WOMEN

ASSURANCE OF PROTECTION OF RIGHTS IN PROPOSED CHARTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the statement yesterday by the government's own Advisory Council on the Status of Women that the proposed human rights charter does not adequately protect women from discrimination, and in light of the apparent muzzling of discussion on the constitution and women by the government's refusal of funds for the National Action Committee's special October 18 meeting of leaders of women's groups scheduled for Winnipeg, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That this House instructs the government to immediately assure all Canadian women that any proposed charter of rights will reflect recognition by the government of the need for protection of their rights.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

SERVING OF WINES FROM B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 regarding a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas there are 28 members of Parliament from the province of British Columbia in this House, whereas these members often welcome and entertain constituents on Parliament Hill, in view of the resolution now before this House which purports to guarantee that everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment, and since the Parliamentary Restaurant does not offer wine produced in British Columbia, members from that province are subject to the cruel and unusual treatment or punishment of having to serve their guests wine not produced in British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That this House strongly urge those responsible to put an end to this cruel and unusual treatment and allow superb British Columbia wines to be served under the auspices of the Parliamentary Restaurant.

Madam Speaker: I doubt that this is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF CANADIANS—STRENGTHENING OF PARLIAMENTARY SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the government's apparent obsession with the protection of human rights for Canadian citizens, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the government cease the practice of illegally raising postal rates without reference to Parliament, that it stop governing by orders in council, and that it implement the recommendations of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments tabled in July, 1980, which would protect the rights of Canadians and strengthen the parliamentary system.

Madam Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR PROGRAMS TO MEET THRONE SPEECH COMMITMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the government's commitment in the Speech from the Throne to bring before Parliament a program of action designed to promote a national development policy, to provide jobs, stimulate growth and increase Canadian ownership and control of our economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House calls on the government to immediately bring before Parliament the programs that it promised in the Speech from the Throne and that meaningful job-creation programs be implemented to alleviate the totally unacceptable levels of unemployment in our country.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REUNIFICATION OF FAMILY OF VLADAS SAKALYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the tremendous courage, determination and will to escape from a life of oppression and lack of freedom demonstrated by Vladas Sakalys, a Lithuanian dissident, in his daring escape from the Soviet Union, travelling some 400 kilometres in 20 days by walking, swimming and sometimes crawling, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That this House, in congratulating Mr. Sakalys, requests that the Secretary of State for External Affairs make every effort to assist in the reunification of Mr. Sakalys with his wife and two young children.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

INTRODUCTION OF "BUY CANADA" POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since it has become abundantly clear as of late that the present government is doing very little to assist the small business community, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That the federal government introduce immediately a "Buy Canada" policy with teeth in it that would enable the federal government to purchase goods and services from Canadian companies wherever economically feasible.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CONTINUATION OF CP RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Bachand (Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that CP Rail has given notice that it will discontinue its Montreal-Farnham and Montreal-Sainte-Thérèse passenger service on October 26, 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Veillette):

That the Canadian government along with the Canadian Transport Commission take immediate steps to prevent the discontinuation of passenger service between Montreal-Farnham and Montreal-Sainte-Thérèse.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO OPERATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The reoccurrence of another hostage-taking incident at Dorchester penitentiary follows a series of disturbances and escapes and establishes the need of affirmative government action to avoid further risk of life to penal officers. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Vankoughnet):

● (1415)

That this House instruct the Solicitor General to implement the recommendation of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester by holding a public inquiry into the operation of Dorchester penitentiary.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTH KOREA—PROTEST OF DEATH SENTENCE PASSED ON KIM DAE-JUNG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the continued harassment and persecution of Kim Dae-Jung, former presidential candidate and leader of the non-communist opposition in South Korea, which has culminated in the military court handing down the death sentence, and in view of the limited possibilities of appeal procedures and the extreme possibility of an early execution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House protest the deplorable action of the military court in South Korea in sentencing to death Kim Dae-Jung, and that this House urge Korean President Chun to secure the release of Mr. Kim.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

NATIONAL GAS EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO BE HONOURED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the authority of Standing Order 43. In light of the Liberal government's dismal track record in ignoring its campaign promises, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the House direct the Liberal government to honour their commitments made on an open line show in Vancouver by the present government House leader in the other place, that there will be no federal tax on the export of natural gas.

Mr. MacEachen: Who said that?

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

INQUIRY WHETHER STATEMENT OF MINISTER GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have some questions for the Prime Minister that relate to a practice which we believe constitutes a grave abuse of both Parliament and of public funds. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism was asked on television this morning whether the government's policy was, and I quote as follows:

Before any of our taxpayers' money is spent we want to know that Parliament has approved of the concept that you are advertising.

The answer of the minister was:

In principle, that is right.

I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us whether the minister was speaking for the government?

Mr. Andre: The government has no principles.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, of course I was speaking in my role as chairman of the cabinet committee on communications. If I may, to correct—among the hee-haws from the opposition—what was said this morning, I said that I believed—and this is the policy we have followed—that advertising carried out and paid for out of public funds by the federal government should widely reflect Parliament, as our phase one ads on the constitution run in August did. I believe they reflected the opinions on all sides of the House of Commons to call for constitutional reform during the referendum debate. I said that I also felt that it was either support from all sides of the House or a policy that had at least been passed in principle in the House.

PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL OF PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the strange reluctance of the Prime Minister to answer that question, which had to do with the statement of government policy and the qualification by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism that he had made that statement in his capacity as chairman of the cabinet committee, leaves unanswered whether or not the minister was speaking for the government, and whether the policy that was stated and quoted exactly from a transcript of a program on CTV this morning, and which differs slightly from what the minister had just said in the House, that in principle the Government of Canada can justify spending taxpayers' money only when Parliament has approved of the concept that has been advertised, is the position of the Government of Canada.

I would ask the Prime Minister not to fob that off on to someone else, but to speak for his government himself and tell us whether that is the policy of his government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I certainly approve the principle as just stated by the minister in his previous answer. In so far as what was stated this morning, I will inquire and find out what was stated. I can see in the quotation there that it obviously cannot be the policy of the government that every advertisement would have to be approved by Parliament, if that is the meaning of the words that I read. Because the Government of Canada is involved in many forms of advertising, such as recruiting for the armed services and so on, and this does not come before Parliament.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that in the leaked document that outlined the various policies the government would follow to try to manipulate public opinion as we went into the question of constitutional reform, specific reference was made to, and I quote:

● (1420)

—once the government has decided what action it intends to take, and Parliament has been reconvened to debate that proposed action, the role of advertising changes. At that point, public funds are being used to sell the governing party's position—

The memorandum to cabinet then went on to say:

Under these circumstances, ministers need to decide if advertising is politically legitimate.

I wonder if the Prime Minister will tell the House of Commons what was the decision of the Government of Canada on that question of political legitimacy, which was put to ministers by this document?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would imagine that most ministers, like myself, have not read that document.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I received it and I can say in all sincerity that it was much too long a document for me to read.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, given the difficulty of the public service, then, in communicating with the Prime Minister, might I suggest that the Prime Minister have this full document sent to whichever advertising agency is working for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism so that he might have prepared a small advertisement to communicate the contents of the government's advice to the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, if that is seriously recommended by the opposition I will take that into consideration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON CBC TELEVISION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister of state for government propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I could not think of a more inappropriate Dr. Goebbels, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I said inappropriate.

An hon. Member: You or him?

Mr. McGrath: Last night on the CBC national news, according to this transcript, the minister had this to say:

The content of ads should reflect either a policy that has been approved at least in principle in Parliament or widely reflect the views of all sides of the House of Commons. It is my view that it is inappropriate to go and spend the public's money on a view, if it is isolated to one party, albeit that that party is the government party.

If that is the minister's view, if he was accurately reported in that transcript, how then can the minister justify a continuation of this scandalous, outrageous advertising program which is undermining the role of Parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Better listen, Jim.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member does not watch television. I would deny vehemently that there is anything scandalous about communicating to Canadians information on a very important issue, constitutional reform, which leaders of all parties in this House supported strongly during the referendum campaign but seem to have changed their commitment a little since that time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition seems to want to answer for me.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He could probably do a better job.

Mr. Fleming: The fact of the matter is that no constitutional ads have been run since September 8.

An hon. Member: What about the billboards?

Mr. Fleming: The billboards will cease. They are under contract. When you purchase billboard space, you have to do it under a time contract and they will end on the fifteenth—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I am glad hon. members are listening, but I wish they would regain their sense of courtesy. I am trying to answer. They have asked me a question and I would like to answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: Someone shouted "What about the billboard ads?" Those ads—which again reflect very much what I thought was the view of this House of Commons—

Mr. Clark: You thought?

Mr. Fleming: —that we needed constitutional reform—will expire on October 15.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to see the minister having to swallow himself whole without condiments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: My question, very simply based on the reply which I have just received from the minister, is this: is he now giving this House an assurance, in keeping with the comments that he made last night on television, that there will be no more money spent on government advertising to promote the government's position on the bill that is now before the House? Is he giving the House that assurance?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I will never assure the hon. member opposite that I will not attempt, as a member of the government, to communicate with the Canadian public something as important as the Canadian constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

PUBLICLY FINANCED POLLS—REPORTED STATEMENT OF MINISTER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I too have a question which pertains to information. I hope I have a little better response from the government than that which we just heard. Yesterday the Minister of Justice said that he would release publicly funded polls pertaining to federal-provincial relations only "when I don't need them any more", obviously expressing what seems to some of us a partisan concern.

Mr. Crosbie: Never!

Mr. Broadbent: Will the minister indicate if he feels that this statement, which he is quoted as having made yesterday, squares with the basic principle of having freedom of information legislation in the first place?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I said that polls had always been taken for the development of government policies. We asked some questions during the referendum campaign, just like the former government did in December, to ascertain public opinion and we used the same procedure during the referendum campaign. Other polls taken since then have been used to develop our policies. We intend to make them public when their usefulness for the development of government policies has been exhausted.

[English]

PUBLICLY FINANCED POLLS—INQUIRY AS TO HOW RESULTS COULD BE COUNTERPRODUCTIVE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister since I asked him a question on the same subject yesterday. He indicated that he would be willing in principle to make information available, but suggested that sometimes such information, for example in the federal-provincial field, could be counterproductive. I wish to ask the Prime Minister how information gathered about the opinions of Canadians in the federal-provincial field, paid for by Canadians, would in any way be counter-productive to the public interest as opposed to the Liberal party interest if it were made public.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is well known, or at least suspected, that many democratic governments engage in polling systems to be informed of the opinions of their electorate. For example, I read a statement this morning to the effect that it happens in the province of Saskatchewan as well. Governments are interested in knowing and assessing between elections the opinions of those who constitute the basic sovereignty of the people. It is the government's job to govern. To govern, it uses this knowledge. If these polls were made public the moment they were gathered together, and if this were done on a universal basis by the NDP government in Saskatchewan and by all other governments in Canada, I think those governments would probably object to this kind of procedure because they are getting polls in order to determine the kind of action which is acceptable to the Canadian people. This is the basis on which they make their decisions.

Mr. Andre: Are you listening to what you are saying?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I am not sure if the hon. member is listening.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, we are, and we are shocked.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member is shocked, I would point out to him that when he was sitting on the government benches, the government of which he was a member was also taking polls of public opinion. We inherited several of these polls.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Publish them.

Mr. Trudeau: They were not made public by his government.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Publish them.

Mr. Trudeau: You did not publish them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You publish them.

Mr. Trudeau: We intend to publish them. That was the thrust of my answer yesterday.

Mr. Clark: When? In ten years?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition did not publish them when he had the results.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister forgets that in the proposed legislation dealing with freedom of information, the option is clearly there that poll data collected pertaining to federal-provincial relations may not be made available to the public. The further implication, therefore, is that the government of the day may be asking questions and keeping the information ad infinitum. We have to rely on its judgment if it is not obligated by law, which sounds a little peculiar coming from a man who is at this time advocating a charter of rights to protect the interests of Canadian citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to ask the Prime Minister this. In this particular field of federal-provincial relations, what conceivable kind of information should be kept from the people of Canada and not released to them once it is gathered? How would that jeopardize the public interest? Surely it can be used for partisan reasons exclusively. If the answer the Prime Minister is going to give us is the same as the one he has just given, his whole approach to the freedom of information legislation surely is a grotesque fantasy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, when the Leader of the New Democratic Party says these polls are used for partisan purposes, he seems to forget that in this instance the government is formed by the Liberal party, as it was formed last year by the Conservative party; and it is the government which is doing the polling and it is the government which is using the result of the poll to inform itself as to what policies—

An hon. Member: Why shouldn't we see it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What about Parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: For the same reason that when the provinces poll on a subject having to do with federal-provincial relations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the New Democratic Party is embarrassed; when getting power in Saskatchewan they followed practices which they condemn in opposition. This has been a constant pattern.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: But, Madam Speaker, I would like to be on record as saying, quite frankly I do not give a damn about polls and I do not take polls.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I would be perfectly happy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I would be perfectly happy to support any move or any legislation making polling at the federal and provincial levels completely illegal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Provencher.

An hon. Member: This is incredible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher.

An hon. Member: Publish and be damned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Could we have some order, please. This is the third time I have given the floor to the hon. member for Provencher; he was not able to hear me.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

EXPANSION OF CONSTITUTION PATRIATION PROGRAM

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for government advertising, following up on questions of yesterday. The game plan of the Liberal party as it appears in a leaked memo—and I call it a game plan because they have been following it exactly—says that now is the time for the hard sell. Today in an interview the minister was asked about reports that the government was planning to expand its advertising budget to the tune of some $30 million in 1980 to sell the patriation plan, to which the minister replied "at the moment it isn't so". Would the minister now tell the House when the hard sell program is being planned and what is its budget?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, there has been no decision on a further constitutional campaign.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, the minister is again not giving an answer as to whether he will take the advice of many, including those who have written the memo, in regard to advertising in a period of time when Parliament is looking at the draft resolution. The government has to look very seriously at the legitimacy of advertising at that time. What can escalate, of course, is a propaganda war. In fact, a CP story quoting Premier Blakeney had that premier stating, for example, "Yes, we have ads prepared on behalf of Saskatchewan", but he fears "an advertising war".

I believe Canadians who want to look rationally at what is the best approach for our future in constitutional terms may find this could divide the country in its approach to constitutional renewal, rather than having a calm, rational debate here in the House where it should now take place. When will the government give clear assurance that it will stop its advertising campaign in view of the fact that Parliament now has the constitution resolution before it?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I have had mail from at least one member of the official opposition calling the constitutional ads excellent. We have the Premier of British Columbia delivering door-to-door information, we have Mr. Blakeney, who has never appeared to me to be someone full of fear of the federal government, talking about a campaign, and we have had Quebec doing it.

I think we have a serious problem in Canada in that Canadians in recent years have not had an opportunity to well understand the programs before Parliament. I would sit down and stand by those statements. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition left our part of what I said this morning in his statement, but the statement by the hon. member for St. John's East was basically accurate in respect of what I said. I stand by that. If and when we make a decision to run further ads then that answer will be available.

An hon. Member: We are being goosed.

INQUIRY AS TO RATIONALE FOR $6 MILLION EXPENDITURE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a further question for the minister of government propaganda who chooses—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Bosley: It is amazing, Madam Speaker, how members opposite do not like the truth. The minister who fully knows—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. I think the hon. member would benefit from calling the minister by his proper title; otherwise he might not get an answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I stand corrected. I have a question for the minister for multiculturalism and government propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I now know where the whole cast for the beaver ad was.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will again give the hon. member the floor but I would ask him not to be argumentative and to go to his question immediately.

Mr. Bosley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have a question for the minister. I know what he stands for if he does not. The question is this. Since he chooses to ignore the staff report to himself which indicates that his ads are clearly partisan propaganda, I would ask him this question about the reasoning behind spending $6 million on the advertising. He maintains that the need is to tell Canadians about a matter, either, I presume—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Bosley: There is a question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister this question. Do you justify the $6 million—

An hon. Member: Who are you asking?

Mr. Bosley: I am asking the minister, Madam Speaker, and he knows who is being asked. It is the minister for multiculturalism and—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. There has been a question. I heard a question. I do not know whether or not there is an answer, but I heard a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I heard a question. If there is no answer then the hon. member can ask another question.

An hon. Member: Go ahead, Jim.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. We have had a first question.

An hon. Member: And no answer.

Madam Speaker: We heard the question. We waited to see if there was an answer and I saw a minister rise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I believe in the midst of all of that the question was about the spending of $6 million and why. If that is the question, let me say that the amount in fact spent on what I call phase one is about $4.9 million; and I have no apology to make for an attempt to inform the Canadian public of a major issue now before Parliament.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. Since the justification used in public this morning was to keep the public thinking about the fact that constitutional reform should take place, does the minister believe that the public does not think that constitutional reform should take place, and do we now have a new policy that government and public money will be used to tell people what they ought to think? Or does the minister believe that the public already supports constitutional reform, in which case what is the justification for spending the money in the first place?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, as a member of Parliament as well as a member of the cabinet—and I think this is in the hearts and minds of hon. members on all sides of this House—certainly in private conversations I have had I have found that there is a genuine concern, which is shared by a number of members of the media, that the Canadian public has a very difficult time being made aware of the various complex issues we consider on the floor of this House. I believe that the Prime Minister gave me a mandate to try to improve communications between the Government of Canada and the Canadian public, and I am trying to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH CARE

TAMPON USE—MEASURES TO PREVENT HARM TO CANADIAN WOMEN

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that many women are suffering and that some have died from the illness called toxic shock syndrome, caused by tampon use, can the minister tell the House what specific measures the government is taking in terms of research standards and labelling requirements in order to stop and prevent serious harm to Canadian women?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, we have had working meetings with various companies marketing the product. They have begun improving the labelling and advertising used for these products. Unfortunately, I am unable to make a final answer today on this, but my department is studying right now what other form of public education would be best to use to make people aware of the weaknesses and problems so that they can make choices accordingly.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, public education will not be enough. It seems that the faith of this government in advertising stretches to all issues.

In view of the fact that Dr. Ajit DasGupta, head of the medical devices bureau of the health protection branch of the minister's own department, has said that they do not do research on tampons and contraceptive devices for women but that they do rigorous tests on condoms because, as Dr. DasGupta says, they respond to priorities, will the minister give an unequivocal assurance that she will change the priorities of her department in order to have effective research, regulations and health protection for Canadian women?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, one of the very first matters which I addressed when I became Minister of National Health and Welfare was precisely that of alerting the pharmaceutical industry and the others who initiate the vast majority of research resulting in concrete findings in matters of contraceptives, because I too felt that the point of view of women had been overlooked. I also asked the Medical Research Council to make it a special priority, despite the fact that the council is not involved to any extent in operational research, in order to make sure that women, who are the first ones concerned in the matter, are never disregarded. That is the answer I can give the hon. member.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MODERNIZATION OF PULP AND PAPER FACTORIES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister still pursuing his negotiations with his Quebec counterpart with a view to revising the federal-provincial agreement for the modernization of pulp and paper factories, and does the minister expect to sign that new agreement in the relatively near future?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes. Following the requests made by several provinces, including Quebec, the cabinet decided to increase the envelope by 20 per cent in the case of Ontario, 33 per cent in that of the maritimes, and 50 per cent for Quebec. Because of that sizeable increase, negotiations are now under way and I hope to be in a position very soon to tell the hon. member that an agreement will be signed with the Quebec government.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

INQUIRY WHETHER CONSENSUS SHOULD BE REACHED BEFORE PROGRAM EXPANSION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, following the questions addressed to him with respect to the advertising campaign of the government or of the Liberal party.

The minister has said in his statements in the House and in interviews that unless there is some consensus among the parties with respect to the subject of the advertising campaign, it would not be appropriate. In view of the fact that there are very substantial differences in this House with respect to the way in which constitutional reform should take place, does the minister consider that it is appropriate for the government at this time to enter into a very expensive advertising campaign? Does he not stand by his principle that there must be consensus as to what is to be achieved before there is an advertising campaign?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member's question is hypothetical because I have made it clear that at this time the cabinet has not approved a further campaign. However, I also tried to make it clear that if this House has approved in principle, then I think it is quite appropriate to go ahead and explain government policy—

Mr. Clark: Formal approval?

Mr. Fleming: —in the same way that the ads which ran in the summer on what I call phase one broadly reflected Parliament and did not go into any specific issues where there was, in my view, wide controversy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the point is exactly that, that there has not yet been a consensus with respect to the question of constitutional reform. There has not been approval in this House to this point in time. Therefore, in view of the government memorandum, which I am sure the minister has read carefully, with respect to advice on advertising campaigns, will the minister now make a categorical statement in the House that he is not going to subscribe to the advice he has received in this memorandum with respect to additional funds, so that we will be assured that there will be no further funds made available for the Liberal party advertising campaign?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, we have over several years done advertising through an office called the Canadian Unity Information Office about Canada and the national government. The last government, of which the hon. member was a member, did that as well.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not true.

Mr. Fleming: It is part of an ongoing campaign to inform the Canadian public. I have made myself clear on several occasions today about the principles I stand by on Government of Canada advertising. I said this morning, however—and I continue to be concerned and I say it quite openly—that that may have to be reviewed if indeed the provinces take an aggressive stand without the approval of their own legislatures, such as that taken by Premier Bennett of British Columbia.

APPROVAL OF UNILINGUAL ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. The minister has just finished saying that it is the Canadian Unity Information Office which is the vehicle for expressing government policy, yet an official of that office has said this in relation to this campaign: "Final approval is really at the cabinet level. We did not make the decision to go with one language. We approved the ads in both languages."

Since the minister says it is the Canadian Unity Information Office that is the vehicle of government policy, how is it that it is the cabinet which gave approval for unilingual ads?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is confused and he confuses me with what he quotes. When I spoke of constitutional ads, I spoke of the Canadian Unity Information Office, which comes under the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations. I do not understand the hon. member's question. I thought the hon. member would understand it is basic policy that when we go to spend taxpayers' money, the cabinet has to approve the spending of it. Therefore, we approved the spending of that $6 million. Not all of that money has been spent. There is no further constitutional ad campaign approved at this time.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, the fact is that the cabinet has been in such a hurry to get these ads out that it violated the Official Languages Act in doing so.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Friesen: I would like to ask the minister who authorized him to spend money in contravention of the act, and if this is such a non-partisan ad campaign, why was the national unity office not used?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, with all respect to the hon. member, that is a silly question. I am sure he would not, and I would not, authorize the approval of any ad campaign which made that mistake. I believe there were articles in the newspaper. That was drawn to my attention several days ago. Clearly an error was made. It is being cleared up, and replacement ads were put up some time ago. I really find it very humorous, after its experience over six months, for the opposition to laugh at a mistake being made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR UNDERTAKING ADVERTISEMENTS WILL NOT CONTRAVENE ADVICE TO MINISTER

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. This morning on CTV he said this:

I don't think that public funds should be spent by any government unless that campaign reflects a policy approved by Parliament or widely reflecting Parliament.

In view of the processes that we have yet to go through here in this Parliament—that is, the reference itself and ultimately a joint parliamentary committee which, if it means anything at all, means it will be considering possible changes, hardly a situation either approved by Parliament or widely reflected in Parliament—will the minister undertake to the House that while the process is in place before Parliament, whether at this stage, the committee stage or any subsequent stage, there will be no ads that might contravene the principles set forth in the advice that the minister himself received from his own officials?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has heard me throughout this question period, and I have tried to make myself very clear. I did not say "approved by Parliament"; I said "approved in principle", and that is clearly what I said.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member looks at the full transcript, he will see it there. If he wants to pick one or two lines, he can do that, but that is what I said yesterday and I was clear on that. If I left out those two words at one point, clearly if the hon. member listened over a period of time or checked any set of transcripts he would find that that was the intention, no matter how much the hon. member shakes his head.

I think it would be irresponsible for me to give any assurance—I am surprised the hon. member would ask for it—but I will do my very best in my role in the cabinet to communicate with the Canadian people on the policies of the Government of Canada, and I have set down the terms under which I will attempt to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, one of the problems in this country is the communication of the policies of this government. What I am asking the minister is whether he will undertake to the House not to complicate even further by possible misinformation the problems of the country. Will he undertake that?

Mr. Fleming: First, Madam Speaker, this apparent piousness about something as fundamental as informing the Canadian public, which I think is the responsibility of any government, coming from the opposition House leader after that ridiculous ad run by the Progressive Conservatives a week ago claiming action we did not take, is fine, and certainly they paid for it and I am glad they did. Because when they talk about being responsible, which is the point I am trying to make, that particular advertising campaign accused the government of a policy that has not been taken by the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: We are trying to inform the Canadian public about policies that either widely reflect Parliament or indeed have been approved in principle. My hon. friends are either thick skulled or obstinate, because I made it clear throughout this question period that at this time there is no campaign. Yes, there may be a campaign and we will have to determine the circumstances. I know they are the voices of the provinces rather than the voices of the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING TAX CREDIT AS PROTECTION AGAINST INCREASE IN ENERGY PRICES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In one of his few forays into the public realm the minister said, and I quote from a recent speech:

In the next few years, a great deal of purchasing power will be withdrawn from the Canadian economy as energy prices rise.

I should like to ask the minister whether he can give us a firm and solemn commitment that any increase in energy prices will be accompanied by a simultaneous imposition of a cost of living tax credit which will provide compensation for Canadians at the lower end of the scale who can least afford—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are a year late; you have already voted against that.

An hon. Member: You moved a motion against that.

Mr. Rae: I stress the word "simultaneous" cost of living tax credit to protect those Canadians who can least afford the energy price rises which appear now to be the deliberate policy of this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Well, Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me to provide a solemn and firm undertaking. Solemnity is not part of my approach to public life and I could not possibly emulate the NDP in the field of solemnity on all occasions. But I will answer the question simply: I cannot give an undertaking at this point, simultaneous or unphased.

Mr. Rae: Well, the minister is lugubrious if he is not solemn, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Elsewhere in the same speech he said, with modesty worthy of his predecessor, the hon. member for St. John's West:

—let me assure you that it was to create jobs, improve living standards and promote greater equity that I took on the position of Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: What did he plan to do on the fourth day?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: I see him laughing now. I would like to ask the minister how that commitment, which appeared to be pretty solemn in the context of the speech, gibes with the fact that we have had since this government took power 1,000 lay-offs per working day, according to the government's own composite industrial wage, workers across Canada have fallen behind in the cost of living, and therefore their living standard has declined. Finally, so far as equity is concerned, nowhere in all of Canada have wages fallen further behind the cost of living than in Atlantic Canada. I would like to know how the record of this government compares with the rather high and solemn standard which the minister has set for himself.

Mr. MacEachen: I guess the hon. member has proven the danger of making speeches and the even greater danger of circulating, so the hon. member will have an opportunity to quote from them. In any event I do not find any contradiction between the declaration of objectives and the current situation. I believe that as time goes on the hon. member will, I hope, be convinced that the government is making a very serious effort to live up to the objectives which were laid out in that speech.

INQUIRY WHY PRIORITY GIVEN TO ADVERTISING PROGRAM OVER REDUCTION IN INFANT MORTALITY RATES

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Minister of State for Social Development. The minister, of course, is aware that his government has often stated its concern for the native people, and indeed he has himself on many occasions. He must be aware that for less than $4 million the federal government could establish a program to reduce infant mortality rates. This program would reduce native infant mortality rates by almost half, which would mean a reduction from 28 to 15 deaths per 1,000 and in the national rate from 16 to 10 per 1,000 live births.

I ask the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Minister of State for Social Development to explain to the House, and indeed to all Canadians, how he can permit this government to give priority to the Liberal advertising program over a reduction of infant deaths in this country.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, since I am responsible for population data, which form the base, and for social policies, and since my colleague the Minister of State for Social Development is responsible for broad directions, may I ask the hon. member whether he would be so kind as to repeat his question?

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I put the question to the Minister of Justice who has been minister of Indian affairs in a previous administration and who is now responsible on behalf of his government for social development in this country. If he is not interested enough to answer the question I put to him—he is the one from whom I wanted an answer—then I will forgo putting it to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Nielsen: My supplementary question is again directed to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as minister responsible for both constitutional and social development in the country. Would he please explain why a non-essential constitutional advertising campaign was initiated, rather than an immunization program for small children which would have enhanced the co-operative spirit in this country? Obviously the minister puts a higher priority on showing Canada geese on television rather than on the health of our young children.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I would like to answer two parts of the question which are clearly within the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not know why the member tries to ask a minister who does not have that information.

Mr. Epp: He is responsible.

Miss Bégin: I would like to tell him—

An hon. Member: He does not want the answer.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think even at this stage, although the question period is practically ending, we do need some silence, and I would thank members for that.

Miss Bégin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The member is trying to link alleged cuts in very key programs to other spending of the government. He is misleading the House right now.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Miss Bégin: The $6 million or something—

An hon. Member: It is $6.2 million.

Miss Bégin: The $6.2 million, as my colleague in the opposition pretends to know, for a so-called children's immunization program is not within federal jurisdiction. That has never been cut because it has never existed in the first place. It falls clearly within provincial jurisdiction. That is the first accusation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: As to the second one, I suppose the member is aware of the health problems of Indians; I hope he visits them in his own riding. He should know that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and myself are moving at a pace which pleases us to have Indians take over health administration at the pace for which each community is prepared and make new requests according to the requests they are making to us.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, yesterday arising out of questions directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I reserved, on a point of order, my right to raise a question of privilege. Since that time we have heard, by way of the public media, from the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), who is responsible for government propaganda or communications. Also we have had replies in the House today.

I raise this as a question of privilege because I believe the practice the government has begun is an affront to the notion of open and free debate, which is basic to the theory of privilege in a parliamentary system. The inside front cover of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice has a thematic quote which reads:

> When you have convinced thinking men that it is right, and humane men that it is just, you will gain your cause. Men lose half of what is gained by violence. What is gained by argument is gained forever.

In the formative years of Parliament the threat of violence was the most obvious impediment to parliamentary debate. The privilege sections of Erskine May are full of references to acts of intimidation which were specifically forbidden so that rational debate, free of physical fear, free of issues of personality, could proceed. Privilege does not exist to prohibit violence. It exists to guarantee the conditions necessary for productive debate. We would be misreading privilege if we applied the specific precedents and forgot their purpose.

Just as our constitution did not foresee all the jurisdictional disputes of today, the law of privilege could not foresee all the conditions under which debate could be throttled. If we recall the purpose of parliamentary privilege I do not think we can ignore what is now taking place. In essence, the public has been compelled to pay for advertising which supports the partisan position of one political party, albeit the government political party. The purpose of such advertising can only be to inhibit the opposition in its attempt to debate government policy or the assumptions on which it is based.

This Parliament has passed a law about partisan advertising and the public purse. Under the Election Expenses Act parties are able to collect money and contributors receive refunds. The Liberal party has used its executive position unilaterally to help itself to additional funds. Unfortunately there are no refunds for the taxpayers here. As has been pointed out in the House, we as a party have advertised against the proposal to de-index personal income taxes. We use money properly collected and accounted for as political contributions under the Election Expenses Act. In the referendum campaign in Quebec, both sides had public funds placed at their disposal.

The Minister of State for Multiculturalism seems to understand perfectly the division between acceptable and unacceptable advertising. Last night he said to a CBC reporter:

> The content of the ads should reflect either a policy that has been approved at least in principle in Parliament or widely reflect the views of all sides of the House of Commons.

The proposal before the House has not been approved in any way as yet, either in principle or in any other way. There are sharp differences emerging in the debate between the parties.

A continuation or escalation of this practice would seriously challenge our democratic system of open, unprejudiced debate. Ads paid for by the executive are merely the modern equivalent of the corruption and intimidation which contaminated the House of Commons at an earlier stage of its development. I believe this view was supported by the opinion of Madam Speaker's distinguished and illustrious predecessor, Mr. Speaker Jerome. As reported in Hansard at page 2180 of the last session, when government task forces were challenged by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), Mr. Speaker said:

> The support of public funds, where applied to parliamentary activities, ought, I think, to apply across the floor of Parliament—

That principle equally applies here. If the public is to be informed at public expense, it should be informed on both sides of the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The practice now gaining in use is a dangerous one to the cause of fair debate. I think the present ad campaigns and the problem generally should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

My argument was supported today by statements made in the House by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, the minister in charge of government communications, when he talked about views having to reflect Parliament widely or approval in principle of Parliament. He went on to say that he had no hesitation in spending money to tell the Canadian people about a matter that is before Parliament. He has refused to give us an undertaking in keeping with what he said last night on television, that he would not permit any further public money to be spent on government advertising campaigns until this measure has been disposed of by the House. He refused categorically today to give us that assurance. If I needed any further arguments to support my question of privilege, I would merely have to refer to the Hansard of today and the replies of the hon. Minister of State for Multiculturalism.

Therefore, if Madam Speaker agrees in her wisdom that I have a prima facie question of privilege, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the matter of the financing of public advertising campaigns at taxpayers' expense on behalf of a partisan policy or opinion, before such policy or opinion has been approved by the House of Commons, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

• (1510)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of all my colleagues to lend our complete support to the question of privilege that has just been raised in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I think it is incontestably the case, or ought to be the case, if the rules of this House were properly enforced in the best traditions of this House, that money spent for advertising should be specifically linked with programs that Parliament as a whole has approved, not ones that are under debate or discussion. In supporting this question of privilege I want to underline the connection that exists between the advertising that could be used and, in our view, has been used from time to time by the present government for partisan purposes and the related question of polling. Everyone knows that before you spend thousands, indeed millions of dollars, on advertising, you do the polling first. We heard earlier in the day, in answers from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), not an apology for keeping for government purposes information that was to be used by them until, in the words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) spoken in Toronto yesterday, it was no longer of use, presumably to the government of the day. I can see no other meaning to that.

We have a government which has been preaching the importance of freedom of information and has drafted a farce of a bill, which is full of loopholes, and the Prime Minister today said they are going to keep information on federal-provincial relations away from members on this side of the House. I think that information should be available. I do not want my argument misunderstood. I do not think anyone on either side of the House would deny the legitimacy of polling. There is absolutely nothing wrong with polling, as such, to obtain information. The question is: should that information be made available to the people who pay for it? The answer from this side of the House is, yes, it should be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: A question of considerable importance is at stake here. On the one hand, the government is polling, and no one objects to that—the Prime Minister tried in his usual way to confuse the issue today—and on the other the real issue is withholding information obtained in the polling and then, specifically related to the question of privilege which was raised today, putting ads in the papers, on television and on radio networks right across Canada, that have as their prime purpose the partisan interests of the Liberal government of the day, to further their particular views on a controversial issue. Surely, Madam Speaker, that is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to make a brief intervention in support of my colleague on his eloquent, articulate, and well-motivated question of privilege as a member of Parliament. I address myself particularly to the members on the government side of the House because I think each of us as members of Parliament must consider the function of raising questions of privilege before the Speaker and the purpose for which we do that.

The purpose of questions of privilege is to raise matters which arise where the individual member of Parliament is somehow interfered with in the performance of his functions and duties as a member. I can think of nothing in this particular instance that has been raised in this House over the course of this Parliament which has been of the same consequence, because of the enormity of the expenditure that is taking place as a result of the government involvement in a multi-million dollar advertising campaign, which I submit is contrary to every fundamental principle upon which Parliament has been developed and fought for over the years.

The normal tradition in our country has been that the issues have been decided upon in free and unfettered debate in the House of Commons, on the floor of this House, as reported by an independent press, as viewed in an unrestricted way by the people of this country. We now have an additional dimension to our situation in Parliament—we have television. For the government spokesman, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), to stand up and say that the point of view of the government has not been adequately expressed and he must recommend to his colleagues that they devote enormous sums of money to an advertising campaign is ludicrous in the extreme. We are now being broadcast live across this country, in every corner, with the exception of remote northern areas.

If this were the only instance—the one we are talking about now with respect to the whole question of advertising on the constitution—well, that would be fine. The minister may give his excuse, but there has been a pattern developing with respect to government advertising since the minister has taken over this responsibility. This shows to me, and should show to all of us as members of Parliament, that there is a plan afoot to enter into and cross that line of appropriate advertising which should be used only for educational or informative purposes, that is to say, when legislation has been approved and passed by Parliament.

Madam Speaker, there is a pattern being developed by this government, and in the instances that I put before you I hope to convince you there is a valid question of privilege here. We had initially a quarter of a million dollars spent on a decision that had already been made by the government with respect to the acquisition of fighter aircraft in Canada—a quarter of a million dollars congratulating the government on a good decision. They did that before the test plane crashed. The fact is it was a self-congratulatory and self-serving kind of advertisement which had nothing whatever to do with a question of education or information but, rather, was politically motivated.

My colleague now has raised the question of advertising with respect to energy matters—misleading in the extreme.

An hon. Member: False!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: False and wrong. These particular advertising campaigns are telling Canadians they have nothing to worry about with respect to their energy future, when we know there is an energy crisis. Now, with respect to the matter that is before the House, we have a debate taking place on the very rudiments, the very fundamental principles upon which our country is based, our constitution. Political cynicism has been observed in this country before. But I doubt whether or not it has cost us in the vicinity of $6 million every time the Minister of State for Multiculturalism addresses the cabinet. That is the ultimate in political cynicism with respect to the very important matter which I and every member of this House feel very strongly about.

My final submission to Your Honour is this: there has been a memorandum which has been under consideration by cabinet, which has been leaked and which has been acknowledged by the minister as well as by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Just so we do not lose sight of the gravity of what the government is entering into with this advertising campaign, I want to quote from this memorandum. It may involve $6 million with respect to the constitution at the present time, but there is every possibility of substantially more money being spent and, indeed, with respect to all its advertising, the estimate is now upward of $50 million.

I believe that a committee should be seized with looking at the advice which the government is now receiving, to consider and recommend to the House guidelines with respect to government advertising. If we look at what has been recommended by the minister through his advisers to cabinet, there is additional reason for having this matter sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I would like to quote from this memorandum which outlines the scenario with regard to advertising on the constitutional debate:

> But once the government has decided what action it intends to take and Parliament has been reconvened to debate that proposed action, the role of advertising changes. At that point, public funds are being used to sell the governing party's position, yet such funds are not available to opposition parties. Thus, the opposition has no effective way to respond, in contrast to the provinces which can, and did during the summer, respond by running their own advertising programs. Under these circumstances, ministers need to decide if advertising is politically legitimate.

That quotation, Madam Speaker, speaks volumes with respect to the intrusion into the House of Commons and the effect that this kind of advertising campaign has on my ability and yours to represent the people whom we have been elected to represent adequately. What is happening is that we are turning this whole question of constitutional reform, indeed, every major issue which comes up in our country, into an advertising war between different levels of government, and between the government with the power of the purse in its hand and the opposition, the role and function of which is to criticize constructively the programs of the government.

Never in this Parliament has there been an issue of this consequence with respect to the invasion of the rights of members of Parliament. I strongly support the motion put forth by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Madam Speaker: I can see that there are several members who want to speak on this particular question. I want to thank the hon. member who just spoke for having at least during part of his speech attempted to focus on the reasons for which he thinks there is a question of privilege. I want to remind hon. members who intend to speak that at this particular stage of the proceedings I am trying to be enlightened as to where the privilege stands. I would be grateful if hon. members would focus their remarks on elaborating where they feel the question of privilege lies.

I have not yet found a prima facie case of privilege, nor have I found to the contrary, but I am trying to inform myself of the reasons for which there might be a question of privilege. I would be grateful if, rather than debating the question itself, hon. members would concentrate their remarks in that area.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, in rising to support the question of privilege by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), I agree with your ruling that the issue before us is whether or not the privileges of myself and my colleagues to participate and come up with a decision on the proposed resolution have in any way been thwarted. We must put the matter into context in view of the fact that throughout the summer there was a campaign by the government to put before the Canadian people their position on constitutional renewal. Some members of this House stated, before we rose for the summer recess, that Parliament was the place where this matter should be first debated.

That debate is now in the House. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his address to the nation last Thursday, said that Parliament had the responsibility to debate this issue. He also said in his address:

Every member of Parliament from every corner of this land is asked to participate in this historic act.

The question before us then is whether or not participation is only the right to rise and speak, or whether it does not also include the right to change the proposal that in its present form is only tentative in nature. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) put the matter into context when he spoke this morning on the CTV program "Canada AM." He said in part:

And then when that program has at least been approved in principle you have the right to tell the public about the program and spend some money on explaining it, otherwise how is the public ever going to know.

I am sure that the minister would agree that this House has not yet approved the resolution. Indeed, the government has not put a resolution before the House, but a proposed resolution. There is a notice of motion to strike a joint committee. I believe, at this point in time when Parliament is debating a possible course of action, that what the government is attempting to do is, possibly not to throttle every member here, but to make the point, now, to everyone outside the House, that no matter what argument is raised, legitimately or otherwise, that argument is not valid and that the plan of action has been completed. I think that point was illustrated by the government in the charade at the first ministers' conference through the manner in which it conducted its affairs. That charade is now being transferred into this House.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, on the question of privilege and in answer to the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who talked about polls, I would simply say that I think it bears no relation to the question of privilege. We were able to answer during oral question period.

Now I should like to speak about the matter of advertising as mentioned by hon. members of the opposition. First of all, I should like to inform the House that the advertising which is referred to was terminated on radio and television on September 8 and that, in addition, as everybody knows, the advertising through billboards will be over this month. It is because of the very nature of that kind of advertising that it will be finished later. As a matter of fact, billboards must be leased for a certain period of time.

But in the very substance of the advertising which was made during the summer, Madam Speaker, absolutely no government position was proposed. If hon. members look objectively at the advertising, they will see that it began after the referendum in Quebec. I recall clearly that on May 21, the day after the referendum, all members present in the House said that the time had come to undertake constitutional changes. All members offered me their best wishes for the work I was undertaking that day, when I was about to leave to visit the premiers, and for the summer during which I met with all my colleagues to try and make some progress in constitutional matters and have the consensus of the provinces.

I do not think that anybody here could now accuse us of not doing everything possible during the summer to try to achieve a consensus. During that time we ran some ads. I will not apologize for it. This publicity tried to raise the consciousness of the Canadian people by telling them how important it was to make the constitution a truly Canadian document, how important it was to do this in the wake of the referendum so as to achieve some progress. I do not think that this publicity, at any time, was aimed at selling a point of view. For instance, during the debate in the House, we said that it was extremely important to patriate the constitution. Every member of this House, including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), agrees that we must patriate the constitution. All parties agree that if we patriate the Canadian constitution we need an amending formula, without which we could not amend the constitution. To say that is important at this time to have—

An hon. Member: We listened to you.

Mr. Clark: We spoke the truth.

An hon. Member: You tripped over it.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I understood that you had directed members of the House to deal with the question of privilege. I thought that you narrowed that down quite nicely, just before the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) spoke, and requested members to speak about the merits, the motivation, and what have you. I thought that the hon. member for Provencher respected your ruling, and I would respectfully request that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) address his remarks to the question of privilege raised and put in a draft motion by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is always the hope of the Chair that at some point some arguments will elucidate the real question of privilege. The Chair often has to be patient with certain speakers in order to ascertain whether that is going to be the case. I would expect that the hon. minister has heard the remarks of his colleague, and that in order to help the Chair he will try to restrict himself to the reasons for which he feels there is or is not privilege.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I was doing. I was explaining the nature of the publicity, and telling hon. members and the Chair that there was nothing in that publicity that was partisan. It was the goal that the House of Commons was pursuing at that time, in order to have constitutional reform come quickly and effectively to Canada. I do not think that the privileges of members have been affected. We told Canadians there was a problem and that the problem should be solved quickly.

I just want to say, Madam Speaker, that there is absolutely no question of privilege in that matter. It was just a matter of informing the public of a problem that existed in Canada, a problem that the House of Commons on May 21 asked me to do my best to resolve. At that moment, one of the policies was to make sure that the public understood the nature of the problem we were having. At no time was there any publicity that was partisan. The publicity stopped on September 8, the day before the opening of the constitutional conference in Ottawa.

Of course, Madam Speaker, I will not deny that there are still some billboards out there. On the billboards it says that Canada is a great country and asks Canadians to think about it. There is no question about that. If they think that because we are proud of being Canadians that that would affect their privilege, I will never apologize for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I just say, Madam Speaker, that there is no substance to that. In terms of the privileges of the House, I should like to quote the Premier of Quebec. On March 31, in reply to a provincial member of the National Assembly, one who is more or less the Conservative or Union Nationale member, Monsieur Fontaine of the riding of Nicolet, who was complaining that the Quebec government was having a lot of publicity like——"Become attached to Quebec", or "dare", or something like that, between equals!—

[English]

—and what not, Premier Lévesque said that, it is the duty of any government to inform its constituents of what is going on. I think there is some publicity at the present time on the radio in Quebec. I heard it when coming to Ottawa not long ago.

The publicity we had was to inform those in the public who did not realize that we had a major problem in Canada. We were not offering Canadians one or the other solution, but the one solution that we all believe in, that this Canada should remain one, united, and strong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am very sorry to hear a member of the opposition complain because we have a preoccupation that when you have the best country in the world you do not take any chance about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I shall attempt to address myself to the substance of the question of privilege. I believe there are probably two elements here that commend themselves to your attention. One has to do with the statement of the minister that advertising would be legitimate only if it had been approved in principle in Parliament. That language, "approved in principle" in Parliament—and I am quoting exactly from transcripts—

Mr. Fleming: Or widely reflected.

Mr. Clark: Now he also adds, "or widely reflected". Earlier, in question period today, he indicated to the House of Commons what standard would be adduced to determine a wide reflection of opinion. He said that if he thought there was a wide reflection of opinion, then there would be a wide reflection of opinion. I would like to suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that it is at least an innovation, and certainly unacceptable, to suggest that a minister of the Crown is empowered by his own judgment to adduce the position of Parliament.

When we use the words "approved in principle" in this House, we use those words in a quite specific and quite legal context. They have to do with formal, legal approval of a matter that has come before, been debated and approved by, a majority of members of the House of Commons. It is not a question of opinion; it is a question of decision. That is what approval means in the lexicon of Parliament. That is the only basis upon which government advertising of the kind that this minister is attempting to justify, could be justified. It is not a matter, simply, of sentiments being expressed; it is a matter of decisions having been made on a wide range of questions. Contrary to the view of my good friend, the Minister of Justice, (Mr. Chrétien), section 42 would not advance the federal state but holds the prospect of ending the federal state and establishing a unitary state.

I have excerpts here of certain of the advertising programs that have been used. The advertising program is designed to express support for federalism. The bill that is being debated contains a provision which could mean the end of federalism and its replacement not by separatism but its replacement by a unitary state.

Mr. Harquail: That is in your mind.

Mr. Clark: I am told that that is simply my opinion, but it is the opinion that I have expressed as the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of my party on a question that has not yet been decided here in the House of Commons. What the government is trying to do is to suggest that its advertisements reflect a decision that has been taken. That is false; that decision has not been taken. Those advertisements cannot be justified as being in any way a reflection of a decision taken here. That is one point, Madam Speaker—that approval in principle has a specific legal meaning here, and that we have not reached approval in principle of those points that are the subject of advertising.

The other matter, Madam Speaker, will perhaps require a little more consideration by the Chair and the law officers at the Table because it has to do with the application to Parliament of new techniques of communication—new techniques in public pursuasion. Reference has been made to the use of public opinion polls.

If I may impose upon the House for just a moment, I had intended to raise a question of privilege later simply to set the record straight. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had indicated that during our period in office we had conducted public opinion polls and held them secret. The facts are that during that period we conducted three public opinion polls: one on energy, one on federal-provincial relations, and one on multiculturalism. The poll on the energy matter was released because there was a request, and instructions were given to officials of the departments of the Government of Canada, when we were the government, that all polls should be released in keeping with the freedom of information legislation that our government had introduced. That was our position, and I recommend it to the government today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Justice asks when they will be made public. He is now their custodian, Madam Speaker, and I would urge him to make them public today.

Let me go back to the point about the new and subtle means of pursuading public opinion and influencing public opinion. We all know that these days extensive use is made of public opinion polls, not simply to determine what the public is thinking on a particular question but to determine what kind of appeals the public might be vulnerable to, what kind of fears or apprehensions might exist in the public mind or in the public psyche, that would allow a particular kind of presentation made by a government, made by a political party, to have some effect. We have had very recent testimony about the extent to which members of this government used that kind of technique.

Three or four weeks ago, before the Advertising and Sales Club of the city of New York, representatives of Goldfarb and other advertising agencies used by the Liberal Party of Canada, indicated to that club that in preparation for the 1980 election campaign the purpose of their polling was not to find what Canadians believed about issues, but what Canadians feared about the political opponents of the Liberal party. Indeed, they were not seeking information as to opinion, they were seeking information as to the vulnerability of the public of Canada, those fears they might have, those aspirations they might have, to which an appeal could be made that might cause people to be manipulated into a decision to which they might not normally have come to themselves.

That is not news which I bring to this House. That is simply a report of the admission made by the people who did the advertising, prepared the campaign, and ran the polls of the Liberal Party of Canada during the 1980 election campaign. They were clearly designed to poll opinion, not to find opinion, but to find fertile ground for sowing fear, fertile ground for trying to build support for particular proposals—

An hon. Member: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Clark: You are not in your seat.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The point here is that the same people who conducted public opinion polls to try to identify fears which they could subsequently exploit—

Mr. Kelly: A point of order—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Kelly) on a point of order.

Mr. Kelly: Madam Speaker, my apologies for not observing earlier the rules of this forum.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Try it now.

Mr. Kelly: I would point out that members on this side have as much to be offended by in the performance of members of the opposition as they think they have with us.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Kelly: And I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that the public of Canada lost faith in the government of his day long before anything was done by this party—

An hon. Member: What is the point of order?

Mr. Kelly: —or long before anything was done in the election.

Mr. Epp: You did better in the other seat.

Madam Speaker: Order. I fail to see that the hon. member is raising a point of order. I believe he is participating in the debate. He can do that at another time, but at this juncture we were listening to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Kelly: Madam Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Kelly: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Don't make an ass of yourself. Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was participating in the debate; he was not raising a point of order. I will now recognize again the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. member at some point wants to raise a point of order, he can do it, but at this particular time I did not feel he was doing that. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Kelly: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I thought I told the hon. member that I did not feel he had a point of order. He cannot be getting up again on a point of order because the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has not yet uttered a word since he raised the first point. He cannot have found a point of order in anything which the Leader of the Opposition might have said.

I would ask the hon. member for Scarborough Centre to resume his seat so as to allow the Leader of the Opposition to express himself. If the hon. member wants to participate in the debate, he can do it later on.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I regret this matter is taking so much time of the House. But the point I was making is that we are now in an age where there are sophisticated and very powerful new methods of influencing opinion. What they involve is a marriage of public opinion polls with high-powered advertising campaigns. We have seen that work in election campaigns. We know who the pollsters were for the Liberal party. We know they are the same pollsters for the Government of Canada now. We know who the advertising agents were for the Liberal party. We know they are the same advertising agents as are used for many of the advertisements to which objection is being taken here. There is a purpose to this new sophisticated kind of marriage of public opinion polls to try to determine where the public is vulnerable and advertising campaigns designed to effect a message which will hit the public where it is vulnerable.

How does that affect the rights of the House of Commons of Canada? Naturally, this House is sensitive and conducts its debates with some sensitivity to public opinion in the country. We are here to serve a public. It is the grave fear of members on this side that these sophisticated new techniques are being used in an organized way by a minister charged specifically with that responsibility, to try to condition public opinion prior to a matter of substance and of importance being discussed and being decided here on the floor of the House of Commons. That, as my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), attempted to indicate, imposes an entirely different environment and circumstance upon this House.

It may be to some degree that those changes that occur in public opinion are beyond the control of Parliament. What we are pointing to here is that there is a deliberate attempt being made by the Government of Canada to use these modern techniques of persuasion to create a public opinion that will be friendly to their positions, and hostile to the positions of their critics on the floor of the House of Commons. In other words, they are using public money to try to reach beyond Parliament to limit the freedom and the capacity of Parliament to come to decisions on basic and fundamental questions here.

In many cases, the advertising used is designed not to inform the public of Canada but to misinform the public of Canada. As I look at some of the advertising here, which talks about making the constitution right, making the constitution work and making the constitution ours, there is no question that that is an appeal to patriotism, an appeal to the pride which Canadians have in their country, and an attempt, a subtle, not very well disguised attempt, to suggest the legislation that will follow from that advertising campaign will be limited simply to the question of bringing the constitution home. That, Madam Speaker, is misinformation. That is false information.

The legislation which the public was conditioned by this advertising to expect was simply patriation of the constitution. But instead of receiving what they were conditioned to expect, the public of Canada has been presented here with a resolution which goes well beyond the laudable goal of patriation, which would, among other things, affect, in a way the Supreme Court declared illegal, the powers of the other place and establish a double standard of amendment: one standard for the Liberal government's amendments, and subsequent standards for all other amendments of interest to other Canadians. This will build into the law of Canada a capacity for any majority government to ignore the provincial governments and the legislatures of the land. In other words, there has been an attempt made to create among Canadians the impression that we were dealing with a limited question here, a question which struck at the heart and spoke only of the location of the Canadian constitution. Instead, after the softening up by the Government of Canada, there was a very different piece of legislation brought in.

As I say, it is very difficult for the Chair or for any members of this House to know exactly how we should respond to new developments in technology. It took our predecessor Houses some time and some discussion to determine what we would do about the so-called fourth estate; whether we would allow journalists in the gallery; whether we would allow that presence to change the traditional proceedings. There was extensive debate and extensive consultation among all parties before it was decided to allow television to take its place and to have cameras here on the floor of the House of Commons.

What I am suggesting is that there is now a new medium, a new instrument of persuasion of which use is being made by the government to try to create a climate, to try to manipulate public opinion which will set the context in which Parliament must decide. I suggest very briefly that that affects the fundamental and traditional freedoms of the Parliament of Canada to make decisions. I think that that attempt to spend public money, to manipulate public opinion on public questions that have not yet been decided, is an improper practice that offends the rights of this House of Commons.

That, in my view, is one of the questions of substance which your Honour will have to decide, along with the question of substance having to do with the quite precise definition of approval in principle as it applies to decisions taken by the House of Commons of Canada.

• (1550)

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I shall do my best to meet the suggestion which you made some time ago, namely, that we address ourselves to the question of privilege itself. In other words, it is not yours to take part in the matters of substance that are being debated back and forth. However, in order for Your Honour to allow the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), you have to be convinced that there is before you a prima facie case of privilege. I contend that there is, and I shall try to make that point.

May I say initially that I, personally, am not as offended by the advertising as are my friends in the Progressive Conservative Party. I think some of them are a waste of money. I believe that commercials for some products are funnier and more interesting to watch. I disagree with many of the things my friends in the official opposition are saying about the possible effect of these advertisements, but somebody has to come to the defence of the official opposition. Whether I agree with them or not, I do so.

I point out to Your Honour that you are not being asked to decide that there has been an act of wrongdoing. You are not even being asked to decide that the matter is to go to a committee. All you are being asked is to decide that there is sufficient prima facie evidence about the question of privilege to permit the motion to be put so that the House can decide whether the matter is to go to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I suggest to Your Honour that the very debate that is taking place here this afternoon, no matter which side one takes, demonstrates the fact that those on the government side have available taxpayers' money to present their case to the people of Canada, whereas those on the opposition side do not have that facility. They do not have available to them taxpayers' money to make their point. I may not agree with the point of view of my friends to the right, but they have the right to make it.

We have some other views about the constitution, but no taxpayers' money is made available to us. We have to pay for these things out of our party funds if we wish to do so, or we have to content ourselves with argument on the floor of the House of Commons or at other public gatherings. However, the government of the day, and because it is the government does not get away from the fact that it is the Liberal party, takes a certain position in the House, has given to it or has taken to itself, a privilege, the right to spend public money which is not available to those taking other positions. At the very least, there are enough precedents regarding this that the House ought to have the chance to send the matter to a committee for investigation.

That is the only question to which you have to address yourself. You do not have to say there has been a wrongdoing or there has not been a wrongdoing. You do not have to say that money has been wrongly spent. All you have to convince yourself is that there is enough question about what has happened that the House should have the right to decide whether the matter is to be sent to a committee for investigation.

As Your Honour knows from past experience, at least from the experience of former Speakers, you might decide that there is a sufficient prima facie case of privilege that the motion might be put and the government could well use its majority to vote it down. However, at this point I think we are on sound ground for insisting that there is a question that ought to be looked into.

I know that the precedent I want to quote is one that I have quoted quite a few times. By now, everybody else in the House must know it as well as I do, but I think it is valid. Back in 1964 and 1965 when the Liberal government brought before Parliament the Canada Pension Plan, which was sponsored by the Hon. Judy LaMarsh, there developed a tremendous advertising campaign against that legislation sponsored by the insurance industry in this country.

I was greatly annoyed. In due course I spoke to Judy LaMarsh about it. I said to her, "Is it not possible for some government advertising to be put in the press to counter these unfair attacks being made by the insurance industry?" As I have said many times, the reply was, "Stanley, I have wanted to do that. I have tried to do it but they tell me"—I don't know who "they" were, Treasury Board or somebody—"it cannot be done. We cannot spend public money on a measure that has not been passed by Parliament."

She went on to say that once the legislation was passed, her department would be free to advertise its benefits and so on. At any rate, her position was that she had tried but the rule was there. What bothers me is that the present Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) is changing the rule.

Before I come to what I want to say that flows from that case, may I say that the other precedent which applies in this instance has already been quoted by the hon. member for St. John's East, namely, the ruling by Mr. Speaker Jerome regarding funds being used by the Clark government for committees or task forces which were made up of Conservative members only. Mr. Speaker Jerome in a reasoned, thoughtful and careful judgment, said it was his view that parliamentary funds have to be made available in such a way that Parliament as a whole is getting the advantage of them.

You may say there is a slight difference, that Mr. Speaker Jerome was talking about parliamentary funds, House of Commons funds if you will, for which the Speaker was responsible. You may say that the funds that are now being used are not coming out of your budget, that they are coming out of the federal government budget. However, the ultimate source is the same in both cases, the taxpayers of Canada.

If Mr. Speaker Jerome thought it was unfair for taxpayers' money to be used to get certain information and do certain things in which only the government side was involved, I suggest it is at least an open question as to whether the present government has the right to use taxpayers' funds to advertise on behalf of its position. I think the whole question of advocacy advertising, subliminal efforts, and all of these things raise many moral questions and questions that relate to our future. It is a good time for us to look at this whole practice. However, as I said earlier, I am not asking you to make a judgment on that. I am saying you have to judge whether there is a sufficient amount of evidence that the question is one that ought to be looked into.

In the course of his remarks the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), and I think others have said the same thing, emphasized that the advertising ended on September 8. The implication of that is that we should not worry any more about it. However, Madam Speaker, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism has said several times in the past two or three days that he has decided that it is all right to spend federal funds gathered from the taxpayers on advertising under two conditions one, on something that has been passed by Parliament and, two, on something on which there is agreement in principle in Parliament, or a wide consensus or what have you. Therefore it is not a case that closed on September 8. We are now having an announcement by a minister which is completely contrary to the rule that the Hon. Judy LaMarsh told me was the rule in 1965.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Whether it is over or not is not the question.

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) says, whether the advertising is over or not, it should be investigated even if it is over. But I find it disturbing and alarming that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism says that this will be the policy from here on. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked whether what the minister said was government policy, the Prime Minister fobbed the question off on the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. He said that he had spoken in his capacity as chairman of the cabinet committee on communications.

Really, we have the right to know what policy is. Judy LaMarsh did not tell me, because I did not press that point, who had made the rule then. We do not know who has made the rule now, but it sets up a situation in which there is gross inequality between the two sides of this House.

As I say, I disagree with many of the things my friends are saying. My friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), a moment ago characterized this advertising as leading to the breakup of Canada and all of that. Whether I agree with the position of the Conservatives or not, they have the right to take the position, they have the right to argue for it, and they have the right to the same facilities available to the government, particularly if federal funds are involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Though I have said it before, I am being reminded by my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), so do we; we have views about the constitution and about that other place a few yards to the east of here. We have views that we have tried to make public in the best ways we can, but no public money is available to us for billboard advertising, radio advertising or television advertising. There is an element of unfairness about this which runs counter to the whole principle that here on the floor of Parliament we are equal in terms of our right to present our case. I believe that equality has been vitiated and damaged by the position the government is taking.

Let me say again, I am not terribly upset about the advertising, but I am upset by the authority with which the Minister of State for Multiculturalism says this is the rule now—that it is his duty to make known to the public of Canada all the information he can give them. The Prime Minister says the public is not as disturbed about information as are members of the Tory party. That is fudging the issue, if anything I ever heard was fudging an issue. The point is: do they have the right by calling it information to use public funds to advertise their side of an issue which has not yet been settled in Parliament? Where I stand on the issue of the constitution does not matter. Indeed, even though I do not agree with the position being taken by the Conservatives on the main issue, I defend their right to equality in the whole picture on the floor of Parliament.

I contend, Madam Speaker, as I said earlier, that you do not have to decide that anyone has done anything wrong. You do not have to take sides on the issue of whether the money has been properly spent or not, but I do think it is clear to you, clear to members of this House, and clear to those who will be following this debate, that there is enough question about what the government has done that the House ought to have the right to decide whether it wants the whole question referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I hope you will grant the hon. member for St. John's East the right to put his motion. If you do, we shall certainly support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Obviously I will not be able to listen to all those who want to take part in this discussion. Therefore the number of speakers I will recognize in the future will depend very much on how briefly those who are recognized speak. I would suggest it would be reasonable that speakers who are to follow do not take more than five minutes, and it would be even better if they took less. As a media person I was always told there is nothing that could not be said or explained in five minutes. I know this House allows much more freedom in expressing oneself than in a tightly knit radio or television program, but perhaps we could apply that rule to ourselves for the remainder of this discussion.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I know this debate is taking up some time and I will try to confine myself to five minutes. I have not been here long enough to become quite as verbose as many. I do feel I have a point to make which bears directly on this matter and which has not yet been advanced.

The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) has professed that governmemnt advertising on the constitution or, for that matter, on any other question, would not be contemplated without the approval or the implied approval of Parliament. He said that on television, and he said it in the House today.

The dimension I would like to develop is merely this. My privilege, my reputation, and my honour as a member of this House have been degraded because members of the government are proclaiming around the country, in my name and in the name of all members of this Parliament, slogans and viewpoints that I believe not merely to be misleading but in many respects to be downright dishonest.

The point about dishonesty has already been made, Madam Speaker, and it would not be proper to make that allegation if I could not be given—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: It would not be proper to make the allegation that such advertisements are misleading or dishonest if I was not permitted a few moments to expand on that by giving some examples.

The Minister of State for Multiculturalism told us earlier today about the education content of these advertisements which depict geese flying, beavers, and the rest. For my part I am most offended by the billboards I see around Canada. For example, let me quote from a television advertisement, and I am sure it must be on a billboard somewhere in the country, and this is part of the government's advertising campaign:

It's over a hundred years since our constitution was written for us.

It is, indeed, over 100 years since the British North America Act was proclaimed, but it was prepared by Canadians and they did that for us. Sure, they are dead, but that did not stop the process of revising and updating the BNA Act which is in fact our constitution.

The foregoing quotation is obviously directed at citizens in this country who have virtually no knowledge of our history or of how the British North America Act was drafted, and it would lead them to believe that the text of the BNA Act was prepared somewhere else than in Canada by people other than Canadians. The truth of the matter is that the Fathers of Confederation were Canadians who worked together in a spirit of good will to create this nation, once a proud nation.

The second quotation, and I am only going to use two or three more if I may, appeared on big billboards across the country and read as follows:

Practically the only thing that hasn't changed is the constitution.

Is that or is that not true, Madam Speaker? I suggest it is downright incorrect. First ministers' conferences represent a distinctively Canadian innovation. Over the years these conferences between provincial and federal ministers have contributed to the amendment and, yes, the reconstitution of the BNA Act in a gradual and orderly manner. For example, Madam Speaker, regional equalization was unheard of in 1867, yet it now forms an integral part of the federal existence. The "have" provinces share generously with those less fortunate. And whoever heard of the women's franchise to vote in 1867? These and many other changes to our constitution have evolved with time, and I submit the slogan is incorrect.

A third and most important example of a slogan which many people in my part of Canada, at least, are very deeply offended by, reads as follows, and this appears on big billboards:

A new constitution: Make it right, make it work, make it ours.

It does not take an intricate mind to conclude that this slogan suggests that the BNA Act is wrong. This implies that the present BNA Act does not work and that it is not ours. It has always been ours, because Canadians wrote it. What was wrong with a former group of colonies going together to the British Parliament with the request that they be given authority to form a federal state within the family of British parliamentary governments, and to make it work? The implication is that it does not work.

It takes trust and confidence between partners in a confederation to make the partnership work, and regrettably that trust and confidence have been eroded and virtually destroyed from one end of this country to another by a government which goes around picking fights with the provinces and their premiers.

I would like now, if I might, to lead to a final quotation which is prominently displayed in the subways of Toronto and on the streets of Vancouver and Charlottetown. This quotation—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. May I ask the co-operation of the hon. member to please focus on the reasons for which he thinks there is a prima facie case of privilege? Hon. members are not serving their cause well if they do not address themselves to that particular point because, if they do not, I will not have their arguments in order to judge the case. They are obviously intervening in this debate in order to enlighten me. I would very much like to be enlightened, and I ask the hon. member to focus on those reasons.

Mr. Siddon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think I tried to express my point at the opening of my remarks, and I will repeat it. I am a member of this House equal to every other member of this House, and when the Minister of State for Multiculturalism proclaims to the country that his advertising campaign speaks for me and has the consent of this House, and at least the implied support of all members of this House, then my reputation and my integrity are questioned. I go home to my constituency and it is said, "But one sign says 'Let's work together to build a better Canada now'." That is a slogan across the land, and who is working together? Who is working together to build a better country?

I believe in judging the merits of the motion put by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), that your Honour has to recognize that the integrity of every member of this House is in question if the slogans the government is proclaiming across the land are misleading and untrue and cast a pall of doubt over my reputation and the reputation of everyone else in this country.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has defined quite well the context within which you must soon make a decision. Yes or no, in view of the evidence given by hon. members opposite, is there a prima facie case of privilege? Madam Speaker, after listening with a lot of attention—which is very difficult I pray you to believe—to all the arguments of the opposition members, I must respectfully conclude that there is not.

First of all, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who introduced the motion and who is no longer in the House, raised two points. He implied, and so did other members opposite, that the advertising campaign purchased and broadcast by the Canadian government was simply a propaganda instrument for the Liberal party. Madam Speaker, I have never in all my life heard so many inaccuracies and lies spoken by one party. In view of the climate which accompanied the referendum campaign, when all members of this House gave their support to what the Canadian government had done and congratulated the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for the commitment that he made a few days before the referendum, that is, to renew the constitution, how can we have strayed so far from this spirit which sustained the House and all its members during the referendum? This is my first point, Madam Speaker.

As for the principle itself, Madam Speaker, only one precedent has been mentioned. Unfortunately, I am not aware of the situation which occurred in 1964 between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the then minister of national health and welfare, but as for the hon. member for St. John's East, he referred to the ruling made by your predecessor about the task forces established by the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

Madam Speaker, when you look at this ruling and especially at the discussions that came before it, you will note that I had myself taken part in the debate and expressed the opinion that there was indeed a question of privilege in that case because my rights as a parliamentarian had been infringed upon. So what distinguishes in this case what you have to decide from what your predecessor decided is precisely this: the task forces set up by the government of the time were made up of only one member, a government member, of course, who held a mandate and was paid out of public funds to go and investigate all over the place and report. I believe, Madam Speaker, that this has precisely nothing to do with the case we are dealing with because we all agree in the House that the constitution should be amended. So, Madam Speaker, if we agree on the principle, what is wrong with our advertising campaign? Because that is exactly what it says.

Madam Speaker, there is not a single member in this House who can say his constituents are fully aware of all federal programs in his riding. If one thing shocks me and aggrieves me as a member, it is when I go back in my riding and say, "Do you know that we, the federal government, are involved in that school, that road, and nobody knows about it?" That must change, Madam Speaker. And that is indeed the scope of the advertising campaign of the federal government under the auspices of the Minister of State responsible for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), to indicate to Canadians what the federal government is doing for them, to indicate to the Government of Canada the policies we want Canadians to understand and in which we want them to participate. And if, Madam Speaker, members across are now telling us they did not accept the principle of constitutional renewal, unfortunately I must say we are very far from the spirit of May 22.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I listened to the parliamentary secretary a few moments ago, and I had a little difficulty containing myself. I do not think there is any doubt in this House of Commons that members of this House in all parties are prepared to accept the proposition, and have accepted the proposition, of constitutional renewal. In other words, what I am saying to my friend is that there are no second-class members. There is no member who is better for his country because he has one point of view, or a detriment to his country because he has another point of view.

The essence of what we have talked about, the charter of rights and everything else, is that I have the right to have a view. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has the right to have a view, so does the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), and so do you, Madam Speaker, and I am offended by what the parliamentary secretary said. I am also offended that he should be allowed to go, the way he was allowed to go, outside your suggestion to hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Come on!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I listen to rhetoric and I sometimes engage in it, but I listen to it, and I have the right to be offended as well by what I have heard.

The issue is a simple one. It is absolutely simple, and it was put simply and clearly by the most experienced member of this House. It is whether or not it is appropriate for the government to spend public funds to promote a decision by Parliament. I think the government can spend public funds for advertising. I have never argued that it could not. All governments have done that.

The issue here is the question of timing, and it is particularly acute because this is a very important issue. We are not just talking about the Canada Pension Plan, capital punishment, gun control or abortion. What we are talking about is the foundation stone of our country, and if there is any question at all in a document—secret, leaked or otherwise—that it might be inappropriate, then it is absolutely inappropriate for the minister not to have considered it, and if he did not consider it—and he may have; I do not know—he ought to be on his feet, not arguing—and he is not arguing; I note that he is sitting listening—but saying, "I welcome this opportunity to have this matter cleared so as a minister of the Crown I will know that the programs I bring forward are appropriate and have the backing of the House of Commons." Surely that is something which ought to appeal to hon. members on all sides of the House because it is a deep question.

Many people do not agree with what the Leader of the Opposition said and says, but he made a point that we are into something new. If we had stumbled into television in the House of Commons the way we are stumbling into the powerful marriage of polls, television and media, then the grand experiment which was carried out in a non-partisan way would have been a failure. It was not a failure.

I do not say that the minister has no mandate to advertise, but I say that he has no mandate to advertise in a way which will undermine this institution, and if there is any question at all, as a responsible minister he should want to have that question resolved. I invite him now to consent to this motion being put so that he will be sure, in an area which is sensitive, that he not only has the backing of his parliamentary secretary, which is taken for granted, but also that he has the backing of the opposition and all members of this House, which he cannot always take for granted, but which is important that he have in terms of the kinds of promotional programs he is about to undertake.

Finally, it is no defence, as raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and by some others in the course of the question period, to say that an ad has terminated. That does not end the question of privilege. The question is still here, the advertising program having been begun. I do not think I have much more to say, but I do invite the minister to rise to his feet and do what his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), did, that is to go to a committee of the House so that his program can be cleared. I think that will end the issue. Parliament will be a lot better if the issue is ended in that way.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I think the government has failed to make a very important distinction. I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) had to say and to what the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) and his parliamentary secretary had to say. I think we have to recognize that there really is a difference between the government advertising information on government programs which are in existence and advocacy advertising.

The parliamentary secretary said that he can go to a school or elsewhere and find he cannot tell people that the government is involved. No one is objecting to that and, for goodness sake, we have certainly seen a plethora of advertisements, both federal and provincial. Every time you go by a bridge you find a plaque saying the federal government gave $28,000 and the provincial government gave so-and-so, under the authorization of the hon. Joe and the hon. so-and-so, and everybody gets their name on it. This is part of the game, because that money has been authorized and approved. No one disapproves when the Government of Canada takes out an advertisement telling people what their rights are under the Canada Pension Plan, or when the government of Ontario takes out advertisements telling people what their rights are under the workmen's compensation act. The Tories do it in Ontario, the Liberals do it in Ottawa, and the NDP does it in Saskatchewan, and we cannot object to that because that is the dissemination of information. Of course it has a subliminal effect, and of course it has a political effect, but still it is information on a program which has been approved by Parliament.

However, there is a very different pattern going on and I want to refer to it. The pattern is that polls are being taken the questions in which are never revealed, nor the answers or results ever revealed. Perhaps I have a personal interest in this. My father wrote a book in 1939, together with Dr. Gallup, called "The Pulse of Democracy". We expect and encourage the government to take the pulse of democracy from time to time. I disagree with the absurd statement made today by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that "we'll stop all polling," putting our heads in the sand so as not to know what the state of public opinion is. This is not going to help things. Coming from an autocrat, this is not a surprising position, but speaking as someone who is a democrat, I think the taking of the pulse of democracy is a very important and healthy development.

Imagine, Madam Speaker, the contrast between two pictures which I am going to paint for you, between what the government has done and continues to do and what it would do, I think, in a parliamentary democracy where the privileges of all members of the House are treated equally. On one hand they are taking secret polls, refusing to release the results, and carrying out advocacy advertising. There is no other name for it, it is the advocacy of a particular position. It is not, as the parliamentary secretary says, merely stating that there is a general position which we all favour. The parliamentary secretary knows perfectly well that, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, many of those ads are a sheer waste of money. But those kinds of ads can develop momentum of their own and are definitely identified with the attitudes, policies and particular constitutional proposals of the Liberal Party of Canada.

An hon. Member: No, not our particular ones.

Mr. Rae: Yes. The parliamentary secretary is shaking his head, but this is absolutely the case. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that I will never look at a beaver or a Canada goose the same again. They look like Liberals in disguise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: And the maple leaves, the clipper ships and the farmhouses. I watched all the ads. The principle is a key principle. Imagine the contrast between the taking of secret polls, refusing to publish the information, then carrying out advocacy advertising in all the media in Canada, and what the leader of my party and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have suggested as a course of action which would protect the privileges of the House.

I will come to the question of privilege in summary. We do not object to the taking of polls. We want to know the questions and we want to know the answers, because knowing the question very often tells you what the answer will be. It will certainly help the government in knowing which questions they are going to be putting in future. We have to know those things. The government should allow this House an opportunity to debate the results of public opinion as we feel it ourselves and as we feel we can represent it.

The government of the day should establish a committee, as it has done and, with all flexibility, it should establish a consensus of the House on the position of the Government of Canada and of the Parliament of Canada with respect to constitutional renewal. No party has a monopoly on constitutional renewal, no party has a monopoly on patriotism, and no party has a monopoly on loyalty to its country or to its future. That is something which is shared by all members of the House.

The question of privilege is really quite simple. It is this. Imagine the implications if we do not consider what to do about the advocacy of the government's positions, for the future of opposition parties in any democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: The government can control the media because they are taking taxpayers' dollars and they can advertise right across the country on the basis of positions which they have and on the basis of polling which they have taken. Compare the resources which the Government of Canada, with its control over the purse strings and over government expenditures, with the budget of the NDP, or even of the Conservative party. There is no comparison at all.

We are faced with a new and very hard question: when does parliamentary democracy become a mockery and when do we replace it with a kind of televised autocracy where the illusion of participation is given by the taking of polls. People come to the door and say, "What do you think the government wants to know?", they take a decision and press a button. The other side of it is the reality where you have a government party which has a monopoly on information and is manipulating that information with a cynicism which we have come to expect of that party, and which we have seen in the memos from civil servants to the Prime Minister and all around. That is the question of privilege.

The question of privilege is: is there a qualitative distinction between the advocacy of a particular position prior to approval by Parliament and the advertising of government programs which have been approved by Parliament? That is not a privilege only of the individual member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). It is a privilege of the House itself, to decide whether Parliament will be able to control the expenditure of government and whether it will be able to express itself freely without the government lobbying against Parliament's position, or whether we will move to a new kind of political system. That political system is not parliamentary democracy as I recognize it but some kind of electronic autocracy, which may be favoured by those on the opposite side, but I do not think it is favoured by the people of Canada, and certainly it is not favoured by the members of my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: It is becoming harder and harder for me to choose which hon. member I should hear next. I will hear two more on the opposition side and one on the government side, and then I will conclude the debate.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my intervention will be very brief. I want to associate myself with the point made very clearly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) which he directs to you, in the very narrow context in which we hope you will find the question of privilege, the subject matter of the question of privilege being of such magnitude and new design that perhaps it should be considered by a committee. That might very well be a logical way to proceed in this matter.

I gave the Chair notice at three o'clock of the point I wanted to make, that is, to remind Madam Speaker that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) and other government members, in arriving at a decision and in rationalizing programs like this, should be very, very aware that they do not speak for me.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): In connection with this matter, I gather from listening that there is a lamentable lack of precedents on the issue Madam Speaker now has to decide. The question that must strike one is why there is such a lack of precedents. There is such a lack of precedents because never before in the history of Canada has a government had the arrogance to attempt to do what this government is attempting to do. To bully and pressure members of Parliament in this way has never been conceived before.

There were some people who thought that the administration which preceded the Clark administration tended to show some arrogance toward the last ten years of its life. But what has happened since February 18 puts that right into shade. That is why, when Madam Speaker looks for precedents, you will not find any on this issue. I hope you, Madam Speaker, will take your time before deciding this issue. I suggest perhaps that it should be taken under advisement and not decided today.

It may be that Madam Speaker cannot do anything about this tyranny of the majority. This is tyranny of the majority. It may be under parliamentary rules and customs that Madam Speaker cannot do anything about it. If that is the case, then we will have to depend on the people of Canada when we can go to them to defend us from this tyranny of the majority, which will be four or five long years away. It may be that this kind of technique will be used by the government, and hundreds of millions of dollars will be spent in the next four years.

If this kind of technique of going to the public with advertising and polling, as the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) outlined a few moments ago, cannot be stopped by Madam Speaker or the members of this House, then in four or five years it will not matter if there is an election or not.

We all know that hon. gentlemen and ladies opposite are the governing party of Canada, but the fact still remains that we on this side of the House should have a fair chance of trying to become the Government of Canada, either the NDP or the Progressive Conservative Party. If Madam Speaker cannot protect us, we will have to appeal to the better judgment of hon. members opposite who have engaged in a very dangerous practice. The parliamentary secretary said that he wanted the people of Canada to be fully informed on the issues. How can they be fully informed on the issues in an advertising campaign? The whole purpose of an advertising campaign is to obscure the issues and to put across one simple point of view. That is the whole point. That is why Premier Blakeney talks about an advertising war for which they may have to get ready in Saskatchewan. It is not to put across the truth.

How could this campaign put across the truth if our views are not given to the public also? We may agree that there is some need for constitutional change in Canada, but we have a different view of what kind of constitutional change is needed and how it should be done. We certainly do not think that it should be done by this Parliament changing, by itself, the rights and responsibilities and jurisdiction of the provinces, which is what the resolution we are debating now will do. In fact we believe it will seriously threaten the unity of this country. Is our view being put across in these advertisements, or the view of the NDP? They are not. It is only the view of the majority that is being put across. They are not putting across a view. They are trying to give the impression that all they are doing is floating through the air like geese while they are trying to bring the Constitution of Canada from Westminster to Canada. That is not what they are trying to do at all. They are not trying to explain the complexities of this proposal, in their ads, what the amending formula is, what will be done and why, what the charter of human rights is, and what the exceptions to it are. When I get my chance to speak on it, I will point out its inadequacies. It is totally inadequate. It is a Liberal piece of hypocrisy. None of that has been explained in these polls.

I am not sure whether this has been referred to before, but it is something else for Madam Speaker to consider. The government's own advisers have raised a serious question with the government as to whether or not this is proper. Everybody in Canada has taken notice of what is known as the Kirby memorandum that put out the blueprint for the first ministers' conference in September. It is headed "Continuing Information Program—Constitutional Renewal" and reads in part as follows:

> The fundamental question to be addressed concerns the legitimacy of spending taxpayers' dollars to promote what will be deemed by many to be a politically partisan position. Ministers may want to note that selling federal constitutional proposals is quite different from the Quebec referendum campaign, when all federal parties basically supported the government's position and hence did not object strongly to federal advertising.

That put the question squarely to cabinet from its own public service. Normally we do not see this, but we can send Madam Speaker a copy of the whole 62-page document. You should have a look at it before making a decision. It continues:

> Moreover, ministers should recognize the important distinction between the use of advertising as a negotiating tactic and its use as a tool to sell the government's programs or policies over the head of the opposition.

This is what the memorandum brought out. Then it goes on to describe the role of government advertising as follows:

> During the summer, government advertising played a significant tactical role in two ways. First, it helped to keep the issue . . . before the public . . . Second, it helped to persuade the provinces that the federal government was not bluffing . . .
> But once the government has decided what action it intends to take, and Parliament has been reconvened to debate that proposed action, the role of advertising changes. At that point, public funds are being used to sell the governing party's position, yet such funds are not made available to opposition parties. Thus, the opposition has no effective way to respond, in contrast to the provinces which can and did during the summer respond by running their own advertising programs. Under these circumstances, ministers need to decide if advertising is politically legitimate.

My advice to you, Madam Speaker, is that if there is any way you can hold in favour of this question of privilege, then you should hold in favour of this question of privilege, and that the burden of proof is on the government. Madam Speaker must be interested in the rights of this House and in this House being anything but just a punching bag for the government. If not, we in the opposition will become a punching bag for gentlemen opposite who will take their polls and get their responses from the public, learn how to couch their campaigns in all simplicity without explaining the complications of their proposals, and not show us the results.

We are paying for it. It is taxpayers' money that is paying for it, the taxpayers of Canada. All these polls are supposed to do is find out what they think. That is not to be shared with us. Then the government will bring in legislation, have a referendum and so on. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) the other day pointed out what the government could do with the referendum, using these same techniques. If Madam Speaker has any way at all of finding for us on this question of privilege, I hope you will do so and I hope you will reserve your judgment. If Madam Speaker cannot hold for us, then believe me it will be tough for the government ever to change in the country or for this body ever to regain any of the importance or influence it once had.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I have become somewhat disturbed as the debate has gone on. Perhaps it is a reflection of Your Honour's continual attempt to be fair to all members, but there are members on this side of the House who wish to participate in the debate. A few minutes ago you said that you would entertain one more. At least eight speakers from the opposition have made their case, and I think fairness would demand an equal right of reply. I hope Madam Speaker would entertain further interventions from this side.

Madam Speaker: I think the debate has gone on long enough. I have invited members to speak on the question of privilege itself, but as I said before I will listen to one more speaker on the government side. We have heard many, many speeches, perhaps not an equal number, but we have heard expressions of opinion on both sides of the House. I will now hear one more speaker.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief and will try to cover, in the light of your admonition to all of us in this House, your point that we should indeed speak to the question of whether or not there is a question of privilege on this issue.

I would argue of course that there is not a question of privilege. There may be an issue for debate, and I think there has been quite an airing of that issue today; certainly in question period yesterday and today it was discussed extensively. I want to touch on a few points made by various members. At the outset we had the member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), with what—I hate to get into crazy and wild rhetoric—seemed to me to be pretty hysterical puffery in making his case. He seems to forget the intellectual leader of the New Democratic Party, the Premier of Saskatchewan, is the one who seems to have heightened this, according to some of the questions of the official opposition today, saying that he is prepared to advertise. And he has not indicated he is prepared to get the approval of his legislature or the other nine legislatures in Canada before any of the premiers do that. Clearly, Mr. Bennett has not done that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: I have listened, I think, with some courtesy to the interjections of all the various members and I hope I will have the chance to make my contribution.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said—and I have three points of his, I think, with which I have a difference—that we, the government, have a privilege that others do not have to present our case. I believe I am quoting him correctly, in sense at least. I gather he means by that that before parliamentary approval we can present a case that would be the case simply of our party rather than the case of something approved by Parliament or, as I have argued earlier, reflecting all sides of the House, and I argued that that has not taken place.

Mr. Orlikow: At the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Fleming: At taxpayers' expense. I argue that that has not taken place. I argue that the constitutional ads which ran in August, indeed, were quite legitimate because they called for constitutional reform. They expressed the view that it was important to update our constitution. I believe that reflects the public statements by leaders on all sides of this House and all the members I know of—I cannot remember anyone saying that there should not be constitutional reform.

I repeat the point made by one or two members on this side who have been able to speak, that the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) had unanimous support for a motion that called for constitutional reform. So I cannot see how this debate today on a question of privilege makes any sense whatsoever.

Mr. Clark: You had better correct that, Jim.

An hon. Member: It's in the record.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would plead with the members to let the minister make his speech without interruptions. We have had a long debate on this question. I have restricted the speeches and I think hon. members will agree that they have had a fair chance to express themselves. Therefore, in order that we may continue with the proceedings of the House, I plead with hon. members to allow the minister to make his point.

Mr. Clark: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I know that it would be the furthest thing from the minister's mind to mislead the House deliberately. He made a reference to the content of the motion moved by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) and is suggesting it had a broad content. That motion, as he will recall, dealt specifically and in a limited way with the question of patriation. I am sure the minister would want to correct the record.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I do not think there is anything to be corrected because I put it in a dual context, of that motion, the speeches given, and the position of the various leaders in this House throughout the referendum.

Mr. Nielsen: That was patriation only, not reform.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I will try to continue, despite the rude interruptions of hon. members opposite. I did not interrupt them and I listened to them carefully during their offerings this afternoon.

I might say again that in the airing of the issue during the time the campaign took place, principally in August,—and there was a considerable airing—there were statements made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), the former minister of state for treasury board, and I might say because I take some responsibility in my job and I was concerned that we act fairly in this policy,—something I have tried to exemplify in my statements last night, and again today—through the summer period we did do a test of the ten major dailies across the country to find out how the Canadian public were reacting to the criticism put forward by the opposition, which is their legitimate right, and I found it interesting that 33 out of 950 contributions from Canadians were about half and half on this issue. So I say again, it has had an airing and I do not think the judgment of the Canadian people is that those ads were unfair.

An hon. Member: What are you talking about?

Mr. Fleming: Allow me to go on. I tried very hard in my position as the chairman of the cabinet committee on communications to be sure that those advertisements were not unfair and did not take undue advantage. It would have been simple enough to say in an ad "Liberalize the Constitution", like "Conserve Ontario." We did not do that although the government of Ontario, I think, is under attack for questionable practices.

We have not put out a position of this government in any form using the taxpayers' money, in the sense of advertising, such as the Premier of British Columbia has done. I was pleased to hear the former government House leader say a few moments ago that his own government, in power last year, spent a considerable amount of money on information and advertising—perhaps it was the Leader of the Opposition that said that—some $30 million to $40 million. Again I argue: how can you have a question of privilege about advertising when—and again I argue this strenuously—it gave no unfair advantage to or presented any particular case of this side of the House?

When I deal with the comments of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) and from several other members, such as the former minister of finance, this righteous indignation that we have gone off sloganeering and have this great advantage, I again argue this certainly has not been the view of all members opposite because it was in the midst of the August campaign that the president of the treasury board of the last government, known as "The Slasher" to some, who cut down on spending—and we had questions today from the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) about spending this money versus immunizing your children, the kind of mixing of two different things which I thought was not fair treatment—we had the call from the office of the former president of the treasury board asking how they could get some of those nice constitutional ads on their local radio stations. I have a letter from the member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) who wrote:

> Dear Jim,
> I am enclosing a copy of a federal government advertisement which appeared in various newspapers including the Stirling News-Argus and the Brighton Independent, which are both in my riding. I think this is an excellent advertisement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: That was the hon. member for Northumberland! So, they are certainly not all of one mind on the usefulness or lack of usefulness or worth of this kind of advertising. I am delighted that at least the hon. member for Northumberland in the opposition feels that it is important that we inform the Canadian public and keep their interest and minds aware of this very important discussion, and not let it fade away to the point at which the view of all sides of this House that there should be reform does not come to a focus and action is taken.

I mentioned earlier the case of Mr. Blakeney. I believe it was the Leader of the Opposition who asked me to make the pledge that I would muzzle any further ads and would not let it happen; I would not take unfair advantage. Well, I give the pledge that I will not be a part of taking any unfair advantage. But I will not muzzle the ability of the federal government to talk to Canadians and inform them when we have a threat from the New Democratic Party Premier of Saskatchewan that he will do that, and we have Premier Bennett already doing it.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: Come on!

Mr. Fleming: I believe I have a responsibility to assist in the informing of the Canadian public. That should be done within a context, and I have tried to describe that context. It is fair to express concern, and hon. members opposite have done that today. But I say: you are not all of one mind. Some members say it is worthwhile, and from the reactions of the Canadian people it can be seen that they did not buy your arguments all through August.

● (1650)

I think the Canadian public wants to be kept aware and informed of what is happening in Parliament, and within that context I can agree with a set of principles. But I also believe that with such an important debate before the House, to take up the time which has been used today, I suggest—and I have a right in this House of Commons to give my views—that what we are getting is a big blue balloon floated to cover up red faces who do not want to look forward to a vote because the Canadian public will be very unhappy when they understand the position of the official opposition.

Mr. Clark: That is one of the weakest performances this House has ever seen, Jim.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have no case so you pound the table.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. As I said previously, this will be the last speaker whom I will hear on this question. As many arguments were put forward and feelings were very strong on this particular question, and as I would like to go over all the different arguments which have been brought forward to ascertain whether there is a prima facie case of privilege, I shall take this matter under advisement.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, when the Minister of State for Multiculturalism was speaking, he made reference to a survey which he said his department had conducted of various newspapers across the country. I gather that there was some contact on behalf of the government with editors or editorial writers to take their survey.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Clark: The reason I raise the matter is that if the practice of having government advertising prior to taking a decision has been joined by the practice of the government getting in touch, for whatever reason, with editorial writers—

Mr. Collenette: You are debating. Obey the rules.

Mr. Clark: —or perhaps with the publishers to try to gauge the response to these advertisements, the purpose of that policy and the extent of that policy may very well be germane to your considerations, Madam Speaker. I simply wanted to know what the minister meant he alluded to these contacts which have been made to determine the effect of the advertising undertaken by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, several of my staff went to the parliamentary library and checked out the editorial pages of those ten major dailies over a four-week period.

MR. NIELSEN—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a question of personal privilege. It involves the reference by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to me when she accused me of misleading the House. Since it is a personal question of privilege it must be raised at the first possible moment, and I inform you of it now, Madam Speaker. I do not think that it would be appropriate for me to pursue it now since the minister is not in the House. I will do so tomorrow.

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—STATEMENTS MADE BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY DURING ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, my point of order arises out of an exchange yesterday with the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) concerning a statement given last May 8 on my behalf by the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of state for mines, the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan). I wish to make clear to the House that in his statement the parliamentary secretary based his remarks on what was my understanding at that time of the McDonald commission's general attitude toward the provision of confidential information to the attorney general with a view to possible proceedings prior to the completion of the commission's hearings and the submission of the commission's report. That understanding which I had was reinforced by an exchange during commission hearings on April 17, 1980, between Mr. Justice McDonald and Mr. Alan Borovoy, general counsel for the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

I referred to that transcript yesterday, but I could not quote it accurately because I did not have it with me. I have it now. At that time the chairman of the Commission of Inquiry responded to Borovoy's submission that the commission ought to, "encourage the normal law enforcement processes to go forward" by noting that such action, "would have required a report by us" based on "representations by counsel as to whether there was conduct not authorized or provided for by law".

As you can see, Madam Speaker, it would be those words which I felt justified the statement which I asked my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, to make. Subsequent to that statement being made by the parliamentary secretary, the chairman of the commission wrote to the parliamentary secretary on May 14 and stated that his response to Mr. Borovoy—which I have just quoted—was to be read solely in the context of the procedures required by law for the commission to make findings recommending further action. The commissioner's later interpretation was not obvious to me from reading the exchange in the transcript to which I have referred.

Mr. Justice McDonald went on to define the commission's position regarding action by the attorneys general prior to the submission of his report by making clear that he and his colleagues, and I quote from the letter, "express no preference one way or another" with respect to such action. It is for the attorneys general of the provinces to decide whether to proceed now or to wait for the commission's report.

For the government's part, my colleague, the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien), has decided that he will not take action within his jurisdiction until the relevant report or reports are received, which, speaking as the minister responsible for the RCMP and including those members whose conduct has been under investigation during this very lengthy period of inquiry, now in excess of three years, I hope that report will be forthcoming in the very near future.

Today in the Ottawa Citizen the hon. member for Burnaby is quoted as making reference also to the letter of Mr. Justice McDonald:

> Robinson said McDonald goes on in his letter to ask the government to correct this "inaccuracy"—

I want to correct that reference because I have the letter here before me. Nowhere in that letter does Mr. Justice McDonald ask the government to correct this inaccuracy. I would also like to add that I was not certain yesterday, but I have checked and I did see the letter, and I also acknowledged it to Mr. Justice McDonald.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I must respond to the statement made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) on the question of privilege which was originally raised on this matter. I regret that the Solicitor General appears to have misled the House in his final remarks with respect to the request by Mr. Justice McDonald. The statement was made that Mr. Justice McDonald had requested that the government, through its representatives, who had originally misled the House, correct the false statement which had been given.

The Solicitor General has stated to the House today that no such request was made by Mr. Justice McDonald. I would refer to the letter which the Solicitor General has now admitted having in his possession after having denied yesterday that he possessed it, which was written on May 14 by Mr. Justice McDonald to the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of state for mines, whom the Solicitor General has acknowledged was speaking on his behalf on May 8:

I trust that you will bring this correction to the attention of those who may have understood that the position of my fellow commissioners and myself was as indicated—i.e. that we "would prefer any such action to await his report". In fact, we express no preference one way or another.

Unquestionably, Madam Speaker, Mr. Justice McDonald asked the government, through the parliamentary secretary, to correct the erroneous information which had been conveyed to Parliament through the parliamentary secretary. I call upon the Solicitor General, now that he has read this letter and has admitted to having read it, to correct the statement which he has just made in this House.

I also call upon the Solicitor General to explain to this House why it was that when the head of the McDonald Commission, Mr. Justice McDonald, requested on May 14, 1980, that this erroneous information be corrected by Parliament and through Parliament to the people of Canada, no action was taken, and why Parliament was not informed that incorrect information had been transmitted to it?

It was only yesterday that I finally received a copy of this letter, after pressing for some considerable length of time the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Mines for it. I suggest that the Solicitor General has misled this House and I call upon him now to correct his statement, which was wrong.

Madam Speaker: This seems to be re-opening what was discussed yesterday. Some facts had been put on the record on both sides of the question and I think we should close the discussion there. I will have to ask the indulgence of the House as to whether the House wants me to proceed with the proceedings preliminary to the orders of the day and not see the clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ANTIBIOTICS

Question No. 596—Mr. Mitges:

Has there been a reassessment of antibiotics used in disease and/or growth promotants in animals and, if so, which of the antibiotics cleared will remain on the market?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There is at present a program for reassessment of antibiotics used for growth promotion in animals. Manufacturers of the 10 antibiotics involved in this program have been requested to submit supportive data from well controlled recent trials under field conditions in Canada to show that these drugs are effective for this purpose. The sale of only those antibiotics which are proven to be effective will be permitted. Present indications are that only three antibiotics are being retested as requested. The three antibiotics involved are therefore the only candidates for retention as growth promotants in this country. Submissions of this type from a manufacturer to a regulatory agency are normally considered confidential until such time as the regulatory decision is taken in response to the submission. The department cannot anticipate the results of these studies and the commitment to the company to pursue this work to completion. This might, as well, provide information to other drug manufacturers about the probable status of drugs, when in fact this type of information of possible economic significance is not usually supplied until submission evaluation is completed. Following assessment of all pertinent data, a final decision on which antibiotics may be sold as growth promotants is expected early in 1981. A similar program for retesting specific disease preventive antibiotics also is under way and will be completed in 1982.

STATISTICS CANADA—SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Question No. 936—Mr. MacKay:

Does Statistics Canada, as empowered by the Statistics Act (a) require individuals to provide their social insurance number (SIN) as part of any questionnaire or survey (b) use SIN numbers to file, collate or otherwise as a link to records from a previous reporting cycle of Statistics Canada or some other department (c) use SIN numbers to facilitate the linking of information from surveys and questionnaires with data accessed from income tax records?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports:

(a) Statistics Canada does request that individuals operating unincorporated businesses provide their SI number on a few survey questionnaires with the specific objective of reducing reporting burden on small businesses.

(b) In the production of certain social statistics, Statistics Canada uses the SI number as a means of linking taxation data year over year in order to generate certain longitudinal characteristics, principally geographical mobility. Also in the social statistics area, Statistics Canada uses the SI number as an initial to certain records from a previous reporting cycle or as a link to other administrative records, through co-operative arrangements with provincial agencies.

(c) Statistics Canada uses the SI number to facilitate the location of relevant tax returns for a small number of individuals operating unincorporated businesses, to eliminate the need for duplicate requests for the same data on a Statistics Canada form. In some cases this involves bringing together data derived from surveys and questionnaires with those from tax records.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—INFORMATION TASK FORCE

Question No. 1,229—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was an information task force planned in the services branch of the Department of Supply and Services, under the former government, for the purpose of studying how the public could be served in a manner which would give better access to information on government programs, joint federal and provincial ventures, etc. and, if so, did this proceed to a point where an additional amount of funds for expansion was either set aside or about to be set aside to provide for same?

2. Has the government proceeded in this regard and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes.

2. There is a task force on service to the public actively working under the deputy minister—services. Its mandate is to improve access to government for Canadians and to stimulate changes in the actual delivery of service and information. The government has both endorsed the goals of the task force and its work program. The work program includes new measures to make access to government by telephone easier, to improve department client practices and to examine ways and means of better providing over-the-counter service. The task force was responsible for the improved listings and blue pages in public telephone directories for example, and in September I signed an agreement with Manitoba marking the first link in a national federal-provincial telephone inquiry service.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KAPLAN—STATEMENT MADE BY MEMBER FOR BURNABY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member opposite accused me of misrepresenting the facts. I should like the opportunity to clarify what I said, because I was not misrepresenting the facts and I think the hon. member has abused my privileges as a member of this House.

There was a letter referred to written by Mr. Justice McDonald to the parliamentary secretary. That letter concludes by saying:

I trust that you will bring this correction to the attention of those who may have understood that the position of my fellow commissioners and myself—

The parliamentary secretary did that. He brought this letter to my attention. I did not deny yesterday receiving the letter. I said, and I quote what I said yesterday: "I do not believe I have seen the letter—". I was wrong. I had seen the letter and I had answered it. My belief was wrong, but I did not deny that I had received it; I simply said that I did not believe I had received it.

The hon. member opposite said yesterday, which was not the fact, that I had denied receiving the letter. I did receive the letter. I went back to my office yesterday afternoon, saw that I had received it, read it, and wrote to Mr. Justice McDonald acknowledging that I had received it.

That letter from Mr. Justice McDonald did not, as the hon. member opposite says, ask the government to correct this inaccuracy. It simply said "—bring this correction—"

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: You can't.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, now that Your Honour has re-opened this subject for debate, I merely wish to ascertain that I will have an opportunity to correct what once again is a complete inaccuracy on the part of the Solicitor General. Your Honour had indicated that the subject was closed and that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) had been given this opportunity. I indicated my view on the matter. Your Honour has now re-opened it and once again we have a completely erroneous statement. The government was asked to correct it, not merely with the Solicitor General, but all those persons who had been misled, including myself and the people of Canada. It was not merely to correct the misunderstanding of the Solicitor General.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I want to remind the hon. member that the hon. minister rose on a question of privilege. I am obligated to listen to him to see whether he has a question of privilege. I might ask him to be brief in trying to expose it to me, but I just have to listen to see whether he has a question of privilege.

If the hon. member wants to answer to that once the question of privilege has been stated, he might seek the floor.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, it is obviously a matter of interpretation between us. I am interpreting the letter one way and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has said that when Mr. Justice McDonald referred to "those" he meant "all those". He interjected the word "all". In his view, Mr. Justice McDonald wanted the parliamentary secretary to set the record straight for the country. Obviously, that is not the way the parliamentary secretary read the letter and that is not the way I read it. The letter has now been made public and the public can make up their own minds about it. It certainly does not say to bring this correction to the attention of "all those", as the hon. member opposite interprets it; he said simply "those who may have understood". The parliamentary secretary interpreted that to mean me, so he brought it to my attention.

On the question of privilege that was raised today I made it clear why I took the interpretation that I did. I feel that my interpretation is justified by what Mr. McDonald said last April in proceedings before him. It is a matter of public record and the public can look at that and draw its own conclusion about which interpretation of the transcript of the parliamentary secretary's statement and Mr. Justice McDonald's letter is accurate.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, in preface to my remarks may I say that I trust the Solicitor General will have no objection to this particular letter being made an appendix and being tabled in the House, if he is genuinely concerned that the public be informed of the facts. At the conclusion of my remarks I would request that it be appended to the Hansard of today.

The Solicitor General has indicated the remarks of Mr. Justice McDonald as follows:

> I trust that you will bring this correction to the attention of those who may have understood that the position of my fellow commissioners and myself was as indicated—

He then went on to indicate the position. The Solicitor General indicates that if the parliamentary secretary brought it to the attention of the Solicitor General, then he was satisfying the requirements of Mr. Justice McDonald.

Madam Speaker, it is a ludicrous proposition to state that when the parliamentary secretary replies to a question in this House suggesting that the government is taking a certain position because a certain statement was made by Mr. Justice McDonald—when that statement to the House of Commons, to the members of Parliament and through them the people of Canada is made, it is erroneous for the Solicitor General to stand up and say that that statement can be corrected by a quiet conversation or perhaps by a letter to himself, when the parliamentary secretary was allegedly speaking on his behalf in the first place. It is completely and utterly without foundation.

Clearly, the record must state that the House was misled. It is not good enough just to say that the Solicitor-General might not have understood and now he understands, even though no one else was informed of the inaccuracy. I would ask that the House grant consent for this letter to be appended to Hansard so that the people of Canada and members of Parliament may make their own judgment as to exactly what Mr. Justice McDonald was referring to.

Madam Speaker: Obviously there is disagreement as to whether the facts were the right ones or not. The hon. member did not say the minister had deliberately misled the House. His interpretation of what went on is that he misled it. The hon. minister put the facts to the House in the belief he did not mislead the House. I think we will let the facts stand on their merits. I do not see a question of privilege in this particular case.

If the minister wants to table certain documents, he may do so in due course, but we have now passed the time when documents can be tabled. He may choose to table same at another time and perhaps accommodate the member, as he has so asked.

The hon. member is rising on what may I ask?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I would ask for leave of the House to have a copy of this letter appended to the Hansard debates of today.

Madam Speaker: We do not have the document on the Table yet. I would say that we should continue the proceedings of the House. The minister might table the document at some other time if he so desires and at that time it will be appended.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. I would ask for leave to table a copy of the document, and that a copy of this document be appended to the Hansard of today's proceedings.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I put myself in your hands for the appropriate procedure. I am perfectly prepared, for my part and for the government, to have that document made public, tabled, and appended to the proceedings.

Mr. Dick: Table it now then.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House to allow the minister to table the document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed that the document be attached to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration from Wednesday, October 8, 1980, of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sitting and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report no later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

Automotive Agreement

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Madam Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Canadian Wheat Board—Grain—Investigation into upgrading—Value received by western farmers; the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble)—Labour conditions—Newfoundland—Reported decision of province to reserve oil rig jobs for Newfoundlanders; the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish)—Public Service—Cost of living increase less than rise in inflation.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills. There being no public bills under that item on the order paper, the House will proceed to the consideration of notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ORDERS IN COUNCIL MADE PURSUANT TO CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all orders in council since 1965 relative to the remission of duties under the Automotive Agreement.

He said: This motion gives us a brief opportunity to examine the agreement concerning automotive products between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America which was signed in January, 1965, and more specifically, the subsequent use of orders in council relating to remission of duties under the agreement.

A remission of duties, being a tariff item, is not spelled out in dollar terms. By its very nature, and however beneficial it may be to the company which profits from this action, it is not a highly visible item for parliamentary review, such as is the case with the spending estimates and public accounts. This lack of visibility at the political level is of even more concern at the industry level.

Before discussing the orders in council referred to in the motion, may I cite a specific item of concern? The orders in council are, of course, a government decision to confer a benefit. It is suggested that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has before him at the present time a proposed order in council that would grant to the Ford Motor Company an unconditional remission of duties for the next five years. Whether or not this is true, and whether or not it would be a justifiable measure, is not as important as the fact that such an order in council is a possibility. One can readily understand the industry concern based on lack of knowledge of the full reason behind past actions.

Let me explain what led to the putting of this motion on the order paper. About a year ago I was invited to a meeting of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association, along with several other members. I had no particular constituency interest in automotive parts manufacture, but I went along because I had no great knowledge of the agreement that had been signed in 1965 concerning automotive products, and I thought I would learn something. At that meeting one of the members of the association expressed his concern that there was no publication of the orders in council which dealt with the remission of duties under this agreement, and I questioned him at the time. I felt that, after all, these orders in council are published in The Canada Gazette and therefore in the public domain. He pointed out that because of the volume of material which goes through, and that obviously these are not starred for any particular industry they are, by their very nature, very well concealed.

The complaint at that time was that they were not able to get from the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce the details which they wanted, which they felt they needed, in order to judge whether or not the actions of the government in issuing these orders in council were rational.

I must admit that I felt the subject should be aired. So upon returning to the House, I put this motion on the order paper. It was short-lived in the last Parliament and it never reached the point where the papers could be produced by the government. Therefore, in this particular Parliament when the item was brought up, the government indicated that the orders in council were too voluminous and accordingly it was not a particularly practical matter to table them. In fact the reply, as I recall, and I will read it is: "The documents are very voluminous and would require a lot of time and a lot of public funds to prepare." I called for the item to be transferred for debate at that time because, once again, if we had said that "we understand", and I do understand, we would still be in the same position of not really being aware of what had been done in the intervening years since 1965.

As a result of the calling of this motion today, I have had meetings with the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and have reviewed with them the 115 orders in council which have been passed in the intervening 15 years. They made interesting reading. I have several copies with me. Of those 115 orders in council, 67 were passed to take care of companies that were not in existence in 1965 and, therefore, could not benefit from the agreement. Of those 67, 35 companies are still operational.

There were many other reasons, which I do not intend to review here, for the other orders in council. All of them were perfectly logical and, from my point of view as a member of Parliament, perfectly acceptable. What was abundantly apparent was that the information which I was receiving was obviously not in the hands of the members of the Automobile Parts Manufacturers' Association of Canada with whom I had met about a year ago. Hence, they have anxiety about what has been done and what could be done.

Canada's automotive trade deficit with the United States escalated sharply last year, 1979, to over $3 billion from a 1978 deficit of around $600 million. There was a substantial increase in the deficit on parts trade. The Science Council report is critical of the less than adequate support from the Canadian government for increases in parts production and engineering in Canada by U.S. automobile subsidiaries. However, the report supported the federal duty remission scheme whereby overseas automobile producers can obtain lower duties by placing more parts orders in Canada. In Canada we have an annual market of about one million automobiles and about one-third of a million commercial vehicles. However, the Canadian industry performs virtually no design research or development work.

I want to refer to the inquiry into the automotive industry which was published in October, 1978. The commissioner was Simon Reisman. I want to refer to some of the comments which pertain to the matter under discussion today, specifically that almost all the actual or perceived problems for Canada in the automotive industry flow from the absence from Canada of any decision making or other head office functions, the lack of significant design, research or development activities, a weak machinery and equipment support industry, and constant danger of inadequate investment.

The inquiry also stated that apart from the addition of snowmobiles and off-highway vehicles where inadvertence rather than policy dictated change, the agreement to which I referred to stands as original negotiated. Incidentally, among the 115 orders in council to which I have referred are those orders in council dealing specifically with snowmobiles and off-highway vehicles.

From the recommendations of this inquiry of Simon Reisman, I want to make reference to five items. I quote:

> The commission does not believe that this is a good time to attempt to re-negotiate the Auto Pact with the U.S. Government. The commission recommends, therefore, that the safeguards under the agreement, namely the assembly ratio, the CVA requirement and the "bogey", as well as the prohibition on imports of used cars and the restriction of duty-free imports to designated manufacturers, not be modified at the present time—

> The commission recommends that a tariff provision be introduced for duty-free import of materials to be used in the production of Canadian automotive parts and accessories. This would take the form of a special end-use item along the lines of similar tariff items now available for the agricultural implements industry and certain other industries. This will enable auto parts producers to obtain their requirements at world competitive prices.

A recommendation of the commission proposed that an advisory body be established to conduct an annual review of developments pertaining to the automotive industry. The commission recommended that this body also be charged with the task of reviewing the operations of the Enterprise Development Program as it relates to the automotive industry.

Another recommendation dealt with the order to increase automotive research and development in Canada. Mr. Simon Reisman said the government may wish to consider limiting the amount of R and D payments to foreign affiliates which may be deducted for tax purposes.

The federal government's response to these recommendations was published in March, 1979. I will refer to only one of the responses. The government stated in part that the termination of existing duty remission programs and their replacement by another program required further study. It was acknowledged there were certain possible advantages to the designated vehicle importer proposal which could result in more production and a better regional distribution of automotive activity in Canada. As far as I am aware, this proposal is still being examined.

It seems from the inquiry and the comments of the industry that there is no basic desire that there be a renegotiation of the agreement as it was signed some 15 years ago. However, the members of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association of Canada are suggesting, and I support their suggestion, that some means be found by which the actions which the government takes through the issuance of orders in council be either communicated directly to interested parties, or that notification should be sent to the interested parties when the order in council has been published in The Canada Gazette so that there can be full knowledge of each and every case. For example, among the listing of the 115 orders in council to which I have already referred, there were a limited few which dealt with the remission of duties in cases of small companies that were on the verge of bankruptcy. This is a judgment call, and certainly at the moment I do not have any knowledge which would suggest that the judgment call of the government in these cases was not good. Nevertheless, it is a judgment call and it should be open to scrutiny by the public. Granted, as I said earlier, the orders in council are printed in The Canada Gazette. Nevertheless, it was abundantly apparent just one year ago after 15 years of issuing these orders in council the interested parties did not have knowledge of changes which had been made by the government, possibly worthwhile, and of direct interest to them.

I would make reference to five of these orders in council which are of some significance. They all deal with relatively large companies—Chrysler, International Harvester, American Motors; two dealt with the Soma-Renault effort in the province of Quebec which subsequently failed.

Certainly inasmuch as the Chrysler action was concerned, no one disputes that it did result in the construction of a $40-million facility in Canada which would not have been built except for the agreement whereby Chrysler benefited from the remission of duties which obligated it in subsequent years to conform to the ratio under the agreement in total. As a result, the plant was built in Canada.

In the well-known case where, due to a strike, it was impossible for the company concerned to comply with the ratio requirements, once again the agreement on remission of duties ensured that in subsequent years this particular company had to conform to the required ratio performance. There is a point here, of course, that in our rather antiquated system under which we operate on a yearly basis there is no carry-over. I have no idea whether any thought has been given to averaging, but it certainly seems to me that in the two cases I have just mentioned some provision for averaging over a period of say five years would have done away with the problem. In fact, that is what the order in council effectively did.

The point of bringing this motion to the floor of the House is to indicate that the government does use orders in council for what certainly on the face of it to me at the present time are good reasons, but nevertheless by their very nature they are not abundantly evident to the public. Certainly if they are not apparent to those who have the greatest interest in them then they are not evident to the public at large.

Last week I discussed with the chairman of the Public Service Commission my belief that the public servant was there to serve the public, and that this meant giving a little more than a limited answer to the question asked. It means, in effect, ensuring that the person posing a question should receive all the information which the public servant realizes is necessary, in this particular case the explanation of the reasons for the multitude of orders in council that have been approved by the government.

I plead that some means be found whereby in future whenever there is an order in council to be approved of a nature that affects this particular association, an immediate communication of the reasons for the order in council be sent to the interested parties. I further suggest that if there is any suggestion that the order in council procedure be used as a means to relieve some of the problems of the Ford Motor Company, such an idea be communicated first to the public so there can be a reaction to this means of giving a tax benefit to a company, a benefit which, after all, will have some effect on the pocket of the taxpayer in Canada.

I hope I have explained my reason for bringing this motion to the floor of the House. I appreciate the co-operation I have received from officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce since the item was called for debate at the end of last week. I hope in the future that kind of co-operation will be extended voluntarily to the members of the industry who are vitally interested in this question. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say it is rather strange to be debating a motion of this nature which calls for the publication of orders in council, in this case regarding the remission of duties in the auto industry. The hon. member should know, and he alluded to this fact briefly, that orders in council of this nature are available from the PCO. As the hon. member is a member of the government he should have no trouble in getting that information from the PCO. In addition, The Canada Gazette has a list of duty remissions as well, and therefore if they are published in The Canada Gazette they are available to the public and certainly to the industry which is interested in duty remissions.

During his comments the hon. member referred basically to recommendations of the Simon-Reisman inquiry into the auto industry, the report of which was tabled in 1978. The information gathered by that commission for that report would have been gathered over a period of perhaps two or three years. Therefore, we are talking about the auto industry as it was in 1975 or 1976. I do not know where the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) has been in the last four or five years, but I can tell him that the auto industry has totally changed in those years. In fact, it has changed for the worse in the last year or two, and that is why there is so much interest in Canada, North America and around the world in improving the auto industry in different areas.

The auto industry in North America has changed in many ways, probably the most important resulting from foreign, offshore imports taking a large slice of the industry in North America. In fact, Japanese imports have accounted for something like 27 per cent of the industry in North America.

There has been a change toward smaller and more fuel-efficient cars. This year American manufacturers have gone to new models, the ones we have been reading about in the last few weeks, including the Ford Escort, the Mercury Lynx, the Chrysler K cars, the Dodge Aries and the General Motors J cars. In other words, there has been a trend toward a world car. I really cannot believe the hon. member would base his comments on an obsolete report which, in essence, has no bearing on the situation today.

It is a totally different world. I do not know where he has been during that time. The changes in the auto industry have been major, therefore the potential solutions are different from what they would have been three or four years ago, and I suggest that the potential solution which should be considered, and considered by this Parliament, in the very near future is to make certain that we, with the United States, will be able to revamp the obsolete and inadequate auto pact which has been in existence since 1965.

The auto pact permits automobiles and automobile parts to cross the Canada-U.S. border duty-free provided certain requirements such as sales-to-production ratios, North American content and so forth are met. Canada traditionally has a moderate surplus in finished vehicles. In fact, in 1979 there was a surplus of some $800 million in finished autos. However, we in Canada have a very large deficit in parts, over $4 billion in 1979 alone, so last year's over-all deficit in the auto pact within the auto industry in Canada with the United States, which includes tires, was a record $3.12 billion.

The cumulative deficit since 1965 is over $11 billion, and it is growing. If we are to try to assist the industry, we cannot look back to 1978, 1977 and 1976. We must look to the present and to the future and to what can and should be done. I say the auto pact must be revamped, and I will get to that in a few moments because that is a long-range plan. It cannot happen overnight.

What should happen overnight, however, are some specific programs which can be put in place immediately if this government would get off its behind and start concentrating on some of the things which can be done to assist the auto industry in Canada. Tens of thousands of Canadians are unemployed because there has been no action by this government. Hundreds of plants across Canada are losing sales and productivity. Dozens of plants across Canada are going bankrupt as a result of the lack of action in the auto industry by this government, yet the hon. member comes up with duty remissions and quotes statements made in an inquiry in 1978. I just cannot comprehend his thinking in this regard.

I do not have time today to go in detail into the specific items with which the government could deal. I hope to do so in the very near future. I hope to express not only my views but those of the Progressive Conservative Party. The first step the government could take is a minor one but, nevertheless, it is one which would alleviate the problems of the industry. That step would be to remove the 9 per cent federal excise tax. This would at least assist in the stimulation of sales of North American-built cars. I suggest the removal of the 9 per cent federal excise tax from North American-built cars only.

The second step is far more important but should be taken only with the short-term in mind until the auto pact can be revamped. That step would be to impose quotas on offshore imports at least at the level of the year 1975 or 1976 when the number of imported cars was far lower and not as damaging to our industry here in Canada as it is today. I travelled to Washington and Detroit to see what the Americans were doing in their industry when it was in trouble, as it has been in the last two years, and I am convinced that with their new world car concept the American auto makers will pull out of the problems they have been encountering, the result not only of the recession which is plaguing both our countries but also of competition from foreign imports which has damaged sales in North America.

We must make sure that Canada gets its fair share of the renewed enthusiasm of the United States auto makers about their world car concept, but I do not think it will. In fact, I am convinced that Canada will not receive its fair share until and unless we change and revamp the obsolete auto pact about which I am talking.

The Liberal government, whether the present government or the one previous to the few short months we spent in office, has effectively relinquished control of Canada's motor car industry and is now making the industry dependent on whatever concessions it can wring from the U.S. auto makers within the constraints of the auto pact. The weakness of the Canadian bargaining position is demonstrated time after time by the involvement of governments in what is known as subsidy auctions. Those are to induce auto manufacturers to locate new plants in Canada rather than in the United States. That is a good point, but if the auto pact was truly effective, Canada would automatically receive its fair share of new investment and it would be quite unnecessary to engage in such costly bribery, which is what it is.

It seems clear that the Canadian industry's most critical problem lies in the parts sector which accounts for the excessive and continually growing over-all trade deficit figures I mentioned earlier. This sector offers much higher benefits than vehicle assembly in terms of value-added and job creation. It is a field in which independent Canadian firms would appear to have good prospects of success, given fair access to the monopoly market operated by the vehicle producers.

Since parts and accessories constitute over three-quarters of the value of the finished vehicle, it is apparent that they must be fully included in any meaningful calculation of benefits accruing to the perspective countries and industrial participants.

I therefore suggest that when we are talking about the remission of duties the principle of fair share should be applied to the parts sector as a separate entity distinct from the vehicle assembly sector with which the present agreement, the auto pact, is primarily concerned. Such segregation would permit the more effective application of essential safeguards and help to ensure compliance with the basic intent of the auto pact.

Since some 60 per cent of total parts consumption is either produced in-house by the vehicle assemblers or comes from captive suppliers, it should be entirely feasible to incorporate the requirement for an appropriate share of Canadian parts in the commitment package for each of the major automotive producers.

Now is the right time—in fact, I think the time is long overdue—for Canada to encourage our parts manufacturers to compete worldwide in this new day and era of the world car, and unless the government takes the initiative to create incentives allowing Canadian manufacturers to get their fair share, this will not happen. We can no longer afford to sit idly by, as the Liberal administration has done time and time again, not dealing with the facts of today but rather looking back to yesterday, content with studies upon studies upon more studies.

The reduction in size and weight and increased fuel efficiency which are taking place in the United States and around the world have put a premium on the use of three materials. They are aluminum, plastics and stainless steel.

These are Canadian strengths with which we can become competitive not just in Canada but in the wider world. Canadian parts manufacturers must be encouraged to go after the automotive parts business anywhere in the world. They can do so. Canada might aid this development through the use of duty remission schemes. I believe we should bid for world productions of components and allow vehicles manufacturers in other countries to deduct from their Canadian duty the value of their parts purchased from Canada. We should consider broadening the application of duty remission to allow foreign producers to apply against Canadian duty on the basis of the total value of Canadian parts used worldwide. This would create an opportunity for Canadian parts manufacturers to trade not only in the United States but also in Japan, Germany, the United Kingdom, Italy and France as well as South America and Africa. With the world car concept, the only way we will stay competitive is to go to the world and trade our advantages—and those are our auto parts and our natural resources—with the rest of the world. We cannot depend on the present auto pact to be able to go forward in that regard.

Such a concept would build on Canadian strengths and would encourage Canadian entrepreneurs to go to world markets to sell. Duty remissions can provide the framework for this export drive. Within the development potential of the remission program, joint ventures with foreign vehicle manufacturers to produce such items as plastic and aluminium components must be encouraged. As part of the same strategy I suggest that Canadian producers of auto parts be encouraged to form export consortia so that they might be more competitive in the world markets.

As I said, we could continue debating this for a long time and come up with the many options that are available. That is precisely my point. Options are available to this government and to this Parliament—I have mentioned a view of them. What is needed is action by the government to work out those options. Unless the government takes action, our auto industry will not get its fair share in the United States where most movement is taking place and our assembly plants and, more important, the smaller and medium-sized parts manufacturers will go down the drain.

So I urge the hon. member not to go back to some reports of three or four years ago and wonder where he can get orders in council when he knows full well—he has been here long enough—that The Canada Gazette prints those orders-in-council and that anybody in the country can find out from that source what they are. If he is indeed concerned about the auto industry, he should put pressure on the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), on the cabinet and on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to start acting on some of these important issues. Only then will we be able to make the best of the strength we have.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to support the resolution put forward by the hon. member opposite. I think there is a very clear need to make a record of these orders in council from some readily available source, which would entitle the Canadian auto industry and the auto industry in general to a remission on import duties. The only thing I really regret is that the resolution is not broader because it appears there is much more information which the public should have, considering the present state of the auto industry and its future options.

I also agree with what the hon. member who has just preceded me said in the sense that I think the government is basically looking at an issue that is dead. The whole North American auto industry has been restructured but we are looking back at what happened almost a decade ago and trying to live with a particular concept which is now dead. If we are not ready to respond to the new trends, we will be left behind and we will find ourselves in a worse situation than the one in which we find ourselves today.

The basic reason for making information in orders in council readily available is that the industry is in very serious difficulty. If there is to be a public debate and public input, that information must be made available. It appears to me that if those orders in council, along with much other documentation, are not made readily available in this country, it will become evident that the Canadian government has continuously given up production quotas and allowed U.S. auto workers and their subsidiaries in Canada to avoid meeting those production quotas and that, in other words, it has given away Canadian jobs. Secondly, the government has not enforced duty payments in penalty for failing to meet particular job guarantees to Canadians. That duty amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars in public revenue which have been given up by orders in council. Those countries have agreed to create jobs in this country in exchange for duty-free marketing and they have agreed to pay penalties in terms of income to Canadians for taking advantage of the market in this country.

I congratulate the hon. member on the motion because I think Canadians have the right to see that information and to have it provided in a readily accessible and consolidated form so that they can participate meaningfully in the debate. What concerns me is that there appears to be much more information needed than is available, and there is some indication that all the information needed will never become available in Canada. Canadians wanting to participate will have to go to the United States where laws on information are far more lenient.

Let us take some examples from the International Trade Commission hearings in the United States and let us consider the questions which were put to the Ford Motor Company. The company has suggested that its failure to meet production quotas in Canada resulted at one time in their owing Canadians duty amounting roughly to $165 million. The procedure which the Canadian government used to allow them not to pay it was to approve a consignment system which allowed the Ford Motor Company to readjust its production quotas. So even though they sold numerous cars in the country in one particular year they were able to break up that allocation over several years.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian government literally gave away Canadian jobs and gave away the compensating revenue which should have accrued to the people of Canada, revenue which amounted to $165 million. I can give you another example, which comes out of the International Trade Commission hearings, or information which is not readily available to Canadians but which they should have. I am referring to the fact that the General Motors Company has failed to meet its production quotas in Canada. The company readily acknowledged at those International Trade Commission hearings that it owes Canadians roughly $6.5 million in duty and that by a variety of schemes it had managed to avoid paying that duty. This demonstrates to me a lack of willingness to ensure that Canadians have their rightful share in the auto industry. Second, there is a serious attempt by the Government of Canada to hide information from Canadians. It is a sad state of affairs when Canadians have to go to the United States to obtain needed documentation. Some of the techniques which allow companies to escape production quotas and duty requirements are questionable. It appears that, rather than elected members of cabinet, officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and of the Department of Finance are making certain rulings by agreement which have allowed companies to escape the requirements of the act. It appears from the evidence before the International Trade Commission that those officials have interpreted the law in such a way as to cause Canadians to give up their claim to revenue and to jobs through guaranteed production quotas. Frankly I think that a legal inquiry should be instituted to determine whether the interpretation of those officials was correct and whether those decisions should not have come from elected members rather than from officialdom.

In the few moments remaining I should like to endorse what the hon. member who preceded me said. The automobile industry in north America has been totally restructured, as he stated. What has happened is that the recession in the United States has caused the market to shrink. The U.S. is left with all the technology relating to small, fuel-efficient cars and with all the production capability. Effectively, there is none available in Canada. The auto industry in Canada is disappointed with the auto pact; they say it is not working. I believe that in the United States, with all their technology, they do not care whether it works or not. We may be sitting here arguing about a document whose time has come and gone, about an industry which has changed while we were worrying about grants for plants and putting the industry on welfare and trying to bargain away a subsidized approach. The industry in the United States has restructured itself, admittedly in a shrunken market, but nevertheless it has responded to the situation and now it has all the technology, all the production capability. I think eventually they will tell us we can have our auto pact and whistle for it. There will be nothing left for us, but their benefits will continue to accrue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen.

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion by members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report no later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I believe the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve was to have the floor but I think the Secretary of State has some information to convey to the House first.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, with your leave I will resume the debate where we had left it last night at the time of adjournment. I will try to assess the effects of the proposed resolution before us over the whole issue of immigration. This debate is all the more important that in yesterday's issue of Le Soleil appeared a headline on first page stating, and I quote, "Ottawa opening up English schools to immigrants."

Mr. Speaker, I strongly protest; the proposed resolution and especially section 23 does not deal at all with the immigration issue and there is absolutely no intention whatsoever of giving back freedom of choice to immigrants in Quebec whatever the country they may come from. Therefore, under the proposed resolution an American, Polish, Italian, Australian, Greek, Portuguese, British, French-Haitian immigrant is still required to send his child to the majority school, the French one.

So it is wrong to keep alive in the public's minds the idea that with this proposed resolution we are creating two classes of immigrants in Quebec. There is only one class of immigrants in Quebec, they all send their children to French school. I want to repeat and emphasize this, because for the last 48 hours in particular, media are reporting that the proposed resolution before the House will in effect reopen the matter of freedom of choice for immigrants to Quebec. Let it then be clearly understood, there is no question of re-establishing freedom of choice for immigrants to Quebec.

The second matter on which I would like to call the attention of the House is the access to English schools for Canadian citizens whose first language is English. When we looked for a way to guarantee Francophones outside Quebec the right to send their children to French school, we had to ask ourselves how we were going to allow the English minority coming to Quebec or living in Quebec to send their children to the school of their choice, or English school. We had no choice, Mr. Speaker, we could not establish two classes of citizens in Canada, one class of citizens born in Canada and another class to whom citizenship is granted. We wanted to avoid the trap of creating two types of citizens—new citizens and Canadian-born ones. What we have in Canada is two official languages, what we have in Quebec is two types of schools, French schools and English schools. Therefore, in determining what groups of citizens must send their children to French school, we had no other choice than to use the criteria of first language. This means that a Canadian citizen coming to Quebec and whose mother tongue is Italian or Polish or Chilean or Spanish must send his children to French school. There is no question of freedom of choice for any other citizen whose first language is not English. They have the same status exactly as French-speaking citizens. Therefore, the only citizens with access to English school under this proposal are those whose first language is English.

[Editor's Note: At this point, a child started crying in the gallery.]

Mr. Joyal: I do not know if this new citizen's mother tongue is English or French, but if ever he has to be enrolled in a Quebec school and his parents' first language is not English, they will have to enroll him in a French school.

We were not free to choose a criterion such as that of Bill 101 which says that the school attended by the parents determines accessibility to the French or the English school, because if we had adopted that criterion we would have made it impossible for Francophones living outside Quebec who could not get their primary or secondary education in French to send their children to a French school. I would like to make that clear to Quebeckers, Mr. Speaker. There is no question of restoring free choice under the proposed resolution nor of opening English schools to immigrants. I insist on that point because during the past two days the media have published reports that do not take into account the contents of the resolution now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, that is the first point I wanted to make. The second deals with an assessment of the demographic fluctuations between Quebec and the remainder of Canada. This is quite important because if we establish that the mother tongue is the criterion of accessibility to English school, we should have some idea of the number of English-speaking Canadians coming within Quebec, as we must have some idea of the number of new English-speaking Canadians who settle down in Quebec. I said yesterday that the percentage of new English-speaking citizens settling in Quebec through immigration over the past two years had a tendency to come into line with their percentage in Quebec; in other words, the number of English-speaking citizens settling down in Quebec through immigration make up 20 per cent as a whole, which is equivalent generally to that part of the population in Quebec.

There is therefore a balance in the immigration process such that the proposed resolution will, without a doubt, change the balance or the numerical importance of Francophones in Quebec. Also, Mr. Speaker, we need only look at the migration of Quebeckers from Quebec. This phenomenon has been going on for 25 years, and I am not the one who came to that conclusion. Mr. Jacques Henripin, one of Quebec's most respected demographers, stated in a study published in January, 1980, that since the present economic situation is not quite in Quebec's favour the trend to leave the province has been stronger over the last 25 years than the trend to come to that province.

For the year 1977-1978, Mr. Henripin noted that there was a loss of 41,000 and 35,000 Quebeckers who left Quebec to establish themselves in other provinces. A breakdown of these migrants by language shows that 29 per cent were Francophones, 62 per cent were Anglophones and 9 per cent were from another language group. This clearly means that there are almost as many French-speaking Quebeckers who leave Quebec to settle elsewhere in Canada as there are new citizens whose mother tongue is English who come into Quebec.

Therefore the provisions of section 23 which grant French-speaking Canadians the right to send their children to French schools when they leave Quebec to live elsewhere in Canada ultimately protect French-speaking Quebeckers more than they bother English-speaking Canadians who would move to Quebec. The people of Quebec must know that because the shift of economic wealth within Canada, which is not an isolated phenomenon, has also been observed in the United States. Therefore the westward shift of wealth is followed by a shift in the population which affects as many Anglophones as Francophones. We must think about the rights of French-speaking Quebeckers to send their children to French schools where they leave Quebec and go live in other provinces.

Nothing in this resolution prevents Quebec from drafting its own policy enabling the government to ensure a fair balance between French-speaking and English-speaking groups as well as groups using other languages. And this is very important, Mr. Speaker, because if I believed that this bill would make it more difficult to maintain this balance without which Quebec cannot be the focal point of Francophones in North America, I would be the first to ask for amendments in this regard. But the facts are quite the opposite. Under section 95 of the present constitution jurisdiction over immigration is shared equally by Quebec and the central government, and this is why, on February 20, 1978, the Government of Canada and the government of Quebec signed a three-year agreement which gives Quebec a power of veto concerning immigrants to its territory, which veto Quebec has used, continues to use and will eventually still use when it expires since it could be renewed by common agreement.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, nothing in this bill goes against the essential provisions of Bill 101 in Quebec. French continues to be the official language of Quebec, it continues to be the working language; French continues to be the language of business and trade, it continues to be the focal point of the efforts of all governments so that Quebec can remain the principal residence of Francophones in North America. I want my fellow citizens to be aware of this because it is very easy to confuse everyone, to raise the spectre of immigration and of the invasion of Quebec, and because we must know exactly what we are talking about when we speak of immigration and new citizens and when we try to balance the relationships which must exist between Francophones and Anglophones in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this is very important because, for our part, we realize that Francophones outside Quebec, who are very conscious of the subject matter of the resolution being debated by Parliament, are well aware that unfortunately this proposal does not go far enough. They tell us: In Victoria, in 1971, seven provinces had agreed to recognize the use of French during the proceedings in the legislatures. There was Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Manitoba. In 1971, three provinces were willing to recognize the use of French before the courts. In 1971, five Canadian provinces were willing to recognize the use of French in their services to their citizens. It may be well to remind the House which provinces those were: Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Ontario. Yes, Mr. Speaker, Ontario.

In 1971, Ontario was willing to recognize the right of Francophones to be served by their government in either of the two official languages in Canada. We forget that too often. Ontario has backtracked in that regard since 1971. The Ontario government is not solely responsible for that. As we know, it has been pointed out repeatedly, the Quebec government was the one that refused the Victoria charter, by demanding what? That it have jurisdiction in the field of social affairs, a topic that has not been heard of again in eight years, which has never been the subject of another constitutional conference. Yet, at that time, at least seven provinces were willing to make significant progress.

When Bill C-60 was put before the House in June of 1978, the federal legislation contained provisions identical to those of the Victoria formula. When the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) addressed the provincial premiers on September 10, 1980, less than a month ago, he made identical proposals. Today, Francophones outside Quebec ask us, "Why do you not respect the commitments you made over ten years ago in Victoria, the promises you made two years ago when you introduced legislation?"

We have to recognize that the present proposed resolution does not go far enough in terms of protecting the rights they are entitled to claim in this country. So, Mr. Speaker, in the days and weeks to come when the committee will debate this issue it will have to consider including proposals allowing those provinces which are willing to proceed towards linguistic equality to achieve the basic equality provided in the proposed resolution, to make voluntary commitments and to guarantee through a provision in the charter the possibility of giving Francophone citizens of their province the same rights that are given to Anglophones in Quebec. That is the basis of Canada, Mr. Speaker. The commitment of all citizens to get exactly the same rights in any province, in any region.

Yesterday I heard my colleague from Ontario who was rightly expressing the aspirations of the west and who told us that in that region there are also people who think that the west might separate some day if we are not sensitive enough to their expectations. He was not talking to a brick wall. Francophones and Quebeckers are fighting in Ottawa in an attempt to re-establish that equality and we are ready to fight with our other colleagues in the House so that our fellow citizens in the west feel at home in our country. But when they return in the west we expect them not to attack the federal government—and I make a difference between the federal government and the Liberal party, knowing as I do the rules of politics—they should not attack our institutions, they should not alienate their fellow citizens and they should do like we Quebeckers do when we return to Quebec. We try to make our fellow citizens understand the advantages of staying in this country but also our duty to change it.

Mr. Speaker, this responsibility works both ways. We are ready to give them all the help they need and to listen to what the Leader of the New Democratic Party said the night when the Prime Minister tabled that resolution. We are listening carefully to the west. We are curious about what is to be done in that part of the country, but what we are asking them is to speak on behalf of Canada when they return home. The reason we are here is essentially to make sure that we have exactly the same perception and understanding of the duties we have with respect to our fellow Canadians. The future of Canada will be based on this, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that when we are called upon to vote on this resolution and to decide, we will choose the extent of freedom the Canada of tomorrow will grant its citizens.

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be, after listening Monday, Tuesday, and the little there was on Wednesday to this debate, that the high quality of most of the speakers has raised this debate far above the level of most debates in this House over the last 25 years. This does not mean that all the speeches were of high quality, but the high quality of most of them should be commented upon. When I use the words high quality, I include such adjectives as sincerity and deep thought, both of which have been put into the speeches in the House. It bears out what has always been the case when we discuss a subject like the constitution, that it requires a tremendous amount of thought trying to think our way through the points which are raised, not for the first time, it is true, but for the first time in the last ten or 12 years.

The constitution was the prevailing subject during the 1930s. It became clear that the weaker provinces under the terms and organization then existing were not able to meet the economic and social costs of a world-wide recession as well as the richer provinces. Then, after tremendous discussion, we moved on and under a royal commission headed by Rowell and then Sirois, the equalization principle came into being.

Now, 40 years later, it has come into the consciousness of the Canadian people that it is time we discuss the matter again. I think we owe a debt to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for suggesting that all members should speak in this debate. That is going to take some time. With the quality of the speeches which we have been hearing, I think it would be very unwise for him to change his view on that proposal.

I want to mention the speech of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), particularly the last five minutes. I watched the faces of those who were in this House across from him and those behind him, which I could see much better on the television monitor.

All members were watching intently. When my leader came down to his conclusion that even though all parties wanted patriation, because it is a matter of national pride, and even though all parties were willing to take a look at what reforms they could bring to the constitution, we had to be aware of the significance of section 42. The impact which was made showed up, not only in the faces of the members, but in the shock effect across this nation as people got a second dose of what they had seen at the first ministers' conference.

At the first ministers' conference we saw a situation across the country whereby through every technique known to modern communications we were told that the Prime Minister would face a united group of provincial premiers, all of whom opposed him. When we saw the conference on television and heard it over the radio we found instead ten sincere, able men putting forward different views which made a lot of sense. Obviously, there was not agreement between the Prime Minister and the premiers, but there was no massing or ganging up.

The people of Canada were proud that there was a difference because they instinctively understand that this is a very important and complex problem. They were proud that men could put forward different views so sincerely and ably, and they knew that this country was in good hands.

Instead of taking that disagreement among the provinces as a sign of weakness in this country, it should be taken as a sign of strength. People are going to have different viewpoints because there is no human being in the whole world who can say for sure at this time what is the right thing to do on the subject we are discussing.

Let us take the idea of federalism. The word is now used openly and proudly but that has only come about in the last few years. When the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) served notice that he stood for a federal system, for the first time many people in Canada knew what he stood for. They got the idea that they have always known to be true, that this was the same concept as we had in 1867. We as Canadians knew in 1867 that it would be impossible to run a country as diverse, a country with so much geography, as a unitarian state. The same view prevailed in the United States in 1787 when men like Alexander Hamilton, keen exponents of a strong central government, listened to the discussion of that unique group in Philadelphia and came down for the first time in history on behalf of the unique form of government, the federal system.

This federal system follows something that we know instinctively to be right—wherever possible, keep government close to the people. It gives a better class of government. You have to have a strong central government, but you can only have a strong central government when you do everything you can to make the other levels of government as strong as possible too. That is the concept of federalism.

There is no such thing as a compact in federalism, just as there is no such thing as a compact in the human body. An arm is an arm is an arm; it is part of the body and you cannot ask the arm to go one way and be different. I am simply saying that the concept of federalism was stated, by the Leader of the Opposition in one or two sentences, more powerfully and clearly than I have ever heard it stated before.

The speech impressed many people. Also, I have no choice but to mention the speech of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). He certainly surprised me. I have listened to him off and on for ten or 12 years and now, all of a sudden, when I heard him come out and in unequivocal terms support the concept of federalism as expressed by the Leader of the Opposition, I had to pay attention and listen very closely.

The House may not understand the significance of that but from a Saskatchewan point of view where we have witnessed this violent political clash for the last 50 years, to hear a socialist saying he believed in a federal system bringing government close to the people wherever possible, letting them make the decisions was, to my mind, revolutionary.

I say to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, quite straightforward by, that I think he could well consider making the conversion complete. I now extend to him on behalf of the Saskatchewan caucus of the Conservative party, a welcome into our ranks where he can stand up and fight with colleagues unanimously behind him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The resolution before us is not going to be weakened by anything I am going to say. It is unfortunate, however, that the resolution should be introduced in the middle of what has been going on in Canada in the last few years, particularly the last five or six months.

I was in the state of Washington last weekend. As I was driving to my destination I heard the American radio stations mention "scam". I knew it was a new word so I looked it up in these new dictionaries. As far as I can tell, it means fraud, it means manipulation, it means phony advertising. What made it news that day was the fact that three legislators in the state of Washington had just finished a four or five-month trial for "scamming"—conspiring to fool people. By God, if that is not what we have had in Canada these last four or five months, I wonder what we have been doing!

An hon. Member: The last 17 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Scam seems to have become part of the political techniques of all political parties but to use it when we are discussing something of common interest to all political parties, the constitution, just goes too far. You do not have to go through the processes as if you were a General Motors or Ford or Chrysler. If you have a lousy car, you put millions of dollars into advertising and claim that it is the best car that was ever built. You con the poor suckers into it. The suckers cannot jump out, unfortunately, but eventually the car companies go broke. Other people come in and provide something better, closer to what the people need but, by God, for 15 or 20 years they really take you to the cleaners.

Scam is such a serious issue in the United States—and I think their politics are just a shade lower in level than ours—that these trials are taking place in state after state. It is so bad down there that I even hear people talking about bringing the presidential candidates who are now running for the three parties—or the two parties and the independent—up on charges of scam. They believe they have a right to charge these people for trying to fool them. The main charge they would level against them is conspiracy to defraud. By God, have we not got conspiracy and fraud going on here?

An hon. Member: That is Liberalism.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I should like to suggest in plain and simple terms tonight that the British North America Act, drawn up by Canadians in Canada, is a good act and a good constitution. Not only has it served this country for over 100 years but it can serve us for another 100 years. There would be no trouble at all dealing with any of our problems, provided there was good feeling and a will to co-operate between the various elements and the levels of government.

I speak from the knowledge of how I have seen the situation deteriorate. If I have time, I may deal with the co-operative federalism we tried to get going from 1957 to 1963. I should like to bring matters more up to date, however.

What is the real issue we are talking about in Canada today? What is the real basic quarrel that is going on? It is not the French fact. Every province in the country, to my knowledge, is trying its level best to get that situation resolved. What we are fighting over in Canada is the same thing we were fighting for before we were a country.

If we look at the early history of the French colony and the English colonies, we see that the battle was over land. What we now call Quebec had small seigniorial farms of 30 or 50 acres, but people could not make a living on that. In the western colony of Ontario the clergy reserves took up the choice pieces of land. There was a tremendous demand for land and things were the same in the United States. The question was finally resolved by moving people westward. When we brought our government into being in 1867, Cartier, speaking on behalf of his part of the country, saw a great opportunity for the hard-pressed farmers of what is now Quebec to go west and share in the great desert out there. Many in this House know why they did not go. People from many countries, from the Atlantic area, from the eastern townships, and from Ontario did go. Thank God, they did, because the Americans were coming in from the south to take it anyway. We made a dominion from sea to sea. Unfortunately, not enough of the sons and daughters of those who worked on these small farms in Quebec joined us in that great adventure.

Land today is still in short supply, but there is something else beneath the land which attracts us. We have discovered that underneath our land, as a result of the productivity of the last two inches of soil, there is a tremendous wealth to be found in aquifers—water, if you like, underground streams and rivers—which is in far greater quantity than all the Great Lakes. At the bottom of the sedimentary areas, great wealth of thermal heat can be found which is hundreds of times greater than all the wealth in the hydrocarbons. When you realize that this wealth is there, who do you suppose wants to get in on the act? What we have witnessed is a battle this last decade or so between the civil servants at the provincial level who are trying to hang on to what they have got and the civil servants at the federal level—in the finance department—trying like the devil to get a hold of it. They are fighting for land now in the new form, and they fight for the taxes on it. So here we are with a federal government, with a highly efficient tax group of people now matched by equally efficient people at the provincial level, fighting to preserve what they have got.

Guess who is caught in the middle? It is the fellow who is fighting to develop the resources. Certainly the politicians are not in the fight, they surrendered long ago. So here we have our masters, the mandarins who have taken a war lord attitude. And the battle between these war lords pops up in various forms.

Look at the budget of 1974—we had two of them that year. Because the provincial governments in five western provinces had doubled, tripled and quadrupled their taxes in the mining industry as well as the oil and gas industry, the federal civil servants said they would not let them get ahead. In 1974, out of their tariff budgets we got a principle that disallowed all provincial royalties and taxes. So we find two governments double-taxing the resource industries. They were so bad that the well drillers moved out of the west, and B.C. and Alberta had to back off a little.

All of this has been admitted in the House, Mr. Speaker. Two finance ministers said we should resolve this problem, but those budgets in 1974 were the opening round of a battle that we are still carrying on and calling a constitutional debate. In 1979, it was still there. Now, as this battle goes on with the roaring of the big guns, the threats go out. These include a natural gas export tax, an electricity export tax, an energy export tax and refining taxes. All these are part of the artillery drum fire of the civil service at Ottawa which is trying to terrify its opponents by threats of what they have to face, and this is one of the reasons why the provincial governments are watching this debate with great care. They suspect that trying seriously to look at what changes we can make in the constitution, and how we bring it to Canada for the first time, a Canadian law is only a guise. The provinces look at it and they are frightened. When people are frightened you get odd actions from them. The conclusion I reach is that this whole matter of the scam we have been using to push through this unilateral approach has already done great harm. But to solidify it in any form of a constitution means, as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition said the other night, the beginning of the end of the federal state. When I heard the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) come out for rapid action on the constitution, I thought how little he has learned of Canadian history. The only way you should deal with the constitution is to surround yourself with people who are not fighting to preserve their little empires, as has to be the case when you deal with heads of governments. Deal with people from all parties who are honestly trying to come up with some sort of way that can meet what we need to change the constitution to make a good constitution even better.

The fight will come down on this question of the charter of rights. There is no argument on patriation. Every party believes in it. We want the constitution back. We want that Canadian constitution to be continued as a Canadian constitution by this Parliament and the other legislatures so we can get at the serious questions knowing full well we have not had to ask somebody else to do it for us.

Let me speak for a moment on this charter of rights. I was pleased and shocked when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) in his speech praised John Diefenbaker's bill of rights. I was one of the chaps who was there. My mind is very clear about the opposition we had to face to bring that into the House. For two and a half years I had to listen to about 18 lawyers in that cabinet, all brilliant, sincere and dedicated people who were trying to find some way to write it in the right way, to do what they wanted to do. In no way could they ever come quickly to the right way of saying it. As everyone knows, we discussed the merits of putting the bill of rights into the statutes affecting only matters under federal jurisdiction. Obviously we discussed the value of entrenchment, American style. At that time there were some 60-odd bills of rights around the world. These men were good men. They were sincere men. But how do you define in any language the rights of the people? It is absolutely impossible. Rights keep changing. Sometimes they pull back and sometimes they move forward in freedom. No matter how honest or how sincere a person is, it is very difficult to describe rights. I doubt if there are any more than one or two people in this House who do not want rights.

In our day, the argument was that common law under the British system, gave you the rights with these other bills of rights, and the Magna Carta all added in. And that was the constitution. It worked through most of their history fairly well, improving and evolving all the time, but it was not working in our day 25 years ago. The Scots were very unhappy, the Irish have been unhappy for one hundred years and now even the Welsh are unhappy. I am simply saying that even in a small little country like Great Britain, using the evolutionary approach, which the United Kingdom has used, it is still difficult. It is equally obvious why the Americans and Canadians went the way we did instead of trying to go back to the unitary approach—I think we would be very unwise to try and do that in our country with the difficulties we have today, even through they are not as great as they were one hundred years ago.

Our difficulties are clearly economic. Who is going to break up a country for a few bucks? We get dragged into these discussions about language rights, desperately sincere men fight to the death on language rights. Three or four hundred years ago they used to fight desperately about religious rights. God, we do mature as time goes on. As long as boys are boys and girls are girls, there is going to be an end to that problem. Don't expect it to happen overnight. I am simply saying that the only issue that we are fighting over, if you look at it with honesty is not all these side issues. Whether the guys in Calgary wear high boots once a year is not the issue. But this scam, saying that we must have a devil so that people can be fearful. Poor Peter Lougheed. He is not the right type of person to make into a devil. Out in his province he catches "Hail Columbia", because he is too easy. He offered the people's oil at 85 per cent of the world price and then brought it down to 75 per cent. Some people say, "What for? You get no thanks. They are just making you a target." Propaganda is used to destroy people. That is not what we need in Canada at this moment. Our fight is over a silly thing called money. It is not worth while breaking up our country by trying to use the technique of destroying a person and trying to make people think that he is the leader of the opposition.

Before I leave this question of rights, whether you entrench it or leave it as a statute, it cannot be perfect. You try to level best to make it perfect, but it changes. Should you leave it so you can change it easily, or entrench it so it is hard to change? There are good arguments in both cases. All I am saying is I do not care which way it is done, it is not going to be perfect. The minute you get it done, someone will come along and say you have to change it because our ideas have changed.

Above all, I would hesitate to take away rights from a province in which there is a deep cultural feeling. It is very dangerous in the name of bilingualism to take away from Quebec, Manitoba, and I might even say British Columbia the right to control the language. The language is the key to their educational cultural function. In my view, we have no choice of saying that if you do not trust the provinces, you are not a country.

I would hesitate to divide the country on such an extraneous issue. It has been and is being resolved. A lot of credit goes to men like René Lévesque. He scared us into taking a hard look at it. There were others before, but René did it well. He really gives a shot. Sure, René is a socialist. He admits honestly he does not like English-speaking people, particularly from England and Montreal, but he likes the rest of us. I can understand that.

Let us get rid of these extraneous issues. Let us go forward together to see how we can get these rights put in there. Whether you take John Diefenbaker's bill of rights and entrench it it does not make any difference. This brings me to the point I started to talk about. I am glad the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is in the chamber. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that this is the only member of Parliament on either side of the House who agrees with me that for seven or eight years, through federal legislation and administration, in her department, under several ministers, we in Canada have deliberately discriminated against orphans? All the rest of the members seem to have had no great interest. There are not that many orphans. She has the courage to stand up and agree with me that there is discrimination, but we cannot get it changed. When you want to change the mandarins, there has to be awful pressure put on them. That pressure can only be put when the Prime Minister is behind the ministers. I am simply pointing out that not one of us is free from blame.

I could talk about air safety. We discriminate in our administration of government in Ottawa against all those who fly in commercial aircraft. I am talking about dying in a commercial aircraft.

Look at the attacks on the family which have occurred in this House over the past ten years. There have been insidious attacks on the family, the fundamental institution of any race, whether it be yellow, black, red or white. We, in the name of great objectives, have seen the family institution attacked. The family is in John Diefenbaker's bill of rights. It was the only bill of rights in the world to mention the family because all previous bills of rights had been brought in by Liberal governments all over the world. The Liberal doctrine is individualism above all. You naturally expect a Conservative government to mention the family because we add to individualism the right of groups, and the main group is the family.

The family has been attacked in this House and I have sat silent, wondering how I could sit there knowing that the bill of rights was being infringed before my very eyes. I do not excuse myself at all. It is so bad that the two Houses of Parliament, the Senate and the House of Commons, have set up a committee to look into this main technique of taking away our freedoms. It is the committee on instruments. They have a list a mile long where we have infringed the bill of rights. They will sit on that committee for God knows how many years. They will come back and we will put it into another committee to be examined.

Where are the voices of freedom when we lose these rights every day in the House? Now we all stand up on this resolution and sanctimoniously say we stand for freedom and want to entrench the rights, put them into a bill of rights. There is not one of us who would dare look in a mirror and say he is honest on that score.

I want to end my remarks with something positive. I stated earlier that if I had the time, I would mention co-operative federalism. These issues that we are fighting and trying to do something about today are not new. I belonged to a government which, rightly or wrongly, tried to establish a new technique of dealing with the provinces. I think I am the one who started the use of the phrase "co-operative federalism".

At one time I had 60 or 70 agreements with the provinces; roads to resources, forestry agreements, and transmission agreements. You name it, and I had an agreement and all the rest of it. We got along fine.

We set up the Canadian council of resource ministers. The first chairman was René Lévesque. When he found out that our interest was not politics but what was best for that resource, we decided on the jurisdiction, and asked those people to perform their function. We got along fine. We had co-operation on rivers. That is our record. We worked with municipalities. Even Duplessis worked with us. That co-operative federalism was based on sitting around with everybody as an equal, whether it was Prince Edward Island or Ontario, until we came to paying for it and then we had to share the costs.

We did a lot of work and spent a lot of time, but we had a considerable track record. Today we follow a different technique. It started in the Pearson days. He picked up the co-operative federalism concept. He thought it meant putting the ten premiers on one side of the table and him on the other. With that guy on one side and with murderer's row on the other, God help the poor federal government. He had to chase his ministers out of Quebec and make peace with Lesage. He chased them out to some other place. I was so embarrassed at that show, I never mentioned co-operative federalism for years after. Let us conclude with some positive things. Let us agree that we want to make these changes to the constitution to make it even better. Let us agree this is going to take time, not just three months. I would suggest it will take something like two or three years. I have a whole list of proposals I intend to offer on a later occasion. Let me start with little steps.

I heard the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) speak here the other night in this regard. Let us start with the eastern provinces, and let us determine in this debate that while we are debating the matter we are not going to stop action. Let us put the matter to a committee which will bring justice to P.E.I., Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Of all the provinces, those provinces have never received the same treatment as the six western provinces. This Parliament amended the British North America Act and made Quebec bigger, Ontario bigger, Manitoba bigger, B.C. bigger and set up the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan with good size. Why have we not done the same for those four eastern provinces? The resources underneath the sea are just as valuable as those above the sea. Let us make P.E.I. just as big as Manitoba and the others the same. In that way the first ministers will sit down at the table and we will not look at a premier and say he has only 2,000 square miles in his province while we have 350,000. He would then be equal when we are meeting to discuss ideas.

Second, let us start to look at our budgeting. Let us take these greedy hands of the finance people off our backs. When I talk about "our backs" I mean the people's backs. Instead of increasing taxes, with all the quantitative evidence we have that increasing taxes reduces the taxtake, stops growth and so on, let us decrease the taxes on those things people need and want and in that way get more money in to balance the budget. Some of you have heard me on this subject many times before. I have all the evidence in the world to show that it works.

Third, as a central demonstration of good faith to those Arabs out in western Canada let us repeal the Petroleum Administration Act as being unconstitutional and inequitable. I said it was unconstitutional when we had the debate. The provinces said this primarily. It was suggested there was an energy crisis when there was not. This scared the daylights out of the judges of the supreme courts and they ruled there was a "peace, order and good government" situation. We now have this legislation sitting there like a sword over every resource province, and that means everyone. Before I am finished I want to see P.E.I. just as strong as Ontario.

I will not go through all the things that were done. I am simply saying that in our budget and in our legislation we ought to treat all Canadians as equals.

I want to say a personal word about the tragedy I see unfolding in respect of a man by the name of Claude Ryan. I have known him for a number of years and have disagreed with him most of the time. He went to work and produced a plan designed to maintain a federal system and meet some of the aspirations of Quebec. I could not agree to all those things nor could anyone else, but he did work and try. He got us all in from all across the country supporting him on his views on the referendum. Then this strategy came out and bang, bang, bang, the whole constitution is to be completed in three months in the summer and two weeks in the fall. Why should a man like this be destroyed? What failure has he experienced that he should be subject to this type of unusual cruelty? I think we have done a great injustice to a great Canadian, Mr. Ryan. He has a right to his opinion and so has Lévesque. He is a Canadian and I am darn sure he will be until he dies. He is not going to move out.

