is worthy of a serious comment. The motion we are dealing with here deals with the Quebec Savings Banks Act and, as we found in the last section, No. 14, sets out an offence with regard to the Quebec Savings Banks Act. My information is that the same provision applies in the Bank Act at page 324 section 314, specifically paragraph (2) which reads as follows:

Everyone who, without reasonable cause, contravenes a provision of this act or the regulations for the contravention of which no punishment is otherwise provided by this act is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both.

Mr. Lambert: All right.

Mr. Evans: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the minister rose and was rather upset when I may have shouted across the floor, "There is a bit of a cover-up here". Let us talk about that for a moment.

In May of this year before this bill left the House at second reading the Inspector General of Banks became aware that the Laurentian group in Quebec had obtained 43 per cent of the shares of the Quebec Savings Bank. Later in the year the minister and the Inspector General of Banks clearly had discussions, and letters were written in the month of July to that group advising that it was in default under the act, telling the group that it could not vote its shares and, generally speaking, calling the group's attention to the matter.

What bothers me, and what bothered many members of the finance committee, is that when section 110 came before the committee for discussion, no mention of the Laurentian problem and the Quebec Savings problem was brought to the attention of that committee in July. It was not until the hon. member for Edmonton West raised the matter in September—

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Minister of State for Finance on a point of order.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order I would like to point out to the hon. member that the provisions of the bill provided that an excess of 10 per cent of shares should not be registered by the institution and the shareholders should not have the right to vote. Those two facts were a violation of the law and this is what his colleague said a while ago and what we said before a standing committee. So no matter how many ribbons they may be wrapped in those allegations are still untruths.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the minister has confirmed that section 110 does provide that shares may not be registered, but when the minister and the Inspector General of Banks had before them a situation, unknown to members of the committee, in which a group in fact controlled 43 per cent of the shares which was known to the minister, the minister, through the Inspector General of Banks, advised the members of that group that they could not vote their shares, and the minister did not reveal this to the committee in July when the section was before the committee. The question was not asked. It was not asked until September when the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) brought it to the attention of the committee, and then the whole thing opened up. Then all of a sudden we learned from the Inspector General of Banks what in fact was happening. It became apparent that Monsieur Garneau is going to be elected—or has now been re-elected—chief executive officer of the Quebec Savings Bank. Somewhere along the line, even though the Laurentian group cannot vote any of its shares, its nominee as chief executive officer will be elected.

It became quite apparent that whether you were able to register your shares or not, you could still perhaps have some effective control over a bank. It is only as a result of that committee hearing and the intense questioning on that day that these amendments are before the House. I say to the minister very sincerely that he should have advised the committee in July of the problem he was having. The inspector general, on the minister's instructions, should have advised the committee at that time, and the inspector general and the minister should have introduced these amendments in the committee when they knew the problems were there. It was only as a result of the questioning of the hon. member for Edmonton West that this matter came to the attention of the committee. The minister shakes his head, but it might well be said that the minister would not be introducing these amendments were it not for that questioning. The minister again shakes his head. I say to the minister that he has to come clean. In the committee the opposition brought forward a certain matter. That matter is now before the House, and these are reasonable amendments. Let us look at them. What the amendment does, particularly with the Quebec Savings Banks, is say, "You have five years in which to divest your shares." If it does not do so in five years, it probably has another two years. Then what does it say? I read motion No. 55, I suppose it is. Subsection (14) says:

Everyone who, without reasonable cause, contravenes subsection (8), (11) or (12) is guilty of an offence—

Is it reasonable cause if you cannot get a decent market price for your shares? It does not say, "Any one who contravenes regardless of cause is guilty of an offence". It says "without reasonable cause". Has the minister in this amendment said to the Laurentian group that the worst that can happen if it does not get rid of its shares is that it will pay a $5,000 fine and that if it has any reasonable cause perhaps it will not pay any fine at all? Under the subsection you can only be convicted once. It is not a continuing offence. It is a one-offence situation. The maximum fine is $5,000 once, and if there is reasonable cause for not obeying the minister's order you do not pay at all; nothing happens to you. You do not lose your shares. You still keep them. The minister cannot make another order and cannot give you another two years or five years. He is finished.

If you show a provincial judge or a superior court judge that you have reasonable cause for not getting rid of your shares, nothing can happen to you. Perhaps you cannot vote the shares, but you could not anyway. However, that does not matter because you certainly could elect your chief executive officer in the way you want without voting.

● (2110)

