POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF DUTY ON SCIENTIFIC EQUIPMENT

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Science and Technology, I shall address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This government has agreed to carry on the funding to universities for scientific research, but we understand they are thinking about imposing a duty on the importation of scientific equipment and supplies. Can the minister assure us that this will not happen, because there is not much use increasing funding for research to universities if we are going to slap a tax on their imported machinery.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I think my friend is referring to a recent report of the tariff board after it held hearings into this matter. If I am not mistaken, the report is presently under study by my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

OTTAWA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF ADEQUATE FACILITIES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Meetings are being held today between Eastern Airlines and the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Municipality executives relative to future direct flights between Ottawa International Airport and the United States. Any decision, however, hinges on agreement by the minister of immigration to having proper customs facilities put in place. Will the minister assure us that such facilities are forthcoming, thereby saving Ottawa from the shame of presently being one of the few international capitals with no direct flights to its largest neighbour and most important market?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to do anything I can to get Ottawa better air service. We are certainly keeping abreast of those negotiations. When the time comes to make a decision concerning immigration facilities, we will certainly be prepared to respond, but we have to wait and see what the negotiations with the airlines result in first.

Mr. Fretz: Madam Speaker, will the minister consult with his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to get his support so we can get this project off the ground and not wait for ten years from now, as we have to with his new manpower policy?

Mr. Axworthy: As you well know, Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport has a very direct and personal interest in improving service in the Ottawa region. I will be glad to consult with him both on transport and on manpower matters.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR ADEQUATE FUNDING TO ENSURE SAFE WORKING ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, I will direct my question to the parliamentary secretary. The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, operating out of the health and science building at McMaster University in Hamilton, has been committed to the increasingly vital role of promoting the fundamental right of Canadians to a healthy and safe working environment. Can the centre be assured by the government of adequate funding to carry out this important mandate effectively and efficiently?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

An hon. Member: A yes or no will do.

Mr. Desmarais: The creation of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was authorized by an act of Parliament in 1978, with the active support of all parties in the House, I might add. When the bill was being considered the then minister of labour, the Hon. John Munro, stated that this vitally important new institution would be financed through funds appropriated by Parliament. This has been done in the last two years and it is the intention of this government to continue to do that.

The organization and development of the centre—

Some hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Desmarais: —is moving ahead very rapidly in accordance with—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Desmarais: —the plans of the board of governors which is comprised of unions, management—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Desmarais: May I come to my conclusion?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1500)

Mr. Desmarais: I might say, Madam Speaker, that the increased activities of the organization would require a much heavier budget in the year 1981-82. The present Minister of Labour has committed himself to seek—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FLEMING—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. CLARK

Madam Speaker: I have a number of notices of questions of privilege. Does the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) still feel he has a question of privilege?

Mr. Clark: Yes or no?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I believe I had the basis of a question of privilege, and that is why I gave you notice. But on the basis that there was no deliberate intention in the charge made, I am willing to withdraw the question of privilege. If, however, there is an indication it was deliberate, I will try to make my point. In reviewing it, I believe it is up in the air. The words do not state it but there is an implication. I do not think the right hon. member would be deliberate in that charge.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I, of course, would not suggest the minister is being deliberate in anything that he does.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. BLAIS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning certain remarks made in this House on October 16 last by the hon. Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) during his learned discourse on the notice of motion before this House. At page 3755 of Hansard for October 16, 1980, the minister, in referring to the distinguished president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, said:

—Mr. Tarnapolsky, is a strong supporter of the legislation with which we are dealing, including the entrenchment of the bill of rights.

I regret to say that this is a completely misleading statement on the part of the minister. I would ask he take this opportunity to make it quite clear that in fact the contrary is true and that Mr. Tarnapolsky opposes very strongly a number of important sections of this proposed charter of rights.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Before allowing the hon. minister to reply, because I feel that he should have the opportunity to do so, I do want to remind the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that this is purely debate. If the hon. member is not satisfied or does not agree with something that a minister or a member of this House has said in this House, it does not constitute a question of privilege.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that I am not ready to withdraw the remark. Quite to the contrary. I listened to Mr. Tarnapolsky on the program "Cross-Country Checkup". He indicated quite clearly that he supported the measures being introduced and debated in this House.

I might say that once the committee stage is reached I would suggest the committee call Mr. Tarnapolsky to appear to discuss the matter—he has agreed to go—and I am sure the hon. gentleman will see that my statement was well founded.

Madam Speaker: I cannot allow the hon. member for Burnaby to speak twice on this question of privilege, which I feel is not a question of privilege. It is a matter of disagreement as to the interpretation made of certain remarks outside the House, from what I can gather. Therefore, there is no prima facie case of privilege in this particular circumstance.

MR. BEATTY—ENERGY ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, last Friday afternoon I asked your permission to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege after I had had an opportunity to review the transcript of your ruling on the question of privilege raised by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

As you will recall, Madam Speaker, my colleague's question of privilege arose from the massive advertising campaign which was begun last summer at the taxpayers' expense to promote the Trudeau government's constitutional initiatives. The substance of the hon. member's concern was that the spending of millions of dollars by the government to promote policies that did not have the support of both sides of this House constituted an attack upon the privileges of members.

Your ruling last Friday was extremely helpful in that it gave the House an indication of what you felt would be necessary, before spending on an advertising campaign by the government, to constitute a question of privilege. While you clearly saw the threats posed in the government's dangerous new entry into advocacy advertising—which is the selling of a particular, disputable, point of view—through the use of quantities of tax dollars that are so large they cannot be matched by groups with opposing views, you said that this action, in itself, did not constitute prima facie grounds for a question of privilege.

Your ruling provides an extremely useful guidance for members about what sort of conditions would have to exist before such an advertising campaign could give rise to a question of privilege.

The relevant part of your ruling, Madam Speaker, which is recorded at page 3781 of Hansard for October 17, 1980, reads as follows:

> The spending of public money cannot be the issue, but when a person or a government attempts to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, or acts in contempt of the House, such action would constitute a prima facie case. However, the interference must be such that the member or the House is truly hindered or intimidated.

A second possible basis for a question of privilege was also mentioned in your ruling, namely, that such advertising represents, and I quote:

> —a publication of false, perverted, partial or injurious reports of the proceedings of the House of Commons or misrepresentations of members.

While it can easily be demonstrated that the government is using tax dollars for an advertising campaign that is replete with false information about energy in Canada, the advertisements do not represent these falsehoods as the position of Parliament or as the policy of individual members. A strict construction of the grounds necessary for a question of privilege to exist would not include the fact that the government is using millions of dollars to spread false information at the taxpayers' expense. This dangerous abuse of tax dollars would have to be opposed by methods other than by the raising of a question of privilege. As the House will be aware, Mr. Murray Coolican of the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee has laid complaints against the government, listing the numerous falsehoods contained in the advertisements, with the Advertising Standards Council and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

For this matter to be raised in the House of Commons, it would have to be dealt with in the context either of debate or of the question period. As your ruling quite properly makes clear, such misleading advertising would not constitute a question of privilege unless it could be shown that it misrepresented the opinions or activities of Parliament or its members.

This brings us to the other conditions you outlined, Madam Speaker, where a government advertising program would present sufficient grounds to justify a question of privilege. I would remind the House of your exact words as reported in Hansard at page 3781 as follows:

> —when a person or a government attempts to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, or acts in contempt of the House, such action would constitute a prima facie case.

It is my intention to demonstrate that the energy advertising campaign currently being run by the government was, in fact, designed to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money. I will show that the campaign was designed and initiated well in advance of the unveiling of the government's energy package which is to be revealed in the Minister of Finance's budget next week. The purpose of the campaign includes preventing members of this House from discharging their responsibility to have, in the words of Your Honour, productive debate on the government's energy policies. In this regard I remind the House of Your Honour's statement at page 3780 of Hansard.

> The original purpose of this privilege was, as the hon. member for St. John's East rightly pointed out, to guarantee the conditions necessary for productive debate.

• (1510)

When I wrote to Your Honour this morning to indicate my intention to raise this matter this afternoon, I sent Your Honour a copy of a document entitled "National Energy Policy, Communications". This memorandum outlines a possible federal advertising campaign on energy. Mr. Donald Hanright, who is the director of communications with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, has admitted publicly that he is the author of that document, so its authenticity is not in doubt.

I draw the attention of the House to page 3 of the paper which, under the title "Strategy", reads as follows:

The underlying strategy in this communications plan is to achieve three goals, in sequence:

1. Take control of the energy debate.
2. Retain that control through action and leadership.
3. Remove 'energy' from the list of high-ranking national concerns.

The purpose of this campaign was very clear. The government was to embark on a major advertising campaign to seize control of the energy debate—

Mr. Lalonde: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: You cannot have order in the middle of a question of privilege.

Mr. Lalonde: On a point of order, I suggest to the hon. member that he take note also of something which happened in this House and that Mr. Hanright, whom the hon. member has quoted, has also said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Hanright declared that this minister had rejected—

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do not see readily what hon. members are protesting about. It seems to me, and I stand to be corrected if I interpret the standing orders wrongly, that a point of order can be raised at any time when a member is addressing the House. That is exactly what the hon. minister asked for. I recognized him, which seems perfectly normal to me. Has the hon. minister concluded his point of order?

[English]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, my point is very brief indeed, and it is in relation to something the hon. member has just stated. He quoted a senior official of my department. I submit to him that he is being quite unfair to this particular senior official because the same senior official indicated, when he was interviewed on this subject, that his memorandum had been rejected by his minister. Therefore, it would be quite inappropriate for the hon. member—

Mr. Clark: Show us the new one, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: —to refer to this document on a very partial basis and not to quote or refer fully to the statement made by the senior official in question. I stated in this House myself that this document had been rejected by me.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, it is regrettable that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) felt it necessary to smuggle in a speech on the merits of the resolution under the guise of a point of order. It was clearly not a point of order.

It is very clear that the purpose of this campaign is that the government is to embark on a major advertising campaign to seize control of the energy debate and to, in the words of the document, "remove 'energy' from the list of high-ranking national concerns". It would be bad enough if such an action were targeted strictly at the government's opponents in the private sector. Spending vast amounts of public money to polish the government's image and to eliminate public concern over an issue which has reached crisis proportions for the whole industrialized world would in itself be extremely dangerous and disturbing. The document makes it clear, however, that the targets of the advertising campaign are not strictly in the private sector. They also include members of this House.

Federal 'control' will be suddenly, forcefully gained with announcement of the 'package'. This, however, will be a lumpy, almost indigestible mass of policy. Unless that initiative is retained by merchandising both the package and its individual elements, and existing programs in the fields of supply, allocation and conservation, that initiative will go by default to the inevitable detractors (including a largely hostile media, the producing provinces, the foreign-owned multinationals, and the Opposition).

What must be noted here is that Mr. Hanright is not talking about the government's opponents in the abstract. He is referring very directly and very specifically to the opposition in Parliament, as his decision to capitalize the word "opposition" makes very clear. How are the government's opponents, including the opposition in Parliament, to be out-manoeuvred under Mr. Hanright's proposals? One element, as Mr. Hanright pointed out, will be the announcement of an energy package which, according to the government, will come with the unveiling of the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) next Tuesday. The other element will be a massive advertising campaign to sell those initiatives.

Under the heading "Retaining Control", Mr. Hanright described the difficulty the government would have in obtaining sufficient favourable attention for its initiatives this fall. He continued:

In any event, these matters are relative. For potential opponents, the timing is even worse, provided we build on the initial communications advantage be continuously selling the federal position through the late summer, fall and winter. These detractors will be disadvantaged by surprise, encumbered by the necessity of applauding many of the policy initiatives, and possibly even nonplussed by our own noisy charivari.

It is clear that the targets of the campaign include members of the House of Commons. It is obvious that the period being referred to here is the present time leading up to and following the unveiling of the government's energy package. In these two regards the government's advertising campaign clearly meets some of the criteria Your Honour outlined for a question of privilege.

However, it is fair to ask what the government proposes to do with its control of the energy debate once it has seized it. Well, Mr. Hanright gives us the answer to that question under the heading "The Energy Issue Take-out".

> Despite some expected difficulty in the early going with regard to the impact of the energy package on the constitutional talks, it should be possible—given the general cast of the strategy thus far—to make substantial gains towards the removal of "energy" from the pantheon of major national issues.
> This is regarded as the essence of the strategy, recognizing that it may take several years to achieve such a goal.

"Simply stated", Mr. Hanright continues further on in the statement, "the objective should be to reduce the level of public concern about energy".

There are few issues which are more important to Canadians than the implementation of a sound energy policy. It would be hard to think of any area where Parliament's attention is more urgently required or which has taken more of Parliament's attention in recent years. That the government's actions in the field of energy are highly controversial is not disputed by Mr. Hanright. Indeed, it is that fact which causes him to propose this major advertising campaign, and we have an indication in a further government document that the measures to be disclosed next week will be still more divisive.

In the infamous August 30 report to cabinet marked "For minister's eyes only" which was prepared under the direction of officials in the Privy Council office and the Department of Justice, the authors warned on page 43 that, and I quote:

> The political climate in Canada is likely to be poisoned by a major energy conflict throughout the fall of this year and at least the early months of next year.

This is a clear warning that the government expects the controversy over its energy policies to worsen dramatically this fall once its policies are made public. In the words of the document, "The political climate in Canada is likely to be poisoned by a major energy conflict".

Far from being lessened by the disclosure of the government's energy package, the need for constructive parliamentary debate on the government's actions is going to be increased. The purpose of the government's advertising campaign, however, is to "remove 'energy' from the list of high-ranking national concerns". I will bring this again to the attention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before he interrupts: "To remove 'energy' from the list of high-ranking national concerns". This is according to the document on which the campaign was based.

I think I have presented sufficient evidence to meet the criteria set out by Your Honour when you ruled last Friday that, and I quote:

> When a person or a government attempts to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, or acts in contempt of the House, such action would constitute a prima facie case.

Let the government not claim that no question of privilege exists because the Hanright memorandum was simply the opinion of a single public servant, or because the advertising campaign currently under way is on a smaller scale than initially proposed by Mr. Hanright. The incontestable fact is that a campaign along the lines suggested by Mr. Hanright is currently under way and, according to a letter I received yesterday from the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), who is responsible for government propaganda, three contracts totalling $5,850,000 have been let, making this the largest advertising campaign of its kind in the history of Canada.

The minister says he disavows Mr. Hanright's memorandum and that it has no validity, but I would then call upon the minister, first of all, to table the strategy documents which outline the purpose of the current advertising campaign because those are not available to Parliament. They are not available to the public. They are not available to Your Honour in order to rule on this question of privilege.

If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) says that Mr. Hanright's document proposing that this attack on Parliament be made is invalid, then let the minister table the strategy documents which exist for the current campaign. However, even if it were the case, and I do not accept it, that Mr. Hanright's memorandum has no validity to the present advertising campaign, the mere fact that a public servant would propose a massive advertising campaign for the expenditure of, I believe, some $11 million which was originally proposed, the mere fact of its being proposed would constitute an attack on the privileges of members of Parliament in that what is being proposed in the document is that the role of Parliament be systematically undermined through the use of this device.

The minister may want to deny parentage of the document, but he cannot deny its validity and its relevance to the issue before the House today, and that is whether or not an attempt is being made, or was proposed to have been made, for the government to use the resources available to it and to it alone to undermine the role of members of Parliament, and to prevent members of Parliament from discharging their historic responsibilities.

Madam Speaker, your responsibility, as has been seen by you and by your predecessors, is to defend the rights and privileges of members of Parliament whenever they come under attack, including when that attack is planned and is executed by the government of the day. No majority in Parliament, no matter how large or how acquiescent it may be, can give the government the right or the ability to seek to impede even a single member of Parliament in discharging his responsibility to the people who sent him here, because the Speaker of the House of Commons remains in the chair to defend the House from such abuses.

In eight years as a member of Parliament, Madam Speaker, I have never seen a more clear instance where the government of the day has used the instruments available to it, and to it alone, in order to impede Parliament in its attempt to discharge its responsibility. You alone, Madam Speaker, have the ability to ensure that Parliament's rights and responsibilities remain undiminished, and I am confident that you will use that power on the basis of the evidence I have presented this afternoon.

If you find, Madam Speaker, that I have a prima facie question of privilege, I will move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the question of the government's energy advertising campaign and all relevant documents relating to the campaign be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for examination and report.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will leave to the Canadian public the decision to judge the frivolous points which have been raised by the opposition during the debate on the resolution of the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Day after day, unable to debate the substance of the important constitutional points which are before this House, divided as they are, the Conservative opposition have tried to raise phony questions of privilege and phony points of order. They have wasted a great many hours of this House in raising points which have all been rejected as ill founded.

I suggest that the particular point raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) is in exactly the same category. In effect, if he had listened to the debate and to the question periods in this House over the last few weeks, he would not have dared or bothered to rise in his seat and occupy 20 minutes of the time of the House with the point he has raised because, as I said on a point of order during his intervention—and I should like to repeat it now quite clearly—the senior official in question had recognized that he had prepared the memo to which the hon. member had referred. When interviewed about it some weeks ago, he indicated that indeed his minister had rejected the memo he had prepared. I stated, standing in my seat in this very House—

An hon. Member: You did exactly what he said.

Mr. Lalonde: —I stated quite categorically that I had rejected the proposal put forward by the senior official in question, and that I did not agree with the objective or with the way in which he was proposing to go about it.

I think I heard my hon. friend state that he did not believe me. I do not want to misquote him, but if he said that I would suggest that he knows the rules of the House and, if he does not believe a statement made by an hon. member in the House, there are rules in the House to deal with such cases. Otherwise, I suggest he should take my statement for what it is, as a statement of facts as they had developed.

Mr. Andre: Ironclad as it is.

Mr. Lalonde: The old argument of my hon. friend is based on a memo which had been rejected. I could go even further, but I will not go into the substance of this memo because, as I said, it is completely irrelevant to this issue.

As to the advertising which is going on currently and has gone on for several weeks, if my hon. friend had taken the trouble to study it—and I note that in his argument he has not referred to a single word used in any of those advertisements—I submit he would find that the advertising campaign, which has been in existence for several weeks or months now, is exactly in line with the advertising campaign which was carried out by his government when they were in office, and by the previous Liberal government. As a matter of fact, if my hon. friend would look at the amount of advertising done by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources last year he would find that it cost about $5 million, which is certainly not very different from the figure which he has mentioned in his intervention.

Therefore, not wanting to waste any more time of the House, let me point out that I think there are issues of great importance and significance before the House now and I would not want to prevent hon. members from participating in the debate on the constitutional issue. However, so far as the question of privilege raised by my hon. friend is concerned, I submit to the House, and to you, Madam Speaker, that it is completely without foundation, that it is completely irrelevant, and as such should be rejected.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Do both hon. members wish to intervene on the same question of privilege?

Tomorrow I shall rule on the question of privilege which was put forward by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) which pertains to the same area of argument which has been made by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). Although it is not on the same subject matter, I feel the two points are very close. After the 20 minute intervention on the part of the hon. member, I honestly feel that the Chair is sufficiently informed, having also heard from the minister, and I should like the House to return to the other business before it. Tomorrow after the question period I shall rule on these two questions of privilege.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, you indicated the other day in response to the member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that, should there be other points to be raised in debates on privilege such as this, you would hear them, and I do have points to be raised. The member who raised the matter today was kind enough to give me a copy of his written transcript where, for instance, he omitted one of the more forceful points of his submission to you today, which arguments, I submit with respect to the Chair, are quite different from those which have been raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and should be, in my submission to you, considered quite separately from the arguments presented by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition the other day—

An hon. Member: Have you no respect for the Chair? Madam Speaker said she had enough.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is trying to gag me and to stop me from raising points which he has not even heard. He has already spoken, so naturally no one else need speak.

An hon. Member: Typical arrogance.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I hate to intervene, but it seems to me that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is reflecting upon the decision you have just made to hear no further interventions on this subject. I should like to have a clarification from you, Madam Speaker, as to whether or not he or other members are indeed permitted to continue this shameful waste of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I was listening to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) because I thought he was making a point of order, but obviously he was pleading with me to hear him and saying he had further arguments to make in favour of this question of privilege.

What I did say was that the hon. member had spoken for 20 minutes. I believe it is the right of a member who feels he has a privilege to expose as completely as possible why he feels he has a question of privilege. I have allowed him 20 minutes in which to do that. I feel the two questions of privilege raised are close; the one raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, and another one today. They will be considered separately. I can give the hon. member for Yukon the assurance that they will be considered separately. What I said and feel is true is that, having listened to both of them, they are quite close and based on arguments which have been drawn from my rulings, but in some of the cases some of the things I said in my rulings were left out. Therefore I feel sufficiently informed and I will not hear any more speakers on this particular question of privilege.

● (1530)

Mr. Dick: You cannot pre-judge on that.

Mr. Nielsen: This matter affects my privileges too as a member of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I have submitted to you, Madam Speaker, the fact that I have additional points to make. How in the world can the Chair judge whether or not there are legitimate additional points until they are heard? Surely I am entitled to be heard on a question affecting so deeply the rights of members.

An hon. Member: Shame on you.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not accept interventions such as the lowly one that was raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren).

Mr. Collenette: Obey the rules of this House. You are arguing with the Chair.

Madam Speaker: I offer to hon. members that I will look at length at the arguments submitted today.

Mr. Nielsen: But I have not submitted mine.

Madam Speaker: If, after having looked at those arguments, I feel I should hear supplementary information, I will do that tomorrow before I rule.

Mr. Dick: No, no.

Madam Speaker: I will not hear any more today on this particular question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Chair asks the co-operation of members on a matter like this one, where I feel I have given members a lot of occasion to express themselves on different questions of privilege that are brought up. This one being so similar—and I think we have discussed this matter in the House quite at length—I ask the co-operation of members in this particular instance to allow me to look at the intervention of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). I feel now that I have been sufficiently informed, but I will offer to some members the opportunity to speak again tomorrow if, having looked at the arguments put forward, I feel I need to be more informed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, the second time you reiterated that you would hear members tomorrow before ruling, there was a qualifier attached to it. I know I have points to present to the Chair that have not been put in this argument. I know that.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Nielsen: You do not, because you have not heard them. If what the Chair is saying to me is that I will have the right to put those points to you tomorrow before your ruling is made, then I will be happy and sit down. But I do not want any qualifications attached to it, because I know I have points the Chair has not yet heard from either this side or that side.

Madam Speaker: I have put the qualifications, and I am afraid I must maintain them. I will hear the hon. member tomorrow if I feel—

An hon. Member: Before, not "if".

Madam Speaker: —that on its face this question might be a question of privilege. If I am absolutely sure by looking at the arguments put forward by the hon. member that there could in no way be a question of privilege involved, then I will not allow a new speaker, having looked at the arguments more carefully, reading them rather than just listening to them. Having done that today, I feel I am sufficiently informed to render a decision, but I have put that reservation and I hope the hon. member will accept it.

Mr. Nielsen: With great respect—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Nielsen: I know I have points—

An hon. Member: Sit down, you have not got the floor.

Mr. Collenette: Obey the rules of the House.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: I know I have points bearing on this question to raise which the Chair has not received.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the hon. member is appealing what I just said.

Mr. Nielsen: Not at all.

Madam Speaker: I heard the hon. member when he said that he thought he had further points. I said that I would want to see whether I need to have further points. Therefore I would ask the hon. member please not to ask for the floor again because I will not be able to give it to him on this particular question.

Mr. Nielsen: Then I rise on a question of personal privilege to give you notice today that, should the course of events take the direction that I am gagged on this question of privilege, I will raise a personal question of privilege followed by a substantive motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: That is the right of the hon. member and I take notice of it.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 795, 806, 821, 1,276 and 1,454.

Order Paper Questions

IJC—SCA PROPOSAL—DUMPING INTO THE NIAGARA RIVER

Question No. 795—Mr. de Jong:

1. Has the IJC participated in the hearings regarding the proposal by SCA Services of New York to dump 2,000,000 gallons of effluent daily into the Niagara river and, if not, for what reasons?

2. Will the government instruct Canada's representatives on the IJC to initiate an investigation into this threat to the environment and, if so, on what date will the investigation be made public?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The IJC has not participated directly in these hearings. Rather it has followed their progress closely, in keeping with its usual practices and procedures.

2. The government cannot instruct the Canadian members of the commission to initiate an investigation as the commission is a binational body whose members receive their instructions from both governments. Moreover, the IJC already is taking an interest in the SCA proposal in the context of its role in assisting both governments to implement the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. If the commission had any concerns it could be expected to raise these with the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CROWN PROPERTIES OUTSIDE CANADA

Question No. 806—Mr. Clarke:

1. Did the Department of External Affairs have market value appraisals taken of property owned by the Crown outside Canada for the Department and, if so (a) in which cities (b) what was the appraised value of the (i) land (ii) buildings?

2. What percentage of the property, in each case (a) is used for (i) residential accommodation (ii) office accommodation (b) is held for other purposes and what are such purposes?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Department of External Affairs had market value appraisals taken of the following properties owned by the Crown outside Canada:

(a) Jakarta —Two staff quarters duplex
Paris —Parly II Apartments (11 units), 4 rue Ventadour—office accommodation
Hong Kong —Viewpoint Apartments (5 units);

(b) The appraised values were as follows:

Jakarta —Appraised $124,378—land and buildings—no separate values obtained.
Purchased 1967 $54,000
Sold $132,000

Paris —Parly II Apartments (11 units).
Appraised $1,438,268—units only, no land.
Purchased $591,000 (1972)
Sold $1,339,745

—4 rue Ventadour
Appraised $373,200 (1980)—office only, no land
Combination land component and constructed value

Hong Kong —Viewpoint Apartments (5 units). Appraised $2,330,000—units only, no land.

The above properties were appraised for purpose of sale as surplus to use, except for the Hong Kong apartments which were appraised to establish their value in anticipation of a redevelopment proposal in partnership with other co-owners of the apartment building.

2. The above properties are identified for the following uses:

Jakarta —residential (2 staff quarters duplex).

Paris —(a) Parly II Apartments (11 units)—residential; staff accommodation

(b) 4 rue Ventadour—office accommodation

Hong Kong —Viewpoint Apartments (5 units) — residential; staff accommodation. (b) None.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—STUDIES ON MARIJUANA

Question No. 821—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1975, what amount was spent on studies related to marijuana by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The amount spent on studies related to marijuana since April 1, 1975 is as follows:

1979-80	6,000

CR DEMONSTRATION ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 1,276—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were employees of the Departments of National Revenue, National Health and Welfare and Industry, Trade and Commerce granted an additional hour at lunch time to participate in the CR demonstration on Parliament Hill on Monday, May 28, 1980, at 12.00 noon and were employees of the Department of Supply and Services refused additional time and, if so, for what reason were different policies adopted?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am advised by the Ministers of National Revenue, National Health and Welfare, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Supply and Services that employees of their departments were not granted additional lunch time on Monday, May 28, 1980.

POST OFFICE—EXCESS OVERAGE

Question No. 1,454—Mr. Riis:

Is there a tabulated account of the accumulated money that occurs from the excess overage of individual postal wicket clerks in the Post Office Department and, if so, to what purpose is such money put to use?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes. Overages of $20 or less are credited to the postal wicket clerk's surplus cash fund to a maximum balance of $75. The surplus cash fund is used to cover shortages up to $20 that may occur in the clerk's credit.

Overages of more than $20 as well as amounts of $20 or less when the clerk's surplus cash fund has attained its $75 maximum balance are credited to postal revenue if the reason for the overage cannot be established in a current or subsequent monthly accounting period. If the reason for the overage is found, the overage would be returned to the clerk.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed from Monday, October 20, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I have listened intently and with a very open mind and heart to the speeches made by hon. members on both sides of the House in reference to the resolution pertaining to the constitution, and I believe there is no question that most hon. members attempted to speak with sincerity. We are all aware that constitutional proposals of historic importance are involved.

I must say that on a number of occasions I have been somewhat disturbed by the personal attacks launched by some members of this chamber. We find ourselves engaged in a debate over the constitution of our country, a debate which, in the final analysis, overflows from these chambers and touches the hearts and souls of each and every Canadian. It is my contention that there is no place for personal attacks and attempts to make political hay in this historic debate.

Hon. members of the House must understand that, above all else, we must be cognizant of the fact that our performance in this House determines to a very large degree the level of respectability afforded this House of Commons. I personally have no intention of launching a personal attack on any member of the House concerning remarks already made in the debate, although there are some points of view upon which I would like to comment. Instead, I would like to speak on this resolution with simplicity and sincerity. As members of this Thirty-second Parliament we have the opportunity now to accomplish what other Parliaments had been unable to accomplish for the last 53 years. Parliament has the opportunity of bringing our constitution home, and after 113 years we will finally have a constitution which is completely our own.

When we were in the embryonic stages as a nation the Fathers of Confederation could have freely decided to sever the ties with Britain, but instead they unanimously chose to bring the resolutions into effect by an act of the British parliament. Now we have grown from that embryonic stage, we are a mature adult nation, and what may have been appropriate in 1867 is no longer appropriate in 1980.

The constitution of 1867 no longer meets the needs and aspirations of Canadians because many of our needs and aspirations have changed. It therefore must be rethought, remodelled, and rewritten to reflect these changes. And it must be done in Canada by Canadians. The constitution of 1867 contains a number of good points that can be modernized and complemented with new elements and incorporated into a truly Canadian document tailored to meet the needs of all Canadians. It is now the time to patriate the constitution, provide for an amending formula, and to entrench a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms and the principle of equalization in that constitution.

I would like to speak very briefly on the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms. At one time it was believed that these rights and freedoms could be adequately protected simply by the ordinary process of parliamentary democracy. But it has been increasingly recognized that more protection is required. The international community has expressed this need through such instruments as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in 1966. The Canadian government, after consultation with the provinces, joined many other nations in subscribing to these international commitments, which were commitments to foster and protect the basic rights of people.

In Canada there has also been a growing recognition that legislatures should provide more positive protection for basic human rights. In 1960 Parliament adopted the Canadian Bill of Rights. Saskatchewan, Alberta and Quebec have provincial bills of rights. In addition there are federal and provincial laws which prohibit discriminatory practices in a broad range of social and economic activities. While these various statutes afford some measure of protection, it is by its very nature limited and sometimes inconsistent. For instance, the legislature which passed a law yesterday could decide to repeal or restrict it tomorrow. An individual's only immediate redress would be to try to convince the same government which had restricted the rights to reinstate them. In a country as large and diverse as Canada, with its two official languages and many cultural and ethnic groups, basic rights and freedoms require more protection than this.

Rights, by their very nature, pertain to individuals and minorities and their protection should not be left simply to the good will of the majority or of the government of the day. Those rights must be guaranteed in the constitution so as to protect them from change by any single government, parliament or legislature. I believe entrenchment in the constitution is the only way of ensuring Canadians their basic rights and freedoms for all time.

I would like to single out just one of the basic rights and freedoms which concerns me greatly as a Canadian and a member of this Parliament. I refer to the right of mobility, the right to work and live in my part of this great country. We have heard overtures from at least one provincial premier in the last short while to enact provincial legislation which would prohibit Canadians from working in his province. I submit this is the kind of legislation which is extremely dangerous to every Canadian. I bring this point up because I may be the only member of the House of Commons who has had an opportunity to work in every province in this great country.

I know what it is like to hitchhike from coast to coast. I know what it is like to pawn my watch in Edmonton in order to buy breakfast. I know what it is like to sleep in a culvert in northern New Brunswick in November. I know what it is like to drive railway spikes for the northern Alberta railway. So I have some general idea of Canada. And I know what it is like, as a Prince Edward Islander, to work in Toronto and shuffle my way onto tramcars at 7.30 in the morning to make my way to an assembly line. But, if I had my life to live over again, I would want to do the same thing because that was how I came to know Canada, and that is why I love Canada and the people of all ethnic backgrounds who make up this great country. That is why we should not allow provincial barriers in any part of this country.

When I travel back to my constituency at the weekends and return to Ottawa on Monday, hardly a week goes by without my meeting on the plane five or six young Prince Edward Islanders who are on their way to Calgary or Toronto seeking jobs, a plane ticket in their pocket and a few dollars. That is quite an experience. I can relate to it because I went through that myself 26 years ago. The only thing different was that I did not have the money for the plane ticket—I used my thumb to get me across this great country. I do not believe we in this Parliament can deny young people from all corners of this great country that privilege and that opportunity if they so desire.

I believe the third main objective of this resolution is to entrench the principle of equalization into the constitution. It is an absolute necessity for the very survival of my province, the province of Prince Edward Island. I was looking over the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) and he quite correctly pointed out what the federal government means to Prince Edward Island. He pointed out that of the $505 million expenditures in 1978 $426 million was in the form of transfer payments or other payments from Ottawa. That is why it is very essential to my province that equalization be written into the new constitution.

When the Fathers of Confederation convened in Charlottetown in 1864, Prince Edward Island was in a very favourable economic position—a "have" area, if you will. I am quite sad to say that since confederation the fair isle of Prince Edward Island has eroded, not only has the sea eroded our beaches but there has also been economic erosion over the last 113 years. Without guaranteed equalization payments, a sharing of the almost limitless wealth of this great country, Prince Edward Island, along with other provinces, would find itself in very difficult circumstances.

A feeling of concern and willingness to share is nothing new to Canadians. The desire to share and help others less well blessed than ourselves has always been an ingredient to be admired in the over-all character of Canadians. But there are many millions of people in underdeveloped countries around the world who would readily admit that their lot is a better one because of Canada's willingness to share. It is that willingness to share in this country which draws us closer together as Canadians.

I believe it is absolutely essential to settle the question of the amending formula. The provinces and the federal government will be involved in studying all constitutional revisions or changes which will affect all Canadians. But the prospect of gaining unanimity on an amending formula is very dim. This being the case, and I believe that hon. members would agree, in order for my province of Prince Edward Island to be afforded meaningful input, I will be suggesting an amendment to section 42 to the committee. I hope that the Premier of Prince Edward Island will join forces with me in submitting that amendment and, indeed, that the two hon. members for the ridings of Malpeque (Mr. Gass) and Hillsborough in P.E.I. will join with us.

I believe that it is necessary to have an amendment because the population of the Atlantic provinces as of July, 1980, if my figures are correct, was 2,265,600 people. Prince Edward Island comprises only 124,000 of this total, or 5.4 per cent of the population of the Atlantic region. Therefore it would be impossible for Prince Edward Island in concert with any other singular province of the Atlantic region to be representative of 50 per cent of the population of that region.

My suggested amendment would be that at least two of the Atlantic provinces be in agreement with no reference made to specific percentages of the population of the Atlantic region. The hon. member for Hillsborough brought up this point yesterday, but I was surprised that he did not suggest an alternative, and I am very surprised that the Premier of Prince Edward Island, Mr. MacLean, whom I admire and who sat in these chambers for many years, did not approach the situation in a little different light.

The hon. member for Hillsborough mentioned that this government was taking the matter on in a partisan fashion. I do not believe that. He also went on to say that he believed that this government could learn a lesson from history, in particular from the Fathers of Confederation who, over a century ago, set aside their often bitter partisanship for a greater cause which was the union of the British North American colonies. He went on to say that at the Charlottetown conference the P.E.I, delegation was comprised of three government members and two opposition members. I would suggest to the premier of the province that rather than take the matter to the courts, perhaps he could learn that same lesson from history. Perhaps, instead of going back to his ten colleagues and making the decision that they would go to the courts, the premier could do something which is more representative of the people.

If the premier were interested in what the hon. member for Hillsborough suggested should be our interest, then he should have used another alternative. The premier could have called the House of Assembly in Prince Edward Island into session to obtain the views of the opposition. Or, indeed, in a province as small as Prince Edward Island, he could have called an election—and I think that it would have been welcomed—to let the people decide. But he has not done that. The premier has not even called a byelection in my old riding of Second Prince. Perhaps this would have given him an indication as to how the people of Prince Edward Island feel about this amendment to the constitution.

These are a number of points which I wanted to bring up because I believe that there are all kinds of room to make specific points in this debate. I do not believe that this government or, indeed, this Parliament, is out to shaft any one area or province of this country. I believe that every one of us sitting here today loves our country too much to do such a thing.

Although Prince Edward Island is small geographically and is limited in population, it is the very cradle of confederation and it must be afforded equal opportunity in determining its destiny and, indeed, the destiny of its nation. I believe that the over-all majority of Canadians are desirous of constitutional renewal. Without an amending formula this desired constitutional renewal will be impossible. As I say, I have listened to the speeches of most of the hon. members, and they all seem to bring out one point, that we need to bring our constitution home, we agree with patriation, and that we should not have to go to a foreign country, even though it is the mother country, to have our constitution amended.

However, I fail to see what good it would do to bring the constitution back to Canada if we did not have an amending formula. That formula, in my opinion, would have to be dealt with in the British Parliament. If we brought the constitution back without such a formula it would be totally useless because we would be left in a strait-jacket. If we were unable to reach agreement in the last 53 years, I see little prospect in the next 53 years.

When I consider some of the items which I have brought up, particularly with regard to mobility and the things which are taking place in this country through the actions of the provinces, I believe it is imperative that we get on with the job and bring the constitution home. If this great country of ours called Canada is to prosper from sea to sea, I humbly submit that the Thirty-second Parliament should act with all dispatch to accomplish what all members of Parliament before us have been unable to accomplish. I say, bring the constitution home.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, would the parliamentary secretary, in view of the statements that he just made, accept a question at this time?

Mr. Henderson: Yes.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the parliamentary secretary is the sole government member of Parliament from Prince Edward Island, and in view of the fact that he mentioned that he was planning to propose an amendment to the amending formula as it would affect his province, has he discussed that amending formula either with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or both, and has he received from them approval for that amendment?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed such an amendment with the Prime Minister. What I said is that I would be presenting an amendment to the parliamentary committee. I asked, and I challenge once again, the Premier of Prince Edward Island and the two hon. members from the island, in the House to join with me so that our province will have that meaningful role within confederation.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary. How does the parliamentary secretary plan to proceed with that action if, as parliamentary secretary having taken an oath he speaks at the present time in terms of government policy, and he has not received that approval earlier?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that I am a member of cabinet.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Hope springs eternal.

Mr. Henderson: Perhaps the hon. member across the floor knows something which I do not know. I must say, though, that it is within my privilege as a member of Parliament representing at least one quarter of the people of Prince Edward Island—

Mr. McGrath: Not as a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Henderson: —to make such an amendment.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is always a little lonely for me to stand up in this place, although I am with colleagues whom I believe to be most sensitive to native issues in this House.

• (1600)

I am also not a little disappointed on entering this debate on the constitution because in the resolution that proposes four classifications of province I find that, as a territorial resident, I am left completely out of the picture, both in the pre-patriation and post-patriation stages.

I am also reminded somewhat of the Beothuks of Newfoundland—I do not mean this as a reflection on present day Newfoundland—who died off in a rather disdained manner. I think this resolution might be the trigger that shoots off a more contemptuous bullet.

Let me state this premise before I make further comments about what we believe—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, because I have already participated in the debate and hence I have no alternative but to interrupt the hon. member. He is historically inaccurate and I am sure he does not mean to deliberately cast a slur on the province of Newfoundland—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is failing to outline privilege in the sense that I have accepted it. I think the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) should be permitted to continue his speech and then the hon. member for St. John's East may respond.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East, but I caution him that questions of privilege should be legitimate.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, you did not even hear me. Consequently I will not delay the hon. member any longer but will reserve the right to get up at the end of his speech.

Mr. Ittinuar: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is the usual case, I believe. I stated an historical fact and said that I did not mean it as a reflection on the province of Newfoundland nor on its residents. I have the utmost respect for the current issues on which they fight because some of those are analogous to ours in the north. Maybe the hon. member for St. John's East will accept my apology.

Mr. Benjamin: You do not owe him any.

Mr. Ittinuar: As I said, I draw that as an analogy to this resolution because I believe it may be the trigger that fires the final bullet for us as a people. I believe that.

Let me state this premise before I start—that the resolution on the constitution now before the House ignores native people and their rightful place in Canadian society.

Mr. Nielsen: It ignores the north.

Mr. Ittinuar: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) interjects saying the north as well, and I shall come to that in a few moments. It perpetuates the view that they are inconsequential in a larger national context. I am as proud as anyone else in this House and I appreciate as fully the fact that I am Canadian but I must attempt to impress upon members that native people are not romantic relics from the past, to be forgotten and ignored in the process of creating a new Canada. We have been involved in the building of Canada from its infancy and long before that.

A few moments ago the hon. member for the Yukon said the resolution ignores the north. In the near future the north will be contributing to the economy of Canada through its resource development and yet, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said to me last year, the Northwest Territories has no standing whatsoever in making the Constitution of Canada. I am sure the hon. member for Yukon would echo those sentiments.

Mr. Nielsen: Echoed.

Mr. Ittinuar: As far as we are concerned, Inuit are not a conquered people nor have they ever been. In most cases native people accepted immigrants from Europe and assisted them in exploring this country and adjusting to its harsh and unknown environment. That may not be the case so much in the south as it is in the north. I could tell stories about explorers and their sentiments about discovering the north. They were inclined to say, "This Eskimo guided me and I discovered this island." So much for that.

In the early years of the European presence in Canada, aboriginal rights were recognized as valid, even though they were not always respected. In the royal proclamation of 1763 the King of England forbade settlement on Indian lands and declared that Indian lands could only be obtained by the Crown through treaties. Native people formed alliances and entered into treaties with Europeans, and even fought beside them in defending Canada in the revolutionary war and the war of 1812. I dare say that native people were also involved in World War II. Unfortunately, by the time of the drafting of the British North America Act, native people were already being taken for granted by those in power. Again, I do not mean any reflection on the Fathers of Confederation. Section 91(24) of the act proves that they were taken for granted, however.

In section 91(24) of the British North America Act native people, or, as we are called, aboriginals, were reduced to the status of an administrative problem. We are still regarded in this way to some extent today. Thus, the federal government was granted jurisdiction over Indians and lands reserved for Indians. The BNA Act did not impose any constitutional obligation upon the federal government to pass any legislation at all concerning native people. Nevertheless, the government passed the Indian Act which does not confer any legal rights or special status upon the native people. It is simply a statute for the administration of Indian affairs. That is the case today.

I want to emphasize this point since I believe it is often misunderstood, even by those who are well-intentioned toward the administration of Indian affairs. The Indian Act provides no constitutional guarantee of aboriginal rights and there is nothing in the BNA Act which recognizes, let alone protects, aboriginal rights. The BNA Act gives Parliament paramountcy, and an act of Parliament could extinguish aboriginal rights at any time. At the moment I do not believe that Parliament has paramountcy over this resolution because it is being railroaded through this House by the party opposite. That is unfortunate. Hon. members opposite would have a far bigger and greater victory if they would listen to people on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ittinuar: I believe the Indian Act is a somewhat paternalistic statute in that it gives the federal government trusteeship over Indians and Indian lands. No special legislation has been enacted, and therefore no special legislation exists. It is interesting that some two or three decades ago the federal government moved Inuit—or Eskimos as some people refer to us—from the province of Quebec and parts of the territories to places like Grise Fiord and Resolute Bay in order to declare its sovereignty over those Arctic islands. We declared sovereignty for Canada, but there has never been a mutual respect of that sovereignty as we are not allowed to participate in any consultation on constitutional amendments.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Ittinuar: That is something that the government should amend. No matter how well intentioned, the government trusteeship has failed dismally and has led to a continuation of poverty, disease, and unemployment in many native communities.

I would challenge anyone in this House to go to places where I know there is disease, where I know there is unemployment, where I know there is poverty, where I know there are inequalities that are not present in any other part of Canada. I would challenge any member to come to those places with me, and I hope some members will take up that challenge. There are reserves in the ridings of some hon. members in which there are unequal opportunities for native people. I hope that these hon. members will take the time to state such cases, as I have done.

No one is happy with the present situation of the native population in Canada. The native people in particular want to see changes, and believe that recognition of their aboriginal rights would begin a new era of optimism and building for a secure future within confederation.

Why do I emphasize aboriginal rights, Mr. Speaker? One of the most crucial factors in preserving cultures, as everyone in this country is well aware, is language. I wish with all my heart and soul that I could make this speech in my own language. Since we are not allowed to do so, I will continue in the only other language that I know.

While everyone else is talking about preserving minority language rights, I want to remind members that in my constituency of Nunatsiaq the language rights of the majority are not protected. In the proposed resolution there is no protection of Inuit rights to speak Inuktitut and no guarantee of their right to educate their children in their native tongue. This is further complicated by the fact there is not enough control over broadcasting in northern communities. The native language rights in the area of health, social services, and criminal justice are also missing from the pages of the proposed document, education being particularly important since it is the crucial element in the preservation of native culture.

Preservation of native lifestyles depend upon their source of livelihood and a sane development policy regarding renewable resources. Unlimited mobility rights would seriously threaten a process of careful and controlled development. Furthermore, native people must be fully involved in the resource development process on their lands, including access to revenue sharing as a means of establishing a stable economic base. In this case the territories are passed by.

Every party in this House has, at one time or another, called for the recognition of aboriginal rights. As recently as last July the Liberal party passed a resolution to:

Work toward the entrenching of original and native people's rights by:

(a) enacting legislation with the consent of the original and native peoples, that clearly provides for Canada's obligations by virtue of aboriginal and treaty rights,

(b) implementing a modern settlement policy that provides for orderly developments by enhancing, not extinguishing aboriginal, treaty and native people's rights and,

(c) include the original and native people's representatives at all levels of constitutional reform.

These people have not carried out any of the commitments of their party. These are all laudable sentiments. I am sure we in the House would express them at one time or another with varying degrees of truth. We on this side certainly express them with truth. We have not seen anything from the other side yet to confirm that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ittinuar: If there is anything to be achieved, now is the time for members to act on their principles and good will.

On Friday before last the Prime Minister said that he would be willing to put the question of native rights on the agenda for discussions toward further constitutional change, after patriation. Last June the Prime Minister agreed to bring up the matter of representation of native people and territorial governments in constitutional talks with the provincial premiers.

In July the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) told an all-chiefs' conference of the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood that native people across Canada may be invited to appear before the continuing committee of ministers to give their views on patriation and the constitution. Statements of good intent have so far lasted as long as one of our summers in the far north. We are looking for constitutional guarantees which are perennial as the permafrost in Grise Fiord, which I believe will last longer than this country.

The aim of the charter of rights and freedoms is to give individuals and minorities recourse to the courts if these rights and freedoms are violated. This I do not argue with. However, the proposed constitutional resolution omits any reference to the collective rights of aboriginal peoples. Canada's native peoples have a unique and historic relationship with the federal government, based on their aboriginal rights as the original inhabitants of Canada. Section 24 of the constitutional resolution provides that existing rights and freedoms of native people will not be affected by the rights and freedoms in the charter. I wonder what kind of guarantee this is when native people have been exerting considerable time and effort on the task of changing and improving the status quo. Are we now to be content with the same unsatisfactory status quo?

Section 24 protects native rights. There are no rights at present for native people. I wish to read the section and then re-read it in a manner which, had it been written that way, might have meant something to the native people. I quote section 24 of the resolution:

The guarantee in this charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada, including any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada.

What does that mean? I dare anyone on that side to interpret that for me so that it gives me a feeling of security. Had it been written in a manner such as this, it would have some meaning.

The guarantee in this charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada, including the aboriginal rights and freedoms that pertain to the native people of Canada and which ensure their distinct cultural, economic and linguistic identities.

That would have had some meaning for us.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that an explicit charter of individual rights and freedoms may be used in the courts to argue against the collective rights of native people. A constitution which does not include a clear reference to the aboriginal rights of native people may, in fact, lead to an erosion of existing rights and freedoms.

I do not suggest that the government is conspiring to erode the few existing rights which we have. Northerners sometimes fear that the government is plotting to assimilate us into the existing southern model. Again, I do not believe that there is a plot. It should be noted, however, that such things sometimes occur as the indirect result of actions which may have been well intended. For example, the Baker Lake court case established that aboriginal rights can be extinguished by Parliament, even as a side effect of another law. However, in the Baker Lake court case, the judge was a previous Liberal cabinet minister of industry, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had a Liberal cabinet minister at that time. The outcome was pretty predictable.

Native people and northerners do not constitute a majority of Canada's population. We all understand that. That is the basis for the argument which the Prime Minister often gives the native people. They argue that we are a mere municipality. The territories have not been included in any constitutional debate of any meaning because their population constitutes hardly more than a municipality in the southern section of Canada.

Those are not all the factors that are involved. We are under-represented in positions of power and influence and, consequently, decisions are sometimes made that affect us, but of which the consequences were not fully considered. I do not expect other members of this House to think like native people or northerners, sometimes not even my hon. friend from Yukon. I do ask them, however, to listen to what native leaders across Canada, and the elected representatives of territorial governments, are saying. The homecoming of the Canadian Constitution will be an historic event. It could turn out to be an historic disaster for native Canadians and northerners. The omission of any reference to aboriginal and treaty rights of native Canadians may not be a sinister attempt to wipe out special status and assimilate us into an American melting pot version of Canadian society. However, the results may lead to the same thing.

I urge all members of this House to insist that patriation not take place until adequate provisions have been made for native participation in the constitutional revision process. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am more than a little despondent about this wish.

This spring the Inuit Committee on National Issues, the National Indian Brotherhood and Native Council of Canada were given funds to conduct research into constitutional issues and present the results of this research to the government. The government is now proposing to patriate a constitution which does not provide mechanisms for receiving native input and which does not even attempt to cover many well-known positions which these organizations have articulated.

Furthermore, the amending formula leaves us little hope that changes beneficial to native people will have any chance of being included after patriation. Perhaps the money which these organizations received was intended to buy time for a government which has no intention of seriously addressing the legitimate concerns of native people with regard to the constitution. No timetable has been set to discuss native participation, and no formal procedure is in place for receiving submissions from the Inuit Committee on National Issues and the other native organizations.

I think this government should make its intentions clear with regard to native participation in constitutional renewal and that these intentions should be communicated to the Inuit Committee on National Issues, the Native Council of Canada and the National Indian Brotherhood, at the earliest possible date because we are rapidly running out of time.

The constitutional resolution as it is written falls short of recognizing the aboriginal rights of native people and offering guarantees which would preserve and enhance native cultures, of which I have spoken. The urgency of having these rights guaranteed in the constitution is enhanced by the fact that the amending formula offers us little hope of having changes made after patriation. Until part V of the resolution comes into force, the unanimous consent of the provinces is required before an amendment can be made. No one here today would argue that unanimous consent is an easily attainable goal. Part V comes into force when the consent of a majority of provinces is required. This is at least two years down the road and it still does not provide native people with any real assurances.

Instead of negotiating directly with the federal government, efforts will be dispersed to include lobbying for provincial support as well. The prospects of successfully amending the constitution to include a direct reference to aboriginal rights, as well as other guarantees which native people feel are essential, are greatly diminished after patriation takes place.

A couple of weeks ago the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada had their annual general assembly, during which they formed a resolution concerning the constitution of Canada. This resolution predictably had to do with making a submission and representation to the Government of Canada about what the Inuit of northern Canada believe should be included in the constitution. I have not yet seen any mechanisms for receiving those submissions or representations, and there is not likely to be. As I said, I am fairly despondent about the constitutional debate as far as the native perspective and as far as the Inuit of northern Canada are concerned. Although we have a word in our language for the constitution "piquyaryuak", I do not believe there is any chance that the Inuit of Canada will ever be given the opportunity to make amendments to benefit them in the context of the nation Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to suggest to the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) that he provide Hansard with the Salabik spelling of the Inuit word for the constitution so that it will appear on our records for the first time.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with three aspects of the resolution now under consideration. First, I note the great number of views expressed by experts, members of Parliament, other people and the public at large on the elements of the constitutional reform generally and more especially on this resolution. I conclude that I and others have to take a relativistic attitude devoid of doctrinairism and absolutism.

In addition, since it is unfortunately impossible to conclude an early constitutional agreement at the federal and provincial levels, it is unavoidable, in my view, that Parliament has to take limited action at the request of government. Moreover, such a unilateral measure is adequately warranted from a philosophical, legal, conventional and political point of view. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the contents of this resolution do not disturb the present balance of powers between the two levels of government in Canada and consequently it is acceptable and can be approved.

I will conclude my remarks by wishing, of course, that the present resolution be adopted after having been polished in committee in the sense Boileau gave to this word and that the effort of constitutional reform be maintained beginning by the search for an amending formula agreed to by the two levels of governments, which is precisely what this resolution calls for.

Mr. Speaker, last weekend I read most of the speeches made in this House since October 6 by my hon. colleagues. All of them were made by learned, passionate and obviously sincere persons. Yet what a wide range of opinions! For some Progressive Conservative members, if adopted this resolution would signal the end of Canadian federalism and that of Canada itself. On the other hand, the same text meets the expectations of many other members and their electors, so they think. Some among the first group, namely, those who oppose the resolution, still approve part of its content thereby often contradicting the arguments they use to reject the other part, the acceptable elements being different from one member to the other. Some would like to add to it, others would rather delete from it according to their own preferences and the degree of public consensus they believe exists. Certainly there is a lesson in that for us to learn. As it should, politics plays a major role in this debate, and I will come back to that later.

Mr. Speaker, I have witnessed in the past the phenomenon of diversified opinions. It was in 1978 and 1979 when, as a member of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, I had the opportunity to hear personally the views of hundreds of Canadians from all walks of life and from all regions of Canada as well as of dozens of experts, all very knowledgeable, including several federal and provincial politicians of yesterday, of today as well as of tomorrow. Most of their contributions have been gathered in the third report of the task force entitled "A Time to Speak," a document which anybody seeking the absolute in politics should read, but which those who do not wish to change orientation should keep away from.

It was then to be expected, Mr. Speaker, that it might be impossible to accommodate all these various and indeed contradictory positions, and that some day or other, if we were to get out of the strait-jacket, the constitutional garment would have to be pulled somewhat at the seams! After the fascinating if overwhelming experience of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, I went to see other federations at work, the Federal Republic of Germany, Switzerland and Yugoslavia. I even had an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to discuss in Sarajevo the dangers of balkanization! Once more, I was looking at the diversity of federal concepts and their practical implementations. May I add that during ten years of my life, as a student and later a professor, I met the finest brains of federal political thought, and during ten years also as a member of Parliament and minister of the Crown, I strived to translate into actions the spirit of federalism, in practical situations such as that referred to by the hon. member for Sarnia, (Mr. Cullen), namely, regional sharing in the development of the petrochemical industry. What did I learn from all that? First, that there is no doubt a spirit of federalism made up of balance and tolerance, but that the means to express that spirit may vary quite significantly from one country to the other, one period to the other, one government to the other, one member of Parliament to the other and one citizen to the other, without anyone's good will being in doubt.

In other words, I learned there is no single and perfect model of the federal state, one that could be imitated by all. All there is is more or less successful variations on famous themes, namely, the two orders of government, the formal distribution of powers, one adjudicator or a number of them if the referendum is to be accepted, institutions promoting interaction, and so on. The principle is understood by all, but there is no single formula to success. As it was in the beginning, as it is now and as it shall not be for centuries and centuries, such is the phrase that could be applied to our Canadian federalism.

[English]

I have learned also that if each one of us individual Canadians, members of Parliament and of legislatures, and heads and members of executives, stand unbending on all our first and favourite choices, nothing will happen. The constitution will not adapt to change, and we might very well die as a country, each of us with his or her constitutional boots on. As Mae West used to say, "Something's got to give".

So, we must compromise, obviously. This has often been said. Such an attitude was probably the best accomplishment of the Task Force on Canadian Unity when eight of us, commissioners, so different in so many ways, agreed on a single set of recommendations. We agreed on something worth while which was generally acceptable, or not unacceptable, to each one of us individually. We never had the pretension of writing a political bible. We hoped only that others would follow the example we tried to set.

Compromise, said the late Hon. Guy Favreau, is "the meeting point between the thoughts of two intelligent beings." As John Kennedy wrote in "Profiles in Courage":

Compromise is not mean cowardice. Indeed it is frequently the compromisers and conciliators who are faced with the severest tests of political courage as they oppose the extremist views.

The content of the resolution before us is a compromise between those who wanted more and those who wanted less and those who wanted both more and less. It may not fully satisfy every one of us—or any one of us for that matter—but it should be accepted, in my view, by the greatest number of people as a first step.

I have learned throughout the years that to compromise with others, one must first compromise with himself. I cannot ask others to give if I remain ungiving in my own first choices of means toward an end which I share with others. So, I am compromising, as I should.

Is the kind of unilateral action stemming from this resolution justified? Like everybody here—I am sure—from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) who was recently elected to the House, I would have wished that government heads would have come to an agreement on four, six, twelve, twenty reform issues before patriation. Unfortunately that satisfaction has been denied to us.

History will doubtless seek to determine who was responsible for the failure of those negotiations, of those which have been going on for so long since 1969, of those which lasted throughout the summer of 1980. Due to the complexity of events, history will fail. I suggest history will consider the list of proposals that the premiers made on that September Friday and will maybe rule that they had worked out marvellous compromises among themselves by adding their first respective choice and disregarding the position of the central government. This is a well-known fact. Be that as it may, two facts remain, the first being that we failed to agree. I deplore the fact we did not, I am sorry we did not, it grieves me that we did not, I could cry about it!

We did not agree, Mr. Speaker, that is one fact. The other is that we do not seem, to my mind, to be about to agree either. So things being what they are, can and must Parliament sanction the present resolution? I ask myself a first question: does that resolution reflect the spirit of Canadian federalism? At first glance, surely for some it does not because it imposes its will upon the constituting governments. But, Mr. Speaker, and I must insist on that point, there is not only one conception of federalism in Canada. Professor Mallory, for instance, after having observed that federalism in Canada—

—is different things to different people—

—writes that Canada has known five forms of federalism since 1867: the quasi-federalism of its early days, the more classical federalism which followed, the federalism of emergency of the war, the co-operative federalism which followed the war, and the mixed federalism of dualism, which he calls the double image federalism of today. And he adds: those forms overlap. Professor Edwin Black, in "Divided Loyalties," speaks of the five concepts of federalism in Canada: the centralist federalism, the administrative federalism, the co-ordinated federalism, the contract theory federalism, and the dualist federalism. He concludes:

[English]

A combination of the concepts is required to characterize Canadian confederation at this time. The federation is chiefly co-ordinate in its political essentials, largely collaborative at the senior levels of the public bureaucracies, and tending to adopt linguistic cultural aspects of the dualist concept. Traces of the compact theory were represented in the constitutional amendment movement, but little evidence was to be found of the centralist concept in any influential circles.

There, to my mind, is an important idea. Before passing judgment on events and men, as in the case, for instance, of the resolution before the House, one must perforce realize that the concept each one of us has of federalism need not necessarily be that of all the others. And, as a consequence, I feel one must try to reconcile his own interpretation with that of the others.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it can still more simply be classified into two schools of thoughts, namely federalism of juridical equality between the two levels of government, to which the Task Force on Canadian Unity generally adhered, and a federalism of juridical seniority of the central government, which this resolution moderately reflects to a certain extent since it claims to be founded on present, previous, former and past agreements with the provinces. This second school of thought, which I call federalism of juridical seniority, emphasizes, because of its wider, more ultimate and final responsibilities, that the federal government has obligations to Canada as a whole which it alone can meet, in the interest of the common good, especially in cases where there exist apparent deadlocks such as the one we are faced with now on the constitutional issue. That is a highly defensible position which I can appreciate for what it is worth, that is to say, a lot. By the way, people would be wrong to think that the rule of unanimity is an essential corollary of federalism of juridical equality. As a matter of fact, several supporters will accept that it may be limited by the will of the majority or for the sake of political expediency.

In any event, I for one refuse to become the prisoner of either one of these two schools, though psychologically I prefer the first one. It seems to me that there are circumstances when the second school is right and this happens to be one of them. Second question: is the unilateral action on the part of the government, on the part of Parliament under this resolution acceptable under constitutional law and convention? Nothing in law prevents the Parliament of Canada from adopting the present resolution, nothing prevents the British parliament from giving its assent. Yet is it the case when it comes to convention? First what do we mean by convention? It is a government practice which does not carry the weight of law, which cannot be referred to in a court of law, but which politicians consider as politically necessary and mandatory. I think it is actually based upon the assent of public opinion, the ultimate recourse in this area. In "The Law and the Constitution", Jennings says, and I quote:

[English]

Conventions keep the constitution in touch with the growth of ideas.

● (1640)

And that is very important, I might add, not only—

[English]

—in touch with the growth of ideas but also, one might add, with the growth of sentiments.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, such a convention is an instrument of government which has great flexibility but which is also very imprecise. The convention, in Canada, as far as constitutional amendment is concerned, is that the British parliament must accept a resolution put to it by the Canadian Parliament asking for an amendment to the Canadian Constitution. Even a legal expert like Brossard states that:

In theory, nothing prevents it from amending the BNA Act by itself or even at the request of a province, but the British parliament feels bound by constitutional conventions. It considers itself merely a recording mechanism.

That is convention. Therefore, the problem is not there, at least I hope so. The problem is here in Canada. So we must ask ourselves: what does convention say as far as the provinces' power to amend is concerned? Can Parliament seek to amend the constitution without the consent of the provinces, especially in matters which affect the division of power, especially in the matters reserved in the 1949 amendment which concerned in part the division of power, the right to education and the institutional use of languages?

But, Mr. Speaker, this is a question I have been considering for quite a while and I have noted that opinions vary, and convention is unspecified and it is well known that in only five out of 18 cases provincial consent was deemed necessary. Even those who believe that such convention exists express their views differently and always very cautiously. For instance, in the dictionary of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, volume 2, we can read the following, and I quote:

Legally speaking, Parliament is not absolutely forced to obtain the prior consent of the provinces. However it did so when in its view the provinces were directly concerned.

Then any dissertation on the state of convention in Canada should insist on sentences such as "according to the judgment of federal authorities", "directly affects the power of the provinces". Some people will certainly state that such convention does not make unanimous consent compulsory. This is where the uncertainty of convention lies in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, there is something much more important, namely, the very nature of convention as it is being discussed. Brossard states the following. I chose my authors carefully to avoid being accused of partisanship. Brossard states the following: "The federal Parliament could even, if it dared do so, amend some constitutional conventions." You see the imprecision surrounding convention. And in a key part of his book Jennings states the following:

[English]

—the real question which is presented to a government is not whether a rule is law or convention, but what the House of Commons will think about it if a certain action is proposed.

[Translation]

Of course, it amounts to stating very clearly and forcefully the supremacy of policies over "what is conventional and over law itself". And Jennings states further:

[English]

Conventions are political decisions. Political antecedents and political consequences prescribe their creation, existence and dissolution.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, we can see that in the end political circumstances are what justifies unilateral action and convention itself. It is therefore a political problem. That is where the problem lies; I repeat that however important philosophy, laws and convention may be, what is at issue is practical politics, the art of governing which is the art of doing what is possible and also the obligation to choose according to a conception of the common good. At this point I refer to what was said by my colleagues who spoke about political necessity, particularly the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) who has made some very important statements on that subject. They said that the federal Parliament must act for all kinds of reasons; efforts have been made over a long period of time to get the consent of the provinces without success; the party that now forms the government has been defending the ideas contained in the resolution for years and its leader, for 12 years at least; on the other hand, some provincial leaders agree with some parts and even the form of the present resolution; some who were in agreement in the past, some who reject it do so for reasons that have absolutely nothing to do with the amendments asked for, and finally some others would like to give their consent but dare not do so. Other points have been argued since October 6, promises were made, there was soon to be action, a breakthrough, a way out of the deadlock. Commitments were made that must be fulfilled at the reasonable moment. The benefits have been stated. The Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development says that patriation and the amending formula will allow what I call an "à la carte" amending process where revision in large blocks has proved to be impossible.

Besides, the other means of breaking the deadlock that have been referred to in the House do not really exist.

• (1650)

For instance, it is very obvious that calling a constituent assembly now would not solve the problems facing Canada. We would spend an enormous amount of time just in determining the rules that would then regulate the process, to establish who would be represented where and on what basis, how decisions would be made, how the vote would be taken. We should then have a lot of problems to solve. It has also been suggested that resolutions be passed in all provinces and in Parliament. The proposals were to be identical. Obviously, it would take decades to be done. On the other hand, it is quite obvious that there is a sufficient consensus among the population on the content of that legislation. As co-chairman of the Task Force on Canadian Unity I had the Hon. John Robarts who was constantly raising this issue and asking us how could anyone reach finality.

[English]

"How to reach finality in this matter."

Well, I see—at least in the press—that Mr. Robarts has also decided to support the government action on that issue. Indeed the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development has quoted the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) himself who in other circumstances has propounded views similar to those we are expressing today.

Mr. Speaker, will this resolution change the balance of power between the two levels of government? Does it diminish the powers of the provinces for the benefit of the central government and, if so, does it do it unacceptably, without their expressed or implied consent? Let us consider the situation more in detail. Does patriation in itself upset the balance of power between the two levels of government? I think that the protection of provinces by London has long since been a myth used by some provinces as a simple bargaining lever. And who is still opposed to patriation? Not too many people as far as I know. Some people, including myself, regret that it should come about this way. Others would have preferred, and so would I, that certain important and meaningful amendments be made either before the constitution was patriated or at the same time. But everyone agrees about this. Others suggest, at least according to what I have read, that patriation should occur after a review of all the components of the Constitution. This is obviously unrealistic since we would already have to review some elements which had already been reviewed before the patriation formula was developed. It is obviously unrealistic.

Third, is the formal amendment procedure proposed in this resolution acceptable? Mr. Speaker, I would have to spend several minutes on this subject to dissect what the resolution contains in this regard. Moreover, I have the impression when I look at the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) that the last word has not been said on this matter and that there will be further exchanges. I hope for my part that we shall be able in the next two years to develop a formula which can be accepted by the central government and the provinces, which will be respectful of both orders of government and which will not include the concept of unanimity, of vetoes and opting-outs. I believe we can do this. The report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, to which I have already referred two or three times, included, in my opinion, a formula which met this objective while granting power of agreement to the people. However, I must admit that this formula required the existence of a chamber of provinces which would vote on the resolution on a simple majority. But since some people still defend this type of an upper chamber, we might be able to apply this formula one day.

What about the entrenchment of basic rights? Here again, Mr. Speaker, there are two opposing views, the one which maintains that the basic rights, which are fundamentally evolutionary, are best guaranteed by the federal and provincial legislatures which are more conscious of the subtleties of social evolution. There is also a view which maintains that the basic rights are inalienable rights which are best protected by the Constitution itself, to which must submit both the legislatures when they legislate and the judges when they interpret the statutes. Both of these positions can be defended. For my part, the choice is simply one of wisdom and political caution, one of, and I quote:

—as Jennings, who, as everyone knows, is a highly recommended author, says.

One thing for sure, the prevailing philosophy today leans toward entrenchment and several speakers have referred to this trend in Canada, in countries governed by common law or civil law, within international bodies. It has been said that the Task Force on Canadian Unity stood as an exception to this trend. This interpretation is wrong. In fact we were going much further than the present resolution in the way of enshrining and institutionalizing bilingualism at the federal and provincial levels. Our report may have recommended a slower process than the present resolution does on rights relating to education in both official languages, merely as a matter of prudence. However it recommended—I suggest my friends read it if they feel it was the opposite—that entrenchment be effected as soon as a provincial consensus would be expressed. And in fact, one could think it had already been expressed in the meetings held in Montreal and St. Andrew's in 1978. One can also think it is now being expressed, at least in English-speaking Canada, and I would think also in French-speaking Canada—maybe not at the government level, on this subject.

In the present resolution, I think there is a consensus, however I noted the matter was hardly discussed.

Relating to the freedom of movement and of settlement I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all provinces will eventually agree to entrench all prerequisites of the economic union, even if it means qualifying them by some GATT regulations on the obligation to justify exceptions and to terminate them as soon as social and economic conditions improve, possibly with an arbitrator to decide on them.

While inclusion of the equalization principle does not seem to raise any problems, I noticed that some people are not logical in that they oppose some aspects of this resolution when they do not raise any objection when they seek recognition. They use those arguments when they do not agree but drop them the moment they do.

Mr. Speaker, on balance, having taken into account philosophy, law, convention, the art of the possible which is the government of the people, I think that this resolution is justified. But on balance is it not always how hard decisions are taken? Last resort measures are often the only workable solutions.

I hope we will resume within a short time the constitutional reform discussions concerning the political institutions and distribution of powers where we have so much to do. Meanwhile, I will keep on being interested in the constitutional change and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will live up to the spirit of federalism in the transport area.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy)—Canadian Pacific Railway—Abandonment of certain daily supplementary service; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie)—Air Safety—Enforcement of regulations respecting aircraft and pilots; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Human rights—Inquiry as to date of implementation of commission's recommendations.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order No. 6, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Stand by unanimous consent.

RENEWABLE ENERGY ACT

MEASURE TO PROMOTE USE OF RENEWABLE ENERGY RESOURCES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved that Bill C-210, to promote the use of renewable energy, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before recognizing the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), it may come as no surprise to him that the Chair thought it necessary to examine the terms of Bill C-210 before the House, because the bill proposes in clause 3 to create a Crown corporation to be known as the Renewable Energy Corporation.

There have been previous instances in which it has been the duty of the Chair to bring to the attention of members of the House that in some circumstances there may be a claim upon the public purse and such bills ought to be presented only in the name of a minister of the Crown. With the assistance of the Table officers I have reviewed the bill, and for those members who may seek to make reference to it, I find that in clauses 3 and 7, matters related to the financing of the corporation appear to be wholly outside the Crown's interests. For that reason the Chair is initially inclined to accept Bill C-210 as being in order. However, there is a tradition related to decisions on such bills whereby the Chair does enter a caveat so that, as debate continues, some hon. member may want to bring to the attention of the Chair some manner in which such a corporation might, in fact, be responsible for the expenditure of public funds. Accordingly, the Chair has taken the position it may have to intervene at some later stage in the proceedings if public funds were found to be involved. Subject to that caveat it is my view that the debate on Bill C-210 should proceed.

Mr. Schellenberger: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I accept your guidance and wisdom with regard to the bill. I am aware of the restrictions under which private members are placed in not having the ability to spend the moneys of the public purse and I attempted, when drafting this bill, to be very cautious in this respect.

The object of the corporation and its directors was to find finances outside of government for the operations of the corporation and, in addition, that they not be reimbursed in their capacity as acting directors. I suspect there would be many people available in Canada to serve on such a corporation because of the interest which exists in renewable energy. As you are aware, there is a great need for this bill, which was pointed out in the debate which took place last week on the opposition motion dealing with energy.

As governments argue as to who will take what part of the energy dollar, we are finding Canadians are being faced with the reality that they are and will be depending more on foreign sources of oil and other forms of energy. I believe very strongly that we, as Canadians, must establish, as a national goal, energy self-sufficiency. Part of that goal must come from renewable energy because we have the ability and the technology to move much faster than we are at the present time toward more renewable energy, forming part of our heating plan, our movement of vehicles, transportation and so on. We are not moving quickly enough to that end.

Most of the encouragement we have received from government has come in the form of research and not enough in the area of practical application of that research. I will not spend a great deal of time on the reasoning and the need for rapid expansion in renewable energy because we have discussed these reasons repeatedly in this House. But Alberta, the province with most of the conventional oil in Canada, has only five billion barrels of conventional oil left and we are pumping approximately 450 million barrels out of that pool per year. Even though we have in our province the second largest pool of hydrocarbons in the world, we need new technology and rapid development with the present technology to meet our needs in the next ten years.

Even if the oil sands and the Cold Lake plant get off the ground—and I sincerely hope they do—we will still need an additional five plants of the same magnitude just to meet our needs to 1985. That has nothing to do with the expansion of demand which Canadians may seek. Some hon. members may say that we have Northern Natural Gas and Oil, Hibernia, Sable Island gas, and tremendous pools of natural gas in Alberta and British Columbia and if we put them in the marketplace we can reach that self-sufficiency goal. That may be true, but at the rate we are going now it could take a good many years before we can get those pools of resources into use by Canadians. So, in light of that background, I believe the national government must encourage Canadians to accept renewable energy at every opportunity because it is lasting, exciting, and something which will catch on quickly in the Canadian sphere. I believe the adoption of Bill C-210 would constitute a start in that area.

I am averse to the creation of another Crown corporation, but we need some way of gathering information and making it available to the Canadian people immediately. We also need protection for consumers because most of the hardware which is now available is imported.

One might ask why we should move quickly with renewables. One of the particular advantages of renewable energy is the fact it is not handicapped by geography. We can use the potatoes in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick to produce alcohol, we can use poplar trees in Quebec and northern Ontario to produce alcohol for vehicles. Solar heat is available in all provinces. Wind is available in most areas and we in the southern part of the prairies know how much energy it can produce for us. This is also true for the islands off Quebec. Heat pumps are another area of technology which is just getting started. Then there is geothermal energy under the foothills of Alberta and parts of British Columbia which can produce hydroelectric power at rates much lower than we can produce at the present time from our rivers, which have been our principal source of electricity in the past.

What I am saying is that natural renewable energy resources are everywhere in Canada and they are capable of being used by all Canadians if they receive the encouragement and information which should be at hand.

What steps should be taken in Canada? There is at present a complete lack of co-ordination between scientists, governments and others interested in obtaining information. There is no central source of information available other than the department, which is just getting started as an information disseminator. There is no agency responsible for testing new devices and inventions. Standards have not been established at the present time, so how are consumers to know when they buy a technology that it will be capable of performing under our winter conditions? Therefore no production, design or construction technologies are available immediately to people who ask for them.

As I say, there is no agency established to co-ordinate further research and development which will assure consumers that what they are buying will work. What I am seeking to do in Bill C-210 is to have Parliament give a commitment to gather this information and work out the standards which are so necessary.

What I would also like to see in the bill are incentives, particularly in the form of tax incentives so that the people of Canada will move toward the use of this technology. When the cost of renewable technology is placed against the cost of natural gas and oil at its present value, the oil and natural gas win out in terms of price. They will not for much longer, and with a minor tax credit to Canadians we could quickly get a certain portion of them involved in renewable energies and increase the percentage of homes and buildings heated by this source.

Another key feature of Bill C-210 is outlined in clause 4(a). That section states that an object of the corporation is to propose design, production and construction standards for renewable energy. Because we are not sponsoring sufficient encouragement to small businesses in Canada so that they will get involved in the production of hardware for solar plants or wind technology, even though the National Research Council has produced one of the best windmills in the world, heat pumps or even digesters in the biomass industry, most of the technology which is now available comes from either the United States or Europe.

As I stated before, there is a need for a group of Canadian people, hopefully a group such as I outlined in this bill, to set out the design standards, production standards and construction standards for the technologies which we now import to prove to our consumers that such devices will work and do have a long life. Most renewable energy forms should have a lifespan of some 20 years in order for them to be placed in an operation. Consumer protection in the field of renewable technologies would be ensured by this bill. Not only would the consumer have greater confidence in his product, but he would also be able to instal and utilize such devices without a great deal of technical or mechanical expertise.

I have also envisioned that this corporation could make use of engineers across Canada. For example, in the budget of last December reference was first made to the use of agricultural stills. We were amazed to learn that an entrepreneur from Montana had come up into the southern portions of the prairie provinces to market a device which he said would work. By putting small advertisements in local newspapers this man attracted crowds of 300 to 500 farmers in small communities as he explained the operation of the still and how it would create, from wheat and straw and other products normally grown on the farm, alcohol which could be used in tractors, cars and homes. This shows that there is an interest. Surely, if the interest is there, our government, through a corporation such as the one I described, could use a group of engineering experts versed in the operation of such technologies to move from community to community across Canada explaining the technologies which are now available and how individuals with very little engineering expertise could, in fact, put these devices to work for themselves if they are given the proper guidance and information.

For example, there are many engineers in the PFRA who are not being fully utilized in their areas throughout western Canada. These people could be used to disseminate this kind of information. If the government would see in their wisdom the advantages of offering a tax credit in the upcoming budget to individuals for the placement of renewable technologies in their homes, this group of engineers could also, while spreading this information, check on the claimants who have installed renewable technology devices in their homes or places of business and give them advice on whether the engineering requirements have been met.

The United States, which is ahead of us in this field by far, is using a toll-free Zenith number in each state. Persons who have an interest in placing, for example, solar heating hardware in their homes can phone this toll-free number and be immediately provided by experts with information, bibliographies of books which are available in local libraries, and any other advice that is available on the particular form of renewable energy about which they are asking. The United States has moved quickly to provide the kinds of information which are not available at the present time in Canada. Through this corporation such a system could be set up under clause 4(d) of the bill because it authorizes the renewable energy corporation to publish information relating to the uses and applications of renewable energy technologies. This clause was designed to ensure that the need for public information is met.

The last function of the corporation would be to co-ordinate further research in the areas of renewable energy-producing devices and inventions. Many Canadians are putting their minds to work and are trying to come up with new ways of using the energy in the sun, the ground, in water, and with machines. Such people are always coming to their members of Parliament and to government with new devices that are capable of doing such and such, but in many cases they are not given an ear and are turned away. As a result, we lose the value of that particular piece of technology. I can see this corporation playing a very important role in this area. It could look at new inventions and, as well, co-ordinate the research dollars which are made available by governments, foundations and large companies. I believe that a central body such as this corporation is necessary to co-ordinate all this information.

Those are my explanations as to why I placed each of the clauses in the bill. I would like to end this portion of my speech with a quote from the book "The Challenge of Man's Future", which was written by Harrison Brown:

> Consumption of the earth's stores of fossil fuels has barely started, yet already we can see the end. In a length of time which is extremely short when compared with the length of time during which man has inhabited the earth, fossil fuels will have been discovered, utilized, and completely consumed.

That is very likely true, but the sun, wind, and waste materials from agricultural products and trees will be with us into perpetuity. It shows how important it is for us to move quickly toward the use of renewable energy forms.

I would like to end my speech by saying that, for the first time in history, the government in its budget of last December recognized that individuals, not just corporations, should have a tax break if they place in their businesses or their homes a heat exchanger or heat exchanger material. It was the first time in history that this type of offer had been made to Canadian citizens. The budget papers and the notices of ways and means motions stated very clearly under energy conservation equipment that there would be a write-off for district heating systems, solar heating systems on the new buildings, small-scale hydroelectric projects, heat recovery systems including heat exchange material and equipment and auxiliary components which are used to conserve energy. That opens up to all Canadians the use of this device of a tax write-off in order to place these in their homes and certainly in businesses. I have checked with the department and it seems that the regulations have finally been written after this long time, because in the budget that he sneaked into the Speech from the Throne, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said he would continue with that initiative.

Mr. Paproski: They listened to you.

Mr. Schellenberger: I hope so. The department has indicated that the regulations should be available to us soon. I sincerely hope that Canadians take advantage of them. In a policy paper published three years ago this party announced a policy which we were then very glad to see incorporated into the budget. It allowed personal tax credits to people, who use renewable technologies. It would have also offered accelerated five year write-offs for the cost of solar equipment, wind technologies, and biomass technologies, used in industrial and commercial buildings and in multiple residences.

We stated many other things that should be done. For instance, we should encourage municipalities not to tax people who use these new technologies in buildings. We should encourage mortgage and insurance companies to incorporate provisions for the use of these technologies into their mortgage contracts and insurance policies. We can think of many other areas where rapid use of renewable energies could be encouraged in the country.

In my bill I have outlined this as much as possible and as far as I can, having regard to the legal requirements of a private member's bill. I offer it to the House and hope it will be accepted so that the committee can use the bill as a basis on which to build a corporation and information disseminating device within government. I hope this will be done as rapidly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, while regarding the hon. member's bill as being in some way redundant, as I shall explain in a moment, I should like to assure the House that we on this side welcome the occasion that he has provided to discuss an important and pressing topic, the use of renewable energies in Canada.

The hon. member has proposed a corporation which in some respects is similar to that to which the government already committed itself in the Speech from the Throne. I am sure the hon. member is aware that such a commitment has more recently been given substance. A corporation embodying some of the responsibilities envisaged in this bill is already in being. I nevertheless welcome his remarks about the various alternate forms of energy that can be developed in Canada and which can play a very real part in our energy future.

Perhaps it would be appropriate if I were to inform the House of some of the current policies and programs of the federal government in the development of renewable energy before turning to specific aspects of the hon. member's bill. I should say at once that the federal government considers the development of alternate forms of energy as a high priority. Indeed, I anticipate that in the new energy policy to be presented to the House next week, the hon. member will see further substantiation of that commitment.

Over the last seven years, the federal government has substantially increased its research and development efforts in renewable energy, from less than $1 million in 1974 to just over $20 million in fiscal year 1979-80. Since 1976, the National Research Council has been the federal government's lead agent in its renewable energy activities. In this role it will continue to be an important actor in the federal government's renewable energy program, as the new alternate energy corporation comes into being. The research and development activities I refer to, as the hon. member noted, include solar energy, biomass, wind energy, geothermal energy, hydraulic energy and so on. Policy responsibility for research and development in these important resources resides, of course, with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. In 1977 the renewable energy resources branch was formed in the department, to begin the development of programs in renewable energy. Later, in 1978 a conservation and renewable energy branch was formed to deal with policy questions. This latter group has the leading role in the federal government for policies regarding the research, development, demonstration and commercialization of renewable sources of energy.

In July, 1978, the federal government announced a major new $380 million initiative to develop renewable sources of energy. These programs related primarily to solar heating, forest biomass use, research and development in renewable energy, and federal-provincial demonstration agreements. These programs are now in place and I am pleased to say, are operating satisfactorily. As an example, the forest industry renewable energy program committed $104 million for the period through 1985, to provide capital assistance to approved projects in the forest industry to displace fossil fuels with wood wastes. Projects which have been approved in many parts of Canada will displace fossil fuels equivalent to about three million barrels of oil per year. Some projects will displace imported oil at an estimated saving to the federal government at the current level of compensation of $53 million in the first year after the approved projects are completed. Related spending by the private sector in Canada will be about $105 million. This is just the beginning. The government has already stated a strong commitment to renewable energy. And the benefits, particularly in displacing imported oil, are now beginning to emerge.

Let me give you a specific example of how the government has committed itself to the development of renewable energy technology. I have in mind the example of solar heating. I should like to quote from an address given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to the Canadian Solar Industries Association on September 30, when he said:

> We need a strong, growing and healthy solar industry, a solar industry that can produce a Canadian product for Canadian conditions. That was, and remains, the purpose of the federal government's purchase and use of solar heating program. I want to assure you this will continue to be an important mainstay in developing a short-term market for solar equipment.

The minister, of course, was referring to the federal government's $125 million solar purchase program.

To demonstrate further the commitment of the federal government to develop solar heating technology and a Canadian solar industry, the minister announced, on September 30, a new federal government initiative. To accelerate the development of solar hot water technology, a new demonstration program involving a thousand units at an estimated cost of $5 million will be undertaken. The objectives of the program will be to demonstrate large-scale deployment of solar domestic water heating systems, to establish the preliminary economies of scale, to identify more precisely the reliability and durability of solar heating systems. The minister also amplified the April announcement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), to which the hon. member opposite referred, of changes in income tax regulations which will make solar energy equipment a more attractive investment for industry by allowing fast write-offs for a wide range of active solar heating equipment. These two measures will further promote the demonstration and commercialization of solar heating. Additional measures will be announced on October 28 or shortly thereafter as part of the national energy program. Hence there is indeed a co-ordinated federal strategy for the development of solar energy, and the government plans to publish this strategy once the consultative process has been completed. We believe there is a great opportunity to build a Canadian solar industry, partly so that Canadians do not need to buy foreign-designed solar equipment from foreign-controlled corporations.

We realize we cannot look for dramatic immediate pay-offs from our investment in an emerging technology such as solar heating or in the demonstration programs sponsored under the federal-provincial agreements on conservation and renewable energy. It would be wrong to embark on such pioneering programs without a realistic sense of the time required to see the results or the difficulties they are likely to experience. But it would be equally wrong to under-estimate the specific contribution they can make over time to our efforts to substitute away from oil.

We believe there may well be good opportunities to make early use of renewable energy forms in remote locations. The urgency of the national effort to substitute away from oil is such that we do not believe any opportunity should be neglected. Some renewable energy forms will be particularly attractive in areas not now serviced by natural gas or hydro electricity.

These are important developments. However, before solar can be commercialized it must be shown to be credible. The public must be convinced that the systems we are developing are reliable. We must remember that solar projects must compete with other technologies such as wind, biomass, energy conservation technologies, geothermal and so on. Before solar heating can be acceptable to the public, there needs to be adequate consumer confidence, a subject the hon. member touched upon. The government is continuing to work with the Canadian Standards Association to develop a standard for domestic water packages. But the public will require tangible evidence when they are in the market for solar heating products. That is why a warranty program is so important, and that is why the government is encouraging the Canadian Solar Industries Association to play the lead role in formulating an industry-wide warranty program.

The government is determined to ensure that the solar industry remains a Canadian industry. In the case of solar, there is rapid technological change. Today's technologies may be superseded by second and by third generation technologies. It will be up to Canadian industry to adapt to change and to seek new ideas and new markets in the face of this world-wide search for ways to capture efficiently the sun's energy.

The bill before us proposes to establish a new institution. One of the objectives is to publish information relating to renewable energy. However, there are already a variety of publications readily available which describe these policies and programs of the federal government. One is called "Energy Update". It provides an overview of the energy situation and government activity in renewable energy. Another, called "New Energy, New Opportunities", describes new government programs in renewable energy in considerable detail.

I would like to touch upon some of the objectives of the new corporation which the hon. member opposite has proposed in his bill. On standards, objective (a) in his bill, the proposal is made for increased standards development. As I have already noted, energy, mines and resources is already working very closely with the Canadian Standards Association and the National Research Council on the development of standards for solar heating equipment. Energy, mines and resources is already collaborating with Canadian Solar Industries Association on the development of warranties for solar heaters.

On testing of new energy technologies, objective (b), energy, mines and resources is sponsoring work by a number of agencies, for example, the Ontario Research Foundation on the use of alcohol fuels in diesel engines, and research work by CANMET, the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology, on the testing of wood appliances. Also, the National Research Council has recently funded a new solar test facility at the Ontario Research Foundation.