We would serve our country well if we stopped banging each other around carrying out these scam operations, and instead did as many of the speakers of this House have suggested, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), for example. Hon. members have been telling us something about the making of a constitution with the inclusion of rights. Let us work at giving more freedoms to Canadian people. Let us not try to fool them that this will provide them with everything they want for forever and after. Let us do the best we can and above all make certain there is no evidence of a single government, either at the provincial or at the federal level, trying to ram something down our throats. You do not force Canadians, Mr. Speaker, you lead them. That is my conclusion.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, during the last fifty years many initiatives were meant to shape this country in the image of its inhabitants. As a nation we have experienced the industrial and technological developments of the post-war period. We have also lived through the social and cultural disruptions of the sixties and we have witnessed the rise of regional nationalisms which emerged at the political and economic levels. All that occurred mainly during the last decade.

Assuredly, it is one of the reasons that explains why it is urgent and necessary to revise the federative agreement. We find this task difficult—and the speeches I just heard confirm this—because of the need to reconcile the various interests of the provinces and those of a national government which represents each of us wherever we live in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, like the Fathers of Confederation, we must be visionaries and perhaps make our own the spirit which sustained them, a certain generosity and above all a sense of audacity before a task they certainly deemed difficult.

[English]

The resolution before the House comes at a time when it is incumbent upon the government to act in order to break the political paralysis created by the lack of agreement at federal-provincial conferences. Indeed, this resolution will give us our own Canadian constitution with a charter of rights and freedoms and the entrenchment of the equalization principle. In fact, a unanimous vote in this House last May expressed agreement to bring home the constitution.

Last Thursday the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke of the tyranny of unanimity when he declared:

> Unanimity gave each first minister a veto: and that veto was increasingly used to seek the particular good of a particular region or province. So we achieved the good of none; least of all did we achieve the good of all, the common good.
> We were led by the dictates of unanimity to bargain freedom against fish—

I happen to be a defender of both. The Prime Minister went on to state:

> —fundamental rights against oil, the independence of our country against long distance telephone rates. But we were led further still, towards a radically new concept of Canada, one in which the national good was merely the sum total of provincial demands—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is precisely the deadlock which must be broken. But while taking this first step, and it is only the beginning, we should serve first not the governments, whether federal or provincial, but the citizens in this country by giving them inalienable fundamental rights. Indeed if we draw up the list of those rights, we see that it is impressive: freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression including freedom of press and other media of information, freedom of association, democratic rights, mobility rights anywhere in the country, minority language educational rights, legal rights, non-discrimination rights, language rights in Parliament and too many others to be mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not reflect on one of the rights that the new charter would guarantee, namely, the right to education in the minority language where the number warrants.

You will understand that my view reflects the history of my ancestors, the Acadians, and my experience as a teacher in the schools of New Brunswick around the fifties. One only has to read the history of Francophone or Anglophone minorities in Canada to understand that the history of survival or assimilation is directly linked to the access to schools in one's mother tongue. It is the access to education in one's language and the humble school teachers, who were often nuns, that are responsible for the fire of developing minorities or the embers that still hold hope in spite of everything. Even before the belated expansion of Radio-Canada, even before the grants from the Secretary of State, the French-speaking people of Acadia, Ontario and western Canada showed through their collections and their cents that they wanted to remain themselves. Can you measure the hope this constitutional amendment brings them?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with the constitutional proposal, which is very important to those who have shown over the last century not only their loyalty to Canada but also their continuing will to live as full citizens—the French-speaking Canadians outside the province of Quebec. The proposed language of education right would enable citizens of Canada whose first language is either French or English, but who are a minority in a given province, to have their children educated in that minority official language, when numbers warrant.

At this point I would like to address this issue not from a legal point of view, for I am not a lawyer, but, rather, perhaps from the standpoint of a bit of common sense and some practical experience. It is possible to give justice and fairness in the area of education without creating division nor causing financial ruin, and here I call to witness my own province of New Brunswick, a region not rich in money and goods but a region whose history should justify suspicion, mistrust and perhaps hostility. Yet New Brunswick is often given as a model to the rest of the country. This was not always the case.

I would like to share with you what I experienced as a New Brunswick teacher during the early fifties in the rural parish of Drummond, which, incidentally, was totally French speaking. I had to prepare totally French-speaking high school students for the provincial matriculation examination in history from an English textbook. The lecture was in French, and then we rehearsed the answers that they would give when they wrote the matriculation tests in English, the same test, by the way, which was passed by the students of the cities of Fredericton and Saint John. As hon. members can well imagine, this created some slight handicap, since matriculation for all New Brunswickers was required for entrance to university, to nursing schools, to normal school and to trade schools. I feel no rancour, and I do not assess blame when I say this. I give this example because I believe that from a difficult past New Brunswick has emerged in the last 20 or 30 years as a leader in the accommodation of different language groups.

After the war, men of vision opened rural high schools to all New Brunswick children, and men of vision with names like Chapman, Blakeney, Taylor, Hugh John Flemming, Louis Robichaud and, yes, Richard Hatfield came to the conclusion that access to education had to be access to one's own culture and, in fact, probably to one's own soul.

How did these changes come about? I believe they came about because there was a coalition of human forces anxious to alleviate human conditions which spoke no language. The first steps were taken by a Liberal government under John McNair, then under a government by Hugh John Flemming, as I said, who was a member of this House, and then through successive governments including the one of Louis Robichaud, an Acadian who was three times elected by a province which has a good majority of English-speaking people. The changes have continued under the leadership of a Conservative premier, Richard Hatfield, and I believe we understood why he spoke so eloquently about rights and about access to rights in the conference which took place last September. Today in matters of education New Brunswick has almost achieved a parallel system for French and English-speaking students.

My province is not divided. My province has, of course, a few marginal extremists on both sides, but its citizens are working and living together with a large measure of respect and co-operation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, another significant aspect which is guaranteed in the proposed constitution is the concept of sharing the great wealth of this country. Indeed, section 31(1)(a) reads, and I quote:

(a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;

This principle of equal opportunities in sharing among the regions of the same country has also dominated political life in my province since 1960. Indeed, we owe the expression "equal opportunities" to the man who was the premier of that province at the time, Louis Robichaud, as he is the one who put in place a program which said—

[English]

Louis Robichaud's equal opportunity program said that whether you are English in Queens or Charlotte counties or French in Restigouche or Gloucester, you had equal access to the meagre wealth of the province. In fact, New Brunswick from that moment on has not ceased progressing, and we need only look at the results of its school system, which finally was opened to all the citizens, not just to those who lived in the privileged cities, to see the progress that co-operation achieved. The fact is that the progessive people in New Brunswick were ready to unite and to reform, and that program has not been destroyed by successive governments. There was hope for everyone. There was hope because it did not matter what language you spoke, what religion you practised or where you lived; the citizens would share in the opportunities of that province. This reform was possible in good part because of federal government programs of unconditional transfers to the poorer provinces which provided citizens with a reasonable level of essential public services and which in fact reduced regional disparities.

The very principle of sharing has become part of our way of life and now, after more than 20 years of practice, the principle of equalization is to be entrenched in the constitution.

The proposal to entrench the equalization principle is not foreign to our history as a nation. Does anyone think that the maritimes joined confederation to get help from other partners? The fact is that then New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were "have" provinces, and not only do the old sketches of Cunard lines leaving the Miramichi and Pointe du Chêne for the high seas reveal the intense commercial activities of mid-nineteenth century on the New Brunswick coast, but they also sometimes rekindle the idea of an economically viable province.

Basic to the Canadian experience is that when one province has flourished with the development of a resource, the other partners benefit, and not to have another's resource does not make one less Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, since last Monday, we have heard several members of the opposition say they endorse such and such a part of the resolution. It seems in fact—and I am thinking of the speech the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Moutain (Mr. Hamilton) just made—that sometimes our divisions are less in the substance than in the method. I have in mind the words of the poet de Saint-Exupéry who once said about a controversy, and I am paraphrasing: We are divided over the means which are the result of our reasoning, but not over the goals which are always the same. I have a feeling that thoses words apply to our debates.

• (2120)

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is an important week in our Parliament. History is being made by all of us, ordinary human beings, yet history is supposed to be made only by giants. When the flag debate took place, ordinary men struggled with an extraordinary problem. There was division and possibly there was rancour.

I remember that as a journalist based in London, my colleagues and I followed the acrimonious debate in the Parliament of Canada with some pretty heavy discussions of our own. Yet, on February 15, 1965, when the new Canadian flag was raised at Canada House on Trafalgar Square, our discussions were forgotten and we were all proud to be Canadians and to be present.

It is my hope that when this resolution is adopted and when our constitution comes home, we will be no less proud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by asking a question which I know many Canadians are asking, and that is: what are we doing here and why are we spending what some people out there think is an inordinate amount of time discussing what some people think is far removed from their daily lives, that is the constitution? I know that this is what a number of people are saying, and it is evident in the mail we all get and in the phone calls we all receive.

Last week I had the opportunity to spend two full days in Vancouver at a meeting of regional council No. 1 of the IWA which was and remains my union. Many of the people at that conference from all over western Canada were asking that question. That is not to say they did not recognize we have to deal with the constitution, but they are impatient because they want Parliament and their elected representatives to get on with the job and deal with it thoroughly but with some dispatch. They want Parliament to bring the constitution home and to begin the job of laying the groundwork for a new structure within which we can live and work in the years to come. They want this Parliament, while the matter of the constitution is before the committee and, we hope, in a quieter way, back before the federal government and the provincial governments, to get down to dealing with many of the other day to day issues, such as the economy, the budget and, I hesitate to say, the Bank Act, as well as other issues with which this Parliament is vitally concerned.

Having said that, I wish to begin by reading a poem written by Earle Birney some years ago entitled "Canada, a Case History". It reads:

> This is the case of a high-school land,
> deadset in adolescence,
> loud treble laughs and sudden fists, > bright cheeks, the gangling presence.
> This boy is wonderful at sports > and physically quite healthy;
> he's taken to church on Sunday still > and keeps his prurience stealthy;
> He doesn't like books except about bears, > collects new coins and model planes > and never refuses a dare.
> His Uncle spoils him with candy, of course, > yet shouts him down when he talks at table.
> You will note he's got some of his French mother's looks > though he's not so witty and no more stable.
> He's really much more like his father and yet
> if you say so he'll pull a great face.
> He wants to be different from everyone else > and daydreams of winning the global race.
> Parents unmarried and living abroad, > relatives keen to bag the estate, > schizophrenia not excluded, > will he learn to grow up before it's too late?

The question we must ask ourselves is whether he will grow up before it is too late. We hope, Mr. Speaker, that Canada will grow up before it is too late and we believe that now is time for this country to grow up. Quite frankly, we do not need any Canada goose ads or goose Canada ads to tell us so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: We were able to figure that out all on our own. I only wish some other members, particularly in the party sitting to my right, would recognize that there is a certain degree of urgency in this matter because, quite frankly, I have had enough of the "nattering nabobs of negativism" who refuse to recognize the limitations of the roles within the political process or the limitations of the bargaining process. This party is not the government—I wish it were—and if we were the government, I am sure we would be introducing a package which is substantially different from that which the government of the day has introduced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: We are not the government and therefore our approach to the issue is different and the proposals which we put forward are not what we would consider to be ideal. But we will play our role and, if the government demonstrates good faith over the next few weeks and months, we intend to play our role in a constructive way to ensure that we grow up as a nation and begin the job of settling down to the kind of work that has to be done if Canada is to grow and thrive.

Perhaps my view is somewhat jaundiced but I have my own definition of the democratic process. It is that democratic political action is the process by which you stop worse things from happening. It is also hoped that somewhere along the way something of positive value can be accomplished. Perhaps that is too limited a view, but in the current context of our present role as a third party it is perhaps the most we can achieve in the life of any Parliament, and that is the role we intend to pursue now.

What is in the resolution which we are considering and what are the motives for its presentation? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), speaking to the Canadian Club in Toronto yesterday, said that the government was acting for three reasons. He stated that the second reason for acting now was to provide a momentum for some change. I have been around a sufficient number of bargaining tables, I think, to know that when matters of vital interest are at stake, people and major forces seldom move unless a gun is put to their head. I do not find that insulting. Other people seem to be threatened by it, but this is part of the daily process in the business world and certainly in the world of industrial relations. I do not feel the least intimidated by it. Rightly or wrongly, the government finds it necessary, or says it finds it necessary, to do a little sabre rattling and to say to some of the provincial jurisdictions that if some accommodation is not reached soon—and I hope the federal government is willing to make some as well—the matter will be decided unilaterally. It is in our interests as a people and as a party, and in the interests of the gentlemen and lady to my right as a party, to realize that the invitation is there to take part in a realistic way. We should do so. To sit there in petulance, as the people to my right have done on other issues, sucking their thumbs and feeling sorry for themselves is not being realistic. They sit there and say, "Why did you not give us a chance to go ahead and do all these wonderful things?" For a government, the first cabinet in history to swear in using the kamikaze oath, to take that kind of position is absolutely incredible. They say we did not give them a chance. They did not give themselves a chance. The first time they had a prime minister during the course of my lifetime, in effect they murdered him. This time they did not have to; he committed suicide. We have had enough of that.

I should like to comment on one major change we feel the government must make if we are to give serious consideration to the many other important proposals before us. My leader said that we support in principle most of the items, if not all, in the current resolution. We agree that patriation is necessary. We agree, historically and now, that a charter of rights is a good thing, though we may have differences as to some of the wording and the possible implications of the government's current wording. We agree in principle to the incorporation of language rights into the constitution. We have some concern over the manner in which that will be interpreted. We hope that is an issue which, along with other items, the government will sit down in good faith and discuss in the weeks to come.

I think all of us in the House agree with the principle of equalization. Certainly we understand that an amending formula of some type is necessary. While we are concerned with certain of the implications of the specifics in the resolution, we hope the government will prove to be open and receptive to suggestions during the course of the negotiations which lie ahead and that the committee will keep an open mind.

My leader has stated one matter about which we are adamant. In order for there to be be some balance in the government's proposal, a recognition of the right of the provinces to own, control and indirectly tax their resources must be included. To do anything else would be a major disturbance of the status quo. We are talking about bringing the constitution home in a relatively short period of time. It would be a little much to expect that any substantial part of this country would accept a package which does not at least retain the basic rights they have always enjoyed. That demand on the part of my party is absolute. It is non-negotiable, it is a "must-have" demand. Also it is a pre-condition for any further consideration of other items the government wants to see included in this resolution.

I should like to put the resource issue in a somewhat different context by referring to the matter of collective and individual rights. There are those of us in this country who feel that individual rights cannot be enforced and sustained except by real and recognized collective rights and that those rights are a myth. We need the power to deny access to resources, whether that power rests with our communities, with our unions, our band or tribal councils or within our provinces. We need the power and muscle to be able to enforce the individual rights listed in any charter. It is as important a principle applied to resources as it is when applied to individual human rights. Legislation and laws can change, but once people recognize they have certain powers and rights they will not give them up. We do not suggest the government can grant those rights, but it is proper that those basic rights, especially in so far as our provinces are concerned, be recognized. It is one further bulwark against the strength of central government action which we in my part of the country feel we must have if we are to ensure the long-term survival of democratic and open government.

In addition to resources we have many other serious concerns, but I stress again that acceptance of the package rests and is dependent upon the government's acceptance of our prime resource demand. In this regard I would also urge the government to bear in mind the importance to Atlantic Canada and other maritime provinces of offshore resources and some tangible recognition of expanded rights thereto by the provinces concerned. After years of dependency those provinces now see a chance to become masters in their own houses or at least to get a piece of the rock.

We should hope to see very soon some tangible proof that the government recognizes the provincial ownership and right to indirect taxation of resources. The government and government members on the joint committee must show some concrete evidence of bargaining in good faith on other key concerns in the weeks and months to come. We are not stipulating anything, but we insist that there must be some evidence that the committee is not a rubber-stamp for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or any cabinet minister. They should listen not only to us but to the official opposition and to the representatives of the provinces. That good faith must be demonstrated in the time that lies immediately ahead.

We are not in a position to judge the receptiveness of the government, but if the package is balanced we intend to support the resolution. Our final decision can only be made on judgment day when the report of the committee is in and the final-final offer of the government is clear. At that time the final answer can be given.

For all provinces, provincial ability to manage and tax resources is a key part of the confederation bargain. For many provinces, particularly those in the west, resources compensate for the lack of a significant manufacturing industry. Resource proceeds allow provinces the financial ability to help stabilize and diversify their provincial economies and provide the services their people need. With wise management, resources are the key enabling most provinces to obtain a reasonable level of economic stability. But the provincial governments' ability to manage their resources so as to create a more stable economy has, in recent years, been seriously impaired. The rights of the provinces to regulate and tax their natural resources have been reinterpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada. Those judgments have called into serious question the ability of provinces to raise revenues from resources and to regulate the rate of production, especially if those resources are sold outside the provinces concerned. Thus it is necessary to reconfirm jurisdiction to the provinces to manage and develop resources, to allow provinces to levy both direct and indirect taxes, as long as they do not discriminate between provincial residents and other Canadians and to permit provinces to legislate with respect to the export of resources from the provinces. Of course, federal paramountcy in trade and commerce would still be maintained.

In summary, the amendment my party would propose would confirm provincial ownership of resources, would incorporate a clause with respect to indirect taxation and, finally, would incorporate a concurrent power with federal paramountcy with respect to trade and commerce as it affects the export of non-renewable natural resources, forestry products and electricity both in interprovincial and international trade.

But resources are more than this to us, especially those of us from British Columbia and western Canada. Control over our resources is more than a matter of cash and carry or "what we have we hold." The British Columbia energy minister perhaps overstated it the other day. I saw in a column by Marjorie Nichols in the Vancouver Sun that:

> Mr. McClelland, without blushing, said that resources represent the culture of British Columbia.

That may be a little much—she thought so—and I think it is going a little too far as well. But, if members opposite wish to understand the attachment by the people of the west to their land and resources they should take the opportunity to enjoy some theatre, a play originating in Saskatchewan which toured across the west and which has twice been covered on CBC television. It is a great play entitled "Paper Wheat". That play, people's theatre as it is, outlines not only the growth, complexion and nature of the developing west and the west today, it clearly and dramatically outlines the long and popular struggle of westerners to gain control of their own resources from Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal Exchanges, the growth of the Wheat Pool in particular and their struggle to gain popular control of the marketing of their products. That process, that struggle—and it is a very recent struggle in western Canada—to gain control of our means of livelihood, our resources, is very much a central part of our culture. I hope you will forgive me for being skeptical but we do not feel that this government appreciates this attitude, this gut feeling in Western Canada. Unless we have concrete evidence very soon from the government that jurisdiction over ownership and resource taxation rights, which until recent years and judgments we always believed was ours, is to be recognized by the government by the acceptance of a clear amendment to their patriation resolution, then we simply cannot agree to support the motion or consider the resolution.

I want to also reject the notion—widespread, apparently, on the other side—that we in the west are greedy and want, either as members or as provincial governments, to keep all our riches, old or new, to ourselves. That has been and remains untrue. A former British Columbia premier made an offer some years ago in relation to natural gas and petroleum resources that if the federal government would guarantee the public development of those resources for the benefit of all the people of Canada then British Columbia would be prepared to share those resources with all Canadians. I understand similar offers were also made by the government of Saskatchewan. There were no takers, but the offers were made. The west, or at least a portion of it has been willing, and is willing, to put Canada first in the interests of all Canadians. And that, Mr. Speaker, is not greed.

What is the federal interest and what is the federal government's record in resources? In the absence of a clear and open commitment by the federal government as to its intent on this matter, within the context of their resolution, one is left to assume they intend to intrude even further in the traditional provincial domain. In view of the past Liberal record we must seriously question the motives behind any such move.

Until the early 1970s there was little expressed interest, not to mention interference, with western resources on the part of the federal government. It was not until the western provincial governments took decisive action to maximize the return on those resources to their people through royalties, direct ownership, marketing agencies and other means that the federal government and the federal courts moved to intervene levying, in effect, double taxation or other penalties which caused great anxiety and difficulty for both the governments and industries involved. It seemed that as long as the private sector was the major winner the feds never acted. But as soon as the people and their provincial governments moved to secure their fair share, the federal government intervened. Maybe it was accidental—we are generous—but it was enough to make us very wary as to some of the motivations which lay behind those central government actions. If the federal government ever wants support for a greater role in economic development they had better start to improve their track record and credibility in that regard.

There are more than a few, especially in western Canada, who hold the view that Canada was created because the CPR needed a country to pay for their railway to resources and the Hudson's Bay Company needed a country and taxpayers to pay the cost of policing their territory. Whether that is an accurate reflection of our origins or not, successive Canadian governments have certainly continued to act as if it were in fact very close to the truth. That is the picture many of us have and federal government actions in recent years have tended to add credibility to what was originally a rather humorous version of the origins of Canada.

Something else has taken place over the years which make us wonder what the constitutional fuss is all about. I think the hon. member for Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) referred to it in a slightly different way a few moments ago. It has to do with why the federal government has again deemed it necessary to move in on the resource field over the last few years.

I want to talk about taxation for a minute. Since the Second World War the direct taxation field has been less and less of a burden on the corporate sector. Federal governments—mostly Liberal—have retreated through political pressure, it would appear, from the field of direct taxation, particularly of the corporate sector.

The level of resource taxation by the provinces, in their field, has not retreated at the same time. Consequently, we see the federal government denying itself, through its own timidity perhaps, access to revenues in its traditional sector while the provinces have not been so encumbered. It has thus found itself in this financial squeeze and obviously it has to find a way out. It would appear that it is not prepared to turn on the corporate sector and return it to its appropriate and historical level of taxation in Canada, so it must find another way.

My friends to my right, during their brief tenure in office, attempted to find yet another way out. They did not go after the provinces but decided, instead of raising taxes, to raise prices as a means of hiding the situation. In the meantime they would look for another way without causing a major tax revolt by searching different routes to see if moneys were available to allow our governments to carry on.

It appears, for whatever the political reasons, that the federal government does not dare to restore corporation taxes. Therefore, it has chosen to move in the field of resources. How it intends to work things out, I do not know, but I do understand that ministers over there are in a bind. We think it is extremely unfair to attack provincial administration and sources of funding in order to escape the rather obvious answers to their own timidity over the years.

I referred some time ago to the play "Paper Wheat". There is a section of that play which refers to the expansion of the Canadian west. It says that it goes on, and on and on and on and on.

Mr. Nielsen: And on.

Mr. Kristiansen: That is a fairly accurate description of the Canadian prairies or it certainly seemed that way to our people when they first arrived in that part of the country. I am also afraid that if these last three days are any example it will begin to characterize the description of the debate we will have on the constitution, as might be gathered even at this early stage.

Mr. Knowles: Don't put the idea in anybody's head.

Mr. Kristiansen: It reminds me of a saying which is often used with regard to strikes, that it does not take much talent to get one started, but it sometimes takes a great deal of wisdom to put an end to one with honour and justice. It is not enough that we write something in stone. For all the importance that a constitution, or in another sphere a contract, may have in its wording and its distribution of benefits and powers, the key thing must be leadership and the willingness of all the parties to live together.

The important thing when we put together the constitution is that it be done in such a way that we can live together in balance. There must be something in it for everybody or everybody loses. It is the same in a marriage; people are entitled to their own space, and that space must be recognized. There must be something of value in the constitution for all the major parties.

In conclusion, I would simply say that while there may be many important concerns and differences in addition to the obvious difference we have over the matter of resources and provincial rights, this is not the time to let those other differences stop us from doing what we must. We must rise above those differences and demonstrate a faith in ourselves as a maturing nation to deal with all these remaining issues in our own time, in our own way in Canada and as Canadians. That is what the process in which we are engaged should be all about, and we in this party believe this is what it is all about. We are willing to play our part and recognize the limitations of our role.

We should have a constitution that is made in Canada. We should have a constitution and a structure in which all Canadians from all areas and all regions can work together and live together to produce what should be in this world of ours the greatest and most wonderful quality of life imaginable anywhere on this planet. Again, that is how we see it and we are prepared to move. We hope that others are as well.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, 113 years ago, with the British North America Act, the people of Canada engaged in an act both of rejection and of affirmation. It was an act of rejection in the sense that we rejected the "Manifest Destiny" which some saw as our future, to be annexed to the United States. But much more important, as an affirmation of our commitment to an equal partnership between our two founding races, Canadians acted at that time to create a political structure that would accommodate the interests of the two founding peoples. Today we are engaged in another stage of that evolution, that of providing political unity without racial, cultural or linguistic conformity.

We are no melting pot. We are committed to a nation in which two founding races can live in equal partnership. However, that equal partnership has been variously interpreted at different times and places in our country's history, creating confusion and frustration. The most recent manifestations of course are the Quebec referendum and the regional preoccupations which mark much of our country today.

Those various interpretations of how we must achieve our political unity have brought practical problems impairing our collective ability to deal with our difficulties. But that commitment to equal partnership has never wavered in all who believe that confederation will be judged a failure if we cannot assure all our citizens full opportunity in either the French or English language and in their own culture. The time has come to place that commitment in a Canadian constitution. In the past, as our country expanded west and east, as industrialization advanced and brought a changing role for governments, as social programs were advanced, amendments to the British North America Act were successfully made.

However, in the absence of an amending formula, that process of evolution, that process of constitutional change, of relying upon amendments to the act of another parliament, has become increasingly cumbersome, increasingly laborious and increasingly anachronistic.

As Senator Forsey said recently, this idea of unanimous consent of the provinces was voted down twice by the House of Commons, in 1869 and in 1871, and that was by a House of Commons which contained a number of fathers of confederation, all of whom voted against the idea of unanimous consent of the provinces.

Against that background, the time has clearly come to patriate our constitution.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—GRAIN—INVESTIGATION INTO UPGRADING—VALUE RECEIVED BY WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, in the last session on May 29, I asked the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board if he could inform the House and the farmers of western Canada whether he had investigated the question of grade promotion, "uppages" or upgrading and, if he had done so, whether he had assured himself that the farmers of western Canada and the producers of grain in that area are receiving full value for their grain.

The question was asked not only on behalf of the grain producers and farmers of western Canada, but on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board, which represents the farmers of Canada. They also lose money as a result of this practice.

The minister replied in the House that he would report back. He did report to me by mail rather than doing so publicly in the House so that it could be on record.

In his written reply, the minister stated that the practice of grade promotion was performed under the auspices of the Canadian Grain Commission which reports to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) then said that if there is any specific evidence of difficulties in relation to grade promotion, he would be pleased to discuss them with the Minister of Agriculture.

I should like to quote his answer. He said:

Grade promotion at terminal elevators is closely supervised and controlled by the Canadian Grain Commission which reports to the Minister of Agriculture. I am assured that the commission is carrying out its responsibilities to ensure that farmers are receiving full value for their grain. If there is specific evidence of difficulties in relation to grade promotion, I would be pleased to discuss this with the Minister of Agriculture—

I should like to say that the terminal elevators are entirely different from the country elevators system where grade promotion is carried out. At the terminal elevator system it is perfectly legal to blend grades other than one and two CWRS but by law the blending of other grades at terminal ports, in the terminal elevator system, is specifically excluded. There is nothing to prevent this practice at the country elevator system—that is, the initial system, the first bout, when the farmer delivers the crop he has worked to grow and for which he hopes to receive a good price.

He may be given a lower grade for his grain which the country elevator will then blend with a higher grade of grain, increasing that grade by one point. The farmer therefore loses the difference in price between the lower grade he was given and the higher grade the elevator system receives.

I have heard of institutionalized theft and that is what this works out to. This is the product the farmer has worked all year to grow and he should be given a fair grade and a fair return. The benefit is going somewhere else—it is going to the country elevator system.

I am well aware of the old argument that the majority of grain in western Canada is sold through co-operative elevators and, in turn, they supposedly will give the shares back so that all members receive equally. This benefit is going somewhere else, that is, to the country elevator system.

I am well aware of the old argument that the majority of the grain in western Canada is sold through co-operative elevators. In turn, supposedly the shares are given back and spread over so all the members share equally. But that is not what it is about. When a person has his own grain which is worth a dollar, why should he not receive the benefit? Why should he not keep it? Why should it be spread out among other members?

There are examples ranging as high as over a dollar a bushel difference in Durum grades; a dollar a bushel between grade No. 4 and grade No. 5 in amber Durum. We have seen this in the past. That is a tremendous difference to a farmer who may deliver 15,000, 25,000, or 30,000 bushels of grain. That could be almost as much as some members of Parliament would lose if they had to take lower pay for their jobs and have their pay blended in with someone else's who performs a little better. In that case, they would not receive full pay.

With respect to the minister's report, I would like to refer to the Booze-Allan report commissioned by his Liberal predecessor, Otto Lang. The report dealt with misshipments and misgradings of grain, and I quote from the report as follows:

The implications of these misshipments and misgradings of grain should prompt the establishment of management incentives and controls which could improve performance—

I know that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy), who I see here tonight, will be reading from a prepared text, but I hope he will take these thoughts into consideration and take them back to his minister so that the farmers of western Canada can receive a fair dollar for a fair product.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would very briefly like to reply to my colleague on the other side following a question he asked last May 29. I think that his speech almost contained the answers I am about to give him and which complement the letter he received from the minister responsible.

First of all, we all know that the main object of grain grading is to guarantee to each producer that the product he delivers at a regional elevator is given the proper grade according to the applicable standards as defined by the Canadian Wheat Board.

In cases of dispute over a shipment, a sample chosen by the producer and the elevator representative is sent to the chief inspector appointed by the board. His decision on the grade given is binding on all parties.

Once the product is in the elevator and has changed owners the agent representing the silo can, if he so wishes, mix the grain if he has to upgrade it. I think that the hon. member even mentioned this a moment ago.

For example, he could buy from five different producers 5,000 bushels of wheat of top quality grade No. 1 and 5,000 bushels of grade No. 2 wheat—higher than average for this grade—and mix both and ship 10,000 bushels of grade No. 1 wheat. Of course this extreme case is strictly for illustrative purposes. In practice, Mr. Speaker, grain improvement through mixing at the regional elevator allows an over-all quality increase in the order of less than 10 per cent. And I know what I am talking about, because as my colleague from Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) suggested in Sainte-Rosalie, there are many in the Saint-Hyacinthe area, and we know that the Coopérative fédérée has enormous silos.

Anyway, that improvement brings indirect benefits to producers. Elevator operators derive financial advantages that lower their handling costs. Once in the elevators, we know that grain can be conditioned, and it can be mixed, with the exception of the two higher classes of red spring wheat. For example, let us take the case of a wagon of No. 3 "out of grade" wheat from western Canada. It is classified grade 3 because of some pebbles, and was brought from a farmer by the representative of a regional elevator. Once cleaned, that wheat is mixed with ordinary grade 3 wheat from western Canada, which improves the quality of the original grain. Here is another example: a farmer ships a load of No. 1 wheat—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED DECISION OF PROVINCE TO RESERVE OIL RIG JOBS FOR NEWFOUNDLANDERS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, it is most propitious that this adjournment debate should occur in the midst of the constitutional debate with which the House is presently confronted. I am particularly delighted that it has, having regard to the fact I have not yet had an opportunity to speak on the current resolution. On May 26 in the question period, I had occasion to refer to a statement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) at a Winnipeg conference at which he was quoted as having said:

> —provincial moves such as Newfoundland's decision to reserve jobs on oil rigs for Newfoundlanders do more to damage Canada in the long run than any nationalism that has surfaced inside Quebec.

I would ask the minister whether he would acknowledge that in following the procedures it has, the government of Newfoundland has simply followed the practice in the province of Quebec under legislation which precluded Ontario construction workers from gaining employment in that province. The minister in part responded by saying:

> —I happen to believe that the essence of this country is having a common market in which Canadians can move to another part of the country and be employed without restrictions on the basis of what province they come from.

Typically, of course, the minister did not respond to the question. There has been a silence of a profound nature with respect to the conduct of the government of the province of Quebec in connection with breaches of our present constitution and inroads made into what would have been expected to be the goodwill that would exist between the provinces of this country. It is easy to enumerate them.

They have as a result of the imposition of a special retail tax on Ontario construction equipment which enters the province of Quebec for construction in that province specifically breached the provisions of section 121 of the British North America Act as part of our constitution. That province has, as I indicated in asking that question of the minister, in addition specifically prevented construction workers from any province, and in particular the province of Ontario, entering the province of Quebec for the purpose of carrying on the legitimate activities of their employers with construction contracts in that province.

The province of Quebec has, contrary to the specific provisions of section 133 of the British North America Act as part of our constitution, imposed restriction on the use of language in the courts and in the legislature of the province of Quebec. In addition, they have been the beneficiary of inaction by the present federal government against the desires and expressed wishes of the province of Newfoundland, under the authority of the federal government, to impose on a public federal works project across Canada or any part of it for the purpose of transmitting hydroelectric power from the lower Churchill to some part of the United States. Yet the federal government has with ease taken those necessary steps under a national works project to allow a pipeline both for natural gas and petroleum products from western Canada into the province of Quebec. That created no problem.

It is a legitimate concern of all Canadians that equity, fair play and justice be enforced by the Government of Canada against all those which breach not only the letter of the law, but the spirit of the law in Canada. No province should be singled out for special preferential treatment, yet this has been the case.

• (2215)

Where has the Minister of Labour specifically laid out condemnation against the action which directly resulted in the action taken by the province of Newfoundland? That province has had a good teacher. The province of Quebec did what it did with impunity. Other provinces in this country can expect to do the same with the same results, unless equity, fair play and justice are put in place and implemented by the Government of Canada. I know we will hear that the current legislation before this House answers all the difficulties and problems. If I may refer to proposed section 6(2), you will find there that it states:

> Every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident of Canada has the right
> (a) to move to and take up residence in any province; and
> (b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.

That is not what the minister said. The minister said "to move to any part of the country and be employed". In order to be employed you not only have to move to but take up residence in, and the term residence has a specific legal meaning defined by the Supreme Court of Canada on a number of occasions. It would not apply in my submission to construction workers from the province of Ontario who move to the province of Quebec.

In any event, we find in section 6(2) as proposed in this measure that those rights are restricted in the event that a provincial government imposes laws primarily on the basis of some internal requirement the province may have. That is a sham. It does not answer the question in respect of real rights of mobility in the country, and this government in introducing that as a panacea for the problem is defrauding the public. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that, in spite of his reservations concerning the resolution presented to this House, I believe that the progress accomplished through this resolution compared with the situation he deplores concerning the resistance of Newfoundland in relation with the hiring of workers from outside the province and concerning the problem of Quebec, which set restrictions to job mobility in the employment sector—I believe that even though no resolution can be perfect, as we are all aware, instead of speaking this evening, he should rise tomorrow in the House and say that he supports entrenchment in the constitution of the right to job mobility, the right for people to move from one province to the other and the right to education in the language of their choice. This is more or less what he objects to in the case of Quebec. I believe that he should start by criticizing the province of Ontario, and refer especially to the right to development in the maritimes and the western provinces. But in any case—

[English]

This position notwithstanding, we favour the concept of a national labour market to respond to worker and employer needs across the country so that all Canadians may enjoy the benefits of economic expansion. It should be noted that the employment referral activities of the CEIC are governed by the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 and the national employment service regulations pertaining to the act. Nothing in the act or regulations gives a preference based on the residence of the worker seeking employment.

In practice, however, it is normally in the best interests of an employer to hire from the local labour force to the maximum extent possible. This is less costly and makes for a more stable and contented work force. In this regard it is the practice of the Canadian employment centres to exhaust the potential of the local labour force on behalf of an employer before extending the search to other regional and/or the national labour markets.

Reference to the federal powers to disallow certain kinds of provincial legislation is a matter with which the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is not prepared to deal here. Such matters more properly fall within the purview of others.

I wish to reiterate, however, that except in those cases where affirmative action is judged to be in the best interest of certain disadvantaged groups our preference is for an open labour market which allows freedom of movement in pursuit of employment to all Canadians. That is why this government is moving toward the entrenchment of the liberty of movement in this country. It is on this concept that many of the commission's programs are developed. The Canada Manpower Mobility Program, which encourages the movement of Canadian workers from regions of high unemployment to low unemployment, either to seek jobs or to relocate once jobs have been found, is but one example.

This government has followed such a practice in the past, and if we compare its actions with those of the previous government during the period it was in office I am sure we would see that we are encouraging the mobility of employment and encouraging opportunity so that people will not be part of ten little provinces but part of one big country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.20 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX

TEXT OF McDONALD COMMISSION LETTER TABLED BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

14 May, 1980

Mr. Russell MacLellan, M.P.
Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)
House of Commons
Ottawa, Ontario

Dear Mr. MacLellan:

My attention, and that of my fellow Commissioners, has been drawn to the following statement made by you on May 8, 1980, in the House of Commons, as reported in Hansard at p. 879:

"The laying of charges is not the responsibility of the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General, but a unique prerogative of the Attorneys General, federal and provincial, depending on the nature of the case. However, Mr. Justice McDonald has clearly indicated that he would prefer any such action to await his report . . . "

I am not aware that I have ever indicated that I would prefer the laying of charges to await the report of the Commission of Inquiry of which I am Chairman. My fellow Commissioners are also unaware of any of the Commissioners having said that.

We understand that the statement you read was based in part on the following passage in the transcript of public proceedings during the presentation by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association on April 17, 1980, at pages 25687-8:

"MR. ALAN BOROVOY: Mr. Chairman, the proposal we had made a couple of years ago did not contemplate such findings in specific cases.

I quite appreciate that problem.

Our proposal was that the Commission should have recommended that the normal law enforcement processes go forward.

That was the recommendation we had sought.

Had they not gone forward, naturally, we could not have said anything to you about that.

But our hope is that, and the point of the submission then was that you would have used your best offices to encourage the normal law enforcement processes to go forward, and that would not have required specific findings in specific cases.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would have required a report by us and it would, therefore, require representations by counsel as to whether there was conduct not authorized or provided for by law."

In order to understand this passage, it is necessary to reproduce pages 25685 to 25688, a copy of which is attached. A reading of those pages will show that there I was attempting to explain why, as the Civil Liberties Association had said, "the Commission has neither recommended a different course of action nor explained its omission to do so." The explanation boils down to this: Our terms of reference and the Inquiries Act require us to follow a certain procedure before we make a report. Only in a report can we make recommendations, including any recommendation in rspect of prosecution. We should not be expected to follow a procedure which does not comply with the law.

I also pointed out that

"As far as systematic techniques are concerned, they are in the public domain and the appropriate authorities have been at liberty to investigate them in detail and reach their decisions as to whether or not to prosecute."

Beyond that it would be improper for myself and my fellow Commissioners to comment publicly or privately as to whether there should be any prosecutions, except in a duly presented Report.

I trust that you will bring this correction to the attention of those who may have understood that the position of my fellow Commissioners and myself was as indicated—i.e. that we "would prefer any such action to await his report". In fact, we express no preference one way or another.

Yours very truly,

David McDonald
Chairman

TRANSCRIPT OF COMMISSION PROCEEDINGS

MR. ALAN BOROVOY: I think, Mr. Chairman, I was probably momentarily paralysed by the prospect of winning a million dollars and it may have clouded otherwise clear judgment . . .

The response I think would be this, that people presumptively should have a right to get lost if they so choose, and save and except for an imminent peril to life or limb and something of that kind, we would be concerned that this could erode the self-reporting mechanisms under the Income Tax Act, which in itself could lead to some pretty intrusive interference into people's lives.

THE CHAIRMAN: The last is a comment rather than a question.

I would like to refer to your Forward and in particular to the last two sentences of the third paragraph in which you say:

Despite scores of unlawful acts by the RCMP which were admitted as far back as October, 1977, not a single charge has been laid or disciplinary measure imposed. To our knowledge, the Commission has neither recommended a different course of action nor explained its omission to do so.

I would like to observe this:

The Government of Canada knows what evidence has been received in hearings before this Commission or recorded in documents received.

The Provinces have available all our public evidence and are at liberty to investigate further those matters, as was done in British Columbia concerning surreptitious entries in criminal investigations.

The law governing this Commission requires us to make recommendations in a report.

The law requires certain steps to be undertaken before we can make a report which is valid in law and we must obey the law.

The law requires that if our report is to include any report against a person, notice must be given to that person of the charge of misconduct.

That this raises difficult issues is demonstrated by the lengthy representation made to us by two counsel for the RCMP, for members of the RCMP, and more recently—that was in early March, and more recently by counsel for the Attorney General of Canada.

I emphasize the Attorney General of Canada and not as reported by a national agency, the Solicitor General.

We, unlike the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, cannot, until the procedure required by law is complied with, reach any conclusion of illegality as far as specific cases are concerned.

As far as systematic techniques are concerned, they are in the public domain and the appropriate authorities have been at liberty to investigate them in detail and reach their decisions as to whether or not to prosecute.

Now, I make those comments in an attempt to enable you to understand our process.

Everything I have said has been said from this chair in public on other occasions, but that does not necessarily mean, I realize, that you have known exactly what has been said in that regard.

All I have tried to do is emphasize that our procedure is governed by law and we are not at liberty, simply, to refer to any specific acts and specific situations as being unlawful.

Whereas others can do so in print or orally, they can say that the unlawfulness has been established by admissions and by evidence.

MR. ALAN BOROVOY: Mr. Chairman, the proposal we had made a couple of years ago did not contemplate such findings in specific cases.

I quite appreciate that problem.

Our proposal was that the Commission should have recommended that the normal law enforcement processes go forward.

That was the recommendation we had sought.

Had they not gone forward, naturally, we could not have said anything to you about that.

But our hope is that, and the point of the submission then was that you would have used your best offices to encourage the normal law enforcement processes to go forward, and that would not have required specific findings in specific cases.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would have required a report by us and it would, therefore, require representations by counsel as to whether there was conduct not authorized or provided for by law.

Thank you. We will adjourn now for fifteen minutes. Pardon me.

I have been advised by my fellow Commissioners there are no further questions, and since I have just completed my questions and comments, we can, therefore, adjourn for the day.

But before doing so, I would like to emphasize again, our gratitude to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association for the high standards of the written submission that has been given to this Commission and the oral submissions made today.

All three of us have said that and I need not say any more, I hope.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

REPORTED STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER ON FREE MOVEMENT OF GOODS AND SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise according to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted in his television performance a week ago that his original constitutional proposals included the right of free movement of goods and services, and in view of the fact that such rights would declare as unconstitutional such policies as prejudicial freight rates and a quota system, which prevent large-scale western industrialization, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the Prime Minister at his news conference today or in a statement on motions explain why he wants to lock the country into today's industrial pattern and prevent natural and well-deserved industrialization of the west.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESCISSION OF RIGHT TO WORK PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put a motion of urgent and pressing importance. In view of the mobility provisions described in section 6 of the government's proposed charter of rights which would guarantee the right to work to any Canadian citizen anywhere in Canada, and recognizing that such federal intervention would clearly frustrate the present power of provincial governments to enact provincial labour laws which guarantee and protect the right of free association accorded to trade unions, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the government be directed to rescind its proposed right-to-work legislation, which would clearly supersede the right of every province to pass provincial labour laws which are, in fact, designed to protect the interests of the labour force and labour unions operating within each province.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

• (1110)

ENTRENCHMENT OF RIGHTS OF "THREATENED SPECIES"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canadians living in Ontario have been subjected to a twin onslaught of advertisements, one telling them to "preserve it, conserve it"—and presumably to vote Conservative—and the other a series of Trojan beavers, geese and clippership—and presumably to vote Liberal—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House urge the entrenchment of the rights of two apparently threatened species, the non-Conservative Ontarian and the non-Liberal national symbol.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT HILL

DISPLAY OF REPLICA OF BOAT USED BY REFUGEES FROM SOUTHEAST ASIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In keeping with the spirit of Thanksgiving and recognizing Canada's tremendous contribution in alleviating human suffering in Southeast Asia, and in particular the willingness of the people of Canada to sponsor and give opportunity to 60,000 homeless refugees, I move, on behalf of the refugees still in transit camps awaiting passage to Canada, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger):

That the House of Commons accept for public display in some suitable location, such as the Library of Parliament, a beautiful hand-made replica of one of the many small boats that carried thousands of Vietnamese to freedom, a replica made in a refugee camp and given as a gesture of gratitude to the people of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

HOLDING OF REFERENDUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government, by virtue of its majority, intends forcing the referendum process on Canadians in its constitutional package, and in view of the fact that the government now has apparently adopted the principle of referenda, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That the government give an undertaking that it will hold a referendum on capital punishment in order that the people of Canada may express their views on the subject.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENITENTIARIES

CALL FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that there has been an increasing number of serious incidents, including hostage-takings and deaths, in Canada's federal penitentiaries in recent months, culminating in the present unfortunate incident at Dorchester, and in view of the fact that the Liberal government has failed to implement many of the important recommendations of the unanimous report of the parliamentary subcommittee on penitentiaries which found a state of crisis to exist in Canada's penal system, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House call upon the Solicitor General to implement as a priority all recommendations of the special subcommittee report on penitentiaries in Canada, and to immediately strike a special committee of this House to determine the reasons for the renewed atmosphere of crisis in Canada's federal prisons before further outbreaks of violence and possible deaths occur.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REJECTION OF APPLICATIONS TO ABANDON RAIL LINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas the Canadian Transport Commission rejected an application to abandon the rail line between East Coulee and Rosedale and between Kneehill and Carbon in 1979, and whereas these continual applications to abandon these lines by the CNR and CPR are driving potential industry from these areas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That once an application to abandon a rail line is rejected, no further application be entertained for at least five years, and probably ten years.

Madam Speaker: For presentation such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR NEGOTIATION OF NEW FUNDING AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I apologize for not taking time to raise this matter with the House leaders of the two other parties prior to this.

Considering that all members of this House endorse the concept of bilingualism and support its continued development, I am certain that we all wish to do what we can to ensure that funding for second language education be maintained, if not expanded. This type of education is the keynote of bilingualism in Canada. Considering the historic moment we are experiencing and considering that federal funding assistance for minority language and second language education programs has been reduced from $200 million last year to $170 million this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House request the Secretary of State to negotiate a new funding agreement which would at least hold federal funding assistance to last year's level.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR SAFETY

UPDATING OF SAFETY PROCEDURES AT AIRPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the recent statements made at the Dubin inquiry into air safety, which stated that the federal government is to blame for most safety problems at airports and that new commercial pilots are not receiving adequate training to be considered safe, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to make an immediate statement on motions as to what steps he will be taking to ensure that safety procedures will be updated and to give immediately a firm commitment to the Canadian people and Parliament regarding what measures he will be taking to ensure the safety of commercial and private air travel in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is for the Minister of Finance, Madam Speaker. There have been a number of forecasts, including the minister's own, the Conference Board in Canada and so on, which have given us gloomy forecasts. I refer the minister to the forecast of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. The bank forecasts a 1 per cent decline in real GNP for this year with very slow recovery next year, that the CPI will be up 10.3 per cent next year, while the Conference Board forecast 10.5 per cent. Unemployment next year will average 8.4 per cent and real business investment is going to go down from a 9.4 per cent real increase last year to 5.5 per cent this year, and decline again to only 3 per cent in 1981.

In view of these forecasts, could the minister give the House a firm date for his budget? Is it October 23? Will the minister bring in a budget which has the fiscal solutions promised by him and his party last December and January, and, in particular, one that cuts taxes and stimulates the growth of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that when the budget comes forward it will implement the pledges made by the leader of the Liberal party on fiscal matters in the last election campaign.

In answer to the other part of the question as to the date of the budget, I have not determined the date but I want to tell the hon. member that it will not be October 23.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, this is the most timid Minister of Finance in our history. If the Prime Minister could be said to be the Lone Ranger, the minister is certainly Tonto.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Get him up, Scout!

Mr. Crosbie: "Kemo Sabe". The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce spoke to the Chamber of Commerce in Quebec City on September 25. He warned them that it would be "unwise to expect too much too soon by way of economic recovery". He has no faith in his Minister of Finance. He said this: "Circumstances permit no magical fiscal solutions to the cyclical economic downturn", such as a stimulative budget. Does the Minister of Finance agree with his lugubrious colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member wants me to agree that there is no quick solution to the current economic difficulties and that there is no solution solely in injecting a larger deficit into the economy, if that is the burden of the question I certainly agree, Madam Speaker, with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, if the minister agrees with his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and if he agreed with his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce last December, when he said that there were quick solutions, that the economy could be stimulated and that there were magical fiscal solutions, what has caused this reversal, this turnaround, this spinning of the last eight months? Has the minister just come to the realization that there is a problem? Why is he not prepared now to offer the solutions which he offered last fall?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. gentleman is building up in his own mind a series of propositions which he is attempting to put forward as ones that I have in the past endorsed as a way of improving the economic situation. If he looks back, he will find in the Liberal platform during the last campaign that the promises made were carefully thought out, and they will be implemented in the budget. I do not find myself in the position the hon. member found himself in when he was driven in his budget to implement incredible proposals simply because they had been put into the Tory election platform. I am not in that position.

FINANCE

EXCHANGE RATE POLICY—EFFECT ON MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I too wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. It is further to some of the projections or forecasts the Toronto-Dominion Bank has made. They are projecting that the balance of payments deficit for Canada in the next two years will grow from $5.8 billion last year to $6.7 billion this year and to $7.9 billion in 1981.

My question to the minister is this. On the assumption that the energy policy, which we hope to receive from his colleague shortly, does not poison the atmosphere of investment relations with other countries and that the inflow of capital that is required for the huge energy projects that are needed by this country is forthcoming, will the minister ensure that the conduct of Canada's exchange rate policy will not undermine the competitive position of the very important manufacturing industry in this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the competitive position at present of the Canadian manufacturing industry is quite strong. Only this week I had a meeting with representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. They assured me of the basic strength of the Canadian manufacturing sector and advised me not to take actions which would disturb that particular advantage of the manufacturing sector. I will certainly keep that advice in mind and not do things that would disturb the future potential of that particular and important sector of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am tempted to ask whether the minister is proposing an advertising program to tell the Canadian people that his policy is the cure-all for the manufacturing industry in this country, but I will not ask him that. We had enough of that yesterday.

The major problem with the Canadian balance of payments is the $17 billion manufacturing deficit this year. We have to be doing things in this country which will improve that deficit, not just hold the line where it is now. Will the minister give the industry a clear signal today or in his budget which will give them the confidence in their investment decisions and enable them to make decisions that will provide the jobs and the long-term investment program which will substantiate the ongoing strength of this industry, particularly at a time when we are looking at an unemployment level of some one million people this winter?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Madam Speaker, I will attempt to give that signal, not today but in the budget.

ENERGY

PETROLEUM MONITORING AGENCY—REPORTED STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question to arouse from his interest in a document the attention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Petroleum Monitoring Agency established by the government, as the minister knows, was set up, among other things, to monitor prices and profits of the petroleum industry and report back to the public and to the government. Today Mr. Harold Renouf, chairman of that agency, is reported to have said the following:

● (1125)

I believe the industry will be better served if we are successful in clarifying to the consumer . . . the need for higher domestic oil and gas prices.

Does the minister not agree that this statement reveals in advance a completely unacceptable, biased attitude on the part of the chairman who is supposed to be monitoring the petroleum industry and its pricing policies?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have had an opportunity of reading the speech made by Mr. Renouf and, frankly, I find nothing objectionable at all in what he has said.

Mr. Broadbent: That is what I was afraid of.

Mr. Lalonde: He has said what I believe all parties and all governments in this country have recognized, that the price of oil and gas will have to increase in the course of this decade. I do not think anybody in this country who has sense challenges this view.

What the monitoring agency is doing, as mentioned by Mr. Renouf, is monitoring very closely the performance of the industry in many areas; the area of profitability, the area of cash flow, research and development effort, reinvestment behaviour, cost of exploration, etc. These features are going to be examined very, very carefully and very closely. This will all be made public and I hope it will help all governments to establish adequate and proper policies in terms of taxation and incentives. Even if the price of oil and gas were to go up, as I am sure they will, and as we all recognize, that does not mean that automatically the increases are going to go overwhelmingly, or in the largest share, to the companies themselves. They may go to the governments of the producing provinces or to the federal government. That is why I say there is nothing objectionable at all in what Mr. Renouf has said.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, surely the minister will acknowledge that he has not addressed the issue at all. It is one thing for a minister of the Crown or members on this side of the House to argue for or against higher energy prices. No one is arguing against their right or responsibility to do that. My question is, does he think that a man who is appointed chairman of a commission to monitor the industry in terms of its pricing and profit policies should be out advocating higher prices and profits, especially at a time when the big five in the industry had increases in their profits of 86 per cent in the past year?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Oshawa is asking me to require the chairman of that commission to live in a literally fictitious world. Mr. Renouf is merely being realistic when he notes that the price of oil products will have to go up. One does not have to be a wizard to know that, reality is there for everyone to see. In his speech Mr. Renouf did not indicate that he favours higher prices, he simply and realistically noted, recognizing government policy and the policy of all governments in the world at present, that the prices of oil products will have to be raised, that it is important that the public understand and know exactly what is going on, who will profit from those increases and who will incur the costs. Such is Mr. Renouf's task in the next few years.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the reply is not better in French. It is the same in French as in English.

• (1130)

[English]

Since we have it in his own words that he supports a biased chairman in advance, would the minister now renounce his campaign rhetoric in which he condemned the oil industry for charging too much and in which he said the Liberals would deal with exploding profits? Will he acknowledge either that that was hypocrisy, or will he change the terms of reference of this agency and give it the authority to roll back unfair price increases?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am tempted to try to answer the hon. member in Latin to see whether he will understand.

Mr. Epp: Go ahead. Maybe you will make some sense.

Mr. Lalonde: Surely we should see this as proof of consistency that the statement is the same in French as it is in English.

With respect to the substance of the hon. member's question, again I challenge his interpretation of any bias in the statement made by Mr. Renouf, who is an outstanding Canadian, has chaired the Anti-Inflation Board in an outstanding way and who is performing his duty under the Inquiries Act in quite an honest and fair way. I suggest to the hon. member for Oshawa that his is not a fair statement to make about Mr. Renouf.

With respect to government policy, it is well known. We stated it during the election campaign and have repreated it consistently since then; and I hope that when we come up with our energy program the hon. member's party will be able to support that program as being one which is good for Canadians at the present time.

GASOHOL—INQUIRY WHETHER CONSIDERATION GIVEN TO REMOVAL OF EXCISE TAX

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the same minister, and it has to do with our well-known lack of capacity to produce liquid portable fuels in the country. I think the minister would agree that we should be encouraging the production of renewable energy, and I wonder if the minister would consider removing the 7 cents a gallon excise tax on gasohol as a measure to increase the production of renewable energy.

I also point out to the minister that, contrary to some opinions held in the country, the production of ethyl alcohol actually contributes to the total food supply and does not subtract from it. I hope the minister takes that into consideration when he answers the question.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to say how much I appreciate the hon. member's interest in renewable resources. I think this is indeed a very important area. The production of renewable resources will need to be encouraged in the next decade and, as the hon. member knows, there is currently a parliamentary task force which is examining these various issues.

The specific question raised by the hon. member would more properly be decided by the Minister of Finance in a budget decision, and I would not want to comment on it further. I am sure the Minister of Finance has heard the hon. member's representation, and I wish to assure the hon. member that his representation will be considered.

INQUIRY WHETHER EXCISE TAX ON GASOHOL WILL BE REMOVED

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Would the Minister of Finance take into consideration the exchange which has just gone on, and will he take it upon himself in the budget to remove the seven cents a gallon excise tax on gasohol so that we may encourage production of liquid portable fuels as a means of making the country truly self-sufficient in energy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will consider the hon. member's representations.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

CALGARY INTERNATIONAL—REPLACEMENT OF CONTROL TOWER

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which he was given notice. About two years ago a multimillion dollar airport terminal was built in Calgary. This modern facility was built, if you can believe it, without an air traffic control tower. The existing control tower was built in 1968 as a temporary facility designed to last five to six years. It is now 12 years old. This tower, a temporary arrangement, was built to serve, but it has done so to no one's satisfaction. As a result, employee morale has fallen to the lowest of lows. Why was this so-called temporary facility not replaced when the new airport terminal was built, and when will it be replaced?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is so nice to be able to be pleasant. The problem was recognized and contracts were allocated on October 2. Work was begun on October 6. The price is $284,000.

Mr. Kushner: Madam Speaker, I hope I am not being unreasonable. I appreciate that the minister has inherited this problem, but what I was referring to was not to the repair of the tower. My question was when the new tower will be built. I know there are tenders out to repair the tower now, but when will a new one be built?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, as I said, the problem was recognized. Working conditions were not good enough and the department is moving now in the way I have indicated. I think my hon. friend should not push his luck too much on a single day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: I thought you were nice all the time.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT SUPPORTS ARCTIC PILOT PROJECT

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am tempted to ask him in Inuktitut, but his interests do not go that far.

Mr. Lalonde: Not my interest, my knowledge.

Mr. Ittinuar: My question concerns government advertising on energy and in particular on Arctic gas reserves and the Arctic pilot project. If government ads are designed to reflect current government policy, as was stated in the House yesterday, can we conclude that the Arctic pilot project is supported by this government?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it is not a lack of interest in Inuktitut; it is the lack of knowledge on my part that I regret.

Mr. Nielsen: So what's new?

Mr. Lalonde: With respect to the hon. member's question, the hon. member knows that the Arctic pilot project is sponsored by Petro-Canada and a group of other companies and that the project is before the National Energy Board. There will be hearings. The normal process will be followed. It is one project among others, the others including the possibility of a polar gas pipeline. All these projects will be examined by the appropriate government authorities before they are approved or rejected by the cabinet.

In the meantime, these are certainly encouraging developments when we see the large additional reserves of natural gas which have been found by the petroleum industry in the Arctic, and we hope also additional reserves of oil. The government is of course supportive of further exploration and further development of those resources in the north, to the benefit not only of other Canadians but also the residents of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Ittinuar: Madam Speaker, I cannot see how the government can reconcile its advertising with the environmental assessment review process and the upcoming National Energy Board hearing as well as the views of the northern peoples, who wish that these hearings would be conducted in earnest and without biased and supportive views from the government.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I think I have indicated that while the government indeed supports in principle exploration and development of resources in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, we want that process to take place having full respect for all the regulatory authorities which exist at the present time, whether they be the Department of the Environment or the National Energy Board. However, once we have said that, we say that we want all these developments to take place, but within the existing requirements which the various pieces of legislation passed by this Parliament imply. I think that is pretty simply to understand.

BANKRUPTCIES

ASTRA TRUST—RE-MOR—INQUIRY WHETHER CIRCUMSTANCES WILL BE EXAMINED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The minister will be aware of the bankruptcy of Astra Trust and its real estate affiliate, Re-Mor. Does he plan an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the bankruptcy in view of the substantial losses sustained by innocent investors and the allegations of fraud against the officers of Astra Trust and Re-Mor?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I am aware of the situation. I would like to remind the hon. member that Re-Mor is a provincially chartered corporation which does not therefore come under federal jurisdiction. Reimbursing procedures under federal law are under way for those people who had invested in Astra corporation. As far as Re-Mor is concerned, the member must understand that from a legal standpoint we are dealing with a very complex issue and that with regard to criminal procedures the government of Ontario is doing its duty in view of the circumstances.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I am aware that Re-Mor is under the control of the provincial government, but bankruptcy is a matter under the control of the federal government. The Re-Mor real estate company, which is an affiliate of Astra Trust, obtained a mortgage broker's licence from the government of Ontario after finance officials in the minister's department ascertained that Astra Trust was in financial trouble. Can the minister advise the House on the quality of communications between the officials of the government of Ontario and his department, because it is the opinion of those who have studied the matter that, had the communications been better, the losses suffered by the depositors could have been avoided.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is making very serious allegations. The information which the Superintendent of Insurance has provided me concerning this fully contradicts the hon. member's allegations.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELIVERY OF CHEQUES TO RECIPIENTS

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Because the Minister of Employment and Immigration is absent, Madam Speaker, I shall direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. My question deals with the problem unemployment insurance recipients are facing following the various work stoppages which have occurred both last week and this week within our public service. I should like to know what special steps the department has taken to deliver the cheques to unemployment insurance recipients. What are these steps and when will the situation return to normal, because people in the various ridings have suffered over the past two weeks due to delays resulting from work stoppages within our public service?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I should like to assure all hon. members that the situation is back to normal everywhere in Canada except Quebec, that the cheques will be delivered directly by mail, as provided for under our regulations, and that there is no backlog.

As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, because of the illegal work stoppages which have occurred over the past two weeks, there are some delays, but I can assure the hon. member that several thousands of cheques have been printed this week. This was not a problem of cheque distribution, but of cheque printing. The cheques were printed yesterday and today, and employment and immigration staff will be working this weekend to make up for lost time.

ABORTIONS

BADGLEY REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO IMPLEMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Within the last month in British Columbia, the boards of two major hospitals have done away completely with their therapeutic abortion committees, seriously reducing access to abortions—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —where required for women in those communities. In view of the fact that the Badgley report, which was commissioned by a previous Liberal government, has recognized this as being a major weakness in existing legislation, and in view of the fact that the situation is so serious that doctors have threatened to remove their services entirely from at least one of these hospitals, what action does the government intend to take to implement the recommendations of the Badgley commission report and put an end to this threat to health care in our communities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, any action would be untimely at this point. We have no intention of introducing any legislation in Parliament to amend the Criminal Code with regard to abortion.

[English]

CUTBACKS IN FUNDING TO PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, this makes a mockery of any suggestion that accessibility to abortion is free and equitable in this country, and I hope sincerely that the Minister of Justice will bring in the changes that were recommended.

My supplementary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is as follows. The federal government has cut back substantially on its funding to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada which is one of the leading proponents of safe, effective, contraceptive and sex education. Both recommendations in this regard were strongly supported in the Badgley report. My question is this: why has the government chosen to cut back on funding to these important organizations at a time when over 60,000 abortions were performed in Canada, and what action does the government intend to take to ensure that these vital services, which will reduce the number of abortions in Canada, will be restored at the earliest possible time?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's information is not accurate. Unfortunately I do not have the exact figures of the subsidy to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada.

For several years now, discussions with the federation following the federal-provincial conference of social security ministers have been aimed at ensuring that the provinces finance the local family planning services across Canada while limiting our role to the national secretariats of those associations.

As a consequence, the money we contribute to the local family planning services is now channelled through the provinces. If the provinces fail to do what is expected of them and do not subsidize those associations adequately, then it is up to hon. members who know what the federal role and responsibilities are to do everything possible to make sure that the money goes where it should.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER DECISION MADE RESPECTING SALE OF NORDAIR

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport whom I have always found to be friendly, if not too swift to act sometimes. Can the minister tell me whether he is any closer now to a decision on the Nordair question than he was some three months ago?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Yes, Madam Speaker, but there is a question of temperament here. My feeling is that one should not, in the process of attempting to solve difficulties, create others that would be worse than the ones one is trying to solve. That is my philosophy and it is in my temperament to take this approach.

Progress is being made in the Nordair issue and the problem will be solved, but before we get there, there are a number of accommodations that have to come from the potential owners, the potential executives of the merged company and also the labour unions. This is being worked on now and I hope that one of these days before too long I will be in a position to announce success.

SALE OF NORDAIR—GUARANTEES OFFERED RESPECTING INTERESTS OF QUEBEC

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. During our short stay in power, several of his Liberal colleagues made representations to me to ensure that the sale of Nordair would at least lead to a majority of shares for Quebec. I suppose that the minister has received similar representations from his colleagues. Can he tell the House today what type of guarantee he can give that a majority of these shares would be reserved for Quebec?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can assure my friend from Joliette that I have received the same representations, probably in the same form as the ones he got used to. The question he raises is part of the problem, and that is what we are trying hard to settle at the moment.

REPORTED STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING PARLIAMENTARY AND PRESIDENTIAL SYSTEMS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday there was quite a discussion in the House about the art of communication, and I should like the right hon. gentleman to communicate to the House, and thus to the country, if the presidential style of government is still his personal preference over the parliamentary form of government we have at present? This is what he told students at the university of Montreal in a most frank and relaxed question and answer period three days after he resigned when he said:

—but if I'd said it before resigning people would say, "Oh, now he wants to be President Trudeau,"—

Then he said:

There's no question of that any more.

● (1150)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, I can confirm that there is no question of that now.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I will just read from the articles which appeared in several papers on November 24, the day after this very frank discussion the present Prime Minister had. He told the students:

—that a presidential system of government like that of France might be best for Canada.

"I can say that now, but if I'd said it before resigning people would say, 'Oh, now he wants to be President Trudeau' "—

"There's no question of that any more."

My supplementary question is in a serious vein. We are debating a resolution which gives to a constitution the very heart and soul of the country. In the last election campaign there was no mandate from the Canadian people because the Prime Minister, the then leader of the opposition, was most silent on constitutions or patriation in 1980. This is the people's constitution, not the constitution of the Prime Minister or the premiers.

Since it could fundamentally change the form of government, would the Prime Minister be prepared depending on the form of the resolution finally reported out of the House, to use the referendum procedure in the bill as a dry run to the Canadian people before he goes to London?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I find it somewhat paradoxical that the hon. member and his party seem to be against the referendum procedure in the proposed section 42 which, after all, is a deadlock breaking mechanism on the one hand—

Mr. Clark: No, it is not.

Mr. Trudeau: —and on the other hand—

Mr. Nielsen: It is a hammerlock mechanism.

Mr. Trudeau: —they are now advocating, or this member in particular is advocating, a referendum which obviously is something that—

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you, Mr. President.

An hon. Member: He was not advocating that. He was asking you.

Mr. Trudeau: No, he was advocating that. My answer is that I wish they would get their act together, as usual.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—REPORTED STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF NORCEN ENERGY RESOURCES RESPECTING EXPORTS TO JAPAN

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I will ask it in Scottish. Yesterday, Mr. Edmund Bovey, the chairman of Norcen Energy Resources, stated that the federal government had authorized him, as energy representative on the Canada-Japan committee, to raise the possibility of liquefied natural gas exports to Japan.

Why is this government, after selling out our natural gas to the United States through the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline, now about to embark upon a policy of further sellouts, that is, of natural gas to Japan? Can the minister confirm or deny the statement made by Mr. Bovey?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it appears that Scottish is a much easier language to understand than I thought. For a moment I thought I would have to refer the question to the Minister of Finance, but I think I can handle this one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the specific question raised by the hon. member is concerned, gas liquefaction is just one other process of handling gas. The question of additional gas exports is purely an academic one at the present time. If there was any project dealing with further gas exports, it would have to be submitted to the National Energy Board in the normal way. However, I would suggest to the hon. member that if we have an opportunity to export more gas, since our reserves are indeed expanding at a very great rate and there is a surplus of natural gas in Canada, I would think Canada should be ready to consider whether it is not more advantageous to our country to have more customers for our gas rather than being dependent on a single customer; and second, whether it would not be good for Canada, and British Columbia in particular, to have further processing of its gas before expediting it abroad.

It seems to me this is a very fair and reasonable question to be raised. If we are to assume that there may be further exports, I think we should examine whether there should not be further processing and more customers for Canada, rather than the single one on which we are dependent, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, it is important that the minister makes the policy very clear because foreign countries are now seeing us as an easy mark for exports.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: No pun intended. This summer The Wall Street Journal reported that Japanese interests had lent Dome Petroleum $400 million for investment in Beaufort Sea oil and gas exploration in Canada's Arctic. In return they will get 25 per cent of the share of oil and gas production.

Did the minister make it very clear to Dome, which is a company that really survives on Canadian tax breaks—it was built up that way—and did he make it clear to the Japanese that in fact there is no oil for export up there, and that if it is found, that oil will not be exported? Will the minister stand up in the House and make it quite clear that he will not sell out our oil when it is found in the Beaufort Sea and is ready to go to market?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, indeed I had the opportunity of meeting several times with spokesmen for Dome Petroleum and also with ministers and senior officials from Japan. In all instances I indicated quite clearly that I could not foresee the day when Canada would have such a surplus of oil that we could export it abroad. This was made quite clear to all the parties concerned, and that is the policy of this government at the present time.

The rule that would have to be applied is that if in decades to come we were to find reserves of the Saudi Arabia style or type, then obviously it is a question Canada would have to decide at that time. We have no indication whatever at the present time that we can rely upon such reserves. If in decades to come this were to be the case, obviously the governments of the day would have to make that decision.

Mr. Crosbie: Sit down.

Mr. Lalonde: At the present time the Japanese have indeed entered into this agreement with Dome. It provides for a share of the production, but it does not authorize the Japanese to take it outside of Canada.

Mr. Clark: Filibuster.

Mr. Lalonde: They would get that share, but it would be subjected to all the requirements of the National Energy Board and they would be obliged to sell it inside Canada under the present rules.

GRANTS TO NATIVE ORGANIZATIONS TO ASSIST IN PARTICIPATION IN RENEWAL

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the significant amounts of money granted to native organizations throughout the country—the Indians, the Inuit and the non-status Indians—to research and to establish their position re self-government and the relationship between themselves and their trustee, the federal minister of Indian affairs, in connection with constitutional renewal. Can the minister tell the House whether a timetable was attached to these grants to ensure that the position of the native people in our country is known before very serious changes are undertaken in connection with our constitution, recognizing, of course, the very special rights of Indian people in our constitution?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, with regard to the grants to native peoples in order to prepare their position on the constitution, there is no time limit in that sense. The money is available to them. It is on a fiscal year basis. They are in receipt of the money. They are utilizing it during this fiscal year. What the situation may be next year will depend upon their submissions, their needs and their analysis by the government.

INPUT FROM NATIVE GROUPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question must be directed to the Prime Minister, particularly having regard to the rather tight schedule given to Parliament and to other partners in confederation to make fundamental and real changes to our constitution in the context of renewed federalism. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has now told us that the Indians have been given more money to study their position, their relationship with Canada as a nation and their relationship with Her Majesty the Queen. What sense is there in carrying on a process that might take years if it is the intention of the Prime Minister to make fundamental changes to coincide with his own time frame, which is July 1 of next year? Will Indians have some input in the process of constitutional change, or is it just going to be another hand-out to keep them appeased, to have them travel around the country enjoying themselves while the Prime Minister is going ahead to make these fundamental changes?

● (1200)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think that last part of the question was something of a slur on the Indian population inferring that they are using funds supplied so they can research their rights to travel around the country and have a good time. I do not think this shows that the hon. member is very serious in asking the question.

As far as our government's position is concerned, we have stated it very many times: we want the Indians to be involved in the constitutional process. I indicated—

An hon. Member: When? How?

Mr. Trudeau: They ask when and how, Madam Speaker. This week and next week officials and the minister will be involved in discussing this very subject with the Indians. I met the leaders of the Inuit and Indian people several months ago and I indicated that any changes directly affecting them would only be made after discussion with them. I have given the undertaking, which I am prepared to repeat, that as soon as we get the constitution home we will be prepared to consider other phases of the constitutional debate and to put the item of native rights on the agenda right then and there. I do not know if the Indians themselves will be prepared at that time to indicate in a final way what they would like to see the constitution say in respect to them, but certainly the minister and his officials are attempting to reach conclusions on that.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—REDUCTION OF SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND MONTREAL

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. For at least a few years now there have been two Via Rail trains departing from Ottawa to Montreal daily, late in the afternoon, and these trains have always been very well patronized. It was not uncommon to see passengers standing up. On October 1, Via Rail suppressed these two departures to replace them with one departure at 1730. Could the minister explain to us the reasons for this service reduction?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker. Generally speaking, I think Via Rail, the Canadian Transport Commission and the Department of Transport are courageously trying at the present time to offer a better rail transport system for passengers. And this obviously requires adjustments. My hon. friend says a train has been suppressed from Ottawa to Montreal. I regret passengers being inconvenienced by this fact, but one must realize that the ticket from Ottawa to Montreal costs the Department of Transport twice as much as the price charged to the passenger himself. I say this simply to demonstrate that a rationalization must be effected, that this will create in certain regions difficulties they have to cope with and which we have to deal with ourselves.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—PUBLICLY FINANCED POLLS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I brought to your attention yesterday on the important subject of polling, something which has been indulged in by this government and by a number of other governments for a considerable period of time. The issue is not whether polling of itself is justified but whether the government, having conducted the polls, has made the proper use of the information it has obtained and, related to that but not essentiel to the argument, the public's interest is also involved in the limits to spending on the question of polling itself. But that is a subsidiary point that I want to make.

I do not usually quote The Globe and Mail as it is not well known as supportive of social democracy in Canada, but every now and then even The Globe and Mail has something to say that is right. In today's paper the case is well made in one sentence about the issue which is at stake on the question of this government's use of polls. In an editorial it says:

> In a democracy the floor is supposed to be equally open to all debaters.

I do not agree with much more than that in The Globe and Mail, but with that sentence I am in fundamental agreement. Since last spring this government has been pursued on the question of polls by members of my party. We raised questions in April and subsequent to that. In July I wrote the Prime Minister, (Mr. Trudeau) asking for clarification of the government's position and an outline of the policy the government would pursue. No adequate answer was received. In fact the answer which I received from the Prime Minister, and which in essence was argued in a related question of privilege yesterday in the House, is that the current government, a partisan government—as all governments are by definition—will judge itself whether polling information is to be made available to all members of the House of Commons and therefore, indirectly, to the people of Canada. For my party this principle is completely unacceptable.

If the people of Canada are going to be financing polling, in a democracy, then all the people, through the House of Commons, have a right to have access to the information provided to the government in those polls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The issue then is not one of legitimacy of the government conducting the polls or not. That is a spurious debating point raised by the Prime Minister who specializes in that kind of activity. The government is entirely right to do some polling if, for example, it has a program in the health field and needs to find out something about its efficacy. It is entirely legitimate from time to time to conduct a survey to find out if the people of Canada are getting a service which ought to be provided by legislation approved by Parliament. There is no doubt that the people in my party accept the necessity of polling, it is a legitimate, important access to relevant information in a modern age. But the question that goes to the root of democratic responsibility is: should such information be kept in the exclusive hands of the government of the day? That is the question which has to be answered.

Our view on this side is very clear. It is fundamentally wrong for the government of the day to obtain information on the one hand but then judge on its own whether or not such information should be made available. That is incontestably a partisan decision.

Certain information can be used to the political advantage of the government. It would be very good to reveal some information, and the government has indicated it would be more than willing from time to time to give the members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada such information, when it is to its advantage. Conversely, look at the information that would come in which would show that programs are not working and are shoddy. It would not be advantageous to the government for members on this side of the House to know that, in a partisan sense, but it would be in the public's interest to know.

We have seen unfortunate experiences in other jurisdictions where polling has been very clearly demonstrated to have been done in one week or one month, kept secret from opposition parties, then used as a method for establishing government policy in subsequent weeks or months. Such a situation raises the spectre of the use of public funds by a political party for its political campaigning, and this has no legitimate basis in a democratic government.

Therefore, I would like to come quickly to the appropriate use of polling and make very specific suggestions which I think would obviate a question of privilege, if the government agreed to them. They are suggestions which should be followed in a democracy. Because they have not been followed, the equal right of all members to have access to all information important to a debate, financed by the people of Canada, is being denied us.

We would suggest the following: that each minister be responsible for ensuring that all contracts for public opinion polling by the minister or agent of the minister be listed after approval is given in the first issue of The Canada Gazette; secondly, the list being published in The Canada Gazette should include the subject matter of the poll, the name of the firm awarded the contract, the amount of the contract and the dates set out in the contract for receipt of the completed survey results by the minister or agent of the minister, and, finally, all polls listed in The Canada Gazette should automatically be tabled by the minister concerned on the next sitting day after the date of receipt set out in The Gazette.

This, in other words, would put all members in this House on an equal basis. Opposition members, government members and cabinet members alike would have the same data which is paid for by the people of Canada. That is the question of privilege. If you find, Madam Speaker, that I do have a case of privilege, I would be prepared to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the question of the right of members of Parliament to information obtained by the government to polls financed by public funds be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration and report.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would have been pleased to defer taking the floor to allow my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), but I will proceed for the moment to speak largely in support of the proposal and the suggestion which have been made by the Leader of the News Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) regarding the importance of having this question considered, and the policy developed, by Parliament. I agree with the Leader of the New Democratic Party that that process may well be made unnecessary if the government is prepared to accept the proposals which have been made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I would point out that this matter has been alluded to in debate recently in this House by, I believe, one of the members from the New Democratic Party, who made the point that the practice of polling has been carried out by New Democratic Party governments in Saskatchewan, by Progressive Conservative governments across the country, including the period I had the honour to lead the Government of Canada, and by Liberal governments.

When we were the Government of Canada we wrestled with the question of whether or not to publish polls which had been carried out by our government. Our decision was that it would be appropriate and proper for those polls to be published. As I indicated yesterday, in the period of time we were the Government of Canada, three public opinion polls were commissioned. One poll had to do with federal-provincial relations, another with energy, and another with multiculturalism.

The poll having to do with energy was the subject of a request by a member of Parliament, who asked that it be published. That request was acceeded to and the poll was made available. In addition, and far more important, we had issued instructions to officials of the Government of Canada in all relevant departments that, in keeping with the freedom of information bill which we introduced—a bill which, I would remind the House, went much further in protecting the public right to information than the bill which has been introduced by the present Liberal government—the practice should be followed of responding positively to any request to publish any poll. That is to say, if a poll was conducted by the Government of Canada and if there was a request to have it published, it should be published.

What is being proposed today by the Leader of the New Democratic Party is that we go a step further. Speaking on behalf of my party, I have no objection at all to the provision that there be no waiting for a request, that there be an automatic triggering so that public opinion sampling carried out in the name of the people of Canada could be available directly to the representatives of the people of Canada assembled in this Parliament.

I might add that certainly if agreement is reached, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) need have no question that we would be prepared to have published today the two polls which were conducted during the tenure of the Progressive Conservative government that have not yet been made public.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, first of all I believe that on the substance of the matter there is no question of privilege. It is purely a matter of government housekeeping policy, and whether polls are taken or not, it is a well known practice that is recognized throughout the world. I think questions can be asked in the House but the privileges of members are not at all affected here and I think the motion of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) is frivolous and is quite simply much more intended to raise a matter for debate than a question of privilege. In any case, Madam Speaker,—

[English]

For example, since March, 1979, there were 141 polls taken by different departments. This includes polls in which there was one question asked by a particular department interested in a specialized field and wishing to collect information from the different organizations and companies in that field. For the amount of $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000, these departments obtain their information on one precise question. These questions may be related to postal services, transportation services, energy and so on.

The government decided to check with every department to determine how many polls were completed since the beginning of 1979. We obtained the figure of 141. That does not mean that they were all necessarily all-encompassing polls. In some cases the poll consisted of one question by one department and cost $1,000 or $2,000. Now that we have collected these polls, we are prepared to release all of them except for 12. One hundred and twenty-nine polls will be released. The other polls have not been completed, or are currently being used. When these polls are no longer being used they will be made public.

For example, some of the most controversial polls taken were instigated by the Canadian Unity Information Office which comes under my responsibility. One poll was conducted in this area by the previous administration. I am glad to have the permission of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to publish the polls of that administration. We obtained from these polls some very useful information on questions related to certain problems in Quebec at the time of the referendum, and we used them to develop strategy. At the time of the referendum other polls were conducted to determine if attitudes had changed.

These polls will be made public, but I do not know when. Some of the polls will be ready next Wednesday and the others one week following. The document is very complicated and thick, and I do not think that it would be advisable to make one for everybody because it would amount to stacks of papers. We want to assure the House that if some members or some people want them, they will be available. We will make the results available to the House very quickly from the Canadian Unity Information Services.

Some results will not be available at this time because that is the rule. I understand the situation in the bill on information is that if there is a request for information, a certain period of time will be required, perhaps a couple of months, in which to make that information available and so on.

I do think, however, that sometimes questions are asked in a context that is only for the purpose of getting some information from the government. When the situation does not call for any further confidentiality, we will then make the information available. I think that any normal administrator will understand that there could be questions in specific areas where at a certain time it is not in the interests of the House or the public to make the information public.

An hon. Member: For example?

Mr. Chrétien: If I had been caught in that situation during the referendum, there would have been a problem. The hon. Leader of the Opposition and his party commissioned a survey that cost about $100,000 in December, when it was done. I got six surveys for the same price later on—I probably made a better deal! There is no question, however, that it would not have been useful or in the public interest to make them available at that time. I had the responsibility, and I was very well supported by all members of the House, of making sure that the case for Canada, from the federal point of view, was put to the Quebec people in the most effective way. At that time I felt it was very important that I use the poll made by the Leader of the Opposition and his party in December, so I used it. In that respect—

Mr. Clark: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition on a point of order.

Mr. Clark: It is a very simple point of order, Madam Speaker. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is slipping into a usage which did not prevail, at least in our day. He referred to me and my party as having commissioned the polls. That is not the case; they were commissioned by the Government of Canada, of which I was then the leader. I am sure it was simply a slip of the tongue, but an important one.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, it is very clear that the right hon. member was the Leader of the Government at that time. I will refer to the Progressive Conservative government of last year, which commissioned the poll. I have used it effectively so I am glad they did it. I do not blame them for that, because it has been very useful.

Of the 141 polls, some consisted of only one question, asked by one department in one set of circumstances. We will make them available as soon as possible. The ones which come directly under my jurisdiction—which are some of the most controversial and which were done by the Canadian Unity Information office—some of these will be available next Wednesday or perhaps the Monday following even sooner, if possible. We will not give the whole package to everybody, but anyone who wants to check them can go to the office and do so. It would be extremely costly to make those stacks of documents available to everybody. There are three done under the direction of the Canadian Unity Information office, that we commissioned in the last few months. Questions are related to energy, to the present debate, and so on. I think we still need them in order to elaborate on policies, but we will make them available as soon as possible.

Perhaps it would be advisable to develop a rule in the near future. I do think, however, that there is absolutely no question of privilege. If hon. members are not satisfied with the answers they receive in the House whenever the government spends money, then there is a rule that a committee will scrutinize all government spending. The ministers appear at the estimates committees and questions can be put to them then. I think, with due respect, Madam Speaker, there is absolutely no question of privilege. If the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) or the Leader of the Opposition wants to debate the policy on polls, it can be done in other forums, such as when the estimates of every department are debated.

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister would answer a question. He referred to 141 polls that have been done, a good number of which he was going to make available, and 12 of which he was going to keep private and confidential.

Mr. Chrétien: For the time being.

Mr. Broadbent: I want to make it clear that we do not agree with that. We would like to know the subject matter of the 12 polls that he is going to keep private.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I do not have the details at this time. One is based on the question of energy. It was requested in order to be able to develop the energy policy that will be made public soon. It could be that if it were released at this time, the substance of it would make the policy public. It may be that when we put a question to the people in order to get their views, the answer could reveal a policy. As we all know, the policy has to be revealed in the House of Commons first—

Mr. Broadbent: That is precisely the point.

Mr. Chrétien: —and not in a sneaky way. The hon. member asked for an example. Other questions were put on other matters, and I do not have them here but they will be made available as soon as possible. If the hon. member feels that as soon as a department receives the result of a poll it should be tabled in the House, then he can ask for it, but I do not think that is very sensible. I do not think that is done anywhere. If we are serious about this and not doing it only for the fun of it, it should have some aim and some objective. The result should be analysed by the government before it is made public.

Mr. Broadbent: Why not by the opposition as well?

Mr. Chrétien: We accept the rule that in the future, when we commission polls and the results have been used for the elaboration of policy, then we will make them public.

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Epp: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to speak on this point of privilege that has been raised by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I was just about to recognize the hon. member as I thought he wanted to speak on the question of privilege. Is the hon. member rising on the question of privilege or on a point of order?

Mr. Epp: The question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member, I want to tell the House that I have a bit of a problem with this question of privilege. First of all, it is very close to the one discussed yesterday in the House and which I took under advisement. Second, it seems to have been used to introduce a substantive motion that might be worth while discussing. That type of motion may come into another procedure and I shall want to examine the matter further.

From the interventions that I have heard until now, I do not see that we have broken any of the rules or practices of this House. It is not clear to me yet that there is a question of privilege. I would therefore ask future speakers to focus on the reasons for the question of privilege. That would be very helpful to the Chair.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am going to relate how I believe the privileges of this House and of every member are affected by the use of polls.

First of all, I support the position taken by the hon. member for Oshawa regarding polls and their use. We have to keep in mind that these polls are conducted through the use of public funds.

Second, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said that these polls, these publicly funded polls, are used "to develop a strategy"—

Mr. Chrétien: And policy.

Mr. Epp: Then he went on to say that the questions used in the polls are for the purpose of gaining certain information which the government wants. But to gain certain information for what purpose?

Mr. Nielsen: For designing advertising.

Mr. Epp: To design advertising. To design policies and strategy?

Mr. Broadbent: For the government.

Mr. Epp: For the government—that is the point—and at public expense. If it is done at public expense, then that information should be available to every member of the House and to the public generally.

I do not want to get into the substantive motion of yesterday relating to advertising, but the point is that the polls are used, first of all, to find out what the public is thinking and then to design an advertising package so that the public can be manipulated and moved toward a policy that the government has already established.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Epp: That is what the government is trying to do, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Chrétien: On a question of privilege, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) cannot rise on a question of privilege when there is already one on the floor, which I am hearing. The hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. Epp: As I said, Madam Speaker, I will not get into the advertising matter. We have seen enough advertising now related to the polling data which the government had received earlier. Just yesterday that point was debated in this House. When members got back to their offices last night they had additional advertising information, related again to polling information which the government received earlier. This speaker's kit is based on certain polling data which the government had received, in trying to move the public to a government position that has not even been concluded in this House.

That is the point of privilege, that my privileges as a member here are being thwarted by manipulation through the use of public money, polls and advertising which are all connected as this government operates on the constitutional question. My privileges are being violated. Therefore, not only should the minister release the polls, which he said he would do at his convenience, selectively, but also information based on that polling which is misleading and wrong, should be stopped.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, very briefly because I consider we have lost a lot of time in the House in the past two days, I would like to ask you if, in light of your many deliberations, you might ponder this case to establish whether the opinions of government technocrats—who are paid out of public funds—give the government should be released and made public to opposition parties. The analogy is there, and I think you should seriously ask yourself the question and I respectfully submit there is no question of privilege here. It is a matter of policy that is debatable, of course, but that does not interfere at all with the rights of members of this House. If the result of the advice given by senior technocrats or the results of polls taken from time to time lead to certain policies, certain bills, then, Madam Speaker, members of this House have the liberty and opportunity to criticize government policies. Having said that, I respectfully submit there is no question of privilege here and it is about time Parliament took its responsibilities and dealt with the urgent and serious matters that are before it.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Very briefly, Madam Speaker, the advertising which my hon. friend the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) was speaking about is in a speaker's kit which reached members' offices last night. It is not only wrong, but almost contemptuous. Not only has this House not completed debate on the subject, but Your Honour has not yet ruled as to whether or not there is a question of privilege in the matters raised yesterday and in the matters raised today.

There is a definite link between the results of the poll and the advertising that comes out. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) said yesterday that the government had not gone into details, it had not gone into specifics in its advertising campaign and that the advertising campaign had ceased—not that that makes any difference, and we made that point yesterday with respect to the privilege. But obviously it has not ceased because we are still being bombarded with one position, that of the Liberal government, in this debate on the constitution. Fundamentally that is wrong and fundamentally that is an abuse of the privileges of every member in this House and, indeed, an erosion of the institution. The least the government can do is to direct the Minister of State for Multiculturalism to freeze the distribution of this advertising until the Chair has made a decision on the question as to whether or not there is privilege, because that, Madam Speaker, is contemptuous of your office.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I shall endeavour to be brief. It seems to me that the responses of both the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) underline the urgency of this matter. They also underline the failure on that side of the House to understand the issue.

The basis laid down by my leader in raising a question of privilege is that this place is supposed to have a certain element of equality about it in so far as debate and dealing with issues are concerned. But the moment the government starts to use taxpayers' funds, whether for the matter we were talking about yesterday or for the conducting of polls, and then says the information obtained is theirs only and not available to the other side is a denial of the rights of both sides of the House of Commons.

> In a close contest when the House is considering a highly controversial measure, the positions of parties are equalized: the government side may rely on its majority but the opposition is strengthened by the rules of procedure which both are bound to observe and which the Speaker must enforce.

It is understood that when the vote comes and decisions are to be made, the government has its majority and it can use it. But in a situation where we are debating matters and considering things, there is supposed to be equality, and if the Speaker leans any way, the Speaker should lean in favour of the opposition so that that equality is established. But when the Minister of Justice stands up and says that he has listened to all of the arguments and he is going to table most of the polls, but the important ones he will hold back for now because he is going to use them for making policy, we suggest that is a denial of the principle of equality on the floor of the House of Commons and it is an abuse of public funds.

Now that I am on my feet, may I interject in what I am saying to suggest that most of us in this place have a birthday every year, and although it would not be appropriate to note them all, when the government House leader has reached that age of relative wisdom, the age of 40, I think we would all like to wish him many happy returns.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: As I said in my friendly way, it is an age of relative wisdom because here on his fortieth birthday, the President of the Privy Council stands up and says it is the same thing for the government to have its paid public servants, who are sworn to certain oaths of secrecy, and so on, give them information which they may not make public, as when the government spends public money to hire private firms outside to conduct polls. I hope that by the time my friend is 50 his wisdom will be much greater than it is on this his fortieth birthday.

It seems to me that the issues we have been discussing the last few days are extremely important. I plead with you again,

Madam Speaker. We are not asking you to rule that there has been wrong doing or abuse, or what have you, but, I am asking you to consider the proposition that there is enough question about what the government is doing to the rights and privileges of Parliament for the issue to be referred to the appropriate committee, and that is why the leader of this party has raised this question of privilege today.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief in what I have to say. There may be, at some stage or other, some confusion in the use of the word government. Some people use the word government meaning the bureaucracy—the public service at the federal level—and some mean that it is all members of Parliament or the parliamentary institution itself. In this discussion today, obviously the word government in the most restrictive sense means the political party which happens to have the executive among its benches who direct the spending of the money and see the results.

I feel quite strongly, and I want to emphasize, as other members have emphasized, that members of Parliament, and that is what they are, who happen to be cabinet ministers, an accident of choice by the Prime Minister or perhaps of wisdom, are receiving through the use of public funds, information which other members of Parliament are not getting. They are, therefore, at an advantage over us. That is not equal or fair.

I can understand that there may be sensitive polls which they may want to withhold for a period of time, possibly for reasons of national security. It might be in the middle of negotiating federal-provincial relations. If there are such polls—

Mr. Nielsen: They should pay for them.

Mr. Dick: Some suggestion has been made that they might pay for them. It may be in the national interest. I will let other speakers speak for themselves. At the very least, they might undertake to communicate those results to the leaders of other parties in the House. Those 12 polls which they may not want to publicize right now would be known to everyone on all sides of the House and we would be on equal footing. That might be a way around those 12 polls if they are going to be withheld. It may not be the best way, but it may be satisfactory. I look forward to the tabling of the other 141 polls.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. What concerns me is the precedent which the government is establishing with regard to the use of polls. For example, if it takes a poll regarding a particular issue and it finds a certain response in the public that it is concerned about, it can then, as was discussed yesterday, engage in an advertising campaign that can be addressed to meet that condition it has found in its polling. Let me illustrate.

In the speaker's guide which has just been given to us it says:

> With a charter of rights and freedoms entrenched in the constitution, it would be beyond the power of Parliament or any provincial legislature acting alone to tamper with it.

That is a subject of debate in this House. The government can take a poll to see what the reaction is in the country. If it finds a result it does not particularly agree with or like, it can engage in an advertising campaign—witness the speaker's manual—to see whether it can manipulate public opinion, which in effect makes the work of this House ineffectual. It is doing an end run around the work in this House. That is why the use of polls becomes so devious, destructive, and really affects the members of the House and the work they do here.

Because of this very controversial statement, about which all of us disagree, the debate is going on. We fundamentally are in disagreement with the whole monitoring process in the constitution. Because we are in disagreement, we are debating it. Yet the government can use those polls and use an advertising campaign in conjunction with those polls to change the attitude of the public rather than allow Parliament full and free debate and let the public understand what is going on in this House.

Madam Speaker: If there had been a speaker on the government side of the House, I would have heard him. I feel that the last speakers more or less brought forth the same argument. I will now cut off the debate and take this question of privilege under advisement. It is very close to the one that was discussed yesterday. In examining this, I might look at them together. I will look at them, especially the second one, in light of the precedents, because the arguments brought forward do not relate very closely to the question of privilege. However, I will take it under advisement.

MR. NIELSEN—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in her seat. The question of privilege I have to raise arises as a result of an exchange between the minister and myself yesterday where the minister, at page 3528 of Hansard, used these words. Referring to myself, she said:

> He is misleading the House right now.

It has long been our practice to avoid the use of such terms in the House, or to qualify them. Certainly it is open to the minister to make a qualification such as "inadvertently misleading" or "unintentionally misleading," which is often done in debate.

May I refer the Chair to page 108 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, the bottom of the page, where the term "mislead" is set out under subsection (2) of 319 of Beauchesne. It states:

> Since 1958, it has been ruled unparliamentary to use the following expressions:

That appears on page 105. There follows a list of those expressions. At page 108 the term "mislead" is included as being one of those expressions which is unparliamentary and the reference is to the debate of January 18, 1958 at page 3346. Again at page 109 references to "deliberately misleading", "deliberately misled" and "wilfully misled" are included as unparliamentary. As well, I might point out there is the expression "attempting to misrepresent". Even an attempt is unparliamentary as a reference. At page 112 of Beauchesne, about two thirds of the way down the page, again the term "mislead" is mentioned as being unparliamentary and also, specifically on point, the term "misleading" is ruled as being unparliamentary in our Debates of April 12, 1960, page 3175. In our Debates of March 7, 1974, at page 257, again "misled" has been held to be unparliamentary.

There seems to be ample evidence in our practices and procedures where that term is unparliamentary. I repeat the term used by the minister, quoting from page 3528 of yesterday's Hansard:

He is misleading the House right now.

I have no objection if the minister wishes to add the word "unintentional" or "inadvertently". Perhaps in the heat of debate it was the minister's own inadvertence or lack of intention to use that kind of term without qualification. I ask her either to withdraw it or qualify it as I have suggested.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is correct. In 1958, the word "mislead" was indeed considered out of order. However, in more recent practice in the House of Commons, it has been allowed provided it was not qualified by the words "intentionally" or "deliberately".

This practice has prevailed in the House in recent years so that, though I do not know exactly what the tenor of the intervention of the Minister of Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) will be, in order to respect more recent usage in the House, perhaps she could qualify the term "mislead" that she used yesterday, as she feels she should. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has the floor.

[English]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, as a lay person who does not have the benefit of legal training, even after eight years as a member of Parliament in this House, I am still appalled at the subtleties of the game of parliamentary debate. The facts are more simple than that, thank God.

When I left the House of Commons after yesterday's question period, a reporter showed me a document. It appeared to be a memo to cabinet and spoke of an immunization program costing $6 million. That does not come from our government, so I do not quite know the parameters of the game being played here in accusing us of having cut programs for children. This was not in our programs because it does not fall under federal jurisdiction. It is not for me to comment on views regarding confidential documents expressed by anybody in this House.

If it is better rhetoric to say "inadvertently misleading the House", of course I will add that adverb with great pleasure.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, do I clearly understand the Chair's ruling here that it is now parliamentary to use the term "misleading" or "misled" without qualification?

Madam Speaker: It is my understanding that you are quite right, that in Beauchesne's 1958 edition the term "misled" was listed as unparliamentary.

Madam Speaker: In 1974?

Mr. Nielsen: If it pleases the Chair, at page 112 in our debates of March 7, 1974, page 257, the term "misled".

Madam Speaker: That is what I was suggesting to the hon. member, that before that the term was considered to be unparliamentary, but in more recent practices of the House it has been admitted as long as it is qualified. It seems to me that if a member rises, as the hon. minister has done now, adding, as she has, "inadvertently" to the term "misled", this should satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: Indeed it does, and I thank the minister for that.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration from Thursday, October 9, 1980, of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to speak for four minutes yesterday evening before the debate was interrupted, and I see that it is now almost one o'clock. With your permission, may we call it one o'clock and resume the debate this afternoon?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When the House took recess at one o'clock this afternoon, government order No. 18 was under consideration and the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time I have begun this speech, and I hope that I may be able to complete it this afternoon.

As we adjourned our sitting last night, I was saying that today, 113 years after confederation, we are once again engaged in nation-building. Today we have before us legislation which sets forth three broad objectives—three Canadian imperatives for our constitution.

The first is to patriate the various acts which will then become the new Constitution of Canada, and to end our anachronistic legislative dependence upon another Parliament.

Second, we wish to entrench a Canadian charter of rights, including mobility rights and minority language education.

Third, we wish to entrench the principle of equality for all Canadians wherever they live.

Others have spoken and others will speak of the procedures of patriation which are set forth in the legislation. They will speak about the proposed methods of amendment to the constitution when it becomes a Canadian constitution in the fullest sense of that word, but this afternoon I want to speak about another matter.

I want to speak about one of the principal rights that is guaranteed in the new constitution, the right of every Canadian to live and to work for himself or herself in any part of Canada and to provide for his or her family in any part of Canada in which he or she chooses to live. In doing so I shall emphasize the importance of these rights to each and every Canadian. They are as well rights designed to encourage the economic integration of the Canadian union in a highly competitive world.

Mobility rights are important to every Canadian. Indeed, most Canadians would assume that they have the right to move about their country and to live and work where they will. About half of the Canadian population moves every five years. Statistics show that one Canadian in every 20 moves from one province to another once every five years.

Extrapolating past trends indicates that mobility rates are very likely to increase. The guarantee of mobility rights is one part of a yet wider guarantee of movement which is essential to making a success of an economic union. Among other things, the Fathers of Confederation knew that the continuation of the customs barriers on manufactured goods and produce which had marked the colonies of British North America had merely served to weaken them all. When the Fathers of Confederation moved toward the British North America Act, they were on the one hand fearful of the British free trade policy, which seemed to call into jeopardy the health of the British North America economy. They were also fearful of the United States abandonment of reciprocity, that is free trade in North America of manufactured goods. So the Fathers of Confederation rightly recognized that economic forces were making for co-operation in British North America, in addition to the various political forces which were also lending impetus to partnership. They wisely sought an economic union for the mutual benefit of all.

• (1410)

In the British North America Act, section 91 substantiates this approach by giving the federal government the fiscal and monetary powers necessary in a customs union, including the tools necessary to ensure the viability of a common market, that is, a common postal service, weights and measures, the census and statistics, matters relating to bankruptcy, patents and copyrights, unemployment insurance and competition policy.

The power to establish interprovincial and international transport policy required to enhance our economic integration was also set forth in section 91 and in the exceptions to exclusive provincial powers which are to be found in section 92.

To further substantiate our economic union, the British North America Act provided for a single currency, a banking system and other necessary monetary instruments, along, of course, with the highly important trade and commerce power granted in section 91, which ensures basic federal economic paramountcy.

Additionally, however, to underline the nature of the economic union which was being created, the British North America Act, in section 121, states:

All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

It was no accident that the Fathers of Confederation entrenched these rights of the federal government in the BNA Act because they were conscious of the problems that would be created if the barriers continued among the future provinces of Canada. Unfortunately, experience has shown that the fears of the Fathers of Confederation were well warranted. Today, of course, section 121 may be read as being intended to include services, capital and labour, as well as the free movement of goods, but in the face of increasing interprovincial barriers it is now seen by many as insufficiently explicit. With notable ingenuity, provinces have discovered other regulatory devices which have the same effect as customs duties, those duties which were eliminated at the time of confederation, and thereby, in effect, they can circumvent section 121.

It has been the recent experience in Canada that provinces have focused increasingly on the means to improve their own narrow economic performance, especially high value added activities. As a result, many provincial policies now weaken the common market, reducing gains that could otherwise be generated by industrial specialization, and labour and capital are not being used as efficiently as possible.

As each province seeks greater industrial and economic growth, they have sometimes, either wittingly or unwittingly, entered into competition with one another. Let me give a few examples of such barriers and obstructions as exist today. I shall do so with reference to three areas: the free movement of goods, the free movement of capital, and the free movement of labour.

In the case of goods, we see procurement practices on the part of provinces which extend to construction contracts as well as the purchase of goods, a necessity for a high degree of provincial content which can detract from the efficiency of Canadian manufacturing and construction industries. In the case of marketing boards, there are limitations and established prices which can hinder interprovincial trade. In the uniformity of legislation, provinces can cut across the intention of a common market, of a customs union even, by putting up terms and conditions which hinder the nature of interprovincial trade.

Similarly in transportation, particularly in the trucking industry, we have many examples of obstruction and lack of reciprocity which contribute to the breaking down of the real benefits which otherwise should accrue from interprovincial commerce. Equally in the case of the free movement of capital, subsidies to provincial companies, provincial investment tax credits, the regulation of security markets by provinces can all lead to a lack of co-ordination and to competition among provinces. There have, of course, been cases of provincial interference in takeover bids, and members of the House are aware of such recent instances in British Columbia and in Quebec. The competition policy itself can cause difficulties in interjurisdictional disputes. Pension plans may vary from province to province in such a way as to hinder the movement of capital. Land sales and provincial investment plans can be regulated in such a way as to prevent or lessen opportunities for other Canadians to participate in the total national development of our country.

But it is on the third area, that of mobility of labour, that I wish to spend a few minutes because it is specifically that right which is now being placed in our constitution. I do not need to remind some of my colleagues in the House of the various local hiring restrictions which may be found in provincial legislation. I would cite the petroleum and natural gas act of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia's act respecting petroleum resources, the Quebec construction industry's labour relations act, Saskatchewan lease agreements with resource development companies seeking licences to operate, and, of course, many other examples could be offered. The point is that under such legislation, which also extends to restrictions on the freedom of movement of professionals as well of skilled and unskilled labour, requirements are imposed which discriminate in favour of provincial residents. To take only one example of many, in Alberta a pharmacist must have resided in the province for three months before he can apply for registration, and the waiting period in Ontario for a pharmacist is six months. Those in the House who are lawyers will be aware equally of the residency restrictions which are placed on the movement of lawyers within our country.

No one would dispute the fact that the provinces have jurisdiction over labour under section 92 of the BNA Act. They can set forth the conditions of employment, the licensing of professionals, and they can legislate labour laws, but these undeniable powers are sometimes distorted or extended in such a way as to cause increasing obstacles to the full realization of our total economic potential.

The impact of these barriers must be evident to anyone who would recognize that any such interprovincial barriers to the movement of labour, capital and goods prevent all Canadians from achieving the benefits which would flow naturally from our full economic integration. We lose, by such barriers, the benefit of a greater scale of production, the benefits of specialization, and the full benefits that can accrue from the sharing of joint services in transportation and in communications.

Most of all, the barriers can reduce Canada's ability as a nation to compete in a difficult world market and to negotiate with other countries on a standing of equality in international trade relations. Such provincial competition serves to reduce our national efficiency. Of course it may alter the division of the economic pie, but certainly it makes it smaller. In the end such internal competition is merely self-defeating and invites retaliation.

Let me quote the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) on that last point. Very recently he stated:

—discrimination by one province explicitly gives nine other provinces the right to do the same thing, that is the right to retaliate. And when this happens, no one should think that the weaker provinces will be the beneficiaries. For retaliation is a more effective weapon in the hands of the strong than in the hands of the weak. Furthermore, retaliation is most likely to take place at times of economic difficulties and this will only compound the problems of the less fortunate provinces.

While the world is removing obstacles, we are allowing them to increase. While the world is seeking larger economic units, whether in Latin America, Asia or Europe, we are subdividing ours. Unable to utilize tariffs, quotas and certain kinds of indirect taxes for constitutional reasons, the provinces have developed partial substitutes by way of subsidies, regulation of industry, moral suasion, provincial or public ownership, and other devices. But, have we not travelled this road before? Well-documented studies clearly point to the unwelcome effects of prolonged protection of the Canadian market on the efficiency of industry, the high degree of foreign ownership in Canada and the uneven distribution of gains and losses by our various regions. Are we seriously proposing to travel that route in yet smaller provincial markets?

In the new Canada Act we recognize the fundamental nature of mobility rights. The clause in the new legislation reads as follows:

Every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident in Canada has the right (a) to move to and take up residence in any province; and (b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.

So, section 121 of the BNA Act which prohibits obstacles to the movement of goods, and this new clause in the legislation guaranteeing mobility rights, serve very real and not hypothetical needs. These rights for the movement of labour, people, goods and capital are essential to our economic development. Also they are essential if we are to reduce economic disparities in our country and achieve the goal of equalization which of course is promised elsewhere in the new legislation, in the new act before us, in the new constitution. We shall not achieve the equalization we seek without the freedom of movement which is also set forth in the legislation.

The principle of mobility of people and labour, is now in our constitution. As in so many other areas, however, the underlying ideas must be seen as implicit rather than explicit. In fact, the clause guaranteeing the freedom of movement is considerably less than some other proposals which have been made during the intense discussions leading up to the debate we are now undertaking. The Quebec government, the Ontario government and others across the country have looked toward the guarantee of the free movement of goods, services, labour and capital in the new constitution.

For example, the constitutional committee of the Canadian Bar Association held that so basic a matter as the degree of a country's economic integration should not be left to changing judicial philosophy but should be articulated in the constitution. Also it urged the need for greater constitutional support of the national market against provincial protectionist policies which could lead to the balkanization of Canada. To a degree that task is still before us. Of course there is provision in the legislation for first ministers' conferences in the two years ahead. It is my hope that the problems of restriction on the interprovincial movement of goods, services and capital will be explicitly prohibited through those further discussions. In any event, we have made progress and we are making progress, in the legislation currently before us, in guaranteeing the freedoms to ensure that we shall be better able to provide every Canadian with a full opportunity to participate in a prosperous economy.

More generally we are participating in a debate which will confirm that with our new constitution at home, amenable to further growth and evolution as necessary by Canadians, we shall affirm our own faith in our own judgment, in the determination of our own domestic arrangements and our own unique way of life.

Victor Hugo once wrote the following:

On résiste à l'invasion des armées, on ne résiste pas à l'invasion des idées.

It has been rather picturesquely translated as:

Greater than the tread of mighty armies is an idea whose hour has come.

The hour has come to bring home the Canadian constitution and to guarantee Canadians those rights which are fundamental to the full realization of the partnership of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a Canadian. Unlike many of my colleagues on this side of the House I am not a constitutional expert, nor can I hope to rise to the eloquence of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on the opening day of this historic debate which was unquestionably the finest speech of my leader's political career. It set the tone and very high standard for interventions from hon. members on all sides of the House on this vitally important and lasting resolution for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): This resolution is for all of us and for all time. On constitutional matters I guess I know as many details about the amending formula and the process of entrenchment of the charter of human rights, indeed the whole mechanism of bringing the British North America Act to Canada, as do most of the 75,000 people I have the honour to represent in Hamilton-Wentworth. I dare say that most of my constituents would agree with the redoubtable former Senator Eugene Forsey when he said:

I haven't heard anyone say that they couldn't sleep at nights because the constitution wasn't patriated, that they couldn't keep their coffee down in the mornings until we see a charter of human rights, or that they couldn't concentrate on their work until there's an amending formula.

I believe my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), can be credited with the saying that "you cannot eat a constitution and constitutions do not employ anybody".

I know from my contact with people, not only throughout my own constituency but during a month-long campaign in the Hamilton West riding and a mid-summer trip to western Canada, that Canadians are far more concerned with the frightening national deficit, ever-increasing unemployment, and the double digit inflation in this country. Even this past week some of my people were wondering why Parliament has been recalled to spend time talking about the constitution, after all we have heard this past summer, and not dealing directly and immediately with a national energy policy. That is not a bad question.

The government may have set December 9 as the deadline for the Special Joint Senate-Commons Committee on Constitutional Reform to complete its hearings, but by December 9 Canadians will be well past the point of no return in terms of any decisions that we make in this Parliament on the average Canadian's budgeting plans for the cost of keeping warm this winter. Whatever results from this great Canadian debate on the constitution will, the government presumes and, we hope, last us for at least another 113 years.

What Canadians in Hamilton-Wentworth, and I suspect in a great many other communities as well, would like to know is what kind of energy security will they have for the next three, or indeed, 13 years. When you talk to people about the constitution they really do ask: what is the fuss all about? What is the rush all about? The only person in one of the major towns in my riding, Ancaster, who would venture an opinion on the constitution was an elderly lady who said, "I have got to go and read up on the BNA Act and find out what they are going to do to it". Nobody I questioned at any of the fall fairs knows how it is done or why it needs to be done.

When you talk about cutting ties with Britain, people in my area do get exercised, but their ties with the mother country are more emotional than governmental. But the feeling generally is that bringing home the constitution will not affect the average true Canadian, strong and free, anywhere in Hamilton-Wentworth. Folks do say, though, it is high time we governed ourselves. But then most people think that is what we have been doing all along.

There is widespread concern, confusion, and raising of eyebrows at all the rhetoric at the recent first ministers' conference. Random samplings of my constituents suggest that all ten provincial premiers were guilty of parochialism of the first order. When you ask them how they feel about the new constitution, as proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the folks I represent are likely to say that this is not the kind of issue they would expect an opposition party to oppose. Then they add, "But of course nobody here is aware of any of the nasty little wrinkles in it."

This 49-page document before us may be emblazoned with a nice red maple leaf flag, but it is indeed dotted with red flags throughout—those nasty little wrinkles. As my leader put it:

> It's a Trojan horse. It looks like it's what we want. It achieves patriation. But it is absolutely dangerous and fundamentally changes the nature of this country.

My leader is dead right. Once that Trojan horse gets inside the walls it will release soldiers who will give many people across this country reason to think about what this government is doing.

The government, through the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, has expressed the hope that this debate will rise above political partisanship. Let me make it clear at the outset—I have two views on letting party allegiance and political bias intrude on an historic debate such as this. The first point I will put on record is that I, like all members of this party, favour patriation of the constitution. I believe it is long past due that Canadians should have control over their own constitution. I favour the entrenchment of a charter of human rights and fundamental freedoms in that constitution. I do have reservations about the imposition of minority language educational rights in the Prime Minister's announced package. I will deal with that in a moment. I strongly recommend the Bill of Rights, preamble and all, be enshrined in this constitution as a lasting tribute to the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

My second point about getting political in this kind of debate is that the Prime Minister has made it impossible to submerge one's partisan stirrings, and at the same time the whole unilateral manner in which this government is proceeding has whipped my feelings as a Canadian into a near frenzy. Concerns have been raised and rebuffed in this chamber about the government keeping up its advertising campaign while this debate is in progress. I am wondering about the travel at taxpayers' expense, such as special government aircraft to the United Kingdom as when Mark and John went off to see the Queen.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) had lunch with the Queen at Balmoral Castle. Then they visited with Prime Minister Margeret Thatcher. That is all fine since it was being done through the Canadian High Commission. But now we learn the two ministers have been wining and dining British journalists and publishers around London to explain the government's point of view, that is, the Liberal point of view, the one, dominating party point of view here. And a question which could be asked is whether any of the opposition parties, any spokesmen from the opposition parties, have been getting to these influential people in the United Kingdom. What upsets us is that we, the taxpayers, pay for all of these luncheons and dinners. We are paying for a unilateral action we do not believe in.

The corollary is that the Prime Minister's cabinet will be fanning out all across the country to spread the message, the propaganda, at government expense, at taxpayers' expense—our expense. They will be concentrating, of course, in western Canada where the concern is deepest, the anger more justifiably acute.

There is no government subsidization in this program for opposition members of Parliament to explain the constitution which affects everybody in this nation. There is no hope at all for those who want to go out and express an opposing point of view. We have to do it at our own cost—and we will. The government is spending our money to promote one point of view, the Liberal point of view, and they ask us to keep this debate non-partisan?

The Prime Minister made an admirable start at a non-partisan, balanced and responsible approach to Canada's constitutional reform when he appointed two of Canada's foremost authorities on the subject to co-chair an important task force, the distinguished former premier of Ontario, the Hon. John Robarts, a master of consensus at gatherings like the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference, in Toronto, and his equally qualified Liberal counterpart, the amiable hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin). They became the Banting and Best of constitutional change.

The Pepin-Robarts Task Force on National Unity went from coast to coast listening to the views of hundreds upon hundreds of Canadians as they poured forth their views almost nightly—on national television—on the kind of Canada they wanted to see. Having thus dramatically sampled the grass roots of this country, at a cost of several million dollars to the taxpayers, the task force handed down comprehensive and far-reaching recommendations for the future of the country. Indeed, pretty soon the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton became the constitutional expert most in demand on the nation-wide speaking circuit, through the media, almost eclipsing the acknowledged dean of constitutional commentary in Canada, former Senator Forsey.

But whose face did we see for seemingly endless hours and days on the TV screen right behind or beside the Prime Minister's at the recent federal-provincial conference? Who got the chance to go to London to see the Queen and explain Canada's case? Why, it was that renowned constitutional expert and household name, the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. Where was the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton? Did anybody ever see his benign countenance on the TV screen during that week-long "Operation Klieg-Light"? Does anybody know if the Minister of Transport was consulted before the Prime Minister's unveiling of this document last week, or whether he was offered any room on the government aircraft which flew off to the United Kingdom this past week carrying the other two ministers to meet the Queen and wine and dine the British press?

I should point out here I am not being mischievously partisan here. I am concerned and disappointed about the Prime Minister freezing out the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton from this historic, symbolic and cataclysmic move of the BNA Act from Britain to Canada. I am disappointed because the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton happens to be my MP. My family's Ottawa residence as opposed to our home in Dundas, Ontario, lies deep within my hon. friend's riding. While I am hoping against hope that he will ever be able to do anything as Minister of Transport to satisfy those of us who are concerned about airport expansion, I had come to expect a somewhat higher profile and, I might add, a much deserved role as one of the fathers of reconfederation. The minister will know that my disappointment is sincere.

Mr. Pepin: I am helping both your airports.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): The minister said that he is helping both my airports. I will believe that when I see the results. My concern about the minister's total exclusion from this exercise goes to the very root of this debate and forms the basis of my party's honest objection to what this Liberal government and this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in particular are determined to do. Let me just quote a couple of key recommendations out of the Pepin-Robarts report:

> Our conclusion, then, with respect to regionalism parallels our judgment about duality in two ways. First, we accept both of them as basic social and political realities, but we also recognize the legitimate claims of both and the potential they offer to enrich and diversify Canadian life. In other words we accept their existence, we also recognize their value . . . we also believe that regionalism in Canadian life is expressed primarily . . . within the framework of the provinces and we regard the provincial and territorial governments as critical agents in articulating the concerns and aspirations of these regional communities.

Clearly, that endorses the provinces as legitimate spokesmen for the concerns of their regions. One of the most telling sections of the Pepin-Robarts report reads as follows:

> —our commitment to the constitution of the Canadian federation that a system with the authority of the state shared by two orders of government—

It says two orders of government.

> —each sovereign and at the same time committed to co-operative association with the other under a constitution.
> We think that the approach to Canada's problems must be as varied and comprehensive as are the problems themselves. There is no single answer that will do the job.

That, in my view, reflects a view of Canada that flies in the face of the Prime Minister's "this or else" approach. On language rights, which go to the heart of our debate on Canadian unity, the Pepin-Robarts report states:

> The principle of the equality of status, rights and privileges of the English and French languages for all purposes declared by the Parliament of Canada, within its sphere of jurisdiction, should be entrenched in the constitution.
> Each provincial legislature should have the right to determine an official language or official languages for that province, within its sphere of jurisdiction.
> Should all provinces agree on these or any other linguistic rights, these rights should then be entrenched in the constitution.

The operative words there are "should all provinces agree". The Pepin-Robarts report favours entrenchment of rights. However, the implication is that entrenchment should be based on consensus in order to have uniformity. The list of rights should, if necessary, be limited to those on which there is agreement. Here is what the present Prime Minister said, according to an article in The Canadian Forum, published in June, 1962, and I quote from page 53:

> I said it earlier: it is necessary to divorce the concepts of the state and of the nation, and to make Canada a society truly pluralist and multinational. And for that, it is necessary to assure to different regions, inside the Canadian state, a large measure of local autonomy, so that through the experience of self-government, the nationals can give themselves laws and institutions indispensable to the growth and progress of their national values. At the same time, and in a movement of withdrawal, it is necessary that British Canadian nationalism consent to change the image it has given to Canada. If it wishes to protect and incarnate its specific ethnic values, it must do it by the machinery of local and regional autonomy, rather than by way of pan-Canadian sovereignty.

Admittedly, this was written 14 years before the Parti Québécois came into power, but it is still interesting to read what the present Prime Minister had to say in 1962. He went on to say:

Moreover, no provincial frontier coincides exactly with ethnic and linguistic frontiers, and consequently no provincial government is asked by the constitution to legislate only for a single ethnic group—that would tend to develop the nation-state mentality at the provincial level. On this point it would be well if the past attitudes of Quebec towards its national minorities served as an example to provinces which have large French, German, Ukrainian and other minorities.

It would appear that the Prime Minister was expressing ideas in 1962 that his own royal commission reflected 16 or 17 years later. Yet the Prime Minister has rejected the thrust of the Pepin-Robarts report, although you would never have known that to have been the case if you read The Toronto Star article by Terrence Wills on January 27, 1979. The Prime Minister is confidently quoted as saying:

I would be happy to campaign on the Pepin-Robarts (task force) general approach to Canadian unity and the constitution.

I think it is the country's loss that the Prime Minister did not follow his own advice and the advice of his own royal commission, that the thrust of a comprehensive and valuable report such as the Pepin-Robarts document should be simply dismissed by the Prime Minister and his advisers. I am sorry that the spirit of that royal commission is not present either in this proposed constitution or in the unilateral approach the government, of which the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton is a part, is now taking.

I mentioned a few moments ago a concern, a reservation I have about the minority language educational rights in the Prime Minister's so-called "people's package". I am worried, indeed convinced, that this proposed resolution here enshrines, enhances, protects part of Quebec's language law Bill 101 forever in the constitution of Canada in so far as Canada's immigrant population is concerned. Section 23(1) does guarantee minority language educational rights if you are a Canadian or a permanent resident and if your mother tongue is either French or English. That right is guaranteed to any Canadian citizen, to enroll their children in schools of first or second official language of their choice, in any province of Canada where numbers warrant minority language educational facilities.

However, that does not extend to any immigrant family going into the province of Quebec. A Portuguese family in Calgary or a newly arrived Hungarian family in Sudbury, or, closer to home, Greek, Dutch or Italian families in my own riding of Hamilton-Wentworth have the choice to educate their children in either English or French schools, where French language educational facilities are now available, except in Quebec.

Section 23(2) says that, in effect, any citizen of Canada moving from one province to another, and in this case it applies particularly to children, have the option of enrolling in the school with the language of their choice, that is, English or French, where numbers warrant in the case of the French language. But any immigrant family, be they our Portuguese friends from Calgary, or the Hungarian family from Sudbury, or the Greek, Dutch or Italian families from my area who move into Quebec must, under Bill 101, have their children enrolled in French schools. I really wonder why should an immigrant family which moves into the province of Quebec not have the same language rights as any immigrant family who, as it states in subsection (2) "changes residence from one province to another"

This is an astonishing omission by a prime minister who claims he is trying to protect minority language rights by enshrining them in his proposed new constitution of Canada, but who appears to be making an exception for the province of Quebec by his very legislation before us now. This document is silent about minority language rights for immigrants.

As I used to say when I was a reporter in the Press Gallery just above you, Mr. Speaker, this is the Prime Minister who, somehow, never quite got around to challenging the legality of Bill 101 in the courts. Now, from the point of view of anyone wanting to move to the province of Quebec, he is virtually enshrining it forever, for all of us, and especially for the vitally important ethno-cultural groups that make Canada such a marvellous mosaic, but which can only feel real freedom in nine provinces out of ten. That kind of principle, enshrined in this proposed constitution of 1980, is totally unacceptable to me as I am sure it will be to any non-Anglo-saxon and non-Francophone groups in Canada:

I should like now to quote the remarks of an acknowledged constitutional expert, as follows:

This proposed new constitution doesn't help the immigrants one scrap. Bill 101 is allowed to continue to ride roughshod over them and it hits their children particularly.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that "immigrants" in this case does not only apply to Third World people who wish to move to Quebec. Bill 101 affects people who do not know a single word of any other language but English. It applies to a professor coming in from the United Kingdom or the United States, immigrants from Australia, New Zealand, the West Indies—this new constitutional proposal does not look after them at all. Bill 101 takes absolute precedence over any other law. If these various immigrant families knew that this proposed charter of minority language educational rights does nothing to give them the freedom of choice that they have every right to demand, and indeed can receive in the nine other provinces of Canada, then I suspect they might think differently about relocating in the province of Quebec. That would be a shame; it could only cause a further deterioration of the economy of that province.

Mr. Speaker, four words uttered at the very beginning of this debate go to the root of this government's intentions, and go to the root of the Canadian federation as we know it. They typify this government's attitude toward the traditions, the conventions, the very idea of what Canada is all about—four words, uttered in a moment of considerable emotion, and in impeccable English by the lead-off speaker for the government, the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), He said "We will change Canada." The emphasis, Mr. Speaker, is on the word "change".

Now, contrary to what those on the government side and our friends on the left might think, the word "change" is not a call to arms to members of my party. I am definitely not one who is in favour of change for the sake of change. Speaking personally, as a progressive kind of Conservative, I welcome change which will truly benefit Canadian society; change which comes about, for example, in response to a social need, through reasoned debate and discussion, change which conserves the best of experience and traditions of the past, as one charts a course for the future. That is the kind of change in which I believe. But as an average Canadian citizen, I cannot help feeling that the present British North America Act has served this country pretty well during the past 113 years.

I know there is a restlessness, among the young people particularly, and in certain areas and regions of this country, about renewing and Canadianizing our constitution. That is an important feeling that must be addressed in any constitutional change. But it is Quebec that wants change most urgently.

All of this can be, and should be, understood by the rest of the country, and by those people who do not see the need for that kind of change—particularly since we have grown of age and no longer need to have our constitution controlled and amended by a foreign country. I can understand most Canadians sympathizing with that point of view.

What I very much resent, and I am speaking quite personally now, as a Canadian and as an individual member of Parliament, not necessarily speaking on behalf of my party, is the unseemly haste, the unnecessary tinkering and tampering with a constitution which is not only the foundation of 113 years of this country's lifetime, but a constitution which our Fathers of Confederation built upon the precedents and traditions of several hundred years of the British parliamentary democratic system. That system, as Winston Churchill once put it, may not be the best system in the world, but it surely beats whatever takes second place.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, this is a deviously dangerous document. No matter how often we on the opposition side try to point out how profoundly we disagree with certain segments of the Prime Minister's proposed new constitution, members on the government side and members of the media choose to interpret this opposition in totality, if I may use a famous word. They disregard some of our very real concerns about the dangerous aspects of this document and choose to interpret any adverse comment about the Prime Minister's image of the future of our country as, possibly, anti-patriation. Let me make clear on behalf of my party, for myself, and to anybody who is listening out there, that we favour patriation of the British North America Act. We favour Canadian control over a Canadian constitution. It is high time that we move now, as we should have moved ten or 15 or 20 years ago. Nobody will disagree with that basic principle. But one cannot rush into this kind of thing by a December 9 deadline.

As Thomas Jefferson wrote in a letter to George Washington, "Delay is preferable to error". I am not suggesting another 53 years' delay, but we do not have to do it by December 9. As I have said, this proposed new constitution is violating a fundamental principle on which this country was built. Whenever you violate a principle, you get a short-term gain but a long-term loss.

The Prime Minister stated at the close of the First Ministers' Conference on the constitution that he sees two concepts of Canada. He saw two irreconcilable versions of this country expressed at the conference. One view, held by some of the provincial premiers, the Prime Minister said, was that Canada is an association of provinces, and that his own view was that Canada "is more than the sum of its parts". The Prime Minister said:

> There is a national interest which transcends regional interests. In a conflict between national and provincial interests, the national interest must prevail.

I found that very interesting. It might interest hon. members to hear the Prime Minister's words from his book, "Federalism and the French Canadian", published in 1968; I quote from page 191 as follows:

> Federalism is by its very essence a compromise and a pact . . . It is a pact or quasi treaty in the sense that the terms of that compromise cannot be changed unilaterally.

I emphasize the last five words—"compromise cannot be changed unilaterally". These are the Prime Minister's own words, his own writings. The Prime Minister once again chooses to ignore his own advice. Mr. Speaker, I am a strong believer in the principle of a federal government's role: Ottawa must act in the national interest when some premiers are acting as czars in their own regions. But the Prime Minister and I really part company when it comes to how strong the central government should be when conflicts arise.

The Canada I believe in is definitely not the Canada that this present Prime Minister is trying to mold in his own image through constitutional reform. Next time you see a picture of the original Fathers of Confederation, count them: 37 men came to a consensus and created a confederation nearly a century and a quarter ago. Canada then, as now, was in fact and still is a sum of its parts. Of course, then, as now, a strong leadership role was needed in Ottawa. But the federal nature of this country was respected, and it was practised with distinction under 15 prime ministers of Canada until the right hon. member for Mount Royal came along.

The Canada I believe in, and in which I have travelled extensively, really amounts to at least five, six, and I feel maybe seven different countries, or regions, each with its own geographical and sociopolitical point of view: Atlantic Canada,

Quebec, Ontario, the prairies, British Columbia, the Yukon and western Arctic, and then perhaps put the eastern Arctic, northern Quebec and Labrador into another not-so-small area.

Within these major regions, you will find developing areas of self-interest and uniqueness. Canada's newest province, Newfoundland, not only resents being lumped in with the maritimes, but one must now refer to Atlantic Canada and Newfoundland and Labrador. I know from sitting immediately behind my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka that more than geography separates northern Ontario from the more materialistic and heavily populated southern and western parts of this province. I cannot imagine three more unusually different experiences than visiting Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. It is almost impossible to believe they are neighbours. It is almost like comparing Nova Scotians with Prince Edward Islanders or New Brunswick Acadians with the folks you meet in St. Boniface.

As for British Columbia, I have come to respect the description of politics in British Columbia offered by a former colleague of mine in the press gallery, Allan Fotheringham. He describes politics in British Columbia simply as an adventure. Mind you, he does go on to describe politics on the Prairies as a cause; here in Ontario as a business; in Quebec as a religion, and in the maritimes as a disease. That is the mosaic of Canada as seen by Mr. Fotheringham. We are breathlessly awaiting an appropriate description of politics in Newfoundland. I am actively consulting the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for St. John's West on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

The point I am trying to make is this: as diversified as we are, as many strains as we go through in this nation, we began by consensus. We have survived for 113 years by consensus. Our differences were always reconcilable. They are reconcilable still. What in the world is the use of denying that fact? Why is government moving in a fashion that could tear this country apart?

By nature, I am an optimist. As a Canadian, I have always been fiercely loyal and proud of my country. The Canada I have known, the Canada in which my family and I live today, the Canada I want to see in the future for my son and for his children and for their children, is a country that builds on the 113 years of its past with all its conventions, its traditions, its incredible diversity and its indefinable character. I see a Canada of the present whose people too often take for granted how very lucky we are to live in freedom, and, when one looks around the rest of the world, how remarkably well off we are.

And when emotions cool in the wake of this constitutional revolution, I pray for very positive chances for Canada in the future. But I say this to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau): that future Canada cannot happen unless and until he adopts a more reasonable attitude toward constitutional reform. His government must replace conflict with consensus. It must replace controversy with compromise. It must replace confrontation with toleration.

I urge the government to show respect for Canada's past, to show some understanding of the tensions and differences in Canada's present so that Canada will have a positive and worth-while future.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I suggest, the resolution we are considering at this time requires the serious and non-partisan attention of all those honoured to sit here in the highest directly-elected position our country affords. Virtually every member of this House will agree that the debate now taking place to resolve the patriation of our constitution is long overdue. We may differ as to the exact contents of the resolution as political parties are wont to do. Surely no one in this chamber shares the reported view of Premier René Lévesque that our constitution should continue to remain on the other side of the ocean.

A little later in my remarks I want to discuss the provision in this resolution for a deadlock-breaking mechanism by way of a referendum. I want to pay particular attention to what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had to say on that subject.

First of all, I would like to make some more general remarks about the constitution itself and the provisions which are contained in this resolution. I think that as Canadians we have long been embarrassed to say in front of an American, or a person from another country, that after 113 years of independence, we still have to go overseas—to England—to request amendments to our constitution and that the British parliament must act with elected representatives from all over the British Isles, none from Canada, to consider Canadian questions.

When I was associated with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, like other members here, I became involved in a discussion one day with a chap from Sierra Leone, and one or two others, and they would not believe me when I told them we still had to go to London to have our constitution amended. It is not only embarrassing, it is unbelievable.

If we accept that such a situation should end, let us examine the question of how it should end. I believe a resolution, such as the one before the House now, preferably with the concurrence of all the provinces, would unquestionably be ideal. This is what, all of us would wish. If there is a difference, perhaps it will lie in the wording I will turn to later—how long can one wait or should one wait to achieve that ideal and whether Canadians are content that we should go on decade after decade without our constitution having been brought home.

Unfortunately, in 53 years of attempts to achieve the desired unanimity among all the provinces, it has not been possible. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) who has just spoken talked of unseeming haste. I can hardly classify him as a red Tory after that remark; that is some haste—53 years. I believe I can establish pretty reasonably to the benefit of the independent observer that if unanimity were not possible in 53 years it would be no more likely to occur in the 70 years between now and the year 2050. Before I do that let us ask the question: if unanimity cannot be achieved, are we content—the members of this House, the public of Canada—to leave the constitution at Westminster for those 70 more years.

Mr. Epp: Nobody is saying we should.

Mr. Nowlan: You were here on Monday, you heard.

Mr. Regan: I heard the Leader of the Opposition and I will be turning to his remarks in due course.

An hon. Member: What are you talking about?

Mr. Regan: I appreciate the desire of hon. members to make interventions, but I want them to hear me out for a while.

Mr. Epp: Stay with the facts and we will.

Mr. Regan: I will stay very close to the facts indeed.

Each person is entitled in this debate to express his or her own opinion in this forum of democracy. Surely at the end of this debate, the rules for determining a majority will prevail only after a serious and detailed study of the provisions of the resolution and of possible alternatives. But as one legislator, the opinion I express and the way I shall vote will be in the direction of patriating our constitution at last in a final, substantive and also symbolically important move to establish our destiny as a great and free country.

It is high time we did this. No longer can excuses be found for further delay. Perhaps the hope that we harboured for so long in this country and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pursued for some 12 years, that of achieving unanimity among ten provincial governments with ten different interests and points of view, was too much to cherish. Certainly the president of the United States would not call together the 50 governors and expect them to agree unanimously on anything. Let me give an example.

There are deeply-held views as to whether civil rights should be entrenched in the constitution. I happen to believe it should be in today's society, but is it likely or logical that ten premiers would have a unanimous opinion on whether civil rights should be entrenched? If you take any ten people, one or two will feel the system works better without entrenchment of rights. I think the majority would feel they should be entrenched. I use that to illustrate that to achieve unanimity on all the items that go together to make up this resolution is a virtually impossible task.

If one accepts my position that inability to achieve unanimity cannot be allowed to thwart indefinitely the aspirations of the Canadian people to bring their own constitution to Canada, the next question that follows is whether we have tried hard enough and long enough to achieve unanimity and whether further efforts would be likely to yield different results. On that point I speak from the vantage point of having participated in the constitutional renewal process as a provincial premier from, if you like, the other side of the table and the other point of view.

While I served as premier of Nova Scotia, I participated in the constitutional first ministers' conference at Victoria in 1971. In succeeding years, I took part in 23 first ministers' conferences. In Victoria, there were people like Premier Strom, for whom I have always had a great respect, Premier Bourassa, the late W. A. C. Bennett and various others who were premiers at that time. Those who held office changed as years passed.

In those 23 first ministers' conferences I came to know how they operate in closed sessions as well as in public. Of course, the talk changes when the prime minister and the premiers go into a closed room. Nine and a half years ago in Victoria we came closer to unanimity on the constitution than ever before, or since. We were closer than is likely ever to happen again, given the emergency of the resource issue and the growing tendency of many premiers to hold Canada's aspiration for patriation of the constitution hostage for the yielding of evermore federal powers to the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: My remarks are consistent. When I was a provincial premier, I believed in a strong central government as being the essence of Canada, and as a "fed", I continue to believe in it just as strongly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I do not fault some premiers because they have a different view of their responsibilities. They have the problem of meeting the demands of their people and the frustration of limited powers in doing so. Some would say these negotiations have dragged on. As new issues have come forth, they would agree to entrench civil rights if more federal power would be given to the provinces. They want to trade the people's rights for more power for their governments.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Regan: I do not even say "shame!" I say it is unfortunate. It is misguided. It is not a process that will bring us a new Canadian constitution because we already have the most decentralized federation in the free world. We must retain a residual amount of power, financial power, in the central government or the country will become balkanized with very different levels of standard of living and nothing in common which can hold nationhood together.

For a period of time after Victoria and in those succeeding conferences, I believed that continuing efforts would overcome the outstanding issues. At Victoria we came very close. Only one government held out against unanimity. I thought that through compromise, persuasion, the passage of time and other meetings we might perhaps achieve unanimity. What I did not then realize but now see clearly is that it does not work that way. The identities of premiers and parties of government keep changing. If there is one characteristic of a new government, it is the desire to distinguish its policies from that of its predecessor. It seems to be a primary requirement for new governments to do this, regardless of what their politics may be. The result is that just when unanimity seems in sight, you have a crop of premiers with new and different demands. Like the child's game of red light, you have to go back to the starting line and start all over again. That is what our society has done.

When I was defeated as premier in September, 1978, I was the senior premier of all the provinces. In other words, I had been premier longer than anyone in the country, except for the national Prime Minister, and that was after only eight years in office. I think this illustrates the rate of turnover in a business that is characterized by a lack of security of tenure. That of course complicates the problem of new governments coming in with new issues.

As premier, I wanted the principle of equalization entrenched in the constitution. I am mighty happy to find that it is going to be. That is what I was laying on the table when looking at it from a provincial point of view.

My successor in that office in Nova Scotia has new and different demands to place on the table as a condition precedent to agreeing to patriation of our constitution, as do many of the other premiers. I suggest it will always be thus if we continue the barren search for unanimity. I have therefore concluded that we are correct, wise and expressing the will of the vast majority of Canadians in moving ahead with patriation at this time.

There is one point I would like to make in that regard. Our great Prime Minister and this government approach this necessity with resignation and with regret that unanimity was not possible.

Mr. Friesen: First, the resignation!

Mr. Regan: Some of his opponents for political purpose try to paint a gleeful picture of the Prime Minister moving ahead without the provinces. All the evidence shows how contrary this is to the truth. Twelve years of patient effort by the Prime Minister to reach agreement with the provinces provides articulate testimony of a determined and sincere effort to achieve unanimity. Twelve years of ever-escalating concessions by the federal government demonstrates remarkable flexibility in the desire to achieve agreement. To me, at least, the foregoing facts require that the present type of action be taken if we are ever to have our own constitution. This I believe.

May I then turn to the contents of the resolution as to whether they are adequate and appropriate to establish a constitution based in Canada which will enable ongoing negotiations with the provinces on any exchanges of powers and responsibilities that will enable our respective levels of government to better serve the people.

First of all, if we are going to bring home the constitution, if we are going to pass the resolution and patriate the constitution, we must have an amending formula. It is necessary because if you do not have a specifically expressed amending formula, a requirement for unanimity might lead to a straitjacket situation, and no future improvements could be made to the constitution even though the great majority of provinces would want them.

The question of the type of amending formula is, of course, one on which there has been much debate. I personally agonized over the Victoria formula because it seemed to give a veto by population to some larger provinces but not to some smaller provinces. I cannot accept the concept of two classes of provinces, yet the only alternative might seem to be unanimity, which is worse.

I think the position the Prime Minister has taken has again shown remarkable flexibility. Let us take first the Victoria formula on which we came closest to achieving unanimity, with nine out of ten premiers accepting it and the tenth accepting it for three or four days until he backed down from it.

Mr. Chrétien: Fourteen days.

Mr. Regan: Let us take that, but let us provide, as the Prime Minister said at the recent conference, that if the provinces have a better one they can bring it forward. They have two years, I believe it is, in which to do that.

Mr. Epp: What percentage do they need? I think it is 80 per cent.

Mr. Regan: He did say that.

Mr. Chrétien: It is eight provinces, 80 per cent.

Mr. Epp: That is not unanimity.

Mr. Regan: If the provinces come forward then we can have a plebiscite on the subject.

Let me refer to the second item, the entrenchment of basic civil rights. I believe this is necessary to protect citizens today from any excess of government. I respect those who hold contrary views, but this is obviously a matter to be decided appropriately here by majority opinion.

The third item refers to language rights. Language rights must be included. Surely this is the essence of the commitment we all made as Canadians a few months ago when we were combatting separatism. When that was at its height and when we were not certain how the plebiscite in Quebec would go, each and every one of the premiers and each and every member of this House, or virtually all, would have been prepared to grant that quickly. How quickly we forget. I think this is vital; it is the essence of what our country is all about and it must be included.

What else does this resolution do? It enshrines the principle of equalization. As a Nova Scotian I am delighted with the words. I find that they are very strong and very satisfactory.

I could talk about mobility of workers, which I consider important, but I want to get on with other matters.

The fifth refers to a deadlock-breaking mechanism in the ultimate event of serious and continued difference between the federal and provincial levels of government. That, of course, is very important. One might well ask whether a deadlock-breaking mechanism is necessary or whether a referendum or an appeal directly to the people of Canada is the appropriate mechanism to break that deadlock.

The first thing to remember is that a way to break such a deadlock between provincial and federal interests has always existed. It has existed for the 113 years of our confederation. But that method will go out of existence the instant the constitution is patriated. It will no longer be there. That safety valve will be gone. That residual power has always been vested in the British Parliament, which has the power to amend the BNA Act without unanimous request. It is not important whether or not the British parliament used that power. In an emergency it was there, and the fact that it was known to be there had a salutary effect on many considerations.

When we bring home the constitution we shall be living in new circumstances. The British parliament will be washing its hands of Canada. It will say it will not enact any more legislation, and its members will probably say thank God they are rid of us. But that parliament will no longer be in a position to be the safety valve, no longer there to be the deadlock-breaking mechanism. We must substitute a new deadlock-breaking mechanism or have none.

I fear that those who assail the deadlock-breaking mechanism by way of referendum have not applied logic to understand the result of not having one. I for one would be extremely uncomfortable to have a constitution in a federal country as diverse and as vast as Canada without provision for an ultimate appeal to the people, or some deadlock-breaking mechanism.

Surely as Canadians, with our fights between the provinces and federal governments, we have demonstrated ample capacity to reach a deadlock. In all such cases does anyone really believe that a strait-jacket of the status quo is preferable to an appeal to the ultimate sovereignty of the people? If that appeal, that deadlock-breaking mechanism, is not to be to the people by way of a referendum, what else? Would it be an appeal to the Dalai Lama, or some other provision? I think that does not make much logic, and that, of course, is where I quarrel with the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is a man for whom I have very considerable respect, a respect beyond that which his office and past offices command, but for him to say in very dramatic fashion that section 42 would or could destroy the provinces and could destroy Canada is a very extraordinary statement.

That right hon. gentleman must know that it provides a narrower opportunity of breaking a constitutional deadlock than presently exists and is, therefore, less of a threat to the provincial powers which he mentions. As long as the constitution remains in England the British parliament has the ultimate residual power to make any change, regardless of how drastic. The constitutional practice has been that the British parliament will act on a resolution of the national Parliament alone. This government is giving up that residual emergency route in bringing home the constitution.

The only case I know of when a province tried to go directly to the British parliament was after Nova Scotia came into confederation in 1867 without a plebiscite in Nova Scotia and the people objected to what the legislators had done. Joe Howe and some of our other boys went overseas and tried to get the British parliament to reverse it. They went as far as getting an independent, John Bright, to make a speech in the House, but the government at Westminster said then, and they have said ever since, that they will deal with the national government of Canada.

This government has far more power to bypass the provinces than it would have under this new provision. Despite the fact that the power has existed for 113 years it has not been used to destroy the provinces. The Leader of the Opposition by his remarks places less confidence in the Canadian people than he does in the British parliament. I would hate to think he shares with René Lévesque comfort in retaining a somewhat colonial status, for if he is willing for patriation I find it hard to believe he would want a constitution without a safety valve. Let us see if his fear is well based, or whether it is another case of contrived hysteria.

In what situation would section 42 be used? It would be used if fundamental disagreement existed between the federal government and some premiers on a constitutional amendment that became necessary and important to the country because of circumstances that could not possibly be foreseen now; maybe 50 or 100 years from now. When you lock yourself into a constitution you lock yourself into it forever.

Let us ask how safe is that safety valve? This appeal to the sovereignty of the people when there is a deadlock between the provinces and the federal government does not just require a majority of the people across the country voting for it.

• (1530)

Because of the regional nature of Canada, the Victoria formula requires that a majority of the people in the Atlantic provinces, a majority of the people in Quebec, a majority of the people in Ontario and a majority of the people in the west turn their backs on their premiers and vote for the federal proposition. That is a very dangerous proposition, is it not? Do hon. members remember the days of the clash between the Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker when he was prime minister and Joseph Smallwood who was premier of Newfoundland? It had something to do with a strike there. They had a terrible clash. If an appeal had been made by way of a plebescite by the federal government, do hon. members think the federal government would have had any chance of carrying a majority in Newfoundland against Mr. Smallwood? Obviously it would be equally ridiculous today. Let us suppose that a federal government was trying to take resources away from Alberta and a plebescite were called in Alberta. How great are the chances that the people of Alberta would vote against Peter Lougheed, for the "feds" and for a transfer of the resources? Hon.

members from Calgary would tell us that the chances are not very great.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. minister seems to be unaware that the proposal as it stands would enable the government to do just that, that it is not a majority in the west but a majority in two of the western—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That is a point of argument and not a point of order.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I have read the proposal well, and if the hon. member had followed my words, he would know that I was giving him an example of regional feelings, and that is exactly the situation.

Mr. Nowlan: Explain P.E.I., then. As a man from Nova Scotia you eliminated P.E.I.

Mr. Regan: I would like to get on with my own arguments, and if there is time afterwards I would be happy to try to deal with that question.

The Leader of the Opposition suggests that provision 42 could do away with the very existence of our provinces. That is so only if the people of every single region of Canada were insane enough to vote to do away with the provinces. Can hon. members imagine that situation? What the Leader of the Opposition does not say is that equally it can be used to destroy federal powers because in any appeal to the people certainly if the people are going to vote in such an irrational way, there are dangers, but just as much danger to the federal powers.

Let us assume the unlikely proposition that a government such as the one led by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition last year was again elected, with its passionate urge to divest the federal government of many of its powers. Let us assume such a government was trying to give things away to the provinces as the previous government did, the lotteries and everything else. Even if some premiers felt this was bad and that strong central government was important, the Leader of the Opposition, the then prime minister, could, under this provision, appeal over the heads of those premiers who objected and believed in strong central government.

Such a government could appeal in the referendum process and, if the people were foolish enough, he could pass an amendment which would strip the federal government, by referendum, of its powers. It works two ways.

Perhaps either proposition falls into the "pigs might fly" category, but I think that my illustration shows that an appeal to the people region by region is no more dangerous to provincial powers than it is to federal powers. This deadlock-breaking referendum power we have talked about in provision 42 may never need to be used. Its very existence probably will discourage totally unreasonable positions because of that possibility of appeal to the people. The people who are here in this room know the democratic process better than anyone else, and they know very well that no government will make an appeal by way of a referendum if it thinks it is likely to lose it, because it would lose face and support.

Mr. Chrétien: Look at Quebec!

Mr. Regan: Look at Quebec is right. The essence of our position is that when federal and provincial governments fail to agree on a proposed constitutional amendment, it is because they have different perceptions of what is in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Since both levels are elected by the same people, it is only reasonable that the people themselves should be asked to decide which level of government they agree with and, hence, break the deadlock. However, because we are in a federal system, we are adopting the double-majority system, that is, a majority of the people in the whole country including a majority of the people in each region of the country.

This is not some new and wild idea that is just tossed out now. In the 1979 campaign the Prime Minister talked of the necessity of a deadlock-breaking mechanism by way of referendum. It can only be opposed by the presumption of those who trust politicians more than they trust the basic common sense of the Canadian people.

Premier Blakeney has raised the question as to which level of government should trigger the referendum process. I believe it is appropriate that the level which has always been referred to as the senior level should do that, only because it speaks for citizens in every part of the country, something no one province can do. I admit that the premiers today have a preoccupation with acquiring more power, so perhaps they want to have powers in that regard, but not unnaturally the provinces can seldom agree among themselves, as we saw in the case of the amending formula, so they hardly could be the group to undertake the beginning of the process on a referendum.

In a federation we can make the two levels as equal as we like, but there must be some way to break the deadlock. In such a situation, to give supreme power to the federal government to break the deadlock would lead to a great outcry. To give it to the provinces would be against the obvious will of the Canadian people. So, instead, what this resolution would do would be to give it to neither. It gives that final right to break the deadlock to the sovereignty of the Canadian people.

That was what was done in Australia. The only amending formula there is a referendum based on a resolution of the federal parliament. It is not necessary that the states agree, but the resolution must gain the support of a majority of the people in six states and a national majority. So the situation there is very similar to ours. Has it destroyed the federal system in Australia? Has it destroyed the states? Not only has it not done so but, in fact, only four out of 24 amendments since that country became a federation have passed. Why? It is because the states have been able to defend their interests by going out to their people and urging them as to vote in a certain way. That is the protection that is there. It is the sovereignty of the people.

I want to say one other thing about referenda and their effect on this country. These are important words to consider when we talk about whether the public comes up with a wise decision in its vote in a referendum. The Quebec legislature would have voted for separation. There was a majority of separatists. If the final authority in Quebec had been in the legislature, Quebec would have voted for separation. But the people of Quebec voted for Canada in that referendum. That is the difference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I have one more example of why a referendum has proved to be good in this country. I wish the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was here. If there had been a vote by those elected to the founding legislature of Newfoundland in 1947, 1948, 1949 or whatever the year they first met was, they would have voted against joining Canada. The hon. member for St. John's West, his family and the rest of the merchants of Water Street were the ones who were deadly against joining Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Don Jamieson.

Mr. Regan: However, because it was possible to make an appeal to the public by way of plebiscite—the legislature would have voted against Canada—the people of Newfoundland voted for Canada, and that is why Newfoundland is in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Don Jamieson lost.

Mr. Regan: I want finally to refer to the irresponsible position taken by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. After going through the whole document trying to find something he could attack, some reason to be different and to justify his position as Leader of the Opposition, his choosing this referendum process is a pretty weak effort.

● (1540)

Mr. Speaker, the national government has responsibilities that no one province can fulfil. The fact is that at federal-provincial conferences, since the very first one, it is always the prime minister of our country who presides. He is the chairman. Whether we like it or not, in a federal system there has to be a difference between the national government and the provincial government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I believe, with all the strength and conviction of my body and soul, that in this resolution the Government of Canada is properly discharging its responsibility. So let us get on with having a Canadian constitution and doing away once and for all with the embarrassment of admitting to people from other countries that we still have these remnants of a colonial past.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the minister would permit me to ask one question, since he has about three minutes left of the time allotted to him.

Mr. Regan: Certainly, I would be honoured.

Mr. Friesen: The minister is surely aware that, for example, postal workers have a right, within their union, to prevent movement of postal workers from one locality to the other without prior consent of their local. It is true also in the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers each local can certify its workers and prevent workers from another local moving into its area without the certification of that union. This is clearly in contravention of this provision in the constitution. I wonder if he, as Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), is willing to go to the postal and electrical workers and tell them that under this section their rights will be declared unconstitutional?

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the honourable and distinguished member for his question but I do not think it particularly relevant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: What this provision establishes is the right of a person to seek employment in any part of the country. That does not mean that there cannot continue to be professional requirements, for example, that only a qualified lawyer can become a member of the bar. If, on the other hand the requirements placed against a person moving to another area and joining a new local or new association are unduly restrictive, it is quite possible that the Supreme Court, in interpreting the provisions of the constitution, might find, in some extreme circumstance, that there was a breach. If that is the case, then, like all good citizens—and there are no better citizens than members of the trade unions—unions will conform. I have no doubt of that whatsoever. I hope that deals with the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I happen to be the next speaker, as the minister knows, but I should like to ask the minister a question in view of something he said in the closing remarks of his speech. I know he is trying to catch a plane, but would he permit me a question before I start my own interesting comments on the substance of the resolution and perhaps indirectly on some comments made by the minister?

Since the minister and I share a certain piece of geography in the deep east, I should like to ask him a question on the amendment procedure prescribed in section 42. Would he agree with me that because of the population distribution, in effect when you refer to two Atlantic provinces forming 50 per cent of the population in the Atlantic region, you bar Prince Edward Island forever and a day, together with any other province, from having a say because in the Atlantic area three provinces are needed to obtain 50 per cent. Therefore the provision would eliminate one of the four Atlantic provinces, of one of which the minister was premier at one time?

Mr. Regan: I thank the hon. member, who comes from a great Nova Scotia family and whom I have known since he was about 16 years old and a so-so tennis player. I thank him for his question and I say to him, through you, sir, that I believe it is under the Victoria formula that two provinces or more are required in a region, constituting 50 per cent, and certainly Prince Edward Island can be part of the majority. But Prince Edward Island and one other province alone would not constitute the needed number, based on the present population. However, when you draw up a constitution, heaven knows what the population changes may be tomorrow. They are drilling for oil in P.E.I., they may establish it and maybe their population will grow. Let me point out that the Victoria formula was not something that was thrust on us by the "feds".

An hon. Member: We are talking about section 42.

Mr. Regan: Yes, but the regions are based on the Victoria amending formula, the same regions as are outlined in the Victoria formula which was developed by the premiers, and I was one of them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan).

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I know the minister has to go and I do not wish to take up too much time commenting on his remarks, but I hope he has taken the bill with him on his plane ride west and will really read it because there is a real difference between the Victoria charter, the Vancouver proposal and the amendment procedure under section 42 which effectively rules out Prince Edward Island, because of the population statistics, from having any input by itself together with one other province. The fact is that two provinces are needed under the Victoria charter and the Vancouver proposal. They spoke about two provinces in a region, not about 50 per cent of the population which would effectively eliminate Prince Edward Island under section 42. But the minister has gone and what he has said will stand on the record. I say again, I hope he will read the resolution. Frankly, I do not think many members, including government members, have read the resolution, and I know we did not have much opportunity to read it, although it is pretty fundamental in terms of the future of this country.

A week ago last night the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in calling Parliament a week early, said that all members from coast to coast would have the opportunity to make a speech on a subject that cannot be any more important than what we are talking about, which is basically the heart and soul of this nation. This constitution is bound up in phraseology and legal verbiage. You can talk about patriation, although it is not very sexy, seductive or exciting, but the fact is that when you shake it all down, you are talking about the heart and soul of this country. That is why, right from the start, I want to make it clear, as my leader made it abundantly clear on Monday when this debate commenced, that there is no member in this party, nor is there, I believe, any member to my left in the New Democratic Party, who is against the patriation of the constitution, the bringing of the constitution back from England to Canada. If that is what we want to do, it could be done on one page which could be agreed to in one hour. We would not have to send Mark, Luke or John cap in hand to have tea with the Queen.

I will talk about the constitution in a very calm way because it is a very serious matter. It strikes at the very foundation of this country. Before I come back to the matter of the patriation of the constitution let me say that it occurred to me on Thursday night when I was listening to the Prime Minister—and I say this to members in an objective way—and then to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), followed by the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), that we are talking about the polarization of the two solitudes in their constitutional dimension. This is what I thought when I heard the Prime Minister's speech over the national airways and also, to a lesser degree, when the debate started here on Monday. The reason I say that is the following. I used to practice law and it was only when talking about the constitution relatively recently that the great difference in philosophies became apparent to me. I am not saying that one approach is right and the other is wrong, but this is the polarization of the two solitudes because these are two fundamentally different approaches. I listened to my Prime Minister speak about freedom in the land and say we need freedom here and freedom there. I can understand this coming from the Prime Minister because he was brought up under the civil code. I will not make pejorative comments and say one is Gallic and the other Napoleon against the British, and I hope my friends opposite will understand that when I refer to the British I will try to stay within the common law and I will try to stay even tempered and take any pejorative overtones out of my comments. We are talking about civil law and common law. Under the common law in nine of the provinces, every Canadian has every right and freedom in the world except those restricted or abridged by law, yet under the civil code one has no rights unless one can point to a piece of paper, a right or freedom. This debate is very interesting because it starts out from two separate polarities; it is almost like the north and south poles. It is difficult to bridge the gap between those people who believe in and have been brought up in the jurisprudence of common law and those who have been very ably brought up in the jurisprudence of the civil code. Later in my remarks I will have more specific comments to make about the entrenchment of the bill of rights in the constitution, but in general as one listened to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition on that Thursday night, one would have thought, from some of the interpretations that we really did not have the freedoms unless they were put on a piece of paper. The whole foundation of this country in nine provinces is that we have all the rights in the world except those that say, "Stop at a stop sign, do not drive too fast, do not drink too much and do not kill somebody". Those are the laws that have restricted the open-ended common law. I am not making any judgment as to which is right and which is wrong, but I will repeat, just to accentuate the point, that they are two fundamentally different philosophies. Under the Civil Code one does not have any right to do anything unless one can point to it in some constitution, some bill of rights or some charter. So, we started off in this debate with the north versus the south, the common law versus the civil law. That presents problems or makes it much more difficult when we try to come to a consensus. I will not be pessimistic like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) and say that unless we adopt this resolution forever and a day we will be behind the eight-ball on amendments, patriation or anything. I do not believe that for an instant. I just want to paint the picture, which I do not think has been painted well enough in this debate, of those two streams of jurisprudence which start out from two different poles. The members of this chamber are elected by the people. Hopefully the job of this chamber and perhaps eventually that of the other place—although I would not mind abolishing the other place, but that is another question—is to try to bridge those parallel streams of jurisprudence to come up with some kind of document. But, I come back to where I started. The debate concerning rights and an equalization formula must take place in this chamber.