This is the section in which the minister proposes to correct that situation. The minister does not come across on the matter. Perhaps he should be given an opportunity to rise and speak again on the issue, but in this particular matter the minister did not explain his problem when section 110 first came before the committee. It was only in the last stages of the committee's hearings in September, as a result of the questioning by the hon. member for Edmonton West, that this matter came before the committee. That is the only reason these amendments are here. They are proper amendments. They are not tough enough and they are not clear enough, but they are proper amendments. I strongly suggest to the minister that he take a look at subclause (14) in motion 55 with respect to Quebec Savings Banks and at the penalties with respect to other chartered banks as well as the other part of the bill in motion No. 17 to make sure that those who attempt to skate around the provisions limiting shareholding by saying, "I don't care whether or not I vote the shares" are in fact committing an offence under the act. I suggest that the penalty attached to the offence be the forfeiture of the shares, because unless you are prepared to put a serious penalty into the act, everyone will find good reason not to dispose of their stock. After all, it may upset the marketplace, or they may not get what they paid for their shares, or they may lose money. This would be terrible! When a person literally flouts a statute of this country, there should be legislation with teeth in it to deal with such a case. This particular statute says that if you flout the statute, you will get five years grace and then another two years, following which maybe you will have to pay $5,000 if you do not have reasonable cause. Is the minister really serious about controlling shareholding? Is he really serious about closing the loophole which has developed as a result of the actions of the Laurentian group? I have talked to the Laurentian group, the minister knows that. I understand their problems and I understand how the problem has developed. But what I and other members are concerned about is what happens with respect to other chartered banks. Will a situation arise where somebody is allowed to buy up a majority share of stocks in those other banks, not vote them and not register them? Will an investigation be ordered in five years and then in another two years, following which, unless you can show reasonable cause, you will not even be fined, and if you are fined, you are only fined $5,000 as a licence fee? Is that the kind of penalty the minister wants? Is that what the minister is talking about? Is that how serious he is with respect to the statute?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Motions Nos. 17, 52, 55 and 59 in the name of the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussieres) were grouped together for debate but will be voted upon separately. The first question is on motion No. 17 in the name of the Minister of State for Finance. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 17 (Mr. Bussières) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is on motion No. 52. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 52 (Mr. Bussières) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The next question is on motion No. 55. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 55 (Mr. Bussières) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The next question is on motion No. 59. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 59 (Mr. Bussières) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to a notification of which I informed the House earlier today at 8 p.m., there is a substantial series of motions to be debated and voted on separately. The first is motion No. 22 standing in the name of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

Motion No. 22

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 27 to 32 at page 145 and substituting the following therefor:

"legal representatives, and any individual may examine the records described in subsection 155(1) during usual business hours of the bank and may take extracts therefrom, free of charge."

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to examine the groupings which have been made by the Chair to see whether or not I agree with the suggestion that the motions be voted upon separately. Once that is done perhaps we could recommend to the House that an order be made that such should be the procedure to be followed later this evening and tomorrow. I think we do require a House order. It would tidy up the debate. However, I have not had a chance to check the motions grouped, so perhaps the debate could proceed on motion No. 22, as you have proposed, Mr. Speaker, following which I could tell you whether we are in agreement with this particular proposal from the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I recognize the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), may I interject to say that when the hon. member for Edmonton West started to make his remarks, I was moving paper around and I missed hearing what he said. I will inform myself immediately on the subject. In the meantime, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Comox-Powell River on motion No. 22.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I think this particular motion deals with the question of financial disclosure. As we indicated earlier, we considered it very important as far as support for this legislation is concerned. It was raised throughout second reading and throughout the committee stage. We held informal discussions concerning possible amendments, and the government certainly did not seem to object to the concept of financial disclosure. The question of where and how much always arises in this connection. It might be interesting to see whether the government would be prepared to accept this amendment. I think it is very easy to accept in some respects and it is certainly not controversial. It is consistent with the government's theme in terms of freedom of information. We have had some wide ranging discussions on how much people have a right to know and so on. It is important to keep in mind that basically we should be given free and easy access to information which affects our lives. I would like to refer to clause 156 as it presently reads. Basically, section 156(1) states:

Shareholders and holders of bank debentures of a bank, their agents and legal representatives may examine the records described in subsection 155(1) during usual business hours of the bank and may take extracts therefrom, free of charge, and any other person may do so on payment of a reasonable fee.

Our amendment would provide that "any individual . . . may take extracts . . . free." Free and ready access to information is the important aspect. It is consistent with freedom of information, and as I said before, hopefully the government will accept this proposition.

What disturbs us more than anything else about any attempt to limit information available to others is that Canada has somewhat of a history of curtailing the rights of people; their ability to understand what is going on around them is hampered by the close and secretive society in which we live. When we look across the line to our neighbours to the south, we find that basically they have a fairly wide-ranging access to information.

At one time questions were raised about the money made by the president of the CPR in Canada, what he was being paid. While other Canadians had wage and price controls imposed upon them we wondered about the salary of the president of the CPR. The salaries of other corporate executives, directors and a whole range of people were not available to be scrutinized. But this material was freely available in the United States. As a matter of fact corporations disclose the information automatically when applying for access to security markets in the United States. There is no hindrance whatsoever, and they are required to display a whole range of information. Simple access to the information is made readily available. Another organization in the United States has set out guidelines. Bank America has set out voluntary guidelines for disclosure. This business of financial disclosure is very important. The corporation indicated that it was not just shareholders or an exclusive group of people who had a right to knowledge, but that its employees also had the right to know what was going on within the corporation for which they worked. Compared with the situation in our country, this attitude is, indeed, progressive.

Look at some of the things that went on when many bank employees attempted to organize. They needed information and assistance. I guess the banks are one of the last bastions of a medieval attitude toward labour relations. These employees experienced great difficulty in obtaining information. But Bank America indicated that its employees had a right and need to be informed about the corporation, its corporate policies, decisions of its board of directors and a great many other matters. Also, that bank acknowledged that its customers also had a need and right to know, and it outlined substantial areas in which customers could obtain information. Investors or people who buy securities and shares in banks also have a right to know, and Bank America freely acknowledged this. It is generally acknowledged that shareholders have a right to information, but the impressive thing about the guidelines is that they far outstrip any information available to Canadians from Canadian banks. They recognize the basic principle that there is a broad need and right to know what some of the major corporations are doing. Unfortunately we are just dealing with the Bank Act and the opportunity to place this principle in the Bank Act.