There are a number of other points in the hon. member's bill which either duplicate activities already being conducted by the federal government or anticipate tasks which will be undertaken by the new alternate energy corporation. I remind the hon. member that in the Speech from the Throne he will find a clear commitment to the creation of an alternate energy corporation. He is probably aware that since the Speech from the Throne, some $20 million has been allocated for the start-up of the new corporation. In the initial period, support for its activites will be provided by Petro-Canada, pending the stage at which the new alternate energy corporation will be able to stand on its own feet.

This new corporation will have a mandate to provide the essential support needed to move renewable energy technologies beyond the demonstration stage into wider commercial use. It will reinforce private sector purchase activity by joint ventures, share purchase and by offering other assistance in the commercialization and marketing of renewable energy technologies.

Of course, there will be some scope for a direct role in research and development and production of renewable energy, but the main emphasis will be on support and encouragement for young Canadian firms in the private sector. Such firms will then have a partner of substance with much needed financial and general business strength. So as firms exploiting renewable energy move toward commercialization of solar, wind and biomass energy technologies, we foresee the corporation playing a strongly supportive role.

In conclusion, the National Research Council, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the new alternate energy corporation will all be important and aggressive actors in the development of renewable sources of energy. Their efforts will be carefully and strongly co-ordinated with other new energy policies to be announced next week. With a strong and coherent energy policy, therefore, the additional corporation proposed in Bill C-210 is unnecessary. I again thank the hon. member for this opportunity to discuss what is an important issue for all Canadians.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to speak to this bill promoting renewable energy sources and technology by the establishment of a renewable energy corporation. I congratulate the hon. member for Wetaskawin (Mr. Schellenberger) for presenting this bill, despite the fact that it calls for another Crown corporation. I understand his party has some strong feelings regarding more Crown corporations, but he has gone ahead anyway. I congratulate him for his courage.

We in the New Democratic Party have no difficulty supporting the bill in principle. We feel, as the preamble says, that there is no doubt that conventional sources of energy are dwindling at an alarming rate in Canada and throughout the world. To back that up, we have witnessed far fewer oil discoveries both in traditional areas in Canada and in our more remote regions. There is no doubt that our petroleum resources are declining even though we have great riches in other forms of energy.

At the moment Canada has no real, substantial energy policy. In spite of what the parliamentary secretary mentioned in terms of what may come about, at the moment, it is fair to say, we do not have any energy policy other than the traditional one of exporting all our cheap energy resources to the United States as quickly as we can. First it was oil, now it is natural gas. Some agency of government, whether it is the member's proposed corporation or some other secretariat or commission has to be charged with the job of co-ordinating the development of new sources, especially in renewable energy fields. The parliamentary secretary says that a corporation of this type will be filling the gap. All of us will be pleased about that, and we look forward to the announcement. My party and I certainly can support the bill in principle, if not every comma or last detail. Indeed, we support enthusiastically the basic principle behind it.

Continued growth in energy consumption seems to be linked inextricably with growth in the economy. The hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) still believes this is true, I think. The minister knows there is growing opinion that the link between continued growth in energy and growth in the economy need not be made.

Sweden, Denmark, the United Kingdom and the United States have all produced studies to this effect, even within the nuclear establishment which is generally opposed to renewable energy. These studies have come to be regarded as milestones. I will mention a couple of them. For example, I speak of "A Low Energy Strategy for the United Kingdom" by Gerald Leach and the study on energy future prepared by the Harvard Business School in the United States. Those are only two which show that we probably do not always need to think of growth in energy use running parallel with growth in the economy. There are newer ways to look at it.

The thought that we cannot easily reduce our energy requirements by as much as 40 per cent without economic disruption is a mistaken belief. I think we can.

While ministers have made certain noises, tokenistic ones in my view, about the need for energy conservation—and I will outline and document this later on—the government is ignoring the real potential of an off-oil policy or an energy saving policy.

It seems to me the government is constantly preoccupied with the supply side, with punching more holes in the Beaufort Sea bed when there are many more gains to be made without risking our environment. We could put substantial sums into conservation. For instance, the United Kingdom, Sweden, Switzerland and West Germany, all highly industrialized nations, with economies working reasonably well, consume 50 per cent less energy per capita than we Canadians do. Japan and France consume two thirds of what we do. Japan and France too are highly industrialized countries but they make greater use of conservation measures than we do. These countries have developed sensible energy policies years ahead of Canada. No one can dispute that. While we may be very rich in energy resources, Canadians continue to be the energy gluttons of the world. I think the party is over now. We cannot continue on this wasteful path for much longer.

People do not want energy, Mr. Speaker. They want what energy provides, namely, heat, light, transportation and communication. Perhaps these ends can be met better by an over-all decrease in energy consumption or simply by increasing the productivity of each thermal unit of energy consumed.

The notion of self-sufficiency in oil is unrealistic unless we improve our energy efficiency. Indeed, Canada was self-sufficient in oil until 1975. But because of increased consumption and only one recent substantial oil find, we are no longer self-sufficient.

The process of improved energy utilization begins with very simple measures. We can improve the thermal design and locations of new houses, offices and factories. We can increase the insulation and employ heat recovery methods, such as heat exchangers in existing dwellings. We can increase the efficiency of appliances and furnaces—something which manufacturers and oil companies are loath to do. We can further improve gasoline mileage by building lighter vehicles and using more efficient engines. We can generate electricity through industrial waste heat. And, as Iceland does, we might do a lot more with district heating. For example, why have one furnace in every home, or apartment building—when one large furnace could heat whole districts? Whole districts can be heated. While we do not have the sources of geothermal heat that Iceland does, a cheap source of energy for them, certainly, we have other sources of heat supply which we could use and spread around throughout districts. In Canada only universities and large institutions have district heating.

About 50 per cent of the housing which will be used in the year 2000 has not yet been built. If Canada is really serious about energy conservation and efficiency, we have to investigate other methods, such as district heating. We need not be confined to oil or geothermal. Other countries are developing different thermal fuels, but in my view Canada is not.

The Gulf Tower in Calgary, a highrise office building, has a tremendously efficient system. It probably uses one fifth of the energy needed for other Calgary office buildings. Methods can be found. If you can decrease by 80 per cent the energy needed for space heating and replicate that over and over as new buildings are built, that is a much more sensible approach than continue the energy binges we have been on for years and years.

We have not encouraged efficiency, but we should. The cost of improving energy productivity and efficiency is relatively modest, while the benefits in increased savings in energy, not to mention the jobs that could be created in alternative energy industries, are immense. It has been said many times that the cheapest barrel of oil is the barrel that we can save. One hears that statement day in and day out whenever one talks to people involved in energy, even government people or people from NRC or EMR. However, we do not see this theme translated into positive programs. There are the pilot programs, certainly, but there is no real push or a battle to try to build more efficient buildings through changes in the building code, for instance. We should be looking at approaches of the kind I have just outlined. If the energy corporation that is contemplated in the bill can help do this and get us moving faster, then I think we can support the bill.

Biomass, solar, low-head hydro and wind all have futures as possible energy sources. We have not yet scratched the surface on the supply side. We are told that with appropriate design, passive solar coupled with insulation can save 85 per cent of the space heating costs and hot water costs in homes. I believe there is only one place in Canada—I believe it is the city of Brantford although I am not certain—which has a solar subdivision where the locations of houses are so arranged that each one has light and an opportunity to absorb as much of the solar heat as possible. That sort of project is not yet in full swing, and it will take a long time, I agree.

However, biomass already supplies 3 per cent of Canada's energy needs. That is about as much as what nuclear does. Of course, in Ontario the mute proportion is much larger, since few other sources are available and nuclear has been overbuilt.

As I see it, the major impediment to the more widespread use of renewables is attitude that we tend to subsidize certain kinds of energy components and not others. We subsidize the nuclear industry tremendously.

Mr. Crosby: There are others to be heard!

Mr. Rose: The hon. member should not worry about it; I will give him plenty of time. I am going to talk until one minute to six because I do not want to talk the bill out. I will give the hon. member one minute to make his remarks.

I think there is probably a good deal more we can do here, but renewables do need support. The alternative energy industry needs a great deal more support than it has been getting in the past. The parliamentary secretary mentioned what has been done in the last five years. When was the energy crisis, anyway? It was more than six or seven years ago, and what we have done in the last five years is extremely modest and nothing to shout about in my opinion. We have, however, made a start.

I have just returned from a tour with the alternative energy committee task force. We toured western Canada and central Canada and took some trips abroad as well. We also went to northern Europe. We are able to see a great many things. I would like to mention some developments which are occurring in such places as Sweden, Ireland and Iceland. The hon. member should certainly be interested in hearing about that in some detail, even though it might take a little time. I would be very pleased to relate some of my experiences in those exotic, out-of-the-way and non-Canadian places.

Let us first deal with the situation in Canada. The committee found that the provincial governments are showing little or no interest in alternative energy. We visited the capitals of Quebec and Ontario and the four western provinces. Not one of those provinces expects renewables, except hydroelectricity, to provide much more than 2 per cent, 4 per cent or maybe 5 per cent of its total energy needs by the year 2000. That does not sound to me like any great enthusiasm or push on the part of the provinces for much more emphasis on renewables. Provinces could use more renewables and still use more total energy, in which case the percentage dependence on renewables would not change very much. I understand that. We could still be employing a good deal more effort, but I do not think those provinces seriously feel that renewables are viable at the moment. And they may not be; I do not know, but I can give some figures from Ontario. In its book called "Energy Security for the Eighties, a Policy for Ontario" the province of Ontario says it expects that the renewables, including energy from waste, forest, industrial by-product heat, solar, wind, wood, direct burning, liquefaction of coal to gas and that sort of thing, will amount to only 5 per cent of the total energy budget needs of the province by 1995.

If we take that 5 per cent and apply it to a year, it amounts to ten days, so Ontario does not expect renewables to amount to much. Looking at investment figures, it appears that Ontario plans to expend some $16 billion on renewable energy by 1995. This is on page 14 of the same publication. When asked where Ontario will get the money and whether it is a budgeted amount, the officials we spoke to said that they expect those funds to come mainly from private sources, so there is no push on the part of the Ontario government. Neither is there on the part of the other governments much enthusiasm for a big start, a big bite into renewables. Enthusiasm for renewables just does not exist, and anyone who thinks it does is kidding himself. It is not happening here in Canada at all. I do not care what kinds of noises are made. I do not care how many big million-dollar ad campaigns are floated. It is not happening, and I do not think it will happen unless people start becoming alarmed and are made aware of the fact that Canada has no strong program to develop and implement large projects based on renewable sources.

I will give some comparisons. The same is modest expectation true in all the other provinces. We wondered why there was so little interest. The committee really wondered. It looked around and visited various places, and all the officials were very co-operative. But why was there no interest? What is the matter? Why is there so little interest in biomass, wind, water, sun, ethanol or forest waste utilization? Does no one believe there is an energy crisis? That is a possibility because we have been fooled so often. Is there no leadership from Ottawa? That is another possibility. There is probably a bit of cynicism on both those points because we have been fooled so often. My constituents believed there is no energy crisis at all, and all there was was a scare campaign on the part of oil companies in an effort to get prices up. I do not believe that, but I think it is the prevailing view out there, and it seems to me this attitude is what is holding back the development and acceptance of renewables by the general public.

Look at what Ottawa is spending this year on energy research and development. The parliamentary secretary made reference to what Ottawa is spending. The total spending for conservation measures and research and development in this country by EMR this year amounts to $12 million. The total spent on all renewables in this country by EMR is $20 million. The same publication lists total spending on nuclear of $104 million. We can see where the priorities lie. They are where they have always been. Money is being spent on fossil fuels. It is also spent on subsidizing oil wells and gas drilling and tar sands developments, but it is not being spent on renewables. I am not suggesting research could absorb it all anyway, but a pitiful $12 million is spent for conservation R and D, $20 million is spent for renewables, when $104 million, if not more, has been spent in each of the last ten years on nukes. That is where Canada's energy priorities lie. They do not lie with the renewables at all.

The Financial Post says we need to spend much more on research and development. On October 18, there was a whole editorial headed "Ignore Research and Development at our Peril". The editorial says that in 1967 we were spending 1.4 per cent of our gross national product on research and development, and now we are spending less than 1 per cent. Is that progress? We are going backwards in this regard. Where do we need the research and development? We need money spent on research and development into energy sources and especially renewables.

We might compare—

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to the hon. member opposite for interrupting, but I would be interested if he would care to cite his authority for the numbers which he just gave. In fact, total federal expenditures on energy conservation during fiscal year 1978-79 exceeded $82 million. In addition, provincial governments spent an estimated $13.5 million, bringing the total for the year to something close to $100 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Hon. members should recognize that the clock moves on. I know the parliamentary secretary is aware that technically speaking that is not a point of order, but I will recognize it for what it is, a question, and I encourage the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) to deal with it as he sees fit, but to recognize the clock as well.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be delighted to do that. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary chose three years and added them all up. I took EMR 1980-81 budget for R and D, and my source was the brief to the parliamentary task force for alternative energy and oil substitution by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I recommend that to the parliamentary secretary for his long winter bedtime reading.

I cannot go on too much longer with this, but there is a great deal more that needs to be said. Let us say that compared with other countries such as Sweden, Canada is spending about one-fortieth as much on conservation and research and development. We have not looked into all alternatives. We have not developed the procedures we need, and we had better start doing so because, as I said earlier, the party is over. Let us get this business of renewables on the rails and start moving on it. Let us stop kidding the public that we are doing a lot more than we are.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me say that I support Bill C-210, to promote the use of renewable energy. I congratulate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) for bringing this very important matter to the attention of the House.

I wanted to take a little time to explain to the House our situation in Nova Scotia. I wanted to explain our developments in tidal power. I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan) wanted to tell us about the development of fossil fuels.

We lost that opportunity because the time in the private members' hour has been occupied. But the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) gave us one important lesson in the matter of renewable energy in his intervention: that he has a solution. The hon. member and the NDP have a solution for the renewable energy problem in Canada. It is hot air, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is full of hot air, his party is full of hot air, and if we could harness that hot air, we would solve the renewable energy problem in Canada. So I will not have an opportunity to talk about tidal power and we will not have an opportunity to talk about the fossil fuel development in Nova Scotia. What we can say is that we support the bill and we hope it will soon come to a vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of the House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) had the floor. The Chair will now recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): It was a very enlightening experience for me, this October 21, to sit in my place and listen to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the very distinguished co-chairman of the committee which in the initial stage looked at the events which led up to the—I think, sometimes, innocuous—procedure which is being followed by the present government with respect to our constitution.

I say at the very outset to the minister, through you, sir, that having followed the hearings and events which surrounded the Pepin-Robarts commission, and as one who was somewhat involved in previous measures, movements and studies by government of some significance to this country, together with others, I was not alone—not alone in this chamber, not alone in the other place, not alone in this country—waiting to hear the minister tell us how in hell he was going to swallow what it was that Trudeau was trying to stuff down his throat.

With some respect, I say that the minister did a remarkable job, first of all, of swallowing himself, of telling us what we already know, what we already accept in all corners of this House, which is that the content of what we are talking about is generally acceptable. He told not only those of us who sit in the opposition; he told the people in his own back benches as well. I watched the 12 of them who were gathered around behind him, in line with the cameras, applauding loudly. I also noticed several of his colleagues not bothering to applaud.

I have a lot of respect and a lot of time for the contribution the Minister of Transport has made to this country in a variety of responsibilities. He has a good intellect, one which Canadians should pay attention to, and if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is a Canadian he, too, should listen to him. I wonder whether he will bother to read the message left by the minister, who is a very distinguished scholar and Canadian, on this particular question. I disagree with the minister when he said, by way of excuse, that it was political prudence that would lead him to support the proposals that are in front of us. I wonder what his colleague, Mr. Robarts, would think of that, Mr. Speaker.

As was the case with other hon. members, I enter this debate with considerable concern, a concern which arises from what I understand to be the implications to the Canadian partnership which are inherent in the proposal that is before us. The subject matter that is raised in this motion to establish a joint committee to discuss the content of a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen concerns not only myself, but I am sure, many other Canadians.

One of the first points I want to make is that this government and its supporting bureaucracy in dealing with this matter are fully aware, as are all of us here, that the vast majority of Canadians will not closely follow this debate. They have other things to do. They have families to raise, other business, social, human and personal commitments, and they will not closely follow the details of these discussions. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us in dealing with this aspect of the measure which is before us to try to indicate to Canadians—in my case to the people of Dartmouth on the eastern shore of Nova Scotia—as it is our responsibility, some of the dangers which are inherent in what is proposed.

In the next few minutes I hope I can in orderly fashion deal, albeit superficially, with some of these matters. It is important to patriate the constitution; there is no question about that. Along with all who have spoken, I too express very sincerely my support for a strong central government. There is nothing new about that; it was expressed in 1867, 1864 and even prior to that. I support this notion in some kind of spirit of true partnership, a true partnership with strong provincial governments.

These concepts are not in conflict. Indeed, there cannot be such a conflict in our system and under our structure. The conflict arises only when one, the predominant partner—and I say to the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) that that is not chauvinistic—attempts to impose upon the other, as the Minister of Transport put it this afternoon. His concern is that we are imposing. This concern is not with the content but with the procedure and that is what I am saying. There can only be conflict when the senior partner in this historic and traditional partnership deliberately and unilaterally imposes its strength and its will on the junior partner.

We have conducted our affairs in this country, not for 113 years, but for virtually 200 years under the British Crown. Is Canada such a bad place? Are we not well off?

Mrs. Erola: We could be better off.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the minister says that we are a good country, we are well off but we could be better off. They were saying that in 1854, in 1858, in 1864 and we are better off. There is nothing wrong with what we are now, and we have done it all under the British Crown. My objection to the position and the process which we are now forced to follow and probably will be forced to bow to because of the weight of the government majority, is simply to the procedure, not the content. The government is wrong. It will destroy this country and it will destroy it knowingly and willingly with no regrets whatsoever. If the hon. members opposite want my conclusion now, I can tell them what it is and sit down.

An hon. Member: Don't keep us in suspense.

Mr. Forrestall: That would be the typical retort or response of a backbencher, supporter or trained seal. The Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) this afternoon in one of the most scurrilous attacks on the opposition I have heard for a long time in this chamber suggested we were wasting the time of the House in this debate. It is rather interesting that the government backbenchers themselves, out of a sense of attempting to achieve some vague level of glory, have spoken more frequently than the opposition parties put together. Why is that? Who is delaying the debate? In any event, nobody can delay this debate.

If every member in this chamber wants to get on his or her feet and speak to his or her country then, by God, it is their right, and no Speaker sitting in that chair, no prime minister of this country and no government, no matter what their intent or their end purpose, will ever change that. The moment it is changed, we will not have a Canada. I suggest to my colleagues from Quebec that they sit up and listen and turn around because I might just be what they would like to attack, but I am not. I have spent 25 years in public life. I can say that Quebeckers have not had the courage to travel to western Canada, to northern Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: We have been there more often than you have been to Quebec.

Mr. Forrestall: I gather that is a rejection of what I had to say, and I apologize, obviously, they all have, and they will not have a question of privilege or a point of order.

[Translation]

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to remind my hon. colleague that as MP for Mercier I visited the west four times this year. I went to Edmonton, three weeks ago, I went to Calgary, I went to Vancouver; I would ask the hon. member to kindly retract his remark.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Come up and see me in the Yukon sometime.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am not sure whether that constitutes a valid point of order or whether it is a point of debate, but in either case the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) had already retracted the comment. So I think we might recognize again the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, unless the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) has a point of order.

Mrs. Erola: Since the hon. member has retracted his statement, I should really withdraw mine as well, but I would like to bring to his attention the fact that I too have on a number of occasions this summer been out west, from Yellowknife to British Columbia to Calgary. I have enjoyed each visit and I am looking forward to further visits.

Mr. Chrétien: I suppose I should make the same point.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I am intrigued by the indignation of the members opposite, because if they have travelled so much in Canada why do they not understand what they are doing to this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: If they have been west, north and to Atlantic Canada, then they should know that they are tearing this country apart. They are trying to impose upon us something which we do not want. They are trying to impose upon us a procedure which is abhorrent to us.

● (2020)

I am not one of those in this country who is a great defender of the Crown but I am one of its greatest exponents when it comes to the system of central government that we enjoy. I will not stand idly by and watch the Prime Minister, with the blind support of hon. members opposite, impose unilaterally measures which the people as a whole will accept only if they are debated and agreed upon in this country.

How can anyone say that they want to end this era of colonialism that has been referred to—it has been referred to in different tongues in different parts of the country—how can anyone say they want to bring an end to things as they are, that they want the constitution in Canada while at the same time bootlegging by way of the back door significant and substantive proposals and measures which are not the subject matter of wide dialogue and widespread requests from the people of the country? On what basis do hon. members opposite feel they can toy with the sentiments of western Canada or the sentiments of Newfoundland? I am sure all hon. members who are interested in this debate watched the premier of the province of Newfoundland on television.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: Hon. members opposite laugh at him.

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Forrestall: Where is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker)? Where is the minister from Newfoundland? It is a good thing those two gentlemen are not in the chamber because that is who members opposite are laughing at. They are laughing at Canadians.

An hon. Member: Sit down!

An hon. Member: Resign!

Mr. Forrestall: Resign? Me? Ha! Long before I resign, sir—

An hon. Member: You accept?

Mr. Forrestall: Long before I resign you will know that you are going to fight this to the death, because I will not permit you to act unilaterally.

An hon. Member: That is beautiful!

Mr. Chrétien: That is your motion tomorrow.

Mr. Forrestall: Bring home the constitution. Bring home the agreed-upon formula. But do not shove down the throats of Canadians amendments made to their constitution in the British House of Commons. If the Prime Minister believes that the British House of Commons will look only at the title of the joint address, then I suggest those who support him in this belief are blind and have not researched the matter. They are acting only in blind support of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. members opposite have spoken with compassion for this country and with some understanding of it. Those of you who know me, know what my roots in Quebec are and I am proud of them—a little more proud than might be suggested by some of the laughter and jests from the other side of the chamber. But I expect that and accept it, Mr. Speaker.

I implore hon. members opposite not to let this country fall apart as a result of their acting unilaterally. We are close to agreement among the provinces on an amending formula—we are very close. We are not far apart, as the government's damnable, inexcusable advertising program would suggest. This country is not divided, although the government is trying to tell us that it is. They have shoved this view down our throats for years. But we are not divided, Mr. Speaker. This is a good, close-knit, close-working country. No one seriously objects to the principles that are embedded in this resolution but they can certainly object to the procedure. It is being done illegally, by way of the back door. I agree with some of the proposals and with some of the positions taken with respect to various premiers. If anyone wants my frank opinion, I think they were fools to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. This is a political argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: After some hon. members opposite have spent 25 years in public life they can then come to me and talk about it. I wonder if they know what it means to struggle. I listened to the distinguished new member from Prince Edward Island, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson) speak of his early years in this country and his love and dedication to it. It was a good speech for a new member. I invite him to look around and get to know other hon. members who represent all the people of this country. Listen to them, please.

Mr. Henderson: I have.

Mr. Forrestall: No, you have not.

An hon. Member: You have turned a deaf ear.

Mr. Forrestall: The hon. member has turned a deaf ear. He has denied everything he said this afternoon by his blind support of unilateral action. This is a country of partnerships and I should like to speak about that for a minute or two. I will deal with two areas.

The other day I listened to—or, perhaps more correctly, I should say read, because sometimes reading is more important than listening—the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), a distinguished Nova Scotian, and I have one or two comments to make about his intervention in the House. I want to touch briefly on the question of equalization as the parliamentary secretary did this afternoon. I am not yet convinced, and probably never will be, of the sincerity of the minister's argument because I do not believe he fully subscribes to the principle. During his intervention he reiterated his support, and presumably that of his cabinet colleagues, for the principle of equalization. No one can really question that, of course. The action of governments from those of Mr. Diefenbaker to Mr. Pearson, to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister, have demonstrated the protections that we need. Their actions regarding equalization have been what the country wanted. There is no question about that. What I do question, however, is how the Minister of Finance could conceivably support the wording of the proposed reference to a joint committee of the two Houses of Parliament. I do not understand how he can allow such a worth-while practice to be broken down in a manner that would allow the government to use the principle of government-to-people, direct transfers, to satisfy the principle of equalization. I do not know how he can accept wording that would lead to the kind of conflict and abuse that is possible. That wording is unacceptable and is wrong.

The Minister of Finance has a long history of great contributions to this chamber and to the country but his acceptance of what is going on now defies the wildest imagination of Nova Scotians or Atlantic Canadians or, indeed, any Canadian who bothers to examine the situation. Yet he has accepted it. Why he would not prefer wording that would require the purpose and intent to be effected through appropriate provincial legislation instead of around them or over their heads, I just do not understand. In public and in private, its integrity should be defended by such a proposal. With respect to the minister's second point, he directed his comments to the question of offshore resources. Along the same lines, the argument or the debate centres on ownership. In this regard, I not only find myself in continuing disagreement with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but as well with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) and other members of the government.

While the prospects of short-term financial gains under the proposals of this government are attractive, it is the long-term prospects and concerns which attract my attention. Implicit in the Minister of Finance's intervention in this debate—and I cannot imagine why he did not refer to it—is the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the so-called British Columbia reference case. By his silence on the matter last week, the minister left me with the clear impression that he was extending a decision based on one set of facts to cover another situation in another part of the country surrounded by a different set of facts.

For the minister to rely on this ploy is out of character. At worst, he implied that the decision extends to the waters adjacent to Atlantic Canada, referring to the process which led to the court decision respecting the B.C. reference. He knows the language of the British North America Act. He knows what section 7 says, namely:

> The provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the same limits as at the passing of this act.

That is a very simple but meaningful statement. The British Columbia reference led the court to a conclusion based on the historical facts leading up to British Columbia joining confederation. These historical facts do not reveal, in any research that I and others have done on the subject, any conferring by the British Crown of rights with respect to the sea, the seabed and the resource, that is the sea and the seabed, which under international law at that time and subsequently it was the clear right of the British Crown to extend.

With regard to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, the record is very different. In our case, the British Crown did extend rights which were clearly theirs to extend to governments or administrations of the day. Perhaps it would serve the minister and, in turn, Nova Scotians and others well if the minister were to re-read our history, although I am sure he does not have to do that. He might do worse than begin with the intervention of the Hon. G. I. Smith of the other place on this question as recently as July 10 of this year. My purpose is to express to this House a determined belief that the resources offshore in eastern Canada belong to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Quebec certainly holds the same view and Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are entitled to that view. From every quarter we hear of growing involvement between Quebec and Ottawa and the producing provinces of natural gas.

I raise this final point to try to impress upon hon. members some of the concerns we have over unilateral action. I raise it in the context of resources offshore. In my opinion, there is little doubt that officials in the two capitals have already decided that Gros Cacouna will be the location of a new petro-chemical industry using eastern Arctic gas and oil as well as the gas and oil of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. We in Atlantic Canada will become nothing other than pipeline caretakers if we do not own the resources affected. Federal ownership will dictate the form and location of an industrial base arising out of these resources.

We had hoped this could have been done in a spirit of co-operation. Obviously it can no longer be done that way. However, for Nova Scotians and Newfoundlanders, one of our great tasks will be to protect this resource. It is clear that our Atlantic ministers—the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour—have lost their argument in cabinet. They have let us down.

Talks have taken place between officials of the province of Quebec and the producing provinces which indicate that east of Quebec gas would not be included for energy security, backing up oil. Rather, it will be to create the initial base for an industrial complex based upon gas and oil. That industrial base, if allowed to go ahead the way it is, will characterize this government's attitude with regard to the four Atlantic provinces.

This is a good country. The subject matter of this resolution gives me very little difficulty though I disagree wholeheartedly with the unilateral way in which the government is acting. Since we are so close to unanimity among the provinces and the federal government on the amending formula, why deny us the time? Some members opposite say it is not a question of time, but that it is about time. Watch them all applaud. Silence. I caught them in their own act. Why can we not have a little more time?

I said earlier that it was wrong for the provinces to go to the courts, but the Prime Minister has forced them to do that. I wish they would have said: let us have patriation with an agreed-upon amending formula. Then we could have had a debate we could all understand instead of muddying the waters with detail.

We are asking the British Parliament to deal with matters we will not deal with ourselves. That is wrong and I object to it. As an Atlantic Canadian and as a Nova Scotian, I say the government is going about this the wrong way. They are sowing the seeds which will tear this country apart. Do you not know Newfoundland? If you did not listen to the premier of that province last night, I suggest you obtain a transcript and read it, because he was serious. The premier of the province of Alberta did not just put through the matter of a referendum just willy-nilly, and if you think you can fight that, you are wrong. You are addressing yourselves to a break-up of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: What would you know about it? Why do you not go there and find out? What the hell would you know about it? Go out there and find out. Go out to Fort McMurray and into Tyvan, Saskatchewan and ask the wheat growers. Go to Ecum Secum. Stand on the wharf and see what the people think of what you are doing. Go to Lloydminster. Go to Vegreville. Go into the valleys of British Columbia. Go into those magnificent mountains. Go and find out. Hon. members over there are supporting a leader who is sowing the seeds of destruction of a way of life in this country. The British Crown that you fellows so deride has not served us badly for 200 years—not 53 years, but 200 years.

Let us get agreement and let us proceed by way of agreement, not by way of confrontation or fighting or argument. Why divide and conquer a country that wants to get on with living and working, providing for its families and providing for national and international security?

This matter before us is important. It is important to all of us. Our blind following of the dictates of a man who wants to be prime minister of a unitary state, a man who wants to be president of his own republic, will lead only to dissension and division. As I mentioned earlier—and this is especially for the Minister of Transport, the distinguished co-chairman from our committee—to suggest to those who know him that he has decided, to support this measure because it is politically prudent, is a position that is not acceptable to me. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the longer this debate goes on, the more often and the more frequent hon. members opposite will hear their constituents voicing their objections to the unilateral action they are so blindly supporting.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I could say, along with most members who have participated in this debate, that I am happy to be taking part in it. But I am not going to say that. I am not going to say that for much the same reasons as the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) expressed earlier this evening.

I come from a region which has been denied a voice, denied a voice at the table and, until now, denied a voice in the debate. The spokesman for our party, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) when opening this debate was the first to speak of Canadians above the 60th parallel. I want to add that voice to this debate in addition to the hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

It has been the intention of our party to approach the issue of constitutional change in a comprehensive and open-minded manner. That has always been our intention. It has been rendered extremely difficult by the Prime Minister's arbitrary and capricious method of imposing change through the medium of the British Parliament against the strongly voiced opposition of the majority of the premiers of this country. It has been rendered difficult also by his refusal to accept the fact that the premiers have exactly the same rights and privileges in matters under their jurisdiction as he, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has in federal matters. They have the same right and responsibility to put forward their views on matters affecting their provinces. It has been rendered difficult, too, by his insistence upon regarding the constitutional issue as a very personal one, one that he is peculiarly qualified to solve—so he thinks—to the point where all those who dare disagree are stigmatized as anti-Canadian. And that has been the tack over there. It has been rendered difficult, too, by the Prime Minister's insistence on creating straw men—putting the premiers in a false position, by setting out the issues in his terms, and in his terms only. It has been rendered difficult, too, by the deliberate attempt of the Liberal government party to mould, to shape and to manipulate public opinion in this country under the guise of legitimate advertising, and embarking on a new era of mind control, the Orwellian 1984 concept.

Since it is my intention to move an amendment this evening, rather than run out of time before doing so, I intend to put it to the House now and then carry on with my remarks. I put this amendment to the House in the hope that it will be accepted in the sense of parliamentary fair play, in keeping with the rules as they used to be before they were altered by the present Prime Minister thus rendering less effective the meaningfulness of this place. I hope it will gain the support of those to my left who appear not to be listening. They might as well be across the aisle for all it matters. From what I hear on the news tonight, they believe they are there. I think, Mr. Speaker, the fix is in and that there will be some kind of perception, some attempt to create the kind of conciliatory process which will allow the public to come away with the belief that the Prime Minister has graciously conceded to the adjurations of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr.

Broadbent). That is a sham and it will come back to haunt them.

An hon. Member: That is democracy.

Mr. Nielsen: That is democratic? Hon. members over there would not know what democratic is or what it means.

The motion I wish to move for your consideration, Mr. Speaker—and you may want to take it under advisement until tomorrow—is:

That the motion now before the House be amended by adding thereto after the sixth paragraph the following:

Notwithstanding any Standing Orders or practices of either House, the committee shall have the power to table a minority report with its main report, and any such report shall be tabled by the committee if signed by three or more members of the committee.

Quite apart from the numerical qualifications in that motion, that used to be our practice in this place. But a few years ago, under the changes in the rules—would the gentleman bring back the copy of my speech please? It is caught under the copy of the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Table your speech.

● (2050)

Mr. Nielsen: Notwithstanding that the present Prime Minister had those rules changed, the fact remains that it used to be the practice in this place that a dissenting voice in committee could be heard. However, under the changes he brought about, they cannot be heard at all, a matter of such importance as this is an occasion when, if there is a minority voice to be heard, it should be heard, and that is the purpose of the resolution.

If they are not out to gag us and if they are not out to preclude another point of view being heard, there will be no difficulty over there and certainly no difficulty on my left. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is in his seat now. He remembers this procedure very well.

Mr. Knowles: No, I have never heard of it.

Mr. Nielsen: You have never heard of a minority report?

Mr. Knowles: Never heard of it.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, I am surprised.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly. That used to be a custom which seems to have been forgotten in this place, but we always permit questions.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: Is he not confusing the fact that minority members in committee have made statements outside the House and reports to the press, with what he is now proposing? I do not recall a committee ever having a minority report tabled in the House.

Mr. Nielsen: The committee itself never had the power to file a minority report, but members on the committee had the opportunity to file a minority report.

Mr. Chénier: Now you are confused.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not the one who is confused. It is that hon. member over there who keeps hopping from seat to seat and interjecting and never taking part in debates who I always hear.

In the instrument that is now before Parliament the Prime Minister and his Liberal government are attempting to do something which has never been attempted in this country before and perhaps not in any country at all with a constitutional and parliamentary democracy.

They are attempting unilaterally to rewrite and revise the constitution in a manner decided upon by the Prime Minister and his advisers in the bowels of the Langevin Block in areas—and there certainly can be no argument on the opposite side or to my left—which are definitely as well under provincial jurisdiction as they are under federal. They are attempting not simply to patriate but unilaterally to rewrite and deeply revise the constitution in a manner decided upon by the Prime Minister and his advisers. They are attempting to impose upon all Canadians, regardless of their political belief, a Liberal party constitution created in the smoke-filled backrooms in the bowels of l'Édifice Langevin. I know. I have been there, and I know how they operate over there.

An hon. Member: For how long?

Mr. Nielsen: I know where all this nonsense came from.

Mr. Harquail: How long were you there?

Mr. Nielsen: We may not have been there long, and perhaps the people of this country will very soon have cause to regret that we were not there a little bit longer. However, that is where this kind of leaked cabinet document for-ministers'-eyes-only comes from.

When I read this document and studied it, I went back to my copy of "Machiavelli the Prince". I read it and re-read it and compared it. I had two copies of "Machiavelli the Prince". I burned my other one because this cabinet document is the update. "Machiavelli the Prince" is now irrelevant. It has no more meaning because this cabinet document is the update on how to manoeuvre, manipulate and shape public opinion to conform with Liberal policy while it is being made. This is a very, very dangerous direction for the political life of this country to be taking.

Knowing that what they are doing cannot be done constitutionally in Canada, they are going over to ask the British Parliament to change the constitution for them. They do not have the courage to do it here. They do not have the courage to submit what they are attempting to the scrutiny of public debate here. They are going to the British parliament to do it for them. That is a strange performance for a government which, though constantly reiterating its desire to remove the vestiges of colonialism, places us in the north, as my colleague, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq said today, in a strait-jacket of colonialism where Liberal policy will keep us forever and a day.

The constitution is more than a document. It is more than a scrap of paper. It is the backbone of a nation. Canadians in general have a vision of what this country is and ought to be, and I am convinced that it is not the view put forward by the Prime Minister and the present government. In his discussions with the premiers the Prime Minister spoke of two versions of Canada—his, and that upheld by the premiers. The Prime Minister's version is now embodied in the document placed before the House, and it is a version which enables the federal government to impose its views on all Canadians. We on this side and, indeed, across the country have reiterated the position that no one is opposed to patriation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We think the constitution should come back, but we think it should be brought back unaltered and unchanged, and it should be brought back, the British North America Act, exactly as it has been since 1867.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We think that whatever changes are made should be made in Canada by Canadians and certainly through a process of consensus involving the premiers rather than by arbitrary imposition, which is the direction this government is taking.

We are told now that it was only because of a last minute cooling off among the Prime Minister's advisers that there is not included in this document before us a device for the assumption by the federal government of equally arbitrary economic powers. Anyone who witnessed the Prime Minister's performance at the federal-provincial first ministers' conference will not feel any surprise at this information. Nothing could be more disruptive of the state of unity of this nation than the attitude of the Prime Minister, and attitude which has done more to sow the seeds of disunity in this country since he took office in 1968 than any other single force in our history. His idea is to bulldoze—and that is the word for it, bulldoze—his version of confederation into place regardless of those elected to represent the people and the views of the people of the provinces. Mark my words, sir, I fully expect hon. members opposite, led by the present Prime Minister, to impose closure on us in this very important debate.

Mr. Harquail: It won't be necessary.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for whatever says it will not be necessary. I have travelled a few times with him. I have a hard enough time remembering the ridings of my own area.

Mr. Harquail: Tell us what Joe told you to say.

Mr. Nielsen: The member for nowhere. I am speaking about the democratic process in this country, which is something the hon. member should study. If he does so, he might understand it.

What the Prime Minister is doing now in bulldozing his version of his confederation into place is nothing short of an invitation to anarchy. Those are my views and the views which are being expressed by Canadians in the north who, up until this afternoon, have been denied any voice in this debate. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) likens us to municipalities, but he and others like him, including the hon. member who is interjecting now, have their own premiers to speak for them. We do not.

Mr. Harquail: Our premier is with us.

Mr. Nielsen: Regardless of where a premier is at, yea or nay, he at least speaks for the people of his province. Canadians above the 60th parallel were denied that basic fundamental right. Hon. members talk about entrenchment of a charter of human rights to speak, feel and think as we please. We, as Canadians above the 60th, cannot even be heard, and that is what we object to. To be heard is fundamental to any democratic process. We have been denied even that right.

An hon. Member: You are being heard right now.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear an interjection from my left, probably from someone from Saskatchewan. I do not know. It came from over there.

Mr. Riis: Behind you.

Mr. Nielsen: All right. I will let you go this time.

Mr. Althouse: We were listening.

Mr. Nielsen: Nothing could be more disruptive of the state of unity in this country. That goes without saying. The Prime Minister used the constitutional issue to catapult himself to the leadership of his party in the first instance, and he has been flogging the same horse ever since. At the Victoria conference, the Prime Minister would have been delighted to acquire from the premiers present an assurance of constitutional change guaranteeing the right of both languages from coast to coast. He was unable to get their consensus, partly because of resistance in the west but more because of the objections of the Liberal Premier of Quebec who had his own ideas about language rights embodied in Bill 22 of that province. Later it was further elaborated in Bill 101 under the separatist government of Premier Lévesque and had the effect of removing from parents the right to choose the language of education.

● (2100)

I want to say immediately to members from that province, most of whom are opposite, that I have been an advocate of constitutional recognition of language rights since entering this House. I am on record more than once to that effect. The Prime Minister bit off half the apple in the Official Languages Act, which was, as you will recall, sir, the constitutional amendment slipped in under the table but which did not give constitutional authority to the sweeping recognition of languages which he was seeking.

So now he is back with the declaration of rights, through which he seeks to smuggle into the constitution language recognition which he could not achieve in any other way because at this stage it is unacceptable to quite a number of the provinces, including the province of Quebec.

Again I would emphasize that in my own personal view the question of educational and language rights is fundamental. It relates directly to the freedom of the individual and should be recognized in any constitution of this country. At the same time, it cannot be forced down the throats of the provinces without grave danger to national unity. We are discovering it in this debate, we are discovering it in the editorials of the leading newspapers throughout the country, including all of them in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. lady wishes to ask a question, I would be very happy to respond. No? I would point out, sir, that the constitution of 1867 provided certain recognition by the Fathers of Confederation, who were signatories of that document as well as of those thereafter, of language and educational rights in the provinces.

As pointed out recently by Premier Buchanan, the Prime Minister and his government have no mandate to make changes in the constitution over the objections of the provinces.

To make changes, as Mr. St. Laurent did in 1949, following consultation and consensus is one thing. To attempt to do so over the objections of the majority of provincial premiers, nullifies, of course, the Prime Minister's own amending formula and, in effect, strikes at the fabric of Canada.

If the Prime Minister has abrogated his sense of responsibility in an unreasoning insistence on creating a place in history for himself regardless of the consequences to Canada, surely there must be some people on the government side who recognize and realize what Canada is all about.

This nation was built on compromise, not revolution; on mutual agreement, not constitutional activism; on consensus, not the arbitrary imposition of one person's ideas. It is time for the Prime Minister and the government to stop treating the constitution as a scrap of paper. Over and over we have heard it referred to as a British document. In fact it is a Canadian document, created by Canadians and drafted by Canadians long before it went to London.

We have all agreed that there must be change. As far as the Prime Minister is concerned, the necessity to consult and the need for unanimity or near unanimity simply represents what he calls a strait-jacket. It is understandable that he would feel that way, but this is the kind of federal-provincial balance the Canadian people want. At one time or another, the rule of consultation and consensus, which has never insisted on unanimity, has been called forth by every premier, of Quebec as well as of the other provinces. In fact, no province today is complaining more loudly than Quebec, from all political quarters in that province.

An hon. Member: Do you want Lévesque?

Mr. Nielsen: I do not know the hon. member's riding but he asks whether I want Lévesque. I will not join issue with him.

Even the material made available by the Prime Minister's office to Liberal party members—and I have it all—outlining and commenting on the highlights of the proposed resolution makes it clear that what we are talking about is more than simple patriation. What we are talking about, in effect, deals with far-reaching and major constitutional amendments smuggled in under the guise of patriation. That material says in part:

In addition to patriation, the resolution contains several important constitutional provisions:

Then it goes on to list them. We have already heard from members on this side with respect to our objections to section 42, one of the most invidious sections in the whole of the constitutional proposal.

I repeat, sir, that there is no quarrel whatever with simple patriation. There is no quarrel, so far as I and members on this side are concerned, with recognizing equal language rights from coast to coast. But what we have before us is infinitely more than that. This is a hastily thrown together attempt to produce what is now in effect a new and revised constitution, using the device of patriation. It is an unprincipled attempt, I suggest, to use the British Parliament to bring about amendments which the government does not have the constitutional authority or the moral fortitude to bring about by itself. Furthermore, it has all been brought about in the context of an almost unanimous rejection by the premiers of the provinces of the pretension of this government to go it alone in major and substantial constitutional changes.

We have the right to ask whether the government's emissaries, those extraordinary envoys who have apprised the British parliament of these facts, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the minister for government propaganda—I cannot remember the proper name of his portfolio—

An hon. Member: The Minister of Communications.

Mr. Nielsen: That is it, that is the nice term. They went over there to see the Queen. One is irresistibly reminded of the nursery rhyme:

Pussy cat, pussy cat, where have you been?
I have been to London to see the Queen.
Pussy cat, pussy cat, what did you do there?
I caught a little mouse under the chair.

Mr. Speaker, methinks it was a rat they caught under the chair. That is what is hidden in this document. If the Prime Minister and the government are permitted to carry this resolution through to a conclusion, we will be dealing with a new and different constitution imposed hastily and against the wishes of the majority of the provinces. All the checks and balances which have grown up over 100 years will be destroyed.

Coming to the performance of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien)—who was here earlier tonight and I am sorry is not here now—I want to make as many allowances for him as possible because, through the years, he has been a good friend of mine. We all understand his commitment to constitutional revision, which is second only to that of the Prime Minister. He has talked about promises made during the referendum campaign. We have no way of knowing, of course, what promises the minister may have made within the purlieus of his own riding. For all we know, he may have promised the moon. But he cannot expect Parliament to make good on all the promises he may have made in the referendum campaign. He may have been guilty of overselling, but that is between himself and his electors. We are dealing with an attempt by the government to do away in one fell swoop with a system we have enjoyed for over 100 years. We are dealing with an attempt to replace a system we have enjoyed for over a century with one devised by the Prime Minister. We are faced with a situation which is absolutely unique in our history when the Government of Canada decides to revise and amend, in effect to rewrite, the Canadian Constitution through the instrumentality of the British parliament, in spite of the fact that the majority of the provinces are against it.

What are the principles embodied in the Prime Minister's amending formula? How easily he and his government toss them aside when it is a question of replacing the constitution with one that they want. How easily we can understand the socialist government of Saskatchewan and the position of the socialist party in this House. They believe in the absolute right of the state to control everything. That is their overriding principle and the mere matter of the constitution does not change that position, despite the remarks of the critic for the NDP. There have been criticisms, too, from the government side, of the proposal, by the premiers to take the government to court to block the proposed action. I can see nothing wrong with that. An implication that this action is undemocratic or indefensible is not quite understandable when that party themselves referred Bill 60 to the Supreme Court.

I put it this way, sir. If it is not unconstitutional for the federal government to rewrite and revise the Constitution of Canada unilaterally, then what could possibly be unconstitutional? I do not see how any of these proposals can have any effect at the provincial level unless the provincial legislatures ratify and agree with them. Certainly the proposed bill of rights, which falls squarely within the property and civil rights section of provincial jurisdiction, can end any legal standing in any province until and unless adopted by the legislature of that province.

It made me sick to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and others opposite refer to the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker's proposals. Mr. Diefenbaker would not be pursuing the course that is being pursued here today. He would have sent his Bill of Rights to London and he would have had it incorporated into the constitution. He would not have gone even that far without the consensus of the provincial premiers, because if any man in this country knew what the constitutional bounds rested upon, it was that right hon. gentleman who is no longer with us. The first ones to cry loudly to Heaven against such an action would have been those who sit opposite. Mr. Diefenbaker was too good a Canadian and too good a constitutionalist to engage in this kind of constitutional sleight of hand.

I say to the Liberal majority over there—those who won an election by telling the people of Canada that they would not increase the price of oil and who are now riding roughshod over provincial rights—that there is a great deal more to the constitutional arrangement than a scrap of paper, which is how they seem to regard it. The constitution can only be honoured if it is respected by those it is intended to serve. It cannot be imposed and forced upon people by a government majority in Parliament. I repeat, we are for patriation; bring it back and we will support it. But bring it back unchanged. When it is in Canadian hands then we will go about amending the constitution in a constitutional way, in Canada.

What the government is doing is illegal by the criteria of their own formula. We want language rights; we will put them in the constitution when each province ratifies that proposal within its own jurisdiction. That is what Quebec wants and that is what the majority of the provinces want. This, sir, is an amendment by force, an amendment by compulsion. This is nothing more or less than the rape of the constitution by the Liberal party. Speaker after speaker over there has risen to say agreement cannot be reached. That is their excuse for going this route. They say the provinces are too slow in consenting, that they do not move quickly enough for this Liberal majority. It used to be the socialists who were Liberals in a hurry and now it is the Liberals who are republicans in a hurry. They cannot wait for the exercise of provincial rights so they wipe them out, wipe them right out of the book. If you can do this you can do anything.

The Prime Minister has already promised to make further changes satisfactory and appealing to his friends, allies and bedmates in the NDP. Apparently that has happened tonight. I do not know what the details are, but it is all part and parcel of their tactics. The Prime Minister's attitude is that the constitution belongs to him and to the Liberal party. He will make the changes. He will write in whatever they want. He has absolute power. What is a constitution worth under those circumstances? It is simply a Liberal document put together in the back rooms of the Liberal party and shoved down the throats of an unwilling nation. Can anyone blame the premiers for going to court? Perhaps in the courts of this country they will find some last vestige of constitutional consciousness, some recognition that the constitution is not the personal property of the Liberal party and the Prime Minister. How often have we heard the cry: "They are moving too slowly for us, so we will shove it down their throats; they are impeding our course, so out they must go"? We have heard it over and over again in the procedural arguments, particularly after the House leader spoke the other day. All of a sudden the clamps came down; everybody was supposed to stop talking, stop debating and away we go, in the face of the Prime Minister's assurance that every single member of this House, from all parts of the country, would have freedom to express his views.

When this matter goes to committee, sir, that committee rule of the guillotine after five minutes is going to be imposed by the Liberal majority. Make no mistake about it, there will be no opportunity for any meaningful participation in debate. Even if it were possible somehow to avoid the tricky process which the government has adopted in putting this matter before the House, we cannot touch the substance of the matter at all. All we can debate is the resolution, as was pointed out by the opposition House leader. We dare to oppose so down we go. We are dead. We are emasculated by the process which has been designed by the government in Machiavellian terms to bring this about. We cannot even ask for time to make suggestions. Not even that. The new absolutism does not tolerate criticism. The new might, the manipulation of the public mind to suit the policies to be shaped by the government in power, does not tolerate criticism. It crushes it beneath the boots of the hobnailed Liberal majority just as it crushed the life out any attempt by Canadians who live above the 60th parallel to be heard at that table. We were not important enough. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) says we only number 25,000 people. But we have 15,000 voters, which is more than the combined total of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia when they came into confederation, and we have been fighting for 25 years—a quarter of a century—to get into confederation on the basis of contributing to the constitutional and federated fabric of this country. But as long as that party sits over there, sir, we will never realize our legitimate aspiration, the aspiration of Canadians who are just as equal as any Canadian in southern Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly on a point of order, as we sometimes say, to set the record straight. During the course of his speech, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said that in the old days the tabling of minority reports by committees was always the practice. I questioned this comment and he challenged by memory when I said that in the years that I have been here I have never known a committee of the House to be permitted to table a minority report.

It would take a great deal of time if I sought to read everything that is written on the issue, but I draw the attention of my hon. friend to Beauchesne, fifth edition, citations 640, 641 and so on. If the hon. member thinks that the fifth edition is a recent edition published since certain rule changes were made, I would refer him back to the fourth edition of Beauchesne which was published in 1958 and draw to his attention citations 318 and 319. In both these volumes it is made clear that the only report that can be tabled by a committee is the report passed by the majority. The citations even go so far as to say that the chairman of the committee must sign that report even if he was against it. Beauchesne clearly says that no minority report can be tabled. If that is not enough, I would refer the hon. member to May's, nineteenth edition, pages 658 and 659 where the same practice is outlined.

I am not rising at this point to enter into any discussion on the procedural admissibility of the hon. member's motion; I am merely confirming my memory and questioning his. He really cannot get away with the statement that in the old days minority reports were tabled. They were released outside the House, but not in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair thanks the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his intervention and reserves judgment on the admissibility of the proposed amendment. If any hon. members would care to offer argument at this point concerning admissibility of the amendment, the Chair would entertain them.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay debate on the motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Why are members opposite laughing? They have been jeering throughout this whole debate, so I guess it is not surprising. I do not want to delay the House by speaking to the admissibility of the motion, but I do want to say that there is a difference between what I am saying and what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is saying. Minority reports were not accepted as separate reports at the table, nor were they accepted as reports coming from the committee, but in those days there was the kind of approach to procedure in committee by which, if there were numbers favouring a minority view—and I forget the numbers—or even a sense by the committee chairman and members on the committee that there was a minority point of view, then that point of view came forward under the signature of the chairman.

I am not trying to sell the House the idea that there used to be a right to table minority reports, not at all.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what you said earlier.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member may have misunderstood what I was saying. He knows as well as I do that minority viewpoints were included in the report when it came back before the House and they were debated. That, in essence, is what is being proposed by this motion—a right, because of changes in the practices here, for the minority voice in that committee to go forward with the report notwithstanding any rules and practices that may exist now.

If that amendment is not accepted we know what will happen. I appeal to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has been around through the changes, because a minority report will not see the light of day in any report which comes back to this House. My sole objective in moving this amendment is to ensure that if there is a minority voice which emerges in our committee considerations it will be heard and debated in this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, you invited hon. members to comment, if they wish, on whether or not the amendment is receivable. I should like to say a few words in that regard. My colleagues spoke of the good old days. I can go back no further than 1972 for obvious reasons, but I could perhaps draw your attention to the Journals for March 16, 1972, page 194, where it is stipulated that:

> Though, in its report, a committee can mention the opinion of those of its members who do not share the views of the majority of their colleagues, it may not table a minority report in the House.

Obviously, it is pointless for me to add anything more. That, then, is the extent of my participation to the debate in answer to your invitation to comment on whether or not the amendment is receivable; once again, that amendment is nothing but another dilatory measure proposed by a Progressive Conservative member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the minister.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I would like to say that the proposal we are debating is, as members opposite tell us, concerned with the protection of minorities. Perhaps we should start protecting the minorities of this House. This House is its own master, irrespective of what it says in Beauchesne. The Alberta legislature, which is more democratic, has been accepting minority reports—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: If you throw a stone at a bunch of dogs and three or four of them start howling, you know what happens. I myself have signed a minority report on a legislative committee in Alberta. Surely this House will not deny the rights of the minority when the whole matter about which we are talking is for the protection of those rights.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest with respect to our process tonight that the Chair take the amendment under advisement and hear argument tomorrow as to its admissibility or inadmissibility so that we may proceed with the debate tonight. I understand that the hon. parliamentary secretary opposite intends to follow me in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has indicated its reservations concerning the admissibility of the amendment and has invited comments at this stage. If there is no further comment, the Chair will recognize speakers in the debate.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the admissibility of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), it seems to me that it is not only a matter for your consideration but also for the consideration of the government. If it does in fact wish to present this matter in good faith as good Canadians, I submit that it should support the presentation of this amendment by the hon. member for Yukon. If, on the other hand, they wish and intend to frustrate the process which has been practised in this House and in this nation since 1867, then they will certainly impose their influence upon you to rule this motion out of order. You, sir, as the Speaker, have acknowledged your responsibility. I hope that the native responsibilities which are incumbent upon a broad-minded government will cause it to pursue a favourable consideration of this motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would call to the attention of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) that it will rule within its own capacity on the admissibility of the amendment. If there are any further comments on the admissibility of the proposed amendment, the Chair would like to hear them now and, if not, the Chair will defer its decision until tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because I have suggested in a spirit of reasonableness that we suspend the argument on the amendment until tomorrow rather than interrupting the progress of the debate tonight. If I am going to be precluded from speaking to the matter tomorrow, I would point out—

Mr. Knowles: Thursday, tomorrow, is an opposition day.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry, it is Thursday. The hon. member has correctly pointed out that tomorrow is an opposition day. The intervention by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), who is very skilful at throwing sand in these debates on procedural matters, has nothing to do with the existing rules simply because of the opening words of the motion. There may have been a flaw and, indeed, one must go along with the Chair's ruling pursuant to the practices of this House with respect to the amendment presented by the opposition House leader the other day. That amendment was not prefaced by the words "notwithstanding the Standing Orders and practices of either House", as those words prefaced the amendment we are discussing now.

• (2130)

What this amendment is requesting the House to do is to suspend the very Standing Order which the government House leader asks the Chair to invoke against it. It is asking the House to suspend the Standing Orders and practices of the House for the purpose of ensuring that a gag will not be placed on the voice of the minority on that committee. Any member who has been around here for any time at all, knows what happens in committee. We are gagged by a five-minute rule.

We are gagged by a Liberal majority which, if it does not stay there, walks out when something happens that does not please it. This amendment ensures that there will be carried into practice the very thing that the government is asking us to enshrine in its bill of rights in this constitution amendment, namely, the voice of the minority.

That is what this amendment is asking the government to do. They can adopt the course of trying to stonewall it by procedural argument—asking the Chair to rule it out of order on procedural grounds, but if they did the right thing and were not afraid of the minority voice they would allow it to be heard when that report comes back to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has heard the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) three times on the point of order. One aspect, however, has not been touched on by anyone who has spoken to date and that is the references to the practices of either House. The Chair has some concern about a resolution of this House apparently giving an instruction concerning the practices of the other place. That is a matter which, I am sure, the Chair will take under advisement.

As I indicated earlier, at this stage the Chair would like to reserve judgment. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer).

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief observation to make. It seems to me that in the democratic system that is embodied in this chamber, one of the most difficult and most delicate things a democratic system has to deal with is the treatment of minorities once the majority has assumed power. If we, by definition are the minority in this House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has asked hon. members to defer comment on the point of order unless they have something fundamental to contribute. The Chair would like to recognize speakers in the general debate with the concurrence of the House. This was the suggestion made by hon. members, including the mover of the amendment. With the concurrence of the House the Chair would like to proceed in this way.

Are there other hon. members who wish to speak on the motion before the House?

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen)—

An hon. Member: Three in a row.

An hon. Member: Filibuster!

An hon. Member: Why don't you people on the government side speak?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte has the floor.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, if we on this side of the House had not seen a member detained or discouraged from rising to speak on this subject, I would not have the pleasure of being on my feet now.

I submit to you, as I think will become evident from many of the speeches in this debate, that those who are so avidly following the course of self-destruction of this nation proposed by this government have rightly and properly shown by their interjections—as they have just now—that perhaps there was some excuse after all for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when, in a petulant mood, he stated that backbenchers are nobodies. If they want to prove that they are somebodies, this would be a great time to do it.

As has been pointed out by my colleagues on many occasions, this is indeed an historic debate and one in which, in a way, I find no great pleasure in participating. I think it implies that we either recognize the concept on which this nation was founded or we may be laying the foundation of its destruction. This is a debate on a resolution that has the potential to alter the face of this country like no other before it. I believe that if this resolution is accepted in its present form it will change the shape of federalism as it has existed historically and that it may not be accepted as a favourable change.

I think it would be valuable to spend some time examining the force of federalism over the last century, because if this is to be called an historic debate, then, I say, history should play a part in the determination of its climax. The precedents set by the wise men of the past, and the examination of those precedents, should not be overlooked yet I submit that this motion could not have been presented had those precedents been given consideration by the government.

The good of the proposed nation as a whole was the primary objective of those who gave this nation their earliest consideration. Although these men had differences, they put those differences behind them and proposed a union that would be mutually beneficial to all parties concerned. This sense of co-operation can perhaps be best summed up in a report carried in the Saint John Morning Telegraph on September 9, 1864, which read as follows:

> The leading argument advanced by the Canadian delegation may be expressed in a few words—there are three elements requisite to national prosperity—territory, population and commerce. We have the first two . . . we want . . . your commercial advantage. We have territory, we have population—we offer them to you. We ask in return an outlet to the ocean—your maritime facilities. Two of the essentials in a country's prosperity are ours, one is yours. Isolated and apart our progress must only be slow at best. United and combined we have all the elements within ourselves of commercial, social and political progress.

What could be more applicable to Canada than that latter statement, Mr. Speaker? There was a deep understanding of the spirit of co-operation. I repeat the words "isolated and apart our progress must only be slow at best." Together we have all the elements of progress. Continuance of isolation in those days, that is, preservation of regional jealousies and unwillingness to compromise, would have meant that Canada as we know it today would never have existed. Jose Howe, a chief opponent of Confederation realized the need for agreement and a sense of fair play when he said:

> If an honest, practicable scheme of union can be arranged, let it be printed—and when it has been aired in all the provinces . . . They will sincerely support the union. If tricked or bullied out of what they highly value, they will never be content.

I suggest that hon. members opposite look at the words of Mr. Howe whom history books identify as one of theirs. If tricked or bullied—I emphasize especially that word "bullied", they will never be content. It seems obvious to me that the government has found itself unable to arrange an honest practicable scheme for bringing home the constitution and has chosen to bully the provinces into accepting those things which they oppose. They will also have the opportunity, some day in the future, by way of their proposed referendum in section 42, to trick the provinces out of what is rightly theirs. To them, I say Joseph Howe was absolutely right when he said that this sort of policy would create incurable dissension.

So we see that compromise was the theme of the day and eventually it led to confederation. But the compromise did not stop there, for if it had we would never have survived as a country to see this day. No, this sense of co-operation and willingness to make certain concessions on behalf of many people is the underlying principle that has allowed Canada to become what it is today—the largest country in the world operating within the structures of co-operative federalism. This has come about because leaders of government have, over the last 100 years, chosen to pursue the ideals set out in that original agreement, those of co-operation, concession, reconciliation of differences and a spirit of unity in working toward a common goal—a Canada they love.

I think it might be wise to spend a few minutes examining some of the examples that have occurred over the past 100 years to illustrate the points I have just set forth. Many amendments to the British North America Act have been brought about over the years. I will come to those shortly. First, though, let us examine some of the lines of thought developed over a period of years with respect toward the union of the British North American provinces. In 1888 in an editorial in the Toronto Globe, the following philosophy was extended:

> The provinces party to the bargain, were, at the time of the compact, independent nations in the sense that they enjoyed self-government subject to the Imperial veto upon their legislation, to the Imperial appointment of the Governor General and to the Queen's command of the forces. The dominion was the creation of the provinces, or in other words, was created by the British parliament at the request of the provinces. The dominion, being non-existent at the time the bargain was made, was plainly not a party to the bargain. It cannot then be a party to the revision of the bargain.

Bear in mind this was in 1880 when already there were some pressures for changes in the bargaining procedures. Although this idea may be somewhat extreme in its exclusion of the central government from the amending process, it does bear out a valuable thesis, that the provinces were the creators of the federal government and therefore must play a vital role in any revision of the original pact. I submit that that is certainly not the case today. One year later a former prime minister, the Right Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, recognized the vital sense of agreement that must pervade any discussion on the topic of federalism when he said:

> The only means of maintaining confederation is to recognize that, within its sphere assigned to it by the constitution, each province is as independent of control by the federal Parliament as the latter is from control by the provincial legislatures.

This perhaps may be the best assessment of that tenuous fine line that defines our system of government. Each of the 11 governments is independent of the other within the framework of the original agreement. What actually lies at the very heart of Mr. Laurier's statement and is most important in any interpretation of that statement, is that no government should act unilaterally to overrule the other. Once again, the spirit of co-operation is emphasized as being essential in this assessment of confederation. Mr. Laurier was much more forceful in his comment on the distribution of powers when he wrote to Lomer Gouin, a member of the Quebec legislative assembly in 1918. In that letter he said:

> To give to the central government, which is drawn from the majority race and the majority religion, the authority to interfere in the jurisdiction assigned to the provinces, is to destroy the legislative independence of the provinces and to make of it a snare and a mockery.

Just what is the hon. gentleman saying? He is asserting that any attempt by the central government to move into provincial jurisdiction such as is proposed to this House presently is to make the authority of the provinces a mockery and essentially to destroy them as a voice of government as originally set out in the British North America Act. It would seem to me that there is no better appraisal of the outcome of the passage of this proposed resolution than that delivered by Mr. Laurier over 60 years ago. Let me quote from another authority:

> Federalism is by its very essence a compromise and a pact. It is a compromise in the sense that when national consensus on all things is not desirable or cannot readily obtain, the area of consensus is reduced in order that consensus on some things may be reached. It is a pact or quasi-treaty, in the sense that the terms of that compromise cannot be changed unilaterally. This is not to say that the terms are fixed forever, but only that in changing them, every effort must be made not to destroy the consensus on which the federated nation rests.

That was a quote from the great man himself, the Prime Minister. This of course was his philosophy prior to his rise to power and his attempts to lead Canada down the garden path to a unitary state. It was back in 1964 that the right hon. gentleman delivered a paper to a conference of Canadian law teachers and political scientists whom he was no doubt trying to impress with his wise assessment of the Canadian governmental system.

I must say there are very few times that I find myself in agreement with the Prime Minister, but I find it very easy to agree with him on that statement. I believe, though, that every effort has not been made by the present government to preserve the vital consensus upon which the federated nation rests, if I may borrow the words of the right hon. gentleman. It is fine to say all of these things, but unless such sentiments as they convey are put into practice they are of little value.

For the next few minutes, I would like to examine some of the actions of various men throughout history which do, in fact, embody the philosophies I have just cited. First let us look at the example of 1907 when an amendment was proposed with regard to the federal subsidies paid to the provinces. It is of little relevance to this debate to spend any time on the amounts proposed or the amounts that had been paid in the past. It is sufficient to realize that all parties acknowledged the need to update the system under which such subsidies were administered. The issue had been discussed at a federal-provincial conference convened solely for the purpose of that discussion. It was there, with a provincial premier as the chairman of the conference, I might add, that agreement was reached between the federal government and all provinces save British Columbia as to how the provisions for subsidies should be changed. British Columbia's opposition was later taken into consideration and some changes were made to accommodate that province. It was Wilfrid Laurier, who was prime minister of the day, and his wisdom, which I noted earlier, which prevailed. He again reiterated his philosophy in the House of Commons in 1907 by saying:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this House and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered.

That is so true. The compact should not be lightly altered and it was not altered by Mr. Laurier. He managed to reach a consensus with the parties concerned and then and only then did he submit the proposed change to the British Parliament for approval. However, as I mentioned earlier, the government of British Columbia was not completely satisfied with the deal which was proposed so it petitioned the British government asking them to change the wording of the amendment. This was done because, as Winston Churchill put it in a speech to the British Parliament, "I would be very sorry if it were thought that the action which His Majesty's government had decided to take meant that they had decided to establish as a precedent that whenever there is a difference on a constitutional question between the federal government and the provinces, the Imperial government would always be prepared to accept the federal point of view as against the provincial." He did not want it understood in Canada that the Imperial government would let the child of the provinces, the federal government, be the dominant master of the government of the United Kingdom. That was his position. The provinces should prevail, consensus should be reached.

That is an opinion to be highly regarded and a precedent to be taken seriously. And it is in no way one that is buried deep in the volumes of history. The Daily Telegraph of London just a couple of weeks ago made the assertion that Mr. Churchill's view of such a situation should still apply, that is, that the British Parliament is under no obligation to accept the federal view as the final word regardless of threatening statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts). On the other hand, it is well within their rights to heed the voices of the provincial governments in this current struggle. Also I might add that they are well aware of the differences between the federal and provincial governments as evidenced by statements in the press such as the one I have just noted and the comments made by some members of the British parliament. These men seem to be in no way intimidated by the threats of the dynamic duo.

The second example which I feel deserves mention took place in 1940. It is one that I believe establishes a rather valuable precedent with regard to the matter currently before this House. In 1935 the government of the then prime minister, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, enacted legislation to establish unemployment insurance in Canada. The government of the day believed it to be within its jurisdiction to enact such legislation and they had been advised by their counsel to that effect. The opposition, under Mr. Mackenzie King, had demanded a referral to the Supreme Court for its opinion on the validity of such legislation. However, an election was called before such action could be taken. When the new Parliament took office—and I ask members on the other side to note this—under Mr. Mackenzie King the legislation was indeed referred to the Supreme Court which ruled that it was ultra vires of Parliament. An appeal was then launched before the Privy Council, at that time the highest authority on such matters. The Privy Council handed down its decision in 1936 which read in part as follows:

> —Dominion legislation, even though it deals with dominion property—

I ask hon. members to take note of the next phrase—

> —may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the province, or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence. If on the true view of the legislation it is found that in reality in pith and substance the legislation invades civil rights within the province, or in respect of other classes or subjects otherwise encroaches upon the provincial field, the legislation will be invalid. To hold otherwise would afford the dominion an easy passage into the provincial domain.

This is precisely what is going on. In the manipulative fashion in which this matter has been presented to us, we may have no access to the courts. There may be no recourse for provinces or individuals, and I submit that we are, at least in a democratic country, entitled to access to the courts. If this is denied to provinces and individuals of this country, what value is any entrenched bill of rights for any citizen, any province, any yet unborn Canadian? There is no confidence in this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: This ruling obviously left the Mackenzie King administration only one course if it wished to enact legislation on unemployment insurance. It had to amend the constitution. This was the route that was followed over a period of three years. Beginning in 1937 Mr. King communicated with the provinces to determine their feeling on the proposed amendment to the constitution. In doing so he discovered that not all provinces were in accord with the federal position. Alberta, under a Social Credit government, New Brunswick, under a Liberal government and Quebec, under a Union Nationale government, all declined to agree to the proposal. It was at this point that Mr. Mackenzie King could have adopted the attitude of the present government, but he was a wiser man. He could have gone ahead with the amendment without full provincial consent. However, he chose to wait until he had full provincial approval before proceeding. He elaborated on this attitude in the House on more than one occasion. At one point in 1938 he was asked when the legislation providing for the amendment would be brought before the House. He answered that it would be done as soon as there was consent—the sooner the better. He had an element of impatience which seems to prevail today but, on the other hand, he had the patience to see it through. He went on to say:

If it cannot be brought in as a result of co-operative effort between the provinces and the dominion, I fail to see how else it can be done. That is the one and only method.

Later in the year, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King commented thus:

We do not want to appear, let alone in reality, to seek in any way to coerce any province of the dominion.

Here was a Liberal prime minister seeking to amend the constitution but clearly unwilling to pursue such an amendment without unanimous support of the provinces.

Eventually, in 1940, full support of the proposed amendment was achieved and a resolution calling on the King to lay before the British parliament the bill containing the proposed amendment was passed by both Houses of Parliament in Canada. The justice minister of the day, Ernest Lapointe, made special note of the support for the resolution which he introduced. He said, "Always we have tried to get the approval of the provinces to an amendment of this kind". Mackenzie King himself said, "The difficult but most necessary part of the whole business was to get the consent of the provinces." I think the words "most necessary" are certainly the important ones in that passage. The right hon. gentleman realized that constitutional amendments required consent of the provinces, that the federal government is in fact the child of the provinces, that the provinces are not the serfs of the central government.

Where is the wisdom of such a man as he today? Besides Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Laurier there was also Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Pearson, all of whom sought constitutional change only after a consensus had been reached with the provinces. Mackenzie King also realized that consent could not be achieved on a broad range of issues. He stated that success had rested on the fact that the provinces had only been asked to agree to an amendment confined to one topic. Again, to quote:

—the circumstances which enabled us to get the approval of all the provinces was the fact that we were asking for only one amendment. May I say that if we had ventured to go beyond we would probably have met with further objections on the part of some, if not all the provinces.

This idea also seemed to prevail with Mr. Laurier in 1907. Only an amendment on subsidies was sought. In 1951, with Mr. St. Laurent, only an amendment on old age pension was sought. In 1960, with Mr. Diefenbaker, only an amendment with regard to the tenure of judges was sought. In 1964, with Mr. Pearson, further amendment was sought to the Old Age Pension Act, once again a single issue amendment with a single subject. In each instance, consensus was achieved. The nation retained its friendly relations, one province with another, and each province with the central government. Here are five clearcut examples, even precedents, of governments seeking constitutional change with, and only with, consent of the provinces.

The present government might ask how it was done. It might also ask a further question of itself: why can we not do it? I believe two elements provide the key: first, the spirit of co-operation, of compromise, and, second, single issue amendment which means going after only one amendment at a time. I think it is safe to say that if the government had attempted patriation with an amending formula it might not have got into the struggle with the provinces in which it now finds itself. But the sheer enormity of the goal, that is, to reach a unanimous decision on 12 issues, made it impossible to achieve. That is what happened at the last meeting of the first ministers.

What did the government do when this route failed? Did it see the light and try to come to terms on just one issue? No, the government chose to throw aside 100 years of history, history laden with that spirit of compromise and consensus. It chose to throw that aside and act unilaterally, bringing in those amendments which the government most desired. In doing so, it has tried to wrap those elements of the amendment which it knows would be most objectionable to the people in an "academic gloss on real life", if I may be so bold as to borrow the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that is what he calls the British right to listen to the provinces; their right not to accept immediately the position or demands of the federal government. Those are the things he calls the academic gloss on real life, things which in the past have proven crucial to the process of constitutional change. Those are the things that he and his government choose to slough off as mere technicalities.

It is obvious that the government also wishes to avoid the technicalities of this proposed resolution and prefers to wrap them up in the appealing sugar-coated gloss of generalized advertising campaigns and motherhood issues.

I for one, and I believe this is a position much supported on this side of the House, find this whole matter repugnant. It shows a high level of contempt for the lessons of history from which we are supposed to draw our knowledge and on which our basic government and system of justice have long survived to the benefit of all Canadians. It would be unfair, however, to accuse the present administration of being totally ignorant of history. Rather it is aware only of that portion of the past which facilitates its needs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McCain: May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—ABANDONMENT OF CERTAIN DAILY SUPPLEMENTARY SERVICE

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, on September 22 last, CP Rail advised passengers on the Farnham-Montreal, Sainte-Thérèse, Laval and Montreal line that it will abandon its commuter train service—which has been operated for generations—due to an increased deficit during the past years.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of the decision taken by the board of directors, some people and passengers advised me that CP Rail was going to give up its commuter train service. On October 17 last. I pointed out to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) the importance of that service and especially that decision which seemed to be quite unexpected, considering that they gave only a month's notice before dropping that service. I mentioned that I was aware of the fact that it was a commuter train service and that it also rests with the province of Quebec and the municipalities involved to provide service to commuters.

The minister replied that he had met his provincial colleague and as a result of negotiations with a view to assisting in the upgrading of Montreal's rail transport equipment they had come to an agreement in principle. And the minister concluded:

—this agreement should be finalized in the days ahead. However, there is one important thing to remember, although the agreement will provide for a substantial federal contribution to this upgrading program—

It therefore seems quite obvious to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian government is prepared to share the cost of overhauling the equipment, that this is a provincial decision and that, according to the press release issued September 22, CP Rail will abandon two lines, Sainte-Thérèse, Laval and Montreal, Farnham and Montreal, without this affecting the Lakeshore service between Montreal and Rigaud. Also, at the end of 1979, the Quebec government made public a general plan to merge this service with the metropolitan urban transport system rearranged by the Montreal Urban Community Transit Commision. So as far as the Lakeshore service is concerned, the province agreed to intervene immediately and CP Rail agreed to continue its service. Why is there a double standard? My question is the following: Does CP Rail not have a moral obligation towards the users of these commuter trains, is it possible to abandon in this way a service with less than a month's notice, and if the service is abandoned, does this not mean a lenghty delay before the service is provided again probably by the provincial authorities? But if service is abandoned on October 26, then there is nothing much we can do and nobody knows how long that can last.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that CP Rail should maintain this service in operation and extend the October 26 deadline until such time as the province would agree to integrate this transportation network in the greater Montreal urban network, as it did for the Rigaud-Lakeshore service.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, as the minister said in reply to my question last Friday, October 17, a substantial amount will be provided to the province to renew commuter train services equipment. If CP Rail still has an accumulated deficit during the integration period of this service, I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to hold back the amount which will be provided to the province to pay the deficit accumulated by CP Rail so that the users of the Sainte-Thérèse, Laval and Montreal, and of the Farnham and Montreal services may continue to use this public service in view of the high cost of energy and the need to reduce the number of cars in the Montreal area. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as a last resort, I urge the minister to examine these two possibilities, that is, to extend the service after October 26 until the agreement has been signed and implemented by the province of Quebec, or else, to hold back the amounts which will be provided to CP Rail for the deficit accumulated during the period of extension of this service. We cannot accept a double standard in this case, Mr. Speaker. Since the province of Quebec agreed in 1979 to maintain commuter trains to Rigaud and Lakeshore, the same policies and the same principles must apply to the service I have mentioned. I therefore ask the minister to consider these two possibilities, and I believe that the parliamentary secretary has already been informed of my representations in this regard. It is not the first time that I have raised the issue of urban transportation in the Montreal area. There is an integrated transportation network, and this is a concern for me and a priority for the users.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a problem which was discussed a month ago by the federal and provincial transport ministers, that of the daily commuter train services. First of all, it should be noted that passenger service is considered as coming under federal jurisdiction, while commuter trains come under provincial jurisdiction. In the case of Sainte-Thérèse, the service has never been designated as a passenger service by the Canadian Transport Commission, whose responsibility it is to make such a ruling. In the case of Farnham, the hon. member is certainly aware of the recent decision of the CTC to the effect that the service could no longer be considered a passenger service. As the jurisdiction in this regard is well defined, it is up to the province and the urban municipality to determine the level of daily services in the area. In September, Mr. Speaker, the provinces notified CP Rail that its two services would not be included in the comprehensive regional commuter train network. Because of its substantial losses and the very small number of passengers, CP Rail decided to abandon both services.

To conclude, I must say that the federal-provincial agreement mentioned by the minister in his reply last Friday concerns a contribution to the modernization of the equipment in the over-all federal aid program to urban transport. The minister hopes to make the details of this agreement public within the next few days.

Personally, I really sympathize with the people who still depend on that service. I agree that a four-week notice of the permanent interrruption of a service given for many years is too short.

I take note of the request of the hon. member for an extension, or the temporary continuation of that service as suggested by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy), and shall inform the minister accordingly without delay.

AIR SAFETY—ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING AIRCRAFT AND PILOTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking tonight about the daily horror stories we are hearing from the Judge Dubin case inquiry. It would appear that flying in Canada today is like playing Russian roulette, and I hope the parliamentary secretary who answers tonight on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) will give a firm commitment on the updating of equipment in control towers at airports across Canada. I also want to hear about a timetable and the amount allotted.

It is very interesting to observe that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is sitting in the House tonight. I hope we are not having any difficulty obtaining funds from him for updating all the ancient equipment in our control towers across Canada. The public is entitled to a firm commitment from the minister, not a bureaucratic answer. I hope the parliamentary secretary has not brought one with him tonight, prepared by officials in the department that is under investigation.

When I read some of the stories which have been coming out of the Dubin inquiry, Mr. Speaker, it makes my hair stand on end. Here are some of the latest statements:

Inaccurate weather forecasting and stringent landing clearances make it tougher to fly planes in Canada than in the United States, an Air Canada captain said Monday.

Charles Burbank told the Dubin inquiry into aviation safety that weather forecasting in Canada "has gone downhill the last few years," and this has added to the frustration of private and commercial pilots.

Here is a further statement from the Dubin inquiry, as reported in The Citizen on January 15, 1980, under the heading "Air safety setup in 'shambles,' inspectors say." It states:

Canada's air safety monitoring system is "loose, arbitrary, hobbled by precedents and badly needs overhaul," according to Transport Canada's civil aviation inspectors.

The inspectors, whose job it is to enforce air safety, made the comments in a brief presented today to the federal aviation safety inquiry headed by Justice Charles Dubin.

The system is in such a shambles, the brief maintains, that Transport Canada is unable to determine even whether Canadian aircraft are airworthy.

Those are very damaging statements. A further story emanating from the Dubin inquiry, this time coming out of Edmonton, says:

The federal government is to blame for most safety problems at airports without air traffic controllers because it won't spend money on modern equipment—

It is unbelievable that we are not maintaining a proper standard of safety in our control towers in Canada.

In a brief to the inquiry the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association said:

—many problems at small, uncontrolled airports are caused by outdated and unserviceable equipment.

"—the infrastructure required for the efficient, effective and safe operations of commercial aircraft in Canada has not kept pace with the rapid increase in aircraft numbers and aircraft performance," said the association.

I hope the association will keep up their pressure. They will certainly receive my support here in the House of Commons.

Here is a further statement out of Edmonton under the heading "Inquiry told pilots short on training". It says:

New commercial pilots don't get enough training in Canada to be considered safe, a federal inquiry into aviation safety in Canada was told Wednesday.

The Northern Air Transport Association, which represents about 90 per cent of the commercial carriers in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, told the Dubin inquiry major airlines often refuse to hire new pilots.

"It is therefore left to the rest of the commercial aviation industry to hire these new pilots, train them and employ them as they gain experience," the association said.

I wish to point out that the Dubin inquiry has not completed its investigation. It is to be wrapped up very shortly. But there is no way we can wait for it to finish its hearings and for the report to be published and for the minister, months down the road, to take a look at the results. He has to give a commitment now, tonight, that some firm action is forthcoming to update the equipment in the control towers and that moneys will be allotted to update that equipment. We are not looking for general statements and the big happy smile we usually get from the Minister of Transport when we raise these issues in the House of Commons.

Another report, this time from Calgary, said:

Aviation spokesmen have called for better training of private pilots in the face of an increasing number of aircraft accidents in Alberta.

There were 48 aircraft accidents in the province to the end of May—five of them involving fatalities—compared with 42 in the first five months of last year.

This is a disaster situation, Mr. Speaker. Another report today, from the The Globe and Mail, entitled "Downed-aircraft locators called $4.25 million gaffe"—and I hope the department that caused this goof has not prepared the answer which the parliamentary secretary is going to read out here tonight—said:

Six years after being told to do so, and after spending $4.25 million, Canada's general aviation community is using an emergency life-saving device that is nearly useless.

● (2215)

I want a political answer tonight, not a bureaucratic answer prepared by a civil servant. We want a firm commitment from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the government.

An article in the Ottawa Citizen of July 17, 1980, headed "Airlines Ordered to Probe Possible Jet Engine Flaws" reads in part:

> Major Canadian airlines are being advised to look for defects in Pratt and Whitney engines in their DC-9, Boeing 727, and Boeing 737 passenger jets after an engine on a Hawaiian Airline plane broke apart on take-off last month.

The situation in Canada is deteriorating. We are far below American standards. I have here a recent letter written by a private pilot to the editor which was published in The Globe and Mail on October 13, 1980. In it he discusses the antiquated equipment used in the control towers. He does not blame the air traffic controllers because it has nothing to do with them. The matter has to do with the Minister of Transport and his department, not his employees. He went into great detail to explain about the outdated equipment in our control towers. He says in part:

> The term 'inefficiency' does not refer directly to the air traffic controllers, but to the rules, regulations and equipment they (ATC) have to work with. I can sympathize with a controller who has to work with antiquated equipment, just as I, as a pilot, might have to fly an aircraft without such sophisticated instrumentation—

I hope we will receive a firm commitment from the parliamentary secretary tonight because the Canadian public is entitled to such a statement.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's interest and concern in aviation safety is most welcome. The subject of aviation safety is one that has been prominent in the public's mind during the hearings held by the Dubin commission across the country.

Perhaps I could take this opportunity to mention the progress of these hearings. The commission has completed five of the six phases of its inquiry, namely, airworthiness, accident investigation and reporting, enforcement, navigational aids and uncontrolled airports. The final phase, now in progress, concerns personnel.

The hearings, as members know, have taken place in many cities and have listened to testimony from a large number of groups and individuals. So great was the interest in this inquiry that the minister recently granted Mr. Dubin an extension to his mandate which would otherwise have expired this month.

This raises the question of a report on the commission's findings. It is now our understanding that Mr. Dubin intends to release a series of reports beginning early in 1981, rather than a single final report. This will allow public discussion on each aspect of the inquiry as the findings appear. I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that it will also allow the department to undertake prompt action on Mr. Dubin's recommendations.

The hon. member raises several specific issues on which evidence has been presented to the commission. The minister has stated several times, and I would emphasize again, that it would not be prudent to take hasty action on the basis of separate pieces of evidence alone. It is only reasonable to hear the counter-evidence and the conclusions of the inquiry itself after it has weighed consideration of all the testimony. It is our hope that the findings of the commission will lead to a safer environment for air travel.

Mr. McKenzie: Are you taking the train home this weekend, Bob?

Mr. Bockstael: I take the airplane just as you do.

HUMAN RIGHTS—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to follow up a question which I asked in this House on May 9, 1980. The question was directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). I asked when the government intended to implement the recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission including, specifically, the recommendations regarding the adding of prescribed grounds of discrimination. I outlined the various recommendations of the Human Rights Commission which were made in its most recent annual report, that was tabled in March, 1980.

At that time the Prime Minister indicated that while he had not had an opportunity to examine the report himself, he hoped that the Minister of Justice would reply some time the following week. He also indicated that the government was seriously considering establishing a special committee of the House which would have a mandate to consider the various recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission in its most recent annual report.

As we know, to date the Minister of Justice has not indicated in this House what action he intends to take on the recommendations of the Human Rights Commission. Of course, the government has not yet tabled any recommendations for a special committee as I proposed, and as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to consider these important recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

I would like briefly to summarize the present mandate of the Canadian Human Rights Commission so that we might be aware of it. I am sure most Canadians recognize the importance of the job it is doing on behalf of all Canadian citizens, particularly minority groups within Canada.

As of December 31, 1979, the Canadian Human Rights Commission had had some two years of experience in administering a very new federal Human Rights Act. Under the terms of that act they have a mandate to investigate alleged discrimination pursuant to various proscribed forms of discrimination. Those proscribed forms of discrimination are outlined in section 2 of the act as follows, and I should just like to cite these for the House. They are on grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, conviction for which a pardon has been granted and, in matters related to employment, physical handicap.

In the spring of this year, the annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission recommended that these grounds of prohibited discrimination should be extended. They did this after careful research and study and after discussing the subject with many people—witnesses, academic experts and others in Canada. They recommended that the presently proscribed grounds of discrimination be expanded to include the following: previous history of mental illness and previous history of dependence on alcohol and/or all other drugs; mental illness; mental handicap or retardation; sexual orientation and political belief. In addition, they recommended the extension of the presently limited protection for the physically handicapped to include all grounds presently covered in the Human Rights Act. At this point the prohibition of discrimination against the physically handicapped relates merely to employment. As I say, after studying this matter, it was recommended that this be extended.

We fully support this recommendation and urge the government to implement it at the earliest possible time and end these insidious forms of discrimination. We would go further and urge that if the government is serious about its commitment to human rights in 1980, these grounds of discrimination which are presently proscribed in the Canadian Human Rights Act should be included within the proposed charter of rights. Not only the nine grounds which are presently proscribed by the Human Rights Act, but in addition, those grounds which have been recommended after careful study and deliberation by the Canadian Human Rights Commission. In other words, section 15 of the proposed charter of rights would be expanded to include the grounds presently proscribed as well as the grounds I outlined earlier which were proposed as additions.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, I hope the federal government will ensure that, at last, all Canadians at all levels of government, whether federal, provincial or municipal, will not be discriminated against on the bases outlined not only in the existing Canadian Human Rights Act but the proposed bases which would be added to it.

I should like to dwell for a moment on the question of discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. As members of this House know, for far too long Canadian men and women have been discriminated against on the basis of their sexual orientation. This discrimination has resulted in too many "gay" persons silently suffering humiliation and harassment. As the Canadian Human Rights Commission stated in the most recent report as follows:

> Although moral or religious convictions about homosexuality are relevant to the private lives of individuals, when it comes to job performance or access to services sexual orientation is irrelevant. Whatever one's views are on the propriety of certain forms of sexual preference, therefore, it must still be acknowledged that persons who are denied quality of opportunity on the basis of their sexual orientation are being discriminated against.