I take exception to the false rhetoric of the Minister of Labour and those men of straw on the other side, those punching bags of false rhetoric. This party believes in patriation. Earlier we said that we want patriation if it is on the basis of the Vancouver proposal or, as far as I am concerned, the Victoria proposal. On Monday when this debate started, my leader said we were in favour of patriation on the basis of the Vancouver proposal, the most recent proposal and an adaptation of the Victoria proposal. There is no equivocation on those two points. I do not know why a minister of the Crown, charged with responsibility in the administration of this government, would take five or ten minutes of his time beating arounds the bush and taking this "man of straw" approach. He suggested by inference that the opposition was against patriation. As I said earlier, there is not a member of this House who likes the situation. We are very much for patriation on the basis of what my leader said in his masterful speech here on Monday. That is the basic issue. As I think all members have tried to accentuate in different ways, we do not want some joint resolution to go from this chamber to Westminster in London, on the banks of the Thames, in order that British legislators may debate our fundamental rights. That would be an insult to me as a legislator and it certainly reinforces what my leader said on Monday. We can throw names around. It is not that they solve anything, but they are good for debate. The proposal of the government indicates that they are the last of the colonials, going hand in hand not toward patriation or an amending formula, but going forward with the 16 pages of detailed fundamentals and an equalization formula. If given a chance, I would have asked the Minister of Labour where he saw the words "equalization payments". They are not there. The equalization formula in this resolution is very weak and needs to be improved, but if we cannot improve it here when the committee finally decides and comes back with a resolution to this House, I do not want a legislator in England who comes from some constituency in the Midlands to start telling me, in areas of economic disparity, how the "colonials" over here are supposed to work with an equalization formula or that "we in Britain know better". The whole thing is topsyturvy. If members across the way give us patriation based on the Vancouver proposal in that resolution with an amending formula, this matter will get through within a day. Then it will come back here and at the proper time we can put in a timetable. We will debate all those things.

It is not just the comments of the Minister of Labour, but the general thrust of the remarks of those in the government. If I were in the government, I suppose I would try the same thrust. Not only do they paint the opposition as being against patriation, it is the same canard when it comes to unanimity. The very fact that in this debate my leader said we were for the Vancouver proposal eliminates the problem of unanimity. I agree it will be difficult if not impossible. Frankly I think the premiers would agree that unanimity on changing the basic constitution would be difficult, if not next to impossible. Perhaps after 53 years we should still try, but there is a big difference in recognizing that unanimity is not necessarily the answer. After all the false starts, there is a fundamental difference between recognizing the reality that unanimity creates problems and going completely to the other side, going unilaterally without consultation with the provinces. One cannot have it both ways. I think the Minister of Labour was sincere, but I understand the realities of unanimity. I suggest to members of the government who have not fully assessed what might happen with this constitutional proposal and other things Parliament will decide, hopefully before Christmas, that they have underestimated a basic feeling across the country. The Minister of Labour said my leader was extreme. I do not know how many times he has talked with the people west of the lakehead, but as it is almost four o'clock I will close this part of my address with the following thought. I am here as a legislator. I am glad about the vote on May 20. I hope we can redeem pledges that were made to Quebec, however they are interpreted, albeit Quebec is a province with a very definite identity that must be respected in ways the Prime Minister is not prepared to accept. But one does not redeem a pledge to a province or a region such as Quebec and forget the larger responsibilities to the country as a whole. If the proposal upsets the country as a whole, what has been accomplished when one says that a pledge to a part has been redeemed?

May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATION AND SUNLIGHT PROVISIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That Bill C-204, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act (provincial representation and sunlight provisions), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the applause from the whole House on Friday afternoon, especially from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Here in the midst of the first session of the Thirty-second Parliament I am fortunate enough to bring before the House a private members' bill which deals with the reform of an administrative tribunal. We have heard much from various members of the House this week about rights, the enforcement of rights, and about the use of the courts to enforce rights. It is true our courts do enforce rights and deal with many important matters and, as I will say later on in my speech, the courts generally have been upgraded in the last few years in terms of membership, appointments and salaries. Indeed, we have a bill before the House to deal further with that. But one area we have forgotten, the forgotten child of pending reform in the government, is the area of administrative tribunals. They are important bodies because they affect our everyday lives. They affect the everyday life of more people than the courts do, I venture to say. The courts try individual cases, occasionally pronounce on general principles and sometimes deal with important cases that affect our rights. But the administrative tribunals deal with such things as phone bills, the cost of our telephones, our airline tickets, the cost of our travel, what we see on television, whether it will be a Canadian or American program, a religious program or some other sort of program. Finally, they deal with the area of oil and gas and, ultimately, have an effect on prices, whether or not we export or retain our oil and gas and other energy resources. They are very important bodies.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I can give you a long list of agencies. I will name a few of them to show the kind of agencies I am talking about: the Immigration Appeal Board, the Atomic Energy Control Board, the National Parole Board, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Canadian Transport Commission, the National Energy Board, the Canadian Radio-Television Telecommunications Commission, the Pensions Appeals Board and the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, to name a few. I could go on—the Labour Relations Board, the Tariff Board etc. They cover areas that affect people's day to day lives.

I want to deal with one specific board which I think is in need of reform, the National Energy Board. I think it is timely because there is a renewed awareness in this country of the impact of energy on our society and on our economy. Now is the appropriate time, in my view, to assess the procedural and legislative guidelines under which the National Energy Board will operate through the 1980s. I want to say a word about the history of the board before I go into the detailed provisions of my bill. The board was set up after the pipeline debate—not the pipeline debate in the last session but the pipeline debate of 1956, when the government tried to ram that particular bill through the House under closure. When Mr. Diefenbaker became prime minister he set up the Borden commission which in 1959 finally recommended there be a board called The National Energy Board. Thus the National Energy Board was created, and it is now 21 years old. The board was born before the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was created. That is very important to know, because the board was given a dual role, a role as an administrative tribunal, that is, a regulator of applications for pipelines, for export of energy and so on, and a role as adviser to the ministry. This dual role has often got the board into trouble over the years and that is something I wish to deal with in my bill.

The board itself had no problem in the 1960s because there was no great energy debate during that time. At this point I will quote from an article by Elaine Dewar in Canadian Business in May, 1980, called "Groping in the Dark", which deals with the National Energy Board. In her article she quotes a statement by a high placed civil servant who was then on the Energy Board as a staff member. He describes how the NEB worked then:

A major role was to go on hands and knees to the U.S. government and get it to take more exports . . . That's what everybody wanted.

Indeed, that was the story of the 1960s. Then oil was discovered in Prudhoe Bay in 1968 and in the Canadian Arctic in 1969. In 1970 the Board gave an energy forecast and the minister—then Mr. Greene—said we have oil and gas for hundreds of years. A year later the Board said that was wrong; we did not have oil and gas for hundreds of years and we would run out in 1991. Later on they said we would run out of oil in 1982. People began to criticize the Board and as the energy debate heated up over the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, over the Alaska highway pipeline and over the exports of gas there were more and more hearings before the National Energy Board.

As hon. members will recall, in the last session of the House of Commons there were many questions about the controversial NEB decision on the Quebec and maritimes pipeline. The NEB, as I said, has been subject to much criticism. I intend to read some of that criticism.

In a 1977 study of the National Energy Board, Alastair Lucas, from the University of Calgary, and Trevor Bell published a report on the board for the Law Reform Commission of Canada. They claimed the NEB was unduly influenced by government and that its advisory and regulatory roles were in conflict. A list of some 28 government committees upon which board members sat, strengthened their case. But the crux of their argument lay in the examination of six issues handled by the National Energy Board. In at least two of them, the Interprovincial Pipeline extension and the Dow Chemical Company ethylene export case, the authors suggested that the NEB decisions were forged outside the hearing room. This is indeed a serious indictment. Mr. Lucas also said:

The industry thinks the board is remote, political and that its members are largely a bunch of political hacks of a sort that are not knowledgeable about the energy business.

It seems that almost everyone has been critical of the board. One lawyer who refused to be quoted appeared at the summer export hearings on behalf of his client who wanted to import gas to the United States. Although the client got what he wanted, the lawyer apparently was upset by what he saw and he said:

They heard evidence only from people who wanted to export gas. The traditional opposition asked no hard questions whatever. The board counsel asked no controversial questions. There were no analytic questions about the reserve numbers. The board will say they found exports on the basis of the evidence but the board counsel, armed with the staff, should have done more than check the numbers. It is just incredible from the public interest point of view.

Criticism is levelled at the board not only by company lawyers but by people from environmental groups, people from consumer groups, poor people's groups and just about everyone. The standard reply from the board, and I quote Mr. Edge, vice-chairman of the board:

We're here to make decisions in the public interest. If we've got a decision which is roundly criticized by all parties, it is probably a good one.

Likewise, Mr. Stabback, a former board member gave comments to the same effect. In other words, they are saying, "we are being criticized by everybody so we must be doing something right". There is another viewpoint and that is, "maybe everybody is right". Maybe there are weaknesses in the board. I am not here to criticize the board. I am here to make some very concrete, simple suggestions through my bill to deal with procedural matters that could make the board better.

I would like to refer now specifically to the bill. It suggests that the board needs first of all some upgrading in membership. What we have on the board now are basically people who are in the industry or people who were in the government. What we need are people with varied backgrounds such as environmentalists, and people with background in consumer matters. I remember when John Turner was a member of this House as minister of justice. In spite of the many things on which he and I disagree, he did one great thing for Canada; he upgraded the appointment of judges to the supreme court. He hired a man named Ed Ratusny who consulted the Bar associations and vetted appointments. As a result we began getting top grade people on the benches, and it shows in judicial decisions.

While we cannot enact such a procedure and put it into law because it is a procedural matter which a minister must see through, I put into the bill a provision which upgrades the board and gives it the status, right there in black and white, of federal court judges and the salary which goes with the appointment. I hope and trust that the appointments will be better because of the procedure I have set out.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I tried to deal in my bill with the problem to which I referred at the outset—whether this is a court or a branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I will not go through the materials I have here, but the stories would make your hair curl. There are stories about decisions, lunches with business executives whose application is before the National Energy Board and so on. It is a rather careless procedure. There is talk behind the scenes and rumours in Ottawa such as, "well the board has to pay attention to what EMR says". Also, it is inherent in the procedure that the board must advise the government.

What I tried to do in my bill is clarify the advisory function. If there is to be an advisory function, then the board must give its advice and render its decisions through a fair procedure. It must be an open procedure with open decisions. I tried to incorporate that into my bill. Third, I tried to bring in the idea that all parties have a right to cross-examination. What I would like to see is any advisory decisions which are made or any advice that is given to the government in the form of documents and so on laid open for people to use in the proceedings. That way everything would be above board.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, I put in the bill a provision to upgrade the role of board counsel. For three years, I worked for the Berger inquiry on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. In many ways we broke new ground in the area of procedural decisions, not only by holding hearings in remote communities but in other ways. One such way was by upgrading the role of commission counsel and giving him the status of a public advocate. He was to get in there and represent the views, as commission counsel saw it, of people who were not there before the board, as a means of filling in all the gaps. Commission counsel and commission staff were available to be called as witnesses. All testimony and documentation was out in the open. Commission counsel's final submission to the board, in this case to Mr. Justice Berger, was publicized two weeks before it was given to the board so that people could look at it and in that way everything was above board.

The fifth clause in my bill requests that internal papers be made public. The concept of freedom of information should also apply to the board because we believe, and I think that this House unanimously now believes, that in this manner we can arrive at better decisions and hold better hearings.

Another provision in the bill is that funds be available for interveners, an area in which the NEB is behind. The CRTC has begun to move in this area because there are people who cannot afford fancy Philadelphia company lawyers or Vancouver lawyers or Calgary lawyers or lawyers from wherever they may come. I merely ask that we recognize the principle that interveners can be funded. While on the commission about which I spoke earlier we had to make such decisions with regard to interveners. We had to decide who should receive the funding and how much they should get. Once we approved the funding they would appear before the board. We even arranged for umbrella groups to appear before the board represented by one lawyer. In this way all points of view can be represented in a fair procedure.

Finally, I ask that there be sunlight provisions in the bill, which is itself a new concept. I do not want my friends to the right, the Conservatives, to think I said "sunset", I said "sunlight". It is an American concept where by if there is to be any meeting outside the boardroom with parties, it has to be recorded and open, unless there are certain reasons for which it should not be open. I would have liked to have gone into more detail in the bill on this subject but I merely introduced the concept. It fits in with the concept of freedom of information.

There are other matters upon which I did not touch in the bill such as expropriation. I believe there is a Senate bill, on expropriation. I could also have dealt with provincial appointments. I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) has a bill on provincial representation. I found this area too difficult with which to deal in my bill. Instead, I dealt with consulting the provinces on appointments and on providing advice to the government when it has sought an opinion. I know that my province of British Columbia is very interested in such areas as pre-build of pipelines, natural gas exports and so on.

I have tried to make it a fair procedure for the provinces as well. It is a very simple bill, Mr. Speaker. There has been lots of talk here about the constitution. Bill C-204 presents the very basic requirements for the performance of an agency of government elected by the people whether you are an oil millionaire, an Inuit, Dogrib or Slavy, a businessman who needs energy to run a factory or a welfare recipient who needs heat to stay warm, whether you are the builder of a pipeline or an environmentalist, whether you are a poor person or a person who is affected by a board's decision on the price of oil and gas—indeed, we are all affected. The procedure before the board now is a bad one.

This is a very simple bill, Mr. Speaker, offering some concrete suggestions and concrete enactments for reforming the National Energy Board. I urge that this House adopt the bill today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Bill C-204 now before the House, it seems to me that it is either unnecessary or redundant. For example, clause 2 of the bill calls for the reasonable cross-examination of witnesses. For quasi-judicial hearings of the board, the proposed requirement to cross-examine witnesses is unnecessary because that right already exists. For non-judicial hearings of the general inquiry type, the proposed provision is undesirable because with the large number of parties that attend at such hearings it may sometimes be necessary to limit cross-examination.

Clause 3(6) of the bill would award costs to public interest groups for the conduct of cases before the board. This has already been considered by the board which does not object to the awarding of costs as such. However, the way the bill is worded, the awarding of costs could be made at any time—even before a hearing—for any group claiming to represent any public interest. The board would not have the power to determine beforehand whether in fact there was representation of a public interest. This further exemplifies the somewhat loosely worded nature of the bill.

Clause 4(5) of the bill, which calls for the restriction of communications between the board and any minister of the Crown or public servant, is again loosely worded and somewhat confusing. If, with this suggested amendment, the hon. member is trying to restrict inappropriate communications, then this is unnecessary since it is already part of the board's practice. Further, if the amendment were to be accepted as worded, then it would make it illegal for the board to communicate with its own staff members who are, of course, public servants. Not only is this subsection unnecessary but its insertion would be interpreted as implying that the board is acting improperly at the present time.

If adopted, Bill C-204 would impair the working of the board. Clause 3(1)(d) would require that a public hearing be held prior to the submission of any advice to the minister. That would be unworkable. It would slow to a crawl the advisory work of the board. There are many matters on which the board can advise the minister promptly, drawing upon its own experience. To call a public hearing in every instance would be senseless.

Clause 3(4) of the bill would designate an officer at each hearing to be responsible for bringing forth any relevant evidence for argument. The system proposed is similar to that used in the United States, but the American system has been described as being overly legalistic, cumbersome and slow. In the Canadian system it is the function of staff to advise the board, not to act as adversary as against the applicant. It is the responsibility of the board and its counsel to ensure that all necessary and relevant evidence has been brought forward.

Clause 20(3) would require notice to be filed in every newspaper within 50 miles of the route of a natural or proposed pipeline or power line and in every newspaper in Canada having a paid circulation of 50,000 or more. This requirement would be both onerous and expensive. At the present, the board requires applicants to publish hearing notices.

Moreover, the NEB has an extensive mailing list to which it sends reports, news and decisions rendered. The public is, of course, free to contact the NEB about hearings and will receive information requested.

This subclause also requires that 60 days notice be given for a hearing. Although this is a desirable objective, there are often situations where the public interest would suffer because of such a delay in proceeding with regulatory hearings and action. An example might be when a pipeline facility is to be constructed to provide service to a new area or where rates of pipeline companies are to be adjusted to reflect current costs. In such cases it is sometimes necessary to reduce the length of notice to 30 days.

In some instances, Mr. Speaker, these amendments would have adverse effects on the decision-making process as we know it.

Clause 4(1) would require that any advice given to the minister be made public. This could clearly have an adverse effect on matters related, for example, federal-provincial relations or, in the instance of international negotiations, between sovereign states. Anything of a sensitive nature would be precluded from discussion between the minister and the board. Without this candid advice and opinion, the minister would not be able to perform his role properly.

Clause 1 of the bill insists that the chairman, vice-chairman and associate vice-chairmen of the board each be paid the same salary as the associate chief justice of the Federal Court of Canada. In our view, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why a board member should be paid on the same salary scale as judges. The duties are different, and board members, in addition to their quasi-judicial role, have a number of administrative duties. In addition, it would not be equitable for the chairman, vice-chairman and two associate vice-chairmen of the board to be paid the same salary because, of course, they have different responsibilities. In fact, there seems to be no real reason to interfere with the existing method by which board members' salaries are set by the Privy Council office.

Some clauses of this bill are impracticable and would impair the effective working of the board. This cannot be in the public interest. Further, preventing the minister of the Crown from receiving the best possible advice on an issue such as this would not improve the decision-making process in any substantial way.

The board has now operated for 20 years and has established its reputation as an effective and fair tribunal by continually improving its procedures under the act and, from time to time, initiating recommendations for amendments to meet changing circumstances and the increasing complexity of the energy economy.

In introducing his bill the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) referred to Bill S-12 regarding the expropriation procedures of the National Energy Board. I should be pleased to touch on that for a moment as an example of the ways in which the legislation concerning the National Energy Board evolves.

The National Energy Board Act has already been looked at with a view to improving and defining those public rights that are affected by the board. Bill S-12, which the hon. member mentioned, passed by the Senate in March, 1979, attempts to modernize expropriation procedures for purposes of establishing rights-of-way for pipelines.

Canada has at least two expropriation procedures; one is the Expropriation Act for 1970. That act, administered by the minister of public works modernized procedures, especially for the determination of fair compensation to the expropriated owner. Section 42 contains the exception that the act does not apply to any expropriation made pursuant to the Railway Act.

The second expropriation procedure as established by section 75 of the National Energy Board Act incorporates the expropriation provisions of the Railway Act, sections 156 to 184. Bill S-12 is designed to change the procedure of expropriation of pipeline rights-of-way by deleting the incorporation of the Railway Act provision and substituting an expropriation procedure. Bill S-12 established a scheme of negotiation and arbitration with a right of appeal to the trial division of the Federal Court of Canada. It also lays out the principles of compensation as guidance to the parties and tribunals that are involved.

This matter of modernizing expropriation under the National Energy Board Act is considered important because it affects the rights of private landowners who are on the right-of-way of a proposed pipeline.

Bill C-204 also deals with public rights and the rights of participants to better understand the information used by the board in its deliberations. We believe that such rights have adequate protection and that a reasonable balance has now been struck between informed and complete public input and the need to determine major energy questions expeditiously.

● (1630)

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for its part is currently occupied with major energy initiatives designed to protect the economic health of Canada, making it difficult for the time being to consider even the modernization of the existing pipeline expropriation procedures.

I have made reference to Bill S-12 in order to remind the hon. members that National Energy Board legislation is under continuing review and assessment. The proposals of Bill S-12, when in due course implemented, will mark a further advance in the evolution of the legislation governing the activities of the National Energy Board.

The hon. member referred in his introduction to the nature of the National Energy Board and its responsibilities. He spoke in particular of the right to information and the principal activities of the board. In that connection I shall quote from the 1977 report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada in which it is stated:

> There is no doubt that the board is in close contact with the industry. But this relationship requires explanation. First, it is clear that the industry cannot dictate National Energy Board decisions on particular applications. The board attempts to maintain a judicial posture on applications, and is sensitive to allegations of bias or influence. This approach appears not to be affected by movements of board members to and from the industry which, in fact, are rare. Most members have industry experience. This reflects the intention of our legislators to appoint members who are experts in various aspects of the energy industry. Furthermore, is there any better source of expert knowledge about the petroleum, natural gas and electrical power industries than within the industries themselves?

Mr. Waddell: Ask John Helliwell.

Mr. MacLaren: I would like to review for the House the various responsibilities and functions of the National Energy Board to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has referred. As the House will be aware, one of the most important tasks of the National Energy Board is regulatory activity. Also, of course, it has a principal advisory capacity. The board's decisions and advice, directly and indirectly, affect the lives of all Canadians since it is involved in virtually all federal energy related matters.

I should like to remind the House, Mr. Speaker, of the general responsibilities and functions of the board, and to review for a moment the activities of the board over the last several years in order to give an insight into its various operations.

I shall conclude by reviewing the proposed amendments again if the hon. member opposite would find that useful. I might just say in summary that although I find the member's proposed amendments in some ways commendable, they are on the whole superfluous.

The genesis of the National Energy Board can, of course, be found, as the hon. member implied, in the final report of the Gordon commission on economic prospects in 1957 and the Borden royal commission on the export of energy resources the following year.

The National Energy Board Act of 1959 and subsequent amendments give the board two principal responsibilities: to regulate specific areas of the oil and gas and electric utilities in the public interest; and to advise the government on the development and use of energy resources. Under the rubric of its regulatory responsibilities, the board has three basic functions. First, granting certificates of public convenience and necessity for construction of pipelines and international power. Second, issuing licences for the export and import of power, natural gas and oil. Third, approving utility rates, tariffs and tolls.

In addition, the board is required to administer certain provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act. This responsibility consists of imposing and collecting a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products and the regulation of the price of natural gas in both interprovincial and export trade. The board is also responsible under the Northern Pipeline Act for the approval of certain conditions for the construction of the natural gas pipeline along the Alaska highway. These relate mainly to the incentive rate of return schemes, financing and tariffs, approval of pipe specifications and the granting of leave to open orders. Under an agreement between the federal government and Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd.—that is the Dempster Link agreement—the company has been required to carry out feasibility studies leading to an application to construct a lateral pipeline along the Dempster highway from the Mackenzie Delta to Whitehorse.

In its advisory duties, the board is charged with monitoring and reporting to the minister of energy on virtually all aspects of energy, making such recommendations as it considers advisable in the public interest. It also prepares studies and reports on other matters related to energy and makes recommendations on appropriate national and international co-operative arrangements.

The outline of the board's role in the national energy field gives substance to the definition of the board as "the turnkey agency in a panoply of federal and provincial bodies." When the board, for instance, is ready to grant a certificate for a pipeline or a power line, or to issue a licence for the export of natural gas or electricity or the import of natural gas or the export of oil for a period exceeding one year, it reports to the governor in council through the minister of energy. If the governor in council approves the issuance of a certificate, then it is issued by the board. In the case of an export application, a licence issued by the board goes into effect as soon as it is approved by the governor in council. When the board refuses an application, the decision is not subject to referral to the governor in council. The board's reports on all these matters are issued as public documents.

Due to the special nature of the trade in crude oil and petroleum products, specifically short-term contracts with the need to make decisions on a daily basis, oil export controls, except for those licences for periods in excess of one year, are implemented directly by the board without reference to the governor in council.

Applications for orders authorizing the export of natural gas and certain other petroleum products for periods of up to one year are also dealt with by the board without reference to the governor in council. Decisions regarding rates, tolls and tariffs are also implemented by the board without reference to the governor in council. The Federal Court of Appeal may reverse the board only on matters of law or on jurisdiction, not on substance.

The number of decisions and the number of inquiries which the board is able to hold each year is a remarkable achievement. In 1979 the board conducted inquiries across Canada on 13 separate topics and issued 2,217 certificates licences and other authorizations. I might add, this compares favourably with the record of United States Federal Energy Regulatory Commission which has been criticized for the backlog of applications waiting to be heard and what might be called the glacial pace of its decision-making.

I hope that with these few words the hon. member opposite will accept the position that the amendments he has brought forward in his bill are, as I stated earlier, in some respects either superfluous or could create delay. I hope he will now join with me in recognizing the competence, skill and devotion of the National Energy Board in carrying out its important function.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my colleague and seatmate, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) has covered very well many of the cautions which have to be borne in mind before one contemplates tampering with a piece of legislation as eminently good as that governing the National Energy Board. That is not to say there are not improvements that could be made to it.

I commend my friend from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on two things; first, his excellent article in Maclean's and, second, for the time and the thought—

Mr. Waddell: I didn't write it.

Mr. Simmons: He did not write it. It is not the kind of thing you would admit to anyway. Second I commend him for the time and the thought that must have gone into an exercise of the magnitude represented in this. I believe in all sincerity that this exercise, which allows us to debate an issue of substance, is a very important part of this parliament. I commend the hon. member in that regard.

I was particularly interested in a couple of the concepts he was espousing. One of them was the "sunlight" provision which has all kinds of connotations, not only for our Tory friends but for others. I find it an interesting concept. It has the potential of becoming an important concept. I wish he would have devoted a little more time to informing the House and the general public about it. He might want to pursue that subject on some other occasion.

I have to say that I may not perhaps have thoroughly understood the full implications of the concept, but that part which I heard the hon. member expound I am not sure should be addressed in that particular way or handled through the mechanism of an amendment to the Energy Board Act. It might more properly be addressed in relation to freedom of information legislation. The government has made a commitment to have that legislation in place. Once that is done, the changes the hon. member talks about may well flow directly from the provisions of that legislation. Alternatively, at that point in time it may be necessary to address ourselves to the existing legislation to ensure that not only is the letter of the law of the freedom of information being observed, but the spirit of the new legislation as well.

The other point I want to respond to has to do with consulting the provinces. This government, and, I submit, the government which preceded it under the leadership of the hon. gentleman from Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), have not been remiss in terms of consulting provincial governments. I am not being semantic, but I take it the hon. member meant consultation with the provincial government administration.

I use this opportunity to make a very important distinction, one that should not be construed as merely semantic. I believe we do ourselves a disservice in this national Parliament when we talk about cousulting the provinces. I say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), to name the entire opposition in the House at this time, the proportions are right in terms of the quality of opposition on that side, a three to one decision almost any day of the week. One Tory is on this side. I must say he does not look at all out of place. We welcome the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). We are glad for the increase in our numbers.

As I was saying, we do ourselves a disservice when we talk about consulting the provinces as meaning consulting the provincial governments. We in this chamber are the provinces. However, we are not the provincial governments. That distinction needs to be articulated. The provincial governments have a mandate and the federal government has a mandate. The Fathers of Confederation recognized in 1864 that certain problems ought to be addressed by a federal government and others by a provincial government.

We in this House represent the provinces. I represent the people of Newfoundland and Labrador just as much as the premier of that province, only on different matters. I represent them in matters of federal jurisdiction and he in matters of provincial jurisdiction. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) represents the people of Newfoundland and Labrador just as much as the premier does; the Prime Minister in matters of federal jurisdiction and the premier in matters of provincial jurisdiction.

The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta represents the people of British Columbia in federal matters as does any provincial cabinet minister on provincial matters. That distinction is not made enough. We allow the premiers and those at the provincial level to give the impression that they are the custodians of everything that resides in the geographical extremities or definition of a particular province when we in this Parliament, aside from the vacancies, normally 282 people, are spokesmen for the two territories and ten provinces of Canada in matters of federal jurisdiction.

I do not think anyone can argue with my hon. friend that any matter is as all-pervasive in its implications as energy policy and energy decisions. It ought to be addressed with the full consultation of anybody or any administration on which it might impact. I invite the hon. member to reflect on this past summer. The federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) spent a fair amount of time consulting with Mr. Leitch, the Alberta energy minister. The Prime Minister consulted with the Premier of Alberta. It is not really germane to talk about the atmosphere of those negotiations, their success or otherwise. The point I am making is that in recent weeks and months this government has shown its willingness to consult, consult, and consult again.

They had dialogue with the governments of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta on matters that are germane to everyone in this House. Surely there has not been a lack of consultation. In the spirit in which we have operated in this country for the past 113 years, we should not need to legislate consultation. There is no point in doing that. As a matter of course, before you do a job, it requires consultation. Indeed, if I had one criticism of the governmental process in Canada over the past few years, it is that we have carried consultation between orders of government too far. I like the word "orders" rather than "levels." I do not see any government as being senior to another government. I see it as having separate assignments from other governments. I am talking about orders of government, the federal order of government and the provincial order of government. In the past few years we have beaten consultation right to death. You cannot turn around in this country now without having a federal-provincial conference. Every time any matter of policy comes up in the two departments I am associated with, whether environment or science and technology, the inevitable answer is: well, we have to wait until we talk to the government of such and such a province on that particular issue. Consultation is not only the order of the day, we have almost reached the point at which it is becoming an impediment to getting things done in this country.

I like the simpler age. I like the way the Fathers of Confederation laid it down. They recognized that the federal order of government ought to be supreme in this area and the provincial order ought to be supreme in that area, and they should each go about doing their respective jobs, but not in isolation. There are times, as I said earlier, when a matter of policy or a matter of action one government is about to take, or contemplates taking, will have an impact on the other government's area of jurisdiction. For that reason, not only because of common sense and common decency but the sheer rules of pragmatics dictate that you ought to say to the other order of government, the government of Alberta or the government of New Brunswick: look, we are contemplating doing this, how will it affect your own legislation or your ability to meet your objectives in this particular area, be it agriculture, energy or fisheries? That is common sense and you cannot legislate it. Why do you need to legislate it?

When you get to the point in this country where there is such mistrust of motives, such a lack of faith in the person who happens to sit in another Parliament than you, or who happens to sit at another cabinet table than you, and when you get to the point where you have a basic lack of trust in that other individual just because he wears a different hat than you, then it is not legislation that is at fault; it is not a lack of good legislation that is causing your problems, it is something much deeper and much more basic.

It is time for a good inward look at ourselves when we begin at every turn saying that the reason the Prime Minister of Canada is doing this is because—and then assigning some base motive, or the reason the Premier of Alberta is doing this is because—and then assigning some base motive to his action. When we reach that point, and in some respects we are at that point in this country on the very subject of energy, something basic has to be done. This is a good part of the reason for the problems we are having, and part of the reason we are hearing Armageddon pontifications on the constitution. It is not because we have vastly different objectives for our people, it is because of a monumental communications barrier. It is because we have become habituated to assigning motives all the time; what is Peter Lougheed really up to, what is Pierre Trudeau really up to or what is Mr. Lyon really up to? Sometimes we would serve this country a lot better if the energy pricing discussion which is before us, and if other issues before us such as the constitutional thing which is not far from my mind—were not being discussed with this basic mistrust which underlies, it seems, everything we now do.

I have seen separate countries conferring with more faith in each other than I see us doing as provinces of the same country. We talk about each other as though we have a couple of heads. We talk about each other as though we were a bunch of rogues. The fact is that we are, in this chamber with 282 parliamentarians, and in the other 12 chambers across this country in the ten provincial capitals and the two territorial capitals, a group of several hundred legislators who have offered ourselves to serve the public good and not to tear daily at each other, trying to character assassinate, trying to tear down reputations and assign motives. That is why this subject of consultation the member talks about is an important one. However, it is not one that we should try to embed in legislation. I submit that is not the route to go.

I am frightened as a Canadian that we may well fall into the trap of thinking we can solve all our problems by dotting the "i's" in the right place and crossing all the "t's". I submit we will only solve our problems, be they in energy, which is the subject before us today, the constitution or any other issue, when we begin to accept each other around this country, be we premiers of provinces, territorial, provincial or federal politicians. We must accept each other as people who by and large have at heart the interests of the Canadian people, or those people in whatever part of Canada we happen to represent in our respective jurisdictions.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) would permit a question during his time. It is a very simple question which arises from the very important point he has made, that there is an atmosphere of distrust in this country. Could he give us an explanation why he believes there is such an atmosphere in Canada today?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), for his question. I am encouraged but not surprised to find that he shares some of the concern I have just expressed on this particular subject.

I spent some of my time this summer, not enough I admit—I made a total of nine trips—west of the Manitoba-Ontario border in the four western provinces; in northern Alberta, southeastern B.C. and in various other parts of those provinces, as part of a self-assignment to get a better understanding of that part of the country. I have been encouraged when talking to a number of members, including my good friend, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), to learn that some months ago they spent some time in rural parts of Newfoundland, my own province. I have talked to other members of both opposition parties who, by virtue of being on standing committees or otherwise, at the initiative of their parties or themselves, have gone out to parts of eastern Canada, the Atlantic provinces, making an effort to get a better understanding.

In direct answer to the hon. gentleman's question in the minute or so remaining, let me say it seems to me that a large portion of the mistrust is the result of something I alluded to briefly just a few minutes ago, and that is the communications issue. I just do not think we know how the other half lives. I just do not think we understand their aspirations. I say to him that I do not understand the aspirations of the west, and I do so because he is from the west. Without being unkind to him, I submit he may not understand full well the aspirations of my people in Newfoundland, Labrador or in Atlantic Canada.

Without being over-simplistic, I think a large part of the answer to his question relates to communications. It is not that we are by nature a people condemned to think ill of each other, but by circumstance we have become people who have stopped listening to each other. That is the indictment; we have stopped listening to each other. Perhaps we have placed labels. We have begun to say: Well, he is from Alberta therefore we can expect him to say that, or he is from Newfoundland and we can expect him to say that. We have begun to categorize and stereotype people. My elementary knowledge of this country tells me first that it is not fair to do that and, second, it is not very productive to do that. That is why I made the appeal earlier to make an effort to break down some of this communications barrier.

MARTIN GOLDFARB AND GOLDFARB ASSOCIATES—RELEASE OF INFORMATION CONCERNING POLLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the stated intention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) to release on Wednesday some information on some of the public opinion polls taken by the government and also the fact that for three years and four months I have had a written question standing on the order paper asking details of all polls taken for the government by Martin Goldfarb and Goldfarb Associates, including their nature, the results and total cost, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House requests the Minister of Justice to release, in addition to the information on public opinion polls which he plans to give, all details concerning Martin Goldfarb and Goldfarb Associates Limited and the taxpayers' money they have received for government polling since 1968; and that this House condemns with utter contempt the government's failure to supply Parliament and the public with answers to questions on Goldfarb taxpayer-paid polling for over three years while it still continues to allow the Liberal affiliated Goldfarb interests to fill their gluttonous Goldfarb bellies at the public trough.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CROSS-COUNTRY MARATHON OF TERRY FOX

EXTENSION OF CONGRATULATIONS AND STRIKING OF STAMP IN COMMEMORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. After consultation I am encouraged and assured by the Hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that Terry Fox, through his Marathon of Hope, has joined the ranks of our outstanding Canadian heroes in his fight against cancer. To those people suffering from this deadly disease in Canada and throughout the world it is Terry Fox who has given them hope through his courage and determination. Most of us have lost someone dear to cancer, just as I lost my dad. Terry Fox has given us special pride in being Canadians and has touched the hearts of us all.

In recognition of Terry Fox and the Marathon of Hope in the fight against cancer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House extends to Terry Fox hearty congratulations and thanks on behalf of all Canadians and, further, that the government strike a suitable stamp to commemorate Terry Fox and his Marathon of Hope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR TESTING

CALL TO CEASE TESTS CONDUCTED BY U.S.S.R.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Seismic signals picked up on Saturday, October 11, indicate the Soviet Union detonated two underground nuclear tests. These tests all add further radiation to our environment and jeopardize the health of all citizens on our planet. All nuclear tests, whether above or below ground, are steps which lead humanity further into the insanity of the nuclear arms race. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House calls on the government of the U.S.S.R. to stop all nuclear testing.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF NEW TERMINAL BUILDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In November of 1977 the Government of Canada announced publicly that Canada would proceed immediately with plans for a major redevelopment of the Charlottetown airport. In view of the fact that Prince Edward Island's archaic air terminal building has yet to be replaced despite serious overcrowding and other deplorable conditions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

● (1410)

That this House urge Transport Canada to proceed without further delay with the construction of a new Charlottetown airport terminal building and related projects in accordance with the design completed and agreed to in 1977.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

HARD RED SPRING WHEAT—ACTION TO CORRECT DISCRIMINATION RESPECTING QUOTAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I have a matter of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the new grain quotas in western Canada. In view of the fact that all of southern Alberta, served by four Canadian Wheat Board delivery blocks, has been completely overlooked with respect to the new grain quotas for hard red spring wheat, and further in view of the obvious situation that all of southern Alberta is the only area in the wheat board designated area of western Canada without new quotas for hard red spring wheat, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That the Minister of Transport, as the senior minister for grain transportation and wheat board matters take immediate action to correct this outright discrimination against southern Alberta with respect to hard red spring wheat quotas.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CALL FOR CONDEMNATION OF JUNTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the recent murders of Salvadorian human rights leaders, Maria Magdalena Henriques, Father Manuel Rafael Reyes and family of the catechist, and the murders of many other human rights and community leaders, and in view of the evidence clearly indicating that this is the work of the forces of the Salvadorian junta and paramilitary groups in civilian dress, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House calls on the Government of Canada to condemn the junta of El Salvador, to protest clearly and openly the continued and increasing military support of that junta by the United States, and take international initiatives to assure the safety, health and lives of Salvadorian human rights and community leaders.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

CALL FOR REJECTION OF IMPOSITION OF FEDERAL TAX ON PROVINCIAL RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing importance to the future of our country. Given the fact that during the short period of two weeks more than 10,000 residents of British Columbia have already signed a petition in which they express their absolute rejection of any attempt by the Government of Canada to impose a discriminatory federal excise tax against the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power from British Columbia, and recognizing also that the mayors and municipalities of British Columbia, meeting in convention last month, passed a resolution unanimously opposing a federal export tax on natural gas, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this House rejects absolutely the unilateral imposition of any federal export tax on provincial resources and hereby directs the government to abandon its planned export tax on natural gas, which would discriminate blatantly and unfairly against the residents, the municipalities and the provincial governments of British Columbia and Alberta.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN PHASING-IN PERIOD RESPECTING BENEFITS TO WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House reaffirms its approval of Bill C-40, passed earlier in this session, in which significant improvements were made respecting the widows of disabled veterans, but regrets that the six-and-a-half-year phasing-in period in that bill means that many thousands of widows will still have to wait from one up to six years before they receive the pensions to which, by law, they are now entitled; and this House therefore calls on the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce legislation to cut that phasing-in period in half, or to make it even shorter, for the benefit of widows who deserve their pensions while they are still alive.

● (1415)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is reflecting on a vote which took place in the House. If I understood well the meaning of this motion, the hon. member agrees with the legislation but disagrees with one of the dispositions of that legislation. The vote has already occurred on that legislation and for that reason I feel that for the time being this motion is not acceptable.

An hon. Member: Three o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I point out that there are many precedents—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Knowles: —of a bill being passed in a session and another bill being passed later in that same session amending the previous bill. That is what I am requesting.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Knowles: However, I am prepared to come back at it in another way on another day.

An hon. Member: Abide by the rules.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I could not understand what the hon. member was saying but I think he said that he was in fact saying something different from the disposition of that legislation and that he will come back another day with a new motion. Is that what the hon. member said?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Madam Speaker: Then I shall expect another motion on another day.

NATIVE RIGHTS

CALL FOR EXPLANATION OF FAILURE TO FORMULATE POLICY RESPECTING SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the uncertainties caused by the lack of action by both the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his special negotiator from the other place in renegotiating the COPE agreement, which is proving to be unacceptable on account of its having been signed in haste without consultation with the Yukon or Northwest Territories governments, affected municipalities or native groups having overlapping claims, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be called upon by this House to make a statement on motions to explain his failure to formulate and announce a policy which would allow for the fair and just settlement of these outstanding land claims.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PENITENTIARIES

HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENTS—DANGER POSED TO GUARDS—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General respecting the series of prison disturbances across Canada that have culminated in the disaster at Dorchester penitentiary and the death of William Morrison. The Solicitor General is aware of the hostage-taking incidents and escapes at federal institutions and I am sure has received complaints from those concerned with security and the safety of the guards and staff. He knows a recent search at Dorchester yielded an arsenal of weapons. I want to know whether he has responded to these warnings. I want to know what action he has taken and proposes to take, but mostly, Madam Speaker, I want to know why he has rendered the guards and staff helpless in the face of obvious danger.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I dispute the notion that we have rendered the guards helpless in the face of obvious danger. I should like to inform the House that I have asked the correctional service to begin, and they have begun, to prepare a list of the names of those offenders across the system who are the most violent and dangerous and who represent the greatest threat to order in the institution.

An hon. Member: Are you going to run them as candidates?

Mr. Kaplan: When I see the list and the numbers involved, I will consider proposing some new program within the institutions for protecting not only the guards and the rest of the prison population, but the community in general, from that very violent group.

An hon. Member: What about the committee report?

Mr. Kaplan: I might add that one of the reasons for the problems in our institutions is the trend in recent years, which I welcome very much, and which I think the House does, not to send people to these institutions who can be diverted and who can be punished by fines or other forms of punishment outside the institutions.

Mr. Crosby: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The staff at Dorchester penitentiary have complained bitterly about lack of manpower to control the prisoners and the Solicitor General has been told in the House and in committees that the situation is dangerous. Does he acknowledge that he received these warnings respecting manpower, will he tell us how he responded to them, and what can he say about the rumour of more resignations among the staff at Dorchester?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I can say that I have not heard that rumour about staff. I am meeting this afternoon or tomorrow with representatives of the union of Solicitor General's employees. I want to discuss with them their grievances and also, of course, the special perspective which they have and which I would like to have on dealing with this type of offender.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, the great problem in our prisons, as the Solicitor General has pointed out, is the handling of dangerous and desperate prisoners. Yet the Solicitor General disregards the warnings and says that he will take the risks of mixing these dangerous men in the general prison population. Can he now justify these risks in terms of the safety of prison staff and the effective administration of Dorchester?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, again that is not exactly accurate. We have two special handling units across the country for housing the most violent and dangerous offenders. They are put in special handling units and they are not released until a national committee, which studies individual cases, feels their release is justified.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What about your speech in London?

Mr. Kaplan: We also have punitive dissociation to which inmates are subject after they engage in incidents.

What concerns me is that so far we have no specific facility for dealing with those who we know are violent, or may be violent and dangerous, and a threat to the institutions and to the guards. It is to that group, the size of which I am not certain yet but which I will know more about within the next few days, that I would like to direct some special programs.

INQUIRY WHETHER CONDITIONS WILL BE EXAMINED

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my questions are also directed to the Solicitor General. I think the House is rather appalled to learn that only after a study the Solicitor General is perhaps thinking of imposing a fine on some convicted murderers who instigated a problem resulting in the killing of a prison guard on the weekend. Has the Solicitor General considered, as several independent members of this House have come to him and pleaded in regard to Dorchester just this summer alone, setting up some type of inquiry so that at long last we can have some public exposition of the real problems that exist, not only in that sick institution but in a sick system generally speaking?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as to Dorchester, there are three inquiries under way. There is one by a coroner; there is one by the police in the area, which may result in charges being laid; and then there is a special inquiry authorized by the commissioner at my direction which is under way now. The results of the last special inquiry at Dorchester, which I have had for a few days, I read over the weekend. They point as well to this problem of the requirement for some new classification, which I propose to devise within the next while when I see the numbers involved, to deal with this violent, dangerous group, who too often are known ahead of time, but only on the basis of suspicion and special insights on the part of the correctional service, but for whom no special program has been designed with their security needs in mind.

Mr. Beatty: Appoint them to the parole board.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, as the Solicitor General knows, the coroner feels he has been bypassed by his officials. The RCMP have made extraordinary attempts to make sure that the facts in this case have not been made public and perhaps will not be made public, which I find quite deplorable. Finally, the commissioner's inquiry which the Solicitor General is now talking about is merely correctional service people talking to correctional service people in an in-house type of inquiry in which the report by this minister is never made public. What I think this House and the public are entitled to—and I ask the minister for it today—is an independent public inquiry not only for Dorchester, but perhaps into the whole mess and method of dealing with these dangerous offenders and hostage-taking incidents.

Mr. Nielsen: That was also a committee recommendation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, as to the point of never making the facts public, I would indicate to the House now that I would be prepared, when the facts have been collected by the special inquiry, to make them public in the next few days as soon as I have them.

• (1425)

As to the nature of the special inquiry group, it is true that normally the special inquiry is constituted of members of the Inspector General's office, which is a division of the correctional service of Canada, but in this particular case we have asked to serve on the commission and have the support of a senior official of the provincial correctional service. Therefore, my hon. friend will have his wish before even asking me to have an outsider sit on that commission. There will be an outsider on it who knows a great deal about penitentiaries.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON, N.S.—INQUIRY WHETHER PLANS TO REVITALIZE STEEL INDUSTRY WILL BE ANNOUNCED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Last week the minister indicated that he was not aware if the task force report on the future of Sysco had been submitted to the government. Is he now aware that not only was that task force report submitted to the government, but that was done about a month ago? If he is aware that that task force report is now in, is he now prepared to announce the detailed plan of the government to revitalize the steel industry in Cape Breton Island along the lines promised by the Prime Minister almost a year ago?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I met with the steelworkers this morning. In preparation for that meeting, I inquired on Friday as to the status of the results of the task force report and I was advised it would be on hand within a few days. Therefore, if it has arrived, then my information is incorrect.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it is not totally unusual for the minister to be incorrect, but I will inform him that the minister responsible for DREE did indeed get the report on September 14; so it has been around for some time. In that context, I would also like to ask him this. In preparing for this morning's meeting, I hope the minister also learned that there is growing potential for export sales of coke in world markets. In order for us to cash in on those export sales, it is essential that we get ahead of our American competitors in modernizing our steel producing facility at Sysco. Does the government have some sense of urgency about this matter, and will the minister be prepared to announce within a matter of days detailed plans for the modernization of Sysco?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, there is and has been a sense of urgency with respect to developing the possibilities for coke. I believe that some weeks ago the Department of Regional Economic Expansion opened an office in Halifax with the sole purpose of developing interest on the continent and elsewhere in establishing a coke plant in the Cape Breton area because it had been established, to my understanding, that such a plant might be viable. So the government has acted long before the hon. member caught on to this idea.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister says he is aware of the matter and is acting with some sense of urgency. He has just demonstrated that he did not know the report was submitted to his government more than a month ago. That is some sense of urgency. An office in Halifax which he announced in order to promote sales will not produce jobs where they are needed most urgently right now, namely in Cape Breton.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In the past few weeks alone, over 600 people have been laid off at Sysco. Since there is potential for selling coke if we modernize now—and the man sitting at the minister's left promised in two elections in a row to modernize that facility within the first year after being elected—when is this government going to get off its collective derriere and live up to its election promises to the people of Cape Breton?

• (1430)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am not going to debate with the hon. member about the arrival of that report. I question very strongly whether his information is accurate, but we can ascertain that later. It is a matter of fact that we can ascertain. My information on Friday was that the results of that task force report would not be available until a few days from now, and would be going forward for study. That is a matter of fact. If it has arrived, all the better.

Having regard to the "man to my left", I would remind the hon. member that when the Prime Minister appeared in Sydney and discussed the Sydney steel plant he repeated a commitment which had already been made by the Government of Canada to the government of Nova Scotia to provide $50 million in support of modernization of the Sydney steel plant. That commitment stills stands and we are awaiting some plan or program which will ensure that when that money and possibly some funds from the provincial government are spent, the Sydney steel plant will have a certain and viable future. I for one am not prepared to advocate spending money unless I have some assurance that the money will result in a viable and certain future for that particular plant.

REQUEST FOR VOTE IN HOUSE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, in light of reports coming out of the Dorchester penitentiary lately concerning resignation of guards, a state of crisis, hostage-takings and deaths, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. In view of these recent events at Dorchester, will the minister consider what the former Conservative government was considering and acting on, the implementation of—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Domm: Quite seriously, Madam Speaker, I refer to implementation and action in this House. Will the Solicitor General assure this House that he will allow private members' bills which are now on the order paper to come forward for debate and vote so that we can know whether in conscience the members of this House of Commons are prepared to substitute their mouths for their words on paper and vote on capital punishment? Will the minister give the opportunity to members of this House to vote on capital punishment?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am not the member of the government responsible for the business of the House, and the question was about the business of the House. I could remind hon. members opposite that this is an opposition day and they could have chosen any subject that they consider important.

An hon. Member: That is a cop-out.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, in light of the state of crisis, the hostage-taking and the fact that a prison guard has been killed, I consider that a direct cop-out on the issue.

My supplementary question to the minister deals with the report of a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs under a former Liberal government which recommended—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Domm: I am going to remind the minister of his own report.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid I have to remind the hon. member that he has the floor now in order to ask a question, not to make a speech.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, would the Solicitor General assure this House that he will implement the recommendations of that special subcommittee by setting up a special institution for the hard-core criminals, those serving 25-year sentences, bringing them in from all over Canada? Will the minister implement the recommendation of that subcommittee? Will he give action to their words?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, in the first place the inmates serving 25 years are not necessarily the most violent and dangerous in the system. That group includes many of the most violent and dangerous inmates, but there are others as well with extra security needs who have to be considered.

As to the report of the MacGuigan committee, it has been very substantially implemented, as I indicated when I appeared before the justice committee. I would be glad to appear before that committee again on my estimates and go through those recommendations which my predecessors, including my immediate predecessor, took some care and concern to implement to the degree it was considered practical to do so.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF SUBCOMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the recent hostage-taking at Dorchester which suggests serious deficiencies in policy-making and/or management at one or more levels of the correctional service of Canada, will the minister reconsider his outright rejection of recommendation No. 24 of the special subcommittee on penitentiaries, chaired by his illustrious colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which strongly recommended the appointment of a board of five members, reporting to the Solicitor General, which would be responsible for the making of policy?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do disagree with that recommendation, and I believe my immediate predecessor, the Conservative solicitor general, did so as well. Because it would remove the accountability of the system to this chamber, and I am not prepared to see that change. Certainly I would be prepared to discuss it with the justice committee, but it would seem unwise to me to interject between Parliament and the correctional service of Canada the sort of board of governors that Air Canada or the CBC has, which reduces the accountability of the institutions in question to the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Halliday: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is again directed to the Solicitor General. If the minister had read the report he would realize that the matter of accountability and responsibility was dealt with by the committee. Inasmuch as the minister has essentially refused to set up a public inquiry which would look into the affair at Dorchester, and at the same time has refused to implement the subcommittee report in toto, as recommended by that committee, will he now implement the intent of recommendation No. 65 of that report by making a special reference of this subject matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Mr. Kaplan: As to whether or not I have read the report, Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that I sat on the committee, I helped gather evidence and I worked on the preparation of that report. On the question of the reference, there is a tremendous volume of work for the justice committee, and I would be happy to deal with questions like that when my estimates, which are now before the committee, are considered. Frankly, it would be for the committee to consider how much of their estimates time they would want to spend on that. There is other work for that committee which I think should have a higher priority.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

INQUIRY HOW MANY SMALL CARS WILL BE MANUFACTURED IN CANADA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As you know, the minister has been travelling around the world trying to help Canadian industry and I wonder whether he might be able to give us some information today. He has no doubt noted that the United States auto industry has moved significantly to the manufacturing of small, what they call world cars with front-wheel drive. Given the auto pact and our very close relationship with them, how many of those cars will be manufactured in Canada this year?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I want to welcome my hon. friend back from his recent journeys to Mexico and Washington.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That was great; now answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: It is my understanding that a number of major motor vehicle manufacturers will be manufacturing smaller cars in Canada in forthcoming model years, and I refer specifically to the Lynx to be assembled in St. Thomas, and the plans of General Motors to assemble smaller cars, I think in the next model year, at its plant in Oshawa. Also, in particular, in the coming year the General Motors company, which has recently tripled the size of its transmission plant in Windsor, will begin manufacturing transmissions there for the new General Motors J cars. I think we are making progress in the area of assembling these smaller, down-sized cars in Canada, as well as manufacturing parts for them. However, I think we need further progress and I am striving to achieve that progress.

● (1440)

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Incidentally, when I was in Washington, the people there mentioned that the minister had been there.

I wonder if the minister might reflect on the ad being run on television which says quite clearly that Americans are not going to be pushed around any longer. That is an ad for Chrysler, and I understand that Chrysler has just announced it will lay off 600 workers in Canada indefinitely on the twenty-fourth of this month. Given that we are not manufacturing small cars and they are not selling big cars, when are we going to stop being pushed around?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the Chrysler cars assembled in Canada are down-sized, fuel-efficient—

Mr. Deans: Nonsense.

Mr. Gray: —models of the Dodge Cordoba and Mirada, compared with the ones previously manufactured here, as well as the down-sized Imperial. I hope we will find an improvement in the over-all sales of these cars as the buying season goes on. I hope also that it will be possible to call back these workers before too long.

My hon. friends are concerned about the Imperial. It is a down-sized, fuel-efficient car, although a luxury car, and with all their supposed concern for workers, I would think hon. members opposite would urge people to buy these cars made in Windsor so that the people in whom they claim to have an interest will continue their work and get back to work.

PENITENTIARIES

SUGGESTED CAUSE OF PRESENT CONDITIONS

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. Can the minister confirm that a significant part of the problem within our prisons is the nature of the institutions themselves and that it was exacerbated by the refusal of the minister's immediate predecessor to proceed with the construction of modern, manageable prisons to replace antiquated, century-old dungeons?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, there is in fact no shortage of accommodation for the present inmate population, but it certainly is true, and I agree with my friend, that some of our institutions are very old. The B.C. penitentiary was one which I was pleased to be able to close in my first few weeks on the job. The penitentiary at Laval is now slated to be closed, and two new institutions, one at Donnacona and one at Drummondville in the province of Quebec, will be constructed over the next four or five years to replace them. However, I want to assure hon. members that the present accommodations of the correctional service of Canada are adequate for the present inmate population.

ENERGY

IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT—EFFECT ON OIL SUPPLY TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the continuing Iran-Iraq war—in fact, it perhaps is escalating—there is going to be a total shut-off of oil production from those two countries for several months, if not longer. Can the minister tell the House whether he has been in contact with his counterparts in the other signatory nations to the International Energy Agreement, and can he give us their view as to the likelihood of the sharing rules of the IEA being brought into effect and eastern Canadians being faced with oil shortages of up to 30 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question which, I am sure, is of interest to all Canadians. I myself have had the opportunity of discussing the matter with some of my colleagues, and in particular with the American Secretary for Energy, Mr. Duncan, a few weeks ago. In addition, my officials have been in touch with the authorities of the International Energy Agency. According to the agency's findings, there is no reason for the western countries to fear an oil shortage as a result of the current Iran-Iraq conflict, particularly because various countries have accumulated considerable reserves; in addition, the co-ordination between member countries of the International Energy Agency is much better now than it has been in the past.

Consequently, there is no reason to fear the need to apply, in the near future, any of the sharing rules to the various members of the IEA. What the members of the agency are concerned about, however, at this time is preventing the flare-up in prices on the free market which could result from a rush of orders on the part of a number of its members. There has been some co-ordination in that regard and I feel we must rejoice in the fact that there has been no appreciable increase in prices on the free market in the last few weeks. The concern expressed by the hon. member, therefore, does not seem to be justified, especially with regard to eastern Canada.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I hope the minister's confidence is based on more than just wishful thinking, and I wonder how we can do without the production of these two major oil producers and still not have our future in some doubt.

Given that the Iran-Iraq war is yet another example of the recklessness, if not insanity, of failing to pursue a policy of energy self-sufficiency with vigour, has the minister, if he is unwilling to make those sensible but tough decisions which are necessary to make this country self-sufficient in oil, at least taken a final decision or any decision or action with regard to some strategic storage in eastern Canada so that at the time of the next crisis, if it occurs in mid-winter, Atlantic Canadians will not be faced with wholesale closures of factories, schools and other public buildings?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the only time when Canada had to face such a danger was in November and December last year while the party of my hon. colleague was in power. Since then the member countries of the International Energy Agency and Canada have considerably increased their reserves. In addition, my colleague should know that Saudi Arabia and certain other countries have agreed to increase their production to offset, to a large extent at least, the discontinuation of supplies from Iraq and Iran. So conditions are such that once again there is no reason to fear that in the coming months there will be a shortage of oil in Canada.

OFFSHORE RESOURCES

REPORTED STATEMENT OF SENATE DEPUTY GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On Thursday the deputy government leader in the Senate, a distinguished and learned lawyer from Ontario, supported the claim of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia to offshore oil and gas. On Friday the Prime Minister hinted that he may be prepared to make resource concessions to the provinces. This is an area in which there is already undisputed jurisdiction under the current provisions of the BNA Act. Was the deputy leader of the government in the Senate speaking for the government when he supported the claim of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia?

That leads me to the next part of my question. Does the Prime Minister intend, in the concessions he has hinted he is prepared to make, to include rights of the coastal provinces to offshore oil and gas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had occasion to see what remarks were made in the other place, but I will gladly refer to them. If, as the hon. member says, it is correct to say that the rights of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia are established beyond dispute, it is hard for me to understand why they have not accepted a reference to the Supreme Court, which we have suggested repeatedly over the past years. If their claims are beyond dispute, why do they not establish them in a reference to the court? I have not heard an answer to that yet.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—REPORTED ANNOUNCEMENT BY GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS RESPECTING EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister with respect to an important announcement emanating from Boston today made by the governor of Massachusetts, Edward King, in which he described a new relationship between Canada and the United States which involves a ten-year multimillion dollar contract to pump Canadian natural gas to the northeastern United States. I realize that this is probably subject to confirmation by officials of the two countries but, if this is the case, why have we apparently advanced in priority pumping gas to the northeastern United States ahead of pumping gas to the maritimes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: —which the Prime Minister specifically promised in a speech given to the Halifax Board of Trade on January 25 of this year and which was one of seven specific commitments he announced at that time—the Minister of Labour will remember; he was there—to help the maritimes get immediate access to natural gas? I wonder if the Prime Minister could give the House a bit more information on this apparent anomaly.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not been made acquainted with that statement by the governor of Massachusetts, but the House will recall that a few years ago when the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Gillespie, was proposing the idea of a pipeline, the idea was that it would be built to the Atlantic provinces, and then there could be exports of gas to the United States after it had served the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I welcome what appears to be some sort of assurance from the Prime Minister in this respect, and I remind him and make a representation to him that until we get a natural gas pipeline to Atlantic Canada we cannot take advantage of our natural geographic position to have the terminal point for LNG in the Strait of Canso area. Would he please hurry up with his implementation of this specific commitment? I would ask him to reread his speech so that there can be no doubt as to any vagueness, as apparently there is in this commitment made to a surrogate, Gordon Gibson, on the west coast, as brought out by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the decision of the National Energy Board was made public several months ago. My hon. friend knows the reasons why the National Energy Board did not see fit to approve at that time the immediate completion of the pipeline to the maritimes. We have indicated that this was still our preferred position. There is an appeal now before the Energy Board respecting its decision, and I suggest that my hon. friend should wait a few weeks before hearing more about this.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM NOT BE DISCONTINUED

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for CMHC. In 1978 the Liberal government made a long-term commitment to municipalities through the community services contributions program which integrated many important services, such as neighbourhood improvement, sewage treatment facilities and plants for conversion of waste into energy. This program was supposed to be the solution to a host of municipal problems. Recent statements by the minister have contributed to the fear that the program is to be discontinued. Will the minister assure the House that there is no truth to this rumour?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated in conversations with each of the provincial counterparts charged with responsibility in housing, yes, indeed, the government is reviewing this program to see whether it will be continued beyond this year. We are looking at the program because nationally it is a program of some $250 million which, in essence, is transferred from the federal government through the province to the municipalities. No doubt it assists the municipalities. As a former mayor I know well the advantages of that program. However, the program is under review. Before the year end I hope to have an answer for the provincial ministers and the municipalities. My objective would be, if the program cannot be continued, that some other way be found to assist the municipalities with their objectives.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Since the minister is unable to give us a clearcut commitment for the continuation of the program, and he has indicated that some substitute program will be put in its place should the other one be discontinued, can he also assure the House that the specific projects under the existing program will be fully funded to completion?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, on the last point, yes, the programs in place will be funded. The terms of the contract specify that and those commitments will be made. But I did not say that a substitute program would be found; I said that that will be my advice to the government and it is my hope that there will be a program.

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA TO TEST LEGALITY OF RESOLUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister following the reasoning of the Prime Minister in response to my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East. Since the Prime Minister is so sure of the legality of his government's position on the constitutional resolution now before the House of Commons, I wonder whether the Prime Minister, following the advice he gave through the hon. member for St. John's East to the government of Newfoundland, would be prepared to make a reference of that matter to the Supreme Court of Canada to see if the Supreme Court of Canada agrees with the Prime Minister that this resolution is entirely within the competence of the Government of Canada, or whether the Supreme Court of Canada will disagree with the Prime Minister, as it did in the case of Bill C-60?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is not only mixing apples and oranges, he is throwing bananas into it too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: You are throwing baloney.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition will recall that in the case of Bill C-60 the reference was on section 91 of the constitution, something that is in there now—

Mr. Crosbie: Sour grapes.

Mr. Trudeau: —and the Supreme Court was judging whether or not under section 91 the federal government had certain powers.

Mr. Beatty: They said that you were wrong.

Mr. Trudeau: The courts always say that one party is wrong and the other is right. In the case of the offshore it is the same thing. There is a division of power between the federal and provincial governments. It is a matter for the courts to say whether that power lies in the federal government or in the provinces.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about patriation?

Mr. Trudeau: The matter of patriation is a matter for the House of Commons. It is before the House of Commons now because there is no provision in the constitution for patriation and there is nothing for the courts to judge upon.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, in the middle of all of the baloney and bananas we have received from the Prime Minister, I did not note a response to my question. My question is: will the Government of Canada agree to a reference as to the constitutionality of the action they are proposing in the resolution that is now before the House of Commons?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I answered the preamble which was baloney and bananas. As to the question itself, I want to see the House study this matter. Then once it is adopted, of course, any citizen or any province can refer the matter to the courts if it so decides. But it is not the intention of the government to ask the courts to decide upon a matter which Parliament itself has before it.

Mr. Crosbie: You are unreliable.

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE RESPECTING HERITAGE CULTURE

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Many ethno-cultural groups in Canada are expressing concern that their heritage language and culture will not be protected by the proposed resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada. This fear was expressed by delegates attending two conventions this weekend, the Ukrainian-Canadian Congress conference in Winnipeg and the delegates attending the Canadian Polish Congress convention in Ottawa. Because of these concerns, would the Prime Minister please clarify whether section 22 or some other section of the proposed resolution does in fact guarantee these Canadians the preservation and further development of their heritage culture, which of course includes their heritage language?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the intention was to address that question in the preamble, and I refer the hon. member to the preamble we submitted to the provinces last June. Unfortunately, the provinces have refused to accept that preamble, and since—

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Trudeau: They have preferred to present to me a preamble which was closer to the wording of the Premier of Quebec, who wanted the idea of self-determination to be included, and of course we could not accept that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE REFERENCE OF PATRIATION QUESTION TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I think that it was on May 28, 1946, that the Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent said, and I quote:

> There are other matters given by the act to the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and the provincial governments; with respect to any of those it is my view that it would not be possible to deal with them without the consent of those to whose jurisdiction they have been confided.

Madam Speaker, I would like to know whether the Prime Minister is prepared to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the unilateral patriation of the constitution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I answered the second question of the hon. member a moment ago when speaking to the Leader of the Official Opposition. As for the first part of the question, it seems to me that the member must be quoting what Mr. St. Laurent said when the first paragraph of section 91 was amended. He was then saying that some matters were outside federal jurisdiction when it wanted to amend its own constitution. The distribution of powers indeed appear in the first paragraph of section 91. I would like to point out that we do not alter the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments in the resolution now under consideration. We do not alter what Mr.

St. Laurent said, that is, that the distribution of powers could not be affected by a federal amendment.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

It is very clear to me that the project aims at reducing the power of the provinces over some matters such as language rights. In my opinion the powers of the provinces will clearly be changed by this resolution. Does the Prime Minister agree? If not, could these matters be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have just given the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition a negative answer to the same question.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES COMMISSIONER

EXPENDITURE ON LANGUAGE GAMES FOR FREE DISTRIBUTION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I wonder if the minister could tell the House whether, contrary to general public belief, the consolidated revenue fund is suffering from an overabundance of surplus.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Not yet, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Gamble: In light of that rather terse but succinct answer, I ask the minister whether the expenditure just recently incurred by Maxwell Yalden, Commissioner of Official Languages, of $1,360,000 in purchasing 200,000 Parker Brothers quality language games for free distribution is an appropriate expenditure of public funds and, if so, where Mr. Yalden acquired the authority, under the Official Languages Act, for that kind of expenditure.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that, as I understand it, Mr. Yalden as the Official Languages Commissioner is an officer of the House of Commons and therefore any member of the House or a parliamentary committee would not only be entitled, but would be obligated, to question Mr. Yalden on the reasons for spending such sums of money, just as members can question the Chief Electoral Officer or other persons who are directly responsible to Parliament and not to the government.

POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF LNG STORAGE FACILITIES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last summer, Petro-Canada announced the construction of large LNG storage facilities. It would appear that consultant firms have chosen two sites: Gros-Cacouna and Canso in Newfoundland. Can the Minister advise us as to the progress of these studies and, if so, when does he expect Petro-Canada or himself to make a definite announcement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): First of all, Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member for Joliette that Canso is in Nova Scotia and not in Newfoundland as he indicated. Secondly, Petro-Canada has not announced a decision regarding this project. Rather, it announced a pilot project for the shipment of natural gas from the Arctic to southern Canada. This project will be submitted for consideration to the National Energy Board which will decide whether or not it should be retained. In its submission to the NEB, Petro-Canada proposed two sites, Gros-Cacouna in Quebec and Canso, in the Strait of Canso in Nova Scotia. This question will also be considered by the NEB which will make a decision that will be made public and will be subject to government approval if indeed there is to be an export of gas from Canada. In the meantime, I think we must let Petro-Canada proceed with the necessary studies on the matter and let the National Energy Board do its work. That is all the information I have on the subject for now. As I indicated, the decision at this point is up to Petro-Canada and the National Energy Board.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, since Canso is in Nova Scotia, and also in the constituency of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance if I am not mistaken, can I have the assurance that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, as a Quebecker, will have as much influence as the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance on the choice of a location?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, every citizen is entitled to be heard by the National Energy Board. However, it would be rather unusual for me as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make representations to the National Energy Board or to exert any kind of pressures on the board. Indeed, neither myself nor my colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, intend to do any such thing. I am certain that the decision will be made in light of what is economically the wisest for Petro-Canada and Canada as a whole. I wish to assure my hon. colleague that this decision will eventually be made in the interest of all Canadians, including Quebeckers.

NATIONAL ANTHEM ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-616, to amend the National Anthem Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, the House will recall that earlier in this session, in a rather unprecedented act, the House symbolized its commitment to national unity by endorsing the national anthem as being the official national anthem of Canada. Circumstances throughout the country made this symbolic act necessary.

It is also known to all members of the House that there are members here who made certain compromises in respect to that, as some of the words in the anthem do not adequately reflect the ethnic make-up of our country. Indeed, one-third of our population cannot lay claim to the word "native" in the anthem and, in his wisdom, the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), who introduced and piloted the bill through the House, said in his speech that it was the intention to allow a private member's bill to proceed, to make the changes to at least two words in the anthem. Madam Speaker, I want to give the House the opportunity to make these changes through my bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise to refer to two particular matters with regard to answering questions on the order paper. The first matter I would like to refer to deals with question No. 15 which has now stood on the order paper for three years and four months.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Mr. Cossitt: It asks a very simple question to this effect: how much money has Martin Goldfarb and Goldfarb Associates and Consultants received from the government for conducting government polls? This question has been on the order paper for three years and four months and has not yet been answered.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) assured this House a few days ago that on Wednesday of this week, and possibly later next week, he will table information about certain government polls. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to assure this House that this question concerning Martin Goldfarb will either be answered at the same time on Wednesday, the same day—because after all he has had three years and four months of notice—or whether the Minister of Justice will include it in his answer.

To quote an old phrase, "Belly up to the bar, boys", it seems to me that with Goldfarb it is "Belly up to the trough and dig into the public funds". I think that it is time the public knew how much money—and it is a lot of money—is going to this enterprise, which is really the chief pollster of the Liberal Party of Canada.

The other point which I would like to raise, Madam Speaker, is with regard to the parliamentary secretary who has been widely quoted by the news media that he would consider or suggest that members be limited to ten or possibly 12 questions on the order paper. Such a move would have the effect of muzzling any member from asking a question if such a proposal were adopted, and I would like to know whether or not it is government policy. After all, if any member of this House were to put ten questions on the order paper, there is nothing in the rules to indicate that they must be answered and, by leaving the questions on the order paper unanswered, under this proposal the government could simply put a member in the position where he could never put another written question on the order paper.

If this is the policy of a government which says that it is in favour of freedom of information, then I think we should know about it, because it is a serious breach of the rights of members. If the hon. parliamentary secretary has been misquoted, then I think now is the time to tell the House that he has been misquoted. If he should perhaps be speaking on his own behalf, rather than on the government's behalf, then I would contend under this point of order that, because he is the member who answers questions on the order paper in the House on behalf of the government, it is very difficult for him to dissociate himself from that function and to speak privately, and therefore the position from which he makes his utterances should be qualified.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I have two very brief points. The parliamentary secretary said, according to these publicized remarks, that the cost of questions on the order paper was between $100 and $1,000 per question per member, and that this was costing the taxpayer too much money. I do not think that it costs too much money to let the public know what is going on when it is with regard to legitimate information, especially when some of the answers are not worth $100, $1,000, but only ten cents, if that.

On my final point, Madam Speaker, I hope we will not be treated to a lecture by the parliamentary secretary on percentages. We usually receive such comments from him as, "We've answered 80 per cent of this member's questions, we've answered 70 per cent of this member's questions, or 75 per cent of that member's questions. The government tries to make it sound as though it is gloriously serving this country when the actual truth is that it answers questions with either a non-answer, or only questions which will do no harm to the government. But for three years and four months it has neglected a question which it is literally afraid to answer.

An hon. Member: You guys can have him.

Mr. Cossitt: The hon. member sitting next to the parliamentary secretary can have his little jokes and asides, but I say that it is time that the members opposite stopped joking and said to their own government, "it is time we had some answers and freedom of information in this country".

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, taking a cue from the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) with regard to his closing remarks, I should say that the government has a freedom of information bill on the order paper, and we hope to proceed with it very soon. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) last week, I believe, made an excellent presentation in which he said that a certain number of polls would be released by the government this week. I will bring the hon. member's question No. 15. to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

On the larger point raised by the hon. member with regard to the use of questions on the order paper, it is quite correct that I have been quoted publicly on this subject in recent weeks. My public comments have emanated from the fact that the hon. member himself on numerous occasions has questioned me before this House after I have given a list of questions and, in my view, has tried to embarrass the government or score political points over the fact that some of these questions were not answered.

Mr. McDermid: Really?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He would never do that!

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member says that his question has been on the order paper for three years and four months. I suggested before that the hon. member's own government could very well have answered that question during its brief tenure in office.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You didn't give us time.

Mr. Collenette: So, I do not think that is an accurate point to make. Since taking on this job I have tried very hard to come to grips with the number of questions on the order paper and to ensure that we give an adequate reply to all members. The tabling of answers last Monday to 446 questions means that we have now answered 65 per cent of the questions presently on the order paper.

I should state that the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville is, to my knowledge, the most frequent user of the order paper.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Good for him; that's his job.

Mr. Collenette: Perhaps that is his job, and I can say that the government has answered half of his questions. I would hope he would be at least satisfied with that performance as of today, but I want to get it up to 100 per cent, and I am trying. I spent some time over the summer chasing some of these answers down. The result was the tabling of 446 answers last week.

I would draw your attention, Madam Speaker, to Beauchesne's fifth edition, chapter 9, at page 129, on the definition of oral and written questions. It appears to me—and this is a personal observation although I deal with these questions every day as part of my duties as parliamentary secretary—that some of the questions which I answer in the House—and I read every answer tabled in this House—really go beyond the bounds of the propriety of written questions as outlined in Beauchesne's at page 129, citation 357.

It is my belief, and I have mentioned it to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), who, as hon. members know, is an ardent proponent of parliamentary reform, that when we get agreement among all parties to proceed with reform, we should not only look at sitting hours and length of speeches, but also at the propriety of questions on the order paper as to whether or not members are really going beyond the original intent of our parliamentary practice in posing such questions.

I hope that there will be general agreement among all sides of the House that we look at this matter on an ongoing basis. It worries me, as a member of Parliament who is charged, as are all members, with making sure that the public's money is spent wisely, to see an inordinate number of questions, many of which are merely a series of variations on one major theme and the answers to which could be easily obtained if the member's secretary were to call the minister's office. That way the question would not have to go on the order paper and be translated into both official languages, or go through the departmental procedures which we have established.

I was quoted in the press a while ago as saying that just to table a yes or no answer to any one question costs approximately $75 of the taxpayer's money. Most of the answers which are tabled in the House are of much longer variety and some of them run into pages. The process costs quite a lot of money and it is my personal belief that members of the House, perhaps through the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, should be looking into the matter. Members of the House should be concerned as to whether or not this particular part of our parliamentary procedure is being followed in the appropriate manner.

There are limits in question period as to the number and types of questions a member can ask. You, Madam Speaker, have laid down a number of rules, or reiterated the proper form for questions in the question period. We have certain procedures for private members' hour. Not all private members' bills come up for debate, yet the one area of our procedures where I think we have an open-ended situation is that of questions on the order paper. In the interest of efficiency and in the interest of fairness to all members who want to ask questions, perhaps we should consider placing a limit on the number of questions that can be asked on the order paper.

I should say in conclusion, Madam Speaker, that if all members of the House of Commons put as many questions on the order paper as does the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, and they could very well do that—

An hon. Member: Like the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

Mr. Collenette: —then very few members would be totally satisfied with the answers, because the resulting paperwork and cost to the public treasury would virtually impede a useful flow of answers to such questions.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I know it was a parliamentary secretary speaking and not a minister, but I want the record to be absolutely clear that if there is any movement by the government to limit the right of members to put questions on the order paper, it will be opposed as vigorously as any thing the hon. parliamentary secretary has ever seen in this House. That is the first thing, Madam Speaker.

The second thing is with respect to the interpretation of the rules. As I understand it, Parliament's function is to make government accountable. I think the rules of this House ought to be and have been, to a great degree—even Beauchesne's—construted in a way that would not limit members of Parliament—not just members of the opposition but members of Parliament generally—from holding ministers accountable.

When my friend says it is easy to pick up the phone and call a minister's secretary and get an answer, I think he is forgetting two things. First of all, a minister's secretary is likely not to answer a question. I wonder if the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) secretary, or a minister's secretary, whose attention is directed to a question from the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), would answer such questions fully? The parliamentary secretary knows that is not so.

What is much more important is that questions on the order paper save the time of the House of Commons so that it can deal with other things. That has always been the preoccupation of the government—to save the time of the House of Commons. More than that, the answer to a question on the order paper appears on the public record; a telephone call does not appear on the public record.

I support absolutely, and I think all my colleagues and any thinking member of this House would support absolutely, the right of any private member of this House of Commons to question the ministry, as the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville has consistently questioned the ministry over the years.

The parliamentary secretary might put the same thing to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who is one of the most consistent and tough questioners on the government side. The right is not just an opposition right; it is a private members' right to hold the government accountable. I tell the parliamentary secretary now that if there is any feeling in the House that there is some support for the idea that such right be limited in some way, it will be resisted in every way within the law.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) seeking the floor to speak on the same point of order?

Mr. Cossitt: A question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

MR. COSSITT—STATEMENT MADE BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY OUTSIDE CHAMBER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises not from what the hon. parliamentary secretary said, but from what he did not say. What I am getting at is that he, in effect, through certain news media, threatened members of this House that he would recommend ten or 12 questions on the order paper be the maximum allowed. I feel that this interferes with the parliamentary privileges of every member on this side of the House or, as our House leader has pointed out, on that side of the House as well. If that is government policy, then I think we should know it. That was not clarified. If it is government policy, then I think I have a legitimate question of privilege, that my privileges and those of every member of the House are being interfered with by an arrogant government that does not want to give information.

I should like to know if whoever the acting prime minister might be, since most of the cabinet have beat it, or the parliamentary secretary, who remains, will now dissociate the government from his statement that they would recommend limiting us to ten or 12 questions. Otherwise, I reserve the right to move that this matter be referred to the appropriate committee as a breach of privileges, in that it is a threat to members of Parliament.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I shall not speak for long, Madam Speaker, but since this involves comments that I allegedly have not made in the House, I fail to see how the hon. member has a question of privilege since hs is referring to something that I have not said here.

In terms of public statements that I may have made in response to questions from reporters, I would point out that I have not gone out and sought a forum on this subject. I have been asked questions, primarily by Canadian Press, and I also talked to The Globe and Mail because of the comments made by the hon. member from time to time. I was just supplying information.

Let me make one thing clear, Madam Speaker. Whether I am a parliamentary secretary does not enter into this. Every member of the House has the right to express an opinion. I have that right, as does the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). I have every right to speak, even publicly, and advocate a change in the rules of procedures of the House of Commons.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Shame.

Mr. Collenette: We all have that right. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) may disagree, but he should not deny me the same rights that he is vigorously defending for his colleague, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville.

I am speaking in a personal way, Madam Speaker. I have mentioned this matter to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), in the course of conversations. He is a great proponent of parliamentary reform and has made certain public statements on the subject. I hope that when this matter goes to committee we can look at the whole question.

In no way did I threaten the hon. member. In fact, I would hope that the hon. member is beyond such threats.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I suppose the hon. member would want me to remind him that he was referring to a statement made outside the House. A statement made outside the House cannot be referred to, and cannot bring about a question of privilege.

There has been some debate, and I will recognize that. I had to listen to the hon. member until he exposed the reason for which he had a question of privilege. I must say, however, that in this particular case there might be a grievance, and maybe an important one, but there is no question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENTAL MISMANAGEMENT OF ENERGY SITUATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of Canada's energy situation with the consequent loss of economic development opportunities and increased threat to the nation's energy security.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to be able to propose this motion to the House. This government's energy policy, or I think we can say this government's lack of an energy policy, has left Canada and Canadians increasingly exposed to shortages of oil from other countries and has cost Canadians literally billions of dollars in lost energy opportunities through industrial development. That is the reason for the motion, which reads as follows:

That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of Canada's energy situation with the consequent loss of economic development opportunities and increased threat to the nation's energy security.

This government has become totally preoccupied with the division of revenues between the federal government and the oil producing provinces. It has run, over the past number of years, the financial affairs of this country in such a haphazard, slipshod fashion, that it has run up a deficit which this year will amount to some $14 billion.

This government views oil revenues as the easiest, most painless way of reducing this huge figure, but in so doing it is splitting the country. It is increasing the exposure of Canadians to a shortage of oil and, in myopia, it is cutting Canadians off from the most tremendous economic development and job-producing opportunities in our history.

Recently, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been running an advertising campaign, the objective of which is to "reduce the level of public concern about energy". Those last words were taken from a document leaked from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which set out the objective of the advertising program. Let us look at that objective against the background of what is happening in this country and in the world today.

In 1979 Canada imported some 430,000 barrels of oil a day from countries such as Venezuela and the Middle East. This is about 25 per cent of our consumption of about 1.8 million barrels a day. What greater reason for concern can there be when two of the largest exporting countries are at war with each other? Possibly that objective will change in 1985 when our imports from these countries will be some 700,000 barrels a day, because that is what the National Energy Board is projecting.

In 1981 shipments through the Sarnia-Montreal oil pipeline will commence to decline. By 1985 that pipeline may cease to transport western oil. If no further oil discoveries are made in western Canada—and there have been practically none until a recent discovery in the Pembina area in the past few months—the province of Ontario will begin using foreign oil in 1985. That is right, the Atlantic provinces and Quebec will be 100 per cent reliant on foreign sources for their oil, and in 1985 Ontario will also be moving into that very exposed position. That is the nature of our oil supply picture today. That is the result of the shortsighted energy policies of the Liberal government, policies which took us from being a net exporter in 1975, five short years ago, two years after the first oil shock, to our exposed position today.

Any number of experts have been predicting that the likelihood of a world-wide shortage of oil in the next few years is increasing, and increasing dramatically. There was an article in The Globe and Mail this morning setting out some of the aspects of this supply problem in relation to the war between Iraq and Iran. I am sorry to say the answer by the minister to a question put by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) ignored the message this news report was conveying to Canadians. The world has managed to cope with the Iranian shortages starting about one and a half years ago, and so far it has managed to cope with the shortages which are starting to occur resulting from the Iraq-Iran war. But we should not be managing our energy policy oblivious to these threats, particularly when we have it within our control to protect ourselves from these shortages through a policy of developing our own oil reserves.

The Economist of London said it all in one paragraph, as follows:

The war between Iraq and Iran has changed the balance of power in the oil-producing Gulf. An Iraq which has people and guns and an Arab Bismarck of a leader willing to use them (and after this war may also control, directly or indirectly, Iran's potential 6 million barrels) will loom over a humiliated and weakened Iran, a Saudi Arabia which has oil but hardly any people, and the assorted statelets of the Gulf coastline. That is the local consequence.

The next sentence should be the concern of Canadians:

For the wider world, whose factories and ships and aircraft and cars depend on the Gulf's already overpriced oil, the main lesson of this war is its reminder that no hidden hand can be counted on to steer the flow of oil safely through the political rivalries of this turbulent region.

The world is laughing at us today. We are the country which was a net exporter in 1975. We are the country which ignored the danger signals of 1973, signals which other countries took so seriously. We are the country which now imports 25 per cent of its oil needs. The world is shaking its head, saying, "How could they have blown it so badly?" And still we have not learned. This government today is following policies which increase our reliance on foreign oil, which increase the risk of shortages in our country. Canadians should be demanding energy policies which will protect us from the whims and wars of such a volatile place as the Middle East. In the face of this, the propaganda machine of the Liberal government is telling Canadians to be complacent, to be confident of the future; "the government has everything under control; Big Brother will look after you." This, Mr. Speaker, is an unforgivable manipulation of public opinion to camouflage the lack of policy to date and to prepare the ground for what, from all reports, appears to be a totally misdirected policy for our energy future.

Rather than taking as its theme the objective of reducing concern in our energy position, the government should be attempting to increase the sense of urgency of Canadians to get on with the job of achieving self-sufficiency, to bring on new sources of energy, to increase conservation efforts, and to reduce our dangerously large dependence on foreign imported oil.

One must question why the government has been so complacent and why its advertising policy should attempt to transfer this complacency to Canadians. Why is it that the opposition must bear the burden of carrying that message to Canadians? This is the second time we have had an opposition day devoted to the problems of supply in this country and the problems of the international disruptions which are going to cause great problems to our country in the future. Why is it that we in opposition must pit our resources against the power of government and its propaganda machine? I have tried hard to understand those reasons. The simplest reason is to hide the obvious shortcomings of government policy to date. Another reason is that any move to self-sufficiency must involve a higher price for oil.

The commitment of the Liberal Party in the last election to hold down the price of oil and gasoline is a most shortsighted policy objective. The disastrous consequences of that are becoming clearer every day. I will discuss some of these later in my remarks. In the meantime, the propaganda machine must operate to deflect the concerns of Canadians from the serious short-term dangers of that policy.

The final reason, I believe, is one which must be viewed in the context of the current constitutional discussions. The Liberal government is trying to split the west from the rest of the country. That is clear. It has stated that its energy policy will "poison the atmosphere"—again, that is a quote from another leaked government document—of future constitutional negotiations. Energy shortages are inevitable because of its policy shortcomings. What better way of deflecting criticism is there than to say that things are in good shape now and, when the shortages come, to blame it on the west? I could let my thinking run further, but I will not succumb to that temptation. However, it is a sad commentary in today's political world that one must push oneself in more Machiavellian terms in order to attempt to understand the policy objectives of this government.

An hon. Member: Anything for power.

Mr. Wilson: At any rate, the clear results of the policy shortcomings are that we must plan for a period of oil supply interruptions, allocations, and rationing. We must plan for periods when some Canadians will not have enough oil to heat their homes, drive their cars, run their tractors and run their fishing boats. We must plan for the shock that our manufacturing, our mining, our paper, our tourism and our transportation industries will suffer when emergency allocation commences, when we have the gas line-ups which have been such a serious problem in the United States' economy. We must expect to suffer a far larger shock when higher prices for offshore oil are forced into our economy in emergency conditions. These are the conditions which we must anticipate and plan for. But they are conditions which are so unnecessary. They are conditions which we could have avoided with a comprehensive energy policy in place, similar to that announced by our government last December.

The Clark government took, as the keystone to its energy policy, the clear objective of energy self-sufficiency. Our fundamental concern was supply. Security of supply was at the core of all aspects of our policy. Energy is the lifeblood of our economy, and in a northern climate such as ours it is a critical element to the livelihood of all Canadians. We were concerned about the impact of the policy on low and middle-income earners. That is why we introduced an energy tax credit, to protect certain groups of Canadians from the price impact of the policy. But without a supply of oil, the price becomes irrelevant.

The damage, both real and potential, which this lack of energy policy is inflicting on the country, is incalculable. We, in the official opposition, urge the government to take as the central theme of their energy policy the objective of self-sufficiency, and to do those things which are necessary to bring on new sources of supply, to avoid the hardship that consumers, particularly those in Ontario and the east, will suffer if shortages occur. We urge this government to reverse the ill-conceived and dangerous direction which their policies have followed in recent years.

The picture which we are facing is not without its bright spots. Canada has the potential of being one of the great energy producers in the world. The tragedy is that we are not capitalizing on it. Canada's energy future can be strong. There is a tremendous opportunity for economic development based on energy if we can get our act together, if we can grasp the significance of this potential and translate it into policy. For some months now I have been referring to our energy future as an opportunity for our over-all economic development.

The energy industry is the growth industry of the 1980s and 1990s. Canada needs some $300 billion in investment in its energy sector during the 1980s, and at least double that in the 1990s. To put that into perspective, our total national income in 1980 will be about $300 billion as well. In other words, we will be spending in the next ten years, in the oil and gas, electrical, pipeline and other energy industries, an amount equal to the total size of our economy today. And this spending will occur across Canada.

This growth will not happen to nearly the extent possible with the attitude and approach which the government has shown to date. There is no energy policy. The Liberals defeated us on December 13, ten months ago yesterday, on the issue of our budget and energy policy, and to date there has been nothing to take its place. In the meantime Canadian industry loses valuable time and opportunities to take advantage of our natural strengths. We have job opportunities in the next seven years in these industries to employ some 350,000 throughout Canada. Many of these will be created by equipment purchases totalling an estimated $120 billion, much of it in central Canada.

The potential stimulus to our manufacturing industry is virtually without parallel in our history. The huge energy projects provide a chance to expand and modernize manufacturing industries in order to provide the wide range of goods and services needed. Project engineering and construction management will be required, as well as steel pipe, valves, compressor stations, construction equipment, prefabricated buildings, welding equipment, electrical generating transmission equipment, and so on. Our oil and gas supply manufacturing sector is becoming one of the most advanced technologically in the world. These are all goods manufactured in Canada. But this manufacturing base must be encouraged through sound economic development and energy policies. Without these policies, the jobs will not be created, the new plants will not be built, and our manufacturing trade deficit, already far too high, will increase further.

To be more specific, the proposed $7 billion Alsands synthetic crude oil project will create some $23.5 billion of economic activity, of which $6.2 billion will be spent in Ontario. This project is being continued at some risk to the sponsors, in anticipation of an early settlement of Canada's oil policy. The Cold Lake project is of a similar magnitude and is in the same holding pattern. If that policy is not brought forward with some degree of urgency, both projects are likely to be shelved. I understand the Cold Lake project now has some 500 engineers on staff. If that project is stopped today, those engineers will disperse to other jobs and it will take some time to revitalize the project. The result will be a considerable delay in completion. Valuable time will be lost in bringing in these new reserves of oil. Investment will be postponed. Jobs will be lost. Our balance of trade will suffer through increased imports of oil. Finally, we will lose ground in this industry of the future.

Today we are a world leader. Venezuela, with its giant Orinoco oil sands, has already shown an interest in Canada's technology. If we do not continue developing our technology, others will overtake us to the point where we could end up importing the technology rather than exporting it.

This same picture holds true in pipeline projects over difficult terrain. The pipe for the Foothills gas pipeline will be worth about $2 billion, split roughly equally between Stelco in Hamilton and Ipsco in Regina. The turbines will cost about $200 million, valves and other materials $70 million. It has been estimated that this pipeline will produce in excess of $1 billion of business for Ontario based companies. Equally important, Canadian pipeline engineers and construction companies will be in the forefront of the technology and will be in a position to bid on similar projects in other countries.

The North American automobile industry is currently undergoing a difficult transition from large gas-guzzlers to smaller energy efficient compact cars. Many thousands of workers are out of work because foreign manufacturers have doubled their share of the market in the past four years. I recently visited Washington and Detroit, with six other colleagues, to learn more about the automobile industry. There we were told that the energy policies of the United States and Canadian governments had contributed significantly to these problems.

North American consumers have for some time been protected from the impact of higher gasoline prices. Japanese and German consumers have been forced to face this reality. As a result, Japanese and German car manufacturers have been at the forefront of developing new energy-efficient cars. When the North American consumer suffered the second oil shock, the revolution in Iran, American consumer preference changed abruptly to the smaller cars. When the North American producers could not meet the new preference for smaller cars, the Japanese and Germans stepped in. This is a classical illustration of how an unrealistic government policy has been overtaken by market forces, to the great disadvantage of local industry. The United States government has recognized this. The Canadian government still has its head in the sand.

Let me give you another example, one that deals with an industry of the future. We hear stories of great advances being made in other countries in the development of alternative sources of energy: gasohol, solar, wind, miniature hydroelectric units. Why not in Canada where we have the climate and industrial capacity to use such alternative sources? It is very simple, Mr. Speaker. Until we get the right mix of energy policies—and price is the most critical element—that development will occur in other countries, and Canada will miss out on a huge new industry. The higher energy prices in other countries are providing a powerful and natural incentive to develop this new technology. This situation is no different than the energy efficient car.

The Royal Bank recently published some statistics which look at this phenomenon from another perspective. Because of the unrealistically low energy prices in Canada and the United States, we have become inefficient users of energy in our industry. To illustrate, the Royal Bank estimated that industrial output for each ton of oil consumed in 1978 was as follows: West Germany, $1,718; Japan, $1,669; Britain, $1,175; United States, $954 and Canada, rock bottom, $840. In other words, Canada was less than half as efficient in its use of energy as was West Germany, partly due to climate and distance, you might say. But, look at the change in consumption patterns in recent years when this difference in price has been so obvious.

Since 1963 output per unit of energy consumed has changed as follows, and again I am using Royal Bank figures: Britain, up 25 per cent; Japan, up 12 per cent; West Germany, up 10 per cent; the United States, up 2.3 per cent; and Canada, down 5.3 per cent.

Government policy has unwittingly encouraged Canadian industry to be less efficient in its use of energy than its main competitors. Industry is now forced to adjust, and in a short period of time, to these new realities.

If this government does not produce a rational and comprehensive energy policy, Canadian industry will continue to suffer and will continue to lose market position. It will continue to have a lack of confidence to invest and expand in these new industries in the future. Valuable business opportunities will be lost in all parts of the country.

Let me urge the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) to work closely with his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), to establish policies and guidelines to encourage the highest possible procurement of Canadian goods and services in the energy field, both in the megaprojects and frontier areas as well as in the conventional fields. Canadian companies have proven to be both competitive and innovative in meeting this challenge.

Government support in the form of procurement policy guidelines could help to carry this success further. This need not be done in a punitive way. Government guidelines can set the operational background. One of the departments could act as a clearing house to ensure that oil companies were aware of the Canadian talent available.

Finally, research and development policies should be formulated to assist these Canadian companies to stay abreast of current technology. In this way Canadian companies can place themselves in the forefront of the market place and be in a position to exploit the huge international market in energy development in the future.

Canada is endowed with massive reserves of many forms of energy and other natural resources. I have spoken in the past of the importance of matching these two ingredients in the development of our industrial policy. There will be many opportunities in the future as the value of these resources increases and their availability decreases. We must be alert to these opportunities and provide the industrial structure and policies to capitalize on them.

Australia today provides the most spectacular example of that to which I refer. Australia is currently planning seven aluminum smelters. Because of high energy costs and scarce supplies Japan is closing down aluminum smelters and will import the finished product from Australia in the future. The reason is very simple: Australia has cheap and readily available coal, as well as the principal natural resource, bauxite.

There will be other opportunities, not necessarily on the same scale, in situations where Canada can combine our plentiful energy and natural resources with profitable, job-creating industrial development. The opportunity is clear. Energy is the number one growth industry for Canada.

We implore the government to show some real sense of urgency, some direction, in order to give our industry the confidence and the sense of commitment that this promise can be fulfilled. The performance by the government to date has been dismal, practically non-existent, and in some ways even negative. This must change if we are to create the jobs, the investment, the new technology, the exports and the sharing of all these benefits by all Canadians.

Energy is our future; it can bind us together and make us strong. This government has chosen to use it to make us weak, to divide us and to undermine our confidence. It is absolutely essential to the strength and future of our country that this government develop a comprehensive energy policy on an urgent basis in order to capture the economic development opportunities which are available and to protect Canada, particularly Ontario and eastern provinces, from the increasing threat to our energy security. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for my party, the New Democrats, on this motion today. As I was listening to the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), I had the horrible sense of déjà vu, that we had been through this before, had this debate before. I checked through Hansard and I found that, indeed, we did, on July 8, 1980. I believe the preceding speaker mentioned that we had spoken on a Conservative opposition day on a motion virtually covering the same topic. I will send a copy of my speech given on July 8 to the hon. member. We will all see, if we look at that debate, that not much has really changed in the interim. We will find that nothing has happened. As the hon. member from Calgary has said, nothing has happened, the situation has become worse. That is true.

We have no energy policy in this country and there does not seem to be one on the horizon. There has not been an energy policy for a number of months, and the country is suffering. The minister can check the situation with any of the members of the all-party committee on national resources and public works. That committee of the House of Commons, of which I and some of my colleagues are members, travelled to the tar sands this summer, as well as to Washington. We saw areas where there is certainly a need for energy policy.

I want to speak today about some of our concerns and ideas regarding a real energy policy for Canada. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), later in the debate, will speak about an issue that has had little debate in this House of Commons, the nuclear issue. In my view and that of my colleagues, this is a matter the Liberal government is really sweeping under the rug. I see here the parliamentary secretary to the minister who has been the outstanding culprit in this particular matter, no doubt following government policy. I invite the minister who intends to speak after me to reply.

The fact is that this government is gung-ho on expanding the nuclear industry at the risk of accidents and harm to future generations. This is a serious matter. We are not going to go into all the difficulties involved in the industry. What we are saying is that we should at least have this out in the open. We may hold different views from our friends to the right about expansion of the nuclear industry, but at least they were prepared when they were in government to have an inquiry, hear argument, and get the matter out in the open. This present government is not prepared at all to do that. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill will speak on that and, if hon. members to my right will listen, I will speak a little bit about our concern over the present lack of energy policy today. I should like to put forward, if I might, what perhaps a typical Canadian consumer would say if he or she were here in the House today.

The first thing a consumer would ask is: who is the minister of energy for this country? I see a gentleman over there who purports to be, but he does not seem to be very effective as the minister. Who fixes the price that we now pay for our gas? It is not fixed by that minister. He was unable to get a deal with the province of Alberta. Indeed, his leader, the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Trudeau), met for two days here in Ottawa with his namesake, Peter, and he spent the rest of the summer worrying about the constitution. I recognize the situation in Quebec and what we have been through in that regard, and I know the constitution is important. However, the people in my riding out west are asking about where our priorities are. Surely the priority should be to have a decent energy policy. As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) has pointed out numerous times in this House, other priorities should be to have a decent housing policy and a policy with respect to inflation. Those are the priorities the man or woman in the street feels.

• (1600)

On August 1, 1980, the price of gasoline went up two dollars. That was a unilateral increase. The minister had nothing to do with it. When asked about it by the press he said, "Well, we will just let it ride and maybe we will get an agreement later on". The question is, who pays for that? I say that the Canadian people pay for that lack of policy because every time Canadians fill up with gas, under the present distribution of gasoline dollars, they fill up the pockets of oil companies. The oil companies are making vast profits.

Mr. Lalonde: What about the government?

Mr. Waddell: An hon. member says the government too. As hon. members know, on every increase and with the existing formula, a one-dollar-a-barrel increase is split such that 45 cents goes to the provincial government of Alberta, 45 cents goes to the oil companies, and ten cents goes to the federal government. If the minister wishes to challenge that, he will have a chance in his speech. I see him nodding. What I say must be true, or else he is tired, either one.

Mr. Lalonde: Maybe both.

Mr. Waddell: The point is that the 45 cents which goes to these companies and which comes out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers goes to the oil companies because there is no proper energy policy or agreement between Peter and Pierre. If Peter and Pierre are unable to make an energy policy or sit down and agree, perhaps it is time they both moved on. That is what Canadian consumers say.

Mr. Paproski: Maybe you, Waddell, will be moving on.

Mr. Waddell: The money is going to companies which are controlled largely by foreigners, and Canadian consumers will eventually get tired of that split.

I listened to the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), the spokesman for the Conservatives, and it seems to me that just as in the debate on July 8 the Conservatives are really still fighting the last election. I am surprised that they raised this matter. I might say that they are fighting the last two elections. They still suggest the policy that Canada should go to world prices. The problem with that is that the consumers of Canada do not really accept that. They see that as an artificial price, and they do not accept that the price of gasoline should go to world levels. The other thing they do not accept, and this is why they defeated the budget of the former minister of finance, is going too quickly to world prices. Consumers do not want the price of gasoline to increase too quickly.

I think Canadians are prepared to accept an increase in the price of gas. They are prepared to take more money out of their pockets to pay the price of gasoline, but with the rider that that money must come back to the government. It has to come back to the people in different ways. It has to come back through tax credits for low income people, and it must come back—I will talk more about this later in my speech—as a way of buying back control and taking public ownership of the Canadian energy industry with that money. If we told the Canadian people that when they pay that extra money for gasoline it is going to take control of their own industry, which has been sold out by previous Liberal and Conservative governments, they would go for that.

While I am on my feet, I want to deal with two matters of government policy which also come to light. Today in the House the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) asked the Prime Minister about a report that the governor of Massachusetts was talking about getting Canadian natural gas exports. Once again we are into a situation in which we are talking about selling out Canadian gas resources rather than using them here in Canada. Other than making a few speeches since he has been minister, the only thing I see that the minister has done has been to make one decision, and that was the decision on the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline. The minister opted for selling out Canadian gas resources in vast quantities to the United States, in this case Alberta gas resources. I say to Mr. "Ironclad Guarantee" that it now appears that there is even some thought of selling out more gas from the maritimes. Where were hon. members to my right when I raised the matter of the pre-build in the House of Commons?

An hon. Member: Hiding.

Mr. Waddell: Half of them did not vote on the matter. The other half voted with the government and continued their policy of selling out Canadian resources.

Mr. Benjamin: Instead of looking after Canadians.

Mr. Waddell: This past summer I instituted a law suit against the Government of Canada, and it is now awaiting trial. In the suit the legality of the government's proceeding on the pre-build is challenged, and that matter will soon come to trial.

I visited the United States this past summer, and it became clear that the Americans have not—and I stress have not—arranged the financing of the full Alaska pipeline, contrary to what we have been told. There is some hope and some movement, but still there is no financial package in place, so right now we have a pre-build of the southern pipeline with no hope at the moment of building the northern part. We have a sell-out of Canadian gas resources.

This summer as well I, as federal NDP energy critic, and Ms. Evelyn Gigantes, who is a provincial member of the Ontario legislature from the Ottawa area and provincial NDP energy critic, proposed that instead of selling out these resources to the United States—or perhaps to Massachusetts now—we should be banking them in Canada. I recognize that some small companies have a problem with cash. They have explored and found gas, and they need to sell it. The minister can reply to my suggestion when he rises after me. What about taking that gas, having Ontario, the federal government and Quebec buy it from those small companies, bank it in Alberta, and then use it later on when there is need for it? I suppose that makes too much sense as an energy policy, but I suggest it to the government. Instead of selling out resources, I suggest that the government adopt that policy.

I want to say something about the industry in this debate. Industry-wide 1979 after-tax profits rose 53 per cent, to $4.7 billion. This money came from Canadian consumers who are having difficulty with unemployment and high inflation. These profits represent a rate of return of 33 per cent on stockholder equity. The cash flow of oil and gas companies has risen 45 per cent, to $7.1 billion. What does the Canadian consumer see? He sees fairly hefty profits and government tax breaks. Dome Petroleum pays no income tax, while the average Canadian consumer pays income tax, and he has no participation in this.

What is the policy of the government in this regard? So far there is none, but I suspect that next week the policy might be to Canadianize the industry. How will that get any money back into the pockets of the average Canadian? What is the point of replacing Andrew Mellon with, say, Bob Blair, or Rockefeller with Bronfman?

Mr. Lalonde: Or T. C. Douglas.

Mr. Waddell: There is no difference, in my view; it is not going to help the average consumer. The consumer sees the amount of a company's income tax and says that the saving grace is that all that money and cash flow will be used to find petroleum. Is that right? It is wrong because, according to the government's own monitoring report, industry-wide petroleum-related investment dropped steeply, from 93 per cent to 80.1 per cent of cash flows. What is happening is that these companies are making large amounts of money and are beginning to invest it in other industries. In other words, when we put gasoline in our tanks and pay for it, we are financing a further takeover of Canadian industry by foreigners. Any government worth its salt would tackle that right away and not wait.

We in Canada should have our own energy policy, and in the short time I have left I would like to state what the basis of that policy should be. The policy should be two-pronged. The first base should be that Canada be energy efficient. We must create an energy-efficient society. That should be the number one goal. Rather than talking about security or whatever, let us talk about Canada being energy sufficient. That should be the goal. That means conservation measures, and in the weeks to come my colleagues will be outlining some such measures. The hon. member for Vancouver East, who sits in front of me, will outline what energy efficiency means to the housing market and the housing industry. The member behind me from Regina will, in his own inimitable fashion, set out what it is like in terms of railways. The first and central goal is that Canada must be energy efficient. That would be the NDP cornerstone of the energy policy: Canada must be energy efficient.

The second goal is that we must have public ownership of our petroleum industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: This goal is what makes our party fundamentally different from my friends across the way. I ask the minister to reply to these arguments. He should tell my why his Canadianization is better than our policy of public ownership. If we have public ownership, it seems to me that we can develop a national energy policy according to public priorities, not according to private ones or the priorities of Mr. Blair, as much as I love him. I have slept on numerous floors with Mr. Blair up in the Arctic and I saw him doing very well in the corporate world. The point is that we could set public priorities and we would have lower costs, because the money would not flow out of the country and it would not flow to fewer shareholders.

Third, we could stop the financing of our own takeover by foreign industry. One dollar out of every three in profits in our total economy in 1990 will come from the gas and oil industry. They are using this money to expand. As the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) said, if we let this situation go, this could not simply end the country as we know it but could end the country itself. That is the key issue today. Will we get control of our energy industry?

I ask the minister to reply. His own monitoring report shows that Canadian companies are investing outside Canada. How will more Canadianization solve that? I am in favour of Canadianization, as is my party, but my party is in favour of Canadianization through public ownership of the resource industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) permit a question? He has a little time left, I believe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He has a minute and a half left. Will the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) accept a question?

Mr. Waddell: Certainly I will accept a question from my friend, as long as he does not ask about our lunch today.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from the comments of a head of a Canadian-owned company with whom perhaps the member has slept as well.

An hon. Member: Explain!

Mr. Kilgour: I will read the quotation and ask him for his comment. He said:

> It is possible to increase the amount of recoverable oil by 50 per cent from six billion barrels to nine billion barrels . . . it would happen if we began to pay the world price for oil. Somehow in Canada we think it is sound economics to pay the Arabs $40 to $42 a barrel for oil, and to pay $15—

It is now $16.75 per barrel.

> —a barrel for Canadian crude oil. It is madness, absolute madness.

Would the hon. member comment on that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In 30 seconds.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to comment on that. When we were in Washington we got the same line from the president of Texaco who said, "Just give us more money and we will find all kinds of oil". I do not believe it, I simply do not believe it. We can do it. It seems to me we can find and develop heavy oil, the tar sands and all the things we have to develop through Petro-Canada and through Canadian public ownership. As I said, that is the direction in which we should go.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say how pleased I am to see that the Progressive Conservative opposition has decided to raise today such an important matter as energy. It is a matter which, of course, is of concern to all Canadians, and I hope that in the few hours the members of the House will spend on that matter they will have the opportunity to deal with the options open to us.

[English]

I must say I regret the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) has left the House. I was inclined to be a little bit harsh on him until I noticed that he does not have the responsibility for energy issues in his party and that the spokesman for the Conservative party on energy is absent from the House. There were so many distortions and a lack of knowledge of the real situation in the energy field in the speech of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre that one would be very tempted to take to pieces the statement he put before the House. In fact I was rather surprised at the tone of the motion put before the House.

When I heard that the Conservatives wanted to debate energy today, somehow I expected the hon. member would relate it to Thanksgiving that took place yesterday and subconsciously he might be giving thanks that the energy policy of this country is under the direction of a government which has established national goals that will best serve the interests of every Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: If one looks at the record of the Conservative party when it was in office last year, indeed its failure can be attributed to its failure to come to grips with the essential energy issues our policy is addressing. I do not want to spend much time on this, but if one looks at the sad record of the Conservative party during its eight months in office, one wonders how they can even raise the energy issue in the House. What does Mr. Speaker remember of their so-called policies on energy?

An hon. Member: Sweet nothing.

Mr. Lalonde: Well, a few things. First there was their attempt to destroy Petro-Canada. That was the first thing they put forward.

Then they allowed the oil stocks in this country to deplete to such a degree that in November and December of last year they were required to set up the Emergency Supply Allocations Board because we were concerned that there would not be enough heating oil to take us through the winter. That was the second element of the so-called energy policy of the Conservative party.

The third element was that they severely damaged our relations with our suppliers. Indeed there was concern as to what would happen over the next while in terms of our supplies from abroad. I do not have to spend much time talking about what that government did to our relationship with Arab countries with their famous Canadian embassy-in-Israel debacle. But the fact is that they seriously jeopardized our relations with all Arab countries and neglected to develop relationships that should have been kept very warm with the government of Mexico, a potential supplier.

Then there was the cherry on the cake, as we say in French, la cerise sur le gâteau. They came with their famous budget in which they imposed savage taxation on Canadians with large price increases which fortunately both opposition parties at the time, ourselves and the New Democratic Party, rejected categorically.

Since they have been in opposition the Conservatives have continued very much the negative stance they adopted vis-à-vis energy, as was evident this afternoon during the course of the speech of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. What have we heard in the last few months? There has been the kind of haranguing we witnessed this afternoon during question period and during the speech of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, and the doom and gloom worries and predictions of members of the Conservative party. I could add to this their self-induced paranoia about the possible gas export tax. They do not even realize the electricity of this country has been taxed for something like 35 years between 1928 and 1963 and that we have had an export tax on oil in this country since 1974.

In effect, apart from calling for higher and higher prices and toeing the line of the fat cats with company-paid cars and expense accounts, the Conservative party has contributed—indeed, as one of my colleagues so ably said, "sweet nothing"—to the development of energy policy in this country. I do not want to spend much time on the demise of the opposition. I would like to talk about our record, our plans, what we have done and what we plan to do.

Mr. Andre: That will be a shorter speech.

Mr. Lalonde: I could take a lot of time, contrary to what the hon. member opposite has been saying. What we have done between 1974 and 1979 and what we intend to do over the next few years is to continue the policy of moderate price increases that will allow the industry to prosper, that will allow the producing provinces to see their revenues and wealth increasing but will also protect the consumer in this country and prevent inflation from running away in Canada. This policy which we have had in effect over the last few years has proven effective and, as it is even now, this year.

Everyone knows that in the fifties and sixties Canada's inflation rate was higher than in the United States. What we see this year, in good part, is that our energy prices are indeed lower than in the United States. The inflation rate in the United States at the present time is running at well over 12 per cent—12.8 per cent in August, 1980—while the rate in Canada was 10.7 per cent at that time. This is significant in terms of the Canadian standard of living as compared to the American standard of living.

What are our objectives? We have three objectives which we stated quite clearly before the Canadian public during the election and since—only the Conservatives have not heard them yet. The first one differentiates us from the Conservatives. I heard the hon. member saying supply was at the core of their policy. Supply is their obsession and, as a result, the only thing they can think of is giving more money to the companies, as if this would necessarily produce one more barrel of oil tomorrow. In effect, it has been proven that this was not necessarily the case. Even if you were to double the price of oil tomorrow there would not be more activity taking place in this country because, as hon. members well know, the industry has been occupied at full capacity over the last few years.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true.

Mr. Lalonde: The objective in this country should be to achieve energy security, which includes looking after supply. It also includes, just as much, looking after substitution, the development and encouragement of Canadians to go into other sources of energy rather than oil, of which we have an abundance. Second, is conservation. We should encourage Canadians to use energy in a much wiser way than we have done in the past. That is our first objective—energy security.

Our second objective is fairness, which means fairness between regions, between producers and consumers, and between levels of government.

Our third objective is to provide Canadians with an opportunity to participate in that industry which will make them not only employees but full partners in the oil and gas industry. These are our objectives.

We have already taken steps in those directions over the last few months, since we have been in office. The first step has been to save Canadian consumers from the infamous 18-cent tax the Conservatives wanted to impose upon Canadians in their budget of last December, a measure which would have cost the Canadian consumers this year over $2 billion more than they have had to pay since we took office.

Our second step has been to improve and increase the security of supply in Canada. We have re-established our traditionally good relationships with the OPEC countries and the other oil producing countries which are not members of OPEC.

An hon. Member: What about Iran and Iraq?

Mr. Lalonde: These steps have taken place over the last few months and we have succeeded in re-establishing those relationships which had been either destroyed or jeopardized by the stupidity of indifference of the previous Conservative government. And today, in spite of the Iran-Iraq conflict, Canada is probably the country in the world with the best balanced sources of supply with regard to its oil supply.

Mr. Andre: You didn't have anything to do with it.

Mr. Lalonde: We have not only relied upon our contacts with other countries in the world producing oil, we have acted inside Canada. One of our first steps was to encourage intensified activities in the Canadian oil and gas industry. In the last few months drilling in western Canada has gone up in comparison with last year.

Mr. Andre: That was planned years ago.

Mr. Lalonde: This year we estimate 8,300 wells will be drilled in western Canada compared with 7,400 last year. The hon. member may talk as much as he wants; the fact is they are there, and I invite him to look at them. If you look at Canada's offshore activities, there were nine wells drilled last year, and 19 this year. This is a clear indication of what has happened inside Canada in the oil and gas industry in the last year.

Mr. Paproski: What about the tar sands?

Mr. Lalonde: I am getting to the tar sands in a moment and I will have more to say about this than you will like.

In addition to encouraging oil and gas activities in Canada, we have given our full endorsement to Petro-Canada, an endorsement that had been sorely lacking under the Tories, and in effect we have reinstated to Petro-Canada the $80 million the Conservatives had cut off from that company. That company is now one of the most active and dynamic companies operating in the oil and gas industry in Canada, with the full support of the government.

Mr. Andre: Do you know they are drilling half as many as Pacific Pete?

Mr. Lalonde: I suspect the hon. member from Calgary is going to die from apoplexy and, if you could do something about him, Mr. Speaker, that would be quite helpful.

Mr. Andre: I want an energy minister that knows what is going on, for the sake of Canada.

Mr. Lalonde: I thought it was a case of apoplexy, but I regret to say it is only a case of lack of elementary courtesy. There is not much I can do about his lack of education.

Mr. Andre: Courtesy requires honesty in the House, too.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the activities of this government are concerned, I have indicated that we have fully supported Petro-Canada and we intend to continue to increase that support. We have also indicated a full program for upgrading our refineries. The net result of the upgrading of the five Canadian refineries will mean that something in the order of 125,000 barrels a day of residual oil will be much better used in this country in the next few years. In this way we will be able to reduce our dependence on imported oil.

Finally, we put before the producing provinces last July a fair and generous offer. That offer meant that the western provinces would have obtained over the next four years something like $40 billion. And even more recently we decided to increase our offer further to $38 a barrel for tar sands and heavy oil, plus indexation of that price to the cost of living over the next few years, plus the possibility of reopening this agreement after five years of operation if for any reason it was found that this price was inadequate.

This, indeed, was a most generous offer, and it certainly answered the expectations of the proponents of the various tar sands and heavy oil plants. As a matter of fact, I can state in this House that this offer corresponded exactly to the request made to us by the proponents of the Cold Lake plant. So, let us not hear stories and arguments from the other side that the federal government is not co-operating with regard to tar sands and heavy oil development. Let us not hear stories that the federal government is delaying the implementation of those projects.

If there is any delay, it is not the fault of the federal government and it is not the fault of the proponents of those various projects. I leave it to the opposition to reach its own conclusion on whose fault it is if there is any delay at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I indicated that our policy is first of all to ensure the security of supplies for Canadians, whether it be in the form of supplies from abroad or in the form of increased production within Canada. And I indicated we have already taken a number of steps in Canada to reach that objective, whether it be in the form of the massive support we gave Petro-Canada, the support we gave business to make sure the oil industry would fully develop under our leadership, or yet the extremely reasonable and adequate prices we offered the producing provinces to reach an agreement regarding the production of oil and gas in this country. But it is a matter not only of increasing production, but also of encouraging Canadians to change their habits as consumers and be less dependent on oil than they have been in the past by encouraging them to use other forms of energy.

Just a few months after taking over my department I announced a national objective for this decade which should enable us to arrive at a situation where only 10 per cent of the residential, commercial and industrial sectors would use oil which means that 90 per cent of those sectors would depend on natural gas, electricity or other forms of energy for their supplies.

In fact, if we could reach that objective—and there is no doubt in my mind we can—we could reduce tomorrow morning our oil consumption by 375,000 barrels a day which would be about the equivalent of our total current imports and the equivalent of the construction of three tar sands plants like Syncrude. That objective is fundamental to our policy, and we firmly intend to reach it. Indeed, we have again already taken steps in that direction. We have already announced the approval of the construction of the pipeline east of Montreal and for Quebec, and we have indicated we were also encouraging the extension of that pipeline to the maritime provinces as soon as possible.

I recently announced an additional program for the solar energy industry in order to help it achieve state-of-the-art technology in this area, through federal subsidies and a very generous tax system.

I recently signed a new agreement with Saskatchewan and Manitoba as well as with the Yukon and the Northwest Territories concerning energy conservation and alternate forms of energy. These are some of the measures we have taken. It is our intention not only to encourage Canadians to substitute other forms of energy for oil consumption but also to encourage them, by all means available, to conserve energy even more.

For example we have allocated more than $200 million this year to the EnerSave Program, to encourage Canadians to insulate their homes much more efficiently than we have done in the past. We already signed some contracts to promote better insulation in federal buildings throughout Canada. We have launched a public education campaign whose significance the Progressive Conservatives are deriding, but that is most important to reach that objective. If I had a parallel to make, it would be with the policy followed by the Canadian government around 1974 or 1975, the new perspective on the health of Canadians, a policy that succeeded not only in Canada but also in other countries, a policy that has been internationally recognized as a breakthrough in government health policy. What we intend to do in the energy sector is something similar. What does this mean? It means relying on citizens, recognizing that citizens themselves, when given a sense of direction by government policy, can change their lifestyles and readily co-operate to reach clear and well-defined objectives that are both in their own interest and the interest of the country as a whole. That basic direction is the one this government intends to follow, even if it does not please the opposition, by calling upon each Canadian citizen to do his share to ensure that Canada will become truly and completely self-reliant in energy matters over this decade.

[English]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, whether it is the question of increasing energy security through increasing supply, better conservation, or substitution of other forms of energy, all three approaches are fundamental to an energy policy for this country. These are the basis for our approach to the question on oil and gas. In a few weeks the federal government will release a national energy program which will supplement all the steps that we have already taken in the last few months and that the Liberal governments have taken since 1974.

What we will not do is follow the actions of the previous Conservative government which established a budget with all kinds of oil and gas increases, but without any program to ensure energy security for Canadians. What we will do is implement our objectives and commitments to the Canadian public concerning security, fairness, and an opportunity to participate.

Mr. Waddell: What about price?

Mr. Lalonde: With regard to energy security, we will stop Canadian dependence on imported oil well within this decade.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: With regard to fairness, first of all we will put a price on oil in Canada which will be related to Canadian cost of production and which will not depend on the gyrations of the international cartel, OPEC.

• (1640)

Mr. Crosby: Why don't you call it a "made-in-Canada" price?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, it will be a "made-in-Canada" price based on the Canadian cost of production.

An hon. Member: Is that the same one you talked about a year ago?

Mr. Lalonde: In fairness, we will also introduce a better and more fair division of revenues between the federal government and the governments of the oil producing provinces.

My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), has referred to the present division of 45 per cent to the producing provinces, 45 per cent to the industry, and 10 per cent to the federal government. I should like to put on record what the situation is in other federal states where the resources are owned by the component states or provinces. In Texas, for instance, a federal state just south of here, the situation—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I hear a Tory is worried over there; he does not like the fact. In Texas the revenue shares are approximately 48 per cent to the producer, 17 per cent to the state government, and 35 per cent to the federal government. That is in the United States, which our friends are so happy to talk about.

An hon. Member: What about Alaska?

Mr. Lalonde: If you look at Alaska you will find that the situation is very similar. I invite you to look at it and find what is happening there.

In Australia, where the situation is very much like that in Canada, what do we see?

An hon. Member: That they have an elected senate.

Mr. Lalonde: The share is 37 per cent to the producer, 15 per cent to the state government, and 48 per cent to the federal government. Australia is a federal state where—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) on a point of order.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, would the minister entertain a question at this time or at end of his speech?

Mr. Lalonde: At the end of my speech I will be happy to entertain a question, Mr. Speaker.

I ask the House and the people of Canada if it is fair that when the federal government, which has to bear all the cost of incentives to the industry to expand its activities in the oil and gas field—

An hon. Member: Like DREE programs in Quebec.

Mr. Lalonde: —where the federal government has to pay higher equalization costs, where the federal government has to pay for the oil compensation fund, where the federal government has the responsibility to provide the national infrastructure in the field of energy, it should be left with only 10 per cent of what Canadian consumers pay for oil and gas? We say that is not fair.

We must look at what is happening elsewhere—what is happening in the United States and what is happening in Australia. I challenge members of the opposition to look at what is happening in any other federal state in the world. They will find that national governments have a much larger share of those revenues than Canada has in order to fulfil its responsibilities.

An hon. Member: But you don't know what to do with it.

Mr. Lalonde: Finally, Mr. Speaker, not only are we going to ensure fairness as well as security of supply through this policy, we are going to ensure an opportunity for Canadians to participate in the ownership of the oil and gas industry in this country.

Not only will 1980 be the year that the Constitution of Canada is patriated, it will also be the year when Canada begins, in a systematic and determined way, to patriate the oil and gas industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister would have us believe that when he went to Alberta to talk with the oil companies and the Alberta government regarding the development of the tar sands—first he offered $32 per barrel to the oil companies—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Shields: I am getting to my question. Are you afraid to listen?

An hon. Member: We want a question, not a speech.

Mr. Shields: Your minister wants to listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Remarks should be addressed to the Chair. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) has the floor for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Shields: The minister would have us believe that the government is not at fault in any way for delaying the tar sands project, but he was told very clearly by the companies which wish to develop it that they must have world prices. They are saying, "We will refund. All we want as a return on our investment is 12 per cent. You may tax it at the top." That is what is done in the United States. Would the minister not consider that more feasible?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this issue. I am happy to tell him that the offer of $38, plus indexation according to the cost of living, is exactly the request made to me by the proponents of Cold Lake, a request that was also put forward to the government of Alberta. Exactly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister's time has expired. I shall recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko).

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to pose a question to the minister to get some clarification on figures that he gave, but if his time has expired I shall have to do it some other way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may put his question with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yurko: The minister quoted the distribution of revenues from oil in Texas as 17 per cent to the state, 48 per cent to the private sector and, I believe, 35 per cent to the federal sector. Could he advise the House of the basis of those percentage figures? Are they based on crude oil at the world price level, or are they on the basis of gasoline at the pump? Perhaps the minister could clarify this.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, we used the same basis of comparison for Canada as for Texas. We have not used two different bases. Obviously that would have been very unfair. What we have used for the purpose of comparison is exactly the same basis in the two countries, and the figures obtained are those that I have mentioned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for La Salle—Joliette!

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): You are nearly correct, Mr. Speaker, we could perhaps call it La Salle's constituency!

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on an undoubtedly serious matter, and I shall try to do so as modestly as possible since, compared with other members of this House, I am not that knowledgeable when it comes to energy. First of all, I believe I should remind the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that the absence of the official critic is due to the fact that he is now in Paris for a meeting of the Association of French Language Parliamentarians. Moreover, I am happy about it. The member who opened the debate was supposed to be in Toronto this evening, and the minister must be aware that there is something important going on in Toronto today.

I would like to say immediately that while listening to the arguments of the minister, we ourselves had the impression—and any Canadian who has not followed politics in the last few years would also have had the impression—that we were hearing a new minister within a new government speaking about new objectives. The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that this government has been in power a long time. I recall hearing very similar comments ten years ago.

An hon. Member: That is not a speech; it is a question!

Mr. La Salle: For the moment, I am not putting a question to the minister. I am beginning my comments. This disturbs the hon. member. I can excuse the absence of the minister convinced as I am that he has important responsibilities. Mr. Speaker, I heard similar comments some ten years ago and this government which was then in power had begun to speak about energy self-sufficiency. I do not forget the practical wish expressed by the minister to the effect that Canada should be autonomous in energy matters. We entirely agree about that, the difference being the means to be used. There is no doubt about it. We had considered and suggested some steps aimed at energy self-sufficiency in the interests of Canadians. Nobody can prevent us from repeating it. This was still clear a few months ago.

● (1650)

However, what happened in the past ten years? This is why we can condemn the government for failing to practise several years ago what they are now preaching. This is not a new problem, Mr. Speaker. The minister mentioned 1974 to 1979. I remember that in 1978 and 1979, for merely partisan reasons, this government deferred general elections on three occasions, thus delaying the implementation of essential steps which are still required to get close to world prices.

I think present members of this House or those who sat from 1974 to 1979 will remember perfectly well that there was a period of eighteen months over which the election was deferred three times before being held in 1979, and the Minister of Finance refused to apply certain increases that were necessary to meet the budgetary requirement for energy self-sufficiency.

I believe we must remind Canadians that that was the sinister doing of the government that is still leading the country at this time. So when the minister talks about his efforts, his proposals, the importance of self-reliance for Canada and less dependency upon foreign countries, there is a ten-year lapse the government must live with and be blamed for and that is what we are going to do. We must recall we have an urgent need of a policy that will enable us to reach and maintain self-reliance.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk more particularly about my province. A few moments ago, an hon. member talked about Ontario. Others will also take the floor. So I would like to tell you for a few minutes about modern Quebec. In order to do that, one has to acknowledge the clearly economic character of its evolution. It is true that cultural and linguistic considerations have stimulated modern Quebeckers in their efforts and that that has caused an acceleration in the evolution of Quebec in the sixties. But let us not allow the acknowledgement of the French fact in Canada to blind us and make us forget about the economic problems which are at the root of the Quebec quiet revolution.

The Quebeckers of today and especially the workers aged between 34 and 45 have benefited from a period of growth in North America which gave them a lifestyle their parents had never enjoyed. The universality of education and television placed them before an opened window on the world and consequently, like it or not, they are fully aware of the values currently defended in our times.

Mr. Pierre Laurin, Director of Hautes Études Commerciales, this dynamic Quebecker who embodies so well the virtues of this generation I am talking about, reminds us of this often and proudly. The Quebec entrepreneur, and here I also include our outstanding Quebec women who so successfully harmonize the qualities of the heart and of the mind, the Quebec entrepreneur emerged during the last two decades. Whether a technocrat, an industrialist or owner of a small business already dealing in exportations, or a leader in our labour unions, this entrepreneur, and here I use the word in its largest definition, is much more concerned with the present and the future of Quebec than his grandfather was concerned with its past. Quebeckers today are living intensely in the present and are looking forward with great energy to the future. They can afford to do so because they have had the wisdom to weigh the respective merits of a cherished past, a present they want to enjoy fully, and a future they would like promising and secure.

And now, Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I would like to get to the heart of the matter we are discussing today, that is energy as a resource, since up until now I have spoken of the creative energy of Quebeckers.

Energy has been the key that opened the door to modern day Quebec just as its abundant production lead to the industrialization of the province in the nineteenth century. We all recall that the creation of Hydro-Quebec represented an important phase in the evolution of Quebec. The majestic and powerful rivers of Quebec prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that God smiles favourably on my native province. The fact that Quebeckers recognized the economic potential of these rivers also fills me with pride. Manic, that gigantic power station which provides energy to Quebec, was created by French-speaking engineers, technicians and workers, which disproved once and for all the shameful misconception about the ability of Quebeckers.

Nobody today can claim that French-speaking Quebeckers are strangers to science, entrepreneurship, and leadership in the business community, the big guys in other words! There is no doubt today that French-speaking Canadians are just as competent in the marketplace as in the realm of ideas. And as if this were not enough luck in itself, natural energy resources ensure the present economic viability of Quebec as well as its future self-sufficiency. For the hydro power of Quebec, the potential of its gas and uranium reserves, the latter giving an indication of its future nuclear capability, the studies on alternate sources such as solar energy of the treatment of waste materials along with the use of a growing technology oriented manpower, all these elements hold in store a definite energy-oriented future for Quebec.

Unfortunately, just as its purely economic future had been jeopardized by the narrow conceptions of a number of previous administrations which, due to a spirit of adventure or by sheer neglect, had gone astray from the natural evolutionary trend of Quebec, this energy future is now in compromised. The federal Liberal government, by appealing to the needs of Quebeckers for economic security during the referendum campaign got a reprieve or, as people said, the last chance for federalism. Those same Liberals have now forsaken them. The lack of courage and honesty of the federal Liberals, their neglect with regard to their economic and energetic fate are quite scandalous, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed true that Quebeckers would rather have a constitution that is really theirs, home made in Canada and reflecting their pride. But just as they rejected the hang-ups of previous administrations which no longer cared about their real needs, or rather about their real needs as a whole, both those of the heart and of the body, Quebeckers should reject the narrow views of the present federal administration. To those who claim that man does not live by bread alone, I would simply answer that they probably always had all the bread they needed and can afford to make such a selfish comment.

The economic future of Quebec will ensure the cultural and linguistic future of Quebec, it is as simple as that. They are interrelated, and Quebeckers know it. This is why so many of them are thinking of getting hold of the economic levers to achieve their aims. This is why so many demagogues play also with the feelings of Quebeckers when it suits them while others play with their fear in economic terms. Sometimes, some people succeed in persuading Quebeckers to put their needs in terms of economic security and growth in the background and to follow their hearts. But Quebeckers pull themselves together eventually. This time, however, I am afraid that they do not have enough time to do so.

Without a secure energy supply, Quebec will miss the boat. Besides, energy is the greatest challenge Canada has ever faced as well as the main factor in its future economic development. In terms of energy, Canada is behaving now as an underdeveloped country, while it should prepare for the most glorious times in its history.

Our dependency on foreign oil imports is increasing instead of decreasing contrary to what the federal Liberal ministers generally, and especially the minister concerned, would have us believe. Quebec is dependent on foreign oil by as much as 60 per cent. Quebeckers know what is going on now in Iran, Mr. Speaker. Like all other Canadians, they can watch it on television. But are Quebeckers aware that not so long ago, Nova Scotia, Quebec's neighbouring province, was fully dependent on Iran for its oil supplies? And I am not talking here about the requirements of corporations or faceless groups, but what Canadians need to heat their homes and fill up their gas tanks.

Canada is importing oil from abroad, from Venezuela, Mexico and Saudi Arabia. It is in the latter area that Iran and Iraq are fighting their war. These supplies of fuel oil and gasoline are not intended for western Canada or even Ontario for the most part, but for Quebec and the maritimes. Should there be another war, another revolution, like in Iran, or even a natural plague like an earthquake, where would Quebec find its oil? Today Quebec depends heavily on oil for its heating, automobiles and industry.

An hon. Member: Where were you last summer?

Mr. La Salle: I am used, Mr. Speaker, to hearing certain comments from the other side but they are also invited to express their concern about the absence today of guarantees of self-sufficiency in the area of energy. Quebec depends on oil for 75 per cent of its heating. Cars run only on oil and industry uses mainly oil. Indeed, 78 per cent of all energy consumed in Quebec comes from oil. Some 200,000 barrels of oil enter Quebec every day from foreign countries; 300,000 come from the producing provinces in western Canada.

Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at least concerned with making sure the supplies coming from within this country are assured, as he is certainly not able to assure the supplies from outside countries? No, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources aggravates the dialogue between Ottawa and the producing provinces. At the same time, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) laughs at the complaints of the producing provinces which want to obtain maximum protection for their resources and thus assure the economic welfare of their people. Those gentlemen who are supposed to be representing the interests of Canadians and Quebeckers so passionately are insulting the oil producing provinces of western Canada that must nevertheless heat Quebec homes this winter and enable Quebeckers to go to work.

During the last election, Mr. Speaker, Quebeckers who were convinced by the Liberals in Ottawa that to pay 18 cents more a gallon for their oil was a useless sacrifice will not have any oil for their cars no matter what price they are willing to pay.

In the meantime, the same Quebeckers that were convinced to reject an 18-cent increase, a small short-term sacrifice required to ensure Quebec's and Canada's economic future, achieve self-sufficiency and guarantee oil supplies to Quebec, these same Quebeckers have just gone through the 15-cent increase since February 18, 1980. Moreover, the former finance minister's budget that Liberals used as an excuse to defeat the Clark government also proposed to give Quebec families tax credits to offset all price increases. Right now this Liberal government is increasing oil prices 15 cents, without any tax credit.

In April, 1980, each Quebec family with revenues below $21,000 would have received a $15 per child and $40 per adult tax credit, with $30 per child and $80 per adult in 1981. So the average Quebec family would have received in 1981 a $220 tax credit, whether they paid taxes or not. Since that time Quebeckers saved 3 cents per gallon with the 15-cent increase for which they are receiving no tax credit, which they had to pay without hope of recovering it. They had to absorb the total increase needed without any compensation based on their revenue, low or otherwise. All paid equally, and the increase does not apply only to all but heating fuel. Our excise tax did not apply to heating fuel.

In the meantime, Liberals in Ottawa promised not to increase the cost of oil as much as Progressive Conservatives were proposing in order to ensure Quebeckers safe supplies of oil and develop Canadian wells to replace foreign ones. We were proposing a $4 increase for 1980 and a $4.50 one for 1981 and 1982. Until now, without the benefits of our integrated program that would have led to self-sufficiency in 1990, Liberals here in Ottawa would have allowed a $3 per barrel direct and indirect increase, but the price is now $4 more per barrel. In the meantime, the cost of subsidies we are paying on foreign oil is increasing tremendously.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, because you are indicating that my time is coming to an end, Quebeckers will have saved 3 cents to find themselves confronted with the danger of losing the free use of their cars if foreign oil becomes scarce. Mr. Speaker, the oil matter is basic in Quebec as elsewhere. The essential supply of oil must be ensured until Quebec can partially rely on its alternative regional resources.

We are aware of the importance of the debate. I deplore the fact that we have been discussing this matter for ten years. I cannot accept that the government should give, or try to give, the impression that it has found a new formula. Today, the blame lies with the fact that this government has been in power too long. It has not had the foresight to give Canada the autonomy we all wish for on both sides of the House.

To my mind, it is our duty to remind them of their faults and failure with regard to that foresight, which has been sadly lacking in parliamentary debates. If they were to make proposals to achieve self-sufficiency by taking into account private enterprise, because here in Canada private enterprise is important, they could get some form of support. But it is our duty to call them to order when they do not offer any guarantees or enough aid to the underprivileged when the time comes to make proposals in energy matters.

Mr. Demers: I should like to ask the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) if he will allow me a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): With the permission of the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Demers: The hon. member for Joliette claims that since the Liberal government took over power on February 18 last, the price of gas has gone up by 15 cents a gallon. I should like to know whether, had his own party stayed in power, Canadians and Quebeckers in particular would not now be paying roughly the same increase, that is 15 cents a gallon plus an excise tax of 18 cents. I should like to be enlightened on that point.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Demers) has surely read the proposal of the last budget where it is clear that we were about to legislate an increase as well as a tax credit for those who earn $21,000 or less. Our position was very clear. It was aimed, precisely as the minister said today, at ensuring self-sufficiency in the field of energy. As a result, we wanted to encourage Canadians toward a very specific goal, that of saving energy. We needed millions of dollars—the minister spoke about it today—to achieve that self-sufficiency, that self-reliance. I believe we were protecting those who were unable to pay. We were asking Canadians to recognize the need to make certain sacrifices. The difference was that we had the courage to explain their needs to Canadians while the Liberals hid behind an increase which will come one way or another.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) on a point of order.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) if he would accept one more question?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Tousignant: The hon. member recognizes that the Progressive Conservatives had suggested an increase of $4 a barrel. At the present time, oil prices have increased somewhat less. During the election campaign, the Liberals forecast that the price of oil might increase by the amount mentioned by the Progressive Conservatives but perhaps by less. In view of the 18-cent tax and the 7-cent reimbursement tax for those who use vehicles for commercial purposes, which makes 25 cents a gallon, can the hon. member figure out how much on a gas tank of 20 gallons these 25 cents a gallon, which we have saved Canadian taxpayers, represent?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is asking what this represents on the one hand, but he has forgotten to mention that our tax credit was geared to the problem that this would cause to low-income Canadians. In this case, I could perhaps ask him if he has figured out what the tax credit, which could come to $250 a year and correspond perhaps to 40,000 miles in view of the increase that we had suggested, represented for an average family of three children. I believe we had a solution which the Liberals refused to use. The hon. member says that reference was made to an oil price increase during the election campaign, but I must say that in my constituency, the Liberals did not talk about any oil price increase. I reminded Canadians and people in Joliette that there would be an increase in any case, but we all know how they responded.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before recognizing the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren), I should deal with the late show this evening.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby)—Energy—Oil—Price increases for home heating; the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Nuclear Energy—Inquiry respecting nuclear policy—Request for tabling terms of reference; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Health Care—Hall Report—Recommendation respecting extra billing by doctors.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENTAL MISMANAGEMENT OF ENERGY SITUATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson:

That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of Canada's energy situation with the consequent loss of economic development opportunities and increased threat to the nation's energy security.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that we have this opportunity today, an opposition day, to discuss energy questions. These questions will, of course, be before the House again very soon, in a matter of weeks, when the new energy policy of the government is set forth. I am sorry, however, that my neighbour to the south in Etobicoke, having introduced this motion and having made a number of broad generalizations about the energy policy of the government, is not in the House and apparently was unable to stay for this discussion, even in fact to hear the reply of the minister to his earlier statements.

Be that as it may, I would wish to point out to the hon. member who introduced the motion that Canada is, after all, an energy-rich country, having an abundance of resources, and that we are, indeed, a net exporter of energy. Certainly in that sense there is no energy crisis in Canada. For example, we had in 1978 an excess of exports over imports of almost $2 billion. The cost of imported oil was more than offset by our exports of natural gas alone. In all areas, except oil, Canada has today a surplus of energy: in natural gas, hydroelectric power, coal, and uranium for nuclear power. Indeed, we export natural gas and we are negotiating the export of additional coal. On current account, in other words, we export more energy than we buy.

The challenge to Canadians in a sense is a challenge of managing abundance. This is an enviable position in today's energy-scarce world.

The current problem, of course, is in respect of oil and not the other areas of energy that I have mentioned. In that specific area of oil, Canada was until fairly recently self-sufficient. In light of the then estimates, we were even an exporter of oil. Unfortunately, that self-sufficiency has temporarily disappeared, but certainly the potential is there, especially in the oil sands, the offshore and the Arctic regions. Unlike almost all other industrial countries, Canada has enormous potential and enormous opportunity in energy.

Conventional sources in Alberta are expected to decline, but vast reserves in our oil sands, offshore, and in Arctic regions promise Canadians once again self-sufficiency. When cheaply produced oil in Alberta was available so too was cheap offshore oil. With those two sources, Canadians were provided with ample oil resources. With the suddenness of OPEC price increases, however, Canada was faced with the challenge of rapidly developing its non-conventional sources, a challenge which involved costly and technologically novel methods.

The results are now beginning to show in the oil sands, in the vast gas reserves identified in the Arctic, and in the offshore reserves of oil and gas on the Atlantic coast. The gap between when we were and when we again shall be self-sufficient has required imports of oil for which we have had to pay increasing amounts. We have subsidized those imports to ensure a gradual increase in price and to ensure equality of costs for all Canadians across Canada. Today we are at a stage when we need to phase in yet higher oil prices in Canada—let no one be mistaken that there will be higher oil prices—to compensate for our import costs and to ensure that the necessary further development of our petroleum industry continues unabated. There will be higher prices, but they will not be world prices. We are committed in this government to maintain a made-in-Canada price which will blend the lower cost of conventional oil, the much higher cost of non-conventional oil and the imported oil, the price over which we have no control.

On the question of non-conventional oil pricing, there can now be little disagreement in principle. The minister pointed out that the government has proposed a price of $38 a barrel, plus an inflator which will provide the necessary funds to ensure that the additional oil sands projects go ahead as planned without interruption.

On the question of conventional oil, we all agree that the price must increase. There has, however, been some disagreement about tying that Canadian price to world levels. It is not our intention to do so and we are committed to a policy which will maintain a made-in-Canada price.

We have had some discussion this afternoon about matters which might better be described as fiscal rather than energy policy. We have talked about the division of oil revenue among the producers, the provinces, and the national government. As the minister pointed out, in all other federal states the revenue accruing to the central government is much greater in proportion to total revenue than here in Canada. Quite obviously there is a need at the federal level for more revenue to meet our obligations in respect of redistribution through equalization payments. There is obviously a need for more national revenue to reduce and eventually eliminate the oil compensation import program, and there is a need to ensure that energy projects receive the essential stimulus of the national government.

In addition, while we recognize the need of industry for funds to develop non-conventional sources, we see that there are also real requirements to move quickly and substantially in the direction of greater Canadian participation in the petroleum industry.

During these past days we have been discussing the patriation of our constitution. We have yet, in my view, to patriate our economy, and one part of that goal will be achieved by our energy policy which aims directly at the question of greater Canadianization of the oil industry.

In introducing this motion the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) referred to possible supply problems and painted a rather gloomy picture of possible disruptions in the supply to Canadians of their essential oil requirements. I would remind the House of the success of this government in negotiating and completing arrangements for the import of new sources of oil from Mexico, the delivery of which I am pleased to say will commence very shortly.

In addition, in Canada today we have Canadian oil inventories of approximately 160 million barrels, and that amount is by no means negligible. Those reserves amount to about 90 days of oil consumption and over 1,000 days—three years—of our current net oil imports.

Nevertheless, the government is also committed to alternatives which will also assist Canadians in being assured that their offshore oil supplies will be adequate to meet all essential needs. We are, for example, currently considering alternatives for establishing an emergency oil inventory. I might point out that given Canada's relatively modest oil imports, this emergency inventory need not be too large. An emergency stock of from 15 million to 25 million barrels would provide from six months' to one year's protection from a loss of 10 per cent to 20 per cent of our current crude oil imports. Even with larger disruptions, this inventory would provide time to evaluate the situation and implement, if necessary, our emergency allocation procedures.

Also in connection with the possibility of emergency supplies, which the hon. member raised earlier, we have made significant progress in the preparation of contingency plans for the allocation of crude oil to refineries and petroleum products to wholesale consumers. Should an emergency become so severe that rationing became necessary, plans are available for that as well.

I might also add that in the international arena we have engaged, with other industrialized countries of the western would, in a third international test to appraise the procedures of the allocation of oil under the International Energy Agency. This may suggest further improvements which might, as necessary, be made to our present procedures.

The hon. member opposite also spoke this afternoon about conservation and renewable energy. I should like for a moment to turn to those two subjects as a further illustration of the ways in which this government has acted, is acting, and will act to provide Canadians with a new energy policy capable of providing the security and fairness of supply which all Canadians have a right to seek.

In the context of energy conservation, the Government of Canada has recently moved, with the provincial governments, in co-operative programs intended to develop promising energy savings or alternative energy technologies. Most recently, an agreement was signed with the government of Saskatchewan. In total almost $120 million has been allocated for joint projects with provinces under this promising conservation program.

Industry is one of the major consumers of oil in Canada. We have worked out co-operative programs with various industry sectors, which has led to substantial savings already in the amount of oil they use, particularly in the manufacturing sector. In co-operation with industry, we have engaged in setting new targets which look for a 23 per cent reduction in the amount of oil consumed by Canadian industry over the base year 1975.

I hardly need remind the House—in any discussion of conservation—of the success of the Canadian Home Insulation Program. CHIP has made more than $200 million available to Canadians for more energy-efficient homes. As has already been announced, new arrangements and additions are being made to that program to ensure greater efficiency and further extension.

On the question of alternative sources, I was pleased that the hon. member opposite raised some questions in his opening statement because the record of the government in this area has been one of constant improvement since the first efforts in, for example, the solar area in 1978. The House may recall that at that time government funding of almost $400 million was offered to assist new research and development in renewable energies, particularly solar. Those programs have already begun to show results, although solar technology is not yet at a stage where it can be widely applied in oil saving procedures. There is no question in my mind that, while not looking for dramatic immediate pay-offs, we must make such investment in what is a Canadian industry offering real potential for the future.

More recently, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) announced further expansion of the federal programs intended to develop solar technology in Canada, including a program which will provide for the construction of a number of dwellings heated in part or in whole by solar water heaters.

In this area of solar energy, as indeed in the areas of a number of other renewable energy resources such as wind, tide or biomass, we are still at an early stage of technological development, but with the significant funding which is becoming available through the federal government in support of these programs I have no doubt of their ultimate success.

I might say in addition that we on this side of the House welcome the recent announcements of the Ontario government regarding its commitment of substantial new funds toward the same end of promoting renewable energy sources in Canada.

I might also note that the government announced in the Speech from the Throne the creation of a renewable energy corporation. That Crown corporation has a mandate to provide essential support for the promotion of renewable energy technologies beyond the demonstration stage and particularly to benefit smaller Canadian companies. The new corporation is now on its way to inception. Funding has been provided for its initial activities, and Petro-Canada is providing, for the moment, necessary administrative support while the new corporation comes into being.

With these few comments on our energy wealth and potential, and with one or two remarks about policies to ensure all Canadians adequate supplies of energy sources, I hope that I have indicated the government's general policy approach to the provision of energy in Canada. I hope, too, that by referring to the conservation initiatives and the new programs in renewable energy I have given substance to our commitment to the need as well to act on the demand side of the equation. In our view, it is not adequate simply to search for new sources of conventional energy within Canada. It is also essential that Canadians recognize and develop methods for conservation and for renewable sources.

With these references to the government's energy policy principles and objectives, to the evidence of the dynamic growth of our energy economy and to the many initiatives we have taken in the past six months, I trust that the House will recognize that our management of Canada's energy situation is fully in accordance with our best national interests. The actions we have taken as a government have greatly reduced the threat to our national energy security experienced in the not too distant past. We will be announcing in the very near future new energy initiatives on the basis of the planning and decisions of the past six months which in our view will enable Canadians to meet the very serious challenges of energy supply and price, the problems of price impact on inflation and on the economy generally facing all countries in 1980. But I believe we in Canada have the opportunity to meet those challenges in a way that is unsurpassed by any other industrialized country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in the debate on the motion moved by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). In order to refresh the minds of hon. members as to what we are debating on this allotted day, it is an opposition procedure by which the opposition can pick a subject and in effect debate the merits and demerits of that subject; it is sort of a replacement of the old supply procedure. But for those people in the television audience, this is one of the few opportunities the opposition has to bring to the fore issues which can be debated because it feels they carry a rather high priority.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre ably led off the debate by moving the following motion:

That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of Canada's energy situation with the consequent loss of economic development opportunities and increased threat to the nation's energy security.

Other than perhaps what is going on in Toronto today where the premiers are talking about the constitution, and what will take place tomorrow when the House recommences the debate on that topic, I do not believe there is a more fundamental question which affects the unity of this country than the question of energy and the policy, or the lack of one, from the federal government. When the scales are weighed up yonder, regardless of what happens to the Constitution of Canada and/or its reform and renewed federalism, there is no doubt in my mind that the policy or lack of policy of the present government on energy will be its single most important substantive indictment. Frankly, that covers a fantastic field because there are many other areas about which we can talk in which the government has not moved with much decision or knowledge. Naturally we in the opposition would think that.

I have only a brief remark to make about the comments of the hon. parliamentary secretary. I was a little disappointed that he reflected on the absence of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre who moved this motion, it is nevertheless the minister's responsibility to be in the House and participate in the debate. He has a responsibility to the Canadian taxpayer and those who cannot pay taxes because they do not have enough money—there are almost more of those than taxpayers. If the minister has developed the arrogance of which many have quite rightly accused him, if he can speak and then disappear, he has almost reversed what Caesar said when he came to Gaul. He would say, "I saw, I conquered and I left".

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) condescended to sit here and listen to the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre move the motion. He listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), the energy critic of the NDP, when he spoke. Perhaps he has good reasons in his mind for not being here today to discuss this fundamental issue of energy, but it is most unfair for the parliamentary secretary to the minister to stand in his place and comment on the absence of a member of the opposition who does not hold a ministerial post and is not paid an extra stipend by the Crown to discharge government business. I have another comment to make about the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren). Again it is just a brief reference to Toronto. It is not just facts and figures or the writ of a constitution that makes constitutions or countries. It is an atmosphere; it is really a feeling which goes a long way toward getting into the intangibles of a constitution. But it is easy to understand why we have problems with the constitution and/or an energy package when we hear the minister of energy or his parliamentary secretary stand in the House and say that there is no crisis in energy. That was the purport of the minister's remarks earlier—that there is no crisis in energy. Mr. Speaker, I do not know where one would have to go in the western world today to find a country which does not have an energy crisis, unless one finds the foxhole Alice in Wonderland slid down years ago in that famous little book Lewis Carroll wrote, which I think the minister and the parliamentary secretary must have read, and lives in a fool's world. There is not a spokesman worthy of his salt who does not appreciate that every western country is confronted with an energy crisis regardless of how one might want to particularize. We talk about the export of gas and the parliamentary secretary says we are only a little short of oil. The parliamentary secretary only has to go east. He can go through the province of Quebec and certainly to Atlantic Canada, and when he is talking about a little deficiency in the supply of oil, he is talking about 80 per cent of the generation of energy in Nova Scotia and more than that in Prince Edward Island. That is real cause for concern in the minds of those in Atlantic Canada and, I would think, among many people in Quebec. It is the basis for what any moderate person would say is a crisis in energy. Whether one wants to talk about conventional sources, gas, solar, alternative supply or conservation, there is not a responsible person in the western world who does not realize that this is a problem on which we do not have a handle because the supply in so many cases is beyond our shores. As was intimated by the parliamentary secretary, the sad thing is that we have the potential, if developed, of developing a sufficiency of supply, and the previous government tried to do something about that. There is an honest difference of opinion. This was expressed in the vote last year and certainly it was expressed in the vote in February by the people of Canada. Perhaps, with respect, they did not understand the full implications of what was attempted in the budget of December last year. The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre had to go to Toronto on parliamentary business. I think it is the height of hyprocrisy for the parliamentary secretary to comment about his absence when the minister responsible for the whole energy field is not in his place and perhaps we will not see him again for the rest of the day.

The minister made an allusion to Thanksgiving and offered some rejoinder as he started. When I heard his remarks, I thought he might have been speaking on April Fools' Day, poking fun, making jests and April Fools' jokes along with some of his larger generalizations. The minister can be a likeable person away from the House. I do not intend this personally, but in the discharge of his ministerial responsibilities, whether in the House or talking to fellow ministers in the provinces, this minister has a capacity to give a turkey indigestion when he tries to explain the problems in the energy field. Looking ahead in the holiday field—and again this is not a personal reflection—in the discharge of his duties outside the House he is a very affable and most humble man who has much about which to be humble; but in the House and dealing with his fellow counterparts in the provinces he has the capacity to make Santa Claus on Christmas Day into Scrooge. Instead of using his energy to develop the policies or the security of supply about which he talks, I submit he is creating discord and division across the land as great as any we have ever known outside Quebec in terms of our future and in terms of the constitution.

Worse than that, there is an element of deception in almost everything he says. I say this with reluctance because I do not want to deliberately accuse a minister of deceiving the House, but this is what is going on, whether it is intentional or unintentional and, frankly, the minister has more brains than a lot of people give him credit for. I do not believe it is unintentional. I believe it is very intentional and we saw several examples of it here today. All right, it can be a matter of debate for him taking pride in so many more wells being drilled this year but the minister knows that in order to drill a well this year you have to plan for it the year before. The real test of this government's mandate will be how many wells are drilled next year. If there is not a satisfactory oil pricing agreement I would venture to say—and I am prepared to bet the minister when he returns to the House—that there will not be as many wells drilled next year as this year if there is not an oil pricing agreement, and we have not seen one yet.

The parliamentary secretary commented on figures and the minister used figures. We all know—government members know, opposition members know and I think the public out there in televisionland know—that any politician worth his salt can play with figures. Figures lie or liars figure, but figures do not lie. Take the precise example the minister used in terms of deception—and I am not talking about the television ads across this land which are trying to lull Canadians into a false sense of complacency that we have security of supply—that we have all those great reserves and resources out there. Getting around to developing them may be another question but do not worry too much. When you see that type of ad how interested are you going to be in conservation? I know what my children think when they see that ad. They ask me: Dad, don't we have a problem with oil in Atlantic Canada? I have to say yes. They ask: Then what is that ad telling us that everything is all right?

You can talk about all your programs—and the insulation program is good as far as it goes—but there have been some other projects involving alternative energy. I think of the Fundy tidal project which used to be in my riding and is now in the riding of the hon. member for Southwest Nova (Miss Campbell). That was an experimental project involving some $42 million, $25 million of which might be the forerunner of the development of tidal power in Canada. Certainly, in Atlantic Canada that could be an alternative source of energy.

But where is the incentive to develop those alternate sources or follow any conservation program in our daily life when there are ads on television which say it is all right, don't worry, Canada is the greatest and there is lots of potential under the ground and under the sea? The exercise defeats its own purpose, Mr. Speaker.

But let us look at the figures used by the minister today. He talked about Texas. I am not the expert in terms of figures but I have these from a fundamental source. The very fraction that he talked about he compared to Texas. He was talking about Alberta. This deception is repeated and repeated so that people think that Alberta is the only bad boy in this picture. The minister knows, even if the parliamentary secretary does not, that it is not 45 per cent that goes to Alberta from the first dollar to the last dollar. The hon. gentleman over there smiles and I take it the smile is in acquiescence. He does know it is a weighted figure. I have heard 45 per cent at federal-provincial conferences, I have heard it on radio, I have heard commentators use it and until I heard the minister use it again today and then went behind the curtains to talk to a couple of members who are more knowledgeable in this field than I am, I did not fully appreciate how deceptive that figure is. The 45 per cent that Alberta supposedly gets is a weighted figure. The province does not get 45 per cent of every dollar that flows into their coffers. Of the first four dollars they only get 16½ per cent. And the figure is weighted up to the 45 per cent. The average, Mr. Speaker, is 37 per cent.

What does that 37 per cent do on $16-a-barrel oil in Alberta? Let us not talk about paying the Mexicans $34 or $36 a barrel. That money would go out of the country and would not develop a thing in Canada. Let us just talk about the $16—less than half the world price—that we pay our fellow Canadians. Thirty-seven per cent of the $16 works out to $5.92 a barrel. The 17 per cent that the minister says is paid to the Texan state government, because they are getting much more as their wholesale price, works out to $6.46. If my figures are wrong I hope the minister will stand in this House tomorrow and ask me to correct this calculation. I have it from a man in our opposition who knows much more about oil than I do and I take his figures as being correct. I saw the charts behind them. But, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to stand and be the one to be rebuked if I am in error. This is just an example which, on my information, shows the deception in regard to this whole energy picture. I find it a very interesting situation when the minister relies on the Texas reed and realizes it is a broken reed, a broken straw.

There are so many other things one could say in the brief time allotted. The minister said he was going to talk about three points. I hope he will start by talking to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In that memorable speech which the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister, gave during the election campaign before the Board of Trade in Halifax on January 25, the Prime Minister did not talk about three commitments, he talked about seven major commitments. There were seven major commitments and I am going to talk about one, the Q and M pipeline. Only two have even come close to being acknowledged. Let us take the minister's words. Forget about the Prime Minister who made seven commitments only two of which have even been acknowledged, and let us take the three the hon. gentleman mentioned here today. He talked about security of supply, alternatives and conservation.

I won't repeat some of what I have said but in terms of supply we have not got an oil pricing agreement, we have not got the development of the tar sands and our supply picture is questionable. Wayne Cheveldayoff, in an article he wrote for The Globe and Mail on May 12, 1980, before he became assistant to the governor of the Bank of Canada—and I think everyone in this House and certainly members opposite would agree with me that Wayne Cheveldayoff would be a very objective commentator on the energy scene—said that within six years the conventional supply, in effect from Alberta, will be used up unless we develop some of those frontier supplies. We are talking about Canadianizing the oil industry. If we do not get down to developing our oil industry, Mr. Speaker, we will have no oil industry to Canadianize.

The minister's second point was fairness between regions. I want to ask the parliamentary secretary how fair is it to end the Q and M pipeline in Quebec and not extend it to Atlantic Canada, though the Prime Minister promised he would do so in the campaign; the Liberal party in a full page ad after the Prime Minister spoke in Halifax promised, in point three, that there would be a natural gas pipeline to ensure all Canadians access to their resources. It said:

> Liberals would take immediate action to begin negotiations for construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes.

To quote the Prime Minister's words which appear on page ten of his speech—it was one of the few printed speeches in the campaign:

> I am announcing today, as part of our program, that a Liberal government will take immediate action to ensure the full co-operation of all parties in the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes.