There is a need for Canadians to know the activities of many of the major corporations in the country. Depriving them of that information means they do not have the information necessary to make reasonable and intelligent decisions about matters affecting their lives, whether it is voting in any of the democratic processes or whether it is taking positive action to support or oppose ongoing activities. The issue we are dealing with here is a very simple one, but at its root is the business of disclosure. I can see no basic opposition to government support of this motion, and I certainly hope the government adopts this particular concept.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, listening to the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), I had some difficulty with the issue he raised because it is completely covered by the government provision which is contained right now in Bill C-6.

Section 156(1) reads as follows:

Shareholders and holders of bank debentures of a bank, their agents and legal representatives may examine the records described in subsection 155(1) during usual business hours of the bank and may take extracts therefrom, free of charge, and any other person may do so on payment of a reasonable fee.

By "reasonable fee", we are talking about the cost of making photocopies. In addition to that, this same information is available in the office of the Inspector General of Banks. Again for the payment of a simple photocopy fee, anyone can walk in, ask for that information and make extracts. That is freedom of information.

The freedom of information bill the government is bringing forward requires the payment of a photocopy fee if one wants that information. If one is a shareholder or a holder of bank debentures, then one can say one has some right to this information without charge, but any stranger coming in off the street will have to pay for the photocopy, which is fair and reasonable. The same thing applies in the freedom of information bill. When photocopies are required, why should the taxpayer pay the shot for information required for personal reasons? In that case a photocopy fee will be charged.

Apparently there is no argument by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River regarding section 155(1) which specifies what information will be made available to the public, shareholders and everyone else. Therefore, the question must be on section 156(1) which is what the amendment applies to. Do people have the right to this information and do they have access to it under the law? The answer to both those questions is yes.

I have listened to the hon. member go on about the principle of freedom of information, access to information, and urging that the amendment he is putting forward should be accepted by the government, but I tell him that what he is requesting is already provided for in the law that the amendment is unnecessary.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am astounded that we have given this much information to the general public in regard to banks. It seems to me that banks, in so far as they are corporate bodies, are no different than any other organizations. When one looks at section 155(1) on page 144 of Bill C-6, one will see that we allow individuals from the street to go in and get minutes of meetings, resolutions of shareholders and copies of all returns and notices required under the Bank Act. But there is a limit. If there is a constructive purpose other than pure snooperism, they can have access to the information. A right to know does not mean an absolute right to know. In many instances, it is absolute snooperism. In many instances it is the question of a competitor.

When one negotiates with another party, one does not have access to the records of that party. One negotiates from one's own strength, not with one's hand in the opponent's pocket. I find that we have gone extraordinarily far in this area. I can remember when the committee changed the law and added, I believe—and I stand to be corrected—in the last paragraph the phrase that "Any other person may do so on payment of a reasonable fee". I rather suspect that the committee per incuriam may have kicked open the door rather widely. I have no reservations whatsoever about opposing this particular amendment.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks about the incredulity of the Parliamentary Secretary of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) with regard to our observations about the generosity of the section as it stands in respect of financial disclosure. I am not an expert on the Bank Act, but I have a hunch that the section as its stands is not the all-encompassing ground for freedom of information which the hon. parliamentary secretary would have us believe. I think we can find evidence of this in the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who has a feeling of anxiety that somebody might actually know what the banks are doing—that we have actually gone too far.

In so far as the coalition of thought between the Liberal party and the Conservative party can be trusted to be in place, I am confident that somewhere the government has in the course of the Bank Act addressed itself to the insecurities expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton West and that, indeed, the measures for financial disclosure will prove not to be as generous as the hon. parliamentary secretary has tried to lead us to believe this evening.

I would like to say a word about the importance of financial disclosure within the context of freedom of information. Much has been said about freedom of information, but we have yet to see any impetus on the part of this government with regard to freedom of information. We are still trying to determine whether or not the government is genuine in what it has said about freedom of information.

With regard to financial disclosure by the banks, I think this particular amendment is important, whether or not it is the section described by the government or whether or not our amendment is accepted. It is important for the people—employees, investors, shareholders and everyone concerned—to know about the effect of investment on the quality of our life in Canada and how the investment decisions of banks impinge on questions of international justice. It is very important—and I know that this question will be addressed in more detail on Monday by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle)—that the public have the ability to know just what kind of investment decisions are being made by Canadian banks in Third World countries, where Canadian banks are operating, how they are operating and whether they are acting in the best interests of the countries with which they are involved or whether they are acting in their own self-interests at the expense of the people in those countries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) warned the Chair and other hon. members earlier on that he might want to address himself to the question of certain motions which might or might not be treated in accordance with the proposals made at eight o'clock this evening. I take the point of view that this proceeding will not interfere with the hon. member's right to pursue that matter later, or whenever.

Shall I dispense with reading the motion?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 22 (Mr. Rae) negatived.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before we go to motion No. 23 may I make reference to the document prepared by the officers of the Table on behalf of Madam Speaker respecting the groupings of the motions which are still on the order paper and what would be proposed for the grouping and the voting. I have examined the document and everything seems to be in order. No amendments have been missed. As far as we are concerned we are quite prepared to have this made an order of the House at this time.