Surely it is time Canadians recognized that this form of discrimination must come to an end wherever it occurs in Canadian society. It is for this reason that we welcome the recommendation of the Canadian Human Rights Commission in this respect and urge the government not only to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation but to change other federal laws which presently discriminate on this basis. I would point out that the Quebec government has recently done this.

In conclusion, I urge that the government give serious consideration to the recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission for expanding the proposed grounds of discrimination. I urge also that it establish a special committee, as suggested, as I said earlier, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself. If members of the government are serious in their commitment to human rights in this country—and I hope that they are and I hope that the expressions in the charter of rights are indicative of that, although we have some concerns about the present form of the charter—not only will they implement their recommendations but they will augment the resources which have been presently granted to the Canadian Human Rights Commission in order to educate the Canadian public and carry out the mandate which was given to them by the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) for his very cogent remarks. It is a reminder to this House that all too often we think the only direction in which this country should go is the direction which the government sets. It is a reminder that there are many directions in which a country can go, all of which are reasonable.

The role of the government vis-à-vis human rights in many forms is to step in and even out the odds to prevent those who cannot help themselves, or who have difficulty helping themselves, from being oppressed by others and by society as a whole. I often hear the question in this House, "Are you serious?", as though the one who asks the quesion is the only one who is serious. I assure the hon. member for Burnaby that we on this side of the House have been serious for many years. We have spent many years protecting individuals who could not help themselves. We have a proud history of protecting individuals who could not help themselves.

In 1940 we brought in unemployment insurance. In the fifties we brought in laws protecting workers from exploitation. In 1961, we brought in schemes for adult occupational training and, in 1945, family allowances, all designed to help people who could not help themselves. In 1966 we brought in the guaranteed income supplement, in 1957 hospital insurance, in 1965 the Canada Pension Plan and, in 1966, medicare.

We have helped the senior citizens and in most cases received no credit. The provinces said that they did it all. We helped those who could not afford their own housing. All these people are handicapped in an economic sense. But for this we receive little credit. I am pleased to say, Mr. Speaker, that we have a history of bringing in social legislation and bringing it in with a sense of reasonableness.

My good friend has brought in four or five different items as though they were one recommendation. I think the report is divided into separate categories. That is the way they should be dealt with. I find it ironic that sexual orientation should always be lumped in with the physically handicapped. I often wonder what they think about being in the same category. The report quite properly deals with different problems under different categories.

The physically handicapped are under 1.1.1, sexual orientation under 1.2.1 and political belief under 1.2.2 dealing with the physically handicapped. I assure my hon. friend that the government is serious. I will jog his memory a bit. The Speech from the Throne said, "There will be amendments to protect the rights of the handicapped". I will rephrase that. It said, "Amendments to protect the right of the handicapped will be made to the Human Rights Act". That is fairly unequivocal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

COMMUNICATIONS

RIGHT OF NORTHERN RESIDENTS TO TELEVISION PROGRAMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), in an address to a meeting of the Broadcast Executive Society yesterday, is reported to have said that he would be taking immediate action to put a halt to the unauthorized earth stations used to pirate television signals and that unauthorized operators would be charged by the Department of Justice and their equipment seized, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That no action be taken which would revoke the rights of residents in northern and remote areas of Canada to enjoy television programming to which they have become accustomed, thereby sending them back to the dark ages of CBC monopoly.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LISTS OF BUSINESSES PERMITTED TO TENDER ON CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, since political patronage lists of businesses permitted to tender on government contracts are now available to Liberal members of Parliament but not to others, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt):

That these political patronage lists held by the Department of Supply and Services be made available immediately to all members of Parliament and to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business in order that we might determine if small businesses are receiving their fair share of this government's patronage pork-barrel.

CANADA-U.S. WEST COAST SALMON TREATY—CALL FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. Yesterday U.S. Senator Claiborne Pell of Rhode Island reaffirmed the U.S. Senate position that it will never pass the Canada-U.S. east coast fisheries treaty in its present form. In view of the experience Canada has gained in dealing with the U.S. on joint management procedures for east coast fisheries and in view of the importance of negotiations presently occurring in Seattle, Washington, to achieve a treaty on Pacific salmon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House requests the government to provide an opportunity for parliamentary debate before Canada ratifies a west coast salmon treaty; and, furthermore, before any ratification or final agreement is made on the west coast salmon treaty Canada wait until final U.S. Senate approval has been obtained, thus assuring west coast fishermen that Canada's final position will not be further weakened by the U.S. Senate's second bite at the fish which has occurred in the east coast fishing treaty.

AGRICULTURE

SALES OF BARLEY BY WESTERN FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas it is the policy of this government to force western Canadian farmers to sell barley to eastern farmers at $40 per tonne less than the foreign market price while simultaneously allowing Ontario farmers to sell 30,000 tonnes of barley at the full price to foreign markets, and in view of the fact that this has resulted in the loss to western farmers of some $1,200,000, thus further demonstrating this government's complete disregard for western Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright):

That this House take steps to prevent further discrimination to western farmers and instruct the minister responsible to allow the free flow of barley to world markets from western Canada.

DORCHESTER, N.B.—REQUEST INCIDENTS OF ALLEGED BEATINGS BE INVESTIGATED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the letter signed by 38 inmates from Dorchester penitentiary and read last night on CBC radio, alleging beatings, cruelty and harassment prior to the recent tragic hostage incident at that penitentiary, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia):

That the Solicitor General include those allegations in the investigation which he has ordered and that he add more non-departmental personnel to the investigating team, including some members of Parliament, in order to ensure a more complete objective assessment.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

ADEQUATE FUNDING FOR MUSEUMS AND GALLERIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The 1979-80 annual report of the National Museums of Canada has once again emphasized the deteriorating conditions of our national, regional and community museums and galleries. Considering the importance of building a strong cultural foundation for Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps to ensure our irreplaceable collections are adequately accommodated, preserved and displayed in such a way that all Canadians may have the opportunity to appreciate our culture and our heritage.

ENERGY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a motion of urgent and pressing importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the hon. Liberal member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), who is also the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley), has condemned the government's proposal to impose a federal excise tax on the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power from Canada, and has also, in a recent statement, given his full support to many aspects of the sensible energy policy which was put forward by the Progressive Conservative government in the ill-fated budget of December, 1979, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be directed to resign immediately so that he might be replaced by the hon. member for Rosemont who has proposed wise, Conservative ideas which would put Canada on the road to energy self-sufficiency.

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PENSIONS TO HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), I move:

That this House urges the government, in view of its stated recognition of the role of spouses working in the home, to bring before the House legislation to provide pensions for all homemaker spouses, in their own right, equivalent to those earned by contributors to the Canada Pension Plan, thus recognizing in full, for pension purposes, the contribution to our society made by those who work in the home.

SMALL BUSINESS

CALL FOR LEGISLATION RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to point out to the House that a great number of small businessmen have been applying to banks and lending institutions to take advantage of small business development bonds. The bonds were confirmed in the "Crosbie" budget and in the mini budget of April, but the legislation has never been introduced and the lending institutions will not make loans without the legislation being introduced and passed. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That this House directs the Minister of Finance to introduce forthwith the legislation allowing small business development bonds; that the legislation be segregated from other tax legislation; that this House do pass the legislation through all readings without debate; in view of the delay in producing the legislation, that the legislation provide that the program be extended until December 31, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST DRAFT AMENDMENTS TO PROPOSED RESOLUTION BE TABLED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It concerns the indication last night that the government is prepared to entertain certain amendments to the draft constitutional resolution presently before the House. So that Parliament will know exactly what we are dealing with, will the minister undertake to have tabled in the House today or tomorrow any draft amendments to the draft resolution on the constitution?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I would be willing to table the exchange of letters between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Of course, we have not yet reached committee stage; I hope we will get there very quickly. I know the Leader of the NDP will present an amendment, and we said that if it is in conformity with the exchange of letters we will accept it. In fact, it is entrenching in the constitution the proposition we made to the provinces last summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, it is precisely because we have had some experience of dealing with the differences which can occur between letters and the language of resolutions and amendments that we are asking the "Liberal democratic government" to table it now—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —so that the House will understand exactly what is being proposed and not be misled by letters or any draft amendments.

But let me turn to another matter. In the Prime Minister's letter to the leader of the New Democratic Party, he specifically failed to deal with a number of issues which are controversial. For example, there was no reference to section 42 respecting a federal referendum. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, speaking as the federal-provincial spokesman for his party, described section 42 as "dangerous", "repugnant" and "highly unacceptable", and these views were shared by the Premier of Saskatchewan who stated that this section "would threaten to undermine the federal-provincial partnership upon which Canada rests". Given those strongly-held views, can the Minister of Justice tell the House whether section 42 will be removed?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, we said many times that the intention of the resolution was very clear. We wanted to make it very clear that section 41 will have to be used before we use section 42. We wanted the deadlock-breaking mechanism to apply only after the formula under section 41 had been followed.

If the language of the resolution is not clear, I will be willing to discuss it with members in committee. What amazes me the most is the fact that the opposition does not want to discuss it in committee where we can have exchanges, and if there is some room for improvements, we will accept them.

At the same time, we said very clearly that we need that deadlock-breaking mechanism. In a speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he said the policy of his party is to have a constitution in Canada and that to have a deadlock-breaking mechanism is an absolute necessity.

Mr. Clark: I remind the Minister of Justice that so far in the debate on the motion more Liberals have spoken than members of the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I take it that, despite any deals which may have been made, the government intends to keep the essential nature of section 42, which the member for Yorkton-Melville has described as "dangerous", "repugnant" and "highly unacceptable".

My supplementary is directed again to the Minister of Justice and concerns another matter which was not raised in yesterday's letter from the Prime Minister to the Leader of the NDP, namely, the question of provincial concurrent jurisdiction over international trade. When speaking on behalf of the NDP, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, their spokesman on federal-provincial relations, stated that it was absolutely necessary to achieve provincial concurrence with federal paramountcy when it comes to international resource trade. Given that in the case of Saskatchewan, for example, such trade accounts for 95 per cent of potash sales and 50 per cent of heavy oil sales—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Clark: I understand this is embarrassing to members of the "Liberal democratic party", but I would like to ask the minister whether he or one of his seatmates—or soulmates—can tell the House whether, as part of yesterday's agreement, the government is prepared to accept concurrent provincial jurisdiction relating to international resource trade?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the letters exchanged between the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Prime Minister of Canada are very clear, and we do not intend now any more than we did this summer to entrench into the constitution transfer of the federal jurisdiction in international trade. We believe this matter must remain under federal jurisdiction, if we really have a country. However, if problems occur in the administration, of course we could always find the administrative solutions required.

[English]

PROVINCIAL OWNERSHIP OF RESOURCES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Justice and I speak in part as a member of Parliament from Ontario, which is the second largest mineral producer in this country. I ask the Minister of Justice to refer to item 1 in the Prime Minister's letter to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, which states that an amendment would be considered which would confirm the jurisdiction of the provinces with respect to exploration, development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources.

Would the Minister of Justice indicate if that section or reference, if passed, limits the present ownership that Ontario has in its own resources, as are so clearly set out in section 109 of the BNA Act, which states that all lands, mines, minerals and royalties shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? Has the minister a legal opinion which would indicate that he has not, in fact, narrowed our rights in Ontario to our own resources, including the right to sell those resources?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, he is asking for a legal opinion and I am not willing to give one at this time. I would like to tell the House we are very eager on this side to go into committee, which would give us the opportunity to reply to those kinds of questions. I have listened to the debate and the opposition is running around looking for someone to make a speech and passing around the same speech to each member who gets up. It would be more convenient for all members of the House and for the level of debate if we were to go into committee and reply to that point. Of course, it is provided in the Canadian constitution that resources belong to the provinces and we intend to respect that. I hope that we can get the matter into committee so that we may define and solve the problems in the resolution and do what the Leader of the Opposition will be asking for later this afternoon, that we unilaterally patriate the constitution.

● (1425)

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again to the Minister of Justice. If in fact it is the government's desire to ensure that the ownership of natural resources remain with the provinces, why did it not simply state that in the letter which the Prime Minister wrote to the Leader of the NDP?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, we shall have answers to all those questions whenever the opposition will allow us to discuss them in committee.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF REFINANCING PROPOSAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the ever ready Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I see that he is getting prepared. Last night in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs the minister refused to confirm any plans to refinance Massey-Ferguson. As the minister spoke in committee, a member of my party actually revealed to the minister the details of such a plan. Would the minister confirm that there is a proposal whereby the federal government will guarantee some $200 million worth of investment shares and, if so, will he now tell the House whether the government has agreed to the refinancing package announced by Massey-Ferguson yesterday? Is the minister willing to make a statement in the House explaining in clear terms the details of this proposal?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will not be able to confirm that the amount the hon. member mentioned is the amount which the government of Ontario and the Government of Canada are willing to guarantee as part of an equity refinancing program for Massey-Ferguson. We have not yet agreed to the proposal set out by Massey-Ferguson in its statement of late yesterday afternoon. Our participation will depend on the working out of satisfactory terms and conditions, such as the terms and conditions from lenders involving the postponement of repayment of principal and interest and maintenance of lines of credit, as well as the agreement by Massey-Ferguson on conditions involving the maintenance of jobs and an increase in production, investment and research and development.

What I said in my press release on Monday is that the government of Ontario and the Government of Canada are:

—prepared to guarantee the capital risk of a portion of the new equity investment in Massey-Ferguson, providing various conditions are met, including a satisfactory degree of co-operation from the existing lenders.

I think that is pretty clear.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, indeed it is very clear. The minister has just said that he will guarantee the new investors. I would like him to clarify the point even further, because the principal investors or largest shareholders in Massey-Ferguson are in fact the employees through their pension fund. Is the minister telling the House, then, that the Government of Canada will provide guarantees to the new free enterprise investors on their money so that they will not be taking any risk, but that the workers at Massey-Ferguson who have their pension funds tied up will not get any backing at all from the Government of Canada?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Watch out, he's going to jump out of bed, Herb!

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, if Massey-Ferguson does not survive, the shares of the employees held in the pension fund will not be worth anything. Our objective is to attract new equity investment to Massey-Ferguson to enable its equity refinancing, so that the company will not only survive but be strengthened. In this way the workers will not only retain their jobs but the value of their shares will be preserved. This is our objective. I am surprised that my hon. friend does not agree with this because the UAW, representing the workers, issued a statement yesterday indicating support for that approach.

● (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. When they are more fully aware of the government's intentions, they may have some qualified opinions following on what the minister says they said yesterday. Will the minister confirm two things to the House. First, with this massive new investment that is going to take place, the inevitable result will be that the shares that are already held by the workers will decline very substantially in value. That is the inevitable result of this infusion of new capital. Therefore, they are not being guaranteed their investment to start with, as the minister is prepared to guarantee to new investors, and their current investment is going to go down in value. Second, if the Government of Canada is going to put up money for this enterprise, does the minister not think it is time that the Canadian public, which will be taking the risk, got some equity in the company?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the governments of Ontario and Canada have not said that they will be putting money into the company. They have said they are willing to guarantee the value of a portion of new equity refinancing. It is my view that one of the terms and conditions to be attached to such a guarantee should be a way of enabling the governments to participate in the success of the company. I think this is something that should be very much pursued.

With respect to the possible value of shares of existing shareholders, this will depend on the degree of success of the company. If the refinancing is successful and the results are a strengthened and more successful Massey, certainly there will not be, as my hon. friend seems to want to see come about, an ultimate lowering of the value of shares held by existing shareholders. My hon. friend would seem to prefer the absolute failure of the company so that the shares held by the workers would be worth nothing and there would be no jobs for them. No wonder the UAW takes quite a different position from the NDP.

PROPOSALS RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF RESOURCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it relates to the cozy deal worked out by the Prime Minister and the leader of the New Democratic Party to achieve an organic understanding between their two parties. With respect to part of the statement made in the Prime Minister's letter to the hon. member for Oshawa—who is understandably leaving the chamber in embarrassment—could the minister comment on the point made by the Prime Minister that the resource issue is conditional upon and "acceptable to us only on the condition that agreement be reached to entrench in the constitution certain basic principles of the economic union".

In view of the fact that Premier Blakeney for one has rejected the proposals arrived at between his national leader and the Prime Minister, can the minister tell the House whether that is a negotiable item with respect to the committee hearing which the Minister of Justice referred to today, and whether he is prepared to compromise with respect to that aspect of the Prime Minister's letter in committee?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think when we are in committee we will debate that. In the letter of the Prime Minister yesterday to the Leader of the New Democratic Party he said we are willing to accept an amendment on resources, on indirect taxation and on interprovincial trade and federal paramountcy. This would be the amendment we would accept.

In terms of economic union, as the people know, the mobility of people has been incorporated in the charter of rights and, of course, we have the movement of goods in section 121. In future rounds of negotiations we will want to strengthen the economic union of Canada even more. For the time being, we have the resolution before the House and the only amendment will be this one.

To reply to the question of the hon. member's leader, of course the resources were already confirmed in the constitution and it is a clarification for renewable resources.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I think it is fair to say that the proposal by the Prime Minister is a sellout and a fraud with respect to ownership of resources of this country, and it will be seen to be so when the people have had a chance to examine it.

I want to ask the minister, in relation to his policy with respect to constitutional amendment, whether yesterday in Edmonton the Minister of the Environment, who has special responsibilities for constitutional matters and who stated that federal-provincial conferences are pernicious and a harmful way to make government policy, and further indicated his support for a constitutional provision abolishing federal-provincial conferences, was speaking on behalf of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I did not read the statement by the hon. minister. I can say that, obviously, the experience we went through this summer when we made an enormous effort to come to an agreement, was very disappointing for us. However, in his speech the Right Hon. Prime Minister already stated that once the constitution is repatriated, we intend to resume our discussions with the provinces on federal institutions and on the sharing of jurisdiction. This is the commitment we made and we intend to fulfil. The mechanism we shall use will be, of course, federal-provincial conferences. If there is a deadlock, the amending formula provided for in the project will be in place.

[English]

PROPOSALS RESPECTING OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister tell the House whether in the course of discussions between the government and the NDP, the question of the rights of provinces to offshore jurisdiction over oil and gas came up? Can the minister also tell the House why this was not included in the package which was announced yesterday in the exchange of letters between the Prime Minister and the leader of the NDP?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, during the summer we made a very generous offer to the maritime provinces in relation to the offshore but it was rejected by the maritime provinces—by the Atlantic provinces. We were offering 100 per cent of the revenues. I think the offer made was a very good one. We are not willing to give away the jurisdiction—

Mr. Clark: You did try.

Mr. Chrétien: —of the federal government in the matter of offshore resources. We want to make sure that the benefit of those resources accrues to the people of the provinces who could benefit from them.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In selling their soul for a little potash, the NDP sold what few friends they had left in the Atlantic provinces and that is a sad day. I should like to ask the minister why the question of renewable resources was not included in the—

An hon. Member: You did a great job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the truth obviously hurts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I should like to ask the minister why the question of renewable resources was not included in the government's package, knowing full well the importance, for example, of the development and transmission of hydroelectricity to the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I should like to reply to the first part of the question of the hon. member and tell him that our position on offshore resources was well explained to the people of Newfoundland and they gave up one more seat in the last general election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: In our negotiations during the summer with Premier Peckford we said that we have some powers in interprovincial trade that could be used if need be. I am amazed to see Premier Peckford always giving us all sorts of problems, but when he needs the federal government he always calls on us to help him get his electricity across Quebec.

Mr. McGrath: That is a constitutional right and you know it.

Mr. Chrétien: In order to get that, we need a strong federal government. If he wants us to help, I think he should stop making the kind of statement that he made yesterday.

Mr. Clark: Roger Simmons just walked out.

Mr. McGrath: That is a constitutional right and you know it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order. Order, please. I have to remind both hon. members that when the Speaker rises in her chair they must resume their seats. We were listening to the hon. Minister of Justice.

An hon. Member: He is finished.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, in the resolution it is clearly stated that there would be no possibility of changing the borders of any province without the approval of the province. It was demagogy on the part of the premier to try to create the impression to the contrary.

Mr. Crombie: This is a deadlock.

Mr. Chrétien: The same thing applies to the right to have religious education in the provinces.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, is the Minister of Justice of Canada now telling this House that Newfoundland does not have, under section 95 of the BNA Act, the right to transmit its power through the province of Quebec to Ontario and elsewhere? Is that the position he is taking as Minister of Justice? We are not looking for help; we are just looking for this government to get—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, whenever there is a market for electricity, we will be willing to help the province of Newfoundland—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: —with the federal powers that we have. If we were to listen to the opposition and weaken the federal government with a type of community of communities, it would be impossible for us to help Newfoundland under those circumstances.

COMMUNICATIONS

PAY TV—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN POLICY BY CRTC

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, following this sort of general hubbub and acrimony, I have a very gentle question for the Minister of Communications.

An hon. Member: A very gentle minister.

Mr. Rose: In view of the simultaneous CRTC and ministerial announcements yesterday that pay TV in Canada is to proceed forthwith, despite the fact that the CRTC's own Therrien report issued in July stated on page 59 that "there is no evidence of widespread demands" and further that "the only people who demand the instant introduction of pay TV are those who expect to make profits out of it", can the minister assure the House that the CRTC, which is an autonomous regulatory body, arrived at this policy U-turn independently and without outside pressure from the minister or his department? Since the minister supports an early introduction of pay TV with no indication of how the objectives of enhanced opportunities for creative people in Canada are to be fulfilled, could the minister also tell Canadians what caused him to push for this premature major change in policy?

An hon. Member: More money.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, as far as I am concerned it is not a major change in policy. The hon. member referred to the Therrien committee report. The Therrien committee is just that, Madam Speaker, it is a committee of the CRTC and it reports to the full CRTC. The announcement which was made yesterday by that body indicated that the CRTC as a whole endorsed the idea and agreed that it is urgent to have a pay TV system in this country. As I have indicated before, it is not a question of whether we will or will not have a pay TV system in this country; it is a question of whether we will have a pay TV system over which Canadians have some influence and control.

As to the hon. member's remark to the effect that no one in this country, except the people who would make a buck from it, want pay TV, I am pleased to inform him that a lot of people in the Canadian production industry, the Canadian arts and cultural community are interested in the significant financial benefits which will accrue to the Canadian program industry and the Canadian cultural industry in general, because a good part of the profits from pay TV would accrue to them.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I was quoting from the Therrien report when I mentioned that the only people who are interested were those who would make a profit. Since it is not a major change in policy, according to the minister, it means that there is no communications policy.

In view of the strong arguments against pay TV as a pipeline for just more U.S. programming and the opposition to it by the creative people who are expected to benefit—as the minister has just explained to me—since they oppose it at this time, can the minister tell us who is directing this change in policy at this time? In addition, I would like to know why major policy changes are announced months in advance of a new comprehensive bill for a Canadian telecommunications policy?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I would like to reiterate what I said initially, that the Therrien committee was just that, a committee of the CRTC. It did not represent the views of the whole of the CRTC. The CRTC in its initial press release two weeks ago indicated that it would be looking at the Therrien committee report, and on the basis of a number of recommendations in it, that it would be issuing positions it would take. Yesterday the CRTC decided to issue its position on pay television in Canada and recognized the urgency of introducing that type of system in this country.

TELEVISION SERVICE TO NORTHERN AND CENTRAL RESIDENTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Communications. The Therrien committee clearly stated that the priority must be to produce a balanced television and communications diet for people in the northern and central part of the provinces and the far north. Is the minister saying now that this is not his priority? Would he also clarify his statement which he made yesterday in Toronto, when he mentioned that something must be done about the proliferation of pirate signals in the urban centres? Is it his intention to develop a policy which will permit stations that have been established in the north to operate legally and under a licence, or will the minister close them all down? Can the minister ease this fear?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. He quite rightly reflected the CRTC's Therrien report to the effect that extension of services and provision for an adequate range of television services to remote and northern communities should be a priority. The full committee of the CRTC has endorsed the Therrien committee report in this regard. I indicated in my speech yesterday in Toronto that I was in full agreement with the CRTC in this connection. As a matter of fact, the CRTC has decided to hold hearings on extension of services to the north in February before any hearings will be held on pay TV. I think that issue is clear both in the Department of Communications and in the CRTC.

As to the question of pirating signals from U.S. satellites, I indicated clearly yesterday that we would pursue the present policy as far as northern communities were concerned. With regard to urban centres in Canada along the southern part of this country, where there is already a wide range of choice of TV signals, we have indicated that we would not tolerate proliferation of dishes to receive illegally U.S. satellite signals because such proliferation would clearly endanger the continued existence and viability of the Canadian broadcasting system, which we believe to be essential to the continued development of this country.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SERVICE TO RESIDENTS OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, my question is to the same minister, the Secretary of State, who is responsible to this House for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

While the previous points raised this afternoon are important, I would like to go back to something fundamental to Canadians. Specifically, it concerns New Brunswick's CBC television studio facilities as well as CBC radio production and broadcasting in northern New Brunswick. I invite the minister to indicate his readiness to take personal action in this matter with the CBC to ensure that after these many years New Brunswickers will catch up to the 1980s and have adequate facilities installed in television and radio, both from Radio-Canada and the CBC, in New Brunswick.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I know that the hon. member is very concerned about the level of CBC coverage in New Brunswick. It is a concern that I have brought to the attention of the CBC authorities. The hon. member will have the opportunity next week to talk directly about this issue with the president of the CBC, who I understand is being called before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Perhaps I could indicate to the hon. member in the meantime that the CBC is at present engaged in building three new transmitters to serve the Campbellton area and radio transmitters and one TV transmitter. I will give a quick breakdown. It includes an FM transmitter carrying the French language service of CBAF Moncton, which is expected to be ready for operation by next December or January of next year; an FM transmitter carrying the English language program of CBA Moncton, which is scheduled to be ready for operation late in 1981.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fox: I believe this is an important question, Madam Speaker; it was raised at the federal-provincial conference. Perhaps hon. members will allow me to conclude. There is a television transmitter carrying French language from CBAF Moncton which is also expected to be in operation in late 1981. It is a continuing concern of my department to see to it that the CBC does indeed give adequate coverage right across the country.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

ENERGY CONSERVATION—ALLEGATIONS OF FALSE AND MISLEADING ADVERTISING

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He will be aware that at least two private sector groups, Friends of the Earth and the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee have lodged complaints with his department concerning the government's massive $5,850,000 energy advertising campaign on the grounds that that campaign includes false and misleading information. The director of the marketing practices branch of his department has written to one of these groups to indicate that he does not have jurisdiction, because no commercial product was being sold and because "there have been some cases in law which appear to have established that agents of the Crown, which would include most government departments, cannot be prosecuted."

● (1450)

May I ask the minister how he can justify this double standard of exempting the government from provisions regarding false and misleading advertising where false and misleading advertising by the private sector would result in criminal charges being laid by the government?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I categorically deny the allegations of the hon. member. There is absolutely no misleading advertising.

[English]

SUGGESTED STANDARDS CODE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Clearly, Madam Speaker, the minister is not concerned about the fact that there is a double standard in the law here.

I wish to pose my supplementary to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, who has the responsibility for government propaganda. In view of the fact that the federal government is the single largest advertiser in Canada and must maintain standards of propriety and accuracy at least equal to those it demands of the private sector, is the minister prepared to draw up and make public a code of advertising standards for federal government advertising? Also, is he prepared to create an independent board to which private sector groups and private individuals can go to lay complaints against the government, where they believe the government has been guilty of false and misleading advertising?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, the radio and television networks themselves have a policy of rejecting ads if they are dishonest or improper. I believe the federal government has acted responsibly in its use of advertising. Over the course of several weeks, we have seen the opposition continuously attempt to throw up a red herring with the advertising issue because they do not want to face the constitutional issue. Clearly it is not the view of the Canadian public that those ads are wrong. It is certainly my view that those ads responsibly bring to the attention of the Canadian public the energy program of the Government of Canada.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL TAX EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRICITY

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I imagine the Minister of Energy has received the letter his colleague, the hon. member for Rosemont, published in the newspapers. I wonder if it is part of the new policy on informing the public. That letter challenges the decision which seems to have been made by the minister to levy a tax on exports of natural gas and electricity for the reasons the minister entertains. In view of the circumstances, and of the fact that his colleague is opposed to it and has sent a letter confirming it to all his colleagues on the government side, can the minister first tell us today that he has indeed decided to levy a tax on natural gas and electricity exports?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): It is perfectly obvious that the hon. member for Joliette would like me to reveal to the House, today, what next Tuesday's budget will bring. I would simply invite him to wait till Tuesday night next at which time the Minister of Finance will bring down the budget.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, on a supplementary. I should have liked the minister to tell the House, first of all, if he agrees on the contents of that letter. In any event, I would remind him of the following excerpt, which I quote:

> In any case, and since Canadians assume responsibility for our own irresponsibility, let us subsidize the price of Canadian oil, at least for a time . . . but let us see to it that all Canadians pay for that folly and not only the producing areas.

Does the minister intend to reply in the affirmative to the invitation his colleague for Rosemont is extending to him?

Mr. Lalonde: There again my hon. colleague will have to wait till next Tuesday when the global energy policy of the government will be made public. I trust that, when he has acquainted himself with it, he will realize that it is an excellent policy for Canada as a whole.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB-CREATION PROGRAM FOR NATIVE PEOPLE—INQUIRY RESPECTING INCREASED FUNDING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In a submission made to a task force on native employment established by the minister's department, the National Indian Brotherhood complained that the job-creation programs being developed by his department were being planned without consultation with the national, provincial or local native organization. They also complained very bitterly about the fact that the funds available for native job-creation programs this year through the community development program and LEAP are substantially less than they were two years ago when the former Liberal government was in office. Has the minister given serious consideration to increasing the amount of money available for native job-creation programs this year?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the whole area of job creation, employment and training is presently under review by a parliamentary committee headed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. There is also a review taking place within our department to look at the internal financing of these areas. It certainly is my intention to combine those reports, when they are available, to develop some new initiatives in this area. We are consulting with native organizations. Last week I met with several groups of them out west. We will certainly bring them into any full consultation before any new programs are introduced.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, the minister's reply to my question indicates there will be no more money this year while the matter is being considered. In the same submission, the National Indian Brotherhood urged the establishment of a joint committee from the minister's department, the Department of Indian Affairs and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion so that for natives there can be one economic development package instead of the completely separate programs which they now have from various departments. Is the minister consulting his colleagues about the possibility of such a joint approach?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, there have been a number of discussions between the departments concerning how we can better co-ordinate and combine the different initiatives to assist native Canadians in employment and training programs, in fact in the whole area of economic development and assistance. As well, I assure the hon. member that in the development of plans we are looking at the initiatives we can take in western Canada where a large proportion of native people reside. We are also looking at ways in which we can develop special initiatives in terms of development funds for them in that area. I can tell the hon. member that the concerns he raises are ones that we also share and there are very extensive discussions taking place.

AIR SAFETY

MIRABEL—SIMULATED CRASH OF DC-8 AIRCRAFT

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Following the safety exercise held at Mirabel yesterday with the simulated crash of a DC-8 aircraft the toll of which would have been 34 dead, 25 seriously injured, 31 passengers with minor injuries and 25 other passengers in a state of shock, can the minister tell the House, first if he is satisfied with the results and, second if the persons in charge of staging this event will be asked to develop a safer and faster rescue system?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I guess the answer to the first question is no and the answer to the second is yes. However, this morning, around eleven o'clock, I asked my department for a detailed report on this situation because not knowing the criteria used for this exercise, I cannot pass judgment on what happened.

I have been told that such simulations take place on a routine basis and I can only rejoice that these dead and injured are just simulated and not real casualties. However, I will seriously further this inquiry and provide the hon. member with the opinions expressed by the experts. Anyway I can assure him that all efforts are being made to improve airport safety in Canada.

COMMUNICATIONS

EARTH STATIONS IN NORTHERN AREAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Communications and ask him to clarify his earlier remark that his department was going to follow current policy with regard to the operation of illegal earth stations. As the minister is aware, the operation of the earth stations involved in the north is illegal. Is he suggesting that he is going to condone this illegal action, go for an interim licence arrangement or have the RCMP look into closing them down?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I refer to the fact that I answered this type of question a number of times in previous months, particularly in the spring and late summer. We do not intend at the moment to close down the operations in the north. We intend to address the problem, first of all, by trying to provide northern and remote communities with an adequate package of Canadian television services. When that is done, we would expect operators in those areas who are licensees, people who would be licensed by the CRTC at that time, to reorient their dishes toward Canadian satellites.

FRENCH PROGRAM TRANSMISSION IN NORTHERN AREAS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that one of these operations in Whitehorse, Yukon, has been required to cease and desist day-long transmission entirely in French transmitted from the city of Montreal, and cannot renew transmission until cleared by the CRTC, will the minister explain whether he knows of this requirement? If so, will he perhaps hasten the approval of the transmission of French programming in the Yukon so that we in that part of the country can share in a very worth-while bilingual program?

● (1500)

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am not sure if I understood the hon. member quite clearly. In any event, I am not aware of the specific instance he has brought to my attention. I will look into it and see what can be done as soon as possible.

Point of Order—Mr. W. Baker

ACCESS OF CANADIAN FARMERS TO UCO ELEVATOR

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. Given the substantial sums of money which were expended by the federal government for construction of the UCO elevator in the Essex area, given the nature of the direction behind the expenditure, namely that the farmers of Essex would have first access to that elevator, and the fact that they are now being refused access to the elevator because it is full, would the minister advise whether he is aware of the problem, whether in fact, as stated, the elevator is full of American product, and whether in fact it is still the intention of his ministry to ensure Canadians that they will have access to those elevators first?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we have received some representations about the inadequacy of the whole system and about its not being able to handle soybeans in particular. One of the main reasons is the abundant crop in southwestern Ontario this year. All facilities are plugged to the top, and we are thankful that we have so much. Much of it is in the position of being exported and it is moving. We hope that this will alleviate the situation. According to what I was told last week, this situation is not brought about because of imported beans either at the Windsor elevator or at the Port Colborne elevator. It was practically all domestic produce which was there.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—POSTPONEMENT OF SPEAKER'S RULING

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I understand that you are prepared today to rule on the questions of privilege standing in the names of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). This is an allotted day, and a short day at that. I have spoken to both hon. members and, in view of the circumstances, I wonder if you would be prepared to defer your ruling until tomorrow in order to save some time.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: Yes, I am prepared to defer the ruling until tomorrow—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you very much Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: —because having looked at the arguments of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), I decided that I would hear the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), so therefore I shall defer until tomorrow.

MR. BLAIS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I understand the procedure concerning motions under S.O. 43 introduced before the oral questions period, the mover must convince the Chair about the urgency and necessity of those motions. To do so, the allegations must be well founded.

[English]

I therefore must take exception to the unfounded allegations which were made by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) in his presentation of his motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if my hon. friend was rising on a question of privilege, I think all of us in this Hose know that the point was neither a question of privilege nor a point of order.

Madam Speaker: For the information of the hon. member, the minister was rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: It was still not a point of order.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 872, 993, 996, 997, 999 and 1,206.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

COUNCIL OF FISHERIES MINISTERS—ATLANTIC PROVINCES, QUEBEC

Question No. 872—Mr. Gass:

Will the council of fisheries ministers of the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and the government meet this year and, if so (a) in what location and on what date (b) what will be the agenda for the meeting?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): No meeting of fisheries ministers of the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and the government has taken place since the change in government. The current constitutional talks, however, afford the opportunity for provincial and federal representatives to share and exchange ideas and recommendations on the future of the fishery in this country.

MR. RICHARD ASSELIN

Question No. 993—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the public service employment history of Mr. Richard Asselin, vice-president of finance and administration of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): We are informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: None. Mr. R. Asselin, B.Com., M.A.Sc., C.A., vice-president of finance and administration has never been employed in the public service.

MR. LEO LABELLE

Question No. 996—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Leo Labelle employed as regional director of the national capital office of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if not, on what date and for what reason did he leave?

2. Has he at any time brought a legal action, or given notice of his intention to bring a legal action, against Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if so, what are all the details involved, including an exact description of the action and the circumstances leading to such action?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

1. No. He resigned on March 23, 1978.

2. Yes. This matter is sub judice.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—TURNOVER IN STAFF

Question No. 997—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the percentage of turnover in staff for the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation during each of the past three years?

2. Is the figure higher than might ordinarily be expected and, if so, what are all the reasons?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

1. 1977: 42 per cent, including staff on probation
   1978: 42 per cent, including staff on probation
   1979: 24 per cent, including staff on probation.

2. No, because 75 per cent of the turnover in 1977, 72 per cent in 1978 and 95 per cent in 1979, of the figures presented in part one, is represented by clerical positions where mobility is much higher than the administrative and sales positions. This is further compounded by the fact that the corporation is a small organization with very few promotion opportunities, consequently, employees often have to look outside for more senior positions. The above should be compared with a turnover of 19.3 per cent (1979) in the administrative support category of the public service where promotion opportunities are far greater.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT—CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—APPOINTEES

Question No. 999—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Yvon Gariépy appointed master of the Royal Canadian Mint and, if so (a) on what date (b) who was the Minister of Supply and Services at the time?

2. Was Madam Claudette Nadeau appointed as head of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if so (a) on what date (b) who was the Minister of Supply and Services at the time?

3. Was Mrs. Anne Asselin, wife of the vice-president of finance and administration of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, a member of the public service and, if so, was she employed in the office of the Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer at any time?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows:

1. Yes.

(a) June 16, 1975.

(b) Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer.

I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

2. Yes.

(a) August 11, 1975.

(b) Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer.

3. No. However, Mrs. Anne Asselin was employed in the office of the Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer from January 26, 1976, to April 20, 1976. Mrs. Asselin's salary was paid by the minister's exempt staff budget.

FIRM OF POULIOT, MERCURE, LeBEL, DESROCHERS, LEGAULT AND DANCOSSE OF MONTREAL

Question No. 1,206—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the total cost for the legal services rendered by the firm of Pouliot, Mercure, LeBel, Desrochers, Legault and Dancosse of Montreal, to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation during the past five years and (a) what is the breakdown for each year (b) how many cases were handled?

2. What is the description of the work done in each case and what was the cost?

3. (a) How many times has the firm been paid a retainer (b) on what dates and what was the amount in each case?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows:

1. $25,993

Motion for Papers

(a) 1975/76 — nil
1977/78 — nil
1978/79 — $1,732
1980/81 — to date — $10,122

(b) 10.

2. Labour relations matter $1,732
Labour relations matter 1,511
Employee termination 1,043
Labour relations matter 1,794
Labour relations advice 1,807
Submission to the Canada Labour Relations Board (CLRB) 3,762
Appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal of decision rendered by the CLRB on May 17, 1979 4,222
Labour relations advice 619
Appeal to Supreme Court of Canada 8,778
Labour relations matter 725

3. (a) None

(b) Not applicable.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—PATRIATION OF CONSTITUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House supports the immediate patriation of the Constitution of Canada, incorporating only the generally agreed upon amending formula known as the Vancouver consensus, so that all other constitutional changes shall be made in Canada by Canadians.

He said: Madam Speaker, I regret that I must rise today to introduce a motion which, I believe, could move Canada from a bitter impasse over constitutional questions in the shadow of the announcement by the government House leader that the Government of Canada intends to invoke the rules of closure to stop the Parliament of Canada from debating the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: I regret indeed that hon. members opposite invoke closure when there have been more speakers on the motion from the government side than there have been from the ranks of the official opposition.

This matter will be discussed at greater length in the country and in the House of Commons, as indeed it was discussed during the pipeline debate when closure was used to stop the right of Parliament to debate a matter—

Mr. Cousineau: And to filibuster.

Mr. Clark: —which would have struck at the heart of the nation. We will discuss it more, but I want to make two points. One is that this is not the normal kind of stoppage of debate we have had. This is the closure of C. D. Howe. This is not the modified Standing Order 75C, so-called. This is pipeline closure. This is the kind of closure which was used, unhappily, in 1957 to try to ride roughshod over the rights of this House of Commons. That is what is being done again today by this government.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: It is interesting to note that the last time this kind of C. D. Howe closure was used, it was used to force upon Parliament changes in the rules of Parliament. It was used then for the first time in the history of the British parliamentary tradition anywhere in the world to change the rules of parliament. Now again that extreme and extraordinary measure of closure—that full force C. D. Howe kind of closure—is being used, to stop debate which has not been excessive, because government speakers have spoken more than hon. members in this party have, it is being used not on a minor matter but on the fundamental law of the land. Hon. members opposite do not want our constitution debated. They want to cut off debate. They want to stop the right of Canadians in Canada's Parliament to discuss the constitution of this country. That is unacceptable.

Mr. Collenette: Rubbish!

Mr. Clark: Because we respect both this institution and this nation, for which disrespect has been shown by the actions of this government, and because we respect the constitution of this nation, what we are proposing, by contrast, is a means by which Canadians can act today to bring the constitution of Canada home today so that Canadians can change it here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

Mr. Clark: The motion that we have introduced provides:

[Translation]

That this House supports the immediate patriation of the Constitution of Canada, incorporating only the generally agreed upon amending formula known as the Vancouver consensus, so that all other constitutional changes shall be made in Canada by Canadians.

[English]

This motion calls for the Parliament and the people of Canada to act quickly on the one constitutional question with which virtually every Canadian agrees, that is, to have the constitution of Canada here at home in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has consistently said he wants our constitution home, I have consistently said I want our constitution home, so has the Leader of the NDP and so has every other member of the House of Commons. What this motion offers is an opportunity to stop talking and to start acting to bring the Canadian Constitution home to Canada in a way that respects the rules and traditions of this House and respects the rules and the nature of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: More than that, this motion today provides a way to ensure that we can work with our constitution once we get it here. It allows the whole Parliament of Canada to approve an amending formula which was accepted in principle by the committee of officials working on constitutional reform through the summer and, even more than that, which was accepted in principle by all the provincial premiers when they met in Ottawa in September, and which was accepted in principle by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Not true.

Mr. Clark: Those are matters of Canadian agreement, agreement on having our constitution home, agreement on the Vancouver formula as the way to work with that constitution once we have it home.

Unfortunately, in recent days the focus of attention in the nation has been on the disagreements which exist on constitutional questions, disagreements which are deep and which are in danger of becoming even deeper. But we should not let those serious disagreements obscure the fact that very real progress was made this summer, and that Canada is, for the first time in at least a decade, in a position where agreement exists as to both the necessity and the means of bringing our Canadian constitution home.

We in this party want Canada to act on that agreement, and our motion provides the instrument to let Parliament start the action to get the Constitution of Canada home so that Canadians can work with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are all aware in this House and throughout the country that discord and disagreement in Canada on how we should renew our federation grow worse with every passing day. We know that, with budget and energy policy coming, other deeply wounding controversies may well lie ahead of this Parliament and of this country. For the sake of our country, all Canadians must come together on common, solid ground. We must do it free of partisan recriminations, and we must do it free of any kind of narrow perspective.

On September 13 the first ministers' conference broke down. Now is not the time to assess blame for that; we have had enough blaming. It is time in this country for some building, building for Canada. To that September conference all the participants came with packages of reforms which they wanted. Obviously, it would have been the best thing for our country if a balanced, comprehensive compromise package of reforms and improvements in the constitution had been agreed on. But that did not happen, as the House knows. What did happen, however, was the emergence of the Vancouver consensus as a formula accepted in principle by virtually all of the participants in the closed session in September.

That formula allows amendments to the constitution, and allows them now, Mr. Speaker, not two years hence. It does not freeze the Constitution of Canada for two years, so that the people of Quebec, who might want more changes, are told, "No, you cannot have them for two years." It does not freeze our constitution for two years so that the people of western Canada who might want changes are told, "No, you cannot have them for two years; it is frozen." Instead, it gives us a means and an instrument by which we in this country can use and change our constitution right now. It is a device we can use today. It is not a device we must wait for two years to use.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: And as the House will know, that formula also protects the provinces of Canada, because it provides the fundamental guarantee that no province can be affected by an amendment unless it chooses to be affected. Thus does it reflect the essential partnership of Canada. Thus does it respect the essential nature of a federal system.

[Translation]

There is no ideal formula but that one has the decided advantage of having been approved, in the present context, by all the partners in federation. Given this approval in principle, it is time all partners set aside, for the time being, all the constitutional amendments they propose. It is time they join in bringing the constitution back to Canada so that the required changes can be effected afterwards by Canadians, in Canada. Let us ask the British Parliament merely to give us back our constitution with the generally accepted Vancouver formula. Let us make that happen quickly and let us then, without the intervention of another country, promptly update our federative agreement.

[English]

I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, why the government insists on a procedure that would have Britain pass amendments to the Constitution of Canada instead of letting Canada pass amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Surely, Mr. Speaker, our constitution is our business. We should be dealing with our constitution here in Canada and we should not be waiting two years, we should be doing it now. What is so tragic about the way we are proceeding is that the Government of Canada not only wants the British to change our constitution but wants us to be prevented from working with our constitution for at least two years. Neither of those is acceptable to me. I am a Canadian, I want to have my constitution here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I see no reason to wait. I see no reason to put in an unnecessary two-year delay, because we can have our constitution home quickly, we can have an amendment formula agreed to quickly, and we can do it quickly. If this motion is accepted, the will of Parliament will be clear. The will of the premiers is already clear; they accepted in principle the Vancouver consensus when they met in September.

Mr. Chrétien: Not true.

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Justice says that is not true. But he knows that is true.

Mr. Chrétien: Ask Bill Davis.

Mr. Clark: He suggests that we ask the Premier of Ontario. The Premier of Ontario indicated, in the last 15 to 20 days, that he is prepared to accept the Vancouver amending formula.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is why we have a basis of agreement here.

If I could speak of the one provincial government of the party which in this House agrees with the Minister of Justice, the Premier of Saskatchewan, he has indicated that he too would find the Vancouver amending formula acceptable. Those are the facts, and the Minister of Justice, if he has any respect for the truth or the federal system, should accept that fact and act on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Then, with the will of Parliament clear, as it could be if members rise above party and vote to support this amendment, and with the will of the premiers clear, we can work quickly on the details of the Vancouver formula, to which I will come later. Then we can work on amendments which will allow us to begin work immediately to change our constitution here in this country. If that happens, if the House of Commons is prepared to rise above party matters and is prepared to accept this motion which allows the House of Commons to bring our constitution home today with an acceptable amending formula, I believe we can then start immediately, we can start this week. Instead of bringing in closure which will divide this country, we could start this week to have officials sit down and discuss the wide range of amendments Canadians might want.

● (1520)

The chairman of the premiers, Mr. Lyon, has suggested that it would be useful to meet again, that we should not write off all the work done this summer, that we should not let the failure of the September conference mean the failure of constitutional reform. He said that there should be more meetings, there should be more discussions. How much more fruitful it would be if those new meetings and new discussions occur in the context of agreement, not only on having our constitution here, but on the formula by which we can have it here? That agreement exists; that agreement exists.

Mr. Chrétien: Not true.

Mr. Clark: It was accepted in principle by all of the first ministers. The Minister of Justice says that it is not true. Perhaps his boss, perhaps the Prime Minister does not agree with it, but every premier does. Every premier is prepared to accept that formula and to use it to bring the Constitution of Canada home.

Mr. Chrétien: No, no; it is not true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: If the atmosphere is positive we can get agreement on constitutional change. If the atmosphere is negative in this country, and it shows that there is a real risk of it becoming deeply negative on this question, on energy questions and other questions, then we will not get agreement on even the simplest kind of changes. That would set back deeply and dangerously the process and the promise of constitutional change in this country. If this motion is accepted, if we bring our constitution home with the Vancouver formula, then we will have both the momentum and the means to achieve Canadian amendments to the Canadian Constitution right here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Ever since the end of the first ministers' conference we have been calling for precisely that approach—patriate with the Vancouver consensus amending formula and then make changes in the Canadian Constitution in Canada by Canadians. In our view it is undeniably the way to make constitutional change a source of bringing Canadians together rather than driving them apart, because they will be driven apart, and they are being driven apart by the current proposed constitutional resolution of the government.

Our views on the dangers for federalism in the proposed resolution are well known, and we intend to keep on making them as forcefully as we can. If we are gagged in Parliament by the use of closure, we will carry our case to the country. A majority of provinces are now testing the constitutionality of this proposal in the courts. It is not just a few provinces but a majority of the provinces of Canada. Premiers are attacking premiers. Federalists in the province of Quebec are disastrously divided, to the joy and to the benefit only of the separatists of the province of Quebec. Western Canadians and Atlantic Canadians justly resent the second-class status and the third-class status of their provinces inherent in the Prime Minister's redesigned Victoria amending formula.

All provinces have just cause to fear the dangers to the basic federal character of Canada in the proposed section 42 where a federally-written, federally-timed referendum could allow Ottawa to go around the other order of government entirely. Plans for provincial referenda multiply. What kind of a situation will we have with different levels of government asking different questions on the same subject of the same people, and getting different answers? What will that lead us to here in this country? It will lead us to chaos in this country, constitutional chaos in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have no need for that chaos because we have the means here for agreement. There is a Canadian will to have our constitution at home. There is a Canadian way to have our constitution at home in the Vancouver amending formula. What is needed is a willingness on the part of the Liberal party to rise above narrow partisanship and to support this principle which will let Canadians have their constitution home. Why does the Liberal party oppose having Canada's constitution home this week? Why does the Liberal party oppose the amending formula which is accepted by all the first ministers? Why is the Liberal party standing in the way of the people of Canada having the constitution of Canada here at home so we can amend it, live with it and work with it in Canada? Why is there that kind of opposition? There should not be. What we need, instead, is a determination to move forward now, immediately, to bring our constitution to Canada in a way that we can work with it in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The government can introduce closure if they will. They intend to do that with the respect for Parliament that was shown by the late C. D. Howe. That is their intention.

An hon. Member: What respect do you have when you filibuster?

Mr. Clark: They talk about a filibuster. This must be the first time in the history of Canada or in the history of the British parliamentary system that anyone has talked about filibuster when the government has spoken more than the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: Not true.

Mr. Clark: I will admit that the speakers of the official opposition have made more sense than the speakers of the government party. There have been 19 Liberal spokesmen and only 18 Progressive Conservative spokesmen, and they call it a filibuster.

Mr. Collenette: What about the NDP? They are part of the opposition.

Mr. Clark: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) suggests that the NDP should be considered part of my party. I am not exchanging letters with the hon. Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: But I say to members like the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), members who, I know, are concerned about the substance of the resolution brought forward by the government, and to members such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, I believe, would be opposed to closure on a constitutional question, that I hope when the time comes for them to cast their votes at a quarter to six this afternoon they will consider whether they want to invite deep rancour and deep division in this country by proceeding both with closure and with a constitutional package they know is divisive, or whether they would prefer to adopt the motion before the House now which would let the Parliament of Canada act today to bring the constitution home immediately in the way that Canadians want.

There are a number of merits to the constitutional amending formula which has been agreed to by the premiers. Of course one merit is the single fact that it has been agreed to. When all of the conditions that were uttered at the first ministers' conference are set aside, when all connections to any packages are put aside, the House must ask the question: why was that formula given virtually unanimous approval in September? Why did it emerge as the only focus of ministerial consideration this summer? Why was the Victoria formula of 1971 not that focus? Why did Premier Davis just the other day acknowledge that he understood the Victoria formula was no longer acceptable? What other generally agreed on formula has ever emerged over all the last several years of debate? The Vancouver consensus is the inescapable amending formula in 1980 for this country. It is the only formula that seeks harmony in the federalism of Canada and allows unity in the national life of this country.

[Translation]

The Vancouver formula applies to the realities of the day and will allow us to build the Canada of tomorrow. At present, it provides that constitutional changes may be made with the consent of Parliament and of two thirds of the provinces comprising at least 50 per cent of the population. However, if the amendment approved by the required majority concerns, first the powers of a provincial legislature to make laws, second the rights and privileges granted or guaranteed by the constitution to the legislature or the government of a province, third the assets or property of a province or, fourth, the natural resources of a province, dissenting provinces may dissociate themselves from the amendment, which would not apply in their case.

• (1530)

I want to emphasize that among those advantages of the Vancouver formula—I draw this to the attention of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party—there is a clear guarantee of natural resource jurisdiction. It is not a guarantee which can be overriden by a referendum triggered unilaterally without any other cause than the will of the Prime Minister. It is a guarantee that will endure. It is a guarantee that provinces can count on unless they choose themselves to surrender or to modify that situation.

The words which I have just used to describe that proposal are drawn from the report to the first ministers by the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution, a committee which I must say was ably co-chaired by the hon. Minister of Justice and by the attorney general of Saskatchewan. There remained some details to work out, especially concerning how to deal with amendments of universal applicability, which cannot be subjected to opting out, whether constitutional provision should be made for the financial implications of opting out of amendments. Those are details. Those are details which can be dealt with.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Justice propose to use closure to stop Parliament from debating a matter when the government spokesmen have outnumbered the spokesmen of the official opposition. The Minister of Justice is skeptical that we can work out those details. I have faith in Canada. I have faith in the capacity of Canadians to work out those details.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What is more, I believe Canadians should be given the chance. Why leave the decisions to the British? We are an independent, sovereign country. I want us to act like Canadians, not like colonials. This provision would allow us to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Various proposals were suggested in the continuing committee's report, and it seems clear that final agreement was clearly within reach with no fundamental issue of principle threatening to polarize or divide opinion. In our view those final stages of negotiation could be completed in short order. No participant in the September conference has suggested otherwise. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will today, but it will be the first time because he has not suggested otherwise before, nor have the representatives of the premiers.

We do know that the Prime Minister himself was prepared to accept the Vancouver consensus if—and he applied a condition—he got agreement for his package of constitutional changes. And I cannot believe that he would have taken that position concerning an amending formula that was neither sensible nor workable. He was bargaining with it. He was bargaining with the Vancouver formula but, by being prepared to bargain with it, he knew that if his bluff was called, if there was agreement with this price, then he would have to deliver on the package. So clearly on the question of principle, on the question of the merits, the Prime Minister of Canada himself accepts the Vancouver amending formula, as did every other first minister at that table in September.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, the government's leaked memo is at pains to list several advantages to the formula, advantages to Canada, and to minimize the disadvantages. One disadvantage, which the Prime Minister has talked about since that time, is that the opting-out formula might lead to what he calls a checkerboard effect. On page 28 of that leaked memo it said:

> No amendment could be made without the consent of Parliament. So there would be a federal check on any checkerboard effect that might be brought about by "opting out": that is Parliament or the government could decline to proceed with an amendment where the provinces did not all agree.

Finally, the government's advisers from the Department of Justice contend that—and again I read from page 29 of the document:

> —if the provincial consensus (on the Vancouver formula) . . . holds, the federal government could consider joining the majority position.

That was the secret advice, the secret decision of the Government of Canada prior to the first ministers' conference. Why will they not accept in public what they accepted in secrecy? Why will they not let Parliament act today on a formula which they were prepared to accept in September? What has changed? Why do they want to stop Parliament from acting now to have our constitution here in Canada where we, in Canada, can work on it? The secret document went on to suggest appropriate arrangements on the side of details referred to earlier.

We know now that the provincial consensus on the Vancouver formula did hold. But the Prime Minister would not agree to join that clear consensus without agreement on his package. It was then the Prime Minister who stopped agreement. As I said earlier, no partner in our federation should now hold all of Canada up to ransom for their own hidden agenda items. The way lay open in September to patriation with the Vancouver formula. It lies open now. And beyond that achievement, which could be finalized in all stages in a matter of weeks, lies the prospect of having the means here in Canada for Canadians to amend our constitution, free from hidden agenda, free from veto, free from referenda, which could override the provinces and destroy the nature of the federal system, and free from blockage.

I believe we have a great opportunity here today to make the most out of unusual circumstances. There is great hope among the people of Canada that we can get an agreement on constitutional change. I remember going into the province of Quebec during the referendum campaign and speaking sincerely about the need for constitutional renewal. I know the attitude in western Canada, the region of Canada from which I come. I know there is a deep sense there that change is needed. I know that in every corner of this land there is a determination to end the colonial system that leaves our constitution in another country and that permits decisions affecting us to be taken by another government. There is a desire to have Canadians act, not only to bring our constitution home but to have it here where we can work with it.

The Prime Minister has amendments that he wants. The Leader of the NDP has amendments that he wants and I have amendments that I want. Premiers have amendments that they want. They can all be dealt with here in Canada and they can be dealt with in accordance with the Vancouver formula. I know I am approaching the end of my allotted time, and so I will conclude by saying that everyone in Canada wants to have constitutional change. Everyone in Canada wants to have our constitution here at home. The reason there is opposition to the government proposal is that they want to have Britain make changes which we believe should only be made here in Canada. They want to continue a colonial status which we want to end. But instead of holding up the House of Commons in debate, our party is today proposing a means by which the Parliament of Canada can act to bring the Constitution of Canada home, to be amended in Canada. It can be done if there is a will in the House of Commons to do it. I pray that there is that will, so that Canadians can change our own constitution here in our own country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this—

Mr. Knowles: You mean "Mr. Speaker."

Mr. Broadbent: We have changed Speakers, I see. I am corrected by the sage of the House, who has just pointed out to me we have changed Speakers.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate with pleasure in this very important debate, which is really a continuation of the debate which has been going on for a number of days on the future of this country. I would like to pick up on one suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), that the approach to constitutional change be made in a non-partisan fashion as much as possible. Shortly after the referendum the Leader of the Opposition expressed sentiments of the kind expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Andre: How do you know that? We did not participate?

Mr. Broadbent: I listened to my colleagues on my right, and I would appreciate their indulgence for a few minutes. They may disagree with what I have to say, but I would have thought that it would have pleased even the member of the Conservative party most immediately to my right.

When the country's constitution is changed it should be done through consensus here in the House of Commons, outside the House, amongst the provinces, the premiers and the ordinary people of our land wherever they may live. Without criticizing the Leader of the Opposition, but simply to illustrate the point, so far, in the discussion on the proposed resolution introduced by the Govenrment of Canada, there has been some partisan reaction. I will not pass judgment on the decision-making process which led to that reaction.

Two Conservative premiers, one from New Brunswick and one from Ontario, have indicated their support for the resolution. Then there are other Conservative premiers who, with equal good will—I am not presupposing that difference of attitude—have indicated their opposition to the government's proposal. The Premier of Saskatchewan, as members of this House well know, has not made up his mind finally on the measure. He sees certain matters which he likes and other which he does not like. The point I am making is that in some quarters there is a feeling of give and take which is appropriate when a nation experiences the kind of severe change which is inevitably involved in constitutional change.

I would like to see that kind of spirit in this debate and the pre-supposition that good will will prevail amongst those with whom we differ. I have no higher regard for the Premier of New Brunswick because he happens to be closer to my position on this issue than I have for the Premier of British Columbia. They are two different Canadians expressing their judgments, and I merely happen to be more in agreement with one than with the other. Nor am I questioning motives.

When the Leader of the Opposition says rhetorically, and he means it substantively, that we should stop being colonials and bring the constitution back to Canada before we make the changes, to a certain real extent he is game-playing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to make my argument. What we have before us in the government resolution are topics which have been debated in Canada and upon which judgment has been passed by the people in the provinces and the House of Commons. In fact it is a Canadian decision, and the British parliament will not act unless they get a recommendation from the people of Canada. We all know that.

I suggest that there is some weakness—and I will not put it any stronger than that—in the argument that by opting for the approach put forth by the Leader of the Opposition over the approach initiated by the Government of Canada, we would somehow be more Canadian. Both involve a decision-making process, the outcome of which will be determined by Canadians. One may be more preferable than the other, but the fundamental, intellectual truth of the situation, surely, is that both decisions, whether we adopt the Conservative party approach or the approach proposed by the Government of Canada, will result in a decision made by Canadians, and no one else, in the final analysis.

There are some very serious implications in the approach proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. There are some things in the government proposal in which my party profoundly believe, such as the entrenchment of rights and the establishment of language rights for the two official languages which exist in our land. At this historical point in our history I believe that these subjects ought to be entrenched, because I fear that the opportunity may not arise again. There is the principle of equalization. This principle can be improved upon, and we will deal with that in committee. It is a principle in which I believe.

There is also the commitment, although it is very fundamental now because the government has made a commitment, that the provinces of Canada will have the right to control and manage the development of their resources. I say to the Leader of the Opposition as a member from western Canada that that is very important at this point in our history. Premier Blakeney said the very same thing at a press conference held today in Regina.

I would also say to the Leader of the Opposition that if we reject the government's approach and accept his approach—and I will come to the concerns which I have over his approach—we will lose the points I have just mentioned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I see that the opposition leader is shaking his head, and I will come back to that point in a minute. We will lose those things. It has been suggested by an hon. member from Newfoundland, a former cabinet minister who ought to have known better, that the proposal of the New Democratic Party on the question of resources was aimed at the province of Saskatchewan. I say to that member as a man who grew up in Ontario, nothing could be further from the truth, and I mean that.

If I thought, for example, that we could have obtained the right for Newfoundland to have control of their offshore resources, he can be sure that that would have been a principal part of the bargaining instrument because that is the position of our party. We believe that the offshore provinces should be put on the same basis as the inshore provinces. That is our belief, but we were not in a position to do anything, and I state it frankly because it is no secret. We have our strength in western Canada and the Liberal party is weak in western Canada.

One can see these moves within the political process in two ways. One can look at it and say, "Ah, somehow that is cynical wheeling and dealing". That is the essence of democratic politics that it be conducted openly. If we believe in the consensual approach to constitutional change, and if there are in a proposal many things in which we believe, as my party saw in the constitutional proposal, such as fundamental rights, language rights and equalization, and you also saw something which was missing in terms of resource control which was important to western Canadians as well as others, and you saw the means of negotiating because of your strength, then I think it is appropriate in a democratic system to negotiate toughly and get it, and we got it.

An hon. Member: You sold out.

Mr. Broadbent: Someone has said that we sold out. I would say to the Conservatives, "What have you obtained for the people of Canada?" Not a thing. The people of Newfoundland should pay attention with some care to what Mr. Peckford is saying because, as a result of constitutional entrenchment which will amount to two full pages of constitutional text, over resources all the provinces will have substantial power. As a result of its inclusion in the constitution, Mr. Peckford, if he is still premier at the time, will have the clear authority to manage and control the right of, for example, development of hydroelectric power in Labrador and Newfoundland itself. No longer will private corporations be able to challenge the right in the courts or his participation in interprovincial trade, as is the case today. The victory which we have won in this debate is for the people of Newfoundland not just the people of the prairies. Similarly,— —in Quebec, Mr. Lévesque wants control over asbestos. With those rights entrenched in the constitution, the Quebec government, presently that of Mr. Lévesque or perhaps in the future that of Mr. Ryan or someone else, could also have control over those natural resources. It could decide what it wants as far as asbestos is concerned. It would be its right, which is not the case at present, because the Supreme Court has made certain decisions in the past which have changed the present constitutional reality of Canada.

[Translation]

● (1550)

[English]

So I say to our friend in the Conservative party, not only for Newfoundland but for the people of the province of Quebec, this constitutional amendment, giving them a right to control the management of their resources, is of profound importance, and I am proud to play a role in that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In Alberta and Saskatchewan the same right holds for the development of taxing powers over their gas, over their oil and, indeed, over their potash.

I should like a member of the Conservative party to put on record, sometime, how many millions of dollars the right to indirect taxation on oil and gas is going to mean to Mr. Lougheed. We have done some preliminary calculations and even for Alberta, Mr. Speaker, "it ain't hay". So the prairie provinces are going to benefit as well.

British Columbia, a province that has gas, a province that has lumber resources but which wants to set up planning mechanisms and that wants to set up a pro-rationing method of development, under the constitutional change that we have proposed and that the government has accepted, the government of British Columbia—whether led by Mr. Bennett, or before long, we anticipate, Mr. Barrett—will be able to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The point is that the resource amendment that the government has decided to accept is not without significance; it is something of real importance to every region and province in our land.

Mr. Clark: Ask Allen Blakeney.

Mr. Broadbent: The Leader of the Opposition tells me to ask Allen Blakeney. Mr. Blakeney spoke for himself a couple of hours ago and said the same thing.

Mr. Clark: Check the record.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say that if we moved in the Conservative party's direction today, if we supported the motion before the House, then language rights, fundamental rights, equalization and provincial control of resources would all go out the window.

Mr. Clark: That is not true.

Mr. Broadbent: The Leader of the Opposition says that is not true. But they would go out the window in the precise sense that if the motion presented by the government and so amended in the future is accepted, we would have those things; under the Conservative proposal we would have nothing but a constitution back here.

In this context, I want to ask about our native people.

Mr. Crombie: They are not protected here.

Mr. Broadbent: A former minister says the native people are not protected here. I correct his in one minor respect only: there is a clause referring to existing rights. I say to the House that this party intends to work very hard to improve what is in the existing resolution presented by the government, and to ensure that the rights of native people are not only as stated in the bill but are extended well beyond that to include treaty obligations as well. So we will be fighting for that.

In the Tory position—and I do not say this pejoratively as I am trying to understand it—if we got the constitution back, all it would mean is we would have it back without any reference to a clause at all—without any understanding that there would be anything in it for our Indian and Inuit population or any of our other native people. At least in the present resolution there is something that we can amend and improve.

The same point could be made with reference to women's rights. There is an affirmative action clause that we like but that can be improved. There is also, in our judgment, a need to deal with the constitution in such a way that it would reverse a number of Supreme Court decisions made in the past decade the effect of which has not been to establish equality between men and women, but just the opposite. In the resolution that the government has offered, we have grounds on which to make improvements on the matter of women's rights, and we intend to do that.

I want to come now, Mr. Speaker, to what in our view is basically wrong with the Vancouver formula. The former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition, says that in his proposal we would have a "work" something—I do not have the precise words from his press release of this morning but the gist of it was that it would be a formula that would enable us to get speedy and concrete change right away. With all due respect, I say to him that in my judgment he is wrong, and I want to tell the House why I think so.

The essence of the Vancouver formula is that all the provinces would particpate in the decision but that any province would have the right to veto its application to its own province. That is what is in the Vancouver formula. Of course, the provinces agreed to that; why would they not? They would each retain a veto over things that affect them; they would have everything to gain and nothing to lose, but I say to the Leader of the Opposition, we are a federal party and we have national responsibilities that go beyond provincial premiers.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If we accepted a formula like that, would we have medicare in Canada?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Broadbent: Would we have hospitalization in Canada?

Some hon. Members: No!

An hon. Member: No thanks to the Tories.

Mr. Broadbent: I say, Mr. Speaker, if we had accepted a formula such as that proposed in the Vancouver amendment we would not have a Canada with a common set of rights—of fundamental decencies, if you like—from coast to coast. We would have a hodge-podge Canada with a highly differentiated set of rights and principles. We will have nothing to do with that kind of Canada.

Mr. Malone: The option is no Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Not only is that a fundamental flaw, it is a serious flaw, and I am disturbed that the Conservative party, as a federal party, could put that forward as a serious option at this time. I mean that, because I think it could lead to the dismemberment—it could lead to a highly differentiated set of rights in every region of our land. There could be family law of one kind in Manitoba, for example, and an entirely different kind in another province. Some provinces would have medicare and others would not. What we stand for in this party is a common sense of Canadian citizenship. That is fundamentally important, Mr. Speaker.

The other point I want to make is less significant but surely must cause the Leader of the Opposition some concern. Some amendments simply cannot be subject to an opting-out formula. I ask the Leader of the Opposition what he would do with proposed amendments that would change the Senate of Canada? What would he do with amendments that would change the Supreme Court of Canada? Will some provinces be able to opt out? In other words, Mr. Speaker, it would be inoperative to take the formula with that kind of requirement—an opting-out process for each of the provinces—in dealing with an idea that we favour, for example, such as provincial participation in the Supreme Court. That would be completely inoperative in a federal state.

Mr. Clark: That is not true.

Mr. Broadbent: I stand to be corrected by the Leader of the Opposition later on, but that is certainly my understanding of the way it would work.

I understand that my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to say to the House that there are many things in the government bill that we profoundly believe in because they have been established New Democratic Party policies. Of course, there are other areas of very serious concern, as my colleagues have expressed. In committee we will deal with the amending formula, women's rights, and native rights. We plan to fight for improvements in those areas.

As a Canadian, I want the deadlock broken; as a Canadian I want a reasonable package that has something that is favourable to Atlantic Canadians, to people in Ontario and in Quebec. We have that in equalization and we have it in language rights, and now we have it in resources. I want action now so that, to use the phrase of the Leader of the Opposition, we do not need to continue to be colonials.

If we bring the constitution home along the lines indicated, we will indeed have a constitution in Canada, and we will have embedded in it a number of just principles that all Canadians could defend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, we witnessed this afternoon what I would call a rather spectacular about-face by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). What does he propose today? He is proposing this afternoon immediate patriation of the constitution, something we have been urging in this House for months and something all Canadians call for. He proposes an amending formula that at this point does not meet with unanimous approval from the provinces. I attended the constitutional conference and I spent the whole summer, Mr. Speaker, trying to get a consensus.

We worked on that formula. We considered the implications. It was first called the Alberta formula and later the Vancouver formula, because it was considered in Vancouver. It was clear to all participants that it was probably the most rigid one that could be included in the constitution, because even though the provinces might or might not accept some changes, it was clear to all participants that the federal government, with an absolute veto in these matters, would very soon be forced never to accept any constitutional amendment because we would eventually evolve into a kind of Canada where there would be certain rights for some Canadians and other rights for other Canadians. And this is basically unacceptable to those who believe that Canada must be able to guarantee its citizens equal rights across the land.

We did consider that formula, but we did so in the following spirit: We believed at some point that we were going to enshrine in the constitution the basic rights of Canadians, that we were going to guarantee Canadians mobility rights; that we were to guarantee minorities education rights in their first language wherever they may be in Canada; that we were going to guarantee Canadians basic liberties, democratic freedoms, non-discrimination rights, mobility rights and so forth. Since these rights were to be guaranteed, we could then consider the formula. But this was only further to agreement on the 12 items or a majority of the items that were under consideration. And anyway, we were telling participants that aspects of that formula were not clear. And this was obvious. During the discussion, the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition referred to certain difficulties.

For example, what were we to do should any province use the opting-out clause to withdraw its support of the constitutional amendment, should there be costs incurred by the people, should this matter not be settled? What were we to do should any part of the constitution not be amendable under the Vancouver or Alberta formula? Suppose, for example, that Canada—that is nine provinces out of ten plus the federal government—decides to have an upper chamber different from the one we now have. There is no way to settle this matter because any one province could have stayed outside this institution by using this formula. If we had another formula—the Vancouver formula is incomplete. There were several other problems of this nature. The Supreme Court, as was mentioned by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and all that. And I know—

[English]

I know that today it was because of a possible consensus, but it was not an agreement. It has never been presented as an agreement by the first ministers. At no time. Never. I defy the hon. Leader of the Opposition to prove that the ten premiers were in agreement with that formula.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We agreed to study the formula. But the more we looked into the formula, the more flaws we found, and until the last moment we agreed to keep looking into it.

If we patriate the constitution today with that formula, it is to hell with the rights of Canadians because we can never enshrine them in the constitution. It would be impossible to have a charter of rights which would apply to all Canadians. Hon. members only have to listen to the speech of Premier Lyon, who said that he will always oppose any entrenchment of a bill of rights in the constitution. He said that time and time again. So I ask: what will the result be? There will be rights for certain Canadians but not for others. As long as I am a parliamentarian, I want to have rights for all Canadians across this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: For instance, take the situation today about the mobility of manpower.

Mr. Crombie: What about the Indians?

Mr. Chrétien: I will come to the rights of Indians. I am not embarrassed by that because I worked for a long time on that problem.

An hon. Member: He was the best minister, too.

Mr. Chrétien: We put a provision in the act that all their rights would be protected, and the incorporation of the charter of rights will not affect the treaty rights of Indians. It is clear in the constitution. If the hon. member has the guts to come to the committee one day and deal with that, we will be able to cope with that problem. But hon. members are refusing to come to the committee. The committee will start next week and we will deal with all of those problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: However, there are a lot of other rights. There were hon. members who made speeches in Quebec who said they did not want to impose education rights. If the Fathers of Confederation had had the wisdom to put education rights in the constitution in 1867, the Canada of today would have far fewer problems than it has now.

Mr. Clark: They were stupid, too?

Mr. Chrétien: No, I do not say that. They were not perfect, neither are we. Nor is the Leader of the Opposition perfect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am telling hon. members that those rights have not been protected in the constitution as they should have been. This is an historical debate—a once in a lifetime chance and we shall not miss it. But it will be impossible with the amending formula which the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting today.

I dealt with ministers all summer. We came close. There was a lot of good will, but certainly the old problem of trying to bargain the patriation against something else again was the flaw which prevented an agreement.

Mr. Clark: It is a shame to have a federation, is it not?

Mr. Chrétien: I say that we want to have the mobility rights and the non-discriminatory rights protected. What is wrong with that?

The freedoms we have in Canada have been gained over the years. This land has known discrimination in the past, but we are mature enough to have overcome a lot of it. The progress that we have made has to be protected forever in the constitution.

Mr. Clark: Tell us about the War Measures Act.

Mr. Chrétien: This is just like what John Diefenbaker wanted to have. I tell hon. members to read the records of 1960 when he was debating the Canadian Bill of Rights. Mr. Diefenbaker was complaining about the provinces which would not agree at that time to have rights protected in the Canadian constitution. We are just finishing the work for Mr. Diefenbaker today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am appalled to know that the Leader of the Opposition who comes from western Canada does not feel strongly about the rights of Canadians.

There are many people in this land who do things and whose rights seem to be well protected in normal society, but these rights can disappear very rapidly. Just take a look at other countries around the world. Some of the most stable societies have seen the ugly head of racism rising to the surface. That shall not happen in Canada because rights will be protected in the constitution.

It is very easy for the majority to have views of minorities. It is the role of this Parliament to make sure that this land of ours, it is a land of minorities of all kinds, will see the rights they have acquired over the last 113 years protected forever in the Canadian constitution. This is the Canada we are going to have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that today the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is trying to find his way out of the mess he got himself into.

An hon. Member: As usual.

Mr. Chrétien: Today he is proposing the unilateral patriation of the constitution. We did not get any agreement on the Vancouver formula. There was no such agreement. Show me the agreement if it does exist. The fact is it does not exist. We have talked about it and it was always under the condition that such and such a thing be accepted. They were not accepted. There was no agreement. Several premiers, several ministers who attended the conference constantly expressed reservations regarding this formula. This is why, Mr. Speaker, we prepared this resolution.

Mr. La Salle: Have there been any agreements on your resolutions?

Mr. Chrétien: I am pleased the member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) raises this issue because we are being accused of not having gone far enough, of not having forced Ontario, for instance, to accept section 133, of not having forced the provinces to accept it. We are being criticized for refraining from systematically invading the provincial jurisdiction concerning bilingualism in the legislatures and as concerns provincial statutes. Some would have liked us to impose—

An hon. Member: Courts of justice!

Mr. Chrétien: —certain things to the provinces. We would have liked to do so, but we have respected the rights of provinces.

Mr. Clark: This is what we are asking you to continue doing!

Mr. Chrétien: And that is what we are doing. However, I do not like people who have a double standard, such as the hon. member for Joliette, who says: "Impose what I want, but do not touch what I do not want." Either we have neutral patriation—and in the patriation formula that we are now proposing, we have basically tried not to effect the balance of powers between the federal government and the provinces. We have respected this balance of power and the only change we have suggested in this regard is the one we accepted today at the request of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, we have agreed to change the powers of the provinces so as to guarantee their control, which is already granted by the constitution, over their own resources by giving them the right to tax resources indirectly and to legislate in the area of interprovincial trade subject to the paramountcy of the federal government. We have accepted this concept. We had not included it from the outset for a very simple reason, namely, that we had decided that we could in no way amend the powers of the federal government or the provinces. What we wanted to do was to provide Canadians with the means to prevent the Canadian government and the provincial legislatures from infringing on the rights of individuals—

Mr. Clark: As in the case of the war measures!

Mr. Chrétien: Exactly, in the case of the war measures, Mr. Speaker. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will recognize that when we have a charter of rights in the constitution—

An hon. Member: There will be a referendum which could—

Mr. Chrétien: While the War Measures Act may have led to abuses in 1970, if we had had at that time a charter of rights we would not have witnessed all those abuses, because any person arrested would have appeared immediately before the courts. The charter of rights will have fundamental effects and we will discuss that in committee when the official opposition will no longer be afraid to go—

An hon. Member: They are afraid.

Mr. Chrétien: Instead of showing those ugly scarecrows, I urge the Leader of the Opposition to come and ask those questions in committee, because those questions will be answered and we will say to him that the War Measures Act will be much more moderated by the entrenchment of a charter of rights in the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, in order to accept the formula they suggest it would require first that the fundamental rights of Canadians be entrenched in the constitution; otherwise, if we wanted a charter of rights for all Canadians some provinces might opt out. As a result some Canadian citizens would have more rights than others and that is why the proposed formula could be accepted if we had a charter of rights, if the power sharing had already been definitely determined in the minds of participants, but now we are putting the cart before the horse. We do not have the agreement of provinces. We therefore have a very rigid formula because there can be no responsible federal government. Unless the vision of the Prime Minister at the time is that of a kind of community of communities where the provinces will always get a yes, where the federal government will be the flunkey, the messenger who will deliver to the provinces anything they want, or unless we have a Prime Minister, a leader of the Canadian government who is anxious to ensure the equality of Canadian citizens, who is anxious to share Canada's wealth. I noticed this afternoon that the Leader of the Opposition never mentioned equalization. Is it not important any more? Does it not count?

Let us suppose now that equalization were not enshrined in the constitution, that we want to include it and that rich provinces opt out. We shall have to collect money from the poor to give to the poor. This is the amending formula of the opposition leader?

If the rights are already enshrined in the constitution there is no problem, but this formula should be extremely rigid in its nature as, in such circumstances, a federal government would not proceed through constitutional amendment if it were to realize that some provinces want to withdraw from the constitutional amendment. And then that right of veto would turn into the same strait-jacket we have been wearing for 53 years, the patriation of the constitution.

So I am pleased to say that today the Leader of the Opposition tries to jump in with us and that he now supports the patriation of the constitution. Under the cover of a supposed agreement he has put forth an amending formula which was never agreed to by the provinces.

Mr. La Salle: It is the majority. We have always supported the government; we simply disagree about methods.

Mr. Chrétien: I am happy to hear that! It is unilateral, hurrah! I am happy to hear that the hon. member for Joliette is for unilateral patriation of the constitution. In addition, what the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting is that we should impose an amending formula right now; on the other hand, we on this side of the House already have a provisional amending formula allowing the provinces to agree; if they find a good formula, we can then incorporate it in the constitution, here, in Canada. That is because we do not want to impose a formula upon the provinces. We say we will give the provinces another two years to agree. If they can come to an agreement in two weeks, so much the better. And if the amending formula is not acceptable to the federal government—

Mr. La Salle: I have never said anything of the kind.

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: If the amending formula proposed by the provinces is seen by this House as not acceptable—

Mr. Clark: No, by a government using closure.

Mr. Chrétien: I will come back to that if I have the time. I do not understand the Leader of the Opposition. I am anxious to go to the committee to respond to all of their questions, but they do not want to see me. The committee need not only sit in the afternoon and evening. It can sit in the morning, afternoon, and all evening.

Mr. Clark: Will it travel?

Mr. Chrétien: We are the Parliament. We do not want a road show. We want the people of Canada to talk through their elected representatives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The usual courtesy was extended to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). It should now be granted to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Chrétien: If the Vancouver formula is so good, what about all the flaws which the Leader of the NDP spoke about earlier? It is a kind of checkerboard formula for a constitution in Canada. If it is so good, let us have the premiers agree to it and make their recommendations to us. If the federal Parliament does not like it, who will decide? It will be the people of Canada who will decide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am not embarrassed by that. I do think that sometimes our priorities as national politicians cannot and should not be the priorities of the premiers, because we have different jurisdictions. If you are a premier it is natural that you defend what you think are your local interests, but we national politicians sometimes have to become the arbitrators of the different aspirations to make sure that the wealth of Canada will be shared, and to make sure that the citizens of Canada will have the same rights.

Mr. Clark: Except the right to speak in Parliament.

Mr. Chrétien: That is our national responsibility, and if we have a fundamental disagreement about the amending formula, the people of Canada will decide what is wrong with it. I have confidence in the people of Canada. We are going into committee. We have tried to make our resolution the best possible.

Mr. Clark: Ha!

Mr. Chrétien: Yes. I have been listening to the speeches of hon. members opposite for weeks. None of the hon. members opposite has spoken about the charter of rights.

Mr. Crombie: Oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, the hon. member asked a question about it. I told him to come to the committee. I did not listen to the hon. member's speech. I am sorry, but we are going to the committee, and we will reply to those questions. The hon. member raised a question about the possibility of not having affirmative actions, and in our charter of rights there is the possibility of affirmative actions, so this problem does not exist. It is good that the hon. member raised the question. It was a valid question, but it is in committee that we can deal with it, so let us go to committee. That is the whole point.

Why do we have this diversion today? Now hon. members opposite will get up and say that we did not debate the constitution today. We have debated it for days and days. In order to waste time there was question of privilege after question of privilege. Some took a whole day, rather than debate. Those subjects were not created by us. They were just raised to gain time. We are going to the committee. We will listen to hon. members there.

Mr. Clark: Then you will cut it off by closure there too.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada want us to make up our minds. They are absolutely fed up with debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: The people of Canada want to know where hon. members opposite stand.

Mr. Clark: I stand for having the constitution home today.

Mr. Chrétien: They do not want the double-barrelled type of standing that we are for and against at the same time. Hon. members opposite should make up their minds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We know where we are going. I think that this tactic of diversion this afternoon will be voted down.

Mr. Clark: You are going to Westminster to hide out.

Mr. Chrétien: We will vote to go to committee. We hope to have a decision by the end of the year, and by some time next year we will have a Canadian constitution which at last will have broken the deadlock forever.

Mr. Clark: You won't have a country next year.

Mr. Chrétien: We will have a Canadian constitution which will be amended in Canada, with a bill of rights which gives a guarantee to all Canadians that the rights they have acquired—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: —will be those of all Canadians, that Canada is a country which could become mature and endow itself with the institutions it needs, a country which would be able to amend its constitution in Canada—

Mr. Clark: For amendments, it is necessary to go to London!

Mr. Chrétien: Since we must go there anyway, we might as well go. We want a charter of rights. Because it is the only legal way we can get one just now, that is the way we will proceed, Mr. Speaker. We have committed ourselves to changes, decided that we wanted a Canadian constitution, that we needed to enshrine the linguistic rights of Canadians in the constitution, as well as both official languages—

Mr. Clark: In England?

Mr. Chrétien: —that we needed to protect in the constitution the rights of Canadians to mobility, non-discrimination and other basic rights, and we will do it now.

An hon. Member: Who is we?

Mr. Chrétien: The Canadian Parliament. That is the promise we have made, Mr. Speaker, and that is the promise we will keep. After 53 years, we will settle the problem once and for all.

[English]

Mr. Clark: That was a disgrace to Parliament, to Quebec and to Canada.

Mr. Rossi: You are a disgrace.

Mr. Malone: You don't know your country. You do not know anything.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rossi: Go Back to the farm where you belong.

Mr. Malone: Shut up. You don't know anything.

Mr. Rossi: Go back to the farm.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in support of the resolution before us, and after the speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), I would like to get back to the realities. I think at times the minister went well beyond the scope of reality and was also caught up by his own rhetoric and histrionics.

An hon. Member: A fanatic, a Hitler.

Mr. Epp: I think it is important that we take a look at the elements of the resolution as well as what has brought this Parliament and Canadians to this position.

I want to spend just a little time on the speech of the Minister of Justice. The minister put into question whether there was agreement between the premiers on the Vancouver consensus. He knows very well, as he co-chaired a committee, that a consensus developed during the summer on the Vancouver consensus. Neither the minister nor the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) has attacked the Vancouver consensus per se. What they have really said is that there are flaws in that consensus or formula. I think the minister wants to be fair and objective about this, so if he takes a look at his package and his proposed resolution, he should agree that the same criticism can be made.

There are members of the minister's own caucus who object seriously to clause 41. There are members of the New Democratic Party who object to clause 41. There are premiers who object to clause 41, but we have not even mentioned, to this point, the abhorrence of clause 42. If the minister is a fair-minded person, surely he does not want to say today in this House that his formula suddenly has more support or more strength because one government supports it, his, and that is the only government which supports it in that sense because the premier of Ontario, for instance, as recently as the Tuesday on which the premiers met in Toronto, said that while Ontario had traditionally supported either the Victoria or Victoria-modified, he could now see the validity of the Vancouver consensus. Why? It is very simple.

It is because he has realized, as a person who is looking at the country and the need to make it work, that he was seeing that the Vancouver consensus fundamentally retained the principle that the provinces are equal entities and that we do not have class A provinces, class B provinces and class C provinces. My hon. colleague, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass), asked where Prince Edward Island is in our formula. Is Prince Edward Island written off? Does Prince Edward Island not exist? Does the minister not care?

The minister says today that we should not accept the formula the premiers agreed to. He is saying that his is better. Why? His actually eliminates Canadians totally. That is what the minister is saying to us.

I know the Minister of Justice quite well. He said that he has faith in the Canadian people. So do I. If that is the case, no matter what the minister's objections have been throughout the summer of negotiations—or today for that matter—why does he object to the people of Canada, through their elected representatives here in Parliament and their premiers who are elected in their respective provinces, making all future amendments to the constitution? Why does the minister insist it be done in Britain rather than in Canada? Why does the minister have more faith in Westminster than he has in this House, the legislatures and the premiers? That is the question he must answer, because under the government's package there is no question that the British parliament is being asked to amend the constitution under an amending formula to which all or no other amendments can ever be brought to bear again. The government wants to bootleg through Britain an amendment in a formula which will never be used again or cannot be used by anyone else. That is what the government is asking Canadians and this Parliament to do.

The Minister of Justice also says he is interested in fair play. So am I, and I sincerely believe that he is that kind of person, but if that is the case, if we look at language rights in the package he has introduced, the proposed resolution, what he is doing for all time is making immigrants who move to the province of Quebec second-class citizens in terms of education and minority language rights. What they are doing is entrenching sections of Bill 101. He said today on the floor of the House that he is in favour of fair play. That is exactly what they are doing in that package. He mentioned, for example, that the War Measures Act cannot be used again under the bill of rights which is included in the proposed resolution. What about the emergency power? Can they not invoke the emergency powers and then come in with the War Measures Act?