Mr. Speaker, the cabinet can either accept or reject a National Energy Board decision. I charge the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the two ministers from Nova Scotia in this ministry—and I do not know who else is from Atlantic Canada because we do not hear about them down there—with selling out the interests of Atlantic Canada by not rejecting the NEB report.

The NEB says that the need for environmental studies is the reason we should not proceed. They know and the minister knows that gas pipelines, and there are all sorts of them buried across this country with grass growing on top of them, would follow the hydro lines which are a worse environmental eyesore. The fuel being transported is gas, which is a heck of a lot less polluting than coal. If there were a break in the pipeline or any other problem, we would know, as he knows and they should know, that in terms of environmental impact the blow-off of methane is a heck of a lot less harmful than many other spills.

They tried to justify not extending the Q and M pipeline by saying there might be something offshore in Sable. We in Atlantic Canada know, as the minister and the NEB should know, that any development offshore would be within a three-year to four-year range which would coincide with the building or construction of a pipeline beyond Quebec if it got under way today. The environmental studies are merely an excuse for the minister. I believe the NEB did a disservice to Atlantic Canada, but it is supposedly beyond parliamentary criticism. I am starting to wonder if it should be.

The whole matter is a political question for the same reason as the building of the CPR to the west to tie it in with the rest of Canada back in 1867 was a political question. It should be a political decision made by a government with fibre in its soul and an interest in all of Canada, not just pieces of Canada, to make sure that that pipeline goes from coast to coast and certainly beyond Quebec into Atlantic Canada.

I cannot get very excited over what the minister said today about fairness to the regions. He need not talk to me about fairness to regions. I am sure there are members on the other side from the province of Newfoundland who must be embarrassed at the present position of the federal government in not allowing the government of Newfoundland to transmit power across Quebec from Churchill Falls. What is the rationale? How can there be a double standard, letting pipelines cross provinces yet not allowing a hydro line to cross Quebec?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: I am very limited in the time I have left, and that man spoke some time ago. He wants to ask a question.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I appreciate that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) may be correct in that the interruption is pursuant to the desire of the hon. member to ask a question, but the Chair cannot know that before we find out.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has already answered my question. He has anticipated it, and I must say that it is very convenient for him—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Tobin: I am going to ask a question which he can certainly answer with fact.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am informed by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants that if it is the intention of the hon. member to ask a question—

Mr. Tobin: It certainly is that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): —that the hon. member does not accept the proposition and does not intend to answer questions while he is speaking. This being the case, there seems to be no point whatsoever in encouraging a question which will not be answered.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I do not have to take any barb from the hon. junior member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin), who has made some very interesting and dynamic contributions in his own way. However, that young member does not need to talk about the truth to me. I am not going to follow the rabbit tracks of the hon. member when I am after bigger game.

Mr. Nielsen: Mouse traps.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to follow mouse traps when I am talking about the minister or even the parliamentary secretary. When the hon. member from the back side comes up to the front side, then I might condescend to listen to him.

Mr. Tobin: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I do not think that I have much time left, Mr. Speaker, but I hope that you do not include these last remarks in the time I have used. In terms of fairness we in Atlantic Canada—and I am disappointed and amazed that the hon. member from Newfoundland does not understand—

Mr. Tobin: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: —and this is one reason why you have had your birthrights sold out, because you have not stood in your place and complained about the fact that you could not get the hydro line from Churchill Falls, Newfoundland, through Quebec. It is members like this, Mr. Speaker, who are not speaking for Atlantic Canada and who are doing a disservice to Atlantic Canada. I hope his constituents will recognize that instead of asking me questions, he should be questioning the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on why there is no transmission of power from Churchill Falls so that the government of Newfoundland could get some dollars to help develop the other section of the project. That is to whom the questions should be directed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: In conclusion, because I know my time is just about up, I will talk about offshore rights which the present government will not honour. I would like to draw attention to an article in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of October 4 which deals not only with the offshore problem today but with some of the history of this country and points out facts which make our offshore situation even more accute and compounds the sense of unfairness which we in Atlantic Canada feel.

As other provinces came into confederation, be it Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or Quebec, vast territories in the north were given to them by act of this Parliament. We do not begrudge this. But, for example, one of the most important developments in Quebec, the James Bay project, is located in this territory. Much of the development which took place in Alberta and Saskatchewan is found in such northern areas. The size of these territories is immense, with approximately 379,000 square miles going to Quebec, approximately 382,000 square miles to Ontario and approximately 237,000 miles to Manitoba. Alberta and Saskatchewan each received 250,000 square miles of new territory.

If one turns to Nova Scotia, which has only 20,000 square miles of territory in total, one can begin to appreciate why in the deep east, if we have any feeling for the deep east and are true sons of the deep east, we feel there is a double standard. We do not mind other provinces getting the territories which make up their present boundaries because it has obviously helped us with regard to equalization grants.

What we cannot understand is why there is not some recognition of the mineral wealth off our shores since those other provinces, through those extra gifts of land, received so much wealth. I would hope the minister will come back into the House and address his mind to a couple of the matters which I have raised.

The most interesting and ironic situation came up when the minister talked about the third item.

I have a different clock from yours, Mr. Speaker, but since yours is the one that governs us, I gather you are indicating that my time is up. In conclusion, the third item mentioned by the minister had to do with Canadian participation in the oil industry. There are reliable assessments that, based on the known supply in this country at the present time, we will not have any oil within a ten-year period unless we develop non-conventional resources. The interesting thing which the minister did not tell us is that it was the fledgling oil industry in the west, when Turner Valley was first discovered during the 1940s, which came east to look for financing. That industry came to the Government of Canada of the day for financing. It happened to be the same type of government in power, a Liberal government, as is the case now, and has, unfortunately, been the case for so long.

Because of the lack of financing from eastern financiers and the government, the oil industry had to go south of the border for financing to develop its fantastic oil potential. I hope that some of the deception, discord and division which is constantly being sown by the minister on this issue will be directed to resolving problems rather than to creating more problems.

Mr. Bujold: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this very lively debate, but as Your Honour will see, it is six o'clock.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If that is agreed, the Chair will call it six o'clock. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.59 p.m. the House took recess.

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. When the House took recess at six o'clock this evening, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold) had the floor. The hon. member for Îles-de-la-Madeleine-Bonaventure now has the floor.

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether you have ever been to the Magdalen Islands but I can see that you have adopted the same attitude as the "Madelinots": you have just said "Îles-de-la-Madeleine-Bonaventure" which will make them very happy because they have been raising Cain with a view to getting a single riding at the federal level; they will be very pleased indeed to see that the Speaker of this House has started speaking of the Îles-de-la-Madeleine riding.

Mr. Speaker, I am indeed very pleased to participate in this extremely important debate and, as my friend, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) was saying this afternoon, this debate is just as important as the other because the two go together. However, my hon. friend took offence at the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) had to leave the House after having heard a representative of each of the two parties of the opposition, in order to get to Toronto and attend the meeting he had convened a few weeks ago, precisely to discuss the extremely important matter that energy is. Our friend took offence at the fact that the minister left his parliamentary secretary to take over in the House; let it be said, in passing, that he does an extraordinary and exemplary job of helping his minister in this tremendous task. But what I find even more regrettable is that our friend, in making such gratuitous affirmations, should have overlooked the fact that his colleague, the energy critic, was not present here in the House. The energy critic of the official opposition is somewhere, in Canada I trust; in addition, the hon. member, his colleague, who presented the motion of non-confidence, left the House immediately after having finished his remarks. He did not even deign to stay in the House to hear the NDP representative and added to the insult by leaving before the minister responsible could reply to the parties of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that our friends on the other side have anything to teach us. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who especially now has awesome responsibilities to bear, has always shown great respect for the House of Commons and the Canadian people and he will continue to do so, I am sure.

I would also like to refer to another point that my friend made in his speech when he was disagreeing with our government's statements on revenue sharing in the oil field. He objected to the figures we quoted, specifically to the fact that the provinces and the industry each receive about 45 per cent of revenues while the federal government receives 10 per cent. Obviously if we go back to the fifties or even the sixties those figures are no longer valid. Even at the beginning of the seventies, revenue sharing had not reached those percentages. We are only considering the figures for the period 1975 to 1979 during which the oil crisis reached its peak throughout the world. If we go back on these years, Mr. Speaker, we note that the provinces' share of the revenues for those five years was 36 per cent in 1975, 40.8 per cent in 1976, 47.1 per cent in 1977, 46.3 per cent in 1978 and 46.5 per cent in 1979. I think, Mr. Speaker, that averages around 45 per cent.

What about the industry's share? In 1975, it received 53 per cent of the revenues, in 1976, 48.8 per cent, in 1977, 41.3 per cent, in 1978, 44.2 per cent and in 1979, 43.4 per cent. As for the federal share, I said earlier 10 per cent. In 1975, it was 10.4 per cent, in 1976, 10.4 per cent, in 1977, 11.6 per cent, in 1978, 9.5 per cent and in 1979, 10.1 per cent. Those are the figures published by our department and which our minister has quoted many times. In view of the figures provided, I feel that those who claim the federal government is putting forward inaccurate data are wrong. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the federal government's share during the crucial years of the energy crisis has been, as I said, approximately 10 per cent. On top of this, because of our government's involvement in the oil industry, which has increased its responsibilities, it is true that our revenue in that area is not very high.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that whenever the energy issue is raised in the House, it seems to bother and disturb our hon. friends opposite. And with reason, I think. This afternoon, our friend, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) dealt with the so-called surrender of our government in this area and he tried to make the point that the gas tax had increased in spite of our commitment to the contrary; we must not forget, however, the increase the official opposition wanted to impose when it was in power. If we had been compelled to bear this increase on top of the other, the total increase would have been over 18 cents a gallon. But our friend from Joliette also said that the federal government, our government, had done nothing about the oil situation. Mr. Speaker, I would like to give some dates and facts. Obviously, I shall not go back to 1963, when we came to power, because I think it would put some of our friends to shame. Let me go back no further than February 1973, when the Hon. Donald Macdonald announced that from then on oil exports be regulated by the National Energy Board and be constantly monitored. On September 4, 1973, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced a price freeze on oil products and suggested abandoning the 1961 national oil policy which, by the way, had been put into place by the former government of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. On October 1, 1973, a tax was imposed on oil exports. In January 1974, the oil import compensation program was implemented.

A compromise was reached and it was agreed that the price of Canadian oil would be frozen until March 31, 1974, and that eastern Canada consumers of imported oil would be subsidized, to standardize the domestic price of crude oil. On January 14, 1974, two important bills were given royal assent, Bill C-236, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, and Bill C-245, the Oil Export Tax Act.

On March 27, 1974, the oil price was raised to $6.50 a barrel effective April 1. On April 8, 1974, the then minister, Mr. Macdonald, tabled the Petroleum Administration Act and on October 25 of that same year the act received royal assent, that is after the 1974 general election. On July 30, 1975, the famous Petro-Canada Act received royal assent. On December 12, 1975, the general agreements on oil price increases were signed. On June 23, 1977, the then minister, Mr. Gillespie, announced the new curves prices would follow until January 1 1979, in other words from July 1, 1977, domestic price for crude would increase by $1 a barrel every six months until January 1, 1979. On November 30, 1978, once again the minister announced that oil prices would go up as expected on January 1, 1979. On February 8, 1979, the minister then announced an emergency plan and on March 29 Bill C-42, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act received royal assent.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, those are the actions the Liberal government has taken since 1973 with respect to oil.

If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I would like now to look at the performance of our friends across the way when they were in power. On June 20, 1979, the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Hnatyshyn, announced an increase in oil prices. On October 8, 1979, Premier Lougheed and the then prime minister, Mr. Clark, could not agree on an oil price. On November 14 of the same year, the meeting between Premier Lougheed and the prime minister failed.

On November 23 of the same year, the then prime minister threatened to take unilateral action. On December 27 of the same year, there was still no agreement between Premier Lougheed and the prime minister. And as you know, Mr. Speaker, on December 11, 1979, the minister of finance of the government of the day introduced his disastrous budget, and we know what happened after that. The government was defeated and the people of Canada saw, after looking at such a performance, that they had no choice but to return the Liberal government to power, a government which knew how to take its responsibilities and carry through all its undertakings. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in one area our government has always been and will continue to be in the years to come a responsible government which will take its responsibilities in this area.

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to a particular point of the whole energy policy, namely the extremely important area of natural gas. Our government took extremely important decisions in this area. One only has to recall the agreement this government gave on the construction and the extension of the pipeline to Quebec City; it also urged the extension of the pipeline to the maritime provinces.

This also brings me to talk about another fact that was noted by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants. He complained this afternoon that the government had not acted on this extremely important matter of extending the pipeline to the maritimes. Yet he should know that his colleagues in the House of Commons regularly ask questions about this and that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has always answered adequately, and that there is now an appeal before the National Energy Board. We hope that a decision will be made in the near future and that it will favour an extension of the pipeline to the maritime provinces. Mr. Speaker, this would mean that our government is truly taking its responsibilities seriously and give great importance to the natural gas sector of energy, to show how our country will be able in the future to stop depending on oil producing countries for its energy needs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to underline briefly the importance that this pipeline, especially the part from Montreal to Quebec City, and then the extension to the maritimes, will have for my region, eastern Quebec, and especially the Gaspé Peninsula. As our region is rather remote from major centres, it must accept enormous deficits for residential heating, and oil is very expensive to transport. We have to accept some slight increases compared with major centres.

The extension of such a pipeline will obviously eliminate all these cost increases. This is precisely why this Liberal government is taking its responsibilities by wanting to extend part of the energy distribution system in Quebec, especially east of Montreal and in eastern Canada, because these are the regions where unemployment is the highest, and which suffer most from their remoteness, and this is why our government has undertaken to see to it that the population of these areas can have access to the enormous supplies of Canadian natural gas.

I find it difficult to understand another criticism that I heard this afternoon concerning the possible running out of conventional oil within six years in Alberta. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that, according to our figures, if we compare proven reserves to consumption this year, these reserves will last from six to eight years.

I think this is forgetting most important energy factors, namely the Canadian energy situation—they forgot that each year we have significant oil discoveries—and neglected all the efforts made by our government in energy conservation. There has been much talk about government advertising in that area. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the advertisements put out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Canadian government each week, each day in the newspapers and each week in weeklies is most important. The aim is simply to make the people understand and realize the need to conserve energy.

Another action by our government is the 10 per cent reduction in the use of oil for home and commercial building heating in Canada, to be replaced by natural gas. These are actions by our government, and in order to explain briefly that such a six to eight-year figure for oil reserves is wrong, our actions in that area must be considered.

This leads me to refer to our natural gas reserves. We know they are important to our energy potential, but we also know that in the late fifties and the early sixties demand for natural gas was not very high. However, a much steeper price increase for oil than gas resulted in significantly higher volumes of natural gas consumption, which experienced a threefold increase between 1962 and 1972. The consumption increase was nearly 12 per cent per year, and the over-all natural gas consumption doubled. Up to 1970, new discoveries more than offset annual production rates, that went from some 35 billion cubic feet in 1962 to nearly 57 billion in 1970. However, at the end of 1974, proven reserves remaining in Alberta and the area were estimated at some 57 billion cubic feet.

However, to continue to maintain the price of natural gas as it was would have greatly hindered discoveries in that sector. This is why our government has stated on several occasions that it would like to increase the price of natural gas. Such a policy has promoted prospecting for natural gas so that in 1979 our known reserves amounted to 80.4 billion cubic feet, good for 52 years. Our reserves also figured out in 1979 were 260 billion cubic feet, enough for 179 years. It therefore means, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government has assumed its responsibilities in the field of natural gas, so that our dependency especially on oil is likely to be reduced. The great efforts that we will be making in the years to come in that area, as the minister said this afternoon, will enable us to reach that self-sufficiency which we seek and all want.

Mr. Speaker, I would like finally to point out another very important fact in the field of natural gas, that is its anti-pollution effect in the sectors where it is used. It is evident that hardly any pollution can be traced to natural gas.

When it comes to regions such as Gaspé and eastern Canada where fishing is a very important and almost vital activity for the people, the use of natural gas will have a definite impact on this area. When we come to the issue of acid rain and consider all the resulting problems in that area, we must make an enormous effort so that natural gas, this natural energy product which does not produce much pollution, be accepted in this country. This is why, Mr. Speaker, our government is taking its responsibilities and we hope that in the forthcoming years the use of natural gas will have increased considerably, especially in eastern Canada.

[English]

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, even a brief review of the energy and industrial opportunities awaiting this country will impress anyone with the folly of failing to produce a national policy to match our Canadian economy. Month after wearying month has gone by while this government sits in thumb-twiddling repose contemplating its constitutional navel.

Is there not one of the members opposite, one of true vision and sincerity who will admit that the strength of a country is derived of substance, of things, of the industrial and social facts of its economy? Perhaps it is the Liberal philosophy to erect a facade of grand and lofty constitutional rhetoric to the world to cover the crumbling ruin of the building it hides. Perhaps it cares more for developing its advertising technique to create false hope than it does to developing the tar sands to create genuine hope.

I am sure the huge irony of the Liberals having watched five increases in the price of gasoline since they came to power on a promise of keeping prices down has not been lost on all Canadians, whether they live in the west, central or eastern regions of this country.

The Liberal demi-gods have been presiding over one of the most divisive rifts between the provinces and the federal government this country has ever seen. Hostilities between different parts of the country have been fostered, encouraged and even initiated. These animosities between the people of Canada need not exist. I can assure this House, and my colleagues from western Canada will bear me out, that there exists an interdependence and a mutual feeling of co-operation between all working people and their families right across the land. There is nothing that unites these people of Canada more than their frustration with the absolute lack of initiatives in the field of energy development on the part of the Liberal government.

Certainly, the people of my own riding of Peterborough and all those who live in the industrial heartland of Ontario, can see very clearly that what is good for the producing provinces is very good for the so-called consuming provinces. For they do not just "consume", they are not just ravenous non-producers wanting a free ride from Alberta; they work, they produce, they conserve, and ultimately they will help move this nation towards a fine and truly national balance of equalization.

The government might also care to ask an Ontario worker whether he would care to choose between losing his job because of lost orders to his firm, or paying a few more cents at the gas pump on his way home from work? I know that the workers at one Dundas area company, for example, who made the bucket wheel reclaimers for the Syncrude plant, are all for Alberta's oil industry getting the green light on revenue infusion for capital investment. That is the only way to keep their orders coming. I am sure these workers would rather not sit at home and debate the merits of section 42. I am sure, too, that they would rather see geese over the end of their shotguns on well-deserved hunting weekends than watch them flap over their TV screens in slow motion.

In my own riding of Peterborough, that city's major industry, the Canadian General Electric plant, depends very heavily on our indigenous energy package. I spoke the other day to a representative of the CGE plant, which employs 4,800 people. He told me that "any expansion in any area where electricity is involved will benefit us". "Our whole market," he said, "is based on the expansion of industry, and the more developments and capital investment projects, the better it is from our point of view".

How is this electricity produced in Ontario? Some 45 per cent of Ontario's total energy requirement is based on oil. Canadian General Electric at Peterborough, for example, can produce pump motors, industrial controls, wire and cable for the resource exploration and development market. This is what is really meant by Ontarians being Canadian; a two-way railroad of goods, services and capital between the west and all parts of Canada. It is not the bird's-eye view gained from the Liberal dirigible gliding through the constitutional clouds.

I must impress upon the government and upon the people of Canada that holding up the development of the oil industry in Alberta or indeed in Newfoundland or anywhere in Canada where oil may be found, is holding up industrial development and economic security for the whole nation, and that is very clear. Second, how can we dispel the horrible misconception throughout the country, especially in central Canada, that the most important thing, the one paramount element in this whole mess, is the cost of a litre of gas for the family wagon or, in Mr. Trudeau's case, a tankful for the Mercedes?

The consumer is already paying a fair portion of the true price, the price that should be displayed on the pumps anyway, through the massive $1.5 billion subsidy payments in 1980 alone, and this because of lack of honesty and sincerity. This amount has to be paid on oil imported from offshore to supply Canada east of Ottawa. As the Ottawa Citizen noted on September 29:

> If the world price keeps rising and Canadian prices are kept artificially low, the cost of the federal oil subsidy, currently $3.5 billion, will keep rising. so will the federal deficit.

Why not pay what we are paying anyway directly at the pumps, approach the world oil price, attract back expansion and exploration capital, achieve our goal of self-sufficiency in the 1990s, and at the same time protect our jobs and industries in central Canada? As the west and east expand so does central Canada, and as they wither in the west and east so does central Canada.

The production manager of Mobil Oil of Canada recently told delegates to a Halifax mining conference that markets will have to be developed in Quebec and Ontario once offshore gas comes into production. The maritimes have offshore natural gas coming into production. Ontario can supply only .2 per cent of her total energy requirements from her own gas sources.

Premier Bill Davis of Ontario is quoted in The Globe and Mail as saying the Ontario government must "actively advance the interests of the people of Ontario." Is it not apparent to everyone in this House that while doing this in Ontario we are advancing the interests of the people of the maritimes? Co-operation, not confrontation over resources, is what the federal government needs to achieve.

Gulf Canada filed a brief with the National Energy Board a short time ago stating that "Canada has only a remote chance of becoming independent of imported oil" in the 1990s. Gulf Oil stated that if appropriate government policy decisions are not made soon, Canada will need to import up to 500,000 barrels per day throughout the 1990s and the cost of these imports could be $15 billion a year.

Of imported oil, Imperial Oil said in its brief to the National Energy Board that:

—continuation of today's uncertain investment environment relative to energy pricing, revenue sharing and the regulatory system will mean that investments will not be made to achieve self-sufficiency.

I have been in touch with Imperial and have discussed the critical nature of this situation in very real and human terms as well as harsh financial ones. The Cold Lake project alone, for example, is accounting for $10 million a month in running, development and support costs. Imperial reckons that this can continue at the outside for only four months under present Liberal government policy. When that time runs out, all the skilled labour and technical research staff will leave Canada to be flung over all parts and corners of the world, wherever there is a climate of expansion and co-operation.

Turning once again for a moment to Ontario, the area which possibly has the most to gain or the most to lose in the long term in this whole question, I doubt if there is one industry or service in Ontario that is not affected by the oil industry. Non-residential construction, for example, accounts for about one-tenth of Canada's gross national product and is one of the few areas of growth anticipated in the 1981 economy. As the vice-president for Stelco of Hamilton said in Toronto the other day, as reported in The Globe and Mail:

"For this growth to happen, governments must allow the price of Canadian oil to approach world levels and remove the many regulatory roadblocks to petroleum and natural gas development".

The people of Ontario and all people of Canada are anxiously awaiting the forthcoming budget which they hope will restore national confidence, national will and true national pride in the opportunities that await them. The president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada said recently:

Lack of consumer confidence is our main concern and the forthcoming budget can be a very important element in restoring confidence.

Uncertainty about our national energy goals cannot continue. As the Alberta chamber of commerce recently pointed out, Shell's Alsands project alone will inject 23.5 billion into Canada's gross national product; 6.2 billion of that would accrue directly to Ontario. The impact of the Alsands project alone on Ontario industry is enough to dispel the suspicious doubts about provincial motives on the part of any Canadian in central Canada. For example, $800 million would go to the iron and steel industry in Hamilton and other places; $370 million would go to metal fabrication and machinery in Toronto; $740 million would go to manufacturing and processing; $325 million would go to transportation equipment in Ontario; $370 million would go to finance industries; $750 million would go to trade and services, and so on. Naturally this massive infusion would spill over into other areas of the economy and stimulate consumer spending.

We do not even dream at the moment of a producing well that might be found somewhere under the 5.1 million acres presently under exploration in Hudson Bay whose coastline is shared by Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. That would make some provincial governments dance to a much different tune.

I need not tell anyone in this House that Canada possesses enormous potential for the development of all her energy sources, particularly gas and oil. It cannot be reiterated often enough that Canada's industries, particularly those in central Canada, are ready and willing to move ahead. High inflation, unemployment, a massive trade deficit, and a national debt which now exceeds $100 billion demand action by this government. They demand more than the sanctimonious, highfalutin camouflage which this government presently is indulging in. This tries the patience of the country and it tries the patience of members of this House, and I can tell you that our growing dependence on foreign oil is far more humiliating than the alleged humiliation we suffered on the few occasions—very few occasions—when this country has had to involve Westminster in the last century.

It is humiliating for a forward-looking country to be the highest per capita consumer of gasoline when all other countries in the western world are making conservation a national priority.

The previous Conservative government had the courage and the vision to put forward a budget which sought to confront the trauma which is felt when habits and lifestyles of individuals are changed in a very visible but ultimately not very significant area, at the gas pumps. The Liberals took advantage of this momentary trauma and exploited the immediate fears of Canadians by pretending that their long-term ones did not exist. As the budget last December stated, low prices have led to excessive consumption, and Canadians pay proportionately less now for gasoline than they did 25 years ago. Consumption of gasoline over the first nine months of 1979 was up 4.3 per cent and down by 4 per cent in the United States.

The Crosbie budget also stated that the oil and gas industry, and I quote:

—would receive $33 billion net of all production costs and taxes. The funds flowing to the industry should be ample to support all needed new energy investments. If this does not turn out to be the case, adjustments will be made to ensure sufficient cash flow to the industry for all needed energy projects.

This was a position which I submit coincides very well with what the oil and gas industry and all the other related industries across Canada are asking for today, and would have been given if the Liberals had not landed this red herring of gas prices hook, line and sinker.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise and comment on the ludicrous motion of the opposition in this House. Hon. members opposite are clearly out of touch. Nothing could be further from the truth than their conventions.

I have not yet heard about the subject of coal. The Canadian government is actively seeking solutions to the very many important problems we face in terms of energy security and consequent economic revitalization. My colleagues have referred to aspects of our energy policy upon which I shall not dwell at this time. I would, however, like to take this opportunity to outline to this House and to the Canadian people the very positive steps taken by the government in the past several years in an effort to stimulate the Canadian coal industry and, in doing so, assist us in our commitment to energy self-sufficiency.

Coal, once out of favour, is now a born-again fuel. After years of relative neglect in the energy industry coal has emerged as a much needed alternative fuel. Spurred on by the dramatic price increases of OPEC, the development of coal resources has taken on renewed urgency. And Canada has large resources of coal. Measured resources are estimated to amount to some 50 billion tons of all types.

However, in 1979 coal contributed only 9.3 per cent of Canada's primary energy supply. Canadian coal production last year amounted to 33 million tons, yet Canada remained a net importer. This situation will likely reverse itself as early as 1982 or 1983 due to the expected increase in demand for Canadian thermal coal on both the domestic and export markets. However, Canada has been a net exporter of metallurgical coal for a number of years, and it is worthy of note that Canada exports a higher percentage of its coal production than does any other country—indeed, 45 per cent in 1978.

Currently, coal is used for two major purposes in Canada. About 75 per cent of the coal consumed is used to produce electricity, and the remaining 25 per cent is used in the steel industry to produce coke, the necessary fuel of the blast furnaces. There is now no doubt that the importance of coal in the Canadian energy economy will continue to grow in the next decade and that by the year 2000 production will exceed the current level by three to five times.

The Canadian coal industry is primarily divided geographically into two sectors, one operating in western Canada and the other operating in the Atlantic provinces. The government has been active recently in both areas. In the western region we have taken a leading role in the development of the northeastern British Columbia coal deposits. We have committed ourselves to the Roberts Bank expansion in co-operation with the provincial government, and dredging work will begin in 1981. The Ridley Island terminal has been identified as an integral part of the future development of the northeastern British Columbia reserves, and we are ready to play our part. Railway line expansion, upgrading and construction will play an important part in this development.

On the east coast, in Atlantic Canada, the government has been working through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in an effort to identify methods by which the viability of the Cape Breton coal industry may be revitalized. The Cape Breton Development Corporation should be commended for its efforts in working closely with DREE on this matter. The Elfstrom report into the accident at No. 26 colliery is presently under consideration, and the recommendations of the commission have been accepted by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) and are currently under active review.

Further to that, I am pleased to tell the House that I am currently participating in and, indeed, encouraging the establishment of a research centre in Cape Breton as a direct result of the Elfstrom recommendations. Clearly, we have been responsive and active in both areas.

My department has been especially active in the development and encouragement of coal as an alternate energy source. Significant new opportunities exist to increase the use of coal in the Canadian energy economy in addition to the present electrical and metallurgical markets. This will be of special benefit to Atlantic Canada and, as this House is aware from previous policy pronouncements of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the federal government is prepared to assume a large proportion of the technical risk in the introduction of new technologies—indeed, up to the point of commercial use.

There are presently two new technologies of interest for which we are financing research and development initiatives in the near term. They are fluidized bed combustion and coal in oil combustion.

The fluidized bed combustion process offers an improved way of burning coal for utility, industrial and institutional needs. This technology permits the burning of a wide range of coals in the same equipment—including the combustion of colliery wastes—and at the same time makes possible a significant reduction in the release of sulphur dioxide through the addition of control agents such as limestone to the combustion bed. Studies are currently under way to introduce this technology to allow the better use of the higher sulphur coals of eastern Canada.

In co-operation with the Department of National Defence I am sure the House will be happy to know that we are planning the replacement of a plant heating unit at the armed forces base at Summerside, Prince Edward Island, with fluidized bed combustion technology. We believe this technology will allow the use of the higher sulphur Cape Breton coals in an environmentally acceptable way.

The new unit will also use wood chips, to take advantage of the forest resources of the island not now being worked to their full potential. Canadian process design teams are involved and equipment will be manufactured in Canada. Current expenditures for this project are in the neighbourhood of $11 million.

The development of coal in oil combustion technology allows the use of coal in facilities originally designed to burn oil only. While this possibility has been known for many years, a number of technical problems have yet to be resolved to allow widespread use of this technique, and these are being addressed in Canada and elsewhere. The Canadian coal in oil combustion trials have been undertaken in co-operation with the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission, and combustion studies are under way in the ten megawatt facility of the commission at Chatham, New Brunswick. This particular investigation has been directed to the possible use of the limited quantities of very high sulphur coals produced in that province. A new process developed by the National Research Council known as the spherical agglomeration process has been incorporated into the preparation system. This process has the unique capability of using the oil itself as a mechanism by which sulphur-bearing impurities in the coal may be rejected. Another possibility for Canadian coal currently under investigation is its suitability for use in the tar sands heavy oil projects as the make-up fuel to supply the necessary steam.

One matter of primary consideration, of course, is the manufacture of synthetic fuel from coal. The coal liquefaction option for Canada will be determined in part by international and domestic developments in the field of synthetic fuels production technologies. While the process has been known for some time, its economic viability is still in question. This brings me to the subject of CANMET.

I am surprised members of the House are unaware of the research work being conducted in Ottawa by the research division of my department. Early in the spring I invited every member of the House to visit the CANMET research centre. I believe only a handful showed up including, I think, just one member of the official opposition. If members had visited us at CANMET, they would have learned of the extensive work being carried out in that department, work which is essential and which has proved that we in Canada can encourage and enter into many programs which will be economically viable.

CANMET is actively pursuing a variety of research projects. We are continuing research into coal liquefaction and gasification. These research projects are being conducted here and across the country as well, particularly in Alberta. Research into clean-burning coal is very important to Canada because our coal, like all coal, has very specific characteristics and qualities that must be considered. In fact, we know definitely that coal from the east coast has a higher methane content and is therefore combustible in that area, while the metallurgical coal of the west coast is highly combustible but offers fewer methane problems. We must develop the specific technology for our Canadian coal.

I am very proud to say this has been done in a great spirit of co-operation with the provinces, particularly with the province of Alberta. CANMET has been working with Alberta in coal research for some time through the Alberta-Canada Energy Resources Research Fund where moneys are being made available for the development of a major coal mining research centre in Edmonton. Also, moneys are provided through this fund for construction of the Energy Resources Building adjacent to the University of Calgary campus and for the Energy Resources Research Building in Devon. I am sure most of the members from that area are aware of these projects.

Under the Canadian coal conversion program the federal government shares the cost on a 50-50 basis with other funding bodies. I have referred to programs financed under this program already, but they are categorized under a multitude of headings, which I would encourage members to read and discover—economics, exploration, strata mechanics, mining methods, underground environment, equipment safety, coal preparation, carbonization, combustion, gasification, liquefaction, coal slurry transportation and environmental aspects. All this work is being conducted here in Canada.

Also, I would urge members of the House to read the book entitled: "Coal—Bridge to the Near Future". In it, coal experts from this country and indeed from my department have offered much-needed advice which has been heeded by many experts in the world. We have been declared to be one of the foremost countries in the development of coal. It is a very interesting book and I would urge all members to look into it, particularly the role Canada must play.

Canada has participated in the world coal study and was party to the conclusions which the study outlined in relation to the world coal system. Incidentally there are a number of projects under way which we would be very happy to describe. The document entitled: "The Current Coal Research and Development Projects in Canada" published recently by my department would bring members up to date on just what is happening in coal.

The conclusions of the world coal study are quite interesting. Perhaps I have time to go into seven of its recommendations. Coal is capable of supplying a high proportion of future energy needs. It now supplies more than 25 per cent of the world's energy. Economically recoverable reserves are very large—many, many times those of oil and gas—and capable of meeting increasing demands well into the future. The coal study went on to indicate that coal will have to supply between one-half and two-thirds of the additional energy needed by the world during the next 20 years, even under the moderate energy growth assumptions of the study. To achieve this goal, world coal production will have to increase 2.5 to three times and the world trade in steam coal will have to grow ten to 15 times above 1979 levels. Many individual decisions must be made along the chain from coal producer to consumer to ensure the required amounts are available when needed. Delays at any point affect the entire chain. This emphasizes the need for prompt and related actions by consumers, producers, governments and other public authorities. It is interesting to note that coal can be mined, moved and used in most areas in ways that conform to high standards of health, safety and environmental protection by the application of available technology and without unacceptable increases in cost. The present knowledge of possible carbon dioxide effects on the climate does not justify delaying the expansion of coal use.

Coal is already competitive in many locations for the generation of electricity and for many industrial and other uses. It will extend further into these and other markets as oil prices rise. The technology for mining, moving and using coal is well established and steadily improving. Technological advances in combustion, gasification and liquefaction will greatly widen the scope for the environmentally acceptable use of coal in the 1990s and beyond. Finally, the conclusions of the world study indicate that the amount of capital required to expand the production, transport and user facilities to triple the use of coal is within the capacity of domestic and international capital markets, though difficulties in financing large coal projects in some developing countries may require special solutions. Of course the protection of the environment remains one of the primary considerations in any decision to go ahead with large-scale coal development and use. The problem of acid rain can be met through the application of methods now becoming available to limit the release of sulphur and nitrogen compounds. The technology exists.

In co-operation with the provinces interested in coal, we are negotiating an improved agreement on coal technology with the United States department of energy. The Government of Canada was a party to the "Principles for Global Action re: Coal" adopted by the governing board of the International Energy Agency in 1979. It is heartening to the government that our support of these principles was, in the words of the Coal Association of Canada, "adequately representative of the views of the association", and as such they adopted them as a statement of their own policy. So, reality is far removed from the substance of tonight's motion.

In closing I should like to mention that my department is seeking ways to stimulate the educational institutions of this land so that they might begin again to produce qualified Canadians in the very important field of coal mining engineering. Last Friday I participated in a seminar where it was brought out that there are no real coal engineering schools in existence in this country; if we need a real coal expert we have to go to England or the United States, and if we want to train some of our mining engineers specifically in the field of coal we must send them offshore. I think this is a shame. Canada produces many hard-rock miners, but unfortunately there are major differences in both mining technology and in safety considerations when one enters a coal mine. I would hope that through our research station plant in the Cape Breton area we would develop some sort of training at the higher level, as well as at the mining level, for those in the trades. We have relied on foreign expertise for the most part in this field but clearly the future trend now suggests our emphasis in this area must change and our universities must meet the challenge, as I am confident they will.

In the near future—not later than the mid-1980s—a comprehensive international market for coal will be operating. The maturing of the international market for energy coal will yield a new international energy reference price. How Canada chooses to react as a supplier in this emerging international market will have important implications for the stability of that market and important implication for the resilience and depth of Canada's own energy supply capabilities. The Canadian government has not and will not abdicate its responsibility to take a leading role.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills rises on a point of order. I might point out that the time of the hon. minister has almost expired and there are many other members wishing to be recognized.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister knows that in Lethbridge-Foothills Petro-Canada is developing a test mine in coal. We have millions of tons of low sulphur coal. My question, which I wonder whether she would consider answering, is: what is the minister and her department doing to encourage the Ontario government, which presently imports over 20 million tons of high sulphur coal from the United States, to switch that to importing low sulphur, Alberta coal, something which would provide part of the answer to our trade balance deficit, as well as to the acid rain situation?

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that Ontario, indeed, has been discovering its own coal and that at the present time our own CANMET is co-operating with the Onakawana Company to investigate the possibility of an electrical generating plant very close to the source. They will probably be operating within five years.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, one is tempted in the course of a debate on energy policy in general, especially speaking at the end of the day as I do, to take time to refute many of the things that have been said over the course of the debate, particularly by members on the government side.

Perhaps all I will do in commenting on the debate thus far is to congratulate the government on a well-arrayed barrage of papers prepared by the civil service, by the officials in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for the various Liberal members who have spoken today. It has been a fine display of how the bureaucracy runs the government in this country.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) mentioned earlier this afternoon, we thought it appropriate in a debate on energy that a particular topic which has not received very much attention in this House be at least brought up during the course of the debate today. My responsibility is to say a few words about the whole question of nuclear power. In my view, any debate on energy policy would have a fatal flaw in it if it were not to take into account the reality of nuclear power and the difficulty of the questions which that particular source of energy raises for us. I find this to be a topic which is often left out of energy discussions, almost as if it is something one does not mention. We talk about off-oil policies, for instance, but we act as if everyone knows what we mean by 'switching to other sources'. We do not really want to talk about it. The words "nuclear power" almost carry, the same stigma as cancer had 20 years ago. It is almost unmentionable.

Today we want to mention it within the context of the obvious commitment of this government to nuclear power as an integral part of the energy strategy for Canada. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren), with whom I have debated in the past, particularly over the experimental vault which they are using to study the effect of long-term radioactive waste disposal in Lac du Bonnet gave on the late show one night what I considered to be a most uncritical description of the role of nuclear power in Canada. It was really disgraceful to hear a member of the government coming out with such a naive innocent view of nuclear power. He did not even acknowledge there were any serious questions attending the subject of nuclear power. I think that is bad.

My contention this evening is that nuclear power should be the subject in this country of a genuine political debate. It is too important an issue to be pursued uncritically by this or any other government, dependent upon the advice and, more important, the world view of the people who are involved in the nuclear industry. Nuclear power is not just a technical question, it involves a way of seeing the world and understanding how we want to move into the future. Topics of these kinds are appropriate subjects for political debate and this is what I wish to suggest this evening to the House of Commons. If we want to do our job properly, and if the government wants to enable us to do it properly, then somehow, in some context, the subject of nuclear power should come before the House for open and intelligent debate.

My colleagues to the right, the Progressive Conservatives, when they were in power were willing to hold a parliamentary inquiry. We would prefer a public inquiry—a much larger exercise into the whole question of nuclear power—but at least, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said earlier, they were willing to acknowledge that there was dissension and concern about this particular subject. I give them credit for that. It may have been the case—as I suspected at the time—that the committee would have been force-fed with documents from Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. It would not really have come to any startling conclusions, but nevertheless there was the acknowledgment there of the issue.

We in the NDP are in favour of a moratorium on the construction of further nuclear reactors until such time as a real debate can take place. We feel that without such a debate the Canadian people will be led down a particular energy path they would not wish to follow if they had the opportunity to really think about the matter in any great depth. I prefer—and as an individual member of Parliament I will have a private member's bill coming before the House to this effect—that we have a referendum on the use of nuclear power. At least if there were a referendum there would be a conscious choice to be made. The Canadian people would have the opportunity to choose whether or not they wish to have a nuclear future. I know the subject of referenda is quite controversial these days, but I nevertheless personally support such a course in this case.

In the debate on metrication in this House, I said that one of the things which needed to happen if politics was to continue to be an alive and vital process in this country, was that the parameters of political debate needed to be expanded; more and more of the decisions which have traditionally been made by the bureaucracy have to be brought into the political process. If people are to continue to have a feeling that political processes matter, if they are to continue to feel that this House of Commons matters—if, indeed, they still feel that—then the parameters of political debate have to be enlarged. This is part of the general malaise which besets us—the parameters are so small that people feel that too much happens automatically without any real debate. This may be the fault of the people as well. However, it is also because they are being falsely comforted on issues such as energy. For instance, in the area of energy, they are being falsely comforted by the advertising campaign of the government, by assurances that we have what it takes, that it is just a matter of relying on the structures, the values and the goals that we have now and our energy needs will be looked after with no problem at all.

Why then is nuclear power such an important question? Why should it be set aside as different from other energy decisions for a specific debate, a debate which might take the form of a moratorium—followed by a decision-making process such as a referendum or perhaps merely a decision of this House or some other process? Actually, nuclear energy is not all that different from any other form of energy in the sense that all energy decisions involve the kind of moral and political decisions which we contend are involved in this issue.

Nuclear power, like any other energy form, cannot and must not be discussed only within a technical framework. The minute we begin to do this we narrow the scope of the discussion and in doing so we miss many of the important points which must be taken into consideration. The form of energy we use determines many aspects of our life, from our relationship to others to our relationship to the environment, our relationship to the future.

In terms of our relationship with others, for instance, and its effect on the structure of our society, nuclear power is a highly centralized form of energy which creates dependence and destroys the self-reliance of communities and regions. Nuclear energy creates the need for security to protect the installations from, for example, the theft of radioactive material. Nuclear energy involves a highly technical and capital-intensive infrastructure in order to maintain and operate the system, not to mention all the other hidden costs into which any inquiry should look. On these grounds alone we need to debate the topic of nuclear power.

Nuclear power has many effects on our relationship to the environment. There are many concerns about its effect on, for example, uranium miners, which in the end may be the most important environmental consideration of the whole question of nuclear energy. There is the effect on the environment as such, particularly in the area of the long term and unsolved problem of how to dispose of radioactive waste. This long-term problem of the potential of this waste material for contaminating ground water, for example, is what distinguishes nuclear energy from other forms of energy. And it is the long-term risk which makes it the appropriate object of a special political debate, and that is what I am calling for tonight. It is dishonesty on the part of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Ontario Hydro or anyone else to suggest otherwise and to trivialize the qualitative difference between the risk involved in nuclear power and the risk involved in other forms of energy. It is that long-term uncertainty which must be taken into consideration.

This brings me to the third point which I raised about the way in which energy forms affect our relationships, and that is with regard to the future. Nuclear power affects our future through long-term uncertainties which cannot be allayed by any false faith in science and technology. God knows, they have gotten us into enough trouble already. So, as in the case of other energy forms, the decisions we make have an effect on our future. Our decision to use up all the conventional oil reserves uncritically and foolishly for no better reason than to adopt a way of life that cannot be sustained and will eventually have to be abandoned was a decision which affected our future. It means now that the people in the future will not have the petroleum resources they may need in order to manufacture plastic goods essential for medical technology or the fuels which are necessary to agriculture for the production of food.

All these energy decisions which we made in the past have affected the future, and nuclear power will be no different except, and here again I want to make the point about the qualitative difference, that there is an irretrievability about the effects of nuclear power which makes it different from other forms of resource depletion or pollution. The half-life of many of the substances about which we are talking is beyond our ability to guarantee structures that will enable us to deal with the risk inherent in their exploitation.

This leads me to say that the government has a responsibility to provide the context for a conscious political choice on the part of Canadians so that they may decide what they really want, what kind of society they want to live in, whether they want the kind of society which nuclear power implies, whether they want the highly centralized, capital intensive, etc, kind of society which is involved, whether, indeed, they want to take those kinds of risks with regard to the environment and the future. These are the topics which I think the Canadian people should be given a chance to debate openly, without feeling that the nuclear power program of this country seems to be going on inevitably in any case, and perhaps we should set aside time for debate in Parliament even though it seems we have already decided. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in response to a question by me some time ago that we are either in the game or out of the game. The government is obviously in the game.

I contend that this decision should not have been made without the appropriate political debate. We call on the government at this time for an opportunity to debate this topic. Having the opportunity of choice is particularly important to Canadians because we do not need nuclear power. We are not in the position of a Third World country which has its back to the wall in the area of energy and is in a moral dilemma and must make the decision between all the moral and environmental implications of nuclear power and whether or not they will have enough energy to bring up the standard of living for their people to the barest minimum. That is not the position in which we find ourselves.

Canadians have other choices. If half of the money invested in nuclear power were invested in renewable energy resources and other alternative energy resources which are more environmentally responsible, then perhaps we would not need this debate at all. We in the NDP are ready for this debate, but that is not to say we are unanimous in our position.

The question of nuclear power crosses ideological boundaries. There is debate within our party on nuclear power with regard to, for example, the policies of the government of Saskatchewan vis-à-vis uranium mining in the north of that province. We are not afraid to admit that this topic is the subject of debate within our own ranks. I personally am proud to stand up and say that within the New Democratic Party of Canada the subject of nuclear power is taken seriously enough that we are divided on it, that we debate it and that it is still a matter of conscientious debate when it comes up on the convention floor.

We are not a bunch of uncritical sheep like the other parties, both of which would in the final analysis allow Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Ontario Hydro to go on completely unchallenged, and I have no hesitation in saying that.

Mr. Paproski: Broadbent has a divided party.

Mr. Blaikie: I encourage the government to create the environment for the kind of healthy, political and philosophical debate on nuclear power that we in our party have had up until now and no doubt will continue to have.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my comments today are motivated by both a specific concern for 33 people and a general concern which I am sure is shared by all members of this House for the health of a Canadian economy.

There is a company in my riding called Fahramet Limited and it is a Canadian company. It has four plants in Orillia, Ontario. It is a high alloy steel foundry employing a wide variety of production methods. It manufactures heat corrosion abrasive resistant castings, items which are used in the petrochemical industry. It recently opened a $4.3 million extension and at that opening I discussed the company's prospects with the general manager. He told me he was proud of his company's ability to produce its products, and that it had the people and the equipment to handle far more orders than the current demand. He said it wanted to increase its share of the petrochemical industry and get into the business of supplying equipment to drilling rigs. He said that drilling is on the decline in Alberta, however, and that the prospects are it will decline even more in the future. This means less demand for pipe for steel castings. Last week the company laid off 33 men in my riding.

I believe very strongly, Mr. Speaker, that if we were to treat the energy situation as an opportunity rather than a problem, those 33 men would still be working or would not have as much difficulty as they are presently finding in getting a job.

I welcome the opportunity to intervene in this debate. In my opinion the discussions in this House, in the media and indeed, across the country, have focused for far too long on the benefits that natural gas and crude oil bring to the place in which they are found. For far too long the focus has been on price; the time has come to focus on what those natural resources can do for the country as a whole.

As Canadians, we have been too narrow in our viewpoint. We have lost sight of the tremendous benefits that these resources could bring to Canada. We have failed to put them to work for Canada.

Crude oil and natural gas were originally found in Ontario. Shortly after World War II, far richer and more vast quantities were found in the west. The expansion of the drilling industry, the pipeline industry and the oil industry in the west is a success story of which every Canadian is proud. It has raised the sights of everyone in the west. There is a sense of pride and vision there which excites everyone who goes to the west.

Canadian technology, ingenuity and resourcefulness have enabled us to find further reserves in the Arctic and off the shores of Newfoundland. Despite the wide geographical sweep of the finds of natural gas and crude oil, the Liberal government remains narrow and unimaginative about the development of these resources. We have the necessary ingenuity and resourcefulness in the field but the bureaucrats in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources certainly do not share these qualities.

Because the government has no energy policy, every Canadian is suffering; every province is suffering. I do not mean because of price and I do not mean because of supply. I mean from good old opportunities lost. Those are opportunities which exist in the production and refining industries, opportunities which exist in the manufacturing industries that use crude oil derivatives as a raw product and opportunities which exist in the various product and service industries which bring these megaprojects on stream.

This government has failed to reach a fair domestic price agreement with the producing provinces. As a result, the Alsands projects have cancelled the $50 million winter works program and suspended its 1981 budget. The Cold Lake project is still on schedule but could be cancelled if there is no agreement.

What do these tar sands projects mean to Canada, Mr. Speaker? If a tar sands project is delayed one year it means one more year of foreign imports of 140,000 barrels per day at a cost of $1.9 billion; it means inflation would add $700 million; it means 8,500 direct and indirect jobs will not come on stream. One tar sands plant, Mr. Speaker, creates an annual average of 11,500 jobs.

My colleague, the hon. member for Peterborough, (Mr. Domm) told the House what the $6.2 billion which would be spent in Ontario would do for the economy if the Liberal government concluded an agreement. Household income in Ontario would be increased by $1.8 billion. Ontario is the industrial heartland of Canada and wants to participate in these opportunities. Ontario wants some more of the $738 million that was spent on the Syncrude oil sands plant. We know large sums will be spent in Ontario because it produces the necessary products.

I suggest that the next time the government brings in an energy policy, the next time an oil sands plant is brought on stream, it examines the amount of Canadian content in those projects. As the member for Simcoe North I do not want to see reformer tubes brought from the United Kingdom through a subsidiary company; I do not want the Celanese company bringing them in through the United States through a subsidiary, Mr. Speaker. I want to see them produced in my riding.

The lack of action on the part of the government boggles the mind, Mr. Speaker. I am not an expert on crude oil or energy but I am fortunate inasmuch as 21 members of our caucus are experts. The problem is that these people from Alberta are shy and retiring; they will not tell us what the deal is and we have to read about it. When I do read about it, I find that the drilling companies are going elsewhere. They cannot get $40 per barrel for their oil so they will not drill here. Can they be blamed?

I see the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has come in, Mr. Speaker and this will be of interest to him. Are we going to repeat the tragedy of our research and development program? Over the years there has been a decline in the share of the gross national product which is spent on research and development. At one time our aerospace industry led the world. We produced water bombers, small jets, research rockets and sophisticated communications systems.

Where has the Liberal government concentrated its efforts, however? On the car industry, Mr. Speaker. Loans to have been guaranteed to Chrysler—a company which got into difficulties because it produced a car which was too big. What did this government do? It bailed them out. Next, it gave $60 million to Michelin so that it could produce tires in Nova Scotia where it had not produced them before. This defeated the Ontario tire industry. The government has completely ignored the consumer, claiming it must protect the textile industry in the province to the east of us.

The government is completely ignoring what could be in the energy situation but this is not surprising when we consider who represents the industrial heartland of the country in the cabinet. As far as the three musketeers from Windsor are concerned, if a product does not have wheels it is not a manufactured product. The minister from the steel city travels around the country. The minister from Toronto, the heartland of manufacturing, travels the country and goes to see the Queen. The other minister is in charge of propaganda. Of course, he is very busy with the advertising campaigns for legislation which is before the House. We must give him full credit for that.

Ontario does not want a handout, Mr. Speaker. It wants an energy policy which will help Canada realize the opportunities which exist. It is shortsighted to view the present situation as a crisis for consumers; it is a crisis for the worker. Jobs are being lost at great cost to the Canadian consumer at this moment. It is small comfort to have cheaper gas if you do not have a job and cannot afford a car. We need jobs to produce the money with which people can buy the gas.

Hon. members opposite did not ignore the energy situation in the past. On October 10, last year, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was very loquacious and suggested that this party did not have a policy. He said we were offering lame excuses. He complained that Canadians wanted to know where we stood on the question of energy prices. "Where does the government stand?" he asked. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) who was in the House until a moment ago said the government had had five months in which to establish its energy policy. Mr. Speaker, the present government has been in office eight months and it still does not have a policy. I should like to know where it is.

In the Speech from the Throne the following passage appeared:

> My government's energy policy is critical to the success of all its economic policies. Energy policy is as important for Canada in the 1980s as railway policy was in the 1880s. Like railway policy in that earlier era, energy development has the potential to create growth and prosperity across Canada.

I agree, Mr. Speaker—but now, not some time in the future. That is what they said. They indicated the country would be presented with an opportunity rather than a crisis and promised they would do something about energy. Then what happened? People know that railways have tunnels. This government has tunnel vision when it comes to energy. We were told we would have a made-in-Canada price. That is a terrific idea they said. Also, that we would shut our eyes to market prices and have a made-in-Canada price. They just wanted the industry to agree that this was a good idea. One hundred dollars invested in the United States returns a fair profit to everyone involved, but with $100 invested here no one knows where they stand.

• (2130)

The Speech from the Throne went on to say that the government is vigorously pursuing a policy consistent with its energy policy commitment. Where is that vigour leading? We have had eight months of vigour and nothing has happened. While this Liberal government fiddles and diddles, at least the Ontario Progressive Conservative government, which some members opposite have been so quick to criticize, is taking action. Last week a plan was announced to invest $165 million in the energy field to encourage conservation and the development of alternative transportation fuel. The development of solar energy would be stimulated and help would be given to local governments to convert heating systems to accept new forms of energy. A lot of things will be done in Ontario. Specifically, what will be done? First, $75 million will be spent. Also, 6,000 man-years of work will be created. That is what we want in Ontario. We do not want any more stalling from this federal government. We want an energy policy. We want work. We do not want handouts. Stuart Smith, the economic genius in Ontario—he has a Ph.D. in something and that makes him a genius—called the policy that of nickels and dimes. If that is a nickels and dimes policy, you Liberals have nothing. I say you do not even have a "cents" policy. The Liberals have done nothing to produce a policy. When will we have one?

An hon. Member: Tomorrow.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member says tomorrow. I heard "a few weeks" mentioned by another member a minute ago. I ask hon. members: is that vigour? Ways in which the insulation program will be improved were talked about in the Speech from the Throne. That was in April. It is now October. Hon. members can tell from my voice that it is cold and that I am getting one. But we are waiting for improvement. I would be glad if I could just get the forms, let alone wait for the program. There are three million housing units in Canada built between 1961 and 1976 that would be eligible. If we had a comprehensive program to provide insulation for those homes or to improve the insulation in them, we would save energy. Home owners would benefit and we would provide work for Canadians in the production and installation of insulation materials. A background paper produced for CMHC as part of the material I have as housing critic indicates that manufacturers of insulation material would consider increasing their capacity if there were a significant increase in demand by the public. We have to understand that we cannot get that capacity increased until we have a program from the Liberal government.

Canadians must begin to understand the benefits which self-sufficiency in crude oil would bring to every one of us. We would be freed of the need to depend on foreign resources and our lack of stability, well known to Canadians because we do not have a plan, would be gone. Moreover, we are presently paying close to $3 billion a year to purchase foreign crude oil and the effect of this on our balance of payments is horrendous. If we were to develop what we have, we could reduce our dependence on foreign oil, we could reduce our deficit, we could reduce our balance of payments problems. Most important of all, we could create an estimated 350,000 jobs for Canadians.

That is the energy situation. That is the energy opportunity. And it is about time we started to treat it as an opportunity and not just as a situation.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to speak this evening on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) relating to energy policy. I was surprised to see the hon. member put forward a motion of this type and I am surprised the official critic is not here to support this motion of the official opposition. Even the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre did not stay around very long after he had made his speech. However, it is rather interesting to note this hon. member alleging there is really a great lack in energy policy when just twelve months ago if we examine the energy policy put forward by the former Progressive Conservative government during the course of their tenure from May 22 to December 13, it was not remarkable for any great amount of policy, as I recall.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

The hon. member for Victoria is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaking just now referred to my seat-mate, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre as leaving shortly after making his speech. The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre had a long-standing commitment in his constituency and he has left for Toronto to fulfil it. I assume there is a similar reason for several other seats in the chamber being vacant.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, if we look back at one of the very first actions taken by the Leader of the Opposition as prime minister a year ago, I believe the day on which his government was sworn into office an announcement was made that the Canadian embassy would be moved from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. We all recall what a fiasco that was and how it poisoned relations with the Arab states from which we get much of our oil. It is rather interesting to note that the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre was the minister of trade at that time, and he spent most of his six or eight months in office trying to rectify the negative impact of that action. If we think of some of the other actions taken by that government during the brief tenure in office, we do not see much energy policy emanating from it. During the 1979 election campaign there was a clear commitment by that government to dispose of Petro-Canada as soon as it came to power. But soon after that, that decision was reversed. As I recall, the plan was to sell part of PetroCan and then to give away part of it or, finally, to sell part of it so some of it could be given away and some could be kept. That national petroleum corporation which is so active in many fields in exploration and in developing transportation systems etc. was thrown into limbo during the course of the nine-month period of the Clark government.

If we look at the budget of December 13, much of it related to energy. But it was rejected first by the House of Commons and then by the country in the general election which ensued. That budget really did not set up much of an energy policy except to raise the price of oil dramatically, both the price per barrel and the excise tax which, I think taken together, amounted to $8 or $10 per barrel equivalent, although most of it was in the excise tax.

If we examine that budget and look at that nine-month period, I ask hon. members where do we see the actual policy statements and policy announcements? Where do we see that interest of the federal government being protected? If we look at the share of benefits we find that over a five-year period I believe it was some $48 billion would go to the producing provinces, some $29 billion to the industry and only $17 billion to the federal government which had the responsibility for the oil compensation program and many other energy initiatives across the country. During that nine month period, not a single major energy project was announced.

However if, we look at some of the Liberal actions during the past four or five years, we see a number of programs relating to energy saving. I think of the Save 10 per cent program. In 1976, the federal government decided to save 10 per cent of its energy needs during the next four years. During the period 1976 to 1980, the consumption of energy by the federal government was reduced by 10 per cent per year. It resulted in a $100 million per year saving in energy costs for the federal government. The government is committed to retaining that 10 per cent reduction during the next ten years in spite of growth in the civil service and government activities. This is a real success story for the federal government. It is a good demonstration for the entire country.

In 1975 the Liberal government set up ten task forces in the major industries of the country. The objective was to reduce the consumption of energy by 12 per cent over the course of five years, 1975 to 1980.

They recently set a new target. During the next five years energy saving is to go from 12 per cent to 23 per cent, an increase of 11 per cent. There are now 15 task forces in the various industrial sectors working to reduce energy consumption in Canadian industry. This is a good example of the federal government and industry co-operating in a voluntary way to save energy and money, and make Canadian industry more competitive and efficient.

There are a number of other areas in which we can make substantial improvements in the conservation of energy. I hope that when the minister announces the full energy policy later this month action will be taken.

The CHIP program should be improved. There should be better inspection. I would like to see mandatory car mileage legislation. This was forecast in the Speech from the Throne. Great pressure should be put on provincial governments to implement the building code recommendations made in 1978, or perhaps something might be done through the mortgage system for which the federal government has a responsibility. There are demonstration houses in various provinces such as Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan, which have a super-energy saving of 70 per cent. We should move toward implementing building codes across the country in co-operation with the provinces to ensure that these savings are effected in the case of new houses. Task forces should be set up in other areas, such as that of commercial buildings. There is an opportunity for tremendous savings there.

This afternoon the minister indicated a number of initiatives which the federal government has already taken, major initiatives in the energy field like the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline the Quebec City pipeline, the increase in the PetroCan budget, solar energy and technology development policy which was recently announced, and an increase in the EnerSave program. All this, of course, is without even getting into the major policy statement which the minister will make later this month.

I want to mention two other important programs announced by the minister a few weeks ago. In the oil substitution program, the federal Liberal government has set a goal involving a very substantial reduction in the use of oil by industry and other major users. This would mean a substitution from oil to gas, electricity and renewable energy resources. If this program is implemented, over the next few years the saving across the country will be 375,000 barrels of oil per day. That is equal to two tar sands plants, or $12 billion. It would be a tremendous saving to the country, utilizing natural gas, electricity and renewable resources which are in good supply rather than crude oil which is in short supply and is rising in price.

Likewise, the policy announced by the minister to upgrade residual oil is a tremendous policy. Much of this residual oil is now used inefficiently and should be replaced by other sources such as natural gas. Much of it is exported. With a capital investment of $3 billion, we could effect a saving of 125,000 barrels of oil a day, the equivalent of one tar sands plant. With a capital investment at various refineries across the country of $3 billion, we could save the equivalent of a $6 billion tar sands plant.

These are some of the actions the Liberal government has taken in its determination to build an energy policy that is fair to the consumer, the producers, the provinces and the federal government. When the full policy is announced later this month by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I am sure it will be apparent to every member of this House that there is no substance to the opposition motion placed before us today.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the debate tonight, I congratulate my colleagues from all parties who have taken part with vigour, and in some cases, understanding. I thank the participants for the arrangement which allows me to participate this evening.

The problem of the Atlantic provinces has, regrettably, been featured for many years by high unemployment and regional disparities. The aspect of regional disparities is recognized in many ways. One is that the many segments of our labour force, Canadians who live in Atlantic provinces, earn two-thirds of the wages that are paid in other parts of the nation.

One of the reasons for the slender and fragile industrial component of our economy in the Atlantic provinces is the high cost of electrical energy. Prince Edward Island has the dubious distinction of having the highest energy rates in Canada. The number two position is held by Nova Scotia. The other two Atlantic provinces fare a little better but because of their dependence to a great degree on oil-fired thermal plants they are closing the gap at a rapid rate.

Clearly what we need in Atlantic Canada is a blueprint which integrates the efforts of governments and government departments at all levels, along with the private sector and the labour movement, in arriving at a strategy to resolve these difficulties and formulate a program for moving forward progressively to see that the ingredients of regional disparity are erased once and for all.

Another feature of regional disparity is that one-half the total revenue of the governments in the Atlantic provinces comes from Ottawa. This is a reflection on the ability of the economies to generate the dollars needed to carry out basic fundamental government services. One feature of any such blueprint has to be an enlightened energy policy, particularly in the field of electric energy which is the lifeblood of our industrial economy in Canada, most certainly in Atlantic Canada.

A principal and fundamental element of any such policy has to be the ability of governments in the Atlantic provinces to use economies of scale in the creation of thermal electrical producing facilities. To do this we in the maritime provinces have interlocked our electric energy systems by submarine cable between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and by high voltage transmission lines between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I view with regret the fact that the Maritime Energy Commission really did not get off the ground, because it would have been a vehicle to supply a pool creating a larger market which would permit us to use economies of scale in building more efficient thermal generating plants. The Maritime Energy Commission, had it got off the ground, would have provided a natural financial vehicle to enable us to move forward with the design stage of the great Fundy tidal power development facility which has been under study and talked about for so very long, and would have allowed the maritime provinces to become the powerhouse of North America.

The spin-off from a development of this nature would attract chemical and metal-based industries on an unprecedented scale, creating good jobs for Canadians living in the maritime provinces. How could we accomplish this with our slender financial resources?

The successor to the MEC may well still achieve this purpose, but what we must have in Atlantic Canada is a solid financial commitment from Ottawa which will enable us to move in this direction.

About ten years ago the premier of Ontario speaking at a federal-provincial conference, and they seem to be going on all the time, suggested that we borrow on the credit of the nation $1 billion to help put the maritimes on their feet. Reflected in the declining purchasing power of the Canadian dollar that comes to about $2 billion today. I think it is a good idea and I would like to tell you how I would use less than that if we had the opportunity.

New Brunswick is just finishing construction, and we hope to bring on line next year, a thermal nuclear plant which will produce 640 megawatts of power. If Ottawa could pay for the capital cost of that plant, which is capital intensive, we would have 640 megawatts of cheap electric power that would impact on a system of only 2,000 megawatts and give New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, because it is tied to New Brunswick by submarine cable, the lowest energy rates in Canada, creating a climate that would really be attractive to industrial growth.

Nova Scotia is in the process of building two thermal plants at the mouth of the Lingan coal mine. This means they do not have to handle coal twice and they can buy it cheap. Those two plants combined will produce 300 megawatts of electric power, and they have two more on the drawing board, which would give Nova Scotia 600 megawatts of power. If we could pay for those plants Nova Scotia would have 600 megawatts of cheap electric power, but their 600 megawatts would impact on a system of only 1,600 megawatts because Nova Scotia has a service-based economy whereas New Brunswick is resource based. That would give Nova Scotia cheap electric power too and would enable us to create a climate which would really be attractive to energy and industrial expansion. However, where is the money going to come from?

Eastern Canada, thanks to a serious error in judgment made some years ago, is completely reliant upon imported foreign oil. Eastern Canada imports 500,000 barrels of foreign oil every day. The Atlantic provinces use 300,000 barrels of this; the province of New Brunswick uses 90,000 barrels. At a subsidy of $20 per barrel Canada is paying $10 million a day in subsidies on imported oil and the Atlantic provinces are completely reliant on this insecure supply source. Would it not be much better to displace much of this imported oil and give the Atlantic provinces the tools to pull up their boot straps and solve their own problems? That is the recommendation I make to the government tonight.

In terms of renewable energy, the government has expanded its system of grants, and I commend it for that. Over the past few years we are spending more money on research and development of new technologies in this field of renewable energy. However, I think the renewable energy program should be given a development dimension, because by any criteria, the Atlantic provinces do not receive their fair share of these projects and this research. This is one area that is not reliant on transportation policies or freight rates which cripple the Atlantic provinces. This is one area where they could be productively used and put to work.

I shudder when you move, Mr. Speaker, because I have one eye on the clock and the other on you.

We have the natural resources which can provide the basis for such research. We have an abundant supply of coal that could provide a research opportunity for the gasification and liquefaction of coal. We have oil shale in abundance. We should research various means to find the most efficient way of getting the oil out of the oil shale and thus make a contribution to our national economy.

We have the agricultural products, the waste wood and the biomass that could develop a methanol industry. We should move in this direction because our national economy needs it. We have an abundance of wood that now, at long last in New Brunswick, is being properly managed, and it, too, could provide a renewable energy source. We have seen some experimentation in New Brunswick in geothermal research; I think it has proved very successful, but the technology has to be improved. This is one area in which I think we could make a productive contribution.

One man who lives in my riding, in Millville, has developed a means of using sawdust blown into the furnace to create a low cost heat source. He has an alternate oil and sawdust burner which I think is a tremendous thing. He has made it out of his wife's sewing machine, her vacuum cleaner and all kinds of parts he has put together. I believe people like this should be harnessed in the national interest to help us by making a contribution to the solution to our problems.

In my view the cornerstone of any intelligent energy policy applicable to the Atlantic provinces should give serious consideration to the harnessing of the tides in the Bay of Fundy. These are the highest tides in the world, and our studies so far, involving the government of Canada and the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, indicate it is feasible to do this. The big question is, what do you do at that point when the tides are balanced and are still? In an enlarged electric grid, a power pool, the energy from the tides in the Bay of Fundy could become firm power by integrating its development and use with the development of Gull Island in Labrador, or Muskrat Falls below it, or, indeed, with the Dickey-Lincoln Dam in the State of Maine, if that development moves forward.

The attraction of huge blocks of energy like this for industry has been well demonstrated throughout the world. Metal and chemical-based industries use huge blocks of energy in their development. My plea to Parliament is to take a good look at this source. Help us in the Atlantic provinces help ourselves. Give us the financial commitment necessary so that we can move forward with this development and share in the good things this great nation has to offer.

One research aspect is that we could use, at will, power from the Fundy development to take part in the scientific experiment now going on in other nations of the world whereby electrolysis is used to develop hydrogen for experimental purposes as a possible gas source as well as oxygen which already has a ready market.

• (2200)

One thing about Fundy which I would like to mention is that the full development of the 4,000 megawatts of power in Fundy would take 20 years. During that period, plants erected around the perimeter of the development could be contributing the electric components to the market, which is the development itself.

I thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker, and for your endurance.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings on the motion, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11).

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—OIL—PRICE INCREASES FOR HOME HEATING

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on June 12, 1980, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) what he proposed to do about the expected increase in the cost of home heating oil. At that point fuel oil retailed in Halifax West for 75 cents per gallon. Today it is at least ten cents more a gallon, at 85 cents. I wanted to know then—and I still want to know—how lower income people across this country, senior citizens and those on fixed incomes can be expected to pay increases of this kind.

Let us remember that many Canadian homes, especially in eastern Canada, still use fuel oil for space heat and for heating water. There are over 7.5 million homes in Canada, and approximately 3.1 million are heated by oil. Another 2.8 million are heated by natural gas, so any increase in the cost of home heating oil presents a problem to a great many Canadians.

More important, those in the lower income bracket spend twice as much on home heating in terms of percentage of their total income as do upper income Canadians, yet we face this great increase when we are told the now-famous "made-in-Canada" oil price is to be established in the future. It is certain that the cost of heating a modest bungalow of, let us say, 1,200 square feet, will rise from its current level of about $800 to approximately $1,000 and involve an increase of about 25 per cent. How will the average Canadian face this $200 increase in his family expenses? Many families across Canada will face even higher increases in their home heating costs.

I ask again today, what will the government do to help those who cannot pay this increase? Unfortunately, I expect the same answer which was given when I asked the question back in June, which is that the government intends to do nothing. Those who faced increases in mortgage interest costs in 1980 know the kinds of answers the government gives to such problems. They, too, went without assistance.

There is another equally serious problem in eastern Canada, particularly on the east coast. We not only face a drastic increase in the cost of home heating oil, but we are also in doubt about the supply of heating oil products. As the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) has just pointed out, we are totally dependent for home heating oil on foreign sources. The crude oil which is refined into home heating products comes from foreign sources and we are cut off from access to Canadian oil and other energy supplies. This means we must have an alternative source of energy, which, at this stage of our development, means natural gas.

Natural gas, as hon. members may know, is priced in Canada at approximately 85 per cent of the basic cost of petroleum products. In a city like Toronto a householder can heat his home with natural gas at approximately 75 per cent of the cost of heating with oil. Of course he will incur conversion costs, but these are in the area of $1,200 for a new unit and something like $450 for a converter unit. We on the east coast are without this option at the present time. In order to put us on a parity with the rest of Canada, there must be an extension of the natural gas pipeline to the east coast.

At present the situation is that the application to extend the natural gas pipeline to the east coast was turned down by the National Energy Board. However, the province of Nova Scotia has entered an appeal from this decision and hopefully the matter will be considered in the very near future. What is of concern and should be underlined in the House with respect to the dealings before the National Energy Board on the matter of the pipeline extension is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) while campaigning in Nova Scotia in January of 1980 promised at a public gathering the extension of the natural gas pipeline to the east coast. Not only did the Prime Minister promise it in the furore of an election campaign, but in September of this year the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) came to Halifax and underlined and repeated the same promise. Yet while the National Energy Board is now deliberating on this very question the government is silent as to what support it will lend to this undertaking.

In terms of the financing, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) just pointed out to the House, we are spending approximately $3 billion of our national resources in subsidizing foreign oil used in eastern Canada, particularly on the east coast. This money would be better spent in subsidizing a natural gas project if indeed subsidies are required. The ultimate effect would be to make energy available on an equal basis across Canada so that those on the east coast will have the same access as other Canadians to the supplies necessary to heat their homes.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) is understandably concerned about the impact of oil price increases on consumers, particularly as they may affect low-income people in the maritime provinces whose annual home heating bills approximate $800.

I appreciate this concern, and the government is fully aware that the fuel price increases which inevitably must take place could create hardships for a number of Canadians. For this reason the government is including a number of programs in its energy planning to alleviate the burden of rising energy prices. I should like to refer briefly to two or three of those programs.

The supply of natural gas to the maritimes is a matter of high priority for this government. Gas supplies to the maritimes will be provided at the earliest possible date. The Atlantic region is fortunate in its future supply opportunities because gas could be supplied from either western Canada, east coast offshore, or the Arctic islands, or a combination of all of those sources. In any event, we can expect by the mid-1980s at the latest that natural gas will be available to maritime residents.

Nova Scotia has important coal resources. Several programs will be implemented to provide for the use of this coal in electric power plants in place of high cost imported oil. As an example of the type of developmental research now under way, combustion plants which use local coal are planned for Summerside, Prince Edward Island, Dartmouth, and Point Tupper, Nova Scotia. Plants at these locations will be converted to coal and will be equipped with facilities which will permit them to burn the high sulphur Cape Breton coals without resultant environmental hazard.

The federal and New Brunswick governments are co-operating on an assessment of New Brunswick peat resources to determine their feasibility for use as a replacement for imported oil in the generating of electricity.

Even with rising fuel costs annual fuel bills can be kept close to present levels with great attention to conservation measures. The federal government's home insulation program is proving to be very beneficial in this respect. The grants available enable home owners to insulate their homes resulting in fuel savings in the range of 25 per cent to 50 per cent. Such savings cancel out a significant part of heating fuel cost increases.

NUCLEAR ENERGY—INQUIRY RESPECTING NUCLEAR POLICY—REQUEST FOR TABLING TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, as you fully appreciate, proceedings on the adjournment of the House of Commons are reserved for those of us who ask questions of the ministry and who are dissatisfied with answers received during the course of the question period. The particular topic I intend to raise this evening is a prime example to you and to all here of the kind of inadequate and ridiculous responses one gets from the minister of energy from time to time with respect to very important matters in our nation's affairs.

Mr. Speaker, you may recall that the government of which I had the honour and privilege to be a part, initiated and brought forward in the name of my colleague who is in the House tonight, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the terms of reference for a national inquiry into nuclear policy of our country. The purpose of that proposed inquiry was one that has been sadly neglected over the course of many years of Liberal administration. The federal government, which claims to have jurisdiction over matters relating to nuclear policy, was virtually the only government which did not consult with the people of our country, give leadership or get its own act into line with respect to national policy; it lacked the will and motivation to take an in-depth look at the policy which should be developed for our country in terms of nuclear industry both domestically and internationally. The terms of reference we brought forward and presented to the House for debate and reference to a committee composed of representatives of all parties in the House were broad; they dealt with the issues which should be dealt with in terms of national nuclear policy and they received the general acclaim of all people within the industry as well as the general public concerned about these matters.

I should point out that in addition to the broad basis on which the inquiry was to be held and the broad terms of reference, there was provision for this inquiry to report and make its recommendations within one year. I think that is significant when one looks at what is happening today in respect to this government, which is taking no action, no initiatives and no steps other than to reverse itself at every opportunity.

I raised my question initially with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and he indicated to me that the energy issue is of such pressing concern to the government that it could not take the time for a national inquiry and that such an option was out of the question in so far as his government was concerned. Instead, he said they would have what is termed "an internal inquiry". I subsequently raised the matter on June 11 with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) during the course of the question period that day. I asked him what the terms of reference for his internal inquiry might be, what would be the provisions with respect to public input and what kind of inquiry was envisaged. I asked him to describe it generally and to make some announcement. Indeed, I asked if he would table those terms of reference in the House. In his response the minister indicated that the policy was being reviewed, that there was no formal task force that would be set up with specific terms of reference but that if I wanted further details he would certainly give them to me. I took the invitation to heart, Mr. Speaker, and wrote to the minister on June 18 asking him what exactly he had in mind.

I received a response by letter of August 19, 1980. I would read part of it into the record as it is germane to the question tonight. The minister said in part as follows:

As you are aware, slower economic growth in Canada and throughout the world has reduced the growth rate of electricity demand. This, in turn, has reduced the demand both in Canada and abroad for AECL's Candu reactors. In consequence, I have asked that in the first phase of our nuclear policy review, emphasis be placed on the status of the industry and its prospects over the decade. As part of the review, we will be examining the policy options open to the government should it appear that support is required beyond that which current policy entails.

There are, of course, other significant areas which need to be examined as part of the policy review and, subsequent to completion of the industry's study later this year, we will turn our attention to them. Included in the list are radioactive waste management, revisions to the Atomic Energy Control Act, and uranium export policies.

You inquired about public input into the review process. Once the study of various aspects is further advanced, I intend to release documents for public comments. It might also be advisable to set up a parliamentary task force to review those documents. In addition, officials of my department have recently been in contact with several non-governmental organizations with an active interest in energy issues in general and nuclear energy in particular.

We now have the situation where the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated there will be no parliamentary review and the minister has indicated that he is considering a parliamentary review on this particular topic. One year has gone by since the government gained the opportunity to deal with this matter. It is incumbent upon us now to ask what are the terms of reference and their content, when does the government intend to bring them down and what about the parliamentary task force. Or are we to wait for maybe another year before the government acts on this matter?

I would remind the parliamentary secretary that if our resolution had been passed and the matter referred to committee, we would now be in the position of expecting a report in the very near future. Delay and inaction on nuclear policy is the trademark of this government to the detriment of the Canadian public.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the matter of representations to the government relative to nuclear industry, issues which the hon. member for Saskatchewan West has raised, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources explained in the House on June 11 in response to an earlier question by the hon. member that a formal task force with specific terms of reference has not been established for the nuclear industry review now under way within the government. He noted, however, that there will be an opportunity for public input when documents dealing with a series of nuclear industry related questions are completed and released.

The interdepartmental study on nuclear industry issues is being conducted as part of the development of a broad energy strategy. Although formal public hearings are not part of this nuclear industry review, the government has had the benefit of extensive hearings held elsewhere in Canada and, in any case, it is the intention of the government to be fully cognizant of views coming from the public on the nuclear industry issues before making policy decisions.

When the decision stage is reached, we shall examine ways in which Parliament and the public can best express their views about proposals put forward at that time. Views of members of this House or organizations and individuals outside the House will certainly be welcomed and taken into consideration.

We believe nuclear energy can play an increasingly important role in helping to meet Canada's future energy needs. There remain, however, questions in the minds of some regarding its application on a larger scale. The government's energy program is designed to come to grips with those questions in the context of a total national energy strategy.

The assessments to be completed in the coming months will provide the policy framework for the decisions required to ensure an appropriate role for nuclear energy in the future. The decisions regarding that role must serve the national in all respects and, accordingly, will encompass informed public views. The government expects to issue background papers on nuclear industry matters in the near future. These papers will help to provide the basis for the development of informed public views on important nuclear industry questions.

HEALTH CARE—HALL REPORT—RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING EXTRA BILLING BY DOCTORS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I am here tonight to try and obtain from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), or from her parliamentary secretary on her behalf, a clear enunciation of what she intends to do in order to bring about one of the main recommendations of the review by former Justice Emmett Hall on medicare in Canada, the outlawing of extra billing.

There are many other recommendations of Mr. Justice Hall that we in the NDP would like to see implemented. I mention briefly just some of them—the abolition of premiums, the promotion of community health care models, the abolition of user fees, the promotion of preventive and rehabilitative medicine, and cost-sharing with poorer provinces to widen the scope of health care services in these provinces. We agree with Mr. Justice Hall that the original vision of a comprehensive health care system in Canada has not been fulfilled, and we will do our part to ensure that eventually it is.

But the recommendation to outlaw extra billing, the practice whereby doctors charge their patients over and above what medicare pays, must be dealt with immediately. Its continuation will, as Mr. Justice Hall rightly points out, lead to the eventual destruction of medicare as we have come to know it by creating a two-tier system of health care in Canada. If it continues, then some people will move to insure themselves against this extra cost through private insurance schemes. This, we submit, would be the beginning of the end of medicare.

Thus, Mr. Justice Hall recommends amendments to the Medical Care Act—which would have to be made by the federal government—declaring extra billing to be contrary to the intent and purpose of the act. We support this recommendation and we support it in the full knowledge that it is part of a package which also recommends a mechanism to ensure reasonable compensation to physicians, including binding arbitration if necessary, as long as it comes at the end of due process by which doctors and provincial governments have had ample opportunity to come to a voluntary agreement.

The medical associations do not run this country and ought not to run the medicare system. Doctors must realize at this point in our social development, that their special status is a thing of the past; that they have no more right to send extra bills to patients than railroad workers in my riding have to "extra bill" the CNR because they are not happy with their incomes or because their standard of living is not what it used to be, or think it ought to be.

The minister said last night on the program "The Watson Report", that public opinion in the provinces would have to protect medicare. This insight into the importance of public opinion must not be used by the minister as a way of abdicating her own responsibilities as Minister of National Health and Welfare and, therefore, as the person in charge of maintaining the medicare system in Canada, responsible for ensuring that we have national health care standards and that over a period of time the vision of a comprehensive health care system in Canada will be fulfilled. The public will do its job with regard to medicare and, in fact, has already done so in various provinces.

Any political party that dared to suggest it might want to tamper with the principles of medicare has consistently been rebuffed by the electorate from time to time. So I am not worried about the public, Mr. Speaker. But the government should be worried about public opinion. It should be worried about what will happen a couple of years from now when the public finds that much of the rhetoric and many of the promises made regarding medicare by the Liberal party in the last two campaigns have not been lived up to and that action has not been taken. We hope action will be taken, however, and that is why I am here tonight, not to ask, as the minister constantly does, what our position is or what that of other people is. We are making our position clear and the public position is clear. We want to know when the position of the minister will be made clear and when she will begin to do her part to stem the erosion of medicare.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) I should like to express once again the position that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) expressed in the House last week with respect to the recommendations in the report of Mr. Justice Hall on extra billing by doctors.

I think the hon. member pointed out that two of the major recommendations made in the Hall report dealt with the concept or problem of extra billing and its twin, binding arbitration.

• (2225)

The minister strongly supports Mr. Justice Hall's view that the practice of extra billing is unacceptable. It should be noted, however, that the whole report states clearly that any action to ban extra billing must be twinned with a mechanism to protect the legitimate interest of doctors with regard to reasonable compensation. Accordingly, he recommends to the provinces that they implement a system of binding arbitration. He acknowledges that the federal government cannot impose such a system on the provinces. That is why he does not recommend that this particular mechanism be specified in the proposed amendment to the federal legislation.

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) mentioned in the House last week, immediately following receipt of the whole report, she convened a federal-provincial conference of health ministers in Winnipeg. This meeting was the first step in a process of consultation to be followed by a meeting of deputy ministers of health in November and by a meeting of ministers in February. In the coming weeks the minister and her officials will be meeting frequently with representatives of the users of health services in the medical profession.

This is an issue of great complexity and of vital importance to all Canadians. A deliberate, thoughtful and determined consultation must take place. The government believes that precipitous legislative action at this time could seriously disrupt the nation's health care system. The government's aim is to preserve and strengthen medicare. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has assured hon. members in this House and, indeed, all Canadians that she is personally giving the highest priority to this issue in order to find resolutions to the problems in our health care system.

I think the minister stated very clearly last week that the federal government will not be disposed to act in a unilateral manner. She has given assurances to the deputy ministers of health and to her counterparts provincially that we hope to address this whole problem of extra billing and the binding arbitration mechanism over the months ahead and that we intend to do it by a consultative method.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF WEATHER FORECASTING FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that weather forecasting in Saskatchewan has deteriorated to the extent that it is considered by many residents of the province as completely unreliable, and in view of the fact that many Saskatchewan residents facing winter are expressing concern that there will be little accurate forecasting of storms and blizzards with resulting danger to the travelling public, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the Department of the Environment do an immediate review of the forecasting facilities in the province with a view to upgrading and improving the accuracy of weather forecasting.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CALL FOR TABLING OF AN ANNUAL REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday during question period the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) made it quite clear that he was as confused about the direction the auto industry was taking as the industry's own uncertainties imply. In view of the fact that confusion and uncertainty do in fact exist within the auto industry as a result of the major overhaul taking place in the United States and around the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House instruct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to produce and table an annual report of the over-all aspects of the auto industry in Canada as recommended by the Reisman report on the auto industry as a first step to assuring that Canada receive its fair share of the industry, particularly in the area of parts and components for the so-called world car concept.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CALL FOR COVERAGE OF PARENTS OF YOUNG CHILDREN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise an urgent matter concerning the rights of parents to pay and pensions. Since the most exploited Canadian workers are parents who work long hours caring for young children with no pay, no benefits and no pensions, and since most parents working in the home full-time are women, many of them raising children on their own, who face insecurity and poverty in later years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately implement Canada Pension Plan coverage for such workers and consider pay for parenting of young children as a policy priority for the near future.

Madam Speaker: This motion, for its presentation, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RECOGNITION OF WORK OF NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In accordance with a 1971 act of Parliament, this is Canadian Environment Week. It is an opportunity to celebrate the richness of Canada's natural environment and to pay tribute to those who have enhanced it. Accordingly I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House reaffirms its commitment to the preservation and enhancement of Canada's environment and recognizes, in particular, the excellent work performed by Canada's non-government environmental organizations.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RELIGIOUS CULTS

CALL FOR INQUIRY INTO INSTITUTE OF APPLIED METAPHYSICS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency concerning a Tweed, Ontario, religious cult known as "I Am", the "Institute of Applied Metaphysics", an acknowledged mind-bending cult promoting parental hatred and operated by Dr. Winnifred Barton who, among other things, has claimed to have visited the lost continent of Atlantis. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House requests an immediate and full inquiry into the fact that the religious cult known as "I Am", through a subsidiary known as "Pro-Painters", has completed approximately $75,000 worth of government work for Canadian Armed Forces, Ottawa, and is about to decorate the Langevin block, occupied by the Prime Minister and the Privy Council, such work having been obtained by subcontract, at least in part, from Burnley Contractors; and finally, that the government is hereby called upon to justify allowing such access to defence establishments and to a high security area such as the Langevin block, especially when such cults have shown in the past an insatiable appetite to gain access to secret government files.

Madam Speaker: This motion, for its presentation, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENT RESPECTING UNMARRIED COUPLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that existing tax laws discriminate against unmarried couples by excluding them from the dependency tax deduction and discriminates against single fathers by excluding them from deducting child care expenses, and considering that the Human Rights Act has no power to prevail over the Income Tax Act, as a single parent I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House instructs the Minister of National Revenue to introduce legislation that would amend the tax law to grant unmarried couples the same tax benefits as legally married persons.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TERRORISM

CONDEMNATION OF ATTACKS ON JEWISH COMMUNITY IN FRANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I believe, Madam Speaker, that we are all aware of the grave danger of the growth of terrorism and of our becoming callous to these concerns. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That this House condemns any and all acts of terrorism anywhere in the world, and especially at this time the several recent and outrageous terrorist attacks on Jews in France; that this House conveys its deep sympathy to these innocent victims and to their relatives, and expresses support for the French government in its determination to protect French Jews and urges that all security forces immediately co-operate internationally in an all-out effort to protect Jews from any further suffering and insult at the hands of national socialists and other extremist groups.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CALL FOR APOLOGY FROM MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that yesterday the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), in this House, confirmed suspicions that his interest in the problems of the auto industry extends only to those of the Chrysler plant in his own riding of Windsor West, and in view of the fact that it appears from his actions that the government loan to Chrysler was made to preserve the hon. minister's constituency but has not aided the 600 workers to be laid off, on behalf of the auto workers at American Motors in Brampton, General Motors in Oshawa, Ford in Oakville and St. Thomas and others throughout the country I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) and the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the minister apologize to Canadians for his apparent bias, and if he cannot encourage Canadians to buy cars made in Canada and not just in his own constituency, that his resignation be submitted forthwith.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

RESUMPTION OF COURT ACTION RESPECTING WHOLESALE DISTRIBUTION OF GASOLINE BY PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the government has decided to drop its charges against Imperial Oil, Irving Oil and Petrofina Canada allegedly engaged in restrictive trade practices in their dealings with the Perrette company by refusing to supply gasoline to its stations and considering the harassing and threatening tactics of large oil companies against independent oil dealers in Quebec, I move, seconded by the member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the House ask the government to reconsider its decision to drop its proceedings and to entrust the bulk distribution of oil with Petro-Canada.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, which was confirmed last night in a special report on the CBC national news. It is exceedingly clear from this and from other widely available data that the present government's non-policy on energy matters is directly responsible for the oil and gas industry abandoning this country in droves, with the result that everyone suffers—industry and the population in general—because of the lack of jobs. Since this government has failed to produce a comprehensive energy policy and has rather derived its position from a bird's-eye view gained from the "Liberal dirigible" drifting around in a constitutional cloud, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House demand the immediate resignation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Madam Speaker: I would now like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery, in the event he slips away, of the former member for Malpeque, the present Premier of Prince Edward Island, the Hon. Angus MacLean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

REFUSAL OF PRIME MINISTER TO REFER RESOLUTION TO SUPREME COURT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Angus, you know you are welcome here!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will recall that yesterday when I asked him about a reference to the Supreme Court for its opinion on the constitutionality of his constitution resolution, he said as reported at page 3630 of Hansard:

—it is not the intention of the government to ask the courts to decide upon a matter which Parliament itself has before it.

The Prime Minister will also remember that two years ago he agreed to refer Bill C-60 to the Supreme Court, even though that bill was before Parliament at the time. He did so because he agreed, to quote him directly from his letter of September 13, 1978 to Premier Blakeney, as follows:

—it seems undesirable to allow allegations of uncertainty in this regard to continue to impede concentration on the substance of the question.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: why is there a double standard? Why would he agree to make a reference on a question in 1978 before the House of Commons and refuse to make a reference on the constitutional resolution now before Parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I attempted to explain that yesterday and I will attempt again to indicate to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Resign!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition.

I indicated that the former case had to do with the present Constitution of Canada, knowing whether section 91, first paragraph, permitted us to amend provisions regarding the Senate through Parliament acting alone or not. This was a matter which properly should be referred to the courts because it had to do with the section in the constitution now.

● (1420)

What we are engaged in at this time, Madam Speaker, is a debate as to whether the Parliament of Canada has the right to go to Great Britain without the unanimous support of the provinces. This is not provided for in any written or unwritten section of the British North America Act, as I explained yesterday; therefore, that is not a matter which, in my view, can be adjudicated upon by the courts. As the hon. leader himself was careful to point out, this is a political battle. It is a different view of different kinds of Canada. I think it is wrong to get the courts to make decisions, not on conflicts of law which are derived from the constitution, but on conflicting views of Canada. That is the present debate.

REQUEST THAT LEGAL OPINION BE MADE PUBLIC

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, just in case anyone missed that, the Prime Minister was saying that the constitution is not a constitutional question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: He has tried to perpetuate a double standard regarding references to the Supreme Court, but we know his position. He refuses to make that reference.

Let me turn my attention for a moment to the Minister of Justice. We are all aware that the practice has always been in this House that legal opinions made available to the government are not made public to the House of Commons or to the public. However, in view of the special and serious nature of this issue, will the Minister of Justice agree to waive the normal confidentiality which attaches to government legal opinions and allow Parliament and the people of Canada to see the advice on which he says the Government of Canada is acting?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I intend to appear before the committee, and hon. members, if we do one day go into committee, will have the opportunity to question me on the matter. The answer the Prime Minister gave a moment ago is self explanatory. The constitution does not provide for its own patriation. Everyone knows that it is the British parliament which must legislate in the matter. And as I have often said, we will go only once and then we can solve all our problems in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, there are some of us here who believe that the Constitution of Canada should be the business of the Parliament of Canada and not the business of the parliament at Westminster.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I take it that the Minister of Justice has now declined to make available to the House of Commons and the people of Canada those legal opinions of which he is so sure but which he will not allow the Supreme Court of Canada to test. I ask either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice whether it is the position of the government now that Parliament and the people of Canada should bow to the government's will on the basis of advice that the Minister of Justice insists on keeping secret, and the validity of which he refuses to submit to the basic test of the Supreme Court?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I just said a minute ago that we are very anxious to go in front of the committee and the members of this House and of the other house will be able to question me on the matter and I will reply to their questions. These are the practices that have been followed in the past and I intend to follow them in the future—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The minister should be allowed to complete his answer.

Mr. Chrétien: —especially when the Leader of the Opposition cannot make up his mind about patriating or not patriating the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF SECTION 42 OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, we at least believe that Canadians should determine their own future, not the parliament of another country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Given the indications in this House over the course of the last week, and yesterday by virtually all of Canada's premiers, and there is growing public opinion, that section 42 of the government's constitutional proposals must not be proceeded with because—and I quote Premier Blakeney on this—"it gives the federal government such a potent weapon that it would threaten the provincial partnership upon which Canada rests", will the Prime Minister now withdraw that especially offensive section in the government's proposals now before Parliament?

● (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, you will recognize that we are being questioned about the bill itself. I am very happy to participate in this debate but, as the Minister of Justice just said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —we thought we would be debating this question in committee. With regard to the particular section which the hon. member finds so offensive, if you will allow me, Madam Speaker, I will try to explain to the hon. member why it is there.

Mr. Lawrence: Why don't you make a speech on it?

Mr. Trudeau: Now I have a member who does not want me to make a speech.

Mr. Lawrence: No, why don't you make a speech?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Get into the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I thank the House for unanimous consent for me to make a speech at this point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Section 42, which some of the premiers and the Leader of the Opposition find so offensive, is, as I have explained before, a deadlock-breaking mechanism.

An hon. Member: The only person who believes that is Ed Broadbent.

Mr. Trudeau: It is something to which we would have recourse in cases when there is a deadlock between the federal and the provincial governments. If, as hon. members opposite have said repeatedly, there are two levels or two orders of government, experience has shown us in the past that these two orders of government cannot always agree with unanimity on any particular course, and this lack of unanimity, which pre-dates every one of us sitting in this Parliament since it goes back to 1927, has prevented Canada from having its own constitution in spite of 53 years of effort. The reason for that has been a deadlock between the two orders of government. It is because we respect those two orders of government that we say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Tell us another one.

Mr. Trudeau: It is because of that that we say a deadlock cannot be broken unilaterally by the federal government once the constitution is in Canada and, therefore, there must be some mechanism to break a deadlock lest it last another 53 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot see how anyone sitting in this chamber would find it offensive for the constitution to provide that in the case of a deadlock—

An hon. Member: It does not provide that.

Mr. Trudeau: —we will appeal to the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: This seems to me the only recourse we can take in order to break a deadlock.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not true and you know it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, certainly I am not any more clear in respect of what the Prime Minister has in mind. What is involved is not a question of lack of unanimity but a question of trying to obtain a consensus so we do not have chaos following in this country. I would again quote Premier Blakeney who said last night on television:

—I think the mood of the country is building into a confrontational mood.

He went on to state:

—we have a situation which is beginning to be more than disquieting. In fact, it begins to be dangerous.

In light of that sentiment being expressed—

An hon. Member: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will read the rest. If you will just give me an opportunity I will give the same speech as the Prime Minister gave.

An hon. Member: That isn't possible.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In light of that kind of sentiment being expressed, is the Prime Minister intending to communicate with the provinces again to see whether consensus can be obtained in this area, and to review with them the proposal before Parliament, or is he determined to move unilaterally to lead to a situation which Premier Blakeney says is dangerous to the continuance of Canada as it is today?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is suggesting, and I agree with him, that consensus would be better; but he knows consensus has not been achieved over 53 years of efforts by six different prime ministers and dozens and dozens of premiers who have tried to find a way of bringing the constitution back. That consensus has not been found.

● (1430)

I am asked by the hon. member why I do not continue working at it. My reply is very simple. The premiers themselves have not reached any consensus on the best amending formula, and that is why we have provided in the resolution before the House that we would offer the people a choice—

Mr. Clark: That is not what the resolution says, and you know it.

Mr. Trudeau: —either of the Victoria formula, which is the most recent formula in Canada which had the agreement of all 11 provinces—

Mr. Beatty: Eleven provinces?

Mr. Trudeau: Eleven governments. It is the most recent one. It dates back to 1971, and that is why we have put the Victoria formula in as one option. The other option will be an option which the provinces among themselves can agree to present to the Canadian people, and surely if they have one they should be prepared to test it with the Canadian people.

That is why the proposed resolution suggests a referendum to be held between two and four years from now so that the people themselves can decide, not the courts. If Parliament and the legislatures and governments of the provinces cannot agree, then we should not go to the courts to tell us how to do it. We should go to the people so that they can tell us which of the two formulas to use.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order. Although this applause might be justified in the views of many—and it has been happening on both sides—it cuts the time of the question period, and there will be fewer members who will be in a position to ask questions.

WAR MEASURES ACT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON 1970 INVOCATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question concerns an event which was set in motion exactly ten years ago tonight. I refer to the imposition of the War Measures Act to combat what was described by the Prime Minister that day as "an apprehended insurrection" in the province of Quebec. The then justice minister said, and I quote:

> It is my hope that some day the full details of the intelligence upon which the government acted can be made public, because until that day comes the people of Canada will not be able to fully appraise the course of action which has been taken by the government.

After a full ten years will the Prime Minister assure us, let us say, within two weeks, that Parliament will be presented with a detailed written explanation of this extraordinary event?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party refers to something described by me as an apprehended insurrection. I remind him that that was stated only after the government of the province of Quebec and the administration of the city of Montreal had written to the federal government describing the situation as that of apprehended insurrection.

An hon. Member: It was your decision.

Mr. Trudeau: At their request—I might say at their pressing and repeated request after a period of several days; Mr. Bourassa has stated this publicly, and I believe Mayor Drapeau has too—we then took the step—

An hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Trudeau: —of proclaiming the War Measures Act and having certain specific regulations apply only in the province of Quebec. That situation of apprehended insurrection was based on data which are frequently forgotten but which are generally known, and we have nothing to add to the facts which are known publicly.

I believe the Deschenes inquiry in the province of Quebec spent a few years trying to establish facts different from those we said were public and well known. If the government of the province of Quebec had found anything untoward in that action or anything suspicious or hidden, the Leader of the New Democratic Party could be very sure that it would have been made public before or during the referendum. The fact that it was not made public shows that even the most hostilely-inclined provincial government was unable to find any facts or establish any realities contrary to those which are well known and upon which we acted.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the facts indeed are well known, including studies which were carried out by the present government of the province of Quebec and the one to which the Prime Minister has just referred. According to RCMP officers directly involved, the War Measures Act itself was totally unnecessary to invoke to deal with the crisis. That is the fact. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, if the sheep on the other side would—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Broadbent: In order to assure Canadians that their rights will never again be unnecessarily suspended by arbitrary action, given the fact that any charter of rights will by nature only provide recourse to violations after they occur and the government's repeated commitments made over a number of years since the invocation of the War Measures Act, will the Prime Minister now assure the House either that amendments will be brought in this session to the present act, or that the government will do what it has promised, as I have indicated many times, which is to bring forward a new piece of legislation which could be used in emergency situations without such a complete violation in an unfair fashion of the rights of innocent people?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we would be anxious to do what the Leader of the New Democratic Party suggests, as we were anxious then, if we could have some agreement on every side of the House to amend the Criminal Code so that the police could be permitted, in cases of widespread violence as existed in October, 1970—

An hon. Member: Widespread?

Mr. Trudeau: Conservatives opposite shake their heads in incredulity when I talk of widespread violence.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We just read the reports.

Mr. Trudeau: There had been more than 100 violent acts over a period of several years, including raids on arsenals, including bombings, including derailments of trains—

An hon. Member: That has happened in the last couple of years too.

Mr. Trudeau: —including the whole downtown section of St. Catherine Street being torn apart, including murder and kidnappings. If this is not widespread—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. May I ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister to concentrate on answering the question of the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: —for Oshawa rather than questions thrown across the floor by other hon. members.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I point out that the question of the Leader of the New Democratic Party really establishes the very basic truth that every democratic country has certain exceptional measures to which it can have recourse in cases of widespread violence. In the case of Canada these exceptional measures are not provided for in the Criminal Code. It would be our preference to have had them provided for in the Criminal Code—

Mr. Broadbent: You have had ten years.

Mr. Trudeau: —and to have that in the future. But I think the question should remind us that what the War Measures Act did was not bring in some sledge-hammer which hit every citizen in every province on every matter in this country. It only had the effect of bringing into operation a certain number of regulations which were the equivalent of any sensible amendment to the Criminal Code.

● (1440)

Therefore, this hallucination about the War Measures Act is often used to forget that we did nothing more under the War Measures Act than bring in certain exceptional measures which, I repeat, are used in practically every other democratic country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, most lawyers interested in civil liberties now concede that the Criminal Code was completely adequate to deal with the level of violence which, everyone agrees, and to be dealt with at the time. That is the point.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister quite seriously, because I would commit my party on the spot, whether he is saying that he would be interested in establishing an all-party committee which, on a priority basis this session, would look into a replacement for the War Measures Act. Because if that is what he is saying, he will have our support 100 per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am somewhat puzzled by the statement of the Leader of the NDP. He begins his question by saying that the Criminal Code, in the opinion of most experts, is enough. Why, then, is he asking for more?

Mr. Broadbent: It was enough in 1970.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, in my question yesterday to the Solicitor General about the Dorchester tragedy I was only able to hint, due to source confidentiality, at the gross suppression of the facts in relation to the tragedy by both the penitentiary officials and the RCMP.

My question to the Solicitor General today is as follows. In view of the publication today of certain allegations by the brother of the dead guard that the two guards who were the hostages had in fact subdued the prisoners and were actually standing when the emergency task force broke into the washroom area where they were incarcerated, and it was only after the task force went in there that guard William Morrison received a shotgun blast in the abdomen which killed him at the hands of one of the other guards, in the light of those allegations being made today I wonder if the Solicitor General would now change his mind and initiate an open, public, independent inquiry into this whole mess.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I refute the suggestion that there has been any suppression of facts at all. The facts are being ascertained, an inquiry is under way. I will repeat what I said to the hon. member yesterday, that I would be prepared in the next few days, as soon as the facts are gathered and they can be authenticated, to make a full statement of exactly what happened during that incident in Dorchester. I said yesterday that I would do that and I am still prepared to do it. But I would suggest to the hon. member that there has been no suppression of facts. In fact, we are working now to gather the facts as best we can so that this statement can be made available.

Mr. Lawrence: If the Solicitor General says there is no suppression of the facts—and certainly there are people involved in provincial agencies and in the administration of justice in New Brunswick who would dispute what the Solicitor General has just said here today—may I ask him when he heard about these allegations? Because if he knew about them previously to this and did not inform the House, I think he is in deep trouble with the House. On the other hand, if he did not know about them, then obviously his own officials have not given him these allegations, which they should have. Now, did he know or did he not?

Mr. Kaplan: I have read everything that has been printed about it and I have received reports from certainly more than half a dozen individuals who were involved in it. There are many conflicts, as there normally would be, between firsthand and second-hand impressions of events which were so charged with excitement and emotion when they occurred. I have not suppressed any of them and I have not made any statement on the facts yet. I want to gather them and I want to be satisfied about the truth of them. As I indicated yesterday, I intend at the earliest opportunity to make them available to the House if it wants, or to make a statement to the House on exactly what happened to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I will remind the minister that on November 6 he told us that he would bring in a budget in the last two weeks of October, and this was a specific promise. In this morning's paper, Mr. Carruthers of The Globe and Mail, usually an accurate reporter, suggests that the budget will not be brought down until November 3 because of the strike by the clerks. Perhaps the clerks write the minister's budget, I do not know. In any event, the suggestion now is that the budget will not be brought down until November. I would like to remind the minister that he has been in office seven and a half months, a month longer than we were before my ill-fated budget was brought down, one of which I am still proud even though it had a toppling effect. The minister will be following in my footsteps, I hope, and toppling in a couple of weeks' time.

Would the minister tell us what is the date of the budget or, if he cannot do that, will he give us an assurance that it will be brought down in October and that another promise will not be broken so soon in this session?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have no way of supporting the speculation which appeared in The Globe and Mail. It was news to me that the decision has been made to bring down the budget in November as a result of the strike of the clerks. That is news. I told the hon. member that I would probably give the House this week the precise date on which the budget will be brought down. I will attempt to do that after I have had a chance to confer with my colleagues tomorrow. I will make every effort to live up to what undoubtedly was an indication to the House that the budget would be brought down in the month of October. If there were to be any change in that, the House will be the first to know, not The Globe and Mail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, during the recent lamented election campaign the Prime Minister said the government would reduce the deficit and he made the promise that the government would hold increases in government expenditures under the rate of growth of the GNP. Figures released today show that the deficit for the first five months of this year is $6,900 million, up 12 per cent from last year, and that expenditures have grown 17 per cent in the first five months of this year to $22.58 billion. On Friday the minister said he was going to carry out the Prime Minister's election promises in his budget. How is he going to carry out these two promises to reduce the deficit and to hold expenditures to zero growth this year, because the GNP is negative this year, not positive? How will he carry out those promises, and are these only the first of many broken promises of measures that he will not implement?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to the growth in expenditures, and accordingly the growth in the deficit, which occurred in his budget when he projected a 10 per cent rate of growth line. I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that if the minister were still in office, he would still be confronted with precisely the same increased expenditures—

Some hon. Members: No way.

Mr. MacEachen: —arising from the increases in the oil import compensation program and increases in the charges on the public debt. There was no action that was taken by the Government of Canada since we came into office that added to that expenditure line or to the deficit, except for the inevitability which arose from these two particular sources.

An hon. Member: No, you haven't read the budget.

Mr. MacEachen: I am still prepared on this day to say that the commitments made by the Prime Minister with respect to the operation of the fiscal side of the government will be carried out, namely that as economic growth resumes in a phased manner that the deficit will be reduced. These, Madam Speaker, were the words used by the Prime Minister, not the words which have been fabricated in a fevered atmosphere by the hon. member for St. John's West.

• (1450)

The second point is that the former minister of finance referred to a commitment to restrain expenditures in accordance with the real growth of the gross national product. Even a finance minister as reckless as my hon. friend would never make that commitment. The Prime Minister was talking about the trend line of nominal GNP and we will follow that as we reveal our medium-term plans for the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHARGE OF RAPE—REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING PROVISIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Yesterday an Ontario Supreme Court judge passed a light sentence on a man who was convicted of rape because the victim was, in the judge's words, "a woman of the world" and did not appear to suffer any ill effects from the experience.

The minister has been promising for some time to introduce a long overdue bill to amend the Criminal Code provisions on sexual offences. In June he said it was coming very soon. When is the minister finally going to move on this important question of concern to all Canadian women and, specifically, when will he bring in legislation to reverse the effect of the recent Supreme Court of Canada decision in Forsythe and Pappajohn, to remove a husband's immunity? Finally, when will he move to define rape not as a crime of passion which "women of the world" really enjoy, but as a crime of violent assault?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I hope to introduce a bill in the coming weeks.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): My supplementary question is also to the Minister of Justice. I might add that I hope the Prime Minister will consider replacing him with someone who has some commitment to justice and who is not solely concerned with the constitution. We need a full-time Minister of Justice in this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The minister knows that the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Pappajohn rape case has caused a great outcry among women's groups all across this country. Will the minister assure this House that our rape laws will be amended so that no man who is accused of rape can claim that he believed, with no reasonable grounds whatsoever, that the woman was really consenting? What action is the minister prepared to take on this recent decision, which is called by some "a rapist's charter" and which is an insult to all Canadian women?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, dealing with problems such as those requires considerable thought to make sure that we make well-balanced legislative proposals. We have to study the matter in depth before reaching a decision; the hon. member and the House would be ill served if we were to act too quickly in the matter. Careful thought is preferable and I believe the case mentioned is controversial. The accused must be ensured normal means to defend himself while the victims must be able to get justice. It is no easy matter. I have been addressing the problem since the summer and hope to be in a position to introduce a bill which, by its very nature, will be somewhat controversial. I intend to take all the time that is needed before acting.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS—REQUEST THAT RESULTS BE PUBLISHED

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Last Friday, he made it known that he intended to table the results of polls held throughout Canada in recent months. Can the Minister of Justice table those findings? How many are available and how many polls have been held in recent months?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the Canadian Unity Information Office conducted 16 polls in the last 18 months. Today, we sent out a letter to all hon. members advising them that the results of 13 of those 16 polls are available this very afternoon. We shall make them public at the request of interested parties. We have no intention of printing them out for everyone because they are very voluminous but all those who want copies of those polls can get in touch with the Canadian Unity Information Office.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NIAGARA RIVER—DISCHARGE OF CONTAMINATED WATER

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. As he well knows, the SCA chemical waste service company of New York has been granted an American permit, from the state of New York, to build a pipeline which will discharge millions of gallons of contaminated water into the Niagara River. He will also know that many Canadian municipalities draw their drinking water from that same river. Will he tell the House whether he, the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister, or anyone else in the Canadian government, has made a vigorous representation to the United States government to have that permit rescinded?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Yes, Madam Speaker, there have been vigorous representations made to the United States government in relation to this issue. These representations, first of all, are to ensure that the U.S. government accepts and will maintain its international obligations under the Great Lakes Water Treaty, a commitment which they have made, and second, to ensure that the Environmental Protection Agency itself reviews materials which have been presented to the state of New York hearings. As the hon. member knows, I, too, made a commitment that our engineers and scientists would examine the material which has been presented to the New York authorities. We have done this and I have issued a report of their findings.

In this regard I would like to salute the efforts of my hon. friend from Niagara Falls, who yesterday referred this whole matter to the IJC, I believe.

Mr. McMillan: A supplementary question for the minister. Would the hon. gentleman be prepared to table in the House any written representations made by him or by the government to his counterparts in the United States, which would confirm to the concerned people in Canada, who doubt the government is taking the action that it promised in the election campaign, that action is, in fact, being taken?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I will certainly look into that. I am not sure if all the representations are written. I have met with Mr. Costle, the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, at least three times and have made representations to him directly. I will investigate and see what written follow-up has been made to those to see if it is appropriate to present them to the House. In that event I would relay the contents to the hon. member, who I know is interested in this matter.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER LEVEL OF POULTRY IMPORTS RENEGOTIATED

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, a minister who has contributed his fair share to the broken promises of his government. A prime example of this would be the tax on Ontario wines. I would refer also to his position on chicken imports. Because of the lack of appropriate action on his part, imports increased from about five million pounds to a level of about 65 million pounds. We moved in, established import levels and we reduced the level of these imports by 22 million pounds.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Wise: I am coming to my question, Madam Speaker. The minister indicated very clearly that he would renegotiate that level and that it would be reduced. I ask the minister—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I suppose the hon. member does have a question, and if so he should ask it now.

Mr. Wise: Well, I have posed the question, Madam Speaker. I am sure the minister does not find it necessary for me to repeat the question. He made a very definite promise to renegotiate that level and to reduce it. Has the hon. gentleman delivered on that promise or does it still remain today a broken promise?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Madam Speaker, the hon. member made several accusations in his preamble to what he called a question. The matter has not been without some investigation. We find, for instance, that the Ontario government makes twice as much as the federal government does on wine taxes. If he wants to be factual he should be factual about that also.

He talks about poultry. Poultry imports are less this year. Right now there are inquiries being made in Canada about poultry moving into the United States because we have provided that stable kind of government which leads to the kind of income for farmers in the poultry business that I know the hon. member supported before he was a minister. When he was a minister he also supported that kind of market operation. The Americans are over here now because they have been producing poultry for over a year at below cost of production, so they are now making inquiries from Canada and asking: Can we buy poultry from you? The trade is switched in a different way, mainly because our producers are economically better off; they are viable, economic entities. So if the hon.

member wants to take a little bit of credit for that, Madam Speaker, I have no objection.

We have had some difficulties trying to arrange a meeting because of the unsettled political situation in the United States of America. They are faced with an election. The meeting has been scheduled at least twice, and if I remember correctly it was not my doing that it was cancelled. It was cancelled on their part.

● (1500)

Mr. Wise: Madam Speaker, the obvious answer is that this remains today as a broken promise. In the third area, the minister made some very definite commitment that he would enlarge the Farm Credit Corporation and increase its funding. We increased the funding by some $50 million. Has the minister delivered on that promise or does it too remain a broken promise today?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member indicates what he has done, but he did not mention that he raised the interest rates of the Farm Credit Corporation at the same time, with the approval of the former president of the treasury board. I would remind the hon. member that the interest rate was recently lowered and also that one of the greatest virtues of all is patience. The hon. member will see that the Farm Credit Corporation will be what he wants, what I want and what we all want for agriculture in Canada very shortly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CALL FOR CESSATION OF UNITED STATES MILITARY AID

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whom we welcome back from his forays abroad. In light of increasing political murders of community, church and other human rights leaders in El Salvador, and in light of the accompanying rise in U.S. military aid to the repressive junta in that country, will the minister now undertake to urge the United States to cease its intervention in El Salvador and halt all military aid to the El Salvador regime?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the presupposition of that question puts the American government in a more unfavourable light than is immediately obvious, but I will undertake to look at that question.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, the present budget is around $5 million in military aid and is increasing by a similar amount this coming year unless we do something. Would the minister therefore, in addition to looking into the matter, instruct our observer at the Organization of American States meeting, which is beginning fairly soon, to express our concern about any continuing military intervention or military aid to that repressive regime?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, our information is that the so-called American aid is purely of a defensive nature, but we will look again at the facts and if the facts warrant, we will make representations.

AGRICULTURE

ESTABLISHMENT OF VETERINARY COLLEGE IN P.E.I. OR MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I understand that the minister had a meeting today with the Premier of Prince Edward Island. I am sure that, among many important things, they probably discussed the formation of the veterinary college in the maritimes. Could the minister tell the House whether or not he and the premier were able to come to any conclusions about the establishment of this college in Prince Edward Island or the maritimes?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I did have a meeting with the Premier of Prince Edward Island and we did talk about the veterinary college in Prince Edward Island or in the maritimes. He was seeking my support to bring the provinces together so that the veterinary college could be established and given the go-ahead. Naturally, the premier would like the college in Prince Edward Island and he recognizes that, if proper federal leadership was given, maybe it could become a fact. I also gathered from the meeting we had today that the Premier of Prince Edward Island is still a very strong federalist.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise merely to give notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege on the basis of answers given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period. My recollection is that the Prime Minister, on a number of occasions, intentionally misled the House on the basis of his contention that the provisions of the so-called resolution under the constitution, particularly section 42, provided for a deadlock-breaking referendum, and that that was the only time that the referendum could be used. I would like to reserve the right to look at the blues and Hansard in order to determine whether the Prime Minister in fact did mislead the House as I have suggested.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Point of Order—Mr. McGrath

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): More truth than fiction there.

An hon. Member: A prediction of the future.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I apologize profusely to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, but the example comes from high places. The Right Hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

[English]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would draw your attention to the blues also, and I would ask that before this question is discussed any further, you rule on the right of the hon. member to say, as he did, that I intentionally misled the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I have great respect for the rules and traditions of the House. In my zeal to make a point I may have used the word "intentionally". Parliamentary tradition being what it is, I certainly unequivocally withdraw that statement to the Prime Minister.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—PUBLIC OPINION POLLS—REPLY OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order arising out of a reply given today by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) with respect to releasing certain polls that were commissioned by the government. My point of order is based on the means which the minister has adopted to get these polls out to members of Parliament. For example, he did not take advantage of Standing Order 41(2) which provides that any minister may lay upon the table of the House any document.

I may have a question of privilege, because if the minister had in fact laid the polls on the table of the House, we would have been in a position to make a judgment as to whether or not an advertisement which appeared last week in the Financial Post entitled "A Subscription to the Goldfarb Report" does in fact constitute a very serious breach of the privileges of this House. One section of this full-page advertisement reads:

> In particular, the 1981 edition of The Goldfarb Report will include a detailed treatment of public attitudes toward the debate surrounding a new Canadian constitution.

It goes on to say where one may obtain the report. It would seem to me that up to this point what has been denied to the House is available through a professional consultant for a fee. This would seem to me to constitute a very serious breach of the privileges of every member of this House. I reserve the right to raise the matter later.

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration from Friday, October 10, 1980, of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 Members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, as the record shows I was able to get the Speaker's eye last Friday and begin my few remarks on a subject that is pretty fundamental and important and which obviously cuts to the very heart and soul of this country. I refer, of course, to the constitution.

Had I faced any problems in continuing my remarks they would have evaporated after the amazing exchange that occurred today between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister said, in effect, that the government will achieve its objective in going by the back door to England to amend the form of government that this country has known until now. We know that even going by the front door alterations affecting the Senate, could not be achieved in the Parliament of Canada, because of the Supreme Court. It is an amazing situation, Mr. Speaker. We may talk about trickery, sneakery or anything else, but when we are considering what the Prime Minister has called "the future and different form of government for Canada," we find out—at least, we on this side have, because we grasped the implications of the resolution—that any fundamental change to our constitution is not going to be effected in this Parliament but rather will be done on the banks of the Thames in London.

As I said on Friday, Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian I resent the fact that Canada's constitution is to be decided in England rather than in this capital of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: If there is a colonial, it is the Prime Minister, taking his teacup in hand and going to Buckingham Palace to have Great Britain decide what our rights are, what the equalization formula and the amending formula are under the terms of this 16-page resolution.

With all due respect to our senators, in my opinion, the other place is not the most fundamental part of government. I have always had a bias in this direction, one shared by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but if the Parliament of Canada could not change the form of the Senate using the front door, because it was held unconstitutional, why should we as Canadian legislators let the Prime Minister go through the back door in London in an effort to change the form of government which exists in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I know that my time is limited, Mr. Speaker, and that other members want to speak. I hope hon. members on both sides of the House representing this country from coast to coast will speak their thoughts on this resolution together with their thoughts about the future of this government.

In the question period, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) repeated the canard about patriation. In a memorable speech when this debate began a week ago last Monday, the Leader of the Opposition said unequivocally that we in Her Majesty's loyal opposition—and I believe also in the NDP—support patriation now, and the amending formula—at least the Vancouver proposal. If those two points were accepted, this resolution could be reduced to one page instead of 16.

Make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker; we support patriation. We do not want to hide behind the robes of the Queen. We want the people of Canada to find out what the future of the country is to be.

I am appalled at the report from the travelling duo, John and Mark, or Mark and John, the two apostles to London, the travelling horsemen. When they came back from London they said the parliament of Great Britain might take three or four days to debate this matter. Surely the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) knows that in the most important debate in recent times, the one concerning the admission of Great Britain to the European Common Market, parliament took only two days to pass the motion. Under their rules, the majority of debates take only one day. The question is put the day it is called, even though it may arise early in the morning of the following day. To suggest there would be three or four days of debate on a resolution coming from Canada merely accentuates the colonial status that the Prime Minister said he was so interested in doing away with when he spoke on television on Thursday night. There would be no need for that if we had a one-page resolution calling for patriation now and on amending formula on the Victoria or Vancouver proposal.

Speaking for myself, I would not be afraid of taking the whole matter to the people if, after a certain length of time for consultation, the premiers and the federal government did not agree on another proposal. We should at least bring the constitution back, though, and have the fight here in the Canadian House of Commons. But there must be consultation with the premiers of the country.

I have pointed out that under our system the civil law and the common law have ridden tandem for 113 years. For the first time, as a result of this proposal, they meet head on. In civil law you have to point to a piece of paper to establish a right, but under the common law that governs nine provinces, you and I, Mr. Speaker, have every right under the sun, except those which are proscribed by law. I am not saying which is wrong or which is right, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether Canadians realize that this resolution would change what has been the common law for nine provinces into a civil code whereby neither this parliament nor the provincial legislatures but the courts, would interpret and legislate that which affects us all. That is a fundamental problem that should not be discussed further at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. members opposite say we have to redeem a promise made to Quebec because of the vote there last May. Well, I am all for redeeming promises and honouring pledges, but it is very difficult to define what the pledge was. The Premier of Quebec, the leader of the opposition in Quebec, the New Democratic Party in Quebec and many columnists have said that this resolution does not redeem any pledge and that it may, in fact, even exacerbate the situation. Leaving that aside, Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister redeem a pledge to one part of the country while ignoring the larger responsibility to the country as a whole?

The Prime Minister can play with words. We know he is very adept at dialectical debate and evading questions within the circumscription of the question period. He did not answer the question put to him. Section 42, which provides for an amending procedure by referendum, is not a deadlock-breaking procedure or mechanism. The majority of premiers, representing over 50 per cent of the people of this country, along with members of this loyal opposition, have said, as did our leader that same Thursday night on television, that section 42 is not a deadlock-breaking mechanism. It has the potential to be a hammer-lock on the fundamental structure of this land, the federal system. That is why we cannot support the resolution as it is presently drafted.

In trying to come to some kind of rationale and in trying to move with the momentum that has been built up, albeit well organized over the summer, with the travelling ministers and the ads that we have heard about and talked about, as well as listening to the speakers, including the Prime Minister as he spoke here again today of "Fifty-three years of failure", I suggest there may have been failure and undoubtedly there have been problems in 53 years of federal-provincial conferences. But this country called Canada has not failed for 53 years in spite of a constitutional problem. This country has grown and developed. I hate to admit it but obviously it has developed more so because of the majority government under the Liberal rule. I have to give credit where credit is due, because the Liberals have been in power, unfortunately, for too long. Is the Prime Minister trying to suggest that the 53 years of constitutional problems and failure have made a failure of this country, which has the broadest and best social programs in the world? Canada is a country from coast to coast which so far we have been proud. I say to hon. members that conferences have created problems, as undoubtedly they will again in the future. But 53 years of problems in federal-provincial conferences do not detract from what we have done in those 53 years in spite of those problems.

I ask hon. members to listen to a thought I had when trying to rationalize the present haste to do something. I shall not go back to the 1930s or to read from "The Third Reich" or read statements made by businessmen after the depression and the problems with the mark. Inflation escalated then because the economic problems became so intense and the businessmen, together with the Junkers, were saying "Let us get someone who will do something". Someone came and did something. He did many things. But when there is too much haste one cannot repent in leisure if one is talking about the constitution. The quiet revolution which we all accept has really been the catalyst initially for this momentum of change. The quiet revolution in Quebec started in the 1950s. If it has taken from the 1950s to now—

An hon. Member: The 1960s.

Mr. Nowlan: Say the 1960s, that is even better. But surely if the quiet revolution in Quebec quite justifiably pinpointed problems in this federation that needed to be redressed, why is this government so hasty? In another part of the country, the west, there were other festering sores. But in the 1950s or the 1960s, which is 12 years or 22 years depending on whether you want to date it from Jean Lesage of maître chez nous or later, there has been a decade or more of festering sores in Quebec which have finally prompted some action for constitutional review. I ask why are we not using the same standard for another fundamental part of the country, the west, so that it too can have a chance to get some redress for their grievances through consultation and conference rather than confrontation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: You do not just go from the snare and the delusion of unanimity, and the fact that unanimity is next to impossible, to unilateral action. There is no need to go from one extreme to another. By the position of this party takes in favour of patriation on the basis of the Vancouver proposal, we are prepared to admit that unanimity is not the way in practice, even though it is the ideal. There should be no more canards or pretence from the other side that unanimity is a necessity and that because you do not have unanimity you have therefore to proceed with unilateral action.

Is it just because the present Prime Minister wears a halo putting him in communication with some extraterrestrial beings that he has the almighty, divine power to do unilaterally what a fellow called Mackenzie King did not do; what a fellow called St. Laurent did not do; what a fellow called Mr. Pearson did not do, or what that greatest tyrant of all, John Diefenbaker, did not do? Just imagine if Mr. Diefenbaker were sitting there today moving unilaterally against the aspirations of the emerging quiet revolution from Quebec. You would have seen all the columnists in those one-paper towns—not one-horse towns—writing very objective columns such as, "Mr. Diefenbaker, you are a tyrant; you are a despot, you are dictatorial." The Prime Minister talks about the tyranny of unanimity. I suggest you cannot answer the tyranny of unanimity with dictatorial unilateral action which fundamentally runs across every constitutional convention that we have respected in this country for 113 years. There is not a member in this House who believes this country would ever have come together if John A. Macdonald had said: "Boys, come here because I am going to act unilaterally." When you breach the convention of consensus, you are breaching the fundamental fabric of this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I have tried to understand how we could be in this position today, debating unilateral action as the answer to the falsehood of unanimity? We want patriation and we know that unanimity is not going to give it. We do not care. We want the Vancouver proposal at least.

In trying to figure this out, I suggest there is a flaw in our federalism today. Even Premier Blakeney, who I heard last night on television, suggested there is a flaw in our federalism. I commend this to those who do not get west of the Lakehead too often because we all want Canada to stay together in some form. But having been in the west and having practised law there for eight years, and having been west this summer, let me say the feeling I have grasped out there has scared me. This feeling is transmitted through moderates and transplants from the east who said this summer, "We do not care. Go your way." They did not say it emotionally as they said it two years ago. They did not talk about French on cornflakes boxes. It is way beyond that. The flaw in this federalism has at least three parts. One is the federal-provincial procedure in evidence at the last two conferences, anyway. I suggest that historically, to counter the powerful federal presence, there has always been a strong counterbalance of one, if not both, of the two senior governments in this country. To counter the federal government, one needed at least Quebec, Ontario, or both, to present another point of view.

I am not going to go too far on this aspect, Mr. Speaker, but we know that today the government of Quebec, for its own reasons, is not really interested in being a counterbalance to the federal point of view. Unfortunately this was apparent in the last federal-provincial conference, and even in the one before. It was manifested on television screens. It was clear. It was apparent yesterday that the great province of Ontario, for its reasons, has not been a counterbalance to the strong federal presence. This has distorted part of the history of federal-provincial conferences. When you compound that imbalance with the second ingredient, which is in this chamber, never has there been more of an imbalance in the representation of different areas of the country. When you get an imbalance in federal-provincial conferences without the two senior governments historically being a counterbalance to the federal presence and then get a distorted House of Commons, the situation becomes even more difficult. As we all know, Conservatives were shut out of Quebec and thereby do not get the voice as directly as they should. On the other side of the coin, west of the Lakehead, there are those two lonely outposts with a mere two members on the government side, also unable to give a clear voice from the west.

The government does not have western representation in its caucus. I say this with all respect to the senators who try to be surrogates but who cannot be because they do not have to face the people at election time. Most of them are converts anyway, and therefore suspect—the Olsons and those other fellows.

Speaking of Senator Olson, the Minister of State for Economic Development, according to the Vancouver Sun for October 11, he said in Edmonton that he does not favour Prime Minister Trudeau's constitutional amending formula. He said, "My personal preference is the Alberta proposal." That is another whole thing which the Prime Minister will have to tackle. Perhaps at some time a prime minister might have said, "It is time to move unilaterally". Perhaps in Mr. Diefenbaker's day in 1958 when there were 208 members, 50 from Quebec on the government side, a prime minister not respectful of provincial jurisdiction might have said he had the troops with representation from all sides and could therefore move unilaterally. However, if there was ever a time when unilateral action should not take place, it is when this House of Commons is as distorted as it is now in representation.

This is compounded by what I said earlier, the phenomenon we see in this country of "one-paper towns." In a one-paper town you get one type of editorial policy. In a one-paper town the message does not get out. Here we have the other side of the coin, using television for manipulation through advertising. We all know that the television medium is the message. It is very good for propaganda, but it does not get the message out. When you get these ingredients, this flaw in federalism, you start to get false notions about what this country is all about.

The Prime Minister said over television that Thursday night, we should not have a checkerboard across this country. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) commented that in terms of our history and social fabric, "checkerboard" is not a pejorative word. The reality is this: when you get outside of Ottawa, west of the Lakehead or into the deep east of Atlantic Canada, it is not a checkerboard but a mosaic of people from different countries who have made this country the way it is.

There is no way in which the Prime Minister can homogenize the Canadian personality from coast to coast to produce some superhuman or Canadianized individual. We are from very different regions. Different groups of new Canadians have formed the vitality of those regions. You do not get homogeny.

The whole insular thinking of Ottawa was shown by the Prime Minister on that Thursday night when he said we do not want a checkerboard and that is why these rights must apply to everybody.

Let us look at question of rights. There is a double standard here. I will not go too far down the road, because the subject does not involve me as much as many sincere members across the way who are from Quebec. However, there is a real paradox when you talk about rights. Some members across the way have made very impassioned speeches about freedom when it comes to rights, yet no freedom of choice for education. This leads to a double standard. I just throw the observation out.

In terms of the amending formula, my leader said there was a double standard. I say there is a triple standard. There is unilateral action today if you are the Prime Minister, unanimity if you are among the premiers for the next two years and a referendum for the people who are not part of those first two groups. There is a triple standard, so let us not talk too much about standards.

I know my time is moving very quickly. However, there are many things I would like to say in terms of the bill of rights. While the language of a bill of rights is something I can accept, I have real apprehension about the dangers of entrenchment. There is a snare and delusion along with entrenchment.

I have here the constitutions of the U.S.S.R., Cuba, Chile, the German Democratic Republic and East Germany. If I had the time to read the sections I have outlined, you would hear beautiful prose about the rights of people, equality, no eavesdropping, judicial systems that are perfect and so on. The most beautiful bills of rights are in these constitutions. However, there is the strange paradox that you more often see an entrenched bill of rights in the constitutions of totalitarian governments than in other parts of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Just like Idi Amin.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): As in the U.S.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member refers to the United States. Did that bill of rights help the Japanese Americans any more than Japanese Canadians who did not have any? Not at all. Take our bill of rights, so called. Fifty-one years ago this month, women in this country finally received a constitutional status. When Nellie Murphy was appointed to the Senate, a woman was finally acknowledged to be a person and could therefore be appointed. Until that time there were no women in the Senate. They were not persons.

The Supreme Court of Canada refused to acknowledge that women were people and could be appointed to the Senate. It was the Privy Council of England which made the final decision. Now that right of appeal has been taken away. She was not a person and they made her a person.

Imagine if that situation had arisen with an entrenched bill of rights in 1929. The last real constitutional change was in 1927. We would be in the snare that is troubling the United States right now with their ERA amendment, trying to amend a constitution to make women people. Thank goodness we were able to make that appeal to England. But even without such recourse we could have done it by our own statute.

My time is very limited, so I will conclude even though there are many other things I would like to say. In terms of the bill of rights, what bothers me most is that another level of government is being established which will interpret the rights. I do not have time to review the rights. Capital punishment will be affected as will the rights of unions. Will there be boys and girls mixed basketball teams, because there is no discrimination between the sexes? Will retirement still be compulsory in many cases at certain ages? Will the Senate go on in perpetuity? There are many questions which arise.

What is important is that you cannot revise the constitution unless you reform this House of Commons. It would take a long time to convince me to go for entrenchment because under our system at the moment, we do not have the other ingredient that comes with entrenchment, a legislative sanction or review of judges. Do we want to go the American way and elect our judges? Will judges at least come before some committee of this House for questioning? Unless we start to hammer this out, we will see a real mutation take place.

The Secretary of State is not here, but other ministers heard him say at the federal-provincial conference that those who are against rights must be in favour of the pressure lobby. Do you want to litigate rights or do you want to exercise pressure and talk to your member of Parliament? The minister said at the federal-provincial conference that the option when talking about rights is to litigate or to lobby. My answer to that is, if you litigate you have to pay a lawyer. When you lobby, the legislature has a chance to vote on the problem you want changed.

How many members opposite appreciate that the Habeas Corpus Act of 1670, the Bill of Rights Act of 1689—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order!

Mr. Nowlan: In conclusion, you do not build for the future by breaking faith with the past and by unilateral action. Yet that is what is being done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to take part in this debate and particularly to have the opportunity to follow the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan). Maybe later in my comments I will touch upon a number of the points which he made in his spirited intervention.

I have attempted to follow the debate from the beginning. It is an interesting debate. For the most part, it has been a serious attempt by members of the House of Commons to deal with a fundamentally important matter. I hope the conclusion or the outcome of this debate will permit us to begin in a concrete way the process of constitutional renewal which we promised the people of Quebec in the course of the referendum and which, in my view, is in accordance with the deep wishes of the Canadian people.

Before discussing the motion put forward by the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) I would like to express to him my appreciation for the difficult work he did in the course of the summer. I know he is disappointed that it did not have the same result as the previous campaign in which he participated, but I am confident that the constitutional discussions held this summer will eventually bear fruit.

I want to disagree with the cast and approach of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants. I disagree with him that Parliament in the present circumstances should not be asked to act on this very important resolution. In fact, I believe Parliament has a duty to act and it has a duty to act now in order to bring home the constitution, in order to entrench in the constitution fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians, in order to entrench in the constitution the principle of equalization, sharing, and also to set in motion a procedure whereby a definitive amending formula can be developed, and that, too, entrenched in the new patriated constitution.

Even the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants agreed that it is necessary to patriate the Constitution of Canada. It is simply not normal for constitutional acts of this country to be the laws of a foreign parliament. That abnormal situation is obviously humiliating for Canada and it is embarrassing for the United Kingdom. We are all convinced that this final remnant of colonialism should disappear from the Canadian political scene. All political parties in the House of Commons and all provincial governments agree with this aspect of the resolution.

There is obviously no disagreement on the principle at stake; there may be disagreement on the procedure. In fact, there has been an interesting shift in the debate, not only in the House of Commons but among the provincial premiers, away from substance to process. That to me is a very important development.

It is necessary also to settle on an amending formula. Every state must have some way of changing its fundamental law, and it is obvious that this requirement is even more important in a federal state where the constituent parts, the provinces and the federal government, must be involved in the constitutional changes which affect all of us.

Canadians want constitutional change; they want constitutional renewal and they cannot have that without an amending formula. That is why in my view it is necessary for Parliament to act as well on an amending formula.

It is necessary also to entrench fundamental rights and freedoms.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. MacEachen: One hon. member asks why. It is my view that the Canadian people, perhaps for deep reasons of their own, maybe deeper than we all can understand, want to have their fundamental rights and freedoms protected and guaranteed by the constitution. I firmly believe that this is the wish of the Canadian people, and I believe it is the duty of Parliament to respond to that wish of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The resolution moved by the Minister of Justice provides for a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms binding upon Parliament, all provincial legislatures and all governments. Of course, the Minister of Justice in his introductory speech outlined in some detail the substance of that charter of rights and freedoms. He said:

> Some have told us that provincial legislatures are better able than courts to protect the rights and freedoms of Canadians. If rights and freedoms were to be dependent upon individual governments, there would be no such thing as rights and freedoms common to all Canadians. I believe that Canadians wherever they live in Canada should have common rights and freedoms.

That statement was made by the Minister of Justice, and I agree with the effort contained in the resolution to provide rights and freedoms that are commonly applicable to all Canadians in every part of this country.

I know there is a case to be made for parliamentary sovereignty—there is no doubt about that. I have often made the case, but I have not been as schizophrenic as members of the opposition have been on this question of parliamentary sovereignty and the rights of Parliament.

Today Parliament has been given an opportunity to deal with this great challenge and opportunity facing the future of Canada. The Parliament of Canada; the members of Parliament representing all the people of Canada, have been asked to deal with this question, yet members somehow shrink away from that opportunity and that challenge. I cannot understand this. I cannot understand why we ought to fall into the trap suggested by persons like Premier Lévesque, that somehow the elected representatives of the people of Canada are "Ottawa guys". He repeated that last night. I do not happen to be an "Ottawa guy". I happen to be a representative of the people of an important part of Canada in the province of Nova Scotia, and I regard every other member of Parliament, not as an "Ottawa guy", but as a person who has been given a mandate by his electors to come to the Parliament of Canada and to deliberate in the Parliament of Canada, and it happens, by accident and not by the intrinsic nature of our mandate, that the location of these deliberations is Ottawa. Let us have no more talk about "Ottawa guys". Why shrink from the opportunity to deal with this important matter in the Parliament of Canada?

I believe, if I may say so, Mr. Speaker, that it is also necessary to entrench in the constitution the principle of equalization. The idea of sharing is one of the most significant features of Canada and of Canadian federalism. I hope we will do everything in our power to nourish the concept of sharing, the concept of equalization which is now proposed in this resolution. Successive governments have given support to this principle and it has led to an array of federal policies and programs which now form part of our national consensus.

For example, if I may use just one or two statistics to show the significance of this concept, at present, fiscal equalization, which has been a separate and distinct program since 1957-58, will require during the current year total disbursements in excess of $3.3 billion, and payments to the provinces from the federal treasury in 1980-81 will amount to $12.5 billion.

Because I think it is important, I will mention also that a theme very frequently emphasized by members of Parliament and many others during the Quebec referendum was the theme of sharing. It is also worth noting that it was the concept which received the widest consensus among the provincial governments.

I want to assure the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), who expressed some concern about the wording on equalization in the resolution, that the wording conforms with a proposal, as I understand it, which was made by the province of British Columbia and which could very well have had the support of some other provinces, contrary to his impression that we have brought forward a formulation of equalization which was rejected by nine provinces of Canada.

We are firmly committed to the principle of equalization. We do not need this in order to make direct payments to individuals, as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville implied. We do not need it, indeed, to continue the program of equalization. But we do believe it is important to enshrine this concept in a constitution of Canada so that sharing will be an important ingredient or element in the future of our national life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: In my opinion it is necessary for Parliament to act, for the reasons I have mentioned, to make these forward steps in the way of entrenchment of human rights, in the way of seeking an amending formula and in the way of embedding the concept of equalization in the constitution. It is necessary for Parliament to act if these things are going to be done, but I believe I can carry the argument further and say that it is urgent for Parliament to act because Parliament is the only institution in the country which is capable of and responsible for maintaining and upholding Canadian sovereignty.

All of us would agree, for example, that Parliament must act to protect the territorial sovereignty of Canada from military threat. All of us would agree that the Parliament of Canada should act to protect the economic sovereignty of Canada from encroachment by foreign powers. I suggest that this function of the Parliament of Canada is not a symbolic function. It is not just a mirage that I am seeing when I talk about the important role of the Parliament of Canada. Witness the efforts of the Parliament of Canada at the United Nations Law of the Sea Conference to secure for Canada better protection for our fisheries and sovereign rights over the natural resources of the continental shelf. A single legislature or combination of legislatures or a single provincial government or a combination of them could not achieve what was achieved by Canada in extending the jurisdiction over the living resources of the sea 200 miles offshore. That was accomplished by the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada acting in a way which could not be emulated by any other institution in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I ask, why should the Parliament of Canada not be asked now to act to secure Canada's constitutional sovereignty? Parliament is the only institution in the country which represents all Canadians and also the only one which can request constitutional action from Westminster. Hon. members opposite who believe in the rights of Parliament ought to be rather pleased that they have been called upon by the government at this time in our history to reinforce the place of Parliament in our national life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, your holiness. That is very nice of you.

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has said that a constitution cannot be imposed arbitrarily on this nation by one individual or government. No one could disagree with that. The constitution cannot be imposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or by the ministry. Action on the constitution can be taken only by the Parliament of Canada, Canadians themselves acting through their elected representatives in Parliament. I find it very strange that at this stage in our history when Parliament, which is the only institution in the country which can act this way, is being, in a sense, put off course by comments and debating points by members of the opposition.

Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition went so far as to say that to do what we are now proposing to do would weaken the federal system. I find that to be a curious and impossible argument. I think it would be Parliament's failure to act which would more undermine our federal system at this point in time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that if the Parliament of Canada, our most important national institution and the only institution capable of acting for all the people of Canada, failed to act, our system of government would lose some of its credibility in the minds of the Canadian people, many of whom are watching what is going on and asking when we are going to make some progress.

I agree with the comments which have been made by the constitutional committee of the Canadian Bar Association, which stated that the entrenchment of a bill of rights and freedoms would strengthen our sense of Canadian unity. The committee said that a clear statement in the constitution of the fundamental values of Canada, the fundamental values which Canadians share, should have an important unifying effect.

The Premier of Ontario returned to the same theme at the first ministers' conference recently, and I think it is worth repeating what the Premier of Ontario said at that time when commenting upon the effect of entrenching a charter of rights. He said, and I quote:

> It is in this way, we believe, our democracy will be rooted in the consciousness of every Canadian and, we think, strengthened as a result.

I agree with that, because if there is, in the consciousness of every Canadian, the unshakable conviction that his rights and freedoms are beyond tampering, are protected and beyond touch, then that certainty increases the appreciation of the citizen and the loyalty of that citizen to the country.

I believe we have now in the Parliament of Canada a unique opportunity to establish in the constitution the values we all share, namely, the rights and freedoms that should be and have been an intrinsic part of our way of life. I go on to say that instead of weakening the federal system, what we are doing, in the way of mobility rights, for example, will strengthen the economic union which in my view is also an indispensable part of our existence. I would add that the entrenching of language minority rights, instead of weakening the federal system, will strengthen it by giving Canadians the right to send their children to school in their own official language where there are sufficient numbers of the minority language to justify a school. I do not think that our federal system is strong if our language minorities are not protected in our constitution. How can anyone argue that such a step is going to weaken Canadian federalism? It deals with a problem that has long been unattended and I will return to that in a moment as well.

Do not tell me, Mr. Speaker, that this proposal will weaken our federal system. The proposed resolution will reinforce federalism as well by strengthening the constitutional position of the provinces. We have heard many unhappy, sorrowful statements, as if the provinces were threatened by this resolution. They are not threatened. The contrary is the case. Their constitutional position is strengthened. For example, until we change the constitution, the joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate is the only requirement for constitution change. Under the resolution, provinces will be necessary participants in the procedure for constitutional amendment, and under the constitution act of 1980, provinces would have the right to initiate amendments. No final amending formula would be adopted without the provinces being consulted, and this will become a legal obligation and will no longer be based on the validity of whatever conventions may exist.

The unanimity rule for amending the constitution which will prevail for two years will also give the provinces a rather strong position. I admit readily, willingly, and without a trace of apology that the resolution provides for national referendums. I would make just two observations on that much overbruised concept—bruised by the opposition. First, the proposed procedure would not be in force for two years after enactment, so that there would be ample time during this period to reach unanimous agreement, if possible, on an alternate amending formula. Second, our proposal simply reflects the government's view that, in the end, sovereignty rests with the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I am ready to take my stand anywhere in this country in saying to the people that if governments, federal or provincial, fail after a serious and determined effort, I would be prepared to give the resolution of that deadlock or failure to the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: It does not say that.

Mr. MacEachen: That is a very strong Liberal position to be taken at this present time.

An hon. Member: Phony!

Mr. MacEachen: I believe also that the resolution will bring major benefits to the people of Canada. Last August I was invited to address the final event in the three hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary celebrations of the settling of the Acadians in Nova Scotia. Three hundred and seventy-five years ago the Acadians came to my province and to other parts of the maritimes. There we were in a thriving Acadian community, Cheticamp, in the northern part of Inverness County, celebrating what I thought was a marvellous anniversary because here was a culture still living, a language still spoken, and all the attributes of life, vigour and confidence. They had survived just barely—I could say more about that—over the years and they have had to survive in all those years within a basically standardized Anglophone educational system. That is what happened.

I do not want to rehearse history, but I am delighted that this particular resolution will provide to the Acadians in my constituency in the counties of Inverness, Richmond and Antigonish, the opportunity, if the parents so wish, for children to be educated in the French language. They will have legal recourse if this venture, this enterprise, succeeds, a right which has never existed in the past. I find it very difficult as a representative of those Acadians not to be deeply touched at the opportunity I shall have when this motion comes to the vote to stand in this House on their behalf and, I hope, by this act of Parliament vindicate their patience and their confident expectation that ultimately justice would be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about another matter which, while of great interest to Canada as a whole, is of particular interest to the Atlantic provinces, namely, the resource question. The NDP has indicated its support for the motion depending on what we do on resources.

An hon. Member: Not all of them.

Mr. MacEachen: I say to my old friend and my young friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that the NDP have never stopped trading—the party is still trading, and here they are again. That is all right, someone else is dealing with that particular aspect of the discussions, but I want to say a word about the question of offshore resources. During the constitutional talks this summer and during this parliamentary debate it has often been suggested that offshore resources should be treated like onshore resources. What this contention simply ignores is that offshore resources are different. Through international negotiations Canada acquired for all Canadians, not only for the residents of the coastal provinces, sovereign rights over the continental shelf for the purpose of exploring it and exploiting its natural resources. I emphasize the fact that Canada's boundaries, Canada's territory, has not been extended, although there are certain persons and groups who believe Canada's boundaries and territory have been extended and that therefore it gives us an opportunity to extend the boundaries of the provinces. There can be no question of extending the boundaries of the provinces since the boundaries of the country as a whole have not been extended. But we have sovereign rights over the continental shelf for the purpose of exploring it and exploiting its natural resources.

● (1610)

It is interesting to observe that at the same time several provinces are arguing that they should have complete control over offshore resources, the international community has accepted the principle of sharing the wealth of the high seas among all countries, not only among coastal states. While all the premiers in Canada would apparently reject the notion that our offshore is part of the heritage of all Canadians the concept of the common heritage of mankind has been accepted internationally, as far as the international seabed is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: What an irony! It is a fact, and it is ironic as well. But I will not pursue that line except to say that given the economic situation in Atlantic Canada and the importance of offshore mineral resource development for the residents of that region and despite our legal position, the federal government nonetheless made what I consider to have been a very reasonable offer to the coastal provinces at the first ministers' conference. During the constitutional discussions the federal government proposed that until they become affluent coastal provinces receive the same kinds of revenues from offshore resources as are derived by provinces with onshore resources. After that point the revenues would be shared with all Canadians.

The Prime Minister did say during the first ministers' conference—and I think it is worth repeating—the following on this point: the federal government believes that when a province grows wealthy enough to stand on its own feet it should then begin to share its wealth with the rest of the country. That is the vision of Canada we are offering to Canadians, one in which we all grow strong by helping each other. And that is another proposition I would be prepared to stand on in any part of Canada, including my own province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I do not wish to say anything further, except I would not like the occasion created by the failure to agree at the constitutional conference to be used to foster alienation in the province of Nova Scotia on the question of the offshore because there is no basis for building the feeling of alienation which seems to be embarked upon at the present time in my province. The fact of the matter is, I have before me some statements from the Premier of Nova Scotia and, later, from a member of the delegation, saying that the province of Nova Scotia recognizes that the federal government has an important role in the offshore, that intensive negotiations have taken place between the Government of Canada and Nova Scotia, that there is a wide area of agreement and that the province and the Government of Canada were close to an agreement and that, indeed, the expectation was expressed that an agreement would be reached. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, through you to the House of Commons and elsewhere, speaking about the situation in Nova Scotia, that the reasonable offer made by the Government of Canada at the first ministers' conference was such that it almost resulted in an agreement with the province of Nova Scotia and I have no doubt that if all the other elements had fallen into place there would have been a clear, firm agreement between my province and the Government of Canada. We ought to build on that situation into the future, in Nova Scotia rather than embark upon a fruitless and unproductive effort to create alienation and build up resentment against the Government of Canada where there is no basis for such resentment to exist.

I see I am drawing close to the end of the time allotted to me for my remarks. Before concluding I would like to thank members of the House for giving me close attention and for listening to what I have said in this debate. I hope other members will have an opportunity either now or in committee, or later on when the report comes from the committee, to express their opinion on this all-important subject. What we are doing is asking the Parliament of Canada to act on this resolution because it is the only institution in Canada that is capable of acting. We are asking the Parliament of Canada to act because it was not possible to reach an agreement with the provinces at the first ministers' conference. Yesterday, at the conference of provincial premiers in Toronto, it was evident that even the ten premiers could not agree among themselves. Is disagreement and inaction to be the permanent formula in the constitutional field? We say no. We say we have tried. Disagreement is continuing and it is now time to move. May I say in conclusion, maybe as a footnote to irony, that I could hardly believe my ears and eyes this morning when I heard and read that the premiers of the provinces were going to the courts, that they were taking what ought to be a political debate and political battle for the minds and support of the Canadian people to the courts for settlement. That from a group who argued for a whole day during the first ministers' conference that it was inappropriate to entrust the fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians to the courts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to make the point that I welcome the opportunity to be able to speak on this matter. As one who was able to spend some time throughout the summer and, indeed, over the last month or two on the matter of the constitution, I do not mind saying that it has been a most difficult subject with which to deal from our side of the fence. There are some good reasons for this situation.

First of all, most of my constituents are concerned about jobs, inflation, budgets, pensions and medicare. Those are the things which bother them on a daily basis and which will bother them in the near future. They realize this and they want to know why we are not dealing with these matters. Second, much of what they understood of the constitutional debate came to them through discussions either by the federal government or through debates between the federal government and the provincial premiers. Much of what would engage their attention in those discussions did not seem to bring them directly into considerations as to what issues are at stake.

The third reason for the situation is that the people were faced with what I can only call the $6 million man, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), who was able to take the constitutional matters before this country and reduce them into the most simplistic terms possible, the kinds of terms which would sell pancakes, cornflakes or any other commodity.

I have found it much easier in the past few weeks to deal with the constitution because the people in the riding of Rosedale, and I would venture to say in the city of Toronto and metropolitan Toronto, with whom I have been in touch, are finally beginning to understand that there is more to the proposal than meets the eye. It is not merely the desire on the part of everyone to bring home the constitution. Every Canadian would like that to happen. But that is not what we are doing; that is only what they were told we are doing.

Once one gets that clear, and into the constitution itself, they realize an old truth, which is that constitutions are indeed very important to them. Changes to constitutions change the relationship between people, between governments and between people and governments. Unless those changes are rooted in principles upon which we agree, then we will not have either social or economic stability in this country. Until we have social and economic stability through the constitution we will not be able to deal adequately with problems related to inflation, jobs, pensions, medicare and all those things which affect people directly.

During discussions with my constituents and other people in Toronto, we have an interesting time because we try to remember much of the history which we were taught so that we can understand the proposals that are before us and what might be good for the country in the future. Constitutional proposals can get very complicated, but the principles behind those proposals and, indeed, behind the Constitution of Canada, are not complicated. There are five fundamental principles which animate and organize the Canadian constitution. I would like to deal with those five principles because I want to measure the proposals from the government against them.

The first principle is that of national union. I emphasize this because very often we forget that the first purpose in 1867 was to organize a national union. Indeed, the wording in the British North America Act is never "confederation" but "union". There is no doubt that when the British North America Act was organized from 1864 to 1867, the fathers knew, or felt at any rate, that they were creating a new nationality. Let me offer a few short quotes to show what people in those days felt they were doing when it came to national union. D'Arcy McGee said:

> I hope to see the day . . . when there will be no other term to our patriotism, but the common name of Canadian, without the prefix of either French or British.

Cartier said:

> The great object and the great question was whether there could not be any means devised by which the great national fragments comprised in each of the British American provinces could be brought together and made into a great nation.

A new nationality meant something that had not existed before, something obviously different from the old status of a British colony. Colonel Gray of Prince Edward Island said that it needs no prophet to foretell that the day would come when we would take our place among the nations of the world.

The library in our Parliament abounds with quotations to explain that we were not only dealing with the regions and the provinces. Indeed, as someone from the other side of the House said, "We are more than the sum of our parts". This country is more than the sum of its parts and the first principle was national unity.

I emphasize that it was a national union organized by Canadians. One of the things which bothered me about the advertising of my old friend, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, was the assumption that somehow the confederation and constitution under which we have lived all these years was made by somebody other than Canadians. It not only offends me because it is wrong, but because it is not helpful. Most people do not understand their own history and if that history is distorted, then it hurts the chance of people understanding what the changes will mean to them.

In fact, there were only two changes to the constitution suggested by the British Parliament at the time. One dealt with the Senate and the other dealt with the name of Canada. The Fathers of Confederation wanted to call it the kingdom of Canada and the British felt that this would upset the Americans so they settled on "dominion".

The second principle is, in a sense, almost the reverse of the first because it dealt with an entirely different reality of Canada. Not only were we building a new nationality, but we were also making sure that the old allegiances were maintained and nurtured. That is why in section 92 of the British North America Act all the exclusive powers of the provinces are listed. The second principle is security of provincial powers. It is important that we recognize why the Fathers of Confederation went to that trouble. The regions and provinces in Canada have their own particular role to play. It is the sense of identity which is brought to the people living in those regions. I remember reading an essay some years ago by Northrop Frye who was looking at the mandate for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at the time. The CBC is charged with the responsibility of maintaining programs in order to further the unity and identity of Canada. Frye pointed out that for the most part unity and identity in Canada are different things, that unity, obviously, means central but identity is most often local.

Indeed, when it comes to the arts, culture, writing music, writing poetry or expression, there is something "vegetable" about it as Frye said. It needs a local environment in which to grow. That does not only apply to Canada. There are no "American writers"; there are writers from New England, writers from the south, writers from Manhattan and southern California. If one goes to Britian, the writers are either from South Wales or from some other section. Imagination about the kind of culture in which we live is rooted in the locality. Attention to the difference between these two principles is fundamental.

The third principle deals with parliamentary government. The preamble says we intend to organize in Canada a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. People in those days knew what they meant when they said "united kingdom". If one looks at a book called "The Constitutions of Nations"—which, by the way, I picked up at the Cabbagetown library, one does not find Canada in there.

Under the heading "Constitutions of Nations", in the reference to the United Kingdom we find: Magna Carta, 1215; The Petition of Right, 1627; Bill of Rights, 1688; The Act of Settlement, 1700; Acts of Union, 1707; Parliament Act, 1911; Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925; and Statute of Westminster, 1931.

A number of others are also mentioned. When people at that time talked about the third principle, that being the parliamentary system or parliamentary government, they knew they were talking about self-government, free institutions and the Crown. That is what it meant to them.

Most important of all, what it meant to them concerned the common law. The best definition of what it meant to them that I know of is given by Dicey. He said that with the British, and indeed, with the British parliamentary system, the law of the constitution, the rules which in foreign countries naturally become part of the constitutional code, are not the source, but are the consequence of rights of individuals as defined and enforced by the courts.

What Dicey was saying—and it is very imporant—is that in the common law the constitution is not the source of rights; the constitution, in fact, is a consequence of those rights already existing. That means they cannot be taken away. We do not have to be beholden to a federal government to give us rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: The source of those rights is more than 1,000 years old; the source of those rights is something that can be recorded in a constitution. It galls me, Mr. Speaker, to hear people say that somehow a government is giving rights to the people. Governments do not do that; rights belong to people and they can either be protected or not protected. That is the significant difference.

The fourth principle has to do with the protection of rights. A moment ago I spoke of the way the common law was dealt with and the role it played in the parliamentary system. There has been a lot of discussion about whether it is better to have entrenched rights or common law rights. Personally I favour common law rights. Someone once said the choice is between judges and politicians, but someone wiser asked: which judge, which politician? There are some politicians that I would trust and others that I would not. I think it is important to recognize that in Canada we did not settle solely for the British system of common law, nor did we adopt only the civil code in the tradition of what was then the province of Quebec. In the old Canadian way, we used both.

The fourth principle, the principle of the protection of rights is done in two ways in this country, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it is done through the common law. The rights of Canadians in the common law are also entrenched, if you like, in the constitution—in the British North America Act itself.

I am not a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, but I would refer you to the Supreme Court Reports 1938 where a case involving the courts in Alberta is reported. In a statement, Chief Justice Duff gives credence to the argument that so long as the word "parliament" is used in the constitution, there you have the bill of rights—the bill of rights that is 1,000 years old.

The argument that somehow there is a split between entrenchment and common law is an artificial one. First of all, we find in the British North America Act the ancient rights arising throughout the centuries of common law. Second, when we wanted to deal with rights which were peculiar to the Canadian experience, we spelled them out in specific sections. We entrenched those as well.