I will propose a motion if need be, or it can come from the government side.

Mr. Bussières: Go ahead.

Mr. Lambert: Therefore, I would move, that the document headed "Further Notice on Report Stage of Bill C-6" dated Thursday, November 13, 1980, with regard to motions No. 22 and on as they appear in that document be made an order of this House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It would appear that there is agreement to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West to the effect that in the paragraph in the document dated today, to which the hon. member referred, dealing with motions Nos. 22 through 58 and as enumerated within that paragraph shall be debated and voted upon separately and there be an order of the House to pass to that effect—

Some hon. Members: All of it. The entire document.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I would like to correct myself. The hon. member for Edmonton West has indicated that his motion states that all of the remaining notes proposed by the Speaker would be dealt with in the manner described in that document. Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed and so ordered. We will move now to motion No. 23.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill) for Mr. Rae moved:

Motion No. 23

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 26 to 31 at page 171 and substituting the following therefor:

"processing services other than those services directly ancillary to the business of banking."

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, we have two concerns I would like to express. There has been wide-ranging debate on the ability of the banks to become involved in activities which are not traditional banking areas. One example was automobile leasing, and then there was the whole question of data processing. The government in its proposal raises serious questions about what has happened in this area. Serious concerns were expressed by very effective lobby groups which appeared before the committee. These groups had obviously spent a tremendous number of hours and considerable funds working to bring to this committee their concerns about banks expanding to areas which are not traditional to banks. They expressed the concern that the banks, with the financial power and muscle they have behind them, would put their competitors out of business.

● (2140)

I want to use the leasing example, Mr. Speaker—because I think its outcome is positive—to illustrate how important this was. Members of the committee, witnesses who appeared there, the letters that were received, the people who work for auto dealers and the auto dealers themselves, made some very substantial points. They said they could not survive against the banks. They also said that they, collectively, employed more people than all the auto manufacturers in Canada. I do not think too many years will pass before they are the only people employed in the auto industry in Canada, considering the government's present approach to that industry. They did an excellent job of expressing their concerns and I think the government collapsed before the onslaught. The committee felt strongly about their fears and said, "Keep the banks out of that area. It is reserved for a certain group of business people who have successfully given employment and contributed to the community and who deserve some protection in law against the might and muscle of the banks and the banks' ability to effectively destroy competition and take whatever areas of the market they want for themselves."

Our concern with this particular amendment is that it was pushed in through the backdoor, accidentally. These people arrived late and they did not have a strong lobby. There was some correspondence and concern was expressed that the banks were moving into the data processing area almost as a natural offshoot of banking. In the process, new companies were being formed in a new field, individual groups where innovation could occur in services to small communities. Competitive services could be offered at reasonable rates for developing businesses. This was not a substantial lobby; in fact it was not quite as persuasive as some of the more powerful groups which came before us to say, "Do not let the banks get in." The government's amendment, in clause 174(2), reads as follows:

Except as authorized by or under this act and in accordance with such terms and conditions, if any, as are prescribed by the regulations, a bank shall not, directly or indirectly, (j) engage in Canada in providing data processing services other than such banking related data processing services, within the meaning prescribed by the regulations, as are prescribed by the regulations to be services that a bank may provide in Canada.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, the phrasing is confusing. That particular piece of information written into the legislation, can be changed. The regulations can expand or alter its meaning. I put the question tonight, Mr. Speaker: to what extent in the very loose wording of that clause, will banks move into areas currently handled by the people who are now handling data processing services?

A small businessman in the city of Courtenay has an account with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce which is an old friend in our riding. It suddenly suggested that as long as he was doing his banking there, for a nominal charge it would do his payroll and take care of all that nasty stuff that involves unemployment insurance, Canada pension deductions, income tax deductions, and so on.

I see that the hon. gentleman from Burlington is leaving with his shovel, Mr. Speaker. He has heard this all before. I think the absence of his shovel in this particular place is an improvement.

What we are concerned with is the infringement of banks on areas of small business. The very loose wording of this clause mentions the desire to handle problems but instead of dealing with them firmly in the legislation they are to be dealt with in the regulations—regulations that can be changed later by order in council—regulations that we have not seen—regulations that are not firm at the present time and certainly will not be in the future.

Our concern is that banks are interested in moving into areas traditionally occupied by small businesses throughout the country. There were representations from data processors. The approach was not as sophisticated and the pressure not as heavy as that of other more effective groups. As a result, I am afraid the protection provided in the legislation is not complete. The minister is shaking his head. I know that he, being of clear heart and sound mind and with beneficence of spirit towards his fellow man, is someone we can all trust and love.

On the other hand, his successors may not see the world in the same way and the regulations may change. In fact, we may find that when they appear in final form these regulations are not exactly what we wanted.

We have an obligation to protect the small entrepreneur, Mr. Speaker. Time and time again I have heard my colleague from Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) declare that neither of the other parties in the House has done a good job for small business in this country. There are many problems, such as a 19 per cent interest rate for small businessmen in the data processing area. There are many bankruptcies today and large numbers of small businessmen are facing difficulty.