An hon. Member: The truth would be helpful.

Mr. Epp: You see, Mr. Speaker, these are the realities. I know why the Minister of Justice holds his views firmly, and I do not object to that, but it is important for the people of Canada, looking at this debate at this period of time, that we also look at the facts. I think the Minister of Justice will admit that what I am putting on the floor of the House is, in fact, the matter of the way in which the constitution will operate.

Additionally, we are facing this day a closure motion at a period of time when the government has had more speakers in this debate than the official opposition.

An hon. Member: That is not an argument.

Mr. Epp: I hear that that is not an argument. In other words, what the member, I suppose, is saying is that you could just have government members speaking. Let me convince members opposite of the accuracy of my contention. I shall quote from 3732 of Hansard of October 16.

On that occasion the Prime Minister said:

"The Speaker has asked that Parliament return on Monday to begin debate on that resolution. Every member of Parliament from every corner of this land is asked to participate in this historic act."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his television address of that Thursday, wanted every member to participate. And yet we face closure today. At present there have been 21 Conservative speakers who took part in the debate. Those are the facts. I ask members of the government: are you sincere when you say that closure is justified at this stage when you yourselves have had more speakers?

The only conclusion to which I can come is that the Prime Minister has no use for federal-provincial conferences, for the premiers or for the provincial legislatures. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) says that federal-provincial conferences are a bother and should be done away with. And now it is the parliamentary debate which is being curtailed. How many members have said that this House should debate this resolution? Yet now we face closure. We face closure even before we go to committee, and the committee is faced with closure on December 9.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Epp: The very memos talk about closure and the negative effect it would have on the House and in the country. The recommendation is in there provisionally at this time, closure of this debate on the Constitution of Canada and the fundamental laws of Canada cannot and should not be used. Putting it in another way, we can see this government, because of its past actions and its negative attitudes toward Parliament, bringing in closure. We have the NDP, those great defenders of democracy! Did you hear so much as a peep today that they object to closure?

An hon. Member: Not a word.

Mr. Epp: Not a word. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) sits mute. He will prostrate himself in front of the Liberals, his present colleagues, and will accept closure in the House and closure in committee.

We have had ten days of debate, and they say closure. I can hardly fathom that the NDP would accept the mess of potage or, as somebody has described it, the mess of potash, that they have received. One thing which I thought I would never see is notice given immediately after a closure motion, that the Leader of the NDP would rise. We heard him give a speech and never object to closure. That is what we saw today. My good friend from Saskatchewan says, "wait". I know they feel uneasy because of the sweetheart deal and because the premier of Saskatchewan today rejected it. He kept it open, but he certainly does not like the deal.

The point is that what we have before us here today is simply a fait accompli by the government using its majority and applying closure, and total acquiescence by the NDP.

For example, there is the matter of resources. The NDP and the Liberals now say there is a guarantee. If you look at the first clause in the Prime Minister's letter, why do you need a guarantee on resources? This right is guaranteed in the constitution. Section 109 guarantees non-renewable resources, and section 92.5 guarantees it for the provinces, and the British North America Act amendments of 1930 guarantee it for the three prairie provinces. Who brought the question in doubt? Who questions ownership of resources? It was this Prime Minister. He brought it in doubt. The provinces did not have that doubt, but this Prime Minister has always tried to smuggle in the notion that the provinces should not own the resources. He has used his powers as the Prime Minister to raise doubts in the minds of Canadians. That very doubt today has caused a division which we see in the country. That is the legacy of Pierre Elliott Trudeau right now. That division is his legacy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: At least we win elections.

Mr. Epp: They might win elections, but what is happening to the country?

An hon. Member: You win elections and ruin the country.

Mr. Epp: They are jocular about it, but let me be quite serious about it. What is happening in western Canada is that western Canadians feel deeply alienated right now. They are as good Canadians as any one of you opposite, and they want to stay in the country. There is an old adage: not only must justice be done, it must appear to be done. Right now the appearance of justice as the west sees it is gone. That is the reality. I say to the members very seriously: at your own peril and at the peril of the country you ignore that fact.

In terms of the Vancouver formula there is a point which I wish to make—I mentioned it earlier—that is, that the principle that the provinces are equal must be maintained in any amending formula. That is not the case in the Victoria formula or in the Victoria modified formula, or in the present package which the government has put before us. As a person coming from a province with a population of about one million people, I recognize the fact that population should be taken as a factor when there is an amendment. There is no argument with that, and that population factor is considered as the resolution passes through the House. It is also recognized to some degree in the other place where, while representation is on the basis of regions, we also recognize the population reality there. But once they have a resolution through both Houses of Parliament and have recognized the population reality, surely they cannot once again classify provinces on the basis of population, making some more equal than others, dealing one in and dealing one out, because then they will not have a mosaic, a country, a federation. It is not a unitary state yet, and we do not intend to let them make it one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: There is one other point. When the first ministers met, there were certain areas they thought should be changed. I do not have the time today to go into the areas of opting in and opting out, but they were restricted. I will just give one for the benefit of the Canadian public. One opting-out section was that if a boundary of a province was to be changed or if its resources were affected, that province could opt out. I think that is only natural and normal. It is becoming clear today that under section 42 the resources of the provinces, no matter what guarantees are in the letter dated October 21 from the Prime Minister to the Leader of the New Democratic Party can be taken way; they can be taken away under section 42.

Mr. Chrétien: They cannot.

Mr. Clark: Of course they can, absolutely.

Mr. Epp: They can be taken away. Throughout this debate we have been saying that on section 42, and we have asked the Prime Minister if he will only use section 42 as a one-time only deadlock breaking device. He never gives us that assurance. He wants that cudgel, he wants that power.

Mr. Clark: To create the deadlock and then use a referendum.

Mr. Chrétien: That is not true.

Mr. Epp: Perhaps I should give the gentleman opposite a simple lesson in political science. The premiers and the members of their ten legislatures have been elected by the people as well. They have some legitimacy, even though the government might not want to recognize that.

Mr. Chrétien: We have some too.

Mr. Epp: That point should be kept in mind. One additional matter which I did not think after ten days of debate would have to be mentioned is the matter of patriation. But I must mention it to both my Liberal colleagues and members of the media. I believe I am a person of some patience, but even as late as last night the press mentioned that suddenly we are in favour of patriation because of the resolution before us. My leader said in the opening speech of this debate that we want patriation, we want it now, and we want our amendments here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: It was in the communique. No matter what the arguments of the Liberals might be in terms of the proposals we put forward, they should not any longer leave, either directly or inferentially, the big myth that we are opposed to patriation. That is the fact. They should stay with the truth, and they know that is the truth. But they like always to shade it. If it helps their argument, they shade it a bit. They should not shade it again.

It makes eminently good sense that the constitution be brought back. The argument put forward by the Minister of Justice that we would not have a constitution, that we would be naked—I would take it seriously if I knew he had. But he himself did not take it seriously. Amendments should be made in Canada. We want a made-in-Canada constitution. I believe that is our responsibility. Let us patriate it. The formula works if we want to make it work and do it at home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy to participate in the debate this afternoon. I want to deal with the procedural aspect of the motion before us, because I think a case could be made that this very supply motion is not in order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Rather than challenge the propriety of this motion and be accused of denying the opposition its right to speak, we have not done that. But if Mr. Speaker consults the precedents, the Standing Orders, and citation 481 of Beauchesne's, for example, he will see that we should not be discussing this matter because the substance of the matter is still before us in motion No. 18. Citation 481 indicates quite clearly that the similarity of the subject matter of an opposition motion cannot prejudice in any way the progress of a bill under discussion which deals with approximately the same matter.

Some hon. Members: What bill?

Mr. Collenette: If the precedents were looked up, I suggest that would also extend to the motion before the House. I just wanted to raise that in passing, because we are being magnanimous.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: We are being generous.

Some hon. Members: Not true.

Mr. Collenette: We know the position in which the official opposition has found itself in this debate. They have no position. In fact the last three weeks has been one exercise of obstruction on behalf of the official opposition in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: They have the audacity to come here with a supply motion on their allotted day and ask us to consider a complicated matter contained in the resolution, that is, patriation with the Vancouver formula. They want discussions and a judgment of this House within three hours this afternoon, yet they plead, they writhe for time to discuss motion No. 18 in committee. They want the committee extended, they want the reporting of the committee and the other debate extended. What it really amounts to is one rule for the Tories, and one rule for the rest. That is what we have before us this afternoon, an exceedingly mischievous motion.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What a distortion.

Mr. Collenette: I can see the fine hands of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in the drafting of this motion. It is mischief, or perhaps it is a clear misunderstanding of the rules. Under Standing Order 58(9), the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and his colleagues know full well that this is a matter of confidence. If the members on this side of the House were disposed to agree with that motion, and if we voted with the official opposition—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We would have a new constitution.

Mr. Collenette: —we would not have a government.

An hon. Member: We have not got one now.

Mr. Collenette: This is a matter of confidence and they know it. The subject matter of the motion does not matter, it does not matter how laudable it is.

Mr. Clark: Ask Lester Pearson.

Mr. Collenette: There may be laudable points in the arguments brought out as a result of this motion, but we are imprisoned with the Standing Orders of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: If we voted with the opposition, there would not be a government; there would be an election.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I lower my eyes.

Mr. Collenette: I put that down to a clear misunderstanding of the rules because, if it is not, it is absolute, pure, unmitigated mischief.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Smile, David.

Mr. Collenette: Given what has happened in the last three weeks, we could probably say to the official opposition—I see the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton making rude faces.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am laughing.

Mr. Collenette: It does not behoove him well, a man of his stature as the House leader of the official opposition to be making smirks and deriding the business of this House. Shame on him for that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. The hon. member can indulge in all the unparliamentary language he wishes, but I was not making rude faces, unless my friend considers a smile of derision at his fatuous argument a rude face.

• (1650)

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I need not comment on the supercilious intervention of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. Obviously the strength of our arguments are getting to that side and I think that the strength of our case, as it has been presented in the last few weeks, has obviously been unsettling to them. That is why the opposition leader sits in his place wriggling, writhing and red-faced, heckling the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). He knows he is in an impossible position.

Another reason why this very motion is mischievous—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mischievous!

Mr. Collenette: However you pronounce it in Victoria or Esquimalt-Saanich—I am quite flexible on my English pronunciation.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the government votes with the official opposition on this motion, as I stated, the government ceases to exist, Parliament is dissolved, and there is an election. If we vote against their motion this afternoon, as we will, I do not think hon. members opposite realize what will happen. It precludes the special joint committee from dealing with the substance of this argument at a later date. And so I question their sincerity, I question their motives. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) went on about the so-called Vancouver consensus. He is bluffing, because if he were really serious he would not bring this motion before us this afternoon, the very vote against which will preclude comment on it or even acceptance of that later in the debate. I say that the arguments of the Leader of the Opposition, if not mischievous are dishonest—and I say the arguments are dishonest—and he is playing games with this House. It is a pure example of Tory trickery.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You're splitting hairs.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, the last three weeks have been marked by very passionate and intellectual debate from all sides. There have been some outstanding interventions—and I have been in the House most of the time—from all sides.

Mr. Paproski: Now you cut them off.

Mr. Collenette: I should say, in countering the incorrect arguments of the opposition, that 25 members from the other side have spoken. Twenty-five members from their side and only 22 from this side. So when you want to talk about the rights of Parliament and the rights of the opposition, it is in the record that there have been more interventions from the other side.

Mr. Malone: You are including the NDP.

Mr. Collenette: Of course we are including the NDP. I cannot understand the arrogance of the Conservative party which likes to protect the rights of the opposition, deriding a legitimate opposition party, that is, the New Democratic Party. They have a right to speak. Perhaps the Tories do not think so, but we do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: I should point out that the speeches from the NDP have not been overly favourable, there have been criticisms, but to their credit they have decided to work within the parliamentary system. The official opposition, devoid of a substantive position on the whole constitutional debate, have chosen to obstruct this House in a wilful manner—a wilful manner, and I say that quite clearly.

The spurious questions of privilege that we have heard, the red herrings we have been subjected to, I think have tested the very fairness and the graciousness of the Chair. I think the Conservative party in this House has brought Parliament to a level at which it has not been for many years. That is a shame, a terrible shame on them that they are not discharging their obligations as a constructive opposition, something they pledged to be when this session reconvened.

I remember the words of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton when he said that we would not have mindless opposition—that they would not be guilty of mindless opposition. Look at Hansard, look at the televised debates. If there is an example of mindless opposition greater than the one which we have sat through during the last three weeks, then I wish to be shown it. We have had obstruction, we have had trickery, and now, this afternoon in this House, the government has said, through the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), that members of this House and the Canadian public will not put up with that kind of obstruction any longer.

The people of Canada want us to get on with budgetary matters. They want us to get on with other pressing issues dealing with energy, the Bank Act, and the 25 other bills on the order paper. They do not want to see the time of this House wasted by the manipulative tactics of the official opposition, the schemers over there, who must sit by candlelight every night with their rulebooks trying to find ways to impede the debate.

We have come to the position where tomorrow night the question will be put. But I should say, contrary to what the official opposition are spreading, the falsehoods that they are spreading throughout the country, that the debate is not terminating. All that is happening is that the motion before us to strike a special committee to look into the resolution, and bill which accompanies the resolution, shall be voted upon. All we are saying is that phase of the debate will be over. There will be ample time in committee. We have had many excellent interventions, and I think of the one made by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie)—I think the Minister of Justice acknowledged his participation a little earlier—in which he brought out a legitimate question. I think of some of the legitimate questions asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who, incidentally, has not spoken in this debate. I wonder where he stands on this matter. He has asked some legitimate questions during question period. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the forum for answering those questions is in the committee.

We want all members of the House and members from the other place to have as much time as possible to grapple with the intricacies, the technicalities, and the substance of the draft constitution of Canada act.

My time is fast coming to a close, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: I can tell by the agitation over on the other side that they recognize the impossibility of their position. They know that the federal Conservative party of Canada, the official opposition, is the subject of ridicule from one coast to the other. We know that the numbers supporting their argument are declining. Only five provinces are supporting their arguments. There has been reassessment by the government of Saskatchewan. Their friend from New Brunswick, even their friend in Nova Scotia, doesn't go along with court action and is desperately trying to put some distance between his government and the irresponsibility of his federal cousins.

What we see is a desperate party, led by desperate people who wish to obstruct and impede the business of this House, who want to deny the people of Canada a charter of rights, a protection of fundamental liberty, who want to deny the people of Canada the self-respect of having at once, at last, our own constitution, one that can be amended in Canada. Mr. Speaker, that is what the official opposition is doing in playing its game of delay and obstruction. The people of Canada are recognizing this, and I have no compunction whatsoever in standing up in support of the motion put forward by the President of the Privy Council.

It is time this House got on with its business, got on with the business of the constitution, and I submit, in closing, that the motion before us this afternoon is either a piece of naivete—and that could very well be the case, knowing the members on the other side—or another example of Tory deception and Tory trickery.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like, on a formal basis, to urge the House to support the motion which is now before us. If hon. members are interested in having the constitution brought home quickly, with consensus, and having the constitution brought home quickly with consensus and the opportunity to have Canadians make alterations, then that is why they should support this motion.

I had an opportunity the other day to deal with some of the matters which concern me about the government's position on the question of the constitution. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) had not had an opportunity to review my remarks, and he indicated an interest. I would like to offer some of those remarks now because I think they bear on the acceptability of the motion before us.

It has become increasingly clear—and I think it is why the government is introducing closure—to the people of Canada that what is before them and this Parliament is not merely the bringing of the constitution home from Britain. If that were the case, then everybody here would support the motion, and that should not go unmarked. If that is all that we are talking about, the motion could be adopted today.

However, if we are on about something other than bringing the constitution home, then there are some problems, I think, of which Canadians are becoming increasingly aware. I want to speak about those problems. There are some Canadians who wonder why, given the budget of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) to explain a simple matter of advertising and patriotism, some provinces are opposed.

Why is it that six provinces are opposed to the proposal, two support it, and two are not sure? Why are six provinces opposed? First of all, it is because the whole thing is being imposed upon them. The constitution of this country was obtained by provincial consensus, and that is the way in which we operate. That system is being changed by imposition. Second, it creates for some provinces a second-class status. That is very important. Is there a member in this House who would like to stand up and say honestly to their constituents, "I am willing to accept that my province, when it comes to constitutional amendments, is second-class"? That is what the government's resolution says. That is what the members of the Liberal party and now my friends in the New Democratic Party are willing to accept, and it is also why a number of people are not willing to accept it, because it creates some provinces more equal than others.

The third thing was stated earlier by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), who said that the question of equalization between provinces is now being used by this resolution to divide the provinces.

Fourth, the problem of natural resources, particularly as it affects the east coast and the west, is not adequately dealt with in this resolution. These are not points which I have made up. Indeed, members of my party and my leader have spoken well on all of these points.

Let us check these points again. The reasons why the provinces are opposed to the constitutional changes proposed by the government are: one, that it is being imposed; two, that it creates second-class provinces; three, that it changes and destroys in large measure the good will created by the equalization formula; and fourth, it continues to make uncertain the opportunity of the provinces to look after themselves in relation to the natural resources, either offshore or within their land boundaries. Those are the reasons.

The second reason why more and more people are becoming concerned lies exactly in the field upon which the Minister of Justice decided to speak loudly. I say loudly because he almost shook the benches over here, not with the wisdom of his remarks, but with their sheer volume. I do not blame him because there is an old saw "if your arguments are weak, shout louder".

Mr. LeBlanc: Your own leader shouted him down.

Mr. Crombie: I think it is fair to say that there are many people who have difficulties with the question of the charter of rights which are good and legitimate. My great difficulty is that there are many people on the government side who simply say, "Here is the charter of rights; it is good for you, take it like a pill". I would like to offer eight problems which have been raised to me by people in this country who represent groups in this country that are wronged and need to be dealt with before we adopt any charter of rights. They are not minor matters.

First of all, the charter of rights as proposed by the government changes our understanding of where our rights come from. The fundamental philosophical basis for the rights which are being offered in the government's proposal says that they will be guaranteed by the constitution. It assumes that our rights come from government. Our rights do not come from government, and they never have come from government. Our rights come from ancient statutes, laws and government processes of 1,000 years, and certainly from the Quebec Act of 1774. No government, particularly this government, has the right to arrogate to themselves that they give Canadians rights. It can destroy or disturb those rights, but it does not give those rights. They belong to Canadians; they belong to us. The government's job is to protect those rights.

The second problem with the charter of rights deals with the War Measures Act and the Emergency Powers Act. If one looks at the debates in the House of Commons from 1947 to 1950 when it dealt with the charter of human rights from the United Nations, and the debates in 1961 when it dealt with the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker's bill of rights, there were Liberal members on both occasions who argued that it was absolutely essential to change the War Measures Act and the Emergency Powers Act and to change the Criminal Code so that it could deal with insurrection and so that the War Measures Act would not be operative in peacetime. It is a good principle and a good thought.

The Criminal Code should deal with this matter to alleviate the constant threat of the War Measures Act and the Emergency Powers Act. The government knows this, but it does not want to deal with the matter because it upsets the advertising campaign. If it really wants to do something, then it should make this change.

The third problem is language. Much of what we have done here in the last couple of weeks and, indeed, in the last number of months is in response to the referendum in Quebec. I suggest that as the message slowly gets through to the people who speak either language in the province of Quebec, they will become more and more concerned about what is in the government's constitutional proposal. Indeed, I would direct all members and anyone who is really interested in rights as a question of rights, not as a question of politics, to pick up a copy of the October 14 Le Devoir and read an article written by Mr. Robert Decary. In this article he goes through all 59 sections of the proposal and takes the sections which are related to the question of the charter of rights and points out the difficulties. He concludes that if the proposal is adopted the province of Quebec will rue the day.

When it comes to the question of rights, we in this country will have to face the reality in the not-too-distant future, one which is avoided in the government's proposal, that the country must operate on the basis of equality, a principle which existed between the two founding groups. That principle is not in the proposal, and that is why the three political parties in the province of Quebec oppose it.

The fourth problem is that people are beginning to wonder why representatives of native groups appear at 6.30 and eleven o'clock in the news on their television sets, and are opposed to this proposal. How can it be when the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and the Minister of Justice are saying that it is a wonderful proposal? What are the Indians complaining about? It has to do with section 6 and section 15, their inability to determine what will happen to their land claims, whether or not there will continue to be any rights or even the possibility of any rights for Métis and non-status Indians, and the effect of that mobility clause in relation to the reservations.

I hear a faint voice from Indian women on this matter. Canada has been brought before the Human Rights Commission at the United Nations because the government will not act to give first-class status to native women. They have wanted to change the Indian Act for years. It is their view that the adoption of the government's charter of rights will forever place them in a second-class position. That is why native people in this country are opposed to the government's constitutional measures.

Fifth, Mr. Speaker, for the first time in the history of this country we have created two classes of immigrant. It is never much fun to be an immigrant, but there was always one saving factor—everyone was the same. When people arrived here without being able to speak the language and wanted to get ahead, they knew one thing for sure—that they were all in the same boat. That is not true any more. Section 23 creates two kinds of immigrant, and that is not acceptable. It is a mockery to suggest that somehow the same rights are guaranteed to all Canadians. It is just not true.

Sixth—and I raised this just the other day in a question, because it is a serious matter—if we adopt the charter of rights as it currently exists in the government proposal, we will run into the same problem that the United States have been coping with for the last 25 years; that is, they increasingly have to phrase their legislation to take into consideration problems that are raised by the courts.

Just the other day I mentioned the Bakke case. In June, 1978, the Supreme Court of the United States—and I think quite rightly—ruled that a black student should not have preference over a white student merely because there was an affirmative action program in the University of California. This has thrown into jeopardy and doubt many social programs, particularly affirmative action programs, in the United States. Anyone who does not believe that can call the Health Education and Welfare Department in Washington in the United States and ask what the effect of the Bakke case was on the development of policy in relation to social programs. By their very nature, Mr. Speaker, social programs are discriminatory.

We have had affirmative action programs for years north of 60, without calling them that, in relation to the hiring of native people. We do not know what is going to happen to those programs. I am not raising idle fears or threats, Mr. Speaker. The problem is real and it must be dealt with before we adopt the principle.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to social programs, when it comes to legal rights, non-discriminatory rights, democratic rights and human rights, there is going to be a massive shift of power to the courts, as the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) said the other day. In all sincerity, I say that may not be an unfair or bad thing, but it must be understood that it is change. It cannot be assumed that there is not going to be a change. We will not become more Canadian as a consequence; we will become more American.

An hon. Member: That is what he always wanted.

Mr. Crombie: It rankles me to hear the nonsense spoken on the other side when they claim that somehow they are being more Canadian. There is nothing more Canadian than the understanding that the common law protects our rights and that ultimately people operating on the principle of consensus will arrive at appropriate opinions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: That is the Canadian system, but the charter of rights changes that. Some people may like the change, but it cannot be denied that it is just that—a change. That is why people are saying, "Ah, I see. We are now going to have to worry about what the Supreme Court says." That means we may have to find another way to get judges. In the United States, where judges make more law than ours do, they have made things more democratic by electing judges. We have not felt the necessity to do that. Indeed, we have always felt that our judicial system was superior because we do not elect our law. If we are going to hand judges the power to make law for people, then we will have to find a better way—as the United States had to—to obtain judges.

On this sixth point with respect to the charter of rights, I say that we are taking a giant step toward the Americanization of this country. That bothers me, particularly when it is done in the name of Canadianism.

Mr. Clark: True Brit.

Mr. Crombie: Yes, using the British to do it.

I come to my seventh point on the charter of rights. On three occasions the Minister of Justice has suggested that he is continuing the work of the late John Diefenbaker. Wow!

An hon. Member: What a perversion.

Mr. Crombie: I am sure he meant it honestly, but I cannot think of any notion that is more wrong. In the debates of 1960 and 1961 setting out the views of Mr. Diefenbaker, two things become very important, and they are very unlike the proposal put forward by the government. First of all, the Bill of Rights deals in the same language as the Quebec Act of 1774; it deals in the same language as the Act of Union in 1841 and in the same language as the Act of 1867—unlike the government's resolution. The Canadian tradition is carried through the Bill of Rights.

Second, the Bill of Rights carries through a right that has been with us and has in many ways determined our rights and privileges, and indeed, has expanded rights and privileges for people. That is, in the enjoyment of property, whether that property be large or small. Many people in this country spend a good part of their lives working very hard for the enjoyment of their property. That is why Mr. Diefenbaker enshrined it in the Bill of Rights. It is not in this one, Mr. Speaker, and that bothers me.

I have offered seven or eight example—and there are more, Mr. Speaker—to explain that there are good and solid reasons why people have difficulty in merely accepting the view that "you ought to accept it and swallow it because it is good four you".

Another reason why people are becoming more aware of the difficulty involved in going along with the government is that increasingly we find we are not a country of consensus, not a country where consent is the operative principle—we are not going to entrench any rights that we do not already have but we are going to be entrenching what we do not have—bitterness and division.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Not one new right is being given by this government. Not one new right, Mr. Speaker. We should bear that in mind. The division and discord being brought down on this country will be with us long after the personal timetables of some politicians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who support what I referred to as the entrenchment of rights because it seemed to me that we entrenched the common law years ago. A few days ago I enumerated them: section 133, language rights; section 94, the civil code in the province of Quebec; section 92, property and civil rights; section 51, representation by population, and section 99, the guarantee of an independent judiciary. Those things are already in the constitution. They did not come from this government, however. They came from Canadians who gave us that legacy 115 years ago. Those of us who oppose and have difficulty accepting that charter of rights and the creation of second-class provinces, for those of us who are opposed to the division and bitterness that are going to be entrenched in this country, would like people to know that we oppose because we honestly feel this way and that it is our responsibility to oppose it. And oppose it, we will, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel): I would like, with your leave Mr. Speaker, to take this opportunity to refer to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. The constituency of Saint-Michel is situated in the northeastern part of Montreal and covers a small area of about 3.5 miles by 4 miles. The majority of the population is French-speaking, 16 per cent come from Italy, 3 per cent from English-speaking countries and 2 per cent belong to various other ethnic groups. They are fine people whom I like and know well. I like to tell them that the most valuable and fulfilling aspect of my mandate is to serve them. I firmly intend to continue to be their representative in this House, just as before when I was their commissioner. They have shown their confidence by electing me four times, twice as commissioner and twice as federal member.

However, this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about the future of our country. Our forefathers have left us a legacy which Quebeckers have kept by voting No at the referendum. As did several of my colleagues from Quebec, I devoted much time, effort and energy to that famous referendum, but our objective was worth the trouble and the weariness.

But this stage—I repeat—this stage of the referendum which I would not dare term a victory, was only the first step. Before we begin tearing at each other I suggest hon. members from both sides of the House should keep in mind the objectives of the constitutional reform. First, the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians will be entrenched for the first time in a Canadian charter of rights. Second, in the charter, Canadians will be assured of the freedom to move across the country and pursue employment in any province. Third—I am still dealing with the objectives of the constitutional reform, for that is what we are here for—the charter will guarantee that citizens of the English or French language minority in a province have the right to educate their children in that language wherever numbers warrant. Fourth, the charter will recognize the principle of equalization, which involves the redistribution of wealth among the provinces. Fifth, a flexible amending procedure will ensure that all changes to the constitution can be made in Canada. But to those who may ask: "What about the entrenchment of the division of powers?" I will reply, "First things first: before one learns to run, one must learn to walk."

True, the proposed resolution needs some adjustment. There will be things to add to it, some things to suppress perhaps, and that is why a special joint committee of the House and the Senate is formed, so that we can all express our views. It is urgent to revise the federation compact, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, we find this task difficult, as reflected in the speeches we have heard in the last few days. The better to understand the government purpose, one must place this proposed resolution in its true perspective. And I repeat what has been said already: patriation will not take away any power from the provinces, it will only suppress a power held by the British Parliament and agree we will at last have a truly Canadian Constitution, providing we agree to get together and show a spirit of co-operation.

The constitution adopted in 1867 does not fulfil our needs and aspirations any more. It needs immediate revising, rethinking and rewriting in order for it to meet our new needs and reality. However, it still contains many things that are good, things which only need to be renovated and combined with new elements to create a truly Canadian instrument that would meet our present needs.

A major part of our constitution is dispersed in a multitude of statutes, a number of which are very little known to the Canadian people. And I know the need to go to London cap in hand for constitutional amendments is a cold shower on the proudness of very many Canadians, who view this not simply as an embarrassing subject but a national blemish.

Let us look together at the stages in our evolution. In 1931, Canada's independence was confirmed by the Statute of Westminster. In 1945 the Supreme Court of Canada became the court of last resort, and the Canadian Parliament acquired powers of constitutional amendment, but for areas of provincial jurisdiction. In 1952 we had our first Canadian Governor General. In 1965 we chose our own national flag. This year, in 1980, Parliament adopted a national anthem. The proposed resolution now before us, Mr. Speaker, is the last stage on the road to full independence.

On Monday October 6 I was pleased to hear the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) state, and I quote:

> It is indeed time to act, and act now, on the Constitution of Canada.

I thank him for it and I know he is sincere, especially after hearing his remarks this afternoon. The opposition motion now before us suggests we should select the so-called Vancouver consensus as the only amending formula. As the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) so eloquently explained earlier, that formula would weaken the central government. I consulted my constituents, Mr. Speaker, and I received a clear and loud message. They want me to support a constitution that will reflect a strong Canada, and for that reason I support the government's position. This afternoon, when the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development, speaking on the motion, referred to basic rights, I heard the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) shout:

[English]

"What about the War Measures Act?" I would like to tell the hon. member about the War Measures Act, and anyone in Canada who wants to hear about it. I am a Quebecker who lived in Montreal in those days. One has to remember those things in the context of the time. Bombs were exploding in mail boxes. I have five children. They took the Metro every day and on top of each building and inside the Metro there were people with machine guns. Every night when my children came home, I got on my knees and thanked the Lord that they were alive. That is what it was like in Quebec in 1970 under the War Measures Act. It is no wonder that that measure was right for the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Killens: Mr. Speaker I would now like to speak for a few minutes about the two founding peoples of our country with regard to culture and language. Some 113 years ago, when English needed protection, because it was the minority language in Lower Canada, Sir George-Étienne Cartier acknowledged the fact when he said, "If we introduce before the provincial legislatures and the imperial government a resolution for the creation of a central government it will be our duty to protect equally all ethnic groups and take into account the interest of each." The English language was then protected in Quebec. Yet as soon as the demographic balance shifted to the advantage of Anglophones within the country as a whole, justice and tolerance were forsaken and we have been living in this state of injustice ever since the birth of the nation. One must not be surprised then if this is a touchy issue in Quebec because there are still a great many Quebeckers with a long memory. To give you an illustration of what I mean, I will quote Sir John A. Macdonald in an admonition addressed to his fellow English-speaking citizens. He said this in 1856, and I quote:

> Leafing through the directory of Lower Canada public servants, you would be surprised to see the supremacy you have in higher positions. Take care that the French do not discover these facts and begin to denounce them.

In spite of a few mistakes concerning language and the economy, Confederation has not been a failure. We still speak French in Quebec. We have developed our own identity and we have a standard of living that many envy us. Some skeptics will say—and I unfortunately see too many of them—that no one needs Quebeckers and that they can separate if they want to. To all of them I say, "Come to Quebec, spend one week around Lake Saint-Jean or the North Shore, spend one week with one of our farmers, and you will see what it means to eat in French, to breathe in French and to live in French." If there are still people who wonder what French Canadians want, I can tell them very simply that they ask for two things. If Canada is his country, the Francophone wants first of all to be heard in the courts of justice in French, from coast to coast. If Canada is his country, he wants to be able to send his children to a French school where numbers warrant it.

And if we do not stop hair-splitting about advertising and polls, we risk missing completely the basic issue of equal rights for everyone. Many of our villages and cities have already celebrated their tri-centennial and many can follow their roots to the beginnings of the colony. These same Canadian roots said No to separation.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution under consideration will protect the legitimate, and I insist on the word "legitimate", and basic rights of the whole Canadian nation. We must therefore take advantage of the present crisis to re-think our country and rebuild it ourselves, otherwise, we shall leave a broken-up country to our children and grandchildren.

For more than 53 years, Mr. Speaker, we have been cleaning up the workings of the constitution. We can no longer afford to do so. The Fathers of Confederation paid their own debt 113 years ago and it is now up to us to pay our debt towards our country.

Mr. Speaker, my time is running out, but before closing I would like to tell members on both sides of the House about a point that I find very important. It concerns section 15 of the proposed resolution, which deals with the right to non-discrimination. That article lists various categories of people who should be protected, but I note that the handicapped had been omitted. I draw that omission to the attention of all hon. members and take this opportunity to ask for their support when the special committee of the House tables its preliminary report, in the very near future, and recommends that the handicapped be included in the bill of rights.

I close, Mr. Speaker, saying that I recognize that opinions differ but the objectives of the proposed resolution, those I enumerated at the start, convince me that our efforts will not be fruitless, provided we manage all of us to respect our Canadian tradition and history of justice, loyalty and sharing for the greater good of all Canadians.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this debate, which has ranged over just about two weeks, has reached a crucial stage. Indeed I would say that in the history of the evolution of Canada's constitution, this will probably, without question of doubt, be judged by historians as a very sad day in the history of Canada.

Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? We were served notice today that the government intends to invoke the rule of closure, not the reform kind of closure, if indeed 75C can be described in that way, which we have under our new rules, which themselves were brought in by the invocation of closure in 1968, but as my leader has said, the pipeline kind of closure, the C. D. Howe kind of closure. It is the kind of closure that no one ever expected this government to dare use again, especially on a debate concerning Canada's constitution.

We had received an invitation, given over the national networks of this country, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he introduced this measure, that he expected members from every corner of the country to participate in this debate. Now, after only two weeks, after less than 20 per cent of the membership of this House has participated, less than one in five of us having had a chance to speak, tomorrow night, appropriately in the dark of night, in the early hours of the morning, the guillotine is to fall on this very important and historic debate on Canada's constitution.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McGrath: Why is the government resorting to the invocation of closure? Why are ministers introducing closure in a debate on which there has been at least one consensus, namely, that it is a debate historic in its significance. I believe the reason the government is invoking closure at this stage of the debate, notwithstanding the fact that the motion before us calls for this debate to be in committee and back in the House before December 9, and that in itself is closure, the reason it is imposing this old-fashioned guillotine of C. D. Howe which does not provide for debate is because this measure cannot stand the scrutiny of public debate.

As my colleague has said, the people are catching on. Therefore it is important to the government, if they want to control their majority in this House and keep the traditional Liberal caucus discipline intact, to get this measure out of the House as quickly as they can. They know that once it gets off the floor of the House it goes into the relative sanctuary of the committee, which does not provide for input from all members of the House, but a relatively small number. It does not provide for the scrutiny of the television cameras or of the microphones of the radio and television networks of this country.

It is well that they would want to get it out of the House. They know that the longer it stays in the House, the more embarrassing it is going to be to the New Democratic Party who, today, sold their souls in support of a measure against which the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) spoke so eloquently in this House just a few days ago. Yes, what a price they are paying.

I pity the New Democratic Party. During my parliamentary career I have had the greatest respect for the party of Tommy Douglas and J. S. Woodsworth and for its philosophic integrity, but I have lost that respect because today I have seen members of the New Democratic Party sell out to the government, sell out their friends in Atlantic Canada, sell out their commitment to the minorities of this country, sell out their commitments to the native people, and sell out their commitments to the rights of women in this country. That is what we have witnessed in this House in the past 24 hours, and that, in my opinion, is also a sad day for Canada.

Today I had occasion to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), for whom I have a great respect both as a man and as a parliamentarian. My question was prompted by a concern arising out of the deal between the New Democratic Party and the government, because I could not quite believe what I was reading when I read the exchange of letters between the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the Prime Minister. There was nothing in them to cover the Atlantic provinces and our argument for jurisdiction over offshore oil and gas.

I asked a question today of the Minister of Justice, who is the leader of the debate for the government and, if we can read between the rhetoric of the hon. gentleman, we get the message loud and clear that it was not even discussed, and while the exchange was taking place between myself and the hon. gentleman, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the senior member of this House from the Atlantic provinces and the senior member of the government, sat there laughing like a Cheshire cat, and well he should because he is the arch-Machiavelli of this House. In fact he should have, as a member representing the interests of the Atlantic provinces in the government, been hanging his head in shame over what this proposal does to the little province, the senior province, of Prince Edward Island.

So far as constitutional reform is concerned, this proposal literally legislates Prince Edward Island out of existence. Where was the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance when that hideous, objectionable provision was written into the proposal now before the House? And yet the New Democratic Party would support that measure, which would deny rights to one of the senior provinces of this confederation with respect to constitutional reform.

In so far as oil and gas and the rights of the province of Newfoundland, which we brought with us as a dominion into this confederation, are concerned, they are being denied not only by the measure brought before this House but also by the so-called sweetheart arrangement entered into a few days ago by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the leader of the government in this House. In so doing the NDP sold its integrity in so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned and sold out what few friends it has left in the Atlantic provinces.

I urge the House to support this motion. I urge my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the senior parliamentarian and dean of this House, who has not said one single word against the scandalous move of the government to invoke closure on this important matter, to vote for our motion.

I urge the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, who made such an eloquent speech against the measure to which he is now married by virtue of the action of his leader, to put his mouth where his heart is and get up and vote against this measure and vote for our motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Finally, I urge the House to end the division and discord which are in the land as a result of the unilateral action the government proposes to take. I urge all hon. members of the House to vote for the realistic measure put forward by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), a measure which would allow for our constitution to be brought back to Canada, a measure which would allow for an amending formula to be built into the constitution and, more particularly, a measure which would allow us to retain our national pride and amend our constitution in Canada where it should be amended.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the debate and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of proceedings now before the House, in accordance with Standing Order 58(9).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will be please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Clark), which was negatived on the following division:

HUMAN RIGHTS

RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH—IMPOSITION OF CLOSURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. One of the major reasons this dictatorial government has given for proceeding with its constitutional package is the need to entrench individual rights. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the Minister of Justice be directed to make a statement to the House reconciling the avowed concern for rights, such as free speech, with the imposition of closure on those Canadians sitting in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CLOSURE MOTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As one of 25 British Columbian members of Parliament in this party who have not had an opportunity to speak on the constitution, and in view of the historic importance of this issue to members of my constituency and to the people of British Columbia, I move:

That the Prime Minister immediately retract this motion to muzzle the Parliament and people of Canada and instead allow full discussion, joined by members from all regions, on the constitution and in this debate.

An hon. Member: I will second it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMUNICATIONS

SEIZURE OF EARTH STATION IN BURNABY, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the federal communications department yesterday swooped in and seized, without adequate warning, a satellite earth station in Burnaby, British Columbia, and in view of the fact that this action is selective and is a heavy-handed approach to enforcement of a law which was broken with impunity by British Columbia's science minister, Pat McGeer, for many weeks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House, while recognizing the importance of obeying federal laws and protecting the integrity of Canada's broadcasting system, deplores this arbitrary law enforcement action, and that there be no further police or court action, at least until the proposed government review of earth station licensing policy has been completed.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ALLEGED INSULT BY PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday in a speech to the Quebec City Chamber of Commerce, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted that he could not remember the name of the Premier of Prince Edward Island.

An hon. Member: Shameful.

Mr. McMillan: It should thus not be a surprise to anyone that the Prime Minister seems unaware of the extent to which his constitutional amending formula discriminates outrageously against that province. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House condemn the Prime Minister for his blatant insult, not only against the Premier of Prince Edward Island, J. Angus MacLean, but against the people of Prince Edward Island themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—CALL FOR REFERENCE OF CLOSURE MOTION TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I rise on a serious matter which involves the birthright, the rights and privileges and the future of every citizen of this great land. We have been subjected to government by public relations, by advertising compaigns, by unilateral decrees, by confrontation, and now by the stifling of speech in the House of Commons. The result has been alienation, division and discord, especially in western Canada.

● (1410)

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House refer the matter of closure to the appropriate House of Commons committee for review, so that it will be less susceptible to abuse in the future.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—CONSULTATIONS WITH ABORIGINAL PEOPLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. First, I should like to draw to the attention of the House that I understand Indian people have just been turned away from the galleries because they were not wearing ties.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Manly: In view of the fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised the chiefs at the First Nations Conference in April that they would be involved in the constitutional process, and that the proposed resolution was drafted without consultation with the aboriginal peoples, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That this House call upon the Prime Minister to make good his promise and meet immediately with the leaders of Indian and other native organizations, and draft acceptable amendments to the constitutional proposal.

Mr. Shields: Where were you yesterday?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member pursue his motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Oberle: You should have told them that yesterday.

Mr. Manly: I had finished, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: You sure have.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: I had already given instructions that when Indian people wearing their traditional costumes, or what they wear as a tie, present themselves to the galleries to listen to the proceedings of the House of Commons they should be admitted. If some person was unaware of that ruling on my part, I would now ask them to please admit these people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—PARTICIPATION IN DEBATE OF ALL MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of extreme urgency. In light of the fact that on October 2 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on nationwide television invited every member of Parliament from every corner of this land to participate in the debate on the constitutional resolution—and the exact words of the Prime Minister were "every member of Parliament from every corner of this land"—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister be required to honour the commitment he made to the members of this House on October 2 and to allow all members who wish to do so to speak on this resolution.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT DEFER DECISION ON UNILATERAL PATRIATION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of the utmost importance for all Canadians, and I shall speak on behalf of millions of Quebeckers.

Considering the final decision of the present government to patriate unilaterally the constitution and the unanimous opposition in the National Assembly of Quebec, including the leader of the Liberal party of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the House unanimously invite the Prime Minister of Canada to postpone his objective and to resume immediately the negotiations on this subject, as requested by several provincial premiers.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

GRAIN

MARKETING OF FEED GRAINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas every tonne of western barley shipped east to the eastern feed market is costing western shippers up to $40 per tonne or the premium available on the export market, whereas the Canadian Wheat Board is forced to sell feed grains at a price below the open market price and such grains can then be redelivered and sold back to the Wheat Board at a much higher price, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That this House condemns this bizarre approach to recycling and calls upon the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board to ensure that all feed grains are marketed by the board notwithstanding the opposition of the Minister of Agriculture to this policy.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REFERENCE OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION TO JOINT COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR LATER REPORTING DATE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, who has acted now to gag Parliament. He knows that the present proposal regarding his committee imposes closure in advance on the committee proposals by requiring a report-back of December 9. I wonder if the Prime Minister would give us a commitment now that he will remove that odious provision of closure in advance from the committee proceedings and establish a reporting date considerably later than December 9?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there is nothing unusual about asking a committee to report by a certain date. On the question of gagging Parliament, to use the expression of the Leader of the Opposition, I would point out to him that our House leader has proposed various alternatives to the Conservative House leader so that Parliament can have a greater chance and a longer time to express itself on this by prolonging hours in various ways.

An hon. Member: Sure.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, sure. The opposition, therefore, if it has that many more points to make, could have made them by accepting prolonged hours, a proposition which had been accepted by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Nowlan: Forget about them.

Mr. Trudeau: They are also members of this House and have views of their own on closure, but who feel, as we do, that the official opposition has nothing constructive or destructive to say on the subject but want to use dilatory motions. The people of Canada would like us to get on with budgetary matters and talk about problems of jobs and inflation and come to the budget.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister exceeds even his own reputation for deception with those words.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He knows full well that his government sets the order of business and had set the date for the budget to be presented in this House, and that would have occurred. He knows full well that closure was imposed in a period when there had been more government spokesmen than there had been opposition spokesmen. He did not answer the question whether or not he was going to keep the gag on the committee that he has put on the House of Commons.

I know that the Prime Minister does not want Canadians to know what he is proposing in this resolution and that is why he has proposed closure. But let me ask him now whether he will give the House of Commons an immediate assurance that during the full committee stage, even if that operates for a limited time under closure in advance, the people of Canada will have full access to the proceedings through television and radio coverage.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, on the rather peculiar preamble to the question my information is that there have been more opposition spokesmen on this debate.

An hon. Member: That is false.

Mr. Trudeau: I have the figures of 22 Liberals, 19 Conservatives and five NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The opposition leader is concerned with putting the case before the Canadian people on the constitution. I point out to him that since the debate began, points of order, questions of privilege and other ways of debating something other than the constitution have been spoken to 27 times by the Liberals, ten times by the NDP and 41 times by the official opposition.

• (1420)

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Cossitt: Why don't you outlaw questions of privilege?

Mr. Trudeau: If the Leader of the Opposition's indignation was not as synthetic as it appears, he would be precisely urging his people to talk about the constitution and the subject matter for long hours if necessary, rather than to use all kinds of dilatory tactics not to talk about it.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, that is the second time the Prime Minister has declined to answer a question in this House. I wonder why he bothers to come. He shuts it down, he refuses to answer questions here, and he refuses to treat the House of Commons as anything other than a nuisance which he can ignore.

We heard yesterday from the Minister of Justice that the Minister of Justice intends to have the committee stay in Ottawa, thereby forcing Canadians who want to talk about their constitution to pay their way to come to Ottawa if they wish to be heard. Will the Prime Minister reject that proposal, that considerations on the constitution of all Canada have to be limited here to this city? Will he give the House the commitment now that there will be an opportunity for the constitutional committee, to which he is forcing this matter to go prematurely, to travel across the country so that its members will know the reality, indeed, in some cases the rage, that is growing across this country as the result of proposals by the government on energy and on the constitution? Will the committee be allowed to travel, or will it be confined here to Ottawa, as it is confined to a deadline?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, on the question of witnesses coming to Ottawa, I suppose it is within the rights of the committee to suggest that they could help people who must travel to Ottawa at great personal expense by reimbursing them this expense.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not in its reference.

Mr. Beatty: He hasn't answered a single question.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, let me repeat, for the Prime Minister's reference, the three questions which he has declined to answer today: One, will he remove the committee deadline of December 9 and give us a more reasonable deadline and thus dilute closure in advance; two, will he give us an undertaking now that there will be the opportunity for full television and radio coverage of the proceedings of the committee; and third, will he let the committee travel to the regions of the whole country so that the constitution of this whole country can be discussed throughout Canada and not in the back pocket of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: You're not a Liberal.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sure that from even the motion made yesterday by the opposition party, it is anxious to see progress made—

Mr. Jelinek: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —on the constitutional front. And I am sure from their earlier speeches that they are as anxious as we are to permit the House to go on to deal with economic matters and energy matters. This being the case, I think the Leader of the Opposition will realize that it is in the interests of the people of this country to have this constitutional matter dealt with expeditiously—

Mr. McDermid: Railroaded through.

Mr. Cossitt: Trudeau's railway.

Mr. Trudeau: —and brought to a conclusion. The way in which this is to be done depends to a great extent on the co-operation or otherwise that we receive from the members of this House, if they sincerely want to debate the issue. I repeat, the longer we take to get the resolution into committee, the less time the committee is bound to have in order to hear witnesses—

Mr. Epp: Answer the question.

Mr. Kempling: You're a disgrace.

Mr. Trudeau: —and to examine in detail the resolution. That is the explanation for our urgency in getting the matter before the committee, so that it can be properly debated. That is the answer to the first question.

Mr. Clark: There is no answer there at all, no answer at all.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is that we want the committee to deal with the matter as soon as possible so that it may come out of committee by December 9.

Mr. Clark: So you keep closure in advance.

• (1425)

Mr. Trudeau: The answer to the second question about television is that the commitee, I believe, is master of its own procedure in this area, and it can examine the advantages or otherwise of having television present.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are the master of the Liberal majority.

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand the nostalgia with which the Tories cry "Liberal majority".

Mr. Clark: Why hide your proposals?

Mr. Trudeau: Surely there is a rule in this House that the majority does have the right to take a vote at some point and prevail over the minority.

Mr. Clark: Those sheep follow you blindly.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, the Leader of the Opposition is asking for answers to his questions, and I see that he is not interested in listening to them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We cannot stand them.

Mr. Trudeau: He is just grumbling and growling away and following in his own way.

INQUIRY WHETHER CLOSURE DISCUSSED WITH LEADER OF NDP

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In the letter dated October 20 from the Leader of the New Democratic Party to the Prime Minister, which confirms that their conspiracy started at a meeting on October 1, there is no mention of the right of the coastal provinces of this country to own and control their offshore non-renewable resources in the same way provinces do that have resources under the soil or under fresh water. In other words, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has sold out eastern Canada—Quebec and the four Atlantic provinces.

At that meeting or at any other meetings between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the NDP, was there any discussion by the Prime Minister with the Leader of the NDP of the Prime Minister's plan to impose closure after only 24 hours of debate in this House and, after only 24 opposition members had spoken? And did the Leader of the NDP say that he would go along with such a proposal, if it was discussed, between these two leaders?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member from St. John's that on October 1, I met not only the Leader of the New Democratic Party but also his own leader.

Mr. Nielsen: Separately.

Mr. Clark: Separately.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, indeed, Madam Speaker, I insisted that they not come at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I should let the hon. member from St. John's know that there also began on that day a conspiracy with the leader of his own party.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, we know that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party are heart to heart, brain to brain, toe to toe and nose to nose, and we know where the Leader of the New Democratic Party's nose is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is the happy hooker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: And we know where the conspiracy is. In the Prime Minister's letter to the Leader of the New Democratic Party for October 21, the Prime Minister said:

I agree with you that it is desirable that the constitutional package have the broadest possible support in Parliament and in the country.

How can the Prime Minister imagine that he is going to get the broadest possible support in Parliament and in the country when all of this country, Quebec and to the east, is ignored and when closure is imposed upon this Parliament so that we are not given an opportunity on this side of the House to make any kind of meaningful contribution with just 24 speakers and 24 hours of debate? How is that going to get the broadest possible support in this country for these proposals, which should be agreed upon unanimously in this country if the right procedure had been adopted?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in the first question the hon. member accused this government of not doing enough for the east. In the second question, he accuses us of catering only to the east and Quebec. Those were his words.

Mr. Clark: No.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Clark: I guess you are getting deaf, too.

Mr. Trudeau: Those were his words, Madam Speaker, and I ask the hon. member to check Hansard if his brains are not constantly in the area that he suggested somebody else's nose is.

Mr. Crosbie: It is crowded there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: At any rate, I fail to see how the hon. member can suggest in his second question that we are only concerned with eastern Canada and Quebec, because the amendments that I have suggested to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that we would be prepared to accept, providing the concept of the Canadian union were provided for, was an amendment precisely on the subjects and in the area demanded by the three westernmost premiers, not only during this last summer and fall, but as far back as October, 1978.

● (1430)

Mr. Clark: That, too, is misleading.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

OIL COMPANY PROFITS—REQUEST FOR ROLLBACK

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, it will be interesting, when our amendment on resources is moved which will give to the people of Newfoundland substantial control over their hydro and more than $600 million to the people of Alberta—

Mr. Clark: Defend yourself, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent —to see if the Tories vote for or against it. It will be interesting.

An hon. Member: Go on over.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Never have I heard such rubbish in all my days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. Order, please. All of this will only shorten the time that hon. members have to ask questions.

Mr. Trudeau: No respect for Parliament.

Madam Speaker: I would ask the House to refrain from applauding. We are having applause at every minute and moment every time someone speaks. The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have a question for the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: Ask him in caucus.

Mr. Broadbent —who has just indicated that he is interested in economic affairs. He will have a chance to demonstrate that now. Given that last year the multinational oil companies in Canada—

Mr. Clark: Bring that up in caucus.

Mr. Broadbent —increased their profits by $5 billion and today figures came out which show their profits are up for the big five by fully another 65 per cent, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared now to illustrate in demonstrative form his expressed concern about the economy by giving to the petroleum monitoring agency the power to roll back such profits and protect the Canadian consumer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my simple answer, of course, is that the Government of Canada has no such power; therefore we could not delegate it to any agency created by the federal government. Under the constitution we cannot roll back profits, as the hon. member suggests, just by a decree of the federal Parliament.

As concerns the profits of these companies, the hon. member is aware of the provisions that this government brought in, ensuring that these profits would be reinvested in Canada in further exploration and development, if indeed the companies wanted to escape certain tax provisions.

Mr. Epp: Is that part of the deal?

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he check the authority that he used to bring in wage and price controls a few years ago and apply it to the oil industry. It fits.

Mr. Clark: Write him a letter, Ed. Write him a letter.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering the answer that the Prime Minister just gave, I should like to ask him this direct—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Take it up in caucus.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't go delirious down there. During the 1980 election campaign he said—

Mr. Clark: "Nineteen" election campaign? Were you there with him, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: —he said in a speech in Sault Ste. Marie, and I quote as follows:

> —several multinationals operating in Canada have profits so large that they're shifting hefty sums out of the country rather than reinvesting in energy.

That is something that the Tories permitted for years, of course. In view of the Prime Minister's own admission on the misuse of these profits, which was subsequently confirmed by another government report this summer, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what he is prepared to do to stop the shift of profits, earned from Canadian resources, away from Canada to other lands?

Mr. Clark: Look who is talking about "stopping shifts".

Mr. Crombie: Ed was at your rally, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must point out to the Leader of the NDP that his comment on wage and price controls is completely irrelevant in this context. He will remember that the Supreme Court was appealed to judge whether this imposition of wage and price controls was permissible under the emergency powers of the constitution. I have not heard anybody, not even the Leader of the NDP suggest that this was a question of national emergency because some companies were making profits, and too large profits.

Mr. Rae: Why is it that only wages go up when there is an emergency?

Mr. McGrath: Don't interrupt your leader.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member for Broadview has a supplementary, I will be happy to instruct him on the course of the law too if he can—

An hon. Member: Send him a letter.

Mr. Trudeau: I am prepared to meet him in my office if he needs a little law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: How about Wednesday morning in caucus?

Mr. Trudeau: As to the government's approach to these large profits which I discussed in Sault Ste. Marie during the election campaign, I am afraid that close as we are, the Leader of the NDP will have to wait until budget night to know how we are dealing with this problem.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister that the Supreme Court decision did, in fact, refer to a bill that pertained to profit control, which is what I am talking about, but the Prime Minister has made it very clear that he is only interested in wage control and not interested at all in profit control.

As a final supplementary question, since the government is now moving toward partriating the constitution, a course of action that this party supports—

An hon. Member: You sure do.

Mr. Broadbent: —given that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources admitted in a speech, appropriately given to the American Stock Exchange last month, that because of foreign ownership in the oil industry there was a net outflow of more than $2 billion in Canada in the last four years alone, when will the government have the courage to patriate not only our constitution but our oil by bringing Imperial, Texaco and Shell under public ownership, so that all Canadians can share the benefit of their own resources?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, lest the hon. member think he has the last word on the constitutional problem of controls, I would point out to him that there was indeed no control on profits; there was a control on wages and on prices.

An hon. Member: Exactly.

Mr. Broadbent: And profit margins.

Mr. Crombie: Hold it fellows, you will get him mad.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Everyone knows that even that was the subject of long debate and contestation by several provinces before the supreme courts.

On the substance of the question, I understand the NDP to be urging on this government massive expropriation of oil companies—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Broadbent: Just a little control.

Mr. Trudeau: They name three very large oil companies and call it just a little bit of control, but they would like the government to take over ownership.

Mr. Broadbent: Right.

Mr. Trudeau: I would point out to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that this we cannot do at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: Why not?

THE CONSTITUTION

OWNERSHIP OF RESOURCES—MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER AND LEADER OF NDP

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, we know that the Leader of the NDP does not speak for the Premier of the province of Saskatchewan or his caucus, but I assume he spoke for the Liberal party in Canada.

I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of the exchange of letters between the Prime Minister and his Oshawa lieutenant, could he confirm or deny that in the give-away of natural resources from the provinces to the federal government, the drafting of that amendment was done at the 90-minute meeting that was held between he and the hon. member for Oshawa on October 1?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member were at all interested in constitutional matters he would see that the substance of my reply to the Leader of the New Democratic Party indicated that we would be doing what we had agreed all through the summer through the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Clark: Boy, that Ed is a tough bargainer.

Mr. Trudeau: —and myself on the first day of the federal-provincial conference in September. We indicated then that we would be prepared to see the provinces have jurisdiction over indirect taxes in the area of resources and interprovincial trade in the area of resources.

I can tell the hon. member that the substance of that was discussed at the meeting and confirmed in my letter, but the kind of amendment we would accept is an amendment which might be phrased—in other words, we would wait to see what they move but it would have to be in substance what we have already offered, plus—

Mr. Clark: Have you got a deal, Ed.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition seems frustrated at having been left out of a constructive proposal to improve the resolution now before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1440)

Mr. Trudeau: I point out to him, Madam Speaker, that all summer the Minister of Justice has been looking for a deal. At that conference I had been looking for a deal.

Mr. Clark: That is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: Since the first federal-provincial conference which I chaired in 1968, I have been looking for a deal. There is nothing shameful in accepting a deal which meets the stated requests of several provincial premiers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister that the government leader in the Senate said yesterday there was not a deal. Be that as it may, I wish to quote from page 3566 of Hansard dated October 9:

—the amendment my party would propose would confirm provincial ownership of resources, would incorporate a clause with respect to indirect taxation and, finally, would incorporate a concurrent power with federal paramountcy with respect to trade and commerce as it affects the export of non-renewable natural resources, forestry products—

That was said by the NDP member for Kootenay West on October 9. On October 21 and 22 there is a convenient exchange of letters, 12 days after that exact wording appears in Hansard from the NDP member. Will the Prime Minister either confirm or deny that there was a deal made regarding the wording of the amendment at the October 1 meeting between himself and the Leader of the New Democratic Party?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, although I think there would be a matter of privilege in not answering that, I think the Leader of the New Democratic Party would not begrudge my telling what happened there. There was talk of the substance. There was no exchange of texts. The first exchange of texts came when I answered the letter a couple of days ago.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—TELEVISING OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister who will be aware of the statement in the infamous August 30 Privy Council memorandum which reads as follows:

A highly contentious measure may best be contained in a committee where it is more readily managed by the House leader and his officers, and where easier and more effective relations can be maintained with the Press Gallery, since relatively few reporters will follow the proceedings.

Now that Parliament is to be gagged and the debate is to be taken out of the House of Commons, is the reason the Prime Minister refused the request made by the Leader of the Opposition for his support to open up the proceedings of the committee to television, so that Canadians from coast to coast can see those proceedings, that he prefers to have these meetings managed and he prefers the sort of manipulation of the press recommended in this Privy Council office document, rather than opening these matters up to the people of Canada, as is being requested by the Leader of the Opposition?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that the debate has been proceeding in front of television for the past—

Mr. Clark: Twenty-four hours.

Mr. Trudeau: —three weeks, I would guess.

Mr. Clark: Twenty-four hours of debating time.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition shouts "24 hours of debating time". We offered to have longer hours, and it is his very party which refused to add to the hours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: You introduced closure.

Mr. Trudeau: It could have been much more than 24 hours over a period of some three weeks if his party had accepted that we prolong the sitting hours.

Mr. Chrétien: Six to eight and until midnight.

Mr. Trudeau: Getting back to the question itself, I have to remind the hon. member that the resolution will, of course, come back to the House—

Mr. Clark: One day.

Mr. Trudeau: —where it will again be in front of television.

Mr. Clark: One day.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand the leader of the Tory party is suggesting one day.

Mr. Clark: That is the rule. What are you saying? Give us a commitment.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the Right Hon. Prime Minister as well as any other member who is being questioned in the House cannot answer two or three persons at the same time. I ask that we restrict ourselves to allowing whoever has the floor to answer one question from one questioner.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the leader of the Tory party is constantly interrupting me when I try to answer one of his own backbenchers. I wish he would show a little more respect for his own people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: However, since he insists on getting in on this debate, I do not understand why he keeps shouting "one day". I have indicated that when the resolution comes out of committee, it will be in front of this House for an indeterminate period of time and there will be television and all the coverage that the Leader of the Opposition would like to get.

I would also indicate that the reason we took this route of putting it into committee is that we are certain if we had not, that if we had just gone the resolution route and said it is one resolution, one stage and nothing else, the Leader of the Opposition would have been screaming his head off.

Mr. Clark: That is not what the secret memo says.

Mr. Trudeau: He would have said, how can we possibly study this, make amendments and hear witnesses because we have been gagged by the government and it is just making it in one stage. Therefore, we made it in three stages.

Mr. Clark: Closure, closure and closure.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member will have to talk to his leader if he wants answers to his questions. He will have to ask his leader to shut up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I suspect that if I want an answer from the Prime Minister, I will have to talk to the Leader of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: It is a straightforward question to the Prime Minister which he can answer with a yes or no. Is the Prime Minister prepared to give his support for the televising of the committee proceeding?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the committee can make its own decisions in that regard.

ENERGY

OIL AND NATURAL GAS EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister of energy my question will be to the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: We don't have one.

Mr. Waddell: On December 6, 1979, the minister of energy had this to say in the House:

> The worst thing we could do is to export gas for a fast buck or in order to support a faltering dollar, because then it will mean that down the line we will have to supply our Canadian needs with more expensive and more polluting resources, such as coal for instance. We have to be very cautious about relying upon illusory, short-term gains.

The minister quietly approved in cabinet last week the export of synthetic natural gas, made from Alberta oil, from the government's Petrosar plant in Sarnia. Enough gas and oil to heat 100,000 Canadians homes for five years has been exported. My question to the Prime Minister is this. What is it to be? Is it to be the energy minister's principles, as set out in that code about not selling off our resources for short-term gain; or is it to be his government's action of selling them out? What is the policy of the government?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. member must be fully aware, Madam Speaker, the export of natural gas from Canada is a matter which is monitored by the National Energy Board. The procedures which the hon. member has questioned have been approved by the National Energy Board and meet the requirement tests of that board.

Mr. Waddell: That is no answer at all, Madam Speaker. I will put my supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask him to answer it. In July his government approved the pre-build of the pipeline to sell out Alberta gas to California and other markets, and last week, a few days ago, there was an agreement to sell natural gas to American utilities in New York. The Times says "14 utilities in the east to get Canadian gas". Finally, the National Energy Board has approved the export of liquid natural gas from Gaz Métropolitain to New Hampshire.

The Prime Minister told my leader that he is not prepared to do anything on ownership of the foreign controlled oil industry. In light of this evidence of sellout of gas and oil, is he prepared to continue a policy of selling out Canadian resources?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, the hon. member should be aware that under the procedures of the National Energy Board a determination is made whether there are supplies surplus to Canadian needs. Those prudent tests adequately ensure Canadians that natural gas reserves are sufficient to justify exports. That policy is being applied in the various cases which the hon. member opposite has cited.

In the specific case of the Gaz Métropolitain exports, those small amounts are simply a continuation of the practices which have been in place for some time and are merely to maintain the levels of exports which have been committed and which have been surplus to Canadian requirements.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SUCCESS OF ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN RESPECTING EFFECTS OF ACID RAIN

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. Given the fact that a large portion of the acid rain falling on Canada comes from emissions in the American mid-west and that the minister has signed a memorandum of intent with the United States and has initiated an advertising campaign directed at American tourists visiting Canada, can the minister indicate to the House whether Canada is achieving any success in reaching and convincing United States officials of the danger of acid rain fallout on Canada originating in the United States?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Yes, Madam Speaker. I believe we are having some success, although obviously much work still remains to be done. I was very pleased to see recently, for instance, a letter of support signed by some 90 United States Congressmen indicating their concern about acid rain problems and their desire to support our views in this matter. I think that letter probably was an outcome of the visit to Washington of the subcommittee of the House of Commons dealing with acid rain chaired by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. I very much welcome the efforts of the subcommittee and the positive result they have had in this case.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—STATUS OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. At all the first ministers' meetings called to discuss the constitution, the northern territories of Yukon and Northwest Territories have been refused the right to speak for themselves. Now, through the hideous use of closure, the government insists that I also be presented from being heard on northern constitutional issues. It seems the government just does not want to hear anybody from that part of the country.

Who does the Prime Minister insist on entrenching and enshrining in the constitution—and believe me, this is what is going to happen under clause 29(1)(a)—the continued colonial status of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, thereby dashing the hope that they ever will achieve provincial status?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that there is some confusion in the question of the hon. member. There is no change in the status of the Yukon or Northwest Territories provided for in the resolution before the House. The situation after patriation will be exactly the same as it is before patriation. The territories will have the same powers, no more, no less.

As for hearing spokesmen from the area, the House will remember that I raised this very point with the premiers at my meeting in early June, and it was agreed—I would rather say felt very strongly—by the premiers that there should be no enlargement at this time of the forum composed of the ten premiers and the federal Prime Minister. This was a collective decision.

In so far as hearing voices from that part of the country, I urge the hon. member to get in contact with his whip. We on this side would be very happy to hear him speak, and I hope the members of the hon. member's party will find a place for him on the roll.

Mr. Clark: In place of one of yours?

PATRIATION—ALLEGED STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING OPINION OF QUEBECKERS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I should like to refer to the speech he made yesterday in Quebec City. In view of the fact that individuals and groups have stated their objections—the Prime Minister is surely aware of it—not to the principle but to the procedure of patriation, and considering the unanimity in the National Assembly, I should like to know how the Prime Minister can suggest and declare publicly that he has the support of Quebeckers, as he said yesterday before the chamber of commerce?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member is anticipating somewhat when he refers to unanimity in the National Assembly. I think his leader indicated that he hoped to obtain that unanimity. However, I do not know whether he will get it.

As for the views of Quebeckers, Madam Speaker, I would acknowledge that it is not a monolith—we saw that during the referendum. But we do know that a decisive majority of Quebeckers are hoping for a renewed constitution within federalism.

Now, the hon. member knows full well that the only way to renew federalism is to make sure that we have a constitution with an amending formula in which the provinces collectively will have a right of veto.

INQUIRY WHETHER MR. RYAN WILL APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): On a supplementary, Madam Speaker. The Right Hon. Prime Minister mentioned my leader in Quebec. I suspect he meant the Quebec premier. Contrary to the Prime Minister of Canada, I respect my Quebec premier, and every other premier, including that of Prince Edward Island.

The Prime Minister spoke of the results of the referendum. He seems to have forgotten that Mr. Ryan no longer stands by his side on the method he wants to use to patriate the constitution. In view of the circumstances, will the Prime Minister at least make sure that the Quebec Liberal party leader is invited before the parliamentary committee to explain his opposition, not to the principle of patriation—no more than I oppose it, for that matter—but to the method the Prime Minister is now using?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the committee so wishes, I encourage it strongly to hear the representations of Mr. Ryan. Several premiers have indicated their wish to appear. As the Liberals are few in that group, I should be very happy to see a Liberal go before that committee to show that the Liberal party has very respectable and responsible men in its ranks. It will be up to the committee to decide. As for the method alluded to by the hon. member, it seems to me explanations in that regard have been lengthy enough; specifically, the methods formerly used only produced 53 years of drifting; moreover, Quebeckers, no more than other Canadians, seem to be willing to see their political men commit themselves once again for as long a period without solving the problem.

Mr. La Salle: Not by any means!

Mr. Trudeau: Not by any means, Madam Speaker! May I be allowed to recall the words of Péguy who said, speaking of the elders, but applying them as well to political men like the hon. member opposite: "Their hands are clean because they have no hands. When one wants to accomplish something, of course, one has to put one's hand to the plough."

[English]

DEBATE ON BANK ACT COMPARED WITH DEBATE ON RESOLUTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Prime Minister. The Bank Act has now been before this House for three Parliaments. It has gone through five separate revisions, including the one produced by the committee. It has had full debate. There have been extensive committee hearings both in this Parliament and in the previous Parliaments before the Senate and before the House. Is it the view of the Prime Minister that the banks are entitled to full representation and discussion but not the constitution of this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I missed the beginning of the question because there was an exchange across the aisle of the House. Let me repeat to the hon. member, who seems to have referred to the period of time the Bank Act has been discussed, that we have been discussing for 53 years the question of patriating the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1500)

Mr. Blenkarn: The Prime Minister will know that we have not been discussing his resolution for 53 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Will the Prime Minister, in the interests of full discussion and representation, give to the special committee the same amount of debating time that this Parliament has already given to the Bank Act?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, this matter is so important and the question of timing is so important—

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Hawkes: Why, why, why?

An hon. Member: Easy.

Madam Speaker: Order. Order please.

Mr. Clark: Why was it not important yesterday?

Mr. Trudeau: —that the—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Sit down, Pierre.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody.

COMMUNICATIONS

EARTH STATIONS—CLOSURE OF GOLDEN CABLEVISION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, that is a very difficult act to follow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: My colleague says, "Thank God for that."

May I put a question to the Minister of Communications. Point five of the minister's press release of October 21 states:

The government is now reviewing measures . . . aimed at making licenses for (earth) stations for TV reception easier to obtain—

Since the minister's crackdown on illegal dishes is aimed primarily at rural areas, can the minister tell the House how he can explain the CRTC shutdown order of Golden Cablevision situated in a remote, isolated mountainous area of British Columbia which has no other alternate means of reception? Further, will the minister postpone enforcement action until an alternate satellite package, as promised by the minister, is made available to inadequately served areas?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. gentleman's question, I should like to point out that really there is no relationship at all between point five of the press release and the current enforcement action which has been initiated in various parts of the country. Point five of the statement referred to my desire and that of the Department of Communications to simplify the regulation and to cut through the red tape necessary for people who have a legitimate interest in obtaining licences for the operation of dish antennas.

So far as the Golden station is concerned, I would be pleased to look at the matter in greater detail. My understanding at this stage is that the cable company operating in Golden recently appeared in front of the CRTC for approval of a licence renewal application by the CRTC. In the process of approving the licence, the CRTC quite properly asked the cable company to cease and desist from receiving illegal television signals from an American satellite.

Mr. Rose: Speaking of illegality, Madam Speaker, since the minister's press release on Monday also suggested a combined network satellite TV package for remote communities, including CBC and CSN, and since the cable-owned CSN has yet to be issued a licence by the CRTC, has the minister yet come to a policy decision as to whether or not cable companies are broadcasters or merely carriers and should be subject to rate of return regulations just as any other carrier?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, there seems to be a misunderstanding in the reading of the release. I mentioned a wrap-around package of the proceedings of the House of Commons which would include approximately 60 hours of programming from CTV and TVA, not CSN, using the Telesat satellites at present in operation in this country. We hope in that way, as an interim measure, to televise to the outlying remote areas of Canada, the underserved areas, some 60 hours of television a week, including full coverage from Friday night right through to Monday morning, and, of course, full coverage on certain nights during the week.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—REQUEST FOR DEFERRAL OF SPEAKER'S RULINGS ON QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order, if I may. I know that since yesterday you have been prepared—and indeed I asked you for it yesterday—to defer until today a ruling with respect to two points of privilege. However, I think that was before the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) gave notice of that odious motion, the purpose of which was to gag and restrict the right of Parliament to debate what is fundamental to our country.

Normally, Madam Speaker, I would have no right to ask you to do this again, but in view of the fact that this motion has intervened and that, in effect, this is the last day of debate, as surely it is the hon. member's intention to call it—the last day of these proceedings at any rate in the House—I wonder, Madam Speaker, whether you would mind deferring your judgment with respect to the questions of privilege so that even the truncated, shortened, gagged debate which is going to take place will not be interrupted by judgments on questions of privilege, however important they may be.

Madam Speaker: I accorded this courtesy to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) yesterday. I saw no objections or any doubts about it, and I think I could delay my judgment until tomorrow. There is nothing which forces me to make the rulings today. Of course, the hon. member is not basing his request on any existing rule. It is left to the discretion of the Chair, and in accordance with the hon. member's request, I will defer those rulings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, today is Thursday and I wonder if I might ask the government House leader his intention for the balance of this week and into next week. I have particularly in mind the fact that the government announced over one week ago that we would be dealing with the budget on the night of Tuesday. I assume the government has not changed its intention in that respect. I want to know about the budget debate, and the government's plans for tomorrow and for Monday.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as I said earlier this week to my colleague, unless it is decided otherwise and on the hypothesis that motion No. 18 will be passed before 11 a.m. tomorrow, tomorrow and Monday will be opposition days. Tuesday afternoon, before the budget speech, we will proceed with consideration of Bill C-42 on the Canada Post Corporation, which is of great urgency. Tuesday evening, as announced, will be budget night. The next day and the one after that will be the first two days of the budget debate as such, and it is too early yet to say whether or not we will suspend the debate next Friday. Again I repeat, because I want it to be clear, this is unless it is decided otherwise and on the hypothesis that the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is approved by 11 a.m. tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am a little surprised at the designation today at three o'clock of an opposition day tomorrow, a day which begins at eleven o'clock in the morning. Frankly, I think that is a bad practice. I want you to know this, Madam Speaker—I will not debate this with other members of the House—that there was a discussion the other day at a House leaders' meeting, at the normal period of time. There was no House leaders' meeting this morning; I was not called and I have a note from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that he was not called for a House leaders' meeting today at the normal time of 9.30 a.m. Quite frankly, I think this is a very bad parliamentary practice. I have no objection at all, and I make it clear, to having an allotted day on Monday; that would have been ample notice for us.

I have just reviewed my own minutes of the House leaders' meeting which was held on October 22 and I see that no definite date was mentioned. The President of the Privy Council said, and I quote my minutes:

Pinard said he was considering one before the budget—which is set for next Tuesday, October 28. Baker will ask the usual House business on Thursday.

I have asked the usual House business question now and I am told we will have two allotted days, one of them on Friday, which is tomorrow. Will the President of the Privy Council consider what he has done? Would he consider, in the interests of fairness—and if he would not, would you, Madam Speaker, consider in the interests of fairness—forgetting about an allotted day tomorrow and having the next allotted day on Monday, which would give us reasonable time to prepare? I think that if this practice continues in the face of motions such as we have today, the relationship that has prevailed in Parliament will break down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I still have the floor, so sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Quite frankly, I think it is bad practice, and the President of the Privy Council had better reconsider this decision.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the question of designating the two opposition days could be left open to further negotiation. I say quite openly that the President of the Privy Council indicated to us—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Perhaps.

Mr. Knowles: —certainly to me—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, he did not.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute.

An hon. Member: That was in your caucus, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles: The President of the Privy Council indicated that either Friday or Monday would be an opposition day and that today he would tell us which one.

An hon. Member: "Might" be.

Mr. Knowles: But there was never any suggestion that both of them would be opposition days. Therefore, I wonder if we could negotiate this matter a little further. Why not bring on the Post Office Crown corporation bill tomorrow?

An hon. Member: What about the constitution?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to agree to my colleagues' request. There has been a misunderstanding, we do not have the same minutes. Tomorrow we will gladly proceed with consideration of Bill C-42. Monday and Tuesday afternoon will be opposition days. If we have finished with Bill C-42, we will begin consideration of the freedom of information bill before the budget speech Tuesday evening. I regret this misunderstanding. I thought I had offered both days, but since we want to be flexible, as always, and with the agreement of my colleagues, we will consider Bill C-42 tomorrow, once again provided we have disposed by 11 a.m. tomorrow of the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien).

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I just want to ask the government House leader, if he had a free day he could play with like that, why is he so anxious to close the debate at one o'clock tomorrow morning? What kind of games is he playing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TELEVISING OF PROCEEDINGS OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): While we are on the subject, because this is important, Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister refused to answer a question; he ducked the question about the televising of the committee proceedings of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is what happened in the course of the question period, and anyone with half an eye could see it. Is the government House leader prepared to take his responsibilities as leader of the government in this House and bring forward a motion at a later time today which will bind the committee in so far as this House is concerned—and I am sure he could do it in the other place because he has a majority over there too—so that he can assure that the committee proceedings with respect to the constitution will be held in the same light of television as this debate has been and that the government is not accepting the advice in that leaked memo which indicated that it was a good thing for the government to hive it off in somebody's back pocket? Will the government House leader indicate that he will take initiatives here and now? I assure him of consent by our party to allowing the televising of that committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague raised two points in his remarks. First, he is wondering why, since we are going to debate the Post Office measure tomorrow, the debate must end at one o'clock tomorrow morning. We have no choice, those are the rules. I would like to remind him that I made him the offer that the House consider this matter until midnight tonight, all day tomorrow and all day Monday until midnight. He was the one who refused after consulting his caucus.

Second, he is asking me to assume my responsibilities as government House leader. I wish to assure him with respect that that is what I intend to do. I would like to remind the House, Madam Speaker, that this is not December 13, 1979, but October 22, 1980. And I shall assume my responsibilities my way, not his.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for displaying his ability to use the calendar. Today is not October 22; it is October 23, if he is interested.

An hon. Member: Of 1980.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The question is a very important one. It has not been answered. Will the government House leader take an initiative here and with the government leader in the Senate, who is Senator Perrault, in case he does not know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Would he take an initiative now to bring forward a motion later in the day by way of amendment to this motion or a separate motion? I assure him of consent, and I am certain the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would consent, even at this late hour, to televising the proceedings of the committee of the House. Will he do so or will he not? Will he tell us?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Prime Minister as replied to this question earlier during question period. It is an established parliamentary practice that the committee sets its own rules. I have a lot of respect for the committees of the House because I think of them as an extension of Parliament and the House of Commons and I believe that Parliament deserves our respect.

As for the suggestion, we have an open mind, and I am willing to negotiate with the hon. member on both the televizing of the debates of one or more committees and the length of the third phase of the debate, when the committee reports back to the House. However, I am certainly not now in a position to reply to the question, and these discussions can take place during our regular meetings between House leaders. I am willing to meet with him any time today, tomorrow or next week to discuss this matter, not separately, but within the more general context of parliamentary reform and the modernization of this institution so that it may—and so that this might be accepted by the public—deal with more than one issue of major importance for the Canadian people. This is what we are now trying to do, Madam Speaker. We are trying to enable Parliament to ask a committee, which is an integral part of Parliament, to study the constitutional issue, while we shall consider the budget and certain economic questions which are of much more interest to the Canadian people, namely the issues of inflation and unemployment.

What we are therefore doing at the present time—and I wish to point this out to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), because I know he is basically honest and will recognize the facts—is simply putting an end to the first stage of the debate, which will be pursued in committee, while the House will be able to deal with economic matters, as the opposition leader himself wanted, in the full knowledge that the House will be able later on to deal further with the constitutional issue and hold a complete debate after December 9.

Madam Speaker, this is our position, and if the Leader of the Official Opposition is honest, he will admit that we are not bringing the debate on the constitution to an end, but that we simply want to enable Parliament to meet its responsibilities and show its respect for the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, with respect to the suggestion that the meetings of the joint committee on the constitution be televised, I should like to indicate our support of that proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: However, there is one condition I should like to make—and I am sure my friend, the House leader of the official opposition, will agree—and that is that it be done by the House of Commons broadcasting service in the same way as the broadcasting of House proceedings is done; in other words, televising the proceedings completely. We do not want commercial or other broadcasters coming in, just picking this person or that, and giving a partial report of what is going on. But if it can be as it is with the House of Commons, an electronic Hansard of the whole business, we would be glad to see it and we think this would be a good time to start it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has put a condition on it which I think is quite appropriate. Quite frankly, I have been one who has wondered why the government has stalled these many months in having the committees of the House televised.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): In any event we are ad idem, at least as between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself. Therefore, it is on that basis that we would like to discuss this matter.

An hon. Member: Well, let us hear from them.

● (1520)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, further on this question, we now have a matter of very real importance to the House of Commons and people of Canada within one voice of the resolution. There has been an agreement expressed by the spokesmen for the NDP and for the official opposition that we would support having the proceedings of the committee, even though it meets under closure in advance, covered by television in the same way that the House of Commons is. All it would take is for the government to say that it, too, is agreed. We are agreed and the NDP is agreed. Will the government stand up now and say that it is prepared to let the public see what goes on within the parliamentary committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I indicated a while ago that we were willing to discuss it as soon as possible this afternoon or tomorrow if necessary. Now I wish to remind the Leader of the Opposition that such a request was made by several chairmen of other committees who each feel that their work is more important than the constitution. Some think that finance ought to come first, others that energy resources head the list. When we introduced television into the House, Madam Speaker, we tried to make Parliament closer to the people with due regard for the concept of televised debates. Now if all those conditions can be complied with without any discrimination against other committees, if it is technically possible without delaying the proceedings of the committee and if the report can be referred to us on December 9, all this being said, I am willing to discuss the matter with my colleagues and try to ease things up. Once again, Madam Speaker, since no conclusion has been drawn, such a request and those negotiations should not delay the tabling of the committee report in the House.

HANSARD CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

PARTY HONOURING FIRST ONE HUNDRED YEARS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise briefly on a point of order, Madam Speaker. This is something which any member might have tried to do under Standing Order 43, but one would not want to run the risk of denial.

I believe that all members of the House would like to express their thanks to the Hansard staff for the interesting and delightful party that was held last night in honour of the first hundred years of Hansard.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the questions to be answered today are Nos. 102, 128, 1,327 and 1,432.

CANADA COUNCIL—GRANTS

Question No. 102—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has it been the practice of the Canada Council to list in their annual report the names of those receiving grants, the amounts they received and the purpose of such grants and, if so, has there been a change in policy in this regard?

2. Does the Canada Council's annual report for 1978-79 list the names of all recipients, the amounts received and the purpose of the grants and, if not, for what reason?

3. In line with a program of increasing freedom of information to the Canadian people, what are all the reasons justifying an apparent inconsistency with regard to information made public by the Canada Council?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows:

1, 2 and 3. There has been no change in policy, but a change in format. The 1978-79 annual report appears in two bilingual volumes. The first provides an overview of Council programs, operations and finances. A supplementary volume includes lists and amounts of grants and other detailed information at least as extensive as that provided in previous years.

The change was introduced primarily to improve the clarity and timeliness of the presentation, for the convenience of users of the documents. In addition, more information can be provided more widely and economically in the new format. The report and supplement are freely available to the public on request.

Order Paper Questions

PHYSICIANS' EMIGRATION

Question No. 128—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past five years, how many physicians have emigrated?

2. Does such emigration concern the Department of National Health and Welfare and, if so (a) what action does it plan to take to assure that the situation changes (b) have provincial departments of health been consulted?

3. Are steps being taken to provide incentives to doctors to stay in Canada and, if so, what are the details?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Number of physicians who have emigrated:

2. The Department of National Health and Welfare is aware that the number of physicians who emigrated has declined in 1979 from the high point reached in 1978. Despite such emigration, the physician-population ratio has continued to improve each year, reaching 1 to 551 population at the end of 1979.

(a) The situation has improved in 1979. However, the Department of National Health and Welfare is presently studying the Hall report in this respect.

(b) Consultations and data exchange take place on a continuing basis as required with provincial departments of health. The Federal-Provincial Advisory Committee on Health Manpower meets twice yearly.

3. Steps to provide incentives to doctors to stay in Canada are primarily the responsibility of the provinces.

NFB FILMS—CORDELIA AND THE PERFORMER

Question No. 1,327—Mr. Friesen:

What was the projected cost of the NFB films Cordelia and The Performer and what was the final cost?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows:

	Projected cost	Final cost
Cordelia	$ 961,722	$ 1,287,976
The Performer	$ 15,651	$ 14,311

FAIRVIEW COVE CONTAINER PIER—PORT OF HALIFAX

Question No. 1,432—Mr. Crosby:

Did the Minister of Transport give directions to the National Harbours Board with respect to the appointment of an operator for the Fairview Cove container pier in the port of Halifax and (a) if so (i) what were they (ii) did the board comply with his direction and appoint an operator or teller and, if not, for what reason (b) if not, did the minister take steps to ensure that cranes and related equipment will be available upon completion of the pier?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

1. No.

(i) Not applicable

(ii) Not applicable

(b) Yes.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—JOB CLASSIFICATION TITLES

Question No. 1,022—Mr. Friesen:

1. What are the job classification titles under which an individual would be employed in the National Film Board?

2. How many individuals were employed by the NFB in (a) 1979 (b) 1980 to date and by job classification, how many received incomes per annum (i) of more than $60,000 (ii) between $50,000 and $60,000 (iii) between $40,000 and $50,000 (iv) between $30,000 and $40,000 (v) between $20,000 and $30,000 (vi) between $10,000 and $20,000 (vii) less than $10,000?

3. How many individuals were employed by the NFB on a contract basis in (a) 1979 (b) 1980 to date and what was the total amount paid for such services?

4. What was the total amount of gross revenues the NFB received from sources outside the government?

Return tabled.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox):

That debate on the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice (government orders, government business, No. 18) regarding special joint committee to consider a proposed resolution to address Her Majesty the Queen—

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, you called "orders of the day". Rule 33 reads in this way:

Immediately before the order of the day—

You have called it and that is the beginning of the process on the order of the day and it is finished for the day. You have called it, and from then on any motion under Standing Order 33 is out of order. Because it says:

Immediately before the order of the day—

You called for motions and he missed it.

Madam Speaker: I was taking time to look at the reference, but quite clearly there is no problem in the proceedings. I called the orders of the day, which is exact. Before the Clerk read the order of the day, the minister was on his feet seeking the floor.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Madam Speaker: I recognized the minister—

Mr. Clark: René Beaudoin!

An hon. Member: He is challenging the Chair!

Madam Speaker: —and he was about to read his motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I was about to finish reading the motion which I should like to resume where I left off when I was interrupted:

—respecting the Constitution of Canada, and any amendment or subamendment thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

I have given the text of motion to the Clerk of the House.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to make it quite clear what had happened. You called motions and you called orders of the day. You are the presiding officer in this House, not the Clerk.

Mr. Clark: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And I mean no disrespect to the Clerk when I say that. Standing Order 33, because it mitigates against the right of members to speak for as long as they wish to speak, is a rule of this House which must be strictly interpreted in favour of the right of members to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If there is any doubt about that, Madam Speaker, then I would suggest that perhaps your Honour should take advice with respect to it. Also, I say with respect—

Mr. Fox: Sounds like the Supreme Court.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member says it sounds like the Supreme Court. This is the Supreme Court.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And in case it has escaped the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, the Speaker is a judicial officer in that court—the judicial officer in that court.

My argument is this, Madam Speaker. The government has every right to move a motion if it wishes to do so, however tasteless and however wrong in terms of Parliament that might be. It can move that whenever it wants to, except that under the rules of the House they have to move it at the right time.