Let me give some examples. Section 133 writes into the constitution language rights with respect to the French and English. Section 92(12) and section 93 deal with religious rights. Section 92(13) deals with property and civil rights. The civil code in Quebec is protected through exclusion by section 94. Democratic rights are also found in the British North America Act as is representation by population which is guaranteed by section 51. An independent judiciary is guaranteed by section 99. An annual session of parliament is guaranteed by section 20.

I cite those elements because it bothers me that somehow we have tried to divide ourselves on the question of whether we support the common law or support the courts, and entrenchment of rights into the constitution. The tradition of this country is that we do both and both are clearly important to us. The reason is that the principle of the protection of rights is always rooted in two important considerations: the first is equity and the second is security.

In the British North America Act we find the ancient language of the Quebec Act of 1774. At that time people talked about property and civil rights. That act is now 206 years of age but it guarantees freedom of religion, legal rights and property and civil rights. The same language was used in 1867 as was used in 1774. I emphasize those historical facts, Mr. Speaker, because they are a cut above the argument that what we are doing is making the constitution ours and making it work with some silly slogan.

The fifth and final principle is the principle of consent and consensus. Those who read the literature regarding the confederation debates and the whole process of confederation are struck by the fact that it was a process of people trying to organize something together in terms of the relationships between governments. They started off with more than 130 resolutions, reduced that number to 106 and then to 72. Finally, it was put into law. In the whole process, from Quebec to Charlottetown to London, they tried to find out not what divided them, but what they could agree on. That is very important because they were not only agreeing on the resolutions that went into the British North America Act; they were creating a unique political style and a unique political tradition, that is, the Canadian tradition.

We are the only country in the whole of North and South America, that did not experience a violent break with its past. We are the only country in North and South America in which there was no revolution to create a constitution under which we could live together. The tools of the Canadian constitution were not guns, not lines drawn on a map, not division; the tools were toleration, civility and compromise. That gave us consensus, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: The fundamental operating principle of this country is exactly that.

There have been many changes since 1867 but those five principles are bedrock. They are: first, the principle of national union; second, the principle of security of provincial powers; third, the principle of the parliamentary system; fourth, the principle of the protection of rights, and fifth, the principle of consent and consensus.

No constitutional change should pass this House that does not accord with those principles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: I challenge anyone in this House, or indeed anyone who is interested in constitutional change, to say that those principles are not the principles that govern this country. They are the principles that govern this country. Let us measure them against the resolution from the government. First, let us get the question of patriation out of the road. There is no one in this country—other people have said it—who does not want to have the constitution brought back home. If hon. members would take a look at the book called "Constitutions of Nations," I borrowed from the Cabbagetown library, they will see that Canada does not appear in it. All kinds of other countries are mentioned. Here is Cyprus, for instance. But nothing on Canada. There is not a Canadian alive who does not want the constitution back home. The government in its resolution has capitalized on that feeling. What it has done is to give the impression that all it is about is bringing the constitution back home. But that is not what the government is about. Mr. Speaker, the people of Rosedale riding, and, increasingly, the people of Toronto are beginning to catch on to the game. They know there are far more serious things happening than simply bringing the constitution back home.

● (1640)

First, this resolution offends the second principle of the protection of the security of provincial powers. If one looks at the amending formula—and by the way, there are a number of options to choose from; there is one which provides an opportunity for every province to agree. If the government really wants to patriate the constitution, it can, and it knows it. But one would almost swear the proposal that has been used was designed to create division and discord. I tell hon. members to look at it. First, as I say, it offends the principle of the security of provincial powers because it is imposed. That is not the spirit of 1867. It is not agreed to by anybody, except one. It is imposed. That is the first reason we do not like the amending formula.

Second, it creates two classes of provinces in this country. Not one any more, but two. Most of all it affects the west. For years the west has assumed that central Canada had treated them as second-class citizens and as second-class provinces. The formula here, the 25 per cent rule so called, means that no matter how much the west grows, no matter how much the province of British Columbia grows—I use British Columbia as an example—and how much Ontario or Quebec does not grow, British Columbia or the west will still not be able to stand four square with the two central Canadian provinces. That is the fact of the matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: There is no other way one can describe it. I can tell you that in Toronto there is not one person I know who says you ought to have an amending formula which says there are two kinds of provinces. There is one kind of province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: To add insult to injury, to then argue that if you cannot get your way you are going to go behind governments to create a referendum means an even bigger problem. What we are saying to the west by this resolution is that not only will it be imposed, not only will the west be second class no matter how much it grows in population, but third, that if they do not like what we do we will conduct a referendum on our terms with our money—probably the Minister of State for Multiculturalism will be funding the advertising.

With respect to the principle governing security of the powers of the provinces we have the equalization formula. It is astounding to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) talk as though he invented it. In fact, the equalization principle in this country was something on which we all agreed. Certainly the province I come from had an opportunity to give for years. I might add there are a lot of other provinces, I will come to them in a moment, which would like an opportunity to give rather than to receive. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) touched on the matter of equalization. A principle which was meant to bring provinces together is now being used by the government in this resolution as a club to divide them. That is the irony in all of this. I know when it comes to the Premier of Saskatchewan with whom I gather the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is having discussions, that the Premier of Saskatchewan will not be bought off by any concession affecting natural resources only however great a concern they are to Saskatchewan and, indeed, every other province. The Premier of Saskatchewan and all other premiers from the west know they cannot accept a bargain and trade natural resources for second-class citizenship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: The second principle this offends is the principle of the protection of rights. I am sorry the Minister of State for Multiculturalism is not here because I had an opportunity last week to read in the Toronto Star and other newspapers his reasons for supporting entrenched rights. He said in this House:

> The end of such democracies as Chile and Greece began, as in Hitler's Germany, with violations of human rights no worse than we have known here in Canada.

That is terrific, Mr. Speaker. I want all hon. members to think about that; Hitler's Germany is no worse than we have known here in Canada. This is an argument for having entrenched rights, by the way. I happened to look up the constitution of Chile and the constitution of Greece. They both have entrenched rights, and so did Nazi Germany.

An hon. Member: And so does Russia.

Mr. Crombie: That is bad enough, but I thought "that is part of the politics of it all." Then the minister made a speech in Toronto. He said this:

> We need an entrenched bill of rights because we have had attacks on East Asians in Toronto, and in one western province alone we have had recently four crosses burned on the lawns of West Indians and Asians who have come to Canada. We need it so all Canadians in this country will know that we all weigh the same on the moral scale.

The evening this was reported I watched on television the reactions of a number of people following the slaying of six citizens in the city of Buffalo. I listened to Jesse Jackson talking about the problems of black people there. Not once did he mention that entrenched rights would help them. He talked about a great number of other things that would help them. If the Minister of State for Multiculturalism is really interested in racism in Toronto, he might want to find out what Jesse Jackson had to say. To use racism as an argument for entrenched rights is sick. It is sick, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Those of us who have dealt with the problem for a long time, like the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery)—I know how he must feel—

Mr. Stollery: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Crombie: I would be happy to answer at the end of my remarks.

In dealing with the principle of the protection of rights, one has also to look at language rights. It seems to me language rights are part of the whole dialogue between French Canada and English Canada and what the referendum in Quebec was all about. So I wonder whether or not we still have a long way to go in paying the debt for the confederation bargain. It seems to me that some of the ancient inequities have not been dealt with. I am impressed by the fact that not only does Premier Lévesque have no interest in saving federalism—indeed he has an interest in making sure it does not work—but Claude Ryan, the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, who fought very hard to make sure that federalism worked, is also opposed. That is another worry.

● (1650)

With regard to native peoples, if you read sections 24, 15 and 6 together and you happen to be an Indian in this country, you are bound to feel great concern. What of the future of land claims under sections 24, 15 and 6? Are there any rights left for non-status Indians and Métis? How does the mobility clause apply if you move off the reservation?

Before the United Nations today there is a case charging Canada with a human rights violation revising from the Indian Act. If one reads it, one can argue that the Indian Act is not amendable in relation to those sections. Therefore, Indian women in this country will be condemned forever to be second-class citizens. That is why native people are opposed to it. It is no secret.

New Canadians are supposedly a concern for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. We are now going to have two classes of immigrants. That's for sure. Nobody denies this, not even the government. By the way, new Canadians, ethnic and cultural groups in this country, are not fooled. Maybe they were for a little while. However, they came from countries where talk about rights is high and delivery of rights is low. They do not need to be told it is good for them. They know better.

The third and final principle which this resolution offends is perhaps the most serious of all, the principle of consent and consensus. This country works, not because of its constitution or its laws, but because it is stable. There is a stability about this country which we have enjoyed for years. Each generation has enjoyed that old-fashioned concept of stability. Maybe it is not too sexy and does not fit into the advertising very well, but stability is what most people are looking for so that they can get on with their own lives. We jeopardize that stability at our own risk.

When a resolution comes before the House which offends the ancient principle of the protection of provincial powers, the protection of rights and the principle of consent and consensus, there is no course open to Her Majesty's loyal opposition but to oppose it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Patriate the constitution. We hope the government will patriate the constitution according to the Vancouver formula. Everyone agrees with that. Bring it home, we will pass it in one day. When it comes to rights and how we are ultimately going to amend the formula, that is for Canadians to decide. Canadians decided on the last constitution. I do not know why the government wants to let the Brits do it 100 years later.

I will read one last citation. In 1964, a recognized expert of the time wrote this. I will read it fairly slowly because it is important.

> Federalism is by its very essence a compromise and a pact. It is a compromise in the sense that when national consensus on all things is not desirable or cannot readily obtain, the area of consensus is reduced in order that consensus on some things be reached. It is a pact or quasi-treaty, in the sense that the terms of that compromise cannot be changed unilaterally. This is not to say that the terms are fixed forever; but only that in changing them, every effort must be made not to destroy the consensus on which the federated nation rests.

The author was then a professor in Montreal, Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I prefer the Pierre Elliott Trudeau of 1964 because between the Pierre Elliott Trudeau of 1964 who could write and understand those words and the Pierre Elliott Trudeau of 1980 lies a long journey of the corruption of power. That is why we oppose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke said that he would accept a question from me. It refers to the point he was making about racial problems in Buffalo. Does the hon. member agree that it was in fact the United States supreme court's interpretation of the United States constitution which allowed black school children, backed by the United States attorney general and the national guard, to desegregate schools in Arkansas and Alabama in spite of opposition by elected state politicians?

Mr. Crombie: Quite so, Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. member would like to prove by the point. It is historically correct. I might add that those schools were constructed during the time the bill of rights was still in force.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part this evening in the debate on the motion to defer that very important resolution to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. I am all the more at ease to support the constitutional endeavour of the government since on July 5, 1977, as recorded in Hansard on page 7350, I delivered a speech in the House during a debate on national unity well before the referendum and I clearly suggested then that we should act unilaterally to patriate the constitution and I quote:

> We will have to accompany the unilateral patriation with a temporary amending formula providing for unanimous consent to change sections of the constitution which cannot be changed now in Canada without the unanimous consent of the provinces, while waiting to find more flexible and comprehensive means to amend our constitution;

And further on, I added:

> This federal declaration of principles—

—which I thought should be attached to our unilateral procedure of patriation—

> —accompanying the unilateral patriation of our constitution, would thus clarify the intention of Parliament and the Canadian Senate concerning the rights of French-speaking people, minorities, individual freedom and regional disparities in Canada.
> This clear and official declaration, accompanying the great symbolic affirmation of our constitution patriation, would influence and induce those attitude changes I have already mentioned and which are so desirable, even necessary for Canada's survival.

Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that we have been through two federal elections and one referendum in the province of Quebec and that more than two and a half years have passed since then, you will understand why I claim today that it is even more urgent and more necessary that we proceed the way we do. I have not changed my mind. On the contrary, I believe it is urgent, very urgent for the protection of our national unity that we proceed as soon as possible, and that we take our responsibilities as the Government of Canada and I hope that following this debate in Parliament, that is in the House of Commons and in the Senate, Canadians can at last take their constitution home and put in it what they want and need.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make my remarks today in as simple a tone as possible. I am aware of the fact that our institution has evolved as far as procedure is concerned and I hope it will keep doing so; its most recent leap forward was the recognition of the right to broadcast our debates.

And I am aware that when we rise in this place it is sometimes difficult to convince some of our friends on the other side and it is indeed very difficult and very impersonal to try and rally people who have already made up their minds and do not want to change. However, we must also be aware, indeed it is our role and duty that when we speak in this House we address all Canadians. Since the live broadcasting of debates, Parliament is now closer to Canadians and I want to take this opportunity to try to answer once again as simply as I can two questions that people ask themselves, at least those people I have met here in Ottawa since the beginning of this debate, in my riding of Drummondville, in Montreal and elsewhere where I had the opportunity to go recently.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the average Canadian who goes about his daily chores, who goes to work, who watches the world series on his TV and is concerned by economic rather than constitutional matters, it is understandable indeed that the large majority of Canadians are not experts in constitutional matters; even, as a lawyer, as a member of this House, as a minister, I do not claim to be an expert on constitutional law. However, there are facts which are ever so present to us, facts we know so intimately as parliamentarians and which it is our duty to recall and explain to the whole population. It has happened and it still happens too often, unfortunately, that in major debates a short part, a section or a chapter is taken out of a whole and interpreted subjectively, even though in good faith, and often misinterpreted. There is the danger in taking out a part from a whole context. Often the debate dwells only on some parts of a legislation of a project or a whole measure put before Parliament. It is at that point that it gets boring for the public and that it gets incomprehensible for the average citizen because all too often we are inclined to take for granted that people know all about what is untold and that we can go and deal directly with a given point and comment on it. So here is what I am going to do. I will simply answer the two following questions. The first I was asked was what exactly is the Canadian government trying to do? And, second, why are we trying to do it now? Those are two very straightforward and very simple questions which the immense majority of Canadians is wondering about.

To respond to the first question dealing essentially with the very nature of our constitutional process, both in substance and form, what does the federal government mean to do? My reply is this: It means essentially to do four things. First, patriate the constitution. Canada is the only independent country in the world which must seek permission from the parliament of another country, namely, the British Parliament in London, England, to amend its own constitution, which is an aberration, an anomaly, which has already lasted too long, and it is time to take the necessary steps, out of sheer pride and dignity, to bring home the constitution, which must lead all of us is long overdue.

The purpose of patriation is therefore to bring home our constitution, so that we may discuss and amend it in Canada without having to deal with the government of a foreign country. That is the first thing to do. So, everyone here agrees. Everyone says it is great, it is perfect—one cannot be against good, or God—patriation is an excellent thing, everyone is in favour of it. Yet, how strange, when everyone agrees with it, that everyone should find all sorts of excuses often procedural rather than fundamental, to obstruct that most important initiative.

The second of the four points is that of enshrining the charter of rights, but I shall come back to that later. The third point is that of including in the constitution a clause enshrining the principle of equalization and the fight against regional disparities. Finally, the fourth point is that of finding, sometime in the future, a mechanism to enable us to amend the constitution without, in every case and to the end of time, having to obtain that infamous unanimity which, as we have seen, is impossible to achieve in as diversified a country as ours.

So, patriation, I have already said so, is an act of dignity. It takes self-respect to say, Listen, after 113 years and especially after 53 years of sterile attempts, which have led to nothing but dead ends and confrontations which often do more damage than good to the unity of the country and our mutual respect, it is high time we acted and got our constitution. This is a great North American country, in 1980, and we are quite capable of amending our constitution on our own, without requiring another country's permission to do so.

The second point is that of enshrining a charter of rights. Mr. Speaker, seven categories of rights and freedoms are to be included in our constitution. And I dare any constitutional expert, any lawyer who specializes in common law. Nuances were being made a while ago to justify the obstruction to our constitutional initiative; it was said that distinctions must be made; that Canada has lawyers who deal only in common laws; that there are lawyers in Canada who deal only in civil law and that, contrary to civil law, common law does not necessarily have its code with articles. Those legalistic nuances, those legal fine points, have no place here in the discussion of the constitution of a country.

Mr. Speaker, we want to include in the constitution a charter of rights to guarantee and protect the fundamental freedoms and rights of Canadians. What are those rights? There are seven categories of rights. The first category comprises the fundamental freedoms, and I want to enumerate them because, as I said a moment ago, what ordinary people think about that, what they read in the papers is the word constitution, the word patriation, and also the word unilateral and the term charter of rights, but we will tell them what those rights are. The first category of fundamental freedoms we want to see enshrined in the Constitution of Canada are quite simply the freedom of conscience and religion, the freedom of thought, the freedom of opinion, the freedom of the press, the freedom of information, the freedom of association and the freedom to hold pacific meetings. What is wrong with the fundamental freedoms of Canadian citizens being protected forever by the Canadian Constitution?

● (1710)

People are asking themselves the question and they are told that this is what we want to do. We want it to be protected so that legislatures will not be able to tamper with it depending on the government of the day. It must be entrenched in a definite manner into a constitution which cannot be amended without the consent of a majority of provinces, as I will explain later, and that of the federal government.

The second category of rights we want to have entrenched in the constitution deals with the democratic rights that we are all aware of but that are seldom mentioned although they are fundamental. I am talking of the sacred right of citizens to vote in Canada and to be elected. Anybody in Canada who meets the normal few criteria set in a democratic society has the right to be a candidate, to become the elected member of his riding and to be its representative in the Parliament of Canada. It is one of the great advantages of our system and there is absolutely nothing wrong, indeed it is desirable that this kind of right be well entrenched in the Canadian constitution.

These democratic rights also include the duration of a Parliament. People will now have the assurance, written in the Canadian constitution, that elections will be held at least every five years and that Parliament will have to sit at least once a year. The other category of rights to be included in the constitution concerns the freedom to move to and settle in any area. It is quite essential that every Canadian, in whatever province, have the right and the freedom to enter and leave any province when he wishes and that every Canadian from whatever area and whatever province be entitled to earn his living in any province without being penalized and without being the victim of any discrimination. This is another category of rights which we want to see entrenched in the constitution and which protect Canadian citizens without penalizing the provincial governments.

The legal guarantees, the right to life, the right to freedom and to security, the right to protection against abusive searches, against unjustified detention and imprisonment, the presumption of being non-guilty, the right to have the assistance of a lawyer and to be tried within a reasonable time are all basic rights which should be entrenched in the constitution we want to patriate.

The other category of rights mentioned in the resolution concerns non-discrimination. We want everyone to be equal before the law, to have equal protection regardless of sex, colour, age or religion. This is a fundamental and current concern. As recently as last evening on the news, we heard about an obvious case of sexual discrimination. This case concerned a husband who was deprived of his right to deduct a pension that he paid to his children for income tax purposes even though this right is recognized in the case of the wife. Because he was a man, he could not benefit from this tax privilege. This is why our Human Rights Commissioner, Mr. Gordon Fairweather, has said that he himself is in favour of entrenching these rights and freedoms within the Canadian Constitution. I am happy to see that Mr. Fairweather has expressed his opinion publicly on this matter because he has a lot of credibility in this field in his capacity of chairman of the Human Rights Commission. Last evening, on the news, he stated his position very clearly and publicly when referring to the case I have mentioned. I think it is essential that the fundamental rights and freedoms of all Canadians be entrenched in the constitution. Indeed the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Max Yalden, also said the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, another category of the most fundamental rights which will be entrenched in the constitution concerns the official languages of Canada, and for the first time in the history of this country, I am surprised and disappointed that so few Quebeckers recognize this fact, Mr. Speaker. For the first time in our history, instead of having a simple bill or a simple federal legislation, the status of the French and English languages will be defined in the Constitution of Canada as being both official languages equally recognized everywhere in Canada. This is fundamental. People seem to forget too often that Canadians have the right to communicate with their federal institutions in their own language when their numbers warrant. That is essential. It is now guaranteed under legislation, but it will be much more secure, no one will be able to change it, it will be compulsory and all Canadian legislatures will have to comply for the greatest advantage of all Canadian citizens. Both the French and English languages will have a status of strict equality everywhere in Canada and that must be emphasized because it will be part of our project, of our constitutional initiative.

The other one, the seventh category of rights that we want to enshrine in our constitution is very important, and would ensure the right to education in the language of the minority. Mr. Speaker, I participated in the campaign with my colleagues and some members on the other side of this House, were saying to the people in the last referendum in Quebec: If you vote no to sovereignty-association, we are going to renew federalism and particularly we guarantee that we shall do our utmost to protect minorities outside Quebec. I am one of those who, in Quebec, criticized Mr. Lévesque and his supporters for choosing a selfish option, an option which completely ignored one million Francophones outside Quebec and the kinds of territorial withdrawal he proposed and still supports, even if his project is delayed for four or five years for electoral purposes, seemed unfair to me and I found really inhuman to abandon and ignore, when you are the premier of a province, almost one million French-speaking Canadians who deserve more from a government that pretends to protect the French language in the province of Quebec.

Yet, today, in this constitutional process, Mr. Speaker, we are protecting Francophone minorities outside Quebec as we are also protecting Anglophone minorities in Quebec for educational purposes. Canadian citizens will be entitled to send their children to the school of their choice everywhere in Canada and this is essential. And the basic purpose of section 23 of our project which is before the House is strictly to protect minorities who already have Canadian citizenship. This is essential.

Mr. Speaker, when we summarize what I just mentioned in the second stage of our process, that is to say the inclusion of a charter of rights while patriating our constitution, we realize that those seven categories of rights are essentially basic rights, and freedoms. Of course, the titles of the document say so, but it is important to repeat it because it has not been mentioned very often in this debate. We hear more about procedural matters. We hear more about referendum, committee, delay in committee, respect or non-respect for Parliament, legal action, but the ordinary citizen deserves and has a right to know that our proposal involves directly his freedom, his dignity and his basic rights.

And that is why I did go to the trouble and took the time to insist on them, to detail them and to extract them from the proposed resolution we are discussing here today. The third essential element in our constitutional procedure is the insertion of a section to entrench the equalization principle, and God knows that as a member I am supporting the fight against regional disparities. I come myself from a region which had a low rate of economic growth before the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and I am proud to say that since 1969, about 4,000 new jobs have been created in my region alone, in my federal constituency of Drummond, thanks to the application of a principle in which this government deeply believes and wants to enshrine in the Canadian Constitution, the principle of the fight against regional disparities and the principle of equal opportunities for all, across Canada.

In my constituency, and I know from experience, for 10 years the Canadian government, in applying this principle, has been involved in 140 projects, has made it possible to create almost 4,000 jobs, has given grants for $25 million and has consolidated thousands of jobs, and that is less than what has been done in many other regions in Canada where the Department of Regional Economic Expansion also worked and participated in different projects. In an area where 45 per cent of the industrial work force used to depend on the textile industry, I can say today that through the application of this principle we have succeeded in varying our industry so that the textile workers who have very important jobs and deserve the protection we are giving them through our excellent policies, now represent no more than 8 per cent of the work force in the Drummond constituency, because thousands of other jobs have been created and all kinds of businesses have appeared.

It is precisely this kind of principle which will enable those regions with a low economic growth rate, those which are less advantaged than others in Canada, to develop; it is precisely this kind of principle that we want to see enshrined in the constitution, Mr. Speaker. This is the very essence of Canada, the equitable distribution of wealth in this country, and this is the third stage of our constitutional proposal. But who and in the name of what principle would oppose the entrenchment of fundamental rights and freedoms but also the principle of the fight against regional disparities and for equal opportunities for all in Canada? This is what we are doing, Mr. Speaker, and this is what the people must know.

The fourth stage, the fourth step of our undertaking in this matter is to find a mechanism which will enable us in future to avoid the kind of meetings which require unanimity to bring about some change, I mean the amending formula. We must find a mechanism, a process, a way so that we may in future, whenever a large majority of partners, of provinces and the Canadian government deem it reasonable, amend the constitution without going to London, because by that time it will have been patriated, our constitution will be back here, but it will not require unanimity, which, as I said earlier, ends up in a dead end in most cases, as the experience of the past 53 years has shown.

What we have in the way of a mechanism in that proposal is quite simple. For a maximum of two years, we have the unanimity rule. We say: Agreed, let us not go too far, let us force nothing upon the provinces during a two-year period. Once we have our own constitution in Canada, there will be no change without the unanimous consent of the provinces and the federal government. This is what is said in our proposal. But in two years time, however, we will negotiate. There is even a section in the proposal, Mr. Speaker, under which we must at least once a year, during that two-year period, hold a constitutional conference to discuss the matter and try to come to an agreement, especially on the final amending formula. And, therefore, to suggest that we do not want to consult the provinces any more, that we will have no more constitutional conferences is turning the facts upside down. In the proposal there is a specific section under which we must hold a constitutional conference at least once a year during the unanimity-rule period, the two-year period. And if during that two-year period the provinces and the Canadian government agree on some mechanism, some amending formula, good! This will solve the problem for the future, and everyone will be happy.

If there is no consensus, then the provinces will have the privilege and the right to propose their own amending formula, provided that it is supported by 80 per cent of the provinces, that is eight provinces, representing 80 per cent of the Canadian people. Of course the formula has to be serious and it must get sufficient provincial support to justify a referendum. We, the Canadian government, will oppose that formula since we will not have agreed to it. We will then propose the Victoria formula, the last one on which provinces were all agreed in 1971 with the federal government. This is the formula we support, that is the provinces that will have received support from 25 per cent of the people before proclamation day. Therefore, for all practical purposes, if on the one hand, Quebec, Ontario and two western provinces representing 50 per cent of the people, and two maritime provinces representing 50 per cent of the people on the other are in agreement with the Canadian government, the change can be made. Such is the Victoria formula. This is what we propose and if in two years there has been no agreement, it will be our formula. We reserve the right to change it and put it on the table in opposition to that put on the table by 80 per cent of the provinces supported by 80 per cent of the people. And we shall go to the people. We shall not decide by ourselves, we are going to ask the people who are sovereign to choose the best amending formula for the future, to prevent constitutional deadlocks and to enable us to progress and to make amendments. This is what is provided for by the mechanism; it is not complicated. We are going to have a referendum if there is no agreement and if eight provinces agree on a formula, we shall propose our own formula and the people will decide. This is how it should work. Ultimately, if ever the provinces do not agree to submit an amending formula, then the Victoria formula I have just described will apply. Moreover, there is section 42 providing that if we really cannot get the consent we require to amend the constitution under the Victoria formula, the people will always be the judge in the last resort, to break the deadlock. This is what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said today while answering the questions of the official opposition. This is the purpose of section 42 which enables the Government of Canada to hold a referendum on a matter requiring an amendment to the constitution. This is essentially the intent of this piece of legislation, to break a constitutional deadlock where we would be unable to come to an agreement to amend the constitution within the limits of the amending formula which will apply at that time.

Mr. Speaker, those are the four basic changes we want to make on the constitutional level. Now I ask: does any one of those changes, any one of those aspects take away a right enjoyed by any Canadian province to give it to the Canadian government, the federal government? Absolutely not. What we are trying to do, Mr. Speaker, is simply to make the legislatures and ourselves, the federal government, respect the Canadian people, respect basic rights in Canada and respect the rights of Canadians as individuals. That is what we are trying to do.

The way in which we have chosen to do this is not very complicated: we are going through Parliament, because it is the only legitimate, legal and recognized way we can proceed after the deadlock and the lack of agreement which resulted from the last constitutional conference. What is wrong with using the most noble institution in the country where the democratically elected representatives of the entire Canadian people, from all regions of the country sit? What is wrong, Mr. Speaker, with using this institution to implement our constitutional proposal?

Hon. members from all political affiliations and representing all regions from coast to coast, are entirely free to take part in this debate, to suggest amendments at the committee stage and to argue their points in a constructive way, so that this resolution be adopted with reasonable delay. And Parliament, in my opinion, is the perfect instrument to carry out this noble task. There are three stages.

Once again, to enlighten the ordinary guy who wonders what we are doing, what is the issue we are debating, I will say that it is a motion calling for a reference to a committee of the resolution I was referring to. And this committee will sit until December 9. At the committee stage, there are a few fairly technical aspects to be considered. There are several clauses. It is not a committee which will travel to every part of Canada, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would like it to. It is not a committee which would travel to Jerusalem or anywhere else. It is a committee which will sit in Ottawa. It will look into the technical aspects of this project and call for witnesses to appear, but its main responsibility will be to finalize the text of our constitutional project over a limited period of time not exceeding six months and not for an extended period as the Leader of the Official Opposition would have it, pending a judgment on some premiers' appeal to the courts.

We would like the committee to report not later than December 9. The date coincides with the end of supply proceedings. It is a matter of parliamentary procedure so that in a third phase—it can be noted how generous we are to Parliament providing as we do three opportunities for debate. We could very well have introduced a mere resolution and held a single debate in the House, or again we could have refused to refer the matter to committee and disallow the third debate to which I have just referred and which will again enable members to voice their views and to consider the report already tabled by the committee. Finally, it will allow Parliament to approve our procedure which is to address a petition to the Queen and the British parliament asking them to return our constitution and allow us to enshrine the charter of human rights of which I spoke as well as the principle of a struggle against regional disparities and an amending mechanism for the future.

This is the only thing we are doing. The procedure is relatively simple. I find it unfortunate that, basically, the major objections raised in most cases by hon. members opposite are objections about the procedure or questions of form.

It seems to me that if the substance is of such importance at the present time and if it can be accepted by the great majority of the people, as they have suggested, it should certainly be possible to discuss the procedural points and come to an agreement so that we may, within a reasonable time, meet the objectives which are aimed at in this process, Mr. Speaker. I would now like to reply to the second question which has been asked of us, which is why we are doing this. We have been asked: All this is very well, but why are you doing this and why are some people objecting? I shall tell you why. There are three reasons. The first is that during the referendum, not so long ago, a considerable number of us travelled through Quebec and elsewhere in the country to tell the people that what we wanted basically was to ask the people to object to sovereignty-association because, for our part, we were offering a guarantee of constitutional renewal. Who will be the most pleased if this project is cancelled and if we are not determined to take our reponsibility seriously as a government? Whose interests will it serve if we do nothing in Ottawa? It is important for the members from other areas of the country to be aware of the answer. This would please and suit the Parti Québécois since it will mean one more step towards independence for Quebec. This would be the end result because in the mind of Mr. Lévesque, nothing can work in the federal system. We are unable to come to any agreement. The renewal of federalism is unthinkable.

Those who talk about renewed federalism are dreamers. This is what he tells the people of Quebec and some members of this House would like us to prove him right. They would like to prevent us from taking certain initiatives which would not penalize the provinces to the advantage of the Canadian government, but which would simply guarantee certain basic rights and freedoms for Canadian citizens. You would like to object to that for procedural reasons, and at the same time play into the hands of Quebec separatists, who blame us for being powerless, for being incapable of getting out of the constitutional deadlock and making a start for changes that really correspond to the aspirations of Quebeckers and Canadians as a whole! This is what you are now doing with your opposition.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are consistent. We fulfill a commitment. We promised Quebeckers and Canadians that we would get out of the constitutional deadlock then we promised a renewed federalism. This is what we are doing, Mr. Speaker, and believe me we have no intention of letting go! We mean business. We are going to see this through. But there is something else. It is not only a question of principle, it is a question of believing in one's country, loving it and trying to bring it to change in a way that does not meet the aspirations of one political party, the Parti Québécois, whose aim is independence. Because we here, in Canada, also said that time had come for an in-depth renewal of our federal system. What we are doing here is only a first step. Do not cry yet, this is nothing as compared to changes that will be coming later on when finally our constitution is in Canada, when we are able to make federalism go forward with an amending formula.

Mr. Speaker, this is only a first step, not the final goal. To those who are scared because they think we are going too far, I say this is only one step, it is not breaking the deadlock. The advantage in our attempt, Mr. Speaker, is that it will allow federalism to change, it will alleviate tensions in the future when our constitution is here, when it is human, modern and includes a mechanism for amendment, when circumstances change, without leading to the kind of confrontation we have been going through and without having to ask everyone else.

That is the second reason and that is the second advantage of our constitutional initiative. First we are being true to our word, second because we are federalists, because we believe in Canada, because we want to unite it even more so, and I have just stated it is a step toward an evolutionary process, a healthy constitutional evolution. And, Mr. Speaker, the third thing that is most important, is that ever since I have been in politics much has been said about the constitution and I have been a member of Parliament for the past six years.

I know that the economy is a fundamental issue. Canada holds an important position in the world. It is a large country which deserves to be further developed. It seems to me that if we respected each other enough and showed it through our actions, if we could once and for all make the first step toward the resolution of this constitutional conflict, we would clear the way for the discussion of other issues that are equally important such as inflation, unemployment, energy and the economy in general. Besides, that is to some extent the reason why we have proceeded in this manner. Mr. Speaker, we felt it was sensible to refer this resolution to the committee for a certain period in order to allow Parliament to consider a budget, to deal with energy and national development. To those who would deny us as a government the right to act in this matter, I say that we have a mandate to govern the country. We do it in a democratic way by consulting Parliament, but our mandate is in no way limited to economic and energy matters. We also have a mandate to act in the area of the constitution, on behalf of the people of this country, Mr. Speaker. Our action is perfectly justified and perfectly legal. To show respect for the people you represent, you should at least have the decency to let them know in their own language what you are doing and why, and in all humility I submit this is what I have been trying to do in this speech.

I am sorry if I took a little too long; I do not usually make full use of my 40-minute speaking time but I had to do it at a certain point in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to take part once again in this debate on the constitution to give this overview because I am deeply convinced that our approach is sober, balanced, realistic and timely, and that it is respectful of the rights of all Canadians. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people that we are representing in this House is a generous, dignified and free people. This is why we are acting the way we are.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has referred to Mr. Lévesque's problem with regard to the Constitution of Canada. I can understand Mr. Lévesque's objection: he is a separatist. But there is also a problem with Mr. Ryan. Mr. Ryan has voiced his own objections against this proposal. Why is he against it? Is the Government of Canada on speaking terms with Mr. Ryan? Why has the position held by the Government of Canada met with Mr. Ryan's disapproval?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I shall answer that question. Mr. Ryan has said, and that is important, that he agrees fully with the substance of the proposal, or the meat of it. A bill of rights entrenched in the constitution, he agrees with that; essentially, he agrees with patriation; and Mr. Ryan is in favour of reducing regional disparities. Yes, I have read all that. I know what Mr. Ryan has said. He fully agrees with our basic decision to act, and I respect his opinion. He does not agree with the timing. I feel we should patriate the constitution after agreements have been reached. But we have been saying that for 53 years now. I am glad that Mr. Ryan is on our side as far as the substance is concerned. As to the form this should take, we may have differing views, but I still respect his opinion. I am happy about one thing though and that is the two years for the amending formula, and my colleague will have to agree with me that the heart of this process, of this proposed reform, is the amending formula. I am convinced that within a few months, with Mr. Ryan in Quebec, we will be able to negotiate a final amending formula. This will not be done with Mr. Lévesque. Mr. Ryan will have a say in the matter. Within the two years of unanimity provided by the bill, Mr. Ryan will manage to get elected and will be negotiating with us, along with the other premiers, in search of the right amending formula. If my colleague is afraid that Mr. Ryan will not take part in the constitutional debate, in the establishment of an amending formula, I am more certain and less skeptical than he is. I have more confidence in Mr. Ryan's chances of winning the next provincial election.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I make an appeal to the House. There were certain understandings about the division of time this afternoon under which the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) would have been able to make his speech before we rise. That time schedule has gone awry somewhat. I wonder if the House would be courteous enough to let the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill finish his speech this afternoon, even if it takes us to five or ten minutes after six.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed to by all members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, a section of the constitution was misquoted by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). The point is important enough that it should be clarified, and I rise on a point of order on the matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. What the hon. member is raising does not constitute a point of order. If he wishes to correct a statement made by the previous speaker, it can be done perhaps through other channels, but certainly not by way of a point of order.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, may I begin this afternoon by saying how grateful I am to Providence for finding myself an active participant in a debate which is, no doubt, part of a constitutional watershed in Canadian history. For better or for worse the Canadian Parliament is being asked to act unilaterally on several fronts in order to break what is perceived to be a constitutional stalemate of long standing.

Today I will try to reflect on what we are being asked to do as a Parliament, and I use the word "reflect" deliberately. This is not an election campaign. It is a debate about the very nature and future of our country, and I encourage all hon. members to see it in that light. I particularly encourage government members to see the debate in this light because I have noticed over the past few days since we began the debate on the constitution a certain partisanship and an arrogant lack of respect for views critical of the government's proposals. I think this is to be deplored in debates of such national significance.

Whether we be New Democrats, Conservatives or Liberals, we must all assume that the others come here with a respectable modicum of love for this country, however various the ideologies and interpretations of tradition we bring to the articulation of this love for Canada. This variety about which I am speaking is Canadian and, therefore, this variety is worthy of being listened to, if we wish to have a real debate and not our usual shouting match.

No government, not even a freshly-elected majority government, can build a country, renew federalism, or change the constitution if it acts as though this proposal is just one among the many proposals it has rammed through over the years.

In this context I feel I must mention the difficulty that is involved in the constitutional debate because of the attitude of the government toward Canadian nationalism and Canadian unity over the years. There is a difficulty in talking about Canada which has come upon us because of the political strategies and attitudes of the Liberal party. I want to mention this difficulty because I feel it weakens our ability to do what me may indeed, be called upon by history to do at this particular point.

The other day I wore a maple leaf pin, one of a number which I had received when I went to a conference of the interparliamentary union. I had some left over, so I had put one on my lapel. In the course of one morning two people came up to me and asked me why I was wearing a Liberal pin, because I was wearing a maple leaf. Liberals may take some fleeting satisfaction in this coincidence of images, but the problem was indicated by my friend from Broadview-Greenwood the other day when he spoke about how he will never be able to see Canadian geese in the same light again, that he will always see them as Liberals in disguise.

That was a humorous way of bringing up a very serious matter, namely that the national symbols and language of Canada have been co-opted by the Liberal party. It is a very successful political strategy, but it means that when we have come to this particular historical moment, a time when we need to talk seriously and in depth about what it means to be a Canadian, every kind of symbol and language that is available has the stench of the Liberal party about it. That is part of the problem. The constitutional advertising is merely the latest example of this particular phenomenon.

For my part this afternoon, I will speak to these proposals from within the general framework of acceptance in principle outlined by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) which is, of course, qualified by our demand that an amendment on resource ownership and control be accepted in order to make this proposal the balanced and undivisive proposal that it must be if it is to be the kind of proposal that builds up, rather than tears down, our country. I will speak also from my own self-understanding as a second-generation Canadian whose father and grandfather served in the two world wars for the sake of a Canada which they believed was worthy of such service, a Canada which I am determined to maintain in such a worthy state and, indeed, increase it if I can do so.

Similarly, I will also speak out of my self-understanding as one who grew up in a part of Winnipeg, Manitoba where almost everyone had grandparents who came from another country. As children in elementary public school, we learned that our country was not one of two founding peoples or one of three, but a Canada of many peoples, of Ukrainian Canadians, Polish Canadians, German Canadians, Italian Canadians, Dutch Canadians, Scottish Canadians, Irish Canadians and so on, who over time, as we grew up, have come to call themselves just Canadians. This is a Canada which is different from the Canada of southern Ontario, the maritimes and even that of large metropolitan centres like Toronto where, indeed, there are many immigrant peoples, but who have had a different experience from the pioneer experience of immigrants in the west.

In any case, we in the New Democratic Party are favourably disposed to the government's proposals mainly because they reflect long-standing positions of the New Democratic Party itself. It is only natural for members of a political party to feel supportive in principle of ideas for which their party has always stood. Let me proceed item by item.

Our party has long been in favour of patriating the constitution. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells us that 20 years ago he introduced a private member's bill to this effect. As the party which, in my view, is the only truly nationalist party in this country, we could not oppose the patriation of our constitution, the bringing home of our constitution to Canadian soil.

We do regret that it has to be done unilaterally, but so be it. We are prepared to accept that this has become a constitutional as well as a symbolic necessity. Our deepest regret as New Democrats is that the Liberal government shows so little interest in giving Canadians control over their own lives both constitutionally and economically. We will not rest until this kind of comprehensive Canadian self-determination is a reality. One form of decolonization deserves another. However, there is one thing I do urge in this respect. I have noticed a tendency on the part of the government, and members of the Progressive Conservative Party have rightly pointed it out, to talk as though all we are doing is patriating the constitution. This may serve well as another Liberal strategy, but it is fundamentally dishonest. The proposal is much larger than that, and all of us should be entitled to debate it without having to listen to rhetoric about how the Liberals only want to bring the constitution home. Where I come from, many Canadians are not only sick and tired of this, they are infuriated at being self-righteously lectured on Canadianism by the Liberal party and its leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). We do not answer to him or to anyone else in the Liberal party for our identity as Canadians. We deeply resent what I cited earlier as the tragic co-opting of Canadian national symbols.

Our party has long been in favour of a charter of rights and freedoms, a position reiterated recently by the federal council of the New Democratic Party. This is our issue. Alone in this House we have a proud record of defending human rights and freedoms when others were willing to turn a blind eye for fear of disagreeing with a determined government or a fearful, aggressive majority, whether it was our criticism of the treatment of Japanese Canadians during the Second World War or our opposition to the paranoid detention of hundreds of innocent Canadians under the auspices of the War Measures Act by the same Prime Minister who now beseeches us about freedoms and rights. Talk about bargaining freedom against fish, Mr. Speaker—in 1970, freedom was sold down the river for nothing but sheer political opportunism.

Freedom of information is consistently violated by this government for no other reason than its own self-interest. Freedom from lawlessness, on the part of the police is still being sold out, through the refusal of this government to respond appropriately to the information revealed by the McDonald commission.

We in the New Democratic Party know what it is like—and many of the older members of the party know better than I do—to have ourselves and our views regarded as subversive just because we dare to take a different view of society than that held by the powers that be, although how the non-violent pursuit of justice and equality can be viewed as subversive in a democracy has always been a mystery to me.

And so we support the charter of rights and freedoms, Mr. Speaker, but not naively and not innocently. It is a starting point. But let us not kid ourselves that a charter of rights will safeguard freedom in the absence of a freedom-loving and freedom vigilant political consciousness on the part of the Canadian people.

This charter does not rule out the War Measures Act. Indeed, it may be the case that no democracy can rule out some kind of emergency powers, however inappropriate the present act may be. More important, the charter of rights does not of itself rule out the tyranny of the majority in any form.

Even the courts are expressions of the political consensus of their day. This is the insight, which ought to be respected, of those who criticize the charter of rights and freedoms by noting that freedoms are ultimately protected by political and not legal realities. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, attached as I am personally to the truth of this insight, it is precisely because they will continue to be true anyway that I can support a charter of rights. Common law and parliamentary supremacy may have been sufficient for a time when there was much uniformity of values and homogeneity of peoples, but there may indeed be wisdom in a charter of rights for a country characterized by a pluralism of peoples and values. In the end, however, there will be no substitute for keeping the love of freedom so alive that the powerful dare not move against bothersome minorities or individuals.

This is not to say, upon reflection, that at the very least we should not also be aware, if only for the sake of knowing what we are doing, that perhaps entrenchment of human rights as such may not be the best way to establish a charter of rights. I have read some persuasive arguments distributed by a professor at Carleton University about a preference for a bill of rights with "priority status" as opposed to "entrenchment", etc., so that elected representatives would still have the final say.

Entrenchment without fundamental changes in our judiciary, in its self-understanding and in its accountability, could be a serious mistake but only time will tell, because it appears that the government is committed with a certain amount of passion to this concept. Let us hope that in the future we will have the freedom to adjust accordingly, if we need to, the Supreme Court and other affected areas.

Our party has long been in favour of language rights for French-speaking Canadians, so we support the entrenchment of minority language education rights. French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec must be able to educate their children in French, even as English-speaking people in Quebec must have the right to educate their children in English in Quebec. It seems to me this is only fair. When it is put this way, many of the objections to French language guarantees disappear.

But we must remember also, the Canada of which I spoke earlier, the communities of Ukrainian, Polish, German, Italian, Dutch and British descent. Perhaps it is because history is not taught well in our schools that the status of French Canada and the historical status of the French language in Canada is so misunderstood, for instance, in western Canada. But surely it is also because the so-called duality of Canada is not part of the lived Canadian experience of so many western Canadians. They sometimes feel that French is being entrenched in such a way as to make their mother tongue second class. The difference between the historical status of French Canada and of the French language, and these people's own linguistic and cultural instincts is often obscured because they have not "lived" the Canada of two founding peoples, or however we may choose to describe it. These people are not anti-French, although their legitimate anxiety is sometimes co-opted by those who are. Indeed, in my riding French immersion education is popular. There is a French immersion school just a block and a half from where I live.

Yet there is still much to be done by way of communication and explanation of this proposal, not just to gain acceptance of the proposal itself but in order that a real fact of Canadian life be recognized, and recognized in order that Canada can be strengthened and not just preserved. People must be encouraged to appreciate the needs and values of those whose reality they cannot immediately share. In this sense, the failure of this in Canada would be a bad sign for the future of the world. If we cannot live together here under relatively favourable conditions then there is little hope that the empathic imagination needed for international justice and development will ever materialize.

Our party has always been in favour of equalization. Greater equality of the human condition is a socialist principle and equalization between richer and poorer provinces is absolutely necessary if Canada is to be able to maintain such things as universality and portability in health care. Just a month ago, the health services review conducted by former Justice Emmett Hall recommended cost-sharing with poorer provinces to fulfil what remains of the original vision of a comprehensive health care system in Canada in order that there be equality of health care and that meaningful national standards be maintained.

We believe in a strong central government, but not in principle; we believe in it because it will be absolutely necessary in the years ahead to patriate our economy and to develop the industrial strategy necessary for saving the Canadian economy from de-industrialization and stagnation. A strong role for the federal government will be required in fields such as health care in order to guarantee quality of life to Canadians in poorer provinces. The importance of the federal government's role in the redistribution of wealth must be emphasized, while admitting that until now the job that the federal government has done in this area is poor indeed. In fact, the poor are still poor and the rich are richer.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of equalization in ways that even the government is not. But we are concerned that equalization, as spelled out in the proposal, is too vague. It does not guarantee that equalization will be between governments as opposed to pay-outs to people or corporations in areas deemed to be in need. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) elaborated on this point just the other day. This party will be offering appropriate amendments in an attempt to improve this part of the proposal when the committee finally meets.

We are in favour of an amending formula. I think all hon. members would agree that it would be quite useless to bring the constitution home without being able to do anything with it when we get it here. We do, however, have some very serious concerns about section 42 where it appears that too much power is being given to the federal government to resolve future constitutional stalemates. Surely it is pessimistic to write in such scenarios, and as I cannot imagine that the details of this section are crucial to the government's vision of the future, we therefore, expect openness to amendments in this area. Unilateral action may be necessary once, but to write in the ability of a future Parliament to act similarly, albeit accompanied by a referendum the terms of which need to be improved, seems unnecessary. This weakens the claim that this is just a package for the people and does not alter federal-provincial relations.

And so we find ourselves in favour, in principle, of the major thrusts of the government's proposals. We will no doubt be suggesting improvements in detail through amendments suggested by our representatives on the joint committee. The government not only should but needs to be open to such amendments if it is truly interested in nation-building.

In this context I wish to reinforce what my leader has already said about our demand that an amendment reinforcing and clarifying provincial ownership and control of resources be accepted in order for us to be able to support the entire constitutional package. This is because we believe that in order for this constitutional watershed to be a positive one and not a negative one, the felt priorities of western Canada must be addressed. It is true there are many other things left to work on, from the Supreme Court to the Senate to family law to communications, and so on. This, we hope to God, is not the final constitutional word. There is plenty of work to be done after patriation. Much remains to be done, for instance, in terms of guaranteeing the rights of women, of native people and of the handicapped. We will be offering amendments in these areas as well and we trust the government will be open to these very important areas of concern. Perhaps some changes might even be made before the constitution is patriated. But if this is to be a constructive word in our constitutional history and not a destructive word, then the government must move on the critical issue of reinforcing and clarifying provincial ownership and control of resources, something, as I understand it, it already agreed to once before on the opening day of the most recent constitutional conference.

The government makes much of the claim that action must be taken if the promises made to Quebeckers in the referendum campaign are to be fulfilled. But many of those who went to Quebec to argue for the No vote said that they, too, wished constitutional change. To make only those changes which are perceived by the government to fulfil its promises to Quebec is to betray the understanding which many Canadians had when they encouraged their fellow Canadians in Quebec to hang in there and work for change together. Our amendment pertaining to resource ownership will significantly redress this imbalance and we trust the government will accept it.

Mention of the referendum campaign in Quebec brings me to my final point, which is the claim that this proposal is the answer, that this proposal is the needed response to the crisis posed by the substantial support for sovereignty association shown in Quebec. I want to suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is far too selfconfident about the ability of his vision, however noble, to fulfil the aspirations of those who voted Yes in the referendum, or indeed to fulfil the aspirations of those who voted No. His is a classically Liberal view of reality—and I use "liberal" in the small "l" sense—with individual French Canadians making their way in the context of equality of opportunity and official bilingualism anywhere in Canada. This is his vision. He has had it for some time and it appears it will be fulfilled before he retires. It is a goal which, I admit, rights old wrongs. If it is accepted by the Canadian people it will strengthen federalism and the distinctiveness of Canada on the North American continent. But it is a vision that does not answer new questions or new problems.

All over the world—and here I can speak about Quebec as a non-Quebecker, because what I am talking about is not just happening in Quebec—people are asking themselves what they can do together as a group, as a people, as a community. Many people are weary of the world in which we are all just individuals. This new sense of community, or the desire for it, seems to be beyond the ken of the Prime Minister and indeed beyond the ken of the Liberal party. All group thinking is mere tribalism and regression. Nationalism is bad, it is just another ghost of Duplessis. For a man with a reputation as an intellectual, the Prime Minister displays an amazing lack of insight in this issue. It's as though he stopped thinking about 20 years ago.

Many people want a more human and therefore often a more decentralized and community-oriented reality. They want to feel they have more control over their collective lives than modern society has been able to give them so far. Thus there were many Anglophones in Quebec whom I know personally, who voted Yes in the referendum. Why did they vote Yes in the referendum? They voted Yes thinking that maybe, on its own, Quebec would be a place where they could stave off the growing intrusion of alienation, remote control and dehumanization that modern society seems to bring with it. This is the real meaning of many people's new fascination with such things, as their cultural identity, because culture is something which humans have as a group. Individuals are too often reduced only to the consumption of images marketed by the mass media. Culture is not just food and dancing or even language. It is something that is fully alive only to the extent that the people who desire it have control over the images which dominate their lives. In this respect, Quebec and the movement in Quebec toward sovereignty-association was a sign of hope for Canada. It was a chance to grow. It was a chance that maybe in the aspirations of Quebec the rest of us in English Canada could get a sense of what we needed to do as a people, that we needed to stand up and stop the erosion of our identity and culture, to stop the way in which we are being swallowed up by the North American reality, so that the lament of Canadian thinkers such as George Grant might be premature instead of prophetic.

The constitutional package does not address these concerns. I predict, therefore, it will not be the solution or the answer to sovereignty-association that it is claimed to be.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to remind ourselves, if we take seriously for a moment the prayers uttered so rapidly and meaninglessly at the beginning of our sessions each day, that the biblical prophets and other wise men and women over the years, including Christ himself, contended with the authorities not about internal constitutional matters, but about whether justice was being done, whether the neighbour was being looked after, even the least of them. We are commanded to seek first the Kingdom of God and its justice, and we are promised that if we do so, everything else will fall into place.

Perhaps in the absence of a commitment to full employment, to adequate pensions, to needed child care programs, to the settlement of land claims, to health care as a right, to a clean environment and work place, to international peace and development—indeed in the absence of a concrete commitment to justice in general—we have no right, no right whatsoever, to expect that this proposal or any other like it will be the answer to our problems.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Collenette: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is now six o'clock, or has the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) called it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair recognized that it was six o'clock and therefore cannot recognize another member from the floor.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

CRASH OF C-130 HERCULES AIRCRAFT—CONDOLENCES TO FAMILIES OF VICTIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in connection with the tragic event of yesterday when eight servicemen lost their lives in the performance of their duty, in this case a search for a lost aircraft. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House extends its condolences and sympathy to the families of these young men.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Moved by Mr. McKinnon, seconded by Mr. Ellis:

That this House extends its condolences and sympathy to the families of these young men, meaning those who lost their lives in the performance of their duty, in this case a search for a lost aircraft.

Does the House agree to the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF WEATHERSHIPS FROM WEST COAST WEATHER STATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I too seek the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the decision of the previous government to maintain the west coast weatherships on station and of Canada's international commitments with respect to weather reporting, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this government be required by this House to reverse its decision with respect to withdrawing the weatherships from the west coast weather station, and hold those ships in place until such time as an automated recorder and transmitter are developed and in place.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WAR MEASURES ACT

CALL FOR REPEAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that since 1976 Canada has committed itself to comply with the UN covenant on civil and political rights; in view of the fact that the Liberal government keeps in force the War Measures Act, an oppressive and repressive piece of legislation whose provisions, including the right to introduce retroactive legislation in criminal matters, are a breach of this covenant; and in view of the fact that ten years after the abuses perpetrated under this act, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is proposing a charter of fundamental rights which would still maintain all the repressive provisions of the War Measures Act,

[English]

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That this House commends those 16 New Democrats, led by Tommy Douglas, who ten years ago courageously opposed the proclamation of the War Measures Act; and that this House call upon the Prime Minister to announce today his intention immediately to repeal the repressive provisions of the War Measures Act, provisions which violate the United Nations covenant, and support amendments to the proposed charter of rights which would ensure that Quebecois and all Canadians are never again subjected to this reign of tyranny.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

SALMON—CONSTRUCTION OF ENHANCEMENT FACILITIES ON FRASER RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the seriously threatened state of Fraser River salmon stocks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That the government be directed to stop using its singular lack of progress in renegotiating the Canada-U.S. salmon treaty as an excuse for stalling the implementation of major salmon enhancement facilities on the Fraser River system, and that the government get on with building these facilities which must be designed and constructed now if we are to prevent the destruction of Fraser River salmon stocks by 1990.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN SHARED PROGRAMS BE PUBLICIZED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following motion:

Considering that it is difficult to trace the amounts represented by the financial participation of the Government of Canada to cost-sharing programs between the federal government and the provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Dion):

That the Council of Canadian Ministers should henceforth invite provincial governments to follow an accounting procedure which would highlight the financial participation of each of the two levels of government for all the budgetary items under the cost-sharing agreements and that, in addition, the financial participation of the government of Canada should always appear clearly in the publicity which is made around those programs.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the hon. member's motion. Under S.O. 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

CALL FOR AMENDMENT OF RESOLUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Prime Minister's extremely insightful conclusion in his essay "The Theory and Practice of Federalism", which says:

There is no reason to presume that the federal government will be more enlightened than the sum of the provincial governments, or even than one provincial government acting alone . . . because a (socialist) province with a planning board might be more likely to plan wisely than a (reactionary) central government with no such board.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to reread his own writings so that he stops treating provincial governments as second class governments and amends his constitutional resolution to include in it the resource rights upon which is predicated the future economic development of the provinces.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

GOLDFARB CONSULTANTS—CALL FOR INJUNCTION AGAINST PUBLICATION OF 1981 REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the October 11 edition of the Financial Post carries an advertisement by Goldfarb Consultants soliciting subscriptions to its 1981 report which would include: "A detailed treatment of public attitudes towards the debate surrounding a new constitution;" and whereas that information appears to come from the polls which the Canadian Unity Information Office asked Goldfarb to conduct and which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) yesterday refused to disclose because, as he said, "disclosure could be injurious to the conduct of federal-provincial affairs", I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government be instructed to seek an injunction against the publication or distribution of the 1981 Goldfarb report, and that the Minister of Justice be instructed to take the necessary steps to prevent such private and mercenary misuse of information paid for by all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—CLASSIFICATION AS ESSENTIAL SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the abnormal congestions in country grain elevators located on CP rail lines, and whereas these massive disruptions in the movement of grain are at the loss of millions of dollars to prairie farmers and have been brought about by a minority of union workers who are at this time not in a legal position to strike, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That all unions associated with the movement of grain, in the interests of farmers and our national economy, be classified as an essential service.

CREDIT UNIONS

TRIBUTE TO FOUNDERS OF, AND WORKERS IN, FINANCIAL SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter that is current today, urgent and necessary. In view of the fact that today is International Credit Union Day, which is intended to pay tribute to a long-standing tradition of co-operative financial services, shared by more than 60 million people and 45,000 credit unions and caisses populaires, and in view of the remarkable history and continuing growth of the credit union movement in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House pay tribute to the dedicated people who founded and continue the work of expanding co-operative principles in financial services to millions of Canadians through credit unions and caisses populaires.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

SEARCH AND RESCUE

CALL FOR DEVELOPMENT OF NEW EMERGENCY LOCATOR TRANSMITTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, the crash of the Canadian Forces air-sea rescue C-130 Hercules with the resulting tragic loss of life points up dramatically the complete lack of policy of the Department of Transport with regard to emergency locator transmitters. Whereas the enormous costs of this and other searches would more than pay for that which I propose, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Transport instruct his department to develop an ELT which will work properly and which would capture the export market, and that the mandatory regulations for ELT's be returned but this time with a decent subsidized program for owners.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS—INQUIRY AS TO REASON RESULTS NOT PUBLISHED

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Yesterday, in a letter to members of Parliament, the minister refused to release three polls which the government conducted subsequent to May 20, 1980. He refused on the grounds that these surveys "could be injurious to the conduct of federal-provincial relations". Given the fact that at least seven provinces are now opposed to the government's measures to patriate and amend the constitution and the fact that the minister has refused to make available polls which would seem to be available elsewhere, will the minister state what is the real reason why he is withholding this information that was paid for by the people of Canada and which the people of Canada through their representatives are entitled to have?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I gave the reasons in the letter. We released 13 polls yesterday. There are three which will be released in due course. I believe that later today we will release something like 117 others. As I said, the polls I will not release relate not only to the constitution but to other questions as well and I think this is not the time to make them public.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the unity office in refusing to release the polls described one of them which was conducted by Goldfarb Consultants "as Canadians' attitudes towards, and expectations for, constitutional reform". That happens to conform with an ad which appeared in the Financial Post of October 11 sponsored by Goldfarb, and I quote:

In particular, the 1981 edition of The Goldfarb Report will include a detailed treatment of public attitudes towards the debate surrounding a new Canadian Constitution.

It would appear that what is available through Goldfarb for a fee is being scandalously denied this House. Has the minister satisfied himself that what he is denying the House is now available for a fee through a consultant which was commissioned in the first instance by this government?

● (1420)

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I have checked exactly that point and the survey which has been made for the Canadian government will not be made available through the ads. I do think the one they are offering is the one that has been paid for and published, I guess, by the Toronto Star.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I ask the minister, who is a good parliamentarian and is known to be fair, because of the differences that have arisen regarding this ad and the polls he is refusing to release to the House, will he agree to allow this matter to be referred to a committee of the House where it can be duly examined and the House can in fact satisfy itself in this regard?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I am following the rules of the House. I have tabled 13 surveys which have been taken in the last 18 months. I think they have been well received. Of course, I am not ready to release the three I mentioned earlier as yet. When it is possible I will be delighted to table them.

I do not see why we should refer the matter to a committee. We have given an answer to the House. Of 141 polls, 129 will be made public almost immediately.

GOLDFARB CONSULTANTS—REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE POLL INFORMATION NOT USED FOR COMMERCIAL GAIN

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to those directed to the minister. The answer he has given my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, indicates to me that he has absolutely no interest in the real spirit of freedom of information. Any important information the government has that may be at variance with the policies he is promoting is denied to us, and only that information which is in favour of government policies is released.

I would like to ask the minister a specific question. In view of the astoundingly similar content of the ad to the information that Goldfarb is selling and the material obtained from the poll which has been conducted by Goldfarb on behalf of the federal government, will the minister guarantee to this House that the government poll on the constitution and the material obtained thereby has in no way been used by Goldfarb for its own commercial gain?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, that is exactly the same assurance I gave the previous questioner, that the polls which have been conducted for the Government of Canada remain the property of the Canadian government and will not be used by this firm for other purposes.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I would ask the minister whether he will verify that the minister is using the provisions of section 14 of the proposed freedom of information act and the spirit of the matter before the House as the basis for withholding the poll in question; and would he agree that it would be more fair, in view of the fact he is following the spirit of the freedom of information law, that there be some opportunity for independent review of that poll or, indeed, a parliamentary reference to a committee so we can satisfy ourselves that the exclusion which he indicates he is now relying upon is in fact valid? Will he not put this matter out of dispute and allow some independent assessment as to what those polls really cover?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, this week we tabled 129 polls taken in Canada over the last 18 months. I think the House will be satisfied since we made a very sincere effort to release the documents we had on hand. There would be a total of 12 only that cannot be made public at this time. We intend to respect the spirit of the legislation on information, and as soon as those documents will be of no more use to us for policy development purposes, we will release them.

GRAIN

INQUIRY WHETHER EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R. WILL BE LIFTED

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport who speaks on grain matters in this House. In view of reports from the United States that Secretary of Agriculture Bergland is about to sign a new five-year agreement for grain sales to the Soviet Union, and as this once again shows the lack of commitment of the United States to its once heralded grain embargo, will the minister now state whether the Canadian government is prepared to call off the grain embargo and remove any restrictions to normal trade?

● (1425)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker. We will try to avoid replacing embargoes from the United States, but we will continue to ship to the U.S.S.R. at our normal and traditional levels.

I had the opportunity yesterday to meet with the Canadian Wheat Board, which was quite encouraged by the international economics of grain at this time, and we are hoping to reach that traditional level of exports.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, the price decline as a result of the embargo has cost western Canadian farmers an estimated $225 million. In view of the sad state of the farm economy—and we need only see the lay-offs and the decline of farm machinery companies to see the effect of this—can the minister say when farmers can expect to receive the compensation they were promised because of reduced grain prices due to the embargo?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the government acknowledges the principle of compensation. There is a committee led by the Minister of Agriculture working on that, and we expect it will report soon.

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT OF COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary is to the Minister of Agriculture. We have seen a number of laudable attempts by this government to put money into the pockets of cash-short farmers, but Canadian hog farmers have been waiting over six months for stabilization payments. People in the drought area have seen their payments cut in half. Can the minister inform this House as to the amount of compensation farmers can be expected to receive, and will he assure the House that the government will not change its mind once the compensation formula has been announced?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we said that we would spend the equivalent of $67 million for drought aid. We have not said we would not spend that amount of money. We met in Regina last week with the advisory group and also with the people who are doing the investigation in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. They outlined some of the problems they have. They also told us of the many good comments they have received from the producers. With the other provisions under the legislation we are bound by with regard to crop insurance, etc., no other country in the world is offering the kind of assistance we are offering.

Under hog stabilization I believe we have 26,000 applications at the present time. We are hoping that those can be processed, if not by the end of November, by early December or before the end of the year. We are hiring extra staff to speed up the processing of stabilization payments. Again, we have not received any direct complaints from any of these people. They have said only that they are both very good programs and that they are very satisfied with them.

INQUIRY WHETHER AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS JEOPARDIZED BY RESOLUTION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice, who in this case in particular fortunately is also the minister responsible for social programs. The minister may recall that in June of 1978 there was a very famous case in the United States, the Bakke case, which dealt with affirmative action programs in relation to the bill of rights in the United States. In that particular case, which the minister will recall, the Supreme Court of the United States threw out the affirmative action program at the University of California on the basis that it was discriminatory according to the bill of rights.

I would like to ask the minister whether he has yet sought a legal opinion as to whether social programs in this country—and more particularly, affirmative action programs—are in jeopardy as a consequence of the bill of rights proposed in his resolution.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the particular case to which the hon. member refers. I will look into that, but I think that we have made provisions in the bill of rights which will be enshrined in the constitution to make sure there is no such problem.

In fact, if this House would make up its mind and send the whole resolution to the committee, I would be able to deal on a one-to-one basis with these questions. The matter is before the House, but it is in the committee where we can reply to these questions.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, like all members of this House, I am aware that section 15(2) of the proposed resolution deals with the question of affirmative action programs as related to the disadvantaged. If the minister will check, he will find that one of the difficulties in the Bakke case and two subsequent cases was that the definition of the word "disadvantaged" caused great difficulty. Right now in Washington—I checked this morning—their own affirmative action programs and many of their social programs are in jeopardy as a consequence of that decision. Would he please undertake to advise the House of the legal opinion which he would seek, and make sure that the House, and indeed all people in this country who are concerned with the matter, are informed?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, we did answer this question a few seconds ago. I said that it is before the committee that we will discuss these issues—

[English]

Mr. Clark: You prefer Westminster.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: —and ensure that the proposed charter of rights be debated in a rational fashion. I think that during the exchanges we might have in committee between members, myself and the officials of my department we could find the best solution. I do not think that it will be in the best interest of the House to try to score political points at this stage—

[English]

Mr. Clark: Yes, go to London, avoid Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to believe there is a serious problem, a problem I would like to solve in a judicial manner as quickly as possible. The best way of doing so is to discuss the proposals of the hon. member in committee, to look at the legislation as it is drafted and amend it if necessary.

[English]

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, the minister well knows, and so do his colleagues, that we will be asked to vote on this matter before it is sent to the committee. The people I represent would like to know the answer to the question. It is a very straightforward question. The basis of my question is this: the Minister of Employment and Immigration brought forward a few weeks ago three affirmative action programs dealing with young people, dealing with women, and dealing with Indians. If the Bakke case were applied here, those three programs would not be declared legal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crombie: I ask the minister only one question—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I know the hon. member was about to ask a question, but I must remind him that when I call him to order, he must resume his seat. Will he now put his question immediately.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I appreciate your advice to me. I should like to ask the minister whether he would undertake to provide the House with a legal opinion that those three programs are not in jeopardy.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, it is my intention to deal with all these problems in the committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: —and I am profoundly convinced that the best way we can protect the rights of Canadians is to have a good charter of rights—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: —and to make sure that this charter of rights is enshrined in the constitution and drafted in such a way that no affirmative action programs which have been decided on for the good of Canadians will be thrown out because of the charter of rights. Basically, a charter of rights is to protect rights. I am glad that the hon. member wants those rights to be protected and I hope he will vote for a charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is a sad response.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED BREACH OF GUIDELINES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the Government of Canada's conflict of interest guidelines. Commodore Arnott, who was the project manager of the frigate program, was offered a position in March, 1980, by Vickers Stanwick, a subsidiary of Vickers Canada. In June of 1980, presumably while this job offer was being negotiated, Vickers Canada was added to the short list from which they had been dropped in October, 1979. At the end of June, 1980, having received departmental permission, Commodore Arnott resigned as project manager and became president of Vickers Stanwick. What is the Prime Minister doing about this flagrant breaching of his guidelines?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think that Commodore Arnott has acted in conformity with the procedure established under existing guidelines on conflict of interest. I am well aware of all the details which the hon. member for Victoria has given me and I have asked privy council to co-ordinate the review of the case to make sure that all these guidelines have been observed according to the existing regulations.

ALLEGED BREACH OF GUIDELINES BY VICKERS CANADA

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I put my question to the Prime Minister because I wanted an answer from someone who knew something about what is going on in the Department of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister and perhaps he would be kind enough to take an interest in this matter. Scan Marine, one of the other competitors, has wisely registered a complaint regarding this matter. Will the Prime Minister now consider rejecting the bid by Vickers Canada in view of the unfair advantage the company has achieved by this flouting of his guidelines, which his Minister of National Defence either condoned or about which he was shockingly ignorant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I reject completely the premise of the question posed by the hon. member. I do want to point out that I am in complete agreement with what the minister has said, that we have ensured that the guidelines were followed by the hon. gentleman, that he followed the guidelines to the extent of asking advice, as the guidelines provide, before accepting this job, and he adhered to the guidelines in every way.

Nonetheless we are, as the minister said, reviewing the case. It is possible that the guidelines might have to be changed if this gives rise to any unfair advantage. I just want to point out that the guidelines were not changed during the period when the hon. member was part of the government of this country. They kept the guidelines, we are keeping them now. We are always ready to review them if they lead to some unfair advantage.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE IN PROPOSED BUDGET OF ADEQUATE FUNDING FOR PROGRAM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a very serious question for the Prime Minister. All parties in the House support the concept of bilingualism and I trust that all members are doing whatever they can in support of bilingualism during these very crucial and historic times. However, in some parts of Canada at least, bilingualism is in jeopardy at this time. If one assumes that education is the cornerstone of a successful bilingual program, the federal funding for bilingual education has been curtailed in the last couple of years, last year from $200 million to the present year—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please ask his question.

Mr. Riis: My question to the Prime Minister is: in the new budget will the Prime Minister assure the House that adequate funding for bilingual education will be provided so that school districts with active programs can have them maintained and expanded?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I hope the hon. member will accept the notion that it is not only the federal government which is responsible for bilingualism; in the spirit in which he asks the question, every province which has jurisdiction over education should be concerned with that. We have been funding substantially education systems in the provinces to the extent of an amount in excess of $2 billion a year for various aspects of post-secondary education which is given to the provinces. The spirit in which we help bilingual education specifically, or education in the other official language, was that the provinces themselves be prepared to accept some responsibilities, and it is in that sense that we hope the provinces will continue to show interest in the matter and that the federal government will not always have to continue supporting them in areas which they claim very strongly are within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am really disappointed to hear that response. Perhaps on another matter, certainly related to the forthcoming budget, may I ask the Prime Minister if he could use his good offices to work with the powers that be to ensure that adequate funds are set aside so that staffs of members of Parliament can have the opportunity for second language education to carry on in the tradition that we do as members.

An hon. Member: Ask Francis Fox.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is a matter which is under my purview. We are looking at this question and if the hon. member wishes to discuss it, he can come to my office. We might do that after the question period.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

INQUIRY RESPECTING EXPANSION OF PORT FACILITIES

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and has to do with ports policy. In view of the fact that Bill C-60 died on the order paper some time ago, I wonder if the minister could inform the House as to his own plans in terms of the planning, construction and expansion of port facilities with respect to the National Harbours Board, and particularly in ports in northern New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is referring to Bill C-50, I think. This was a bill the intent of which was to bring the whole of the port structure in Canada under a single umbrella. This was well received by some but not by others, and as my friend said, the bill was not passed.

• (1440)

In recent months I have received a great number of representations and I have consulted with a great number of people. What the press indicated a few days ago was that we were now moving toward the recognition of a greater element of diversity in our future port policy. The idea would be to have the national harbours commission bill as it is and to try to improve on the National Harbours Board Act in order to allow for a different kind of structure. I will soon be introducing these ideas to my colleagues in cabinet before doing so in the House of Commons.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT OF WESTERN ENERGY DEVELOPMENT FUND

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I would address my question to the Hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if I could break into his conference for a moment. Will the minister confirm the announcement made four weeks ago by the liberal Senate leader from British Columbia, who said that the federal government will be establishing a $4 billion western energy development fund to be spent over the next ten years, on who knows what? Will the minister agree that $4 billion is substantially less than one-fifth of the $25 billion to $30 billion which the federal government seeks to raise over the same ten-year period by invading the natural gas revenues of British Columbia and Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam speaker, in spite of his very often erroneous allegations, the hon. member knows I always pay attention to what he says. I think today is another example of his flying by the seat of his pants on a lot of issues at the same time.

An hon. Member: You run the government that way.

Mr. Lalonde: When the Prime Minister met the Premier of Alberta at the end of July, he indicated that it was the intention of the federal government, in addition to all its new energy expenditures and initiatives, to set aside a western economic development fund which would be used to help the economic development of the western provinces to the tune of $4 billion. That was the offer the Prime Minister made at the end of July in his meeting with the Premier of Alberta.

As hon. members know, this offer was turned down by the Premier of Alberta. I have indicated that in the next few weeks the government would come out with a global energy program and also that there will be a budget in the next few weeks. I invite my hon. friend to wait patiently and he will see what happens in that respect.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROPOSED TAX ON NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRIC EXPORTS WILL BE ABANDONED

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I can presume, then, that we should take pronouncements made in recent days by the Senate leader from British Columbia with a large grain of salt.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Recognizing that more than 20,000 British Columbians have now signed a petition expressing their absolute rejection of any attempt by the federal government to expropriate provincial resource revenues through the unilateral imposition of a federal export tax on natural gas and hydroelectric power, is the Minister of Finance now prepared to announce that the government will honour the election promises made to British Columbians by Mr. Gordon Gibson and the same hon. Senate leader, Mr. Perrault, by abandoning here and now all plans to impose this discriminatory export tax against the residents of British Columbia and Alberta?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, at this time I am not prepared to rule out any option that is available in framing my budget.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

RETURN OF AHOP UNITS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I believe last April the minister informed the House the AHOP program was 95 per cent successful. Will he then explain why, in the region of Peel—that is, Brampton and Mississauga—where 40 per cent of all AHOP units built in Canada were erected, 40 per cent of them have been returned to CMHC and are being returned at the rate of 50 to 75 units per month? Will the minister now admit that the AHOP program has been a complete and total disaster? What is he planning to do to alleviate the problem?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the question is a repeat question and the answer is the same as I gave. In my opinion and in the opinion of CMHC officials, many municipal councillors and many people knowledgeable in the field, in large part the AHOP program was successful. It accomplished many objectives, such as employment in the industry and accommodation to people who can afford it, and I stand by the figures I gave earlier.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, that answer is ludicrous. I might remind the minister that the five-year program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not seeking information, he is giving it. Will he please put a question?

Mr. McDermid: Now that the 8 per cent mortgages are up and these people are required to pay 14.5 per cent for a first mortgage and 13 per cent for a second mortgage so as to pay back the government to reduce that interest loan, what will the minister do to alleviate the problem faced by the people who are leaving these homes in droves? The minister should not ignore this problem and he should not tell us that it is 95 per cent successful, because it is not.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the answer to the second question is much easier. I am sure my hon. friend has forgotten that in March of last year, in response to the problem that he indicated, CMHC through the ministry indicated that we will accept on an individual basis requests in hardship cases to ensure that that portion of a person's income which exceeds 30 per cent would be reviewed, and that those hardship cases would have the same availability to the earlier program. That was the design of the program when it was announced five years ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTHEAST ASIA—ABUSES OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A year and a half ago, the House of Commons unanimously passed a motion introduced by the hon. member for Matane concerning the situation in Cambodia. It proposed that all members of the Canadian Parliament express their horror at that genocide, which is one of the worst crimes in the history of mankind, and asked all parliamentarians and governments which maintain relations with our country to protest against that slaughter which has astounded the entire world.

[English]

On Monday of this week Canada voted at the United Nations in favour of seating representatives of the infamous Pol Pot regime, apparently following the advice of our Southeast Asian friends who see the Pol Pot guerrillas as a means of keeping Viet Nam off balance.

My question is directed to the minister. By what norms of human decency has Canada seen fit to follow the faulty and self-interested advice of our friends in Southeast Asia and not Canada's collective conscience on this vote, the only practical result of which will be to prolong the agony of the Cambodian people? Will the minister at least undertake, in the circumstances, to hear the other side of the story from representatives of the Heng Samrin regime and Vietnam?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, Canada frequently has condemned the human rights abuses of the Pol Pot regime. I can state quite plainly in the House, as we have stated before, that we would not want to see a Pol Pot government again in power in Kampuchea. But we voted this week in the United Nations for the Pol Pot regime for a very limited purpose, and that is to continue its seating in the United Nations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: I wonder whether members opposite who have been applauding are applauding for the Heng Samrin regime or for Viet Nam, the aggressor.

The reason we cast this vote for representation is precisely because any alternative would be far worse. To approve the Heng Samrin regime and the Vitenamese aggressors in Kampuchea who are supporting that regime certainly would not be an improvement. We do not condone such aggression. We are working with the nations of Southeast Asia in the hope of reaching a political solution which will see another government eventually in power in that country.

GARRISON DIVERSION

SUGGESTED LOBBY BY ALL-PARTY DELEGATION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have here a copy of the tender call for construction of the New Rockford Canal portion of the Garrison Diversion Unit, construction of which will be of benefit to North Dakota only if the entire project is completed, which will, of course cause irreparable damage to Manitoba's fisheries and environment.

Since diplomatic channels have clearly been unsuccessful in protecting Canadian and Manitoba interests in this matter, is the minister now prepared to explore more convincing tactics in bilateral negotiation, such as face-to-face lobbying by an all-party Canadian delegation that could forcefully and convincingly show our friends to the south how seriously Canadians are concerned about this matter?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have accepted the support of members of Parliament of all parties with regard to any lobbying on the subject they would wish to do with American legislators. In fact, over the past week we have made representations to the government of the United States with respect to the way in which they propose to spend this money that has been allocated by congress. We have the assurance of the U.S. government that the money will not be used to advance the construction in any way that would harm Canadian interests. However, we submitted an additional diplomatic note to request details so that we may be assured of this.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, in 1977 the International Joint Commission handed down its report on the trans-boundary implications of the Garrison Diversion, a report which was very sympathetic to Canadian interest. Over three years have passed since then. Is the minister now in a position to tell this House when he expects that bilateral negotiations on the terms of the 1977 IJC report will begin?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, this is part of the same picture. We have the assurance of the U.S. government that no money will be spent in a way which will advance the Garrison project detrimentally to Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Do you believe that?

Mr. MacGuigan: I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we are seeking details so that we can be publicly assured as to how the money is being spent and be able to judge for ourselves whether or not this is the case.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROMPT DELIVERY OF CHEQUES TO RECIPIENTS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. The recent strike created havoc in unemployment insurance offices and the current backlog is creating problems for those who are entitled to unemployment insurance and who are still waiting for their cheques. In view of the estimation which the department did, no doubt, of the situation, can the parliamentary secretary tell us whether special measures will be taken in the next 24 hours to help those who are still waiting for their benefits?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I told the hon. member for Manicouagan last week, the problem has nothing to do with the distribution of cheques, as it may be the case in the province of Quebec in connection with welfare and the postal strike. It is a matter of issuing the cheques. While the clerks were on strike, unfortunately, no cheques were printed. Since last week they have been working overtime and most of the cheques were issued or will be within hours or days. I am quite confident that before the weekend or the middle of next week most cases will have been dealt with. In cases where serious financial problems are being experienced, the social affairs department in Quebec can help out the people concerned, but on an individual basis.

ESTABLISHMENT OF EMERGENCY FUND

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I have received an important telegram from Montreal; it is self-explanatory. The emergency committee receives hundreds of requests because the responsible social bodies cannot meet the demand, which means that the people concerned are penniless. Can the parliamentary secretary at least indicate to us whether he is willing to recommend to the minister that a very special emergency be set up, in view of the unbelievable problems those people are now up against, not only in Montreal but throughout the province of Quebec as well as in my riding?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): As we know, Madam Speaker, all the welfare services of the province of Quebec are authorized, and have the necessary funds, to meet urgent problems. With regard to the unemployment insurance benefits, as those cheques are not sent out on a regular basis like pensions, or in a fixed monthly amount—some employees receive a cheque for $150 one month and $75 another—it is impossible for our department to say it will put out cheques in an equal amount for everyone. Each case has to be dealt with individually. That is the cause of the delay in some cases. But in all cases of hardship, the Quebec social affairs department must meet the needs. Other volunteer organizations, other sources of financial assistance, can help out those people in cases of emergency. Unfortunately, our department is not set up to solve that type of problem: that is a provincial responsibility.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REGULATION RESPECTING USE OF METRIC SYSTEM FOR HOUSE PLANS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the minister responsible for Canada Mortage and Housing Corporation. I understand it is government policy that in order for an individual to be eligible to apply for a CMHC mortgage loan, all the house plans must be in metric. Does that regulation apply to all the provinces or are there currently certain sections of the country that are exempt from such a regulation? If, indeed, there are certain provinces which are not bound by the regulation at the present time, would the minister explain to the House why some provinces are bound by the regulation while others are not?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, my information is that the requirement of the corporation is one that is national in scope. I stand to be corrected, and I will look into the matter. I might add that I have received praise as well as criticism as a result of the difficulty caused. On the other hand, people and groups in the industry, associations, builders and so on, have said that it is a good move and they have complimented the corporation on that course of action.

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, the minister is undoubtedly aware that not all those in the business of selling homes have plans available in metric. Many of them have plans that are only available in the imperial measure. Is the government prepared to make concessions at all for those dealers who do not have plans that are available in metric? I would also add that in my earlier question I meant to include the territories as well as the provinces.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, my information is that the corporation is attempting to persuade and encourage the industry to follow the course of using metric in all plans that are submitted. I understand that this has taken a little bit of time. I understand as well that the industry, through its associations of builders and so on, is attempting to encourage builders and the industry itself to equip itself to comply with the regulations.

COAL—SUPPLY TO SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would the acting minister immediately cause to be investigated the circumstances whereby the reserves of coal supplied by Devco to the Sydney Steel Corporation have become precariously low on site, and any unexpected interruption in production would cause this already troubled corporation great difficulty. Could I have that undertaking?

An hon. Member: Where is the acting minister?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who says there is one?

An hon. Member: There isn't one.

An hon. Member: Someone answer the question.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I shall be happy to take notice of the question and refer it to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I shall see to it that the hon. member receives a reply as soon as possible.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, Madam Speaker. This time I will direct it to the government House leader. Perhaps the House leader will also take under representation the fact that there appears to be more money being made from sales to the Sydney Steel Corporation, which is very close to Devco, than is being made on sales to customers such as Stelco or on export sales. In view of the fact that these corporations are both vital to Cape Breton and that maximum co-operation between them is necessary, would the House leader convey to his colleague the request to make certain that Sysco is receiving all the benefits of its close proximity to Devco for the mutual benefit of the area and not being charged a price that is unreasonable, having regard to all the circumstances?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I shall certainly tell the minister responsible about the comments made by the hon. member in his question.

RAILWAYS

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—ALLEGED SLOW-DOWN IN ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Following allegations of a slow-down in grain movements from southern Alberta, is the minister able, through his own office or through the grain transportation co-ordination office, to bring pressure on the railways in Alberta and British Columbia to implement measures which will correct this situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, a number of entities have tried to help the parties to reach some conclusions, to come to some agreement, but this has not yet proved to be successful. The parties themselves have negotiated quite hard and the Department of Labour has also sent a negotiator. He came to an agreement which the labour side could not accept. Then the Canadian Transport Commission for the western division has been around, the Canadian grain co-ordinator has been around, all kinds of people have tried to help but have not yet been successful. I am trying on my own now.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS CONDUCTED BY CANADIAN UNITY INFORMATION OFFICE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and is a follow-up to questions asked earlier about polls taken by the Canadian Unity Information Office. In a statement in his letter to members of Parliament the minister said that he could not possibly release three of those surveys because they could be injurious to the conduct of federal-provincial affairs.

Mr. Clark: What nonsense.

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to ask the minister whether he could possibly elaborate a little more on why the results and details of these polls might prejudice the relations between the provinces and the federal government, or why it might be injurious? What possible questions could be asked that could be harmful? What possible results could the government have that might be harmful to the relations between the federal government and the provinces in a poll that is financed by the taxpayers of this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will be able to see for himself when I make the polls public in the next few weeks or months. We have made 13 of them public until now. Everyone can see the kind of questions we have asked in the past, and I am convinced that the hon. member will understand when these polls are made public that the questions do not deal only with the constitutional problem.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what can possibly be so harmful about public opinion? It is the Canadian public opinion that he is trying to hold back from the House.

The minister says in his letter that later on these polls will be made public. I should like to ask him now for a commitment that the three polls referred to will be made public before the joint committee on the constitution meets. If he cannot do that, can he at least assure the House that those three polls will be made public before the committee has to make a final recommendation to this House on the resolution on the constitution? I think we have a right to know, as opposition members of Parliament, what information the government has.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I have made public 13 of the results of the polls taken during the last 18 months, and from the response of hon. members it seems that they might have preferred that none of them had been made public. In any case, Madam Speaker, our policy is very clear. When we are through using the polls for policy development purposes, we shall make them public. At this time, these polls are being used to develop certain policies which have not yet been finalized by the government in many areas, and we shall make them public when the policies have been announced.

REQUEST MINISTER RECONSIDER REFUSAL TO RELEASE POLL RESULTS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there is no thinking member in this House of Commons who can accept the garbage we have just heard from the Minister of Justice.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Not one. To say that is to say that it is wrong for people to be informed of what the collective opinion is on a public issue. Would the minister reconsider what he has just said in the spirit of freedom of information—this freedom that was talked about in Toronto a few days ago by the Minister of Communications. Would the minister reconsider what he is saying in terms of the damage he is doing to this whole process in this Parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am very surprised by the attitude of the hon. member. We shall make public today or tomorrow 129 of the 141 polls made by the government during the last 18 months, some of which were taken by the Progressive Conservative administration and not made public at the time, which we will now do. As I have said, we shall also make public the three others which are under my control in due time. As a matter of fact, the Freedom of Information Act provides for a certain lapse of time between the application and the moment when the minister must make the information public, and we shall follow the spirit of the law.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARK—ADVERTISEMENT SPONSORED BY PUBLICATIONS CANADA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege relating to a matter that has recently come to my attention and that, in my judgment, constitutes not only a breach of the privileges of this House but also, I regret to inform you, an indication of contempt by the government for the Chair and your responsibilities as Speaker of the House of Commons.

The House will recall that there is before your Honour for your decision a question of privilege raised and argued in this House at some length in relation to government advertising, having to do with the matter which is under discussion by the House of Commons and on which the House of Commons has not yet reached a decision, that is to say, the contents of the draft resolution proposed by the government. That is a matter on which Your Honour has not yet rendered judgment.

Between the time the question was raised and before Your Honour's decision, an advertisement has begun to appear in newspapers across the land. This appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail, this morning, on page 17, under the title "Something to Think About". It is sponsored by an organization called Publications Canada, which I can only assume is the successor to Information Canada, of infamous renown in the House of Commons and the country.

This advertisement invites Canadians to go to their urban post offices and secure two documents which will give them more information about the matters that are under debate and have yet to be decided in the House of Commons.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that this is a very substantive breach of the privileges of this House and indeed, a contempt of your office by the Government of Canada, knowing this matter has been raised and not decided upon, to commence a new series of advertisements or advertising programs. That is one matter which I think you should judge.

The other matter which is equally important, is that the information in at least one of these documents is false information. I have not had the opportunity to read all the documents in extensive detail, but I can draw your attention to at least two statements in one of the documents which are false and one statement which is very seriously misleading.

A statement which is false in the document entitled, in English, "Highlights of a Proposed Resolution Respecting the Constitution of Canada", appears on page 1 and states that this proposal would provide as follows:

An amending procedure will ensure that all changes to the constitution can be made in Canada.

That is not true, Madam Speaker. What the Government of Canada is trying to do, what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to do, is not to have all changes made in Canada but, instead, to take certain changes which he proposes and smuggle those through Westminster so that they will be beyond the reach of this Parliament and will be decided, instead, by a foreign parliament in a foreign country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Therefore, Madam Speaker, the statement in this document does not reflect the attitude of hiding in the skirts of Westminster that is being evinced by this government in relation to certain of the amendments that it prefers. That statement is false.

The second statement that is false also appears on page 1 of the same document, and reads as follows:

If the proposed resolution is endorsed by Parliament, the Government of Canada will submit the joint address to the Queen—

It is our understanding, Madam Speaker, that what would be endorsed as a basis for a joint address to Westminster—is not the resolution but simply a procedural motion—a motion of concurrence in a committee report. It will not at all be an endorsement of the substance of the resolution; it would simply be the vote on the procedural question. That, too, Madam Speaker, is a matter that is false.

Madam Speaker: Order, please, I shall put this in the form of a question because I need to be enlightened on what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is leading to. If he is raising a question of privilege that flows from today's deliberations, that is one thing, and that is why I have listened to the right hon. member, because what he was saying was very close to it. But he seems to be asking about something which took place outside the House. The right hon. member could raise a question of privilege concerning something which occurred outside the House if he wished to, but I would need to have notice. The only question of privilege that I can hear from the right hon. member is if it flows from the deliberations of today's question period. Therefore, I would ask the right hon. member to argue on something which has been discussed today rather than something which happened outside the House. Otherwise, I will have to ask him to give me notice.

● (1510)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I will naturally take your guidance on the matter. I thought a question of privilege could be raised without notice, either if it arose from the proceedings in the House or if it came to the attention of a member during the proceedings of the House. But if you are ruling otherwise, and I gather you are, I stand to give you notice of an intention to raise this question of privilege substantively tomorrow.

I would say in passing, before I resume my seat, that I think it would be appropriate for the Government of Canada, on a matter regarding which a decision has to be rendered by the Chair, to stop these advertisements until Your Honour has made a ruling.

MR. HNATYSHYN—PUBLIC OPINION POLLS—ADVERTISEMENT SPONSORED BY GOLDFARB CONSULTANTS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given written notice to Your Honour. It is with respect to a matter raised in the question period today. It was originally raised under a point of order yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

It relates to the question of the polls which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has refused to deliver and disclose to members of Parliament. In the course of developing the basis upon which my question of privilege is made I might just point out that we have an offering, as you will know from the question period, from the Goldfarb Consultants organization. This advertisement appeared in the Financial Times for October 11, 1980. It was a full-page ad in which it is pointed out that the Goldfarb organization will publish a report to include a detailed treatment of public attitudes toward the debate surrounding a new Canadian Constitution. On the other hand, the polls in question which are being refused to us as members of Parliament by the Minister of Justice covering polling by Goldfarb Consultants Ltd., deal with Canadians' attitudes toward and expectations for constitutional reform. The similarities, notwithstanding the excuses given by the Minister of Justice, are quite outstanding.

These particular studies seem to be upon the same topic and the same subject matter, so we are faced with two particular problems. One is the whole question of the basis upon which the minister has refused to give and disclose those particular polls. The minister has apparently referred to and used the spirit of the freedom of information bill which is now before the House of Commons. Even though he was aware that this matter was going to be raised as a question of privilege, he has left the House, as my colleague has just mentioned. The fact is that the spirit of that particular bill which is now before the House is being used by the government as a basis of exclusion to disclosure of these documents. On the other hand, we, as members of Parliament, do not have available to us the recourse or the remedies which would be available if the bill had been passed. Therefore we do not have the ability to go to an independent arbiter, information ombudsman or a commissioner, nor do we have the right to make a judicial appeal on that particular decision.

The importance and urgency of this matter are that we are now dealing with a momentous debate. We have a resolution which purports to amend the constitution of our country and to change in a substantial way the Constitution of Canada. So, we are denied information with respect to public opinion by the people of Canada in polling carried out at public expense by the government on the eve of the committee consideration, and indeed during the course of the discussion in Parliament of this very important topic. The second aspect is this: notwithstanding the fact that we have a statement by the minister in the House, the information which is being offered by Goldfarb Corporation for a fee and the information that has been obtained by Goldfarb for the government are amazingly similar. I think we have the right to ask ourselves whether or not there is a principle and question involved here of proprietary interest held by the Government of Canada with respect to the information obtained by the Goldfarb Corporation.

We should have the opportunity, I submit, Madam Speaker, to have a parliamentary investigation of this matter. I think it is appropriate for us as parliamentarians to be able to determine whether or not there has been a breach of the normal guidelines which would prohibit information obtained for the government for a fee, in which the government has a proprietary interest, to be merchandised by the polling company or by the consultants who have been retained to obtain this information. We should be in a position to satisfy ourselves that there is no motivation behind the Minister of Justice in refusing to disclose this particular information on the basis that he wants Goldfarb to come out first and be able to proceed on a commercial basis with this information before it is made generally available to the public.

The problem which concerns me is this: the matter has great urgency. The matter is one which deals with the rights and privileges of every member of this House with respect to the availability of information obtained at public expense for a very important debate in the House at the present time. My rights, and the rights of every member of Parliament in this House, have been seriously and adversely affected.

In introducing this topic to you, Madam Speaker, I simply say that in the event that you do find there is a prima facie case, I am glad to provide for your consideration not only the ad in question so that you can have the opportunity to look at the wording, but also the material sent to me from the Minister of Justice, together with the listing by him of the polls carried out by Goldfarb which have been denied to us. If you see, on the basis of information that I have supplied to you and the representation I am now making, that there is a prima facie question of privilege and my privileges have been adversely affected, I would ask you to entertain a motion for a reference, and I have a motion to propose to you.

However, I have one final point before I move the motion. It is a point which I believe was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the other day. It is not necessary for you to decide whether or not there has been a breach of privilege but whether a prima facie case has been raised by the proponent of the motion. It is up to the committee, once the question has been referred to that committee, to carry out an investigation to determine whether or not there has been a breach of privilege by the actions of the minister in this particular instance.

I simply want to submit to you that you are considering whether or not there is a prima facie case, but not deciding the issue itself as to whether or not there has been any breach of privilege by the actions of the minister. I am not asking you to decide but rather to have the committee decide. In any event, Madam Speaker, if you find a prima facie case, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the matter of the offering for sale by the Goldfarb organization of polling data denied to the House of Commons by reason of the federal-provincial exclusion clause of the proposed freedom of information legislation constituting a breach of the privileges of the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

● (1520)

Madam Speaker: Before I hear other members on this question, I must say that it is very close to two other questions which I have under advisement. The additional question which is raised refers to the publication of certain material. The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has raised this question. He indicated that the material which was published is very similar to the kind of information or the title of the information contained in documents transmitted to him by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). However, he has not to my satisfaction described in what way the substance of the material published by Goldfarb constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House. The fact that something is published does not in itself constitute a question of privilege. The substance of it might constitute a privilege.

I will hear one other member because I have seen one rise on this question of privilege. I remind him that he must address himself to that particular point because, at this stage, I do not see a question of privilege in the matter that has been raised.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I will try at the outset to address myself specifically to the issue which you have raised because I think there is a very serious question of privilege here.

What my colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), has questioned is whether it is proper, if in fact it has taken place, for commercial subscribers to the so-called Goldfarb report to have access to information paid for by the Canadian taxpayer and which is denied this Parliament. Surely nothing would be more fundamental when looking at the rights of members of Parliament than that they should be entitled to have access to information prepared for the Government of Canada at the expense of the taxpayers of this country by a commercial company which is offering the information for sale for private gain to its customers.

What my colleague from Saskatoon West has asked is how we can possibly determine whether this is the case or not as long as Parliament is being refused access to the information. As long as we do not know what is in those polls which tax dollars have financed, there is no way we can make this comparison. We are not able to decide whether in fact Mr. Goldfarb is selling information which was paid for by the taxpayers for use by the Government of Canada. If, indeed, Mr. Goldfarb is selling such information for private gain, it would constitute, in my opinion, a very clear breach of the privileges of members of Parliament to have them be denied by the government, on whatever grounds, access to this information.

At the present time, Madam Speaker, you are taking under advisement a question of privilege that was raised on Friday. You are looking at the whole question of whether it is proper that public opinion in Canada should be classified. Only this government would feel it had the right to classify public opinion and treat it as something secret, and treat the results of studies carried out at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada as materials to which it alone should be privy, and Parliament and the people of Canada should not have access.

At the same time I would like to mention, arising out of the remarks of the Minister of Justice in the House today when he commented on the question of the release of polls, that the Minister of Justice misleads the House, I hope unintentionally, when he indicates, if that was the implication of what he was saying, that there was a policy when we were in government of withholding information gained through polls paid for by the taxpayer. In co-operation with my colleague from Joliette I was the minister who had responsibility for co-ordinating the government's activities on advertising and upon public opinion research. I can indicate to the House that our government's policy from the outset was that any poll paid for by the taxpayer should be made freely available to the people of Canada.

Mr. Ouellet: How many polls did you release?

Mr. Beatty: I say to the minister that we did not believe it was necessary to even enunciate a principle that should be so straight forward, that you do not classify public opinion polls paid for by tax dollars. These are matters which belong to the people of Canada.

I want to indicate to the government, as strenuously as I can, that if any of these polls which are being withheld by the government were taken during our tenure in office, I call upon the government today to release those polls. In doing that, I do so with the support of my leader. I invite members opposite to indicate if any of them at any time during our tenure in office requested these polls and were refused, because the policy was clear from the outset, that every single poll of this sort financed by tax dollars would be made available to the people of Canada, and certainly to the Parliament of Canada. If they have changed that policy and are classifying public opinion polls, and in particular any that were paid for during our tenure in office, they have the responsibility to declassify them and make them available to Parliament and the public as soon as possible.

Let me return to the point you asked me to deal with, Madam Speaker. This is a very serious breach of the privileges of members of Parliament if tax dollars are used to develop public opinion polls and then those polls are classified and withheld from the Parliament of Canada at the time when they are critical for a debate which is taking place in Parliament this very day. If they are withheld from us, they are withheld from the people of Canada by the government, but this can be achieved through the backdoor by paying money to Martin Goldfarb, subscribing to his Goldfarb report for which he is taking full-page ads to try to sell. He points out in there that he has done extensive work for the Government of Canada.

The only way in which you, Madam Speaker, and members of this House, can make an informed judgment as to whether there has been a very serious breach of the privileges of members of the House of Commons is if the government is required to declassify those public opinion polls which they are keeping secret at the present time. That must be done.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, this is a good example of the lack of interest of Progressive Conservatives in the constitutional debate. Every excuse and every means, even if they show a complete lack of respect toward the population and toward Parliament, seem to them completely justifiable to raise a matter which certainly does not constitute grounds for a question of privilege. What the hon. member has just stated and suggested is the complete opposite of what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said today in replying to certain questions. As you will see, the whole issue concerns a difference of opinions about the facts. How then can anyone conclude that the privileges of the members of Parliament are affected if, basically, the facts that should have been proven to your satisfaction, Madam Speaker, are denied on this side of the House?

Obviously, the member who spoke before the last speaker tried to give you a procedural lesson by saying, "Do not be afraid, all you have to do is to say that we are right and decide whether or not there is a prima facie question of privilege, and it will be up to the committee to examine the whole matter and determine whether you are right or not." I am sorry, but this is not procedurally correct. The hon. member was wrong. According to the procedure, you must decide, in light of the facts which are stated, whether there is a prima facie question of privilege. However, it is the House of Commons as a whole which must decide whether or not there is a question of privilege.

For you to conclude that there is a prima facie question of privilege, Madam Speaker, you need some facts. It is not just a matter of stating high principles. These must be supported by facts which show that members of Parliament have indeed been prevented from doing their usual work, fulfilling their duty as members and representing adequately their fellow citizens.

In the present case, there is absolutely no alleged fact which shows that members of Parliament seem to have been prevented from fulfilling their duty. On the contrary, the alleged facts have been expressly denied by the Minister of Justice. This is therefore a debate. This is what the members of the opposition want. They want a debate on the question, even though there has already been an overly lengthy debate last week on the same matter following a question raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. This is the second point of my argument, Madam Speaker, which shows how much the members of the Progressive Conservative Party are afraid to deal with the constitutional issue within the normal boundaries of the debate which has been going on recently. That fact is, there is already a question of privilege which has been reserved by you, Madam Speaker, on exactly the same matter which had been raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and I suggest they are abusing this institution and wasting the time of Canadian taxpayers as well as of hon. members of this House. By so doing, they are showing a lack of responsibility, and if Progressive Conservative Party members take advantage of every opportunity other than the debate on the constitution to play the game of petty politics, they deserve to be denounced, and I denounce them publicly. They are seeking every possible way to prevent the debate on the constitution from progressing normally.

To conclude, Madam Speaker, they are wasting the time of the House. There is absolutely no basis for raising this question of privilege, and I say that they are showing disrespect by rising on a question of privilege which has already been reserved by you, as introduced by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

● (1530)

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I wish to begin by agreeing with you that what we have before the House today is very similar to a question of privilege raised on Friday and, indeed, a previous question of privilege raised in respect of government advertising on Thursday of last week.

If I may, I want to refer you to a ruling by Speaker Jerome back on December 10 last. This was referred to in the House last week by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who quoted from page 2180 of Hansard for that date. I should like to quote it again as follows:

> The support of public funds, where applied to parliamentary activities, ought, I think, to apply across the floor of Parliament—

That was a ruling he made in respect of a different issue where the government of the day had established task forces made up of members of only one political party. The ruling was that where public funds apply, those public funds should apply equally across the floor of the House when dealing with parliamentary activities.

What I want to suggest to you today is that we are dealing with an issue here that is as relevant, in terms of a constitutional committee, to a parliamentary activity as it was last September in relation to the task forces on grain movement, beef and so on, established by the government of the day. I think the same rule should apply here as applied at that time.

Another interesting comment made by Speaker Jerome on the same day, as reported at page 2181 of Hansard, is as follows:

> I hope the House will take the sense of the argument, which I think is a very serious argument, and the sense of the Chair in this respect, that it is a practice which ought to be considered very carefully before it is entered into again. If it were to be attempted again, I would think the House ought to be consulted.

In other words, the House ought to be consulted before that type of activity is entered into again. One may say it was a different kind of activity because it involved task forces made up of members of only one party using public funds. I point back to what Speaker Jerome said when talking about parliamentary activity. We have before the House today a resolution on the constitution. We are not talking here at all about the substance of that resolution. We are talking about a resolution being before the House, regarding the constitution. It will establish a special committee of this House and the other place to study a document relating to the constitution. That, in my opinion, is a parliamentary activity. If the government of a previous day could not spend money for its MPs on task forces, it seems to me you can apply the same argument, that the government of the day should not have access to public funds to carry on a public opinion poll to the results of which the government alone will have access.

An hon. Member: How about paying public servants? Can we not do that?

Mr. Nystrom: The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), I believe, talks about paying civil servants.

Mr. Knowles: You don't pay them very well.

Mr. Nystrom: I want to say to him that this is a totally different argument because public servants are involved in administering programs of the government from day to day.

Mr. Knowles: And there is parliamentary approval for it.

Mr. Nystrom: They are running departments and, as my friend points out, there is parliamentary approval for that. Their jobs are defined by Parliament and we have approved them. We have passed acts, and they are administering those acts. Once Parliament has passed an act that is a totally different story. I see nothing wrong in principle with government advertising if the act has been passed and is the law of this land. What we are dealing with here today is something totally different. We are dealing with a proposal of the Government of Canada, and be it good or bad is immaterial and irrelevant, which is now a proposal of one party, a party which happens to be in the Government of Canada and which, in preparing its argument for Parliament and the committee, has access to public opinion polls about how Canadians think their country should be organized. We do not have access to those polls and we do not have access to those funds as opposition members.

We are all elected as equals, and until a law is passed in Parliament, until public servants have been told what to do by Parliament, then I maintain that, as Mr. Speaker Jerome ruled, for any parliamentary activity, access to the funds should apply equally to members on both sides of the Chair, equally across the floor of this House.

I would like to ask you to take a serious look at that and the intent, because the Speaker said, as it appears in Hansard of that date, that before we enter into a practice of this sort again it should be given very serious consideration. He said the House ought to be consulted. I think we would be very wise if we were to refer this matter of polls, the matter of government advertising on proposals that are not the law of the land, have not been enacted, and where public servants do not have the direction of the Parliament of Canada, to a special committee. I think this is a question that strikes possibly at the very essence of the democratic system, of freedom, of equality of votes in this country, be they cast by members of Parliament on the government or on the opposition side of the House.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: With leave from hon. members, I would now interrupt debate on the point of privilege raised this afternoon. I would not like to anticipate on the two decisions I will give tomorrow, because they are very close to this one, and I submit to hon. members that evidence of this lies in the arguments heard in the House this afternoon. They are almost identical with those raised on the two points of privilege I have taken under consideration and on which I will rule tomorrow.

On the point raised today, I have not been satisfied up till now—although I reserve decision on this—as to what information in the studies, surveys or submission from Goldfarb Consultants is not included in the studies the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) decided to make available to hon. members by a procedure he chose himself and that may not please all hon. members. I have no authority whatsoever to force the minister to table documents in this House. He selected a procedure, a way of his own to make available studies that in my view are very bulky. That is his business, and if hon. members are not satisfied with the way the minister made these documents available, they of course will have opportunities to debate this some way or other.

Therefore I reserve judgment on this point of privilege. I will render tomorrow the two decisions I took under consideration and also my ruling on today's point of privilege. I am not saying that they are all identical, not at all. They concern slightly different aspects. They are not identical, but they are similar enough, they are based on the same matter, and I shall rule tomorrow on all three.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order and I must confess to you that it relates to the matter you have just reserved upon and, therefore, have not decided upon. This is something I feel should be brought to your attention. I raise it because of answers to questions in respect of this whole matter of polling. If you had not reserved decision I would not be raising this matter, because I do have respect for the Chair, and I think you understand that.

● (1540)

What I am concerned about is that in answer to a question put yesterday, as reported at page 3685 of Hansard—the question having to do with the tabling of the results of the polls—the minister decided that he would not table those results. He can make that decision. I will ask my friend the government House leader a little later about that, but he can make that decision. I will tell you, Madam Speaker, as a matter of record, that he is adopting a process by which the poll results can be obtained. The raw figures and the questions asked can be obtained.

Mr. Pinard: That is not a point of order, Walter.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We know that there was a detailed analysis of those polls. That detailed analysis is not being released. It is the analysis which is referred to in the Goldfarb ad.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I thank the hon. member for bringing this fact to my attention. I think I referred to it when I was telling the House that I was reserving my decision on this question of privilege. I did say that perhaps hon. members are not satisfied with the mechanism the minister chose to make these studies or polls available—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That was not the point.

Madam Speaker: —to the members of this House, but that is the mechanism he chose. If hon. members want to discuss that on some other occasion or while raising some other point, I can entertain it, but since I said I am going to reserve on this question of privilege the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) really has been relating his remarks to that question of privilege. In any event, I have heard him, but I will not entertain any other interventions on this particular question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the government House leader could tell us his plans for the end of this week and into next week.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: With pleasure, Madam Speaker. If we can conclude the debate on the motion to refer to committee the resolution on the constitution fairly soon, perhaps even tonight, we could, pending the budget speech, proceed with consideration of three bills which are quite important and urgent, as my hon. colleague well knows. We could proceed with consideration of the motion to refer to committee, as soon as possible, Bill C-42 to establish the Canada Post Corporation. As my colleague will recall, the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) raised the matter just before the summer recess. He is no doubt well aware that postal employees are anxious to see this bill passed by Parliament, and I am certain that he will show his customary sense of responsibility so that the special committee can discuss the constitution and Parliament can consider important pieces of legislation such as Bill C-42 on the Post Office, and Bill C-43, which these questions of privilege have alluded to and which deals with access to information. The bill is before the House and should be considered as soon as possible, along with the Bank Act, which has yet to be passed at the report and third reading stages, and receive royal assent by November 30 of this year.

[English]

I want to take advantage of this situation and to point out to my hon. colleagues that the constitution is very important, the budget will be very important, and the energy matter will be very important, but we still have some 30 bills on the order paper, and three of them are very urgent. I just talked about them, and I refer to Bills C-42, C-43, and C-6.

If my hon. colleagues want to co-operate, they should understand that after the committee stage of debate on the resolution there will be a third stage on the floor of the House of Commons to deal with the report of the committee. There will be ample time to deal with the constitutional issue on the floor of this House. It might be useful to agree to the motion to refer the constitution resolution to the committee as soon as possible, hopefully tonight or, at the latest, at the beginning of next week, so that this House can be in a position to deal with the economy, as requested by the hon. member's own leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), to deal with the bills I just talked about and to deal with the other important and major issues this country is now facing.

Next Wednesday will be an allotted day. I had wanted to designate tomorrow, but it will be on Wednesday next. I would like that to be clear. We talked about Friday, but next Wednesday will be the next allotted day.

If my hon. colleague has further questions, I would be delighted to try to provide him with some answers.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I appreciate that. As the government House leader knows, the government chooses the order of business, and it has chosen to bring a resolution before the House. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) invited all hon. members to participate in the debate. Frankly, as a member of this House, I appreciate that. I am going to be participating in the debate this afternoon. I look forward to that, and I know there are other hon. members who look forward to it. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) set the parameters of this debate in the course of his speech when he indicated the importance of this particular stage.

I just want to make the record clear that the government can choose the business of the House as it wants to, and we will deal with it. I know the position the government House leader is in. I sympathize with him completely, and he must know that.

As far as the opposition day is concerned, the remarks of the government House leader were quite in order. However, it would be helpful to the business of the House, and I ask the minister this as part of my point of order, if he would prevail upon the Minister of Justice not to leave these polls, with such information as they contain, at the Canadian Unity Office and at every other government department around town so that we have to go all over town to get whatever information is available. The press has to do that. There is no gathering together of it. I wish the government House leader would prevail upon his friend, the Minister of Justice, to do what is normal, to come into the House, table the questions, the polls and the results, and also table the analyses of those polls which were referred to in this matter as being available for commercial purposes by Goldfarb. I wish the government House leader would prevail upon the Minister of Justice to do all those things, table them here and then end the dispute.

I think it is important that the government House leader should know that this matter is not merely procedural. He may regard it as such, but it is not. If these are attitudinal polls with respect to the attitude of the public of Canada about the issue before Parliament, then they go much further than that, and if he wants to facilitate business he had better do a bit of facilitating himself.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, on the first part of the remarks made by my hon. colleague, this is the first indication I have had that his party intends to prolong the debate on the first phase.

Mr. Paproski: Oh, come on, Pinard.

Mr. Nielsen: It is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us.

Mr. Cousineau: We listened to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Wait until the minister has finished.

Mr. Beatty: Did you speak in the debate, Pinard? We want the same right.

Mr. Pinard: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. member. Perhaps hon. members opposite intend to let it go fairly quickly. If so, I appreciate that, because what the Prime Minister said, and what I am also saying—and I wonder why hon. members opposite are crying about it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: If hon. members do not feel well, they may get out. I do not mind.

Mr. Beatty: Did you speak yesterday?

Mr. Pinard: I will send the hon. member a copy of my speech.

What I am saying to my hon. colleague—and I want to be serious with him because I think he was serious—is that what the Prime Minister said, and what we have been saying all the time, is that we certainly do think this is a very major and important debate, and as many members as possible should participate.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, that is what he said. The Prime Minister did not specify one particular stage. My hon. friends will understand that participation in a debate can mean during the committee stage or even at the third stage when this resolution will be back.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What is the third stage?

Mr. Pinard: I would be glad to inform my hon. colleague of what is going on here. I thought he understood.

We are debating now a motion to refer the resolution to a committee. Once the committee receives the resolution, it will have a limited period of time in which to look at it, until December 9. The committee will then report to the House, and the House will then be in a position to look at the report of the committee which will deal exactly with the resolution.

An hon. Member: Will we debate it?

Mr. Pinard: That is exactly what is going on.

An hon. Member: And debate it?

Mr. Pinard: And debate the report of the committee, yes.

Mr. Kempling: The report, not the resolution?

Mr. Pinard: The report will deal with the resolution. It will not talk about the World Series.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No tricks?

Mr. Cousineau: You are filibustering.

Mr. Pinard: I am trying to explain what seems to me very obvious. When a committee reports to the House, what is considered by the House is the report of the committee. We do not intend at the time to deal with anything else but the report related to the resolution which is pertinent to the constitution. I think my colleague knows about that. If he wants us to talk about anything else, he had better tell us. What I am saying to him is that the House will have full opportunity at the third stage which I have just described to speak on the resolution which will be dealt with in the report of the committee.

• (1550)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: I suggest hon. members ask their House leader, who is very knowledgeable and who will be able to provide them with further details. I do not wish to take up the whole time of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: We like to talk about the constitution.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Pinard: That is my answer to the first point raised by the House leader of the Tory party.

On the second point, I do not know if I should answer a question which I consider to be a prolongation of the debate which the hon. member started with Madam Speaker after she had decided to take some questions of privilege under consideration. I certainly do not intend to tell the Minister of Justice what to do. I think he answered the questions today very well. What he is doing, I think, is right. There is absolutely no breach of privilege of any sort in the way he is acting, and in a few moments I will be delighted to table the many, many polls that have been taken in the last 18 months.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), if I understand him correctly, has made it clear that if there is House time between the point when the debate on the present motion has concluded and the budget is to begin, that intervening time will be used to deal with Bill C-42, Bill C-43, and the report stage and third reading of Bill C-6. Can he tell us in which order those three bills will be dealt with, if there is a gap between the consideration of this resolution and the budget?

In connection with the budget, may I remind the government House leader that yesterday his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in reply to a question about the budget said:

> I will attempt to do that after I have had a chance to confer with my colleagues tomorrow.

Well, that tomorrow is today. The Minister of Finance has left. Is the President of the Privy Council in a position to tell us what the date of the budget is to be?

Mr. Pinard: May I say in reply to the second part of the question that, yes, "tomorrow" is today, but it is not yet over so I am not in a position to provide any indication on this. I had expected that perhaps a question would have been put to the minister today. Obviously the hon. member had no question on the matter, and I cannot answer in the minister's name at this stage.

With regard to the first part of the question as to the order in which we would like to deal with the three bills I had mentioned, it all depends on the length of the gap. If it is a long gap—and I understand the NDP would like to see this resolution go to the committee as soon as possible because they understand that they will have ample opportunity to debate the matter later on—we would like to look first at the Bank Act because of the great number of amendments which will have to be discussed. But if the gap is short between the end of the debate on this motion and the beginning of the debate on the budget, then I suggest that we start debate on Bill C-42 which is related to making the Post Office into a Crown corporation. As I said earlier, there is much pressure, I understand—and I recognize that kind of pressure—and we should show some responsibility and deal with the matter as soon as possible.

We have the opportunity of dealing with all those important matters and at the same time continuing the debate on the constitution, because the committee will consider the resolution on the constitution and at the same time the House of Commons will be dealing with the bills mentioned, with the budget, and with the energy measures, just as the leader of the Tory party has asked be done.

Mr. Knowles: I have two other questions which I should like to put to the government House leader under the heading of the business of the House. It is now 13 years since a special committee recommended to Parliament that a regime of collective bargaining for employees on Parliament Hill be established. The minister's predecessors promised several times that this matter would be considered. Can he say whether consideration has been given to the introduction of such legislation during this session?

My other question relates to the fact that there are thousands of veterans' widows who are disturbed and unhappy over the fact that they are having to wait four, five or six years for the pensions which were authorized earlier in this session. Will the government House leader discuss with his colleague, the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, the possibility of bringing in another bill in this session to amend chapter 19 of the Statutes of 1980 to shorten or eliminate that most unfair waiting period?

Mr. Pinard: With regard to the first point, Madam Speaker, there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne dealing with the request made by the hon. member so I would be surprised if, in this session, there would be an opportunity to look at legislation related to the matter raised by the hon. member.

With regard to the second point, it is not the first time that the hon. member has shown some interest in the matter. I will be glad to speak to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs but I cannot guarantee that we will agree to amend our legislation at this point.

Mr. Knowles: You will hear from me again.

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, still speaking on the business of the House, I wish to make a point on the question which was brought up. There was a misrepresentation of facts which I think should be clarified at this time. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) paraphrased what he thought were the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In fact, I have the transcript in front of me and the words do not convey what he thought was the interpretation. On that occasion the Prime Minister said:

> The Speaker has asked that Parliament return on Monday to begin debate on that resolution. Every member of Parliament from every corner of this land is asked to participate in this historic act.

By this he meant the debate on the resolution.

Mr. Pinard: I just want to say that we agree with that fully. As I was saying, the debate will not end with the acceptance of the reference of the matter to the committee; it will go on in committee, and the resolution will come back to the floor of the House where it will be debated. So every member of Parliament will have the opportunity to speak, not necessarily on the first stage but throughout the three stages. That is what I was saying, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Taylor: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. After the resolution comes back from the committee it is too late. We have representations to make. Only a few members go to the committee. We have representations to make on behalf of the people who sent us here and we should not be denied the right to do so.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it is the hon. member's leader who, while in power, advocated the creation of a great number of committees to deal with subjects of importance. I believe in this institution which includes the committee system. As I was saying, it will not only be the committee which will look into the matter. The House is now looking into it, the committee will look into it, and it will be back on the floor of the House, so the hon. member should feel much more secure now that he knows he will have sometime the opportunity to speak, either at this stage, in committee, or when the resolution is back on the floor of the House.

Mr. Taylor: I do not feel secure at all. I want to make my representations first.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have not recognized the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, during that exchange of views by the parliamentary leaders of the three parties in the House, reference was made to the legislation setting up the Post Office Corporation. I would like, therefore, to recall that my friends opposite have given their support in principle and said that they wished to hasten the passage of the legislation. I hope that the good will shown a few months ago is still there and that it will be possible to find the necessary time to pass that legislation. The unions which have to renegotiate collective agreements in the near future would like to do so under the Labour Code rather than under the public service legislation.

Therefore, it is necessary to obtain the co-operation of all political parties in the House and I hope that we will find the time to do so even if we have to ask our hon. friends opposite to give up one of their allotted days to discuss that bill.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I took part in the discussion with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaser General (Mr. Ouellet) with respect to the postal corporation bill. I would suggest that he speak to his House leader and that his House leader can help him to decide which is the best time to bring in the bill. There is nothing that I said in the exchange we had in the earlier part of the year from which I would back away.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

Madam Speaker: Routine Proceedings. Presenting Reports from Standing or Special Committees. Tabling of Documents. Statements by Ministers.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I wish to table some papers. Do I have leave to table them?

Madam Speaker: Order. With the consent of the House, we will now revert to tabling of documents.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

LISTS OF PUBLIC OPINION SURVEYS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I presume that hon. members have no objection to my tabling the polls. Under the provision of Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table a copy in both official languages of lists of public opinion surveys either conducted or planned since March, 1979.

NEW MEAT RESEARCH BUILDING—LACOMBE—ALBERTA

Question No. 1,285—Mr. Schellenberger:

Were plans for the new meat research building at the federal agricultural station in Lacombe, Alberta, submitted to the Treasury Board and, if so (a) what is the projected cost (b) on what date will construction begin (c) what is the anticipated date of completion?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes.

(a) The Treasury Board approved this project at the department's preliminary estimate of cost of one million dollars.

(b) Dates for commencement and completion of construction have not yet been established.

(c) As in (b).

AGRICULTURE—MONETARY ASSISTANCE—CONSTITUENCY OF OXFORD

Question No. 1,352—Mr. Halliday:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79, how many (i) beef (ii) dairy (iii) poultry (iv) pork (v) egg (vi) corn producers in the constituency of Oxford, applied for assistance and received monetary assistance from the Department of Agriculture?

2. For the same years, how many persons in the constituency of Oxford applied for a loan and received a loan from the Farm Credit Corporation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. None.

2. Farm Credit Corporation advises that statistics are not maintained on a constituency basis. The constituency of Oxford is made up of two field areas, which results in an overlap into the constituency of Brant. However, based on the foregoing, the answer is:

	1977-78	1978-79
(a) Applied for a loan	120	109
(b) Received a loan	110	83

ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,486—Mr. Cossitt:

What is a full description of the methods and procedures for hiring of (a) permanent (b) temporary or seasonal employees in the St. Lawrence Islands National Park?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): St. Lawrence Islands National Park conducts its own recruiting only for administrative support (clerical) and operational (maintenance, etc.) positions.

(a) Hiring of permanent employees

Closed or open competition

In the event that attempts to recruit qualified candidates from within the public service are unsuccessful or where it has been determined to be in the best interests of the public service, the responsible staffing officer may, subject to the conditions of delegation, consider recruitment from outside the public service, in accordance with the Public Service Employment Act and Regulations.

(i) Open competitions (open to the public)

The park must go to the local Canada Employment Centre for referrals. Potential candidates are referred by the local Canada Employment and Immigration Centre (CEIC) office in Brockville, Ontario. The region covered by this office extends from Brockville to Gananoque but the area of the region may be increased to cover Prescott-Kingston if the local CEIC office feels that a wider search is required due to an insufficient number of candidates being available in the Brockville-Gananoque area. The candidates are then interviewed by parks personnel and rated against appropriate selection standards. Qualified candidates are then placed on an eligible list and offered positions as vacancies occur during the time the eligible list is valid, as governed by Public Service Commission regulations.

(ii) Closed competitions (open only to federal employees)

There are two types of closed competitions; local and regional. A local closed competition includes only employees of St. Lawrence Islands National Park. A regional closed competition includes Parks Canada employees, Ontario region, which emcompasses the province of Ontario. The area of competition for closed competitions is determined from the "Area of Competition Guidelines" as issued by the Public Service Commission on the basis of three considerations: the organizational unit within which a candidate must be employed in order to be considered; the geographic boundaries of the area of competition; and the occupational group and salary of employees. Closed competitions for employees of St. Lawrence Islands National Park take place when the number of candidates is sufficient to meet the three considerations listed above. Closed competitions are widened to a regional scope when the park cannot provide sufficient candidates. Closed competitions are extended to other regions and other departments when an insufficient number of candidates is available. The candidates are interviewed by parks personnel and rated against appropriate selection standards. Qualified candidates are then placed on an eligible list and offered positions as vacancies occur during the time the eligible list is valid, as governed by Public Service Commission regulations.

(b) Hiring of temporary or seasonal employees

The methods and procedures are the same as in (a)(i) and (a)(ii).

If there is a requirement to staff positions other than those in the administrative support or operational categories as described above, it is referred to the regional office for action. The personnel advisor in the regional office essentially follows very similar procedures using the Public Service Commission as a central agency instead of the Canada Employment and Immigration Centre.

RESEARCH—ENERGY

Question No. 1,494—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For each of the past three years, what amount did the government spend on research into all forms of energy—oil, gas, coal, tar sands, heavy oil, solar, nuclear and what is the current projected expenditure?

2. On a per capita basis, how does Canada's energy research related expenditures compare with other member countries of the OECD?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In so far as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned:

1 and 2. See lists below. Table I shows the governments' expenditures on energy research for four years and table II shows the per capita comparison to other member countries of the OECD (Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development) for government and industrial energy research.

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration from Wednesday, October 15, 1980, of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate which is, as many members of the House have recognized, an important and historic debate and one which has been of very high quality. I have not been able to be here for all the comments of members of the House, but I have followed closely their remarks as reported in Hansard. It is clear that members on all sides of the House participating in the debate have raised questions of serious and thorough interest.

Also I am rather glad to have had the opportunity today to listen to the crossfire before we reached this stage. I was somewhat surprised by the puzzlement, concern, or almost astonishment which has just been expressed by some mmembers opposite about the course we have proposed to deal with this resolution because clearly it has been known to them for some time. I should like to refer to the remarks of the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), as reported at page 3290 of Hansard of October 6, which read as follows:

The significant debate will come when the resolution itself is brought directly before the House some time after the committee has made its report. Only when that resolution is presented will we know if the government has taken any account—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to the minister, but I want him to understand that what we were talking about was a resolution debatable and amendable in this House in the form of an address to Her Majesty the Queen and to the British Parliament. We were not talking about the concurrence debate which was referred to by my friend. Precisely that is what the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was referring to at that time, just so that he understands.

Mr. Roberts: I think I understand the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), but it does not seem to me that that is the clear purport of the remarks made by his leader.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Resolution.

Mr. Roberts: What is referred to is not the resolution before the House, but a resolution which has gone to the committee. It refers to the report made by the committee. His leader said:

Only when that resolution is presented will we know if the government has taken any account at all of the views that are expressed by members of this House of Commons—

Clearly the reference is a report coming from the committee after it has been referred by the House to the committee. This procedure, which seems to have elicited so much surprise today, is one that has been perfectly well known to members opposite for some time.

As I said, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We welcome you too.

Mr. Roberts: I am glad the hon. House leader opposite welcomes my participation in the debate which clearly has gone on for some time.

I hope to discuss seriously some of the points made by other speakers in the debate. Inevitably in a debate which has gone on this long there is a certain redundancy of argument and a certain reference to what has already taken place. Of course in a debate which has ranged so widely, inevitably there are things that appear to be consistent and some seem to be inconsistent. It seems to me somewhat surprising when we proposed a charter of rights for individuals, which is a common element in virtually every federal system in the world, that critics should accuse us not of supporting federalism but of abandoning British tradition. When we propose an amending procedure with an attached referendum, they falsely accuse us of establishing a unitary system of government which is characteristic of the government of Great Britain. They do not condemn us for accepting the British unitary system but they accuse us of abandoning federalism.

Perhaps it is even more surprising that provincial governments attack us for suggesting that an appeal to the courts should be permissible to protect the rights of the people, and then themselves appeal to the courts to protect the rights of provincial governments, as if somehow it is more important that the courts protect the rights of provincial governments rather than the rights of individual citizens.

Of course in our proposals we have neither abandoned the British parliamentary tradition nor the principles of federalism; we embrace them. In our proposals for reform we do not alter the distribution of powers between two levels of government, the essential of any federal system, nor do we propose to abandon the traditions of British government, the linkage between the executives and the legislatures which is common to the tradition not only of this House but to the legislatures of the provinces. We are not suggesting to change any of that. Indeed we have preserved in our proposals both the desirable aspects of the parliamentary system and the balance of federalism.

I should like to refer essentially to two speeches made at the beginning of this debate. First I refer to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition in which I think we dwelt largely on a marginal or peripheral—I do not say unimportant—concern with section 42 of the amending procedure.

● (1610)

I would also like, perhaps a bit later, to refer to the remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), partially because I believe that he stated very clearly to the House the two essential questions which confront the House and upon which the House must at this stage decide.

Let me first refer to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. While he did refer to the inappropriateness, as he believes it, of the government proceeding in the fashion which is described in the joint resolution that will be forwarded to the Queen, and therefore to the attention of the British Parliament, a large portion of the Opposition Leader's remarks dealt with the effect of the amending procedure which we have proposed for the consideration of the House. I would like to refer in passing to the hon. member's remarks suggesting that we were following what he called a "unilateral" procedure. Clearly, it is not a unilateral procedure because we have the support of others, and it is not merely the government.

The unilateral approach to the constitutional amendment is one which he described as contesting the validity of the approach. I think it is undoubtedly clear that what we have proposed is the proper legal approach. The British North America Act is an act of the British parliament and therefore amendable by that Parliament. Clearly, the procedures under which that amendment will take place through the British parliament are well known.

It is contested that constitutionally the precedents which underlie an address from the House of Commons and Senate of Canada may not have been fulfilled in this circumstance. It seems to me that there is confusion as to what are those precedents. Therefore, I would like to dwell on the question of what the constitutional conventions have been in the past as they relate to amendments of the constitution of Canada, the British North America Act.

One can judge differently the number of amendments which apply. Strictly speaking, there are 18 amendments to the BNA Act and, if one includes the Statute of Westminster, there are a few more. In only four instances—five, if one includes the Statute of Westminster—out of 22 of those amendments has the unanimous agreement of the provinces been asked for and obtained. They were in relation to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940; the Old Age Pension, 1951; retirement age of provincial superior court judges, 1960; and the addition of supplementary benefits to old age pensions in 1964. As I say, if one includes the Statute of Westminster, 1931, that is another precedent of consultation.

However, in all the other cases, that extensive consultation agreement did not take place. In 1907 amendments requested by the Canadian Parliament were consented to by all the provinces but British Columbia. The British North America Act of 1930 which transferred resources to the four western provinces had the consent of only those four provinces. The British North America Act of 1949 confirmed the terms of the union between Newfoundland and Canada, and it had the consent of that province only. None of the other constitutional amendments in 1868, 1871, 1875, 1886, 1893, 1895, 1915, 1916, 1927, 1946, 1949, and 1950 involved the securing of provincial consent, unanimous or otherwise.

In view of the historical record, it is very difficult to contend that the precedent has been established that unanimous consent, or even substantial consensus, is a requirement for triggering the legal process which is clearly within the authority of the British parliament to enact. However, it was not on that issue which the Leader of the Opposition essentially concentrated his remarks. What he referred to again and again as the preponderant aspect of his speech was the amending formula which is contained in section 42 of the proposed resolution. This he describes, for instance, as something that "breaks that partnership" which is the essence of the federal system. He went on to say, according to Hansard at page 3291:

—the central government would have the authority to deprive unilaterally—

And I stress that he uses the word "unilaterally".

—the provinces of their powers . . . because this authority would not be limited, this central government could, if it chose to, deprive the provinces of all their powers for all time.

On page 3292 of Hansard, the opposition leader is reported as saying that section 42 is the:

—greatest menace to rights . . . this provision allows rights to be removed by referendum, and any day when there is a fever in this land against a particular group of people, against a particular group of rights, this government, by the power it seeks in section 42, could invoke that power to have a national referendum—

And he says that the government could hold that referendum any day. Again, on page 3295 of Hansard the Leader of the Opposition is reported as having referred to:

—the power to amend unilaterally the constitution by way of a referendum and in so doing going over the governments and the legislatures of the provinces.

Unfortunately, in his description to the House of this section, the Leader of the Opposition is guilty of both sins of commission and sins of omission. First of all, it is not accurate to describe section 42 as one which permits the Government of Canada to act unilaterally. Section 42 does not permit the government to act alone.

Section 42 requires co-operation or support in one of two ways, either by the participation and support of the provinces on the basis of the Victoria formula, or on the basis of the support of the people of Canada. It certainly does not enable the Government of Canada to act without either the support of the provinces or the people of Canada. Clearly in his remarks to the House, the opposition leader—and I do not suggest that it was intentionally, but inadvertently—mischaracterized what is said in section 42.

He is also guilty of sins of omission. He not only describes inaccurately the requirement for consultation and acceptance either by the provinces or the people of the country, but he describes a national referendum as if it alone were the key to triggering the support for an amendment if an appeal were made to the people of Canada. Not once in his remarks did the Leader of the Opposition touch upon the fact that what is required is not simply, if there is to be a referendum asking for constitutional change, a national majority of support, but a majority of support in each of the four major regions of the country. We are not talking, as some readers of his remarks might gather, of a situation in which two or three regions of the country could come together and impose their will over a fourth region of the country, where a majority across the country might impose its will on a regional majority. Section 42 describes a rather complicated referendum procedure which requires that there be strong regional support in every region of the country if there is to be the use of this mechanism.

The third thing I would say about section 42 is that it is not an extraordinary and unusual provision. Upon occasion members opposite have somehow described it as a tyrannous mechanism. I find it very puzzling that democratically elected politicians would regard an appeal to the people as some tyrannous mechanism. It is the kind of approach which we find, for instance, in the United States federation. There it is possible to get support for constitutional amendments, not simply through the support of state legislatures, but also through the provisions for conventions which can take place so that the people themselves may directly participate in having that kind of constitutional change result.

Mr. Dick: That is misleading.

Mr. Roberts: The purpose of section 42, on which the Leader of the Opposition spent so much time, is to arrive at a mechanism by which, if there is a deadlock between the views of the national government and the views of the provincial government about what constitutional changes might be required, there is a mechanism for resolving that deadlock.

No longer, after the House presents these proposed constitutional changes to the British government to put before the British parliament, will we be in a situation in which, in dire emergencies, the British parliament would bail us out. There must be some way to solve the continuing conflict between provincial and federal governments on constitutional change. Surely, in a democratic country, the best way to resolve that conflict is through some form of appeal to the people of the country.

I know that there are members opposite, and perhaps others, who are concerned about the effectiveness or adequacy of this method as a procedure for breaking the deadlock. All I can say to that is, "Les us get the bill into committee and let us have changes proposed as quickly as possible". Clearly, in the resolution we have brought forward, the series of provisions which we think command public support would be the most publicly acceptable. We are anxious to see if improvements can be suggested and if improvements are suggested, the proper place for that to take place is in committee.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would permit, I would prefer to take the question at the end of my remarks, and I shall try and leave a minute for it. I shall not go on too long. I think he will be rather pleased with the next stage of my remarks and I do not want to deprive him of the pleasure of that. My reference is to the point of view expressed by the leader of his party during the debate, and that is what I wish to turn to now.

I suggested that the point of view expressed by the Leader of the Opposition in the opening days of debate was peripheral—and I do not mean that in any slighting way—but it seems to me that the leader of the hon. gentleman's party cut through to the essential questions that should preoccupy the House.

The amending procedure is something that can be discussed adequately in committee.

I am going to cite the words of the hon. member for Oshawa because I think they put the question before the House very well. As reported at page 3296 of Hansard for October 6, he said:

> The first question is—is it legitimate, is it appropriate at this time, for the Parliament of Canada, alone, to be supporting a resolution that would change the constitution of this country.

I want to discuss that question. He went on to say:

> The second question to be answered, whatever one decides on the first, is whether the particular package we have before us on a range of matters . . . is one we should support on its own terms—

I wish to say a few things about that as well.

The first question relates to the legitimacy of acting now in the way that we have proposed to the House. My argument would be that if one examines the history of attempts over more than 50 years for Canadians—officials, governments, the people of Canada—to resolve these questions, and if one looks at the urgency of the question now, given the regional discontents in our country expressed and dealt with most recently in pressing fashion in the Quebec referendum campaign—if one looks at the history, if one looks at the present crisis, if one looks at the opportunity, now is clearly the time to act.

On the final day of the first ministers' conference when provincial premiers were summing up their points of view, some of them remarked how wonderful it had been because it was such an educational experience and that they were finally getting to see, in substance, all the dimensions of the constitutional problems. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, we have been educating ourselves for well over 50 years. It is time we graduated. There have been a whole series of attempts, all of which ended in futility—attempts to change and resolve the problems dealt with by the resolution presented to the House.

There was the dominion-provincial conference of 1927 because at that time Great Britain wished to relinquish its powers of direction over Canadian law. Discussions were held with the provinces to try to arrive at some sort of amending procedure. The proposals reached were rejected by a number of provinces.

In 1931 we tried again as a result of a request from Ontario when a dominion-provincial conference was held in the spring of that year, but no agreement was reached.

A special committee of the House of Commons was established in 1935. Between February and the end of June it held 11 sessions but could not reach agreement.

A dominion-provincial conference was called in 1935 and a continuing committee was established on constitutional questions which sat well into 1936 and reported on March 2. No further action was taken because World War II intervened.

After the war, in 1950, there was a fourth attempt to try to reach agreement, but the committee could not reach agreement and a conference convened in Quebec in September to discuss the findings of the committee equally could not come to a successful conclusion.

In 1960 the conference of attorneys general convened. It met four times before September, 1961, but failed to come to any conclusion. A draft bill was prepared for the House of Commons but it did not receive the approval of the provinces and that initiative was dropped as well.

In June, 1964, discussions were reopened, but in January, 1966, the Quebec government indicated that it would not accept the proposals put forward, so that failed.

In February, 1968, the first ministers came together and began discussions which culminated in the Victoria conference of 1971. Again, the provinces were unable to agree on constitutional change at that point, because of the disapproval of the province of Quebec.

In April, 1975, there was a federal-provincial conference, an eighth attempt to find an amending formula which would suit the country. Again, in October of that year, the provinces informed the federal government that they would not agree to the patriation exercise but wished to have a much wider ranging discussion on constitutional reform.

The ninth attempt was in 1978-79. This led to the presentation to the House of Commons of Bill C-60 at the end of October, 1978. As most hon. members know, this was the subject of very considerable discussion and controversy.

Earlier this year, from June to September, my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), and I participated in an attempt to find a common basis of agreement with the provinces on constitutional reform.

So, Mr. Speaker, since 1927 there have been ten attempts to achieve patriation and an amending formula. Two have been on provincial initiatives, in 1931 and 1968; there have been 21 meetings of first ministers on the constitution; 43 meetings of ministers; a minimum of 17 meetings of officials alone to discuss patriation and an amending formula, and a host of other informal meetings throughout that period.

Looking at this 50 years of attempts, one is tempted to paraphrase Shaw's St. Joan—"How long, how long, O Lord, how long before Heaven is prepared to receive thy saint?"

This long history of attempts and, I think, the frustration of that process, were brought home clearly to the people of Canada by the televised proceedings earlier this year, and this history of frustrated attempts to reach agreements, I think, has some simple explanation. Partially, it reflects the divergent views on what the nature of Canada is, but also it reflects tactical considerations. I do not say this out of any disrespect for provincial governments. One expects that when the provincial governments encounter the federal government there will be hard bargaining. Clearly, in a situation where one argues, with credibility, that there had to be unanimous approval of the provinces for change, every province had an incentive to hold out for some accommodation of its specific and unique view. Every province, in a sense, would feel under that kind of tradition, that it was a hammer-lock for twisting out yet more concessions from the federal government. Clearly, in those circumstances, it is extremely difficult to bring the eleven governments together in agreement.

What we have proposed now, by removing that hammer-lock of the necessity of unanimous consent, will place the continuing negotiations of the provinces and the federal government on a much sounder, more equitable basis of discussion and negotiation.

To this long, sad and, in some ways, almost tragic history of attempts to meet the needs of constitutional reform, we have to add new elements which are clear to most of us. They were certainly clear to us last spring when we were considering the effect of the referendum debate in Quebec, that is, the urgency of the situation we face flowing from the referendum debate and the decision made by the people of Quebec at that time.

Not only did federal politicians on both sides of the House go to Quebec at that time to say they were prepared to undertake significant and thorough changes to the constitution but, I believe, each of the provincial premiers outside Quebec made the same kind of commitment. With the successful resolution of the Quebec referendum debate, we on this side of the House and, I believe, hon. members opposite as well, accepted the urgency and the need to respond—the need to fulfil the commitments which had been made to Quebeckers at that time.

I regret to say that after the summer's discussions with provincial governments, and as the summer wore on, the sense of urgency and priority which had animated discussion, began to disappear from the point of view expressed by the provinces.

To us on this side of the House, however, that urgency is still there. It may be that within the next few days the people of Quebec, through a general election in Quebec or whatever, will again be asked to comment and reflect upon and express again the decision they made last spring. We believe on this side of the House that it is urgent, and that we have a sound commitment to the people of Quebec to provide them with the kind of significant change that we believe they wish to have.

An hon. Member: What about other provinces?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. member asks about other provinces. I shall return to that in just a moment.

• (1630)

There is one other aspect which leads me to believe that we must act now. Clearly if we are to act now it cannot be with the kind of unanimity that I believe the Leader of the Opposition has suggested we should have. It is because there is—at least I believe it to be so—a sense of impatience and urgency throughout the country, not simply on the part of Quebeckers but throughout the country, that we deal with and solve these questions. There has come into the Canadian consciousness a sense that the time really has come to decide whether Canada is to be simply in a sense the sum of its parts, cumulative regions of the country, or whether there is a society based on a strong national economy and a strong national government which is much more above and beyond the parts of the country.

In relation to that question I would like to cite at some length—I hope not at too great length—some of the comments made by one of Canada's most distinguished historians, Professor Arthur Lower, before this debate began and before the resolution was presented to the public and the Parliament, but after the conclusion of the last federal-provincial conference. I think he expresses in his words the kind of concern which I have just tried to express, that sense of impatience that the governments of Canada and the people of Canada resolve their views on the fundamental nature of this country. I cite from an open letter which I believe is addressed to the Ottawa Citizen. In it he is referring to the federal-provincial conference. He says:

> It seems obvious that agreement will never be reached between the federal government and ten demanding provinces. Future conferences will probably find more disagreement than this last one. The cause lies in the very nature of things, for there will always be at least one province out of line. It is hardly the same as a jury trial; you cannot keep provincial premiers locked up until they come to an agreement. One could probe deeper still, for the ultimate cause lies in the dilemma we face over the nature of Canada.

He then goes on to draw some parallels with the situation in the early years of the United States when he describes the United States as having dodged the question of sovereignty for three-quarters of a century. He then says this:

> It seems to me that the point for Canada is quite clear. No more than the Americans shall we be able to go on with the question of sovereignty completely unsettled. The way out that we have tried is of course federalist, but surely federalism assumes that the last word lies somewhere. The recent conference has shown that we are trying to tell ourselves that it lies nowhere, that a country can go on without making all-important decisions. I think this is impossible. The power of decision there must be, and it must lie at the centre.

What we have proposed is that that centre of authority ultimately should lie with the people of Canada, by being able to appeal to them to resolve disputes about the constitutional order and amendments to it.

To revert to Professor Lower, he goes on in his letter to say:

The plain fact is that if a so-called country does not have the power of decision in one set of hands, that is, one government, it is not a country at all but merely a league of states. Remember the fate of the League of Nations. No member would abandon its sovereignty and the league went to pieces.

The moral it seems to me, is plain; we must somehow or another put a stop to the present tendency, a very strong one, to convert ourselves into a league and head back to a federal union. The second moral follows at once; we must have within our borders the right to amend our constitution.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what we have suggested should be done.

My remarks therefore echo I believe those of the Leader of the New Democratic Party on the first question he posed. Is it appropriate for us to act this way at this time? I say the study of history and the sense of the present crisis of the country give us no choice but to proceed as we cannot receive we will never receive, the strong support of all the provinces. We must now proceed on the basis of the resolution which the House of Commons and the Senate will, I hope, pass to the British parliament to ask it to resolve once and for all that question.

The second question which the Leader of the New Democratic Party raised was the question of whether this particular package that we have, the one which entrenches a charter of rights, is one which we should support in its own terms, whether it was submitted as a resolution by the Parliament of Canada or whether it came after unanimous agreement between the government of the day and the provincial governments. I would say there again the climate of urgency in the country requires us to proceed in this way.

If we are to respond to those interests of French-speaking Canadians, who, I believe, are anxious to see control of the constitution in this country and who are anxious to see minority language rights entrenched across Canada, it is important that we do so urgently. I think we also must respond to the concerns of other Canadians, not simply Quebeckers, who are concerned about the protection of civil liberties in this country, who are concerned about establishing the principle of equalization within the constitution, and who are concerned about rights of mobility across the country. It is urgent for us to respond to those concerns.

It may be tempting to say, "Let us simply accept an amending procedure now and then go through what this rather rigid amending procedure describes as a possible course of action." But given, as I believe we have, the very strong general support of the people across the country; given, as I hope we will have, the support of members from all sides of the House, it seems to me that we cannot afford to go through a lengthy process of the implementation of what those, I think, generally accepted rights would require, because the formula is rigid. And rightly so.

What should be, and what I think most Canadians believe to be, and want to have, is the common heritage of Canadian citizenship. Therefore, it is important to act now. It is important to act before the people of Quebec are led to believe that their hopes and their ambitions will be frustrated by the lengthy process of delay. We believe that given the sense of impatience of the provinces; and given, I think, the very evident general support that the inclusion of this charter of liberties within the constitution which is patriated to Canada would provide, this is something which the people of Canada very much wish to see happen.

I recommend this resolution to the House. I urge members to send it to committee so that it can be discussed in detail as quickly as possible. I look forward confidently to their support for what is, I think, a proposal which has the support of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in the midst of the minister's speech he indicated that he would accept a question at the end. May I now put it to him?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Please do.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I now put a question to him?

My question relates to section 42 of the proposed resolution. I ask my question as one who believes that we would be insane if we did not have in a Canadian constitution some provision for breaking a deadlock. I think if we had a constitution which we could not amend for 50 years, we would ask: why did we ever bring it here from Britain? As I say, I ask it as one who favours something like section 42.

I have now heard four ministers, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts), all say clearly and categorically that section 42 is simply for the purpose of breaking a deadlock.

Mr. Dick: It is not true.

Mr. Knowles: If you look at the resolution, sections 41 and 42 seem to be equal choices. There is no if, and, but, comma or anything else between them. I ask the minister whether the government would be willing, when the resolution is in committee, to make a slight amendment—it takes only a slight one—to put into the resolution the words which these ministers have been giving us, namely, that section 42—that is the holding of a referendum by the federal authority—would come into play only if a deadlock has developed under section 41; only if section 41 has been tried?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the sanity of the hon. member. I am reassured to know that three of my colleagues have expressed the same view that I have expressed. The point which I thought I tried to make is that we have brought forward proposals which we thought through carefully and which we believe would command a maximum of public acceptability and support, and, we hope, support in the House. The place to consider amendments clearly is within the committee. We have undertaken to consider carefully any amendments which will be brought forward. When we see what the specific form of the amendment is, then we will be able to consider whether it more adequately meets that need of a deadlock formula than the proposal which we made.

● (1640)

I want to say to hon. members in all seriousness that we are prepared to consider very carefully and seriously whatever is brought forward. I am not empowered nor am I disposed to say at the moment what our response would be before seeing it in explicit terms. I can quite easily give the assurance that whatever amendments are brought forward, we will consider them with the utmost patience and the utmost openness on the part of the government.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I put this supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that four ministers have now clearly said that this is a deadlock provision only, will the government consider bringing in its own amendment so that it puts into the resolution the words which four ministers have uttered in this House?

Mr. Roberts: As I said, Mr. Speaker, we brought forward what we thought, after reflection, was the most appropriate mechanism. I do not know, therefore, why in a sense we should take on the burden of trying to do even better what we already thought had been done best.

Mr. Dick: You have all been wrong.

Mr. Roberts: If we are wrong and it is not the most appropriate mechanism, I urge the House to let the proposal go to committee so we can see what better mousetrap they can give us. If they provide a better mousetrap, we will buy it.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would entertain another question.

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I would appreciate if I could respond to only one more.

Mr. Neil: My question is simply this. Early in his remarks the minister indicated his support for the principle of a referendum. I presume he was expressing the views of his party when he made the comment. I wonder if he personally would agree to the use of a referendum to determine the wishes of the Canadian people vis-à-vis capital punishment and, if not, why not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I do not think that question can be entertained during this debate.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his courtesy in indicating that he has a problem and must leave. I understand that completely. I promise to be as kind to him in his absence as I would be if he were here.

I listened with great interest to the minister's speech. I listened with much greater interest to the straightforward question put to him as a minister of the Crown, fourth in order of having made representations about the matter of a deadlock with respect to the change in section 42. The question was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The question deserved a straight answer. Instead, there was equivocation. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) was in the chamber, but he did not rise to his feet to clarify the matter. Having had that opportunity, the government has done what I hoped it would not do. It has confirmed the provisions with respect to section 42, confirmed the concerns expressed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and compounded it by saying that we can move an amendment in the committee.

Anyone who has been here for a period of time knows there is no right in committee to move an amendment to the proposal before the House. We can talk about it and even recommend it, but unless the resolution comes back to the House of Commons in the form of a resolution or, as the Leader of the Opposition described it, an address to Her Majesty the Queen, there is no right of any member of Parliament to make an amendment. I intend to deal with this later, but it is so fundamental to the rights of Parliament I felt I should make some comment on it now.

When I was elected to this House is 1972 I thought we would be dealing with a number of things. I did not look that far ahead to know that we would have an opportunity to take part in a debate on something so fundamental as the constitution of one's country. It therefore goes without saying that this is an important debate. This debate deals with the fundamental issue of confederation which heretofore has always been the relationship between the federal and provincial governments, not the relationship between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers.

The history of this country has been one long series of federal-provincial negotiations, some of them successful and some not. All were carried on in a consultative way. The feeling was expressed by Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Laurier before them all, and Mr. Diefenbaker, that all of this would be carried on having in mind the concept of consensus. This is the first time in our 113-year history that we have abandoned the seeking of a consensus. This makes it doubly important for all members of Parliament to express themselves with regard to this matter.

While this is an important debate, I want to say that I am sickened by the atmosphere of it, not here in the House of Commons because we often have differences of opinion. I am sickened and saddened by the tragedy which has occurred within this debate, the spectacle of five provincial premiers, who may be joined by two more, threatening to bring action in the courts. It does not matter whether they win or lose. That is irrelevant. That is the stuff which law students worry about. It is not the concern of members of Parliament.

The existence of an atmosphere in Canada that would cause provincial premiers, for whatever purpose, to bring an action is a tragedy. We have never before come to this point. It is therefore important that the government consider what it is doing. For the first time, in a grand litigious way, a number of the provinces are bringing an action against the federal government for something it is doing.

Juxtaposed and set against that is the Prime Minister who, if he is to be likened to anything in this debate, is obviously the head of the family. He has decided not to send the document in dispute to the Supreme Court of Canada with the hope that the dispute can be ironed out as to the legalities and requirements of the law and what are the jurisdictions. That was the purpose of the question yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. He suggested to the Prime Minister that if there is this dispute, it should be settled quickly. Why not settle it outside this place, outside the provincial conferences, at least in so far as to how far the Government of Canada can and should go? What we had tossed back was that this is apples and oranges, baloney, as someone called it, comparing one thing with another. That is not the real issue.

We in this House and the government ought to be looking at our capacity for finding ways to settle the dispute, not to continue it and not to exacerbate it, because while we are involved in these things what I worry about, and what affects the people of my riding, is that provincial and federal governments are occupying their time and their energies in this regard while the country suffers an economic downturn and economic problems that should require our full attention. It would be an excellent thing if somehow or other this could be diverted. The government may choose not to stop this debate, and I am not suggesting that it should. I am suggesting that the court be used in the midst of it to settle some of those issues. I hope the government will reconsider its decision not to take this matter to court.

Let me make it very clear that the issue here is not patriation. It is being cast that way, as if opposition parties, members of my party and members of others, were opposed to bringing the constitution home. That is not so. I travel as widely as does the government House leader, he more widely in his province than in mine, and I more widely in my province than in his, but I say that is not the issue. There is no problem I have found anywhere among the people I represent in this regard. There is no one anywhere in Canada who thinks it is a great idea for us to go trotting off to Great Britain, hat in hand, and stand at the skirts of Margaret Thatcher and ask her, "Please, Margaret, pass a little bill for us so we can have our constitution at home." Nobody would suggest that is so.

I think it is degrading, though, if I may say so with respect, to have the Prime Minister of Canada go to Great Britain and say, "Do not just bring my constitution home and give me an amending process so I can deal with it myself, but do a few things here that I cannot do in my own country." That is an admission of failure.

The real issue is not whether we recognize certain basic rights in a document or code of civil rights. That is not the real issue. I always thought I was a citizen of a free country where rights existed whether or not they were in a code. I always felt I had a right, as a citizen, to have the Supreme Court protect me in the event an action was brought against my person, my family or my property. I have felt those rights would be protected whether or not they were written, because that was part of my tradition as a member of a free society.

That is not the issue, whether or not we are in favour of a statement of rights. The issue is not whether or not we are in favour of something within a constitution which says we are our brother's keeper in this country. I have looked upon the whole issue of regional disparity before this document ever came to Parliament, and before it was ever thought of as necessary to be entrenched in the constitution. I never thought that was necessary, but I do not object to it being there, because in fact all of the programs show that we are our brother's keeper; that I have a duty if I live in a "have" province to assist those in the "have-not" provinces of Canada; to assist areas in respect of employment, job training and all of the other things. I have a duty to assist the people of Nova Scotia if an infrastructure is necessary there, just as the people of Ontario have an obligation.

The suggestion that this be entrenched in a constitution did not arise out of this resolution. I should make that clear. When the Leader of the Opposition was prime minister of Canada that was the first time the suggestion was made that there be entrenchment of those rights within a constitution, and I refer to those rights that affect the ability of Canadians in another part of Canada to bring or have brought to them a standard of living and a standard of service that is appropriate. We agree in that regard, and there is no issue there. There could not be an issue there if you live in a federal state.

The real issue in this matter revolves around the amending formula. As I said, for the first time we have before us a proposal which is simply unacceptable to large groups within our national community. That is the situation. No one is arguing about patriation. No one is arguing about the necessity to really spell out rights. That is not a problem. Nobody is arguing about whether rights exist, and that is not a problem. No one is arguing about regional disparity. There is encased in this document a formula which is unacceptable to large groups within the national community whose consent until now was considered obligatory by every prime minister before this one.

I must say that an amending formula is absolutely essential in a federal state. A federal state has as its hallmark something written and something set down. In most federal states they have something which sets out the legal rights, powers and dimensions of authority of the different levels of government. If you are going to do anything with that I think it is inappropriate for there to be patriation without an amending formula. I am not concerned about patriation as an issue, but I think that would be inappropriate because we could not deal with it. We would be better off not to patriate if we did not have an amending formula because we have demonstrated our inability on most occasions to agree unanimously, all 11 governments as they now stand in the country.

If that view is shared as to the essentiality of the amending formula it is the attainment of that formula which is the real significance of patriation. The real significance in the attainment of that formula is Canadian political leadership, and that is what we have lacked here in this country, in spite of what we have tried to do in the last little while by way of obtaining what is obviously wanted by the government, a desire shared in some respects by people across this country. We have lacked real political leadership.

Members opposite should not deceive themselves. The fact that this proposal comes before us at this time under these circumstances does not represent a triumph for the Prime Minister. It is a signed, sealed and witnessed testament to the Prime Minister's failure. He and his Minister of Justice may say with conviction that we, as a nation, have failed to find an amending formula. The truth is, however, that he as a prime minister, and as chairman of a range of federal-provincial conferences, has failed and failed again.

If anything, the provinces are now more suspicious than they were ten years ago. They are more hostile to federal policies and they are less interested in speculation about the national good. In side-stepping the chaos he is creating in Canada, and that is what he is doing, the Prime Minister may be bowing to the inevitable, but I tell him he ought not to be bowing to applause. There is no doubt that it is getting increasingly difficult, perhaps now impossible, to achieve consensus among the provinces and the federal government. That would take a skilful leader, and I see no point in pretending now that the right hon. Prime Minister is a skilful leader or that he fits that description.

• (1700)

I also see no point in joining hon. members opposite in pretending that failure has been transmuted into success by their enthusiasm for this measure, because that is just not the case. It is a failure however we look at it. Because it comes to us under these circumstances, it is a testament to the failure of Canadian political leadership. It was important to achieve a consensus because the histories and the perspectives within this country are so diverse that no one man can rely on his own convictions to reflect accurately all the emotions and aspirations of all Canadians. That is a Canadian fact, and it is a fact that the Prime Minister has not come to grips with.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I want to thank the hon. member for calling it six o'clock, but if he does not mind, we will call it five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty); Computers—Use by government of databanks; the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Forest Fires—Plans to alleviate hardship suffered by victims; the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly)—Consumer and Corporate Affairs—Call for investigation into reason for B.C. Telephone rate increase.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, Notices of Motions (Papers), Private Bills and Public Bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Item number one, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt); shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

STUDY OF GRAIN TRANSPORT IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the latest completed study on grain transport in western Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the response to this motion on April 14 of this year by the parliamentary secretary was that the document in question was too voluminous. In fact, and I will quote the answer:

The document requested is of a voluminous character and would require an inordinate cost and length of time to prepare. I have however sent today a copy of the requested document to the hon. member.

That is so, Mr. Speaker. I did receive the document. Then the question is, why am I asking for this debate today? It is because I have several questions which I want to put on the record. The first question, of course, is accessibility by the public.

The reason I wanted the document tabled is that once it is tabled I know it is accessible to every member of Parliament, and it is also accessible to the public.