In the final analysis, this is a very loose provision and I suggest it would allow the banks to move into the area. There will certainly be lobbying and pressure from the banks to allow them to do this. They have already attempted to encroach on the conditions laid down for car leasing when we wanted to protect that line of business. Fears have been expressed that in time the bankers' association may be able effectively to erode the protection which was built in for that business.

There is certainly no protection in this particular clause, Mr. Speaker. Had the government felt an obligation to small business and a responsibility to protect it, I think the clause would have been firmer. The clause that we recommend would be firmer.

This concludes my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I would like to hear an explanation from the minister about this very loose and openended statement.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has demonstrated to this House how confused he is about what businesses do. He spoke about payroll services. If he had been around small business for any length of time he would know that it has long been the business of banks to offer to put a payroll together for businesses. At a time when people were paid in the lawful money of Canada, the banks put it in brown envelopes and delivered it to the business for distribution to its employees.

Subsection (2)(j) refers to data processing related to banking services and to other services that a bank may provide. In other words, there are limits on the kind of data processing that a bank can do for a customer, or as part of its business. The business is described in the regulations and probably that, more than anything, ties the bank's hands. It certainly ties the government's hands in terms of proclaiming regulations. I suggest, sir, that the best way we can control the bank's expansion in the data processing field is as described in subsection (j). There was an effort in committee to go over the regulations. I think it was the hon. member for Comox-Powell River who was taking a look at the regulations proposed at that time, and he could really find no difficulty with them. I suppose he would like to see all of the regulations described at the committee set out in the statute. That might be appropriate in some cases, but business conditions change in this country. I suggest that the way the clause right now is probably the best than can be done by any draftsman with respect to controlling the activities of the banks in this field.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a couple of minutes only to indicate to the House the government's concern to protect small business effectively when drafting that clause of the legislation. But the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) did say that the computer sector was changing extensively, that it was developing with startling rapidity.

In the same way, Mr. Speaker, it must be recognized that with the advent of computer techniques in the financial and banking institutions the modes and operating processes of banking activities will change also. For more protection, we have reintroduced within the regulations the flexibility needed to adjust ourselves to that development in order to maintain the protection we want to give small businesses.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about this matter of the banks and data processing. I recall when the Bank Act was before us several years ago the numerous machinations we went through when this matter came up. A great deal of concern was expressed by members of the committee about the bank putting undue pressure on small business. I believe one of my colleagues has already mentioned this. Perhaps the banks were trying to tie the small businessman's line of credit with the offering and taking of data processing services.

During that period I purchased a computer for my own business. We approached the bank and told the bank what we were going to do. The bank told us they would have that service available and offered it to us. We decided not to take it because we wished to remain flexible. We told the bank that at some time we might want to change from that bank to another bank. There were no hard feelings about that and the bank told us they appreciated our comments.

I think we have gone as far as we should go. I think what is in the act now is proper. While it is all right in this part of the country in large urban centres to talk about small computer companies offering services to small business, we should also bear in mind that there are parts of the country where the services are not available. There may be many small businesses desirous of using that service from banks. It may be to their advantage to do so and we should not preclude them out of hand from that opportunity. I think the provision in the bill as it stands is right and proper. From my own experience, the banks take no exception if you do not wish to use this service. I think that is a very mature way of looking at it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 23 (Mr. Rae) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House will now proceed with motion No. 25 standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 25

That Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 25 to 29 at page 177 and substituting the following therefor:

"an amount equal to ten per cent at that time of the total domestic assets of the bank in Canada as shown in the compilation of schedule Q of this act."

He said: Mr. Speaker, logically motion No. 24 and motion No. 26 should be discussed together and then motion No. 25. While motions numbered 24 and 26 are really related, motion No. 25 comes at the bottom of the section. This will become clear as I explain it along the way. I want to refer to motion No. 25 in part and then I will come back to it later on.

The purpose of these three amendments, Nos. 24, 25 and 26, is to deal with the ability of the banks to lend money on the security of a mortgage on real property. I remember back to 1966 when we were putting in amendments to the act as it exists today. Up to that time the banks had not been allowed to lend money on the security of a mortgage on real property. It was felt that as major financial institutions they should take some part in the financing of home construction in the country. Not all banks were willing to do so, however. As a matter of fact, the banks were dragged kicking and screaming to the table. I remember the then president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, a delightful gentleman of Scottish ancestry—I will not name the bank of which he was then general manager—felt that it was quite wrong for the banks to get involved in mortgages of up to 25 years. The banks never lent on anything more than two years. Loans were always liquid. There was no such thing as a loan on a chattel mortgage. The banks were expressly prohibited from dealing on the basis of a chattel mortgage. Nevertheless, the general feeling was that banks should get involved in the mortgage business. We were working from the Porter commission report, remember, and this was one of its recommendations. However, there was a definite limit. One did not forget the bank crisis of either 1932 or 1934 in the United States.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but we have now reached ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION—DIRECTIVES TO MINISTERS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on May 14 of this year I asked the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) if, pending the introduction of the freedom of information bill, the government had issued any directions to cabinet ministers to the effect that they should conduct themselves in strict adherence and compliance with the principles of freedom of information. Although the Deputy Prime Minister answered me in the affirmative, events since that time have led me to doubt the government's sincerity in terms of complying with principles of freedom of information.

Despite the high marks that were given to the bill on its early introduction, subsequent reflection on taking a look at that bill and comparing it with its predecessor from the previous government, C-15, leads one to wonder whether serious changes have not been made which make the bill much more restrictive than its predecessor.