You had called orders of the day, Madam Speaker. The record can be checked. The Clerk is silent in the House; your Honour presides. Then my friend, the government House leader, rose to put his motion. I say, Madam Speaker, that he was out of time and that that motion is not now receivable. It was not receivable when he put it.

Mr. Nielsen: You can't weasel out of it.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You cannot back up the proceedings of this House and date them back and say that something happened that never happened before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There is at least one former Speaker in this House of Commons, and if there was ever a time in the life of this Parliament when the Speaker of this House should take advice, it is now. I say that because I have a great respect for the institution of the Chair and also for these rules. I think you know that, Madam Speaker.

Therefore, before you make a ruling with respect to this matter—because there is no appeal from your ruling—you should look at and listen to the video tapes of the proceedings and look at the blues. If necessary, we are prepared to suspend the proceedings in this House for as long as it will take for you to make the decision. This is a very important ruling that you are about to make, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I wish to say a word with respect to the point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). May I be permitted to say, so that it will be very clear, that my colleagues and I are opposed to the introduction of the closure motion. We shall be voting against it, and I shall have something to say about the whole practice of closure if I get the floor later today.

However, Madam Speaker, I think that when a member rises to take part in a point of order debate, he should not twist the rules or even their wording, as did the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, and he should not try to put the Chair in an impossible position. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, and he would like both the video tape and the blues checked, read the standing order as though it said "immediately before the orders of the day are called".

That is not what Standing Order 33 says. It says:

Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called—

Madam Speaker, you did not call an order of the day, but "orders of the day".

Mr. Nielsen: Come on!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. The President of the Privy Council got up before anyone called order No. 18 or before anything has been called.

Mr. Clark: There goes your reputation, Stanley.

Mr. Nielsen: That completes the process.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear, as long as the motion is put before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate, that it is in order. I resent the bringing in of the motion and I am sorry that we are having this kind of a day, but I do not think that the Speaker should be put in the impossible position which has been created by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton misquoting the rule.

Mr. McCain: Madam Speaker, in support of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and because of my position as the one who would rise next to participate in the debate, I was watching every muscle and movement of the gentleman who would present that motion. Because if he did not make that move and put the motion, it was then my turn to speak. I was rising in my seat to speak on orders of the day before he twitched a muscle in his seat.

Madam Speaker: I thank hon. members for their interventions. I thank the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) when he says that he has a lot of respect for this House and particularly for the Chair. I, too, have a lot of respect for what the hon. members have to say. One can imagine that I had tried to foresee any points of procedure that might be brought up at this particular time. Therefore, I was also watching every possible muscle of every possible member in this House.

Madam Speaker: I called the orders of the day. The order of the day to be discussed today had not yet been chosen, precisely because the Clerk had not risen to announce that particular order of the day. Before that happened, the minister—and I was watching very closely—chose to propose his motion.

Because I have such respect for what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has to say, I will interrupt Proceedings for a few minutes in order to consult with the Table to make sure that my decision today will be fair and, particularly, according to our rules.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think that is quite appropriate. I hope you understand, and I want you to understand, that that question is advanced—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: You're oozing, Walter.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is very difficult for the Chair to deal with difficult points of procedure, especially if there is so much noise in the House that the Chair cannot hear.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I just want to say that I appreciate the consideration that you are giving to the point of order.

[Editor's Note: At this point the sitting was suspended for approximately two minutes.]

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Members will realize that there are several orders of the day and that is why I call "orders of the day". I cannot know which order of the day will be called until the Clerk announces that order of the day. Therefore, I cannot recognize a speaker to speak on that order of the day before it is announced.

What happened is that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) got up before the "order" of the day, not the "orders" of the day, was announced. Therefore, he was acting quite in conformity with Standing Order 33, which reads:

Immediately before the order of the day—

Therefore, the minister is quite in order and his motion must be put to the House.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That debate on the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice (government orders, government business, No. 18) regarding a special joint committee to consider a proposed resolution to address Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and any amendment or subamendment thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those against the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 21, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Madam Speaker: On Tuesday last, October 21, 1980, when the House was considering government business No. 18 dealing with the Constitution of Canada, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) offered an amendment which the Chair took under advisement. I might read it for the benefit of hon. members.

That the motion be amended by adding thereto after the sixth paragraph the following:

Notwithstanding any standing orders or practices of either House, the committee shall have the power to table a minority report, with its main report, and any such report shall be tabled by the committee if signed by three or more members of the committee.

The Chair has some serious concerns about the procedural acceptability of this motion.

First of all, the amendment seeks to change the powers of the committee to be established in a way which is not contemplated by the rules or practices of the House as they now stand. The submission of minority reports from committees to this House is not part of our parliamentary practice. This was clearly stated by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux in a ruling on March 16, 1972, in which he quoted paragraph 319 of the fourth edition of Beauchesne, which I do not need to repeat now. I might add that the same provision appears in citation 641 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne.

If the hon. member's amendment were accepted, it would indeed amend our standing orders in an indirect way. As hon. members know, amendments to standing orders can only be effected by unanimous consent or by a substantive motion preceded by a 48-hour notice. Therefore, I cannot accept the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. Dick: A good Liberal ruling.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my constituency lies in that area of Canada which might well be called the cradle of confederation. It is just a little extension from Charlottetown. It was in that cradle that the concept of confederation was conceived, and in that plan four then independent countries rendered unto the confederation of Canada their own independence to become part of a greater team.

In that rendering of their independence to the rest of Canada they conceived a plan in which the first ministers of this land, now 11 in all, were each to be one among equals. The practice and procedures of confederation from that moment until this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office were that, being a group of equals, the chairmanship revolved around, through, and among the provinces, and included the Prime Minister of Canada. This Prime Minister has chosen to dominate the various meetings of first ministers of Canada. He has imposed himself upon this nation not as one among equals, but he has self-esteemed himself as the first among equals. Under this situation the spirit of confederation cannot function, and unity cannot prevail.

● (1620)

Mr. McCain: Canada has long had two competing parties. One of them was the Liberal party. It was a proud party and it has been successful in the political scenes of Canada because the Liberal party controlled its governments. This government has escaped from the judicious control of its party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: If any member in this House does not believe me, let him read Canada's political history from cover to cover, let him spend some months, as I have, in neglect of my constituency problems, in neglect of functions in my constituency, to devote full time to the problem of the Constitution of Canada.

I regret that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) should say that I was passed this speech by somebody to deliver it in the House. That may be his fashion of operation, Mr. Speaker, but it is not mine, nor has it been, for his information, the fashion of operation of any speaker in this party on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: There has been no coercion, there has been no suggestion as to "what you say or how you say it," and this includes me, at this, the most crucial moment perhaps of all in the debate. I am proud that at this moment in time I can stand here in defence of Canada. I sang "O Canada" with a zest with which I never sang it before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No Liberal stood up.

Mr. McCain: Never before did I feel that I was complying in totality with the words "I stand on guard for thee" as I do at this moment, and as I sang in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I sat here watching every Atlantic member who was in his seat rising in contempt of the Atlantic area which cradled confederation and which has cherished it. I think I heard the bones of the Fathers of Confederation rattling all over Atlantic Canada as these people, who have not studied the consequence of what we are considering today, rose and voted for closure on this item. Mr. Speaker, it is an insufferable neglect of duty and I hope that, particularly those from Newfoundland, when they go back, will receive the treatment which they deserve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: They have confronted the opinion of every legislator, regardless of whether or not they support Mr.

Peckford that Newfoundland should have control of its resources both onshore and offshore and free passage of its renewable resources to any markets to which they might deliver them. Every member of Newfoundland's legislature supports that, and the vote has to be interpreted as being against that. I say that because, although we have been pledged ownership of resources by some who have spoken on the government side of the House, the controls which will be imposed by the constitutional proposals, and the scurrilous agreement between the NDP and the Liberal party, put ownership of a resource in no substantial position of importance any longer because the control of the resource passes over from those independent entities to the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I just want you, members from Atlantic Canada, to understand what you are voting for and what interpretation can be put on this very innocuous-appearing document which carries within it powers of interpretation which go far beyond the understanding of the parliamentary secretary and of the President of the Privy Council.

Canada is in jeopardy, it cannot be otherwise described. I have assumed this position, not because of my party but because my party and I agree wholeheartedly. It is a position against which I have been advised by constituents because there is no understanding among the masses in Canada of the real consequence of the ultimate interpretation of the resolution, section by section. There is no understanding that Canada will now be governed by the courts instead of by the legislation of this land, that Canada may have its rights jeopardized in the courts and they will not be correctable by legislation in this land but will instead demand an amendment to the constitution.

How could any democratic-minded person, in all honesty, if he proclaims democracy as his base, vote without understanding the possible interpretations? I think the weakness of the case can be well pointed out by the fact that not a single Liberal member in the House has offered an argument in support of the document which we are at present considering and debating. They have shafted us with their barbs. They have had their tantrums, as did the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) yesterday, a perfectly planned theatrical tantrum which got him the publicity he wanted. It was a disgrace to the operation of Parliament from a minister of the Crown, particularly one holding his portfolio.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I have listened with great care to many speeches, and have read others, and I have not found one supporting statement or argument for a clause, word or phrase, but merely a contention that it must be there.

The government now is afraid that the milk chocolate with which it has adorned this instrument will dissolve, and that the intelligent people of Canada will begin to spread the word that it is only used to encrust a bitter lemon. It has been a matter of camouflage and misleading information promoted both by speakers in this House and a $30 million propaganda program to advise the people, "We are working for you, God bless you, you are in safe hands." Little do they know what is happening. Now they are afraid of time because there is an obvious change of opinion and because I and others members of this House, with some danger to our own political future, recognizing that principles are more important than an individual political future, have taken this unpopular stand, as every poll in this country has proclaimed. But we have taken the logical stand, and logic and right will prevail, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: Why the rush? I want to know what is the importance of time in the discussion of this item. Why should discussion of an item of such consequence to the country be restricted in time when the consequence of the time spent and the decision reached will be timeless as it goes forward in the history of this country? What is the justification for the restriction of time and for closure? In the interests of a happy, prosperous and harmonious Canada co-operating together for prosperity in the future, I make a plea that sanity may prevail and emotion may subside so that reason can rule and we get what we need in a constitution. I support human rights, etc., and let no one have the unadulterated gall to deny that. So in order that we may have more time, I plead with the House that it may accept this motion which I make, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the motion be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph and substituting therefor the following:

"That the committee submit its report not later than February 12, 1981; that the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; that the committee be empowered to retain the services of advisers to assist in its work; and that it also be empowered to retain such professional, clerical and stenographic help as may be required.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I move that motion in recognition of the fact that there are people who have spent a lifetime studying the constitutional history, constitutional procedures, the constitutional possibilities, and the consequences of hasty adoption of constitutions in other domains, and that this constitution should not be arrived at under datelines and deadlines. Before it becomes law, or before it is submitted to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, it must have the pooling of the wisest men in this domain to phrase it so that it will last. It should not be the hasty phrases committed to paper as they were in the PM's office or in some other marble alley somewhere out of sight in this domain of ours, without proper understanding of the ultimate consequences.

● (1630)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. With respect to the motion moved by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), because this may occur again in the proceedings, I want to indicate that in view of the fact Standing Order 33 is in play at the moment, I think it is the obligation of the Chair to take into consideration any amendments such as the present one and to give a ruling on them as quickly as possible. I would propose that the debate continue and that a ruling will be prepared within the next few moments.

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not have time to deal with all of the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), but I should like to deal with one point because it affects my constituency so much. He somehow implied that voting for this motion, as we did today, those of us from Atlantic Canada and from Newfoundland somehow voted against the transmission of hydro through Quebec to market. I want to tell him that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is on public record at the first ministers' conference—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rompkey: —as saying that the federal government is totally behind the province of Newfoundland in the transmission of hydro through Quebec, providing a market can be found for that power. It is quite clear it in no way affects this vote at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: I wanted to speak about that point, but also I want to address myself to the resolution before us. We are discussing here the foundation of our future. We have an opportunity to set down the ideals on which our way of life is based.

We may have thought that we were creating a country in 1867, but surely a modern and independent country must have a constitution of its own and the power to change that constitution, a constitution which sets down for all time the rights of individuals. That is what this motion is all about. It seeks to ensure that Canadians everywhere have the fundamental freedom that people in other free nations enjoy; that people have the democratic rights to which they are entitled; that there be no discrimination in this country on the basis of race, ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex; that the citizens of the English and French-speaking minority in any province have the right to educate their children in that minority language wherever numbers warrant; that mobility rights ensure the right of every citizen to move freely from one province to another, to establish a residence and to seek a job anywhere in Canada.

Our people—and I am talking of the people in Newfoundland and Labrador—no matter where they are, where they were born or what their ethnic origin, have never been confined to a particular region of the country. Our people have been free to go where fortune beckoned them. Before confederation between Newfoundland and Canada, Newfoundlanders travelled the oceans of the world, crossing the sea to a variety of foreign lands in pursuit of trade and commerce. They came to know many countries, and many countries came to know them as seamen and businessmen.

Since confederation in 1949, Newfoundlanders and Labradorians have travelled to all parts of Canada—to Fort McMurray, to Toronto, to Calgary, and to Galt. They have settled, raised their families and pursued their careers. In doing so, they have made themselves not less Newfoundlanders but all the more Canadians. It is true some of them have gone of necessity and have regretted that necessity, but others have gone through choice. Of the latter some have obtained the highest offices in this land. Yet, certainly the effect of the present provincial regulations would be to confine our people to the province.

Surely if Newfoundland would keep other Canadians out, it stands to reason other provinces would be forced to keep out Newfoundlanders. The outcome of that policy would be to balkanize, to build walls, to restrict Canadians to a region. This is clearly wrong. This country belongs to all of us; not just a part of the country but all of Canada. Each of us should be free to move and to settle in any part.

Mr. Clark: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Rompkey: This freedom must be written for all time in our constitution.

The present government proposal also establishes in the constitution the principle of equalization. If any province in confederation has benefited from this policy, surely it has been Newfoundland and Labrador. There is no Newfoundlander today, no Labradorian today, not a single one of us from Cape Chidley to Cape Race, whose life is not immensely better because we are today Canadians. At the present time 60 per cent of the provincial budget comes from Ottawa. Of course this does not include the individual transfer payments such as family allowance, unemployment insurance and pensions, which are an attempt to equalize the financial situation of individuals.

People in provinces want to be able to stand on their own two feet through income from the development of their own resources. But, until such time as this can be accomplished, they have a right to expect that the resources of the nation are used to ensure their services are up to a reasonable standard, for the fundamental principle of confederation is sharing, and the manifestation of that principle is the program of equalization.

The inconsistency of the provincial government of Newfoundland mystifies me. Are they saying that by rejecting this resolution they are rejecting the principle of equalization? Quite clearly they are firmly rejecting the measure before the House of Commons at the present time. We know they have rejected the federal government offer of 100 per cent of the revenue which would normally accrue to a province from oil production. I am at a loss to know exactly what they want. Certainly they want to sustain their rhetoric; they want to rattle sabres; they want to hunt headlines; they want to bicker with the federal government.

I believe the people of Newfoundland understand the need for a strong national government. They are aware of the individual benefits such a government can provide, and I have listed some of them. They know from where the money has come to build the Trans-Canada highway and the major trunk roads in that province. They know who built the wharves, breakwaters and fishing boats. The people of Newfoundland know the need for a strong national government, a government with the strength to help those who need it most. That is why they will never condone the vision of Premier Peckford. That is why they will never agree with him that the federal government is merely a creature of the provinces, so that presumably they can change it and, indeed, destroy it at will. That is why they will never share with him the vision of Premier Lévesque.

For, while he may later have tried to wriggle out of it, he quite clearly placed himself in the Lévesque camp at the first ministers' conference. He said:

It is too bad all of Canada couldn't have viewed it yesterday when both yourself, Mr. Prime Minister, and Mr. Lévesque articulated clearer than I have ever seen it done before two different visions of Canada. Hydro power notwithstanding, I would have to side with the theory advocated by Mr. Lévesque.

That is where the dispute is, hydro power is the greatest resource we have and that is where our future lies.

Premier Peckford, like Premier Lévesque, wants a confederation of convenience. He wants the federal government when he needs it, but he wishes it was not there when it needs him. He needs the federal government to authorize pushing power from the Lower Churchill through Quebec; he wants the federal government to give orders to another province in that instance, but he wants a hands-off policy when it comes to the offshore. In that situation he wants to cut the cord and forgets about a Newfoundland contribution to the welfare of Canada. He is saying to Canada, "Yes, you've invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the fishery to develop it. Yes, you have supported fishermen and fish companies but now the companies are making a dollar and fishermen's incomes are up, we want to draw a line around Newfoundland and catch and process our own Newfoundland fish. We don't know how we'll tell Newfoundland fish from Nova Scotia fish but we'll find a way. Thanks for the ride, Canada; don't call us, we'll call you."

Similarly, the federal government has made an important contribution to the development of offshore oil. Surely federal tax incentives have played an important part in bringing all offshore exploration to its present state. Surely the role of Petro-Canada, the state-owned oil company which members opposite wanted to do away with, has been a tremendous asset to Newfoundland. In fact it is fair to say that without direct and indirect federal involvement there would be no offshore oil and gas exploration, there would be no Hibernia. According to Premier Peckford it all belongs to Newfoundland, in spite of the national need for petroleum. He is saying, "We want you around when we need you, but kindly disappear when you need us." He makes Scrooge look like the tooth fairy.

No nation can exist on the basis of expediency; there must be a constant sharing and not just when it is convenient. Canada has a need, a need for a secure supply of petroleum. The country which has helped and supported Newfoundland since 1949 now needs our help and we, as a province, should respond. We should agree to share the revenues and the control of development. That is the Canadian way, and it could work. If the provincial government were thinking "Canadian" and if they were willing to co-operate, it could work. But instead we find a constant bickering with and railing against the federal government.

Every day from the Confederation Building in St. John's the federal government is bashed as if the provincial Tories thought this was the way to win friends and influence people. Every possible opportunity is seized to blame the federal government for the ills of the province. Everything that goes wrong is the fault of the federal government. And yet the federal government is expected to step in and pick up the pieces when things fall apart. And things are falling apart because the whole focus has been on offshore. Everything else is pushed into the background. Unemployment is growing, the cost of living is rising, the construction industry is reeling while the provincial government treats its people to rhetoric on the offshore. And this in spite of the fact that we need many Hibernias to reduce our dependence on equalization grants. But you cannot put rhetoric in the bank. You cannot put rhetoric on your kitchen table. Our people want jobs and prosperity for themselves and their province.

I wish to quote from a recent letter from Mr. John MacDonald of Paradise River on the coast of Labrador. Labrador is the site of the Churchill River vast hydro potential and the member for Carleton-Charlotte referred to that. Mr. Peckford says he wants to go ahead with this development. He wants a strong federal government to order Quebec to take Labrador power through their province. He is for mobility of power but against mobility of people. The only problem is that while he has found a way to benefit the people of New York he has not found a way to benefit the people of Labrador. They see the danger of this resource, like others, moving out of their territory, with no real benefit to them. Meanwhile, conditions in Labrador are crying out for attention and the provincial government does nothing to address these conditions.

I want to quote from Mr. MacDonald's letter to a St. John's newspaper, which said in part:

People in other towns complain about the condition of their roads. We don't have a road. We have a foot path running along the edge of the river—we have one telephone in town, usable for about four hours a day. It is regularly out of order—we don't have a supermarket—we must scramble to find a wholesaler who will sell us our winter supply of food in September—medical facilities are a laugh—so Mr. Peckford when you're sitting in St. John's sometime—anticipating your next speech on oil rights, give a thought to Paradise River.

The people of Labrador are not fooled by the provincial rhetoric. They know the reality of the situation. They know that the wild talk and gestures are a smokescreen to camouflage deplorable conditions which the provincial government is doing nothing to correct. What our people want is not rhetoric but jobs. They know enough about Canada to know this can only be accomplished through co-operation with a strong federal government. Their experience in confederation tells them that it is a matter of give and take. Sometimes you take, other times you give. That is what confederation is all about—sharing.

The federal government offered a good deal on the offshore. The provincial government turned it down, claiming the only important thing was ownership. Yet it has refused to present the matter to the Supreme Court, the only body which can decide ownership, in spite of the fact that Newfoundland claims to have an excellent case. Many people believe Newfoundland has a special case, a unique case. But only the Supreme Court of Canada can decide, and the province will not submit the matter to it. It refuses to negotiate. It refuses to go to court. Meanwhile the rhetoric continues. Ottawa-bashing continues. An ugly, anti-Canadian feeling continues to be fostered in our province. That is the saddest thing of all, Mr. Speaker.

All across this county groups and individuals are attempting to balkanize, to cut off a piece of the country, to build a wall in order to achieve separation. This is a challenge to the essential nature of Canada.

There are those in my own province who would encourage extreme Newfoundland nationalism that they know was present at the time of confederation. In 1949 the vote for Canada was put. There were those who wanted Newfoundland to be independent, and they feared Canada. This feeling was reflected in an anti-confederate song which ended with the line "Come near at your peril, Canadian wolf." Today there are those who are trying to preserve the myth of the Canadian wolf, except today there is a variation on the theme, which goes, "Come near when we want you, but only if we want you." So the challenge and the conflict are still present in Newfoundland, the conflict between those for confederation and those against, those for one country and those for ten, those for the Trudeau vision and those for the Lévesque vision. But Newfoundland has changed since confederation and Newfoundlanders have changed. In 1949 just over 50 per cent voted for Canada. Today the vote would be overwhelmingly for Canada, because since that time we have come to know and appreciate our Canadian neighbours. Since that time we have become Canadian.

While we may look back nostalgically at the past, this very act suggests a different future. Surely that future is within and not without Canada. Surely our Canadian identity enhances rather than diminishes our Newfoundland identity. Surely we do not have to be either Newfoundlanders or Canadians. We can be both. We must be both, just as French Canadians must be both and Alberta Canadians must be both. Canada draws its strength from its differences but only when those differences exists in harmony and unity.

There are those who want to put Newfoundland culture on the shelf and make it a museum piece. Those people want to build up the myth of the modern Canadian wolf. But our society is strong because we are growing and developing. Our people are strong because they are not only Newfoundlanders but Canadians. That is why I am shocked and outraged at the recent hysterical outburst of the Premier of Newfoundland. We heard he would take the federal government to court over this constitutional initiative. He must know full well that he does not have a chance. But he is persuaded to this cause because he is a member of the Lougheed, Lyon, Lévesque group—and we all clearly know Mr. Lévesque's intentions. Still, Premier Peckford seeks the authority of the court in a case he cannot win and, at the same time—

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if the minister would clarify whether he is suggesting, in the name of his government, that Premier Lyon of Manitoba and Premier Peckford of Newfoundland are separatists. Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Rompkey: You will have to rule on that point of order, Mr. Speaker, but I have said what I have said and I am sure the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I think the hon. minister perhaps does deserve the usual comment which goes in such cases. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) took the opportunity to do what has been done on some occasions, that is, to interrupt an hon. member who has the floor and to ask a question. I did not underline the right of the hon. minister either to answer a question, if he saw fit, or simply to continue with his remarks. Having said that, I recognize the minister again.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, there was a clear grouping of premiers and we know clearly what certain members of that group stand for. I think it is pretty clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Rompkey: Premier Peckford refuses to submit offshore ownership to the court in spite of the fact that many believe Newfoundland has a good case. Why this ambivalence? Why is there this contradiction? If the courts are trustworthy and if only they can rule on ownership, and if ownership is the "be all" and "end all", then why are they not asked to judge? Mr. Peckford will ask them to rule on a matter which affects the future of Canada, but not on a matter which affects the future of Newfoundland and Labrador. One thing we can say about the plan is that he is consistent in his inconsistency. However, several days ago Mr. Peckford rose to an all-time high in rhetoric by charging that the proposed resolution on the Canadian constitution would take away the rights of the Newfoundlanders and Labradorians to denominational education and would leave the way open for changes to the Labrador boundary as it now exists.

● (1650)

Either Mr. Peckford cannot read or he is deliberately misleading the people of the province by those ridiculous statements. By deliberately singling out emotional issues such as the denominational education system and the Labrador boundary, he is attempting to stampede Newfoundlanders and Labradorians against the federal government's constitutional proposal. The scare tactics which Mr. Peckford is using are similar to those used by Mr. Lévesque during the Quebec referendum campaign. But these scare tactics did not work in Quebec and they will not work in Newfoundland.

The Newfoundland Liberal MPs on this side of the House are determined to fight, with all the strength we can muster, the demagoguery which we have witnessed in our own province. Once our people know the facts they will see the sham for what it is. The constitutional resolution which we are debating here explicitly guarantees the Labrador border and our denominational schools. Section 43 and section 47 of the resolution are our protection.

Section 43 provides a special rule whereby amendments that do not apply to all provinces, such as the terms of union, would be made only with the consent of Parliament and the province concerned. Mr. Peckford conveniently forgot to point this out in his province-wide broadcast. Furthermore, section 47 is even more explicit. It says that no amending formula as outlined in the resolution would apply where the constitution contains another procedure for making an amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. As I often do when in the chair, I try to signal hon. members or ministers who are speaking that they have a moment or two left to wrap up. There is some pressure on all hon. members because of the 20-minute time limit. Because I allowed an interruption, I will give the hon. minister 30 seconds.

Mr. Rompkey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to point out the facts on this important issue in our province, as they exist at the present time. We on this side of the House stand firm on the matter. I wanted to point out one particular matter which came up in the recent amendment that deals with the transfer of resources from one province to another and indirect and direct taxation. The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) dealt with this subject very well yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Rompkey: I want to say to my friends across the way that it will be an asset to our people, not a liability.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my point of order to the acting government House leader. It would be my view, as well as the view of members of my party that, considering the events today, it would be inappropriate to have a private members' hour. We would rather have the hour used for the debating of this resolution. I have spoken to the House leader of the New Democratic Party, and I believe that they are in agreement. I would ask that the government accede to this request as well.

Mr. Dick: Make it unanimous.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped that the hon. member could have given me prior notice of this suggestion. We have six minutes left before we call it private members' hour. I will give my decision at one minute to five.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. There is a small technical problem, and the Chair has difficulty hearing at times. I do not know whether the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) put a motion or whether there was an implicit agreement to give further consideration to the suggestion.

Mr. Epp: I asked for unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair can interpret the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary that there is not unanimous consent, but nonetheless I think it is in order to put the question.

Mr. Dick: No, he said that he would wait for five minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Then there is agreement to delay discussion on this matter?

Mr. Dick: Yes.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in due course I will deal with the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) where it is necessary. In my opening remarks I would like to say with regard to my leader that as I was reading my Roman history recently I came across the philosopher Seneca, who said:

Whereas fire is the test of gold, adversity is the test of a strong man.

Our leader has been tested in adversity and I think that he is showing himself well in these times of adversity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I am not talking about brown, I said gold. I have only 20 minutes allotted to me, so I cannot make the full presentation that I wanted to make. I did not expect that closure would be introduced in this debate. After only 24 hours of debate, after only 46 members out of 279 in this House have spoken, after 22 out of 145 Liberals have spoken—123 have not spoken—after 19 out of 102 Progressive Conservatives have spoken, 83 have not; and after only five out of 32 NDP members have spoken, leaving 25 who have not spoken—

Mr. Knowles: Twenty-seven. Can't you count?

Mr. Crosbie: —231 members of this House, give or take a few, have not had a chance to speak in this debate. It took God six days to make the world. It takes the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) only 24 hours of debate to remake Canada.

The Prime Minister has tried to deceive the Canadian people. He said in his opening statement several weeks ago on television that the Canadian people have to find a way of breaking out of 53 years of constitutional paralysis. To say the best about that statement, it is an untruth. We have had many constitutional changes in the last 53 years. There has been no constitutional paralysis.

For example, in 1940, unemployment insurance was added to the federal jurisdiction, and in 1951 section 94(a) was added to the old age pension to clarify federal powers. There has been no impasse. Even if there has been debate on the constitution over the last 20 years or 30 years, it has not been because of the provinces that have been so abused by the government—Newfoundland, Alberta and the rest of them—it has been mainly because the French Canadian people of Quebec did not feel that their province had sufficient powers and jurisdiction to protect them in their homeland of Quebec.

That is the debate which I have been following since the 1940s. That is the debate which I have heard introduced by premiers of Quebec ever since the late 1940s, that they did not feel under the present system they had sufficient powers and jurisdiction in the province of Quebec to protect the rights and responsibilities of their own French Canadian people. Suddenly this summer after the referendum, in which the Prime Minister at no time during the referendum ever said to the people of Quebec, "Vote no against the referendum and, if you do, I am going to restrict your provincial powers", he has a change of mind. He was going to double track the country, now he is doublecrossing the Quebeckers.

After getting the people of Quebec to say no in the referendum, he is now turning around and restricting the powers and responsibilities of the province of Quebec as well as of the other nine provinces. It is a shameful turn-around from what was promised to the people of Quebec in the referendum. The people who have introduced this issue in Canada over the past 30 years are now having imposed on them something which is 100 per cent opposite to what they wanted.

We have a strong central government now. We should pay no attention to the pretence that poor granny Trudeau is up here with a weak federal government and he is going to be severely abused and assaulted by these ten rapacious premiers. It is untrue. The Prime Minister has the power to disallow provincial legislation or have it reserved by the lieutenant governor. He has the power to have a work declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. He can take over any industry in the country through a proclamation passed by this House. These are all federal powers which the Prime Minister has today. Under section 92(10)(a) he has the power with respect to works or undertakings between the provinces, but he will not use this section to aid the province of Newfoundland.

The Prime Minister will not work to declare a hydro transmission line from Labrador to, say, New York, Ontario or New Brunswick, to be to the general advantage of Canada and to stop the tyranny under which we have suffered in Newfoundland since 1965 so that we can transmit our electricity across Quebec.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) on a point of order.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, we would be agreeable to sitting through private members' hour. The item which will be set aside is in the name of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon). I must reiterate, however, that the House will take its normal adjournment at six o'clock. We will just go until six o'clock, but through private members' hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous agreement that the House dispense with private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) on a point of order.

Mr. Siddon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I approach this request with mixed feelings because my private members' bill was to come before the House. I am faced with a choice between freshwater fish and the future of our country. I feel, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I can understand the hon. member's problem, but all the Chair can do at this time is ask the House if there is unanimous consent to dispense with private members' hour. Is there?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There being unanimous consent, the Chair must recognize the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the federal government has these powers now, but it often chooses not to exercise them because it does not think that the people of Canada would support the exercise. Mr. Speaker, we support bringing the BNA Act back from the United Kingdom to Canada—and an amending formula as well. But we do not support the scurvy plot that the Government of Canada is instituting—that because it would not have the powers after the constitution is brought back to do what it now proposes, it should have it done in the United Kingdom in Parliament there first, because they think that what would be illegal here would be legal there.

The Prime Minister is the last of the old colonial boys. He is not asking us just to improve and bring back the constitution; he wants it changed fundamentally before it ever comes here. We cannot accept that and we are not going to accept the concept of a referendum.

The Minister of National Revenue referred to Premier Peckford's worries about denominational education and the Labrador boundary. Section 43 of this act is meaningless. It can be changed. If this can be done today, any Government of Canada in the future with a majority in Parliament can change it again. They could use the referendum to go over the heads of the provinces and have any section of the act changed. So section 43 is meaningless. There is no protection for Newfoundland's denominational education, there is no protection for the Newfoundland boundary with Quebec, there is no protection for any provincial right in the constitution whatsoever if what the government attempts to do now is carried through and they are given the power to have a referendum and to decide what powers are necessary to amend the act and decide who has to agree. None of us have any protection.

The charter of human rights is meaningless, and if I had the time I would go into that. It can be changed at any time by the tyranny of the majority opposite. They are going to tyrannize the rest of us. They plan to tyrannize the country because they have this majority and they are going to shape Canada, they think, in the view that they have of it. They are going to find it cannot be done, Mr. Speaker.

What is a confederation, Mr. Speaker? Webster's dictionary gives the following definition:

A body of confederates especially of states more or less permanently united for common purposes.

Canada is given as an example. But we are not going to be that kind of state any longer if this goes through. The Prime Minister does not even mention the states that were there originally before they joined; just people.

What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier say in 1889? He said:

The only means of maintaining confederation is to recognize that, within its sphere assigned to it by the constitution, each province is as independent of control by the federal Parliament as the latter is from control by the provincial legislatures.

That is what the grand old man of Liberalism said. The only means of maintaining confederation is, as he put it, not this kind of imposition on the legislatures by the federal Parliament. That is why we fear the termination of our system if this attempt is successful.

In the course of his lectures on April 10 and 11, 1980, Mr. Michael Kirby, who is now secretary to the cabinet for federal-provincial relations, said:

But for anyone who believes—as I do—that the process of decision-making in our kind of society is as important as the decision itself—that is, that means are in fact as important as ends to our society—then this was an important and imaginative experiment.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker: "that means are in fact as important as ends". That is what hon. members opposite forget. They are going ahead as though their ends justify everything and as if the means do not count. In his advice, Mr. Kirby forgets what he said in his own lectures.

An editorial in the Toronto Globe of July 3, 1869, stated as follows:

The danger most to be feared is that men who really do not believe in confederation at all should so seek to extend and consolidate the federal legislative and executive power that the local governments and legislatures shall be in danger of becoming mere shadows and shams, and that the evil from such a danger may lead to the opposite extreme of ignoring national unity, and in zeal for mere local interests and specialities, the breaking up of confederation altogether.

That is what they feared in those days, and that is what is happening today. It is what we fear.

The Prime Minister apparently wants to have his place in history. I should like to make one brief reference to the book "Newfoundland—Dawn Without Light", in which the author, Dr. Herbert L. Pottle, deals with the question of leaders who want their place in history. The relevant abstract reads as follows:

A political leader's preoccupation with his place in history is not a good omen for his enduring contribution to history. For a leader so engrossed has his attention constantly diverted from the basic business of governing—which can have historical significance—to the petty distractions of forever reckoning up his personal triumphs and setbacks—which is not history but diary.

That is what the Prime Minister is doing.

Let me deal with the Newfoundland situation now. There is nothing in this great resource concept of the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) and the Prime Minister that deals with offshore mineral resources at all. As a matter of fact, in his letter of October 20, the Leader of the New Democratic Party did not even mention the offshore resource question. He did not make that a condition because he does not care about eastern Canada. He does not care a bit.

What does the government leader in the Senate say about this? Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from the proceedings of the other place of yesterday, at page 909. When asked about this arrangement between the Leader of the NDP and the Prime Minister, the government leader in the Senate had this to say:

There is no deviation from the BNA Act. This statement in the letter from the Prime Minister flows from the BNA Act itself. It is a reconfirmation. It is a restatement of a right which is already enjoyed by the provinces.

So the Leader of the NDP has negotiated mightily and all he got was a reaffirmation of the BNA Act, which is being disregarded in this House in any event.

There is nothing for offshore resources and there is nothing for interprovincial movement of electricity. And the hon. minister opposite even had the gall to mention that. There is no action by this government to free Newfoundland from the tyranny and usurpation of their electricity by Quebec which refuses to let it flow through that province to other customers. There is nothing about that. You could drive a truck through the equalization clause in the so-called charter of human rights. There is no obligation on the government whatsoever with respect to equalization. This is the government—

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) on a point of order.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) entertain a very short question? It will not take much of his time. I realize he has a lot to say.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Tobin: Would the hon. member tell me what he and his government were doing for seven months about solving all these problems that he is accusing this government of not having solved? What were you doing for seven months, John? Writing that budget?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, we were recognizing the offshore mineral rights of the province of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: You were—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: What about this labour mobility, this terrible thing that the Newfoundland government is trying to do? The Minister of National Revenue said that the Newfoundland people have gone all over the world to work. Yes, Mr. Speaker, but that is not a freedom; it is because they have been forced out of their own island, out of their own province to get jobs because they cannot get them there. That is not a freedom. It is tyranny that men have to leave their families for six months, nine months or twelve months to go to the Yukon or Ontario or Quebec, or somewhere else in the world, to work because they cannot get work at home. That is why the Peckford government has got this regulation that applies only to the offshore. That is not freedom. But it is freedom we want in Newfoundland—freedom to grow and develop. That has been forgotten on the other side that has forgotten Newfoundland.

● (1710)

Here is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) referring to the premier of our province. He said this yesterday:

If he wants us to help, I think he should stop that kind of statement.

If that is not a threat, what is it? If the Premier of Newfoundland dare so much as to have his own opinions and to give his own views then this government here is going to punish him. This government here is not going to help Newfoundland because of statements made by Newfoundland's premier. I tell you we are not coming hat-in-hand and cap-in-hand to you crowd up here any longer. We are going to stand on our own feet. Our premier does not have to beg for help from you people here in the government. He is not going to beg for help. He is going to put forward his views on policy, the same as the Premier of Ontario, the Premier of Quebec and the premiers of the other provinces do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister of National Revenue is going to blame the regional disparity in Newfoundland on the Newfoundland government. I ask what has the minister's government done to help Newfoundland since it assumed office? It has not signed one DREE agreement. It has cut off the money flow to Newfoundland. It has reneged on the Trans-Canada highway agreement. It has stopped, for example, the little synchrolift in St. John's West. This is nothing but the tyranny of the majority attempting to bully us into keeping our mouths shut in Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Then we come to the Prime Minister and the Queen. I do not have time to go into this, but I tell you to read the threat the Prime Minister made with reference to the Queen in his press conference two weeks ago. The Prime Minister was asked why he had chosen to retain the British monarch as a symbol of the Canadian state. The answer given was this:

Well, because this evening we are not attempting to solve all the problems.

Ergo, the Queen is a problem. But she is not a problem to us in Newfoundland. But that will be the next step, to tamper with the monarchy, if the government is successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The amendment of the NDP is not even supported by the Premier of Saskatchewan. All he has is the right for Saskatchewan to impose indirect taxation. There is nothing that is conceivably of any use to any other province but weakened resource ownership and control in all the other provinces. There is nothing for the offshore. He has done nothing but humiliate his own party and his own members, and contradict what they said in this House.

We do not have time in 20 minutes to consider all of the constitutional issues. But this whole process and this amendment should not be going to England. It should have had unanimous consent here. If this government had only done what we had suggested yesterday should be done and left the rest to be done properly in Canada, all of us could have supported it. But instead it is going there in discord and disharmony. It is going with six provinces deadly opposed to it. The constitutional amendment is going there ignoring the courts of Canada and not waiting until they give a judgment on whether the process is legal or not. It is going without our support. We are going to fight it to the end. We are never going to stop fighting it. Is that the way to change and bring a new constitution to Canada? I do not think so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: And hon. members over there have put us in that position. Here is what the Prime Minister said in 1968:

If the underdevelopment of the Atlantic provinces is not corrected—not by charity or subsidies—

It is the charities and subsidies which the minister loves. The statement continues:

—but by helping them become areas of economic growth—then the unity of the country is almost assuredly destroyed as it would be by the French-English confrontation.

He has forgotten that now. We want to be an area of economic growth and we want to do that through the offshore. The Prime Minister stops that because he wants us to be dependent, waiting for his charity for the rest of our lives. We are not going to do it. That is the position in Newfoundland.

I want to move a suggested amendment under the provisions of Standing Order 5(a):

That the House continue its consideration of government motion No. 18 between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. this day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member intend to move his motion under the provisions of Standing Order 6(5)(a)?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

While you are considering that, Mr. Speaker, I will close on this note. Dr. Pottle in his book—

Mr. Collenette: Have you moved the motion? Did you say Standing Order 6(5)(a)?

Mr. Crosbie: I take my orders from the Chair, not from any Liberal parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member is proposing to move his motion under the provisions of Standing Order 6(5)(a).

Mr. Crosbie: Precisely.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks, I refer to Dr. Pottle's book which is very valuable. At page 199 he asked, of Canada:

What are those dreams, he queried quietly, of hope that leap to life in your fair land?

And further down the page we read this:

What do you hold supreme in unison? What is the good for which you stand on guard?

The good for which we stand on guard is not closure on the fundamental issue of the constitution. We do not stand on guard for the bullying of small provinces, underdeveloped provinces and poor provinces, because they dare to speak out. We do not stand on guard for that, and we do not agree with that. We do not stand on guard to change the whole nature of Canadian federalism without the consent of the provinces which help make up the 11 governments. We believe in 11 strong governments, not one super government and ten counties which the government can bully at will. We believe that that protects freedoms, and that is the only way freedoms will ever be protected.

We do not stand on guard for the referendum technique of the fascist states. They always have their referendums and they can get the people to agree to everything. We do not, and I do not, stand on guard for the despotism of an arrogant and unbending idealogue who is going to force this country to suit his tastes before he goes, he thinks. Well, he will suffer a lot of resistance on that.

I do not stand on guard for the use of polls and advertising which misinform the public and keep people's minds closed when they should be open. This is done not to help them understand the issue but to help them not to understand the issue. I do not stand on guard for that, and I feel shame for those who do. I do not stand on guard to use any means at all to keep ourselves in power. That is already obvious. We believe that a government has to work for the good of the people, not just to use every sleazy trick it can to stay in power and never accomplish anything. We do not stand on guard for that. We stand on guard for a Canada that has some democratic freedoms, and economic freedoms. We are not even free to enjoy property under the Prime Minister's new charter.

We believe that standing on guard means standing on guard for conciliation and compromise, for consent and for a confederation, not a unitary state with everything imposed on the rest, where a minister of justice—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Crosbie) agreed to.

● (1720)

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this extremely important debate on the future of our country. I am somewhat surprised at the comments made by the previous speaker, especially the impassioned rhetoric he used to make a review of the constitutional problems which our country is facing, problems which we have been considering for years.

I have been especially astonished by his intervention because, in my opinion, the process which will be launched with the passage of the resolution introduced by the government, that is adoption by both Houses, the House of Commons and the Senate, is indeed the ideal opportunity given to all governments in the country, federal and provincial, and to all Canadians to untangle the constitutional issue. And I know that this constitutional solution is a concern for most Canadians as well as for a great majority of members of this House, especially for those who were involved in the Quebec referendum.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, as we all remember, a commitment was made to get the constitutional revision under way as soon as possible, a process which has been going on for years and has always pitched headlong into a dead end, not necessarily because of ill will, but because of certains restrictions. We now have the possibility, by accepting this resolution, of launching that constitutional reform. As I said, those of us who were closely involved in the Quebec referendum promised to spare no effort in breaking out of the impasse and breaking new ground in the constitutional revision process. I am happy that the government should have taken steps to respect that promise by bringing in this resolution to the House and referring its study to a committee which, contrary to some of the remarks we heard here today, is not subject to closure, but will have every opportunity to question and hear Canadians who will doubtless have extremely interesting views on this resolution.

Why is it specious to oppose, unless it is for reasons of principles, the adoption of that resolution and the start of our renewed constitution? Indeed, it would be a matter of concern if the resolution infringed upon the fundamentals of the sharing of powers between the central and provincial governments. It would be upsetting if, in fact, the resolution contained provisions adding to the powers of the central government and reducing those of the provinces or, inversely diminishing those of the federal government and adding to those of the provinces. However, Mr. Speaker, a close look at the resolution will reveal that it does not alter in any way those fundamental powers, the sharing of powers between central and provincial governments. What it does is this: it prepares—

Mr. Clark: I am listening!

Mr. Bussières: Yes, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had better listen, because he does not seem to have understood. The resolution paves the way for patriating the constitution and that is important. As far as I know, this does not reduce in any way the power of the provinces or add anything to those of the central government. So the objective of the resolution is to patriate the constitution, to see to it that the most important document for Canadian political institutions, that is the constitution, become a truly Canadian instrument, to Canadianize the constitutional instrument governing the country. I think there is nothing outrageous in there, and the vast majority—

Mr. Clark: Bring back the constitutional document from London, England!

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, it has been a long time since the sophisms uttered by the Leader of the Opposition fail to impress me. He should realize that not only do they not impress Canadians but they make him look ridiculous.

We shall therefore begin by patriating the constitution. This makes the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) smile becaue he has never taken his role as a Canadian member of Parliament seriously. Does he really want Canadians to have a constitution? If so, let him support the resolution introduced by the government with the same energy he used to fight the Parti Québécois referendum. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, with this resolution, we shall be able to include a charter of rights in the Canadian constitution. Will the entrenchment of this charter of rights give more powers to the central government and take some away from the provinces?

The first aspect of the charter of rights concerns basic freedoms. We want to enshrine the freedom of conscience, the freedom of religion, the freedom of the press and the freedom of information in the constitution. The hon. member is showing that he is not very knowledgeable in this matter since the Canadian constitution does not provide for these freedoms. If we want to entrench these basic freedoms within the constitution, I do not see how this can add to the powers of the central government and what entrenchment of the freedom of religion, of thought, of the press and of information takes away from the provincial governments, since we also want to include in this charter of rights basic democratic rights, the right to vote and the right of eligibility to the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, what does the fact of entrenching these rights within the constitution add to the powers of the central government? Does the entrenchment of the right to vote, the right of eligibility, the right to hold elections within a certain time take anything away from the powers of the provinces? I do not believe that by enshrining these rights of the individuals, these basic liberties, these democratic rights, we are taking anything away from the provinces or adding anything to the powers of the central government.

Still within the context of this charter of rights, there is the freedom to move and to settle down anywhere in Canada for all Canadian citizens. Once again, this individual right of a Canadian citizen adds nothing to the powers of the central government and takes nothing away from the powers of the provincial governments. The same is true of the legal guarantees of citizens, and non-discrimination. What is also extremely interesting is that the equal status of the French and English languages everywhere in Canada will be enshrined in the constitution.

Mr. La Salle: Where numbers warrant!

Mr. Bussières: And I hear, Mr. Speaker, like a heart-felt cry coming from the hon. member for Joliette, the bitter comment of the Quebec premier, "where numbers warrant." There is nothing disgraceful, Mr. Speaker, in the fact that equality of rights is guaranteed, adding "where numbers warrant"—

Mr. La Salle: Repeat that.

Mr. Bussières: —for some school services and so on. It is not disgraceful. It comes to adding, Mr. Speaker, and to indicating for the first time in Canadian history, the equality of rights of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. And I am proud to see that our government provides all hon. members with the opportunity to give their views on this fundamental equality of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, in a third step, we shall establish the principle of sharing, of equalization. What makes our country interesting is its wealth, reflected as it is in its diversity first, namely the make-up of the population itself. Diversity in respect of geography, which shows that throughout history there has been a displacement of wealth from one area to another, that some regions at some point in our history went through periods of wealth, and it is the foundation of our federalism that when these regions went through a period of wealth they shared it with other regions. And we realize, we get the obvious feeling these years, especially since the energy crisis, that that wealth was displaced from a region or regions to other ones, and as our history unfolds, sharing is to the benefit of other provinces that at some earlier point also had to share with others.

By enshrining into our constitution that basic principle of wealth-sharing, and solemnly reaffirming in a constitutional document one of the principles behind our Canadian federalism, I fail to see how we could be detracting powers from the provinces and adding to central powers. What we are doing in fact is recognizing what has kept this country united, the generosity of Canadians, and reaffirming a solemn commitment in the constitution that such a bond will be maintained and strengthened by all governments.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in a last step, we give ourselves an amendment mechanism, a deadlock-breaking mechanism. Over these last 50 years we have gone through many attempts at constitutional negotiations. We realize it was not always easy to come to unanimity rules, we also realize the danger in unanimity rules. The danger is not to err but to do nothing, procrastinate and never progress. In order to avoid any recurrence of such deadlocks, there is provision for a deadlock-breaking mechanism.

As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, I am especially happy that the Canadian government allows this House and the Senate, by addressing this resolution, to break the deadlock of constitutional reform.

We have had tensions, we shall certainly have more in our country, but as we become able first to Canadianize our institutions, keep improving the way the various powers are used in our country, we shall have ever more chance of meeting more and more pressing requirements of the people who want a new constitution. Moreover, I am convinced that after the committee study and after the debate that will follow its report, we shall be able to proceed as quickly as possible to the patriation, to the entrenchment of a charter of rights into our constitution. We shall also be able to recognize equalization as the underlying principle of Canadian federalism and give ourselves an amending formula. Thus we shall have honoured the commitments we made to the majority of Quebeckers who voted yes to the Canadian federation and to the renewal of the federation.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I feel grateful to be speaking in this debate. It is sad that a member should feel grateful that he is able to speak in a debate in the House, but I am pleased I was able to get in before the Liberals cut us all off at one o'clock tomorrow morning. I would like to express my appreciation to my colleagues, many of whom are not permitted to speak on this resolution and who are going to be deprived of their opportunities as members of Parliament to participate in the debate, thanks to the peculiar notions the Liberals have about what is fair debate in the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

Today we are under closure, which was brought in last night. I would like to comment a bit about that. Unusual as it is, this is the third time in our history that we have been gagged in this fashion. I am astonished at the New Democratic Party—with the word "democratic" in its name—for having raised no objection to closure yesterday. Today, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the New Democratic Party brought in the most irrelevant possible motions which made no mention of our having to operate today under closure.

Again during the question period members of the New Democratic Party raised no objections to closure on an important item like this. I can hardly believe it.

Mr. Orlikow: Did we not vote against it?

Mr. McKinnon: They will probably vote against it.

Mr. Orlikow: We did vote against it.

Mr. McKinnon: They did vote against it, but they are there when the Liberals need them. The Liberals can always count on them. There was once a movie, and I believe it was Lauren Bacall who said to Humphrey Bogart, "If you need me, just whistle." That is all the Liberals need to do, and members of the New Democratic Party will come. They do not have to be paid; they do not have to be given position; just whistle, and they will be there if they are needed, and members of the Liberal party know it.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and "simple Simon" came to an agreement as to what would be a suitable exchange for the loyalty of the members of the New Democratic Party at this time. As I understand the letter I read, there were three items. Mainly the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) was able to assure himself that not much would be taken away from the provinces, seeing that the provinces already own the resources, and that they would be given management and control while the ownership was taken away from them. To my mind, I would prefer ownership if I had a choice between owning something or managing and controlling it.

As I walked this morning and puzzled over how the Leader of the New Democratic Party could do it, I could think only of the poor provinces which are to gain nothing. Instead of Mr. Blakeney's dealing in the highly intelligent and forceful manner he does in negotiations with the Prime Minister, simple Simon went instead.

We heard much today from the Prime Minister about the necessity for this drastic measure because the matter has been discussed for 53 years. While he shed his crocodile tears here about the discussions he has gone through and the trouble he has seen, I was thinking about an article which appeared in 1971 written by the journalist Peter Ward. This is what the Prime Minister had to say about the charter in those days, and Peter Ward quoted the Prime Minister at that time:

> Constitutional reform is something Canada can live without. A fact demonstrated by all the premiers at the series of conferences, said Mr. Trudeau. He reminded Toronto newsmen that in 1967 at the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, he had opposed tackling constitutional reform.

"I said if we opened the constitution, it would be a can of worms and we were going to have more trouble than is obvious to those who are sailing into it with light hearts.

"I said we had more important things to do."

Constitutional reform is not an issue that is important to the people, but is a "good whipping boy for a lot of the nationalists," he said.

The Prime Minister now claims that we have worked hard for 53 years to get our constitution back, but that is what he was actually saying in those days. This is also reflected in Hansard for January 26, 1970, at page 2812. The Prime Minister said, and I quote:

I, personally, went on record as saying that of all the urgent problems facing Canada, in my view the constitution had lowest priority.

Today for the third time in history he invokes closure in this Parliament to make sure we do not have an opportunity to look at this, and he tries to wrap himself in the flag of patriotism by saying that he has been on this beat, or that there has been an ongoing debate for 53 years. If there has been, he has been on the wrong side of it.

Let us leave the sorry spectacle of what has been happening in the last few days and go on to the real problems with the constitution. We are in a debate on the constitution, and while we are being asked to vote on the patriation resolution, this almost mundane term, in fact, connotes far more. The resolution with which Parliament has been presented is, in fact, a fundamental constitutional assertion. It proposes a new amending formula, seeks to entrench certain linguistic and economic rights, and sets out certain rules within which Parliament will operate.

All of this should mean that we have gathered here for a profound and thoughtful debate, and yet there is a pervasive rancour in the House and in the proceedings here. It is with unhappiness that I contrast the spirit in the land today with George Brown's assessment of the original confederation debates. As you will recall, George Brown was the Liberal opposite number of John A. Macdonald in those days. George Brown said:

Have we not then, Mr. Speaker, great cause of thankfulness that we have found a better way for the solution of our troubles than that which has entailed in other countries such deplorable results? And should not every one of us endeavour to rise to the magnitude of the occasion, and earnestly seek to deal with this question to the end, in the same candid and conciliatory spirit in which, so far, it has been discussed?

I wish that today's national debate also displayed such a candid and conciliatory spirit. Yesterday we had the example of this party putting its policy on the line in the form of a motion in an opposition day, that the constitution be patriated at once and that it be subject from then on only to Canadian amendments, made in Canada for Canadians.

Where does this national rancour that I mentioned come from? I believe that the answer to that question lies here in what the House is being asked to pass. Parliament is not being requested to participate in the formation of federal proposals, nor is it being asked to decide upon an agreement worked out between Ottawa and the provinces. It is being told, instead, to confirm an individual's ultimatum. This has caused the unease here as well as the evident concern displayed by many of the provinces.

The document with which we have been presented is not the product of confederal deliberations. Rather, while dealing with the federal nature of Canada, its genesis is clearly the almost solitary deliberations of this Liberal Prime Minister.

This fact concerns me for several reasons. First, this unilateral action to impose, in addition to a new amendment procedure, a bundle of other major changes to the constitutional order of this country, is being undertaken without the assent of the provinces. On this matter I will quote my leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who succinctly summarized the situation in his initial response to these proposals when he said of the Prime Minister:

He imposes a double standard for changing the constitution. For those changes he wants, Ottawa will act alone. For the changes that others might seek later, he requires unanimous consent for at least two years and then an unknown formula.

This flies in the face of this country's legal and constitutional practice and, indeed, takes on aspects usually seen only in a unitary state, not in a federation. On this matter I should like to quote A. V. Dicey from his "An Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution." It reads as follows:

The law of the constitution must be either legally immutable, or else capable of being changed only by some authority above and beyond the ordinary legislative bodies, whether federal or state legislatures, existing under the constitution—

It is, at any rate, certain that whenever the founders of a federal government hold the maintenance of a federal system to be of primary importance, supreme legislative power cannot be safely vested in any legislature acting under the constitution. For so to vest legislative sovereignty would be inconsistent with the aim of federalism, namely, the permanent division between the spheres of the national government and of the several states.

I should like to quote again the Prime Minister from the Debates in 1976 when he was speaking to the House about the patriation of the constitution. He said:

It is for these reasons that I have raised the possibility that Parliament might seek to have "patriation" accomplished without provincial consent if that consent seems impossible to achieve. Clearly it would be a last resort and clearly it should not be on a basis that could affect the distribution of powers or the position of the provinces.

That is exactly the opposite of what he is doing today. He went on to say:

It must not provide any means by which Parliament could act unilaterally in future in any area where it cannot do so today since that would erode the essence of our federal system.

That is from page 12687 of Hansard of April 9, 1976. Yet is not this the precise effect of the resolution before us: to affect profoundly the nature of Canadian government as the result of unilateral action of just such an ordinary legislative body?

My second major concern with the form in which the constitutional changes are proposed lies in the procedures of its proposed passage through this House. It seems that the House is to be denied the right to make any substantive amendments to the Prime Minister's proposals. While not wishing to dwell overly on the specific defects of this legislation, does not section 41, for example, deserve being debated and voted upon, considering that it entirely removes one province from the constitutional process by rendering irrelevant its legislature's vote on any future amendments?

The House is to be deprived of the right to amend substantively and, instead, a committee is to deal with the issues, with no guarantee of their ability to change matters of substance.

On the respect for Parliament and the people of Canada displayed by this procedure, I will quote from a less exalted source than those I have been using, namely, from the infamous memo to cabinet from the Prime Minister's constitutional advisers. It reads:

A highly contentious measure may be best contained in a committee where it is more readily managed by the House leaders and his officers, and where easier and more effective relations can be maintained with the press gallery, since relatively few reporters will follow the proceedings.

So members of Parliament are to be dealt with in the arena in which they can most easily be managed, in committee, while press relations are to be based on lack of knowledge. Such a procedure can only result in substantial bitterness as well as real cynicism about the commitment of the current government to the fundamental tenets of democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: The faith of the citizens in the justice and merits of these changes in the constitutional order will depend, in large part, upon the way in which they are seen to be done. This brings me to an area of broad concern with these procedures: the general spirit in which things are being done and the way in which the changes will be perceived.

I spoke earlier about a feeling of rancour and distrust, and that is surely what will result from the actions taken yesterday and today in voting closure. While it is unfortunate that such unpleasantness is developing over any government action, it is a threat to the nature of politics when it develops over constitutional matters. While constitutional change does not require social unanimity, successful change surely requires the broadest possible consensus that the procedures were fair. On this topic I should like to quote from the classics, not from Machiavelli so in vogue in some quarters of the House, but from Aristotle, who said:

Legislators would therefore direct their attention to the causes which lead to the preservation and the destruction of constitutions and on that basis they should devote their efforts to the construction of stability. They must be on their guard against all the elements of destruction, they must leave their state with a body of laws, customary as well as enacted.

It is precisely this latter element of stability—the customary body of laws and procedures—to which this resolution does violence and which puts at risk the social consent on which the constitution ultimately depends.

On this matter I will use another quotation, this time from Bagehot's study, "The British Constitution." It reads:

There are two great objects which every constitution must attain to be successful, which every old and celebrated one must have wonderfully achieved: Every constitution must first gain authority, and then use authority; it must first win the loyalty and confidence of mankind, and then employ that homage in the work of government.

● (1750)

In seeking to use authority in the form which he alone desires, I fear the Prime Minister may forget the loyalty and confidence upon which it must be based. This House must look with foreboding on this possibility.

Thus far in this debate I have concentrated upon the grave defects in the way in which the Prime Minister wishes to have the constitution patriated and amended. While these procedural considerations are clearly the most important ones, for they affect the spirit of the constitution, there are in addition substantive problems with some of the changes being proposed. I will now turn to those specific defects.

To begin with, I should like to look at section 42 of the resolution. In this formula for future amendments, the government is proposing radical changes in the nature of constitutional government. While the use of a referendum is itself new, the really radical departure from current practice lies in the complete circumvention of the provinces. Before this, any change which affected provincial governments had to involve those governments in the decision. Section 42 would see the federal government appealing directly to the people over the heads of the provinces. Not only would the federal Parliament—and particularly in times of majority government, that means one political party—decide upon the issue and the wording of any plebiscite, but section 46(1) gives the federal government the power to set all the rules for the conduct of any debate or campaign on the question that was to be posed.

The Prime Minister says this will only be applied in case of deadlock, but to him deadlock is when he has one viewpoint and the ten premiers have another. It never enters his mind that the ten premiers might be right and that he could be wrong.

While this power to make the rules under which any campaign would be conducted is an obvious example of the federal government's self-created monopoly on initiating and controlling constitutional change under section 42, a more fundamental source of control lies in its power to choose the substance and wording of any referendum. This gives the federal government all of the initiative.

To understand the consequences of this, consider a case in which the federal government, with or without the support of the bulk of the provinces, wanted a particular amendment but faced adamant opposition from enough provinces to block amendments under the provisions of section 41. In this case the federal government would be able to circumvent the provincial opposition and go directly to a referendum with a question phrased to its liking, at a time of its choosing, with the rules it selects, and as we now know, with an unlimited advertising budget paid by the taxpayer.

Now consider the converse case where there is extensive or even unanimous provincial agreement on a proposed change which faces opposition from Ottawa. In this case there is no recourse for the provinces; the federal government would retain an absolute veto. This asymmetry in the position of federal and provincial governments when it comes to amending the constitution would surely be a continuing source of contention within the Canadian confederation. As the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said of the referendum this section establishes, "it denies the basic partnership and the basic essence of federalism."

In addition to the opposition this proposal is bound to meet, there is certain to be provincial dissatisfaction at the agglomeration of proposals made in this resolution. It must be remembered that this is not a seamless whole, a system of mutually necessary provisions for the realization of a specific objective. Instead, it is the embodiment of several disjointed policy thrusts of the current Liberal government.

There is, to be sure, a portion which patriates the constitution and as a necessarily concomitant provision provides an amending formula, although I might add paranthetically, with one amending formula never discussed with the provinces and another which, while masquerading as the Victoria charter formula, differs radically in that it entirely disenfranchises Prince Edward Island.

To this set of patriation proposals has been added a series of other packages including political, economic, and legal rights, the formal institutionalization of first ministers' conferences, the entrenchment of a limited policy of official bilingualism, and some minority language education rights. This melange is no coherent corpus on which any patriation must rest, rather it represents the Prime Minister's solitary vision of what is good for the nation, what he feels he must impose.

In his remarks accompanying the release of the resolution, the Prime Minister said in criticism of the provinces:

> We were led by the dictates of unanimity to bargain freedom against fish, fundamental rights against oil, the independence of our country against long-distance telephone rates.

Yet, leaving aside the overblown rhetoric, is this not essentially what his ultimatum to this House represents? Is he not saying, "You can patriate the constitution but only on my terms?" To use his phrase, is this not bargaining the independence of our country against an idiosyncratic vision of what rights should be entrenched?

I suggest to the Prime Minister that accord is not impossible. The Leader of the Opposition has detailed in his motion yesterday a way in which it could be achieved. The constitution can be patriated with an amending formula. Then amendments supported by either a province or the federal government can be proposed, considered, and adopted if they meet the requirements for amendments. By setting Ottawa's desired goals on equal footing with those of the provinces, the mutual respect and independence between levels of government necessary for the well-functioning continuation of any confederation can be realized.

Madam Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

I am now ready to rule on the amendment offered by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), which reads as follows:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph and substituting therefor the following:
> "That the committee submit its report not later than February 12, 1981;
> That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;
> That the committee be empowered to retain the services of advisers to assist in its work; and that it also be empowered to retain such professional, clerical and stenographic help as may be required;

I find the first part of the amendment acceptable, namely, the change of the date by which the committee will report back to the House, from December 9, 1980, to February 12, 1981.

However, the other two elements of the amendment cause some difficulty because they seek to extend the order of reference of the committee which can be done by means of an instruction to the committee, but not by an amendment to the motion to establish the committee. I refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citations 621(3), 756 and 759, among others.

I would suggest to the hon. member that if he were prepared to delete the second and third propositions from his amendment, I would be prepared to propose the question on the first part, namely:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph and substituting the following therefor:
> "That the committee submit its report not later than February 12, 1981."

Mr. McCain: I respect the ruling of Madam Speaker and accept your suggestion that the last paragraph should be deleted and that the amendment should refer only to the date of February 12, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Therefore it is moved by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

> That the motion be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph and substituting the following therefor:
> "That the committee submit its report not later than February 12, 1981".

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Now that Madam Speaker has found the amendment to be in order, I should like to speak to it before there is a vote upon it. I think the amendment is highly essential to the successful rescuing of any remnants of propriety to this debate. I regret that the narrow language of the rules under which we operate did not allow the admissibility of the other sections, because what this party wants to do is ensure that even though a gag has been put on the mouth of the House of Commons it will not be possible to put so restrictive and confining a gag on the committee proceedings, which we are now forced to move.

There has been, by the imposition of closure by this government, a very deep abuse of the privileges of the House of Commons, and the privileges of all Canadians who are served and represented here. My hon. friend from Victoria has indicated this is the third time in history—the third time in history—that this measure has been used. And was it used on some minor, niggling question, some matter of no moment to the people of Canada? No. This extraordinary measure to limit the ability of Parliament to speak, this measure of closure, is being used on the debate of the constitution of Canada itself. That is an absolute abuse of the power of a majority in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I say this deliberately, if there were more members with the kind of courage their electors thought they had when they sent them to the House of Commons, this motion would not have passed and we would not be operating under the rules of closure here today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I must also say, Mr. Speaker, that unfortunately in this debate so far—in the 24 hours plus of debate that we have had on this question—the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has demonstrated his respect for Parliament and his interest, his interest, in the constitutional question. He urged members of Parliament from all parties to debate, and then he took away their opportunity to debate by slapping a muzzle on the mouths of the elected representatives of the House of Commons and then he, himself, declined to come before the House. Why was that? I suspect it was because he is ashamed of the measure which he is bringing in here, as every other member of his party should be ashamed. What they are trying to do in the name of reforming the Constitution of Canada is to force upon the people of Canada, by going to Britain, proposals which they are not confident the people of Canada themselves would accept if they went to the people.

An hon. Member: That is not correct.

Mr. Clark: Some otherwise silent Liberal backbencher who has voted here for closure, voted to muzzle Parliament, says that is not true. If it is not true, why is the Government of Canada running to Britain with questions which should be decided here in the Canadian House of Commons? Why do you not trust the people of Canada? Why do you hide out in Westminster?

Let me refer also to the attitude of the NDP, as my colleague earlier did, toward the question of closure. The Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) yesterday, after closure was announced by the government House leader, had an opportunity to stand in his place and speak. He mentioned the word "closure" once. He mentioned it in passing. The word passed his lips. But there was no objection by the NDP to closure. There was no objection taken on the floor of the House of Commons to the muzzling of Parliament on a matter of fundamental concern and fundamental interest to the people of this country—for the third time in the history of Canada. We do not know what the price was. We do not know what went on in those discussions between the Leader of the NDP, that Neville Chamberlain of Canadian politics, and the Prime Minister of Canada. Clearly, whatever it was, it bought the silence of the NDP and they did not even stand in their places yesterday to oppose the imposition of closure, to oppose the attempt by the Government of Canada to muzzle debate on the fundamental law of the land in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, by their actions in the last 24 hours the government have demonstrated what some of us previously had only feared—that there is no willingness at all on the part of the Prime Minister, his ministers or, apparently, his supporters on both sides of this House of Commons, to engage in meaningful parliamentary debate on the constitutional resolution. The Prime Minister, after stating last October 2 that Parliament would return early to begin debate on this matter, after demanding that all the members of the House participate, said "Every member of Parliament from every corner of this land is asked to participate in this historic act." Now, after only 24 hours of debate involving less than one-fifth of the members of this chamber, we are faced with closure.

This is an extraordinary situation that the Liberal party has imposed upon the House of Commons today, a deep abuse of this institution. Such a move, such a gagging of the members of this institution, should not be undertaken lightly. Indeed, we know that the advice of even the most cynical of the Prime Minister's advisers indicated that, in the words of the famous leaked memorandum, that has guided their every action since Herb Gray broke his word about resigning if interest rates went up—that famous leaked memorandum said:

It would be almost unthinkable to use time allocation (closure) on a resolution calling for patriation of the constitution.

That is what the leaked memorandum said—"almost unthinkable". Yet the unthinkable has happened. Further, by his stubborn adherence to a December 9 deadline for committee consideration, the government of the Prime Minister is determined to use every parliamentary device, every cynical means of manipulation to thwart parliamentary public debate.

I hope that the government will accept the amendment that is put forward here so that there will be an opportunity for this Parliament to consider this matter without having a gun to its head, so that there will be an opportunity for the members of the House of Commons to take this question across the country.

The other day we asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) whether there would be an opportunity to travel. We asked the Prime Minister this question again today. In declining to answer, they both indicated that they wanted to keep the committee here. Well, why should the constitution of Canada be confined to a discussion in the city of Ottawa? I see the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain) is here. Why should not the people of Niagara Falls have an opportunity to express their concerns about the constitution of their country in their city? Why, if they are worried about it, should they have to come here?

I see members of Parliament here from Toronto. Why should Liberal members of Parliament from Toronto put up with a provision which says that a committee considering the Constitution of Canada will hold its deliberations only here? Indeed, there is a chairman of a committee from Toronto here.

His committee has the right to travel. It is considering the problems of the handicapped. Why, if the people of Canada are allowed to be heard on the problems of the handicapped, should they not be allowed to be heard on the question of the basic law of the land? Why is the attempt being made to limit that debate to this city?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I say simply, in passing, that there are two regions in particular where this refusal to have the committee travel would be deeply dangerous. It would be deeply dangerous in Atlantic Canada because, as my hon. friend from Hillsborough has indicated, this proposal would wipe out to all intents and purposes the influence of the province of Prince Edward Island. Indeed, it proposes to confer upon other provinces in Atlantic Canada a second-class status. It proposes to smuggle through a reference to equalization that is a most inadequate reference. And the people of that region, people who do not have the money to travel to Ottawa to make their views known on the constitution, should not be forced to remain silent because they cannot afford to come to speak to their Parliament about their constitution. They should have the right to have their constitution debated in their region. And the same is true for the west. I will return to the west in a moment because I am deeply concerned about what is happening now in western Canada as a result of various initiatives of this government.

In the west, in particular, there have been dramatic and dangerous changes in attitude toward this Canadian confederation. In the last eight to nine months there has been a dangerous development of feeling against the country developing in that region. Liberal members of Parliament, I believe, who voted for closure would not support that measure if they had the opportunity to hear directly from the people of western Canada some of the concerns that are on the minds of the people in western Canada. I say to my colleagues in the House of Commons who come from other parts of the country that they owe it to their country, they owe it to the ability of their country to continue, not to sit here in splended isolation in Ottawa. But they should travel so that they can hear first-hand the advice of concerned Canadians who are now falling victim, falling prey to the siren song of separatism because of the actions that have been taken by this government.

Before you aggravate that situation, those of you who come from other parts of Canada, who are members of a majority government which has no seats in half of the geographic land mass of this country, you owe it to your country and to yourselves to go out and hear what the people of western Canada have to say about the constitutional proposal. What we need is parliamentary public debate here in the House of Commons and across the country.

We have been denied that debate in the House of Commons but we should not put unreasonable, destructive limits upon the committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which will consider this matter because if we gag that body, if we allow the manipulative work of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) to affect opinion across the country, and if we leave it to propaganda and leave the truth aside, then we are dealing very seriously with possible ruptures in our country. I say to members of this House of Commons, from whatever corner they may come, you should not be prepared to allow your blind loyalty to your leader to force you to take actions which might rend this country.

I had harsh words a moment ago for members of the New Democratic Party. I will certainly amend them in one case. I am delighted to learn that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) announced this afternoon that he will be opposing the Liberal government's motion to send the proposed constitutional package to committee. I see that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is in the House of Commons. I heard him speak on section 42, and he believes that it would be destructive to the nation. I would hope that he will find in his heart that it is his duty to act as his colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby, did, and stand against this attempt to ramrod through the House of Commons and into a controlled committee the discussion of the nation's future.

The amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), is one further attempt by my party to open up the process so that the people of Canada can be heard and can study the issue. Yesterday we gave this House of Commons the opportunity to end some of the bitterness and to achieve some of the goals that surround this debate. The goal is to get our constitution home. Yesterday, we provided a means to allow Parliament to vote to bring it home. The Liberal party and the NDP voted against bringing our constitution home. We wanted our constitution home in a way that we could work with it in an atmosphere that would be constructive.

Instead, as my colleague from Victoria has said, we run the risk of an atmosphere that is deeply divisive. As he said, a constitution is not simply a piece of law, a constitution reflects the mentality and the essence of a country. This government by its actions and by acquiescing to closure is poisoning the atmosphere of this country, and we will not have a solid constitution emerge from a poisoned country.

We want the committee's considerations to be open. We want it to travel, and we hope that there will be a willingness on the part of the Liberal members, as there is in the NDP and in our party, to have television and radio in that committee. We hope that the Prime Minister will not try to hide the discussions on the constitutional package from the people of Canada. Indeed, had it been in order—unfortunately it is not because of the narrow range of our rules—we would have allowed the House of Commons the right to vote upon having television and radio in committee so that the people of Canada could know what is being proposed.

The reason that closure is upon this House is very simple. The Government of Canada does not want the people of Canada to know what it is proposing to do with the constitution. The reason that closure was rushed in so quickly, at a time when there have been more government members speak than members of the official opposition, is that the Liberal party with its pollsters—and it is a government not of principles but of pollsters—found out that public opinion is changing. It is changing because people are finding out what is at issue here.

They understand that the propaganda put out by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism is false. What is at issue here is not simple patriation. If patriation were the question, the Liberal party would have voted for patriation yesterday instead of against it. The people of Canada are becoming more aware with each day's debate of some of the issues. My colleague from Rosedale dramatically indicated the other day some of the problems for individuals, native people, women, other individuals and groups in the country that might be affected by affirmative action, a wide range of Canadians whose interests are directly threatened by this piece of legislation.

It is no wonder that the government do not want the matter debated in public. They are ashamed and they do not want people to know what they are proposing, so they try to hide it. That is why we have closure here. We believe that instead of having closure and limiting this debate, there should be an opportunity for the people of Canada to know what is going on. This is why there should not be artificial limitation put upon the time of that committee to sit, why there should be an opportunity for television and radio to be present, and why there should be an opportunity for the committee to travel across the country.

Let the committee go to Newfoundland and see how badly the people there are being served by the Liberal members from that province, who trust their citizens so little that they do not want them to know what the Government of Canada is proposing. Let them go to western Canada and across this country. Let them go into Quebec and ask the people there directly whether or not they believe this proposal serves the interests of federalism or the interests of separatism. We have one response to that question. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) is quoted in the October 23 issue of the Toronto Star. In the news article he indicates why he opposes the proposal put forth by his government. He said:

> I want English Canada to know this commitment . . . is not what we promised Quebeckers during the referendum.
> According to the public opinion polls, a majority of Quebeckers want a substantive change—not just a cosmetic change to our federal system.
> What we're doing now is an indication that the federal government is not really interested in a profound reform of our federal system.
> I think that what we are doing now . . . we're in the process of giving the Parti Québecois another term of office.

Those are the words of the Liberal member of Parliament for Montmorency who had the courage to stand in his place and speak what he believes, rather than accepting the muzzle of his leader. Where, I wonder, are the other Liberal members of Parliament? What kind of sheep are they that they sit in fear of their leader, rather than speaking to the interests of their constituents and their provinces?

The Constitution

Yesterday in Quebec City the Prime Minister, while his minister was acting to stop debate in Parliament, again accused provincial premiers who oppose his resolution of siding with René Lévesque.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are pointing at your watch, and I believe that I have about two minutes left.

The Prime Minister's argument is that if you are not with him then you are against Canada. That is a familiar argument of the Prime Minister, although it is a little bit more difficult to make now that he wants Britain to decide questions which most of us want Canada to decide. But his prophecy is true. Mr. Lévesque embraced separatism in Quebec partly in reaction to the rigid, stubborn attitude of this government, and now other individuals in other parts of Canada are being driven by the Liberal government toward separation.

The Liberal government which presided over the growth of separatism in Quebec is creating the conditions for separatism in western Canada. I would draw to the attention of hon. members a speech made last night in the other place by a former premier and a dedicated federalist, Senator Ernest Manning, who said:

> I am deeply troubled by the large number of serious-minded responsible people in western Canada who a year ago would have rejected the idea of separation out of hand, but who are now joining or supporting organizations advocating that the west separate. Such organizations are attracting members and fringe supporters not by hundreds but by thousands. It would be a grave mistake for the federal government to ignore the potential danger to Canada inherent in such trends.

I implore members of this House of Commons not to ignore the attitudes that are growing in western Canada and elsewhere in the country, and not to ignore the seeds of disunity that this government has sown. I urge the government, if they must resort to this unforgivable mechanism of closure, if they must muzzle Parliament, at least to let the committee of Parliament do its work. Let it have time to study. Let it carry through, as the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte suggested, until February 12. Let the television cameras and radio be present so that people will know what is being discussed. Let Claude Ryan and others come to that committee and let them speak freely and fully about the damage this measure will do to their part of Canada. Let the committee do its work. Do not muzzle the committee as the House of Commons has been muzzled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering an amendment to the main motion, an amendment aimed at delaying till February next the report of the joint committee of the House and the Senate dealing with the resolution on the Canadian constitution.

Before I deal with the matter, I know quite well that hon. members will guess that the subject which I will try to develop is very clear to me but before dealing with it, I would like to ask the former prime minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), to be careful when he misleadingly suggests that the constitutional amendments proposed by Parliament and the government will be altered or redrafted by the British government.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is absolutely incorrect and he knows it as well as all other members do.

I think, therefore, that on this point the Leader of the Opposition should be corrected.

Moreover, he stated that yesterday we voted against the patriation of the constitution, which is not correct. Hon. members on the government side voted yesterday on the patriation of the constitution and the Vanvouver formula, a formula which is unacceptable to people like me and to all hon. members on this side of the House.

When the former prime minister, therefore—

An hon. Member: Temporary.

Mr. Gauthier: —yes, temporary, for a six-month period—when the Leader of the Opposition makes such a statement—I know him as a man who is honest most of the time—he knows that this is not correct, I can only assume that it is fully partisan and directed at the electorate.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to this debate and I feel that this resolution is extremely important for Francophone members born and living outside Quebec—they are few and far between in the House. The proposed resolution is extremely important, because we would no longer operate under the supremacy of our provincial governments, but rather under the rule of a constitution with our rights entrenched and protected by a court of justice, which we hope will demonstrate as much generosity and enlightenment as those we have enjoyed for several years.

Still, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with two different concepts, one of which is the concept expounded by several Progressive Conservative members and which upholds the supremacy of Parliament. Personally, I agree with those who firmly believe that today, after 113 years, it is time for us to effect this change and to entrench our rights in the constitution and then move to the other aspect which I stand for, that is judicial supremacy. And in the course of my remarks I will try to demonstrate why today minorities in Canada, linguistic minorities not only outside Quebec but within Quebec as well, support and back fully this resolution which aims at enshrining within the constitution the rights of minorities. If I were to put a title on my speech, Mr. Speaker, I would say that minorities need more rights and more power than majorities do. This would be the title of my remarks because to anyone wondering what promises of success any constitutional resolution may hold I would say that the most fundamental matter is the entrenchment of a charter of rights and liberties, including language rights. In my opinion, any country must be defined from this basis.

Therefore it seems to me, and it is not a surprise to hon. members, that I linger over this vision, over this popular concept, we want to establish the independence of our country and in a move of pride and fairness, we want not only to patriate the Constitution in Canada but also to include the fundamental and individual rights, including some linguistic rights.

As a matter of fact, minorities need more rights than majorities. The latter protect themselves naturally because of their number, their political influence, and the environment they create. Within the time allocated to me I shall try to demonstrate why we should act today and enshrine linguistic rights of minorities and of all Canadians. In the present system, those fundamental and individual rights are under the jurisdiction of Parliament, which means they depend to a large extent on legislative action, whether under the principle of the supremacy of law or through common law and some other texts which govern us. The constitutional bill of 1980 proposes to change this system and replace it by the enshrinement of rights, which of course favours the principle of judicial supremacy. There rights, I repeat, cannot be changed or circumvented by an amendment to the constitution, a procedure which is more difficult than the mere passing of an ordinary law.

Mr. Speaker, I am among those who believe that, after 113 years, parliamentary supremacy over rights and freedoms, including language rights, must be replaced by the entrenchment of those rights and freedoms in the constitution, including language rights, in order to guarantee and protect those rights. It is fairly easy to explain why minority groups have tended to support the supremacy of the courts. The reasons underlying that support are historical and confirm the experience several of us have had. Indeed I will give several examples.

I support the entrenchment of fundamental rights because, in my opinion, it provides greater assurance and therefore greater protection against possible abuses by governments and majorities. Besides, most major democratic countries have already acted in that direction. A charter of individual rights and freedoms is the most common aspect of all federations in the world. The European Community, for example, to which England, France, and other countries belong, is bound by the European Convention on Human Rights and by the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. Finally, Mr. Speaker, who can deny the educational and moral value of entrenching human rights in a constitution.

I also endorse the proposal to include in the constitution the right to education in the minority language. This will, of course, surprise no one. This will guarantee Canadians the right to educate their children in their mother tongue, where numbers warrant. It is not exaggerated to say that Franco-

Ontarians have suffered greatly from this concept of where numbers warrant. I speak from experience because I have spent 11 years on schools boards, from 1961 to 1972, trying to make local and provincial authorities understand the grounds for a French-language high school system financed by the Ontario treasury.

We have won a few battles, but we are still far from having the homogeneous French school system we want and hope to have one day. If minority rights had been entrenched in the constitution, we would have reached our goal more quickly. We are constantly in danger of being assimilated by the majority group. It has sometimes been only through our individual will and collective determination that we have been able to hope to survive as French-speaking Canadians. Once again, Mr. Speaker, if minority rights had been entrenched, we would have been able to remain more numerous. Individually, French Canadians have survived only because of their persistent fighting spirit. They have been attacked from all sides, and sometimes, they were able to survive because they were attacked. When you are ignored, you die, but when you are attacked, if you have courage, you defend yourself, and this is what we did. Mr. Speaker, a minority needs more rights than the majority. I am disappointed to note that he has left, but in any case, I was very disappointed last Tuesday to hear the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) lecture French minorities outside Quebec about language rights. I was surprised and saddened that this Francophone member of Parliament would give us the classical argument of majorities concerning entrenchment of rights in the constitution, and I quote:

—as these rights are very closely related to the provincial jurisdiction over education, I do not see why it should be urgent or necessary to enshrine them in the constitution at the risk of giving rise to quarrels like those the past generations have known.

That is certainly the hon. member for Joliette speaking! When a French minority in another province asks for the concrete and practical means to survive, it is told that it must absolutely not provoke conflicts and frictions within the community. It is all right to help it, but only if this disturbs in no way the group which is comfortably installed in a majority position. If it follows the rule suggested by the hon. member for Joliette, the minority has only one alternative: to keep still, be quiet and let itself be assimilated.

The linguistic minorities of Canada have no intention of listening to the nonsense uttered by the hon. member for Joliette. He speaks very strangely. He speaks the language of some of the premiers who suggested only a few years ago that they should sign bilateral agreements concerning education and who favoured interprovincial bargaining with their minorities as pawns.

Mr. Speaker, we will stand up against the trade-off of our survival, we are not the pawns of the majority, we want our rights to be entrenched in our constitution. We dream of becoming first-class citizens. This collective will has given birth to several movements aimed at regrouping minorities. We have created many associations and several organizations. These associations are made up of average Canadians and are striving to correct linguistic injustice, both at school and in society. These provincial associations which often work in an hostile environment have been the main architects of an almost permanent fight. We need them, they need us and the federal government has supported them, God knows how much. Some might say that these provincial and national organizations are lobbying groups sometimes led by ambitious leaders. If the leaders are sometimes obliged to speak frankly and roughly to governments and to majorities it is because they sometimes have to shout louder to be heard. I think that most Canadians who are part of a minority will support entrenching linguistic rights at school in our constitution. To them it is an important guarantee which will help them in their collective search for equality and equity. For instance, Mr. Speaker, on September 28, 1980, ACFO, the French Canadian Association of Ontario, at their convention in Ottawa, passed the following resolution, this was before the resolution now before us was brought in and I quote:

That ACFO strongly urge patriation of the British North America Act, and that the prerequisite for that support be that the new Canadian Constitution enshrine basic rights and freedoms, including language rights for official language minorities.

It is that same provincial association that often spearheaded the fight in Ontario. We fought for the right to speak and even pray in one's language. We fought for the right to work in one's language, under a boss who often misunderstood our aspirations. We fought to have our children educated in French in Ontario and elsewhere. We fought for public services in French. We fought for the right to defend ourselves in courts of justice at all levels. We fought against language prejudice, that often feeds on misconceptions about the institutional bilinguism. We fought to preserve and develop our culture. Such has been the struggle of generations of Franco-Ontarians and Franco-Manitobans, "Fransaskois", Acadians and people outside Quebec, who wanted to and will succeed in surviving in this country.

It has been pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that although this debate is very important and very serious for the Progressive Conservatives, there are hardly some odd ten of them, here, and I find ridiculous at this stage that we have to sit through dinner hours when those people do not even think it worth their while to remain here to listen to the debates.

Here we are, Mr. Speaker, in 1980, discussing a resolution that is most important in my view. I emphasize the phrase "discussing a resolution", because such is the process that will start after this evening. Whatever the Leader of the Opposition or others on his side may say, the suggestion that we are muzzling this debate is preposterous. What we are doing after three weeks, after hearing nearly 50 members, what we are saying is that finally we must come to serious consideration of the resolution. We are going to refer it to a committee, where everyone will have an opportunity to comment, to put his arguments forward and probably to point out and correct what he considers is wrong.

Mr. Speaker, if the committee makes an in-depth study of the resolution and tables a report, I hear the Leader of the Opposition say: "We will be back on February 12 with a report". I do not care whether we come back on February 10 or February 12 or December 9, as long as we work seriously. I have no objection whatsoever. We will manage to study the proposal within the framework of the schedule Parliament must follow. I heard the Leader of the Opposition say that we should be talking about the economy and energy matters. I think he understands very well the restrictions imposed by the present parliamentary schedule and that he must also have a lot of work to do and therefore it might be better not to keep the debate going for too long if that is to disorganize everybody's work and delay our proceedings, as has been done for two or three weeks after question period. Members of the House would keep raising points of order and questions of privilege for two or three hours. I do not think that delaying the work of the House that way is what one could call serious parliamentarianism.

How will Canadians use the new constitution? I honestly do not know. Time will tell. There is no doubt, for instance, that the constitutional instrument carries more weight than an ordinary statute because a constitution is not easily changed. The Leader of the Opposition spoke against section 42 because it refers to a referendum and the people will have their say. In short, Mr. Speaker, that is democracy, it is a regime where people have the right to speak. Personally, I have read several editorials and I would refer the Leader of the Opposition to an article written September 23, 1980, by Pierre Tremblay of Le Droit. I do not intend to read it because it is quite long but it is very good. Indeed, Mr. Tremblay's theme is that the federal-provincial dispute is over, that we must now call on the people when politicians are up against a deadlock they cannot get out of.

Mr. Speaker, I have been told that in history—and that is very interesting, in my opinion—political powers may often skirt around or repeal certain constitutional rights. I am thinking in particular of section 23 in Manitoba which was repealed by the will of a single legislative assembly. How many times in our short history did linguistic minorities have to fight to maintain, or even worse, secure such rights as the free choice of their religion and their language? How often did minorities see their rights disappear just when they seemed to be safe? It took eighty years to recognize that those statutes of the Manitoba legislature were discriminatory and anti-constitutional. It was recognized because a man, Mr. Georges Forest, on his own initiative, was willing to give of his time and money to fight for one of his fundamental rights, his linguistic right.