I had a second and allied question, and that was whether this document, which I consider of some importance, was also prepared in the French language so that it could be available to those of our Canadian citizens who do not understand, or easily understand, the English language.

This debate also arises from a question which I raised in 1978 and which had to do with the Crowsnest Pass rates. The answer I got at that time, December 15, 1978, was to the effect that the total subsidy on the Crowsnest Pass rates in 1977, the last year for which figures were available, was some $239 million. The same answer also stated that the 1974 subsidy in total was $141 million, illustrating that between 1974 and 1977, some three years, there had been a 70 per cent increase. The matter concerns me for two reasons, I suppose. One was the fact that this was an amount which was being paid either by the taxpayer or the consumer and which was not particularly visible. It also seemed to be an amount which was increasing very rapidly.

On September 29 of this year the Canadian Federation of Agriculture stated that the federation supported a policy that would fairly compensate the railways for the movement of grain by rail and, it added, "while retaining the statutory rate structure" which is known as the Crow benefit.

Let us look for a moment at this particular item and put on the record precisely what we are talking about. The Crow benefit comes from an act assented to on June 29, 1897. It was an act to authorize a subsidy for a railway through the Crowsnest Pass. I will quote one sentence, as follows:

—no higher rates than such reduced rates or tolls shall be charged after the dates mentioned on such merchandise from the points aforesaid.

So from 1897 until today we continue with the same rates.

Turning back to the cost to the taxpayer and the consumer for a moment, the 1977 variable costs incurred by Canadian National exceeded the revenues by $110 million, an increase of 40 per cent over the 1974 shortfall of $79 million. The 1977 variable costs incurred by CP Rail exceeded the revenues received from the users of the service by $124 million, an increase of 62 per cent over the 1974 shortfall of $76 million.

In 1977 the total revenues received by CN and CP from the statutory rates did not even cover the variable costs incurred in the maintenance of running and yard track and roadway property. This explains the railways' reluctance to expend maintenance and capital dollars on the grain dependent lines and capital dollars on the equipment required for the transportation of grain traffic. For the year 1977 to bring the railways to a state wherein the revenues received are equal to the variable costs incurred, the users of the service would have had to be charged an additional $10 per ton.

If the government were to make up the 1977 revenue shortfall experienced by the railways, a total subsidy payment of $239 million would have been required.

In addition to the branch line subsidy payments, the federal government also incurred the ownership costs associated with the 8,000 Canadian Wheat Board hopper cars in service and the ownership and maintenance costs associated with the rehabilitation of the prairie branch lines. If the government had subsidized the railways to the break-even point in 1977, the government would have picked up 70 per cent or more of the total costs incurred in the 1977 transportation of statutory grain.

I should add that this information is contained in the Snavely report dated September, 1978. The Snavely report emphatically maintained that retaining statutory rates for the movement of prairie grain by rail would not help the system become more efficient, and the federal government could become the major financial participant in the grain-handling system. The commission said the railways should be allowed to charge market rates for moving grain so that they would have the incentive to modernize the system.

Keeping statutory rates would leave the system virtually devoid of monetary incentives for efficient use of the transportation resource and, perhaps even worse, monetary penalties for inefficient uses of that resource.

Last month, September, 1980, in the last grain transportation authority commentary produced by Dr. H. M. Horner, the federal grain co-ordinator, reference is made to a variety of factors that affect Canada's efficiency in handling grain, including reduced performance due to labour unrest, lack of suitable grain, a two-week audit of a major terminal, switching difficulties, the capacity of the tracks, and unnecessary and costly interchange of cars.

● (1710)

The statutory rate issue is perhaps the most significant factor in that the pricing structure for goods and services is a major determinant of any system's operating efficiency and capital investment levels. The existence of statutory grain rates confers an apparent financial benefit on producers of export grain and contributes significantly to the lack of railway system renewal and expansion. The lack of flexible rail pricing systems does not provide incentives for more intensive or efficient use of the system.

There is a broad area of agreement that much has to be done to ensure the most efficient use of our transportation resource. It must be remembered that attempting to bridge the gap between the railway's cost and their recompense under statutory rates with federal subsidies would leave Ottawa picking up 60 per cent of the tab for the annual grain movement.

Another related matter concerns me. On May 14 of this year I received an answer to a question which informed me that the total number of cars owned by Canadian railways on April 30, 1979, was some 157,000, of which Canadian owned cars on American lines were in excess of 27,000. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) added that neither the government nor its agencies were taking any steps to expedite the return of Canadian rolling stock from the United States. I must admit, when we are talking of the shortage of rolling stock, that I would like a better explanation of why some 27,000 of our total numbers of 157,000 cars appeared to be permanently in the United States, not necessarily the same cars.

Thus, faced with reports of huge government subsidies and inefficient operations, I felt it was necessary that the latest government attitude to the movement of grain in western Canada be made public, hence my motion for the production of the latest study. As is recorded in Hansard, the requested document was sent to me. It is entitled, "Report for the Grains Group, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce." It is contained in two volumes dated July, 1979. It was prepared by Booze, Allen and Hamilton Inc., transportation consultants, and the IBI group under the direction of the grains group of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The report contains the results of an operations analysis of grains transportation and handling in western Canada carried out during the period from August, 1978, through June, 1979.

Specifically excluded from the terms of reference were possible changes to the statutory rates, that is, the Crow rates for grain. However, a recommendation in the report shows no hesitancy in suggesting another massive input of public funding. It recommends that, in addition to the 2,000 covered hopper cars now on order by the Canadian Wheat Board, 1,900 hopper cars be ordered for delivery in each of the following years, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, and 1983-84 crop years, and a further 1,700 cars for delivery in 1984-85. A total of 9,300 cars over the six-year period will be needed, requiring an investment of about $400 million in 1979 dollars. It is estimated that up to an additional 4,000 cars costing about $173 million may be necessary.

The report goes on to comment that there is a substantial body of opinion among major participants in the production, handling and transportation of grain in Canada, that some way must be found soon to provide a compensatory return to the railways for moving grain. Failing this, the lack of capital renewal of relevant rail facilities will become critical, vitally affecting the grain industry, the railways and other important industries.

The report also states that improved information, planning and control systems are required to direct the right grain to the right terminal at the right time.

To move Canadian grain it will be necessary to ensure an adequate number of boxcars. An inventory of the Canadian grain car fleet indicates that the number of serviceable cars regularly in grain service at the end of 1978 was about 22,000 units. The fleet currently consists of about two thirds railway-owned boxcars and one third government owned hopper cars. The boxcars fleets are old, with an average age of 29 years for Canadian Pacific and 33 years for Canadian National. As a result, the anticipated attrition rates for boxcars are high. Projections to 1985, based on railway company attrition estimates, indicate that the total number of cars in grain service will decline to 13,200, or less than 60 per cent of the 1978 inventory.

In addition to the existing number of cars, there will be in service the 2,000 covered hopper cars which have been ordered by the Canadian Wheat Board for current delivery.

As I have said, it is estimated that a cumulative total of 9,300 new cars will be required by 1985-86, and that the cumulative car total would cost about $400 million, based on a price of $43,000 per hopper car at 1979 prices.

It is interesting to note that in another government document produced by the commission on the cost of transporting grain by rail, which has only recently been received here in Ottawa—in fact, the date stamp on this document is October 14, 1980—it is stated that the cost of cars just three years ago was between $22,390 and $22,710, the variation in the two prices apparent between Canadian Pacific and Canadian National not being explained. But essentially we are talking about between $22,000 and $23,000 per hopper car, meaning that at the time, the agreement to purchase 2,000 hopper cars was worth some $46 million. Now we are talking about cars costing $43,000 per hopper car at 1979 prices, and we are talking about purchasing into the 1985-86 year at which time undoubtedly the price will once again have doubled. So that the figure that I have mentioned of $400 million based on 1979 prices should be taken with a pinch of salt. In addition, 125 locomotive units will need to be added by 1985-86 at a cost of $106 million in 1979 dollars.

The report recommended that a task force be established with strong leadership and an effective mandate to implement needed changes in the grain transportation system. The report also emphasizes that the institutional, operational and capital improvements recommended, while essential to the realization of Canada's grain export potential, should not be seen as a substitute to resolution of the Crow rate issue. The railways no longer have the economic or physical capacity to underwrite the grain drain. If the Crow issue is not resolved, the problem outlined in the report will not be completely overcome and grain will suffer due to its low priority.

I find the issue to be quite relevant today, Mr. Speaker. It is something of a pleasure—maybe that is not the right word—to be able to talk of the assistance that is going to the western grain farmer which is being paid out of Canadian taxes and by the Canadian consumer, therefore the share by which the easterner is participating in helping the western farmer. It is an example of something which I do not oppose, but I think probably it needs to be said these days that everything does not flow from west to east. In this particular case there is a considerable flow of dollars from east to west.

● (1720)

I have several questions for the parliamentary secretary who, I assume, will reply on behalf of the government. The questions are as follows: when the government removed the subsidy on bread, why did it not also eliminate the heavy subsidy to the western grain farmer, the subsidy paid jointly by all taxpayers and by all consumers? Is the report of which I have been given a copy available to the public? Is it available in the French language? Is any thought being given to co-ordinating the interests of the four ministers concerned, the Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board), Senator Argue, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), so as to reduce their overlapping activities? Will the recommended task force be established? Will the report we have discussed today be referred to a standing committee of this House for study?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few comments in relation to grain transport in western Canada because the motion before us directly addresses an issue which has preoccupied federal governments so much in recent years and because I believe this is an opportune time to put in perspective our achievements in grain transportation.

There has been considerable activity in this area in recent months. The present minister has participated actively in dialogue and discussions with western transport and agriculture ministers on several occasions. He has consulted with industry leaders, including representatives of the producers, of the pools and of the grain companies. In fact, just yesterday the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was in Winnipeg discussing the future of the office of the grain transport authority and a possible successor to Dr. Horner who recently resigned. This interest on the part of the government is not newly found. Indeed, there has been a number of studies and several major programs undertaken in the last decade. I should like to touch on these briefly and try to assess the impact of each.

We can trace the beginning of the current approach to grain transportation issues to about 1969. In that year two significant moves were made. One was the establishment of the grains group as an interdepartmental advisory body drawing its staff from the Departments of Agriculture, Industry, Trade and Commerce, and Transport. Its creation stemmed from the recognition that grain production, transportation and marketing were integral parts of a whole system which could not be dealt within isolation and that a central unit was required at the policy level to maintain contact with the many organizations involved in the grain industry, ranging from farm organizations to provincial governments, from the Canadian Transport Commission to the Canadian Grain Commission, to name only a few.

The other significant move was the establishment of a basic rail network of 12,500 miles. This enabled elevator companies and producers for the first time to make sound financial planning decisions. It was recognized, however, that a number of branch lines were uneconomic, and a branch line subsidy program was introduced. It might be worth mentioning the amount that has been disbursed under this program, as it often seems to be sidelined in the discussion of more recent programs. Since the first payments in 1971 through to 1980 the CTC has paid the railways—that is the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Northern Alberta Railway,—$779.1 million in branch line subsidies.

The branch line subsidy program, however, was a piecemeal approach. It was soon recognized there were more fundamental problems with the grain handling system that were far larger than simple uneconomic branch lines. Canada's exports were not keeping pace with world grain trade. This was more a symptom than a cause. The most alarming fact was that the railways were allowing their grain-related capital plant to deteriorate rapidly in favour of more profitable traffic, and grain transportation was suffering.

The first full-scale inquiry into these major problems was the commission on grain transportation and handling in western Canada, commonly called the "Hall commission" after its leader. Established in 1975 it held hearings across the west and its wideranging recommendations in 1977 had a major impact. I know a number of members who were involved in the debate at that time and will tell you how controversial many of the Hall recommendations were. There are still people in the west, and members of Parliament who will come and say, "Adopt the Hall recommendations lock, stock and barrel!"

Now many of the Hall recommendations were in fact adopted. Others, for better or worse, have been overtaken by events but not before having a very real influence on the course of action which was eventually taken. One critical area was the whole question of the prairie rail network. The Hall commission had recommended adding some 1,800 miles of track to the 12,500 miles already guaranteed in the basic network. The commission also recommended some 2,200 miles for abandonment and a reassessment over a 12-year period of the remaining 2,300 miles of the total branch line network. This was followed by PRAC because a 12-year wait left producers and companies with a great deal of uncertainty. Urgent action was needed in the form of a speedy reassessment.

The Prairie Rail Action Committee was given the task in 1977 and was told to report in 18 months, which was an early candidate of the sunset clause concept. As a result of the work of this committee a further 1,000 miles were added to the basic network and about 1,300 miles were recommended for abandonment subject to normal CTC review. PRAC was unique. Not only did it report in 15 months, or three months before its deadline, but it released recommendations as it progressed rather than waiting for a final report. This allowed elevator companies to announce over $10 million worth of improvements to their facilities before the assessment was completed. As hon. members know, this was not the end.

An election came along and we found ourselves with yet another study under way, this time by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). Now I would have been glad to give the member proposing the motion a copy of this study but we on this side of the House have not had the privilege of seeing it. This is a bit of a shame because, as a result of the study a number of lines recommended for abandonment by PRAC suddenly were included in the basic network. So it must have been an interesting study. But that is history, for another election came along and the present minister inherited the legacy I have just described.

Simply for the record, I mention the minister's announcement of August 6 this year. After his own review of a number of the lines involved, he decided the uncertainty which had lingered for years had to end and that a strong case had been made for retention of the lines. About 630 miles were thereby added to the basic network bringing the total mileage guaranteed to the year 2000 to about 15,900 miles representing approximately 83 per cent of the branch line network which existed in the 1930s.

Let me go back to the Hall commission and pick up another aspect of federal study and action in grain transportation. It was by this time generally accepted that the railways were losing money. But how much? There was no common understanding of the magnitude of the losses, nor was there complete acceptance that the railways were in fact losing money on grain despite the findings of the MacPherson Royal Commission on Transportation.

Perhaps the most significant study on grain transportation was the one done by Mr. Carl Snavely, head of the commission on the costs of transporting grain by rail. The Snavely commission identified for the first time in a systematic, quantitative way the losses incurred by the railways as a result of the statutory grain rates. The proposer of the motion has been provided with a copy of this study.

The results of the study, first released in 1976, then later updated, showed that railways in 1977 experienced a revenue shortfall of $175 million on grain transportation. It is generally estimated that those losses are in excess of $200 million per year at the present time. While there are different estimates of these losses by the railways themselves and by western provincial governments, the Snavely report still provides the most independent assessment available. Whatever the actual figures, their magnitude made it clear why the railways were forced to allow their capital plant to deteriorate.

Three major initiatives have been taken to bring railway rolling stock and infrastructure back to the condition they need to be in for efficient movement of grain. The first, begun in 1973 and later accelerated, was the purchase of modern, heavy-load hopper cars. The federal hopper car fleet now numbers 8,000, purchased at a cost of $258 million. A further 2,000 cars are in the process of being acquired on long-term leases at a cost of approximately $11 million to $12 million per year. We were pleased to see the provinces get involved in this question with the acquisition of some additional hopper cars of their own.

The second initiative was the repair of the existing boxcar fleet. By 1974, when this program began, CN and CP boxcars, many of them 30 years old, were in deplorable shape. The federal government has provided over $22 million to the railways to share the cost of rehabilitating some 7,400 boxcars.

Between boxcar rehabilitation and the acquisition of hopper cars, the grain car fleet is beginning to respond to the demand placed on it. Results can be seen this past year during which grain deliveries to export points were up almost 20 per cent over the previous year.

The third and most substantial initiative was the program to bring the condition of prairie branch lines up to standard. Announced in 1977, the program involves over $700 million total expenditures, of which $240 million has already been spent. Already there are noticeable results in the condition of prairie branch lines, and, again, Canada's grain trade has benefited.

I could talk about a number of other improvements in the grain transportation system, including the expenditures at the port of Churchill since 1968, the elevator modernization at the port of Montreal and the recently concluded agreement to proceed with construction of a major grain terminal at Prince Rupert. But we have been talking primarily about studies and there are a couple of recent one I want to mention.

As I mentioned earlier, the problems of the grain transportation system were recognized as widespread and deep-rooted. Studies had indentified major institutional and economic difficulties in specific aspects of the grain industry. Significant improvements were under way, at a substantial cost, in the areas of rolling stock, rail network rationalization, branch line upgrading, and port modernization. But what was needed was a look at the system as a dynamic, interrelated structure, and recommendations on immediate action to relieve bottlenecks.

This was the study undertaken by the consultants Booz-Allen, completed in July, 1979, which, as requested in the motion put forward by the hon. member, was forwarded to him. The recommendation of their report which received the most visible follow-up was that a grain transportation improvement task force be established, headed by someone of stature in the industry, with an action-oriented mandate to propose, oversee and monitor improvements in the grain transportation system. As members know, this led to the creation of the office of the grain transportation co-ordinator.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, there has been no shortage of studies. Nonetheless, I think it is clear that this government is firmly committed to making significant improvements to the grain transportation system. Not only studies have taken place, there has also been action on a number of fronts, involving large expenditures. In fact, approximately $1.3 billion has been spent on grain transport related projects since 1970.

The government recognizes, first and foremost, the vulnerable position of the producer, particularly in such areas as a crop diversification and further processing. But now there is also a realization of the magnitude of the railways' losses, with the result that Canada is not achieving its potential in grain exports.

The debate on grain transportation is now a rational, realistic one. Different ideas are emerging, and it is our challenge to hear these and develop proposals which will be beneficial to the grain industry and acceptable to westerners. In concluding my comments on this motion, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that this government will continue to place a high priority on improving the Canadian grain handling and transportation system, and that the country as a whole will benefit from the improvements.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) asked a question relating to the latest report. The latest report is available to all hon. members and the public by request. At this time it has not been translated into the second official language, and that is the reason it has not been tabled in the House.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep my remarks brief so that the hon. member from the NDP will have a chance to contribute to this debate. Prairie farmers are sick and tired of studies; they want to see action. The first light at the end of the tunnel came for hundreds of prairie farmers when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was the minister of transport. He gave the farmers some hope by appointing Dr. Hugh Horner to the position of grain transportation co-ordinator.

● (1740)

Farmers have become rather depressed because this government's lack of action has set them back ten years. The parliamentary secretary stated that the government wants action and that is what we on the prairies want as well. I would now like to outline some of the concerns of the prairie farmer, Mr. Speaker.

The stage was set for improvements at Prince Rupert to be well under way by this time. The contract was not signed until September, however, so it is questionable how much work can be done over the winter. The entire summer season was lost through the inaction of the National Harbours Board and the lack of aggressiveness on the part of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). Now that an agreement has been signed and the first contract let, I hope we will see action and be able to reap the benefit of that eight million ton bushel terminal on Ridley Island.

I should like now to deal with the problem of the railways losing money. When the original contracts were made with the railways, in many instances they began the construction of branch lines. The elevators, coal mines and so on, resulted from that. The railways were also given $1 million to provide the country with passenger and freight service. As well, they were given one million acres of land and all of the mineral rights. Today, when the railways claim to be losing money, they count only the money from a particular branch line and refuse to include the vast amounts of revenue from mineral rights, hotel concessions and the other businesses they operate. Because they now separate one section of their business from the others, they claim to be losing money.

In particular, the CPR received ample compensation for the Crowsnest rate. Prairie farmers will be very reluctant to give that rate up unless they are offered something comparable. They have given up concessions too many times without receiving anything in return and have suffered as a consequence. I think the government should require the railways to include in their profit statement the vast sums of money made from mineral rights. That item should not be kept separate from others in the operation of the railway. The railways were given those mineral rights with the understanding that they would give rail service to the country but now they separate the operations as though they had no relationship whatsoever. I know that divorce is common but this divorce should not be permitted. The mineral rights were given as a concession for operating the railways, and that is what they should be required to do.

Prairie farmers have a few complaints about the Crowsnest rate as well. It is now being used as a means of cheap transportation of feed to the east, particularly Quebec where the provincial government subsidizes the production of hogs and feed. This means that the western cattle and hog producer cannot compete. The Crowsnest rate, combined with the subsidy, makes for unfair competition and the federal government should do something about this.

A lot should be said about branch lines, Mr. Speaker. On Friday I presented a motion under Standing Order 43, regarding the branch line from Rosedale to East Coulee, serving a coal mining operation, the one from Kneehill to Carbon, a grain operation, and one that I did not mention, from Strathmore to Langdon, which is also a grain operation and is required by the town. The CTC heard the applications from the CPR in connection with the Carbon line and the Strathmore line in 1978 and now they are applying again. Just yesterday, the mayor of Strathmore told me that potential business is being lost to the town because it is not known whether the railway will be there next year or not. This is a trick on the part of the railways—to keep applying and applying until they wear down the resistance of the Canadian Transport Commission. It just is not fair. When the railways branch of the CTC makes a decision after a full investigation, that should hold good for at least five years, preferably ten, so that there can be some stability in the situation and industry can be attracted to particular areas.

I hope the Minister of Transport will ensure that these repeated applications by the railways every second year will not be tolerated. It keeps potential industries out of the communities. I have mentioned three cases and I can only guess how many more there are across the country.

In Vancouver, the port will not accept grain from large transports. In the United States, large transports travel a few hundred miles to take clean grain to the terminal right at the seaport where it is loaded. But the Vancouver port refuses to accept grain from some transports. This leads one to wonder whether there is a connection with the railways to make sure that it is hauled by them. If the transports can offer fair and reasonable competition they should be permitted to do so.

There should be facilities at inland elevators to clean grain. The Rockyford Terminal Association was formed by a large group of farmers who put up their own money to show what can and should be done to clean grain and get it to the market, given a fair chance.

This leads me to another grievance that the farmers have, Mr. Speaker. They have no say in how long they must wait to load the grain on a ship. They have no say about whether the workers at the Vancouver port will go on strike tomorrow or next week, as they have gone on strike so many times over the years. A few years ago the pearl barley market was lost to the United States and we never got it back. Strikes were intended to hurt the ruthless employer, but today they are hurting innocent people like the prairie farmer whose livelihood is being jeopardized. Some people think that the Canadian government or the taxpayer bears the cost of demurrage while the ships sit and wait but it comes out of the pockets of the prairie grain producer. Last year $18 million was lost because of the lackadaisical handling of ships in Vancouver.

There are several other things I would like to mention, Mr. Speaker, but I shall close with some remarks about the Neil report because I know my hon. friend to my left would like to have a little time to speak on this. The Neil report saved many branch lines. To some degree, these branch lines had been built with public money. They should not simply be torn up. I come from a coal mining area. I have seen a coal mine where the tracks were removed three times and built over again, each adding to the price of coal. When we have these rail lines built, surely we can leave them there even if they are not used at present to full capacity because they will likely be required in the future. We need some stability with regard to our branch lines so that we will not be driving industry away and almost forcing grain companies to close their elevators.

● (1750)

The prairie farmers are tired of studies. They are tired of putting money in other people's pockets. I hope the changes made by this government will put a few more dollars into the farmers' pockets, the people on whom we depend to grow food for this nation and for many other hungry people.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand from the intent of the motion that the mover is proposing to make public the Booze, Allen and Hamilton report prepared by a firm from Bethesda, Maryland, U.S.A.

I think the point was made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) that the report is in effect public. Certainly all of the farm organization leaders that I know of and a great many private individuals now have the report, though, granted, it is not printed in French. I think the report was published, as it says on the front page, in June, 1979. The reasons for the report go back to the crop year of 1977-1978. At that time the system appeared to find it impossible to move all the grain for which there were sales. The wheat board in a conservative estimate estimated they had forgone over half a billion dollars worth of grain sales because of the inability of the railways and the system to move the grain. What was even more galling to farmers was that after having seen that half billion dollars in sales, so to speak, go down the tube, they were asked to pay an additional $18.4 million in demurrage payments because the system was unable to perform according to requirements, and the ships were waiting.

It is interesting that the report itself was very action-oriented, and in spite of what was said in the House today, the rate structure and the compensation issue was specifically left out of the terms of reference of the Booze-Allen report. The recommendations of the report were recommendations that would be effective whether or not the rate problem, if it is a problem, was addressed. I also find the report interesting because a number of the recommendations, along with the key areas where the board saw problems, were being acted upon even before the report was published. A number of the findings of the report were fairly general knowledge to those who were interested in watching the operations of the grain trade before the report came down.

It was public knowledge that the system was not producing enough grain cars; that there would be an annual shortfall of 2,000 hopper cars until the year 1985 and that a shortfall on this scale would still continue if it were not for the intervention of some of the provincial governments, the federal government and indeed the wheat board on behalf of the producers themselves.

The report deals with a situation that has arisen because the direction of the grain trade has reversed in this country of ours. The bulk of the trade no longer moves from west to east but to where the markets are in 1980 and 1990, that is to the west, the Orient. Because of this shift we have seen the phasing out of some of the facilities at Thunder Bay because the volume of storage no longer is required. We see that the railway capacity to the west is perhaps not always adequate for the amount of traffic required of it. We are seeing very clearly that the terminal capacity at the west coast is not adequate to handle the amount of grain now available for shipment through those ports in order to meet existing markets.

Consequently, it was no surprise that the Booze, Allen and Hamilton report suggested that Prince Rupert be developed further. It pointed out the fairly obvious problems that exist in Vancouver with regard to space and the possibility of expanding the storage facility there. It pointed out there is still a very real need for terminal space at the ports. The reasons, I thought, were fairly obvious reasons. You cannot rely on ships always arriving in port on time. We have early arrivals. We have bunching of ships around the Christmas season. Captains try to get their crews to Vancouver, or any port for that matter, for the Christmas holiday, so they arrive ahead of the supposed loading time. As a result we get this bunching effect at the port of Vancouver on occasion. It is usually reported in January, but sometimes it carries over to the early part of February. The situation is exacerbated because this is also the time of year when the railways have trouble getting through the mountain passes. The report seems to be cognizant of those facts.

I think most people in the grain business are cognizant of the fact that the railway line which goes to Prince Rupert is not so subject to weather disruptions during winter. That is another of the reasons for expanding facilities at the port of Prince Rupert.

Because I have only two or three minutes before the debate is interrupted and I am not sure whether it will carry on for a full 90 minutes, I will bring my remarks to a conclusion, temporarily, and make a few points about the over-all system since we do not have time to analyse the seven or eight points in the system where problems can occur. I simply say that the report finds no problem with capacity in the country. The country elevator system has plenty of capacity. The railways are short of cars. That is a known situation and it is being dealt with. As I say, the report did not deal with the compensation aspects. But within the industry I think there is a consensus that the Crow rate is important and necessary if producers of grain are going to continue in existence. The report did not deal specifically with this, but it is fairly obvious that the wheat board is the linchpin in the system. Whether or not the transport authority is within or outside the jurisdiction of the wheat board really does not matter. The data come into the wheat board. The computer system is in place as well as the lines to connect the system. It could make the system work better.

I think the railways are giving cause for concern—I suppose we can say two and a half railways because we have small regional railways in the country—when it comes to exchanging cars. Those cars are tied up for another day or two simply because CN wants to take its own cars and CP likewise. If we combine the two railways into one system, which makes sense for a great many other reasons, we could increase the turnaround and the efficiency of the system, putting more of the grains under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board. This would improve the efficiency of the system. Rapeseed, in particular, has been a bugbear in terms of handling arrangements. Cars must be specially sorted out to separate terminal elevators. There are no switching arrangements and no pooling arrangements for rapeseed.

If issues of this kind were looked at objectively and acted upon, the question of rate could then be judged in the proper context.

It is interesting that the Booze-Allen report even looks at the national economy when it deals with costs because the board talks about just two or three crop years paying for the extra costs of keeping the system big enough to handle large crops. Booze-Allen, at least, has not fallen into the trap of some of the previous studies of analysing the system on a corporate basis to see whether it will show a profit or not. It is simply dealing with the system as it should be dealt with, as being able to provide a service. That is the basic way of looking at grain transportation. The first question to ask is: can it do the job or can it not? Most of the basics are there if we simply reorganize the structure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) had the floor.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the adjournment to which you referred, I had made the point that no one person in this country can rely on his own conviction to adequately and accurately reflect all the conflicting and contending emotions and aspirations of this country.

I put it to the members here, is there any one man who can come before this House and at the same time speak for Newfoundland with its trans-Atlantic traditions which were just changed some 31 years ago or about the frustrations of the seafaring provinces of the eastern part of Canada? Can he fully comprehend and fully understand those things? Can that person fully comprehend and understand the struggle of the people of Quebec to retain their pride of history, language and culture against successive waves of military invasion, commercial displacement and social and industrial change? That is a tall order for any man. Would he understand the Ontario of Toronto or the Ontario that is divorced from Toronto, such as the small town I grew up in which is about as remote from Toronto as is Medicine Hat?

If that one politician could grasp all at once the significance of being a maritimer, a Quebecker or an Ontarian, would he at the same time be able to grasp the experience of western Canada, its settlement at times seeming to be only for the exploitation of central Canada and to understand how much that means to a westerner? Could he understand how far British Columbia really is from this House and many of its debates? That is the essence of this country.

That is why in 1867 and all the conferences ahead of it it was decided that the only way this country could operate was by way of federation. It was impossible otherwise. It would have been more convenient for a unitary state, but it could not operate any other way.

Any person may think he comprehends this country in all its variety, but such understanding is not given to man. We are all shaped by our own particular view and our own particular version of the national heritage. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave up meeting with the premiers and the provinces, he substituted one man's vision for a vision accommodating the perspective of all Canadians. He has either endowed himself with supernatural understanding or he has come to believe that consensus is not necessary. The Prime Minister makes light of consensus because he could not achieve consensus, not because it is worthless in Canadian terms. He must now embrace the dangerous fiction of the national will. He must now embarrass us as a nation by asking the British parliament to shut its eyes to the dissent he is unable to defuse and pass a Canada act. He sends his ministers to England to make sure that the British parliament does not make a qualitative judgment about the political process in our country.

If the Prime Minister persists in his unswerving course, he will leave behind him his constitutional settlement without the breadth of support which is required in a federal democracy. He hopes to settle this question forever. We can only hope he has not doomed this country to perpetual fractionalism, and that is the essence of this debate.

● (2010)

No consensus has been reached with the provinces. We are told it was impossible, and if it was not impossible then it is likely impossible now. If common sense ruled this debate rather than impatience, this package could have been taken to the provinces because when you look at it you will see it is not the package that was rejected in September. Many of the contentious issues which were there at the conference in September are not in that package now.

I have to be realistic. It appears that the Prime Minister is committed to pursuing his package here in the House of Commons and only here. I ask him and I ask his colleagues: will they use the House of Commons to build a more firm settlement for their constitutional arrangements, whatever is finally decided upon? Will they listen to and reflect on the views expressed by MPs who together represent a greater proportion of the population than the government majority does? It would be in the best interest of this country if they did.

I want to turn to another point, and that is a matter which was raised earlier in the course of the day with regard to a procedural matter, particularly in questions put to the government House leader. My party has raised a number of questions about the procedural process we are to go through in adopting this resolution. Procedure bores people but it protects the rights of members to properly debate and amend a proposition before them.

What exactly do we now have here before us? We are debating whether we should set up a special committee to study, not a resolution, but the subject matter of a document containing a proposed resolution. When the committee makes its report, in whatever form, it will be suggesting amendments that should in its opinion be made when the resolution itself is brought back into the House. If the House concurs, the House will be concurring in the committee's report as to whether a resolution should be brought before the House and, if so, with what amendments. Never in this entire process do we deal directly with the resolution, and as a result of the procedure which has been outlined today we cannot any of us propose direct amendments. To fulfil the requirements of the rules of this House the government will have to introduce the resolution directly, have it debated directly, and pass it directly.

When this debate began we were told there would be no tricks. It looks to me as if the whole process is a pack of tricks. We have tried to get a clarification in this House of the process of passing a constitutional resolution; none has been forthcoming. However, last week a brochure was published by the government entitled "The Canadian Constitution: Explanation of a proposed Resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada". On page 18 of this booklet there is a statement which the government did not have the honesty to give in this House. It reads:

> If the committee recommends the adoption of resolutions in the form of the proposed resolution, with or without changes, and both the House of Commons and the Senate concur in that recommendation, those concurrences will constitute a joint address. The government will then transmit the joint address to the Queen.

Let me make it clear that that will not constitute a joint address. Let me make the position of my party clear on this prostitution of the rules of the House of Commons. First, nothing can constitute a joint address unless it is a joint address. In the past such addresses were passed directly as resolutions and they must be now.

Second, we do not believe the House can deal indirectly with the subject matter of a resolution and then be deemed to have passed the resolution directly. If the government wants to change the rules it can introduce a temporary standing order to do that. It cannot sneak in through the back door.

Third, we do not accept that a majority of the House has the right to truncate the process of debate on this question any more than it can arbitrarily eliminate third reading of any particular bill.

Fourth, we believe that this procedure is being advanced to deprive the opposition and, indeed, Parliament of its full rights of amendment and debate. We do not accept that a process accepted by the House as suitable for amending its own internal rules can arbitrarily be deemed appropriate for an address to the sovereign.

Fifth, we believe our practices are quite clear—that concurring in the report on a subject matter outside the House itself leaves the implementation for a later stage.

Sixth, we believe it would be highly improper for the government to go to the Speaker and ask that she sign and engross as a joint address something which is not a joint address. It would be even more improper of the Speaker to sign such a document and thereby put the sign of approval on a misrepresentation of the House's actions.

Finally, we believe that the constitutional soundness of this whole process is extremely dubious, to put it at its mildest, and that an attempt to proceed in this manner will put the Speaker and possibly the Governor General in an invidious and dangerous position.

This is a question of due process, minority rights, the duty of the Speaker to protect minorities against an abuse of the rules, and of possible misrepresentation of the proceedings of this House. We are not prepared to accept the idea that our rules are whatever the government wishes those rules to be.

This proposition, if I may say so with great respect, is sickeningly two-faced. The government has said it would not be acceptable to limit a constitutional debate. The Prime Minister has said that. In reality the government is saying, the longer we debate, the less committee study there will be. It has said there would be no tricks. Behind the backs of the members it published a document laying out the procedural dirty tricks it would not admit to in the House. We are told by Liberal members that this is just a committee reference. In reality the government plans to rewrite the rules once this so-called document reaches the committee. Suddenly the resolution will be born of the reference of the subject matter. I protest this process; we protest this process. It is unconstitutional and what flows from it is doubtful. I hope all members of the House will remember what I have said as we proceed further in this debate.

There are questions about the propriety of section 42. There is a feeling around, and I share it, that the referendum is not dealt from a straight deck, and this is borne out by the answer or non-answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) received from the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts). It is being passed off as if the debate was on the bill of rights. I said at the outset that there is no real problem with a statement of rights in Canada, and there is not, but would it not be wise of this House to ensure what particular rights we want to entrench, because if we entrench them those rights cannot be changed quickly or easily. That is important for us to remember.

I had some early troubles with the idea of a bill of rights, and I confess there are feelings in this House among lawyers and others, as there are among judges and legislators all over Canada, and as there are among legal commentators, about the idea of a bill of rights at all. I had a little difficulty with it; I confess that to you, Mr. Speaker I could as easily argue the case against a bill of rights as I could for a bill of rights.

I know how this argument comes about. There is a tendency in civil law to codify. As the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) said the other day, we have adopted, in the good old Canadian way, two processes. Some rights are codified and some are not codified. Frankly, I do not hold that to be the real issue, but I do say it is important, if we do entrench, that we know what we are entrenching and that we really do entrench protections which not only spell out what the law is, but what the law should be and what we would like the law to be, we must buttress and augment what rights we have always felt flowed from our living in a free society.

Clause 24 of the bill relieves me of the problem of the casting aside of certain rights as a result of the codifying of other rights. My mind is relieved, and it is my belief that if we are satisfied with the wording of the clause we want to entrench, the process of entrenching can be construed not as an abandonment of the common law tradition but as a method by which the common law traditions can be strengthened.

At least that is what I hope we would want. However, given the inflexibility of entrenchment, the wording becomes extremely important.

I want to take a look at clause 1 of the bill, if I have a few moments. Clause 1 of the draft bill is the so-called guarantee of rights. It says:

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits as are generally accepted in a free and democratic society with a parliamentary system of government.

Any lawyer or anyone else could drive a freight train through that so-called guarantee of rights.

An hon. Member: Amend it!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My friend says, "amend it," and he is right, but let him not stand in this House and say that what is written here is the last word. If we look at native rights and minority language rights, we find that they are imperfection personified. I said to one of my colleagues that they look the tough sections, in any event—as if they were written on an envelope in haste somewhere between Ottawa and the northern parts of Canada when this document was taken up to be reviewed by the Prime Minister.

That is the problem, and I do not have the time to go into the detail today. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said he favoured the view of the Canadian Bar Association on rights. Then why was the right to own property left out? That is part of the Canadian Bar Association's view on rights. Why was that right left out? Is there some reason or other?

The minority language rights reference is not what I thought it was and not as it was represented by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). It creates two kinds of Canadians, and they are not French and English. Subclauses (1) and (2) discriminate with respect to rights. They create two classes of Canadians, and if we are going to talk about rights, Canadians are one class whether they are French or English and whether they live in Manitoba, Quebec or Ontario. This is not something I would feel proud of as a draftsman in terms of protecting rights. If we are going to have these rights, then let us entrench what we consider our best efforts rather than our first efforts. That is a problem we have.

We have talked about the problem of an amending formula. The hon. member for Rosedale laid out the objections, gave an alternative to the government with respect to the Vancouver formula and gave an undertaking on behalf of our party which I am prepared to repeat on behalf of our party.

The referendum in this bill is not a neutral device.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this country is more than the sum of its parts, and I believe we cannot have deadlock forever. There is a time to act, as there was a time to act in the deadlocked Canada of 1864, and I hope that Canada as a nation will be the focus of our loyalty and the essence of our hope. I have no illusions about the provinces. They operate in a different political context than I do.

We had a message.

[Translation]

In the speech he made on Monday, the Minister of Justice was kind enough to draw my attention and that of my colleagues to the comments made by Premier Davis. I would like to do likewise and quote the comments made by Mr. Ryan, his leader, if Mr. Davis is mine, as reported in the newspaper Le Devoir on Monday, October 6.

Mr. Ryan wrote and I quote:

—the federal system has been based up to now on the principle of equality between both levels of government, each in its own jurisdiction; there was no question that one level of government be dependent on the other or have preponderance over the other. With the system introduced under the federal project, the preponderance of the federal government over the provinces is acknowledged. It is a new political principle which, in my view, gives an entirely new aspect to constitutional law and political development in Canada. And we do not believe that it is the proper way in which to lead Canada at present. We maintain that the constitution is the common property and responsibility of the two levels of government. For major changes affecting the constitution, it is necessary to obtain the consent of both levels of government. Neither of those levels can assume the privilege or the right to act alone in those matters which may indeed alter federative relations.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the government has come to this House of Commons. In doing so, the government has hurt the cause of confederation in the way in which it has come. If the government wants to help the cause of confederation, then people on the government side should understand that there are representative views in this House which are different but which are nonetheless Canadian, and they ought to listen to those views. I want to give them every chance to do that.

Therefore, in closing I wish to move an amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty):

That the motion be amended by adding thereto after the fifth paragraph the following:

"That the committee shall be deemed to have the resolution directly before it for the purpose of discussion and amendment, and that the committee shall report the resolution as amended in a form which will permit both Houses to directly consider and amend the said resolution".

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, before we debate the amendment—and I understand that my hon. colleague will seek the floor in a few minutes—I wonder if the opposition House leader would grant me a question, just as I granted him one yesterday after my speech.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Oh, yes

• (2030)

Mr. Pinard: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) just mentioned that he doubted the legality of our process. As I understood him, he believed that some premiers would go to the court to contest the legality of our procedure in the House on the matter of the patriation of the constitution. I should like him to explain to me how it is that the premiers could not even agree unanimously on this matter? They could not even reach unanimity on this fundamental question of the legality—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has an amendment before it. I should simply like to note at this point that the Chair would like to take the amendment under advisement before ruling whether or not the amendment is in order. The Chair will now proceed to recognize the next speaker in the debate.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When I spoke previously it was on a point of order. You had recognized me on a point of order when I asked for permission to ask a question, and I understand the hon. gentleman accepted my request. If you will recognize me, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the question, but if you do not, I will not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has expired and the minister can only ask a question with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: Yesterday I granted the hon. gentleman a question. My question is as follows: How does he reconcile his views on the legality of our action if the premiers cannot agree on this, because only some of them say they will contest our action, and what does he say about Premier Davis subscribing totally to our action in the House?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I suppose I could answer that by asking my friend a question. What does he say about his leader in Quebec totally disagreeing with the action that the government has taken?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I answered the hon. member's question yesterday and I wish I could repeat that answer. It is a problem. This is the position and it has nothing to do with legality or illegality. What I said at the outset stands. I said that I think the regrettable situation which we find in this country, and that is putting it mildly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the minister, it seems to me that we are now entering into an exchange between two hon. members. With the consent of the House, the Chair would now like to recognize the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais).

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to express the tremendous pleasure I feel at being able to take part in this historic debate. I listened with great interest to what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who must now take leave, had to say. I congratulate him on his efforts in trying to speak the language of Molière. It is the first time I have heard him, and I hope that the opportunity will present itself again only in a very distant future, after he has had a chance to take lessons. Now, that being said, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that this afternoon—

[English]

This afternoon when I was listening to the preliminary debate before orders of the day were called, I thought this would be a very long debate indeed because a number of members in the opposition rose on a number of points and I had the distinct impression, this being my first full day in the House during the debate on the constitution, that this debate would be prolonged unduly. However, I was comforted by the fact that, as hon. members will recall, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, in effect, eliminated a large number of issues which I felt would have been debated otherwise. He indicated that patriation was not an issue. He said that patriation was generally agreed to by the people of Canada and by members of this House. I concur with that and I congratulate him on his perspicacity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: He then said that he had no difficulty with the bill of rights. He repeated this statement just before concluding. He said that there was some details with which he perhaps took issue but generally he believed in the entrenchment of a bill of rights. That again is one of the areas which I thought would have been the subject of considerable controversy, but he did away with that one and again I congratulate him on his co-operation.

The third issue was the question of the amendment. He admitted that we needed to bring the constitution home with an amending formula and he agreed with the principle which was being advanced. I felt very comforted by that particular agreement, and indeed there is very little else left for him to debate at this time. But when he started dealing with the amending formula, I could see very well that he was unable to understand what the government was attempting to do. He stated in effect that we attempted to advance the amending formula without consent from the provinces, and he even accused the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of lack of leadership when he introduced this particular amending formula.

I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that if he reviewed the whole historical context of the debates and discussions which took place between the federal governments and the provincial governments since the statute of Westminster in 1931, he would recognize that every possible attempt has been made to secure a consensus among the provinces. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) this afternoon gave chapter and verse on every one of the meetings, federal and provincial, prime ministerial and ministerial, which took place. He indicated that in spite of all those meetings, we were unable to reach consensus.

I do not think there is a more striking example than that of the Victoria conference in 1971. Reviewing the events of that conference, it will be recognized that in 1971 the provinces and the federal government under the leadership of the Prime Minister had agreed on an amending formula, a formula which made eminent good sense. Following that particular agreement, the then premier of Quebec, Robert Bourassa, went back to his province and stated in effect that he withdrew his consent based on the refusal by the federal government to recognize primacy over social policies at the provincial level. What he said in effect was, "I do not get the power that I want, so you will not get the amending formula." Of course, everyone knows that without the amending formula no patriation is possible.

What happened in Victoria in 1971 is exactly what had happened at every previous meeting and every meeting since, namely, that the patriation of the constitution and the amending formula, which of necessity has to be attached, has been the lever used by the provinces in order to pry out of the central government that concession which was considered proper to its own jurisdiction. So, in effect, what has happened is that every one of the provinces has imposed the unanimity rule in order to secure full consensus which applied to the specific will and desire of each of the individual provinces. In that context it is a physical, intellectual and moral impossibility for a consensus to be reached.

We went through the exercise of drafting Bill C-60 in cabinet. I sat on the cabinet committee which assisted in the drafting of that legislation. We had every hope that that bill would at least permit us to change our own structures at the federal level. That was unsuccessful. I participated in the preparation for the federal-provincial discussions in 1979 when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) attempted with the utmost flexibility, through every effort he possessed, to secure an agreement between the provinces. That proved to be impossible.

● (2040)

Mr. Dick: He was rigid.

Mr. Blais: Rigidity is the last word I would use to describe that exercise. When we reached that impasse there needed to be a slicing of the Gordian knot. I do not know of any other example or parallel befitting the impasse we reached than the Gordian knot.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton agreed that we had public support. He ought to agree and take heed of it because there is a recognition throughout the country that we are doing what needs to be done and what needs to be done now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: You are losing your support.

Mr. Blais: Hon. gentlemen opposite should listen to their constituents. I have been in some of their ridings and I have received the positive response they do not expect but will wake up to. I have been in Parry Sound, Orillia, Nipissing, Toronto and New Brunswick. People said that we were doing the right thing and gave us the "go-ahead" to do it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I have hit a sensitive nerve on the other side. I note the hon. gentlemen who are sensitive are those most open to the representations of their constituents.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton indicated a concern regarding certain areas of the charter of human rights. I listened this afternoon to the question of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) who raised the Bakke case and the question of affirmative action. I simply call section 15 to the attention of the House, the non-discrimination section of the resolution. It contains specific provisions so that the non-discrimination rights do not in any way infringe upon positive action programs as reflected through policy or through legislation. That is the type of foresight we used in the preparation of this resolution.

Also, I was somewhat concerned about an article written by Mr. Gwyn in which he quoted the counsel for the Canadian Civil Liberties Association who expressed some reservation about the entrenchment of a bill of rights. I simply point out that the counsel is a hired hand of that particular association, whereas the chairman, Mr. Tarnapolsky, is a strong supporter of the legislation with which we are dealing, including the entrenchment of the bill of rights. I suggest that is the position to adopt. I have never been able to accept the argument that somehow we should be running after 11 legislatures in this country to protect human and civil rights of individuals, in effect something which should be up front. One will notice in the resolution before us that the first section deals with human rights and that subsequent sections deal with rights of individuals. That is the importance which ought to be given them.

I am a lawyer trained in the common law as is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. He expressed reservations about codifying, that is, entrenching. I do not have any of those reservations. While I have a great deal of respect for skilful lawyers who are original and like to hunt in libraries in order to unearth principles of common law which may protect their clients, I do not think the man on the street, the Canadian citizen, is interested in hiring lawyers in order to ascertain his human rights. He wants them up front.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: No greater man recognized that necessity than John Diefenbaker when he saw the common law as imperfect and understood the necessity of codifying those principles and rights up front in the bill of rights he introduced in the legislation. Unfortunately that was interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada in the guise of an interpretation statute; it was never given its intended weight. The entrenchment of a bill of rights, mobility rights and non-discrimination rights will secure for Canadians a recognition of rights recognized throughout civilization. It is time to entrench those rights.

[Translation]

But there is in fact another reason why I wanted to take part in this debate. It is true that I have been sitting in this House for eight years as a member of Parliament, but I have been a French Canadian and a Franco-Ontarian for 40 years, since I was born. And this really means something. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to study constitutional law when I was in primary school, in the sixth, seventh and eighth grades, because our teachers recognized that it was essential for us to know our rights if we wanted to preserve our identity as French Canadians even though we lived outside Quebec.

I can say, Mr. Speaker, that the issue of the minority language and education rights existed before confederation, as hon. members know quite well. In fact, the last issue to be settled when the confederative agreement of 1867 was passed was the protection of minority rights as concerns education. This appears under British North America Act section 93.

When I was a small boy, I lived in a city called Sturgeon Falls in northern Ontario. My great grandparents settled in northern Ontario with the building of the railway in the 1880s. They had left the province of Quebec because they considered that all of Canada was their country. They and many of their fellow citizens settled in northern Ontario.

In my native city, there were schools right from the start, but unfortunately, then came what was called regulation 17. I do not want to go over this sad moment in our history, but our basic rights were infringed upon by a statutory regulation of the province of Ontario. It was after this that French Canadian national movements such as the ACFO, the movement of Olivar Asselin, and others, were created to strengthen the French language and culture in Ontario.

I had myself the privilege of taking an active part in French Canadian activities in Toronto. First, when I was admitted to the Bar, I sat on the advisory committee for French language education when the Étienne Brûlé secondary school was established in Toronto. It is hard to imagine that in a city of two million people where there were more than 60,000 French Canadians, we tried for four years to get a French secondary school. Four years, Mr. Speaker! I was there myself only for the last three years, and we were told that we would be unable to get 200 students in our school. Of course, we now have that school and even more because the need has been recognized, but there was already virtually systematic resistance at that time. However, this was in a city where people said: nearly all of the residents of Toronto are English Canadians! There are no French Canadians. Of course, that was not true. But in other Ontario areas where we had a French majority, we had to extract, to tear out French schools from the public administration, as well as we could. I have children, Mr. Speaker, I was fortunate. In fact, I went to an English language public school, but after that I went to Ottawa University and perfected my French.

My younger brother went through all his classes in French schools in Ontario, and is quite happy about it. I would like my children, whom I dragged along into western Canada this summer, could also have mobility, be able to go to western Canada and live as they live at home, as I lived in Sturgeon Falls, as my grandparents lived in Hull and Glengarry-Prescott. This is not asking very much. I was brought up with a concept of Canada under which I had as much place as a Francophone as any Anglophone anywhere across the land, and I am not prepared to accept anything less. I am not being selfish, because my presence is a contribution to the country. I am not talking of my own self of course, but rather the presence of French civilization that contributes to this whole country we call Canada.

Morever, Mr. Speaker, to people who may oppose this I would suggest I never forced anyone to speak French. If people want to speak to me in French, they are welcome to do so. But I recognize realities. Being Franco-Ontarian, I recognize I had to learn English. And I had no fear in doing so, because I feel it is an advantage to speak the two most used languages in the civilized world. I have absolutely no concern about this, and I worked hard to learn English. I am not ashamed of it, no more than I am ashamed of speaking French and trying to do so with all the concentration, vigour and imagination I am capable of. Mr. Speaker, this is the nature of this country.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton referred earlier to the problem in this country, because of the vastness of our regions like the west, for anybody to understand all that. This is a truism.

• (2050)

[English]

Nobody, but nobody, can deny that this country has been enriched by a vast array of human beings who brought their immeasurable wealth to our shores. Every time I attend a citizenship acceptance ceremony I am impressed. The judge always identifies the number of countries that are represented by the new citizens and, on every occasion, I tell them that this is a brand new country in the full process of evolution and development with the strongest potential of any country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I say to hon. members opposite that there is no divisiveness in what we are attempting to do. The divisiveness will come from undue delay caused by the other side of the House for no reason at all. Hon. members opposite know full well that after we patriate the constitution, as we will, we will deal seriatim with every issue that has to be dealt with at the federal-provincial level. That is of necessity. But we will remove that very unfortunate lever which was used by the provinces, namely, the very fact of patriation, which has stopped constructive negotiation and discussion.

Constructive negotiation and discussion is essential if this country, with its unfathomable wealth, is to be able to pursue its course as a unified country and as a country which will invite to its shores people to develop its population to a level which was foreseen by our predecessors, including Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but cannot be conceived to the full extent even by ourselves as we sit here debating this essential document.

I am pleased to have participated in this debate. The details can be discussed at a later stage, and that stage has to be in committee. Let us send this resolution to committee and we will all be better for it.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as I stand, I am forced to admit that it is a moving experience, to stand and defend my country from internal assaults. It reminds me of when I was called upon to defend my country from external assaults. It is a very stirring and emotional experience. I would say that it is gut-gripping when so much is at stake.

The best thing I can think of to do in the circumstances is to approach the whole matter calmly and rationally and critically analyse the various proposals that are before us to decide which, if any, are acceptable and what effect each may have on the country which we in this chamber and people throughout the land hold so dear. What then are the proposals? The resolution before us has been there long enough now to allow us to stand back and look at it critically and analytically to determine what it is attempting to do and how it proposes to carry out its purposes.

It proposes to patriate what is called the constitution. I say that it proposes to patriate the BNA Act and other elements of the constitution. It proposes the entrenchment of a charter of rights and equalization principles. Finally, it proposes an amending formula. This whole thing is to be done under a deadline. That is a large package to submit to a deadline. I would like to look at each of these areas separately. I will begin with patriation.

I suppose the process could be called patriation. It is a name which has been invented for a specific purpose, although, the closer one looks at the process, the phonier it becomes. I have no hesitation in accepting the notion that Canada's constitutional forms, documents, acts, whatever, should be amendable and dealt with in this Parliament. But as much as I want to see the constitutional provisions within our grasp here for amendment—in other words, as much as I want to see patriation—I cannot help but be struck by the irony of the way the government is going about it in this resolution.

What we are being asked to do, and I find it quite incredible, is exchange one British statute for another. That is not patriation, it is a travesty of patriation. I want patriation. I do not want a travesty of patriation.

● (2100)

Let me explain. It has to be explained and it has to be understood not just by you, Mr. Speaker, but by all hon. members opposite as well as by the entire Canadian population. In my view, we are being conned at the present time into believing that what we are doing is patriating the BNA Act and other elements of the constitution.

Let us examine the process closely. We are being asked to approve a joint resolution. The Fathers of Confederation approved a joint resolution and once the context was agreed upon in 1864 and 1866, it was transmitted to the British parliament to be passed into law. It became the BNA Act, a British statute. There is no question about that.

Once the resolution before us today is approved by both Houses of Parliament it will be transmitted to the British parliament, with a prayer, a request, that the content of the resolution, known as the Canada Act, be approved by the British parliament. That is the exact procedure used in 1867 to bring the BNA Act and Canada into being.

We all recognize that the BNA Act is now described as an act of the British parliament which, of course, it is, and some shame seems to be attached to that. If the Canada Act is approved by the British parliament it will also be an act of the British parliament. It is true that the British parliament will not be able to amend it—they withdraw from that—but it will remain an act of the British parliament and it contains elements of the constitution that have never been there before. I suggest we must very carefully look at this notion of patriation and what it means in terms of the statute. It will have been drafted in Canada, like the resolution which became the BNA Act, but it will still have been approved by the British parliament.

Boiled down to its essentials it comes to this, Mr. Speaker: Canada's constitution as set out in the Canada Act—and there is more to it than that—will be an act of the British parliament. We must think about that, Mr. Speaker. We must not allow ourselves to be fooled. I wonder if we are being taken on a ride down Tom Fool Hill? If the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has his way the British parliament will give us a new constitution. I emphasize this: the British parliament will be giving us this new constitution.

The Prime Minister sent two of his ministers to London. I suggest that in a manner of speaking what we are doing is hiding behind the skirts of Margaret Thatcher and asking her to do the dirty work that we are not prepared to do ourselves—to pass a law so that it will be effective here, and then we say, "Don't ever touch our constitution again." I suggest there is another way, one that has been proposed by this House and a shorter way. We could ask the British parliament to relieve themselves of those provisions of the statute of Westminster which enabled them to amend our constitution and we will do it here. The order of doing that would probably be the other way around—that we do it here and then ask them to deprive themselves of the right to interfere in our constitutional affairs, if you like. Meanwhile, we should not be taken in completely, utterly and entirely by the notion of patriation as it is being put across in much of the literature, printed and vocal, that is being issued across Canada.

Why are we proceeding by way of another British statute when there is a neater, tidier way of proceeding? The cabinet document that was leaked during the first ministers' meeting could give us some inkling why we are being asked to follow this route.

An hon. Member: It was not a cabinet document.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Apparently that is now being denied.

An hon. Member: It is not a cabinet document.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There is a document of advice to the Prime Minister as to the question of validity, and this is a very important point. As to the question of validity, the document states as follows on page 50:

—it is the view of the Department of Justice that a law passed by the U.K. parliament to patriate the constitution,—

Note the use of the word again.

—with an amending formula and other changes, could not be successfully attacked in the courts.

"Validity of the move", Mr. Speaker! Are they afraid of it being attacked in the Canadian courts—the validity of their action? They must be ashamed of it to judge by the way they are proceeding.

Of course, this resolution has yet to be passed by the U.K. parliament and therefore, in my judgment, the validity of the proposals could successfully be called into question in the courts before this is passed—not patriation as such, but the process by which this whole operation is being carried out.

Let me proceed to the second point, namely, that the British parliament is being asked to do a good deal more than just patriate the constitution. If that were all, then the British parliament would undoubtedly be delighted to patriate it and have done with it. But much more than that is being sought.

Westminster is, in fact, not only being asked to rid itself of the tiresome task of looking after the BNA Act and amending it from time to time when asked; Westminster is being asked, in addition, to amend it for one last time as far as they are concerned, and, in the process, rid itself of that tiresome chore.

In what areas is approval being sought for this final Westminster amendment? Largely, it is admitted with regret, in areas touching on provincial jurisdiction. Entrenched rights, many of which are property and civil rights. Under the BNA Act which is being patriated in a sense under article 50 or 51—the name is changed but it is still the BNA Act, to all intents and purposes—property and civil rights were assigned to the provinces, as was education. Those two elements are being changed in the constitution, presumably at the request of the government. The British parliament is expected to make those changes.

Equally important in the area touching upon the powers of the Senate, an area which itself impinges on provincial or regional jurisdiction, are the prerogatives of the regions or provinces. This is done without consulting with, and certainly without the consent of, the provinces.

In essence what we see first of all is the Prime Minister presenting a resolution to Parliament which because of its attack on provincial jurisdiction will fundamentally alter the federal nature of this country built up over 113 years. In addition, changes have been proposed in the powers of the Senate, thereby producing a fundamental change in the accepted parliamentary nature of this country. I shall return to this matter late in my remarks.

The argument we hear from the government's side asks what can be done after 53 years. We are being asked to do this in 53 days. What is the deadline there for, I should like to know? That is not more than 53 days away. If we cannot do it as a nation in 53 years, is this House expected to do it in 53 days?

An hon. Member: Two years.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They say it has proved impossible to get agreement short of unanimity on how to proceed with amendments affecting the provinces. I question the absence of unanimity, however. In fact, I suggest that it is not true. It is a downright lie. It is a lie.

● (2110)

The Vancouver consensus was agreed on by 11 governments meeting in Vancouver last fall. This was all governments, provincial and federal. If that is not unanimity, I do not know what is. I ask why it was rejected. Why should we turn our backs on such a prize and proceed by way of the Victoria formula which was rejected ten years ago? One can only speculate. Unfortunately, my speculation, based on 12 years of experiencing the Prime Minister's baneful influence on the public service and Parliament, leads me to the view that it is being done deliberately to provoke antagonism, just as the Pitfield document was deliberately leaked in Winnipeg to provoke dissension in the meetings of the council of ministers, and just as the other longer 65-page document—whatever it is called—on closure of the meetings on September 12 or 13 was designed to bring about the failure of the first ministers' meeting.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my reading of why we have rejected a prize, a unanimously agreed upon formula, and picked one up which was thrown overboard ten years ago. The reason is that dissension is the way this government plans to govern this country. I am afraid there is something sinister here. I will return to provide supporting evidence of my belief in a minute.

The third element has to do with an equalization provision—as though that were new. Equalization has been a constitutional practice in this country I should say for almost 30 years now. It was suggested by the leader of my party at a meeting and included in a document which has come to be known as the Kingston memorandum, agreed upon by seven premiers and the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). It suggested that the equalization formula be included and entrenched in any constitution that might develop. The form in which it is there requires, I think, a little bit of refinement. There is no problem with the idea.

If I look behind that equalization formula I wonder whether I would find the same musty cupboard with grubs, moths and things that I found when I looked behind patriation. I think I will just leave that one for the time being and on another occasion I may have a return to it.

I think you are entitled to ask, Mr. Speaker, why I am so worried about the federal Parliament trespassing upon provincial areas of jurisdiction without consent. This brings us to the question of what is Canada. How did Canada come into being? Here again I suggest we go right back to fundamentals. Not many of us may know it, but the BNA Act—incidentally, despite what television and the billboard ads are saying—was written in Canada by Canadians. It has been ours from the beginning, despite those stupid advertisements which cost us $6 million.

The BNA Act starts out in its preamble in this fashion:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion—

This is followed in section 4 by the definition of Canada in these terms:

> —the Name Canada shall be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this Act.

In other words, the coming together of three provinces, which eventually became four provinces, desiring to be united and form a central government.

Who or what then is Canada? Since Canada came into being and is recognized as having been constituted as "Canada" by the coming together of the "Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick", and since the other provinces are regarded, once they have been created as provinces and joined the union, as being equal in all respects to the original partners, it follows, according to any logic of which I have knowledge, that Canada as an entity is a creation of the provinces.

I ask hon. members not to jump too hastily. Do not let our imaginations run too far ahead on this. Let us also remember that the foremost authority on the federal notion, K. C. Wheare of Oxford, in his Federal Government defined the federal principle in the following manner: "By the federal principle, I mean the method of dividing powers so that the general and regional governments are each within its sphere co-ordinate and independent".

Canada was indeed created by the provinces—in the final analysis by all the provinces. In the document whereby this creation was consummated, the BNA Act, the powers, jurisdictions and areas of operation of the two orders of government of Canada on the one hand and of the provinces on the other were set forth in relatively clear terms, implicit in which was the notion that each order of government generally speaking would be sovereign in the area assigned to it, give or take a joint jurisdiction.

Following this logic, I think it should be abundantly obvious that any changes in powers, jurisdictions or areas of operation, particularly of the creating provinces, should not occur without the concurrence of those provinces. The resolution before us, however, is barely consistent with that sort of logic because it proposes a contrary form of procedure: that which was created by the BNA Act, namely the central government, now proposes without consultation to set in entrenching concrete limitations on the freedom within which its creators, the provinces, may act. It has bypassed its creators and purports to legislate on their behalf affecting property, civil rights and education.

Do you know what I call that, Mr. Speaker? I call it constitutional cannibalism. The creature has turned on its creator to dismember it, to consume it piece by piece. This is a serious change in the structure of Canada and, Mr. Speaker, Westminster is being asked not only to make the change, but to condone it. Have we no shame in this country? Are we unable to stand on our own feet and write our own constitution? This disposition of the government to bypass the provinces in areas of clearly provincial jurisdiction emerges again in the amending formula set forth in section 42, because here we see enunciated the principle that the amendments to the constitution may, in certain circumstances, be effected through referenda thereby bypassing again constituted provincial authorities. This is again a serious change in the federal nature of Canada and one which gives rise to the deepest misgivings. The basic constitutional nature of our country is being altered without consulting the provinces and, therefore, without the agreement of the provinces; and Westminster is being asked to condone this change.

If I may move briefly to section 44, again dealing with an amending procedure, I suggest that here, too, we find a proposal which upon acceptance would alter Canada fundamentally in that it would change the nature of our parliamentary institutions. Section 44 provides, in certain circumstances, that the House of Commons' views will prevail whether the Senate is prepared to go along or not. Westminster is being asked to put its stamp of approval on this change too. It is clear to me, therefore, and I hope it is becoming clearer to others, that this resolution contains not just the one Trojan horse mentioned by my leader when he spoke on Monday last, but two. One, and a double one at that—it must be a dromedary—a potential threat to the federal nature of our country, and two, a potential threat to the parliamentary institutions of this country.

In relation to the second of these, the threat to the Senate, I draw the attention of the House to a citation from the Supreme Court in the reference to it in 1978 on this very issue as it arose out of Bill C-60. Eight justices examining this matter held the view, and I quote:

> The fundamental character of the Senate cannot be altered by unilateral action by the Parliament of Canada.

That is in the final paragraph of their judgment. What is Parliament doing if it proceeds along the course it is now following? It is asking Westminster to do that which unilateral action by this Parliament is unable to do. I think that is absolutely disgraceful. I am ashamed.

This is where the whole deal becomes very, very sneaky and tricky, despite what we hear. Our friends in the government will say this is not being done by the Parliament of Canada, it is the parliament of the U.K. that is being asked to do it. To that, I think the reply should be a second reading from that ruling, just a little bit earlier in the same paragraph, and I invite hon. members to read the whole judgment. The assembled judges said:

> The character of the Senate was determined by the British parliament in response to the proposals submitted by the three provinces in order to meet the requirements of the proposed federal system.

Now we see one order of government proposing that this fundamental character be altered unilaterally by another parliament. I say we have a travesty of law, a shameful travesty because this government is unwilling and unable to proceed by an agreed formula toward effecting all these changes. The Vancouver consensus would make it so simple. It could get these changes done with that formula. I do not like these implications at all.

I am fearful first of all that any constitution for this country built along these lines will inevitably create deeper divisiveness than now exists. God knows, and I seldom use that word in public unless I mean it deeply, God knows how deep those divisions are right now. I am sure the government does not. The government is completely unaware of how deep they have made the divisiveness. I suppose the line is somewhere about Lake of the Woods. From there on they say, "Get rid of that government, get them out." I have had little notes sent to me saying, "Get them out, Don, before they destroy us."

That is divisiveness. I do not like to be able to repeat that, but that is the feeling in the west. It is high time those people over there got wind of it. Apparently the leader in the Senate is unable to get the message across. He probably does not even tell them because he is scared.

We have looked at patriation and have found it a travesty. We have looked at the charter of rights and found it to be an invasion of provincial jurisdiction without consent. We have looked at the amending formula and found it to have a double fault, bypassing the provinces and bypassing the Senate, both assaults on the fundamental nature of this country which set out in its course, and I hope it can be made to continue, as a federal country with a parliamentary system of government.

What about equalization? That is another reason why I along with a great many other Canadians have very little trust in the author of this document. I think that underlies a great deal of it. He may not realize this. I have mentioned it already, and I feel it needs mentioning again because these warnings fall on deaf ears. In the west there is a deepseated and genuine long-standing mistrust of the present Prime Minister. My own distrust is perhaps more personal, but I know that many share my doubts.

I ask myself, for example, whether I am prepared to see the British North America Act patriated, if that is the word, and entrusted to a man who had the effrontery to state publicly, and without a blush or backward glance over his own past, as he did in Winnipeg not too long ago, that a country which has been through two world wars should be ashamed to send its constitution to a foreign country for amendment. What utter balderdash, he above all people uttering even one word about world wars. He is a great one to be talking.

I must also ask myself whether I am prepared to accept at face value the patriation and other formulae proposed by a man who as recently as 1965, before entering the government, wrote as he did in an article published that year, and I quote:

Our existing constitution . . . creates a country in which Quebec may call on the support of nine allies to protect provincial autonomy.

He goes on a couple of lines later:

And this is the constitution our innovators want to change.

That was written by the present Prime Minister and is published in English in a book entitled "Federalism and French Canadians", page 44. I again quote:

Their vision of the Canadian constitution mentioned in the mandate of the legislative assembly's constitutional committee—

He was writing a brief for them.

—must be interpreted as taking place over several generations.

That was written in 1965. It is at page 43. Is the present resolution his first step? Perhaps. Finally, and again I quote:

To my mind, this—

That is, a lack of consensus in Quebec.

—only goes to prove that we must not meddle with the constitution yet.

True, he was talking from no position of power in 1965. He continues at page 43:

The real danger is that all these constitutional debates will provide an escape valve for our energies, and useful diversionary tactics for those who fear the profound social reforms advocated by the progressive element in our provinces.

I am also concerned when I think of these proposals to confide Canada's constitutional future to someone who was either unprepared, when western civilization including Canada was being threatened by the Nazi tide, or unwilling to go out and defend it, but not ashamed to have others defend it for him.

Mr. Pepin: You said that once already. Why are you repeating it?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No, I did not say that. Moreover, he did his utmost to persuade his fellow Canadians to join him in abstaining from that defence.

Mr. Cousineau: How is it possible that you have so much hatred in your heart?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I also wonder whether I can see my way clear to entrusting my country's constitution to someone who, upon becoming Prime Minister, proceeded almost immediately by pushing through a change in the rules to emasculate this House and Parliament and reduce the role of parliamentarians to total ineffectiveness, calling them nobodies once they are 100 yards away from the Hill. I also wonder whether I can put my country's constitution into the hands of a man who did his utmost to get Canada out of NATO and who, when that failed, allowed our armed strength to dwindle from 100,000 to 80,000, a reduction of 20 per cent and, even then in a cunning way, deprived those forces of updated equipment until, as a last resort, all major items had to be ordered at once at tremendous cost. Is that the sort of a man to whom I want to entrust the constitution? My answer is no.

• (2130)

I am not even sure that I want to see my country's future determined by a man who so diluted and dispirited the public service, in which I served with pride up to a point, by riding roughshod over the merit principle, by the appointment of such favourites as Pitfield and Head, that those who remain either feel filleted or are hopelessly beholden to him and his form of government for the preferment and emoluments with which he has bought their allegiance.

I wonder also about the matter of overlooking 12 Liberal years of federal fiscal fecklessness which saw increases in annual budgets from $12 billion to over $50 billion while deficits have climbed from less then $1 billion to over $15 billion. I say fervently: from men such as this may God soon deliver us.

Or again, are we ready to trust the ideas of a man who in 12 years has driven the national debt from $16.7 billion to $53.8 billion on which total public debt charges have increased from about $34 per head of population to over $200? Not necessarily to cap it all, but very nearly, I am not sure I am prepared to see my country moulded by a man who is ready enough to pay $38 a barrel to the Arab and Latin American producers, but begrudges his fellow Canadians an increase beyond $16.75 a barrel. That is a sad, sad litany. It is not a record to inspire confidence in one who aspires to create the constitutional strait-jacket by which we would be bound for the next century.

After all this I am moved to wonder why he is proceeding in this way when other less confrontational avenues are open, and I have shown where those avenues lie. Those avenues are there but he has deliberately avoided them. Why, for example, as I suggested earlier, has he chosen a modified Victoria formula when the Vancouver consensus was accepted by all? I suggest this is confrontation for the sake of confrontation. I am wondering whether, in fact, having courted and invited rejection by the premiers, he is inviting rejection by Westminster in order to say "Ha! I told you, you are just a bunch of colonials. I will write your constitution for you and I will make this a republic", as he said he wanted to do when he spoke to the students in Montreal. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in joining the debate on this motion I feel I am taking part in a very important step forward for Canadians.

Those who drafted the British North America Act of 1867 produced a wise and far-seeing document, but much has happened since then and, as contemporary Canadians in a fast moving world, we are influenced by events which the Fathers of Confederation could not have foreseen. Clearly, the majority of Canadians now wish to have a constitution made in Canada for contemporary Canada and which can be amended in Canada.

In fact, on May 9 of this year the House of Commons approved unanimously a motion proposed and seconded by two Conservative members from western Canada which called on Parliament to submit an address to Her Majesty the Queen requesting "that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada".

We may differ sincerely and profoundly on the division of powers, on an amending formula or on the process but, quite clearly, there is agreement on patriation itself. The resolution before us aims at patriation with conditions on which there is now a fair measure of agreement. The present resolution does not change the division of powers; it gives no additional powers to any level of government, but it does enhance the rights of individual citizens.

The British North America Act of 1867 recognized Canada's linguistic and cultural duality; 60 per cent of Canadians then were of British origin and 30 per cent of French origin. Since then we have seen major changes in our population. In 1971 some 44 per cent of all Canadians were of British origin, 29 per cent of French descent and 27 per cent were of other ethnic backgrounds. This 27 per cent represented more than five million Canadians living in all ten provinces. Today, approximately 30 per cent of the population of Canada is composed of Canadians of neither French nor Anglo-Celtic extraction.

The policy of multiculturalism announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1971 recognizes the equal contributions of all Canadians as nation builders. In 1971 the Prime Minister said:

> National unity, if it is to mean anything in the deeply personal sense, must be founded on confidence in one's own individual identity; out of this can grow respect for that of others and a willingness to share ideas, attitudes and assumptions. A vigorous policy of multiculturalism will help create this initial confidence. It can form the base of a society which is based on fair play for all . . . A policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework is basically the conscious support of individual freedom of choice. We are free to be ourselves. But this cannot be left to chance. It must be fostered and pursued actively. If freedom of choice is in danger for some ethnic groups, it is in danger for all. It is the policy of this government to eliminate any such danger and to safeguard this freedom.

Every one of us or our ancestors emigrated to this country and together we have created a unique society, a society benefiting from the sharing of our many cultures, traditions and backgrounds. It is fundamental to the growth and success of this country that we live together in a spirit of mutual respect, understanding and equal opportunity for everyone, no matter what our race or background. That is why I consider the enshrining of the charter of human rights in the constitution essential.

Some have argued that fundamental rights are well protected by our unwritten traditions of freedom and by the legislation of provincial governments. At the beginning of this debate we heard from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) some of the compelling arguments which the Canadian Bar Association has advanced in favour of enshrining a charter of rights in the constitution.

The rights and freedoms in the motion before us include not only human rights such as freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought and expression, freedom of the press, freedom of peaceful assembly, but also democratic rights—the right to vote and to stand for office regardless of race, national origin, colour, age or sex.

As late as 1909 a member of the House of Lords in England described as "momentous and far-reaching" the constitutional change involved in considering a woman eligible to vote.

[Translation]

Until the privy council of England made a ruling in the famous case known as the "persons" case, women were considered under the constitution to be incapable of taking part in public life.

In 1905, the superior court of British Columbia ruled that a woman was not a person qualified to become a lawyer in that province.

In 1915, in Quebec, during the proceedings launched by a woman who wanted to be admitted to the Quebec Bar, the judge stated that to admit a woman to the profession:

> —would be nothing less than a crime against public order and an obvious breach of morality and public decency.

In 1928, five Alberta residents sent a petition to the government asking that the superior court rule on whether women were "qualified persons" to be appointed to the Senate under the provisions of section 24 of the British North America Act.

The Supreme Court of Canada rejected the concept that women were persons, but the case was appealed before the legal committee of the privy council of England. The privy council accepted the concept and the constitutional law now includes a provision to this effect.

[English]

One of the five women involved in the "persons" case was a police magistrate who, on more than one occasion, heard argued in her court the rather interesting proposition that "women are persons in matters of pain and penalties but not persons in the matter of rights and privileges".

● (2140)

Those who argue that our rights are sufficiently well protected by existing law and traditions would do well to stop and reflect on the severe limitations faced by women even in this century. We can really take nothing for granted where basic rights are concerned.

In Canada, even in this century, laws have been passed which removed basic human rights from groups of citizens in different provinces. For example, in the west, Japanese-Canadians were deprived of their rights. There was suppression of freedom of religion in Quebec and, more recently, the right of citizens to seek employment from one province to another has been limited in Quebec and Newfoundland.

The resolution before the House provides for a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms binding on Parliament and on all provincial legislatures and governments. While it is true that a number of rights and freedoms are provided for by law now in such federal statutes as the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canadian Bill of Rights, the Criminal Code and in various laws at the provincial level, most of these laws are subject to change, and the protection legislated today could theoretically be removed or limited by another enactment in the future. Entrenching the rights contained in this charter would place those basic human rights beyond the ordinary reach of Parliament or a provincial legislature.

I am very pleased to see the concept of mobility rights included in this charter. All citizens, as a matter of right, should be free to live and work anywhere in Canada without discrimination based on the previous province of residence. The situation which we have seen recently of one province refusing employment to Canadians who come from another province is indeed a serious matter. It is understandable, perhaps, that in times of some economic difficulty people become self-protective and more narrow and parochial in their views, but that is all the more reason to have mobility rights entrenched in the constitution to help us maintain our normal generous, open characteristics in difficult times and to remind us that we have one Canadian citizenship, not ten provincial citizenships.

The practice of using federal revenues to redistribute wealth to the less advantaged provinces of this country has existed since 1957, and this equalization principle is also in the motion before us. Equalization payments are now an established convention established by statute so that basic services to citizens can be maintained at a comparable level across Canada. Enshrining the principle of equalization in the constitution is an important recognition of the Canadian tradition of sharing our resources and our prosperity just as we share in certain risks and difficulties.

[Translation]

Parliament and the Government of Canada will have to respect the principle of equalization as concerns the less privileged provinces. Both levels of government will have to undertake to promote equal opportunities among Canadians, stimulate economic development to reduce disparities and provide essential public services of a reasonable quality for all Canadians.

[English]

On the question of language rights, the charter uses wording very similar to that agreed on by the provincial premiers in Montreal in 1978. The charter will give Canadians the right to have their children educated in whichever official language is used by the parents where there are sufficient numbers of the minority language group to justify a school.

This, of course, is a very important right when viewed in connection with mobility of workers. If we really want to make it easier for Québecois to live and work for a few years in other parts of Canada and for Anglophone Canadians to live and work in Quebec from time to time, we must make it easier for people to move their families. Undoubtedly English-speaking Canadians who move to Quebec will want to improve their French and will want their children to learn French in order to take part fully in the social and cultural life of that province. But if the long-term future of the children is in English-speaking Canada, they will also want to ensure that the children maintain and build on their knowledge of English.

Obviously one can make comparable statements about the Quebecker who moves to another province in Canada for a few years as part of his or her career line progression and who wants his or her children to maintain their proficiency in French. Parents may make different choices depending on the ages of their children, their facility in the second official language and so forth, but they should have the right of choice and the educational facilities to make that choice a reality.

An important historical and political reality in our country is that we have an entire province where a vast majority of the people speak French. The legal, religious and social institutions of Quebec are primarily of French origin. This French fact is an important part of Canada, and all of us are richer for it.

At the same time as we adopted a multiculturalism policy we adopted the official languages policy. In these twin and mutually reinforcing policies we were saying that Canada recognizes the aspirations of all its people to participate fully in our society. As Canadians we undertook then to ensure that cultural differences do not bar anyone from full participation.

Not long ago the people of Quebec voted overwhelmingly against separation and for Canada. Let us now move to ensure that it is easier for them to work and to be welcomed in all of Canada.

We live in an essentially tolerant country, a country in which human and cultural values matter, a country in which there is room to accommodate the individuality and legitimate aspirations of all people. These are important values, important enough to enshrine in a constitution.

I said earlier that the motion before us aims at patriation of the constitution with conditions to which most people agree. These include, first, a charter of human rights, including mobility rights and language rights, and second, a commitment to promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians and to furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities.

The rock on which many previous attempts at patriation have foundered is, of course, the amending formula. The proposal before us is that for the first two years after patriation, constitutional amendments should require the consent of the House of Commons, the Senate and all the provincial governments. Federal-provincial conferences would continue, and at the end of two years the amending formula could be either something new, agreed on by all parties, or the Victoria charter formula. There is also provision for a national referendum, if necessary. It may not be necessary. I hope that good will and the Canadian gift for conciliation and civilized compromise will carry the day.

Provincial premiers are elected to represent provincial interests rather than to take positions in the broad national interest, and they have bargained hard for their own regions. Although this has sometimes produced incongruous situations over the past 53 years when ten different prime ministers have tried to get agreement to patriate the constitution, one cannot fault the premiers for trying to get maximum advantage at federal-provincial conferences. Neither can we allow the deadlock to continue for another 53 years. The 282 members of the House of Commons are elected to think and work in terms of the nation as a whole. Many of the speeches we have heard in this debate have reflected that concern and have also reflected what we are hearing from our constituents. First, people are tired of indecision and want the constitution patriated, and second, people want to see this House deal also with the economy, with employment and with energy.

The House met a week earlier than planned, and, when this motion is passed, work on the constitution will continue in committee over the next three months, so that until the day set for the committee to report back, the House will indeed be free to deal with other matters.

I look forward to seeing the constitutional debate continue in the context of normal, orderly conduct of parliamentary business. I also trust that the provincial premiers will, in the best interest of all Canadians, find more areas of agreement with each other and with the Government of Canada.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I enter into the debate on Canada's constitution. I first came to the House of Commons with patriotic feelings, a sense of Canadianship, wanting to Canadianize some of Canada's institutions and to Canadianize Canada's constitution, and also with a great will and desire to see Canada's economy fall much more directly under Canada's control.

Many of these things have not taken place, but today we find that the debate on the constitution which is taking place in the House does deal with the Canadianization of our constitution. I note that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his remarks on Thursday when he first announced the resolution which was placed before the House, stated in part:

> Earlier today, a joint resolution was placed on the order paper of Parliament, which, if Parliament approves, will provide a key to our future as a nation. The Speaker has asked that Parliament return on Monday to begin debate on that resolution.

That was a week later than we had originally thought we might come back. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Every member of Parliament from every corner of this land is asked to participate in this historic act.

The words "historic act" can only mean the debate of this resolution in Parliament. Fewer than 12 per cent of the members of Parliament have spoken so far. In fact, as I stand here speaking, I am the thirty-first member to have taken part in this debate. In the past, over 60 members of Parliament have participated in various debates, so I would anticipate that, at the rate we have been proceeding, this debate will carry on for a minimum of two or three weeks longer if everyone in the House speaks.

What has struck me as being fundamental to the debate up to this stage is the amount of agreement which all Canadians, including all members of Parliament, have reached. There is a great deal of agreement, there is consensus, I dare say. I took the opportunity of looking up the word "consensus" in the dictionary on the Table, the shorter version of the Oxford dictionary. It states that consensus in the sense of government and governing does not require unanimity; consensus is the majority view.

I think you will find that of the provincial governments, the government here in Ottawa and the two chambers representing Parliament, of those 12 institutions, the majority concur. In fact, I would say that there is more than consensus, that there is unanimity on the patriation of the constitution. Of course, this resolution deals with patriation. Second, there is consensus that there should be patriation with an amending formula. I think there is consensus, or a majority view, that there should be an amending formula. The amending formula would not be the one which is proposed only by the Liberal government in the House of Commons, which is the Victoria formula. The majority view which has been expressed by the provinces is that it should be either the Vancouver or the Alberta-Vancouver formula.

Should we be so partisan as to insist on our right to penmanship, or are either of those points of view or formulas workable? I really think that they are. I think that either one is workable, although I happen to believe that one is preferable to the other. The reason I believe that the Vancouver or the Alberta-Vancouver consensus is preferable is, frankly, that although I represent a constituency in Ontario which is the largest province in Canada in population, and although my constituency borders on the second largest province in Canada in population, that is Quebec, the two central provinces, I do not think that either of the two provinces should, for all time, have a veto. Two hundred years from now the bulk of the population of Canada might be in Alberta or in British Columbia. How much of the population of the United States was in California, Oregon and Washington 200 years ago? This is something we must consider. When we resume debate on this matter tomorrow, I hope to go into some specifics and more detail.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

COMPUTERS—USE BY GOVERNMENT OF DATABANKS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on May 9 of this year I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) about an incident where an attempt was made by students of a New York private school, the Dalton school, to enter 21 Canadian computer databanks. As we all know, this work was in fact the work of Grade VIII students. While the damage done was not as extensive as originally thought, although considerable damage was done in some of the databanks they were able to enter, the students were able to enter at least two databanks. If clever grade school students could break into computer databanks with ease, what would computer professionals be capable of doing?

To make matters worse, at least two databanks approached by these students were federal government databanks. Luckily the students were unable to gain access to the computers and no information was destroyed. In response to my question the President of the Treasury Board indicated that no government databanks with sensitive information have dial-in access. However, sensitivity of information is in the eye of the beholder. I asked the minister for a list and a description of those databanks with dial-in access so that the people of Canada could be sure the information contained in government databanks is not sensitive.

I received that list and it indicates that among the databanks included in Datapac is the computer of the Department of Veterans Affairs. It concerns me that this computer is included in Datapac, a system with dial-in access, particularly if it contains private information about veterans such as medical information supplied for disability claims. I ask the parliamentary secretary or the minister to provide me with information about this databank and to take steps to protect the information contained in it, if it contains any sensitive data.

In the same context, in the Infoswitch system the Department of Employment and Immigration has a computer databank which is the field operational support system for immigration. I should like to know—and I think the House is entitled to know—the substance of that databank. Does it include information which properly should be held as personal and confidential? Are there threats to the personal privacy of individuals on the basis of information being held in that databank?

If the government feels it is necessary to keep certain databanks connected to Infoswitch or Datapac, it should take greater care for the security of its information. Encryption devices currently available at reasonable prices would protect information contained in databanks. I have been told that the government does not use these devices. I think their use would go a long way toward stopping computer vandals and more sophisticated computer thieves. I should like to ask if the minister has any plans to introduce such devices.

Also the government should help in developing standards for the private enterprise to protect its computer information. The Dalton school incident earlier this year showed that private computers were more vulnerable than government ones. Although regulation may not be necessary, at least the government could help to provide voluntary standards to assist private industry to cope with this problem.

Equally disturbing as the lack of technical protection against computer theft is the lack of legal protection. Activities similar to those of the Dalton school students are being reported with increasing frequency. Just recently, however, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled, in a similar case involving a student at the University of Alberta, that the unauthorized use of computers is not illegal. Indeed its logic was airtight. In matters of theft from telecommunications equipment, it is impossible to convict someone unless the equipment used is defined as a communications device; clearly computers are not.

I should stress that it is not the courts that I criticize. They were asked to interpret legislation which was obsolete and inadequate. I address my comments to the government, for Canada truly needs new legislation on this matter. Many hon. members will be aware that just last month the Canadian Bar Association sent a telegram to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) imploring him to take immediate steps to fill in the gap created by the Supreme Court decision. According to the association, the telegram, which was co-signed by the Canadian Information Processing Society and the Canadian Law Information Council had this to say:

> The difficulty of imposing penalties on those who make unauthorized use of computer facilities puts at risk the security of commercial and government operations.

If the Criminal Code redefined communications facilities to include computers, the penalties would have a definite sting. Currently, the code provides for up to ten years imprisonment for thefts above $200 if the Crown proceeds by way of indictment and up to two years if the theft is below $200. That is one option which the government could follow.

But failing support for this option, perhaps the provinces could be persuaded to amend their property and civil rights laws to include computer theft as a trespassing violation. When I posed this question to the minister, he indicated that the government was prepared to take action and that it was prepared, if necessary, to introduce legislation. Too much time has passed already. Canadians are entitled to know what action the government is prepared to take, and they have a right to see this bill put before Parliament without further delay.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) for raising this issue, and more specifically for the manner in which he raised it, because it is of such interest that it departs greatly from the party lines which generally dictate our debates in the House. He has raised the much more important issue of protecting our databanks as well as the services which Treasury Board must provide to store the information which the various departments need to carry out their duties under the constitution and their respective acts of Parliament.

The Treasury Board is responsible for the administrative policies affecting databanks, including the protection of computers. During the special audit of the computer operations he carried out in 1977, the Auditor General noticed that the government was more concerned about the protection of its systems than the private sector. The recommendations he made following this audit have been applied to his satisfaction. The hon. member, who was himself minister of state for the Treasury Board a few months ago, is fully aware of the extent to which the board wants to apply the Auditor General's recommendations when they concern security in the public sector.

The RCMP is presently establishing standards covering several security aspects in electronic data processing. In March 1980, only a few months ago, Treasury Board approved the first of these standards which dealt with management and staff. This standard advises against processing sensitive data or furnishing essential services using computers which have other unknown users, as in the case of computers linked to so-called open networks where access is not controlled and where anyone can link up directly through switched lines. It is up to each deputy minister to implement the required safety measures and to ensure the security of data banks. He is the one responsible for deciding the importance of the information and the degree of protection needed in each case by determining among other things what resources will be used to ensure the protection of information, in view of existing risks and possible threats. Furthermore, it is the duty of all departments to make an assessment of the threat or the risk to security coming from the maintenance of data banks.

The security inspection and assessment group of the RCMP is instructed to give advice, to inspect data processing facilities on the request of the departments and to formulate recommendations to deputy ministers. The latter are then asked to report to the RCMP on the implementation of the recommendations. In turn, the RCMP has to report to Treasury Board on the general conditions of security within government. The security standards on data processing which were developed by the RCMP for Treasury Board are based on the experience of the facilities inspection group which goes back many years, and they represent efficient and sophisticated measurements which allow the government to take advantage of the data processing technology while meeting our concerns in the area of security.

Datapac and Infoswitch are telecommunication services which are offered respectively by Bell Canada and CN-CP Telecommunications. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe referred earlier to both systems when he mentioned the offences made by the students in New York. Those two networks are intended specially for computer systems. Subscribers can send messages from computer terminals through transmission lines to terminals belonging to other subscribers. That is known as an open user group. There is also what is known as a closed group where a set group of users only has access to the network in order to preserve its private character. Because several users share the cost of those installations, those services save from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of transmissions costs. It is therefore obviously financially advantageous to subscribe to those commercial services.

The system known as the closed group—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Joyal: Mr. Speaker, I shall send the hon. member additional notes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not allowed during this debate.

FOREST FIRES—PLANS TO ALLEVIATE HARDSHIP SUFFERED BY VICTIMS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on a question I raised on May 27 regarding the drought in the prairie provinces and regarding assistance that, I hoped would come from the federal government to producers of cattle and grain in western Canada at a time when it was very badly needed.

Part of my question concerned a press release—or a cabinet document or a memorandum—from Regina which said there was not much the government could do to assist producers in western Canada "but that it was of critical importance that we be perceived to be doing something; that we should arrange and stage a public relations effort" which would be perceived by people in that area as action by the government.

That is exactly what this program is, Mr. Speaker. It has been changed many times. Cattlemen and farmers in western Canada are trying to cut through the red tape but unfortunately they are not able to.

Here are some of the changes that have been made. First of all, they were told that eligibility for assistance meant that a producer must have 75 per cent of his crop insurance or guarantee of production to be eligible and he would receive $70 per cow or bull up to $140 per dairy cow and $16 per ewe, of the basic herd. He was told he would receive one payment in 1980 and another in 1981.

When the announcement was made, it included the province of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and some parts of the province of Alberta. That was changed in midstream. To be eligible, cattle producers are required to be in a designated crop area—in an area where the crop harvested is less than 80 per cent of the average yield and where less than 60 per cent of the rainfall was between November 1, 1979, and May 31, 1980. There has been a great deal of change. When you only receive $35 per cow and you expected to receive $70 it does something to the economy and the supply of cattle feed, which is basically hay in our part of the country. In Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba the price of hay increased $60 per ton after the original announcement that producers would receive $70 per animal in the basic herd. Then that amount was cut to $35 per animal. Also, instead of two payments there will be one and there may be a payment later. There is no commitment to that payment, just a statement that there may be one.

Some producers will receive payment without a check being made of their eligibility and others will not receive the payment until after their eligibility has been checked. This seems to be unfair and discriminatory and omits a lot of producers.

● (2215)

When the precipitation factor was introduced the fact that one part of Sasktachewan and the southern part of Alberta is short grass country was overlooked. Short grass country comprises most of the cattle area in Alberta. If the people who introduced the program have never heard of a winter drought they should start talking to the people who have been in that part of the country for a number of years. Unless the moisture is there in the winter and unless it is there the previous fall, the short grass will not grow. You can get all the rain you want, as that part of the country did early in the year, and it still will not produce the carrying capacity which is needed in the short grass country of southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta.

Let us take a look at some of the other people who are neglected. For instance, what about the feed lot operators? What about the people who are feeding out the yearlings? That is not considered part of their basic herd, but their costs for hay have gone up again, $60 to $70 a tonne because of the announcement of this program in its original form and then its withdrawal halfway through.

On September 19, I issued a press release asking that the deadline for applications be extended. I did this because I and my colleagues had received numerous complaints. Producers could not get through to the Zenith number. They were not able to get application forms to apply for assistance and they were afraid they would miss what little assistance was there. Two days later, on September 22, the government announced the deadline for submitting applications had been extended. But many areas are still ineligible. When you look at the border of Saskatchewan and Alberta, you will see that that area too should be considered for assistance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have to advise him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) for his interest in Canadian agriculture as he is a member of the agriculture committee. I should like to correct some remarks he just made about the question he had put to the House on May 27, 1980 and which appears on page 1436 of Hansard.

On August 27, 1980, in Regina, Agriculture Canada announced that an amount of $13.4 million would be given for the cattle and feed program. This program followed a press release published by the Minister of Agriculture concerning the drought aid program. This program complemented the $41 million federal commitment to the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program announced last month by the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and which aimed at ensuring that basic breeding herds would not be sold off because of feed shortages.

Of course, the regional offices in Winnipeg and Regina were administering this program for the cattle producers of northwestern Ontario. A sharing agreement was developed for the Herd Maintenance Program in northwestern Ontario.

The assistance provided through the Herd Maintenance Program consisted of a $70 payment and on this point I wish to correct the hon. member who told us earlier that it was $140. It is $70 for the dairy cow or the steer, $35 for the steer or the cow and $8 for ewes or rams up to 300 steer and dairy cows and up to 1,200 sheep.

On September 19, 1980, the province of Alberta announced the Feed Transportation Assistance Program.

The areas of Alberta considered for this program are the eastern parts of the province, the Peace River, Smith and Hondo sectors. This program was launched on July 1, 1980, and will last until March 1, 1981. On September 15 the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan announced the continuation of their relief program for fodder and cattle.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by saying that advertising leaflets prepared by Agriculture Canada about the programs to be implemented during the periods of shortages in animal fodder are still available in all Agriculture Canada offices and I hope that the help provided by the Department of Agriculture to western farmers will compensate the deficits they are experiencing this year.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—CALL FOR INVESTIGATION INTO REASONS FOR B.C. TELEPHONE RATE INCREASE

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my statement tonight related to a question I asked on May 6 of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). I asked whether he would inquire into some of the reasons behind the proposed increase in the B.C. Tel rates which are currently before the CRTC and, if he found that the capital investment program which was associated with those rates was not in the best interests of the consumers, would he intervene in the rate hearings.

I will give some of the background behind my question. B.C. Tel is proposing to spend approximately $2.5 billion in a capital expansion program. They are asking the consumers to foot the bill. What it will do is provide them with an automatic switching system. That is the guts of it.

What the minister has to do in this inquiry, on which we have no information at the present time, is to look into what the subscriber is getting for this $2.5 billion investment. They are getting an automated system which, it is acknowledged, will provide no better service to the consumer. In fact, it can be demonstrated that there will be a reduction in certain kinds of services they now enjoy.

There will 850 lay-offs throughout small communities in British Columbia. This will cause tremendous economic dislocation. It means the withdrawal of approximately $17 million a year payroll from communities which have no other economic alternatives. What is curious is in order to arrive at this economic dislocation, loss of payroll and disruption of their economy, people are being asked to make substantial increases in the amount they already pay B.C. Tel.

Something else they are obtaining for their $2.5 billion contribution is the continuation of a very poor quality of service. Many people in the province of British Columbia feel that the B.C. Tel system provides a service that is of poorer quality than the telephone system in Bangladesh. The CRTC was sufficiently concerned about it to hold quality-of-service hearings in British Columbia. The public was not allowed access. The commission failed to produce the report in time to allow interveners in the present hearing to use that information to argue intelligently against the rate increase currently proposed.

According to the evidence at hand, an extremely poor labour relations package will result. Company-labour management policies will result in a tremendous disruption of service. I would not be surprised if at the bottom of it was B.C. Tel's strategy to demonstrate to the CRTC through a rather intricate means that they require more money.

What does B.C. Tel get out of it? They jack up their rate of return from a current 12 per cent to 14 per cent. They get a Cadillac in terms of an automated system without the appendages of employees they now have. They continue a rather healthy profit picture, which was seemed to be in excess in 1976 when they had to return money to the consumers. This investigation is necessary. I firmly believe that the result, if it was done with diligence, would show that B.C. Tel, which is owned by a foreign-owned multinational corporation, is contemplating a capital investment program that is in the interests of the company's investment program, not in the interests of the consumers of British Columbia. In the final analysis, the question the people have to ask is whether the system is needed. The vice-president of General Telephone and Electronics, which owns the controlling interest in B.C. Tel and all the subsidiaries relating to it, basically stated this. Vice-president of finance William Harrison, in a publication put out as an in-house publication of General Telephone and Electronics, stated that basically the electro-mechanical switching which was already in place and paid for by previous rate increases by the subscribers in British Columbia was going to provide satisfactory service into the foreseeable future. Now they want to take that equipment we have paid for, and from which we are obtaining service, and which they feel will be satisfactory, and throw it out and buy a bunch of automated equipment from their subsidiaries and charge us the bill for it. Frankly, I do not think that is an acceptable procedure.

I suspect that if the minister's response follows true to form we will have one of three answers tonight to this particular dilemma—the one they call the oil company response, that is, "we are still looking at it"; or the credit card rip-off response, which is that the company is right, or what I call the automobile secret warranty scam, in which case "it is not my fault or my responsibility." I would certainly be encouraged if they had taken some positive action on behalf of consumers in the province of British Columbia and looked seriously at this problem and intervened by putting some serious questions before the CRTC. Thank you.

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Thank you Mr. Speaker. I want to congratulate the hon. member for his question and his concern for consumers and workers in his riding. Coming from a province where there is a strike against the New Brunswick Telephone Company, which is in its one hundredth day, I can sympathize with some of the points raised by the hon. member.

As the hon. member knows, the CRTC regulates in the public interest all federally chartered telephone companies. In the case of a request for a general increase in rates the CRTC usually holds a public hearing to offer the public an opportunity to intervene and test the telephone company's case for an increase in rates. The date for filing an intervention before the CRTC with respect to B.C. Tel's current application was April 21, 1980. The CRTC is responsible to Parliament through the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) and I would direct the member to him for further questions on procedures.

The director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act, who is a senior official of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, has a statutory right vested in him through the act to intervene before federal regulatory boards and make representations in respect of the maintenance of competition. For some time the director has been expressing concern about the effects which vertical integration between telephone companies and their suppliers may be having on competition in the telecommunications equipment markets.

The relationship between B.C. Tel and its suppliers is well known to the director who was involved recently as an intervener before the CRTC when that body heard and approved an application which strengthened the formal corporate ties between B.C. Tel and its supplier firms. The director and others, including the Consumers Association of Canada, opposed the B.C. Tel application at that time, and it should be noted that the issue is now under appeal before the Federal Court.

I should also note that the director is pursuing this issue of verticle integration before another forum, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commissin, which is looking very broadly at the question to determine whether or not the public interest is best served by such close corporate ties between telephone companies and their suppliers.

While vertical integration is an important issue that this department is working steadily to resolve before the CRTC, the RTPC and in the courts, it is not considered that this issue is appropriate to the confines of a general rate hearing, such as the present B.C. Tel application. The director did consider the possibility of an intervention and concluded that one would not be warranted at this time.

In arriving at this conclusion the director was guided by past experience during interventions before the CRTC, wherein it has become clear that the commission does not consider it appropriate to go beyond an examination of the specific rates under review and related cost information. I should note, however, that the director has in the past urged the CRTC to instruct federally-regulated telephone companies to establish competitive procurement practices which would, if instituted, provide the regulator with a better yardstick to measure the reasonableness of equipment costs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

PENSIONS

INDEXING PROVISIONS FOR SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter as urgent and as pressing as today's figures on the cost of living. Given that eat-in food prices went up 1.9 per cent last month for a year-to-year growth factor of 14.2 per cent, while eat-out and take-out food prices went up .6 per cent for a year-to-year total of 8.6 per cent, and because many senior citizens are so poor that they cannot eat out, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the government give consideration to eliminating the eat-out portion for indexing purposes for old age pensioners, or, secondly, tying pensions to the poverty level.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

RELIEF FOR NORTHERN RESIDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, having regard to the very real hardships and disadvantages suffered by residents living in northern and isolated parts of our country resulting from excessive living costs, under Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the government, in the final stages of preparing a budget, give recognition to the most fundamental principle of taxation by which the rate of tax is measured to a taxpayer's ability to pay, and to the principle of equity and fairness, which was announced by the Prime Minister in his last Speech from the Throne, by granting tax relief on all benefits and allowances paid to northerners as compensation for the financial hardships and disadvantages associated with living in the north; and further that serious consideration be given to the example of other countries with similar geographic realities and uncongenial conditions whereby cost-of-living differentials are compensated for with a lower rate of personal income tax.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN PHASING-IN PERIOD FOR VETERANS' WIDOWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I believe it has now been clarified that it is in order, even in the same session in which a bill has been passed and has become law, for a bill to be introduced amending a provision of the earlier legislation, as was done on Tuesday when a private member brought in a bill to amend the National Anthem Act. Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), I move:

That this House regrets that under legislation enacted earlier in this session respecting the widows of disabled veterans there is a six-and-a-half-year phasing-in period, which means that many thousands of widows will still have to wait from one up to six years before they receive the pensions to which by law they are now entitled, and this House therefore calls on the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce forthwith a bill to amend what was this session's Bill C-40, now Chapter 19 of the Statutes of 1980, to reduce substantially or to eliminate completely that six-and-a-half-year phasing-in period, so that veterans' widows will receive the pensions granted to them by this Parliament while they are still alive.

NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the seriousness of Canada's oil supply is acute and remains one of the most critical issues facing Canada today, and whereas last evening the Liberal members of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works displayed appalling lack of concern when they deliberately walked out of a meeting during a crucial presentation to that committee by the Alsands consortium, under the obvious direction of the parliamentary secretary to the minister of energy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to appear before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works prior to the budget presentation so that all members of Parliament can have meaningful input before the budget is brought before this House.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH CARE

CALL FOR FUNDING TO IMPROVE SYSTEM IN ONTARIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that in Ontario, due to cuts in hospital budgets by the minister of health, there has been a marked deterioration in the quality of health care delivery to the extent that some patients requiring intensive care must wait up to 20 days to be admitted to an intensive care unit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That this House urge the minister of health for Ontario to give human life a higher priority than money and budgets and supply the necessary funds to restore a high quality health care system in Ontario.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CALL FOR DIVISION OF MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last week in Ottawa there was an important two-day conference on technological development, or the lack of it, in Canada which was well attended by almost 200 of Canada's top research people and companies. Inasmuch as the future job opportunities for young Canadians and the living standard of all Canadians are totally dependent on our industries becoming competitive with those in other countries, particularly the United States, inasmuch as research spending in Canada has been allowed to degenerate to a level as low as that of countries like Ireland and Iceland, and inasmuch as this aspect of economic development needs the vital, undivided and determined efforts of the minister, who because of his third job, that of court messenger, did not attend the important conference last week to hear the views and concerns of the delegates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of State for Science and Technology be divested of his other part-time jobs of environment and constitutional errand boy so that he can devote his full time and best efforts to the most vitally needed and yet completely neglected ministry of this government which, in this important economic aspect, over the past 12 years has proven to be totally inept.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

STEPS TO ATTRACT DENTISTS TO ISOLATED NORTHERN COMMUNITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that many communities in the Northwest Territories rely totally on visiting dentists who come to these communities only two or three times yearly, creating a problem for the dental health of children in particular, and in view of the fact that the Department of National Health and Welfare has been aware of this problem for a long, long time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare be instructed by this House to take concrete steps to attract dentists to isolated northern communities, and that in the meantime, the number of visits per year to these communities be increased.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF PROTECTION OF INDEXATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, who will know that today's CPI figures indicate another increase in the cost of living, and also continue to project double-digit inflation for Canada, even before we know the impact of the energy price increase the government intends. Will the minister now give Parliament and the people of Canada the assurance that all Canadians will continue to have the protection of indexing of their personal income taxes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, this question has been raised in the House on a number of occasions. I repeat the answer given on previous occasions, namely, that this is one of the options I have been considering, as the former minister of finance stated he himself had considered prior to his budget. The result of my consideration will be indicated to the House when the budget comes.

Mr. Knowles: When is that?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what the minister is saying is that this government is continuing to threaten waitresses, single-parent families and low-income Canadians across the country with the removal of indexing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, protected by their parliamentary indemnity they think it is funny to levy this back door secret tax upon the poor. We on this side of the House do not. Even though his colleague, the Minister of Justice, declines to give information to the House of Commons, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance might be prepared now to tell us when Parliament will receive the budget that he has delayed for eight long months?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker. I told the hon. member for St. John's West that I would probably indicate the budget date this week, and I am pleased to do so by saying the budget will be delivered on October 28.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, may I congratulate the minister on the first decision he has made this parliamentary session.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I should also like to ask the minister whether the energy policy statement which has been promised by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be made before the budget, or is the government considering having the energy policy and the budget policy announced simultaneously?

Mr. MacEachen: Speaking for myself, Madam Speaker, the budget obviously will contain matters which are related to energy policy, and it seems to me that we will make an effort to bring these together in a way that the required budget preparation will not be jeopardized.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ENERGY POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Just to be clear on this, Madam Speaker, perhaps I should direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who promised an energy statement to the House of Commons. Does the minister intend to make that statement before budget day or, if not, does he intend to make it on budget day?

● (1120)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to give the Leader of the Opposition the assurance that this government will not do what the previous government did and come out with a budget without having an energy policy. They will come out simultaneously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): God help the country!

PENSIONS

INADEQUACY OF OLD AGE SUPPLEMENT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister explain why government members turned down my motion under Standing Order 43 to give consideration to helping older people in this country cope with the incredibly high cost of food when, as it is obvious from figures released today, their $35 old age supplement is already eaten up?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether I should reply to a question which seems to me slightly out of order. The hon. member knows quite well that no government member said no. I am unable to identify who said no to such a motion and I wonder if the hon. member can do so. We are always particularly interested in the fate of the humble and the poor in Canada. We have always worked in that direction and we will continue to do so.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS FROM DOUBLE DIGIT INFLATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, in that case I shall reintroduce my motion on Monday and hope that hon. members on the government side and members on all sides of the House will agree to giving pensioners a break.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Surely in this instance the minister cannot deny his economic responsibility to the consumer in view of today's disturbing figures, and since the minister has so much clout in the cabinet—he certainly has enough portfolios—will he assure the House that he will protect the welfare of the consumer and through the October 28 budget stop the double digit inflation which is so devastating to those Canadians on fixed incomes?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that I do not shirk my responsibilities toward consumers. On the other hand, the hon. member should not think that macro-economic policies come under the jurisdiction of my department. If he has some questions to raise or representations to make, he should direct them to the Minister of Finance.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY WHETHER PROVISIONS WILL INCREASE LIVING COSTS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question again follows up on the news about the consumer price index today, and I would like to direct it to the Minister of Finance. There has been, as we all realize, a substantial increase in the annual inflation rate. We are looking now at a figure of 10.7 per cent. There has been a dramatic increase in the price of food, the rate of which is running at roughly 13 per cent, and a loss in purchasing power for most Canadian families, running at about $1,400 a year. This has continued over a three-year period.

I wonder if the Minister of Finance would mind confirming for this House that when his budget is presented on October 28 we will find a dramatic increase again in the cost of living for all Canadians, including dramatic increases in the price of energy and substantial tax increases? Would the minister be prepared to confirm that we will not find relief from this burden and that in fact inflation will probably be out of control as a result of this new budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not possible for me to indicate now what measures will be in the budget, but I should in a sense temper the statements made by the hon. member by saying that the inflation rate for 1980 will probably be in the order of 10 per cent. That is a figure I have used previously and I see no reason to change it today, even though 10 per cent is serious enough.

I also point out that in the December budget of last year the projected rate of inflation for 1980 and 1981 was 11 per cent, and I will try to avoid that higher figure in my budget presentation.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the optimism of the minister might be tempered a little since the future looks a little bleaker than it did even last December. One welcome aspect was the promise in the throne speech to protect Canadians who can least afford to suffer under what looks to be a dramatic increase in the inflation rate, and since the last budget I think very few people would acknowledge the claims just made by the minister.

Would the minister give us some assurance that he will move in the budget to place directly in the hands of those Canadians who can least afford the costs of inflation some relief mechanism, possibly a cost of living tax credit directly to low income and middle-income Canadians? Could he assure us that in fact the promise made in the throne speech will be in the budget?

● (1125)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that, in view of the inflationary pressures existing in the country, during the election campaign we promised to increase the guaranteed income supplement. That was one of the first actions we took when we returned to Ottawa and a new Parliament. That is very much in line with the commitment that still stands in the Speech from the Throne to help those in Canada who need help most.

Mr. Skelly: Those would have been tremendous contributions to Canadian society if we had not seen such manoeuvres on the government's part to cancel their effect with high interest rates and other negative policies. The one thing which concerns most Canadians, I think, is the fact that the price increase in food and other areas will continue unabated. Has the minister undertaken any moves for his government to consult with industry to try to control some of the price increases, and I am thinking particularly of food? Is there ongoing consultation, through the minister's department or another one, to try to handle, or perhaps to hold or contain, prices and possibly to roll them back in some areas?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that, since earlier in the year when we delivered the Speech from the Throne and promised assistance, interest rates have indeed decreased and that these gains were not nullified, as he has indicated in his question. I would also point out to the hon. member that he should look in some detail at the sources of the increases in the cost of living index which come from increasing beef, pork and poultry prices, which have accounted for most of the gain in food prices in September. I believe that once he is aware of that fact he will understand that speaking to the industrialists of the country is no solution to price increases of agricultural products.

ENERGY

ESTIMATE OF OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION ACTIVITY IN 1981

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it arises from the increasing evidence that, in spite of the propaganda in the minister's advertising campaign, all is not well in terms of Canada's energy future and that there will be a very significant decrease in oil and gas exploration activity in Canada next year. As one measure, the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors estimates, and I quote, that "as much as 25 per cent of exploration activity now being conducted in western Canada may swing next year into the United States".

My question to the minister is: does he accept that estimate of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors and, if not, what is his estimate of the exploration activity in Canada next year? Will it be higher, lower, and by how much?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already told the House that exploration activities this year in western Canada are far better than they were last year. These facts are self-explanatory.

As far as future speculations are concerned, I would rather leave that to my hon. colleague and other people who are professional speculators. I think that when our energy policy is released all Canadians, including westerners, will realize that it is very wise, very dynamic, very good for Canada as a whole and for western Canada in particular. As well the industry will see that it will be to its advantage to stay and pursue its work in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, if the minister had been briefed by his officials and had even rudimentary knowledge of the industry, he would recognize that drilling this year was based on planning last year. We are concerned about drilling next year which is being planned and budgeted for now. If the minister is not concerned about Canada's energy future, who is? To whom should we turn in this government who is concerned? Does the minister recognize that this movement of people, money and equipment to the United States is a one-way trip and we will not get this equipment back? He said on Tuesday that he expects Canada to be self-sufficient by the end of the decade. Is this rupture of people, money and equipment part of his plan to make this country self-sufficient? If it is, could he please explain how this is helping Canada to be self-sufficient, and helping to protect Canadians from the vagaries of insecure international supplies?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague is losing his proverbial self-control simply on the basis of sheer speculations. This government's policy is based on reality and facts. The facts are there to demonstrate that there was much more exploration this year than the previous year, and that before making final decisions the industry will clearly want to know the energy policy of the government which will be made public within two weeks. The industry will come to the decision it considers appropriate at that time. Meanwhile, I think that my hon. colleague would have everything to gain by setting aside his bitterness for another moment. I think that at the present time he is simply speculating.

NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister reconsider his absolute refusal to appear before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works prior to announcing or publishing the energy policy of the government and prior to the budget, so that members of the House of Commons can discharge their duties and represent the people to the minister? To paraphrase the minister's own word, I think he will find that we are not unreasonable; we just want to sit down and express some of our concerns to which he is obviously not listening.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, without hesitation I should like to indicate to my hon. colleague that I have listened most attentively to the views expressed by hon. members. Several debates have already been held in the House over the past few months on the energy issue. One was held as recently as last Tuesday in which I participated and during which I heard the various representations of hon. members. I should like also to indicate to my hon. colleague that if any hon. member of the opposition has particular views to express on this matter, I would be delighted to meet with them. I can say that I have discussed this matter abundantly in the past with the government caucus and that I will have many opportunities to discuss it again with them until the budget comes down. If other hon. members have views they would like to convey to me, I should be happy to receive them too. As to a formal appearance before the committee, I have already agreed to appear, I think, on November 4, that is, as soon as I possibly can after the government's energy policy is released, to explain this policy and answer any question hon. members may care to ask on a precise and definite program. In the meantime, however, I think the best approach during the coming week is to make myself available to all hon. members who may want to advise me of their views on this matter.

[English]

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, we are looking for a skating expert to come to Fort McMurray to teach skating lessons, and I think we have just heard from one.

An hon. Member: Fancy skating.

Mr. Shields: My supplementary question is directed to the minister. The minister indicated that he is prepared to meet with hon. members at this time, and to sit down and hear their views. Will the minister meet with the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works before the budget comes down and before the energy policy comes out? The members of this committee have been doing a great deal of work. We have toured all the tar sands facilities in northeastern Alberta. We have read volumes of material. Last night we listened to a presentation by the Alsands consortium.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am extremely happy the members of the committee have done a number of things I have done over the last several months.

Mr. Nielsen: The Liberals walked out.

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad we will have a very knowledgeable committee on national resources which will be examining our energy policy. I welcome this.

Mr. Clark: Why did the Liberals walk out?

Mr. Lalonde: We have had many debates in this House. Members of the House have had plenty of opportunity to make representations as to what the policies of the government should be. If my hon. friend wishes to make additional representations, I am at his disposal at any time.

As far as meeting with the committee as such is concerned, I indicated that I thought it was preferable to do so after the budget and after the release of our energy statement, when I will be in a position to answer all questions of hon. members in a very specific and detailed way. That will begin on November 4.

BANK OF CANADA

INQUIRY RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF PRIME RATE

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister explain to the House, if he knows, what goes on in the mind of the governor of the Bank of Canada as he sits down to set the prime rate? Given that yesterday he had an opportunity to allow the prime rate to go considerably below the level at which he set it, that that could have had a very beneficial effect on consumers all across the country, and that that would have affected the mortgage interest rates of people who are required to renew their mortgages today, tomorrow and next week, why would he hold it up artificially? Why would he go into the marketplace and buy in order to hold it up for an hour or two in the afternoon to establish a rate higher than necessary?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is aware that the bank rate is established as a result of a weekly auction of treasury bills.

Mr. Knowles: A manipulative auction.

Mr. MacEachen: Yesterday the bank rate declined, as it did the preceding Thursday. I have no knowledge of what trading took place with respect to these treasury bills, but I assure the hon. member, if he is concerned on that point, that the governor of the Bank of Canada does not have a policy of maintaining interest rates above what is possible as a result of market operations. The hon. member knows as well that in this particular year there has been a rather unprecedented roller-coaster in the interest rate field, particularly in the United States.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I confess the minister is right. There has been an unprecedented roller-coaster, particularly in the United States, and we have followed it.

If the minister does not know what went on yesterday with regard to the purchase and sale of treasury bills, he should be made aware of the facts and he should be concerned that the Bank of Canada moved in and involved itself in the marketplace in a way to hold the rate artificially high. Does the minister not feel it is time for him or someone in the government to assume the political responsibility for the actions of the governor of the Bank of Canada, to take a look at what he is doing and to decide whether he is suitable to carry on in that role in the future?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the government, and particularly myself, certainly are taking a look at what is going on. In the very uncertain circumstances with which we are presently faced it seems to me that the policy of the bank to adjust rates in accordance with market changes is a very sound one.

Mr. Deans: But they are manipulating the market.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is talking about activities of the Bank of Canada in the market. That is a matter of his knowledge, not of mine.

Because I think it is important, I would make a comment with respect to the hon. member's suggestion that we have persistently followed American trends. The fact is that at certain particular periods Canadian interest rates, particularly short-term ones, have been considerably below those existing in the United States. If he looks at the trend he will find that, while we are obviously subject to influences from the market in the United States, for obvious reasons we are not following and have not followed, and the market does not consistently follow, movements in the United States.

Mr. Deans: Definitely not.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

ABANDONMENT OF CERTAIN DAILY SUPPLEMENTARY SERVICE

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the Canadian Transport Commission approved the decision made by Canadian Pacific to abandon, on October 26, the commuter train service between Farnham, Sainte-Thérèse, Laval and Montreal, and if so, this decision should mean that the service will be incorporated in a metropolitan transport system operated by the Montreal Urban Community, such as the one the provincial government announced in 1979 for the Lakeshore service between Montreal, Vaudreuil and Rigaud, and such as was stipulated in the press release made by Canadian Pacific Rail?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Last May, the Canadian Transport Commission rendered a decision which made a distinction between regular passenger service and commuter service. In the second case, the CTC simply stated that it did not have jurisdiction, and therefore CP is free to abandon certain lines in urban areas if they are not profitable.

Furthermore, I have entered into negotiations with the Quebec transport minister with a view to assisting in the upgrading of Montreal's rail transport equipment. We have come to an agreement in principle in this area and this agreement should be finalized in the days ahead. However, there is one important thing to remember. Although the agreement will provide for a substantial federal contribution to this upgrading program, it will also state the responsibility of the province and of the municipality as far as operations and future changes are concerned. It will therefore be up to the province and the Montreal Urban Community to decide which urban lines are to be maintained.

MULTICULTURALISM

DISCONTINUANCE OF "TRADITIONS CANADA" DESK CALENDARS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. In a letter which I received from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the president, Dr. Goldbloom, writes:

> In 1980, money from the Government of Canada . . . made possible the sending of Traditions Canada (a desk calendar) without charge to a certain number of individuals and institutions, but such is no longer the case.

Could the minister inform the House how the government can reconcile the policy of spending vast sums of money on advertising their ideas of Canada in various publications, on the one hand, while on the other it takes away from the council funds for a publication which informs the general public of the rich diversity of Canada in many cultures and communities?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I would be pleased to look again at the situation the hon. member and former minister brings to my attention. I would remind him that the budget in multiculturalism, which he froze during his tenure, has recommenced and thus a number of important newspapers communicating with various of our communities where people are not easily fluent in English or French—in either of the two official languages—are now being assisted. Frankly, in a time of restraint it was felt there was a religious base to some degree to the very worth-while calendar put out, that it was a very expensive product which was not massively distributed because of its cost, and therefore it had some exclusivity to it. But I will certainly look at the question again to see if that is the best way to spend the money.

LOCATION OF SERVICE BUREAU

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): My supplementary is for the Minister of Supply and Services, Madam Speaker. On September 23 the minister announced the October opening of a number of federal service bureaux to help Canadians gain access to government information and services—shades of Information Canada. On October 1 my office contacted the minister's office for the location of the first service bureau, which is to be located in Edmonton, according to the minister's statement. No one knew of the location at that time and we were assured that as soon as a decision was made my office would be informed. Today is October 17 and I still have no news. Can the minister now tell the House where the first bureau is located, whether it is to be in my constituency, or exactly where in Edmonton it is to be located?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position today to advise the hon. gentleman where specifically the office will be located. I thought the hon. gentleman would be pleased at the fact that I chose his city as the first location for a service to the public office.

I would also like to disabuse the hon. member of the opinion he seems to hold that this is "shades of Information Canada". The service to the public offices are going to be reactive offices; they are going to be much more similar to the hon. gentleman's own constituency office than anything that had been dealt with by Information Canada.

Mr. Paproski: Duplication of services!

ENERGY

ENERGY POLICY—ACCEPTANCE BY WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Earlier in the question period we were treated to what most western Canadians believe is the attitude of the present government. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that Canadians would be happy with his energy policy and western Canadians would be happy with his energy policy. It is comments such as that which fuel the separation movement in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Hawkes: I am wondering if the minister would like to take the opportunity in question period to assure us that he and his government are not acting in every way possible to fuel that separation movement and to push western Canada out of Canada.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I regret if the translation may not have been quite accurate. I recall I answered the question in French, and what I said was that when the energy policy comes out I am sure it will be a policy well received by all Canadians, including western Canadians, who I believe are Canadians like everybody else. I do not know if the hon. member agrees with that but it is the view of this side of the House anyway.

As to the fuelling of separatist feeling or division, I have heard it talked about a lot in western Canada by a great many people lately but I would say those feelings have not been fuelled by this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, those of us on this side of the House who live in that region face that every day and it is that attitude and the kind of comments made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources here today which fuels that movement. I hope they will stop it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HIGH COMMISSIONER TO LONDON—INQUIRY WHETHER APPOINTMENT FOR FIVE-YEAR TERM

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Island): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister, who I know is well aware that the appointments of Canadian High Commissioner to London and Ambassador to France are traditionally for periods of five years. I know he is also aware that this practice of fulfilling the five-year period was respected by the previous government in the cases of the Hon. Gérard Pelletier and the Hon. Paul Martin.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he would confirm, contrary to continuing press speculation, that the present incumbent of the position of Canadian High Commissioner to London, the Hon. Jean Wadds, will be accorded this same treatment and the practice will extend to her in her appointment, which I am sure the Prime Minister knows is being carried out with extreme competence and high devotion to duty.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would certainly agree that the High Commissioner to London is a very distinguished High Commissioner and I have high regard for her. As for the practice referred to by the hon. lady, I have no knowledge of any such practice or of any set time for any appointments to ambassadorial posts anywhere.

Miss MacDonald: I would like to ask the Prime Minister then, looking at the history of appointments as Ambassador to France and High Commissioner to the United Kingdom, which if he will go back over those have been for five-year periods, whether that also holds with regard to the present incumbent in London.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I can remember some High Commissioners to London who stayed a period considerably shorter than the five years, but it seems to me that is irrelevant. What the hon. lady is saying is that in the last 12 years, during which our government named ambassadors to Paris and high commissioners to London, they were so good we decided to keep them five years, which may be the case in the present situation. But there is no such rule.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TRANSLATORS' DISPUTE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question concerns the worsening relations between the government and its employees and is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board.

In light of the fact that CUPTE, the translators union, the very people who are translating my words into the other official language at this time, have been forced into a strike position for next Monday, although they have already agreed with the report of the conciliation board, I wonder why it is the policy, and if not the policy certainly the practice of this government, to force its employees into strike action. This contract with the translators expired 18 months ago and the contract with the clerks expired over a year ago. Why is it the policy of the government to stall and delay and force our employees to suffer because it will not move in negotiations?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the policy of the government is to strike a fair and equitable settlement with its employees. No one is forcing the union in question to go on strike. I was very disappointed to learn yesterday that they did not show up for the mediation procedures. There had been substantial progress made. I hope they will return to mediation and that this problem will be eliminated.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, the problem has been not that they will not show up for meetings but that the government will not move in those meetings. My question relates to that very fact. The Minister of Employment and Immigration went to Copenhagen last July where he signed an agreement providing that we would remove discrimination against women. Yet the Public Service Commission has said that one of the basic reasons for women not moving up in the public service is the fact that they have family responsibilities. The government's nominee on the conciliation board expressed his strongest dissent for the principle of paid maternity leave, one of the very things that is keeping women out of the public service. Why should they meet with the mediators when the government refuse to give them something that is fair and just?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I think it would be helpful if the hon. member would follow the mediation proceedings and negotiations a little more carefully. We extended a very generous family leave package to the clerks and we have made the same offer to the translators. I am surprised that the hon. member would consider a provision where for 17 weeks employees receive 60 per cent of insured earnings, which is roughly $174 per week, is not generous. I think it is an important precedent and one that we should all be proud of. That has been offered to the translators and, as far as I know, it has been rejected. Their demands are much higher than that.

I want the House to bear in mind that when I say "fairness" we mean fairness to the Canadian taxpayer. This seems to escape the hon. gentleman. It is important that we be fair to both sides in this dispute, as we represent the public as well as our employees.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSULTATIONS WITH INDIAN GROUPS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who was here a minute ago but has left. Perhaps I could put the question to the Prime Minister. This week, at a meeting in Saskatchewan with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said that the Indians of Canada would be fully consulted on their constitutional proposals and that their rights would be protected in any new constitution.

Would the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister tell the House whether these consultations will take place before December 9, the date when the special committee must report, and whether the protections that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development referred to might be incorporated by amendment into the proposed constitution act of 1980, submitted to the House of Commons on October 6?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, subject to verification it is my understanding that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has his officials meeting with Indian groups this week and that he plans to meet with them in the very near future.

In so far as the undertaking that Indians and native people generally would be involved in amendments to the constitution which concern them, I gave that undertaking personally several months ago at a meeting of native chiefs here in Ottawa. I think in that regard it is clear that we have established that we are anxious to find ways in which they would see their rights better protected.

I have suggested and I repeat that as soon as we have the constitution back in Canada with the basic rights entrenched, we will be happy to go into a next phase where we would put native rights as one of the first items on the agenda and deal with it then. In the meantime, I am very happy to see our ministers and officials attempting to work out with Indians and with Inuit leaders ways in which that could be best stated in the constitution.

PENSIONS REVIEW BOARD

INQUIRY RESPECTING INCREASE IN STAFF

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. In a letter to the late minister last August, the War Amputations of Canada made the minister and his officials aware of the fact that between 1972 and 1980 some 370 of their members died during the time the service bureau of that organization was working on their claims for pensions. In view of this very alarming statistic, can the acting minister tell the House what steps the department is taking to bring the staff of the Pensions Review Board up to strength?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as everyone knows, I was appointed acting minister only a few days ago and I am quite aware of the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member. I will refer it to department officials to determine how I will be able to give him a better answer in a few days.

[English]

Mr. Mckenzie: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Can the minister also tell the House, in view of the number of cases pending, if the Bureau of Pensions Advocates now has a full staff of advocates?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, some positions remain to be filled on that bureau and with the co-operation of my officials I intend to see to it immediately that they are as soon as possible. I am as much aware as my hon. colleague is that if there is any backlog in the bureau's work some veterans will suffer and that is something I always try very hard to avoid.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED PRIVATIZATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the recent speech made by Dr. LeClair, corporate vice-president of CNR, wherein he suggested that the government might consider the possibility of partial privatization of CNR. May I ask the minister if this is being actively considered by the government and, if so, when the details might be made known?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed the vice-president of CN was reflecting the tremendous financial needs CN will have in the coming years, particularly for developments in western Canada, such as double tracking in many instances. CN has a problem and the solution Mr. LeClair recommended is one that the government is looking at presently. An announcement will be made, if needed, after discussion of this issue within the government itself.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question. If such a decision is being considered at the present time, would the minister contemplate bringing forward legislation? How might he propose to incorporate such a plan, or has he given it that much thought?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, there are many ways in which this could be done. My hon. friend, who is very much dedicated to the adjustment of the Crowsnest rate, would look upon that as one of the ways in which the financing of CNR development could take place.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING TRAIN CREWS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport and I have given him notice of it. As the minister is aware, there is a problem regarding CP Rail's operation of trains in the mountain region. I have been in constant contact with the Minister of Labour and the train crews involved.

I should like to ask the minister if he is in favour of recommending to the Minister of Labour some federal legislation that could help train crews and other workers under federal jurisdiction to be able to eat meals during their tour of duty? The major cause of this problem is that they are 11 hours on duty, and some of them have been dismissed because they went to eat. I want to ask the Minister of Labour if he is prepared to recommend changes to the Canada Labour Code to allow these people to eat meals.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed my hon. friend has made some recommendations and suggestions to my office about what might be done to solve the present labour management problem at Revelstoke. I welcome this but he will recognize that this is essentially a labour-management problem and I will pass the information on to the Minister of Labour who should be involved.

● (1200)

In the meantime, yesterday I sent telegrams to both parties inviting them to get together to solve this problem in the shortest possible period of time, because obviously the economy of the west, and of the country as a whole, is suffering from the labour-management problem which exists in the area.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, this clearly is a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the minister's department allowed the reduction of train crews, especially in the mountain division, where employees—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is very argumentative in his question. I would very much appreciate it if he would ask it simply and briefly.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Transport is this. In view of the fact that the minister allowed them to reduce crews and people have had their wages reduced by $175 a month by taking jobs as brakemen on west freight, which is causing a slow-down in the operation of trains, will the minister request that CP Rail implement the three-man crew on the east mountain division in order to speed up train traffic?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am surprised that a socialist would talk in this fashion. Obviously, the determination as to how many employees should be on trains, or how long they should spend on coffee breaks or meal breaks, is one for determination in the contract between labour and management. Consequently my department has no authority to get itself involved in these matters. This is a contract problem. In this instance, there is discussion, between management and employees which has to be resolved. The only thing I can do, which I have already done, is to press the parties to come to terms rapidly.

As I said yesterday, members of the CTC for the western division have attended, as have the grain co-ordination people from Winnipeg. A number of people have tried to resolve the issue but the parties have not yet been able to come to a conclusion. However, I hope this will happen in coming days.

MULTICULTURALISM

FUNDING FOR RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to that raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton North. It is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. If I understood the answer given to my colleague, the member from Edmonton North, with respect to funding for the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the minister indicated that funding was not forthcoming because this was a religiously-based organization. Quite apart from the fact that I take exception to the description of that organization, it is there to promote understanding between religious groups in our country.

Therefore, could the minister indicate whether or not there are guidelines or criteria with respect to funding under multiculturalism auspices, and whether or not people who have religious bases will be excluded from funding by the minister and his department?

An hon. Member: Discrimination.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I hear an hon. member opposite shout "discrimination", which I take to be just a silly side comment. I think that is unfair to me or to anyone who cares about the concept of multiculturalism, and I think members on all sides of the House do, at least to the best of my information.

I am trying to do my best to be straightforward about it. There are problems where there are various religions that also relate to some political base as well. Multiculturalism, as I understand it, is a policy agreed to by all sides of the House to encourage Canadians of whatever heritage to interrelate.

The work done by the organization of Christians and Jews is exemplary. We have a close working relationship with them, and I think that was continued by the previous government as well. I simply said there was a problem. I do not think the government should get into the position of starting to judge material sent out to be sure that those materials include every possible religious faith so as to be sure we are absolutely fair. We should give as a priority the encouragement of intercultural activity which is not based on material such as those particular calendars. It is my view at the moment, as I said in my previous answer, that they are very expensive, and therefore limited in the numbers that can be distributed.

We have a limited budget; it is now at about $10 million. We have a number of demands for a number of different reasons and there must be priorities. It is simply a matter of priorities which has led to this current decision. I have already said, however, that I will certainly look at the matter again.

FISHERIES

DAMAGES SUSTAINED BY COD FISHERMEN IN GASPÉ—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Has the minister been advised that 18 herring seine boats came within a mile of the coast at Cloridorme in the Gaspé Peninsula where they damaged almost 55 cod nets belonging to inshore fishermen and costing about $300 each?

As it is not the first time such an incident has occurred in that area, will the minister see to it that a complete inquiry is made into the situation, with a view to finding the captains of the boats involved in damaging the equipment of the Gaspé fishermen and getting them to pay damages?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, that incident was indeed brought up a few days ago. We have sent one of our representatives to look into the matter on the spot. There were damages, in some cases where the nets were not marked precisely as the rules demand to avoid that type of incident. But I can say to the hon. member that the damages involved will be reimbursed by the seine boat owners association. We feel it is possible to avoid those incidents. What is important is for everyone to be willing to respect the rules: they exist specifically to protect everyone.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Madam Speaker: On Thursday last the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) raised a question of privilege, the gist of which is set out in his proposed motion where he asked:

> That the matter of the financing of public advertising campaigns at taxpayers expense on behalf of a partisan policy or opinion, before such policy or opinion has been approved by the House of Commons, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In brief, the issue is whether the allegation that the government is using public funds to publicize its parliamentary position on the constitutional question constitutes a prima facie case of breach of privilege. While this is a very important matter, the Speaker is compelled to examine it in the context of parliamentary privilege, and particularly whether it constitutes, on its face, a breach of parliamentary privilege or contempt of Parliament.

Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the rights and immunities necessary for the House and members to do their parliamentary work, and includes the necessary power of the House to enforce these rights and immunities. This excludes any matter for which a solution may be found in the Standing Orders or practices of the House, or the statute law.

In brief, these privileges of members are: freedom of speech in the House, the right to attend their parliamentary work without being subject to subpoenas to be a witness in other arenas, without being called for jury duty, and without being subject to civil arrest. In addition, the House itself has the power to provide for its own constitution, its own procedure, to discipline its members and to punish for contempt.

It seems to me that what is at issue here is the propriety of the government in spending public funds to advertise its position in the current constitutional question. The hon. member for St. John's East, in his eloquent manner, has expressed a concern that the parliamentary rules and privileges are in tune with the times, particularly the privilege of freedom of speech.

He, along with other members, is aware that the old High Court of Parliament met in secret, that publication of its proceedings was forbidden, and that the only privilege accorded members was to ensure their safe arrival to, in effect, do the King's and his Council's bidding. When the House of Commons evolved separately somewhere in the mid-fourteenth century, while this freedom from arrest to attend the sittings was already established, members still had to work on the freedom to speak freely in debate which was asserted for the first time by Speaker Thomas More only in 1523. This privilege was subsequently firmly established by the Bill of Rights in 1688.

The original purpose then of this privilege was, as the hon. member for St. John's East rightly pointed out, to guarantee the conditions necessary for productive debate, and he, as well as others, is concerned that the actions of the government play havoc with this privilege or right. The lively debate which this question of privilege initiated deals to a great extent with the propriety of the government's actions, that is, whether or not it was proper for the government to advertise its position on a subject under debate in Parliament. To a limited extent, debate raised the issue of new techniques of public persuasion and its application to Parliament. The Chair will remain vigilant to new techniques in communication and generally to make certain that parliamentary privilege is upheld. The Chair is also confident that she will be prompted from time to time by members in this respect.

However, it is difficult to find a prima facie case of privilege in the allegations of government spending which do not impede the House or the members in their parliamentary work. The decision of my predecessor on December 10, 1975, referred to in the course of this debate, related to the use of government funds to pay the expenses of government members of the House of Commons while doing work at the government's request, and is thus somewhat removed from the allegations here.

The spending of public money cannot be the issue, but when a person or a government attempts to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, or acts in contempt of the House, such action would constitute a prima facie case. However, the interference must be such that the member or the House is truly hindered or intimidated.

The fact that certain members feel they are disadvantaged by not having the same funds to advertise as does the government, which could possibly be a point of debate, as a matter of impropriety or under any other heading, does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege unless such advertisements themselves constitute a contempt of the House, and to do so there would have to be some evidence that they represent a publication of false, perverted, partial or injurious reports of the proceedings of the House of Commons or misrepresentations of members. There is no evidence before me to suggest that. Rather, the advertising referred to by members seems to deal with the issue of the constitution rather than the proceedings of the House. Therefore, while the hon. member raised a very important question, which was ably debated by all hon. members, it was not a question involving the privileges of the House requiring the intervention of the Chair.

Indeed, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made the point during the debate that the subject ought to be debated. Of course, everyone agrees that the House ought to debate important questions, but other opportunities exist for debate on matters of this sort and the Chair is sure that members of Parliament will take full advantage of these opportunities.

[Translation]

MR. BROADBENT—PUBLICLY FINANCED POLLS

Madam Speaker: I would also like to give my ruling on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). Notwithstanding the fact that he is not in the House at the moment and that it is usually in the presence of the member concerned that such rulings are given, I believe that I should nevertheless give my ruling today.

On Friday, October 10, the hon. member for Oshawa also raised a question of privilege related to the one I have just referred to. He concentrated on the issue of publishing the results of government polls. He complained of the fact that the results of these polls were not available and asked that priority be given to this matter during the debates now under way and that it be referred to the committee. Once again, hon. members must not forget that the rules concerning parliamentary privileges are designed to allow them to do all that is needed to fulfil their parliamentary duties and for the operation of this House. The question raised by the hon. member is certainly a very important question of principle on which he and others expressed certain opinions. This subject should probably be debated. However, as moved the motion is a substantive motion which therefore requires prior notice. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has stated that the results of 129 polls out of 141 will be published while those of 12 offices will remain confidential for a certain time.

The hon. member for Oshawa expressed his disagreement about this decision of the minister, as he had the right to do. However, for the Chair to give priority to any matter, there must be evidence of some element of infringement upon the privilege of members or of some substantial offence to the House and the member concerned. Even though this question is very important, the Chair cannot find any evidence of such an element.

[English]

MR. HNATYSHYN—PUBLIC OPINION POLLS—ADVERTISEMENT SPONSORED BY GOLDFARB CONSULTANTS

Madam Speaker: Finally, yesterday the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) raised a question of privilege based on an advertisement which appeared in a recent edition of a newspaper in which it is alleged that the information to be made available by a private pollster who had been engaged by the government appears to be similar to the information alleged to have been refused to be provided to members by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). The hon. member also offers to provide the advertisement in question and the material sent by the Minister of Justice to all members.

Hon. members will appreciate that this alleged question of privilege may be described as an extension of our proceedings of October 9 and 10 last on which I just ruled. Again, I do not think it is unfair to suggest that we are not only dealing with a complaint about government activity, but in addition about the activity of the pollster in question.

With respect to the activities of the government, members will appreciate that unless there is an order of the House directing any such activities, the Chair must be guided by the narrow limits of parliamentary privilege. Certainly if the pollsters' publication contains any misrepresentation of members, or false, perverted or injurious reports of the proceedings of the House, such could amount to contempt. However, there is no evidence before the House of what that publication contains and, constrained as I am by the very narrow limits of parliamentary privilege, I am unable to find a prima facie case. The hon. member, of course, may raise this matter in other, more appropriate ways provided by our rules.

MR. CLARK—ADVERTISEMENT SPONSORED BY PUBLICATIONS CANADA

Madam Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) gave me notice yesterday of a question of privilege. I would remind the right hon. member that I have just ruled on three matters which are very closely related to what appears to be his question of privilege, as I understand it from the written notice sent to me. I must ask the right hon. member to concentrate on what he thinks constitutes a privilege and please not enter into the general debate on the three matters on which I have just ruled.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, you are quite right that your ruling now, of which I had no knowledge yesterday, does deal with one of the questions that I wanted to raise, having to do with the propriety of the Government of Canada using advertising which is designed to manipulate opinion of the public of Canada in the way it will affect debate in this House of Commons.

You have, Madam Speaker, as is appropriate, ruled narrowly on the ground of privilege. You have made it clear that it is not your position or your right in these circumstances to rule on the ground of propriety. Certainly in our judgment the question of propriety is very much open and we regard this action as an attempt to manipulate public opinion to be a most improper action.

I was interested in Your Honour's reference to the suggestion that this matter ought to be debated in the House of Commons, particularly in light of the new techniques that are now available and now being used by the government, first of all, to sample public opinions, learn public fears and then design advertising to exploit those public fears, which the Government of Canada is now doing.

I hope in light of that reference, your favourable reference to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the government might choose to make a reference to the appropriate standing committee of the House even in the absence of a finding of privilege, of this very important question which can very materially affect not only the deliberations of this House, but the ability of the people of Canada to have information from their government which they can count upon as being true information and not information designed to manipulate opinion.

There is another matter to which I wanted to turn attention yesterday. It has to do with the privileges of the Chair and the propriety of the Government of Canada acting on a question that is under consideration by the Chair. This matter, as you indicate, was raised first by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), last Thursday. On the weekend, the Government of Canada began a series of advertisements in a range of newspapers across the country, daily, weekly, and in the ethno-cultural press, designed to cause Canadians to take their opinions about constitutional matters from a document containing clearly false statements about the constitutional matter that is before the House of Commons.

The narrow ground has to do with the appropriateness of the Government of Canada acting in absolute flagrant disregard for the fact that the question is under consideration by the Chair, by initiating a new series of advertisements, as I say, after the question had been raised in the House of Commons and before a decision had been rendered. I have checked to see what precedents there are in the rules of the House of Commons, and I find there are very few because this has been done so rarely that there has not been an opportunity for precedent to accumulate. I simply think this is a matter that affects the respect that must be shown the Chair and your office by hon. members of the House, including those in the government, and I think that is a matter to which it would be well for you and your officers to turn some attention.

You may recall, Madam Speaker, if I may come to the question of the narrow ground of privilege on which you found, it was our attempt last year in government to introduce a new grievance procedure in the House of Commons to allow members of Parliament to raise issues that do not fall within the strict and narrow confines of privilege but which, nonetheless, affect the capacity of the House of Commons to deal in an open and effective way with matters which were legitimate grievances.

I think there is no question at all that this deliberate use by the Government of Canada of false advertising to manipulate public opinion on a question that is before the House of Commons constitutes a very major grievance.

We had tried to introduce reforms that would allow this matter to be dealt with under the rules. This present government, having shown not as much interest in parliamentary reform, has not introduced similar reforms, so we are without remedy. We were without remedy before you on that kind of question.

There is one aspect of your ruling which I would want to consider at greater length that intrigues me, and it has to do with your finding that a case of privilege might arise if there was, indeed, a false representation of the views of members of the House of Commons.

Members of the government, most of them, are members of the House of Commons. This document "The Canadian Constitution 1980" contains information which is false. It is consequently a false representation of the position being put forward by those members of the House of Commons who are members of the government.

As I indicated yesterday, and I will not take a great deal of time, the false information arose in a number of specific ways. The first is on page 1 of this document where it says, and I am reading from the English version:

An amending procedure will ensure that all changes to the constitution can be made in Canada.

That is false, Madam Speaker, and it falsely represents the position being put forward by members of the House of Commons who are members of the cabinet, the Government of Canada. What they are proposing is not a proposal that would have all changes made in Canada. They are proposing a procedure which would allow that those changes which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government personally want relating to a charter of rights will not be made in this Parliament or this country. Those changes will be made in the Parliament of Westminster and in the country of Great Britain. The statement being put out is a false representation of the views of those members of Parliament who are members of the government.

This document goes on to say:

If the proposed resolution is endorsed by Parliament, the Government of Canada will submit the joint address to the Queen—

That again is a false representation of the position held by the ministers who are members of the House of Commons. They do not propose to have an address to the Queen based upon the endorsation of the resolution. They propose, instead, as any careful reading of the motion before the House would indicate, to have the joint address founded upon a procedural vote, a vote to concur in a committee report. It will not be a vote on the substance of the resolution because, indeed, we do not have a formal resolution before us. It will not be a vote which deals with the substance of the resolution. It will be a vote which deals with a procedural question as to how Parliament deals with a committee report. Therefore, Madam Speaker, this information which is the subject of advertisement by the Government of Canada again falsely represents the position of members of Parliament who are members of the Government of Canada.

I would argue that there is also a false representation in the statement in the preface to the other document which says:

—Canada will remain . . . a federal system of government—

That, in my judgment, is very much open to question at the moment because section 42 allows the Government of Canada, in effect, to end the federal system by ignoring the provinces as partners in the Canadian federation.

I agree that that may well be a matter for debate in the House, but certainly once you give one level of government the power to ignore the other level of the government absolutely, which is the unfettered power sought by the Government of Canada in section 42, you no longer have a federal system. Therefore that statement, if not false, is at least highly misleading.

I consider it also to be misleading that this document makes no reference to section 42. Indeed, it does its best to hide in the shadows this section which the government interprets in a way different from the language of the resolution. Again, that is merely misleading.

The published statements I referred to are false. They falsely reflect the views of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), the government House leader, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), and other ministers of the Crown who are members of the House of Commons, because they do not describe with any accuracy at all the measure they have put before the House of Commons. Consequently they are false statements.

This is a matter which was not brought to your attention by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, by myself or others who took part in the earlier debate, because at that time we had not seen this document with those false statements. The argument we were making at that time had to do with television and, perhaps, some radio advertisements, and billboards, deliberately general in nature. This is much more specific and, as I point out to you, there are at least two instances where the views of members of the House of Commons are falsely reflected in a way I think constitutes a breach of the privileges of at least those members. If they are not prepared to raise this matter, then I, as Leader of the Opposition and an officer of the House of Commons, am prepared to act in their stead in drawing this to your attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I understand that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is maintaining his question of privilege on the basis that certain documents contain false representations, and this is a new ground on which to invoke privilege.

Mr. Clark: That is right.

Madam Speaker: I see that several members are getting up to speak on this subject. I will hear from two members on one side and two members on the other side, and then I will decide in what direction I might be going on this particular matter.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order in respect of what you have just said. I do not know whether it is possible for you to gauge the course of an argument in advance in that you might hear all the points from two members. You may very well, but I say with respect that perhaps you should address your mind to the arguments, and if there are questions which are unanswered they may be answered by hearing more from one side or the other.

Madam Speaker: That is exactly what I said. I will hear from two on one side and from two on the other side, and I will then decide what course I will follow. I suppose the hon. member assumed that after that I would cut off the debate. That decision has not yet been reached.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you.

Madam Speaker: I am just attempting to introduce a little bit of discipline in respect of these questions of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have researched the number of questions of privilege which have been raised in this House since I have been the Speaker. I do not know whether this relates to the fact that I have become the Speaker, I have not really been able to compare that number with other periods. It seems to me that questions of privilege are being raised in order to air grievances in many cases, or to try to bring in debates which are not those which are before the House and to interrupt the business of the House.

● (1230)

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has suggested that something might have to be done about allowing hon. members to air their grievances, and that the Standing Orders do not provide enough occasions on which to air the grievances of hon. members. That is not my business. If the House wishes to change its rules, it may change them, but I am here to apply the rules as I understand and interpret them. I am in the hands of the House, but the House has given me clear instructions through the Standing Orders, and I would not be fulfilling my responsibility if I did not apply those rules as fairly as I possibly can.

I will hear two hon. members on each side and then decide my course of action.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, with regard to the first point raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), he made the suggestion that the government refer to a committee the subject matter on which Your Honour has ruled today, or at least part of it, and I am willing to look at his suggestion if he would be willing to look at the possibility of his party's agreeing to use some of the ten allotted days which are available to the opposition parties from now until December 10. If he makes an effort to use some of those days to debate subjects he considers important, perhaps he would find those to be good opportunities to raise questions which could be debated. They could even be followed by votes, as he well knows, because he is entitled to a few votes on those allotted days. This would have the consequence of freeing the floor of this House for the discussion of the really urgent issues facing this nation.

I suppose Your Honour was right in outlining the fact that there is an obvious abuse of questions of privilege which prevents Parliament from dealing with the real business with which it has to deal under the circumstances.

[Translation]

With regard to what he maintains is a new question of privilege today, basing his argument essentially on the fact that he claims again that the government is guilty of misleading publicity, I have only this to say, Madam Speaker: he quoted two examples which are founded on his own personal interpretation of our constitutional measures. That is the interpretation the Leader of the Opposition gave of section 42 of the constitutional act of 1980, which is only part of the group of measures now before the House. The same goes for the other point he brought up.

I am quite willing to respect his opinion. He can see things as he wishes. I remember well his first speech in the House of Commons early last week when he spoke on the motion to refer the matter to committee. He showed his command of parliamentary procedure by objecting to the fact that the motion, which spoke of the quorum in committee, required the presence of 12 members as being sufficient for a quorum. He said he was shocked that the motion did not mention that at least two parties should be represented to have a quorum.

Since then, I am sure he must have sought the advice of his House leader, because never in a million years has a similar motion in parliamentary practice specified that two parties should be represented to constitute a quorum. In our parliamentary practice and my hon. parliamentary colleague who is a specialist in the matter, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), can vouch for that, the committee itself has always decided how it would proceed and stated that the quorum would consist of so many persons and require, in addition, that two parties be represented.

If he understands our constitutional measures as well as our Standing Orders or parliamentary procedure, I think that you are justified, Madam Speaker, in questioning the validity of his allegations about the truthfulness or falseness of the data we publish.

Madam Speaker, I say this with respect, because the hon. member is not always wrong, but in this case he is mistaken. He does not interpret the facts as we do. And it is exactly the matter being discussed in this first stage soon to be completed, I hope, which the committee will be called upon to discuss and with which the House will deal again when the committee submits its report.

I wonder why the Chair would rule there is a prima facie case of privilege affecting the freedom of speech of members of the House or their duties as elected representatives. Indeed, I wonder why the Chair would so rule, because there is clearly some discrepancy between the facts. As much as I respect the views of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) on some points. I feel that they in turn should respect mine. We do not agree on the facts and we are willing to debate the issue, Madam Speaker. Debatable questions and different views do not constitute a case of privilege. That is not what is provided under our Standing Orders to make it possible for such a highly respectable institution as Parliament to carry out its business in an orderly fashion.

In conclusion, as I do not want to waste the time of the House, I feel that the further argument put forward by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that the publicity is misleading does not hold water. His allegation is based on his interpretation of what we are now doing in the House. Moreover, we do not agree that this advertising campaign is directly related to the matter before the House. What is certain at least, Madam Speaker, it is not inconsistent with the motion moved by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) and which was unanimously adopted by the House. There is nothing in the advertising campaign which goes against the motion unanimously adopted by Parliament already.

Mr. Clark: That is not true!

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Before the right hon. member says it is not true, let me repeat what I said. What I said was that in the publicity I have seen so far—and I may have missed some of it, but I have learned nothing new from the Leader of the Opposition—there has been nothing contrary to the substance of the motion, which was approved unanimously by this House, of the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Clark: Read these, and you will see the differences.

Mr. Pinard: The Leader of the Opposition may disagree with me, but what is obvious is that I am in full disagreement with the interpretation of the facts of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. That shows that this is a matter of debate essentially and not a question of privilege.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to make a very brief intervention in support of my leader and the position he has so adequately and well articulated with respect to this question of privilege.

The government House leader has simply failed to address himself to the very specific points raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The Leader of the Opposition has pointed out that the publications put out by the Government of Canada are false, incorrect, and a misrepresentation of the position set forth, not by myself or by the Leader of the Opposition, but by the government represented by the cabinet in the House. I cannot understand why the government does not understand that simple proposition. It is simply wrong. Hon. members opposite should have the courage and forthrightness to stand and admit that these statements in this document are wrong.

Having said that, I think the points Your Honour alluded to in the course of your remarks in addressing yourself to the matters which have been raised thus far are very relevant, because we are now looking at actions which have been taken by the Government of Canada through a planned arrangement with respect to publicity and public advertising under the directorship of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming).

Hon. members opposite stand and say quite frankly that they are going into an extensive and expensive advertising campaign to try to put across the positions of the Government of Canada and to create better understanding. However, in the course of that pursuit there is the great possibility of actions being taken by members of the cabinet and by the government represented in this House which do in effect misrepresent, by the manipulation of public opinion, the position of each and every member which thereby affect my rights as a member of Parliament. They affect my privileges. What we are now facing is the prospect and the possibility—and I take it Your Honour will have an opportunity to read this material—of a total and absolute misrepresentation of my position. If the government is left unfettered in its ability to do that with the full resources it has at its command, including the public treasury, we will possibly be entering into an area of government by public advertising agency as opposed to government responsible to the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Government by Goldfarb.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I simply want to reiterate that I think the Leader of the Opposition has raised a valid question of privilege, with specific instances which relate to the ruling you made this very day. I think that the representatives of the government could stand up and admit that these statements, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out to them, are false and incorrect. I do not want to reiterate that, but should like to simply say, as a member of Parliament, that my rights will be affected by manipulation of public opinion polls by the government, and I think it is a valid base upon which you can find our privileges to have been adversely affected.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Ouellet: Tell him he is insulting the Canadian public.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief but it is important that I touch on a couple of points because the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in particular first said yesterday, and then again today, that I had apparently done something which was in defiance of the Chair or an insult to the Chair. I would not do that because of my respect for that institution, and because of my respect for you as the individual in the chair.

The implication of the charge made by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that somehow the government had defied the Chair because some ads were run in newspapers—and I want to talk about those ads in the proper context rather than in the misleading context such as that put forward by the Leader of the Opposition—was that we were preventing you, Madam Speaker, from having the opportunity of making an objective judgment and then delivering your decision today.

It seems to me that the implication of that is that the government cannot carry on its business, and indeed could not carry on the constitutional debate while you were considering an issue which related to material discussed in the constitutional debate. It would seem to me that that would be an absurdity if indeed the business of the government and its responsibilities to the Canadian public ceased when you were considering questions and had not decided them before the House of Commons. That would become a new method of keeping this Parliament from operating at all, although I must admit the opposition has been pretty effective in the last few days in keeping it from operating and moving ahead by bringing up these various issues.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Fleming: I tried to make it very clear that I saw phase one of the constitutional advertising, as discussed during the question of privilege brought up last week, as indeed being something different from what had happened in the past. It was creating an awareness. I admitted that, and I tried to give a parameter for the circumstances in which I thought that was appropriate, and that led to considerable debate. But the ads which the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition mentioned yesterday and now discusses, are fundamental, and are part of an ongoing practice under which, I believe, his government operated, in philosophy at least.

Mr. Clark: That is not true.

Mr. Fleming: He says it is not true. He will have his opportunity to speak. I must say, Madam Speaker, I found, and anybody who is a regular reader of Hansard will find, given the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition's proximity to the Hansard reporters, there is a constancy in his demeaning comments to members on this side of the House. Heckling is a healthy part of this institution, but if somebody looks through Hansard they will find a regularity in those demeaning comments. I do not think that, with his position and the position he held in the past, he has to carry on in that way. He would gain for himself and for his office more respect if he were to listen and then participate in the debate, as he can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, in an interview on the CBC Sunday morning program, when speaking about how long he thought the debate should go on before reference and how he felt about the position of the government, said:

> We are speaking four days into the debate, a week after the Prime Minister dropped his surprise on the people of Canada. I think it would be surprising if there were a wide number of Canadians who yet had a chance to read the bill, read the resolution. I hope they will. I think it is very early yet to suggest what is happening in public opinion, in public support.

All those newspaper ads do is say, "Do you want to read about it? Here is the information." Surely that is the responsibility—

Mr. Clark: That is not true.

Mr. Fleming: Again I am being interrupted. If the right hon. member wishes to get up, he can do so if he wants to.

Madam Speaker: I do not know who has precedence, the Speaker or the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, but I just want to caution the minister not to comment on the ruling that I had made. We are not speaking of that here. We are speaking of a document published by the government. I would be grateful if the minister would concentrate on discussing that matter. Does the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition have a point of order?

Mr. Clark: Yes, a very brief point of order, Madam Speaker. The minister has taken exception to my interventions. My interventions have been to point out the falsity of his statements. If he will stop making false statements, I will stop intervening.

An hon. Member: That is not an intervention, it is heckling.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, later I will look at the record because I believe that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, by use of a synonym, has said that I have been lying to the House. Another hon. member has just said that that is right. I believe that is in contravention of the rules, but let me continue.

I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I certainly had no intention of reflecting on your decision. I was attempting to answer the first point made by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition in which he said that a series of ads published in the last few days were in contravention of your consideration of the question on which you ruled, and I am trying to make the point that they are not, they simply bring to the attention of the Canadian public information that is available. They take no role, make no advocacy, and are most straightforward.

The second point I should like to discuss which was brought up by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is the issue of the content itself. In the simplest terms—because I believe the government House leader dealt with that matter very capably—I should like to point out that if we are going to have, as questions of privilege, debates over the content of materials as summed up by governments, then it is a very shallow argument indeed for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to make because I could read from beginning to end the budget in the brief document which his government put out last December 11 and made exactly the same kind of argument about what was appropriate, what was misleading, what was true, what I thought was correct, and what was not telling the facts to the Canadian public.