It would take too long this evening for me to enumerate all those problems. Suffice it to say there are a number of changes which will make it more difficult for Canadians to have access to information. First, Bill C-43 will make it harder to discover what documents actually exist. For instance, section 5(3) implies that if information appears to be exempt from release, it does not have to be listed in information bulletins. Second, the exemption categories appear to go further than the previous bill in protecting information from release. Third, the status, powers and pay of the information commissioner have been eroded considerably. Fourth, and perhaps most important, it does not appear as though the additional powers given to the courts will promote the degree of openness that ought to be expected.

For example, if a judge is deciding whether a document in certain categories ought to be withheld, he cannot decide whether the department head is entitled to withhold it, but only whether he had reasonable grounds for doing so. Finally, and if these changes were not bad enough, the provision in the previous government's bill requiring the freedom of information committee to produce a comprehensive review of the effectiveness of the act after three years has been dropped in this new provision.

My concern about the government's policy on freedom of information is not limited strictly to the changes which have been made in the bill which is currently before the House. My most pressing concern relates to the government's activities in recent days and the attitude exhibited over the course of the last several days over the whole question of freedom of information.

Perhaps the best example I can give of how the government has demonstrated that it does not subscribe to the principles of freedom of information was given yesterday in the committee on the constitution. Members of that committee asked the government whether it would make available to the committee, as an aid to study of the government's proposals on the constitution, three polls conducted by the government at public expense which touched on the whole question of constitutional reform.

What I thought incredible was that government members on the committee and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) refused to agree with the principle that publicly funded polls should not be classified, that they should be made available to the people of Canada. This is a principle which is essential and one which should be respected by the government if it is serious about the principle of freedom of information. This is why we pressed them in committee to agree that those polls be released. The government has refused.

What we have seen in recent days has been a desire on the part of government to use massive amounts of tax dollars to sell its position on various issues, including on the constitutional issue, where the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have listened to the hon. member. He very appropriately used the phrase "as an example". From there on he has been commenting on certain matters before the constitutional committee and some of the proceedings relating to that committee. The problem is that at a certain time he fell afoul of the rule that committee proceedings are not to be commented upon in the House. He would assist the Chair if he would bring to an end the example and move to the point of his question.

Mr. Beatty: Gladly, Mr. Speaker, because whether the government produces the information before the committee or before Parliament is irrelevant. I would be delighted if the government were prepared to come before this House where they were asked to produce the evidence given in those polls which should be of interest to the whole Canadian public, certainly to every member of this chamber.

I have had on the order paper for up to four months a series of questions asking the government for information relating to the government's advertising campaign. To date all of those questions have gone unanswered. The government has not been prepared to come clean with the Canadian people and disclose the amount of money it is spending at the present time to promote its point of view on various issues. We know that at the present time the government is asking Parliament to appropriate a further $17 million for the Canadian Unity Information Office, $15 million of which appears earmarked for programs such as public opinion surveying and advertising sales campaigns, in large part for the constitution. Again, when we have asked for the breakdown of this information the government has been less than forthcoming. This is why, when we are dealing with the issue of whether or not the government is prepared to subscribe to the principle of freedom of information even prior to the passage of the legislation, it is essential that we take note of the government's policy in so many of these areas. In instance after instance the government is not prepared to level with the Canadian people and give them the information which Parliament and the people of Canada are entitled to see, particularly as it relates to the expenditure of public funds. I call upon the government this evening to reverse that policy and to recognize that the Canadian people are entitled to know how their money is being spent and how decisions are being made which affect their daily lives.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I would bring it to the attention of the hon. member that the access to information bill to which he was presumably referring in his rather wide-ranging remarks received first reading July 17 and has not yet gone to committee. I would like to inform him that in keeping with the undertaking made to the Canadian people last July the government introduced a bill containing a package of legislative proposals concerning access to information. The scope of the bill constitutes a vast improvement over attempts of the previous government in the area of public access to information.

Once in force, the access to information legislation will create a right of access to all government records, subject to limited and defined exemptions to protect public and private interests. Government decisions will initially be reviewable by an information commissioner. Denials of access can be referred for judicial review by the Federal Court, which will have the power to order release if it determines that the records were wrongly withheld.

The new legislation will become a central feature of our institutions. It will make them more open and more democratic. It will make decision-makers accountable for their actions and decisions, be they ministers or civil servants.

The hon. member has raised the question of the government's behaviour now that the bill has been tabled. I would remind him that it has only been tabled. The government is moving, and has been moving, on a number of fronts to provide more open government during the interim period which will lead, hopefully, to this legislation being passed by the House. Thus, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has asked that all ministers make special efforts to comply with the spirit of the legislation, bearing in mind the limitations which are imposed by existing legal constraints and the absence of the administrative infrastructure which will ultimately be put in place.

The government has also made public the list of cabinet committees and their composition, to which the hon. member referred in his original question, which I believe was asked on May 14. The government has also tabled the list of polls conducted, or in planning, since March, 1979. Consistent with the spirit of the access to information legislation it has made available the results of the vast majority of these polls and justified non-disclosures on the basis of specific exemptions in the access legislation. The government has undertaken to release these latter poll results when their disclosure will not go against any of the public or private interests which are protected by the exemptions. It intends to live up to this undertaking.