Here, in Ontario, we lived under regulation 17. It took several years before we could get that regressive and discriminatory measure repealed and get justice. Even now, it is still an important theme in Ontario where we often call for justice. That work is very important to us. Let us not think, Mr. Speaker, that the charter of rights is the achievement of all hopes, that it will answer all the aspirations of the official languages minority groups. It is an excellent beginning, which delights me, but though we have obtained the required minimum, it does not mean that we should miss any opportunity or initiative to improve it. If we really want the official linguistic minorities to live their culture and language fully, they must be dispensed health and social services in their tongue, in their own provinces. Finally, radio and television services must be extended to the whole population, and that, in the two official languages wherever those who request it are numerous enough.

Canada is becoming increasingly a people of minorities. Statistics confirm it every day. I feel, therefore, that it is imperative that their fundamental rights be protected. There is nothing extraordinary, Mr. Speaker, about the fact that a country has one or several minorities. Most big countries in the world have linguistic minorities that they have to accommodate. Besides, there is a maxim which says that a minority that has the will to survive and is attacked will know how to fight back, whereas a minority that is unaware of itself and is also ignored by the majority is often doomed to extinction.

[English]

We are faced in Canada today with a challenge of great importance to us all, the challenge of keeping this country together.

To understand each other with all our regional and sectional loyalties, our varying customs and traditions; to understand what this country is all about, a country with two official languages and a multitude of cultures; to understand that there are forces at work to build a better Canada while at the same time other forces want to destroy it—therein lies the challenge.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are going to rise and tell me that my time is up. I am very sorry. I would have liked to finish my speech, but I must abide by the rules and surrender my place to another member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps the Chair might take this opportunity to familiarize hon. members, those who are present, with the habit I have of trying to warn hon. members that they are coming to the end of their time. Whether the hon. member speaking happens to catch that message or not—and I know there is a considerable amount of pressure on members, although the Chair has been a trifle lax—I think I ought to be exact from here on. I want to warn hon. members that whether they see the notification that they are coming to the end of their time or not, I will from here on cut short debate precisely at the time required.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the amendment and to the main motion, I have a 40-minute speech which I cannot give in the 20 minutes allotted to me. Therefore, I will make the whole text of my speech public. In the interests of giving other hon. members the opportunity to speak in order to express their views, I will just present a brief summary.

I have said in the past that I am favourably disposed toward the government's package and have in the past supported and still support a number of principles. My reasons are given in the text which is available to anyone who wishes to read it. I will file my speech with each of the committee members when the committee is selected.

First, I support unilateral patriation by Parliament with the unanimity formula, as per the motion I moved on May 9 and which was passed unanimously by the House. I also supported the motion of last night for unilateral patriation, with the Vancouver consensus. The constitution must be patriated quickly so that changes can be made sequentially to reduce increasing tensions in our nation.

Second, I support the process of finding a less restricting formula than the unanimity formula, but I reject the government's process as needing substantive revision, and indeed, revisions are mandatory.

Third, I support a people's referendum as a process for constitutional change. The people should be able to initiate such a referendum rather than the federal government only and a majority in each province should be required for passage, not only the majority in each of the four regions.

Fourth, I strongly support maintaining the equality of provincial status and the protection of existing provincial powers and rights with reduction in such powers being by consent only, particularly in regard to provincial lands, resources and boundary rights. In my main speech I have proposed an amendment to that effect.

Fifth, I support equalization and the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms, but the resolution needs redrafting to provide clarity and interpretation of these matters. I would have preferred that such be done in Canada after patriation.

Sixth, I do not want to kill the government's constitutional package and, therefore, kill patriation. I want to improve it and effect patriation. Therefore, I support sending it to committee, but not under the process of closure. This is an unneeded action on behalf of the government. I am saddened by it. It is an unfortunate action after only two and a half weeks of sitting in this House to debate one of the most important issues to come before this House since 1867.

This is an action to limit the privileges of members of this House to speak on this vital issue. I know there has been some obstruction. There always is on both sides. However, another month of debate would not have been an inconvenience to this House or, indeed, to Canada. I must utterly reject the closure action by the government.

Thirteen years ago almost to the month, when I joined the Conservative party of Canada, I asked, what does this party stand for? Is it just a collection of individuals with a common purpose and a common view, or is it more? Has it got a creed and an unshakeable philosophical foundation, or is it just a garment which we can take off and put on as the opportunity arises?

I searched and there were few answers to be found. I had resolved that this conservatism is an integrity of spirit and an orderly expansion of conscience that is genuinely important and not of the fleeting variety. It is on the basis of that individual integrity or spirit of conscience that I shall vote on this measure from here on, as it is a measure of profound gravity. I trust that each member in this House will do the same. I respect every member's right to do so on this fundamental issue. This is an issue for statesmen and not for partisan politics and partisan politicians.

It has taken me five minutes, effectively, to file my speech, or say that I am going to file it with the committee members, and present my summary. At this rate I believe many members will have—and they should have—the opportunity to speak on this resolution before it is sent to committee later on tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to participate in this historic debate, and I am proud, as are all hon. members who have spoken, to play a small part in it.

At the outset of this debate I thought perhaps I might be hearing from a few constituents as to why Parliament would be spending its time on a constitution when there are postal interruptions, clerks' strikes and obvious economic problems in this country, but I think that the constituents of my riding have shown great maturity. I think we have to recognize that something which may be important is not on any given day or week or month necessarily urgent, but the fact that it may not be urgent on one day does not mean it is not of vital importance to this country. I think that the voters and constituents certainly in Toronto and in the constituency which I have the honour to represent have appreciated the necessity for Parliament to come to grips with this issue at this time.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) have to be commended for the leadership they have shown in biting the bullet and being prepared to go ahead with this question and resolve something Canadians have not, unfortunately, been able to resolve for decades.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Smith: What is before the House is a resolution to appoint a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to consider and report upon the constitutional document which was issued by the government on October 2. There have been many speeches. Many of them have been excellent. But I think we have to recognize that we are beginning what will be a chapter which may last for several months and that the curtain is not being dropped on it tonight as if somehow the gong were going and this were the end of the show. I think that has perhaps not been pointed out by opposition members when they have addressed themselves to the motion with which we are going to have to deal later tonight. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) himself said on October 2, and I quote:

> The significant debate will come when the resolution itself is brought directly before the House some time after the committee has made its report.

Mr. Beatty: It will not and never will be.

Mr. Smith: Those are not my words; those are the words of the Leader of the Opposition—"significant debate"—and that debate will occur when the committee reports back; but hon. members opposite will not have a chance to do anything unless we set the committee up. That is why we have to set it up, and the time to do that has certainly come.

With regard to the package and, first, patriation, everyone who has spoken seems to agree that it is high time we do it. I certainly agree. It has dragged on for many, many years. For over 50 years efforts have not borne fruit, and I think everyone would concede that every reasonable effort has been made by this government in the last few months to come to a reasonable agreement with the provinces. If that is not recognized by certain members of the opposition, it certainly will be by historians. I suggest it is by the public right now.

Let us consider the amending formula. I support the proposal. I think it is reasonable, fair and within the Canadian tradition. It does protect provincial powers. We are not talking about any realignment of the division of powers. There can be no finalization of any division of powers within the next two years without unanimous consent. I cannot understand what Premier Peckford could complain about in the next two years.

If after two years we cannot come to some agreement, then we go to the Victoria formula, and in clause 42 there is also provision for a referendum. This is what seems to have the official opposition in particular quite riled up. Hon. members in the official opposition say that theoretically this could destroy federalism as we know it and that this could destroy the country. Well, I think we have to concede that if a power is there, notwithstanding the fact that I think it is quite clear it is only going to be used as a last resort, then it can be used.

Let us assume that disallowance can be used. If we are going to talk theory, let us talk theory. To suggest that somehow something new is coming on the scene which will suddenly destroy federalism is absolutely ludicrous when we look at the power of disallowance which has existed many years in the country. Did it destroy federalism? Of course it did not.

In his speech on October 6 the Leader of the Opposition said, and I quote from page 3291 of Hansard:

> And because this authority would not be limited, this central government could, if it chose to, deprive the provinces of all their powers and for all times.

He went on to say:

> Under this resolution, the central government could destroy what makes Canada a federation. And if it did, I am afraid it would signal the end of Canada as a country.

That is simply not correct. The power is not the government at all, it is the people, and there is a pretty fundamental difference. I think that the official opposition has totally ignored the fact that the ultimate sovereignty from which all governments derive their power is the people. I have much more faith in the Canadian people than the opposition has.

Hon. members opposite talk about the tyranny of the majority. In his speech the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) repeatedly referred to the tyranny of the majority. Well, I hardly think that a requirement that there be 51 per cent in each of the four regions of this country is a formula designed to allow whimsical fads to be swept into a constitution. I think that is absolute nonsense and is something I reject. I have much more faith in the people of this country than people who are making those arguments seem to have.

Let me make just brief reference to the charter. I support it. There are some obvious things in there with which I do not think anyone could disagree. We all believe in freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, freedom of the press, etc. I do not understand why anyone could possibly get worked up about that, but there are some other things which perhaps are not quite so historic and which may be a bit more unique to Canada.

I believe in equalization. I am a member from central Canada, from Ontario, from Toronto. I am one of those Toronto fellows, and in terms of tax paid in areas of the country, it is a statistical fact that Toronto has paid a disproportionate share of taxes in relation to its population. I do not quarrel with that for one second. I agree with it and welcome it. I support that because that is what this country is all about. This country is all about sharing. That is what this government is all about, that is what this party is all about and that is what this provision is all about. That is why we have to get on with it and enshrine it in a constitution so that it is beyond question and not something which can be swept out by another government which might come in and which does not believe in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Smith: Another provision in the charter has to do with mobility rights. This is something we had not talked about until recent years. It is rather a new idea and a new concept, but I submit that mobility rights are needed because barriers have unfortunately been springing up which are stopping people from one part of the country from getting jobs in other parts of the country. That is certainly not what I understand a country to be about.

Today we heard the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) defend that piece of Newfoundland legislation which will deny jobs in Newfoundland to people from other parts of the country. We can see the kind of protection of mobility rights there would be under a government of which he was part. That is the reason we have to secure the right of Canadians to go to any part of this country and to have employment in any part of this country. We need to do that in such a way that it cannot be swept aside when some government may come along which does not like that provision.

We have heard some scathing attacks from the official opposition on the package, but what is the alternative hon. members opposite are talking about? I have read their speeches several times. I have looked through the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Provencher, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and other official opposition spokesmen who have spoken in this debate. They are all over the map. They talk about the Vancouver consensus. They hold it up like the Holy Grail as if it were the solution to everything. Let us have a look at it. It provides that seven provinces which make up 50 per cent of the population can, in conjunction with the federal government, effect an amendment to the constitution. It says 50 per cent, and although the hon. member for Provencher said he did not feel too comfortable with that and he thought it should be two-thirds, he said he would go along with it. Two paragraphs later in his speech, however, he attacked our formula which requires over 50 per cent in each of the four regions and said that that is the tyranny of 51 per cent. Yet the opposition embraces a formula which requires a fair 50 per cent of the population of this country as represented by their provincial governments.

An hon. Member: That is not the whole story.

Mr. Smith: You are right, that is not the whole story because it gets worse. They then have an opting-out formula which is not, to my understanding, within the tradition of this country, with one province opting out of this and another opting out of that. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), quite properly, labelled that provision a checker board sort of formula which would result in different parts of the country having different laws. What does a country mean when you have that sort of thing happening across the land?

The hon. member for Rosedale, who gave us a good speech and told us some truths, spoke about the five principles of Canadian confederation. Two of them were national union and consensus. I submit that the opting-out provision runs counter to the theme which he was developing. Why, then, does the Leader of the Opposition think the Vancouver consensus is so great? I will tell you why. He thinks it is great because, with the opting-out provision, he does not have to choose between premiers. He does not have to choose between Lougheed and Davis and between all these Tory premiers across the country who cannot get their act together. So it is an easy way out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Smith: That is why they like the Vancouver consensus. Consensus—what a joke!

If the House has been following the conference attended by the premiers last week in Toronto, hon. members would realize that it is literally laughable to talk about consensus. But that is the route he wants to take. If that is leadership, they can have it. That is not the sort of leadership that this country needs and it is not the leadership that this government has been giving. I think we need to have a constitutional framework which will keep this country together.

Then, on top of that, they have this odd idea about a constituent assembly, but we did not hear too much about that. The only person who spoke about that was the hon. member for Provencher, but he did not say what they were going to do. "It would be a terrible thing if we had a provision in a constitution which allows a referendum," they say, but somehow it is okay to set up a constitutional assembly, according to them. Where do they get their mandate? I am not quite sure about that, it has not been too clearly spelled out.

So I submit that the opposition does not have its act together; it is all over the map on this and, in fact, there is no alternative. We have one clear option which has been presented, and it is a reasonable one, one on which we are going to move, one that will carry and one in which we will all be proud to play a part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Smith: There is one final point I should like to make, and that is that I for one happen to think it is possible to make some improvements to the charter. I think that is the function of the committee. Some hon. members might be aware of the fact that I am chairman of the committee on the handicapped and disabled. I happen to believe that the charter would be improved if a specific reference to them were included in it. I have spoken on this before and I intend to carry on with this idea and hope to address the committee on that. It would not be a new thing which would open the floodgates to many minority groups because, in fact, a precedent has already been established in the Human Rights Act. The reference in it to the rights of the handicapped and disabled would improve even further what I believe to be a sound and good charter.

After having had the opportunity to travel across the country with the committee and to listen to people speak, I can assure you that Canadians from coast to coast, particularly disabled Canadians, feel very strongly about their rights. They do not really feel certain about them being guaranteed by the various provincial governments of this land. We heard over 600 briefs and many of them spoke to this issue. Without exception they support the concept of a charter enshrining rights. I hope it will ultimately be expanded and made clear that those rights refer specifically to disabled Canadians.

As I have said earlier, I am pleased to participate in what I believe is an historic debate. I am proud to be here tonight to take part in this debate because I think we are doing something that is historic, something that will be good for Canada and which, I think, when completed, will allow us to get on to other things.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I may find that I am a voice crying in the wilderness, but there is a plea that I should like to make at this stage in our proceedings and I want to make it as earnestly as I can.

We are just about at the end of this debate on the motion to set up a joint committee to deal with the constitution, and the likelihood is that that motion will carry about six hours from now and that the matter will be sent to the special joint committee. My plea is that we have had enough contention, acrimony and backbiting both ways, and that the time has come for us to send this whole proposition to the committee in a spirit of good will, with the plea that it approach the job with the seriousness which it deserves.

Maybe I am dreaming something that cannot happen but I would like to see this motion passed tonight without a recorded vote as the means of saying to the committee, "We have done our fighting, we have done our arguing, we have had our contentions; now it is up to the committee to do the job on the proposed resolution which needs to be done."

I want to say that my colleagues and I are prepared to support the amendment proposed this afternoon to give the committee additional time to do its job, and I hope that the government might consider accepting that amendment. It might even be that with a little investigation it could be found that the official opposition would be willing to let the motion go to committee without a recorded vote if the amendment were accepted.

I say all of this, Mr. Speaker, because I believe I reflect the thinking of the Canadian people about the September conference, namely, that it was a crying shame that 11 grown-up men sitting down together could not reach agreement on the proposal for a new constitution, but instead broke up in a way which has led to an increasing sense of division in the country. I think there was hope on the part of the people of Canada that the 282 of us—we are only 279 now since there are a few vacancies—might be grownup men and women and might be able to do the job where the premiers failed. But instead we have had three weeks of pretty contentious debate ending today under a vote with respect to closure. I regret very much that we are doing it this way.

In my experience, every time Standing Order 33 is invoked it produces a feeling of discontent, unhappiness and ill-will around this place that does no good for the parliamentary process. It is a rule that has been around for a long time. Its conception and birth were highly questionable. It was brought in in 1913 by the Conservative government of the day because it was having trouble getting a naval aid bill through Parliament. Because it had so much trouble with those filibustering Liberals, it stopped the debate, brought in changes in the rule, then went back to the debate and applied the new rules. We often use the phrase about changing the rules in the middle of the game. It was not just a phrase in 1913, it was an actuality. As I say, the few times it has been used since it has produced ill-will and unhappiness.

In particular, I remember the experience in 1956 in the pipeline debate when it was applied four times. Four times we sat here until two, three or four o'clock in the morning in what was a dramatic part of the history of this Parliament but really a very sad one. I can assert that we have never got over some of the damage done to this place by the use of closure in 1956.

We have had it a few times since then. It was used with respect to the flag debate. On that occasion, like today, my party was prepared to vote for the motion with respect to the new flag, but we voted against the attempt to close that debate by closure. It was brought in again in 1969. Closure was used again that year to bring in those other debate-ending rules, 75A, 75B and 75C.

I believe members will agree with me that even the normal relationships and greetings we give to each other in the lobbies and around this building have been cooled today because of closure and the kind of experience we are having. I feel very strongly that if we had just negotiated a bit more, a few days more, even a week or what have you, we could have closed this debate without using the guillotine.

If I speak critically of the government for invoking closure, I must say there is blame on the other side as well. Progressive Conservatives members have tried to use arithmetic to show they have not had as many speeches in the debate as the Liberals, but they are the ones who refused to agree to any proposal to bring the debate to a close voluntarily. We have heard from them scathing denunciations of the package before the House as though it would bring Canada to an end, as though good will was completely absent from the minds of those who drafted the resolution. We have had a great deal of the kind of debate which does not enhance the reputation of this Parliament or expedite its proceedings. All right, we have had it. We cannot go back and undo it. Things have been said which I hope some members are sorry for. It has been done, but that is over now. It will end at one o'clock tonight or one o'clock tomorrow morning. Is it not time for us to realize that we are dealing with a terribly important issue, namely, the basic constitution of this country, and that we should send this matter to a joint committee, calling upon it in good will and in good faith to try to come up with a document which will meet the needs and the wishes of the country?

My leader has made our position very clear on a number of occasions. He has pointed out that after all the years Canada has been here, the 113 years or even the 53 years since an attempt was made to Canadianize the constitution, surely there comes a time when the matter should be taken in hand and we should go through with it. We accept the proposition that we should now try to go through with that job, but I think it should be recognized not just as a job handed to us by the government. It is something in which all sides of the House should co-operate as helpfully and as constructively as we possibly can. Not only do we feel there is a case for doing the job now and getting it over with; perhaps the most common remark I get from people in my constituency and other parts of the country is: "Why do you not get the job over with?"

In addition to that, we think there are some things in the package which are good. Most of us believe in the entrenchment of a charter of rights. Most of us believe that language justice should be entrenched in our charter. We all say we believe in the principle of equalization. These things really ought to be part of a constitution. So why should we be backbiting about these things or failing to get to the things that may yet need to be done?

I am particularly proud of what the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has done in his negotiations with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the question of making very clear the rights of provinces to control and administer their natural resources, with all that that means.

Mr. Wilson: What about ownership?

Mr. Knowles: The ownership is there already, but as my hon. friend knows, there have been court cases and decisions in recent times which have cast some doubt upon the meaning of that ownership. Then, of course, there is the whole question of indirect taxation on natural resource products, interprovincial trade and so on. My leader has done a good job in persuading the Prime Minister to agree to that proposal. I hope it is recognized that although this provides a balance which makes the package more acceptable, or certainly less unacceptable, to western Canada, nevertheless it applies to all the provinces of Canada from British Columbia to Newfoundland. I am proud of my leader for the job he has done in negotiating this matter with the Prime Minister, but I also think—I may be cut down for saying this—that a word of thanks might even be given to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: —for having the flexibility to discuss these matters with the hon. member for Oshawa and to agree to make the necessary changes. I think we have done a fairly good job, a number of us, in pressing the point that section 42 of the proposed resolution needs to be looked at closely in terms of the purpose for which it is to be used. I say quite openly that I have discussed this matter with at least five members of cabinet and I find they all agree with me. Each of them has said that the government is willing in committee to make any amendments necessary to put in clear language what was intended. What worries some members about section 42 is that it seems to be a method of amending the constitution which is equal to section 41. The government says, "No, the intention is only to use section 42 if there is a deadlock under section 41".

Now, some members on the government side are still saying that the language is clear. I do not think it is, but the ministers to whom I have spoken have said that if it is obvious that section 42 needs to be amended to make sure it is used for the means of breaking a deadlock, they will put that in there. I welcome the fact that four or five ministers have said that to me. I believe that all of us should accept the fact that this does give a hope for some improvement in the package. As I said the other day, I think we would be insane to bring home a constitution which did not have a deadlock-breaking provision. We could go on for 40 or 50 years without ever getting it amended, without ever dealing with some of the other things that I also think should be considered. In particular, Mr. Speaker, even though we think we have done well—particularly, our leader has done well—in getting the concessions on the resource bit, and even though some of us think we have done well in getting several ministers to agree to make section 42 applicable only if there is a deadlock under 41, there are still other things that the committee ought to look at. My plea is that we try tonight at one o'clock to pass this motion unanimously and send it to the committee so that the committee will know that there is in Parliament good will, that it wants in good faith consideration of some of the other things. There are quite a few but I am going to emphasize three, one was mentioned just a moment ago. In my view, the whole question of the protection of the rights of women is something we should still look at further. I know that the government says that there is language in there about equal rights and so on, and one of my colleagues will be dealing with this later tonight. Court decisions have shown there really is not equality and I would like in particular to see the committee look at it. It is my feeling that if we keep on fighting each other with nothing but contention and acrimony the committee will stiffen up, will tighten up and do nothing. As I said when I first rose to my feet, my plea is that we send this to the committee with good will, asking its members in good faith to deal with other matters, such as a formula for including women's rights in the constitution.

I say the same thing with regard to the rights of our native peoples. They feel very strongly about this, as every member of this House knows. They feel that the assertions in the proposed resolution about the continued existence of the treaties and rights that are there is not enough and that something more should be done.

As I say, we are proud of the improvement that we won but that does not stop us from saying that more should be won. It is my feeling that we will not get any more changes if we just tighten up and make this a battle from one side to the other. Let us admit that we have had our battle—three weeks of it. Let us give it to the committee in a spirit of good will and ask it in good faith, both sides, to ask the Liberals to look very squarely at the pleas which will come for women's rights and native rights. I ask the House to say, through the way it votes tonight, that we want these issues left open so that they can be dealt with in the constitution if it is at all possible to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I was pleased a moment ago to hear the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) raise a point, which was one of the three that I intended to deal with in this portion of my remarks, namely, the rights of the handicapped people of this country. They feel very upset that nothing seems to be done for them in this constitution. Again, I would like to see that done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: As I say, Mr. Speaker, if we carry on in the committee the way we have carried on here for three weeks, as just a contest, a party vote, nothing will happen. It is too important to do that. We have had our fights. We have had our contention. Let us let that drop. I plead that tonight we pass this motion unanimously and send it to committee in that spirit.

As I have already said, we are prepared to support the amendment to change the date by which the committee is to report. We will be doing so if it comes to a vote. Maybe there can even be some negotiations between now and one o'clock based on the plea which I have been making, that it is time to deal seriously, honestly and in good faith with this issue. As I say, I would like to see it go to the committee in that spirit so the things which have already been agreed upon will be amendments which the committee can put through and that other things can be done as well. There may be others. It has not been a good three-week period in Parliament but if we send it to the committee in a proper way we can yet come up with a good constitution and be proud of a job well done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time I have had the opportunity of speaking formally to the House. The first occasion was in speaking to second reading of the Municipal Grants Act. At that time I made the comment that I thought the quick passage of that act was a good omen for the future of the country, a good omen for the future of renewed federalism. It demonstrated a willingness on the part of this level of government to recognize the responsibilities of the other two levels of government and it was a step toward co-operation between governments.

On that occasion, which happened to be the evening of the Quebec referendum, I had the opportunity to comment on the significance of the referendum vote. I offered one caution, I suggested that if we were to be successful in our thrust toward a renewed federalism, there was a heavy responsibility on the part of the provinces to match the demonstrated will that evening of this level of government. It had to be a will that addressed not only the problems of Quebec but also the question of bettering and encouraging other provinces into the process of building a better Canada.

Unhappily, the provinces have failed to rise to the occasion, as evidenced by the way in which certain of the provincial premiers fell into the spider's web woven at last month's first ministers' conference by one of their members whose political raison d'être has been and continues to be the setting up of his province as a separate entity outside of Canada, albeit with the retention of all the benefits of this confederation. The spider's web has continued to enmesh more of the premiers, culminating in the recent announcement by five in number, an announcement which seems particularly ironic in light of the fact that the premiers have expressed their intention to take their perceived grievances to the courts, the same recourse which they allegedly abhor in the context of the proposed charter of rights and freedoms. It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's elected first ministers have tried 13 times since 1927 to patriate, to bring reform to the British North America Act. Our proposed resolution takes the best from those attempts. It offers the Canadian people a doorway through a stone wall created by the requirement of unanimity—unanimous approval of all of the ministers for constitutional renewal and independence. Unfortunately, but predictably, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) overreacts to our proposal by calling for a made-in-Canada constitution. What, might I ask, are we doing in this place right now, the Parliament of Canada, the one great democratic institution representing all Canadians, addressing the subject? We are, Mr. Speaker, doing exactly what the Leader of the Opposition asks that we do.

There has been alarmist talk about our proposal, destroying the federal system in Canada and destroying the country. Any attempt at undermining the orderly and rational development of Canada as a truly independent nation does not come from this side of the House. What we are seeking is not to destroy the federation, but a "fetteration", a hobbling of the Canadian people by the unanimity rule that I have referred to, that has kept us back these many years.

Under our proposal the federal system remains intact. There is no lessening of provincial powers to the benefit of the federal government. In fact, in the long run the opposite may well be the case. All we are intent on doing, once and for all, is to bid farewell to the nineteenth century and to prepare this country for the twenty-first century. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) describes our plans in the words of Premier Davis of Ontario as, "The first sensible steps to renew our unity and to revive our nationhood."

As I mentioned earlier, and as many speakers on the subject have noted, there have been numerous attempts over a period of 53 years to modernize the Canadian Constitution. To a degree that is understandable. No one expects to construct a fine institution in a hurry. We realize that anything worthwhile takes time. When we consider, for example, the ongoing renovations to this superb building in which we are now, gathered, the parliamentary Centre Block, which has been the meeting place of the elected representatives of our country, consequent upon the great fire of 1916, it is easy to understand that the building of any institution, whether it is physical, ideological, social or political, does not happen overnight.

You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that modifications to the Peace Tower are currently under way. It was built in memorial to the contribution made by Canadians in the First World War. The 53-bell carillon which has delighted residents and tourists alike for more than half a century, was inaugurated, interestingly, on July 1, 1927, for the diamond jubilee of confederation. Ironically, the first major overhaul of the Peace Tower is taking place 53 years after its completion, the same time frame in which Canadian people have been trying to initiate a major overhaul of their constitution. The renovations are substantial and they are to be completed within 18 months. We are talking about the installation of a new elevator and accessories, as well as provisions for the handicapped people to be able to enjoy—

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the member who is speaking is a minister of the Crown and he should be aware of the fact that what we are debating is the proposal to revise the Constitution of Canada. What possible relevance could elevators in the Peace Tower or the carillon in the Parliament Buildings have to the constitution remains to be proven. I suggest that the minister has the responsibility at least to be in order.

Mr. Irwin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the hon. member stand on the same point of order?

Mr. Irwin: It is a point of order which arises out of the hon. member's point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I think we would perhaps be better served if we could deal with one point of order at a time. I listened to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) and to the minister whose references to the carillon and the Peace Tower, I think, were tying in with his comments related to earlier matters which occurred in 1927 which involved the Canadian Constitution. So far as I am concerned, the minister's comments are, from what I have heard, perfectly in order. Does the hon. member still seek the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Irwin: No.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the recollection of all hon. members, including the hon. member who rose on a point of order, the inscription over the western archway of the Peace Tower which reads, "Where there is no vision, the people perish".

Our proposed resolution respecting the constitution is one of vision. We recognize that if Canada is at long last going to take its place amongst independent nations of the world, we cannot do it by looking back to our colonial ties. We must look forward to the day when all decisions affecting our destiny are enacted on Canadian soil and by a government elected by the Canadian people.

The proposed resolution contains the vision of a people who are guaranteed freedom of conscience, opinion, assembly, and the right to vote. It entrenches the principle of equality before the law for all Canadians, irrespective of sex, colour or religion. It confirms and supports the rights of Canadians to move, to work and to live in any part of Canada, and to have their children educated in either official language where numbers warrant. And it enshrines the principle of sharing or equalization as past generations of Canadians, native and pioneer, have shown in this vast country of ours that survival as a nation depends on this spirit of generosity.

By no means, the least of these are those Canadians who have paid the supreme sacrifice in times of war, as was so eloquently and movingly pointed out by the the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) in his remarks in the House last Friday. But hon. members need not look any further than this chamber for examples of the length of time required to complete any worth-while project. The work in stone and the panels above the heads of hon. members here tonight are an example of the time and care required physically or, as I have indicated, through the process of law, to the attention of any worth-while project.

The dominion sculptor, Eleanor Milne, and her staff have been working for several years on these high relief panels, coincidentally called the BNA series.

Mr. Beatty: That is pathetic.

Mr. Cosgrove: In making reference to this art work, I am trying to illustrate that patience and the application of hard work over a long period of time are the usual prerequisites of any worth-while project. Similarly, I think that it is quite propitious that the physical aspects of Parliament are undergoing renovation, as witnessed by the work on the Peace Tower, at the same time that we address the legal implications of patriating the constitution.

Our proposed resolution contains mechanisms in recognition of the fact that time is required to sort out the details, such as in section 32 which provides for ongoing consultation between the Prime Minister and the first ministers of the provinces, until part 5, which deals with the amending procedure, comes into force.

In addition to the riding I represent being the largest in Canada in terms of population, it is composed of hundreds of small businesses, many of which I was instrumental in attracting to the area because of my conviction that we needed a proper mix of work opportunities together with living and recreation considerations.

Since the introduction of the resolution to Parliament in this resumed session, I have received many comments concerning it, a number of which have been small businessmen who are supportive of expeditious action to bring some resolution to our constitutional wrangling so that the government can deal with other current concerns such as amendments to the Bank Act, improvements to the postal service, the budget, energy issues and so on. I made a point of interesting myself in the expressed concerns of the small business community.

For example, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, an organization representing some 600 community chambers of commerce and boards of trade, more than 3,000 companies and 70 trade and professional associations, reminded us that it adheres to a principle voiced at one of its earliest meetings more than half a century ago. The principle is, "To think and talk in terms of Canada, putting aside all provincialism. If Canada as a whole is prosperous, then individually and provincially we will all share in that prosperity." It was interesting to note that in the first point of their submission on constitutional matters, the chamber recommends:

That Canada's legislators do their utmost to ensure a speedy and efficient discussion aimed at identifying issues clearly, before amending a constitution which, on the whole, has served the interests of the Canadian people very well.

Mr. Speaker, the decision by some of the provinces to refer our proposal to the courts hardly meets this call from an important segment of Canadian society for a "speedy and efficient discussion".

As the Attorney General of Ontario has pointed out, the current constitutional issue is a political, not a legal issue.

The Chamber of Commerce's submission indicates support for a federal power sufficient to ensure the free circulation of goods and services, labour, and capital across the country, to the end that all Canadians will be dealt with and treated equitably wherever they may be in Canada.

I was happy to see that Mr. Sam Hughes, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, applauded the charter of rights in our proposed resolution guaranteeing free movement of labour within the country. I share his sentiment that it would have been preferable to expand this concept of a Canadian common market to include the free movement of capital, goods and services, but I reiterate the Prime Minister's statement that our proposals are only the first sensible step to renew our unity and revive our nationhood.

The chamber's submission also calls for ongoing formal consultation between the federal government and the provinces to co-ordinate trade and other initiatives abroad better while speaking with one voice in international affairs.

As I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us contemplates the ongoing discussions between the two levels of government as witnessed by section 32.

It was particularly gratifying to see a proposal from the Chamber of Commerce relating to the maintenance of a system of transfer payments designed to ensure the availability of basic services in all regions of Canada. This has been touched upon by other hon. members this evening.

This is enshrined in our proposed resolution in section 31 through the principle of equalization, which commits the Government of Canada and the provincial governments to promote equal opportunities for the well-being of all Canadians, to further economic development, to reduce disparity in opportunities, and to provide essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I did not mention that the submission by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce contains recommendations which do not necessarily coincide with the total philosophy of this government. But, as has been indicated by hon. members who have spoken previously, once the resolution is referred to committee and the opportunity is made available for in-depth consideration, then we feel there will be an opportunity for a genuine exchange of opinions. That is the appropriate place for it, Mr. Speaker.

Another voice heard on the constitutional issue was that of the Business Council on National Issues, an association of the chief executive officers of some 140 major corporations across Canada. In a letter to the Prime Minister dated September 2, 1980, the Council expressed the view that governments should be restrained by the constitution from adopting legislation or regulations that would have the effect of restricting, again, the mobility of persons in pursuit of a legitimate livelihood; or of unjustly depriving a person of the rights of ownership; or of limiting a person's right to have, where numbers warrant, access to government services in either official language.

The letter also states, and I quote:

We do not underestimate the difficulty of achieving a new constitutional understanding in a country as vast and complex as Canada, but we believe that the time for accommodation is overdue.

We want to convey to you the sense of urgency and concern that we share, concern that a continued lack of resolution of constitutional issues will in the future, as it has in the past, cause us to lose opportunities for investment and jobs.

Decisions have not been taken, investments not made, jobs not created, because of the uncertainty and unpredictability of the economic climate in Canada.

That is the business community addressing every member of the House, Mr. Speaker.

In a recent address the Canadian Manufacturers' Association president, Mr. J. E. Newall, said that the prime role of the business sector—to produce goods and services in the most efficient and productive way possible—was being adversely affected by a growing fragmentation of the Canadian common market and by the delays and uncertainties caused by the seemingly endless debate on the division of economic powers between the central government and the provinces.

As Mr. Newall put it:

One critical objective of constitutional reform should be to strengthen Canada's common market. The provincial preferences may, when considered individually and in isolation, give the appearance of provincial benefits. However, all produce national inefficiencies. They produce retaliation from other provinces.

Earlier in my comments about the inscription on the Peace Tower, Mr. Speaker, I referred to our resolution as a vision of what Canada can be once we have embraced the principle of self-determination in its entirety. In some ways, the conference of first ministers offered the premiers a chance to be visionaries, but they rejected it.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all members present in this House, the Canadian business community, and all Canadians, if they share that vision of our Canada, to show their support, and join in supporting the government in its resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity that I have had to speak as the member of Parliament for Vancouver Centre. It is the custom of this House that, under these circumstances, new members describe for the record the constituency which they have the honour to represent. Today I am forced to forgo this tradition because I speak under the guillotine of closure. I speak under the constraints of limited debate imposed by the Government of Canada.

The people of Vancouver Centre will remember that. They are Canadians who come from a rich and diversified background. They represent English, German, French, Chinese, Japanese, Greek, Italian and Ukrainian stock. Many of them are new Canadians who came here seeking freedom. Others are senior citizens and war veterans. They will always remember that the first time they heard their new member of Parliament speak on their behalf in the Parliament of Canada, it was under a motion to muzzle the debate on the future of their country.

Vancouver Centre is the very heart of Vancouver. Our riding is often termed "Lotus Land" in honour of our lifestyle. In China, where I was born, I remember the lotus as eternally serene, warmed by the sun and blessed by the rain—like our riding—rising out of the muddied waters. Mr. Speaker, at the moment we in lotus land are finding that the waters are very muddied indeed.

We have a Liberal government which is proposing to diminish the power of the provinces and increase the powers of the federal government in the national interest. But this government cannot represent the national interest, Mr. Speaker. It has no elected representatives west of the Red River Valley. It is, as The Globe and Mail describes it, a regional federal government which is using extraordinary powers to stop the elected representatives of Canada debating the future of Canada.

We have a Liberal government that spent $6 million of our money on television advertisements urging us to bring the constitution home to Canada. But that same government this week voted against the Conservative motion to bring the constitution home.

We have a Liberal government which is urging us, in the national interest, to have a "made-in-Canada" constitution. But that same government is going to Westminster to ask the British parliament to make changes in our constitution that nine of our ten provinces do not want.

We have a government which is imposing on us, unilaterally, changes in the way that we govern ourselves. They call it a people's package, yet this very same package obscures the human rights of women, of natives and of minority groups.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, because I am speaking under gag rule, we have a government whose Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) invites us all to speak on a matter concerning the future of our country, and who then invokes closure. When this government brought in closure, only three members of Parliament from the province of British Columbia had been granted an opportunity to articulate the concerns of British Columbia. That is the federal regional government's concept of free and open debate.

You can see why, Mr. Speaker, from the viewpoint of lotus land, Vancouver Centre, the waters are very turgid indeed, and they have been further silted by the actions of the NDP. The NDP is taking credit for proposed amendments to the constitution which would give us less than we already have. The NDP considers this progress.

• (1950)

Miss Carney: The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) is claiming a victory in the area of natural resources. Let me remind hon. members what the government House leader in the other place, Senator Ray Perrault, describes as victory by the New Democratic Party. Referring to the letter from the leader of the liberal democratic party to his House leader on the opposition benches, Senator Perrault says:

It is a reconfirmation. It is a restatement of a right which is already enjoyed by the provinces.

Reconfirmation. Restatement. In fact, it is not even that. I would ask the hon. member for Oshawa, if he owned a gold mine, would he willingly exchange that ownership for the right to manage it? Or, if he owned the rights to an oil well, would he willingly exchange his certificate of ownership for a licence to control its use?

The NDP have managed to give away an ace card for a low card. In fact the NDP have dealt themselves out of the game and they might as well cash in their chips on this debate because they have lost their credibility with the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: The liberal democrats have joined forces to force changes which will completely alter the nature of Canadian confederation. Among these changes will be the establishment of second class status for British Columbia.

Let me establish for the record how that secondary status will apply. In the amending formula proposed by the Liberals, any changes to the constitution must have the approval of 80 per cent of the population. And any change must be approved by a province that has, at the time the new constitution is proclaimed, a population of at least 25 per cent of Canada as a whole. Ontario has 35 per cent of the population. Quebec, whose population is declining, has 26.5 per cent. But British Columbia has only 10 per cent to 11 per cent. That means Quebec and Ontario can always veto a change in the rules. But B.C. will never have equal rights, nor will any western provinces, nor will the Atlantic provinces. The right to set the terms of our confederation will lie forever more with central Canada, and central Canada only.

Our problem here, Mr. Speaker, is that there are two prevailing views of the national interest. In the west we have historically viewed our country as a nation from sea to sea to northern sea. But hon. members across the floor of this House have consistently defined the country in terms of their own self-interest. They have defined Canada as being the equivalent of central Canada. We, in the west, have never accepted this limited role of Canada. Our concept encompasses the west and the north and the Atlantic provinces. And only when the interests of the regions can be satisfied can we honestly say in this House that we have met the test of the national interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: This defining of Canada in terms of the self-interest of central Canada is evident in our tariff policies which protect eastern industries and limit the growth of western ones. It is evident in our transportation policies which discriminate against western products. It is evident in the concept, proposed by the Liberals, of mobility of labour. Mobility of labour is attractive in a province such as Ontario where 10,000 people recently applied for 1,000 jobs. But in Vancouver mobility of labour means the migration of 4,000 people a month to British Columbia. Mobility of labour means that every $85,000 house is selling for a quarter of a million dollars. It means that British Columbians are being priced out of a chance to own their own homes in their own cities. Mobility of labour means that native Canadians who need the time to learn the skills to participate in job opportunities which are opening to them will be denied that right. The freedom to move should at least be matched by their freedom to stay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: This country was built on the mobility of labour. We used to call it simply "going west". One hundred years ago, my own grandmother, Brigit Casey, left this very valley, not 16 miles from here, to go west to homestead and to ranch. She and her kinfolk, the Tierneys and the McKennas and the O'Keefes, did not go west to build a second-class province as the government proposes. And their kinswoman did not return to this valley as the MP for Vancouver Centre to enshrine in our Canadian Constitution a secondary role for B.C. or for any province of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: This country was built on the mobility of labour. It was also built on fairness. You cannot enshrine one concept, the freedom to move, without enshrining equality.

I have said earlier that this government has defined the national interest in its self-interest because it has been of benefit for it to do so. But I do not understand why the government thinks that we, in the west, would accept the secondary role. B.C. joined confederation as a Crown colony, in its own right, in 1871. At that time we had choices. But British Columbians then, and now, felt that their interest was in the wider concept of a great confederation.

It is interesting to reflect on the tensions which existed 100 years ago between British Columbia and the Liberal government of the day. It is widely known that, as a condition of confederation, British Columbia was promised a railway. It is not so widely known that the Liberal government of the 1880s, which succeeded the Conservative government of Sir John A. Macdonald, tried to welsh on that promise. Instead of a railroad, the Liberal government offered B.C. a miserly $750,000. The dispute over the railway and the threats of secession resounded in both Victoria and here in Ottawa. The trouble shooter, Lord Dufferin, was sent to mediate this dispute in 1876. He wrote to the Liberal prime minister at the time saying:

> At this moment British Columbia is possessed by a frenzied sense, however unreasonable, of injury and wrong.

We still possess that injured sense of wrong.

We had in the 1880s a premier of B.C., and a member of this House named Amor DeCosmos. The man who called himself the lover of the world, loved the concept of Canada. He led the movement to bring the Crown colony of British Columbia into confederation. Yet, as he sat in this House as an MP, he heard his province described as greedy in defending its interests. The Hansard debates of the time record that Mr. DeCosmos said that he had heard from time to time in this House the grossest insults that had ever been offered to any people cast on the people of British Columbia. He said that B.C. had been charged with endeavouring to gain something from this dominion without giving anything in return.

Therefore, 101 years ago, in the forty-second year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, during the first session of the Fourth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada convened on February 13, 1879, the Debates of the House of Commons record at page 1079 the following:

> MR. DECOSMOS: I move for leave to introduce a bill, entitled an act to provide for the peaceful separation of British Columbia, seconded by any gentleman opposite who thinks proper to second it.

The motion was not seconded.

I refer to this action of 100 years ago because the separatist movement in B.C. is still alive. In a recent poll of my own riding, 75 per cent of the respondents reported that western separatism, in their view, had increased. As one respondent said, "I feel less Canadian".

I refer to this bill today to remind the hon. gentlemen opposite that should they wish to pursue a course which would result in inequitable treatment for British Columbians, a bill similar to that tabled by Amor DeCosmos will inevitably be introduced in this House. I cannot predict when that will happen, but the constitution of a country is a living document. It enshrines the terms under which we have agreed to live together. It determines our rights as human beings and our rights to property, as well as our basic freedoms as Canadians. The people of my province will begin to realize eventually that this constitution which the federal regional Liberal government seeks to impose on us will relegate British Columbians to second rate citizenship. They will never accept it.

Let there be no misunderstanding. British Columbia will not renounce Canada. Canada, as defined by the hon. members opposite, will renounce us in the west. And when they do so, if they do so, there will be no referendum in British Columbia. There will be no apprehended insurrection. If the Liberal government seeks to bring in this constitution and force us to accept a secondary role, we will just go our way.

● (2000)

In closing, let me remind you that history is on our side. The bill for the peaceful separation of B.C. was not passed. The railway was built. And in this spirit of fairness and of equity, we urge that the hon. members opposite reverse their present determination to proceed with the destruction of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak this evening for a few minutes about this important question of the resolution before us, a resolution whose aim is to refer to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate an aspect of the constitutional question, namely, patriation of the constitution, an amending formula, the entrenchment of fundamental rights, certain rights concerning education and some minority language rights.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is regrettable that the Progressive Conservative Party decided from the very first evening when this debate was launched, to make it a "divisive" debate. They complain that it is a "divisive" debate, a debate which gives rise to strange emotions in the country, but we can wonder why they adopted such an attitude if they were so frightened of having a "divisive" debate. And today we are faced with a situation where the government, after almost three weeks of debate I think—perhaps it is not exactly three weeks, but if it isn't, it is only a matter of one or two days—decided simply to refer this resolution to a committee.

I can understand that the Progressive Conservative Party does not like some parts of the resolution. I can understand that, on the basic question, there are some things with which they disagree. This is clearly their right, and if feelings exist in the country that are really opposed to certain basic elements of this resolution, it is their duty to say so, but I wonder why they should try to hide opposition to these questions, which are so important to the country, behind a criticism of the procedure that the government is following, without making any proposal concerning what other kind of procedure they would like to follow. I have heard everything and I have listened to the debates, I have not read all of them in detail but I have read many of them, and I have heard many. I wonder therefore why the Progressive Conservative Party could not come to the committee and put forward another procedure, instead of simply telling us that a resolution like this will give rise to strong feeling in the country, which could be a divisive debate. Unless of course they want to make sure that we will never have what the resolution proposes. After all, it is important to patriate the constitution. The Progressive Conservatives tell us that they would be willing to patriate it, and after that to have an amending formula which some provinces agree would be the Vancouver amending formula.

But not everybody in Canada agrees on this amending formula. Who is to say that this fine amendment is the absolute truth? It simply appeals to certain premiers who would like to have the right of veto on certain questions in an amending formula. Why should the solution suddenly have to be the one these few premiers propose? And what would we do then about the question of the entrenchment of rights?

Mr. Speaker, it is said that this resolution can break up Canada. The previous speaker said it exactly, namely, that this motion of closure should be withdrawn because it could break up Canada. We are told about threats of western separatism. Mr. Speaker, in this situation we have to decide. As a Canadian, and as a member of Parliament, I cannot debate a question with Canadian members of Parliament—not provincial members but federal members—who tell me: "Be careful what you propose, be careful how you vote, be careful what you do, because the people I represent will perhaps want to separate." I cannot accept this blackmail, Mr. Speaker.

I have never accepted it. Where I come from, among Acadians, we have people who are a kind of separatist, they want an Acadian province. I have never come to the House to tell Anglophones, when dealing with linguistic or cultural issues, "Give us what we ask for because we are afraid of the separatists!" On the contrary, I have decided to opt for an attitude of political moderation, and I do not come here to tell people, "You had better give us what we want because we are going to separate." Therefore, I say to my colleagues from the west, whatever their party, that there may well be feelings of separatism in the west. But the people of the west will then have to decide; either they want to belong to Canada or they don't. But they had better not come and blackmail me like this—

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: You will probably fight against the country too and you will throw them out.

Mr. Breau: I do not know what the hon. member is referring to. I am saying that I cannot debate any question, including the constitution, if a federal MP is going to tell me that I had better be careful what I propose and had better accept what he wants because, if not, his region may separate. Those MPs may be expressing something that is correct, but they have to make up their minds whether they are going to fight for the country in their region or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: When I fight a Canadian separatist in my province—

Mr. Clark: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows there are certain courtesies in the House. One of those has to do with a member who has just made his or her maiden speech. At the best of times a member of Parliament should not misrepresent the positions put forward by another. That is particularly so in the case of a first speech, as was the case with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney), who said nothing of the kind that is being attributed to her by the hon. member now speaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I am not referring at all to the hon. member who just spoke. I am referring to a sentiment which even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) expressed in his speech a few hours ago. I am not referring to that hon. member at all. I did not know that it was her maiden speech, and if anybody takes it that way, I am not referring to her at all.

● (2010)

In any event, even if it was not her maiden speech, I would not discuss this question attributing something to one member in particular. I could have referred to the Leader of the Opposition, and I did not. I am just suggesting that on these kinds of emotional issues hon. members might be expressing something which exists out there, but they on their own are going to have to decide in their regions if they are going to fight for Canada or not, because when I fight separatism in my province I do not come here and blackmail anybody and say, "You had better give me linguistic rights or my region might become separatist". That is not what I say. I fight them—

[Translation]

I oppose those people by saying that they are too narrow-minded. I say to them that we are Canadians and we are going to remain Canadians. That is what we say. Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the feelings of the people who have spoken from all parts of the country on the constitutional question and not only on the resolution. Important things are going to happen in the coming months and in coming years. As the Parliament of Canada, we are going to have to decide if in future we are really going to have a federal government and whether it will have power or not. When westerners speak about the constitution, I think they are touching on a question which deals not only with the resolution before us but also with those constitutional questions, the questions of powers, which go much deeper.

But, Mr. Speaker, even there, in dealing with questions of energy, I have tried for a long time to understand what were the aspirations of the west. About the energy question for example, it will have to be decided that it is not only a matter of agreeing on price levels but also on which government will have the power. Some people, some political representatives from western Canada, especially at the provincial level, say, "Well, we cannot be sure that the federal government is going to be able to have a good energy development policy in the future." Mr. Speaker, we cannot agree as a political basis for this country, as a constitutional basis, to discuss the distribution of powers among the governments, to discuss the country's future on that basis. We cannot start saying because the federal government has more members from one region of the country than from another, that we will not be able to rely on the federal government to act in the interest of all Canadians. Here again, people are going to have to decide. I cannot debate these questions of powers in the context of energy, or in the area of the constitution, if people tell me, "Listen, you are doing things that will perhaps give rise to separatism in the west." If this gives rise to separatist sentiment, the sole salvation for the country will be if westerners combat this sentiment, as my party has combated separatism in Quebec, and as I combat separatism in my province. I have not asked westerners, I have not asked people from Ontario or people from Quebec to come and combat the separatist element in my province. We are doing that ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the Progressive Conservative Party had decided to make this debate one which did not give rise to these divisions. It had the chance to do so. It could have made this a positive debate, without delaying three weeks on a simple resolution to refer something to committee. It could have made positive recommendations as, for example, on the question of a referendum, in the event of a lack of agreement between the provincial and federal levels, to consult the people directly in this area. What would they do when the situation was so inflexible that the federal government and the government of all the provinces could not agree on the amendment to the constitution? A means is being proposed. I must say that I myself do not necessarily like all these means, I do not say that all these procedures are those that I would necessarily prefer, but I am not alone in this House. The members of the Progressive Conservative Party are not alone either. If we want to solve the problems of this country by trying to have constitutional reform, it is going to be necessary to decide some time to patriate our constitution. Once we patriate it, we must agree on a process for changing it. But why is it that every time the Progressive Conservative Party—

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Why did you vote against it, then?

Mr. Breau: The hon. member should listen to me; then he would understand.

[Translation]

Whenever the Liberal party, or the Prime Minister, put forward a means of changing the constitution, the country is suddenly divided. However, I have heard many of their members speak about different views of Canada. But why? How is it that the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau), the Prime Minister of this country, who has clearly explained this to Canadians and to Quebeckers on several occasions, because he represents those views. I can understand that the mentalities of all the people who know Canadian law or who discuss constitutional policy are not the same. We have different pasts, we have different kinds of education, we are not identical in Canada. It is they who preach diversity. But do those gentlement in the Progressive Conservative Party realize that whenever they oppose the Prime Minister's proposals for constitutional change, they immediately say, "Ah! you are going to break up Canada?" Do they not appreciate the fact that what is happening is that they are maybe opposing a mentality or a way of wanting to change things in Canada— When we see people for instance who criticize the fact that the Prime Minister wants to codify things too much in the constitution?

But, Mr. Speaker, those questions in Canada, in discussions of constitutional law, are not monolithic. It is true that some publicists or other people propose to change things in this area. Can they not realize that they are systematically opposing those mentalities or those ways of changing things, for example the entrenchment of language rights, which are things that many Canadians want? When we speak of entrenching in a constitution language rights or educational rights, there are things that some people of different backgrounds like to see in their legal documents, in their constitutional documents. People may hold different opinions about the means of doing this, but at some time these questions will have to be reconciled. And I hope that the Progressive Conservative Party will go before the joint committee to make positive proposals to improve the resolution, if they really want to improve it. But, Mr. Speaker, the country must move on these questions. In the resolution or in the constitutional proposal, for Acadians there are clearly things missing.

I said earlier that as far as the procedures and some of the things that are being proposed are concerned, if I were doing it, I would perhaps do it differently. But in a debate like this, Mr. Speaker, we must reconcile our ideas. We are sometimes going to have to find precisely what is the common ground on which we can move. Moreover, I would like to see many other things in this resolution. For example, it does not contain the institutionalization of bilingualism in New Brunswick. Why? It is because the federal government, contrary to what the members of the opposition say, has not wished to hamper the rights of the provinces.

We have said that this would be kept to a strict minimum for educational rights. Is there a member in the House who can honestly say that it is possible to respond to the aspirations of Francophones in this country without at least entrenching in the constitution their right to an education in their language? What can we say of those fine people who throughout the debate on Bill 101, asked the federal government to intercede in the Supreme Court of Canada? I myself heard the Leader of the opposition stand up in the House and ask the government to oppose Bill 101 before the Supreme Court of Canada. In this draft resolution we are doing something which runs directly counter to the spirit of Bill 101, precisely to give the Anglophone minority of Quebec and the Francophone minorities in the other provinces the right to an education in their language.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question? It involves a matter which is material to what he is saying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Breau: I will, at the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

So this resolution contains the minimum. As an Acadian, I would prefer to see the institutionalization of bilingualism in the provincial services of my province. The Premier of New Brunswick has repeated on several occasions that he would be willing to do this. I therefore wonder why, then, he does not convene the legislative assembly of New Brunswick and pass a resolution in accordance with which he could ask the federal Parliament to include the entrenchment of provincial language rights in this resolution, to ensure more or less what is contained in the present section 133 which is going to apply to Quebec and Manitoba? It could apply to New Brunswick. I would, therefore, like the Premier of New Brunswick to convene the legislative assembly and pass a resolution. I am convinced that the debate would not be very long, because he says his party would agree. The Liberal party would certainly agree in New Brunswick, and it would then be possible to incorporate the entrenchment of language rights for New Brunswick in this resolution, which would include, moreover, educational rights, and this is important for us as an insurance policy. This would not give us anything new right away, because educational rights have been obtained politically. There are still things to do. Clearly, there are some Anglophone cities in New Brunswick which have a large Francophone minority and which still do not offer an education in French. But if the Premier of New Brunswick wanted to, it would be possible to pass a resolution in the legislative assembly which would institutionalize services in French and in English in New Brunswick and to incorporate that in this resolution.

I will end on this note, Mr. Speaker. The reason why this is not done is precisely to avoid doing what the Progressive Conservatives accuse us of. In this resolution, the strict minimum for hampering provincial rights deals with educational rights. So, Mr. Speaker, I hope that in the hours that follow—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty).

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I have a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) wishes to ask a question. I wish to point out that the time allotted to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) has expired, and the hon. member for Mississauga South can only ask a question with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I believe there was unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair heard some noes. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe.

The Constitution

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I want to say how moving it was to be here in the House of Commons to hear the maiden speech made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney), this evening. It should have been a moment of great joy, a tremendous opportunity and a great pleasure to be able to make her first remarks in debate as a member of the House of Commons, just as for so many of us it should have been a period of happiness because, one week from this evening, a number of us, including my leader, myself and my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), our spokesman for federal-provincial relations, will be celebrating some eight years as members of the House of Commons. So one would have expected that this would have been a happy occasion for us. Instead, it represents for so many of us the saddest days of our parliamentary career.

What we see today is a decision that Parliament be gagged, that this institution, which we joined with so much pride eight years ago, and which my colleague from Vancouver Centre joined so recently, is to be rendered impotent by the government majority.

Already earlier today a vote was taken to say that on the most profound, essential and central matter facing the country today, the unity of Canada, our very survival as a country, Parliament is to be silenced. The Liberal members voted one after another, without dissent, to silence Parliament.

Yesterday when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) gave notice of his intention to move that closure be put into place, he did so after 24 hours of debate in this House of Commons on this resolution; he did so after, out of 145 Liberals, 22 had spoken; he did so after only 19 of the Progressive Conservatives, out of 102, had spoken, leaving 83 who had not been heard; and he did so after 5 members of the NDP had spoken out of a total of 32, leaving 27 who had not.

This will be the fourth time in the last 25 years in which this rule has been invoked to gag Parliament. Let us take a look at those three other times. It was done once in 1969 when the government decided that they wanted to change the rules of Parliament, so they invoked closure to do that. They did so after the recommendations of the standing committee on parliamentary reform had been tabled in June of 1968, and they were debated until December, 1968, because the opposition objected to rule 75c which would allow the government to limit debate on each stage of a bill without agreement from any other party. The matter was referred back to the committee in December of 1968, and it was retabled in the House on June 20, 1969, and debated until closure was invoked on July 24. That was the last time that this rule was used, but you can see at least the extent to which Parliament was given an opportunity to be heard before the Liberal government moved.

When was the previous time? It was in 1964 in the flag debate. Again the Liberal government voted to prevent Parliament from speaking any further. The flag debate was begun on June 15, 1964, and concluded on December 15, 1964, several months later. When the debate ended in December, every Conservative MP, except for two, had spoken at least once, three had spoken five times, seven had spoken four times, and nineteen had spoken three times. In all, 92 Conservatives made 195 speeches during the debate. At that time 34 Liberals spoke 41 times, 10 NDP members made 17 speeches, eight Social Credit MPs delivered 12 speeches, and six Créditiste members spoke 13 times.

The Liberals on that occasion moved to prevent Parliament from debating the matter further, but you can get some idea, Mr. Speaker, of what they thought in the mid-1960s about limiting Parliament's right to speak. At least members had had a chance to be heard. We objected to the imposition of closure, but at least on that occasion members had a chance to be heard.

When was the first time in the past 25 years that closure was invoked? It was in the pipeline debate which started on May 17, 1956, and ended on June 5, 1956, on Black Friday, as you will remember, Mr. Speaker. It lasted 15 House days from the day when the bill was introduced until closure. Yesterday, after 24 hours of debate on the constitution of this country, on the national future of this country, the President of the Privy Council announced that he was moving to gag Parliament. The country was outraged in 1956, on Black Friday, when the Liberal government of the day moved to gag Parliament after 15 sitting days, and indeed that government was defeated at the next election. And yet today the government moves after 24 hours of debate in the House on the most fundamental law of the land.

I listened earlier this evening as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) complained about the acrimony in this debate. He said that there was too much anger and he said he hoped that later this evening members of this House would agree to allow this matter to go to committee without even a recorded vote. He said that he hoped we would ask the committee of the House, where this bill will be sent, to deal with the matter in a spirit of good will. If anger is not justified when members of the House of Commons find their most fundamental right and responsibility taken away from them, ruthlessly denied by the government majority, when would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre feel it was justified?

Mr. Beatty: As someone seen by Canadians from coast to coast as the prime defender of Parliament, when would he feel it was justified to be angry? If there is no justification in being angry tonight, when Canadians with very deep feelings about the country see its future being threatened by the action of the government, when would anger be justifield? When would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre feel it was appropriate that we stand up and be counted, that there be a vote, that it not be sent to committee without a vote?

I have compared the decision to invoke closure in this debate with the experience of the past. I have indicated my abhorrence and the abhorrence of members on this side at the gagging of Parliament. Today in Question Period my leader, my House leader, and I each asked questions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), if at least he would not be prepared to allow the committee proceedings to be opened to the people of Canada, so that they could see it on nationwide television and hear it on radio. We asked for the support of the Prime Minister of Canada.

If Parliament was to be denied the opportunity to speak further on second reading, if it was to be sidetracked into a committee, could the committee proceedings at least be televised and opened to the people of Canada? The Prime Minister of Canada refused. He said that he would not take a position in favour of opening up the committee proceedings to the people of Canada. Why not? I think Canadians are entitled to know why the Prime Minister, who has not bothered to be in the House this afternoon while this debate was taking place after he invoked closure, felt he was not prepared to put his support behind opening up the proceedings of the committee so that Canadian could see it.

Perhaps one indication comes from the infamous August 30 Privy Council office memo marked, "For Ministers' Eyes Only". I refer to page 49 which reads in part as follows:

> A highly contentious measure may be best contained in a committee where it is more readily managed by the House leader and his officers, and where easier and more effective relations can be maintained with the press gallery, since relatively few reporters will follow the proceedings.

Why? It wants to manage the news and to manipulate public opinion.

Members on this side of the House would be interested in seeing which government members will be on the committee when it is finally struck. The next page of the memo of the Privy Council office deals with the makeup of the committee. It would be useful for Liberal members in the House tonight who voted to gag Parliament earlier today to know what their leadership is expecting of them on this committee. Page 50 reads as follows:

> In committee the government's position is likely to suffer. Attackers would be louder and more numerous than defenders. Careful choice of government members would be essential, and careful orchestration of hearings would be needed to ensure effective presentation of the government's position.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated earlier that he expected the committee to act in good faith, without a spirit of acrimony. He asked us to trust the government. On what basis does the government present itself as worthy of our trust? On what basis does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the silent members sitting behind him, agree to go along with this denigration of Parliament and with this measure which attacks the basic rights of members of Parliament and inflicts damage upon the country? What was it worth? What did they receive in the exchange to agree to vote with the government on the basis of the assurance that the provinces would have what they have today, or perhaps less in the case of resources? What was it worth to the government?

Why was the government so anxious when it has a majority in the House of Commons and can get its way any day it wants? Why was it essential that members of the NDP support them? It is a fair question. It is because the government has no base of support in western Canada, the New Democratic Party has largely been reduced to its western base, and according to government spokesmen quoted in the press, it would be useful to have western spokesmen defending what the government is doing to western Canada in this package.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that he was proud of his leader for the deal he struck. Will he be proud next week? Will the constituents of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre be proud next Tuesday when the government unveils the second aspect of its proposals, its energy proposal? Energy is inextricably linked in the context of today's Canada with the whole constitutional debate. What can we expect? Can we expect the good will, compromise, and good spirit requested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, or can we expect to see more of the same—more attacks, more attempts by the government to pit region against region, Canadian against Canadian to divide us?

Again the document of the Privy Council office gives us some idea of what to expect next Tuesday night when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) unveils his energy package? It explained why it was essential the government rush this package through the House and what impediments could be put in the way of speedy passage. Page 43 reads in part as follows:

> The political climate in Canada is likely to be poisoned by a major energy conflict throughout the fall of this year and at least the early months of next year.

How will members of the NDP explain their support to their constituents after next Tuesday?

I listened as the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) said on radio that he was deeply disturbed by what the government had done in invoking closure. He thought it was wrong. It is not credible to effect a pose of injured innocence when one has been living in a condition of public promiscuity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: No one will believe it. So, we stand alone. Later this evening members of the NDP will vote with their friends in the government to move this matter into committee, notwithstanding the deep-felt concerns of many of them and the concerns of their constituents. I am prepared to stand alone. Let it be recorded when the history of these events is written that the Progressive Conservative Party was prepared to stand for the conception of Canada we inherited, that we must be a federal system, that this country must be built on more than one man's vision, that it belongs to 22 million Canadians. We have a tradition and a heritage we inherited from our forefathers and hold in trust for our children. Grievous damage is done to our country when one man, with his acquiescent majority, chooses to impose his will on the rest of Canada. We stand alone but we stand proudly alone and we are not ashamed of it.

The government argues it is essential that action be taken precipitately and immediately because, according to the Prime Minister, it is a national disgrace that our constitution resides in Westminster today. He said that we are colonials. According to him, the fact that we have had the same constitution for 113 years is proof that we failed; it is proof of constitutional failure. The fact our constitution has lasted for 113 years despite all assaults is proof of how magnificently this country has succeeded, how well the constitution was written by the Fathers of Confederation 113 years ago. Yes, it is in need of modernization. No one opposes that. Let us modernize it here in Canada. Yes, we favour bringing the constitution to Canada. Let us do that. My leader moved a motion yesterday which indicated that we should move immediately to bring the constitution home and make the changes here in Canada, not in Westminster.

If the Prime Minister were here tonight I would ask him to answer one question. If it is a national disgrace, if we have to hang our heads in shame because amendments are made by Westminster and it is urgent that we take precipitous action, why is it acceptable for him to ask Westminster to legislate his proposed major package instead of it being done here in the House of Commons? Where is the logic? How can it be a disgrace in one instance but not a disgrace if Westminster is doing his bidding?

In the proposals before the House tonight the Prime Minister is proposing two amending formulae. One is unanimous agreement and the second is the Victoria formula, neither of which would have enabled him to change the constitution in the form he is proposing tonight. He is saying that we will go back to Westminster one more time, we will go through this degrading routine about which he is complaining. We will ask Westminster to make the changes and then we will not allow anyone else to do the same thing ever again because it is degrading. How can members of this House with integrity not be angered by that? How can they not feel deeply that a grievous injustice is being done to our country?

We have heard members on the other side accuse us of giving encouragement to those who would destroy the country. We abhor the use of closure in this debate because of our deep commitment to this country, because we feel profoundly that this country must not be damaged through the actions of one man, that Canadians have a right to be heard on this motion and that the representatives of Canadians have a right to be heard, not gagged.

We rise tonight to speak because we think it is essential that changes be made in Canada to our constitution, but not by a foreign country. We rise tonight because we believe it is essential that this country go forward with constitutional change on the basis of good will and compromise. If the Prime Minister attempts to justify what he is doing to the country tonight on the grounds of its being essential to promote unity let me ask members of this House to give an honest answer to this question: is Canada more united tonight as a result of the actions of the Prime Minister and his colleagues, or is it more divided?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: What the government has attempted to do in trying to impose one man's opinion on this country, to reshape Canada along the visions of one man, it is to divide Canadians, to pit region against region. We will see more of that next Tuesday night when the energy package is unveiled.

But members of this party, which is the party of confederation, the party of Sir John A. Macdonald, stand now and we will stand at one o'clock tomorrow morning, to vote to say that we believe Canada is more than one man's vision and that it is essential that action not be taken by this Prime Minister which will lead to grievous damage to this country, which we all feel so deeply about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me this evening to be able to speak to the proposed resolution on the Canadian Constitution and the amendment of the constitution, which is before the House at this time. The government has moved in this direction to bring back the constitution, to put this proposed resolution before the House, to undo a road block which has prohibited constitutional reform for 53 years in this country. The federal proposal, if adopted by both Houses of Parliament, will bring the constitution home with a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms. It will, within two years' time, allow this country to amend the constitution with the co-operation of the provinces and Parliament. If it cannot be agreed to in that period of time, then another amending formula must be reached, either with the approval of Parliament and the legislatures or the approval of the Canadian citizens, a majority of the voters in each region in the four regions of Canada.

When this matter was put before the House we anticipated disagreement, but I did not think for a moment we anticipated the unpredictable response which has come forward from members opposite, and from the provinces in this country. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has stated that we should take this matter to the Supreme Court as a test case. In fact seven of the premiers of this country are going to do just that, they are going to take this question before the Supreme Court.

Of those seven premiers, who are we dealing with here? First of all we are dealing with Premier René Lévesque of the province of Quebec, who is criticizing the federal government for moving unilaterally when, only six months ago, he moved unilaterally to try to take one of the provinces out of confederation.

Who are we dealing with but Premier Sterling Lyon of Manitoba? He also wants this put forward as a test case. This is the man who, less than a month ago, did not want to see a charter of rights and freedoms included in the constitution because he said it would give the judiciary primacy over the elected legislatures.

Who are we dealing with but Premier Brian Peckford of Newfoundland? It was he who, when it was suggested by the Prime Minister he take his claim for control over offshore resources to the Supreme Court, stated that this was a political matter and not a legal matter. I suggest to Premier Peckford and to members opposite that there is not a more political matter than the question we are dealing with at the present time. They are prepared to take this matter to the Supreme Court, using as a precedent the Supreme Court's decision in 1979 against a proposed change in the selection process of the Senate about which the Supreme Court ruled on Bill C-60. This would have given the provinces some power of selection over senators. It prohibited such authority. It prohibited, overruled and struck out Parliament's right. It overruled Parliament's right to pass appropriate legislation, and said that Parliament was acting contrary to section 91(1) of our present constitution.

In this present situation we are not dealing with a Canadian bill, nor are we dealing with proposed legislation. We are dealing with a proposed resolution and, as such, we are not talking about Canadian legislation. We are proposing a resolution which will be taken to the British parliament asking them to amend one of their own acts. Certainly, no one can suggest that the Supreme Court of Canada would have control over an act of the British parliament. But other than the legal questions—

An hon. Member: We knew that.

Mr. MacLellan: Thank you, I knew you would. Other than the legal question there is a political question, which is so very important to the premiers who are now advocating taking this test case to the Supreme Court. I suggest the provinces' position in forcing this question on the Supreme Court of Canada will not only damage the credibility and the influence of the Supreme Court but will be damaging as a direct result to all of Canada.

Mr. Kempling: What a weak argument!

Mr. MacLellan: To push this on the Supreme Court would, in fact, be the same situation as existed in the United States in 1856 when the Dred Scott case was presented to the U.S. Supreme Court for political purposes only. It was 40 years later—not until the case of Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896—before the Supreme Court regained any kind of authority and any kind of reputation in constitutional matters. This is a situation where the provinces are asking the Supreme Court to do their work for them, to make a political decision and to make that political decision in a situation that is very emotionally strung. If the Supreme Court does do this they could be looked upon by large segments of this country as the villains. I do not feel that the Supreme Court should be put in this position.

● (2050)

As to the question of whether this proposed resolution is necessary, I say that it is, particularly with regard to the charter of rights and freedoms. We need not look any further than the mobility rights provision. What can be more fundamental and necessary to this country than this fundamental right to move and to take up residence in any province and to seek a livelihood there without discrimination based on provincial boundaries? Yet this right is being threatened by these very same provinces. They are placing their desire for power above the welfare of the citizens of this country.

For example, Quebec has banned approximately 3,000 eastern Ontario construction workers from working in that province. The province of Newfoundland has made out a registry of workers in the offshore oil industry so that they can give priority to Newfoundlanders. The province of Nova Scotia has passed a petroleum resources act whereby the government can step in and regulate who will be given jobs in the offshore oil and gas industry of that province. It is incredible that such a thing could happen in this country.

At a time when the provinces should be working closer together to solve the problems of this country, they are driving wedges between themselves. It seems that the only thing which the provinces seem to have in common is the fact that, in their disagreement amongst themselves, they see the strength of the federal government as a threat to their desires for more power and authority. It is all to the detriment of the country as a whole.

It is not this proposed resolution which is a danger to this country, but the attempt by the provinces to balkanize this country. We cannot allow the commerce of this country to be severely handicapped by the restrictive practices being put forward by the provinces. For example, the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission will not put the Ontario-based company, Petrosar, on their list of approved purchasers. Newfoundland cannot export its electricity to the United States through Quebec. The province of British Columbia is giving 10 per cent preference to purchasers and suppliers within the province, while giving other provinces only a marginal advantage over foreign suppliers. This will not make for a strong Canada, nor is it the Canada which people envisioned at the time of confederation.

I would like to comment on a couple of other provisions which are very important to me as a member of the Atlantic region. They deal with the provisions of equalization and regional disparity. We have heard the term equalization used numerous times in this debate. It is a term which has been very much maligned. It has been said that equalization should mean equalization payments. To do that would feed the paranoiac tendencies of the provinces. The term equalization is much more than equalization payments. Equalization payments refer to the services which are provided by the provinces.

There is such a large federal package which is owing and which should be forthcoming to the people of Canada in the form of equal shares. Transportation, pensions, and disability compensation are areas of assistance in which a country of this nature and this wealth should be able to give to its citizens as a right.

I would also like to refer to section 1(c) which refers to the providing of essential public services of a reasonable quality to all Canadians. Anyone who would say that such a section is not necessary should, I suggest, look at the present practices of CN and its subsidiaries, such as Canadian National Express, which provide services in this country that are inferior to the services which they provided 40 years ago. How will the regions of Canada outside the major metropolitan areas be protected in their expectation of better services from such a company unless it is put in the constitution as a right? Obviously, the right does not exist at the present time. With regard to regional disparity, almost every region of this country at one time or another has been or can expect to be economically inferior to another region. Prosperity is a very fleeting thing. It will not remain in any one area indefinitely.

I do not say that prosperous areas should not look to and work for the time when they will be less prosperous. I have no objection to the fact that some areas of this country are more prosperous than others. All I am saying is that this prosperity should not interfere with the attaining of regional economic sufficiency by other regions of this country. It is very important to me, as a member from Atlantic Canada, that this matter be foremost in the thinking of any constitution by any government. No region, least of all Atlantic Canada, is looking for a handout. All any area is looking for, I am sure, is an investment in its future. That is certainly the position of Atlantic Canada.

Areas which are not as fortunate economically as others can experience difficult times, not only the infrastructure of the community, but the individuals of these communities. In a community which has fallen upon economic hardship and which is declining, it is the people who suffer. These people have worked all their lives through the depression and the wars up to the present, and they are not able to work any more due to the fact that they are aged, they suffer from ill health, or the area in which they live is economically depressed.

Many of these people do not have the wherewithal to recoup the savings which they lost and to regain their self-sufficiency. They may have spent most of their lives paying the mortgages on their houses, building up a small savings account, and collecting a few other things. In times of economic stress their homes are worth considerably less. I think it is important that we be mindful of this situation. When we talk about the building up of monetary reserves, personal fortunes, and developing economic potential, we must not forget the people who have already worked and who have attained savings. They have not accumulated fortunes, but it is that money upon which they have come to rely.

When talking about the fortunes and money that will be accumulated in the future in this country, let us not forget the money and the fortunes which have already been accumulated and upon which many people in this country depend.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. MacLellan: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member whether he is going on record at this time as a member from Atlantic Canada as saying that the proposal that we are debating tonight will really improve the economic prosperity, the freedom of the Atlantic region, its resource base, and its hope for the future? Is that what the hon. member is telling the House?

Mr. MacLellan: Yes I am.

• (2100)

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the entrenchment of a charter of human rights and freedoms in the Canadian constitution is, in my view, and in the view of the New Democratic Party, essential. I also applaud the initiative taken by my leader to have the provincial ownership and control of natural resources entrenched in the constitution.

Mr. Blenkarn: They are already there.

Miss Jewett: I am so glad the hon. member intervened, Mr. Speaker, because the Premier of British Columbia, Bill Bennett, has been saying for the last several years that the New Democratic Party, federally and provincially, intended to take away such protections as now exist of provincial ownership of resources. He went all over the province saying that the NDP was going to take away such protection as existed of provincial control of resources. But now, when the New Democratic Party will not only not take away what has been there but has taken the initiative to ensure that provincial ownership and control of these resources is entrenched, and therefore fundamentally safeguarded, the Premier of British Columbia does not know what to say. Indeed, on this score the Premier of British Columbia passes all understanding.

An hon. Member: Like the NDP.

Miss Jewett: Furthermore, the suggestion made earlier tonight by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) that somehow or other a particular amending formula, the Victoria formula, and not any other such as the Vancouver consensus, might damage British Columbia is, it seems to me, entirely erroneous.

In the first place, for the first two years after the constitution is patriated, there must be unanimity for any amendment to take place, and unanimity includes British Columbia.

In the second place, the Vancouver formula that the Conservative party seems so fond of, would not necessarily favour and, indeed, could abolish, some of British Columbia's most important or cherished interests if pursued by other provinces in a direction that B.C. did not find desirable.

I gather that the premier is now slowing down a bit and realizes that what is before this House, so far as it concerns British Columbia, is of benefit.

As we all know, however, and as has been spoken of many times, there are deficiencies in this proposed resolution one of which affects a group comprising 52 per cent of the population right across this country. The most alarming deficiency in the resolution and the one I want to talk about tonight and make specific recommendations on, is the absence of any guarantee or even mention of women's human right to equality.

The absence of any mention of women's human right to equality in the proposed charter of rights and freedoms was brought to the attention of the government as long ago as midsummer in an excellent paper written by Professor Beverley Baines of the law school at Queen's University, which is 67 pages long, and in another paper prepared by Mary Eberts, a distinguished constitutional lawyer in Toronto, and in a number of shorter papers prepared for the conference on women and the Canadian Constitution that the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women had scheduled but which, unfortunately, could not be held, for the first weekend in September.

The government has lots of opportunity to know why its proposed section 15, ridiculously named non-discrimination rights, was of no benefit to women. Yet the government did nothing.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Miss Jewett: The minister responsible for the status of women does not yet know that there is a problem and the government lawyers—who unfortunately are not the Beverley Baines and Mary Eberts of this world—

Mrs. Mitchell: Are all men.

Miss Jewett: That is true. Those who are preparing the work on the constitution are all men. They do not understand the problem either.

Fortunately, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, every one of them a patronage-appointed Grit, had the guts a couple of weeks ago to stand up and say that, as far as women are concerned, this package will not do. For the first time in the many years that the Liberals have been appointing people to that council, they showed their independence.

Mr. Blenkarn: Are you going to vote for it?

Miss Jewett: I should like to put on record now an excerpt from an October 8 press release issued by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which reads as follows:

'Canadian women should know that their rights are not protected by the federal government's proposed charter of rights,' said Doris Anderson, president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, at a press conference in Ottawa today. 'Unless wording of the charter is revised to guarantee fundamental rights for women, they will continue to risk the kind of discrimination so often experienced in the past.'

Clause 15(1) of the charter under discussion reads:

Everyone has the right to equality before the law and to the equal protection of the law—

This wording is inadequate because in every single case in the 1970s when practically the same wording, which is contained in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, was being interpreted by the courts, the Supreme Court did not find that women were equal in the law. The Supreme Court either interpreted the "before the law" clause to mean "in the administration of the law", or else it tried to find some other principle which, in effect, would deny women their equality.

The two most important cases, of course, are the 1973 decision in the Lavell and Bédard case where two Indian women had lost their status because they married non-Indians. As we all know, section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act states that Indian women who marry non-Indians lose all their claims as Indians. This law does not apply to Indian men who marry non-Indians. In that case the Supreme Court decided that the words "before the law", that now also appear in clause 15 of this charter, only referred to the administration of the law and not to the law itself. In 1978 in the famous Bliss case, and basically without going into the details of it because of shortage of time, the court decided that no inequality was being suffered by Stella Bliss in the non-payment of unemployment insurance to her, because the law had resulted in a denial of benefits only to some unemployed pregnant women and not to all of them.

Unless the proposed charter is rewritten, these two decisions will stand as precedents. Nor is it good enough to say, as I understand some government advisers are saying, that once these words are entrenched everything will be all right, because the courts will then say, "it is entrenched now and we have to handle it differently." That is probably the most ludicrous argument one could imagine. Once precedents are established, courts very rarely change their interpretation.

More important, with the exception of one Supreme Court Justice, at no time have the courts felt that the Canadian Bill of Rights could not overrule other statutes. In all these cases, all justices, with one exception, treated the Canadian Bill of Rights, the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, as though it were entrenched. In this connection, the famous Drybones case has never been overturned. Thank goodness, we now have bright young women teaching constitutional law in the law schools of Canada, who bring these facts to our attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: The same is true of the protection of the law clause. The only change in section 15 from the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights is the addition of the word "equal". So it is now equal protection of the law. That again will not be of very much help, if indeed any help at all. It is a copying of American terminology and a tendency to think highly of American jurisprudence as far as the interpretation of equal protection of the law is concerned. I think this is well taken if one is looking at their interpretation of cases regarding race inequality. But if we look at the interpretation of that clause as far as sex inequality is concerned, we see that it is of no help whatsoever to women.

I must say the Quebec charter of human rights is more enlightened. It does not use the words "before the law" at all. The phrase in French is "en pleine égalité".

Perhaps that is a phrase we should take into consideration when we are revising the wording in committee.

The courts have striven manfully to find some principle to give—

Mr. Knowles: That is the trouble.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We all make mistakes.

Miss Jewett: On the contrary, manfully, and I mean "manfully". The courts have striven manfully to find some principle to give substance the "before the law" clause. They have developed five different principles. I mentioned one particularly, the one saying that "before the law" meant in the administration of the law we were equal. The courts have developed four others. None of them is helpful to women. None promotes a woman's human right to equality. What the courts need and desperately want is guidance. The message must be very clear from this Parliament, and in the Constitution of Canada, that to use the same words will do no good. A message must be clearly given to the courts by the use of new, different and stronger words, that from now on we do intend women to be treated equally.

If I may, I would like to put on the record now proposed wording. I am not a lawyer, and I have no doubt there are deficiencies in this wording. However, I have made an attempt at least to give expression to what I feel might be a clear message to the Supreme Court and other courts, that what we really want, in a positive and constructive way, is protection of women's full rights to equality.

I would begin by calling this section not non-discrimination rights because that title refers only to the second subsection, but rather call it the right to equality. By the way, I am now referring to others who will be included in this section as hon. members will hear in a moment.

I would like to see in the first subsection the following:

All persons, men and women alike, shall be equal in the law and before the law without unreasonable distinction based on national or ethnic origin, age or religion.

I stress "equal in the law." I hope hon. members get my point. "Before the law" has not given us equality. It must be changed. "In the law" is a logical, clearcut change.

In the second subsection, and I hope other members will agree, I would like to see the following:

Race, sex or other immutable characteristic shall never constitute a reasonable basis for distinction except as provided in subsection 3.

The vital ones are "immutable characteristic".

The third section I propose I have taken from the Human Rights Act. I think the affirmative action in that act is the best. My proposed third subsection would read:

Nothing in this charter limits the authority of Parliament or a legislature to authorize any program or activity that is designed to prevent disadvantages that are likely to be suffered by, or to eliminate or reduce disadvantages that are suffered by any group of individuals when those disadvantages would be based on or related to race, sex or other immutable characteristic of those groups of individuals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: Finally, in my proposed section 15 I would like to see words to the effect that:

Equality is a positive goal to be sought, particularly for women and other disadvantaged peoples, and that evening-up is a necessary process to the achieving of equality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: I hope that all members of the House of Commons, not just all of the women members, although I hope all 14 of us will be together on this as much as we were a few months ago in trying to move for the total equality of Indian women, will join together to make substantive and fundamentally important changes and totally restructure section 15 of the proposed charter.

Unless we do this now, and I am anxious that we get to committee to do it, we will be 100 years more before we get these changes made.

Women in the United States have been fighting since 1924 to get an equal rights amendment in the American constitution. If we bring back the constitution with section 15 as it is now, given the interpretation by the Supreme Court of Canada, we will not, as women, genuinely be able to claim equality in our society. The likelihood of all of the legislatures getting together with the federal government and amending that section after it has been brought back is somewhat remote.

It is not good enough to say on this, and other vital issues, that we will do it later. The time to do it is now.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) has some time left, would she permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) accept a question from the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)?

Miss Jewett: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indicated, and I agree with her, that the courts are not very good institutions for reform, which is precisely the argument the head of the Civil Liberties Association has made. Therefore, entrenchment is not an enhancement to people's rights. Why does the hon. member plan to vote for entrenchment if this is a deterrent to reform? If there are so many flaws in this proposal, why is it such a civilized document?

Miss Jewett: On the last point, to be quite frank, my indictment includes all you guys, too. You have never read or studied the wording of the proposed charter nor have many members on the government side. Most of you have never really studied or read any of the cases wherein that wording was interpreted detrimentally to women.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, her remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since the draft resolution was tabled in the House we have been engaged in an historic debate that will bring out the fundamental principles on which our parliamentary and federal democratic institutions are based. All during the constitutional talks of the debates in the House, we have been accused by certain provincial premiers and members of the opposition of seeking to destroy our system of government. They have accused us of wanting to reduce the powers of the provinces and increase those of the federal government.

Now that we have tabled a motion for closure in order to refer the resolution to a joint committee for further study, we are being accused of abusing our parliamentary and democratic principles. I would ask how these same members of the opposition can oppose a resolution encompassing the fundamental principles on which the democratic values of our parliamentary system and our federal institutions are based. Mr. Speaker, I wonder how, in all good faith toward their constituents, these elected representatives can oppose a resolution which would entrench in the Constitution the fundamental rights and freedom to which every Canadian citizen is entitled. And finally, Mr. Speaker, I wonder how these same representatives can deny those who elected them, their fellow Canadians, the rights and freedoms associated with mobility, of working wherever they wish in the country, the right to instruction in their mother tongue, or any other right of freedom belonging to them as citizens of a sovereign and democratic federation.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the Progressive Conservative members are toying with the fundamental and individual rights of Canadians. They are manipulating the resolution and motion for closure for their own political good, with no respect for the electorate or for the House. And then they accuse us of wishing to cut off debate without giving them sufficient opportunity to express their opinion on the motion tabled in the House on October 6.

Mr. Speaker, if in the two and a half weeks they have been unable to mount an opposition to the motion tabled by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) it is because they did not know how to, not because they had insufficient time. We on this side of the House realize the importance of this resolution. We have decided that it is time to refer this resolution to a committee for further study. And that is why we have tabled a motion for closure in the House. In deciding to invoke this historic closure procedure, our purpose was not to cut off debate but rather to study this resolution more carefully in committee and give the House an opportunity to turn its attention to other pressing issues.

[English]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to focus on some of the comments which have been made over the course of the last few months and in the constitutional debates in the House.

Throughout these talks and debates, we have heard cries from certain provincial premiers, and from members opposite, that the federal government is alienating western Canadians. Just the other day, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) openly stated in the House that western Canadians were feeling deeply alienated. Well, I am a western Canadian. I represent a riding in Manitoba which borders on the Provencher riding represented by my hon. friend opposite, and I certainly do not sense that deep feeling of alienation.

Rather, I would suggest that some western Canadian premiers who are not really speaking for the majority of their citizens have been alienating themselves from their own regions and from their own ridings.

I personally applaud our government for the concessions it recently proposed in the way of resource control. I truthfully believe that these concessions will be welcomed by western Canadians and are much in line with what they have been seeking for many years, in terms of guarantees.

The last decade has been one of prosperity for the western Canadian provinces. Once almost entirely dependent on agriculture, the prairie provinces have experienced new forms of economic growth which have enabled them to diversify and industrialize their economies around new resources. These new developments have greatly changed the economic and political balance of confederation in a way never yet experienced in our history. This change should not lead us to western alienation, an image members opposite are forever conjuring, but to a new partnership between the regions and provinces in a unified country. I believe this attitude should be welcomed by all Canadians.

Because of the economic boom in western Canada, we as a nation are today much stronger, much more able to cope with international tensions such as those which prevail in the world oil market. Just as the national policy of 1879 strengthened our country and enabled us to counter external political and economic encroachments, our newly-found wealth in hydrocarbon resources has, on the one hand, served to reaffirm this union, and on the other, has led to a much better redistribution of wealth throughout the country.