What we are really having here, I believe, is a continuing effort to pull a blind over the real constitutional debate, and to delay Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have heard a series of arguments on both sides. The document in question has been read and the Chair would like to look at the document to see whether the arguments contained in the interventions of the various members do lead to my finding of a prima facie case of privilege. I will take the question of privilege under advisement.

MR. PAPROSKI—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I should like to reserve my right to raise a point of privilege. When the minister stated, in answer to my question this afternoon, that I froze the multicultural budget, I think he was deliberately misleading the House. I would like to look at the blues and to reserve my right to bring forward a point of privilege.

MR. BEATTY—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask your permission to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege next week in a matter related to that raised by my leader today, but which is independent.

Over the course of your ruling today you gave the House information on how you viewed the possibility that the government's advertising might constitute a breach of the privileges of members of Parliament. On the basis of that information I should like to have the opportunity to review the government's advertisements relating to the energy program, the multi-million dollar campaign, which gives false information and may misrepresent the position of Parliament.

Second, arising out of your statement that questions of privilege should be argued on the basis of whether or not the government's actions impede the ability of members of Parliament to discharge their responsibilities, I will want to take a look at that advertising campaign to see whether a case can be made, as I believe it can, that that expenditure of tax dollars to seize control of the energy debate, which was the intention of the government when they brought it in, according to a confidential memorandum prepared by one of their officials, constitutes a breach of the privileges of members of Parliament. I would simply like to reserve my right to argue a question of privilege at some point next week, if it seems merited.

● (1250)

MR. McCAIN—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, like the member who has just spoken, I should like to refer to page 3728 of Hansard which indicates that the government House leader is of the opinion that the substance of what we have been discussing, that is, government advertising, in no way interferes with the fulfilling of the obligations of members of Parliament. Very briefly, members of Parliament seem to have been prevented from fulfilling their duties. The government House leader said:

> In the present case, there is absolutely no alleged fact which shows that members of Parliament seem to have been prevented from fulfilling their duty.

On the basis of that statement I submit that my opportunity to fulfil the responsibilities I feel as a member of Parliament cannot be properly undertaken under the circumstances of the debate, its presentation by the government, and the suggestion of the government House leader. Like the former speaker, I reserve my right to raise a question of privilege on that next week.

An hon. Member: Anything to delay debate.

ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—CONSTITUENCY OF OXFORD

Question No. 1,363—Mr. Halliday:

For the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79, how many businesses in the constituency of Oxford applied for assistance and received monetary assistance under the Enterprise Development Program?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce: in fiscal year 1978/79, one (1) loan guarantee project for $139,500 was approved for a company located in the constituency of Oxford under the Enterprise Development Program. No assistance was provided in fiscal year 1977/78 under the program. The Enterprise Development Program does not utilize formal application forms per se but rather, project submissions are prepared by officials of the department and presented to the decision-making committees. The initial approach to the department is typically a verbal or letter inquiry. In the circumstances, record keeping of the number of firms who have "applied" for program support is difficult and statistics of this nature are not maintained.

MASSEY-FERGUSON

Question No. 1,440—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Has it come to the attention of the government that Massey-Ferguson, which has announced a lay-off of more than 3,200 workers in Ontario, is undertaking a massive investment program in Trujillo, Peru, allocating U.S. $25 million to build a new foundry?

2. Has the government, through the Department of External Affairs or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce assisted Massey-Ferguson in the implementation of this investment program?

3. Has the government encouraged Massey-Ferguson to export Canadian built machinery to South American nations as an alternative to export jobs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

1. Massey-Ferguson Limited has advised that it has not made any investment in Peru since 1973 and has no plans for future investment there.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed from Thursday, October 16, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, last night before ten o'clock I had the opportunity to start my comments. I had five minutes then, and I believe I will have six minutes now. I do not know if there will be other questions of privilege, but I would hate to divide my allotted 40 minutes into five-minute segments. So that my allotted time is not divided into three segments, I wonder if the Chair would allow me to call it one o'clock; then my time would be divided into only two segments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Dick: This will be my third effort to get started on this and I hope I will be able to complete my remarks in the 35 minutes I have remaining. Last night I made a few opening remarks which I concluded at page 3764 of Hansard, and I will pick up from where I left off last night.

I said I felt there was a consensus in Canada; in fact, I thought there was unanimity in Canada among all levels of government and all parties, whether provincial or federal, that the constitution be patriated to Canada. I also said that in the "Shorter Oxford Dictionary" definition of "consensus", where it refers to a government, it means a majority view. I think we do have a majority view, or a consensus, in Canada on the amending formula. I felt that the consensus probably revolved around the Vancouver amending formula rather than the Victoria amending formula.

I feel one thing which must be spelt out is that a consensus is most important in dealing with the fundamental law of our country, and the constitution is the fundamental law of our country. As much agreement as possible is necessary for a law to have the maximum respect. If law is not respected, then it will become ridiculed and, if it becomes ridiculed, faith in the law will be diminished and we head toward plain disrespect for the law. This is illustrated today by the example of the law in Ontario where people under the age of 16 are not allowed to use vending machines—that law is disrespected. The law dealing with the smoking of marijuana is a disrespected law in its present form. That, of course, can lead almost to anarchy, as recently illustrated in Iran where the people lost faith in the existing constitution and there was revolution.

However, with unanimity on patriation of our constitution and with consensus on the amending formula, I would like to deal briefly with why I cannot support the Victoria amending formula as proposed. That is because it enshrines in stone, from now until doomsday, that two provinces, the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, will forever have a veto. Whether or not they end up with only 10 per cent of the population in the country 150 years from now, they still will have a veto. I submit that is not fair and is not looking into the future. I do not think any particular province or region should have a veto on constitutional change.

With the unanimity on patriation and the consensus evolving around the Vancouver formula, any person with any leadership qualities should now be able to fashion an agreement on patriation and an amending formula, and bring the British North America Act back to Canada. Once it is in Canada we can then institute any other changes by means of our amending formula. Unless a leader is being unreasonable or is holding out for some special amending formula, or for some personal ideology that he wants to have incorporated into the package to be passed in Westminster, there is no doubt in my mind that an agreement for patriation and an amending formula could be fashioned—possibly within 48 hours.

● (1410)

That is not the case, however, and the reason is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government insist on the Victoria formula and insist on adding a great deal more to the resolution that will go to Westminster than just patriation and the amending formula.

I feel that we should be moving ahead on this in the sense that if the governing party in the House of Commons were willing to give a little and not insist that its penmanship is better than that of others, and if it really wanted to bring the country together, it could do so.

How did the parties arrive at the positions they have taken in this House? It strikes me that the government position was stated as more or less a fait accompli in the resolution distributed after the first speaker began his remarks two weeks ago. It was dictated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Prime Minister, and they will not vary from what they have dictated.

How has the Progressive Conservative Party arrived at the position it has taken? Frankly, I think it has arrived at it in a negative fashion. I think it has looked at the resolution and said there are too many wrongs in it and that therefore the resolution is defective and a new resolution which is not so defective should be substituted. I say that is a negative way of arriving at a position. Certainly after the press heard the former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) speak, they said he was against patriation and against an amending formula. That is not true but that is how they have perceived him and painted him—in a negative manner.

The New Democratic Party has arrived at its position by a more positive route, but with reservations. That party has said it supports patriation and an amending formula, but has certain reservations and will only agree with the government if it includes resource ownership in provincial hands. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) then added that he would have to meet with his caucus the next Monday and if they had some other things he would reserve the right to bring those up. That has not been reported but that party reserved its support on resources and whatever other ideas the caucus offered.

When the second speaker for the New Democratic Party spoke on October 7, we found out that the party was not just making a reservation on resource ownership. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) expanded the New Democratic Party's reservations to include section 42, the referendum amending formula; equalization; minority language education, offshore resources and native peoples. That makes six matters on which the party now has reservations.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) spoke yesterday, he agreed with those six reservations. I could not help but notice also that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) issued a press statement last weekend in which he stated his position as being closer to that of the Leader of the Opposition than to that of the leader of his own party.

It seems to me that having arrived at its position from a more positive initial response, the NDP is now four-square with the position of the Conservative party. Their reservations are abundant and many. They are not just agreeing on patriation, and on amending formula, if the Victoria formula were to be accepted, but they have many reservations in other areas.

Where do I stand myself, Mr. Speaker? As I indicated last night, I am in favour of Canadianization of the constitution. Quite frankly, I am also in favour of Canadianization of and Canadian control over our economy. I wish we were not subject to the whim and will of so many foreign powers. I am in favour of patriation and I also want an amending formula. Personally, I have no objection to the charter of rights and freedoms. I have some small quarrels or reservations with it, but in principle I have no objections to it—except that it is dividing the country unnecessarily.

Besides patriation and the amending formula, the government also wants the United Kingdom to add a lot of other amendments—to the British North America Act before it comes back to Canada. Those would be enshrined—and then a new amending formula would be imposed. It would be much more difficult to amend after that, than for the Prime Minister to get his own prerogatives entrenched while the constitution is still in the United Kingdom.

I have no disagreement with the $6 million advertising program—with the Canada geese saying, "Let's fly our constitution back to Canada", or that they want to have an amending formula. I do not complain of that; in fact I agree with it. But the ads do not say what else is in the resolution—the whole realm of other things involved.

I want to point out that I am not responsible to any premier; I am not responsible to any other person or any other politician, elected or otherwise. I am responsible only to the constituents of Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton who can judge what I have said and how I have represented them, at any election.

While I am dealing with patriation I should like to make a couple of suggestions, Mr. Speaker, regarding the interim amending formula which is set out in sections 33 to 40. I suggest that in section 38(1) set out on pages 10 and 11 of the resolution, instead of 80 per cent of the population and at least eight of the provinces, it be changed to "two-thirds of the provinces with 60 per cent of the population". Otherwise, Quebec and Ontario, which both have over 20 per cent of the population, could veto any joint action by the other nine provinces in suggesting an alternative amending formula in that interim period. I recommend two-thirds of the provinces because I do not think we should enshrine seven.

I do not know that there will always be only ten provinces in Canada. The Yukon Territory might join Canada as a province one day—and I hope it will. The Northwest Territories might even join as two provinces because of the vast area involved. We would then have 13 provinces. There is even a possibility that Ontario could be divided and become two provinces. Some people in northern Ontario have agitated for that, just as some people in the Saguenay-Lac St. Jean area of Quebec have agitated for that part of Quebec to be a different province from the part encompassing Montreal and the southern part of Quebec. We could end up with 14 provinces, and seven out of 14 is only half. That is a long way from two-thirds, which I think would stand the test of time much better. I also think there should be a requirement for 60 per cent of the population, not 50 per cent, at any time in any of the various amending formulae that come up in the various sections.

Even Premier Lévesque admitted that if he won 51 per cent of the vote in the referendum last year, it would not be sufficient to take Quebec out of Canada. He did not feel that percentage was sufficient because peoples' emotions can be inflamed enough to pick up 6 per cent, 8 per cent or 10 per cent when their support would not otherwise be forthcoming.

I think that 60 per cent would be a fair reflection of a higher standard of public opinion that should be required to change a constitution than merely a simple majority, or as some people have referred to as the tyranny of the majority. On certain days under certain circumstances the government would be able to get a majority, maybe not 60 per cent, and it may be more difficult to change that.

Further in the amending formula sections, if we deal with the final amending formula, which is part 5 starting at page 12, I think that section 41(1)(b) should be changed. In that section (b), which I cannot support, as I have indicated, because it gives certain provinces a veto from now until doomsday, to:

(b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces of Canada if the provinces whose legislatures have approved the resolutions have a combined population of at least 60 per cent of the total population of Canada.

We should do away with the Victoria formula which the proposed resolution enshrines.

Now, I come to section 42. Personally I am not worried about a referendum in this country. But what has to be set aside is four ministers, including the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who both said two days ago that section 42 is only there as a deadlock-breaking mechanism if they cannot resolve constitutional problems by the various levels of government as per section 41. That is a categorical mistruth—since I am not permitted to say lie—because there is no provision in this resolution that says "if".

The government can go directly to section 42 without going to section 41 to begin with, and for that reason I cannot support section 42. Should the word "if" be inserted or in the alternative, the government wanted to go to a referendum, I personally would have no objection, but I do think the provision should be that two-thirds of the provinces having 60 per cent of the population must support it.

I come now to section 44. The government tried in 1978 to amend the Senate through proposed Bill C-60 which then dealt with the constitution. The Supreme Court overruled the government and said that the bill could not be introduced. The government is now trying to smuggle through the back door of Westminster a change in the constitution which will affect the Senate, before it comes home. We Canadians will not have a right to do it by referendum or have it resolved by the various levels of government.

If the government really wanted to resolve the deadlock, as they talk of when referring to section 42, something might be phrased in section 41. If section 44 were eliminated, I think something of this nature would be of assistance. That would bring a new section 41(2) and this might say:

If a resolution is passed by the Senate or House of Commons which is designed to amend the Constitution of Canada;

(a) the other chamber of Parliament, be it either the House of Commons or the Senate must put the same resolution as passed by the first chamber, to itself, and allowing at least 20 hours for debate followed by a vote on the resolution before 180 days have elapsed for the passage of the resolution in the first chamber, any period when the Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing those 180 days.

And a (b) section to that new Section 41(2) might read:

(b) Each provincial assembly or legislature must within two years of the date on which the resolution passed the first chamber of the Parliament of Canada put the same resolution to themselves and after allowing at least 20 hours for debate thereon, vote on the resolution.

I would then suggest that Section 41(3) could perhaps be incorporated as well. It might say:

If a resolution designed to amend the Constitution of Canada is first passed by a legislative assembly of one of the provinces then that province shall under the seal of the province immediately forward the resolution as carried to the Governor General of Canada and the lieutenants governor of the other provinces and they shall cause the resolution to be placed before Parliament and the other provincial legislative assemblies, and a) within two years of the date the resolution was passed by the initiating province it shall be caused to be debated in each provincial legislative assembly for at least 20 hours and then voted thereon, b) as to Parliament it will first be placed before the Senate, debated and voted thereon within two years of its being passed by the legislature of the initiating province, and, secondly, will be placed before the House of Commons and be debated there and voted thereon before two years plus 180 days have elapsed from the time the resolution was first adopted by the initiating province.

And a new Section 41(4) might read:

If the House of Commons, Senate or any of the provincial assemblies does not debate and vote on the resolutions within the time periods prescribed, then it will be deemed that that body, be it the House of Commons, Senate or provincial legislature, has passed the resolution in the affirmative.

That would break any deadlock without having to go to section 42. It would also require an action in the various legislatures across the country and in both chambers of Parliament.

Section 44, as I see it, is perhaps put there because the government is afraid the Senate might not act on something and thus stall a desired amendment brought by one of the provinces, or initiated by one of the provinces, and brought forward in the House of Commons. The mechanism that I have mentioned would prevent the Senate from stalling on something by just not acting. It says that if they do not act within the prescribed period, it will be deemed that it has been done and done in the affirmative. Therefore the only way the Senate can stop that is by acting and acting in the negative. I suggest that might be the type of amending formula which would get around some of the controversy dealing with section 42 and section 44. It would also break the deadlock.

I have dealt with the patriation and the amending formula and some of the suggestions that I had. The government could divide this resolution and forget the rest for now. We would end up by having a consensus within 48 hours, certainly within a short period of time, with the vast majority of Canadians, probably 80 per cent of them, being able to support the then resolution going to Westminster. As I say, when you have the majority support of Canadians on the side of the law, then the law will not be disrespected. If the government insists on enshrining the other things, then there are some problems.

Let me deal with the areas where the problems do arise, although personally I do not find that I have a great deal of difficulty with them. First it is the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms. It starts out in the first section with guaranteeing certain rights subject only to the will of Parliament. Then the fundamental rights are set out. Oddly enough these are all included in Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights which was passed in 1960, except for some which might be called the cerebral thought processes. The additions are: freedom of conscience, thought, belief and opinion. Those are all inside somebody's head. I did not know that anybody could control what was going on inside my head. I always thought that I had those freedoms anyhow. I still think that those must be part of trying to free the cerebral process—perhaps of the Liberal backbenchers. Maybe it is something only for the Prime Minister who likes to think of himself as an intellect and therefore wanted all these things dealing with the mind put in. However, I have no problem with them if it is insisted upon that they be there, but I think it clutters things up.

The Diefenbaker Bill of Rights could have been adopted in this section. This might have deferred some of the controversy which has been stirred up.

● (1430)

If somebody is so egotistical as to insist on their penmanship and craftsmanship, then this country certainly is in difficulty. I have no problems with sections 3 and 4, democratic rights, nor 5, and 6, mobility rights. I happen to agree with that. My constituency has a border with the province of Quebec which not long ago passed regulations not allowing any people from my province to work in that province, yet their people come across and work in my constituency on a regular basis in the construction industry. That is pretty tough. People used to truck pulpwood to the Portage du Fort plant of Consolidated Bathurst. They had to buy a $500 licence to go half a mile on a paved highway after that regulation was brought in, after using that highway for five or six years at no cost, and all Quebec trucks use the Ontario highways at no cost. Therefore I have no difficulty with mobility rights. Frankly, I am surprised this does not go further and include powers over the economy.

In the legal rights section, I was sort of humoured to find in that section the following:

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person—

I was sort of humoured when the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) quoted the French charter of human and citizens rights of 1789 which states that "the purpose of any political association is the conservation of natural and imprescriptible human rights. Those rights are freedom, ownership and resistance to oppression". They have ownership there.

I looked into the American Bill of Rights. They have certain rights, including the right to own property. I looked into the Canadian Bill of Rights, section 1(a), which states that everyone has the right to life, liberty and property. Property has been left out of this section. It appears nowhere in this charter of rights and freedoms. Does that mean the federal government is not going to enshrine that the people of Canada have the right to property, or is it because they were afraid they would be transgressing provincial jurisdiction? They did not worry about that with civil rights and it comes in the same subsection as property and civil rights. They should have placed property in there.

There is also property controlled at the federal level, intellectual and commercial property, such as patents, trademarks and copyrights. They are not enshrined. On the right to ownership or the right to possession of property, if you do not have the right to possession of property, things, your own belongings, I submit there are no freedoms. What good are the other freedoms if you are not allowed to have these personal belongings? I find that a little bit ridiculous.

Section 8 dealing with 'search and seizure' according to established law is a pussyfooting section. I do not think it is going to change dramatically any law in this country.

Section 9 is the same as section 2(a) of the bill of rights except that it does not mention the word "exile".

Section 10(a) is the same as section 2(c)(i) of the Bill of Rights.

Paragraph (b) of section 10 is the same as 2(c)(ii) and (c) is the same as 2(c)(iii) of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights.

Section 11(a) is the same as 2(c)(i) of the Bill of Rights.

Paragraph (b) is new, stating that a person should be tried within a reasonable time. I have no difficulty with that.

Paragraph (c) is the same as 2(f) of the Bill of Rights.

Paragraph (d) is the same as 2(f) of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights.

Paragraph (e) is new. You cannot be convicted today of anything which is not an offence today. That is just saying you cannot be convicted of anything if at the time you are alleged to have done it it was not an offence. I do not see the necessity for that.

Paragraph (f) of section 11 deals with double jeopardy. That is already covered in the Criminal Code of Canada.

Paragraph (g) deals with the lesser sentences when they changed the Parole Act. That is already covered in an amendment to the Parole Act which we dealt with two or three years ago in this country.

Section 12 is already covered by section 2(d) of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights.

Section 13 is covered by 2(d) of the Canadian Bill of Rights and is also covered by the Canada Evidence Act and Ontario Evidence Act.

Section 14 of this resolution is covered by section 2(g) of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights.

Section 15(1) is covered by section 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

There is one aspect which some people are concerned about. That is in section 8, where a person has the right to seizure on certain grounds. Some people feel this is going to change the law. It will not make the law like the American law. In the American law under writs, you must identify the place you are going to search, the people and what you are searching for. That is set out in the constitution of the United States, amendment number four, "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation and, particularly, describing the place to be searched, the persons or the things to be seized". They do not mention 'things' here in this section 8, so I do not think it would follow the same way as the American law has followed, something which I certainly would not want to have brought into Canada.

I want to point out some problems in the next sections in the few minutes I have remaining.

I have no problems with sections 16 to 19 which are already entrenched in our Official Languages Act.

I do have some specific problems with section 23. I believe it is wrong. This has not yet been raised. I quote from section 23(2):

> Where a citizen of Canada changes residence from one province to another and, prior to the change, any child of that citizen has been receiving his or her primary or secondary school instruction in either English or French—

Then they have the right to continue. However, if a young married couple with pre-schoolers who speak French move to Cornwall, they will not be guaranteed the right to attend French schools. The older child would have had to start in a French school. That whole section will have to be rewritten. The people of Canada should be able to send their children to a school of the official language of their choice, period, rather than have two classes of immigrants as suggested in section 23(1) and also discriminating against pre-schoolers moving versus people whose oldest child has already commenced school, in section 23(2).

The equalization formula is wrong.

If there was good will in this place and a willingness to accept different views, the government would not have incorporated this resolution in such a way that we will never be able to amend it. Right now we are only asked to move a motion to send the "proposed resolution", not the official resolution, to a committee which will make a report. Any amendments that they think should be made in the resolution—again we cannot amend the resolution—should be included in the report. The report will be brought back to this House for a debate on whether we agree with the report, to send the resolution to England as a joint address. There is no place I can see where this provides for amendments. A place for amendments has not been guaranteed by the government.

● (1440)

The government says of section 42 that it is only a deadlock-breaking procedure, but that is patently false. As they indicated yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), they would not be willing to propose an amendment.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of making a few remarks on this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to speak to the proposed resolution, all the more so because from time immemorial in this country the debate has resumed every year in an attempt to straighten out the constitution that was bequeathed to us in good faith but which, from an administrative standpoint, should from time to time have been modernized and assured us, I feel, of justice and equality.

The national anthem that was passed here last July starts in French with the beautiful words: O Canada, terre de nos aïeux. But the way we behave, I wonder if we really want to do much for future generations, or if we merely want to sign the death warrant of this great country which has every reason to survive.

I am happy to take part in this debate as a representative of a generation that is eager to make of this vast land of ours a country in which freedom and good faith are the very foundation of future discussions and future development.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken the time to ask the opinion of some people in my riding to ascertain whether the proposal put forth by the government reflected a heartfelt desire for change in the population and whether these people accepted the resolution proposed by the government in this fall of 1980. People very freely and sincerely replied that it was high time someone did something in this country and that it was time that leadership asserted itself.

For much too long, passivity has been the common name for this constitutional debate. Of course, whenever people meet, be they provincial premiers or the Prime Minister of Canada, each has legitimate interests to uphold. But there is one important thing to remember and that is that these interests must converge, in other words the whole of the country must benefit as much as possible from the efforts of each of these first ministers. And it is this aspect which has eluded those who have run the country in the past and those who, at present, oppose the decision to proceed with the patriation of the constitution.

I can say quite openly and sincerely, Mr. Speaker, that I am under no pressure from above or below to support this proposed resolution. I do so with conviction, with decisiveness, because I am certain that among all imperfect means it is still the best to achieve a breakthrough towards a new start for this country. We are at the crossroads and I sincerely believe that we cannot backtrack.

I can understand that the opposition parties and even some other well-meaning individuals are against the conditions attached to patriation, I can understand the sensitivities of other people, but I am convinced that if each and every one of us examined their motives we would all agree that the time has come to set aside partisan interests in order to find the best formula to put an end not only to 53 years of hesitation, 53 years of impatience, but to 113 years of efforts to rejuvenate this constitution and bring it home and make it Canadian.

In what frame of mind has this measure been undertaken? Are people asking themselves this question, what motivated those who have initiated this measure? This action has been undertaken in the wake of successive efforts at reaching an agreement among first ministers. It started in 1927 to be precise. Efforts were made again in 1931, 1935, 1936, 1950, 1961, 1964, 1971, 1975, 1976, 1978, 1979 and 1980. And always with the same result, just like a yo-yo that goes up and down but never stops. There has never been an agreement for the good of all. That is precisely where the mistake lies now, on the part of the official opposition and those who are against this measure, for they want to keep searching indefinitely for an ideal means while it has been amply demonstrated that this is not feasible. It is so true that in the democratic system of government the law of the majority prevails when total and absolute majority cannot be achieved. In a type of negotiation where two levels of government are involved, it is a lot to expect all these premiers to agree, all of them at the same time on the same items. This is why, following the attempts of an openly separatist and equally hypocritical party, the Canadian government has had to set in motion a process to patriate the constitution. This is a moral commitment, which was very firm, and for those who followed the various stages of the referendum campaign in Quebec, I should simply like to quote briefly from a statement made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Quebec City on May 14, 1980. When people are speaking of moral commitment, when people are wondering about our being justified in acting this way today, reference should be made to that statement which is crystal clear, and which Quebeckers know very well. Mr. Trudeau said, and I quote: "If the answer to the referendum question is No, we have all said that this no would be interpreted as a mandate to change the constitution in order to renew our federalism." That I did not say. Neither did Mr. Clark, nor Mr. Broadbent, nor even the nine premiers of the other provinces. The 75 hon. members who were elected in that province to go and represent them in Ottawa said No and this means we want some change.

Further, Mr. Trudeau said in conclusion, and I quote: "I know because I talked to those hon. members this morning, I know that I can commit myself most firmly that if the answer is "no"—"—and note this——we will immediately set in motion the mechanism to renew the constitution, and we will not stop until it is done.

It is precisely this moral commitment which has triggered the admittedly rapid procedure designed to patriate the constitution. But before we got to the present stage, throughout the summer, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) travelled from one provincial capital to another in order to prepare yet another constitutional conference where we might reach an agreement. For three months, week after week, justice ministers of various provinces met nonstop with the Minister of Justice of Canada in an attempt to find a common ground.

Moreover, in September, another constitutional conference was held to determine the exact position of various heads of government regarding constitutional renewal. Instead of presenting the Canadian government with a counter offer, the provincial premiers chose once again to devise a formula leading to a deadlock. That is to say they chose to deal with purely provincial concerns instead of taking a comprehensive view of the situation which directly concerns all Canadians.

● (1450)

And this government has a broader role to play in the House of Commons, the undivided role of representing all Canadians. True, this order of government has a role equal to the one played by the provinces, but a different one, even though it is of equal importance. And it is to represent in all fairness and equity all Canadians from coast to coast. At the constitutional conference held last September, one of the major points to remember is that the Prime Minister of Canada did not have the mandate to hand over to each provincial premier a part of our Canadian heritage. Nobody has the mandate to hand over to any region of Canada whatever belongs de facto and de jure to every Canadian citizen.

When I asked a little while ago in what spirit that reform, that unlocking action had been initiated, I did say that it had been devised out of a moral commitment. And when the Progressive Conservative Party was in power, they also had voiced such a moral commitment to get to effect those changes. At his press conference two weeks ago, the Leader of the Opposition indicated that he agreed in principle with the government's proposal, but that he could not agree with the means being used. But should we fight over the means, the structures? Should we not instead seek a formula which would meet the needs of Canadians? Who will actually benefit from this constitutional breakthrough? Everybody seems eager to defend his own structure, to speak on behalf of the group he represents, but there is something all hon. members should try to understand, and it is that we represent each and every member of these organizations. The same people who are part of these organizations have also elected us. This is a basic truth which is often overlooked.

Furthermore, the government's proposal is designed for future generations, while this debate more often than not is used to promote short-term political interests. The generation to which I belong is really getting impatient and is not interested in sacrificing its youth discussing constitutional matters for the next 53 years. This is of paramount importance.

For too long we have been sacrificed in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada in the interests of a false nationalism, always inspiring but restrictive. This plan requires from all Canadians what the philosopher Bergson called a supplement of soul. That is what we need in the House. We have the impression, not to say personal conviction, that some people are interested in discussing rather than making headway.

The people of Manicouagan are proud workers who elected me to defend the economy, to find work for their children and not to quibble for 50 years about issues which are mostly out of date. I think that if Canada is to progress we need that change of direction which will enable us to plan much further. The debate which has been going on for years is a stumbling block hindering Canada's evolution.

Still in 1980 we are taking up weeks to discuss a matter which members of Parliament should have solved in the fifties. This was for the country a truly rotten gift which is corroding the social fabric to the extent that we now have the impression that a withdrawal would be the best formula. The members of the government team have taken up the challenge to expand Canadian views and allow Canadians to be everywhere at home.

Of course, this is a tremendous challenge and there are people who are convinced, I think, that it might be an impossible undertaking.

Yet, it has been demonstrated that Canadians want to meet that challenge, particularly in Quebec. In spite of what some people might think of his character, the Prime Minister of Canada has been elected five times in Quebec and each time with an increased majority. So, as concerns Quebec, there is no need to say that he has the absolute confidence of the people and if you want to talk about a traitor you should find another person than this Prime Minister.

If you want to learn about our Prime Minister's vision concerning the constitution, you just need to refer to the book he wrote in 1976 entitled "Federalism and French Canadians", on page 52. About a possible constitutional reform, he said and I quote:

> There is nothing easier than proposing constitutional reforms, and I could very easily outline several points that would some day have to be taken into account by a new constitution. For example:
> (a) A bill of rights could be incorporated into the constitution, to limit the powers that legal authorities have over human rights in Canada. In addition to protecting traditional political and social rights, such a bill would specifically put the French and English languages on an equal basis before the law.

Virtually the exact wording or at least the spirit of that text is to be found in the proposed resolution.

> (b) The protection of basic rights having thus been ensured, there would be no danger in reducing the central government's predominance in certain areas (for example, by abolishing the right of reservation and disallowance); at the same time, this would have the advantage of getting rid of some of the constitution's imperial phraseology.

And so on and so forth—

When faced with references to sell-out or about-face, to a man who does not know where he is going, it is very easy to prove that this is not so by going through the writings of that man in order to show how true it is. If one politician stood up these recent years, it is the current leader of the Liberal party. And I feel this is what the people want, somebody with a direction, somebody with a vision of this country's future. And it is important to emphasize this because in Quebec we hear regularly the terms traitor and treason. These terms bounced around all through the referendum campaign. And, needless to repeat, both French-speaking Quebeckers and the total Quebec population voted no, they voted to remain in Canada. This is fundamental.

And the patriation and amendment provisions, as with all the aspects included in the document, confirm the supremacy of citizens over the structure of state. I cannot see why the provinces can object to what is inside, because this exercise is simply to give more rights to citizens, but without, of course, going through the provincial structures, and all premiers would prefer that this go through provincial structures. If we could not go through provincial structures, it is because they did not have enough vision and generosity to let the citizens have a charter of basic rights and freedoms, language rights and other aspects included in the document.

The most upset may be provincial governments. They will have to react, because their citizens will have received more rights and, faced with these new rights granted citizens, they will have to change their structures in order to allow for more freedom in the land. And references to encroachment on the federal spirit are misleading, because in this House we represent the same people.

Those people who have elected us have also elected their provincial spokesmen or premiers. We represent the same people but we have different duties, that is to ensure that rights and freedoms are protected throughout the country. If provincial premiers had endorsed the philosophy contained in this draft resolution, if they had agreed to widen their vision of a free and equitable Canada, we could have reached this kind of unanimity very easily and therefore passed this resolution in a more happy way. But we have not been able to do this because some narrow minds have forced us to act through the central government and this is unfortunate. The time had come for a man to show some leadership and assert once and for all that it was necessary to take all legitimate actions to put the proposal before the federal Parliament and bring back home something which belongs to us.

People of my generation want things to change. They really want to look toward the future and the challenge of the year 2000 is a priority to us. We no longer want to sit on the past and begin criticizing what could have been done and what should have been done. We are determined to look to the future with some people of good will and good faith and forget the fights which hopefully have separated us for some time and look at the future in a very generous way. Indeed the role of Parliament and of the state is to fulfil three essential duties: to protect the citizens' freedom, to provide them with the highest security and give them prosperity. Those are the three very basic elements of a state, whether a central, a provincial or a municipal government. What we want is to forget the present time and project ourselves into this future, to become really one of the most generous countries as far as freedoms are concerned, a country likely to grow in harmony.

There is danger, in the present debate, if hon. members do not assume their responsibilities, of our country being divided even more because of an endless and mostly useless debate in which all parties are hurling abuse at one another. The proposal has been put before Parliament. We still have to discuss its principles for some time. Let us hope that next week we will be able to refer it to the committee. Everyone will have a chance to express his point of view and then we will be able to see to what extent it is still possible to improve this document. Again I repeat that it is not a perfect document. If anybody here has a perfect document in his pocket, let him table it. It is about time.

We must work with what is humanly possible and above all we must base our willingness for a change on good faith and on future generations instead of always aiming for a short term and taking what is now a fact as something that cannot be changed.

This proposal even contains an amending formula which is very flexible, in my opinion. It was adopted in Victoria, and for the next two years we will be absolutely unable to change anything without full endorsement from all first ministers. Quebeckers have to send a new government team to discuss renewed federalism on their behalf. The whole division of powers has yet to be studied. The premiers who really wish in all good faith to work at establishing new means to provide their provinces and Canada with strong instruments, powerful economic instruments, will have the possibility to do so during these next two years.

If the proposed resolution itself includes items with which some of the premiers disagree, they can still discuss them further among themselves and develop an amendment proposal which would retain some of the elements of the constitutional proposal, and everything will be possible. But one thing is clear, and that is that the document will be Canadian and will have belonged to us while we now have to go and beg elsewhere for things which are the pride of the country. I would remind members opposite that history might judge very severely the stand they have taken recently. We have only to recall the debate on the flag and the emotional hours we spent in this House in the longest debate ever held in our history, when members opposite were literally against the proposal for all sorts of reasons, traditions representations, honour, and if we now talk about this matter with the youngest and the oldest among us, we realize that it was a mistake to take such a stand concerning the approval of the flag. This flag is now a symbol of unity throughout the country. No one believes that any other flag could represent us.

I remind members opposite of the critical need to understand the dangers of this debate. I recognize that one might disagree with some of the means proposed, but I do not accept that the means must come second to the whole Canadian ideal we are defending. I could have spoken expressly about the language. I could have spoken about each of the rights provided in the charter. But I believe that in the last two weeks, several of my colleagues on both sides of the House have already done so and that it would serve no purpose to add anything to the comments which have been made.

However, there is perhaps one element I would like to mention, that two major points stand out when we examine the history of the old constitutional conflict. The problem of this country is not a problem of dictatorship, it is not a problem of wealth, it is not a problem of poverty, but rather a problem of structure and of sharing. The great advantage that Canadians have always had has been to be heirs to a country which might be too vast for certain minds. The problem of this country is that some people find it hard to understand the concepts of time and space. When we look at what is going on around us, at all the wars, the famines and the dictatorships, and when we compare this with the country we call Canada, it is very easy to see that we are like spoilt children who find it hard to be generous and to share even though their stomachs are full.

And what intensifies even more so this conflict are our personality clashes. This is what is eroding the national fiber of this country. We are incapable of appreciating this great heritage of ours and through the structures of society reach the people to whom we are answerable. This whole set up of school, municipal, provincial and federal structures is here to be of assistance to the private citizens and not the opposite.

This is what we must understand and this is what people outside these walls must understand. There is no intention of taking things and rights away from anybody. The idea is to give people more of the same. The member for Manicouagan, the Prime Minister of Canada or the Premier of Quebec or of any other province or any member of Parliament for that matter are only transitory figures but the country as a whole will remain and generations will succeed one another. What we must always have present in our mind is what we are going to leave behind for future generations and in which spirit we are going to transmit that heritage. The proposed resolution is drafted in that kind of spirit, namely the granting of cultural guarantees. I am referring to language rights but also to mobility rights and the mobility rights contained in this proposed resolution are a thing I am experiencing in my own riding.

● (1510)

Here is an example to illustrate how this happens. Over the past few years the economic centre of our country has been shifting westward. Contractors in my region, the type of people whom we might call the builders of our country, go to Edmonton to do business there. Quite often these people do not speak English very well. Nevertheless they are ready to take up the challenge and to follow the trends of the economy. The very principle of the resolution recognizes freedom of movement for citizens and capital from one part of the country to the other. And this is a fact. Ask any Canada employment centre how many people knock on the door to inquire about mobility plans to go west and how many westerners seek to go east. By this resolution, we enshrine this reality. Is anyone in this House opposed to such proposal? Is any province against such proposal? And yet we have heard premiers say: Listen, this is going to confuse our mobility plans. Mobility programs for citizens of our country are not designed to meet the needs of manpower plans, but to enable people to work where they want to.

Manpower plans can be adapted to the population. That is what we must confirm in this resolution. French-speaking families moving westward would then be able to get certain French-speaking institutions, if numbers warrant, and that matter would not be left for the federal or provincial governments but for the courts to decide. They would be able to rule in these matters on the basis of jurisprudence and after examining the facts.

I think there are very few cases of such generous projects in the history of Canada and what is most astonishing is the fact that those who oppose it do so simply on the basis of the methods and means used to implement it. Such an approach is risky for those who are unable to overcome their own opposition and deal strictly with the principle. That is I think the saddest aspect I see in the negative criticism made about supporting this resolution.

In closing my remarks, I would simply say that the great principle of liberalism, which I think everybody in this House would defend, puts the priority on the individual and not on the structures or on the state and I would challenge anybody in the House to find a formula within the proposed resolution that is contrary to what I have just said. Everything in that proposed resolution is addressed directly to the citizens and not the institutions, and that is what confirms the supremacy of the rights of the citizens over those of the state. That is what is important. In a world that is overmechanized, overbureaucratized, it was high time such principles were stated; it may also be high time to switch to action in order to achieve concrete objectives: that is why we are elected.

Go out in the street and ask the people what they think of this protracted debate. They will tell you, over and over again: You were elected to do that work; you are paid to solve those problems. Quit calling on us as witness and act. But act according to our freedoms and in terms of the generation to come. That is what we ask of you. Stop going over the same things time and time again and assume your responsibilities. That is the stand we must take, that is what we must act upon, instead of going around in circles and hiding behind false principles and sophistry to justify our inertia. There is only one thing to do: we must break out of the deadlock, go further and assert that we are a free country, capable of bringing back home what belongs to us, and mature enough to include in our constitution commitments that require surpassing ourselves. I ask them to be understanding. I ask them to consider from the north to the south and from the east to the west this large continent which we have inherited and to think that the discussions which are going on are perhaps the mere last effort which will enable us finally to obtain our basic rights as Canadian citizens, that the forthcoming years are merely a gleam of the future and that we will be able to gain control and to carry on the harmonious development of this country. I am convinced that if our fathers had been timid rather than confident, today our standard of living would not be so high and our freedoms would not be so well asserted. A nation grows old when it resists expansion. Our country perhaps has arrived at the age of puberty but I am now convinced that we are not far from adulthood and that we will be able to take up the great challenge passed onto us by former generations and anticipated by future generations of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the resolution to establish a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider the total package the government wishes to send to Her Majesty the Queen.

Yesterday was international credit union day. I thank my colleagues in all parties for giving unanimous consent to my motion under Standing Order 43 earlier today which paid tribute to the credit union and caisse populaire movements in Canada and around the world. It is in that spirit and in accordance with the principles and philosophies of the co-operative movement, the major foundation of the political party to which I am happy to belong, I want to make my remarks on the resolution containing a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen regarding the Constitution of Canada.

Usually I am a hard-nosed partisan democratic socialist. Usually on social and economic issues I will argue, berate and condemn—and sometimes support—any of the actions, policies or ideas of my fellow Canadians who are Liberals or Conservatives whether in this chamber or anywhere else in the country. But this is not the time or the subject on which to do that. My comments apply to myself as well as to everyone in this place. Fingerpointing, personal attacks or extreme partisanship have no place in this particular debate. There must be an openness and willingness to consider positively the points of view, ideas and amendments submitted by any hon. member of this chamber or the committee, or when the committee reports back to the House.

There is a better way to conduct ourselves in this debate. We do not need a stubborn, arbitrary, unilateral manner. We do not need a mindless, thoughtless, incoherent babble from people who oppose someone or who oppose part or all of what is being submitted by the government. We certainly do not need personal attacks nor do we need the imputing of motives. In fact, we should be listening to one another and accepting the views of others in good faith. There is not a member of this House who agrees with this resolution 100 per cent; I suspect even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could point out two or three things that are in it which he does not like. And that applies to every member in this chamber.

We do not need a gang of five going to court, nor do we need an attitude and state of mind from the government which precludes openness and favourable consideration of suggestions and amendments put forward by opposition parties or individual members from any party when the committee meets. I and others do not like the fact that the government is acting unilaterally on this matter, even though I fully understand and appreciate why they feel compelled to do so. Someone said, and I forget who it was: We were elected to make laws, not legislatures. We were elected to support or oppose governments, not establish them. We were elected to work under the rules, not make them by ourselves.

The five principles that are in the legislation have been policies of my party at various periods of time. For example, patriation has been part of our party policy since the 1930s, when the CCF spoke up for patriation of our constitution. We support the amending formula. Language rights has been party policy for many years. I am hopeful the government will, in committee, do something about what appears to me to be a double standard. But we support in principle the entrenching of language rights. We have supported for many years entrenching a charter of rights even though that in itself will not be sufficient to guarantee those rights. We have always supported the principle of equalization and here again we hope the government will accept amendments which would make that provision in the resolution even better. We hope it will specify and spell out equalization payments.

Most of all, my party insists that this resolution embody a sixth principle, namely, the matter of ownership, control and the right to manage the resources by the provinces.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) rises on a point of order and wishes to ask a question with the hon. member's permission.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to get this finished so I can get to the airport. I will try to keep my remarks under 40 minutes and if he would be good enough to question me then I would be happy to try to answer him.

Yesterday was the tenth anniversary of the imposition of the War Measures Act during peacetime. Ten years ago yesterday my former leader and political mentor—I hope he still is my political mentor—Tommy Douglas, told this House the NDP party did not accept the government's heavy-handed tactics which could cause a person to be held for 90 days or more without an opportunity to prove he or she did not belong to a subversive organization. He said:

> This government now has the power by order in council to do anything it wants—to intern any citizen, to deport any citizen, to arrest any person or to declare any organization subversive or illegal.

I am not convinced the present wording of the government's proposed constitution act would prevent a repeat of this denial of rights. Section one of the proposed charter of rights says:

> The Canadian charter of rights and freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits as are generally accepted in a free and democratic society with a parliamentary system of government.

The words "as generally accepted" are a loose definition which could be interpreted in many ways. I hope the government will be willing to review this section when it is before the committee. I wonder why this qualification should apply to the right under section 12:

> —not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Would that qualification to which I referred permit a repeat of the disgraceful treatment accorded to Japanese Canadians 40 years ago? Talk about the entrenching of rights in a constitution does not necessarily guarantee one will receive those rights. The counter-example is that in the American constitution, with those rights entrenched, the treatment of the American-Japanese was as bad as, or worse than, that accorded the Japanese in Canada. It took the Americans as long to redress the harm done as it did Canada. I agree the Americans did redress that harm in a better way then we did, in a larger way. But it took them as long, even though those rights were entrenched. So entrenchment by itself does not guarantee one will always receive those rights.

Why should there be a qualification on the right to be told with what offence you are being charged? I hope the government as well as all other members of the committee will want to look at that and improve upon it. There are many ideas in the constitutional proposal I agree with; I have illustrated the five principles that are there and the sixth that we feel must be there. While we will support the passing of the motion to establish the committee we will take full part in the proceedings of that committee and we will have amendments and proposals to make. We want to hear from and listen favourably to the suggestions and amendments made by members of the Conservative party and the Liberal party. We want to deal with other concerns.

I cannot vote against the principle of patriating our constitution. I cannot vote against the entrenchment of language rights. I cannot vote against a charter of rights being in our constitution. I cannot vote against equalization. But surely that does not prevent me, or any hon. member in this House, or any citizen of Canada, from expressing concerns about other provisions in the resolution and asking for, and achieving some success with regard to acceptance of amendments moved by the opposition parties or by the government which make improvements or corrections affecting concerns other than the principles I enunciated and which we feel we must support.

For example, there is a need to provide for equalization payments instead of the possibility, maybe the probability, of patronage pay-offs. The constitution must always be in touch with the people of our country; it must be a reflection and not a manipulation of the people who live here.

The Indian and native people in my part of the country have special concerns. Of equal priority to constitutional reform is the need to correct the greatest land fraud in history—the unpaid debt of land entitlements. In my province the federal government generously gave the Hudson's Bay Company 3.3 million acres of land and it swiftly gave the CPR ten million acres. It negotiated with the Indian people and they were entitled to 1.5 million acres through agreements which have yet to be lived up to. My colleague, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) will speak further on this matter. Do these original peoples, whose roots in our country go back thousands of years, deserve that kind of treatment?

I want to deal with resources for a few moments. In order to understand why resources are important to me, to my party, to my province and, indeed, to all western provinces and, in effect, to all of the provinces and territories, one needs to go back in history before the discovery of oil or gas or potash. The national policy for this country, developed by Sir John A. Macdonald, goes back to the days when tariffs were used to encourage the growth of domestic industry in central Canada. An indivisible part of national policy has been the provision of transportation services to the maritimes and the west by the federal power.

Thus, this country grew by two principles: tariff protection for central Canada and efficient transportation for the west and the Atlantic. In recent years, however, the transportation system has not been adequate. As Mr. Justice Hall said in his eminent report, "Feelings exist that western Canadians are the source of someone else's affluence and to a degree they blame the transportation system for their frustration."

For one reason or another, the federal government has never understood this feeling. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) seems to be unable to speak about western concerns without tipping over a bale stack in the process. During the constitutional negotiations this summer, the Prime Minister asked the west to trade resource dollars for federal investment in the transportation system. In all sincerity and kindness I should like to ask the Prime Minister why the west should pay twice—once through tariffs and once again through resource dollars.

The west has been vulnerable to boom and bust cycles in the economy. I remember the "dirty thirties"—I am a child of the depression. I saw farmers who lost their homes and their farms when four-fifths of the crops went to pay off interest on debt. In the past five years the west has been moving ahead and now that we are moving, our citizens feel others are holding us back just when we have the chance to diversify our economy with resources in order to avoid the boom and bust cycle.

The issue of resources is as important to us, Mr. Speaker, as language and culture is, not only to the people of Quebec, but to the rest of Canada. To us in the west at least, resources are just as important and through bitter experience, that concern has become equal to other concerns. Two decisions of the Supreme Court are part of our bitter experience. In 1973, the government of Saskatchewan levied a tax to capture windfall profits from oil companies. There was no objection to them receiving their cost of production and a reasonable return on their investment. In the CIGOL case, the Supreme Court supported a challenge to the Saskatchewan government's right to levy that tax. It was bad enough that we had to fight the oil industry and the oil corporations but in that instance the minister of justice of the day went to the Supreme Court on behalf of the federal government in support of the oil companies' case. And some people wonder why there is bitterness!

In the Central Canada Potash case, the Supreme Court struck down Saskatchewan's pro-rationing regulations which were originally introduced by a provincial Liberal government. Saskatchewan won both court cases in the lower courts but lost in the Supreme Court. Neither case upheld a federal law. Both struck down a provincial law concerning resources, leaving the companies unregulated and untaxed by either government.

No constitution is acceptable to the NDP unless it clarifies the situation and provides that natural resources and the right to indirect taxation belong to the provinces. It should provide, specifically, for the provinces to levy indirect taxes; for provincial concurrence with federal paramountcy for interprovincial trade and for provincial concurrence with federal paramountcy for international trade.

If the federal government accepts the principle of provincial ownership of resources and accepts this amendment to the proposed constitution, we will have the beginnings of a workable package. This is not just meaningful to Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. I know the premier of Alberta has pooh-poohed this to some extent and said it did not mean much to that province. I wish he had checked with his minister of mineral resources. In the case of Alberta alone, 20 per cent of oil and gas production is freehold, that is, it is on land where someone other than the government owns the mineral rights. Most of those lands in Alberta—and here we go again, Mr. Speaker—are owned by Canadian Pacific and Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. Production from those freehold lands amounts to 90.5 million barrels of oil annually and 489 billion cubic feet of gas annually. If Alberta is permitted to levy indirect taxation equivalent to a 30 per cent royalty under our constitution on production from freehold lands, it would collect a net in excess of $600 million per year. How rich would you have to be before you would not seriously consider wanting the right to that $600 million per year? By the way, that would exceed Saskatchewan's total income from hydrocarbon production, so it is important. And not only to Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker.

Sometimes the problem is not so much what the government wants to do as the way in which it wants to do certain things. I have read the resolution for a joint address and it raises many questions. First of all, is it wise to write the constitution in a language that few people can understand? Being an innocent prairie boy, I had a great deal of difficulty understanding some of the wording. One need only look at what I see as being the "guts" of the resolution, section 51 of the Constitution Act. What does that mean to the average citizen? Imagine putting that on a ballot for a referendum.

More important, in my view—and certainly this is not the view of my party as far as I am aware; the party has not officially expressed a view—there is an illusion that this resolution, once it is accepted here and in the United Kingdom, will somehow patriate our constitution. This resolution asks the United Kingdom parliament to pass a law called the Canada act which, in turn, automatically becomes the constitution act. No matter how one reads it, the Canada act will remain on the statute books of the United Kingdom unless and until it is repealed by the United Kingdom parliament. The United Kingdom parliament is totally sovereign over its own laws and it could repeal the Canada act or amend it. I am not saying that the United Kingdom parliament would do that, but it could.

In Canada we do not have provision for a chapter in our statutes. We would have the constitution act printed as an appendix to our statutes, as is the BNA Act. Hon. members know what can be done with an appendix; it can be taken out by a doctor, or in its other sense removed by Parliament. Merely passing this resolution is not sufficient to totally patriate our constitution, neither will unilateral action solve this problem threatening to divide us.

Our country was not created because it was convenient geographically. In the nineteenth century there were serious divisions between us then as there are today. There were some factors then, as there are now, which provide a basis for co-operation. Co-operation 113 years ago was essential because British trade and fiscal policy removing imperial preference left us vulnerable to continental integration. Agricultural and other trade was potentially continental; we had to head off competition with the Americans. Co-operation was required from all people in Canada in those days. It still is. The Canadian Wheat Board is a good example. The first American canals and railways pressured us into building railroads. These were expensive ventures which required a strong federal government. However, it has always been the case that we also need strong provincial governments. After all, it was the provinces—New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Upper and Lower Canada—which originally passed resolutions to create the BNA Act. There was no national Parliament as we know it now. The constitutional debate which create our country had input not just from heads of government but from the general consensus of the people.

I regret very much that following the September 8 to September 12 conference the government did not follow a policy resolution of the New Democratic Party. I want to read it into the record. We said, prior to the conference that if by the end of the first ministers' conference there is deadlock and no prospect of success through the first ministers' negotiating process alone, in the place of unilateral action, which could be divisive, we recommend a new round of deliberations be started almost immediately and that the conference participants include multiparty delegations selected by Parliament and each of the provincial legislatures. These delegations should be made up of equal numbers of delegates from each province and the number of delegates from Parliament would be equal to the total number of delegates from the provinces. We further said, Mr. Speaker, that in addition, the original peoples be given the right to direct representation and vote in the deliberations; that the multiparty delegations from the Territories be given the right to direct representation and vote in the deliberations; that a delegation of women's organizations be given the right to direct representation and vote in the deliberations, and that after a series of regional meetings in the intervening period, this process of deliberation end one year from now. We stated, also, that a two-thirds majority of those individual delegates present and voting on proposals in each session should determine the recommendations by the conference and that the package of proposals produced by the negotiations would require ratification by seven legislatures representing all of the regions of Canada, one of which must be the province of Quebec, and by the Parliament of Canada. Having obtained such ratification, these proposals would then constitute law and would then constitute Canada's constitution.

I guess it is too late for the government to do that now. We just wish they had listened and taken that into account and considered doing it.

I want to close my remarks with some final thoughts on the whole matter. However, allow me first to complete my remarks in terms of whether or not we are following the best method. I do not disagree with what the government wants to do; I do disagree with some of the ways in which the government proposes to do it. We are being asked to have the parliament of the United Kingdom pass an act which has the force of law in Canada. It seems to me that one thing you do not do is allow one legislative body and government to set the rules for the structure of executive powers which are to reside somewhere else.

As a result of the Quebec referendum, the government—and I understand this—has chosen to move quickly, albeit unilaterally, in order to try to satisfy the people in Quebec, as well as all the rest of Canada, who want to have their constitution brought home. Yet the action being taken by the government has been rejected by the people in Quebec, certainly by Mr. Lévesque and by Mr. Ryan. This should give the government pause and cause it to be even more favourably disposed to receive and accept amendments from members on this side of the House as well as amendments from its own side.

When any one of us from any party presents a case, a point, a suggestion or an amendment, it should be received and considered in good faith as being sincerely and honestly meant, in the most open, positive and most favourable way possible by all other members of this House and of the committee.

I close by saying that the government having made the decision it has made—and it has the right to make the decision in terms of how the government wishes to proceed—this Parliament has the opportunity to bring about an accomplishment which could be heralded, remembered and spoken about for the next 200 years. We have that opportunity, provided we all deal with this together in a spirit of co-operation. If we do not deal with this in that manner so that it will be something spoken of and remembered and recognized for the next 200 years, we will not have done our job very well. We will have let down our country and our people.

We do well to remember and think about our original peoples and all they have done over these thousands of years; we might all think about and remember les habitants and all they have done since they came to this country and pioneered in the Atlantic and Quebec regions and then in the west. Think about all those who came since then—the English-speaking peoples, the peoples of many other races and cultures, who settled this country. I invite my compatriots here to consider, too, what some others have done. Specifically, I want to tell my hon. friends in this chamber about one of the most moving experiences of my life. It occurred when I visited a cemetery in Adagem, which is in northern Belgium. There were 980 Canadians aged 19 to 30 buried there. They were from the Regina Rifles Regiment, the South Saskatchewan Regiment and the Royal 22nd Regiment, the Van Doos. There were the names of French and English Canadians alongside Polish, Ukrainian and German names. When all of us are carrying on this debate, deciding on how to conduct and address ourselves to succeeding generations, let us remember all of those and make sure that what they have done has not been for naught.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, that was a very moving finish to a very eloquent speech. It is indeed an honour to be here today to address what is a very important resolution not only to this House but to the country, a resolution which will ultimately patriate our constitution for the last time, which will entrench a charter of rights and give us an amending procedure.

It is my hope that this matter will soon go to the committee of the House and the Senate so that it can be expeditiously dealt with at the committee level and a joint address sent to England and the Queen before Christmas. It is unfortunate that a group of premiers have decided to take us to court, but not unexpected. The premiers of this country have been looked after by a successive number of federal parliaments. It is about time we started to look after the country. I am going to quote a lot of Conservatives. In 1865, Sir John A. Macdonald made a very profound observation. He said:

> We have strengthened the general government. We have given the general legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail, all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local governments and local legislatures shall be conferred upon the general government and legislature. We have thus avoided that great source of weakness which has been the cause of the disruption of the United States.

In the ensuing 115 years, through judicial interpretation and legislative negotiation, we have gone in the complete opposite direction. It is a myth today to say that the federal government is stronger than or even as strong as the collective powers of the provinces. Let me set out immediately the distribution of direct expenditures on goods and services between the two levels of government over the past 113 years.

In 1870 the federal government spent 52 per cent and the provincial governments, including the municipalities, 48 per cent. By 1926 we were down to 26 per cent and the provincial and municipal governments up to 74 per cent. In 1950 we moved up to 48 per cent with a provincial-municipal level of 52 per cent. In 1975 we were down to 24 per cent and the provinces with the municipalities were spending three times as much as us.

We have been too generous to the provinces and in our generosity have seriously impaired the imbalance of federal-provincial relations. No matter what party you belong to, you are still a member of this Parliament and want to maintain a balance. Either that or you do not understand what confederation is all about.

I might say that one of the most generous periods has been under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the last 12 years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Irwin: You laugh, but the facts say so. Check them. Instead of talking rhetoric, go to the figures, they are there.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am prepared to rule now on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I am in the hands of hon. members. I could delay the ruling if the hon. member wants to continue his speech. However, since the amendment is an important one, I am prepared to listen to some argument from both sides. I do have some reservations about the amendment; however, I am prepared to rule now. I am in the hands of hon. members as to whether they would like me to rule now or have the hon. member continue.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, after quick consultation with my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin), may I say he will be quite willing to yield the floor to you to give this judgment at this time. It is crucial that we have a ruling on the substance of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. We are quite in agreement with that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If you make your ruling now, Madam Speaker, you will not be permitting us to argue in advance of having prepared the ruling. I wonder if the hon. gentleman would like to continue his speech. I do not want to hold up the debate. What is being suggested could be done the first thing after question period. It appears there is some doubt on the part of the Chair. I would like to be able to consider an argument with respect to it because I put the motion forward quite seriously. I hope that will be agreeable to my hon. friend.

Madam Speaker: That is acceptable to me, if that is the desire of the House. If we hear the hon. gentleman, we will have to think about what we do at four o'clock. We would again have to decide whether to continue with this matter or take it up on Monday.

Mr. Collenette: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I misunderstood. I thought you were going to render a decision on the admissibility of the amendment proposed last evening. If you are saying you want to entertain argument, before you make your definitive decision, I suggest that we hold this over until Monday.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreeable to the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: We will hold it over until Monday.

Mr. Irwin: I will continue. Sir John A. Macdonald strengthened the union. He knew the union and knew what he wanted to do. We have gone through a traumatic experience in Quebec—and we have short memories if we do not think it was. Having overcome a cultural challenge, we are now looking at an economic challenge. It makes little difference to me if this country is destroyed culturally or economically. In the end, it is the same result.

Last weekend I was in my riding of Sault Ste. Marie. Whenever possible, I discussed the constitution with various friends. Quite frankly, in Sault Ste. Marie at this time of the year it is not the main topic of discussion. We do not stand on street corners and talk for 40 minutes about the constitutional debate. However, I did try. I found, as probably most members opposite found, that the people want patriation. They want an end to 50 years of endless and often needless debate. There is a time when you have to get off the ski lift and attack the hill. I suggest that members opposite are too frightened to get off the ski lift and do something.

Some people have asked, what is the disagreement. Actually, they ask what we are doing here. I have a certain difficulty explaining to them that on most of the items we have agreement. We all want patriation, we all want some charter, we all agree on entrenchment of fundamental rights such as conscience, religion, expression and a free press. There have been no serious disagreements about democratic rights such as voting and the duration of legislatures and parliaments. There have been some questions about mobility rights, but in our hearts, as indicated by the speeches, it is obvious to all present that we want Canadians to be able to move anywhere in Canada and work at what they want without having to be born in a specific province or having to live in a specific province for a certain number of months.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

REFERENCE OF CONTENTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered to study the contents of the Official Secrets Act and to recommend any changes that the committee deems necessary, in order that the act would be limited in its application to enemy espionage and offences to national security.

He said: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As indicated in the notice of motion, it should be obvious to some that the purpose of this motion is to revive a motion of a similar nature made in this House by my predecessor, the Hon. Gerald W. Baldwin, one of this nation's greatest champions of human rights. Mr. Baldwin, as I understand it, is now happily retired. I am sure he is watching us all very closely to make sure we do not let this motion get talked out, but will let it proceed uninhibited.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that unlike my predecessor's motion, my motion does not attempt to restrict the government's claim of Crown privilege in committee. Thus, I fail to see any reason why the government should not support this motion. All it asks is merely that the Official Secrets Act be studied with great care by the committee. There can be no harm in that, only a great deal of good.

I am confident all members on both sides of the House will support this motion in the same way as they supported the motion by Mr. Baldwin. I was not in the House the last time around, but now I and other newly elected members have the opportunity of showing our support for this badly needed public scrutiny of the Official Secrets Act.

I sincerely hope the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will once again show his support for this cause for which Mr. Baldwin struggled so long. It would indeed be fitting if today the House passed this motion, almost exactly one year since Mr. Baldwin moved his motion under Standing Order 43. It would, I feel, be a great gesture of respect and admiration for the many years Mr. Baldwin devoted to this place. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am asking hon. members to unanimously support this motion since doing so will result in a great step toward alleviating this nation of a 69-year old pain in the democratic neck.

I have recently been informed that the Department of Justice is presently reviewing this antiquated act. We in this House are all happy to hear it, but that should in no way constitute a reason for this House not passing my motion. We must act now, and since the Department of Justice is studying the matter I hope its officers will provide their full co-operation to the committee.

I hope the Prime Minister will again see the light as he did one year ago. I hope the government will not deny the people of this country the opportunity to take this legislation out of the justice department's dark and mysterious secret closets.

At this point I suppose I should begin to speak at length on the precise reasons for which this act is such an inherent evil contained within our statutes, but I feel we all know and have witnessed the detrimental results which occur when citizens have been prosecuted under it.

We all watched with disbelief as one of this nation's respected daily newspapers, The Toronto Sun, was prosecuted for merely carrying out its duty to the public. We stood aghast while good Canadian citizens such as Peter Treu were being stripped of their rights, and while people were being told they did not even have the right to a public trial. Today we sit and wonder why it has taken a decade, ten long, frustrating years, for the people whose rights were violated, for the truth about the October crisis, to begin to trickle out from the cracks of bureaucratic secrecy in the name of national security. Some 650 people were arrested during that nightmare in 1970—650 reasons why the Official Secrets Act must be reviewed.

I should mention that this is the first time I have risen in this House to speak. It is indeed a great honour for me and I look forward to the years ahead during which I hope I will do this place honour by upholding its many fine traditions. I should very much like to speak at length about the constituency of Peace River, explaining to you, Mr. Speaker, what makes the land of the mighty Peace such a glorious place to grow up in and such a beautiful place to grow old in. However, I am afraid I do not feel it appropriate that I go into that now. I feel it is more important to tell this House through you, Mr. Speaker, of the deeply felt concern and anxiety the people of the Peace River constituency are conveying to me at the present time. The people of Peace River, of Grande Prairie, of Valleyview, the people of all the towns, villages and hamlets, the native peoples, the people who work the land in order that the rest of the nation may put bread on its tables, the people who work 12 and 16-hour shifts seven days a week on the drilling rigs in order that the rest of the nation may be able to keep its houses warm in the winter, its food hot and its cars running; all the people of Peace River from all walks of life are worried. Their worries are increasing daily.

Does the Prime Minister know why they are worried? Does the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) know why they are worried? Does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) know why they are worried? I do not think they know; it is their job to know but they do not, and I suggest they do not because they do not want to know.

The people of Peace River are not frightened about the economy of the entire world sliding down hill, for they are strong and they know that with good government the country will continue to grow and develop. The people of Peace River are not afraid of global war because they know that is in the hands of God and not something they should worry about. They shall always voice their dismay at any war and they will always be ready to stand and defend their country, their Canada, from enemies which may threaten our borders.

What the people of Peace River fear is none of these things. They fear more than anything Canada's present federal government. This is a well-informed electorate and the people realize all too well the inherent dangers the entire nation faces today, particularly now when they hear members of the Trudeau administration talking about federal unilateral action on the constitution with referenda rigged in order that the federal government may bypass the people's chosen representatives in provincial legislatures.

The people of Peace River listen with astonishment as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tells people across the country that Albertans are villains, greedy culprits wanting to ruin the nation. They listen closely when the Prime Minister talks of how much he wishes to uphold the rights of Canadians and of how he wants to enshrine a bill of rights in the constitution, yet they are astounded when they hear this same Prime Minister saying it will be possible for these enshrined rights to be taken away through the federally-initiated mechanism of a referendum.

Members of the government say they will not take away the rights they will so graciously grant us. They tell us it is the people alone who will be able to take our rights away through this referendum mechanism. Looking back to 1970 it is possible to see what a fallacy this is. If the country had been put to a referendum at that time on whether the War Measures Act should be invoked I think the government would have found the support it needed. I will return to this subject in a moment.

First I should like to examine the real reason the federal government so badly wants the referenda clause inserted in the constitution. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is nothing but a means for this government to turn this country into a wholly unitary state. The people of my constituency are alarmed at this prospect for they know this country cannot function as a unitary state. They are not the only ones who realize this fact. If I may, I should like to refer the House to a quotation from a statement by one of the elder statesmen of this place. He said:

> —a unitary state simply will not work in Canada. Theoretically . . . a unitary state enables a country to deal with problems more quickly, more simply as they arise. But if it means breaking up the country, what kind of efficiency is that?

● (1610)

I wonder if the Right Hon. Prime Minister remembers saying those words. If not, Hansard of April 25, 1969, will serve to refresh his memory. Now the Prime Minister proposes to patriate the constitution unilaterally and he proposes to insert a clause enabling him to bypass the provincial governments. By doing so, he sets a very dangerous precedent; we all know that once power is taken, it is seldom if ever given back.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister has changed his mind since he pointed out the dangers of a unitary state over ten years ago. Does he now believe that a unitary state is not as dangerous as it was a decade ago? If he does believe this, then I and the people of Peace River must protest. By adopting this "deadlock-breaking mechanism", as the Prime Minister likes to refer to his section 42 of the Pierre Elliott Trudeau act, he is in fact bypassing the people's chosen regional representatives, and therefore he is setting up the initial step towards turning this country into a truly unitary state.

Once again I would refer the House to a statement the Prime Minister made about four years ago. On April 9, 1976, he told the nation, and again I quote:

> I have raised the possibility that Parliament might seek to have patriation accomplished without provincial consent if that consent seems impossible to achieve. Clearly it would be a last resort and clearly it should not be on the basis that could affect the distribution of powers or the position of the provinces. I must not provide any means by which Parliament could act unilaterally in future in any area where it cannot do so today since that would erode the essence of our federal system.

Yet is that not what he is doing right now? Is not section 42 of the constitutional resolution a means by which Parliament could act unilaterally in an area where it cannot do so today? And therefore would that not erode, as the Prime Minister himself indicated, the essence of our federal system? And, again according to the Prime Minister, would that not break up the country?

In looking to the future I can envisage a situation that would be considered a crisis, just as the events of October, 1970, were considered a crisis. I can envisage the federal government wanting to take advantage of the situation for political purposes, as it did in 1970.

The government would make a mountain out of a molehill, even though it would be a rather large molehill, just as it did in 1970 when the Hon. Jean Marchand stood up in the House and told the entire nation that there were over 3,000 terrorists in and around Montreal about to blow up the city and planning the overthrow of the national government. The truth of the matter, as has been shown in the recently-leaked Quebec government study, is that Marchand's statements were nothing more than a fabrication. I can see the government attempting some time in the future to whip the country into a frenzied panic in order that it may do what it wants, and in the way that it wants. The country will be goaded into believing that only the government can save it, just as happened in 1970. And the Official Secrets Act will be used to prevent any honest bureaucrat from coming forward with the truth for fear of being prosecuted.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the people of the Peace country are worried. They do not wish to see the country destroyed. They do not wish to see the Government of Canada, in the name of a crisis, move unilaterally into areas which are not its to move in.

They do not wish the government to have police state powers as listed in the War Measures Act or in the Official Secrets Act. They do not wish any of these things that could be brought about through a referendum.

But it seems the federal government will not listen. Its members are content with their formula. They care not that it will bring about a tyranny of the majority, because they know that it will open the door for them to turn Canada into a unitary state. But they are naive in thinking that they will be successful. The government will destroy the nation if it persists in its attempts, and this is what the people of my constituency fear more than anything.

The Prime Minister had the country sucked in in 1970, and he thinks he can suck the country in again in 1980. Well, he does not have me fooled, he does not have the people of the Peace River riding fooled and I am confident he does not have the people of Canada fooled.

The people of Canada want honest government. They do not want the Official Secrets Act as it now stands. They do not want one man or one party acting alone to change the constitution. They do not want any more propaganda on their television screens.

I think the time has come for this government to own up to the people. It is still not too late. It can still change its course; it can start right now by giving immediate approval to this motion. Let hon. members opposite reach into their consciences so that perhaps they may see the light, although it appears that too many years in power have forever dimmed the light of truth for the governing party of this country.

I would like to close by once again paying tribute to one of the greatest parliamentarians who has ever stood in this chamber. I think that Jed Baldwin is very happy that he is not here any more, that he does not have to put up with this government and its evil ways. But if he were here today, I know what it is he would tell this government. He would look hon. members opposite straight in the eye, and deliver his favourite quote from Scripture: "The truth shall set you free". In honour of this great man, I shall humbly repeat him: "The truth shall set you free".

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the need to review the Official Secrets Act must be obvious to everyone. It is certainly obvious to the members of the New Democratic Party, and we urge the government to give its full support to the motion as do we in the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) for his remarks in his maiden speech. It is my privilege today to address a few remarks to his motion, and I would like to repeat the motion because it is important.

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered to study the contents of the Official Secrets Act and to recommend any changes that the committee deems necessary, in order that the act would be limited in its application to enemy espionage and offences to national security.

A great deal of discussion has evolved around the Official Secrets Act, and just about everyone agrees there should be major amendments and a major redefinition. As most hon. members are aware, there is a great similarity between our act and the English act, as they were both fostered in the same country. In 1972 the Franks report, which is an English report dealing with the English act, said the following in the opening statement:

The Official Secrets Acts have been in existence in this country for only eighty years.

The Franks report sets out a fundamental evolution that we tend to forget. It states that, and I quote:

—economic manoeuvres (of a country) have come to be considered no less vital to the basis of the life of the community than the movement of its troops.

We are talking economic war nowadays as well as atomic war and war by machines.

The Franks report also points out a second very important evolution with regard to the massive information we have now accumulated. There is a feeling that the government should safeguard the confidences of its citizens almost as strictly as it guards information of use to an enemy. It is staggering to the bureaucracies just how much information we do have about individuals, and there is an onus on us to use that information tactfully and for the purposes intended and not to make headlines for The Toronto Sun.

● (1620)

The Franks report sets out one of the more definitive sections which I have read on general issues. It states:

We have so far indicated these wider issues in the most general terms. But they can be more simply expressed. Even a democratic government requires a measure of secrecy for some of its functions, as a means whereby it can better carry out its duties on behalf of the people. Among the primary tasks of government are the defence of the nation from external threats, the maintenance of relations with the rest of the world and the preservation of law and order. Defence against external attack would be severely prejudiced if potential enemies had access, directly or indirectly, to the details of our plans and weapons. It would be impossible to negotiate with other countries if all discussion, however delicate, was conducted completely in the open. Some measures for the prevention or detection of crime would be ineffective if they were known to criminals. Some of the internal processes of government should be conducted in confidence if they are to result in effective policies.

Against this need for security, the report then goes on, at page 12, to give the other side of the coin, the need of citizens for openness by governments, when it states:

A government which pursues secret aims, or which operates in greater secrecy than the effective conduct of its proper functions requires, or which turns information services into propaganda agencies, will lose the trust of the people.

That is so true.

It will be countered by ill-formed and destructive criticism.

That is also true.

Its critics will try to break down all barriers erected to preserve secrecy, and they will disclose all that they can—

We have seen that happen.

—by whatever means, discover.

We have seen that happen.

As a result, matters will be revealed when they ought to remain secret in the interests of the nation.

These two statements, so simply put in the classical English method, reek with the sound of truth and common sense. A balance must be struck by the government and guidelines must be drafted that are utilitarian and understandable.

There is a need for security in certain matters, but there is a greater need for our civil servants to deal effectively with the public, knowing the limits of their authority and without fear of repercussion, such as losing their jobs. We do not need civil servants who say nothing because they have been burnt too many times, nor civil servants who say too much because they do not know any better or out of a sense of pure vindictiveness.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has set certain guidelines. Quite frankly, I understand four of them and I have difficulty with the fifth. In the first four he wants public servants to communicate with the public, members of Parliament and the news media. The guidelines encourage frankness. There is an admonition not to discuss advice or recommendations tendered to ministers or to speculate about policy deliberations or future policy decisions. These are contained in the first four sections. It is the fifth section which ties in with what the hon. member was saying, because the guideline states:

These guidelines cannot and do not authorize the disclosure of information which is specifically prohibited by law.

The problem is that we do not know what is specifically prohibited by law.

As Sir Lionel Heald, former attorney general of England said, in the extreme case, the official act would:

—make it a crime, without any possibility of defence, to report the number of cups of tea consumed per week in a government department.

Sir Lionel was probably overstating the case, but he was not overstating the problem. Most of the disclosures are handled either as disciplinary matters or merely as a learning experience where a subordinate is talked to by his superior. This is a normal administrative procedure designed to deal with unintentional disclosure, or disclosure resulting from lack of experience. This policy will continue.

The problem with which we are dealing today is not the same. The problem today is: when does disclosure become a criminal offence.

The Official Secrets Act can be divided into two sections, the espionage section and the unintentional leakage section. The recent Peter Treu and Toronto Sun cases are examples of leakage. The espionage cases are self-evident and I will return to them in a minute.

There is a great deal of thought being given to dividing these two types of offences and putting them in different statutes; to put the espionage section in the Criminal Code and the leakage section in what could be termed a legal statute, and then repealing the act. This is probably what we should do, although I cannot speak for the government.

There is a line of thought—and if you have done Crown attorney work or been a Crown attorney, it is quite cogent—which says keep them together. We should consider this, because in many cases when there is a moral certainty that a person is guilty of espionage, he cannot be convicted, for one reason or another. In many cases, the witnesses refuse to testify and then, even though the process may start at that level, it winds up as a conviction for leakage. Notwithstanding this, I think that on the whole the weight of opinion leans toward dividing up the offences, which is what I think is the intention of the hon. member in his motion.

I think the problem is much broader than this, and that is why I would not recommend endorsing the motion. The Official Secrets Act was passed in 1939, and prior to that time we were governed by the 1911 English legislation applying to our country. Several minor changes were made in 1950, 1967, 1970 and 1973. Half of the Canadian prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act arose as a result of the defection of Igor Gouzenko in 1946 when he was trying to set up a spy network in Canada. Since that time there have been only four prosecutions: Against Biernacki in 1961, Featherston in 1967, Treu in 1978, and recently The Toronto Sun, its publisher and editor. Biernacki was a landed immigrant from Poland who was doing some advance work in preparation for setting up a spy ring in Canada. He was discharged at the preliminary hearing because, in the words of the then Judge Shorteno, the information was "insignificant, worthless public information".

To some, this decision might indicate that our civil liberties are well protected. To others, it might leave the impression that we need more internal security, more manpower or more teeth in our legislation.

The Featherston case was clearcut. Featherston was convicted for attempting to pass secret marine charts to the Soviets showing positions of shipwrecks off the east coast. I gather—I am no expert on submarines and my lack of knowledge of maritime law is so significant that it is worthy of respect—that submarines can use these shipwrecks to remain undetected by radar. Featherston was convicted and he received a sentence of two and a half years.

Treu, as you know, Mr. Speaker, was ultimately acquitted and The Toronto Sun, which published a "top secret" document outlining suspected Russian activity in Canada, was also acquitted when Judge Carl Waisberg said that "the document was no longer, if ever, secret".

Let me say as an aside that the Treu case was conducted in camera. In that case the lawyer made no objection so I do not know whether he preferred it or whether he just felt he could do nothing about it. But that should be something we should consider: should there be the absolute right, except in certain specific circumstances where the onus lies on the Crown, for the accused to have an open trial?

Under a section of the act—I do not know the exact number of the section but I think it is section 50—the Crown may proceed either by indictment or summarily. The option is the Crown's, the penalties are so diverse and the act gives such great powers to the Crown that we should look seriously at those two sections and, as has been recommended by several leading authorities, we should get rid of one, perhaps the summary section, to go with the indictment and to grade our penalties. The Dollard commission, I think, suggested life in one circumstance and six years in another.

There is no right to a jury, and this is probably the only really serious offence where there is no right to a jury. I certainly feel this right should be given. This is something that should be considered. It could be solved easily by following the McDonald commission and making the jury subject to a quasi-official secrets act, and if they speak of the evidence at any time thereafter, they could be convicted of a crime. In that way, the accused would have the right to a jury and the secrets could be protected.

A very good book has been written by M. L. Friedland of the faculty of law of the university of Toronto and was commissioned for the McDonald commission. It is called "National Security: The Legal Dimensions." In that book, Mr. Friedland dealt with many presumptions. Naturally I have not read every statute, but I have never seen so many presumptions against an accused in such a short document as the Official Secrets Act. I have always disliked evidentiary presumptions. I say that because of my experience as a former police commissioner, a one-time prosecutor and a bureaucrat who had to regulate for a short period of time. Presumptions are short cuts that lead to laziness and a mistrust of the judicial system, but I have never seen them make the system better. As a matter of fact, the more the presumptions the better chance the accused, even if acquitted, will walk away from the courtroom with the sense that justice was not done. Mr. Friedland dealt fairly with the presumptions. He showed how presumptions are used to foster further presumptions. If "A" occurs there is a presumption that "B" occurs; because "B" is presumed then "C" is presumed. It goes beyond what one would normally expect to find in presumption sections. This should be looked at by the committee. I doubt some of these sections would even stand up if the constitutional act passed.

● (1630)

Page 54 of Mr. Friedland's book deals with the penalties for the offence of leakage, a maximum of 14 years being much too high. Even though the courts would never impose it, they assume when Parliament assigns so many years to an offence that it is an indication of our disposition toward the crime. I do not think anyone here intends that 14 years should be the maximum penalty for leakage. I found page 57 of this book interesting. I was a regulator for the CRTC for three years, and I was a part-time commissioner. I have a fair knowledge of the way the media works. There is no such thing as a free media because many things govern what it does, such as the publishers, the size of the media or the advertisers. But there is a growing concern in the country that the media feels it has the right to publish anything it gets its hands on by whatever means. This is not the attitude of Mr. Friedland, nor is it the attitude of the McDonald commission. Recommendation 14 reads as follows:

The communication of government information relating to security and intelligence or the administration of criminal justice by a person who receives such information, even though such information is unsolicited, be an offence.

I think that view should be supported and it is something at which the committee should be looking. Also Mr. Friedland dealt with designation by the minister: should the minister have the right to designate something top secret or should the court decide? It is important that the courts decide because almost everything accessible to bureaucrats is marked "confidential" or words to that effect. It is a system that is too loose to be incorporated in what we traditionally regard as the criminal law.

The final report of the McDonald commission dated October 9, 1979, was very refreshing. It pulled no punches, it was clear and concise, readable and understandable. One does not have to be a lawyer to understand it perfectly, whether one agrees with all of it, some of it or none of it. I agree with the intent of the motion of the hon. member, but there is a weakness in it. It is the strict limitation of the motion which is evident even upon a cursory review of the first report of the McDonald commission. I will run through a few of the sections. Recommendation 1 suggests a single enactment of offences relating to espionage. Recommendation 2 suggests that espionage offences apply only to communications directed to a foreign power. Recommendation 5 sets out the definition of espionage. It is a good definition, but in itself it should be the subject of great debate because the report of the McDonald commission recommends that an offence occurs:

—if such persons know that the foreign power will or might use some information for a purpose prejudicial to the security of Canada or acts with reckless disregard of the consequences of their actions to the security of Canada.

Is that standard too narrow? Should it be broader than that or should we just say, "If it is a reckless disregard you will be convicted; if it is not, even though it might be negligence, you will not be convicted."? Recommendation 6 would repeal the provisions of the act relating to a prohibited place, which has not been an issue here but has been an issue on nuclear rearmament in England. Recommendation 7 deals with harbouring and suggests that a person accused of harbouring should only be convicted if he or she has knowledge of the commission or the anticipated commission of an espionage offence. It is a narrower definition than the old one and fairer to the person who might be caught in the situation of meeting up with someone who has been involved in espionage. Recommendation 8 is a suggestion for a new offence, the possession of espionage instruments. It is similar to the possession of burglar tools.

There are several recommendations dealing with leakage which merit careful scrutiny by the standing committee. Recommendation 19 suggests the removal of the summary conviction provisions. Recommendations 20 and 21 deal with juries. Recommendation 22 suggests that the espionage section be increased to life imprisonment in one case and to six years in the other, whereas in recommendation 23, the McDonald commission recommended that the penalty be reduced from 14 years to six years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak for a few moments on this motion. I congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) for continuing the excellent work of his predecessor, the Hon. Jed Baldwin, who started the fight many years ago for the freedom of information. Mr. Baldwin is a very honourable gentleman who is well respected by members on all sides of the House.

I should like to deal further with the position of the Conservative party in supporting this motion and our position regarding freedom of information. We have a policy paper respecting freedom of information. We made it perfectly clear that the Conservative party approved the freedom of information principle in the 1972, 1974 and 1979 elections. Mr. Baldwin conducted a cross-Canada newspaper campaign to elicit public support for freedom of information legislation and received about 4,000 letters of support from individual Canadians; this support is probably much larger today. A couple of years ago an all-party committee on freedom of information in its report urged:

—all members of Parliament, on a non-partisan basis, to join the committee and press for strong freedom of information legislation in the present session of Parliament.

Also the committee made the following recommendations:

That freedom of information legislation be enacted in the present session of Parliament.

That the act provide for judicial review by a panel of federal court judges.

That the exemptions for releasing documents be specifically and narrowly drafted.

That the freedom of information bills presented by the government be subject to a free vote.

Our policy paper under the section entitled: "Official Secrets Act" reads as follows:

A Progressive Conservative government will review the procedures used in the classification of government documents to ensure that non-sensitive material is not classified and its release and discussion thereby prevented.

In the last Conservative government the Conservative House leader, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), released a statement on freedom of information legislation. He stated:

Instead of everything in the government's possession being secret unless decided otherwise, everything will now be public unless declared secret under precise terms defined by Parliament.

It is unfortunate that we cannot get the present government to take that position. One wonders what it is trying to hide all the time. I think this comes from having been in office too long. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) also stated that it was the intention to enable taxpayers to find out just what their government is up to and just how their money is being spent. I think Canadian taxpayers certainly have a right to know this. In a statement made on October 24, 1979, he said legal opinions generated within the government should be released. We had an example today, when we were discussing the constitution, of the government refusing to give us any information they have on legal opinions whether it is legal or not to bring the constitution back in the way they are proposing. We thought we were making some headway when the present Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), in July of this year, introduced a bill to lift the curtain of secrecy. That hope was short-lived, because a secret document leaked in August—it seems the majority of our documents are leaked to us, which is a ridiculous way for the official opposition and the other opposition parties to be able to ask proper questions—stated the information bill had a very low priority with the present government. The parliamentary secretary tells us how they support a bill and what a wonderful bill it is, congratulating the hon. member on his fine efforts. Then they talk it out right until five o'clock. I think that is ridiculous. This would be an excellent bill to refer to a committee for discussion; the committee could carry on with its work while the House carries on here with its work. Maybe we will find a parliamentary secretary today on the Liberal side with some intestinal fortitude who will refuse to read out the civil-servant-prepared document he was given to enable him to talk this out until five o'clock. Let us have a little surprise from the other side of the House on this Friday afternoon.

● (1640)

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) this afternoon. I followed his remarks on his motion very closely. The motion reads as follows:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered to study the contents of the Official Secrets Acts and to recommend any changes that the committee deems necessary, in order that the Act would be limited in its application to enemy espionage and offences to national security.

I was about to tell the hon. member he was continuing the tradition espoused by his predecessor from Peace River and would be a vigorous spokesman for open government. However, he did not say very much about his motion. He used most of his time to enter the constitutional debate. I might say to the hon. member that his predecessor would not have done that.

There are two broad themes I wish to develop in my remarks. I think the last speaker will be pleased to hear that like the hon. member on his motion I believe there is good reason to reform the Official Secrets Act. However, I cannot accept his motion at this time. The wording of the motion is quite wrong. It prejudges the work of the standing committee. I also believe this is not a suitable time to refer the Official Secrets Act to a standing committee of the House.

Before elaborating on my areas of agreement and disagreement with the hon. member I will refer briefly to some of the background to the current situation. Canada's Official Secrets Act is the outgrowth of a United Kingdom statute and in many important respects it continues to parallel the legislation on the statute books at Westminster. The first U.K. law was passed in 1889 due to continuing leaks of government information. It was aimed at preventing unauthorized disclosure of government information, whether for espionage or for other reasons. The first Canadian Official Secrets Act was passed in 1890 and its provisions were transferred to the Criminal Code when it was enacted in 1892. The official secrets provisions in the Criminal Code were amended in 1911 in conjunction with U.K. amendments introduced the same year. The official secrets provisions remained in the Code until 1939, when Parliament passed a separate statute, which was largely carry-forward of the Criminal Code provisions.

The Official Secrets Act deals with two broad areas of concern. The first is a series of offences related to espionage. These offences are found in section three of the act, with a few exceptions. The second area is authorized disclosure, loosely described as leakage, and a number of related offences which are found in section four. Since 1939 there have been 21 prosecutions for breaches of our Official Secrets Act, or conspiracy to breach the act. Nine of them resulted in convictions. Three prosecutions were based on section four—leakage—alone, and section four was used as an additional count in another. All the other prosecutions were based on section three—espionage. The great majority of prosecutions arose as a result of the 1946 defection of Igor Gouzenko, a Soviet embassy employee in Ottawa. Gouzenko told a tale of intrigue about Soviet spy operations in Canada. Since the Gouzenko incident there have been only four prosecutions, two for espionage and two for leakage. Only one of these prosecutions, for espionage, resulted in a conviction.

I do not intend to discuss in detail today the espionage provisions of the Official Secrets Act. My reasons for not doing so are related to my reasons for opposing this motion. For over three years a commission of inquiry—the McDonald commission—has been examining the policies and practices which now apply to the protection of the security of Canada. Matters of security, of course, involve dangers from abroad, including espionage, as well as internal threats to our democratic institutions. But we have yet to receive a comprehensive report from the commission of inquiry on matters of security policy. Until we have that report it would be unwise for Parliament to prejudge the most appropriate way for us to deal with official secrets legislation. Therefore I suggest we wait until we have the main report in our hands. Then we can decide how best to tackle the crucial issues it will raise.

Before discussing the leakage issue, however, let me touch briefly on one particular aspect of the espionage provisions—their ambiguity. This aspect can be discussed without having the full McDonald commission report on security matters. The troubling issue here is that it is not clear whether the type of information which is covered by espionage provisions must be "secret official" information or whether it need not be "secret" and "official". On this point, Canadian jurisprudence favours a restrictive approach, that is, secret official information must be communicated for there to be an offence.

● (1650)

The jurisprudence can be traced to a decision in 1949 in a case before the Quebec Court of Appeal. All decisions since then have reflected the restrictive approach. The U.K. jurisprudence supports the unrestrictive approach; that is, all information is covered by the espionage offence and not just secret official information. While research conducted for the McDonald commission tends to support the U.K. jurisprudence, the main point that emerges is that there is confusion relating to the scope of our current espionage law. Whatever else we do, therefore, we shall have to clarify the scope of the legislation that deals with espionage.

Leakage is the second matter dealt with in the Official Secrets Act. In my view, there is little doubt that there are shortcomings in the current statutory provisions. This has been shown quite conclusively in the report of the McKenzie Royal Commission on Security, the report of the 1972 Franks committee in the U.K., and the first report of the McDonald Commission, made available late last year.

Let me state some of the main concerns regarding the leakage provisions. First, it is probably not appropriate that the offence of unauthorized disclosure should be dealt with in the same statute as the far more serious offence of espionage. People tend to think of the Official Secrets Act as the statute under which spies are prosecuted. Therefore, any person charged under the Official Secrets Act may, to some extent, be tainted by the perception that he has, however indirectly, been associated with activities that involve disloyalty to Canada.

Second, the leakage provisions are ambiguous in a variety of respects. There is controversy about whether they cover all government information or only secret official information; that is, the same uncertainty that exists in relation to the scope of the espionage provisions applies also in respect of leakage.

There is also ambiguity concerning the procedures for authorizing disclosure. It is apparent that much government information is disclosed without the express approval of cabinet, and that these disclosures are not viewed as offences. The reason they are not considered offences can be traced to the doctrine of "implied authorization"—a doctrine which rests heavily on the view that public servants are free, indeed required, to communicate information where such communication can be reasonably seen as part of their responsibilities. While there is much common sense in this view, the doctrine is not expressly acknowledged in the current statute. Consequently, we cannot be certain that the Canadian courts would accept it as an unwritten part of the law.

A further area of ambiguity in the current leakage provisions relates to uncertainty about whether mens rea—that is, knowledge of guilt—must be present for there to be an offence. This too helps to create doubts regarding the scope of offences found in section 4.

Third, there are grounds to believe that the act may be too far-reaching. Under its provisions, a person can be convicted for unauthorized disclosure, and thus imprisoned, without any requirement that the Crown prove damage to important Canadian interests. I hope that the offence can be redefined and made to focus on acts that involve real injury.

There is one further serious shortcoming in the current provisions of the Official Secrets Act. For reasons that are partly related to the current ambiguities in the act, it is difficult for the government to prosecute those who are thought to be guilty of an offence under its provisions, and it is even more difficult to secure a conviction. Thus, there is the paradox of a statute which appears to some to be too far-reaching in its scope, but which is nonetheless of limited value in protecting the security of Canada.

Accordingly, at the appropriate time, it will be important for Parliament to consider measures to reform the Official Secrets Act. At that time, it will be important to find the right balance between the need to promote open government, and related values like effective Parliamentary opposition and freedom of speech and of the press, on the one hand, and the obvious necessity of protecting specific categories of government information against unauthorized disclosure, on the other.

The necessity to protect certain categories of information brings me to my second objection to the motion before us today. That motion prejudges the conclusions and recommendations of the studies that the standing committee is asked to undertake. The motion presumes that reform of the Official Secrets Act would afford no protection to government information except in the context of espionage and security. However, there are other cogent reasons to safeguard information; and while it may be that some of that protection need not be afforded through the Official Secrets Act, I would be very surprised if the only categories of information that require protection were those set out in the motion. In this respect, I would draw attention to the fact that governments the world over, including those of other western democracies, recognize the necessity of affording such protection.

What categories of information do governments have to protect against disclosure? Government information is generally protected where: first, the disclosure may be expected to injure the national interest; second, the information relates to the private affairs of individuals or businesses, and third, the disclosure would contribute to a weakening in the effective operation of government. These reasons, of course, lie behind the exemption provisions in the Access to Information portion of Bill C-43, and similar exemptions in the freedom of information legislation in other jurisdictions.

The first two reasons are straightforward. For example, it is generally accepted that governments should not be required to disclose information that would be injurious to the defence of Canada or that would jeopardize the investigation or prevention of subversive activities. It is similarly agreed that information received in confidence from an individual or business should generally be protected. Although the practical application of these reasons can raise difficulties in particular cases, there is likely a consensus that the reasons themselves provide a legitimate basis for refusing to disclose information.

The third reason—the effective operation of government—is sometimes ignored. Let me say a few words about this. At the centre of our decision-making processes is, of course, the cabinet. Under the Canadian constitutional system, the cabinet is collectively responsible to Parliament for government policy. While individual ministers may argue against particular cabinet decisions, and indeed accept them with misgivings, those ministers are nonetheless a part of the team that is responsible for what has been decided; they must acquiesce in the decisions or, if they cannot do so, they must resign.

If the deliberations of cabinet were public, this would derogate from the doctrine of cabinet responsibility. It would then be unclear if the cabinet as a whole, or just the ministers who concurred in a decision, were responsible for it. Indeed, I would go so far as to suggest that if the deliberations of cabinet were made public, including recommendations and advice that are a part of those deliberations, this would alter constitutional relationships between the principal institutions of our political system in an absolutely fundamental way.

Of course, it may be that certain categories of information can be protected without resort to the Official Secrets Act—that we should reserve the criminal sanction for only the most serious breaches. This will require careful consideration. But where a leak of information can cause injury to the defence or security of Canada, or jeopardize lives, or impede criminal investigations, or otherwise cause damage on a large scale, the government surely has an obligation to its citizens to protect such information by all reasonable means. It would be remiss if it failed to safeguard such information.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEFINITION OF "PRODUCER"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas the use of producer cars is the only alternative available to farmers from being locked into the commercial elevator system; whereas a recent interpretation of "producer", as it appears in the act, prohibits two or more producers from combining their grain or rape to fill a producer car, which takes away the right from smaller producers; and whereas the Canada Grain Act has recognized this right of producers for many years, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House request the Minister of Agriculture to bring in forthwith an amendment to the said section of the Canada Grain Act or pass a regulation stipulating that "producer" means more than one farmer, which has been the interpretation throughout the years until recently.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

CALL FOR INCLUSION IN BUDGET OF EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the callous answer of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to 12,000 unemployed workers demonstrating at Queen's Park last Saturday was that his ministry would introduce a new national manpower strategy to take full effect in 1990. As this is an urgent and pressing matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration start burning the midnight oil, if he can negotiate for its supply, in order that his secret employment strategy might be included in the government's forthcoming budget on October 28. Perhaps this would demonstrate that the minister appreciates the need for job creation now in 1980, not ten years hence in 1990.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR TESTING

CALL FOR PROTEST OF TEST CONDUCTED BY CHINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the cloud of radioactive fall-out from Chinese nuclear testing is now reaching Ontario and is, therefore, threatening to become a matter of national concern, and whereas no matter where it is, such fall-out is to be deplored as a further hazard to the human and non-human environment and as another sign of the world's self-destructive commitment to the nuclear arms race, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the Canadian government be instructed by this House to protest the Chinese actions and to call on the Chinese government to stop all nuclear testing.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PATRIATION—REPORTED REMARKS OF BRITISH MP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Madam Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Given the fact that parliamentarians of any country and of whatever political stripe are welcome as guests in Canada, given the fact that Canada's hospitality in this regard is seldom abused, given the fact that British labour MP, Bruce George, is now telling us that unless certain action is taken by the Canadian Parliament, he and some of his colleagues in England will treat patriation as a sticky wicket, and given the fact that Canadian parliamentarians are quite capable of managing Canadian affairs—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: —and, unlike Mr. George, we have abandoned the colonial mentality, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson):

That a message be sent to this British MP telling him that we do not wish to "let George do it" and that if he continues in his present vein he be asked to repatriate himself.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

INDEXING PROVISIONS FOR SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): In view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) told this House last Friday that nobody on the government side could possibly have said no to my motion, thereby indicating that she supported it and gave me every reason to expect unanimous consent for my motion, therefore, Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I again move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the government give consideration to eliminating the eat-out portion of the cost of food for indexing purposes for old age pensioners, or, secondly, tying pensions to the poverty level.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am not in a position to say whether this is exactly the same motion but I will put it again to the House. The motion, for presentation, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Collenette said no.

THE STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA

TRADING OF SHARES—CALL FOR INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that since June of this year approximately one-third of the common shares of The Steel Company of Canada have been traded and in the last week more than 250,000 shares have been traded in one day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government instruct that an inquiry be conducted to determine the reasons for the most recent, significant and unusual trading of The Steel Company of Canada shares and that particular attention be paid to the question whether or not this action in the marketplace reflects a possible takeover of The Steel Company of Canada by non-Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR DISPUTES

GIANT YELLOWKNIFE MINES LTD.—CALL FOR ACTION TO RESOLVE DISPUTE WITH UNION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the strike between the Canadian Aluminum Smelter and Allied Workers Union and Giant Yellowknife Mines Ltd. is now in its fourth month, thereby causing considerable hardships to both sides of the dispute as well as adversely affecting the economy of the Northwest Territories, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Labour make real efforts to resolve this unfortunate industrial dispute and, more important, introduce amendments to the Canada Labour Code to enable the territorial legislature to enact its own labour legislation so that disputes not of national scope can be handled at the territorial level rather than being under the jurisdiction of the federal government, which has neither the time nor the inclination to deal with these important yet local issues.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CALL FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO REVIEW PENSION POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of recent and continuing reports from recognized pension experts that the Canada Pension Plan will be bankrupt in less than 20 years unless steps are now taken to increase contributions and revise the plan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the House direct the government to create a special committee to review pension policy in general and the Canada Pension Plan in particular, to ensure that today's contributors will not be tomorrow's short-changed pensioners.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HIGHWAYS

MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY, NEWFOUNDLAND—DANGEROUS CROSSING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the operation of Memorial University of Newfoundland in St. John's has been effectively closed down as of Friday last, after thousands of university students gathered to protest unsafe pedestrian conditions on the university campus; in view of the fact that some nine students have been hit by vehicles since September, several of whom have been seriously injured and one of whom has been killed, and in view of the fact that Memorial University's student union has exhausted every other reasonable measure to have this hazardous condition corrected, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker):

That this House support the 8,000 students at Memorial University of Newfoundland who have gathered in peaceful and responsible protest and are requesting that the university, the city and the provincial government act now to build an overpass or underpass across the four-lane highway which students are presently forced to cross at great risk to their personal health and lives.

Madam Speaker: I have some doubt as to the acceptability of this motion. It seems to be a matter of provincial jurisdiction and therefore I would ask the hon. member to send his motion to the Chair so that we can see whether it is acceptable and put it on another day if we find that it is.

CHARGES OF VIOLATIONS MADE BY NATIVE COUNCIL OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, the Native Council of Canada has started action before an international tribunal in Amsterdam charging the Canadian government with gross violations of international human and civil rights conventions. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House requests the government to respond to the very serious charges of human rights violations filed with the Russell Tribunal in Amsterdam by the Native Council of Canada and that we object strenuously to the methods of constitutional change now before Parliament, particularly those which deal with the entrenchment of a charter of rights, until such time as the three recognized native organizations, including the Native Council of Canada, have been fully consulted with regard to such changes which may directly affect Indian and other native rights.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PROMISE TO REDUCE EXPENDITURE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On October 10 the Minister of Finance said in this House that the Liberal platform promises on the economy "will be implemented in the budget".

On January 12 of last year the Prime Minister made a speech to the Liberal Campaign College at Toronto. There were five themes to the economic program. The Prime Minister said, and I quote him exactly, "We will hold the line on government expenditure growth to under the rate of GNP".

The Minister of Finance has admitted that spending is up this year 13.7 per cent. We know that for the first six months of this year the GNP is down, and it will be negative this year, so that if the Prime Minister is to carry out his promise, government spending should be less than last year. We know that for the first five months of the year government spending is up 17 per cent.

Would the Prime Minister tell the House how he is going to carry out this already broken promise or whether he is going to direct the Minister of Finance to see that this solemn promise he made in Toronto on January 12 is met this year?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance did indicate that he would explain in his budget how he intends to carry on his economic management. The hon. member should know that this is a year of adjustment, having had to reconsider the estimates voted down by Parliament and which the hon. member himself had drawn up. If he can be patient for a few days he will learn how the Minister of Finance will manage our economy in the next years.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. I know he is aging; he is now 61, but perhaps he will answer.

I remind the Prime Minister that in his speech in Toronto he said this: "Liberals will do what we say we will do". The Prime Minister said in that same speech—and this is one of his themes—and I quote: "This party will not simply stand by and let the recession come. We will fight it and overcome it".

We have had six months of recession. Real growth was down 2.5 per cent in the first quarter and 4.3 per cent in the second quarter. The Prime Minister has stood by for eight months and let the recession go forward. When is he going to start the fight? His Minister of Finance says he cannot stimulate the economy in his coming budget. Will the Prime Minister instruct the Minister of Finance, if he is to stimulate the economy and carry out the Prime Minister's pledge, the good old fight, not to let any recession start in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, as I indicated a moment ago, if the hon. member is patient, he will learn the detailed strategy of the government in the budget to be tabled in a few days.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, we have been patient for eight months. My final supplementary is addressed to the Prime Minister. Perhaps the Prime Minister will amend the constitution and fight the recession that way. Perhaps he will make a constitutional amendment to outlaw or stop recessions in their tracks.

In his same speech the Prime Minister said, and I quote: "We must endorse the right of every Canadian to have a job". On September 20, 757,000 Candians were unemployed, 38,000 more than at the same time last year. The Prime Minister said, "We must guarantee the income security of our older citizens." Now the cost of living is is up 10.7 per cent, up 0.9 per cent in September due to food costs.

Is the Prime Minister going to have our senior citizens stop eating, or is he going to take some action? What action is the Prime Minister going to take with respect to more employment and guaranteeing income security for elderly citizens by battling inflation? Is he going to direct the Minister of Finance that he is not to de-index the income tax, which would harm senior citizens? Will he at least follow up—

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Never mind putting the question on to the Minister of State (Finance)—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is unaware of the activities of the House, because one of the first bills which the House had to approve was indeed aimed at helping senior citizens meet our economic difficulties. I would like also to remind him that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has announced plans to help those who experience more difficulties to find employment in our society. I have also been told that recently falling employment rates are encouraging indications of possible development in the employment sector.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE RESPECTING ACTUARIAL SOUNDNESS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is for the Minister of State for Social Development, the minister who is a custodian of social development. Given the fact that over the weekend an internationally recognized actuary said, to a group in Vancouver, that by the year 2000, unless the government takes steps now, the Canada Pension Plan will be bankrupt, and given the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadians look to this plan as their only means of income security in their old age, what assurances is the minister able to give the House, and through the House to the country, and what steps has the government taken, to ensure that the Canada Pension Plan is in fact actuarially sound and can deliver?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, we are not playing musical chairs this afternoon. Let me say in response to the hon. member for St. John's East that when the Canada Pension Plan was set up, it was recognized that unless changes were made in contribution rates, by 1985 they would have to be renegotiated; otherwise we would have the scenario which has been developed over the weekend by the expert that was mentioned.

It is safe to say that the Department of National Health and Welfare and this government are committed to pension reform and it is one of the top priorities of the minister and her department. Since February of 1977 a special subcommittee has been reporting to the Minister of Finance which involves his deputy ministers and his finance counterparts in the provinces. The subcommittee has been meeting and discussing what kind of changes will take place over the next five years in the pension plan so that we can ensure for the people of this country a fiscally sound pension plan, particularly for our elderly.

In addition, we are convinced that some changes have to take place over the next five years, and we are well on top of this. We will begin with a conference in the spring of 1981 which will be held here in Ottawa to start the necessary reforms to our pension act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, unfortunately I cannot raise a point of order during the question period but I should like to have guidance from Your Honour. It seems to me that recently we passed legislation in the House setting up a Ministry of State for Social Development. Surely my question should have been answered by the minister who has that statutory responsibility.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. A question has been asked. A minister may or may not answer a question. A parliamentary secretary may answer in his place. I fail to see a point of order. But if the hon. member has a supplementary question, I will give him the floor.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I stand by your admonition.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker—

Mr. McGrath: Go ahead, please.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we are like the Phillies; we have a very good designated hitter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: They need all the designated hitters they can get. I should like to ask the minister responsible for social policy the following question. The report of the task force on retirement income systems in Canada was tabled in the House on April 21 of this year. The government has taken no action on the report. It identifies, for example, the plight of retired homemaking women in this country who represent a disproportionately high number of the poor of this nation, which I think is a disgrace. One of the recommendations of that report is that the homemaking spouse, who is generally a woman, should be included under the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan. Is it the intention of this government to honour that election commitment which it made and include women in the Canada Pension Plan?

Mr. Frith: Madam Speaker, it is the intention of this government to implement all of the policy directives which were announced, I believe, in April of 1979 by the Prime Minister with respect to the reforms that are required in this country to give adequate protection to our elderly. I know that to a large extent my minister and her department are totally committed to a reform of the pension system which will address the inequalities which exist now for women in Canada.

INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES LAW ON CANADIAN FIRMS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question which I would like to direct to the Prime Minister. I will keep my eyes open to see who stands up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1425)

Mr. Deans: Now we have that out of the way, I wonder if the Prime Minister shares the concerns expressed over the weekend by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the application extraterritorially of American law in Canada as it has affected Canadian industry. Recognizing that, does he realize its detrimental effect on Canada's fishing industry, auto industry, steel industry and in particular recently on the Bombardier company that was required to set up a company in the United States in order to do business there? What does the Prime Minister propose to do in Canada, using the available resources and manpower, in order to build the Canadian economy on behalf of Canadians?

An hon. Member: Put it in the constitution.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to the quotes of the hon. member, it seems to me he is stating government policy of wanting to be in control of our own domestic economic environment, and that is the government's line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: That is the government's line. I have a supplementary question, if I may. Is the Prime Minister aware that in the last year there were 65,000 jobs lost in the province of Ontario; that on every single working day over the course of the last 12 months almost 1,000 people were laid off? Can the Prime Minister indicate what kind of permanent job-creation programs, based on the human and natural resources of Canada, we can expect to see from the government over the course of the next two or three years which might stabilize our economy, free us from the unnecessary influence of the United States and allow us to be masters in our own home economically?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not sure if at this time the hon. member wants me to review all Canadian government policies regarding foreign investments.

Mr. Deans: Yes, please do.

Mr. Trudeau: If that is the case, I must submit to him that during question period is not the point at which it can be done. But I must remind him, as the member of the official opposition was reminded, that the budget will be brought down on October 30.

An hon. Member: October 28.

Mr. Trudeau: On October 28.

Mr. Crosbie: Your memory is going.

Mr. Trudeau: It would seem to me that this kind of preoccupation is not only one the hon. member would want to discuss in the budget debate, but likely is one the minister will be addressing himself since the problem of unemployment ranks very high in his preoccupations.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I understand from what the Minister of Finance said that unemployment does not rank very highly in his preoccupations.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Deans: Recognizing that there are so many unemployed in Canada and that there are few new jobs being created, either by the government or by anyone else at this point in time, can the Prime Minister provide for the House information on a program to guarantee that people who in fact will be unemployed are given adequate notice, that plants planning to close down permanently or temporarily must justify those decisions before the public, and that there maybe some economic assistance for the people who are being laid off and abused by many in the private sector—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deans: They are being laid off one day, recalled the next day and laid off another day. Their futures are being played with and tampered with. What will we hear from the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is seemingly in ignorance of many of the laws and policies applied by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in matters such as these, notices of lay-offs and so on. He is unaware of the actions the government has taken in many, many instances; the one in Sudbury a couple of years ago comes to mind. But if the hon. member is talking about the government's macro-economic policies, it seems to me he cannot possibly understand macro-economics if he says that we are not concerned with unemployment. This sounds like the hon. member for St. John's West, who said earlier—

Mr. Deans: You are not concerned.

Mr. Crosbie: They are not. Read your platform.

Mr. Trudeau: They are both saying the same thing, distasteful as that is to both of them. They should know that presently the economy is being stimulated to the tune of a $14 billion deficit. If this is not showing a concern for creating jobs and encouraging growth, then I submit we should begin again the whole theory of macro-economics.

NUCLEAR TESTING

RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT FROM CHINESE TEST OVER WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure he knows a great many Canadians have been gravely disturbed to learn that a mass of radioactive debris emanating from a Chinese atmospheric nuclear test is now falling out over western Canada. I would like to ask the minister what assurance he can give that this debris poses no threat or danger to Canadians; and, further, I ask what steps he has taken to communicate Canadian concerns to Chinese officials, knowing, of course, that China is not a party to the nuclear test ban treaty?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not yet able to give the House any assurance with respect to the possible effects of this cloud of radiation. We have not been able to assess what the result will be, and because it occurred after my most recent meeting with the Chinese ambassador I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss it with him. After we get some assessment of the consequences I shall certainly do so.

Miss MacDonald: I trust the minister will understand the seriousness of this situation and not delay in making the proper moves, both to find out the gravity of the situation in western Canada and also to communicate our concerns directly and quickly to Chinese officials. I would like to ask him, so that we do not have a repetition of an event such as this, whether he would consider using the good offices of Arthur Menzies, until recently Canada's ambassador to China and now our ambassador on disarmament, so he can follow up with Chinese officials over this event?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I would certainly be prepared to consider that representation.

INQUIRY WHETHER PUBLIC ALERTED TO DANGERS ARISING FROM FALL-OUT

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): My related question is to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the world's inability to stop nuclear proliferation, thereby increasing the further probability of large scale atmospheric tests such as Pakistan and India have conducted, can the President of the Privy Council inform the House what provisions Emergency Planning Canada has or is contemplating to inform or protect the Canadian public with regard to the dangers which might arise from nuclear fall-out?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, my colleague is aware that we have recently adopted a policy concerning emergency planning measures. In the implementation of this new policy I must naturally ensure a degree of co-ordination between the provinces and the federal government regarding the actions to be taken in cases of emergency in order to help those who would need it. The case mentioned by the hon. member deserves serious consideration. I will enquire to find out the exact situation and try to report to him as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Wenman: With reference to the new Emergency Planning Canada program recently announced by the minister, would he be willing to table the report leading up to that decision?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if the member wishes to obtain a copy of the newly adopted policy, it will be a pleasure for me to provide him with one as it has already been made public.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED PRIVATIZATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and arises out of responses he made to the hon. member for Vegreville last week. I could hardly believe my ears; it seems the Liberals have not learned anything from the lesson the Tories received about the wholesale opposition to the privatization of Petro-Canada.

In view of the fact taxpayers have invested billions of dollars in Canadian National over the years, footed the bill year after year for their losses, and since the CNR finally paid a $41 million dividend to the taxpayers of Canada last year, is the minister telling us, in his response to the hon. member for Vegreville, that the government is seriously considering allowing the privatizing of the CNR?

I would also like to ask the minister why the taxpayers should not continue to receive dividends from the profits which are finally being made by Canadian National, instead of going to private investors? Will he categorically reject this nonsense of privatizing Canadian National?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I also read the press clipping on that subject and am still wondering how the author came to that conclusion. The other day I emphasized the fact that CN would be in need of substantial investments in the coming years for all kinds of worth-while purposes and that money will have to be found. I indicated one of the ways in which it could be done was by way of proper compensation for the transportation of grain in western Canada. Obviously there are other methods, such as loans and investments. But these are government decisions and there is no intention on our part to privatize CN.

Mr. Benjamin: If the minister would implement Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations regarding the Crow rate, the CNR would have nothing to complain about.

Mr. Lalonde: And all the others, too.

Mr. Benjamin: Most of the others have been implemented. The minister should read it.

I would like to ask the minister if instead of considering this nonsense of privatization of a corporation which the taxpayers have paid for over and over again, would he suggest to his colleagues, to this House and to the country, adopting policies, similar attitudes and actions of industrialized nations all over the world and do exactly the opposite? Will the government move into the twentieth century by integrating Canadian National with Canadian Pacific to form a unified, publicly-owned utility, instead of taking it back to the nineteenth century of the railroad barons?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, this idea is not a new one, it has been suggested a number of times. It is not government policy at this time.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROTECTION FOR DISABLED IN PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that many persons with disabilities are presently suffering from discrimination and have voiced their desire to be protected in any new constitution, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if non-discrimination rights for persons with disabilities could be incorporated by amendment into the proposed constitution act of 1980?

An hon. Member: And women?

An hon. Member: And natives?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I hear, along with this constructive suggestion from the member for Kitchener, members of the official opposition saying we should also include other factors in this bill of rights, and they have suggested women and natives. I am very happy that at last we have the support of the Tory party for our action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am grateful to the member from Kitchener for having at last brought forth this honest support of our action in protecting the basic rights of Canadians. I am prepared to examine any amendments which can improve the status of the resolution before the House. In some cases I have indicated it would be useful to carry on the discussion so that in the second phase of negotiations, once we have a constitution in Canada, amendable in Canada, we could indeed improve in many ways the bill of rights, including the way suggested by the hon. member from Kitchener.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

Q AND M—INQUIRY RESPECTING EXTENSION TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I regret the Minister of Finance is not here because my question is based on an undertaking given by that minister at a port of Halifax dinner earlier in September that he would personally intervene, either by way of the budget or through other procedures, to ensure that the maritime provinces enjoyed the benefits of an extended natural gas pipeline. My question arises out of the reapplication by the Arctic pilot project for their program in the north to bring gas down to the south. In that application they suggested that only Gros Cacouna could be considered if the pipeline was not extended. Would the minister tell the House whether or not he is aware of any particular action taken by the Minister of Finance to ensure that Q and M is in fact extended to the maritime provinces?

● (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, not only does the government intend to present its budget next Tuesday but also its energy policy program. I would therefore say to my hon. colleague that if he can show some patience for seven more days he will get an answer to this question on Tuesday night of next week.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I address my supplementary question to the same minister. Of course we are all patient and we want the line extended. What I would like from the minister is an assurance that the maritime provinces will not be done out of their potential to develop in this country a third petro-chemical industry based on the export market. Surely this matter is not part of the energy policy; it has more to do with trade policy and the treatment which this government will accord to the Atlantic provinces.

Will the maritime provinces and Newfoundland have an opportunity to develop that third petro-chemical industry in that part of Canada? And can the minister give the assurance that no action which the government is taking will deliberately deflect into Gros Cacouna the development of that very vital industry to the Atlantic region?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that, throughout history, successive Liberal governments have always been in the forefront with regard to the economic development of the maritimes. As for the specific question of the hon. member, once again I must give him the same reply as to the preceding question.

HOUSING

INQUIRY RESPECTING EXTENSION OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed either to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the minister in charge of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and it involves the CHIP program. The minister will know that this program provides bonuses to people who have houses built prior to 1961 up to the amount of $500 for insulating their homes. In view of the fact that houses built up to 1973, when the problems of OPEC developed, have almost the same insulation as houses built prior to 1961, will the minister extend the program to cover all homes built up to 1973?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will certainly look into the representation made by the hon. member. Again, he will have to wait for the budget and the announcement of our policy next week for an answer.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, while the minister is looking into that matter, I notice that the advertising of the minister's department in connection with energy is to the effect that we have lots of energy with surpluses in gas, coal and electricity, but that there are shortages of oil. If the minister has a shortage of funds, would he consider an insulation program directed to people who must heat their homes with oil so that they will be given an opportunity and financial assistance to reduce the cost of oil for heating?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, again I will consider this question as a representation, and the hon. member will have an answer to his question in the announcement of government policy next week.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

INQUIRY RESPECTING REDUCTION OF PHASING-IN PERIOD FOR VETERANS' WIDOWS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence, in his very important capacity as Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. It relates to the landmark piece of legislation which was passed in this House of Commons on July 9 having to do with the pensions of veterans' widows and with other pieces of veterans' legislation. It was a good bill, but in view of the fact that as the bill stands, now as Chapter 19 of the Statutes of 1980, many thousands of veterans' widows are having to wait from one up to six and a half years before they will get the pensions to which they are now entitled, will the minister give serious consideration to finding a way either of shortening that phasing-in period or doing away with it altogether?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to see that, like my predecessor the Hon. Daniel MacDonald, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is deeply concerned about the veterans welfare especially with regard to veterans' widows who, in fact, may have to wait a while before getting full pension. I should like to say to the hon. member that it is true that Bill C-40 which we passed was a very important bill for the veterans and I am happy to recognize that the party of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre supported us. However, our financial resources were limited at that time and we were unable to give maximum benefits as we would have liked. I should like to mention to the hon. member that the Department of Veterans Affairs can have a closer look to see if perchance there are critical situations, and look at the cases of those who are in greatest need. At the present time, there is no backlog and we would be willing, if there are urgent cases, to examine them immediately. But I understand full well the intervention of the hon. member, Madam Speaker, and I am convinced that we shall endeavour, come the next budgetary revisions, to correct the type of weaknesses that still exist in Bill C-40.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that three weeks from tomorrow the nation will be honouring our veterans and, in particular, we will be honouring a widowed mother over at the Cenotaph, will the minister do his best to make some statement on this matter in the House before November 11?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, in this regard I can state that within our budgetary and financial requirements, we can be assured, based on my own personal experience and that of several other members, that the required statements have been made in order to encourage the widows of veterans to be patient so that we can satisfy their needs as quickly as possible.

UNITED NATIONS

MacBRIDE COMMISSION REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION AT BELGRADE CONFERENCE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the MacBride commission report on information and the media which is to be considered at the UNESCO conference this month in Belgrade and the limitations which this report, if adopted and implemented, could have on the freedom of the press and the free flow of information in the world, can the minister say what position Canada will take at this United Nations conference concerning this report on the media and the free flow of information?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there are many aspects of the MacBride report which appeal to the Canadian government, but there are also other respects in which it goes beyond what we would wish to see become international policy. Our delegation to the UNESCO conference which is currently taking place in Belgrade has been instructed to resist any move to convert the proposed steering roles of government into downright interference with the rights of the press.

METRIC CONVERSION

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING RETAIL FOOD SECTOR

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of State for Small Businesses, I will put my question to his parliamentary secretary, and if he wishes to pass it to the Prime Minister that would be fine. It deals with a newspaper release in the late summer by the Minister of State for Small Businesses to the effect that he was recommending to cabinet that metric not proceed in the 21 or so test cities in Canada on January 1. I would like to know whether or not this recommendation was made to cabinet as was announced and, if it was, did cabinet concur that metric not proceed in the retail food sector on January 1?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am happy to report that we must, of course, give the industry the time to implement the program. Therefore we will not be able to proceed for January 1, 1981, but we foresee the possibility of doing so for January 1982.

[English]

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question deals with the answer to a question on the order paper. In view of the fact that this government has spent through the Metric Commission over $25 million, as is reported at page 1305 of Hansard on May 22, to implement the metric system, that two successive years, both by the former government and now this present government have been spent on the implementation of metric in the retail food sector and that the budget for next year alone is in excess of $8 million, will the minister assure this House that he will give serious consideration to the temporary suspension of the Metric Commission, which has a budget of $17,444,000 over the next three years?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I will gladly submit these representations to the minister responsible, but I must say that I personally do not share the member's view.

PENITENTIARIES

MISSION, B.C.—STABBING BY ESCAPEE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. At the beginning of this past weekend I understand that two residents of Mission, B.C., Flora Smith and Mary Fredeen, were nearly stabbed to death. The stab wounds were inflicted by a convicted murderer, an escapee from the nearby federal institution. It is alleged that this person "walked away" from the institution. Would the minister tell us how the accused managed to escape from the institution, and how does the Solicitor General intend to prevent escapes in the future from other federal institutions across Canada?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the details of that incident are being looked into. I will be in a position to answer that question when I have a report.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, it is the policy now of the Solicitor General's parole boards not to revoke parole on the basis of police information only. Can the Solicitor General tell the House whether that policy is still in force or whether the minister intends to change it? Because as I understand it, if the person who allegedly committed this crime was out on parole, his parole would not have been revoked on the basis of the two stabbings.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, as hon. members in this chamber are aware, that is a discretion which the parole board is meant to exercise and does exercise without political interference. I will convey the hon. member's concern about that particular policy to the parole board.

RAILWAYS

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—SLOWDOWN IN REVELSTOKE, B.C.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the labour slowdown in the Revelstoke CP section which is affecting CP Rail, I ask the minister whether he has a handle on that problem? If so, what initiatives and what actions is the minister taking to speed up the movement of grain during the harvest season on the prairies?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as I have reported previously, a great number of people have tried to help. Some problems were raised the other day by an hon. member concerning meal times; others have mentioned that it was a case of too few crewmen on trains, and that sort of thing.

I have inquired of the Department of Labour and I have been assured that these problems have been solved. However, on the union side there is still an unwillingness to go ahead with the agreement which was apparently reached. I am informed it is a problem for the union. Efforts are being made to try to come to a conclusion, hopefully a positive one, on the union side.

In the meantime a number of steps have been taken. The A-type delivery quotas have been extended by the Canadian Wheat Board and 300 to 500 cars will leave southern Alberta in the coming weeks to carry grains to Thunder Bay in order to relieve the congestion at Vancouver. So the problem is being attended to as well as possible at the present time.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I ask the Minister of Transport why, if in his view the problem has been solved, there are predictions now that only ten cars per day will be unloaded from CP lines at the port of Vancouver? Does the minister consider that a shifting from Vancouver to Thunder Bay will alleviate the grain shipping problems when there are designated trains going to Vancouver? Does he agree that the shipment to Thunder Bay will not resolve the problem in Vancouver?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I think when one reads the answer that I gave, one will see I did not say the problem was solved; I said efforts were being made. There is a nuance there.

As for the west coast delivery question, it was indicated in the press that 3,000 cars per week were available. I understand the figure is 1,500. At the moment, 800 to 900 cars a week are going to Vancouver. There is a slowdown. Consequently there has been a reduction at the level of 3.3 per cent in unloading at Vancouver, if my memory serves me correctly. Over all, meaning the four ports of Thunder Bay, Churchill, Vancouver and Prince Rupert, unloading is up by 8 per cent to 9 per cent at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SPEECH OF MINISTER CONCERNING GRIEVANCES WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from a speech the minister made this weekend in which he addressed himself to a list of serious Canadian grievances. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not get the kind of U.S. responses he is looking for, what is his next move?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe that by addressing ourselves to the sense of fair play on the part of the United States, we have a very good chance of success.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

REVOCATION OF APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL ASSISTANT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister tell the House whether the Privy Council has passed an order revoking the appointment of a special assistant to the Prime Minister for defence matters in Canada, and if so, why?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as a former minister of national defence should know, an order in council to this effect was passed previously as a matter of administration. When it was revoked, it was simply revoked because the regulations were changed and that is now not necessary. As a former minister of national defence, the hon. member should know that. Similar cases to this one occurred when the hon. member was in the cabinet and there is nothing unusual about it. It is just an administrative consequence.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I think there is considerable worry in the country about what the present Minister of National Defence knows about this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Real concern.

Mr. McKinnon: If his appointment was necessary on June 12, as indicated in the Privy Council order of that date, why is it no longer necessary? If the individual is no longer being paid by the general fund, what fund is his salary coming from? Specifically, is the pay and emolument of this appointee being found from the budget of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, as I just said, it was changed because the regulation has been changed and we can do it otherwise now. That is the simple answer to that question.

As for knowing everything about national defence, I would just like to say to the former minister of national defence I do not think that he had much time to learn everything about national defence. Therefore I do not know why in the same time I should know everything about national defence.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TRANSLATORS' DISPUTE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board since it deals with the translators' strike, as opposed to interpreters. Could the minister now supply us with a progress report on that strike?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I indicated on Friday last, during question period, that the mediation process failed, unfortunately, and Friday we made another offer that was rather generous in my view. We are now waiting to see what will happen, and I hope we will go back to the table for further negotiations.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board could indicate, in the case where that strike is not resolved today, for instance, whether Hansard will be published tomorrow, because this would be detrimental to our privileges here.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I hope we have a sufficient number of non-striking translators, those who are excluded from the right to strike, to supply the services needed.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS—ACTION TO AVOID POSSIBLE VIOLATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. The Minister is aware that in 1979 a complaint was filed by a number of Canadians with the United Nations human rights committee concerning a violation by Canada of the international covenant on civil and political rights. The government has until now strenuously resisted this complaint, arguing that it was not admissible.

● (1500)

However, in August of this year the minister knows that the United Nations human rights committee found that in fact this complaint was admissible. The complaint alleged that the 1977 Parole Act amendments should have been made retroactive, affecting some 800 prisoners.

My question to the Solicitor General is this. What action does the government, allegedly committed to a charter of rights in our international obligations, intend to take to ensure that Canada is not in fact found guilty of a violation of the international covenant on civil and political rights in this respect.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the matter is now before the United Nations and they will make their determination about it. As far as the administration is concerned, we were simply following a very clear position taken on a vote by this Parliament that the rights to which the hon. member referred should not be made retroactive. The matter was voted on in this House. A majority decided not to make that legislation retroactive. My own consideration was that it would be an abuse of executive authority to use the various authorities which the government has to do something that goes expressly against a decision made by this chamber.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. I point out to the minister that at the time an amendment to make the amendments retroactive was moved by this side of the House, supported by both parties on this side, but it was his party which rejected it. In light of this, is the minister prepared to pass the necessary orders in council affecting the sentences of some 800 prisoners; or, at the very least, in view of the fact that we are talking about the liberty of hundreds of Canadians, is the minister prepared to give a reference to the justice committee, as was supported by my colleagues on this side of the House, so that we might study this question in light of the new evidence and make a recommendation to the minister for possible action?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, the government will give very serious consideration to the determination of this matter by the United Nations. Nevertheless, this Parliament is sovereign and a determination made by the United Nations on that subject would not be binding on this Parliament. As I indicated, I would certainly be prepared to consider, and the government would consider, a resolution passed by this House dealing with those inmates, all of whom are parole violators who have been returned to prison and are not, because of the decision of Parliament, being given account of their street time. It is a complicated matter. It has been raised in the form of a reference by the hon. member, but he failed to get unanimous consent for it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FLEMING—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. PAPROSKI

Madam Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege in the name of the hon. Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Fleming). I would simply point out to him that his question of privilege deals with two members. One is in this House today, namely the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski). The second part of that question of privilege concerns the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who informed me he could not be here today. The minister may raise that part of his question of privilege dealing with the hon. member for Edmonton North, or he may wait for some other time when these two members are present in the House, especially if this concerns two contributions that followed each other. However, I will let the minister decide on the moment to raise his question of privilege.

[English]

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): I think that while I have the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) trapped here in the House, if he does not mind and if it is agreeable to you, Madam Speaker, I will proceed with this particular issue. Both are common in my view, in the sense that this deals with what I believe is unparliamentary language. Other than that, I think they can be separated. I will be very brief. At page 3787 of Hansard for October 17, last Friday, a few minutes after the conclusion of question period, the hon. member for Edmonton North caught your eye and rose to say:

> Madam Speaker, I should like to reserve my right to raise a point of privilege. When the minister stated, in answer to my question this afternoon, that I froze the multicultural budget, I think he was deliberately misleading the House. I would like to look at the blues and to reserve my right to bring forward a point of privilege.

I in turn checked the blues. As Hansard shows, I said in response to the hon. member during question period, and I quote:

> —I would be pleased to look again at the situation the hon. member and former minister brings to my attention. I would remind him that the budget in multiculturalism, which he froze during his tenure, has recommenced and thus a number of important newspapers communicating with various—

I thought I had made it clear by saying with regard to the over-all spending of multiculturalism, that budget which he froze, which is the only portion of his over-all spending which I know that he froze, the one to deal with ethnic press, had been unfrozen. I am certainly willing, in a sense of co-operation in this House, to make it clear that I meant the advertising budget and not the total multiculturalism budget. I thought my wording had made that clear.

In any case, Madam Speaker, I believe that whatever happened in my wording, it is unparliamentary, and I cite Beauchesne's fifth edition, pages 108 and 109, which list many, many cases where to say another member has deliberately misled the House is inappropriate. On those grounds I submit that, as a representative of a group of Canadians who elected me, it is my right to ask the hon. member to withdraw that unparliamentary language.

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, it was my understanding, when the minister rose to answer my question, he did say that I froze the whole multicultural budget during my tenure in office. That was my understanding. If in any way in the heat of argument I did say that the hon. member deliberately misled the House, after his explanation here this afternoon I withdraw that statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: That disposes of this point of order. I thank the two hon. members for the spirit in which they have helped the House to resolve this problem.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. TOBIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With the greatest respect for your authority in the chair, Madam Speaker, referring to my motion under Standing Order 43, I was wondering whether you have had time to consider the appropriateness of my motion under Standing Order 43 today.

Perhaps I can be informed, but I was not aware there was any matter, whether it be provincial, municipal or federal—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member could send me his motion under Standing Order 43. The Chair is quite willing to give that service to any member. If members wish to be assisted with regard to the manner in which a motion can be worded, or if they want to check as to whether it is acceptable, the Chair is quite willing to give that type of service. This is what I invited the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) to do, because I had serious doubts about the acceptability of his motion. If he will do that, possibly we can deal with his motion tomorrow, if we all agree that it is in order.

POST OFFICE CONSULTANTS

Question No. 749—Mr. Shields:

Since August 1, 1978, how many (a) administrative (b) policy consultants were under contract to the Post Office Department and/or any boards, commissions or corporations reporting to the minister and, in each case, what amount was paid to them?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Canada Post does not have administrative consultants as such, but instead has management consultants.

(a) Thirty one management (consultants) contracts
—Total cost $507,475.17

(b) Three policy (consultants) contracts
—Total cost $ 32,995.00

F-18A FIGHTER CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,442—Mr. Rose:

As of July 10, 1980, do the figures of industrial benefits flowing from the F-18A fighter contract of 47 per cent for Quebec, 41 per cent for Ontario and 12 per cent for the rest of Canada still apply and (a) if not, what are the revised figures of benefit sharing as they relate to the provinces (b) if so, what is British Columbia's share of the package?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: the percentage distribution of industrial benefits expected to be enjoyed by each province is only an estimate. Such benefits are to be realized over a period of more than 15 years. The exact measure of such benefits will also include the value to be ascribed to technology transfer, export market development and tourism promoted by the arrangements. We will need to be much further into the new fighter program before a more complete estimate of provincial distribution can be determined.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF HON. LINCOLN ALEXANDER

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and opportunity today to say to you that we have a distinguished guest in the gallery, the former hon. member for Hamilton West who is now the Chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board of Ontario. I think it is only fair that we should recognize him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed from Friday, October 17, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Madam Speaker: Last Friday, I was prepared to rule on the admissibility of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Out of courtesy for hon. members and the House I had offered to entertain some arguments on both sides concerning the admissibility of that amendment. I am still prepared to rule today but as hon. members had preferred Friday to voice some arguments I am going to hear them now. In a spirit of co-operation I shall ask them to be as brief as possible and to discuss only the reason why they consider that amendment to be admissible or not.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am just looking at the words of the parliamentary secretary last Friday as reported at page 3805 of Hansard, and I quote as follows:

I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I misunderstood. I thought you were going to render a decision on the admissibility of the amendment proposed last evening. If you are saying you want to entertain argument, before you make your definitive decision, I suggest that we hold this over until Monday.

I gathered that my friend had some objection that he wanted to raise with respect to the amendment. I think it might be appropriate if the House heard what those objections were, and then perhaps there might be some response.

I have not had any guidance from the Chair on what the Chair's objections are so that I could answer them. But he obviously did. I wonder if he might give his argument in opposition and then I might deal with that. I suppose the assumption is always in favour of admitting admendments if at all possible.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, since you were in the chair on Friday at ten minutes to four o'clock, you will remember that there was a little misunderstanding. Perhaps I could explain it once again to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

You entered the chamber and I thought you were going to give your decision on the admissibility of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. We on this side were quite prepared to waive the time of the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Irwin) for his speech so that we could hear your decision and, perhaps, even waive private members' hour. The comments made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton were based on something you said which I did not catch, to the effect that, notwithstanding the fact that you were prepared to rule, you would also be prepared to entertain further argument.

I thought in my wisdom, since the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) was not here—and he is intimately concerned with this amendment—that perhaps we could hold it until Monday. That is the reason we are bringing it up again today, but if it is the decision of the Chair to rule right away, we have no objection.

Madam Speaker: It is not the decision of the Chair to rule right now but I am prepared to rule this afternoon. I extended the courtesy to the House to allow any hon. member wanting to give further argument on the acceptability of this amendment and I am prepared to hear that; if not, I am prepared to rule. After hearing arguments, I will see whether they substantially modify what I intend to rule this afternoon. I thought that some hon. members might have argument. I understand this is a normal courtesy that is usually extended to the House, and it is for this purpose that I am doing it.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I appreciate your thoughtfulness, Madam Speaker. The reason I rose just a few moments ago is that we are now faced with a judgment that has not been argued and we are facing an argument not knowing, in the general area, what the objections of the Chair might be. I assume it is the duty of the government House leader and, or, his colleague, to indicate if the government has some objections and if they can help the Chair, then they should deal with those objections. Surely the onus does not lie with the proponent, in the absence of any indication of what the illegality might be, to advance argument to sustain it.

I thought that the interpretation of the rules should be that these motions ought to be sustainable, and ought to be sustained unless there is a reason that they should not be. That is the reason I look to my friends to advance some arguments as to why they ought not to be.

Madam Speaker: May I explain what is going on in my mind. I hope we both understand the same thing.

It seems to me that it often happens when an amendment is proposed that members make points of order on the amendment. When the amendment was proposed, one of my deputies was in the chair and he took it immediately under advisement. I understand no points of order were raised as to the acceptability of the amendment. This sometimes occurs and, of course, sometimes it does not.

If there are no members who want to rise for this particular reason, that is fine, and I shall proceed. I shall give a chance to hon. members if they want to rise, however.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the government now decides it is going to sit silent. If I may say so, I think that is a lack of courtesy, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has just indicated, for what ought to be the appropriate procedure.

If I am put in the position that I must offend in the face of a possibility of a ruling by Your Honour without Your Honour indicating, in a general way, what the objections are, or being prepared to rule in the event that no one speaks up, then I think the process is an unusual one, if I may say so. It is the reverse of what I think ought to be the appropriate procedure, that the House hear objections from the other side, if there are any. Otherwise, I think it would not be abnormal for me to ask the Chair what the objections are in a general way—not a judgment, but if there are some objections to it, tell me the area in which I have to argue. That is all I am asking, Madam Speaker. Normally that is the responsibility of the government House leader or his assistant, if he does not feel capable of arguing the question himself. It would normally be his job, I think, to help the Chair. However, it would be helpful if I had some general idea of the area in which I should argue.

● (1520)

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, on Friday I was trying to be helpful to the Chair and all hon. members of the House because I said that we on this side would stand down and allow you to present your decision, but it was the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who said he was not going to hold up the debate. He said, and I quote:

It appears there is some doubt on the part of the Chair. I would like to be able to consider an argument with respect to it because I put the motion forward quite seriously.

It was to accommodate the hon. member that I then suggested we wait until today so that he could formulate arguments in favour of his own motion, since that seemed to be what he was proposing on Friday. That is at page 3805 of Hansard.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I do not want to prolong this, but what I think we have is a grinning Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) who is suggesting that I have not propounded reasons for my motion, and if he will re-read the speech which preceded the granting of the motion, he will see exactly the reasons that the motion is there. If that motion is invalid, and the parliamentary secretary thinks so, then I believe it is a duty of the parliamentary secretary, or the President of the Privy Council or of someone to stand up and state the reasons generally so that I can meet those objections, if that is possible.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, last Friday, around four o'clock, you very simply stated that you were ready to give a ruling on the amendment put by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). In your preamble, you suggested that you had some reservations about the amendment and we on this side were quite prepared to hear your decision. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, seeing the weakness of his case and seeing his chances of success progressively diminishing, sought leave to delay the debate in order to put forth more arguments.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Those explanations have already been given, I think. That is quite clear. We have Hansard here. I think we are all quite aware of what went on last Friday. As I said, I did that out of courtesy for the House. I think that is quite natural, normal and customary. If nobody wants the floor, it is then clearly my duty to hand down a decision, and for the benefit of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—

[English]

Of course I cannot review the general areas in which I intend to rule in favour or against this amendment. I was just extending a normal courtesy, but if there are no speakers, of course I shall be able to rule.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious to us that the argument is unfounded and we would not want to be considered as accomplices of those who are trying to delay the constitutional debate.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, now we understand the erudite and learned argument of the government House leader against the motion that is put. I know he worked all weekend preparing such a learned argument, and he is to be congratulated because he has advanced the cause of the House of Commons to a great degree.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I hope the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) will join in it, but I just want the Chair to know—and I say this with respect—that it is very helpful to members who advance motions in good faith to find out from the Chair, but also perhaps from the other side, why there might be some objection. It is very helpful in understanding.

However, if Your Honour wants a citation with respect to why I believe there is room within the rules for this kind of amendment, let me start off by telling Your Honour what this amendment says, and what the amendment that was advanced said. What the amendment was for was to provide an opportunity to the House of Commons to deal, appropriately and in accordance with established principles, with an address to Her Majesty the Queen, if that is to be the end of the debate.

If Your Honour reads carefully what the government has proposed in the literature which is now in general circulation in Canada, you will see what the government's proposal is going to be. If the committee recommends adoption of resolutions in the form of the proposed resolution, with or without changes, and both the House of Commons and the Senate concur in that recommendation, those concurrences will constitute a request or a joint address.

The point of the argument I made in my speech is that by no stretch of the imagination, even the imagination of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), can what is not a joint address constitute a joint address. As I also made clear in my speech at that time, that affects you in your responsibilities in terms of the Chair. It may very well affect His Excellency the Governor General in terms of his responsibility.

It is an important point, and what that amendment is trying to do is to give the House of Commons, not extended powers, because I am sure that would be the argument against it, and at committee not to give the committee extended powers, but to complete the powers that are necessary for the committee legally and lawfully to carry out what the government eventually wants done, i.e., an amendment and an address to Her Majesty the Queen. At this point in time that is impossible.

Why is it in order? I will quote from the chapter in Beauchesne on privileges of the House, citation 21 at page 13, as follows:

It follows, therefore,—

I will read the whole section.

> The most fundamental privilege of the House as a whole is to establish rules of procedure for itself and to enforce them. A few rules are laid down in the British North America Act, but the vast majority are resolutions of the House which may be added to, amended, or repealed at the discretion of the House. It follows, therefore, that the House may dispense with the application of any of these rules by unanimous consent on any occasion, or, by motion may suspend their operation for a specified length of time.

It is within the ambit of that citation that this amendment is brought. My respectful submission is that it not only is important, in carrying out what is the responsibility of the House, Madam Speaker, to complete what is a joint address which is what the government wants; it is within the realm of citation 21, and certainly if the argument against it is that we are seeking greater powers than are contained in the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), I ask you, Madam Speaker, to take a look at the proposals laid out by the government in its publication.

The government is seeking greater powers and the consent of this House to have greater powers than those to which it is entitled by law, and I think it falls within the ambit of this House, in the words of that citation, "by motion may suspend their operation," to suspend the operations of its own rules for a specified period of time, and that is precisely the purpose of this matter, to carry out the intent and purpose of citation 21.

Aside from the practical side of it, it is a very important matter for this House of Commons to consider. I laid out, I thought, for the assistance not only of the members of the House but of a particular member of the House, namely you, Madam Speaker, the pitfalls in the practice that is being adopted by the government in this matter. That is something we are going to have to consider, and it is for that reason that I think the House owes a duty to itself to agree to this amendment. If it does not, that is fine; the House then has neglected its duty to itself. Regardless of that, the question is as to its propriety and, in my judgment and in my respectful submission, it falls within the ambit of our rules of practice.

● (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the remarks of my hon. colleague. He referred directly to the text of the motion under consideration and I submit that the amendment he proposed is inadmissible for several reasons. The most obvious is that if one reads carefully the amendment of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), one realizes that it is an absolute negation of the main motion. The main motion proposes that a special joint committee of the House and the Senate consider the proposed resolution. The hon. member, in his amendment, proposes the opposite, that is that the committee not consider the proposed resolution but rather that it be directed to study a resolution, something which has nothing to do with reality. Moreover, he wants the committee to report that the House would not be able to consider the report but would have to consider the resolution itself. Therefore, I think that right from the start, the amendment is contrary to all parliamentary practices and that it is an absolute negation of the main motion. He is asking a committee to do something it is not empowered to do. All a committee of the House can do, whether it be permanent or special, is to bring in a report.

In our motion, we ask the committee to report on whether or not the text of the resolution should be accepted. The request of the hon. member for Nepean-Carelton is a denial of that. In addition, he presupposes the decision of the committee because, theoretically, in principle, in its report the committee could very well recommend to the House that it reject the text of the proposed resolution submitted to it.

If that were the case then, theoretically, the amendment he proposes would prevent the committee from reaching that conclusion because we are duty-bound to study the resolution itself. If the committee comes to the conclusion that it does not want us to accept its report recommending that the proposed resolution be accepted, if we want the committee to be free to reach that conclusion, then we cannot endorse the amendment of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton which, in advance, even now, before the committee looks into the matter, before it brings in its report, requires of it that it advise us that the House of Commons is not studying its report but a resolution. Again, that is another argument against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. It is out of order, contrary to parliamentary practice and common sense.

Madam Speaker, since the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has finally, and with great difficulty, attempted to justify his amendment, it becomes obvious that on the other hand we, members of the government party, cannot, under our standing orders, find his amendment in order. However may I point out to you what, in reality, the motion as it now reads will lead to—and here I am not speaking of the amendment but of the main motion. It will achieve the same result as that sought by an amendment that is illegal, contrary to our rules and therefore out of order? Because the committee will be able to study, clause by clause, the proposed resolution referred to it. If we look closely at the amendment of the hon. Progressive Conservative member, it says, and I quote:

[English]

That the committee shall be deemed to have the resolution directly before it for the purpose of discussion and amendment,—

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, there is absolutely nothing in our motion which prevents the committee from considering the joint resolution "for the purpose of discussion and amendment". On the contrary, it is the mandate of the committee to discuss the project and amend it if necessary by December 9. Therefore, the first part of the amendment of the hon. member from the Progressive Conservative Party is already covered by the main motion. His proposal is useless because it is already written.

As to the second part he mentions:

[English]

—and that the committee shall report the resolution as amended in a form which will permit both Houses to directly consider and amend the said resolution.

[Translation]

But as far as the form is concerned, I shall not repeat what I said; it is unacceptable for the reasons I mentioned. But in the facts, Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton who is so knowledgeable about the Standing Orders of the House—

[English]

Mr. Andre: That is trickery—there is no agreement on the second part.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: —in spite of his cries, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) knows very well that once the report of the committee is completed, what the House will be studying is the committee report as to whether the proposed resolution should be adopted or rejected. If one is to assume that the committee report will recommend the adoption of the proposed resolution for a joint address, what the House can do then is to ask, and there are no restrictions to that, as long as it wishes, that the report be referred to the committee for amendment in such and such a way. So in a quite indirect manner, the House will be able to debate amendments to the resolution even if it is a committee report that is being considered. I would therefore like it to be quite clear and I challenge my learned colleague to prove me wrong with valid references in support of his opinion. Once a motion for passing it is before the House a committee report can be returned to a committee so that it can amend it in a given manner. I therefore think that I am not just demonstrating tricks of parliamentary procedure. It is rather obvious and I am quite sure the hon. member was aware of that.

So what he is looking for in the second part of his amendment which in itself is out of order, is still something he can obtain by the means he was aware of and that I have just brought to his attention. In this approach, therefore, there is absolutely no trickery, Madam Speaker. In fact the House is dealing with a motion calling for a resolution to be referred to a committee. Then the committee would be entitled to discuss and amend it. Finally the House would hold a debate after December 9 to look into the committee report. It is too early at this stage to anticipate what the committee's findings will be, but if they were to the effect that the text of the proposed resolution should be accepted, then the opposition could ask as often as it pleased for the report to be sent back to the committee to be amended in such and such a way, and we would end up with exactly the same result as the one sought through the proposed amendment.

For the reasons I have just indicated, Madam Speaker, I finally suggest that the amendment is out of order as to its form. Substantially, it brings nothing new and provides hon. members of the opposition with no entitlement other than those which already exist under the main motion.

● (1540)

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) proposed an amendment to the motion on Thursday evening which the Chair took under advisement. For the benefit of hon. members I shall read the amendment to the House.

"That the motion be amended by adding thereto after the fifth paragraph the following:

"That the committee shall be deemed to have the resolution directly before it for the purpose of discussion and amendment, and that the committee shall report the resolution as amended in a form which will permit both Houses to directly consider and amend the said resolution." "

The motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development stated inter alia that a committee be appointed to consider and report upon a certain document and "to recommend in their report whether or not such an address with such amendments as the committee considers necessary" should be presented to Her Majesty.

Those powers are in no way different from the powers sought in the amendment by the words "that the committee should be deemed to have the resolution directly before it for the purpose of discussion and amendment" and if that assumption is correct then the Chair's view would be that that part of the proposed amendment was redundant and not needed. The proposed amendment then goes on to say "that the committee shall report the resolution as amended in a form which will permit both Houses to directly consider and amend the said resolution."

The Chair has some misgiving about this part of the amendment. First, it appears to be a general instruction to the committee to amend the proposed resolution contained in the document to be referred to it, and second, and most important, it appears to be a substantive proposal to change in this instance our normal rules and practices relating to the procedures of referral of matters to committee and consideration of reports therefrom. As such, it is a substantive proposal beyond the scope of the motion and cannot be received by the Chair.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, naturally I accept the ruling, but it may be appropriate to ask a question now or at some other point in time by way of a point of order or perhaps even on House business, if I can ask a question on Monday with respect to House business. The ruling was clearly that this is a substantive proposal beyond the scope of the motion which is precisely the point I made. It offers the final stage of what is the normal practice respecting joint addresses to Her Majesty the Queen, with the right of members of Parliament to move amendments and debate the resolution itself in full Parliament.

In view of the statement of the government House leader that we would arrive at the same result, as if the amendment in fact was adopted, I wonder if the government would be prepared to put a motion, hopefully to be accepted on unanimous consent, that the substance of the motion become part of the order of procedure of this House with respect to the committee and the work of the House after the committee has reported. If they would do that, I would so move it when it is appropriate, in the hope that we could settle this very important question as to how we are to address Her Majesty the Queen, because we must do so with respect to the amendments the government seeks to the Constitution of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I want it to be very clear that a committee report recommending the adoption of the resolution submitted to it and having the effect of endorsing such report has exactly the same effect as a direct resolution which would be debated on the floor of the House. This being said, I suggest it is premature, before the committee report is known, to negotiate on the shape the debate could take at the third stage, that is once the stage of the study in committee will be over.

So as regards the substance of the hon. member's question, even though I do not agree with him as to the preamble, once again, I want this to be very clear. I want to say that we consider the debate on the committee report to be essentially the same thing as the debate on the resolution itself, and that, likewise, it is the substance that should be debated. Having said this, and I reckon we differ in opinion on this point, if my colleague would prefer the debate to be on a resolution rather than on a committee report, we have to wait to know the substance of the committee report before we are able to negotiate in an intelligent way.

I would therefore suggest to him that he wait for the committee's report. Once the report is drawn up and available, we will be open to discussion to determine both the form—and I emphasize this—and the duration of the debate at the third stage.

In the meantime his request is premature, but I do not close the door entirely. I appreciate his intelligent discussion of the matter. I was expecting his question and I believe he also expected my answer. Right now we are at a very preliminary stage; this is merely a motion of procedure to refer this to a committee. There is no reason why this should be delayed any longer.

Once the committee has amended, if it so decides, or discussed in depth the proposal, until December 9, and depending upon the nature of its report, I will be pleased to discuss with my hon. colleague both the form of what we will be called upon to discuss at the third stage and the duration of that debate. At that time we may come to agreement. For the time being this is premature.

May I take this opportunity, since my colleague raises a point of order on the business of the House, to offer right now and ask for unanimous consent to recover the time lost on countless occasions since the beginning of this debate for reasons of form, by sitting this evening from six to eight without interruption, and from ten to twelve this evening, in order not to conclude the debate this evening but to hear a greater number of members if such is the wish of Conservative members.

We would give consent to the House sitting without interruption on the motion from now until twelve.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the offer. To date I have found the debate to be a most interesting one. If one checks the record, as I am sure Madam Speaker has, one will find the Liberal party has found it much more interesting than we have, in that it has put up more speakers during the course of this debate than we have, by actual count. I appreciate their interventions in the debate because indeed it is a fundamental one. It is such a fundamental one that, in my judgment, there is no need to change the rules of the House of Commons. But if at some point a motion is brought—and the hon. member knows the sections of the rules about which I am talking—and that motion is carried, naturally the House would go ahead.

I appreciate the words of the hon. the member, that this matter is still open, because it is very important. But I say to him that what we are talking about is the terms of reference of the parliamentary committee which will be considering the proposals of the government. So, in that sense it is not premature at all. In fact I think it is necessary. I say with respect it is absolutely necessary the committee know the extent of its responsibilities and will not be involved in a process that can possibly deny to Parliament, at the whim of the government, the benefit and right to have before it an address to Her Majesty the Queen in the normal manner, with the power of any member on any side of the House of Commons, because it is everyone's country, to move appropriate amendments. That is the purpose of wanting to do it now. My friend has said the door is open. I think it is a very important door which he has left ajar, and I thank him.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, obviously the door will be open after the committee report. My hon. colleague seems to be asking that we open the door before it goes to committee. The motion is there, the ruling has been made; that is clear. Essentially I told him—and I will not repeat it because it is on the record—that the door was open for negotiations as to the form of the debate at third stage as well as to the length of the debate at third stage. I said that in French; perhaps he misunderstood me.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I heard it. My French is improving.

Mr. Pinard: Since I do not have the consent of the Tory party to debate from six to eight and from ten to twelve o'clock tonight, I will be more generous and promise not to put up any Liberal speakers between six and eight o'clock and between ten and twelve o'clock, so that more Tory speakers may use the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased we are finally getting back to what I think is very important—the constitution—not points of privilege, points of debate, but points of substance.

When I finished speaking on Friday I think I had fairly shown that although Sir John A. Macdonald had wanted a strong federal government and had framed the British North America Act in such terms, over the years, through legislation and federal-provincial negotiations, we had weakened that concept. I think I had shown fairly, with the use of figures, that today the federal government spends approximately 24 per cent of the revenue collected in this country while the combined spending of the provinces and the municipalities is now 76 per cent. I was in the process of explaining—and I thought we agreed on more things than we disagreed—everyone says they want patriation.

We all stand for some form of entrenchment of certain fundamental rights. We all want democratic rights, with few exceptions, specifically in Newfoundland. We think that mobility is good for this country, that a person should be able to move from one province to another, find a job and take up employment as a Canadian, not just because he happened to be born in that particular province or lived there for a certain number of months.

We all agree on the life, liberty, and security of persons section, and on the unlawful search, detention and imprisonment, arrest, charge and trial procedures. Indeed, there have been suggestions we don't go far enough. Now there have been some suggestions about tuning up the non-discrimination sections in the proposed constitution. But, generally, everyone in this House supports the entrenchment of a clause defending non-discrimination by reason of race, national or ethnic origin, religion, age or sex.

Not only in this debate but during the referendum, and I sat here and listened to it, most speakers in this House supported the entrenchment of minority language rights throughout Canada. Now there has been some suggestion that perhaps the will is no longer here. I hope not, and I think not.

I am asked by the curious, back in my riding—as I explained on Friday we don't stand around Sault Ste. Marie in the cold fall and discuss the constitution for 40 minutes—what is the problem? I try to state it as fairly as possible. I say we agree on most things, that if there is disagreement with the New Democratic Party it is because they want the power over natural resources to be given to the provinces. I say the official opposition does not like the idea of a national referendum if the provinces and federal government cannot agree on constitutional amendment in future, especially the right of the federal government to call a referendum of its own volition.

I have come to know and respect many of the members opposite since this Parliament has been in session. I say with sincerity I hope history does not ultimately label your parties as obstructionists. But I think that will be the verdict. John Diefenbaker came so close, and failed. He said:

> If only we had pressed on instead of delaying to permit the further consideration of one or two minor matters.

That will not happen again. I saw it happen here today, Friday, and Thursday, because of the opposition, who prefer to debate points of privilege and points of order when we are here debating the constitution of this country, which will be in effect for the next hundred years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irwin: We have failed too many times in the past. On balance, between unanimity and the good of the country, there is really no choice as far as we are concerned. Every member of this party, from the Ottawa Valley to the Manitoba border, which happens to be all Liberal, will be supporting this constitution when it comes back, not apologetically but with pride, because we know it is necessary. In the north we are not saying "Now is the time", but we are saying "It is about time".

Let us look at the times we came very close, and let us start with John Diefenbaker. I have a great deal of respect for John Diefenbaker. As a matter of fact when I cast my first vote it was for John Diefenbaker, when I was living in Toronto.

For two things he was never criticized, his courage and his passion for this country. He wore that passion on his sleeve. John Diefenbaker fought for a Bill of Rights and, when it passed, how many Canadians thought at that time that that beautiful piece of legislation would be interpreted by the courts into insignificance? That is exactly what happened.

How did he feel about entrenchment? This is what he said:

> A bill of rights for Canada is the only way in which to stop the march on the part of the government toward arbitrary power, and to curb the arrogance of men "clad in a little brief authority".

He went on to say:

> —some say that it is unnecessary and our unwritten constitutional rights protect us (a familiar refrain).
>
> They have not in the past.
> They cannot unless you and I have a right to the protection of law in the courts of the land.

How wise he was. We often forget that as well as being a legislator he was noted as a civil liberties lawyer. His years before the bar and his years as a legislator brought him to the conclusion that we needed a binding bill of rights.

Mr. Blenkarn: Why don't we have John Diefenbaker?

Mr. Irwin: It was more refreshing when we did have John Diefenbaker.

What about the provinces and the provincial governments? He said with regard to the provincial governments:

> My experience with the provincial governments indicated that they were too jealous of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights to support any amendment applicable to themselves. I have little hope that their attitude will be altered in the years ahead.

He was right, their attitude has not changed.

What did he say about the different types of citizenship, which they are basically espousing in the provinces? He knew there could only be one type of citizenship. He knew that without that basic tenet there could be no Canada. He said:

There are others who claim that the Parliament of Canada cannot pass laws to preserve the constitutional freedom of Canadians.

If that be true, then Canadian citizenship is a provincial variable.

There will be nine kinds of Canadians in Canada whose freedoms will be based on the home address of each of us.

If that contention be true, Canadian unity is a meaningless term—

John Diefenbaker came so close. Do you remember in 1961 when he and the Hon. E. D. Fulton had reached a consensus with the provincial attorneys general, after about 15 months of work? It was at that time that we almost had what we are trying to get today. But the government tarried, they waited and did not act—the chance was gone. He failed. Let us learn from that experience. Let us stop nitpicking and get on with the job, unless you really do not want it to happen, unless you want the failure of 20 years ago. Diefenbaker's experience was invaluable and we should learn from it.

Let us look at our side. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent tried, and he failed. How did he feel about our responsibilities? He said:

National unity demands that all those who form part of the Canadian Parliament feel that their responsibility is to the Canadian people as a whole, and that they are not the representatives of any provincial government or any municipality or other local authority.

Over the last few days I have heard many charges hurled at the opposition. It is alleged that they are front men of the provinces, that they are spokesmen for the provinces, and conduits for the provinces. My instinct tells me this is not true. But I will be quite frank with you—you are more preoccupied with provincial rights than you are with the country as a whole. Perhaps it may be because of the uneven balance which occurred in the last election and the way we have broken up the country politically. I don't know the reason, but quite frankly, what my ears tell me in this debate is that the oppositions are sounding very parochial and very provincial. I do not think this is healthy for the country.

St. Laurent had problems with the provinces when he abolished appeals to the Privy Council, which was done without provincial consent for the simple reason he could not get it from Duplessis. If Mr. St. Laurent had waited for provincial consent, our government of last resort would still be in London. It would be something, for the premiers of the provinces could say in that case, "I am not going to the Supreme Court of Canada, I am going to the Privy Council or I am going to London to have the case adjudicated". This is exactly what would have happened if the government had waited for unanimity.