● (2210)

The media guidelines laying down the ground rules by which officials should abide in their dealings with parliamentarians and the media have been confirmed and are being followed.

On a more clearly administrative front, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and his officials are actively preparing for implementation of the legislation. They are hard at work compiling the index or register of federal government information.

I think that adequately and in full answers the question which was originally asked on May 14 last—not the question to which the hon. member referred this evening.

WATER RESOURCES—SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—REFERENCE BY B.C. GOVERNMENT OF U.S. PROPOSAL TO FLOOD TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to address my colleagues in the House tonight on a subject of considerable importance in the province of British Columbia. I think it ought to be of considerable importance to all hon. members from whatever part of Canada they come. It concerns the proposed flooding of the Canadian Skagit Valley in British Columbia, a proposal which has been proceeded with over many years by the Seattle City Light Company in the state of Washington. What Seattle City Light does is propose to move on a 1942 International Joint Commission order, the validity of which is in serious question, to raise the Ross Dam on the American side of the Skagit River and flood about 15 miles of the Canadian Skagit. They have presumed to pay $34,000 a year for the flooded land, but they will receive many millions of dollars of benefit in power.

I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on October 21. In view of the fact that the government of the province of British Columbia has now taken a reference to the International Joint Commission to seek redress in this matter, I asked the minister what steps the Government of Canada is taking to respond to the invitation of the International Joint Commission to put in submissions in support of the application of the province of British Columbia for a review of the order and the consequences of the proposed flooding.

At that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I quote:

> Madam Speaker, the position of the government has been consistent; we believe this problem should be settled by negotiation. We have consistently offered our good offices to assist the province of British Columbia in that regard.

In effect, knowing almost nothing about this issue, the Secretary of State for External Affairs promised to do almost nothing. However, subsequent to that, in committee I had occasion to ask questions of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons), and he chose to take a very belligerent view and to accuse the province of British Columbia of not being serious in its opposition to the flooding.

This is, of course, contrary to the facts—that is a problem the parliamentary secretary has had before. It is contrary to the facts because after 1972 two different governments of the province of British Columbia consistently to this day have actively and steadily opposed the flooding of this valley and have gone through protracted negotiations with Seattle City Light to find a solution.

As a consequence of the remarks of the parliamentary secretary the minister of the environment of British Columbia sent a telegram to the federal Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) which said the following:

> Greatly disturbed by press reports quoting Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Environment saying province of British Columbia not serious in negotiations regarding Skagit River and not keeping federal government informed.
> If reports accurate this is in complete contradiction to facts. We have negotiated seriously and kept you informed at all stages. I must insist on retraction of inaccurate statements made by parliamentary secretary.

Happily, the Minister of the Environment for Canada responded immediately and contradicted completely his parliamentary secretary by stating in his telegram, and I quote:

> In reply to your telegram let there be no repeat no misunderstanding that the federal government continues to oppose further flooding of Skagit Valley. We are aware of deep concern this issue poses for British Columbia and recognize your earlier efforts to resolve it. Be assured we support your efforts to have matter resolved. We are now reviewing your "request in application"—
>
> That is the application to the International Joint Commission.
>
> —which is before the International Joint Commission and will offer views on this matter to the commission. My department is fully prepared to meet with and co-operate with yours.

● (2215)

I should add that the British Columbia Minister of the Environment was pleased with that response but not happy with the activities of the parliamentary secretary, and he demanded a retraction. However, I should like to know whether the government can tell me tonight just what steps will be taken to support the application of British Columbia before the International Joint Commission, and whether the government can tell me if those representations will be made by the Department of the Environment alone or in conjunction with the Department of External Affairs.

I realize, of course, that the response of my friend, the Minister of the Environment, is inconsistent with the earlier statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I put that down to the good work which the Minister of the Environment did in persuading the Secretary of State for External Affairs that this was indeed too important a matter for the government to remain on the sidelines. As a consequence, I commend the Minister of the Environment for his response, but I would like to know tonight whether the department will be making submissions by itself or whether it will be supported by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with the full weight of the Canadian government behind him.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, during the question period on October 21, the hon. member opposite suggested that the government has changed its position on the Skagit Valley flooding. I wish to emphasize emphatically that this is not the case. Over the past decade, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), successive ministers of environment and other ministers and officials of the Canadian government have, on numerous occasions, taken the position that the environmental and recreational resources of this unique river valley were too important to be sacrificed to a power reservoir. This view was also embodied in unanimous House of Commons resolutions in 1973 and 1977.

However, we have also been conscious of the fact that in 1967 British Columbia signed a 99-year agreement with Seattle by which the province received compensation in return for the flooding, and that until 1973 British Columbia accepted this payment. The Canadian government, therefore, concluded that the most promising avenue for solution of this problem lay in a negotiated settlement involving these two parties. When direct negotiations between province and city began in 1974, the Canadian government made clear its willingness to render all possible assistance by way of good offices to promote such a settlement. We remain prepared to do so should conditions again appear favourable.

Unfortunately, for the moment these negotiations have broken down and British Columbia has filed a "request in the application" with the International Joint Commission, requesting that it annul or rescind its 1942 order giving the city authority to flood the valley, subject to reaching agreement on compensation with British Columbia.

The hon. member asked why the federal government had not supported the province in this request. In fact, British Columbia neither requested nor required any such federal support in making its approach to the commission. The IJC had earlier ruled that it could hear British Columbia's 1974 request on this subject, a position strongly advocated by the Canadian government in support of the province.