Interprovincial migration from eastern to western Canada has been remarkable. I think that all westerners should welcome those fellow Canadians who come to western Canada in search of employment and the opportunity to start a new life in a region where such opportunities are plentiful. There is a lot to be said about the entrenchment of mobility rights in the constitution, and especially on the part of provinces experiencing financial difficulties.

If economic growth in the west brings about a movement of people to that region, then, no doubt, some of these new settlers will be from Quebec, in much the same way as the French Canadians came to the west, more than a century ago.

I believe we should guarantee their rights to the full appreciation of their language and culture, and allow their children to have access to French language education as they would have, had they stayed in Quebec.

The converse is also true. When we in the west hear of a friend or neighbour being transferred by his company into Quebec, we expect that province to reciprocate and allow that family to obtain an English education in that province.

Speaking of new wealth in the west, some provincial politicians in western Canada appear to think this new wealth has been forthcoming for decades and has been withheld forcibly by defensive eastern provinces. To these politicians, it appears as though this new wealth will finally allow them to get even with their eastern counterparts. It almost appears at times as if we are experiencing an historical grudge match. It is especially distressing when one considers that it was a crisis in the world oil markets which so influenced the way certain western Canadian politicians were to reassess confederation.

In a country as large and as geographically diverse as Canada, it is not extraordinary that we should come face to face with this problem referred to so often as regional discontent. However, we all have to ask ourselves how profound this problem really is. Do Canadians really feel that way about their regional interests surpassing their national interests, or is the situation being exaggerated by provincial political leaders.

Canadians have managed to build a nation in spite of all these regional barriers. Canadians by birth along with immigrants have opened up the land in western Canada, not to challenge eastern Canada or the federal institutions, but rather to contribute to the building of a nation. Today, I firmly believe that the grandchildren and great grandchildren of these early settlers still believe as strongly in this country as did their ancestors.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding in Manitoba which has traditionally been bicultural in character, a riding which has its place in history as the fortress of French language and culture in western Canada, a riding which has been in existence since the province of Manitoba joined the Dominion of Canada.

When Manitoba became a Canadian province, French Canadians represented a significant proportion of its population. The school system was divided into two sectors to accommodate both the Protestant and Catholic groups. French was the language of the instruction in the vast majority of Catholic schools, and the Manitoba legislature recognized both languages. The French-Canadian population constituted at that time a homogeneous community in which it was possible to live one's life in French on a daily basis and participate fully in our culture.

At the centre of this community was the church and the family, and French Canadians in Manitoba could gather round these two institutions so as not to be assimilated by the growing Anglo-Saxon population. With the wave of immigrants and Canadian colonists from Ontario to Western Canada, drawn by the national policy of Macdonald in 1879, French Canadians were soon to be reduced to minority status and swept along on the tide of Anglicization. In 1890 the Manitoba legislature was to abolish French as an official language and set up a public and English-speaking system of non-denominational schools. French Canadians found themselves, in 1890, deprived of the rights conferred on them by the Manitoba Act.

After a series of battles in the Supreme Court and the Privy Council in London, and a series of interventions by the federal government, French Canadians received a few privileges.

I am speaking today in defence of language rights and the right to education in the language of the minority because of my experience in Manitoba as a student, as a parent and as an elected member of a school board. I experienced the problems that French Canadians went through to receive their education in French.

In Manitoba, for example, the history of French Canadians has been one of fighting for their right to be educated in their own language. I can recall as a student having to hide our French grammar books whenever we had a visit from the Department of Education inspector. Mr. Speaker, this was an example of the rights of French Canadians in Manitoba.

And our premier in Manitoba continues to say that his government can ensure that the Franco-Manitoban minority will be well protected in his province. I wonder how Premier Lyon would be able to convince one of my constituents, Mr. Georges Forest, who had to go as far as the Supreme Court of Canada to fight a mere unilingual parking ticket, the product of a discriminatory provincial legislature.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote one of the greatest political leaders this country has known, Sir John A. Macdonald who said, in 1865, during debate on the possibility of creating a Canadian confederation, and I quote the original text in English:

[English]

The delegates from all provinces have agreed that the use of the French language will serve as one of the principles on which confederation will be based.

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this whole question of real equality between the two founding peoples is not a new phenomenon. I think it is time to pay tribute to our forefathers by entrenching in our constitution the historic rights of all Canadians.

[English]

I was born in Manitoba and I have lived in Manitoba all my life, but first and foremost I am a Canadian. It might be thought that it was not necessary to say so in this House, but I am a Canadian of parentage whose maternal language was neither English nor French. I am from a lesser minority, a minority within minorities, and I have experienced what that means. I know that if the rights of Canadians are not protected by the two main official language groups, then the other minorities will suffer as a consequence.

I do not believe we can count on our provincial governments to protect us in that fashion, and if we are going to wait for the constitution to evolve from unanimous agreement, I do not think I will live long enough to see that day. We have our national anthem, we have our flag and we are mature enough to have our own constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: I mentioned the hon. member for Provencher. He knows that back in 1957 we were struggling to have our rights in school, I for the people of St. Boniface and he for the Mennonite population in Manitoba. We knew we could not get them, but I worked with people like Thiessen and Wiebe in an effort to make sure we would get those rights. The premier of the province was trying to help us, but the majority would not give them to us. Then we experienced the administration of Premier Edward Schreyer. He took us a long way by bringing in laws which would help the minority have its linguistic rights respected. We are still struggling for those rights and it is laughable to see the Premier of Manitoba saying, on television, "I am looking after the needs of the minorities; they are satisfied". That is not the case.

Today I am speaking from the heart. Hon. members opposite say the debate has lasted only 24 hours, but since October 6, when we started early—and nine days before we were supposed to—all we have seen has been obstructionism and moves to slow down the resolution and its reference to committee. Yesterday we saw the funniest about-face I have ever contemplated in this House. Hon. members opposite now have been presented with the solution.

They were against it; they did not want to do it. They were in favour of patriation and the principle thereof. They were in favour of human rights and the principle thereof. They were in favour of the formula of equalization and the principle thereof. But they did not like the way we were proceeding. They felt we should take a different approach—that this was the wrong time and the wrong place. Then yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) told us that he had the solution. "We will do it in one shot, it will not take long and we do not even need a committee". He said, "We will do it right here this afternoon; let's go". That is because hon. members opposite have read the will of the Canadian people. The Canadian people want their constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: As I said earlier, hon. members opposite are posturing for political reasons. They are holding the government back from doing its job, and we have to do it now. We should get the resolution into committee, deal with it seriously and get on with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Bockstael: Yes.

Mr. Clark: While I naturally disagreed with some of the hon. member's concluding comments, I was interested in his proposal that French language and English language rights in education should exist for anyone anywhere in Canada. The hon. member was making a particular reference to people who might move from Quebec, for example, to my constituency in rural western Alberta or from my constituency to Quebec. As I understood him, he was saying that in all cases they should have the right to schooling in the language of the majority language region they left. I wonder if the hon. member intends to introduce an amendment to the resolution to make the resolution have the effect he says he seeks.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I used the words "in all cases". Having been a school trustee and recognizing the existence of economic common sense, I know that it should be where numbers justify. That is the way I feel.

Mr. McDermid: Who decides the numbers?

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the parliamentary secretary permit a second question if there is a moment of his time left?

Mr. Bockstael: Yes.

● (2140)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) on a point of order.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I will put my question in English. As somebody who was also born in Manitoba, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary, who spoke of the Manitoba school question, is aware of the fact that the Manitoba school act—which was an unjust act, I quite agree with him—was enacted after two demagogic speeches in Portage la Prairie in 1889? I am sure he is aware of those speeches. Does he not think that section 42 is precisely the sort of instrument that a demagogue, like Dalton McCarthy or Joseph Martin, who gave those speeches in Portage la Prairie, would love to have in our constitution so they could do the same thing to a minority as the Manitoba Liberal government did in 1890 to the French-speaking minority?

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, I agree with our leader that section 42 is a system to unblock a bottleneck. It will be invoked in that sense because we have evidence of 53 years of bottlenecks with the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am one of the fortunate and privileged members of the House. I have still 20 minutes in which to address the House and express my views with respect to a matter of supreme national concern.

All of my colleagues in the House, and I include those who do not happen to belong to the party to which I belong, do not have that right or privilege. Accordingly, I am very specially privileged indeed. Some of them have brought it upon themselves. Looking at the scant numbers of government members in the House, I can see that perhaps it is not important to them to bother to attend here to address this matter in the way most members in my party wish to do. There are 21 Liberal members in the House today to deal with this issue.

One of the most essential factors with which I am confronted as I look at this resolution is that according to the government this is not the forum where issues of a primary nature concerning all Canadians should be dealt with. It is to be somewhere else, and I wonder where that other place is. Is it to be in London, to which city the government has dispatched two of its ministers to make proposals concerning what the constitution of Canada should be? I would have thought it should have been here, and I would have thought that members of the House who had anything to say on this essential issue would want such an opportunity. Unfortunately, however, we are to be greatly disappointed.

Let us then go to the issue that confronts us with respect to the resolution before the House which gave rise to closure, and let us immediately dismiss some of the irrelevancies that have been raised. It is very clear that the party to which I belong has a firm and fixed view that the Constitution of Canada should be patriated. We also believe there should be a formula for amendments in the future. That formula has been described as "seven out of ten." I will not go beyond that, other than to mention that indeed there is no doubt that members of this party believe fundamentally in a bill of rights. It was a former prime minister from this party who introduced Canada's Bill of Rights which still stands. It may well be that there should be an amendment to that Bill of Rights changing section 2 so as to give the bill as it currently stands primacy over general laws in Canada. But we are dealing with something that is substantially different and upon which closure has been brought, that is, the concept that the charter of rights and freedoms which will affect all Canadians should be placed beyond the control of the House of Commons.

Today we heard a statement from the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) which might initially have stunned some of the members. It was to the effect that should this resolution be passed, the Supreme Court of Canada, the highest court in the land, will no longer be that. What fundamental difference does that make to me as a member of Parliament? Am I indeed robbed of some great right? True, that would happen, but it does not concern me. The fact that this will no longer be the high court of justice for Canada is not as significant as the effect it would have upon the democratic process in Canada, because what we are doing here will destroy democracy.

Mr. Gamble: The hon. member who has never looked at the resolution laughs. That does not surprise me. What we have here is a proposition which will place in the hands of the Supreme Court of Canada—not the one that is here today that we all know, but the one that will be there 100 years from now and whose members we do not recognize because they have not yet been appointed—the right to determine the laws of Canada and legislate those laws because the process of legal interpretation includes legislation.

For a perfect example of that process we need only look to our southern neighbour where the laws passed in a constitutional form have been changed over the years as a result of judicial interpretation. The natural result of that, they say, is that there has been progress. The court has made those changes necessarily. But the fact is, there is a danger in adopting the process they have adopted to our situation without the safeguards they enjoy. There is not a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States who is not appointed without the sanction and approval, after due scrutiny, of the Congress of the U.S. There is no provision for such scrutiny in this resolution. In the United States, lower court judges are elected by the people. The people, directly or indirectly, control the administration of justice. Our system, simply put, is that one man, the Attorney General of Canada, will make the appointments. Whom does he appoint? We do not know, but I will tell you what the people do not know—that once appointed, no one can ever get rid of them. The people can get rid of my friends across the way, they can get rid of me, they can get rid of all of us, but they cannot get rid of the judges, and it is the judges who will legislate in Canada if this resolution is passed. The public should be made aware of it, but the government members opposite do not bother. They talk about the rights of the minorities. I heard the comment of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). He is in the House tonight. "The minorities must be protected," he said. That is true, but so must the majority. Who is protecting the democratic process? Who is speaking for the system that has evolved and from which we derive our right to be here and from which the people derive their right to get rid of us? No one does, because it does not concern them. That is the fundamental problem which the Liberal government does not address because it is something they do not want the public to know, and the sooner they can get this matter before the committee where it can be whisked away in the dark, the better they will like it.

Having commented upon the one fundamental problem which exists with regard to the concept of the resolution, let us now take the lid off the general garbage can and look at the trash that is contained therein. We are told by speaker after speaker for the government that, as a consequence of the adoption of this resolution, Canadians will be able to move from one part of Canada to the other, find residence and seek gainful employment. We have heard this evening from an hon. member on the government benches that he is aware of a piece of legislation of an obnoxious nature in the province of Quebec which precludes construction workers from the province of Ontario taking jobs in Quebec on construction projects, contracts which have been won by Ontario construction firms. Section 6 is held up as an answer to the problem and as a panacea. One should read that section. Section 6.(2) allegedly grants relief, but one should read on to see what section 6.(3) indicates. It provides that none of the prohibitions set forth in subsection (2) shall be rendered unenforceable unless the purpose was primarily a discriminatory one designed to discriminate against the former province of the intended applicant for a position or job. The hon. member who raised this issue should have studied the law of the province of Quebec. He would have discovered that in fact this is the very justification the government uses to offend the principle this is supposed to correct. Section 6 protecting mobility rights is a sham and a fraud. It will not protect Canadians, and they should be made aware of that.

The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) expressed pleasure that after the passage of this resolution and the enactment of these provisions into our constitution, Canadians moving from one province to another might insist upon their children being educated in the official language of their choice. The great difficulty under section 23 with respect to Canadians moving from one province to another is that if they do not have school age children at the time of their move, they have no rights at all. The children are required to be in school. If a child is four or five years old and not yet in school, his parents might as well forget about that possibility because that child does not qualify. There is no protection there.

Interestingly enough, the real abuse to which members opposite have not directed any attention is that section 23.(1) establishes entrenched second-class citizens in this country. The hon. member for St. Boniface said he did not belong to the English majority or the French minority group in Canada. He indicated that he came from some other background. I welcome him to the underprivileged group because that is what he would be if he came to Canada from a country such as Italy where he did not speak either English or French; his privileges and rights would immediately have vanished. If this provision is passed in its offensive form, he would not be able to go into any province of this country and have his children educated in either English or French because he would have no rights. It is abhorrent that the government dared to present a proposal containing such unparalleled bias against new Canadian citizens. Once a person becomes a Canadian citizen, I believe he or she is entitled to all rights and privileges—not just some of them—which accrue to a Canadian citizen.

I cannot and will not support the entrenchment of prejudice and discrimination in the Constitution of Canada. I am appalled at the audacity of the Government of Canada in bringing forward a package containing such abuses. One wonders how the government ever contemplated the passage, without complaint, of section 41 of the resolution. Simply put, section 41(1)(b)(i) creates a special class of province. It is a class of province without identification in terms of the name of that province or of those provinces which at any time before the issue of a proclamation according to any previous general census had a population of at least 25 per cent of the total population of Canada. It so happens that the only two provinces which qualify under that subsection are the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. All other provinces are specifically identified by name. With respect to rights in connection with constitutional amendments, the other provinces need a combined population in their respective areas of at least 50 per cent of the total population of their area. The guide determining when the population count is to be taken with respect to what are referred to as the Atlantic and western provinces is the latest general census. Ministers opposite have created the grandfather of all grandfather clauses. They have created a privileged set of provinces in Canada which will never lose their right to refuse to consent to an amendment to the constitution.

I come from the province of Ontario, one of those privileged provinces. If I were to follow the example of some hon. members on the government side of the House from Quebec, I would sit down and keep my mouth shut. Apparently that is appropriate. But there is not a thinking resident in the riding of York North who would support such an abuse, who would be prepared to accept forever special treatment denied his fellow countrymen.

There is a drum sounding in western Canada. It is sounding discontent. The echoes of that drum have been heard in the House this evening and earlier. The government has heard it but will pay no attention. The government will not hear until that muted sound becomes a roar of thunder and descends on its head with a vengeance. They will not listen because they believe people are bluffing. The people of Canada want fairness and equity. They want to be treated the same regardless of where they live. If they are not, the slight inconvenience the government recently experienced in the province of Quebec will seem tame by comparison to the anguish it brings upon itself and the entire country. I urge the government to think carefully about second class provinces and about the need for fair play and equity. I urge them to reject what has been, upon examination, nothing but a statute of frauds perpetrated upon Canadians. It is not a statute of fraud in the usual legal sense, where fraud is to be prohibited, but a statute of fraud in the sense that it is to be encouraged and promoted and advanced at the expense of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, we are concerned with matters of grave national interest and I rise to speak hoping that in some small way some of my colleagues in this House and on the government side may pensively reflect upon what they are doing to Canada, recognizing that by taking the steps they are taking this evening they may cause irreparable harm to this institution and to this country. Accordingly, I ask them to reflect carefully upon what they do.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Constitution

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be participating today in the debate on the constitution. A number of members have already spoken in the House and have expressed their desire to see their freedoms protected in our constitution. Today all of us can cherish the dream of giving the choice to the people of this beautiful and rapidly growing country and of opening the way to the realization of their hopes.

At the time of the Quebec referendum, the Prime Minister told all Canadians that when the referendum was over, we were going to patriate the constitution. Today, Mr. Speaker, our Prime Minister wants to carry out his promise, and we are being called traitors, sheep and all sorts of other names. I would like to say that I am proud to be a Canadian and to serve a Prime Minister who stands upright and who wants to build a future for the entire nation, to give it freedom of conscience and of religion, freedom of thought, freedom of the press and of information, freedom to live at liberty in a Canada where every citizen may move about without hindrance. We should not forget the billions of people who would give anything to have the freedom we enjoy in Canada.

I cannot understand the negative attitude of my friends on the other side, who are inventing all sorts of excuses and who seem to want to destroy this beautiful country. It is for this reason that I am making my contribution today. As a Canadian and as a spokesman for my fellow citizens, I wish to express to the House their feelings and their desire to see their individual rights and their language rights guaranteed everywhere in Canada, along with their basic and democratic right to have their children educated in their mother tongue. It is the duty of all hon. members to place the rights of Canadians before those of the state. And it is for these reasons that I appeal to all Canadians to help us to entrench all these rights in the new Canadian constitution.

Mr. La Salle: You will have to convince Mr. Ryan!

Mr. Savard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention an example which some of us experienced during the Quinquennale de la francophonie in Winnipeg. I had an experience during my visit to that area. I saw people who were very proud of speaking French but who, unfortunately, for fear of losing their jobs, were obliged to speak English. The same thing happens in the universities. Students attend courses in French, but as soon as they leave the university they go back to speaking English.

I was looking at a television program recently on the twentieth anniversary of French television in Winnipeg, in which we were shown how French teaching in the school would cease the minute the inspector came into the classroom. As far as I am concerned, I find this situation deplorable and unacceptable. Francophones ask neither favour nor privilege, but merely the right to be treated as full partners and not as second-class citizens. They have the right to live and to develop in all the provinces of Canada.

I should like also, Mr. Speaker, to mention the magnificent work of our Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and his performance during his meeting with the ministers. In my view, he is quite right in saying that we must follow the work of Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Thomas, for it is worthy of mention. But when I hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I am afraid, and I am sure those two great men are turning in their graves.

Let us consider the right to economic mobility for our citizens across the country. What will happen to the right to life and liberty if we cannot move to or settle, work or invest in the province of our choice? Without this freedom, will our system become like those of totalitarian countries? As we know, the citizens of communist countries do not enjoy these rights; they don't even exist. In Russia, travel from one state to another requires a permit from the central government. Personally, I say that Canadians, in our country, have no intention of adopting this way of life, and on their behalf, I insist that this freedom, the right to mobility, be retained, because Canada is a free country from sea to sea.

With regard to economic union, Mr. Speaker, such union is important to the well-being of all Canadians, in addition to providing our vast and varied country with one of the highest standards of living in the world. The different regions and economic sectors must complement one another in order to conserve their resources, for without their mutual co-operation, Canada will become a country dependent upon other industrialized countries. Although the constitution in its 113 years has not kept pace with developments in society, I find it quite normal that the provinces should claim certain powers; if each one took only its share of the pie, it would be ideal. It is also normal that our government should retain those powers that affect the national interest and that concern the country as a whole. The new constitution should encompass this concept, while adapting to the evolution of the society to come. This action on the part of the government is justified, because there is no alternative. We have made a commitment to the people of Quebec, and we must now carry it out. We must have an amending formula binding the central government and all the provinces of Canada.

[English]

The Anglophones in my province have always had the opportunities and right to live and work in their language. They should have those rights guaranteed in our constitution, and their example should be made to all the other provinces. The rights and dignities of Francophones across this country should be held as dear as those of Anglophones in Quebec.

[Translation]

As we can see, the federal government has no intention of taking any power away from the provinces. During the recent discussions, the provinces wanted to negotiate these rights. I say that these rights are not negotiable. They belong to the men and women of Canada, and we must leave them what is theirs. It is now time to repatriate the constitution, with an amending formula, including every guarantee of the rights binding the federal and provincial governments, and to have a greater willingness to listen to those around us and to understand their needs. There is a need for greater generosity toward others. These factors are all equally important to the unity of the nation. Surely this is easy to understand. This is what we want for Canada. According to the opposition, it is an artificial Canada that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) envisions and would have us accept. Canada is a reality, and the hopes of Canadians are equally real.

The dream I spoke of earlier is one shared by all Canadian men and women—that of having all the freedoms and all the basic rights that we are believed to possess already in Canada. The provincial premiers are also agreed that we possess these rights. I can repeat the Prime Minister's question: if we have them now, why would they not want to entrench them in the constitution?

Last week, Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively as a member of the Opposition said that the Prime Minister was planting a time bomb in the very heart of the country and was preparing to demolish the Canadian federation. Well, I refuse to accept such a statement, which I consider an insult to the people of Canada, because the Prime Minister is one of the greatest men of Quebec and of Canada, regardless of what the opposition may think.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is one of our own, and no one can deny that, through his efforts, the position of Francophones has greatly improved. What is there to say about the adoption of the Official Languages Act, about the integration of Francophones at all levels of the public service across Canada? Through the force of his ideas and the firmness of his convictions, he has won the hearts of Quebeckers and has led them toward the kind of renewed federalism that is envisioned in this proposal.

[English]

The hour of decision has arrived. After 53 years, we are about to take the historic steps of bringing our constitution home, and giving all Canadians the rights, not privileges as some premiers would have it, that they deserve. That will be our legacy to future generations of Canadians, and that is why I will proudly vote in favour of the government's resolution before us tonight.

[Translation]

Politicians have now been trying to patriate the constitution for 53 years and all have failed. Now is the time to decide. We are going to take that decision and for the first time in our history the freedoms and fundamental rights of Canadians will be enshrined in a Canadian charter. We owe it to ourselves to patriate the Canadian constitution made in Canada by Canadians. We have the power and the duty to do so.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I participate in this debate with a degree of sadness and regret having regard to the fact that we have just had thrust upon this House one of the most repugnant and most destructive devices ever perpetrated on the democratic process. I am deeply saddened, because the debate that has taken place in this chamber for the last 24 hours interspersed over a couple of weeks or so is perhaps the most important historic debate I have ever witnessed in my 12 years as a member of the House. It is with a great deal of regret that I see it cut off prematurely having regard to its importance and the fact that some members who wanted to speak will not have that opportunity.

The government's action is the result of a move that is ruthless, arrogant and, I believe, cowardly. Parliament is now succumbing, as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) has said, to the tyranny of the majority. The excellent debate we have had so far is coming to an end. There have been many excellent speeches made in this chamber. It is perhaps the best debate I have ever witnessed in my 12 years here. Many of the speeches have been delivered with deep conviction, deep feeling and in a sincere manner. But the government's actions have turned the debate into one of bitterness and division; the atmosphere has become poisoned.

It seems to me there is a pattern in the way in which this government has approached constitutional reform. It is treating this House in the same way as it treated the premiers. It has ignored the warnings and the legitimate grievances which have been expressed by members on both sides of the House. The government has ignored the participation of the members who have spoken with such deep conviction and with such deep feeling. This government, it is very clear, thrives on confrontation. This is not in keeping with the Canadian tradition or the spirit of confederation.

I feel very badly and very deeply about this kind of atmosphere, and it should not be prevalent when we are dealing with such a basic fundamental and important issue. We must ask ourselves, "Why the haste all of a sudden?" We hear from members opposite that the process has been ongoing for 53 years and suddenly, bang, it comes to an end. Several members have quoted from the infamous secret document that was leaked, the document that was for ministers' eyes only. There are a couple of points contained in that document which should be put on the record. The first deals with the concern the government felt over the provinces taking the matter to court. Their considered opinion is summarized in a couple of points which I would like to put on the record:

A provincial reference to a Court of Appeal would probably take one and a half to two years from the time of initiation until it was finally disposed of on appeal to the supreme court. While there could be advantages in such a delay there would be some potential disadvantages; the province could frame the reference question without our agreement and . . . could focus solely on whether the procedure is in accordance with the Canadian conventions rather than whether the patriation measure adopted is legal. Also, while the ultimate supreme court pronouncement would be postponed by this process, there would be the additional risk of an earlier, possibly critical, provincial court judgment.

They are almost assuming that it would spell trouble if the matter got into the courts. The document goes on:

There would be a strong strategic advantage in having the joint resolution passed and the U.K. legislation enacted before a Canadian court had occasion to pronounce on the validity of the measure and the procedure employed to achieve it. This would suggest the desirability of swift passage of the resolution and U.K. legislation.

That is what they are afraid of and there are other motives as well with which I will deal. I want to say in all sincerity that there was deep division within the country when this debate started and that as a result of the actions of the government over the past 24 hours, there is more division today. I say this with great regret. There is frustration, tension and some very intense feeling which has now been transferred into outright anger.

The government is ignoring that feeling. I was surprised at the comments of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) who downplays the feelings of the west. Mr. Speaker and my friends in the House of Commons, that gentleman is fooling you because he is not really reflecting accurately the views of western Canadians as I see them, and I travel western Canada quite a bit. That view is not shared by a very distinguished Canadian, a former premier of the province of Alberta who serves in the other place.

Let me refer to some of his comments. He expresses the misgivings he feels about the way in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is proceeding with respect to patriation. At page 920 of Senate Debates for October 22, Senator Manning is reported as follows:

I do not question the Prime Minister's belief that he has chosen the right and responsible course, but he is wrong—terribly wrong—and he is risking unnecessarily the danger of tearing confederation apart.

That gentleman knows a bit about this country, Mr. Speaker, and he knows about the west. This matter has also been referred to by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) and several members from the Atlantic, as well as the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble). Over the past summer these members travelled the west and sensed the feelings there. They sensed that, in general, westerners feel that many of their grievances have been ignored and that there are further injustices ahead as a result of the government's action.

Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to understand the position of the New Democratic Party. I believe they have sold their soul in an attempt to garner some short-term political gain. As well, I believe they have betrayed their constituents in western Canada, because in my view, the resource issue is now fuzzier than ever. It is unclear. It is de facto ownership taken away. I believe the New Democratic Party has played into the Prime Minister's hands.

The result will be interpreted in the west as once again relegating them to the colonial status of 50 years ago. That is a significant number, because rights were gained through the passage of the Natural Resources Transfer Act of 1930 after long struggle and intense deliberation.

It was as a result of the passage of that legislation and other, subsequent, legislation that the ownership of resources was transferred to the provinces, as to the other provinces in confederation. It seems to me that the actions of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) constitute a backward step with respect to a very important, vital and fundamental element as far as western Canada is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Premier Blakeney is not buying the package. In my view, the New Democratic Party is ignoring that area of Canada which really rejected the Liberal party. People there declined to vote for the Liberal party, fearing something like this could happen. Those constituents who voted NDP in the last election will now have to swallow a Liberal policy.

The government and the New Democratic Party should not ignore some other facts which I want to place on the record. They should not ignore the fact that the minister in the other place who speaks for the province of Alberta does not support the amending formula contained in this resolution. Instead, he supports the Alberta position—the Vancouver formula. That is the position this party has adopted.

They should not ignore the fact that seven or eight provinces do not support the proposal, as is evidenced by the proposed court actions. They should not overlook the fact that day by day as this debate goes on and Canadians become more familiar with what is contained in the package, constitutional experts, editorialists and well-informed Canadians are openly expressing reservations about it. Notwithstanding this, the government has accelerated the pace at which it intends to proceed.

Why is there such concern in the country, Mr. Speaker? In my view there is concern because the proposal sets out to change the fundamental nature of Canadian confederation. Dr. Timothy Christian, a professor of constitutional law at Alberta University has referred to the package as a change which will move Canada closer to the American model. He states that the concept of binding referendums is a radical departure from parliamentary democracy.

What are some of the further concerns that bother me and other Canadians, Mr. Speaker? Substantive changes are proposed in the division of powers between the two levels of government. An amending formula is proposed which is not acceptable to the majority of provinces and, as has been pointed out on a number of occasions by speakers on this side, different classes of provinces are established for all time. The equality of status is gone. As the hon. member for Rosedale said, the provinces of the west can never become first-class provinces. This is regrettable because it disregards the reality of the current growth trends.

An hon. Member: You are reading the section wrong.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says I am reading the section wrong. Well, there must be a lot of other Canadians who are reading the section wrong, if that is the case. I do not see any great wisdom coming from the hon. member, who tried to get up on a phony point of order today.

In my view it establishes different classes of citizenship. Clause 42 has been alluded to on a number of occasions. It is a club, and not merely a device for dealing with a deadlock. Hon. members opposite would be advised to read it over and over again. It empowers the federal government to remould a nation through federal manipulation. This arouses suspicion, Mr. Speaker. It prompts one to ask what the motives of the government are. Is the Prime Minister serious when he says he believes that the presidential system of government, like that of France, might be the best for Canada? Is that his motive?

I have referred to provincial resource ownership. There is a great deal of uncertainty about that issue, Mr. Speaker. And what about Canada's first citizens—treaty rights, claims, Indian women? That area is certainly not clear and the Indians have not been consulted. The guarantees are less than clear. I should like to quote from an article in The Journal of St. Paul, Alberta, on October 15. It begins as follows:

If, indeed, the federal government patriates the British North America Act, as it proposes to do, without consent of the Indian people and without entrenching Indian treaty rights in a new constitution, it is guilty of a serious breach of trust, according to Eugene Steinhauer, President of the Indian Association of Alberta.

Later, the article continues:

The Indian nations of Alberta have taken the position publicly on numerous occasions that they are opposed to patriation of the BNA Act unless the Indian people are guaranteed that their treaty rights will be entrenched in the new constitution.

The treaties which were signed in good faith between the Crown and the Indian people more than a hundred years ago recognized the aboriginal peoples of this country as 'nations', Mr. Steinhauer says, 'and these treaties were agreements by which these nations peacefully surrendered many thousands of square miles of land in exchange for small parcels called "reserves". These parcels, and the right to self-government, belong to the Indian people "as long as the sun shines, the river flows and the grass grows.'

Referring to the innocuous clause 24 of the proposed charter the article goes on to say:

'This is a deliberate sidestepping of what should be a strong and positive statement reconfirming our treaties,' Steinhauer says. 'Our rights must be clearly defined.'

I certainly support that statement, and I am sure my hon. friends do as well, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the ownership of property, Mr. Speaker? When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) introduced this resolution he said he was completing some of the work started by the late Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker to enshrine the Bill of Rights into the constitution.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a very glaring omission in so far as the charter of rights versus the Bill of Rights is concerned. In the charter of rights I do not see any mention of the right of an individual to life, liberty, security and the enjoyment of property. That is not in the resolution before us. And why, Mr. Speaker? Does that mean we can look forward to the wholesale expropriation of land in this country? Maybe. We know what some of the philosophical musings of the Prime Minister were in earlier days. Is the real thrust of the Prime Minister emerging in this package? These are very serious questions, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: And there are no answers.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am sure that most Canadians do not realize that the right to enjoy ownership of property is omitted in this so-called entrenchment of human rights.

● (2230)

What about the right to life? That certainly should be basic and fundamental to a charter of human rights. Surely the right to life is the primary and basic human right on which all other rights depend. Without this right we can have no others, for a human being deprived of his life is deprived forever of all his other rights. The first duty of the state must therefore be the protection of human life, a duty which it owes to every human being before all else. Surely recognition of this, if Parliament is serious about preserving basic human rights, should involve immediately steps to end the legalized murder of unborn children in this country, about 60,000 of them annually.

I come now to the protection of minority language rights, English and French. What about new Canadians who do not have proficiency in English or French? Will they get any special rights under this proposition? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said that Canada is a country of minorities. He told us that this package would protect and guarantee the rights of minorities. How will new Canadians, who know nothing of French or English, be protected in this particular area? When we look at the composition of this country and the reality of Canada, we find that the population of the six eastern provinces is composed of British and French to the extent of some 80 per cent. The population on the prairies is composed of about 51 per cent who are of British and French origin. In more detail, 44 per cent are British, 7 per cent are French; 15 per cent are German and 10 per cent are Ukrainian. As well, there is a host of other minority groups. That is the reality of western Canada, Mr. Speaker. In my view, this proposition creates two classes of citizens.

When we set out to divide basic human rights, one thing becomes obvious. In the process of attempting to codify or define freedoms, you start limiting those freedoms. Our common law has allowed our traditions and customs to crystallize. To suggest that basic human rights are not already recognized in this reality is an overstatement of the fact.

In conclusion, if we want to preserve basic human rights, we must preserve this institution of Parliament because Parliament is a guardian of human rights. If we preserve this institution, we will preserve our human rights, but what we are doing today is destroying the role of Parliament.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in this debate in which we are asked to consider a resolution addressing the patriation of our constitution and including in its provisions a charter of rights and freedoms, entrenchment of the concept of equalization and an amending formula. As such, this resolution marks a turning point in Canadian history. I believe it provides a basis for progress in the future.

On Monday, October 6, 1980, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) on behalf of the government introduced this historic initiative in constitutional reform, an initiative which will move Canada the final step on the road to self-rule and independence. It will finally break the constitutional log jam which has plagued Canada for far too long.

[Translation]

The Minister of Justice and Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) has provided an opportunity for every member to take up a great challenge. It is for us, the members of this House, to take up this challenge. We must combine the best ideas of yesterday with those of today, and use them to build a foundation for our future. I sincerely believe that the future of this great country actually depends on the success of our current efforts. These efforts and initiatives will point the way for renewal of the basis of our nation, and will bring new vitality to our institutions.

[English]

Not since those dedicated men took such momentous decisions 113 years ago has the clear need for action by the national government, in the interests of Canada and of all Canadians, been so obvious. While we would all prefer that that action be based on consensus among all levels of government—and I think I speak for all members of this House when I say this—such consensus is not at hand nor is it reasonable to expect that it can or will be in the foreseeable future.

An hon. Member: It is possible.

Mr. Evans: Therefore, the choice is for unilateral action or for no action at all. I contend that the latter alternative is clearly unacceptable to Canadians.

Let us look at the nature of the unilateral action which has been proposed. The resolution we are considering is composed of a joint address from the House of Commons and the Senate to patriate our constitution in some form. In the course of preparing such an address, a joint committee made up of members of both chambers of Parliament and from all sides of those chambers will be struck to consider the resolution. The committee will have the power to appoint subcommittees, to sit whenever necessary and to gather information from a variety of sources. At the conclusion of these committee hearings, recommendations will be made to the House and the Senate for further debate.

The mandate and the timetable for this committee are clear. Yet there are those who claim this procedure is not only a plot, but, indeed, a sinister attack on the federal system. In my view, the procedure we are following is neither of those things. Rather, it is a clear reaffirmation of our parliamentary system of government. It assures that the constitutional choices which face our nation will be made in Parliament by the representatives of all Canadians. They will be made by parliamentarians exercising their responsibility to the people of Canada. Far from attacking the federal system, the actions proposed by the government indicate an understanding of the federalism of our founding fathers. They indicate a concern for the future of Canada, a realistic view of government and an understanding of Canadian institutions.

As will be gathered from my remarks, I take exception to the view that Canada is a "community of communities" or an association of ten provinces whose governments are not only co-equal but, in a very real sense, superior to the national government. According to this view, the national government must not do anything with which the provincial governments disagree, and indeed must do anything the provincial premiers agree among themselves ought to be done.

Carried to its logical conclusion, the national government in such a Canada would be no more than a central secretariat to implement the biddings of the provinces. We would no longer be a federation but, rather, a loose grouping of several more or less sovereign states.

I reject this view of Canada, Mr. Speaker, as did, I contend, the Fathers of Confederation. Nothing could be further from the conception of the Canada which emerged from Charlottetown in 1864.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our federal system was designed to enable the national government to take responsibility for the welfare of all Canadians. This objective is clearly defined in our constitution, which gives the central government power to act in order to maintain peace, order and good government. I might add that the central government even has the power to disallow provincial legislation. Confederation does not mean a weak, loose union, as some provinces and some opposition members believe; on the contrary, confederation means more than the mere sum of its parts.

● (2240)

The purpose of this confederation as conceived by the Fathers of Confederation was to establish an overriding national presence in northern North America with the ability to ameliorate disputes among the members of the union. It is this heritage which all of us in this House have solemnly sworn to protect and to foster. It is this heritage which the resolution we are considering acknowledges. However, while our political system was based on principles of accommodation and amelioration, I believe these principles have tended to become blurred over time, to a large degree as a result of decisions taken by the Privy Council in London prior to the establishment of the Supreme Court in Canada, decisions which dramatically altered the confederation of our Canadian founders.

I sincerely believe we must move now to establish an alternative to unanimity as the decision rule for resolving fundamental national conflicts; we must move now to re-establish the fundamental principles upon which our confederation was founded, we must move now to arrest the drift towards regionalism and alienation which threatens the national interest. I sincerely believe that if we fail to do these things, if instead we opt for inaction in the name of immediate harmony, we will certainly see the dissolution of Canada in the future.

Never before, since 1867, have Canadians faced such an obvious choice. We can either act now to establish effective means to modernize and maintain the currency of our system, or we can watch the system break down under the weight of its current inflexibility.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has postulated that we run the risk of breaking up this country by affirming the resolution put forward by the Minister of Justice. Yes, unilateral action is potentially divisive. Yes, there is a risk of discord.

However, if this is the case, how could the Leader of the Opposition, as he supposedly does, and as I believe he does, put the motion yesterday to unilaterally patriate and, not only that, but to impose an amending formula without any discussion between the government at the federal level and the provinces?

What is the basis of the risk that is at the bottom of the fear of the Leader of the Opposition. Is it unilateral action? Is it the imposition of an amending formula? That cannot be the basis of the fears of the Leader of the Opposition. His motion put forward both unilateral action and an amending formula.

The resolution before the House calls for an amending formula of unanimity for two years, during which time discussions can take place between the federal government and the provincial governments. We can come to an agreement on an acceptable amending formula. At the end of that time, the Victoria formula is there. If it is not agreed to among the provinces, the provinces can put forward an alternative. Those two alternatives can be placed before the people of Canada for their decision.

That is a much more reasonable and conciliatory approach than simply to say, because of what is assumed by hon. members opposite, that the Vancouver consensus is what all the provinces want, therefore we will impose it on them. That does not seem to be a reasonable thing to do. Therefore, I have to say that it cannot be the amending formula that is the cause of this great risk of dissension.

I looked at the speeches by the Leader of the Opposition, his opening speech and the speeches he made involving questions of privilege and so on. I ask myself: is equalization the basis of the risk? I noticed in the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition he said equalization was, in fact, a desirable thing. If it is so desirable, I wonder why it was not included in his motion yesterday. I believe the Leader of the Opposition sincerely thinks equalization should be in the constitution.

I therefore have to assume from his statements that equalization is not the basis of the risk which is going to tear this country apart. If it is not unilateral action, not the amending formula and not equalization, there is only one thing left. That is the charter of rights. I would have liked to have heard more discussion on the charter of rights, if that is the basis of our difficulty. If it is, why, in the last two and a half weeks, have we heard so little discussion on the charter of rights per se and where the problems are.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) made some interesting points this evening. He brought forward some rational observations. Hon. members opposite have seen me sitting in the chamber listening attentively to what they have to say. However, I have not heard a great deal of discussion on the charter of rights, which I have to conclude is the basis for the disagreement. Universal imposition of a charter of rights has to be the basis of the great risk which is going to tear the country apart.

I find some other difficulties. This evening the hon. member for Vegreville indicated his knowledge that the Indian people oppose unilateral patriation without guarantees of their fundamental rights. How could the hon. member for Vegreville last night support the motion put by the Leader of the Opposition to patriate the constitutional unilaterally without having those rights entrenched in the constitution?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: We will put them in when we get it back over here.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says they will put those rights in when we get them back here. The hon. member for Vegreville made the point that the Indian leaders have said they do not want patriation at all unless those rights are in the constitution, guaranteed before it comes back. But knowing this, saying he supports that view, he supported the motion last night of the Leader of the Opposition.

We believe the resolution before this House is a course of action that holds far less risk than the alternatives proposed by the opposition of either no action or actions which would ultimately further regional separations. The government proposes unilateral action but this action is not divisive in itself since it does not affect the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments. It does provide, at last, a clear means for resolving our future disagreements and for clarifying our past disagreements which have been with us for many years. As such, the government proposal minimizes the long-term risk of conflict and political paralysis.

It is clear that nation-building is neither a smooth nor easy process. Nor is it furthered by giving in on all fronts to regional demands in a search for harmony. Nation-building is fraught with trials and challenges, and, to succeed, these challenges must be accepted and trials faced. Neither inaction and indecision nor mindless capitulation can long be tolerated. Time is certain to bury those who refuse to face these fundamental facts of life.

● (2250)

If the Fathers of Confederation had adopted a wait-and-see attitude or a negotiate-forever stance, I am convinced that we would not today have the privilege of holding Canadian citizenship. If the fathers of confederation had adopted "a province-building at the expense of nation-building" attitude, Canada never would have been formed in the first place.

I say to the Leader of the Opposition that we have no choice but to renew our constitution now, and that in view of the clear impasse which we face as a result of the current unanimity rule, the federal government has no choice but to act unilaterally and decisively.

In the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> Now it is our time to repay our inheritance. Our duty is clear: it is to complete the foundations of our independence and of our freedoms.

After all, if it is not the role and responsibility of the national government, the government in which all Canadians are represented, to take action in the face of a clearly perceived need, then I ask hon. members opposite and hon. members on my own side, what is the role of the national government? I reiterate that decisive action in the national interest is indeed the role of the national government as perceived not only by ourselves but also by our founding fathers.

Much has changed since 1867, and the distribution of powers has shifted dramatically from this initial conception, but it is important in this debate to understand clearly that the initial conception of the distribution of powers between governments in Canada perceived the very real danger of political paralysis. To ignore the current fact of this paralysis would be to deny the wisdom of our founders.

The federal government has the responsibility and the duty to act in the national interest. The resolution before this House is consistent with this responsibility and duty. It is important for all of us to embrace the principles in this resolution. I sincerely believe that the risk of losing Canada is not presented by this resolution. Rather, it is presented by a continuation of the status quo.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in all my life I have never seen so much hypocrisy as we have seen from the other side of this House. Hon. members opposite have been talking about being loyal to Canada, but not one of them, not even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), would stand up today when "O Canada" was being sung. When two Liberal members did stand up, they were beckoned to sit down. In other words, the party over there has become a bunch of Trudeau clones. Whatever Trudeau says, that is what they do. The people of Canada are catching on to this hypocrisy.

Another case of hypocrisy which is sickening to the people of Canada is that hon. members opposite get up now and praise the late Right. Hon. John Diefenbaker. When he was alive they insulted him and did everything they could to hurt him. They persecuted him. They thwarted his efforts. Now that he has passed on they are praising him. Such hypocrisy is sickening.

Hon. members opposite talk about having high principles. The other day when my hon. friend, the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Kushner), introduced a resolution asking that we support Terry Fox and those who are suffering and dying of cancer, the Liberals said no. They turned it down. I say, shame. They made a mistake that day. The hon. member gave them another chance. He introduced it a second time in order to help Terry Fox help the people who are dying of cancer, but the Liberals again said no. What high principles? What kind of outfit is this government which does not even want to help the cancer people of this country?

Besides hypocrisy, I have never seen anything more like a dictatorship than what we see on the other side of the House. I joined the Royal Canadian Air Force to fight against totalitarianism. I did everything I was told to do for three years. I never thought I would have to come back and fight totalitarianism in the House of Commons in Canada. However, that is what we are doing. We hear many fabrications and half-truths. We see efforts to fool the people of this country. It is no wonder hon. members opposite want closure. The people are getting their eyes opened, and if they had another week there would almost be a revolution in this country. There may be even now, because people are hearing half-truths from the government from the Prime Minister down.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister and Stuart Smith, the Liberal leader in Ontario, went from town to town telling the people of Ontario—endeavouring to brainwash them—that the oil and gas of Alberta belong to all the people of Canada. They forgot to say that the gold of Ontario belongs just to the people of Ontario. They forgot to say that the hydro of Quebec belongs just to the people of Quebec and that the timber of B.C. belongs just to the people of B.C. They defiled themselves by telling something which is completely contrary to the BNA Act. They said that these natural resources in Alberta, gas and oil, belong to all the people of Canada. They had to be elected by fabrication.

Here hon. members opposite talk about honesty and truthfulness. It is no wonder the people cannot believe the Prime Minister. It is no wonder they have no faith in the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: With regard to half truths, the Prime Minister goes to the press and says this package he is presenting is the result of what the people of Quebec wanted when they voted against national sovereignty. That is a complete fabrication. Even Claude Ryan, the Liberal leader of Quebec, will not go along with that. He will take this government to court if the government of Quebec will not. Hon. members opposite stand up and ask the people to believe them. We cannot believe a thing the Prime Minister of Canada says.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: There are some hon. members opposite, including the hon. member from Manitoba, who tried to fool this House today that the people of western Canada are not thinking seriously about these things. I wonder why 600 people showed up at a separation meeting in Red Deer the other night. I wonder why the people of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and B.C. are organizing separation movements. One of them claims it has 13,000 members. They are completely fed up with what the Liberals are giving them in western Canada.

I want to give one example. Bob Giles was the editor and publisher of The Watchman, an Argenteuil paper, in the Argenteuil-Two Mountains constituency. He was the publisher and editor of the family business there that was started more than 75 years ago. Mr. Giles and his paper supported the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) after his first nomination as a candidate to contest that riding right up until Mr. Giles left the province of Quebec. He was writing editorials against separation. He went out to Alberta in 1977 and became the publisher and editor of the Strathmore Standard in the Alberta Bow River constituency. Since that time he made a study of the alienation he saw all around him and the reasons people were becoming disgruntled with the federal government. He found out what it was all about. He became disenchanted with the present Prime Minister and the Liberal government. The other day he even purchased a cap to show that he was no longer going to support the Liberal government. He wants fairness in this country, and he is wearing a cap like the one I have in my hand now. On it it says: "Western Republic of Canada". He is not breaking away from Canada. We would not let the Prime Minister drive us out of this country. But Bob Giles is wearing this cap. I am not wearing it yet, but if we have much more of this totalitarianism, I will be the next one to put it on.

People in western Canada do not want—nor do they ask for—any special deal or special consideration. Their long-festering anger has been aggravated by the refusal of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to give Alberta a reasonable price for its oil and gas and by the Prime Minister and Stuart Smith endeavouring to brainwash central Canadians by telling them that Alberta gas and oil belong to all Canadians, which is a complete fabrication and a denial of the BNA Act.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised the people of western Canada—and I was there and heard him at the western resources conference—that he would correct the unfairness about freight rates. Freight rates are at their apex in this country. We pay the highest rates going west and we pay the highest rates going east. The Prime Minister made a promise to the people of western Canada when he said that there was no reason why one quarter of the population should not have a fair deal. He promised them a fair deal in freight rates but he has done nothing about it. By dilly-dallying and leaving the grain transportation in the mess it was in 1979, he is ruining the farmers. He ruined our oil industry by establishing an export price for oil a few years ago. He has set back the industry four years. No wonder we are still paying millions of dollars for imported oil. Most of it is owing to the very actions of the present Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Bob Giles, once a strong Liberal, now has taken a stand the other way. He wants fairness in this country. The only way he can get it, he thinks, is to establish a republic in western Canada. He asked me to give this cap to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) with his compliments in the hope that the minister will take it to the next cabinet meeting and show the Prime Minister what he is doing to Canada. He is breaking up Canada, he is dividing this country.

Mr. Speaker, I will not simply stand and say, "yes, yes" the way the Liberal members are doing, because I see the country being broken up.

An hon. Member: That is right!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: In 1968, the Prime Minister promised the people a just society, and he gave them the War Measures Act. In 1972, he promised them a new society, and he gave them record inflation and unemployment. In 1974, he promised no wage and price controls. He ridiculed the then leader of the opposition, the Hon. Robert Stanfield, and then he imposed wage and price controls, though not as it would have been done had Mr. Stanfield been elected. In 1980, he promised no increase in gas prices, and he gave them an increase. Everybody who goes to the pump knows that.

What about our natural resources? All we are asking for is a fair deal. We went through the depression years. I went hungry and I saw my mother go hungry in those years. I made up my mind, growing up with all that wheat in the fields and all that abundance, that there is no reason why men and women, boys and girls should be hungry in the midst of plenty. I made up my mind that I would do everything I could to make sure that no other Canadian would have to suffer that way. Then we found oil—not with the help of people in eastern Canada but with the help of Americans. Now things are looking a little better. Because we are doing well, we get ridicule from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and from the Prime Minister. They are angry because we are building up the heritage fund to make sure we never have to go back to those times again. They want to destroy our industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: They say we do not share. We have shared with every other province equally. In addition to that we have shared $17 billion by selling our oil and gas at a lower price to Canadians than the world price. I wonder if anybody who has gold in Ontario did that, or those who have hydro or those who have timber. We have paid the full price for our machinery. We have paid through the nose every time. You want us to continue to give and give. No wonder hundreds of people are wearing this cap. I want to tell you that if you continue this kind of thing, you will break up Canada and you will not have Canada to govern. You had better think it over pretty carefully.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: This fabrication and this hypocrisy is all we get. Here we have the Prime Minister and the Leader of the NDP telling the people that they are giving them something. Let us look at the BNA Act. It says that all lands, mines, minerals and royalties belong to the provinces. They already own them. Then look at the letter which the Prime Minister sent to the Leader of the NDP which warms the heart of the Leader of the NDP who then cuddles up to the Prime Minister. This is what the letter says:

—confirm the jurisdiction of the provinces with respect to exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources—

There is nothing about ownership there. This is less than we have now under the BNA Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Who are they trying to fool? They must think the people of Canada are illiterate. The people of Canada are not illiterate. There is another thing in that letter which warmed the heart of the New Democratic Party Leader. I am referring to the words "subject to full federal paramountcy" in the letter. They still want to have their hand in there to do what they like, even in that letter. No wonder Mr. Blakeney will not fall for that kind of thing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: The people of Canada will not be doing it either. There is another thing I want to say. They do not even say what they want to manage. Is it management of prices or is it management of drilling? Mr. Trudeau does not say anything about that.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Taylor: His answer to a question today showed us the totalitarian concept of our Prime Minister. The Leader of the NDP asked the Prime Minister if he would nationalize the oil industry, and Mr. Trudeau's answer was "no, not at this time."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I should like to call the attention of the hon. member that it is not the practice of the House to refer to members of this House by their names. They should be referred to either by their constituencies or their ministries.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Leader of the Liberal party are two of a kind. What was the answer of the Prime Minister? It was "not at this time". I tell the people of Canada: beware, because he will not say he will not nationalize. What he says is "not at this time." In his own book written a little while ago called, "Federalism, Nationalism and Reason—by Pierre E. Trudeau"—I have to say his name because that is what it says on the book—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: He wrote:

Thus when a tightly knit minority within a state begins to define itself forcefully and consistently as a nation, it is triggering a mechanism which will tend to propel it towards full statehood.

Here he is planning for that day. He spoke to the Montreal students about a French republic. He said it would be better for us to have a French republic. If he wants a French republic, why will he not stand up and say so? I have nothing againt a French republic, but why is he beating around the bush and trying to sneak it into the constitution for the British parliament to pass?

Then we heard a few other things the other day about there being no other alternative. That is nonsense. The premiers of this province are ready and willing. We could have had agreement, as Senator Manning said in his speech in the Senate the other day. If the package had not been put there with all the pet theories of the Prime Minister, there could have been agreement. He did it deliberately so they would not reach agreement. He is not fooling anyone. He did not want an agreement. He wanted to be a hero. But nobody thought he would try to sneak it over to England and have it passed by the British parliament. Oh, he is so embarrassed when he goes over there to ask for an amendment. The other day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) felt so bad that tears almost streamed down his face because they had to go to the British parliament for an amendment. But where is that embarrassment now when he is asking for a whole package of amendments? The Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have each said there are no changes in the powers. I want to say that there is a change in the powers. They are projecting themselves into provincial jurisdictions. That is exactly what they are doing. The BNA Act puts education under provincial control, and the government is deliberately projecting itself into provincial jurisdiction. Education is a responsibility of the provinces. The regulations indicate that parents have the right to send their children to schools of their choice, whether English or French.

I sent a questionnaire out to the householders in my constituency. One question I asked was: Are you in favour of guaranteeing in the constitution the right of a minority group speaking either French or English to have their children educated in the language of the minority? Sixty-four per cent of the replies indicated they were not in favour of putting this into the constitution. The second question was: Do you consider it sufficient to trust each province to provide such facilities where the need exists? Seventy per cent said, "Yes, we are prepared to trust each province". Putting that in the constitution will be counterproductive. It will make people who believe today that the government is forcing French down their throats, say, "There, I told you; they are even asking for an amendment to the BNA Act".

Let me tell the House what the province of Alberta is already doing. It is providing full services for children of French parentage from Grade I to university, wherever the numbers require it. The provincial department and the school boards are co-operative, the private and separate school boards are co-operative. They provide education for Ukrainians and Germans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate this evening in this most important debate. We have all expressed our respect for this institution. When we think about this institution, we recognize that it involves the adversary system. But when one witnesses what was presented in the House tonight and all other remarks made by members of the official opposition respecting this important matter, one wonders about the adversary system.

With respect to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), the most charitable comment one could make is that he coloured the issue of the constitution very well, indeed. I say "coloured" and not "covered" because he did not address himself to the issue before the House tonight.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I immediately agreed with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he invited members of the House to speak about the issue at hand. He invited hon. members to speak about the constitution, not what we have witnessed here—innuendo, name-calling and misrepresentation of the worst kind. That is what we have seen in the House of Commons. There is one word for that type of demagoguery. It is despicable. That is the word for it.

We could get into the same type of response. If we want to pretend that this institution is supposed to work that way—that we do not discuss bills or the issue before us, that we attempt to mislead Canadians, we can do so, especially with the advent of television. Hon. members opposite have not explained that this is not a bill, that it is only a motion, that we will refer it to committee and it will come back.

Some hon. Members: It is not a motion.

Mr. Harquail: It is a resolution. We are moving motions with respect to the resolution.

Mr. Epp: It is not a resolution.

Mr. Harquail: They do not tell Canadians—

An hon. Member: You do not know what it is.

Mr. Harquail: They do not tell Canadians through the media that there will be a continuing debate and freedom of expression in this House, which is what this very institution stands for.

Mr. Clark: When? How much?

Mr. Harquail: I have the privilege of doing that tonight. I am able to express myself without their interruptions. This is what the House of Commons is all about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: The right to be heard is the basic, fundamental principle of the House; members opposite should take some lessons—

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Clark: —I wonder if the hon. member who is speaking would answer the following two questions for me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: How is the right to speak guarded by the imposition of closure?

Mr. Lalonde: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Clark: How many days of debate will be guaranteed in this House of Commons after a report from committee?

Mr. Harquail: Canadians gave the gentlemen who just spoke a great right when they gave him the title of "Right Honourable." I should think that he would want to think before he speaks and give some respect to that right.

Mr. Clark: Answer the question!

Mr. Harquail: I will answer you in the way you should be answered. When I have finished my time in which to speak, I will be happy to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect, the hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Clark: Please.

Mr. Harquail: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. This institution is what debating is about. If I were to debate with the right hon. gentleman, I would suggest that he should speak with the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) who has some suggestions about his performance in recent times, if I remember correctly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: That is what concerns the right hon. gentleman. That is what preoccupies the right hon. gentleman, especially with the type of advice he received tonight. That is why he is concerned, that is why he is grabbing for straws. He has been on every side. I could not imagine any other position he could take on this issue. He has been on every side of the waterfront. That is what he has been doing. He does not say that we came back here early, that we reconvened the session earlier than planned. He does not mention that.

An hon. Member: A 24-hour debate.

Mr. Harquail: They are on this 24-hour kick. Do they think they can mislead and fool Canadians?

An hon. Member: Not as well as you can.

Mr. Harquail: Do they think they can fool Canadians as the House leader for the official opposition tried to do this afternoon? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre tried to twist what Madam Speaker had said in this honourable chamber and tried to tear away the respect we all have for the Chair. Is that what it is supposed to be all about—anything at all costs? Is that the position being taken by the opposition?

Mr. Clark: It is your policy.

Mr. Harquail: With respect to the constitution—

An hon. Member: You have no respect.

Mr. Harquail: We all believe in a good foundation. Usually one starts with a foundation. I would have thought premiers, Canadians and parliamentarians here would want to co-operate to bring the constitution back here. We have our Canadian flag and we have our national anthem, O Canada. For the last 53 years of federal-provincial conferences we have seen delaying tactics. First we got the flag, more recently we got O Canada, and now we are getting down to discussing the constitution. I think that explains the situation very adequately for Canadians. Because of the adversary system, they feel they must fight every issue—the flag, O Canada, Canada itself and the constitution—just for the sake of being able to say that they have been a good opposition. Especially when it is as plain as the noses on their faces, can they not see the light and understand what Canadians want?

• (2320)

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Members on this side of the House will agree to say nothing further during the hon. member's speech if he will agree to say something to the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, that intervention is typical. It is a waste of the time of the House and it is not fair. At one time the hon. member was, I believe, the parliamentary secretary to the House leader and I would have thought he would have picked up a little in the short time he was in that position. You do not raise frivolous points of order and take up the time of another speaker to do it. I respectfully request him not to do that.

What are we witnessing here? There is a section in the Criminal Code which talks about inciting. I submit that some of the comments which have been made in recent days, and especially today, by previous speakers on the opposite side of the House, fall dangerously close to inciting Canadians—spreading fear about the threat and danger of what is going to happen to Canada.

An hon. Member: You cannot incite with the truth.

Mr. Harquail: I would like to read from a recent letter to an editor signed by a Canadian from Jasper, Alberta. It says:

> I have been visiting Ottawa for some weeks and have followed carefully the political speeches of the various party leaders.
> Since my home is in western Canada and I am reasonably familiar with the views of our fellow citizens out there, may I say that the artless naiveté of Mr. Joe Clark with respect to the possibility of western Canada separating from the rest of the country on account of the constitutional question is pure hallucination.

That is the truth. The letter goes on to say:

> Where would we go on our own? We are in no way prepared to defend ourselves in case of a war. Would we wish to be gobbled up by the United States? We know that the American states have much less independence and rights than have the provinces of Canada.

And these will be protected when we patriate the contitution, protected to an even greater extent. The writer of the letter goes on to say:

> It is little wonder that Canadians quickly got the low-down on our Joe and dumped him promptly.
> I read that magnificent letter of Prof. Arthur Lower of Queen's University and I agree with him completely. Truly, "If you, Mr. Prime Minister, succeed in holding us together and preventing the provinces destroying us, no name in Canadian history will go down in greater honour than yours."

And the letter is signed by J. R. Dietrich, of Jasper, Alberta.

An hon. Member: Which newspaper?

Mr. Harquail: I am prepared to say where I received the information. It was in The Citizen.

We have all travelled across this country and we all have a very deep sense of pride in being Canadian. Part of my work in the last six years has taken me to the west. I have relatives and, yes, I have friends there. They are true Canadians, they are in a majority and they are not talking about separation. They are talking about the future of this country; that is what they talk about because they are sincerely dedicated to keeping the country together. That is what I support. That is what I like about westerners; they are not afraid to say they are proud to be Canadian. Whether you are in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba, that is what Canada is all about.

I would like to say something with respect to the all-important aspect of entrenching rights, which is one of the main questions in this debate. I live in northern New Brunswick, which borders la belle province de Québec, on the banks of the Restigouche River, and I went to the school board so that my sons could learn the second language. And, yes, some 15 years ago I was told: No, but we might allow you to put them in an immersion course; we only need 16 students and if we could just borrow your son he would round out the members for the class. I had no intention of accepting that. I wanted my sons to go into a pure French class and to really get the feel of the second language, the French language. I am happy to tell you that because of my perseverance I won my case with the school board and all my sons have gone through the elementary classes—right up to grade 7—in French, not in an immersion class but in a pure French class. And my three sons are beautifully bilingual today. That is what I believe in.

[Translation]

When I was young I did not have the opportunity to learn French, the second language of our country, because our schools were English.

Mr. Speaker, for a long time in my public life I have supported the position of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in so far as the Acadians of New Brunswick are concerned. Yes, I will defend the Acadians of New Brunswick! Yes, I will defend the basic rights of the French language in the constitution! That is my position, without reservation!

[English]

That is why I am very pleased to have the privilege of standing in my place tonight to say that this is what I have offered and told my people we would work for—not only for the rights of language, but for cultural, educational and all the other fundamental rights which we have been talking about and which are so very important to the future. That is the aspect which is important to the future survival of this country. We do not have to go around drumming or dreaming up some imaginary story in order to spook or scare Canadians about what is going to happen in this country.

I implore all members of this House to show some respect for this institution, to try to see the other members' points of view. Many of us have had the opportunity to travel outside Canada. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, are aware of the feeling you have when you return to Canada, where we have freedom, where we can walk the streets without fear for life and safety. That is the greatest aspect of this country and one we should preserve and protect. I do not need to delay the House by enumerating all the countries where you cannot do that. I just wanted to draw attention to it tonight because I have had occasion to travel in other countries and am so delighted to get back to Canada. When you see people getting down to kiss the very soil, you recognize that that is the feeling you have when you come back to this great country. We know the reasons why we are proud to be Canadian. It is because of the rights we have and because we are willing to take up our responsibilities and accept our duty. We intend to see to it that once the constitution is back we will have free debate.

Mr. Speaker, we see the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) saying, one minute, that he agrees we should bring back the constitution. The next minute he is saying he doesn't like the way we are approaching the situation. He should make up his mind.

Let me conclude with a quotation from the Institute of Research on Public Policy. It says:

> The problem has been that in recent years the traditional economic links between the Canadian provinces have been eroding. In my opinion that erosion could, if not reversed, threaten our very survival as a nation.
> If we are to succeed in our quest for a strengthened nation and a renewed Canada then we must begin by making a commitment and a conscious decision not only to rework constitutional arrangements but to build solid economic relationships among the regions of Canada. We need a new set of economic and political relationships which can accommodate our existing strengths across the country—in the maritimes, in Quebec, in Ontario and in the west—in such a way that we reinforce each other in a genuine partnership that creates a stronger and more united whole and a more united country.

In concluding, I hope we will not abuse the rules of this House and not abuse the television coverage that is going out to the people in such a way that the only word that can be applied is "misleading". It is misleading in almost every aspect on all fronts with respect to the subject matter which we have been debating since we returned from the summer recess. What I would like to see is a sensible, realistic approach to the responsibilities and the work which we are called upon to do here.

While we are talking about rights—and it does not matter whether I take the time on a question of privilege or a point of order or on another occasion—what about the question of television within this House? As a result of television, this House is no longer what it once was. In many instances, it is now a television studio. One of the deals was that we would not have editing or abuses of the service of bringing the message to Canadians which they are perfectly entitled to receive. Now members opposite want to extend television beyond the House into other areas. But that subject might best be left for debate at some other time. I cannot recall that during the short time I have been here we have debated the pros and cons of televising the debates of this House or agreed that we would allow people and the media outside the chamber to play with the debates. That is not my understanding of the original plan. We will have a chance to come back to this matter another time. However, it is an example of people treading upon other people's rights and of people misleading other people. It is divisive and a great threat to this country and it is something which I, in the coming months and years, will work to correct.

In the meantime I would like to express my appreciation to at least some of the members who have courteously allowed me to express myself in this free, democratic institution. I would hope that as we go on to the work in committee and as we come back to this chamber, each and every member will have had the opportunity to express himself, or herself, through that cherished, precious right of freedom of speech which relates to the very work we are doing in terms of the constitution and all the work we will carry out once the constitution is brought back in terms of the amending formula.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, returning to my point of order—and I know the hon. member would not want to mislead the House or the public—I would remind him of his undertaking to reply to my two questions at the end of his remarks. I would like him to explain to us how freedom of speech is guaranteed by the imposition of closure. Second, and this matter is of very real interest to all members of the House, he spoke about the opportunity for full debate once the matter is out of committee. Will the hon. member tell us now how many days and weeks of full debate in the House of Commons the Government of Canada is prepared to guarantee once the proposal comes back from committee? The hon. member claims to be interested in the right of parliamentary debate, so these points should be of interest to him, and I know he wanted the opportunity to respond.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to the Leader of the Opposition for giving me the opportunity to speak once again. I would like to explain to the Canadian people that we have rules in this House. Standing Orders 75A, B and C have on many occasions been misquoted in a misleading fashion. Standing Order 75C has been referred to as closure. It was never closure. This is closure, but all those other times we were not on closure. With respect to the other question, I would have thought the right hon. member would have learned the lesson as Prime Minister to respect his House leader. Our House leader answers for our party and he will give indication to members opposite about the decisions by government, which has been elected to govern, as to how much time will be allotted for the debate and when we will debate, and I suspect the right hon. gentleman respects that.

Mr. Clark: That means we will have closure again.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, it is with feelings of pleasure and regret that I stand in this House tonight to speak on the constitution and the future of Canada. The regret is that I have only 20 minutes to speak. I hear hon. members opposite saying that all they need is another westerner. We just heard the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) talk about the freedom of this House and now some members are saying that all they need is another westerner. I can tell hon. members opposite that we in western Canada feel that we are a part of Canada. We are proud of Canada and we intend to tell the people of Canada about our feelings and how we want to stay in Canada.

Members are allowed only 20 minutes to speak on the Constitution of Canada. The future of our country, the future of my children, my grandchildren and my great grandchildren will be decided by members who will speak for a brief 20 minutes. We have had only 24 hours of debate. Some of my hon. friends on this side will not have an opportunity to speak this evening. Many of them will be denied that right because of the gag rule, because of closure, because of the stifling of free speech which has been imposed upon this House.

Yesterday the House had the opportunity to debate and vote on a motion proposed by my party which would immediately patriate, immediately domicile in Canada, the Constitution of Canada. It could have been brought home with an amending formula agreed upon by the ten premiers of Canada and then debated in this House until we had a Canadian constitution for Canadians. We all know what happened. We have not changed our ideas about Canada. We have not changed our ideas on getting the constitution home, but the government voted against our proposal.

Not only did the government vote against it, but so did members of the New Democratic Party. The loudest objection which we heard yesterday from members of the government was that our proposal would allow some provinces the right to opt out if there was a federal intrusion on their jurisdiction. It would have allowed them to decide whether or not they would like to be included in a federal instrusion on their jurisdiction. They said that was not right.

The people of Canada not only elect members to the House of Commons, but they also elect members to the legislatures and they, too, are Canadians who represent their people and they, too, have a right in Canada. When I entered this House a year ago, I had many things in mind. I entered it with a great deal of respect for all members but particularly for those of long service. Some of those whom I respect have a legend which goes before them. One such member is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who is known as a great citizen and an upright supporter of the free speech.

Yesterday when this government imposed closure on us, that supposedly hon. member whom I respected did not stand when it came time. He sat in his place and allowed the House of Commons to be gagged without uttering a word. The people from Saskatchewan, Kindersley-Lloydminster constituency which I represent and the people from all the other constituencies, which are represented by members of my party and members of the New Democratic Party, have a belief in Canada and want to stay in Canada. I was pleased when the Prime Minister made the announcement that the constitutional resolution would be represented in the House. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), though we are not of the same political party and have several differences of opinion, expressed the feelings, the desires and concerns of their constituents.

The hon. member for Prince Albert is quoted in the Prince Albert Daily Herald of Friday, October 3, as saying, "Prime Minister Trudeau's move to patriate the British North America Act is a study in cynicism". He said that the Prime Minister was trying to patriate without provincial consensus, that he ignored the issues and that a provincial consensus was needed if the federal government was going to continue to pursue its options. I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert, Mr. Speaker, but I regret that I have not heard him speak on this very important matter in the House. I would like to think that he will continue to represent the wishes of his constituents.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) stood in his place in this House and in a fine and eloquent manner spoke of the pitfalls and inequities that he saw in the resolution. As to sections 42 and 46 concerning the amending formula he said it was not proper that under this resolution the right could be given through an amending formula and taken away through a manipulative referendum which denied the basic partnership and essence of federalism. That is what he said in this House. I hope members of his party continue to talk that way because I believe they truly represent their constituents. That is what we hear. That is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was saying when he said we should set aside our differences. I agree with those two members of the NDP but I should like to ask whether there are other members who feel that way and who may not have spoken in the House. Only one member from that party spoke on the resolution today. As I understood the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he was speaking on an amendment or a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Does the hon. member not realize, with respect to our stand on closure, that we voted against it today solidly? Does he not realize that I did make a full 20-minute speech today, including our attack on closure? The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) made a full 20-minute speech and we have another one to come. Would the hon. member not like to get his facts straight?

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I certainly retract my remarks about the matter on which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking, but sometimes we hear 20-minute speeches from the hon. gentleman on other matters. I do apologize to the hon. gentleman.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) spoke as well, and I referred to his speech earlier today. In effect he was saying, "My leader said that we support in principle most, if not all, of the items in the resolution," but then he went on to say, "with regard to resources taxation." He then quoted the former premier of the province of British Columbia, Mr. Barrett, as saying:

British Columbia is prepared to share all the oil and natural gas rights granted to it by the constitution if the Government of Canada would put under public control all of the oil and gas in the country.

That is very nice, for the people of British Columbia. Then he added the comment that it appears the NDP are willing and want the province to maintain jurisdiction over natural resources, that is, unless the federal government would promise to nationalize all the natural resources—then they would give it all to them. I am sure the people of British Columbia would be very interested in that proposition.

This Liberal-democrat coalition will be bringing in a supposed amendment which is not acceptable to any but the Prime Minister and the leader of the New Democratic Party. It is not acceptable to the premier of Saskatchewan who was quoted today as saying that this move has made it more difficult for the provinces to bargain. There was a big hullabaloo about the right to indirect taxation. But most of the resources from Saskatchewan are not exported to other parts of Canada, Mr. Speaker, they are exported outside the borders of Canada. So indirect taxation does nothing in those circumstances.

Mr. Blakeney has already found a way to get around indirect taxation by imposing an income tax at the wellhead which has diminished, and will continue to diminish, the search for oil in our province. In that way, the potential of this country to become self-sufficient in oil will be jeopardized.

We speak of Canada as being more than just a federal government. Several members—and not just members of my party—have spoken about this resolution. One province accepts it; two are not sure and seven are considering action in the courts. Senator Manning has spoken out in the other place against the resolution and the political minister for Alberta in the other place, the Minister of State for Economic Development (Mr. Olson) is reported in the Vancouver Sun of October 11 as follows:

Economic development Minister Bud Olson, the lone Albertan in the federal cabinet, said Friday he does not favour Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau's constitutional amending formula.

The senator told student Liberals at the University of Alberta that his "personal preference" is for the Alberta amending formula.

So it is not just members of this party who oppose the motion, Mr. Speaker. We want to know why we have to change the system under which we have been governed. We want to know by what right the only acceptable viewpoint is that of the Liberals. More than that one viewpoint must be represented.

Let us examine what that Liberal viewpoint represents in Canada, Mr. Speaker. There is a total of 282 seats in this House and at the present time there are a number of vacancies. The government has 143 members and a majority of 33 seats. The province of Quebec has sent 72 members to the government benches—

An hon. Member: Seventy-four.

Mr. McKnight: —and over 86 per cent of Liberal members are from the central provinces, Quebec and Ontario. Only 20 Liberal members come from the eight other provinces combined, two of them west of the Ontario-Manitoba border. So what about rural Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

An hon. Member: There are NDP members.

Mr. McKnight: I hear a member on the government side saying it is all right because the NDP supports them. I should like to tell hon. members opposite that from the information I have and the speeches I have read in this House, I gather that not all NDP members support the government. I commend them for that and for speaking out for their constituents.

We have heard a great deal about the intense emotions involved in this question and we have been accused of using scare tactics and inciting, when all we are trying to do is gain the attention of this government.

I think everyone recognizes that the premier of my province is a very conservative individual, a quiet man who goes out of his way not to overstate a case. As a matter of fact, I think the premiers of western Canada have gone out of their way to understate the feelings and strong concerns of the people of western Canada. In an interview, Premier Blakeney was asked:

How do you sense the mood of the country now and how dangerous is this continuing acrimony, do you think, in terms of national unity?

He replied:

Well, I think the mood of the country is building into a confrontational mood.

● (2350)

Later on in the interview Mr. Blakeney said:

—we have a situation which is beginning to be more than disquieting. In fact, it begins to be dangerous.

The question was then put to him as follows:

Dangerous to the continuous existence of Canada as we know it now?

The answer given by Mr. Blakeney was:

Yes, I mean dangerous to the continuous existence of Canada. I don't want to overstate that—

Referring to the constitutional talks this summer, later in the interview, Mr. Blakeney said this:

With respect to the agreement of the package there was a rough and ready agreement by the premiers on all of the items in the constitutional package—

I ask hon. members what does this tell us? It tells us that there was agreement among ten provinces. But who could not agree? The federal government could not agree, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Trudeau could not agree. The "incredible sulk" could not agree. He wanted to sulk and go away in his corner so that he could write his own constitution. The premiers did not break up that conference, The federal government did.

There is more to what has been said about the problems in western Canada. I noticed the hon. member for Restigouche was reading from a newspaper. Now I would like to read an article written by Mr. Stan Roberts, ex-Liberal MLA for the province of Manitoba, who is presently executive director of Canada West Foundation. He said:

Trudeau was acting tonight as though he was president of a unitary state.

Now you know why he is an ex-Liberal MLA for Manitoba, Mr. Speaker. The article continues:

Ottawa's initiative can do nothing but increase separatist's sympathies in the west, he warned. This will fan the flames. It's like pouring a little of our well-known Alberta crude on the fire.

But the hon. member for Restigouche took great pride in reading a letter which appeared in a newspaper in Ottawa, supposedly written by someone in Alberta. I have a letter which appeared in the Edmonton Journal which was written by someone from Penticton, British Columbia. I think some of my NDP colleagues would be interested in it. The letter reads:

A great destiny awaits Western Canada if it severs the Gordian knot but unless we do rise to the occasion we will forever remain central Canada's milch cow, forever under its political and economic control, eventually, perhaps, to be ruled by Emperor Trudeau in a totalitarian state.

If we search through the newspapers, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we could all find letters to editors stating some of the views that we have put forth.

I say to members opposite, and to the Government of Canada, that we are trying to make you understand. We are trying to have you help us. We want your help. We want you people to help us, as I tried to make clear in my own way when I stood in this House and asked the people of Quebec to stay in this country because we wanted them. We wanted them then and we want them now. We want to stay with them as Canadians. But, Mr. Speaker, we need your help and the help of members opposite. I stood in this House and condemned a long-time friend because he is leading a unionist party of Canada that has, as its goal, the breakup of Canada. I did not enjoy condemning a friend. I know how the people of Quebec felt when they had to condemn friends. But I will stand in this House and condemn the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his party if they break up Canada because I hope that some day my daughters and sons will be able to come to this House of Commons and have the opportunity to represent their part of Canada in a nation of Canada as we know it, and as we continue to want it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I enter this debate tonight on this motion, I think back to the part of Canada where I was born. I remember the old people saying that some day in Canada we would have a flag. They also said that some day our constitution would be patriated to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Some day it will be brought to its rightful home. Needless to say I never thought that I would be part of the institution that would debate the flag issue. I can remember that debate. Mr. Speaker, we used closure then. I can remember some of the people on the other side of the House crying.

Mr. Dick: After five weeks.

Mr. Whelan: I remember the wild stories of what was going to happen to this country of ours. I was part of that decision and I was proud. I am proud every day that I walk by the House of Commons and see Canada's flag flying on top of the peace tower.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I will be just as proud that I am part of bringing the constitution to its rightful home in Ottawa. Some of us have travelled around the world. We are the big helpers to the developing countries. Every now and again we hear the little remark that we are still a colony.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: We hear people say that we do not have our constitution at home. Here we are, the great mature country called Canada, and we are scared of something—I do not know what it is—of fear itself is about the only way I could describe it. But I do not understand some of the things that are being said about bringing the constitution here and about the way it is being done.

One can look at the records and see how often prime ministers and leaders of this country, of every political faith, Conservative and Liberal, ever since 1921 have tried and tried to bring the constitution to its rightful home, where it has never been, and failed because they could never come to an agreement.

I hear this talk about closure. I think it is so funny when that group over there talks about the rights and privileges of Parliament. My God, Mr. Speaker, they loved Parliament so much they were not going to let us use it last year because they kept us out of this place so long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Never in our history since confederation from the time an election was called until the House of Commons reconvened, the lovers of freedom and the lovers of democracy on the other side of the House did not even want to let us use this great institution. They wanted to run a country without Parliament. It was the longest time since confederation—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Whelan: Now these are the people, the great freedom-lovers of Parliament. One of the members earlier—I forget his name and his riding—he talked about Alberta. He talked about us being a group of dictators and he said all kinds of horrible things. I could not help but think about an article I read in the paper the other day. It concerned one member of Parliament in Alberta who was brave enough to disagree with that great democratic institution called the Conservative party of Alberta. What did they do? They threw him out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: They threw him out because he disagreed. He could no longer be part of that great democratic party, the Conservative party of Alberta under Peter Lougheed. He could no longer stay there because he disagreed. Was it because they had a minority position? They don't have any opposition. They now have one more member in the opposition. I believe that brings them up to six in the opposition, so he is going to sit as in independent. I bet he is happy. At least he can say and do what he wants. He can be free and independent.

• (2400)

We use the British parliamentary system. We hear them talking about closure. Who has used closure most in Canada? The Conservative party. Who has been in power least? The Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Closure has been used in the House of Commons 18 times, ten times by the Conservatives and eight times by the Liberals. Just imagine if they had been in power as long as us. They probably would have used it 100 times, if you went by the percentages.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: What a phony group, what a phony group! The hypocrisy of it! There must be a better word to describe them than that. There probably is in the other official language. I have been criticized for travelling around Canada. I am probably the most travelled Canadian, the most travelled parliamentarian. I have been in an elected position since I was 21 years of age. That will be 36 years I have been in an elected position, either on school boards, municipal councils or as a member of Parliament.

An hon. Member: That's 25 years too long.

Mr. Whelan: Why do I stay in the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Whelan: Mainly because of the democratic function that takes place. They re-elect me all the time and keep sending me back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The other reason I run is because I have become so fearful of that group over there and what they would do to this country. Just imagine. When we go across the country and talk to Canadians or around the world and talk to other people, what do they say? You are from Canada, the people who are the best housed, the people that have the best way of life in the world, the highest standard of living, the highest standard of earning of any people in the world. There are more people living on the same plateau in Canada than any other country.

Canada is the envy of the world. I was recently in British Columbia, the Fraser Valley, Chilliwack, Abbotsford and other places. I visited farmers and other ordinary citizens of that area. The people there come from many different parts of the world, so we talked quite a bit about the constitution. They talked about Canada, because they are just ordinary people like their Minister of Agriculture. They told me that when they came to Canada, if anyone had told them they were going to a province named Alberta, Ontario or Quebec, they would not have known where they were going, though they knew they were going to Canada. They said they do not understand what is going on, they do not understand this debate. They told me they want us to get it over with, finish it, and bring the constitution back to Canada.

That was in Chilliwack, Dauphin, Ste. Rose du Lac, Russell, Yorkton, Margo, Kamsack and Regina. When I was in Regina, they had a walk-up microphone poll. Even that showed they were in favour of what we are doing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They must have talked to the only three Liberals there.

Mr. Whelan: It was a fairly high percentage. I have a brother in Regina.

Mr. McKnight: What's his profession?

Mr. Whelan: I will tell you his profession. He is in the insurance and real estate business.

An hon. Member: What party does he belong to?

Mr. Whelan: He is retired from the New Democratic Party, by force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I want to tell you this. He was a minister in the present government of Saskatchewan. He is no longer a minister there. He said to me "Gene, don't you forget this. I am a Canadian first and I will fight to help you. I will volunteer. I won't charge you one penny".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: He said, "I will do anything I can to make sure this Canada we know stays together". We have heard people talk about poverty. I can remember in Canada when we did not have medicare, hospitalization and so on. The member who just spoke talked about what we are going to do to this country. There were nine of us raised on mothers' allowance, if you can imagine what that was like during the dirty thirties. I remember that. In what other part of the world could one achieve one of the highest positions in the country with that kind of a background, besides Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: My ancestry is what? Irish, French, Welsh, and Indian. I have a Hungarian sister-in-law, a Roumanian brother-in-law, a German brother-in-law, a Finnish sister-in-law, a wife of German-Yugoslav ancestry and I live in an Italian neighbourhood.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: There is no other country with the make-up of people that we have who have built this country from sea to sea, 4,000 miles. We have people from all over the world building and sharing together to make us the envy of the world, this country of Canada. Now some of them would have a community of communities, I believe they call it. That is not what we want in Canada. We want the Canada that we know and love. We want the Canada which that guy Jean Chrétien fought so hard for in the referendum in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I can remember when that minister came to the House. He only spoke one language. He does much better than I, he now speaks two. When he came here, he used to practice his English. One day he said to me, "Eugene, I want to have lunch with you so that I can practise my English".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I said to him, "Jean, you are welcome but it won't be English, it will be Whelanese you hear". He is the minister we all admire. He fought like no one else in the Quebec referendum. Now they are trying to say that the Minister of Justice, who is leading the battle here, has changed, the man who took that strong stand in Quebec for Canada. They say he has changed. They know that is not true. He is the same strong Canadian he always was.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: When talking about television in this chamber today, members opposite said they want television in committee. The chairman of the agriculture committee then told me that his committee is also entitled to television coverage. I agree. There is nothing more important than food production and agriculture. We saw a display in the House today that I am sure would not have taken place if we did not have television in the House of Commons. They stood up and sang "O Canada", the former prime minister with his hands in his pockets.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: The former prime minister stood up with his hands in his pockets. Television will show that. What a show! He did not even sing the words to "O Canada".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (0010)

Mr. Whelan: I can remember my first trip to western Canada when I was a teenager. We went to western Canada. For what? To help. That was the time they used to get young easterners to go on excursions. It was to help harvest the wheat. It was an experience I never forgot. I spent four and a half days riding on a train to go, of all places, to a beautiful part of Canada, Alberta. My address was High River, Alberta. My brother visited the former prime minister's father in that town. Even then I did not find Alberta any different from Come By Chance, Port Hardy, Vancouver Island, Nipawin, Kamsack, Wetaskiwin or wherever. Canadians are not very much different from each other. They want the basic things of life.

Mr. Andre: So why treat them as second-class citizens?

Mr. Whelan: They want shoes on the baby and bread on the table. They want a form of security. That means some kind of job so that they can earn their own way in Canada. They can do that by sharing, not by saying "greed" or "We want more than the rest of you." They cannot do that by saying, "We do not want to share the way we build Canada" or "We do not want to be in a position where perhaps we are better off and share with someone who is not so well off." For instance, what good is the heritage fund piled high?

Mr. Andre: You are piling it high right now.

Mr. Whelan: On the farm we have piles, and we know that if we do not spread it around, it does not do a bit of good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The same is true in our society with money. You cannot corral it in one part of the country and not distribute it properly in the rest of the country. That is not the way Canada was built. We shared these things to build a country which is—and I know I am repeating myself—the envy of the world. Our way of life is the envy of the world. We are the best housed and the best educated. We have the best of the whole world. Some talk of another Utopia. If there is a better part of the world, I want to go and see it some day. I could describe Canada, as a new Canadian in my area described it the other day. He was watching television and listening to his children talk about the debates they read, young educated people who are more fortunate than their dads. He was an immigrant from Italy, and he said to me, "Gino, I would like to make a comparison. The world is one great big roast beef, and Canada is the best slice of that roast beef". I have heard no one here describe it any better than Biase Di Pasquale, a neighbour of mine who is proud of his accomplishments in this country. He is so proud that he trusts the people who have been in power longer than the other party in Canada. He trusts his Gino because he knows his Gino.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, the minister has a moment or two left. I wonder if he would permit a question.

An hon. Member: Let him finish. You have been interfering all night.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I understand that I have about three or four minutes left. I go as Minister of Agriculture to World Food Council meetings, the FAO and the OECD in Paris. At any world food meeting respect is paid to Canada. I know it is not paid to me because of who I am. It is because of what I represent. I represent that country called Canada which is looked on not as a huge military power or a huge power which is trying to impose some political philosophy on anybody else but as a country which enjoys the most freedom of any country in the world.

Ours is the country which is much envied. People want to come here and be part of this country called Canada. Yes, I am proud to be a Canadian, and I will do everything I can to make the people of Canada understand what this debate is about. It is about bringing our constitution to its rightful resting place. I will do my best to explain in the humblest of language because I do not think anyone uses more humble language than I do. I do not know how to use any other language. About 95 per cent or 90 per cent of the people of Canada are something like your Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. They have had rough lives. They have had tough lives. They do not have that much education, but they do appreciate Canada, and they want it to stay as it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in the debate on the constitution, especially since many of my colleagues who would wish to speak have had that right denied them by the imposition of closure. I object to the government's refusal to hear what my colleagues have to say and to the unjust limitation of debate on an issue of such basic importance as the constitution.

Along with other New Democrats I agree with the need to bring our constitution home. I would be happy to see a charter of rights and the principle of equalization enshrined in our constitution. Coming from British Columbia, I am glad that New Democrats were able to get the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to agree to provincial control of resources. Six years ago I saw how the federal government prevented that right and how it hampered the economy of British Columbia under Premier Barrett because it refused to grant that right. Provinces need these rights so that they can develop their own economies without being hobbled by Ottawa.

However, while I support many of the features in the constitutional package, I join with my colleagues in deploring the inadequacies in the charter of rights and its failure to recognize the rights of women and natives.

I wish to direct my remarks particularly to the charter's failure to recognize and enshrine the rights of Canada's Indian, Inuit and Metis people. If we look at the charter we see that it lists in great detail the rights the government considers important. We have inherited many of these rights from centuries-old traditions. They are so deeply interwoven in the fabric of our society that perhaps they do not need to be enshrined, but they are enshrined, and they are spelled out.