● (1600)

Thirty-one years ago, in 1949, Mr. St. Laurent told an audience of young people:

We will be in full possession both theoretically and in practice of our autonomy. We will be masters in our own home—

He was referring to the time when we would abolish appeals to the Privy Council and gain the right to amend the Canadian constitution at home. Those young people in that audience are now in their late forties and early fifties, and they are sick of waiting. How many more decades must they wait? The time is now. I do not know about the opposition, but the government of this country and the people of Canada want and deserve to be masters of their own home.

I would like to deal now specifically with the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to the House on October 6. I listened to that speech, because it was an important speech. The Leader of the Opposition represents a great segment of Canada. In certain ways, he made an amazing speech. There seemed to be an obsession with section 42 which deals with the referendum. The Leader of the Opposition seemed to have little or no faith in the ability of the people of this country to make an intelligent decision in a referendum. He would prefer to leave these basic rights and their amendments to the politicians.

I would remind the Leader of the Opposition, and it is unfortunate that he is not here, that if it had not been for the people's referendum in Quebec, if we had left the matter to the great legislator Lévesque, we would not even be debating this constitution today; we would be discussing sovereignty association. It was not the politicians of Quebec who were in power who saved us from separation, it was the people of Quebec. I believe that the Opposition Leader underestimates the intelligence of the ever average Canadian and overestimates the intelligence of the average politician.

Politicians get stampeded as easily as the public, probably more so. For instance, in Australia where there is a referendum process, over the last 64 years out of 24 amendments proposed, only four passed. Presumably they were proposed by the political institutions and rejected by the people. Yet, the Leader of the Opposition feels that section 42 is "the greatest menace to rights". It is odd that he should feel that the public is the greatest menace to rights.

The Leader of the Opposition touches or, rather, meanders through section 44; and also section 51, which deals with colonial status, without saying too much of substance and at page 3295 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

This is our position: To bring back the constitution with an agreed formula and nothing else.

What the Leader of the Opposition is really proposing is really nothing more than an empty gesture. As a basis for meaningful discussion, I find this quite discouraging. This nation needs better direction than that.

I use the word "direction" because this constitution is more a direction than it is a destination. For the Acadians, that direction is a better way of preserving their culture and way of life through minority education rights. For the people of Saskatchewan, it is a direction that was started decades ago when they were the first province to bring in a bill of rights and to propound a series of schemes with one basic foundation which was, essentially, common sharing for the common good.

For the Quebecker, the direction is a Canada in which he will strive to protect English minorities inside Quebec, and the rest of the country will strive to protect French-speaking minorities outside Quebec, and that is the way it should be. For Alberta, the direction will serve as a reminder that we in Ontario have paid out millions in equalization grants to other provinces and have not once, even though it is owing to us under the formula, asked for such a grant ourselves. It is also a reminder to Alberta from the people of northern Ontario that for years we paid 25 per cent over the world price for petroleum because it was a good idea to develop the petroleum industry in Alberta. We did not begrudge paying this price because we thought that it was a good idea and for the common good of all Canadians. When someone drew an imaginary line at Ottawa and said, "Everything west of that line belongs to Alberta", we said, "Fine, that's the way it should be".

For the Franco-Ontarians, that direction is away from the divisive debate which we recently saw in Penetanguishene, and in the future, when numbers warrant, there will be the right to minority language education. It will not be left to the whim of the local board of education. I am sure that the direction is right and the correct one to take. It is a direction toward the people. There should always be a direction toward the people.

Too often we feel that the power is here, and we forget that we are just the holders of power for the time being. This is something which Premier Peckford should remember. He feels that the provinces created the federal government and the federal system. I suggest to him that it is more accurate to say that the people created the federal system and these same people should be asked to amend the constitution in a referendum from time to time when it becomes necessary.

I sat in the House through most of the debate. I came to this sitting full of enthusiasm and hope. At the beginning I really thought that all of us together would create a historical moment, that we as one would mould a constitution and set aside political differences to give to the people not only something that they vitally need but something that they vitally deserve. I felt that there would be some differences and some suggestions, but in the end that we would come together as one, as ten fingers come together to strengthen two hands, as one voice speaking to England.

I felt that we had learned through the mistakes of the past. I was wrong; we have learned nothing. But this time there will be the political will to go the distance. This time there will be no retreat, and Canada will get a constitution. Henry David Thoreau once said:

> If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer.

It would appear that the sound which we are hearing is not the same sound which members opposite are hearing.

Mr. Dinsdale: That's right.

Mr. Irwin: That is certainly right. It appears that that sound periodically says that there are certain rights which should be enshrined in the constitution and members opposite are not hearing it. It is the sound which says, "If we are a country, then we must protect minority rights". It is a sound that says, "How long must we suffer the indignation of going, cap in hand, to England to do something which we should be doing in our own country?". It is a sound which says—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Irwin: I listened to you, and now you are going to listen to me.

It is a sound which says, "Any Canadian, no matter where he is born, has the right to work anywhere in Canada." It is a sound that says, "This country should no longer tolerate padlock laws, like in Quebec, and laws which discriminate against regions." It is a sound which says, and this point was raised earlier, "This country does not tolerate union busting under the name of security." It is a sound which says that this time there will be a codified law against discrimination because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, region, age or sex.

This time the aspirations of a nation will not be thwarted by those who use fear as a means of confusion, or those who use points of privilege as points of debate instead of points of substance. If members opposite cannot hear that drummer's beat, then they ought to move aside because this time this legislation will not end up in a bucket of dust, and this time, when the numbers are counted, we will be there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, many members have referred to this debate as historic. For my province, Prince Edward Island, the debate is indeed historic, because we are considering a proposal that would end P.E.I.'s provincial status as far as having any future say in constitutional matters is concerned. Isn't it ironic, Mr. Speaker, that the very province which served as the birthplace of confederation, in September, 1864, will, 116 years later, receive the hardest blow from the most far-reaching changes in Canada's constitution since confederation?

● (1610)

In my own remarks, I intend to focus, almost exclusively, on the injustices which the government's constitutional package would inflict on my province. I do so unashamedly because, if members in this House do not stand up for the smaller provinces, no one will; certainly the government will not. At the same time, by focusing on injustices inflicted by the resolution on my province and region, I hope to draw attention to the violation which is being done to confederation itself. Just as the civility of any society can be judged by how it treats its minorities, the vitality of our federal system can be measured by how it responds to the concerns of its smallest partners. By that standard, the government's package of constitutional change fails miserably.

Let us look at the proposed resolution for a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, in particular, the amending provisions. The Parliament of Canada will be asked to approve a proposal to ask the British parliament to terminate its authority in all matters relating to the amendment of the Canadian Constitution. I have no quarrel with that. My party has long favoured the patriation of the British North America Act. Why should we Canadians have to go cap in hand to another country, even our mother country, for changes in our constitution? We should not.

But, following patriation, the amending formula that would likely apply under the government's resolution would be that outlined in sections 41 and 42. In reality, there are two amending formulae. The first would require the approval of Parliament and some of the provincial legislatures. The second would require the approval of Parliament and of the people of some of the provinces through a Canada-wide referendum. In either case the same approach is taken in the calculation of provincial consent, whether expressed indirectly through the provincial legislatures or directly through a plebiscite. It is at this point where, in effect, three classes of provinces in Canada would be established.

In the first class of provinces would be Ontario and Quebec, for each is treated as a region unto itself and given an absolute veto over any future constitutional change. All other provinces would be reduced to the status of second class, except for Prince Edward Island, which would have the dubious distinction of being in a class by itself, that of third class.

In the west, for example, the approval of any two provinces comprising 50 per cent of the population of that regon is required. Although not enjoying a veto, as Quebec and Ontario would, any province in the west would have at least a chance to join with another province in that region to make up the required 50 per cent. In effect, given the current populations of the western provinces, British Columbia would have a near veto because no other two provinces together now make up 50 per cent of the total population of the west. British Columbia, then, would have to be one of the two. In future, however, if population shifts occur, such may not always be the case, and all western provinces might be on an equal footing as far as sections 41 and 42 are concerned.

By contrast, in the Atlantic region, Prince Edward Island would not now, and will likely never be able to join with any other single province in the region to meet the 50 per cent regional population requirement for constitutional change under sections 41 or 42. Thus, Prince Edward Island's approval or disapproval of a proposed constitutional change would be rendered irrelevant. The island would be denied any role whatever in constitutional decision-making. I am not arguing for Prince Edward Island to have a veto over constitutional change. Nor am I arguing that the rule of federal-provincial unanimity should apply before constitutional change can occur. Clearly, that would place Canadians in a constitutional strait-jacket.

But, just as the approval of all provinces should not be required for constitutional change, so also no province should be cut out of constitutional decision-making altogether. Yet the resolution proposes to do exactly that to Prince Edward Island.

On Wednesday, October 15, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) described the amending formula in the resolution as the Victoria charter. Mr. Speaker, it is not. At best, it is a substantially modified Victoria charter. Under the Victoria charter, 50 per cent of the provinces in the Atlantic region, any two provinces, would have had to agree to a change in the constitution. Although the Victoria charter required the approval of at least two provinces in the west comprising 50 per cent of the population of that region, the same charter only required the approval of two of the provinces in Atlantic Canada, regardless of population. Accordingly, under the Victoria charter, Prince Edward Island could join with any province in the region to approve or oppose constitutional change. Under the modified Victoria charter, no such possibility exists.

Mr. Speaker, my party strongly opposes section 41 and section 42 because, among other reasons, these sections create three classes of provinces in a country where such a political caste system should be anathema. To my mind, section 42 is particularly repugnant. By providing for the imposition of constitutional change through referenda, section 42 undermines the elected representatives of the people at the provincial level. In doing so, the section debases the provinces as vital partners in our federal system.

The affront to federalism posed by section 42 is compounded by the fact that the federal government—not the federal government in concert with the provinces but, rather, the federal government acting alone—would control the rules of the referendum, its timing, and even the wording of it. Worse still is the danger that the federal government might also use huge amounts of advertising and public opinion polling dollars to manipulate the results. Indeed, the record of the present government demonstrates the likelihood of that happening. Under such circumstances, the referendum votes of the people of Prince Edward Island would be buried under an avalanche of votes from the huge metropolitan areas of the country. In Ontario alone there are at least eight cities which have populations greater than Prince Edward Island's. Surely democracy is more than just a matter of numbers. I ask hon. members, should Prince Edward Island's long history as a separate province not count for something?

A much fairer formula for Prince Edward Island, for the other provinces and for all of Canada is, I think, the so-called Vancouver formula—a formula agreed to by all the provinces and the federal government this past summer, but one on which the Prime Minister has refused to act. Under that formula, constitutional change would require the approval of Parliament and seven provinces making up 50 per cent of the population of Canada, with an opting-out provision on certain selected exclusive provincial rights. Any proposed changes to the constitution would then proceed according to the formula. Such a formula would give my small province some role in constitutional matters though, of course, not a veto.

For example, suppose six provinces comprising 50 per cent of the population of Canada agree to a constitutional change but they require the approval of a seventh province, irrespective of its population. Prince Edward Island could be that seventh province. Similarly, although less likely, suppose seven provinces agree to a constitutional change but they do not quite make up 50 per cent of the population. They might require the approval of Prince Edward Island's tiny population to put them over the top.

I am not arguing that Canada should tailor-make its constitution to meet the particular circumstances of Prince Edward Island, or of any other single province for that matter. I am saying, though, that whatever formula is adopted, it should not be unfair to any province. By that test, the Vancouver formula is infinitely better than the so-called modified Victoria charter.

Sections 41 and 42 constitute a direct assault on P.E.I.'s interests as a separate province of Canada. The resolution is an affront to our province—and, indeed, to all provinces—in a number of ways.

May I draw your attention, in particular, to section 44. That section effectively emasculates the Senate of Canada in constitutional decision-making. It says that an amendment to the constitution can be made without the approval of the Senate under specified circumstances. The government is proposing to change unilaterally, in a fundamental way, a central institution of Parliament; an instrument established at confederation specifically to safeguard the rights of small provinces like Prince Edward Island. And it is doing so in a fashion that the Supreme Court of Canada declared ultra vires when the government tested the legality of a similar measure, Bill C-60, before the court just ten months ago.

To my mind, Canadians all too often and too lightly dismiss the Senate as an anachronism. Now is not the time, nor is here the place, to point out the usefulness, both real and potential, of the red chamber. But it is well worth stressing the importance placed upon the Senate by the provinces, especially the maritime provinces, at the time of confederation.

In a federal assembly based on representation by population, the maritime members knew they were destined to be heavily outnumbered. Their one hope of redressing the political imbalance lay in the Senate, or the "Legislative Council" as it was then called. The upper house was clearly seen, and specifically constituted, as a defender of regional and provincial interests. The question of representation in the Senate was, in fact, the most hotly debated issue of the proposed federal scheme at the Quebec conference in October, 1864.

The leader of what was later to be called the Liberal party, George Brown, called the equality of representation for the regions in the Senate "the very essence of the compact" that was confederation. "On no other condition", he said, "could we have advanced a step". Professor Robert MacKay, an acknowledged expert on the Senate, has described it as "the last means of defence for the protection of provincial or sectional rights". Yet the present federal government is proposing to reduce dramatically the power of the Senate in constitutional matters. Not only will small provinces like Prince Edward Island be left to fend for themselves in the face of national referenda dominated by the large populous provinces and cities of Canada, those small provinces will also lose the protection afforded them through the Senate by the terms of confederation itself.

What the present federal government is trying to do is nothing less than change the rules of confederation to the point where we will no longer have a federal system in any true sense of the term. My leader has said that the Prime Minister's concept of federalism is much closer to a unitary state than a federal state. I believe he is right. If we are to have a form of unitary system in Canada, then the maritime provinces may as well close shop today. Certainly, they will cease to have any real say in constitutional questions.

And where will it all end? In future it will be easy for the federal government to obtain the constitutional changes it wants. Not even the Senate will be there to stop a majority prime minister hell-bent on getting his own way. For example, the British North America Act guarantees the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing the province. That guarantee is a most important one for P.E.I. Few other provinces, perhaps none of them, need the same protection because their respective populations are large enough to assure them an adequate number of seats in the House.

Yet section 50(f) of the government's resolution proposes that the relevant section in the Canadian constitution may be changed in accordance with the amending procedure prescribed by section 41 or 42 of the resolution. Given the adverse implications of section 42 for P.E.I., one wonders how long the island will be guaranteed a minimum of four seats in the House of Commons. My province will not be able to count on the Senate to safeguard its historic constitutional right in that connection, since the role of the upper house in constitutional matters will have been severely curtailed if the resolution is not substantially changed.

A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I referred to George Brown's 1864 description of confederation as a "compact". I believe that, in a special sense, confederation was a compact and that great violence will be done to it by the federal government's resolution.

I would be the first to agree with my lawyer friends in the House that the confederation settlement was not a contract in the technical or legal sense. The BNA Act was, after all, a British statute, not a Canadian one. None of the colonies was sovereign at the time of confederation, so no government among them was legally competent to enter into any binding agreement with the others. Furthermore, Ontario and Quebec were brought into existence by the BNA Act. Thus they could not have been parties to a legal compact that established them.

Confederation was, nevertheless, a distinctly Canadian response to a Canadian problem. If confederation was not a compact in the strict contractual sense, the parties to it did make mutual commitments. The terms of the union written into the BNA Act, though finally settled by the British government, followed very closely the Quebec resolutions agreed to by the political leaders of the British North American colonies.

Some of the colonies represented at the Charlottetown and Quebec conferences—my own province, for example—chose not to enter confederation until after 1867, despite pressure from the imperial government. That fact demonstrates that the colonies did have, and did exercise, a fair measure of self-determination.

In a moral sense, then, if not in a legal sense, confederation was a compact. The various communities shared widespread assumptions about the nature of the confederation agreement and those same assumptions made it possible for the communities to accept the agreement.

There was, in other words, a spirit of confederation. That spirit dictated, among other things, that the federal Parliament may not unilaterally cause the Canadian constitution to be amended in any way it chooses. Unilateral action by the federal government on fundamental constitutional amendments, especially those affecting the provinces, would be incompatible with federalism. Worse still, such action would be a serious breach of the mutual commitments made when the Dominion of Canada was established and when new provinces were subsequently added. Yet that is what the present government proposes to do with its resolution.

The spirit of confederation is not only linked to the fact that distinct social and political communities came together to build a new country. The spirit of confederation is also linked to the fact that those communities, in one form or another, continue to exist to this very day. The spirit of confederation in 1867 consisted of a due regard for the nature and interests of the communities that formed Canada. And the spirit of confederation is the same now. The country could not have existed in 1867, and it cannot exist now, without a reasonable respect for the communities which comprise it and for the institutions through which those communities express themselves.

By riding roughshod over the provinces in such a basic area as the constitution, the present federal government is extinguishing the spirit that gave birth to our country and that has helped keep it united for over a century.

The current federal government is trying to act alone to change permanently the nature of Canada, overriding the wishes of Parliament and the provinces. It is proposing a charter of rights that, however commendable in some ways, imposes enormous obligations on the provinces in what are their exclusive fields—education, property, and civil rights. And, in all of these changes, the government is applying a double standard. The Prime Minister is asking the British parliament to make all the changes he wants. But changes sought by others, in future, will require a new amending formula that is heavily loaded in favour of the federal government at the expense of the provinces, especially Prince Edward Island, which would be excluded from the process altogether. The government's resolution betrays the spirit of confederation and, in doing so, betrays Canada itself.

Your Honour, I do not want to leave the impression that I am personally opposed to everything in the resolution. The entrenchment of the principle of equalization, in section 31, is especially welcome. Still, let us not be seduced into believing there is more in section 31 than meets the eye. Although there is an expressed commitment to provide "essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians", how such a goal is to be achieved is not mentioned. Certainly any reference to equalization payments is conspicuously absent.

In any event, equalization payments, though laudable, are not a panacea for the economic ills that affect many parts of our country, including my own region. The fact is, the per capita income in the Atlantic provinces still lags well behind the Canadian average despite equalization payments and other efforts by both levels of government to reduce regional economic inequalities.

Indeed, an over-reliance on the transfer payment approach to regional disparities is part of the problem. Instead of helping the so-called have-not provinces to become self-sufficient, transfer payments—whether to individuals or to provincial treasuries—have tended to make those provinces even more dependent on the rest of Canada. Since transfer payments are rarely an investment in the economy of the recipient, the money commonly gets recycled back to Quebec and Ontario through expenditures on goods and services produced in the industrial heartland of the country.

In P.E.I., for example, government transfers to persons contributed 23 per cent of the total personal income of the province, compared to only 13 per cent for Canada as a whole. Of the $505 million expenditures by the federal government, the provincial government, local government, and hospitals on the island in 1978, the last year for which figures are available, $426 million was provided by the federal government alone. Prince Edward Island, like the other Atlantic provinces, has become, in a special sense, a ward of the federal government.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that such regional economic servitude is exclusively the result of either neglect or accident. One cannot overlook the fact that it has served the interests of central Canada to have the Atlantic provinces as a ready market for their manufactured goods, rather than engaged in manufacturing themselves. National policies, from protective tariffs to freight rates, have consistently favoured Ontario and Quebec—the very provinces whose votes have enabled the Liberal Party of Canada to govern the country for most of this century.

As the Premier of Prince Edward Island put it at the first ministers' conference in Ottawa last month:

> Could it be that the central government only responds 'in the national interest' when those who are asked to make concessions are minorities in the House of Commons, but never when those expected to make concessions are the numerical majorities? Could it be that, if we had a truly federal state, in which all partners had a more significant voice, national policies might more truly reflect the interests of all provinces and, hence, the entire country?

I wish to close my remarks today on the constitution, Mr. Speaker, by expressing profound regret that the government has seen fit to proceed with its constitutional package in a highly partisan fashion. Not only has it alienated most of the provinces through its high-handedness, it has also refused to involve, in any real way, members of the opposition parties in the House. To the extent that the people of Canada have been invited to participate, it has been through government manipulation at the hands of professional pollsters and propagandizers.

The Prime Minister has made constitutional reform his exclusive preserve. I want to stress at this point that, in my view, no member of the House should doubt the Prime Minister's genuine dedication to Canada nor the breadth of his knowledge of constitutional matters. But a constitution must reflect the preoccupations of more than just one man. A constitution must reflect the aspirations of the society for which it provides the rules of government. What is more, a society's constitution must have a degree of acceptance in the population at large, even if the legal complexities may not be understood by every citizen.

I believe this government can learn a lesson from history, from the Fathers of Confederation, in particular. Over a century ago they set aside their often bitter partisanship for a greater cause, the union of the British North American colonies. Sir John A. Macdonald, no shrinking violet himself when it came to partisan politics, invited his arch-enemy George Brown, and two other reformers, to join him in a coalition to bring about constitutional change as a means of breaking the political deadlock then faced by the Canada, a deadlock that was greater than any between the federal government and the provinces today. To his lasting credit, though he hated the government leader, Brown accepted Macdonald's invitation.

The coalition of 1864 lasted right up to confederation because the politicians of the day were prepared to place the public interest ahead of their narrow partisan or personal interests.

By the same token, most of the delegations from the various colonies at the constitutional conferences preceding confederation were composed of representatives of more than one party. At the Charlottetown conference, for example, the P.E.I. delegation was comprised of three government members and two opposition members. At the Quebec conference, the ratio was four to three, with the delegations of other colonies similarly formed.

I am not now calling for a coalition government to deal with Canada's current constitutional problems. By my fear is this: if the Prime Minister and his government are able to use their parliamentary majority to impose their will—against strong opposition in Parliament, against the opposition of almost all the provinces, and against significant opposition in the country at large—the victory will be seen as a Liberal party victory. For constitutional change to have lasting success, it must be seen as the country's victory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: The Fathers of Confederation, despite vigorous debate, soon recognized their meetings in Charlottetown and Quebec as a divinely granted opportunity. They rose to the occasion and built better than they knew.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I was taken aback by the force of media opposition to my party's call this past summer for a broadly-based special convention to deal with proposals for constitutional change. Such a convention would involve representatives from all parties, at both the federal and provincial levels, government and opposition members alike, as well as a number of distinguished Canadians outside the political realm. To my mind that proposal was a worthy one, though it may be too late to act on it now. It is, however, not too late to follow the spirit that motivated the proposal for a constitutional convention, the same spirit that gave birth to confederation more than a century ago.

The distinguished political scientist, Donald Smiley, has written, and I quote:

A politically organized society cannot in the long run survive without the capacity to appeal effectively to the will and imagination of its citizens, particularly one so little formed as that of Canada and so vulnerable to disintegrative forces from within and assimilative pressures from without.

However successful the present government might be in parliamentary one-upmanship, a constitution cannot be forced on a people if it is to serve them long and well. I urge the government to reassess its tactics in the crucial days and weeks ahead. The confederation spirit has served the country well for over a century. If given another chance it will not let us down now.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to most of the contributions and speeches which have been made on this very important subject matter, the proposed resolution which will, I think, affect the future of this country very dramatically in time. I do not for a moment attempt to minimize the impact of this proposed resolution, if adopted. I think the real question is not whether it will have an impact on Canada and on its citizens but whether that impact will be beneficial or detrimental to the future of Canada and to its citizens.

I have listened through a great many debates in this House. I have participated in a few. I have always felt somehow that the House of Commons, with all its faults, had always met the challenge of the day, and I have a feeling that it will once again.

I must commend the hon. member who just sat down for his very reasoned, passionate and logical contribution. There have been many in this particular debate because the whole nature of the House of Commons is such that members from all parties on issues, particularly as important as this, should reflect the concern and the misgivings of their particular regions. That really is the main function of a federal system, and I must say that I was particularly impressed the other day by the contributions, for instance, of two members from Newfoundland, diametrically opposed as they are, in good Newfoundland tradition, on certain issues. They reflected the tremendous appreciation they have for this great country. They reflected, in impassioned speeches, the concern the regions have that somehow we may be stumbling into a formula which somehow would create the type of imbalance that the Fathers of Confederation were concerned about.

I am not a historian. I am not an expert on the constitution. I reflect, as did the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), those very forces which molded my thinking. The hon. member's views are conditioned by the privilege of having lived in Newfoundland prior to 1949, although at times he does not look that old, and he is now a member of the federal Parliament. My views are conditioned by my background, that of an English-speaking Quebecker in my infancy. I am one who has had the privilege of sitting in this House elected from a Quebec riding for I do not know how many years, perhaps 15. Now I have an equally glorious opportunity to represent a riding in Ontario.

Fortune was such that I spent 18 months in the Quebec Assembly where not only Bill 101 was adopted but also Bill 1, which we hear little about these days. It was struck down by the Human Rights Commission of that province. I sat in that assembly in the months preceding the legislation which set up a referendum, and so I know to a great degree how emotional this debate can be and how thin the line is between reasoned participation and impassioned rhetoric which will not stand the test of time.

I participated in this House in the official languages debate. I can remember the resistance to change in those days. That was understandable. Members came from parts of the country where bilingualism was not an issue. To the everlasting credit of the House of Commons that important piece of legislation was adopted, after reasoned debate and concern for what were legitimate points of view expressed in that debate. I think in retrospect there is nobody in this House who would want to touch that piece of legislation, even though time has proved that at times it was implemented with too much zeal, or not enough.

I was here and participated in the flag debate. I remember that debate very well. What I remember are the good contributions which were made from all parts of the House. Again I understood the concern of hon. members who felt that somehow we were severing for all time our ties with the Commonwealth of Great Britain. I remember the impassioned and moving speeches on the Red Ensign and on the contribution that flag had made to this country in two wars. There were legitimate concerns, but again in retrospect I think we feared for nothing. The Canadian flag has been a unifying flag, perhaps because it was acceptable to all Canadians regardless of whether they traced their heritage to Great Britain or France. It was a flag which was devoid of symbols. It was uniquely ours, and again I must say that that was a traumatic debate which lasted the better part of a year, or a summer at least.

I will not refresh the memories of hon. members with other milestones in the slow but sure evolution from colonialism to full nationhood. Initiatives have been taken not only by this side of the House but also by Conservative prime ministers. I might say on behalf of the hon. gentleman who has led the Conservatives and who was prime minister for a little while that, in his way, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has contributed to unity by his methods and by the efforts he made to learn the other official language of this country.

I often wonder if perhaps in French-speaking Quebec those efforts are appreciated to the degree they should be, because never again can we Liberals in that province subtley suggest that the Conservative party did not understand or did not want to reflect bilingualism. I think that myth should be dissipated once and for all, not only because of the efforts of the Leader of the Opposition to learn French but because of the stand of the opposition on the Official Languages Act.

● (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I do not propose to speak in any great detail about this clause or that clause. After all, what we are asked to do in the House is to refer the resolution proposed by the government to a joint committee of the House and the other place. Once that proposed resolution reaches the committee, there, I am sure, many of the concerns, observations and fears of hon. members opposite can be resolved, discussed, debated, put at ease and, perhaps, result in amendments—I do not pretend to know. But I do know that hundreds of thousands of people who are watching this debate on television, Canadians from all walks of life, are beginning to ask—at least that is what I found over the weekend—"when will you complete the preliminary step toward the adoption of the resolution, and when will this resolution be turned over to the committee?" I do not pretend to know the answer, but I leave with the House leaders the observation that if this debate is to have the desired effect on a matter as fundamental as changing the constitution, if it is to be done in the proper atmosphere, then I think we would want to come to some conclusion as to when this resolution should be referred to the committee, and I do not think the opposition would want to be charged with obstruction through a series of questions of privileges or points of order.

As so many hon. members have pointed out, we are affecting the constitution of this country to a tremendous degree, at least the written portion of the constitution, the British North America Act. I have thought very deeply about it because, by reason of the fact that I am English-speaking and did have the privilege of living for so many years in Quebec and representing ridings in Quebec, I was preoccupied, more than most, I suppose, with constitutional minority rights. The minorities about whom I was most concerned, of course, were the French-speaking Quebeckers. I used to get up in the House in the 1960s and speak with great pride about how well I was treated in that province as an English-speaking Quebecker. I am sure I spoke in every province in the 1960s at the request of the late

Mr. Pearson on the type of Canada we could fashion with a high degree of tolerance and understanding of both official languages, cultures and religions, which was a way of life in Quebec, if only the same tolerance and understanding could spread right across this great country of ours.

I must say that I have seen tremendous progress. I can remember when, in 1962, I felt a moment of embarrassment when a group of my constituents came to visit Parliament and I could not find a bilingual guide to explain the beauty of this building. That is no longer the case. I can remember also when documents were never tabled in the House in both official languages simultaneously. It was understood. You babbled something about translation when you tabled the documents, and it was done six weeks or two months later, if at all. That is no longer the case.

I have seen much progress in Ontario. Since I have represented Lincoln, I have been impressed at the progress that the Conservative government of Ontario has made in the area of language and culture.

I was also there in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, when the provincial government took away some of the privileges that I had as an English-speaking Quebecker, which to me had become rights; for example, the right to put a sign over my store in any language if I was in business, a right which Quebeckers no longer enjoy. I realized then how fragile the rights of individuals are if the force of those rights is found in provincial legislation and not in the federal constitution. I came to that conclusion a long time ago, Mr. Speaker.

Indeed, when I think back to the vision of Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights, Mr. Pearson with his flag, or the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) dedication to the Official Languages Act, I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that if these fundamental changes had not been made, if we had not moved to strengthen the symbols of federalism and strengthen federalism in the House itself, if we had not once again pleaded with French-speaking Quebeckers of the calibre of our Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the present Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) or, going back, the late Guy Favreau—I could name them all, some of them no longer here—if we had not prevailed on those people to come to the House of Commons to remind French-speaking Canadians that this was their country, all of it, not just Quebec, that indeed there was a role for them to play, that they could become prime ministers and that they could become cabinet ministers of great strength and influence who commanded respect despite the fact that they were French-speaking Quebeckers, that discrimination, at least here, was a thing of the past, I doubt very much that we could have won the referendum.

So I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all hon. members, that what we are doing right now will have the same impact in two, three, five or ten years from now if the force of separation in that province or in other provinces rears its ugly head. The Fathers of Confederation opted for a federal system. If you read their speeches carefully you will find that they also opted for a strong central government in our federal system, as strong as they could obtain and not lose the support of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

I have suggested that, throughout the years, through provincial legislation, through economic shifts, the central government has become relatively weak in comparison to some of the provincial governments, particularly in the field of the economy. You might say to me now that there are ways and means in which this imbalance can be redressed. That is true, it has happened. The federal government assumed tremendous powers through necessity during the war, powers which it has been reluctant at times to give up. Some powers, I think, it has given up too easily. But the present formula for federalism, what we are tinkering with—and that is the danger of tinkering with it—has been remarkably successful.

We are the finest country in the world because of our economic system. We have been able to combine free enterprise with social reform, and provide our system with the best educated work force in the world because of our dedication to equality of opportunity and free education wherever possible. We have the healthiest work force in the world, thanks to medicare and the determination of a series of governments to look after social reform. We have the very unique concept of equalization, sharing, which have spelled the difference between inequality and equality of opportunity in this country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—Government advertising—Approval of unilingual advertisements; the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn)—Finance—Government policy on interest rates; the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar)—The Constitution—Participation of native people and northerners in constitutional discussions.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Notice of motion No. 8, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent. Item No. 11, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean). Shall the item stand?

RADIOACTIVE WASTE

SUGGESTED MORATORIUM ON CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR POWER STATIONS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider declaring a moratorium on the further construction of nuclear power stations pending the report of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons to look into ways and means of improving techniques for radioactive waste disposal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a number of years ago some other members of the House of Commons and I had an opportunity to examine closely Canada's nuclear industry through questioning in the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. I remember at the time, in late 1977, the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Hon. Alastair Gillespie, stating with very strong confidence to myself and my colleagues that the answer to the problem of nuclear waste disposal was at hand. Perhaps he could be forgiven for his remarks since he was using the report of Dr. Hare as his source, which indicated in 1977 that "there are good prospects for the safe, permanent disposal of reactor wastes and irradiated fuel." Unfortunately, three years have passed since those remarks were made and the Hare report was published, and we are no closer to a solution today than we were at that time.

The most recent study of the problem by an all-party committee of the Ontario legislature made some interesting conclusions, specifically that Canada's nuclear waste program is ineffective, run by the wrong organization and foundering on public mistrust. The committee found fault with both federal and provincial governments for a lack of adequate research into disposal sites and a failure to support stringent safety regulations when shipping radioactive materials. Moreover, the committee concluded that governments have tended to present biased accounts to the public in regard to nuclear fuel disposal. I believe the remarks of the minister to which I referred earlier are an example of such biased, overly optimistic accounts.

I almost wish the former member for Etobicoke were here with us today to give us further reassuring testimony. Instead, we must now face the reality of nuclear wastes without the comfort of even his verbal safeguards which have become unfounded over the past three years. What happened to the "good prospects" referred to in the Hare report? Nuclear wastes pose a threat to the environment, and subsequently are a threat to the health and safety of all of us and our constituents. The danger of these wastes is a function of the extreme radioactivity of spent fuel of any nuclear reactor. For several reasons the most significant of these waste products is plutonium-239, known in some circles as the "element of the lord of hell". Although primarily known and feared as the principal component of atomic weaponry, plutonium-239 also is the central threat to our environment. It is known that one milligram of this element can cause lung cancer if inhaled. In laboratory tests one eight-millionth of a pound of plutonium-239 caused lung cancer in animals. In fact it is one of the most lethal poisons known to mankind.

Compounding the lethality problem of plutonium is the incredible longevity of the element. Whereas other reactor waste products may have a half life in the order of 30 years, that of plutonium-239 in fact is 24,000 years, that is, fully one half of all the plutonium-239 we produce today will still be with us with its attendant radioactivity 24,000 years from now. Expressed in other terms, it will take 240,000 years before the plutonium-239 created today will reach a low enough level of radioactivity to present no real threat to the human race or our environment. Nor is plutonium-239 the only radioactive waste product of nuclear reactors.

Even the heavy water used as a moderator in the Candu emerges from the reactor radioactive, and all radioactivity affects human tissue in exactly the same way. By ionizing atoms it changes the configuration of cellular molecules. In so far as molecular function depends upon its configuration, that molecule, and hence the cell, becomes incapable of fulfilling its intended function. It has been found that radium which is similar to plutonium-239 in its effects on the human body can cause necrosis and tumours of the bone and anaemia resulting in death. Also it can result in cancer of the skin, lungs and thyroid.

I have dwelt for some time on the unpleasant details of radioactivity because it is important for all members of the House to realize the consequences of plunging headlong into the development of nuclear power. I say "headlong" because the government has yet to provide any clear indication of progress in regard to the problem of waste management. I should have excited the minister, but I have been unable to. But, I have cited the example of a minister's responsibility for overseeing the development of a Canadian nuclear policy over the last few years. He said that solution was at hand, that in fact they had found the solution. They have not found the solution. I defy anyone in the nuclear industry to come forward now and state that we are closer to a solution than we were in 1977. I hope in response to this motion today that someone will stand and say if there is any such person. I hope that person will come forward and state that we are closer to a solution than we were in 1977. Any reading of science I have done indicates that in fact we are no closer.

I understand that AECL has now delayed for at least two years the selection of a disposal site for Canada's nuclear wastes, so three years is extended to five years. Let me give an example of the consequences of the failure to find such a disposal site. In my own riding I have been trying for the last four years to have some low-level radioactive material removed from a specific site in Surrey. Earlier AECB made a commitment to remove the material by December of this year. I am afraid that kind of commitment is like the one given by the former minister who said that a waste site would be found for high-level radioactive wastes. We cannot even solve the basic problem of low-level radioactive waste. Now they are saying that this December guarantee to remove this product from my riding to a more permanent waste disposal site may not be met. And it is now suddenly up to the provinces. Now that we cannot find a solution, throw it to the provinces, which seems to be the policy of the federal government.

I think in this particular case we have a clear example of the irresponsible behaviour of the present government and its agencies in regard to nuclear energy and radioactive waste disposal. The AECB in this case licensed the manufacturing process which created radioactive wastes, yet once the wastes were left behind the AECB refused to accept responsibility for them, sloughing them off instead onto the provincial government.

It is this kind of attitude which contributes to public contempt and suspicion of the nuclear industry in Canada. A Gallup poll taken January 11 of this year, commissioned by none other than the AECL themselves, found that 47 per cent of Ontario residents opposed a waste disposal site in their community, even if a safe disposal method were found, while 39 per cent did not know, and only 6 per cent supported the idea of a waste disposal site. There has to be a reason why these people are concerned. I have listened to some of these reasons for their concern and I cannot understand why the government opposite is not concerned in the same way.

There is good reason to oppose a nuclear waste disposal site in your community. In the first place a satisfactory storage system has yet to be worked out. Immobilizing the waste in glass has been suggested, but unless an adequate cooling system can be developed the glass itself will melt down and leak wastes into the soil. Furthermore, the reacting waste forms gases which could shatter the glass unit. Other problems relate to the site itself. Drilling holes into granite creates fractures, these fractures in turn might allow the entry of water. Earthquake activity can further extend a fracture. We must never forget that we are dealing not with decades, or more centuries, but with thousands upon thousands of years. These are some of the problems which have to be faced. We should not deceive ourselves into thinking the problem is an insignificant one.

Right now the only means we have for looking after radioactive wastes is to store them in temporary cooling ponds, which are a type of large swimming pool. Every day 1700 pounds of reactor wastes are placed in these pools from Ontario's reactors alone. By the year 2,000 we will have to find a way of disposing of 80,000 tons of highly radioactive waste. In this context I should point out that these statistics come from the commission's report itself entitled "The Management of Canada's Nuclear Wastes." The report recommended a step-by-step program calling for an operating repository capable of receiving Canada's nuclear wastes to be in operation by 1995 to 2,000. We have yet to reach the first step in that program, which was the declaration of a national plan to deal with nuclear wastes. Is that the kind of response we are going to get? The prospect of 80,000 tons of radioactive waste sitting around in storage pools becomes increasingly unpleasant.

At this point a most obvious question springs to mind. Canada's first nuclear reactor started up in 1945 when this country was, and is, foremost in nuclear energy research. We were leaders, and perhaps we still are, in nuclear technology, but we are not leaders in the disposal of the waste products from our technology. There is absolutely no excuse for a country as technologically developed as Canada to have made no provisions for the management of reactor wastes. Yet despite the fact Canada's commercial nuclear program has been in operation since 1962, the minister of the environment, when I questioned him in committee in 1976, referred to the disposal of nuclear wastes as a "new development". His deputy minister then elaborated by saying that the Department of the Environment and the Department of Energy had recently been contacted to pursue the matter and to come up with policy recommendations.

Sixteen years passed after the first commercial reactor started before the government realized it had a problem on its hands with the storage and disposal of nuclear wastes. Granted, a reactor usually takes ten years before it is producing significant amounts of waste. But we have not stopped at just one reactor, we have continued to build more, with little or no regard for environmental consequences.

This leads me to another point. Not only have we continued to construct nuclear reactors without having any means of disposing of the wastes. Moreover, we have exported our nuclear technology and its incumbent problems to any country willing to pay the price. We have exported the technology, we have exported the basic raw materials, but we have not been able to provide the expertise to deal with the disposal of the wastes. Here we enter into the realm of safeguards and a whole host of other complications to this industry. India constructed her first nuclear explosive device with the aid of a Candu reactor. Pakistan is well on its way to producing an atomic bomb. But those very real problems tend to obscure another aspect of nuclear sales and one which becomes increasingly more significant for those countries with peaceful intentions. I am referring specifically to the problem of waste disposal for those countries which accept this bargain of unlimited energy in exchange for the hazards of nuclear wastes.

I refer again to my questioning of cabinet ministers in 1976. I asked if Canada has a moral obligation, a moral responsibility. If we are going to export this technology, these raw materials to less developed countries than ourselves when we cannot handle the wastes, how do we expect them to do so? The then minister of the environment replied that he could not do anything about that because he did not have the information to give them. Therefore, it stands that if we cannot provide the information to help nations protect themselves from our technology, are we not morally obligated not to export it?

Furthermore, the minister said the Canadian government had no means of implementing in other countries the environmental rules we may observe in our own country. That position was confirmed by the minister then responsible for external affairs. Given this attitude, which has not changed in the four years since those statements were made, it is clear the government is guilty of moral bankruptcy for continuing to export our nuclear capabilities to countries less equipped than ourselves to handle these potentially dangerous problems. It is equally clear the government should cease to export any nuclear materials until such time as adequate safety and environmental standards are in effect. If need be, this would include the return to Canada of all spent fuels from our nuclear reactors abroad. But of course we cannot do that because we have no means of dealing with the transportation or handling of these wastes once they have reached our shores.

The previous government was prepared to face the problems posed by nuclear energy. The Conservative party had indicated its intention and had begun to establish a joint House and Senate committee to examine the various aspects of nuclear power. My own motion, which I sponsor here today, is more modest in its scope in that it calls for an examination of the nuclear waste problem only. However, it is because of the long term and significant dangers associated with spent fuels that I ask the House today to consider placing a moratorium on the future construction of nuclear power plants until the problem of wastes can be adequately dealt with. I am not saying we have to stop our industry, I am saying we have to spend as much energy finding solutions to the problem of nuclear waste as we spend paying bribes to foreign governments to buy our technology. If we spent just that much effort perhaps we would get closer to that solution which is supposedly at hand.

This issue is still too important to be left to internal departmental study, which is a very convenient way of putting something on the shelf and forgetting about it. It demands attention from members of all parties of this House of Commons. Because of the threat posed by nuclear wastes to future generations, this House would be derelict in its responsibility to the Canadian people if it did not hold public hearings. Why should the public not have its say in this country as it does in almost every country in the world?

It is clear that attempts to advance waste disposal research further are hampered by a public distrust of AECL. It is equally clear that such distrust is, to a large extent, justified. AECL continues to see waste disposal as a public relations problem. Combined with the failure to do anything about nuclear waste until the problem is almost unmanageable, AECL's attitude has alienated those very people whom it can least afford to offend. Public hearings by a joint House-Senate committee would enable both sides to clear the air and would be considerably less partisan than an industry-sponsored hearing which must consider its own vested interest. This is a matter for government, not a matter for the industry.

I would like to sum up with a brief thought. In the case of plutonium-239, in the words of an author of a recent book on this subject, "We are asking all foreseeable generations of human beings to guard this element from accident, sabotage and acts of God". The very least we can do as responsible members of Parliament is to try to ensure that from the moment we knew about the problem, from that very moment, we began with all our efforts to seek solutions, knowledge and technology relative to waste disposal so that we can safeguard, not just ourselves, but future generations of not only Canadians, but mankind.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the initiative taken by the hon. member opposite in raising the question of nuclear matters in Canada today, particularly the question of nuclear-spent fuel disposal and the related matter of public participation in that important subject.

The hon. member has drawn to the attention of the House the fact that the generation of electricity by nuclear reactors carries with it the problem of how we can best dispose safely of the spent fuel produced.

More than 99 per cent of the radioactive material produced in the typical Candu station remains in the used fuel which is now stored temporarily at the reactor sites. Hon. members will be aware that this fuel contains useful material which could be recovered and used to produce yet more energy as technology to that end develops. If the useful material were to be recycled, most of the residual radioactive material would be left behind as separated waste. No matter whether the radioactive material is left in the fuel or separated as waste, clearly, as the hon. member opposite pointed out, it must be handled with care and isolated from man until the radioactivity decreases to an insignificant level.

The question then arises as to whether this can be done safely. We have heard today of the present practice which is to store the spent fuel at the reactor sites. It can indeed be stored there indefinitely with suitable maintenance, but that practice would place a burden on future generations, to maintain that high degree of surveillance over the spent fuel. Accordingly, researchers are working, under agreement reached between the Ontario government and the national government, to investigate various ways of permanent disposal. The choice to be made is to discard the entire used fuel bundles from the reactors after sealing them in corrosion-proof containers, in which case the used fuel would be considered a waste in the true sense of the word, or to recycle the useful materials in the used fuel and melt the pure wastes, that is the fission byproducts, together with glass-making chemicals to produce a highly insoluble solid for disposal. Scientists and engineers, including the geologists, involved in this research agree on the suitability of geological disposal. The used fuel or solid radioactive glass waste would be placed in a deep vault carved out of primeval rock.

In Canada we are fortunate in that we have, for example, in the Canadian Shield more than 1,000 locations which have the theoretical potential as sites for waste disposal. A nuclear waste vault in such circumstances would look like a large hard rock mine with the spent fuel isolated under 500 to 1,000 metres of rock. A single vault would be sufficient to hold all of the nuclear waste produced in Canada for the next 50 years.

That research which, as I say, has been conducted under the aegis of the Ontraio government and the federal government, has been subjected to a variety of reviews. In a few minutes I want to turn to the question raised by the hon. member on public participation in this aspect as well as other aspects of nuclear energy generation. Before doing so, however, I want to refer to the annual report of the technical advisory committee on nuclear fuel waste management program, a committee of independent experts, of which the hon. member opposite may know.

It might be useful if I were to point out to the House that in the committee's over-all view, the current research program is well conceived. There are many impressive accomplishments, as the report of the technical advisory committee notes, and the research objectives are becoming more clearly defined and the most critical areas in which more research is needed are being identified. The committee was reassured by the increasing participation in the program by university and industry scientists and engineers and the excellent understanding of relevant international research activities on the part of the principal investigators.

The committee in its report in May stressed that a proper scientific and technical evaluation of the program can only be made if the necessary research information is available. In particular it noted that extensive geoscientific work in the field is necessary and that it is essential that approvals for field research be obtained. I might add parenthetically that such activity is going forward at this very moment.

Further, the committee affirmed its general approval and support for major increases in funding for the expansion of the geoscientific and geotechnical programs, especially in regard to field research activities and the development of an underground research laboratory.

In discussing the work which has been done in the field of evaluation of the current program for the disposal of nuclear spent fuel, the hon. member opposite made reference to the final report of the select committee on Ontario hydro affairs of the Ontario legislature. I am pleased that he did so because that report contains much information of value to those who are actively concerned with the current research phase of the spent fuel program.

The hon. member opposite may be aware that the report of the Ontario select committee has characterized the current nuclear waste program as fundamentally sound. It has also put forward a number of proposals for futher evolution in the current practices in the program, practices mainly related to the participation of the public and to the over-all management of the program. I can assure the hon. member that those recommendations will be studied by the federal government as well as by the Ontario government. I am quite certain that many of them will be subjects of discussion between the two levels of government.

I see that the time is passing. The hon. member opposite, in bringing forward his motion, has raised a variety of subjects to which I would like to respond. However, given the limited time available, it might be better if I were to restrict myself to one or two of his observations.

He spoke of the problems associated with the export of nuclear technology from Canada. First he drew a picture of his concern about the safeguards which are in place to prevent any repetition of the experience with India and to prevent the abuse of Candu technology by countries importing that technology. I am sure the hon. member is aware that the Canadian safeguard provisions against non-proliferation are as stringent and as demanding as any in the world today. I am sure he is very conscious that Canada has foregone commercial opportunities for additional commercial sales as a result of our commitment to an unparalleled high level of safeguards against nuclear proliferation.

Mr. Wenman: Safeguards such as those with India?

Mr. MacLaren: Second, in terms of technology with regard to spent fuel disposal, the hon. member opposite will be aware that the Canadian research program is merely one of many such programs. Many research programs are conducted by other governments which generate electricity through nuclear fission. Additionally there are, of course, international research programs under the aegis of the International Atomic Energy Authority in Vienna. Those programs of research are also directed toward some of the questions which the hon. member opposite raised earlier.

Mr. Speaker, the motion before us calls for a moratorium on the further construction of nuclear power stations. I do not know whether the hon. member had that moratorium in mind for Canada only or whether he also meant a prohibition on the export of nuclear technology. Be that as it may, he looks for a moratorium while improved techniques for radioactive waste disposal would be examined by a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

In our view a moratorium might be appropriate in areas where the government cannot proceed because of confusion or indecision. I do not know whether it was that experience of the previous government in this area which led it to the proposal for a moratorium when it was in office. For our part, we have not felt the need for a moratorium because our policy is not marked by confusion or indecision. On the contrary, the government's views on nuclear energy, and particularly on the future of the nuclear industry in Canada, were set forth in a brief statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as reported in Hansard for May 1, 1980. The Prime Minister said we were not undertaking a public inquiry, in the broad sense of the word, because we believed the time schedule for keeping our nuclear industry viable is short. The Prime Minister also noted that we were in some danger of seeing the Canadian nuclear industry become obsolete and losing its opportunities to sell Canadian high technology in other countries. He noted too that we wanted to take this opportunity to determine in what ways the promotion of the Canadian nuclear industry and, indeed, the sales abroad of Candu technology, might be encouraged. There is no intention, of course, in that connection to prevent the Canadian public, either concurrently with the review or subsequently, from expressing their views. The Prime Minister did stress that a long inquiry about whether, as he put it, we stay in the game or get out, would not be feasible since it might well be during the time taken up by such an inquiry that our industry lost its momentum in the face of both international competition and national considerations.

Mr. Speaker, as members of the House know, there have been a variety of inquiries here in Canada over recent years into the various aspects of the generation of nuclear energy. I would refer the hon. member opposite, when he raises the question how Canadians have had such opportunities, to a whole series of inquiries. I might mention the Cluff Lake board of inquiry in Saskatchewan, the Ontario Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning, the Ontario Royal Commission on the Health and Safety of Workers in the Mines, the Select Committee of the Ontario Legislature investigating Ontario Hydro affairs—to which the hon. member referred—the Ontario Environmental Assessment Board into the expansion of the uranium mines in the Elliot Lake area, the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office panels on Eldorado's proposed uranium refineries, and meetings of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works of the House which has addressed a variety of nuclear energy questions. I should add, of course, that members may have available the first report of the technical advisory committee on the nuclear fuel waste management program, to which I referred earlier. I am sure the hon. member opposite, coming from British Columbia, will be aware of the Bates inquiry which is finishing its work. There is also a provincial parliamentary committee which has been looking into various questions relating to nuclear generation in New Brunswick.

With such a variety of reports, commissions, inquiries and boards in place over recent years, there has not, in our view, been any lack of opportunity for public participation in the discussion of nuclear energy questions.

In addition, both the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and I myself in recent months have had an opportunity to meet with representatives of a variety of organizations, some representing the nuclear industry and others representing such bodies as Energy Probe, Energy Pathways and the Canadian Coalition for Nuclear Responsibility, which represent a range of attitudes towards nuclear energy. We have had the benefit of their views and so have the public servants involved in the current review of the nuclear industry.

In raising questions about the nuclear energy industry in Canada I would have thought the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) might have spent a moment or two more on the various benefits which have accrued to Canadians from that energy option of which he is so much aware. I am sure it was only through lack of time that he did not. There are, in my view, three principal ways and a number of subsidiary ways in which the nuclear energy industry in Canada is of benefit to Canadians.

It is important, first, as an essential part of our diversified energy strategy. Second, the Candu reactor is a leader in Canadian industrial development in the high technology area. The Candu industry is one of the few industries of wholly Canadian character with a high degree of technological content. As many international observers have pointed out, the Candu reactor is a remarkable achievement in an area of great technical challenge.

Third, the Candu industry, in its export potential, represents a vehicle to help carry Canadian industries into foreign markets and to bring the benefits of Canadian technology to countries which are desperately short of energy and which can find through nuclear generation the sources of energy for their industry and domestic use which they so much need.

I believe my time is about up, although I could add more about the nature of the nuclear industry in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Radioactive Waste Disposal

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise to support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), although I must say I do not think it goes far enough either in dealing with a moratorium on the waste disposal problem or in dealing with the industry itself. Having listened to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, one is left with the feeling that should the waste disposal problem be dealt with adequately he would certainly be supporting the nuclear industry. The previous speaker made some comments in relation to the value of the nuclear industry to the Canadian economy, but I did not hear him or any other member of his party propose their ridings as a national disposal site for waste in Canada.

Looking at the field as a whole, there are five main areas which need to be dealt with. The first is mining, the impact the actual removal of uranium from the ground and the primary milling processes will have on the workers in that area, along with the storage of first-level refined ore. This is an area where very little money has been spent by the federal government in assessing the health impact and the environmental impact, though both are very real and tragic.

The second relates to refining. Some money has been spent on this. The main expenditures have been on fuel fabrication and the fuel cycle itself, the actual phase whereby some cash flow is generated. The government has been spending money in this specific area.

The problem of waste disposal is one that disturbs not only myself but people everywhere because of the dramatic expansion in the volume of nuclear wastes sitting in various places around the world. It is interesting to look at a recent energy, mines and resources report which points out some of the factors they are considering. Most members of this House are aware that most of the fuel bundles and wastes from the nuclear cycle have been stored in cooled-water areas. This is called surface disposal. One of the less enlightened proposals which have been discussed involves sticking the nuclear waste into the Arctic or Antarctic ice sheets, which all of us know are likely to melt at some point, certainly with the "greenhouse effect" from CO_2 that is now affecting the world.

Disposal into outer space is another very unenlightened proposal. Disposal on ocean plains is another option the United States and a number of European countries are now considering, though with some distaste, because when this method was used in the past the containers burst open releasing nuclear waste. Frequently overlooked in connection with this type of disposal method, is the fact that once the nuclear waste gets into the environment, it is very quickly bio-accumulated, rising up the food chain and into the food web and eventually into man, who is at the top of the food chain.

Another prospect is geological containment on land, a method that seems to be preferred by members opposite. I will be raising some very serious questions this afternoon regarding that proposal, including the use of salt formations for disposal purposes.

Last year I had the opportunity to ask some questions of the vice-president of research for Atomic Energy of Canada, Mr. Hart. I would like to put a couple of his responses on the record. I asked him:

—first, where waste is at present being stored in Canada; how much, in gross tonnage; and exactly how it gets there from the site it is currently at.

Mr. Hart replied:

I do not have the exact tonnage, but you can think of it as about one Olympic-size swimming pool, perhaps half to two-thirds full.

In my view, that is a pretty frivolous attitude to take toward a very serious environmental problem, one that we all recognize as capable of causing serious cancers in man. The second question I put is very relevant to the proposals put forward from the government side regarding geological containment on land. I put the following question to Mr. Hart at that time:

If we look, for example, at the Atikokan and Sudbury areas, if the waste was to be moved from one site to another, could you give us some idea of how that waste would be moved there? Also, in what form is it going to be stored in the geological areas that it is proposed to place it in?

Mr. Hart replied:

If a site is selected away from the reactors, which is likely, the fuel will be transported in shielded flasks which have been tested for fire resistance, crash resistance; there are some other tests as well. It will be transported either by road or rail and taken to the site. When it is at the site, the concept we have now, which is still, as I say, under research, is that it will be buried deep in a stable geologic formation. The material will, in fact, be buried deep in these formations. It will be tested for some time in that formation and then the hole will be backfilled. It will be monitored for a while, but the idea is to prove that it can be left unattended for all time.

It is important to point out some of the problems of locking it into geological containment. For example, ground water could at some future point get in and move some of the radioactive materials into the ground water supply. Members opposite, and perhaps those to my right, should become better versed about such things as iodine 129. The half life of iodine 129 is 17 million years. When we are talking about that type of containment or some of these other government proposals, such as placing it in the ocean or in ice sheets, we are talking about geological time. We are simply not talking about the history of civilization, which extends for only 10,000 years. We are talking about the safe disposal of wastes that have many millions of years in just half lives. There could be further ice ages, enormous disruptions on the planet; the placement of materials of this type in the environment in any way at this point in time is inadvisable. At some future date another generation will have to pay for the risk we took in order to better our lives. We have not really reflected on the very serious health dangers our actions will impose on future generations.

Another example is technetium 99, again a substance with a multimillion-year half life, capable of moving very quickly in the groundwater system. This is something we should keep very much in mind. Very pertinent to our discussion today is another question I put to Mr. Hart last year. I quote:

Exactly how radioactive is the material that would be moved? For example, if the container were here in the room and there was a crash and some of it fell out on the floor, just how radioactive is it?

MR. HART: The flasks have been tested by a railway locomotive going 80 miles an hour crashing into a solid concrete abutment, and there was, in fact, no leakage at all.

I question the intelligence of our friendly scientists working for Atomic Energy who would think of such an experiment as tying a flask on the front of a locomotive and running the locomotive into a cement wall at 80 miles an hour. Some pretty serious questions concerning responsibilities to the Canadian public arise when a statement like that is put on the record. He went on to say:

You could sit on the flask itself. If there was some leakage, I guess it would depend on how much.

● (1750)

I think that is self-evident, Mr. Speaker. The exchange goes on as follows:

MR. FULTON: Let us say there was a pound of it here in the middle of the floor.

Hon. members should keep in mind that if there were a pound of this material from one of the nuclear plants in Canada sitting on the floor of this chamber, I would be equally anxious to ask the vice-president in charge of research whether I would be safe sitting here. He replied:

If there was a pound of it in the middle of the floor, no, you probably would not be safe sitting here. You would probably be safe sitting back at the door there.

I really question what is happening in the nuclear industry in Canada when we get such statements from people who are being paid by the taxpayers of this country and, who go to such lengths as tying a flask of radioactive material on the front of a locomotive and then running that locomotive into a wall at 80 miles an hour! If that is government policy, then I think we have a much more serious question on our hands than perhaps immediately meets the eye.

It is not only the waste from the nuclear industry itself which causes problems; there are radioactive wastes from industry as well. A lot of people do not recognize that smoke detectors, for instance, contain radioactive material. Hospitals and universities also house such material. Earlier in this session I raised a question in the House regarding the University of British Columbia. It is my understanding that over the last couple of decades the university has simply dumped its radioactive waste in Vancouver Harbour, off Point Atkinson. Apparently someone went out in a rowboat and simply threw it over the side. I have gone to a great deal of trouble to try to find out where the waste sites are but officials do not recall where the radioactive waste was dumped from the boats.

This is not an unfamiliar problem, Mr. Speaker. Quite recently questions were put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in this House regarding the transportation of radioactive material in Canada. It appears that when 58 containers of ore were being moved on a passenger flight in this country, not one of them had the lid properly secured.

We have to look not only at the health of workers in the mining industry but also at refining, fuel fabrication and the fuel cycle to see the dangers to the public and workers. The majority of funds in this country are going to those two areas, which are highly scientific and highly technical.

Radioactive Waste Disposal

A few days ago in Toronto I had the opportunity of listening to Dr. Noel Brown, Chairman of the United Nations Environment Planning Committee who gave a very interesting overview of the Three Mile Island incident. He pointed out that had that incident occurred anywhere else in the world—for example in places where our CANDU reactors have gone—it might not have been so easily dealt with. In the United States, and to a great extent in Canada, there are enough scientists in the nuclear field who could get together quickly in an emergency. But had such a thing happened in India, for example, there might have been a much more serious incident because of the lack of an adequate scientific response.

I must point out that the hesitant, piecemeal approach which has marked the entire history of the nuclear industry, going back to the 1930s was taken because of sheer economic expediency. In all our efforts to get a saleable commodity, be it electricity or the various readioactive substances used in medicine, sheer economic expediency has governed our dealings with health or environmental issues. Very little money has been spent on these very serious problems and we have yet to hear from the government of any major new expenditures in this regard.

I should like to return to the prospect of placing these containers, be they composed of cement or of various metals, whatever the scientific community decides, in the geological formations. How long will it be before the various radionuclides reach the surface? That is a serious question, since it is inevitable that they will. All the types of storage tried to date have been viable at the very best in terms of centuries. These materials will inevitably get back to the surface. They will work their way into streams and back to the food web and thus have a very serious impact on man.

A case in point is Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. which is still dumping waste at Port Granby. At this time, all levels of government are co-operating to try to get that company to expand—particularly its uranium hexafluoride operation, commonly known as UF6—from 5,000 metric tons per year to 9,000 by 1984. The nuclear garbage coming from that industry will be around, not for decades or centuries, but for ice ages to come, so we must be concerned about the impact of such debris on future generations.

As recently as 1976, $7 million was allocated to clean up Port Hope where 550 homes were found to have radiation levels above AECB health standards. I think most hon. members have a fairly good understanding of the Love Canal incident in the United Sates, of which there are now potentially hundreds. We have Canada's very own, home-grown Love Canal situations as a result of a government which did not care to allocate enough money to make sure things were done right from the very beginning and that conditions were made safe. So far, building materials including studs and parts of walls have been removed from 220 homes that contained the highest levels of radioactivity. A further 152 homes have had stacks installed in order to remove loose radon gas from them. I must point out that radon gas has had a very serious impact on the health of workers in the uranium industry and that very little research is being done on the problem. Soil has been removed from beneath 280 homes sites because the ore left over from the refining process was highly radioactive. Rather than hauling it to a central site which one would expect of a government with some foresight, it was simply dumped into ravines and used as backfill for home sites. To date, 104,225 tons of low level debris have been moved to Chalk River but there is still 200,000 tons of contaminated earth in Port Hope. I am not aware that the government has any plans to deal with this serious situation.

I should like to quote a statement of George Wald, the 1967 Nobel Prize winner as follows:

—no one knows how to store the waste products, which will remain dangerous for half a million years. The whole of human civilization is perhaps 10,000 years old, and we are producing material that will represent a lethal liability for man and for life on earth for hundreds of thousands of years to come. At present this stuff is being stockpiled just about where it is produced, while we try to figure out what to do with it.

I certainly support the private member's bill introduced by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. I wonder, if nuclear waste were being properly cared for, whether he would openly support the nuclear industry, which is posing the most serious issue facing mankind on this planet at the moment. A previous speaker on the government side of the House just softsoaped the issue, in my view, Mr. Speaker, hoping that the public will remain quiet on this crucial health and environmental issue in Canada.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the three previous speakers that I come from a riding neighbour to the riding of Algoma, which, of course, is critically involved in the extraction of uranium, an ore used in the uranium hexafluoride operation in Port Hope. In May or June of this year it was announced that the uranium refinery for the production of uranium hexafluoride would be located in Blind River. My part of the country has, therefore, been involved in the nuclear issue.

It goes without saying that it would be irresponsible of any government not to take the question of nuclear waste disposal very seriously. Some members on the other side, however, have stated that the government is doing nothing about research into the question of safe and efficient disposal of nuclear waste at the present time. That is to stretch the truth, Mr. Speaker. Many Canadians call for a moratorium on nuclear waste disposal but in my opinion that is simply to run away from the problem. A significant percentage of the hydroelectricity demand in the province of Ontario is met by nuclear energy. This means, as the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) mentioned, that these rods of fuel are at the present time stored in pools.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) had the floor. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Lincoln.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking at five o'clock, I was expressing the opinion that confederation has been a remarkable success. I talked very briefly about our economic system which has evolved and which combines the best of the free enterprise system and social obligations to the less fortunate and our dedication to the quality of life, thus providing our system with the best educated work force in the world and the healthiest population because of medicare.

I spoke of our equalization principle. Without it there could be no equality of opportunity in this country. I spoke about the principle that those who can afford it should help those in need, not only on an individual basis through the transfer of unemployment insurance, for example, from the worker in Ontario to those less fortunate, but also with the transfer of funds through our equalization formula.

Canada has been a remarkable success story, and it is recognized around the world that we have the finest country in the world. When we combine our standard of living with our degree of freedoms, I doubt if any country can match ours.

However, if confederation has been such a great success, why am I an advocate of the proposed resolution before the House, which in a relatively short period of time I hope will be referred to the special joint committee of the House and the Senate? As learned members opposite have emphasized in the last week, the fundamental philosophy behind the BNA Act has been, of course, compromise. It reflects a combination of the civil code, for instance, and jurisprudence to look after the rights of individuals.

But the one defect and the main defect in the BNA Act, is that it does not contain an amending formula. It does not contain an amending formula because the Fathers of Confederation did not think one was necessary. Perhaps in the light of the times one was not necessary. Forceful advocates of the rights of English Catholics like Connolly and McGee made sure that our rights were protected in the BNA Act. Others made sure that the rights of English Protestants were protected under section 133. Concern for French-speaking Canadians in the west was minimal. Numerically it was not a problem. Even the rights of French-speaking Canadians in Ontario were not a pressing problem in the field of education, because where French-speaking Ontarians lived they lived together and could control their own system of education and their own schools that long ago.

There is a relationship between the concern of Canadians today for individual rights and the general acceptance across Canada at this very moment today that we should get on with the business at hand, that this proposed resolution should be debated a few more days and then sent on to committee. I think this is the first time since I came here in 1962 that Canadians have shown any concern at all about the issue of constitutional change. If anything, the tendency in the past has been to say, "Oh, not again; why are you debating proposed constitutional changes and amending formulae at a time when we have unemployment problems, inflation problems, tariff problems and energy policy problems?" I think the reason is that in recent years Canadians have become more conscious of individual rights and of how fragile individual rights really are.

Our history has been blemished like the history of any other country, and I will not repeat what has been said in this House about how we treated Canadians of Japanese origin during the war, about how we treated the Jehovah's Witnesses in Quebec in the 1950s and the infamous padlock law, about how some of the privileges of English-speaking Quebeckers have been eradicated, the result of provincial legislation, and about how in most provinces in this country individual rights of people, particularly in the field of education, are not as generous as they were at the time of confederation. This is unfortunate, but I think that perhaps for the first time the need to enshrine our rights in the constitution has become a real issue in many homes.

Take, for instance, the whole issue of mobility. I was minister of labour for a number of years, close to the labour movement as a result, and I can remember the anger, the agony of trade unions in this country, particularly in the construction industry, when construction workers in Cornwall found they could not work in the province of Quebec two years ago, and when painters from Hull could not work in the national capital, in Ottawa. This was a real issue which was resolved through debate and discussion between appropriate ministers of one province and the other, but the element of retaliation was there: "If you do not allow our construction workers in your province, we will not allow your painters in our province." This registered with Canadians, particularly those who come from Europe.

I can remember one very angry union leader asking me, "Is it really a big step from a work permit by the minister of manpower of a particular province to the day when we are going to need permits to travel across this country? Is it all that far-fetched to think that the next step will be the need for visas to travel from one province to another?" Intelligent and concerned Canadians see this trend toward balkanization. They wonder about it and ask, "What are we going to do about it?" When the Premier of Newfoundland—and I do not want to belabour him—stresses and emphasizes his dilemma, on the one hand, of providing jobs for the people of his province in the flourishing oil industry in Newfoundland, and the problem of denying access to those jobs to Canadians of other provinces, this is not a reassuring situation. The issue, for instance, of owning land anywhere in Canada by Canadians is another problem—

An hon. Member: Where is that covered in this bill?

Mr. Mackasey: I did not say it was. I did not interrupt the hon. member, and I will not interrupt him. If he would remain quiet during the rest of my speech, I will be very pleased. I did say earlier, when, I hope, the hon. member was in his seat, that the details to which he referred can be discussed when this resolution gets to committee. But I do not want to be bogged down on particular little points. I could ask the hon. member where, in here, is the province of Ontario prepared to recognize French as the official language in our province? It is not in there either, nor is freedom of choice in the field of education, nor was it intended, and I will come to that matter in a few minutes, if I am permitted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is the hon. member going to put in an amendment about this?

Some hon. Members: Put it in.

Mr. Mackasey: I will come to that. I suggest that the opposition members put in an amendment and they might be surprised at the reception on this side of the House.

What is proposed, Mr. Speaker? It is proposed that we bring our constitution home, the BNA Act, a further evolution, as I said earlier, a logical transition from a colonial state to a nation. The Governor General is now a Canadian, the new flag which is ours, and the Official Languages Act which reflects the true nature of Canada, and now we are suggesting, after all these years, that we bring the constitution home. I am not suggesting we should have moved at a faster pace. After all, we have achieved all that in a spirit of relative harmony and with virtually no bloodshed as compared to, say, the United States. But what is the sense of bringing home a constitution which we cannot amend because the Fathers of Confederation did not see the need at the time for an amending formula? What would be more logical, in selecting the amending formula to come along with the BNA Act, than the only formula which all the provincial premiers at one time agreed to in Victoria in 1971?

An hon. Member: What about the Vancouver consensus in 1980?

Mr. Mackasey: With the hon. member's voice one can hear anything he says, but unfortunately he does not make too much sense.

That formula is the only formula that the provincial premiers of this country were able to agree to, and I think that, barring a better one, and with the two-year period in which the provinces and the federal government can get together and come up with a better one, this makes sense.

Let me come back to the other point, Mr. Speaker. What are the entrenched rights which we think Canada needs and which provincial legislation provides in some cases? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that provincial legislation is only as good as the legislatures or the premiers of that province at that time in history, and there is no guarantee that if our rights are enshrined in provincial legislation, those rights will be found in that same provincial legislation five, ten, or 15 years from now. So our rights must be enshrined in the constitution.

Is anybody here against the enshrinement of the fundamental freedoms, freedom of thought, freedom of religion, freedom of belief, freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of the press and other media, freedom of peaceful assembly and of association?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Is anyone here against the right to stand for office for election to the House of Commons? Is anyone here against the democratic right which includes the requirement that no House of Commons and no legislative assembly continue for longer than five years?

Is anyone here against mobility rights?

An hon. Member: What about freedom of property?

Mr. Mackasey: What about the democratic right which gives people the opportunity to speak from their seats? That is part of it, so I am not going to let the member worry me. Mobility rights? It is perhaps the most important right we can have at the moment, the right to work anywhere in this country in any province.

An hon. Member: What about free enterprise?

Mr. Mackasey: The right to establish ourselves and seek employment anywhere, the right to remain in Canada or leave the country, minority language educational rights which provide that citizens of the English-speaking or French-speaking minority of a province have the right to educate their children in that minority language, wherever numbers warrant—what is so important about that, Mr. Speaker? It is extremely important. How many of my friends in my province, in Quebec when I lived there, refused or had to refuse promotions, transfers by multinational corporations in other provinces, refusing jobs in Ontario, Manitoba or British Columbia because of their unease and concern that their children would not be able to continue their education in French? And now, because of provisions in Bill 101, English-speaking Canadians from the west, from Ontario and from the maritimes, are concerned also about transferring to the province of Quebec because of their unease about Bill 101 which permits them to have their children educated in English only with the permission of the government, and only then for a short period of time.

An hon. Member: Why did you not challenge the legislation?

Mr. Mackasey: Go home and you tell the people in your province what they should be doing about minority rights, and we will all applaud. The last time I was in Lincoln riding, I came to the conclusion that I was still in Canada. I was welcomed there, I was elected there. I beat a Tory there, and I will beat him again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Is anyone in this House opposed to legal rights, the right to life and liberty, the security of a person, protection against unlawful search and seizure, unlawful detention or imprisonment, the right to be properly informed of the reasons, and non-discrimination rights which ensure that all Canadians, regardless of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex, have the same before the law?

As I said earlier today, I think the Official Languages Act indicates what can be done in this House when people of good will stick together. In 1969 the Official Languages Act was passed with the support of all parties. As I recall it, some of the more eloquent speeches came from members opposite. But that too should be enshrined in the constitution so that subsequent parliaments can deal with the situation if some pressure groups try in some way to amend, water down, or make inoperative that particular legislation.

My time is nearly over, but I urge members of Parliament to consider approaching this particular debate in the same spirit which existed when pieces of legislation dramatically altering this country were passed. I am thinking of the flag, official languages, and many others. I urge that this matter be referred to the committee sooner than later. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians watching this debate. For the first time hundreds of thousands of them are in favour of what is proposed here because, for the first time, thousands of them are concerned about individual rights.

A new Canadian who comes here is concerned about his or her rights. In many instances that is what brought people here in the first place. They are concerned whether their culture, language, freedom and ways of life will be protected, as I think the House should be. They wonder why there has been a delay. In fact most of them are wondering why it has taken almost 50 years to reach the point where we are working toward bringing our written constitution back to Canada.

Those people who are concerned about a referendum should not be concerned. The chances of it being used are not necessarily remote but, according to the formula, as a last resort. What does it mean? What does it intend to do? It will appeal directly to Canadians to settle an impasse between the central and provincial governments. To whom should we appeal? We have reached an impasse in our ability to do things, to enshrine human freedoms, rights and privileges. It is the people who suffer, not the members of Parliament. It is quite logical to appeal to them in a referendum if we must, because after all their rights are being held up.

As I said before supper, I believe the high calibre of the debate should continue. There have been remarkable contributions from all parts of the House. If we look at this with a view to bringing to an end an impasse which was never intended by the Fathers of Confederation when they omitted to provide an amending formula, and if we look at it as one of our great responsibilities as members of Parliament to bite the bullet and do the things needed for Canadians, many years too late, I think all of us will be able to look back in five or ten years with approval on our own contributions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say how pleased I am to participate in this debate. This evening I hope to point out, certainly to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), and other members of the House of Commons, the real concern of members on this side of the House respecting this resolution, and the real concerns of many, many Canadians across Canada. I will try to demonstrate to the House, as best I can, the fact that the country we know as Canada is really a partnership. It was formed that way and it was operated that way. One of the greatest threats the resolution proposes is the potential destruction of the partnership which makes Canada a truly unique country.

Also I should like to be able to say that this measure represents a major historical event in the progress of our nation. A nation's constitution is the basic law of the land. It provides the framework for social, political, and economic actions of its citizens. It is the document which establishes the basic ground rules of Canadian society. As such, any proposals to change this basic document should have the effect of increasing our sense of community and improving our institutions and processes in order that the quality of life of Canadian citizens can be advanced. In short, changes to the constitution should be directed toward greater harmony and understanding. They should be unifying and, above all else, they should not be undertaken lightly or without effective discussion and agreement between all partners of this confederation.

I believe the measure we are discussing today does none of these things. Without question, in my opinion, it is one of the most dangerous documents I have seen come before the House of Commons in the ten years I have been a member of Parliament. Both the manner in which this resolution is being presented and the resolution itself represent a direct threat to the very foundation of Canada. The resolution denies over 100 years of common Canadian experience. Since 1867 Canadians have been working toward developing systems and processes uniquely Canadian that can be applied to resolve Canadian problems within a framework which meets the underlying conditions of that common experience. The resolution which comes before us in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in my opinion, could destroy a fundamental part of our common heritage—our federal system of government.

Before I move on to the method of introducing this resolution and the specific contents of the document we are debating, I should like to say a few words about the nature of our federal system, why it evolved as it did, and how it has been used to meet the needs of Canadians. Canada's federation is a blend of government systems not found anywhere else in the world. It is truly a unique wedding of the principles of parliamentary government with the forms and institutions of a federal system of government organization. I believe all members of the House have a good grasp of the principle of parliamentary democracy, but it is true that sometimes we forget the importance of federalism in the Canadian experience and how we brought ourselves to the point we are at today.

Canadians gain a lot from both parts of our system. From the principles of the common law and parliamentary government we gain protection of individual rights and freedoms, an assurance of democratic principles and guarantees of our independence as a nation and freedom as a people. Individual rights and freedoms are matters of basic importance to all Canadians. If there was a measure to improve their protection in Canada, I am certain all members and all Canadians would wholeheartedly and gladly support it. However, the protection and the benefit Canadians gain from our federal system are also matters of basic concern to all of us. I believe this proposal is a direct threat to those uniquely Canadian concerns because it threatens the federal system we have established to protect and assure them. Canadian federalism is just not a superficial luxury. When the Fathers of Confederation wedded the two systems of federalism and parliamentary government they did not do it simply as a sop to the provinces, nor did they do it as a means of window-dressing our constitution to distinguish it from the parliamentary system of Great Britain. Finally, I am convinced they did not do it simply as a means of causing problems for future generations of Canadians.

Canada's blend of federalism with parliamentary government emerged from a unique set of conditions which still apply today in Canada. Had these conditions not existed there would have been no need to marry the two distinct systems of government. Under different conditions it would have been easier simply to form a unitary state modelled on the parliamentary institutions of Great Britain and let it go at that.

What are these conditions which necessitate a federal form of organization in Canada? First, I believe our size is a major factor. Even today we have a relatively small population scattered across a vast and varied land. Governing this nation with a unitary national government could not help but produce feelings of remoteness and alienation in places like British Columbia or Nova Scotia. Even residents of the capital city would tend to feel removed from their governments because things of immediate local concern, such as schools, roads and property taxes, would all be governed by our national government. As a result we have developed a system of dividing the labour between the two levels of government, one that is equipped to deal with major questions of truly national importance and one which is closer to the people and equipped to deal with those questions of a more localized nature which could easily get lost in the shuffle under a unitary national government.

The second main factor requiring a federal form of government is, in my opinion, the diverse social, cultural and linguistic character of our country. This diversity is enhanced by our size and the relative isolation of large parts of our population. I believe it is the federal system and not the parliamentary form of government which protects the rights of Canadians in this area most effectively. Under a unitary state the distinct views and needs of cultural groups would again be lost in a shuffle of competing minority group interests. Under a federal form of government minority groups can have a much greater impact and participation in those items which concern them in their everyday lives.

I would like to take a few moments to expand on these concepts because I believe they are important if we are to try and understand the nature of the threat to federalism, which this resolution implies. I believe the two preconditions of federalism, which I have outlined briefly, come together in a national characteristic which is distinctly Canadian. Canadians are among the most self-reliant and independent people in the world. Our unique contribution to that self-reliance and independence is loyalty and a strong desire to celebrate our distinctiveness. We have a national government in place to guarantee certain basic universal rights and freedoms. But we have created a federal system to allow us as a people to develop and grow differently within the bounds of those universal rights.

These uniquely Canadian requirements were well illustrated in the BNA Act which wedded parliamentary government to the federal system in order to provide a unique solution to a truly Canadian set of conditions. Basically it is the federal system which affords the greatest assurance and protection for our people. The significance of this is well demonstrated in section 92 of the BNA Act which outlines the rights and powers granted to the provincial governments. While items of provincial jurisdiction are not absolutely inviolate under the BNA Act, the importance which the founding fathers placed on the federal system is clearly illustrated by the difficulties that will befall any national government which attempts an unwarranted intrusion into the provincial realm. Similarly, the desire to afford strong protection is illustrated by the granting of powers to the provinces which are much stronger and more extensive than those which have devolved to the state level of government in the nation to the south of us.

The unique solution to Canadian conditions provided by the wedding of two forms of political organization also recognizes the need for a truly national consideration. The parliamentary system of government is designed to protect individual rights and provision was made in the BNA Act which would allow the national government to go to the aid of individuals or groups whose rights might be threatened by provincial governments. Conversely, it is the federal system and the relatively greater strength of the provincial governments which affords protection against an infringement of our rights by the national government itself.

The conclusion which should be drawn is clear. The Canadian system is a unique experiment which has served us pretty well for the last 113 years because our national needs and the needs stemming from our regional and cultural diversity have evolved a system that is a partnership. This Canadian partnership implies relative equality for our two levels of government in areas where their interests are common or shared and relative independence in areas where their interests are largely exclusive. In other words, the Canadian experiment attempts to bring our diversity together where there is common interest and shared experience while at the same time allowing all Canadians an opportunity to celebrate their differences in different regions of the country. I contend our partnership does not allow for minority shareholders. The board of directors of Canada, if you like, is composed of relatively equal partners each with an area of expertise which allows him to make a valuable contribution and each with an area of responsibility which requires that consideration be given to the common responsibility. The over-all goal of this organization is the protection of life and liberty and the furtherance of quality of life in Canada. Each component part is important to the achieving of these goals and each has a very distinct role to play. I believe this resolution provides a threat to the federal component of our system and if we lose that component we lose something which is uniquely Canadian, designed to deal with our uniquely Canadian conditions.

I believe Canadians want to resolve a problem that seems to be simply an eternal squabble about our constitution. I also believe they will support any action which provides a greater degree of protection for their fundamental rights of liberty and freedom. In other words, Canadians want to be Canadian. They want to be proud of their nationality and their institutions. They know their identity and they do not want to continually have it questioned as a result of constant bickering over the constitution or eternal federal-provincial fights. On the face of it, this resolution before us does not openly contradict any of these fundamental Canadian desires. If it passed I submit that there would still be a unit called Canada marked on the maps of the world and we would still have a Canadian flag and a national anthem. But many people in various parts of the country—certainly in the part from which I come—are asking "But for how long?" I believe as I mentioned earlier, that this resolution is deliberately, designed to change the concept of the Canadian federation as a partnership.

● (2040)

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is imposing his personal opinions on the partners of our confederation. Those opinions will effectively destroy the partnership which countless generations of Canadians have worked so hard to forge and which, as I mentioned before, is working pretty well. If, as I suggest, these actions by the Prime Minister destroy our Canadian partnership, how long will it be before citizens in the west and the east, or the north and the south, decide they no longer need to be a part of the country because they no longer enjoy the rights of the partnership they feel they have enjoyed, certainly up until this time.

I believe there is a general consensus across Canada as to the positive benefits that can be achieved by a charter of rights in a new constitution. I also believe there is almost universal agreement on patriating our constitution with a suitable amending formula which reflects the reality of Canada's own totally unique experiment. However, I do not believe that Canadians would accept these improvements if the cost was the destruction or even the possible destruction of the Canadian partnership and the risk of fragmenting the country. Those possibilities are, in my opinion, certainly very distinct. Yet, this is exactly what I feel the Prime Minister is proposing to do and why I referred to the resolution earlier as being one of the most dangerous pieces of legislation to come before Parliament while I have had the privilege to be a member of the House of Commons.

I believe that the method which the Prime Minister has chosen is a dangerous method. The Prime Minister has imposed a deadline on the entire question. In effect, one of the partners of our confederation has said to all the other so-called equal partners that this process will be accomplished within a certain period of time whether they like it or not. In effect, the Prime Minister strode into the nation's boardroom, deliberately pointed a gun at the head of each of the other directors and said, "You will behave or suffer the consequences".

In a federation which was built on the concept of partnership and all that it implies in terms of discussion, compromise and consensus, putting partners under the gun destroys any hope of goodwill or mutual trust. Obviously, the Prime Minister has decided to create a Canadian constitution in virtually his own image. Items like the fundamental rights of Parliament or the partners in our confederation can be shoved aside if he so wishes. As a result of the way in which the Prime Minister is implementing this action, it is clear there will be no change without the personal stamp of the Prime Minister.

Through this resolution the government intends to patriate the Constitution of Canada with the addition of a charter of rights and a formula for amending the constitution once it is home in Canada. It is the amending formula the government proposes which provides the greatest threat to the partnership of our federation. Once again, I stress that if the partnership is damaged, then we in Canada are in for very troubled times.

The amending formula proposed in the resolution is in two parts, and these are contained in section 41 and section 42. Section 41 outlines the procedure for amendment by the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces. Section 42 provides for a referendum on constitutional change which will be called by the national government if it sees fit. I wish to deal with section 42 first.

Let us assume for a moment that a change in the constitution was not accomplished under the provisions of section 41, which I will deal with shortly. If the Government of Canada particularly favoured that amendment it could, under section 42, issue a proclamation calling for a referendum to be held. Further provision of the bill states clearly that the federal government is solely responsible for making the laws that govern the rules of a referendum, subject only to the restriction that no Canadian citizen shall have his or her rights to vote removed.

How does this affect the concept of a Canadian partnership? First, there is no provision to allow the provinces to call a referendum across Canada in the event that it is the federal government which opposes a particular constitutional change. Second, there is nothing in the resolution that provides standard rules or principles to govern the referendum itself. Since the Governement of Canada is solely responsible for the rules of the referendum, it could easily amend the laws in that regard to suit its position on any given constitutional proposal. If it was in favour of a particular change, it could relax the majority required; if it were opposed, it could, I suppose, substantially tighten the requirements. In either case, the provinces would come under the complete domination of the federal government.

Instead of being equals in the Canadian federation, this provision creates ten second-class citizens within the partnership itself. Having made second-class citizens of the provinces under section 42, the federal government then proceeds to destroy the partnership even further under the provisions of section 41. The amending formula outlined in this section is complicated, but certain key elements stand out clearly.

The first element is that no changes to our constitution will occur without the consent of the provinces of Canada which now hold, or have ever held, 25 per cent of the population of Canada. Of course, this provision gives the provinces of Ontario and Quebec veto power over any constitutional change in the future. Furthermore, population trends indicate clearly that no other provinces in Canada are likely to join this select group of veto holders in the foreseeable future.

The second element is the amendment procedure that applies to the rest of Canada, which is: agreement by two of the provincial governments in each of the Atlantic regions and the western regions. However, these two provinces must contain between them at least 50 per cent of the population of the region for their approval to have any effect. Clearly, this amendment procedure discriminates against the smaller provinces in our federation and denies them the rights and responsibilities of full partnership that they feel, and justly, that they have enjoyed up to this point.

Furthermore, it discriminates against the western provinces and Atlantic provinces as regions by institutionalizing different classes of provinces in the amending process. For example, consider the position of my home province of Manitaba and the province of Saskatchewan. Because of the relatively small populations in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, neither province can substantially affect the result of a constitutional amendment. Manitoba could combine with either British Columbia or Alberta in the western region to meet the requirement for approval or rejection of a proposed amendment. However, Manitoba and Saskatchewan acting together could not alter the outcome of an amendment one way or the other without the assistance of either Alberta or British Columbia. Therefore, the proposal creates second-class provinces within the nation and further subdivides the provinces within the regions.

What does the principle of subclasses of provinces do to the idea of our Canadian partnership? I contend that it destroys it completely. Under the constitution of a country, people should be equal regardless of where they live within that country.

The Canadian partnership is further eroded by the fact that one of the partners of our federation is not granted any status at all, not even second-class status. Since the proposal requires that approval be granted by at least two provinces containing 50 per cent of the population of any region, where does Prince Edward Island fit in? If Prince Edward Island combines with any other province in the Atlantic region, it still does not provide 50 per cent of the population. Accordingly, for purposes of constitutional amendment, it will always be necessary for two of the remaining three Atlantic provinces to be involved in the process.

Prince Edward Island's participation will have no effect one way or the other, and in constitutional change it will be meaningless. Prince Edward Island is a province to which this Prime Minister has kindly granted no status whatsoever. It cannot even lay claim to second-class or third-class status with respect to the amending formula. It is ironic that the home of the Charlottetown conference and the birthplace of our nation is now to be granted the unique distinction of having no status at all. That is a far cry from a partnership of relative equals such as I outlined earlier.

I believe the Prime Minister has taken what I consider to be a destructive course of action in a somewhat cold and calculating fashion. I also believe that this amending formula has been deliberately designed to stem the increase in political power which would flow naturally to the western provinces as the population increases and our importance to the national economy becomes more apparent.

It is abundantly clear that the western provinces are grossly underrepresented in the process of constitutional amendment proposed by the government in this resolution. The requirement that two provinces within a region agree to a proposed amendment opens the door to divide-and-rule tactics by the federal government. In addition, it allows the federal government to maintain its stranglehold over the provinces which, by right, should be relatively equal partners in confederation.

The province of Manitoba is under no illusion that it is able to make the same kind of economic impact as the larger provinces such as Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta or Quebec. However, the people of Manitoba take very seriously their rights and responsibilities as full and equal partners in our confederation. This proposal could simply take those rights away, and Manitobans like other Canadians in other provinces would become second-class citizens of our country in terms of constitutional changes. If Manitobans become second class citizens under the constitution or, for that matter, if any other citizen in any other province becomes second class, there is no partnership. There is no equality for our citizens and the domination of the national government is complete.

I am warning the Prime Minister this evening that talk about western separation which we hear about from time to time in this chamber is not idle. Westerners are Canadians, and I believe they always will be Canadians in their hearts. But if one man and one party can unilaterally create second or third class status for the citizens of 50 per cent of the nation with a single stroke of the pen westerners cannot help but ask where is the value in remaining Canadian. Until now, the citizens of western Canada have been accorded relatively equal partnership in our confederation. If the Prime Minister insists on making people in the west second raters, it could easily be an action they are unable to accept, especially if it is coupled in the next few weeks or months with export taxes on natural gas, or on hydro. In fact, any unilateral action affecting the area of resources might lead to a real and growing separatist threat in western Canada.

Having made those comments and issued that warning to the Prime Minister, I would like to devote my remaining time to outlining proposals which might help the government out of the situation in which it finds itself as a result of its actions. We on this side of the House believe they would be well received all across Canada, they have been demonstrated to be workable, certainly from the provinces' point of view. But before going further, I want to explain once again to the government exactly what is so distasteful about the resolution which has been brought before us. First on the list is the Prime Minister's partiality not only for unilateral federal change to the constitution, but indeed, for one-man change. This serves only to destroy our hard-won partnership and has inflamed passions all across Canada.

Second is the double standard implied throughout the government's resolution. It is a double standard because unilateral federal action applies to any amendments proposed by the present government while all other partners in the federation must endure the application of the amending formula. It is a double standard because the Prime Minister, by his actions, creates distinctions and classes among the partners in our country and, by extension, creates second and third class citizens in a country which above all else values the democratic rights of freedom and equality.

Instead of destroying our unique Canadian partnership, I urge the Prime Minister to live up to his commitments made during the referendum campaign in the province of Quebec and propose measures which will renew and strengthen our federation, not weaken it.

On this side of the House, we are 100 per cent in favour of patriating our constitution, just as we favour any and all procedures and reforms which will strengthen the Canadian partnership in a manner consistent with the social and political realities of Canada. I believe the problem is not so much the idea of a charter of rights or the patriation of the constitution as it is the dangerous effect on our federation resulting from the manner in which the solution is being imposed, and the serious consequences of the amendment proposals which form such a large part of the resolution.

To restore faith in our provincial partners and begin to restore the sense of goodwill which is so necessary, I believe the Prime Minister should make the necessary arrangements to renew the federal-provincial negotiations beginning some time in the early part of the new year. Furthermore, if the Prime Minister is intent on persisting in unilateral action, he could make great strides toward restoring confidence across Canada if he changed this resolution to include the amending formula known as the Vancouver formula which was accepted, at least in principle, by the provinces. It would require that Parliament plus at least seven provinces containing at least 50 per cent of the population, express their approval of any future constitutional change. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that creates more evident equality and more of a partnership than we find under the proposed resolution. However, in certain clearly defined areas, such as the rights of provincial governments, provincial property or the ownership of natural resources, individual provinces would have the option to opt out of the proposed change. An amending formula such as this would have the advantage of restoring the goodwill and co-operation necessary for our Canadian partnership. It is not perfect; I do not think any of us could devise a perfect formula. But it is better in one way; it works.

Finally, I would urge the Prime Minister to call a special constitutional conference of a wider nature so as to implement changes in our constitution and set out the appropriate amending formula as I have outlined.

The irony of the proposal before us is almost beyond description. Not only does the Prime Minister intend to unilaterally impose his own will on the Canadian people, but he wants to accomplish that goal by asking the British government to change our constitution. In order to provide a system for amending the Canadian Constitution in Canada, by Canadians, the Prime Minister proposes to ask the British government for its permission. While that is the legal way at present, Canadians as a people are mature enough to be able to accomplish the necessary changes on their own through the vehicle of a widely based and representative constitutional convention. The British people and the British government are also mature enough to recognize that Canadians have the right and the responsibility to determine the ground rules for their own future.

If it were not for the fact that the government's proposals are so dangerous, the irony of a situation in which an anti-colonial prime minister is using an essentially colonial vehicle to implement these changes, would be humorous. It is not humorous though. I think it is frightening. This proposal and its possible consequences on the various regions of Canada, along with the intrusion into the provincial domain of natural resources, could together lead to a frightening period in Canadian history.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the arguments and comments of all members in this House who have participated in this debate. I am honoured to rise in my place as the representative of Nickel Belt and to bring what I know are their concerns into this forum.

I am especially happy to comment on the proposed charter of rights and freedoms, a charter which will end all types of discrimination. As a person from a northern community, an ethnic and a woman who has been active in the working world for some 27 years, I have indeed been witness to discrimination. I would like to comment about that for just a moment as a working woman. I know what it is to be passed over for promotion simply because I am a woman.

● (2100)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Tell them the story you told me.

Mrs. Erola: I do not have the time. I am only allotted 40 minutes. However, I would love to tell that story. I would like to say something to those, women particularly, who say they want something special. I say I want equality, nothing more and nothing less.

Northern Ontario is a hardy land and the people who settled it were equally hardy. They were immigrants from many countries with a multitude of ethnic, social and cultural backgrounds. They came to Canada because Canada offered them something different. It offered them unlimited opportunity and it offered them freedom—freedom to follow their own dreams and to pursue their own interests.

I grew up in an ethnic environment. I can tell you there always existed a great pride in being a Canadian. Ethnic communities across this land are very conscious of their responsibility to the country which has given them so much. They first and foremost are good Canadians.

Every member who has taken his place in this House of Commons has, I am sure, at one time or another been present at a citizenship ceremony when new Canadians were sworn in. Everyone has seen the shine in their eyes. It is a genuine pride. They are proud to be Canadians, and we were proud as children to be Canadians. They are proud despite the acts of discrimination against many ethnic groups in Canada during the war. Indeed, the Canadian record is not without blemish. Most of us in this House have been made very much aware of what happened to the Japanese in Canada. I should like to tell you something of what happened to people of Italian, Finnish and to some degree German parentage in Canada during the war.

Italian parents of my friends suffered greatly, and they suffered unjustly. Though Canadian citizens with two sons fighting for Canada overseas, these people were marched off to be fingerprinted and their guns confiscated. We were all aware of other injustices against other ethnic groups. As a matter of fact, it happened within the church of my community. Despite it, ethnic communities across this country have persevered. Life goes on and injustice can be corrected.

I remember my parents and grandparents, Finnish born, speaking about the promise of Canada, of the history and especially the future of Canada. I think you will find that across this nation the ethnic communities are in general more tolerant and more sympathetic than any other group on the issue of linguistic rights. They themselves speak a second language in most cases, be it German, Finnish, Japanese, Ukrainian, Croatian, what have you. They appreciate the benefit that a second language can provide. It is an asset, an opportunity, a means through which we can broaden our understanding of one another.

Certainly in northern Ontario, in Nickel Belt, the Francophone community has had to fight long and hard to enjoy linguistic equality. However, I am happy to say that the previously unsettled atmosphere has now changed in my area. Let me tell you what used to happen to the Francophone in days not so far gone by. They fought first of all to have French minority language rights in the elementary schools. That happened. At the end of grade eight, after eight years of French language instruction, these children were placed into an English milieu. What happened to them in grade nine or ten? They dropped out. It was generally accepted that they were ineducable when the fact was they had been educated for eight years in one language and were then expected to sink or swim in another language.

That was changed. Through long and bitter struggles, we developed French secondary schools in our area. I believe we now have five. What happened to them at the end of secondary school? Did they have to go on to an English university? No. The people of northern Ontario did not tolerate that. They turned around and created a bilingual university, Laurentian University. In northern Ontario a student can go from kindergarten right through university in the French language. I am very proud to say that Laurentian University now offers a translators course which is the pride of not only northern Ontario but all of Canada.

I can also state that many of the youngsters have reversed the situation. Many of those who now attend French immersion classes share my own ethnic background, or that of other ethnic groups which help make up my riding. I might add that our courts in northern Ontario are now, for all practical purposes, bilingual. The battle was not an easy victory in northern Ontario. One of my early election promises was that I would fight to have minority language rights enshrined in the constitution.

[Translation]

To my constituents of Nickel Belt and French Canadians all over Canada, I proudly present this constitution, a constitution which guarantees the right to education in the language of the minority.

[English]

This resolution before us will enshrine in the constitution the rights to linguistic equality and educational choice where numbers merit. They will be protected forever. Linguistic rights are but a small part of this constitutional package. The renewed constitution will be the embodiment of our national purpose. It will define the basic sets of principles by which this nation will be governed in the future. It will be a symbol of the strength of Canada as one nation and the vitality of Canadian democracy.

I would like to dwell on this idea of symbols for a moment. Frankly, I think the beaver has been much maligned of late. I am very familiar with the beaver, there being many of them in my part of the country. Occasionally they are a nuisance. However, it was the only truly Canadian symbol that my mother, as an immigrant, had to offer us when I was growing up. I am rather proud of them. It will be very much easier for new immigrants who come to this country. They will have a flag and a constitution. These are not mere symbols, but real and tangible symbols.

Today we have so much more in our country, a flag, and a constitution that will be our guarantee for the people, a guarantee from their government to protect them from undue discrimination and harassment for all time. Basic human rights will be enshrined, not as mere lip service to well founded ideals but as part of the law of the land. The package of rights will have an effect that is long overdue. For example, upon the passing into law of the provisions of the proposed new Canadian constitution, injustices such as presently exist with respect to the rights of Indian women in Canada will disappear.

This is where I chastise some members of the House, Mr. Speaker. Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act which establishes criteria whereby Indian women are arbitrarily discriminated against has never really been an issue close to the members of this chamber, with the exception of a few, even though it was a blatant example of discrimination. The provisions of our new constitution will not allow such unjust treatment to continue. It is true that there is a period of transition; but the important point to remember is that such an injustice will not have the opportunity to reappear.

For those members who are shaking their heads, may I say that the women of this Parliament took matters in hand last spring and crossed party lines to make a statement saying they did not endorse it. Since then I believe that 42 bands have rescinded that part of the act. I am very proud of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: I should add that all the women in this Parliament participated in the activity of this committee and signed the declaration.

A guarantee of fundamental rights and freedoms can do nothing less than make us stronger; stronger as a nation and stronger as a people. If a government is to be judged by those whom it governs, and well it should, one of the main criteria for evaluation must undoubtedly be freedom. The best government is that which provides the maximum freedom for the individual. This document provides the Canadian people with a guarantee of that freedom.

Since the release of this proposal we have heard ominous statements of gloom and impending doom. There is concern in some provincial capitals that certain clauses of the new constitution will deprive them of their protectionist attitudes and practices. To this argument I can only say that this is Canada; we do not require internal passports in this country or papers and dossiers to travel from region to region, to work in one part or the other. This is Canada, a free land; a land where every Canadian is given the choice to choose his or her residence, occupation and lifestyle.

I have been behind the Iron Curtain where checkpoints are established on all access roads to cities to control the movement, not just of visitors, but of their own people. They do not enjoy freedom of mobility. To deprive our citizens of their freedom to live and work unhindered in any region of Canada is clearly an unacceptable option. Democracy demands better.

As a mother of two young people and through my contact with other young people, I am continually encouraged by their openness and candour. Something that young Canadians have done a great deal of—and I applaud them for it—is travelling. Every summer we see them on the road, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, discovering their country—discovering places in which they might like to live and work in the future. It is difficult to explain to them the artificial barriers to their mobility that have been created by narrow regionalism.

I met with several senior mining industry officials in Ottawa over a week ago and the first thing that they commented on to me was the importance of the mobility clause to the future of the mining industry. Unfortunately it seems that some of the provincial premiers—and some hon. members opposite—think industry can operate in a vacuum. I must inform them that it cannot.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I think I should read from a brief they presented to me, part of which they will be presenting this weekend to the conference of mines ministers in Halifax. The brief states, in part, as follows:

> There is no doubt that Canadian unity is being seriously eroded, not only by the continuing dispute between governments over the distribution of powers, but also by the economic barriers that the provinces are setting up against each other. This contributes to the fragmentation of the Canadian common market and impedes the movement of capital, labour and products. Further, the climate of uncertainty thus created has affected business decisions. The result is to raise the cost of doing business in Canada, making it less attractive to new investment, both domestic and foreign, at the very time when massive amounts of capital are required to finance the many major projects which this country needs if it is to fulfil its destiny.

They went further, to urge all governments to give earnest consideration to these concerns which are shared by all productive sectors of the country.

Ultimately, the decisions on the future of this country will be made by the people. It is the people who will choose a formula for future amendment if the first ministers fail to reach an agreement. It is the people whose rights and freedoms are being protected, and therefore it is the people who must be the final authority. The people of Canada deserve and want a Canadian constitution, not a constitution that is an act of the British House of Commons. This last remnant of colonialism is an embarrassment to Canada and to many Canadians. Are we not a mature enough democracy to be trusted with our own constitution? Can we not be trusted to responsibly protect the rights of all Canadians?

I am a proud Canadian; the people of northern Ontario are also proud Canadians. The people of northern Ontario, like most of the people in this country, want to see action now—for us, for our children, for their children and for all future Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

Is the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Forrestall: I should like to ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, by now the phrases, "constitutional reform", "renewed federalism", "amending formula" and "charter of rights" must be etched in the minds and souls of many Canadians. But most Canadians, just like some of us here, must be wondering what this all means and what has rendered our constitution so useless in the face of certain events which have happened suddenly and other events which have taken some time to develop.

There is a whole series of such events but I want to mention just two or three which have occurred over a period of time placing certain strains on the framework of our institutions and the fibre of our country.

The first event is the so-called "quiet revolution" which has been taking place in the province of Quebec for some time. Revolutions are really a short cut to evolution and the results of a revolution demand sudden and rapid change. It is really not the fault of English Canada, which was not a part of the revolution in the province of Quebec, that this change is now required so quickly. A lot of my friends from the province of Quebec do not realize that one of the problems there was that the provincial government paid very little attention to the most basic concept in the evolution of a culture—education.

It was only in the mid-sixties that the government of Quebec established a department of education and assumed that jurisdiction for itself, having earlier left it to the church. As I have said, the revolution made quick change a necessity. This change was proposed in two forms, and those two forms were pursued simultaneously. One of them was separatism, something that is totally unacceptable to the majority of the province of Quebec itself, and certainly to the rest of Canadians. The other form of quick and sudden change was the spreading of certain rights, which our compatriots in the province of Quebec legitimately desired for themselves, to the rest of the country.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can never get it through his head that those of us who stood in this House voting against another resolution dealing with the Official Languages Act were not so much against the Official Languages Act itself but, rather, against the way in which it was being implemented. It was to be implemented over a period of time which coincided with the Prime Minister's own personal timeframe which was too quick for the rest of Canada to accept. However, I do not want to dwell on the revolution in Quebec because it is not as germane to this debate as are certain other factors.

The second event which occurred, again over a long period of time, it could be said, was the incredible technological revolution which took place after the Second World War. Things which happened with respect to the electronic media altered very dramatically and fundamentally our very lifestyle in this country, as they did throughout the western world. Development in this field gave the federal government direct jurisdiction over something which was formerly entirely in the domain of the provinces. The television set is now, for better or worse, the focal point of all our cultural activities. That is probably stretching it somewhat, but it certainly is the focal point of much of our culture, and it is no longer just an entertainment medium. It is no longer just an information medium, either. It is certainly and most profoundly a medium of education.

As we all know, Canada would never have been possible in the first place if the provinces had not received an ironclad guarantee that they would always be in control of education and culture. John A. Macdonald was a fierce federalist, and he wanted to keep education in the domain of the federal government, but none of the partners would have joined if he had insisted on that. So, with the evolution of radio, television and other means of communication the federal government, through its residual powers, retained jurisdiction over the regulatory control of these media and, in so doing, asserted itself very clearly in a provincial jurisdiction. This caused all kinds of problems, with which we are still trying to wrestle.

Then, of course, there was one other event which occurred rather more suddenly. That was the energy crisis, all the problems which were associated with that, and the obvious need to develop a strategy which would deal equally and fairly with all Canadians regardless of whether they lived in the producing or consuming provinces.

If we look at the three events I have mentioned, we might ask: why was it that our constitution was not adequately equipped? What were the weaknesses in the constitution which made it inadequate to deal with mounting tensions? First, the constitution was inadequate in that it did not provide a formula to redistribute the residual powers which were granted under the British North America Act to the federal government. In other words, in terms of the electronic media and federal intrusion in that area the constitution was not sufficient to bring the partners of confederation together and to redistribute these powers and give some of this regulatory jurisdiction back to the provinces where it belonged. The provinces did not take the initiative of bringing the matter before the Supreme Court for adjudication there.

There is a very weak and vague definition in the constitution with respect to the relationship between the individual and the state, and the constitution is rather weak, as I have said, with respect to the relationship between the provinces and the federal government. There is a lack of a formula whereby meaningful change could occur without creating tensions. The constitution also provides for an electoral system which is not suitable for a modern democracy, particularly one functioning within a framework such as ours, so rich in geography and so diverse in culture and demography.

Institutions failed as well. In particular—and I mention only one example—the Senate did not fulfil the role which was intended for it by the Fathers of Confederation. The Senate, as hon. members know, was to be a regional forum where sober second thought was to be given to what happened in the House of Commons and regional concerns were to find expression. However, as the different provinces joined confederation they had different priorities. The province of Prince Edward Island wanted many senators. The province of British Columbia wanted the railway. As it happens, in British Columbia we have 12 per cent of the population and only 5 per cent of the senators. Those five or six senators who sit in the upper House representing British Columbia are all from the lower mainland, which represents one-fifth of the land mass of British Columbia. Even if that were different, I do not believe the Senate, since confederation, has ever fulfilled its role.

The prerogative of government leaders to appoint senators has always been abused by all prime ministers, and the other place has failed to assert itself in a way which would have eased the tensions and crises we have experienced from time to time. So, people ask themselves, "What can we do now to correct all these crises which are with us?" The people in the province of Quebec can say legitimately that something will have to happen if they are to stay in confederation. There is dissension in western Canada as well. There are feelings of alienation and, as we have heard in the last few days from some of our friends here in the House of Commons, sentiments of separatism are being expressed even there.

Among the people I represent there is certainly a clear consensus, if not unanimous accord, that we should undertake this first and most symbolic act of patriating the constitution. Some questions come to mind right away which would have to be answered, of course, but certainly all of us want to carry out this symbolic act. The questions to which I have referred include: Who would be the guardian of the constitution when we get it to Canada? Will it be the Governor General, will it be the Queen, or will we choose a president to be the guardian of the constitution? When Britain surrenders its jurisdiction over the BNA Act, what will it mean to our relationship with the Commonwealth? I happen to think that our attachment to the Commonwealth and to Her Majesty the Queen is so strong that not even the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would have the gall or the courage ever to tamper with that.

So I say, let us patriate the constitution. Indeed, sir, that is the feeling expressed by all the spokesmen who have participated in the debate so far. I also feel, and the people whom I represent feel, that it would not make much sense to patriate the constitution without finding a key which would unlock it so that it can be amended when we do get it.

We have talked about a number of scenarios and proposals which the first ministers of the provinces have discussed with the federal government regarding an amending formula. There are two proposals in particular which come to mind: the Victoria charter and the Vancouver formula. I happen to think that the Vancouver formula would be much more fair and equitable, as was so eloquently stated by my hon. friends, and indeed it is the expressed opinion of our party that the Vancouver formula would provide us with that key which has proved so elusive.

The resolution which is before the House does more than just patriate and amend our constitution. It is in the area of the entrenchment of rights that I personally have serious reservations. I should like to say a few words about what it means to me and to the many people to whom I have talked to have a charter of human rights entrenched in the constitution. I should like to agree at the outset that no one, either in this chamber or outside it, has a monopoly on the ideals which have been referred to here—freedom, liberty and human rights. But it becomes painfully obvious that some of us have different definitions of those rights and different perceptions as to whether these rights should or should not be entreanched in the constitution. Are we so naive as to think—as obviously the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mrs. Erola) who spoke before is—that with the entrenchment of human rights in the constitution we will end all discrimination for all time? Are we so naive as to believe that with this one act we could end all discrimination forever? The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) was probably nearer the mark when he said that the constitution is not the source of our rights and freedoms but that it is the consequence of history in practice. You cannot legislate attitudes of people.

Basic freedoms and human rights have different meanings in different parts of the world. There are constraints to people's rights and freedoms for reasons of space and reasons of geography. The country in which I grew up has at present 66 million people, yet it is only as big as my constituency in north eastern B.C. Obviously in such an environment one cannot exercise the same rights and freedoms as one can in a country like Canada.

Then there is intellectual freedom. Again, not all of us are as mature and free intellectually as some others are. There is also economic and political freedom. Some say there are no political rights without economic freedom, and they relate that to free enterprise. Some of us did not feel free until we started our own businesses, when we became free to make our own mistakes. I was always under the illusion that I was also the benefactor of things I did right. However, that is no longer the case. We are now more of a collective society and we talk more about collective freedoms.

In a society such as ours we have obligations towards our neighbours. This confines our rights and freedoms. There is also the perception of our neighbours which should be taken into account because, as it is said in the Bible, if your neighbour does not think you should be free, then indeed you are not.

In some countries in the western world today there is conscription and people have to join the armed forces and train in case of war because they are close to a flashpoint of international tension. In this country, after we have entrenched our rights and freedoms, we should no longer have to do this. Certainly our Prime Minister has never felt he should ever have to join an army to defend our country. What would the freedoms which we have entrenched in our constitution mean if some day it should be the intention of a country with a different political ideology to attack and overrun our soil and we all sat back and exercised the right, which the Prime Minister seems to have reserved for himself, never to have to take up arms to defend our nation? What would happen to our entrenched freedoms if the communists were ever to take us over? I grew up in a country where there was an entrenched bill of rights which was written by Adolf Hitler. What did these entrenched rights mean when it was all over? I can tell you, sir, what it meant to me at the tender age of 12. It meant to me that I wanted to leave that country and start a new life some place else. Certainly when I came over here I had some real expectations about how this country should evolve.

From time to time there must be change. Indeed, one of our former prime ministers, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, said this about the entrenchment of rights when he spoke at the constitutional conference in 1968:

If a mistake is made in an ordinary statute, it can be remedied at a subsequent session of Parliament or the legislature. But a constitutional error may be almost irremediable and the consequences serious in the extreme.

From time to time we must make changes to our constitution and from time to time we must expand it. Who knows, maybe we might even find it necessary to restrict certain rights and freedoms for a short period of time. The Prime Minister should know that. In 1970 he found it necessary to impose the War Measures Act. Will he now say that no such thing will ever happen again when our rights are entrenched? Can we all gain access to the Supreme Court tomorrow morning if anything should threaten us individually or as a society? I say that such thinking is naive in the extreme. Our constitution should be flexible enough to expand on occasion the rights, liberties and freedoms of individuals, and, if the need arises, to ask individuals in our society to join a collective cause to defend the greater goals of our country. Is it not one's basic right to bring up one's children in a safe, wholesome and congenial environment and to protect them from influences which would adversely affect them in their formative years? But as proposed in this formula, there is also the right, now to be entrenched in the constitution, to express oneself in any way one wishes. If we draw upon the experience of the United States where freedom of expression is entrenched as the cardinal principle of democracy, we must accept the fact that our newsstands will be cluttered with smut and pornography because there are people in our society who like to express themselves in that way.

Is it not one's right to receive services which are essential to sustain oneself as a useful and full member of society, services that are provided by the government? The Post Office is an example. Does that right not conflict with the right to strike and withhold such services which is to be entrenched in the constitution? What about this most fundamental principle of democracy, the freedom of association, which is also to be entrenched? Freedom of association is really the very basis or foundation of our political system. One is free to associate with political parties and to express oneself publicly. How is the Supreme Court to interpret that after it becomes entrenched? The NDP, our friends to the left, might be wise, before they jump into that bath-tub, not only to check with the Saskatchewan premier who has some reservations with respect to resource questions, but also to check with "god" McDermott as to how he feels about it, because if freedom of association is interpreted in future in this country the way it is in other more advanced industrial nations, it means one can no longer be compelled to belong to a union. Not only is one free to belong, one is free to withhold membership. I wonder whether the NDP has given any thought to that little goody before they run away with their enthusiasm in support of this resolution.

For a few minutes I should like to talk more specifically about the latest attempt of the Prime Minister at social engineering in terms of two separate and distinct groups of minorities which will undoubtedly suffer very serious adverse effects. The first of these groups is our native Indians. In this connection, a group of native Indians will be going before an international tribunal in Amsterdam in the next little while to charge the federal government with ethnocide, which is a form of cultural genocide. One wonders why people in a society as free and generous as ours would have cause to seek redress in an international tribunal against the obvious and blatant discrimination they are suffering.

In this resolution we are talking also about the entrenchment of certain cultural and linguistic rights. I happen to think that if there are any cultural and linguistic rights which should be entrenched in any constitution, it should be those of the original people of this land, the rights of people who have no other place to go to replenish their culture. The fountain of their culture is mother earth on this North American continent. It is not derived from French, English, Italian or German—languages and cultures in evidence throughout the world. Their culture is indigenous, it is right here and there is no place else to go.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) spoke in emotional terms about his experience when he visited with the Acadians in Nova Scotia who were celebrating 375 years of presence and culture in his native province. He said in glowing terms that this culture is still very vivid and alive. I wonder if the same thing can be said for Indian culture. If native Indians could look back 375 years, I wonder if they could make the same claim—that the culture which existed then is still vivid and alive in our country today. I say they could not, and I say we must do something to ensure that whatever change we make to the constitution and whatever we entrench in the constitution it must make provision for some of the legitimate aspirations and, indeed, the legitimate rights of native Indians of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: In his early culture the native Indian always understood the important relationship between rights, freedoms, responsibilities and restraints. The native Indian in North America gathered material goods only to be given away as gifts and in so doing he ensured the protection of the society in which he lived. We could have drawn a lesson from that, but unfortunately we did not. Not only have we denied native Indians their traditional rights, but we have fractured and broken the treaties we made after we came. We promised native Indians that as long as the wind blows, the water flows and the sun shines, they would be able to hunt, fish and live in harmony with nature as they had before, even though we knew at the time we signed the treaties that there might be some day when rights of this kind could no longer be exercised as they were then. But even today we have not yet told the Indians that that is indeed the case. This resolution tells the Indian population, the Inuit and the non-status Indian population, that the Prime Minister is as committed now to the white paper of 1969 as he was then, and that today he is committed to a course of assimilation and integration at the most rapid pace possible. His opinion on it has not changed since 1969. Why does he not consult with native leaders before making these amendments to the constitution? In answer to my questions in the House he said, "We will patriate the constitution, we will bring it home, and then we will consult with Indians and other interested groups." He forgot to say that the rights of certain minority groups would be entrenched and that the rights of other minority groups would be very much in a secondary position.

I should like to say a few words about another minority group to which I belong. It is not as small or as helpless as the others I have mentioned. It has always been reluctant and perhaps somewhat afraid to speak out. Most assuredly it does not have the same kind of claim and right to speak out in this particular debate. I refer to the one third of our population consisting of new Canadians who did not inherit this great land by birth. All of us in this House with the exception of my hon. friend from the Arctic have belonged to this minority group at one time or another, or our ancestors have. People come to this land for different reasons, mostly for reasons of economic opportunity, which compelled them to make the move. But in many cases it was to escape political persecution and tension. They came to this country to seek political freedom. By accepting citizenship in this country they felt they were entering into a contract, a contract to which they had contributed the assets they had brought with them, such as their education, the skills they had acquired and brought with them and which someone else had paid for. They made a commitment to totally embrace the practice and way of life which was in evidence in Canada when they came. In return they expected the kind of freedom which was in evidence here, the kind of democracy that is the envy of the world. And they expected it would be assured not only to them for the rest of their lives but to their children as well. So they have a very clear stake; they entered into a contract and I, as one of this minority group, think this contract is now about to be broken.

As I said earlier, most of these people came from countries which do possess an entrenched charter of rights. Probably the most beautiful and philosophical charter of rights is that contained in the constitution of the Soviet Union. But what does it mean? It does not mean anything unless it is entrenched in the hearts and minds of the people who interchange with each other. Immigrants expected they would be accepted as full and equal members of this society and that there would be no disadvantages for reason of race, religion or colour. Again, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mrs. Erola) spoke in glowing terms of the immigrants with whom she came in contact and told us how they had been discriminated against. Well, sir, to entrench rights creates nothing but expectations which sometimes cannot be fulfilled. What, for instance, does freedom of religion mean to some of us? Does it mean that an immigrant family can come from India and bring with them their sacred cow and walk it down Yonge Street in Toronto? Of course not.

I can honestly and truthfully say, sir, that I have never been discriminated against. But my commitment was very complete to this country the very first day I arrived here. I was under no illusion that my children could be taught my native language in school. I was under no illusion that I could for ever practice my culture. I knew I had to attune myself to the mainstream of life which was practised here. Indeed, that was the reason for which I came. Certainly I have been in contact with bigots, of whom one has to be charitable and understanding, and it will probably be only my children who will become full members of this society.

Honestly, though, to talk about the generosity of this country one has to look at my experience as an example. Here I am, a member of Parliament. If someone had told me when I landed in Halifax on October 15, an immigrant at the age of 19, that some day I would be a member of the House of Commons, well, sir, I would not have believed it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: Nevertheless, there are members of ethnic groups in my constituency who are being discriminated against every day and were discriminated against after the First and Second World Wars, as well as in between. The reason they are sometimes discriminated against is because they have unreasonable expectations about the relationship between the old country and the new country and their own relationship with this country.

An immigrant knows better than anyone else that one cannot legislate the attitudes of people. Immigrants are most tolerant of those who are narrow minded and who have no understanding. Our immigrants know that only time can heal and that the only rights one has are those which are entrenched in the hearts and minds of the people with whom you live, the people who are your neighbours, the people who share your community. Entrenching the laws does not and will not help the immigrant, or the Indian, to make accommodations for bigotry and insensitivity.

What can we do as a government other than entrench rights? We can create a climate in which hostile attitudes will change. We can assert ourselves in the field of education. When I entered Parliament in 1972 multiculturalism was one of the identifying features of our country. Now we seem to be saying that multiculturalism is a secondary objective, that there are only two cultures and two languages with official status, the others being in a secondary position.

Sir, I know my time is running short but if you would permit me I would like to read a statement by the present Prime Minister when he spoke in 1969:

One must be in the wheelhouse to see what shifts are taking place. I know we have spun the wheel and I know that the rudder is beginning to press against the waves and the sea—perhaps the observer, who is sitting on deck sipping his tea, sees the horizon much in the same direction and doesn't realize it, but perhaps he will find himself disembarking at a different island than the one he thought he was sailing for—

When I speak to my friends in the native community and my friends in the ethnic community I say I have the sinking feeling that we shall be landing on an island to which we did not think we were headed if we allow this resolution to go ahead, amended by a foreign country with entrenchment of special rights for some and not for others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Henderson: May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING—APPROVAL OF UNILINGUAL ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, on October 9 I asked a question of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Flemming), who is also in charge of government advertising. I was witness to the astounding defence which that minister was making that day in support of the government advertising campaign to justify the government's resolution to bring back the constitution.

● (2200)

One thing which all Canadians will accept is that television advertising is designed to oversimplify the most complex issues, problems or products. The idea is to simplify to the point of oversimplification. It is the job of a television advertiser to put the issues into a 30 second clip, and in this case they will determine the future of the country for generations to come. The fact that the government has hired an agency to put on the television screen the picture of flying geese to convey to the Canadian people the simplicity of the issue of bringing home or patriating the constitution is almost insulting. Canada is probably facing its most complex issue in the past decade, and the government is resorting to the simplest of techniques in an attempt to simplify the complexity of the issue.

The second thing I wanted to point out is that in this particular advertising campaign not only is the issue oversimplified, but there is also untruth. If one listens to the script of those ads, they are saying very forthrightly that Canada has a constitution which was made in England; that it is time the constitution was brought home and we had a constitution made in Canada by Canadians. Historically, that is just plain wrong.

If I read my history books correctly, the Fathers of Confederation spent at least three years in Canada discussing, arguing, compromising and negotiating on the issues which faced the Canada of that day, and finally came up with a proposal to form the British North America Act which was then taken to England and passed by Westminster with only two minor changes being made. The fact is that the British North America Act is a constitution made in Canada by Canadians. The fact is that the television ads are blatantly untruthful.

The irony, as the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) just pointed out, is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is a great anti-colonialist, wants to use our colonial station to revise the constitution in England in such a way that he can have his charter of rights and freedoms in Canada untouched by Canadian hands.

The government's advertising campaign on the constitution is oversimplified, untruthful and, third, misleading. On the one hand the Minister of State for Multiculturalism said in the House on October 9 that all the advertising was under the aegis and guidance of the Canadian Unity Information Office and that, therefore, it was a non-political, non-partisan campaign. Such a statement is plainly misleading. An officer of the Canadian Unity Information Office the very day of the minister's speech was reported in newspapers as having issued a statement to the effect that the final decision on specific cases in that advertising campaign were made by cabinet.

It is ironic that for two years a commission travelled across Canada studying the issues of unity. One of the co-chairmen of that commission is sitting in the House as a Liberal cabinet minister now, and he is being totally ignored. The Pepin-Robarts report has been totally ignored in the document which is under debate right now. It would appear as though there was a two-year campaign at a cost of millions of dollars that went for nothing in terms of the final product.

It is misleading for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism to say, as he did in his speech of October 9, that the final word comes from the Canadian Unity Information Office when in fact a decision was made by cabinet in the particular case which I brought to the attention of the House. I am referring to the portion of the campaign which used billboards; the fact is that the advertising on the billboards was unilingual. This is a total contravention of the bilingual act. If, as that officer of the Canadian Unity Information Office has said, the final decisions were made by cabinet, then they are responsible for the unilingual billboards which were in total contravention of the act and in violation of the law. How could the minister stand and say that it is a non-partisan campaign? One cannot have a non-partisan campaign when partisan decisions are made by cabinet. It is totally offensive for the government to wrap itself in the Canadian flag. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) said the other day that everybody who is for his particular constitutional package is a good Canadian and everybody who is against it is suspect. Somehow that begins to smell. It now appears to be almost unpatriotic to disagree with the Liberal party and the Liberal government.

● (2205)

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, in responding to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), I take it that his main point is the non-bilingual billboards because the other matters to which he referred have been dealt with by the Speaker. I do not want to go back to issues which have been debated day after day in the last week or so.

Billboard advertising was under the auspices of the Canadian Unity Information Office. There was a national campaign. At the time it was felt that the whole country wanted patriation in some form. The billboards did not indicate that the Liberals wanted it, nor did they indicate that the Progressive Conservatives and the New Democratic Party were against it. The billboards were more or less straightforward. They advertised patriating our constitution—"one constitution"; "make it ours".

As for the matter of bilingualism, billboard advertising was in both French and English.

Mr. Friesen: In different places in the country.

Mr. Irwin: Let me get on with that. For instance, outside of Quebec where there is a high concentration of French-speaking Canadians, in such places as St. Boniface, Bathurst, Campbellton, Dalhousie, Moncton, Sudbury, Timmins, Windsor and Cornwall, there were two separate billboards, one in French and one in English. In my riding of Sault Ste. Marie with perhaps 2,000 to 2,500 French Canadians, which is not a high concentration, there were bilingual billboards. There were not many, but I believe I saw some. There were French and English billboards on Montreal Island.

On September 8, radio and television advertising was stopped. Billboards were rented on two-month contracts, and on October 15 most of them were removed. If they have not been removed, it is because the space has not been rented, but our responsibility ended on October 15.

As my hon. friend knows, government is not perfect. Everything was done that could be done to remedy the situation when the issue was raised. It is not the intent to continue along these lines. Obviously we are not a single mind even on such a basic issue as "one constitution; bring it home; make it ours."

FINANCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, on June 3 last, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the following:

Is the government's policy at the present time to keep interest rates higher than the market forces would normally indicate?

If one examines the interest rate structure in this country since this government took office and after the flurry of high interest rates immediately following its taking office, through the months of June, July and up to now, it would seem that interest rates have been deliberately kept higher by the government than market forces would normally indicate. One begins to wonder why this is and what, in fact, is happening. To refresh people's memories, the Bank of Canada, lending to commercial banks, is prepared to lend at 25 bases points over the average rate of 90-day treasury bills as determined at the weekly auction. This week the Bank of Canada is prepared to lend at 11.6 per cent. The rate was slightly different when I asked the question in June. However, there is no question that the rate charged by the chartered banks to their most preferred borrowers is to some extent related to the Bank of Canada rate.

● (2210)

During the period through last fall when the Progressive Conservative government was in office, the difference between the Bank of Canada rate and the chartered bank rate was somewhere around one-half per cent or about 50 bases points, sometimes extending to as many as 100 bases points, but not more. Since this spring, the rate has rarely fallen as close as it is today. Even today the difference is 115 bases points. When the question was asked, it was 120.82 bases points.

One wonders why this is happening. One would have to look at a series of Bank of Canada statements, which are produced weekly, to see what in fact is taking place. It is clear that the Bank of Canada, in order to keep rates up, reduced its holding of treasury bills in one week alone by $424.5 million, and further in order to keep rates of interest up and to keep the Canadian dollar at a lower figure than it would normally go if rates were allowed by the market forces to justify themselves, increased its holdings of foreign currency in one week by $325.9 million.

Dealing in treasury bills alone, year over year, while the amount of treasury bills placed by the government on the open market has been $5.36 billion, the administration opposite has reduced its holdings of treasury bills by $110 million. In other words, the government has been operating the money markets in such a way as to influence those markets, paying more for its treasury bills than it needs to, or raising prices for treasury bills higher than necessary, enabling it to dispose of all its treasury bills on the private market.

That would not be so bad if it were not for the suspicion of myself and others that this government is in bed with the large chartered banks. While this year the chartered banks have increased their deposits by $15.8 billion, their holdings of government securities have not increased markedly at all. In effect, the government has been operating its financing in such a way as to absorb almost all of the private funds available in the marketplace and has not been leaning on the chartered banking system to supply its funds. The parliamentary secretary will know from his experience in the field that the Bank of Canada has estimated privately that there may be about $12 billion in annual savings by Canadians available for investment. The effect of the way the government has been operating is to soak up all that investment in order to finance its bond issues and make sure that interest rates in Canada are kept higher than they normally would be.

• (2215)

From January 1, 1977, until the present time, the amount of government borrowing has increased from $42 billion to $77 billion. Of that increase of $35 billion, over $28 billion has been directly soaked up by the public. Most of the money borrowed has been soaked up by the public. Certainly in the past year the banks have taken virtually none of it.

This government uses the Bank of Canada as a vehicle to finance its outrageous debt, and uses the interest rate system to force interest rates up in Canada so as to deprive private business of money. Consequently, we get the very proper statement from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business that in Ontario alone 17.2 per cent of businesses have delayed planned expansions or cancelled new job opportunities because of excessively high interest rates.

I maintain that the interest rate policy of the government is designed to force up interest rates and thus make it possible for the government to place its outrageous debt requirements on the open market. This deprives small business, medium business and indeed, large business, of the opportunity to borrow at realistic rates. The effect of the government's activity has been to increase interest rates to business by between .5 per cent and 1 per cent, at least. The policy so far this year has been to hide behind the scheme of allegedly relating interest rates to the average of treasury bills. But this is a dirty float—the same dirty float as they used in foreign exchange dealings.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may remember that when the question he referred to was posed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with a supplementary to me, I indicated that the policy of the Bank of Canada has been and continues to be to resist sharp fluctuations in interest rates in Canada, especially in the 91-day treasury bill market, by buying out of the market and selling into the market, as the case may be, when the Bank perceives that the interest rate fluctuations are beyond normal bounds or are erratic and threaten to destabilize capital markets in the country.

The hon. member will recall that the purpose of these activities of the Bank of Canada is to maintain orderly markets. If he would look at the mandate given to the Bank of Canada in the Bank of Canada Act, he would see that one of the three stated purposes for the establishment of the Bank of Canada was to maintain orderly markets in Canadian capital and financial areas.

The mandate of the Bank of Canada is to maintain orderly markets. Over the period to which the hon. member has referred, it has both bought and sold government securities which means that in some cases it was moving in opposition to a rise in interest rates and that at other times it was moving in opposition to a decline in interest rates when it thought those interest rate movements were excessively erratic.

• (2220)

There is no evidence at all to support the hon. member's contention that the bank has been consistently keeping interest rates above their equilibrium level. In fact, it is quite clear that the bank could simply not maintain interest rates above what the market would say is the equilibrium rate in the marketplace for any length of time whatsoever because it would mean that the bank would have to be operating in one direction against the market in a consistent way, and the bank simply does not have sufficient power to force itself against the market consistently over a long period of time.

All I can say to the hon. member is that if he will look more carefully and perhaps take some guidance from the answers which have been provided to him in previous sessions of the House, I think he will find that in fact his contention is unfounded and that the bank has simply not been undertaking any such policy as he suggests in his question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.20 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED NATURAL GAS EXPORT TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I expect the unanimous consent of the House to my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity; and as we get closer to the budget, it becomes more urgent and more pressing. Because the imposition of a tax on exported natural gas would reduce provincial revenues in British Columbia and thereby limit the province's ability to provide to its people such services as hospital and medical care; and because such a tax would also tend to dampen the effort being put into the search for additional energy supplies in British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House urge the Minister of Finance to refrain in his forthcoming budget from imposing a tax on natural gas and other forms of energy.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR CANADA

CALL FOR DECISION ON AIRCRAFT FUEL SUPPLY TO BE LEFT TO PILOT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to move a motion. In view of the testimony by a pilot at the air safety hearings yesterday that Air Canada puts subtle pressure on pilots to accept low fuel supplies on certain flights and that this has already caused incidents where flights have been forced to land to refuel before reaching their destination, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House calls upon the Minister of Transport to require Air Canada to leave the decision on how much fuel is taken on for each flight entirely up to the pilots.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—LANDING FEES FOR LIGHT AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put a motion of urgent and pressing importance. In view of the government's plan to increase substantially the fees charged to private pilots landing at Canadian airports effective on November 1, 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That the Minister of Transport be directed to cancel his plans to raise the landing fees from $1.65 to $5 per landing for light aircraft flying into Vancouver International Airport until such time as the government carries out the commitment made by the former Progressive Conservative minister of transport to reactivate the alternative Boundary Bay airfield for general aviation use, a commitment which must be met promptly if air safety is to be maintained in the Vancouver control area.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the policy of this government is to pay $36 a barrel for heavy oil from Venezuela and Mexico and to force refineries to accept this oil rather than to use heavy oil from western Canada priced at $16.75 a barrel, and because paying foreign producers while there is a surplus of heavy oil in western Canada represents an oil policy so out of touch with reality that it staggers the imagination and constitutes a complete abdication of ministerial responsibility, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House ask for the immediate resignation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and urgently requests the Prime Minister to replace him with a minister who has demonstrated a greater ability to formulate policy and to manage a department, such as, say, the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AVIATION HALL OF FAME

CALL FOR FEDERAL ANNUAL GRANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to place before the House a motion requiring serious and pressing consideration. Canada's Aviation Hall of Fame has been established in the city of Edmonton with the purpose, among others, of preserving and highlighting the heroic flying deeds of some of the early bush pilots of northern Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the federal government generously support by way of an annual monetary grant this very worth-while project which has been established in the national interest.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

CALL FOR CONGRATULATIONS TO ALBERTA MLA FOR SUPPORTING FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As hon. members probably know, last Thursday the MLA for Calgary-Buffalo, Mr. Tom Sindlinger, was thrown out of his party caucus after he dared support publicly the proposed resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada.

[Translation]

Considering that the House will surely recognize that it is urgent to guarantee the rights and basic freedoms of all Canadians, and considering that a provincial member lost his right to speak within the caucus of his party, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael):

[English]

That this House send a message of congratulations to the MLA for Calgary-Buffalo for his loyalty to Canada and urge him to continue his work in a spirit of sharing that is indispensable to achieving Canadian unity.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of this House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIVE RIGHTS

CALL FOR EXPLANATION OF POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, the first of a series of five-year policy statements entitled "Directions for the Eighties" has caused considerable resentment within the native community. Whereas finding solutions to the problems faced by the native community is of the utmost urgency to Canada, and since the proposed policy caused sufficient embarrassment to the minister to cause him to halt immediately its implementation, thereby exhibiting a total lack of control by the minister over his officials, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately investigate what his officials are doing, make a statement on motions to the House and put an end to these chaotic and embarrassing occurrences within his department.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

SLOWDOWN IN GRAIN MOVEMENT—CALL FOR REINSTATEMENT OF FORMER GRAIN TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency which has arisen since the resignation of Dr. Hugh Horner as grain transportation co-ordinator. In the short time which has elapsed problems have once again surfaced in the movement of grain from western Canada to western ports. Elevators are being plugged, and farmers are unable to deliver grain, denying them of needed revenue.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the Minister of Transport immediately request Dr. Hugh Horner to reassume the responsibilities of his former position for a sufficiently long period of time to get the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board out of this mess and the farmers out of a financial squeeze.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

STEPS TO ENSURE BENEFITS OF SBDB PROGRAM INURE TO SMALL BUSINESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that chartered banks and other financial institutions are quoting different rates of interest under the proposed SBDB program, and since the purpose of the SBDB program is to provide interest rate relief to small business, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to take the necessary steps to ensure that the full benefits of the SBDB program accrue to small business and are not used to subsidize chartered bank profits.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

FUTURE FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Science and Technology, who is speaking on constitutional matters today to western Liberals—I suppose he took them with him—I will address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

● (1415)

This month the minister's stand-in speaker at the Financial Post high technology conference made the same announcement as his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, when he stated that:

The federal government faces serious fiscal choices. It is likely that the government will not be in a position to respond financially in anything like the amounts required by the high-tech industries in the 1980s and 1990s.

In plain talk, this means that the government has so fouled up its priorities that it has no money. Does the minister identify himself with the statement, and does he agree that he has lost the battle in cabinet for vitally needed funds to develop this country, create legitimate careers and jobs for young Canadians, and reverse the government's dismal economic record?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I am glad to see that support for making research and development and industrial development generally a priority of government is a matter which transcends party boundaries, and I hope we will see this continuing in the months to come since encouragement of research and development is a matter of priority with this government.

Despite fiscal constraints, I think we will see confirmed practical ways of carrying out that priority in a way that means jobs, innovation and development for Canadian industry.

Mr. Gilchrist: Madam Speaker, in spite of such lofty rhetoric, the minister knows very well that if we do not begin massive programs of research and development, more jobs will be lost to foreigners. The Japanese, through their high technology, have already replaced the Swiss as watchmakers to the world and they have taken over hundreds of automotive jobs in the minister's own riding. Will the minister undertake to remind the Minister of Finance that the government's commitment—and I underscore the word "commitment"—is to increase its investment in research to 1.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1985, not decrease it. This is too vital an area for another Liberal broken promise.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I do not think there is time in this question period for me to detail the long record of Conservative broken promises—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Tell us about the interest rates.

An hon. Member: When did you resign, Herb?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I do not have to remind the Minister of Finance about the importance of support for research and development. He shares the view that I and all of us on this side of the House share, and which I hope members on the other side share as well, regarding the importance of this matter and of government leadership in this area.

Mr. Gilchrist: Well, Madam Speaker, let me be specific. Could the minister explain how the same policies, which have plunged Canada's technological effort by one quarter of 1 per cent to the shameful level of under 1 per cent of the gross national product—equal to Iceland and Ireland and other such "high technology" countries—will suddenly magically turn around, reverse the decline and instead bring about a two-thirds increase, even if that figure is met? And if it is not met, how can it be in Canada's interest, since it will put us so much out of step with our trading partners and cost us thousands of Canadian jobs?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we intend to improve, upgrade and substantially add to what is already in place.

FUNDS ALLOTTED TO SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, perhaps in view of the previous answers I could direct my question to the Minister of Finance, who is also acting Treasury Board head. As the chief architect of our federal fiscal framework, I wonder if the Minister of Finance, in view of the comments made by his colleague about support of science and technology being shared by the Minister of Finance, would indicate why he has permitted the public service to snowball once again in size, going up over 7,000 in numbers since last April alone, costing the treasury in the full year $140 million, when the total amount allotted to science and technology as a department is $7 million, or one-twentieth of that amount?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member had better address the question to the President of the Treasury Board instead of to the alternate president of the treasury board.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I will give the Minister of Finance another chance because I think the lack of funding for science and technology in this country is a terribly important issue. Would the Minister of Finance, perhaps after he has crowned the three hundred thousandth new public servant in this country—that is the number of public servants we have just exceeded—indicate whether he plans to take up, especially with privately-owned foreign concerns in this country, the need that they give their local subsidiaries in Canada a greater mandate, especially in the field of research and development?

● (1420)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, no one could disagree with the motherhood portion of that question.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TOXIC WASTE BY AMAX

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the fact that an internal review of Amax's permit to dump 100 million metric tons of toxic heavy metals into Alice Arm, British Columbia, has been completed, would the minister advise the House whether or not he now agrees with the conclusions of the McCart report? It reads in part as follows:

—the potential impacts are serious enough to preclude marine disposal of tailings.

If the minister has not yet reached that conclusion, would he now call for a formal impact assessment and public hearings?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I have in fact received the report and I want to discuss it with the authors. Hopefully I will go to British Columbia this evening to discuss it with them this week. I may have a fuller answer for the hon. member early next week.

IMPACT OF DUMPING ON NISHGAS AND COMMERCIAL FISHERY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I hope he and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will get together on this issue. On October 6, 1980, the minister sent out a letter in which he called for a review committee to consider a public inquiry on the Amax question. Would the minister now advise whether the impact of this dumping on the Nishga people and the commercial fishery are considerations of the government, or is the review process simply a further cover-up of the backroom election deal made between Amax and the Liberal party?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I had a chance to discuss this question with the chief of the Nishga people a couple of days ago. I indicated that if he wanted to give further consideration to the materials before him before asking me to consider seriously a public inquiry, I would be more than happy to give him that opportunity. As I perceive it, further discussions will be going on before I will be required to make any decision of that kind.

CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Very clearly the corporate interest is being supported by the government in this particular situation. The conflict between the evidence produced by the corporate sector and that by independent scientists looking into this matter indicates that the ocean will be seriously polluted and that in fact there may be an impact something like genocide of the Nishga people at the head of Alice Arm.

Will the Prime Minister simply stand up and indicate that he will call a full public inquiry into this situation, since the permit given to Amax is the only one of its kind in Canada and was granted behind closed doors in the middle of the 1979 federal election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had listened to the minister he would have understood that we asked for a review of the question precisely for that reason.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

TECHNOLOGICAL CONTRACTS—PREFERENCE FOR CANADIAN BIDDERS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. Inasmuch as government procurement policies are acknowledged to be a key tool in advancing Canadian scientific expertise by providing opportunities for private Canadian firms to develop their unique proficiencies through the supply of specialized services and technological benefits to the Government of Canada, will the minister advise the House as to the specific rules and criteria used by his department to ensure that Canadian bidders are given a decided advantage when bidding on contracts of a technological nature?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member wanted to ask that question in committee this morning. Hopefully we will be able to go into further details at the next session. I am pleased the hon. gentleman has called to the attention of the House and all hon. members the role the Department of Supply and Services is playing in the research and development field.

● (1425)

Yesterday I issued a press release relating to the 172 contracts which I had signed for research and development with various institutions and corporations in Canada valued at $10,348,943. The criterion which we used is the furtherance of research and development in Canada for Canadian-based companies and the marketability of the products of that research and development.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister, who may not be aware of the fact that a $250,000 contract was awarded by his department in 1978 to the Tracor Corporation of Texas for the supply of an airport noise monitoring system to be installed at the Toronto International Airport. The awarding of this contract was met with strong opposition from the Canadian acoustical community.

Does the minister realize that at least four qualified Canadian firms had bid competitively on that contract, that scientific experts in the Ministry of Transport and elsewhere, including other government laboratories, had strongly and forcefully advised against the procurement of the Texas system, and that the $250,000 imported system now sits in mothballs at Malton Airport because it does not work? It is completely useless. How does the minister explain this blunder in the face of his remarks of a few moments ago?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that I am not familiar with what occurred in 1978. My responsibilities were assumed in March, 1980.

I will look into the matter which the hon. gentleman has identified. I point out to him that when we deal in the field of science and procurement with contracts in the range of $1.5 billion a year, the amount of the contract which he has identified, namely $250,000, is not huge. But notwithstanding that, I will look into the details and give him a full report.

AIR SAFETY

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORTS ON EMERGENCY LOCATOR TRANSMITTERS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It refers to transport matters but I think it has much interest to the Minister of National Defence, to whom I wish to put the question. It now seems obvious that despite repeated questions and repeated non-answers from ministers of transport, in my case back to 1973, they have been fully aware of the problems related to the ELTs. I wonder if this minister would undertake to have his colleague put on the table of the House the report or reports which are in existence dealing with those problems.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the question of the hon. member is very interesting to me and as far as the defence department is concerned we always have been very interested because if the use of ELTs was compulsory in all small aircraft, our costs on search would be much less.

We have collaborated very closely with the Ministry of Transport to see how they can devise a new ELT with a proper battery which can stand all kinds of weather. We are pushing very hard to have this done as soon as possible because it will afford protection to the flyers and also to the department.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, the minister did not answer my question. I am going to ask it of him again, plus a further question, because he touched on the cost. The cost to pilots has been more than $4 million. The cost in dollars to the Ministry of National Defence has been incalculable, to say nothing of the cost in lives, which is completely unacceptable.

Given those facts, would the minister give a clear and definite undertaking that he will support in cabinet, if necessary, or with the Minister of Transport, the research necessary to produce a suitable ELT and support with some dollars, the placing of them in private aircraft; and as I have asked earlier, will he have the report which is available now placed on the table of the House?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think I did answer the question when I stated that we are now co-operating with the Department of Transport to have an ELT as technically improved as possible to protect human life and the cost of our research.

I should also add that in my dealings with cabinet, the committees and the Department of Transport, he can rely on my entire co-operation to support the Minister of Transport in that direction.

As for the report, I will discuss it with my colleague, the Minister of Transport, to see whether it can be made public.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE FOR CANADIAN COMPANIES IN FINANCIAL DIFFICULTY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the assistance which the government has announced it is prepared to give Massey-Ferguson with regard to the financial difficulty it now faces, is it the policy of the government that it will in future make available the same kind of financial assistance to all Canadian companies which run into the same or similar type of financial difficulty as Massey-Ferguson, and does it intend to make that assistance to all other Canadian companies in proportion to the size of their operation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the announcement which I made yesterday is with respect to assistance that we had decided, jointly with the province of Ontario, to offer as part of the refinancing of Massey-Ferguson.

The question as to whether similar occasions will arise in the future will have to be decided in the light of the circumstances of each case and, in particular, in light of the economic costs and benefits associated with the particular company for Canada as a whole.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, as a job lost in any area is just as important as a job lost in any other area, and as those people who are employed by one company, irrespective of size, are just as important as those employed by a big company, is it the intention of the government to give exactly the same kind of treatment and support and show the same kind of interest as it has now indicated it is willing to give to Massey-Ferguson, or does it simply believe in the policy that "big is beautiful", and the government is not really interested in small companies that run into the same kind of financial problems as large companies?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we already offer very substantial help to small and medium-sized companies in Canada through programs such as the Federal Business Development Bank and the enterprise development program.

An hon. Member: Come off it!

Mr. Wilson: Answer the question.

Mr. Gray: We are certainly prepared to examine possible new initiatives which would add to these very successful programs. I have especially noticed the abandonment by my hon. friend on the part of the Conservative party of its traditional reluctance to have the government intervene in the marketplace.

Mr. Hees: In other words, the government's policy is "big is beautiful and to hell with everybody else".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CROWN LAND DISPOSAL POLICY OF B.C. GOVERNMENT

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment who is responsible for forestry, I direct my question to the minister responsible for intergovernmental relations. On July 1, 1980, the government of British Columbia announced a new Crown land disposal policy which potentially will alienate and destroy tens of thousands of acres of forest at fire-sale prices. This is at a time when all governments through CCREM have demanded the importance of expanding our forest base.

Is the government aware of this policy and its potentially destructive impact on our forest resource and, if so, what action has the government taken to dissuade the government of B.C. from its mindless attack on this vital and fast dwindling natural resource?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must be aware that the decision made by the government of British Columbia is entirely within its competence because the resource is provincial. The hon. member allows us to make the point that this government never does have and never has had the intention to tell the governments of the provinces what to do with their resources; we have confidence in their ability.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You get full marks for comedy.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, I can assure the parliamentary secretary that this party is quite aware of the prerogatives of the provinces when it comes to resources. What it does prove, in fact, is that laws and constitutions cannot stop fools from acting like fools.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: In view of the importance of this resource, as stated many times by the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers, a federal-provincial body representing all provincial governments across Canada as well as the federal government, and in view of the serious consequences of this totally irresponsible action, will the minister responsible immediately consult with industry and labour representatives and together with them work to persuade—to persuade, not to force—the provincial government of British Columbia to reverse this idiotic and self-destructive course?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, what the hon. member is getting exercised about is the decision or determination by the B.C. government to allow some of its Crown land to be used for agricultural purposes. I do not know what he has against agriculture. We on this side do not have anything against the subject.

Mr. Nielsen: Nothing for it either.

Mr. Simmons: We also see this decision of the government of B.C. as a decision which is strictly within provincial jurisdiction. We have no intention of interfering with it. I suggest to the hon. member that his question ought to be more properly directed to the appropriate minister in the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Clark: Or perhaps to Westminster.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY WHETHER ECONOMIC FORECAST WILL BE TABLED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister took a vow of silence yesterday, and he would not answer me, so I have a question for the minister. The Prime Minister, of course, is a bit afraid.

Last year the government of the day introduced for the first time a five-year forecast in connection with the budget entitled "Economic Assumptions Underlying the Fiscal Projections of the Budget". In addition, just before the budget was brought down we tabled a tax expenditure account. Other information was also tabled, such as the explanation of the new expenditure-management system. The minister does not have such a system so I do not expect him to table it.

Does the minister intend to table a five-year economic forecast with his budget to follow the precedent set last year; and will he be tabling an annual tax expenditure budget and report that would show tax revenues forgone and which will bring up-to-date and refine the one published last year, as that report admitted that it was not entirely refined? Will these things be done?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as one who has always believed in open government—

An hon. Member: "Open government by closed mouth".

Mr. MacEachen: —I propose to table all the documents which became part of the budget picture last December. I would add, and I am sure that the hon. member will understand, that these projections and assumptions are just that and, as I learned and as he learned, some of the projections which he made last December did not last very long. Despite that disability, I still think that it is worth while to give the largest possible amount of information to the public, even though much of it is at risk.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I am very much encouraged by what the minister has said because it shows that perhaps he is still ready to learn and to follow good practices. I would also like to ask the minister whether or not he will be dealing with the question of sunset provisions of tax measures. We had promised last year a review to determine whether or not it would be rational to have sunset provisions attached to certain tax measures.

Also, will the minister follow our example by referring the question of tax treatment of charitable donations and the question of capital gains taxes to a parliamentary committee as we intended to do? These are very involved questions. Will he follow our example in these areas as well?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, in the statement which I made in April I indicated that I would be tabling a paper on capital gains. I will be doing that, if not on the day or the day after the budget, then very shortly thereafter, so that the House will be able to base a consideration of capital gains on an analysis which has been prepared within the Department of Finance. This document will be made available to the House as early as possible after the budget.

Obviously, some of the proposals will have sunset clauses, but I want to make sure that the sun does not set on me as it set on the hon. member.

Mr. Crosbie: It will rise again.

AGRICULTURE

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF ACCELERATING PAYMENTS TO HOG PRODUCERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Agriculture, but as he is away from the House, I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. We are aware that last summer, through its Agricultural Stabilization Board, the Department of Agriculture provided assistance to qualified hog breeders and feeders. A great many of them, however, are complaining that payments are being made slowly. I should like therefore to ask the parliamentary secretary if the board has received many applications, how many cheques have already been sent out to the two categories of producers, and if these payments could be accelerated.

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his question. Indeed, the two programs which have been implemented by the Department of Agriculture will require expenditures of $46.5 million and $6.5 million for hogs and piglets respectively. As far as hogs are concerned, 25,487 applications have been received and 5,998 cheques have been issued. The remaining cheques should be issued before the end of 1980. As far as piglets are concerned, 3,900 applications have been received and the cheques should be sent out within the next two weeks.

SECOND WORLD WAR

KATYN FOREST MASSACRE—REPRESENTATION AT UNVEILING OF MEMORIAL

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On September 14 this year there was an unveiling of a memorial to the 15,000 Polish officers who lost their lives in 1940 as a result of an execution near the town of Katyn in Poland. At that commemoration there were representatives from the official opposition, representatives from the government of Ontario and the opposition of the government of Ontario, as well as a number of municipal politicians. The federal government had intended to send a representative but at the last minute the plans were changed.

My question to the minister is: on what basis did the government change its mind and decide not to have representation at this very important event; and was external pressure applied to the government which caused it to change its mind?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe there was representation by several governments, but that had no influence on the attitude of the government because our long-standing policy has been not to participate in any activities relating to the Katyn forest massacre. I think the fact that the people of Poland at that time were undergoing such traumatic events should alone be sufficient reason to justify that position.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. If the government has had this long-standing policy, why did it decide to send a representative to the memorial commemoration, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park? Why did it change its mind at the last minute, and what governments were pressuring the Government of Canada not to send a representative to that event?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that it was the governments of Poland and the Soviet Union which made representations to us, but I repeat that that had no influence whatever on the long-standing policy of this government, which was established long before such representations were received. Members of Parliament, of course, are free to attend such events on their own behalf and a number of members from this side of the House did so.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATEMENTS BY PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND RESPECTING FEDERAL PROPOSALS

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last night the Premier of Newfoundland made some extreme statements, claiming that measures proposed by this government could result in Newfoundland losing control over Labrador and its right to a denominational system of education. Could the Prime Minister assure the House that such is not the case?

An hon. Member: Isn't it in the Supreme Court?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, members of the opposition are asking about the Supreme Court. I would point out that the statements are clearly untrue, based not on an interpretation of the courts but on what our resolution itself says. When there are other methods of amending the constitution, we do not propose to use the amending provision; we propose to use the one which is preserved in our resolution by section 53 and item 4 of the schedule. In other words, we cannot change the boundaries of a province without the consent of that province.

An hon. Member: A referendum?

Mr. Trudeau: That is stated clearly in our resolution, if only Premier Peckford took the time to read it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Pardon. The Right Hon. Prime Minister had not finished with his answer, I am sorry. I will give him the floor.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the opposition often asks questions in two parts so I do not see why they would object to a question in two parts by a member on this side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: On this question of denominational schools, Mr. Peckford again failed to read the resolution. When we talk of freedom of religion, we are not following the type of protection given in the United States which forbids the establishment of religions. Therefore, far from abolishing the right of denominational schools to continue to exist, our proposed resolution, on the contrary, guarantees the existence of that freedom of religion. It is also guaranteed by section 93 of the British North America Act which is continued by the present resolution. So again, on this item Premier Peckford is completely off base.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL INTERNATIONAL—IMPLEMENTATION OF DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Transport and the importance of my question, I shall put it to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Last Thursday the Secretary of State, addressing the Mirabel Cargo Association, recalled that during the election campaign the Liberal party had promised to proceed with phase two of Mirabel, which was part of the original project, adding, and I quote:

—in fact, there is absolutely no question at this time of proceeding with phase 2 of Mirabel as provided for in the original plan and entailing the construction of a second airport and another landing strip.

Can the Prime Minister tell us today whether the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications was then speaking on behalf of the government and whether he, the Prime Minister, was advised of that decision?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport, I must say the question is still under study; it would be unwise to announce a decision at this time. When the impact of the over-all situation at Mirabel and Dorval has been looked into, the minister, in agreement with cabinet, will be in a position to announce the decision to the House.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, in view of the reply of the parliamentary secretary, it seems clear that the Minister of Communications made an unfounded statement in affirming that going ahead with phase 2 had been definitely decided against; under those circumstances, can the parliamentary secretary assure us that a study is being made on the possibility of achieving the original objective which, according to the statement of the Minister of Communications, has been definitely cancelled?

Mr. Bockstael: Madam Speaker, there is still an element of uncertainty due to deep changes in our economy and the use of the two services, especially that of the Mirabel airport. The matter is still under review and the Minister of Transport will have an announcement to make at a later date.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON—PROPOSAL TO REFINANCE

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the minister might share with us the nature of the proposal which was put before this government and the government of Ontario with regard to the recapitalization and reorganization of Massey-Ferguson which justified the government taking this most unusual position of guaranteeing the new equity investment of those who might put their money into Massey-Ferguson without similarly guaranteeing the jobs of the people who work there.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend missed a very important part of what I had to say in making my announcement on behalf of the federal government yesterday. At that time I said that among the very important conditions attached to the willingness of the Government of Canada and the government of Ontario to guarantee a portion of the equity refinancing of Massey-Ferguson would be conditions involving the preservation of jobs and the carrying out of further research and development, production and investment by Massey-Ferguson in Canada. These will be conditions very much attached to what we intend to do in facilitating the refinancing of Massey-Ferguson.

Mr. Deans: In order that we can better understand what it is that the minister proposes to do and the nature of the guarantees that he is going to extract, is the minister prepared to stand in this House and explain to us and the people of Canada exactly what form the guarantees will take which will assure us that the equity investment guarantee will in fact mean for Canadians that there will be jobs, that there will be a reorganized company and that there will in fact be a profit-making operation from which we can derive benefit? If he can, will he explain why the government, if it feels this is a good thing to do, did not take an equity position and gain for Canada at least some return?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the exact details of the eventual arrangements are subject to detailed negotiation to ensure as a government, on behalf of the workers of Massey-Ferguson, the 300 suppliers and 300 dealers—the small businesses which my friend on the Conservative side forgot about when he asked me a question a few minutes ago—that we have in place commitments with respect to investment, production and research and development, commitments we will insist on having in place as a condition of making available, along with the government of Ontario, the guarantee of equity that we mentioned yesterday. I do not think my hon. friend would want me to prejudice the type of outcome of negotiations which he is calling for by making some premature disclosure of details which will harm our negotiating position. I also want to say that the position we are taking is the kind that has been very strongly called for by the UAW representing the workers at Massey.

WATER RESOURCES

SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—REFERENCE BY B.C. GOVERNMENT OF U.S. PROPOSAL TO FLOOD TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister knows, the province of British Columbia has now referred the question of the American proposal to flood the Canadian Skagit river valley in British Columbia to the International Joint Commission. I ask the minister why there has not yet been any move on the part of the federal government to support that initiative on the part of the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, negotiations have been ongoing in this matter between American and city authorities and British Columbia. Our position is well known. We have never been enthusiastic about this project but there is, after all, an agreement involving the province of British Columbia. We believe it is for the province of British Columbia to face up to its responsibility and to attempt to change the minds of the U.S. signatories in this respect.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, the minister knows that has not been the position of the federal government for ten years. If that is now the position of the federal government, the federal government is leaving the province of British Columbia in an extraordinarily difficult position in dealing with the United States of America. The minister has been very brave about trying to cover up on the messy and seamy side of the Canadian arrangements.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: I want to know now, is the Government of Canada prepared, after all these years, finally to get on the side of British Columbia and tell the American government that their order is invalid, that the order is not fair and that we will not have our valley flooded? Are we going to get an answer or is the minister going to run for cover?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the position of the government has been consistent; we believe this problem should be settled by negotiation. We have consistently offered our good offices to assist the province of British Columbia in that regard.