The Canadian government believes that British Columbia's request deserves a full and fair hearing and that the IJC is the proper forum for this. The commission has asked for views from interested parties, including the Canadian government, by December 17. We are now preparing our response. We hope that British Columbia's approach to the IJC will be instrumental in promoting a successful resolution of this issue and we will do all in our power to assist such an outcome.

Over the past decade the government has left responsible U.S. authorities, including President Ford, in no doubt that we would view with deep concern any developments which could result in the Skagit Valley being further flooded. We expect that no action will be taken by Seattle until the IJC has had a fair opportunity to consider the full range of subjects raised by the request.

THE CONSTITUTION—INQUIRY WHETHER LETTER RECEIVED FROM NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD REQUESTING DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 7, I wanted to know whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would meet with the leaders of Canada's native organizations to discuss the constitution. We all know the Prime Minister promised that native people would be able to participate in all decisions about the constitution which directly affected them. We all know this promise was broken and that the native people were locked out of any decision-making process regarding the present constitutional resolution. Native people have expressed fears that their rights are being ignored and denied. Experts in constitutional law agreed that their fears well founded.

In response the government pointed to section 24 of the Charter of Rights which indicated that nothing in the charter denied "any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada". No recognition, no guarantees; only a statement that the charter does not take away any rights which may exist.

Indian, Metis and Inuit leaders want to sit down with the Prime Minister to explain their position. They want to find out what kind of amendment might be acceptable to the government. When I raised this request, the Prime Minister responded by pointing to the $1.4 million the government made available so that native organizations could develop their constitutional position. But money is no substitute for a meeting which could produce results. With regard to money, I might point out that the government spent some $6 million advertising its position and trying to sell it to the Canadian people. Compared to that the $1.4 million to native organizations is not too substantial.

In addition the Prime Minister raised the "ante" for native people wanting to get into the constitutional game. He demands that the various native organizations representing different peoples should reach not only a common understanding of their rights among themselves, but also that their amendments must be acceptable to all parties in the House and hopefully to several of the provincial governments.

I have not noticed any great concern for such unanimity with any other part of the constitution. The Government of Canada, as successor to the Imperial government of Great Britain, is involved in a compact with native people which predates the compact with the provinces at confederation. It is the responsibility of the federal government to honour that compact and to ensure that the provinces honour it also. We see the double standard of the Prime Minister most clearly when we contrast his concern for educational language rights with his laid-back attitude to native rights.

At his November 7 press conference, the Prime Minister said:

> I am convinced that there would never be an entrenched charter of rights. Particularly, there would never be entrenched educational language rights if it weren't done now by the national Parliament the last time, as it were, that we had a possibility of proceeding in this way to amend the constitution. In other words, once we have a constitution in Canada, whether it be with the Victoria formula, or any other formula, we will never get anything saying that all Canadians are equal, because there will always be some provinces—

And he went on to detail the opposition which would come from the provinces.

On October 30, just a week earlier, in a letter to the leaders of national native organizations, he said:

> I believe that Canadians, with new-found pride in their own constitution and in their new maturity as a country, will be more than ever generous in considering the needs and wishes of our first citizens. In short, I believe that constitutional change after patriation will become easier rather than harder—

For language rights he considers that it will be impossible to deal with after patriation; for native rights he takes the very laid-back attitude that it will be easier.

On behalf of the native people of Canada, I ask the government to treat native rights as seriously as it treats language rights. I ask the Prime Minister to sit down with the leaders of Canada's native organizations to find acceptable ways of recognizing those rights and guaranteeing them in our constitution.

● (2225)

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member again that the native peoples will be heard at the constitutional discussions. The hon. member has referred to a letter written by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on October 30 to the three national native organizations.

In that letter the Prime Minister confirmed that there will be no changes in the constitution directly affecting the native peoples without full discussion with them. The Prime Minister expressed the government's desire to discuss with native groups those matters of special concern to them—aboriginal rights, treaty rights and internal native self-government. He also indicated that there will be a good deal of preparatory work required and that there will be a number of meetings between senior officials and native groups.

On at least ten occasions in the past three or four weeks I have heard in this House, and I wish to affirm again, that each of the three groups has been given approximately $400,000, totalling over $1 million, to prepare its case. The Prime Minister has publicly pledged that this will be the first subject at the next first ministers' conference or a priority subject of the federal government.

Naturally, as the hon. member knows, the government has agreed to consultations with the provinces which also have an interest in the matter. I wish to point to the proposed constitution and section 24 which, I am aware, is a reverse declaration and which clearly states that none of the rights of native peoples will be taken away by reason of the constitution. If my good friend wishes to make some proposals, they should be made in the constitutional committee. What wording would he like to see in section 24? What does he want to do in connection with specific problems which can be handled by the government? Does the hon. member have a position on the problem on Vancouver Island or on the Micmac claim in Newfoundland? Does the hon. member have a position on the four claims in the Northwest Territories or on the one claim in northern Ontario or on the three claims in Quebec?

When the hon. member says we are not treating the problem seriously, I suggest that he is showing concern but offering no solutions. We must sit down and look at individual solutions which have been put forth. Solutions should be put forward, not the same questions day after day. The government takes the problem seriously and is trying to solve it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