Other rights, such as those relating to language, are new and not yet universally accepted. Again, these rights are spelled out in detail.

However, when we come to native rights, what do we find? We have a fuzzy non-statement about non-rights. Section 24 of the charter of rights says, and I quote:

> The guarantee in this charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada, including any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada.

That is all there is, "any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada". George III did better than that. In the proclamation of 1763 he said, and I quote:

—it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest, and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them . . . as their hunting grounds.

Mr. Malone: We want George III!

Mr. Manly: We know what George III said. The Indian people of Canada want that proclamation attached to the constitution as a schedule. Recognition of aboriginal rights was one of the causes of the American revolution because protection of Indian lands rankled those Americans who were already afire with the idea of manifest destiny. The American Declaration of Independence objected to the action of George III in raising the conditions applying to new appropriations of lands.

We all recognize that George III was not an original thinker. He was simply following what had been standard practice for European nations since their first encounters with North America. Claims of sovereignty by European powers were really claims to be able to treaty with local Indian nations for the land. It was generally accepted that Indians had aboriginal rights to the land that could not be arbitrarily denied. Three possible methods were established for obtaining title to land. The first was by occupation of vacant lands. Recent studies of hunting, trapping and food gathering patterns across Canada have shown that in spite of the vastness of our country, almost every part of it was used by the native people. There was no empty or unused land in Canada.

The second way was by way of what was called the just war. I do not know of any just war by which Indians in Canada were vanquished and lost their rights or their land. The third method was by purchase with consent of the owners. In many parts of Canada the Crown did enter into treaties with the native people. The Indian peoples granted certain rights to the Crown and in return they were promised certain rights. As recently as July 5, 1973, Queen Elizabeth II told the Indian people:

You may be assured that my Government of Canada recognizes the importance of full compliance with the spirit and terms of your treaties.

The rights of Metis people were also recognized in these treaties and also in the Manitoba act of 1870. Thus, across Canada, native people have both aboriginal rights and treaty rights which, at different times, have been recognized and guaranteed by the Crown. But the proposed charter of rights glosses over this by talking about "any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada." The charter lists other rights in specific detail. It denies native rights by vague generalities. Because of their minority position in our society, native people have a greater, not a lesser, need to have their rights enshrined.

The government has argued that we need a charter of rights because we cannot entrust rights to the changing whims of legislatures. I ask you: What people have suffered more legislative infringements on their rights than the Indian people? Amendments to the Indian Act passed by this House of Commons over the past 100 years have hampered the Indian people in every facet of their lives. Freedom of religion was interpreted to mean freedom to decide which church would send in missionaries, and I speak of the former missionaries in Indian villages. Traditional religious and cultural practices, such as the potlach, native dancing and dancing societies, were forbidden.

Earlier in our century, the act required Indians to get permission from the Indian agent to go to exhibitions, rodeos and dances. They needed permission from the superintendent-general to collect money for their organizations, a way of discouraging those organizations from pressing the government in connection with land claims. Indian people lost their status without their consent. In other situations, people were given Indian status and included in band membership with a share in the meagre resources of the reserve without permission of the band involved.

These are some of the things Canada's Parliament has done to the rights of Indian people. They know full well, therefore, that they cannot depend upon legislatures to maintain their rights. These rights must be recognized and enshrined in the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manly: The Indian people today still remember the 1969 white paper which would have stripped them of all their rights. This 1969 white paper was the catalyst which brought them together with a great many organizations and helped them to advance to the level of political involvement in which they find themselves today. But as they look at the proposed charter of rights, they see clauses in it which would have the same effect and which would leave them without rights, without protection and without even the basic, minimal recognition which they have at present. The Prime Minister has promised the native people that they could be participants in all constitutional amendments which concern them. What could possibly concern native people more than the entrenchment of their rights? Yet Indian people were not consulted about the charter of rights. In their absence, a vague clause was inserted which does violence to their rights.

Last week, the Prime Minister said that as soon as the constitution is brought back to Canada, native rights will be one of the first items on the agenda. What hypocrisy! The Prime Minister knows full well that by placing Indian rights on a post-patriation agenda, he is denying these people their last chance to obtain justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manly: Section 50 states very clearly that any amendment to the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms can only be made in accordance with sections 41 or 42. Obviously the Prime Minister is not willing to trust his cherished language rights to the vagaries of such a process because he knows it would be almost impossible for such rights to be adopted. In the same way, he must know that if Indian rights are not recognized and enshrined now, they never will be, not so long as we have people like Premier Hatfield who denies the very concept of aboriginal rights. If we believe in native rights, we must act now. In committee we will be moving and supporting amendments to achieve this. We take the Prime Minister at his word that he will be willing to accept amendments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manly: The other night, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) asked for a spirit of compromise. I ask the government if, in that spirit of compromise, whether it will change its position and recognize the basic rights of our native people so that they are not compromised right out of the picture. I ask the government to include as schedules to the constitution such documents as the treaties and the royal proclamation of 1763 which will assure the native people that their native rights are not being denied.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me point to a fact that is often ignored when we speak about Indian people. We often hear the statistics about poverty, unemployment and poor health. We watch television documentaries about substandard housing and the failure of the educational system. We know all about the negative side of Indian life, and every six months or so it becomes a two-day wonder for the media. What we do not hear or see is the positive side—that there is something good about being Indian. For hundreds of years Indian peoples in North America have refused to assimilate or lose their identity as Indians. In spite of poverty, discrimination, bad housing conditions, the lack of opportunity on reserves and denial of their rights, they hang on to their Indian identity and culture. There is something good for them about their Indian culture. Obviously they have something very valuable.

What they ask from Canada is a recognition of their rights so that they can maintain their identity and the culture which is so important to them. They ask for their rights so that they can build a decent economy which will enable them to maintain their status, rights and culture with some dignity. Native people do not believe that being Indian, Métis or Inuit must go hand in hand with poverty. I believe Canada needs the contribution native people can make to our social fabric. We can learn from them. We have the wealth and resources in this country to afford a pluralistic society. We do not all need to fit into the same mold. The native people of our country can only make a contribution if we recognize their rightful place in our society and give them their due.

On behalf of the more than one million native people of this country, I appeal to the government to recognize and entrench the rights of native people so that they can take their full place in Canadian society, and, furthermore, so that Canada can achieve its destiny as a nation of justice and opportunity for all people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Constitution

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to follow the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) because he gave one of his usual speeches which did not say very much. Had he given his speech on a manure spreader, it never would have had a bigger load. To stand in the House of Commons and ask people to believe when he travels around the world that people say, "Oh, you are from Canada, that country which has its constitution in London" is just pure nonsense. How can anyone be expected to believe that?

An hon. Member: Express it in farm terms.

Mr. Kempling: I must remember the decorum of the House. I cannot express it in farm terms.

It has been written that when the British Parliament had the BNA Act before it in 1867, the act passed in 30 minutes because a much more urgent matter was waiting to be introduced. That matter was an act dealing with the licensing of dogs. It was a much more urgent matter than the constitution of Canada. The reason it took only 30 minutes to pass was that the British House had full knowledge that several years of discussion had preceded the writing of the act. The Parliament of Westminster knew that such discussion had taken place. Some of it was very bitter, but in the final analysis a consensus was reached and they felt justified in passing it in 30 minutes.

We have heard many members on the other side say that the country has been confounded, put in a strait-jacket or what have you, for 53 years. I had a resumé done by the parliamentary library of the constitutional conferences from 1927 to 1980. Anyone reading it would realize that it is just not so, the country has not been tied. There have been many, many instances where there has been complete consensus. In fact there were two occasions when the premiers and the federal authorities agreed unanimously to suspend further discussion on the constitution because they had more urgent matters before them, most of them dealing with the economy. Anyone who tries to persuade the people of Canada that somehow we have been strangled and tied for 53 years is perpetuating a fraud.

The first time the provincial premiers met, shortly after confederation, it was to deal with a revenue matter. They met to deal with revenue-sharing because the provinces had given up tariffs to the federal government and the federal government had expanded, in lieu of tariffs, a per capita grant. They met because the rising population in the provinces was such that the revenue was just not adequate. This is really what we are talking about today. When we get down to brass tacks, we realize we are talking about revenues again. The federal government is in a revenue bind. It just does not have enough revenue coming in. It does not want to go the honest route of taxation, as my party endeavoured to do. They are trying to put a claim on provincial revenues so that they will not have to raise federal revenues as much as they probably should.

This debate has taken some rather strange twists and turns today. Members have told us we took up too much time on points of order and questions of privilege and that is one of the reasons why the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) brought on closure. If one looks at the record, one will find there was a total of 86 minutes, or one hour and 26 minutes, in the full 24 hours of this debate devoted to questions of privilege and points of order. That is really not very much time. If that is one of the reasons for bringing on closure, it is an absolute fraud.

It has been argued that there is a crisis in the country. The crisis is in the minds of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and those around him who perceive the difficulties in the country as a crisis. There is no crisis in the minds of the people outside. In my eight years as a member of Parliament—and I know many members have been here longer—I have never had a constituent ask when the Constitution of Canada would be changed or tell me that it should be changed.

An hon. Member: You ought to travel with Gene.

Mr. Kempling: He encounters it outside of the country. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) participated in the debate the other day. It was a good, measured speech, but he left the impression that the four million or so immigrants who have come to Canada since 1945 are demanding that the charter of rights be written into the constitution. I cannot believe that people who came here from Uganda, Chile, Poland, Hungary, India, Tibet, the Caribbean, Viet Nam, Great Britain, any country in the western world or the mid-east, are asking for a charter of rights to be put in the constitution. That is just not so. They came here because we offered a better form of government, a better livelihood and more security than they ever had in the countries they left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: They came here from dictatorships. They recognized that there was freedom here. I do not think one of them came here with a burning desire in his gut to change the constitution of Canada. That is a fraud as well.

● (0040)

We have expressed our views on closure and our concerns about the committee stage. We have heard members opposite say: put this debate to the committee. Members on this side have expressed their views on that aspect to some extent. But why are we reluctant to see it go into committee without having our full say? The reason is that we have watched how the committee system in this House works over the years. We have watched the way in which those experts on the other side have manipulated the committees of the House of Commons. I would ask you, sir, to sit in a committee of the House of Commons and watch them play the game of the clock. You know how that is done. The minister appearing before the committee arrives a few minutes late, which takes up ten minutes. Then the chairman decides to read a report of the standing committee and that goes on for another ten or 15 minutes. Then the minister reads an opening statement which can take another ten or 15 minutes. Maybe the minister's assistant is with him and he will be asked by the minister if he wants to make a statement. That goes on for yet another ten or 15 minutes. Then with the points of order and the general razzmatazz back and forth, the next thing you know an hour of a two-hour committee meeting is over. That is what we are afraid of. That is why we want to know the terms which will govern the committee. That is why we are asking that the committee proceedings be televised. That is why we want it broadcast—so they cannot play games, so they cannot play the game of the committee.

We have watched it, sir. We have seen committees of the House of Commons sit knowing that a member from our side was to propose an amendment. Before he could do so, the government members left the committee so that there would no longer be a quorum. We have watched that game being played and that is why we are concerned that this committee should receive the proper attention it deserves.

Members opposite have suggested that this measure is like an ordinary bill, that we have first reading, second reading and then reference to committee, after which it comes back for report stage and third reading upon which debate continues. We do not believe this. The government House leader has not told us how long the debate will go on after the report comes back to the House. He will not say.

Mr. Pinard: There is no limit.

Mr. Kempling: Now he says there is no limit.

Mr. Clark: But there will be closure again.

Mr. Kempling: That is right. We know there will be closure again. We know the games they play. We know what to look for. We have tried to the best of our ability in this debate to expose the games they play so that the people of Canada will see the way they manipulate the business of the House.

The other point I wish to make is that very few people in Canada have read the British North America Act. There is hardly a person in the country who has read the reference which is before the House. So you have a population which does not know the act, does not know the reference, but which is being persuaded by subliminal advertising, in many cases, to urge their members of Parliament to amend the constitution. That is a fraud.

What the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and my colleagues on this side of the House have been asking is that the committee be allowed to travel across Canada to hear the views of Canadians, those Canadians who do not know what is in the BNA Act, who do not know what is in the resolution which is before the House. That is what we want. We have put an amendment forward which would allow the committee to travel so that Canadians in all parts of Canada can be heard. That matter has yet to be ruled on but I do not have much confidence that our requests will be agreed to.

We have this matter before us now, a motion to refer a proposed resolution to committee. And we know the games they play in committee. The subject matter which is being discussed is not broadly understood across the country by the people of Canada. I am sure the committee will not be allowed to travel to hear the views of the native people and others in various parts of the country. That is what really upsets members on this side.

Listening to members opposite—and I think I can say this because I am from Ontario—what disturbs me most is how little they understand about the feeling in western Canada. I have spoken with my hon. friends here who are from western Canada and I think I am a fair judge of their character, sincerity and honesty, and I do not think I have ever seen so much emotion from members as I have seen from the members of our caucus who come from western Canada. They are really concerned and upset.

This summer I travelled twice to western Canada and I spoke with the people there. I sensed the feeling of frustration. And when members stand up and talk about separatism in the west, I believe them. I believe the forces are gathering out there and if we fail to listen to them it will be a tragedy.

I see from an article in the newspaper tonight that the Prime Minister is threatening further closure on this debate so that he can meet his deadline.

A few months ago the province of Quebec was engaged in a referendum. Members opposite came to us and asked for our support. They asked us to go into Quebec with them. The Leader of the Opposition went into Quebec and appeared on a platform with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). Other members of our party also went into Quebec to speak for the No forces. The chief government whip came to me, as whip for our party, time and time again and said to me: I have so-and-so who wants to go into Quebec to campaign for the No forces, could we have a "pair" for him? And I know he will tell you that we co-operated. I told him we would give him a "pair" any time any member opposite was going into Quebec to speak for the No forces. We kept our word every time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: What we are asking here today, and what we have been asking for in this debate is that we be afforded the same courtesy.

There is a serious situation in western Canada. I really do not think members of the government party understand how serious it is. We are asking for time to continue this debate. We are asking for time to get out to the people in western Canada and speak to them. We are asking for time for the committee to travel across the country. We are asking, in all sincerity, that the committee be allowed to travel so we can test the depth of the concern in western Canada and let those people be heard before we make the final changes in the constitution. That is all we are really asking, sir.

Let me conclude by saying that in a democracy constitutions come up from the people, not down from the government. Today, that process, by the imposition of closure has been stopped. Therefore, I cannot support the motion that is before the House at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang), but would like to bring it to the attention of the House that at this time, according to the provisions of Standing Order 33, no members will be recognized after one o'clock. Any member recognized prior to that time has the usual time limit.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, during the remarks by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), who indicated his concern that there would be limits placed upon the debate after the matter came out of committee, the government House leader called across the floor and said, "There is no limit". That is to say there would be no limit on debate in this House of Commons after the matter came out of committee. Obviously, that is of real importance. Would the government House leader rise and give us a categorical assurance that there would be no limit upon the opportunity of the House of Commons to debate this matter after the report of the committee.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): That isn't a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the government House leader wishes to rise on the point of order, the Chair will recognize him, but the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang).

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has a very learned House leader, and I am sure that he can learn a lot from him about the rules of the House of Commons.

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of Parliament I feel very privileged to participate in this debate and to have the opportunity to share with hon. members of this House some of the thoughts and views I feel are germane to this discussion on the constitution. In order to acquaint myself with many of the constitutional issues that are now before us, I have had to conduct myself for the past few months not unlike a student who is cramming for an important exam.

In the process though, I have run across some insights which I think would be useful to this debate. One in particular stands out in my mind. It reads and I quote:

> I confess that I do not entirely approve of this constitution at present, but sir, I am not sure I shall never approve of it, for, having lived long, I have experienced many instances of being obliged, by better information or fuller consideration, to change opinions even on important subjects, which I once thought right, but found to be otherwise. It is therefore that, the older I grow, the more apt I am to doubt my own judgment of others.
> Nevertheless, I doubt whether any other convention we can obtain may be able to make a better constitution; for, when you assemble a number of men, to have the advantage of their joint wisdom, you inevitably assemble with those men all their prejudices, their passions, their errors of opinion, their local interests, and their selfish views. From such an assembly can a perfect production be expected?
> It therefore astonishes me, sir, to find this system approaching so near to perfection as it does; and I think it will astonish our enemies, who are waiting with confidence to hear that our counsels are confounded like those of the builders of Babel, and that our states are on the point of separation, only to meet hereafter for the purpose of cutting one another's throats. Thus I consent, sir, to this constitution, because I expect no better, and because I am not sure that it is not the best. The opinions I have had of its errors I sacrifice to the public good.

This quote is from a man who was an entrepreneur, a philosopher, an inventor and a world renowned statesman. The speaker was Benjamin Franklin, the place was the constitutional convention in Philadelphia in 1787, almost 200 years ago.

The situation Franklin described is remarkably similar to the one we as members of Parliament are confronted with in considering this constitutional resolution. Like those who framed the American constitution, we have inherited a legacy of failure upon failure in our attempts over the past 53 years to achieve a national consensus on the constitution. We must not let the quest for some elusive constitutional perfection paralyse the need and responsibility we have to govern Canada effectively.

If we are to learn the lessons of history, it is clear we have to push forward for constitutional renewal despite the cries of those who would consider this resolution for a little bit longer in this House of Commons or a little bit longer in committee or a little bit longer with the provinces.

What may seem like an arbitrary timetable for the constitutional resolution is actually the only realistic course of action for our government to take in the wake of the Quebec referendum. If the government chose to delay the process any longer we would clearly be abdicating our national responsibility. A promise was made to the people of Quebec and the people of Canada on the question of constitutional renewal and that promise must be kept. Indeed, the wishes of The Canadian people themselves are the paramount consideration in the government's policy of constitutional renewal.

A Gallup poll conducted outside Quebec before the referendum indicated that a full 68 per cent of those surveyed preferred a renewed federalism, while only 32 per cent opted for our present constitutional arrangements.

As the motion put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) demonstrated when it received the unanimous support of this House, there is unanimous consent to the principle of patriation with an amending formula within this Canadian Parliament. Virtually all Canadians agree that we as an independent and sovereign nation should not have to turn to the Parliament of another independent and sovereign nation to change our constitution. Many premiers, and this was underlined by the statement made over the weekend by the premier of New Brunswick, also endorse in principle the concept of patriation.

The second parallel which I would like to draw between confederation and the establishment of the BNA Act is that the situation in preconfederation days compares to that of the present time. We had the Atlantic region, Canada east or Quebec or lower Canada, and Canada west which was Ontario. The leaders of these regions could not agree on an agreement to form one single federal government, and it was through the perseverence and persistence of George Brown that an all-party committee was formed in 1864. He, as the chairman of that committee, played a leading role in drafting the document which later became the British North America Act. This is not the first time a committee has been asked to discuss and make amendments and consider drafts for the constitution. This is how the original BNA Act was drafted. So I do not understand all the consternation and temper tantrums of the Tory party over sending this resolution to committee.

Mr. Speaker, I see that it is drawing near to one o'clock, but some of my colleagues have asked me to continue and I will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Ensuring that the national interest is safeguarded is the core of our responsibility to the people of Canada. It is clear that patriation is in the national interest. To make patriation more than a symbolic gesture, the inclusion of an amending formula is imperative. For almost a month we have heard some of the premiers and some of the members of this House condemn the government's initiatives on the constitution as dictatorial, unCanadian. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) told us it threatens to "break the fundamental balance which has been at the heart of our federal system ever since the Canadian nation was created."

Let us consider this statement for a moment and examine it carefully, particularly the words "ever since the Canadian nation was created". The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition seems to forget that when the Fathers of Confederation were in the process of founding this nation a civil war was raging in the United States. As the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) pointed out in his speech, Sir John A. Macdonald was very clear about the need for a strong central government in order to overcome the fatal flaw in the American system which was only resolved after millions of lives had been lost.

It should be evident, despite the attempt of the Leader of the Opposition to rewrite history, that the fundamental balance he speaks of is not so much a balance as a distribution of powers between two levels of government with the central government predominant. At least that is the way the Fathers of Confederation saw it. The evolution of Canadian federalism has been a slightly different story, though. Over the years, the provinces have acquired more power as the federal government has attempted to take into account their needs and concerns. And it has been nearly 53 years since the federal government tried to reach agreement with the provinces on an amending formula. Meanwhile, our independent status was confirmed by the statute of Westminster in 1931. In the Second World War, Canadian forces fought for the first time under Canadian generals. In 1949, the Supreme Court became the final court of appeal in Canada, instead of the British court, and in the same year Parliament acquired the power to amend certain areas of our constitution. In 1952, for the first time, a Canadian was appointed Governor General. In 1965, we adopted our national flag and earlier this year, we formally adopted a national anthem. It is a combination of patriation and an amending formula that is now the key to full independence—freeing ourselves from the last vestiges of colonial status.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The process has been a gradual one. But the forces who advocate Quebec separatism did not spring up overnight either. And when the final vote was tallied on the night of May 20, it was clear that we had a job to perform. To dilly-dally any longer on the question of constitutional reform would have been a fatal error. There are times for compromise and negotiation, and there are times for action. This is a time for action pure and simple.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: But that is not the only reason we must proceed quickly. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) pointed out in his very eloquent address, we must act now in order to provide the momentum for further reform. Canada has far too much economic potential as a nation to let it be continuously stalled and sidetracked by an unending process of constitutional negotiations. The purpose of this constitutional resolution is to remove the doubt, the uncertainty and the deadlock that have plagued past constitutional talks. This demands leadership and leadership demands courage. The Liberal party lacks neither, Mr. Speaker, so to conclude, I would like to ask the members opposite to leave go their doubts, their fears and their divisiveness. No constitution is perfect. But however perfect or imperfect the constitutional resolution before us is, all members of this House must recognize that a constitution is an act of faith—faith in the Canadian people, faith in the generations of Canadians who will carry on in the spirit of tolerance and equity that has largely characterized our past, and will hopefully characterize our future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! order! order! In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 33—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the provisions of—

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I demand the right to be heard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I demand my right to be heard. I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Wenman: I demand the right to be heard here. I will not sit down until I have been heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: I demand protection from this House of Commons. I demand from the Governor General of Canada—I demand to speak now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Order, please!

Mr. Wenman: I demand my right to speak and I am going to speak. The Bill of Rights of Canada is being—this is a mockery. It is a mockery, Mr. Speaker, because of the very bill that we discussed. I demand that we have the freedom to speak in this House. This is a hypocritical bill. My right is being denied to me—not only my right but the right of everyone who has spoken in this House. Mr. Speaker, I demand my right. I will not be seated until I have been heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House will recognize the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) on a matter of privilege. The hon. member for Pembina on a question of privilege.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I demand on behalf of myself and my colleagues the opportunity to participate in this debate. We have a responsibility to those individuals who have elected us and I wish to exercise that responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: The Prime Minister gave a commitment in his news conference that all us members of Parliament would have an opportunity to participate in the discussion on our constitution. He has reneged on that promise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite hon. members to be seated. I am hearing one member on a question of privilege and surely courtesy to their colleague requires that they allow the hon. member I have recognized to have the floor. Would the others please be seated? I am recognizing the hon. member on a question of privilege. Surely his colleagues will at least extend that courtesy.

Mr. Elzinga: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister in his conference indicated that all members of Parliament would have an opportunity to participate in this debate. It is obvious that we who come from all those parts of Canada other than central Canada feel a basic need to speak in this debate because effectively this resolution makes second class citizens of all those individuals outside Quebec and Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: This resolution further confirms the feelings of westerners in developing that feeling of alienation. It is a belief held by many that this Prime Minister is aggravating the situation. We hope to have an opportunity to participate to assure them that they do have a voice in the constitutional debate and this voice has been muffled and closed by the closure motion brought in by the Liberal government opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Question!

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I demand—

Mr. Cossitt: Question of privilege!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair finds there is no question of privilege, that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons have been observed. The Standing Orders of the House of Commons have been observed. It is my duty at this point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —to interrupt the proceedings—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: This man is a dictator!

Mr. Wenman: You may not. We must be heard. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West will speak in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —raised by the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Who runs this country?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! Order, please!

Mr. Cossitt: A question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. Order, please. Order! Order, please.

Mr. Wenman: I will not be seated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! Order! Order, please. The hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) has been recognized on a question of privilege and the Chair has listened and is going to rule on the matter the hon. member has raised.

The Chair finds, after listening carefully to the hon. member for Pembina that the provisions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) please sit down? Will the member please take his seat?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: No!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: No!

Mr. Cossitt: I demand to speak!

Mr. Wenman: I demand my right to speak on the Constitution of Canada for the people of my riding. We have not been heard. Hon. members on the other side have not been heard either.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has listened to the matter of privilege raised by the hon. member for Pembina and is ruling that there is no valid point of privilege established, that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons are being observed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: I demand the right to speak. It is my duty to protect my rights as an hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is now my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —to dispose of the motion now before the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: We demand the right to speak now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the question. The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain).

Mr. Wenman: I demand the right to speak!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, we want the right to speak—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (0110)

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, we want the right to speak.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: I demand the right to be heard, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: No!

[Editor's Note: At this point some members left their seats and approached the Chair.]

An hon. Member: I demand the right to be heard on the constitution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I call to the attention of the hon. members that they can make speeches only from their places in this House.

I call to hon. members' attention that according to the rules and practices of this House they can only be recognized from their places. Hon. members cannot be recognized from other places.

An hon. Member: I demand the right to be heard!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I call to the attention of hon. members Standing Order 12(2), which reads as follows:

When Mr. Speaker is putting a question, no member shall enter, walk out of, or across the House, or make any noise or disturbance.

An hon. Member: I demand the right to be heard!

An hon. Member: We want the right to speak!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I ask hon. members to take their places in the House and observe the rules of the House.

An hon. Member: I demand the right to be heard!

Mr. Siddon: This is our constitution at stake.

An hon. Member: This is a free country. I have the right to be heard.

An hon. Member: Stand up for democracy.

Some hon. Members: We have the right to be heard.

An hon. Member: What goes on here? How does this man, Trudeau, run the whole country singlehanded like this?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must invite hon. members to show respect for this institution by returning to their places. I invite hon. members to return to their places in this House.

An hon. Member: I demand the right to be heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite hon. members to return to their places.

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister has misled this House.

An hon. Member: I demand the right to be heard.

Mr. Chrétien: Where is the leadership on the other side?

An hon. Member: I demand the right right now to speak on the constitution.

An hon. Member: This is freedom of speech?

An hon. Member: Where is the War Measures Act?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I ask hon. members to return to their places.

Mr. Dick: Privilege!

An hon. Member: Bring the constitution home.

An hon. Member: What about the Vancouver consensus?

An hon. Member: Privilege!

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

It now being 2 a.m., this House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 2 a.m. Friday, October 24, the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 24, 1980

The House met at 11 a.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

CALL FOR TEST OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION IN SUPREME COURT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the decision of six provincial governments to challenge the validity of the constitutional resolution of the federal government in the provincial courts, and in view of the serious divisions which have already been created in Canada among governments and private citizens over this issue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government test its proposals in the Supreme Court of Canada so as to shorten the time during which Canadians will remain in doubt as to the constitutionality of the government's approach to constitutional change.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR GUARANTEE JOINT COMMITTEE WILL TRAVEL ACROSS CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the action of the government to suppress constructive criticism in the House of its constitutional proposals by invoking closure on the House this morning, and in view of the fact that recently major women's conferences, organized to review the constitutional proposal, were cancelled with the government's complicity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the government guarantee that the special joint constitutional committee be required to travel across this country, to ensure that not only women but native peoples, minority groups and others whose rights will be restricted by the wording of this constitution will be permitted to have their concerns heard.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DISARMAMENT

AFFIRMATION OF COMMITMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On the occasion of United Nations Day and the start of disarmament week in Canada, and at a point in world history when mankind spends more than 20 times as much on instruments of destruction—some $500 billion annually—as it does on official development assistance to his neighbours in poorer lands, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House affirm its commitment to disarmament as a primary objective of our foreign policy, and that it call upon the Government of Canada to actively pursue the "strategy of suffocation" outlined by the present Prime Minister to the United Nations special session on disarmament, namely, (1) a comprehensive test ban to impede the further development of nuclear explosive devices; (2) an agreement to stop the flight-testing of all new strategic delivery vehicles; (3) an agreement to prohibit all production of fissionable material for weapons purposes; and (4) an agreement to limit and then progressively to reduce military spending on new strategic nuclear weapons systems.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO BE HEARD IN JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len. Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a very serious matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in invoking closure, has deprived many western members of the right to be heard on the constitution in this House. Given the serious matter of the Prime Minister's responsibility with respect to western alienation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House allow all members to be heard in the committee so that the Prime Minister's concerted effort does not further divide this country.

S.O. 43

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RIGHT TO SPEAK—CALL FOR CONDEMNATION OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas probably the most important right enjoyed, at least prior to this date, by Canadians has been the right to be heard through their elected representatives in Parliament on important national issues; and whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has violated this basic constitutional right through the insidious and odious use of closure on, of all matters, the constitutional debate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) and all the other members who were denied the right to speak:

That this House condemns the Prime Minister for his wanton abuse of the time-honoured rights and ancient privileges of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INVOCATION OF CLOSURE—CALL FOR CONDEMNATION OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the arbitrary and inexcusable action of the government of invoking closure denied a majority of members of the House of Commons the exercise of their right to rise in the House of Commons and speak on behalf of their constituents, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) publicly had given an unequivocal undertaking that all members of the House, from all parts of Canada, would be given the opportunity of expressing their views, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House condemns the action of the Prime Minister and those of his advisers who yesterday made a mockery of our democratic system which so many Canadians fought and died for.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STANDING ORDERS

S.O. 33—CALL FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of most urgent and pressing necessity. Recognizing that the most fundamental and basic right of any member of the House of Commons is his ability and his right to speak in the House of Commons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House immediately refer the study of Standing Order 33 to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, either for the purpose of revoking the order completely, or to modify the order so that it will allow the majority of members of Parliament to speak before it is invoked, and that all members of Parliament should have at least a brief opportunity to speak before it is voted upon.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMUNICATIONS

U.S. SATELLITTE SIGNALS—CALL FOR MORATORIUM ON PROCEDURES PROHIBITING RECEPTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) recently announced a crackdown on the reception and redistribution of U.S. television satellite signals and that the minister has promised an alternative Canadian package for inadequately served areas before the end of this fall, I move, seconded by the hon. member opposite for Cochrane (Mr. Penner):

That the minister declare a moratorium on further enforcement procedures until (a), so-called inadequately served areas are explicitly defined, and (b), a high quality Canadian satellite package is provided as an alternative to U.S. signals.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENTS TO DRAFT RESOLUTION FOLLOWING REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I direct my question to the government House leader, if I can attract his attention. The government House leader will know that on page 890 of Senate Hansard of October 21, the Hon. George McIlraith, who for three years was a distinguished Liberal government House leader in this chamber, raised the concern that the procedures being followed by this government in the constitutional reference may prevent Parliament from acting on any amendments of substance to the committee report.

Senator McIlraith's point is that the special joint committee will be dead once it reports and that neither chamber can instruct members of the other chamber to accept amendments. That position was put forth three days ago by a former government House leader in this House, who is now in the other place. No doubt the government House leader has had a chance to consider that matter since his colleague, the government House leader in the Senate, said that it would be given urgent consideration.

Will the President of the Privy Council now tell the House of Commons what is the government's response to Senator McIlraith's concern that no changes can occur in the draft resolution after it emerges from the committee?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am unaware of the request made by Senator McIlraith. All I can say to the Leader of the Opposition is that the committee will consider the resolution at the committee stage. That is its mandate. The committee will be empowered to make the appropriate amendments to the resolution. Moreover, we have already agreed to some amendments suggested by the New Democratic Party and we have publicly stated on several occasions that we were quite receptive to any constructive amendment so that in our opinion the committee will be indeed empowered to amend the resolution before submitting its report to the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the government House leader missed, either deliberately or by accident, the point of the question. I must say I find it difficult to believe that a matter which was raised three days ago to his counterpart and colleague in the other place, the Senate House leader, has not come to his attention, but if he says that it has not, naturally I must accept his word.

What guarantees can the government House leader give the House of Commons that there will be an opportunity to amend the resolution after it comes from committee? I am not referring to amendments in that committee which is tightly controlled by a government majority. I am talking about the rights of this whole House of Commons. The distinguished Senator McIlraith has raised questions suggesting that, in his view, it will not be possible for the House of Commons or the Senate to change the report that comes from the committee. In other words, debate in this full House is over on the question. What is the minister's response to that most serious allegation made in the Senate by his predecessor as Liberal government House leader, to which his colleague, the government leader in the Senate, gave an undertaking to have a full response three days ago?

Miss Jewett: Think of something, Allan.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition says that he is not interested in seeing amendments introduced in committee because of its government majority. May I remind him that we have the same majority on the floor of the House of Commons. I fail to see the logic in his argument for refusing to consider amendments in committee because of our majority there since, in the final analysis, we also have a majority in the House of Commons.

With regard to the opinion he wants from me, yesterday he requested others and I referred him to his learned House leader. I shall be happy to advise him on what will happen once the committee report has been tabled, depending on its contents, because the hon. member now is assuming what it will contain. I want the committee to feel entirely free to do its work as it sees fit. I respect both Parliament and the committee. Theoretically, and in principle, the committee will have the right to come to a conclusion which is not known to us now.

But, in his question, the Leader of the Opposition assumed that the committee will recommend that the joint resolution be presented to the Queen and the British parliament. That is hypothetical, but even then I am willing to tell him what I think, to give him my opinion as the government leader. Once the report is made, should it so recommend, the House will be presented with a motion to that effect. The debate will be on the motion to accept the report. That is nothing new, it has been done before and I have mentioned it before; we have been explaining it for three weeks now. I am convinced, in any event, but I hope the Leader of the Opposition understands.

That report which will be considered by the House will allow the latter, if it so wishes, to make other amendments to the resolution, and to ask that it be deferred once more to the committee for further amendments.

So my understanding of the procedure on this subject and the one which I already discussed with his own parliamentary leader is as follows: in an indirect manner, the House can do what it could do if it were dealing with a resolution, that is to say, through the motion, refer the report back to the committee so that the committee could amend it in such and such a manner. The House will know the reason for the request, from the Conservatives, incidentally, to refer the report for the purpose of bringing in a very specific amendment and so it will be in a position to debate the question.

Yet, by the very nature of this procedure, indeed it is still the committee which will have to make the amendments. That is exactly the procedure. Things would have been different had we had before the House—

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Pinard: If my colleague wishes to get a complete answer, I will continue. If he prefers not to get full answer he will continue to remain in the dark.

Had we put this resolution directly before the House the opposition could not have taken advantage of the three-stage debate that we are now having. Then, of course, the resolution itself could have been amended on the floor of the House. And thanks to the government majority we would not have been bound by any proposal whatsoever. Yet we chose the option of referring it to the committee because we respect this institution and because it gives hon. members more opportunities to express their points of view at three stages rather than only one.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, there were a great number of "ifs" in that answer that will never come to pass. The government House leader knows that the committee to which he would return the matter, if there were amendments, will no longer exist. That committee ends on the twelfth day of December. It is dead; absolutely functus; it no longer exists. He should consult his colleague, Senator McIlraith, on that point. But it is a clear point: there is no committee to which Parliament can refer back amendments.

My question is a very simple one. It is based upon the principle that Parliament might want to amend the substance of the report that comes from the joint committee. Will Parliament have the power to amend the substance of the report that comes from the committee?

● (1125)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I just explained to the Leader of the Opposition that at this stage it is necessary to speculate about the content of the committee's report to express an opinion about it. I do not think it is normal to answer purely hypothetical questions, but I have been nice and considerate enough to explain to him the way I see the whole situation. He just repeated the very same question. In these circumstances, I must tell him: Let us wait until we appoint the committee. But if he were wise, careful and above all sincere, he would use the opportunity which the committee offers him to propose the constructive amendments he has in mind, if any, to facilitate progress on the constitutional issues and help renew federalism.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we will be in committee proposing amendments, but the matter which might arise, as it has very often in this House of Commons, is that after the committee reports this Parliament may, in its wisdom, decide to change what the committee recommends. That has happened before. The procedure which the government has established, does not, according to Senator McIlraith, provide us with that opportunity. The minister has three times declined to answer my question, perhaps because he does not know. I presume the government had a legal opinion on which it based this most unusual procedure.

I have two simple questions, we do not need long answers. The first is this: Does the government have a legal opinion on the question raised by Senator McIlraith? I will rephrase the question so it is clear. Does the government have a legal opinion guaranteeing the right of Parliament to change the substance of the committee report after it has come from committee? If so, will the government House leader in the interests of civilized procedure in this House—I am sorry to borrow the hon. member's word—table that legal opinion?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I just gave an opinion to the Leader of the Official Opposition and I told him that we chose to follow the avenue which will allow the largest possible number of members on both sides of the House to propose amendments to the resolution which will be examined by the joint committee of the House and the Senate when, at last, that committee is allowed to form and meet.

[English]

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE TO MEMBERS OF RIGHT TO SPEAK

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, in view of the rather convoluted and esoteric answers given by the government House leader, may I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister, who I presume is also the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the unprecedented anger and confusion caused to the House of Commons—which is probably unique even in his long parliamentary experience—can the Deputy Prime Minister assure myself and other members in this House that there will be ample opportunity for members to speak, as was intimated but not guaranteed by the Prime Minister yesterday when he used the word "indeterminate", which is a weasel word if I ever heard one? I think the Prime Minister said there will be an indeterminate time for us to look into this matter later.

May I have the basic guarantee from this respected parliamentarian that indeed members of the House of Commons—every one of them—will have an opportunity to speak in this chamber on the paramount importance of the country's constitution, as they so obviously want to do? Can he give us that guarantee without any equivocation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not think it has ever been a principle of parliamentary democracy that every member of the chamber should speak on every item which comes before the House.

Mr. Clark: What about the constitution?

An hon. Member: We have a right to speak.

Mr. MacEachen: That has never been a principle that I have observed in this House of Commons.

We are organized on the party system. Usually parties take positions and these positions are presented by many members in the House. I subscribe to the notion, and so does the government, that there should be ample opportunity for every point of view to be expressed. The hon. member will realize that, in addition to the debate which has already been terminated, there will be an opportunity in the committee for members of Parliament representing the various parties to present their views. That committee report will come back, it will be debated in the House of Commons, and a further opportunity will be given to members to express their views.

Mr. Clark: Can Parliament amend its substance?

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that that procedure is very much in the parliamentary tradition as I have observed it in the House of Commons during my period of time.

● (1130)

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I regret to say this, but I believe the House will agree I was right when I used the adjective a "weasel" promise. Not only did the Prime Minister on national television make it perfectly clear, but he emphasized and re-emphasized that every member of Parliament would have an opportunity to debate fully this matter, as was the case with the flag debate and other matters of interest and importance, and now his Deputy Prime Minister is equivocating. I simply want an assurance and perhaps a definition of what the Prime Minister meant by the word "indeterminate". Are we now to be told that there will not be the opportunity here in the House of Commons for all members who wish to contribute something to his country's constitutional debate, but they will have to go to the committee or go through some other procedure to do it? Will the Deputy Prime Minister simply give us his undertaking on behalf of this government that every member of Parliament from every region and every province of this country can speak on the constitution? Will he do that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is espousing the principle that on this particular resolution every member in the House of Commons should have an opportunity to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It seems to me that if the hon. member and his party were serious in reaching that objective, they would have accepted the proposal made by the government to extend very extensively the hours of sittings of the House so that more and more members could be heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Let me tell the hon. member, through you, Madam Speaker, that we are still prepared as a government to consider ways by which we can increase the number of hours, the number of sittings and the days of sittings so that as many members as possible can speak, and possibly reach the ideal of every member speaking. However, there is no way that can be done if hon. members opposite refuse to co-operate in extending the hours of sitting, and in taking up the valuable time allocated by fruitless and pointless questions of privilege and points of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister knows this perfectly well, and I ask him this very seriously. Is he telling the House—I see he is not even paying attention. That is typical, Madam Speaker. Is the Deputy Prime Minister telling the members of this House that even if we had acquiesced in this very extraordinary procedure on a matter as important as this, we would have had time, no matter if we sat all night, fully to discuss this most important matter before he brought in closure? He has defeated his own argument by bringing in closure before anybody could possibly have fulfilled the conditions he has just enunciated.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that there are three stages. We have completed one stage. There is a second stage in committee, and a third stage when the report comes back from the committee.

Mr. Clark: What happens then?

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member is serious about giving additional members an opportunity to speak, let him encourage his party to make some arrangement so that additional hours and sittings can be arranged.

THE BUDGET

POSSIBLE LEAK OF CONTENTS—REQUEST FOR DENIAL FROM MINISTER

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on a story in this morning's The Globe and Mail by Jeff Carruthers which would seem to represent a leak of the budget the minister proposes to bring in Tuesday night.

In view of the fact that such advance information as to what is to be in the budget could have repercussions on the stock market, could permit some people to make huge sums of money and throw things into a bit of a tizzy, will the Minister of Finance declare categorically that the story in this morning's The Globe and Mail is incorrect, that this is not a forecast of his budget of Tuesday night?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, prior to every budget there are speculative stories relating to the budget. That happened last December when there were innumerable stories as to what would be in the budget. That has happened on this occasion. I have a long list of newspaper articles containing speculation as to what may or may not be in the budget. That is a normal process and it does not require the Minister of Finance either to confirm or deny the rich, often erroneous, speculation that occurs.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that this story lists seriatim at least 15 specific points in very precise terms and very precise detail, will the minister keep this in mind when he brings down his budget and, if there has been a leak, will he take steps to find out how that came about?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, we will not be able to deal with that possibility until after the budget has been delivered. Obviously at that time if there appears to have been any leak, which is a matter quite apart from speculation, action will be taken. However, because the speculation is so diversified and wide-ranging in all newspapers—there is not just the article by Mr. Carruthers; there is a variety of others—it would be difficult for the speculation, in some cases at least, not to be right—for example, the date of the budget.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that one of the most important items in Mr. Carruthers' story is to the effect that there is to be an export tax on natural gas and electricity, and in view of the serious nature of this, will the minister deny categorically that he has any intention of imposing such a tax—

An hon. Member: You want to know what is in the budget.

Mr. Knowles: I want the minister to deny that there is a budget leak—particularly when it is in the minister's power, by increasing taxes on the multinationals, which have had a 65 per cent increase in their profits in the last nine months, to get the funds he needs without the offensive tax which Mr. Carruthers says the minister is going to produce?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the same question was raised recently at the meeting of ministers of finance when a number of ministers asked me to forswear at that point the possibility of an export tax. What I will say today is what I told them, namely that it is an option that is available to the Minister of Finance, that it is fully within the constitutional authority of the Government of Canada to levy such a tax, and it is an option which is being considered at the present time.

STANDING ORDERS

S.O. 33—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, in order that the rights of private members on both sides of this House will not be further offended, and in view of the fact that Standing Order 33 effectively restricts the freedom of speech of duly elected members of Parliament, will the government take steps to remove or to modify the rule by referring it to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections?

● (1140)

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the suggestion made by the hon. member concerns 1/116 of the kind of reform we would welcome in this institution, because the Standing Orders of this House contain 116 items. On the other hand, I have a suggestion to make. Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C when applied are termed as closure by the opposition, but they are really used to limit the debate and to extend it more than a full day if we wish. The hon. member knows full well that these Standing Orders cannot apply to a motion, only to a bill, because they only concern the different stages of a bill. So I suggest it would be a positive step—and I am open to this suggestion if the hon. member wants to make it—to include in Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C motions as well as bills. This would have enabled us in this case to allow more than a full day while restricting the debate at this first stage of the constitutional issue. So, according to his suggestion, Madam Speaker, if, on the one hand, we are quite open to parliamentary reform, and I want to indicate to my colleagues that something is forthcoming in this regard, it would also be advisable to consider applying the provisions of Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C to a motion in addition to a bill.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CLOSURE WILL NOT BE REINVOKED

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, of course I would welcome any move toward parliamentary reform, and I thank the minister for agreeing to consider such an initiative.

An hon. Member: And respect.

Mr. Wenman: I respect Parliament, my friend, and I hope you do the same.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: In his press conference yesterday the Prime Minister hinted at the use of closure to limit debate on further stages of this proposal or motion which will be returned to the House. Can the Deputy Prime Minister assure this House that the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada will not, during the forthcoming procedures, invoke closure again? In fact, closure should not be invoked until the parliamentary reform suggested by his colleague is completed. Can he give us the assurance that all members will have the right to speak and that closure will not be invoked in further stages?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows as well as I do that the rule invoked yesterday is a part of the procedure of the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Brought in by the Tories in 1913.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has properly reminded us that the closure rule was brought in by the Conservative party.

Mr. Crombie: Not for the constitution.

Mr. MacEachen: I remember also that Mr. Diefenbaker, before he became prime minister, stated that he would abolish the closure rule, but during his period as prime minister he forgot all about it.

Mr. Clark: He never used it.

Mr. MacEachen: He left the closure rule on the books, and when the present House leader for the Conservative party brought in his paper on parliamentary change, to my recollection he did not include any indication of abolishing closure.

EXPRESSION OF VIEWS OF MEMBERS BEFORE JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the fact that the parliamentary committee which is to be established will consist of a relatively small number of members, probably five or six from our party and two from the New Democratic Party, and in light of last night's closure when 200 members were denied the right to speak about the fundamental arrangements which govern this country, would the minister please advise this House as to how these members are to make their views known to the committee so that the committee will have the advantage of knowing those views when reporting to this House? In particular, is any consideration being given whereby members have to ask to be witnesses before a committee of Parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, those are questions which could be easily answered by the parliamentary leader of my hon. colleague. However, I am pleased to remind him that, with the assistance of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I suggested to his party to sit longer hours when there would be no Liberal speakers and when we would have only Progressive Conservative speakers to participate in the debate, and that his own caucus rejected that offer.

We mentioned earlier through the Deputy Prime Minister that we were prepared during the third stage, once the committee has reported to the House, to discuss an extension of the debate hours and also an extension of the days for the debate on that matter. So we are prepared to negotiate all those questions, and to give more time to all hon. members who want to participate but we want the opposition to prove its good faith by accepting at least the reasonable offers we made them.

[English]

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, the conduct of the government with respect to this debate has entrenched bitterness, it has not entrenched rights.

My supplementary question is to the same minister, and it pertains to the constitution, which is the public social contract which underpins the terms on which Canadians live together. Does the minister not believe that this basic arrangement, which keeps people living together in a state hopefully of harmony, deserves a maximum amount of scrutiny, certainly more than the Bank Act or any other bill which comes before the House? Why have we not been given an opportunity to debate fully the constitution of our country?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, may I remind the hon. member that it was his own leader who urged us not to deal with this very important question but rather with economic matters when Parliament resumed? We thought that this institution was capable of working on more than one important matter at a time. We also thought this institution was capable of showing the Canadian public that, through its committees, it could tackle concurrently constitutional, economic and energy issues.

So if some members of the opposition want to show the Canadian people it is possible to paralyse Parliament, they may succeed temporarily but I can guarantee that over the long term common sense will prevail and the public will realize that Parliament can function, can face the realities of the eighties, and also that we have the power and the capacity to cope with important issues such as the constitution, the economy, energy and all others to which he referred. All that is required for the House to function really well and for each member to enjoy complete freedom of expression is a little co-operation and good faith.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY WHETHER NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TAX WILL BE IMPOSED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I would like to return to the matter of the budget which was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because it affects my constituents right in their pocket books.

My question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and concerns the proposed energy export tax which we on this side of the House firmly oppose. I wonder if the minister is aware that the National Energy Board's own figures show that the export tax would fall four and a half times heavier on western gas exports than, say, other exports such as electricity, and therefore is discriminatory against one area of the country.

Mr. Andre: Since when have you cared?

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I do not have to take lectures from the Conservatives in this area.

Mr. Clark: What about Ed Broadbent and his sweetheart deals?

Mr. Waddell: Just be quiet and listen to my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Waddell: In light of the delicate political situation in the west, which the minister must understand, and in light of the fact that there is a gas bubble in the United States—they are not taking all our gas now—why is the minister's government stubbornly, and stupidly in my view, going ahead with this proposed export tax?

Mr. Malone: I heard a bubble.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I regret that my hon. friend has been subjected to abuse by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, but we on this side of the House are used to that from the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend has been speculating on the content of the budget. I suggest to my hon. friend that he wait for the budget and then he will be able to reach his own conclusions. I have indicated previously that the government was concerned to ensure that there would be fairness in our energy policy which will be announced. I hope that when the hon. member looks at it, he will find it to be a fair policy for all Canadians, including western Canadians.

Mr. Waddell: I thank the minister and I should like to tell him that I take lots of abuse from my colleagues to the right, but I would like to have some answers from him. He can stand up and just deny that he will bring in the tax. Let me suggest to him—and I wish he would respond to this—that a government like his government can get hooked on a tax like this because they will crave more and more of the revenues. The National Energy Board is now talking about a new pricing formula so that we can lower the price of gas and sell more to the United States. Will the minister stand in his place now and rule out the possibility of the Government of Canada decreasing the price of Canadian gas in the U.S. market?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I think it would be rather foolhardy while the National Energy Board is proceeding with a review of the situation and having consultations with the provincial governments concerned and the industry to prejudge any of the recommendations that may come out of this study. We will see what the recommendations are and those recommendations will be made public. I am sure there will be an opportunity to discuss them and the government will take a decision if specific changes are recommended.

I can tell the hon. member that at the present time I am not considering changes to the existing formula. However, if there are improvements that are necessary, I think it would be stupid on the part of the government not to wait for those recommendations.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATIONS OF WIRETAPPING

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Solicitor General of Canada. In view of information released by CBC this morning alleging that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has wiretapped the legislature of British Columbia, is the minister aware of that incident and if so what does he intend to do?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I can say that the policy I follow is this: first, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police obeys the law. What the RCMP did in this case and in the case of the Yukon, is that it appeared before the courts each time to secure a warrant. Second, it respects the privileges of all legislatures and those of the Canadian Parliament as well. The problem is to know which privileges have to be respected in the various legislatures. It is not always clear. In the case mentioned by the hon. member, it was discovered later on, after a committee meeting, what were the privileges of that legislature. So I sent a letter to all speakers across the country to ask them or their legislatures what privileges they wanted the RCMP to respect. When they send me their answers, I can assure the House that we will certainly be prepared to respect the respective privileges of the legislatures.

THE CONSTITUTION

OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS TO JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, as one who was denied the right to speak in the debate on the constitution, I have been rather disturbed by some of the answers given this morning by the House leader. The Prime Minister gave an undertaking, not only to individual members but to the citizens of Canada, that their representatives would be entitled to speak in this debate. That has been denied us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and it is similar to the question put to the House leader. Will I, as an individual member, have the opportunity of making representations to the committee or will I have to be a member of that committee before I can do so? It is a very simple question and I would like an answer.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the committee will be established. It is master of its own proceedings and it can decide—

An hon. Member: What nonsense!

Mr. MacEachen: —to bring in any member of Parliament. It has been obvious to me for quite some time that members of Parliament who are not members of the committee have been able to be present and have also been permitted to make their views known.

Mr. Neil: I have a short supplementary question. I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister is prepared to examine the procedure and perhaps make some changes which will guarantee the members of the House of Commons the right to make amendments to the proposed resolution when it is returned to the House.

Mr. Clark: Amendments of substance.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Madam Speaker, I am not proposing to propose amendments to the Standing Orders of the House. The government House leader has already dealt with that question. When the report comes out of the committee, it will be possible for the House to determine what it wishes to do with it. But I am sure the hon. member is sincere in expressing a desire to have his views heard, either in committee or in the House of Commons, and personally I am quite sympathetic to that point of view.

Mr. Neil: Then demonstrate your sympathy.

Mr. MacEachen: But I suggest to the hon. member that there should be a way to accommodate both the desire of the government to facilitate the passage of this resolution and the desire of hon. members to participate. If his party is prepared to negotiate in good faith in order to make appropriate arrangements in the way described by the House leader, then he will find that we will negotiate in good faith also.

Mr. Clark: That is trickery. Appropriate arrangements on his own terms. That is nonsense.

OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO DEBATE JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, further to the questions asked this morning I should like to add another question and I direct it to the government House leader. From the time of the introduction of this constitutional resolution, we have heard a good deal of glowing comments with respect to fundamental rights and the necessity to entrench those rights against arrogant governments and politicians. We had a fine example of that just recently.

Following the committee's discussions, will I as a member of this House have an opportunity to participate in the debate after the committee has reported to the House, having been one of those who was denied the opportunity by the actions of that arrogant government to speak in this constitutional debate, one in which the Prime Minister invited all members of Parliament to participate?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I repeat that we will show the same open-mindedness as at the first stage, when we asked the Progressive Conservative Party to negotiate a time schedule which would make it possible for a larger number of its members to deal with this issue. Once again, I reiterate this offer. We are willing to negotiate in good faith, as we have always done in the past, and we expect now the Progressive Conservative Party to co-operate even more to make it possible for its backbenchers—I strongly urge the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party to listen attentively to these representations—to express their views. I advise him that I will make offers to his House leader to increase the time allotted for discussion, even adding a few days, if necessary, so that a larger number of hon. members may be heard. I hope, therefore, that we will obtain more serious co-operation, and that good faith will prevail more than it has up to now.

[English]

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. Since the reason for the introduction of closure was the economic measures that the government wanted to introduce, may I ask why the minister did not introduce those economic measures last week, this week or even today, and why is the Prime Minister not in his place today if these economic measures are so important?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member is well aware, we will have a budget speech Tuesday night. The offer we made the Conservatives and which they refused was to sit till midnight on Monday to debate the constitutional proposal. We made the offer but they refused. Given that refusal we had no other alternative but to take our responsibilities and respect the Canadian public and act as we did.

Madam Speaker, I draw the attention of hon. members across the aisle to the fact that we have had two elections in one year, that there are 30 bills on the order paper, that we must have nine opposition days before December 10, seven of which will be between November 14 and December 10, and six of those being Committees of the Whole House.

We must have six and one half days to debate the budget speech. Yet we must also continue to govern the country. We must also take our responsibilities. That is why, Madam Speaker, we acted as we did in order to give Parliament, through its committee, the opportunity to consider the constitutional proposal while, at the same time, assuming our responsibilities toward the Canadian public which expects a lot more from its elected representatives than purely delaying tactics such as the ones we have seen in the last few days.

FISHERIES

CANADA-U.S. WEST COAST SALMON TREATY—OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister will be painfully aware of the difficulty Canada is having in getting ratification of the east coast fisheries treaty. Also he will be aware of some of the sacrifices fishermen on the east coast have already been asked to make in getting any approval from the negotiating committees.

This week in Seattle, Washington, the negotiating committees for the United States and Canada met to discuss a treaty which will have a joint management of the west coast salmon industry. Does the minister feel that the treaty on the west coast is important enough to have a parliamentary debate before any Canadian government ratification occurs? Will he guarantee to give some assurance to the House that before any ratification is undertaken by the government we will have a chance to discuss the treaty which may be signed?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, certainly I recognize the sacrifices made by Canadian fishermen on the east coast. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made that point very strongly and clearly. As for the possible west coast agreement, I have not yet been debriefed on the results of the negotiations that took place this week.

An hon. Member: What do you mean by "debriefed"?

Mr. LeBlanc: I hope to do this over the weekend. I do not think the procedure in Canada is the same as that in the United States. For that reason I do not think I can answer in substance the hon. member's invitation to have a debate of the type which would lead to a vote on ratification or non-ratification. As the hon. member well knows, I favour full discussion of these questions in a parliamentary committee. I am sure we will find a way to air fully the views of members on all sides of the House.

ALTERNATIVE METHODS OF NEGOTIATION

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, perhaps the minister is aware that one of the difficulties in the Canadian public's mind is that they do not have enough information. They are not aware of the kinds of sacrifices Canadian fishermen have already undertaken.

I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Recently at a conference on "Approaches to Foreign Policy—Differences and Similarities" the minister made the following statement:

> In Canada, parliamentary approval is sought only for some of the very most important treaties, and treaty negotiation and ratification is a matter of executive authority as an element of the royal prerogative.

Also the minister indicated that they were looking at alternatives to the present method of negotiating treaties. Does he feel this treaty is important enough to be dealt with in Parliament? Has he decided on any mechanism by which we can delay our decision in the House or by his government until the United States Senate has given its approval?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, that is a question which has not yet been considered by the government nor in all its implications even by myself, because we are not far enough along the road yet for that decision to be warranted.

OFFICIAL REPORT

DELAY IN TRANSLATION OF YESTERDAY'S ISSUE

Madam Speaker: With the permission of the House, I should like to make two brief statements. I want to inform the House that Hansard will be available later today; we have had problems with translations. It is not that the translators did not work very hard in order to allow us to have Hansard this morning, but because of the circumstances of which all members are aware, the staff was rather thin, some of them had worked for approximately 48 hours in a row, and people were very, very tired. Therefore, there will be a delay in the publication of Hansard today, but we hope things will be re-established very rapidly.

I think hon. members would want me to thank those people who have worked hard to translate Hansard so that we can have it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE OF SECURITY GUARDS BEHIND CURTAINS IN CHAMBER

Madam Speaker: I have another statement about security guards. I have been made aware of the presence of security guards behind the curtains, and I have initiated an inquiry as to why they were positioned there, and for what reason. I will want to investigate that matter thoroughly and report to the House as soon as I can.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BEATTY—ENERGY ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Madam Speaker: I have before me a question of privilege which is not completed; I deferred it for two days. As I said the other day in the House, after having read the statements of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), I wanted to ascertain whether the Chair needed to be further informed on that particular question of privilege.

I found in the statement of the hon. member that indeed he had pursued the government for the substance of a document written by a public servant, and also for the substance of campaign ads on energy. But, he did not really relate the substance of these documents to the specific matter of parliamentary privilege. Therefore, I should like to hear the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and I should like to ask him if he would try, for my guidance and in order to be helpful to the House, to relate more closely the substance of those documents and those ads to the matter of parliamentary privilege, so that I may be able to establish whether there is a prima facie case of privilege.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, you no doubt saw, at the same time as I rose when this matter was first raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was also rising to participate in the argument before you.

I have discussed this matter with the hon. member for St. John's East, and in the interest of saving the time of the House on this question, he will be speaking for both of us.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I will endeavour to be brief because some of my colleagues have other matters of considerable urgency which they wish to raise.

Very briefly, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) bears a certain similarity to a question of privilege which I raised earlier, on which Your Honour has ruled and to which Your Honour has alluded, as well as the question of privilege raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). What concerns us is the narrow interpretation by the Chair of privilege in so far as the use of intimidation is concerned.

It would be my argument, with great respect, if Your Honour were to view the arguments presented by my colleague and indeed by myself on previous occasions in that context, that we now have a new dimension in this country which has a direct bearing and influence upon our proceedings in this House. That new dimension is the mass media and the access of the Government of Canada to that mass media, indeed the access we have as a Parliament to the mass media through the use of television cameras now in this House.

● (1210)

You will recall, Madam Speaker, that when my colleague presented his question of privilege he referred to a memorandum which had been issued by a senior official of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. That memorandum referred to the debate which would take place in the House on energy policy, and I quote from that memorandum:

The underlying strategy in this communications plan is to achieve three goals, in sequence:

1. Take control of the energy debate.
2. Retain that control through action and leadership.
3. Remove "energy" from the list of highranking national concerns.

Now, we know there has been the sum of some $5.6 million already spent on a campaign to take control of the debate. We also know that one of the target groups of that advertising campaign is the official opposition, so identified in the memo.

It has been argued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that the memo was not accepted. But we know from the public record, by the person who wrote the memo, that we do not know what parts of the strategy contained in the memo had in fact been accepted by the government and implemented, because he refused to state this directly in reply to a question put to him in an interview. It seems to me that if the government is to be permitted, through the use of public funds, voted by this House, to gain control of a debate through the manipulation of the mass media, with the official opposition as one of the target groups, in my opinion is a serious breach of the privileges of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is just as much intimidation as we had in the past where a member could be physically intimidated by one means or another. The means of intimidation are now through the manipulation of the media by the government, and the control which the media could exercise on public opinion and, hence, on the members of this House as a target group in terms of the government "taking control of the debate". I believe that is a very serious matter. I believe that it has tremendous consequences for parliamentary democracy down the road. It is almost Orwellian in its consequences. It is in that sense that my colleagues and I would like Your Honour to look at the question of privilege raised by my colleague, because we believe it to be a serious and substantive matter.

If the Chair, in its wisdom, with the learned advisers which Madam Speaker has at her disposal, is to examine this question of privilege in the narrow and ancient confines of the interpretation of privilege, as laid down by Beauchesne, May and our own procedures, then, of course, you will rule that there is no prima facie case of privilege. But if Your Honour will examine the question of privilege in light of present day reality and the propensity of this government, by its own admission, to use public funds to manipulate and control public opinion and, indeed, to go even one step further, by designating in a memo of a senior official of the government, the official opposition as one of the target groups of such a manipulative advertising campaign, then Madam Speaker will readily see why we want to press this matter, why we feel it is a matter of considerable concern, and why we graciously submit to Your Honour that you take it under advisement and that you view it in that context. Failure to do so, Madam Speaker, in my humble submission, will only bring on further questions of privilege because the government has already indicated its intention to persist in what I consider to be gross misuse of public funds.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I can note very briefly that I know that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has given his point of view and explained the facts. He has said very clearly that he has denied the facts on which members opposite have based their question of privilege. They have alleged the existence of a memorandum from an official to justify their argument, and for his part, the minister has clearly said that this memorandum has been rejected and that it is not being used or followed. Moreover, according to the minister, the official involved has admitted publicly that what he had recommended had not been followed but, rather, rejected by the minister.

Having said this, Madam Speaker, you are faced with members who maintain the opposite. You are also faced with a minister whose word must be believed and who has stated to the members who raised this question of privilege that they have no reason to feel concerned because the memorandum in question and the recommendations made by the official have been rejected, as the official himself has confirmed.

That being so, Madam Speaker, I would like to limit my comments to a procedural matter since the facts have been clearly pointed out by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I would like to refer to citation 16 on page 11 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its members—

The quotation used by Beauchesne was made by Sir Erskine May in his "Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament," nineteenth edition, London, 1976, page 67. This is the definition of our privileges. In paragraph 17 which follows, in light of this very restricted definition of our privileges, Beauchesne states, still on page 11:

> A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in Parliament.

This is easy to understand, Madam Speaker. On page 12, of Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 19(1) states, and I quote:

> A dispute—

and here it is even more relevant:

> A dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

Now, that is exactly the case before us. Since it is fundamentally a difference of opinion about facts, it cannot be a breach of privilege affecting hon. members. It is a matter of debate and, at any rate, it is certainly a breach of privilege even if the facts were admittedly as defined in citation 16 I quoted earlier.

So the present situation is quite familiar to you, Madam Speaker, namely that, of course, it is up to the House to decide if there is a breach of privilege. Your role, as indicated in Beauchesne's citation 84, on page 27, is to rule whether a prima facie case can be established. The current parliamentary practice offers numerous precedents, and one only has to refer to the proceedings of the last couple of weeks to the effect that divergent opinions on facts are matters for debate rather than questions of privileges. That is why, in this case, I respectfully submit that this is a matter for debate and that there is absolutely no basis for the question of privilege.

[English]

Madam Speaker: If there are no further interventions I will reserve judgment on this particular question of privilege. I thank the hon. member for the arguments he has put forward. He has made a serious effort to relate the question of privilege to the matter of parliamentary privilege and I thank him for that because that is, of course, most helpful to the Chair.

In the circumstances I will also reserve my ruling on the question of privilege which has been raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), which is not similar but very close. I have notice of other questions of privilege by other hon. members.

• (1220)

MR. THACKER—IMPOSITION OF CLOSURE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I would like you to consider, and it arises out of the events of yesterday and shortly before yesterday. I claim that the imposition of the closure rule on the resolution dealing with the constitution violates my personal privilege as a member of this House to attend here and to speak for my constituents. My claim is that I am restricted to the narrow point of the constitution.

As you know, Madam Speaker, if this resolution comes into force, the whole social fabric of our country will be changed. As the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) has pointed out, we do have a social contract. I submit that there will be many changes in the future, and I would like your advice. I believe that it is a violation of our privileges as members to be able to speak because we are limited to the narrow point of amending our Canadian constitution.

When I came here as a new member I read Beauchesne, particularly the section in the fifth edition dealing with "Principles of Parliamentary Law", which states:

To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence of a tyranny of a majority; . . . to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse.

I clearly feel that I have the right to speak. I am sure that you are aware, Madam Speaker, of the section in the BNA Act which gives to my constituents the privilege to elect a person to come here and represent their views. I have referred you to Beauchesne and the long-standing customs and traditions of this House.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) claimed to Canadians that their member would be able to speak, and therefore I claim that privilege because of the law and because I represent a minority region, and because the government is acting on sudden impulse. This resolution reduces my constituents, the province of Alberta and the other provinces, from a position of equality on constitutional amendment to a position of perpetual second-class status.

The resolution imposes rights over our long-standing common law tradition. For example, section 42 in the resolution has the potential to destroy the protection which heretofore was inherent in my provincial government, and section 44 interferes with the protection which my constituents have heretofore had through the Senate. I have studied the resolution, listened to the speeches, and consulted with my constituents by letter, telephone, and personally, and I have prepared very carefully a speech of some 21 pages in which I attempt to point out to hon. members opposite the very deep feelings we have in the west about this resolution and the potential downside for us.

We are dealing with the constitution. It is a document which will go on forever. I believe that I have a privilege and that my constituents have the right to have their views put before this House so that my children and grandchildren will remember, 100 years and 200 years down the road, that their member at least had an input. I believe that closure has blocked that privilege. I submit that there is a prima facie case of privilege and I therefore move:

That the whole question of closure related to the narrow point of the constitution be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

We look to you personally, Madam Speaker, because this matter will go on for many, many decades, to create some new law with respect to constitutional amendments.

Madam Speaker: At the outset, I would remind the hon. member that Standing Order 33 does not make any exception as to the subject which may come under closure. I believe that part of his argumentation was based on the fact that we are dealing with a particular subject and that he would have liked to have had a chance to express himself at length on that particular subject. Of course, that is the right of all members of Parliament, and our rules are devised in order to allow members to express themselves. Those rules have been voluntarily imposed on the House by the members and they are accepted by all the members.

At some point, and at certain times, members feel that these rules are restrictive and, indeed, they are. But if they are restrictive to some, these restrictions are designed to protect others so that they too can express themselves. A very simple example is the 20-minute, 30-minute, and 40-minute rule which is applied to various speeches. One member might find that 40 minutes is restrictive and, indeed, it is as far as he is concerned. But that rule is designed to allow other members to express themselves because that also is a right of this House.

The matter to which the hon. member is referring has been voted upon in this House. I have merely executed a decision of this House. Closure had been voted into this House. Once that is done the procedure follows, and I try to apply it as best as I can interpret it. My feelings, and I have been very careful throughout this last day, yesterday, to be as fair as possible, because I know how important it is when such a measure is proposed to the House, are that everything should be done in order and in conformity with our Standing Orders.

I have applied my efforts and my best attention to see that everything was just so in the course of yesterday. I must tell the hon. member that my feeling is very strong, that everything which went on, which members might or might not like, was done strictly according to our Standing Orders. Therefore, I am very sorry to say that I cannot find a question of privilege in the hon. member's question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRESENTATION OF BUDGET

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, pursuant to Standing Order 60, I request that you designate an order of the day to permit the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to present his budget at 8 p.m. on Tuesday, October 28, 1980.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LEWIS—NOTICE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that you have undertaken to investigate the matter of the security police in this House last evening, or earlier this morning, I am content that my question of privilege stand down until you have had an opportunity to report to this House.

MR. OBERLE—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. MacEACHEN

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is with regard to references that were made in the course of the question period earlier today by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) in response to a question by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). I am very concerned about the matter, as I am sure the Chair will be, because the two members involved, particularly the Deputy Prime Minister, calculate their words very carefully. The Deputy Prime Minister, as we know, is always very deliberate in his statements.

Why I am concerned and why I feel that I have a question of privilege is because I think that I clearly understood the Deputy Prime Minister to say that there were discussions between the House leader of the official opposition and the government House leader with respect to extended hours and extended days on the constitutional debate. I do not have the blues, but I intend to check them. Certainly it is misleading of the facts as they were told to me by my House leader.

This is not the usual debate. Members in this chamber were glued to their chairs and were glued to every word that was uttered in this House by members on both sides. It is a debate that will fundamentally and ultimately change the way of life of Canadians, the relationships between individuals and minority groups with their governments and with their state. We were all in the chamber.

The Deputy Prime Minister knew full well that even to suggest that there was an offer of extended hours was utter nonsense because, even though the government planned through entrenchment of rights, to do certain things that are nothing more than a utopian dream, such as to eliminate discrimination all at once, they will not be able with this measure to extend the hours of the day which are 24 for members of Parliament and every other citizen of this country.

We were in this chamber from two o'clock in the afternoon until ten o'clock at night, every day. There was just no way that a member could do his work in his office and discharge his responsibilities to his constituents in the time allowed. A member cannot sit in this chamber 24 hours a day; there are other things that have to be done, so that was nonsense because the Deputy Prime Minister knew this. When he said there was an offer to extend the days, that was misleading the House. It could leave the impression throughout the country that this party was not co-operative. I want to be very sure that the Deputy Prime Minister was not being deliberate when he said this. I am concerned because, as I have said, the minister is usually very calculated and very deliberate in all he says.

There was no opportunity for members of this House—as you know, Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity. I was one of 17 members of the official opposition who had the opportunity to speak, but all the rest of my colleagues did not.

It is not in the interests of restoring order, respect and decorum in this House, for the Deputy Prime Minister to make statements which are obviously misleading and, I will not at this moment use the word "deliberate" but I shall reserve the right to do so once I have had the opportunity to examine the blues.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): On that point, Madam Speaker, I presume the hon. member, if he was not mistaken altogether, was really alluding to the Deputy Prime Minister and not to the leader of the government; since he was looking at me while speaking, he may have mistaken one for the other. Be that as it may, I was here when the Deputy Prime Minister answered the question and I myself had to answer some of the questions on the matter; I want that to be very clear.

No one on this side of the House said that extra days had been offered to the opposition for the first stage. What the Deputy Prime Minister said was that we would be willing to negotiate for the third stage; I said the same thing, that is we would be willing to extend the hours and, if need be, allow extra. But when my learned colleague refers to the offer made for the first stage, which ended during the night, then, as we said, and I call upon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to vouch for it, since those proposals were made to each of the respective caucuses of the three parties—in fact, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made the proposal himself—to allow the House to sit yesterday, Thursday, from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., and from 10 p.m. till midnight, then all day Friday, that is today, during normal hours, Monday at dinner time from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. and 10 till midnight, provided the vote on the motion passed last night, was taken Tuesday afternoon, before the budget speech. That is exactly what the proposal entailed that was made at the meeting of the House leaders and which we agreed would be submitted to our respective caucuses. Obviously, the NDP accepted the proposal. It came from them. We, on our side of the House, were also willing to accept it. It was the Tories who refused it. Those are the facts, I hope that can satisfy and placate my learned colleague; that is what we said and I cannot believe the Deputy Prime Minister would say anything different with regard to the first stage.

When the Deputy Prime Minister spoke of extra days, it was in terms of the third stage; he said that we would be willing to negotiate an extension of the deadline, the hours of debate, even if it meant having to sit extra days. I reiterate the same offer.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I think I should wrap this up by putting something on the record that the government House leader did not put there. As he is aware, I attended that House leaders' meeting when that offer was made. At that time I indicated that the proposal would likely not find favour in our caucus unless the days were extended, because we had 43 or more members who had yet to speak. Obviously the hours proposed were not going to accommodate 43 plus members who still had to speak and who had indicated their desire to speak on the measure. Additional days were therefore required. I thought that should be added to the explanation just given by the government House leader.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) on the same point.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my comment in this connection is that when one is speaking of the right of members of Parliament to express the views of their constituents, there is no matter of negotiating. The words "rights" and "negotiations", as far as members of Parliament are concerned, should not be used in the same sentence.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), mentioned, there is the possibility of extending the number of days. Certainly, in a matter as important as the constitution of this country which will determine the shape, size, form, and manner of living in this country for the next century, and perhaps more, this is surely a matter where all members of this House should have an opportunity to speak in the normal hours of debate of this House.

I will not accept the word "negotiation" in terms of the exercise of my right to be heard in this House, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) wants to look at Hansard to see whether the first answer which was given to him conforms with what he thought he heard. I do not know whether the explanation given now by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) satisfies him as to what was said—I am not saying he is satisfied with the substance of it but as to what was said, and the further explanation given by the hon. member for the Yukon.

Am I to understand that the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River is giving me notice that he might bring up the question of privilege once he has seen the blues?

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, if the Acting Prime Minister said that an offer was made to add days to the constitutional debate, I reserve the right to raise this question again.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in conclusion, since my learned colleague from Yukon has commented on the nature of the negotiations on the proposal, I may add, since this also concerns the point of order raised by the other hon. member, that when our proposal was rejected, he was not present at the one o'clock meeting Wednesday afternoon in my office, it was rather—

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that such information might extend the debate. The hon. member wishes to refer to the official report to see whether the answers really agree with what he thinks he has heard. I feel that the exchange has gone on long enough and I want to see what the hon. member will decide on Monday.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I merely wish to point out that I asked for a counterproposal, but none was forthcoming. There was therefore no question of extending—

Madam Speaker: I think that was quite clear. Thank you.

EXCISE TAX

PETITION RESPECTING NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRIC POWER—MR. SIDDON

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, during the past three and one half weeks, over 30,000 residents of British Columbia have signed a petition in which they expressed their absolute rejection of any attempts by the Government of Canada to impose a federal excise tax on the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power from British Columbia.

On behalf of my constituents, and many other British Columbians, I present to this House the signatures of 8,640 Canadians and residents of British Columbia who are absolutely opposed to any form of federal excise tax being imposed upon the natural gas and other natural resources of British Columbia.

I might add, Madam Speaker, it is through no help from the NDP that we obtained these signatures. I was presented with a grand total of 25 signatures by that party after they studiously avoided the question for several weeks.

Members of this House know that any such tax on the resources of British Columbia would violate a basic condition of my province's entry into confederation, that condition being that the resources of British Columbia shall belong in perpetuity to the province—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe I have a number of petitions today. I must remind hon. members that they are allowed to present their petitions but not to enter into debate. The presentation should be kept extremely short—and when I say extremely short, I mean generally within a minute.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I shall close very succinctly. I just wanted to say, pertinent to the petition, that the revenues therefrom were to be used for the development of communities, opportunities, and services to the people of British Columbia.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, on behalf of these petitioners I ask for serious consideration of their strong appeal to the Prime Minister and to the Government of Canada through this House of Commons.

PETITION RESPECTING NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRIC POWER—MISS CARNEY

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, with your permission, I would like to present a petition signed by 1,765 British Columbians who, having due regard for the constitutional guarantee made to British Columbians under the British North America Act which promises that all natural resources within B.C. belong to the province, express their absolute rejection of any attempt by the Government of Canada to impose a federal excise tax on the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power from British Columbia. This petition represents the results of a one-day blitz and is representative only of the deep feeling in my constituency.

On behalf of my petitioners, I ask for serious consideration of their request by the Government of Canada.

PETITION RESPECTING NATURAL GAS—MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise and with your permission, wish to present a petition signed by 3,502 Canadian citizens living in British Columbia. This petition indicates their complete and unalterable opposition to the plans of this government to impose a tax on natural gas exported to customers in the United States, the tax being collected from the revenues of the selling agency, a B.C. Crown corporation, and through that corporation to the provincial government, thereby depriving residents of British Columbia of some of the vitally important services to which they are entitled, such as hospital and medical care.

As to form, there are a number of signatures on a newspaper column which appeared in a daily newspaper on the weekend of September 27 which have been transcribed onto the proper petition form that I have attached. On behalf of the petitioners, I ask for consideration of their requests by the Government of Canada.

PETITIONS RESPECTING NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRIC POWER—MR. COOK

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I echo the comments of my colleagues. With your permission I wish to present a petition signed by residents of my riding, North Vancouver-Burnaby. In the absence of my colleague, the hon. member Capilano (Mr. Huntington), I present the same petition signed by residents of his riding, in total somewhat over 3,200. If the mails in Canada were better there would be double that number because I am informed there are many sheets still on their way here.

The petition asks that the Government of Canada not impose a federal excise tax on the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power from British Columbia because of the severe repercussions upon the economy of British Columbia.

In addition, on behalf of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), who is not in the House, we have an additional 2,000 signatures from that particular area of the province of British Columbia. On behalf of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) an additional 2,870 of his constituents have also signed an identical petition.

I would respectfully submit these petitions on behalf of my four colleagues and myself to you, Madam Speaker.

PETITIONS RESPECTING NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRIC POWER—MR. KING

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I, too, ask your permission to present this House with a petition requesting that a proposed tax on the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power not be imposed. Therefore, I present that petition signed by 2,561 constituents of Okanagan-Similkameen, which is in central south British Columbia.

On behalf of the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) I present another petition signed by 517 constituents of his riding. The petition rejects absolutely any attempt by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the Government of Canada to impose a federal excise tax on the export of natural gas, the imposition of which would be a disguised form of supplementary income tax against every resident of British Columbia.

On behalf of the petitioners, Canadians resident in British Columbia, I ask for consideration of their request by the Government of Canada.

PETITIONS RESPECTING NATURAL GAS—MR. OBERLE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, it is fitting that I am the last one to present petitions today because British Columbia derives its entire energy resource harvest from northeastern British Columbia, the area that I represent.

I, too, rise to echo the comments which have been made by my hon. colleagues. I present petitions which have been collected by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway), the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish), and myself on behalf of my constituents in Prince George-Peace River. These petitions protest the proposed imposition of an excise tax on natural gas resources harvested in British Columbia.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 86, 390 and 1,232 to 1,247 inclusive.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES—MATERIALS STORED BY CABINET MINISTERS

Question No. 86—Mr. Cossitt:

Did any cabinet minister in the former government who was defeated on May 22, 1979, consign or make arrangements with the Public Archives to accept or store material and, if so, in each case (a) what is his/her name (b) what was the general nature of the material (c) has it been sorted and catalogued and, if not, on what date will it be (d) will it be available for examination by the general public and (i) if so, on what date (ii) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Archives as follows: The Public Archives Canada offers security storage facilities for the papers of current former cabinet ministers. Under the deposit system the papers remain the property of the particular depositor who also controls access. The Public Archives does not sort or describe the papers, but provides only the storage facility. The final disposition of the papers is determined later by the depositor.

A. The following cabinet ministers who were defeated on May 22, 1979, have placed papers on deposit in the Public Archives.

Name	Extent in Metres
Tony Abbott	40.8m
Norm Cafik	24.0m
Iona Campagnolo	61.5m
Bud Cullen	33.0m
Hugh Faulkner	71.2m
Alastair Gillespie	104.03m
Jack Horner	14.1m
Otto Lang	98.1m
Len Marchand	31.2m
Martin O'Connell	47.7m
John Roberts	18.6m

The following cabinet minister who was defeated on May 22, 1979, has donated papers to the Public Archives:

Barney Danson	100.97m

B. The Public Archives is not apprised of the specific contents of the deposit collections. Experience with collections that have been donated to the Public Archives indicate that while the contents vary from one minister to another, the general contents fall within one or more of the following categories:

—papers accumulated as a member of Parliament including constituency correspondence, research and subject files and party files,

—personal and political papers relating to ministerial responsibilities including correspondence, memoranda, research and reference files, speeches, clippings retained in the minister's office, —papers of a non-political nature, for example family and business matters.

C and D. Collections received on deposit are not sorted or listed by the Public Archives. The Public Archives will approach each depositor regarding the permanent retention of the papers at the Public Archives. Upon donation of the collections Public Archives staff schedule the material to be sorted, listed and described. Papers of lasting historical research value are retained for the permanent collection of the Public Archives. Access provisions are determined by the donor in consultation with the Public Archives.

NOTE: No archival work has been done on the Danson papers at this time.

CANARCH LIMITED

Question No. 390—Mr. Herbert:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits of Canarch Limited?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

Canarch Limited (Non-Operating)

	(a) 1977	(b) 1978
1. Revenues	—	—
Net Earnings	—	—
2. (a) Grants, Subsidies	—	—

(c) Investment	Nil	Nil

CANADIAN ELECTRICAL INDUSTRY—CONSULTATIVE TASK FORCE

Questions Nos. 1,232 to 1,247 incl.—Mr. Herbert:

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that all companies should be measured against a code of business conduct related to Canadian economic and social priorities and firms which qualify should be treated equally by governments irrespective of the nationality of their ownership or control and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Order Paper Questions

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that it should develop a contingency plan in the event of non-removal of existing non-tariff barriers or the introduction of new non-tariff barriers by foreign countries and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that ITC, EDC and CIDA should collaborate to optimize financing programs in support of domestic manufacturers' exports and to select aid projects which match the particular skills of Canada's manufacturing industry with the needs of developing countries and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that it should investigate further means by which the link between subsidiaries and parent companies that are foreign owned can be used to benefit Canadian firms and to strengthen their performance and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that the government should continue to press for a stronger international agreement limiting the provision of concessional financing to developed countries and should monitor the level of financing coming into Canada, with a view to neutralizing its effect when it is used to finance products which compete directly with Canadian products and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that the Canadian economy reap benefits for Canadian industry by assuring access to foreign markets or by devices designed to assure Canadian manufacturers a "fair" chance in the Canadian market and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that Canada should seek to delay the reduction of Canadian tariffs until it is demonstrated that relevant non-trade barriers have been removed and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that the government consider a domestic financing corporation to assure that Canadian manufacturers are not at a disadvantage in their own country and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that the government should re-examine the position of the Canadian manufacturer relative to foreign competitors on the matter of dumping, following which a joint industry-government effort should be made to develop appropriate policy and procedures to prevent dumping in so far as possible by (a) shortening the time element in the finding of dumping and of injury (b) minimizing the cost to the Canadian company in demonstrating that injury has taken place (c) definition of "injury" that should not make it unreasonably difficult to establish that injury has taken place (d) requiring an affidavit from the foreign supplier that the goods are not being dumped (e) a commitment not to purchase foreign goods at dumped prices and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that Canada should work toward neutralizing the United States disc program and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that Canada should work toward eliminating the advantage held by the United States on the matter of the definition of "injury" for countervail purposes and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that the government should assure that the lowering of Canadian tariffs does not put Third World countries in a preferred position in the Canadian market by using aid granted by Canada for industrial development and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that it change the application of the federal manufacturers' sales tax so that imports do not derive a competitive advantage over Canadian manufactured appliances and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that tied aid can be justified and should be emphasized and that it should be a fundamental guideline of Canada's aid policy to use Canadian consultants, Canadian specifications and Canadian products and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that it should shorten the period for write-offs for tax purposes of building investments to encourage expansion needed to support programs related to investment for productivity improvement and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Did the sector task force on the Canadian Electrical Industry recommend to the government in July, 1978, that adjustment policies and plans should be developed before the tariff reductions come into effect and, if so, what was the government's reaction to the recommendation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: This question is derived directly from the report of the Consultative Task Force on the Canadian Electrical Industry. This report was released in November, 1978, and its contents are available to the general public. The reaction by the federal government to each of these points was published in "Response of the Federal Government to the Recommendations of the Consultative Task Force on the Canadian Electrical Industry". This report was made public in May, 1979.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the only reason I rise on a point of order now before you call the orders of the day is because the government House leader is about to leave the House, and perhaps I can be permitted to raise my point of order now.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has a point of order?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, madam Speaker. It deals with business of the House. I realize that perhaps the government House leader has an important engagement. I do so in the relative peace and tranquility of a Friday session, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will appreciate what I am about to say in light of the very serious questions raised in the House today regarding an order of this House established last night setting up a joint committee of the House and the other place. Today the Acting Prime Minister referred to the committee being the master of its own destiny. But the committee can only operate within the terms of reference laid down for it by this House. That order does not permit the committee to travel in Canada.

In view of the petitions, questions, and representations which have been made, and in view of the invocation of closure on the debate after a very small percentage of hon. members of this House had an opportunity to participate, thereby depriving many regions of the country and the vast majority of the constituencies of Canada of the opportunity to be directly represented in the debate on the most important issue of the constitution, perhaps the most important issue to come before Parliament this century, I would ask the government House leader whether the government is now prepared to issue an order permitting that committee to travel from place to place in Canada, through all the provinces and territories, in order that the people who were not represented in the debate through their members will have a chance to appear.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, on October 6, when Parliament was reconvened, the member was aware of the content of the motion. And his party chose to extend this first stage to three weeks, thus shortening accordingly the committee stage. Now, Madam Speaker, on the first point, since this is a quiet Friday, I may remind the Conservative members that they chose to shorten the time in committee by taking more time in the House. May I also add, on this quiet Friday, that if his party had agreed to our offer to sit between six and eight o'clock on Thursday and Monday, and from ten o'clock to midnight on Thursday and Monday, and also on Monday and Tuesday last, an offer which I made to his party, more members could have taken part in the debate. This must also appear on the record and be thoroughly understood by the right-minded members on this quiet Friday.

As to his question whether the committee will travel, I will tell him frankly and as directly as possible that the answer is no. Several committees have travelled across the country to deal with the constitutional issue in the last few years. During the Quebec referendum campaign last spring, several members, even some of his party, campaigned on Canadian unity and made the headlines in all newspapers and media throughout the country. The intentions of the people have been sounded. They have been sensitized. That is why the committee has been set up. It is because I respect my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), that I am telling him why the deadline for the committee report is December 9. The very essence, the very reason for the creation of the committee stage as part of our approach and procedure is to allow the committee to consider the technical amendments which may be proposed to polish and improve, if there is room for improvement, the resolution which is relatively complex.

In conclusion, I would say that we could very well have tabled the resolution right in Parliament. It would have been a simple motion, a single stage, a single phase and, given all the obligations it has to meet, the House would have had to study it clause by clause. Given his vast experience of the House of Commons, my knowledgeable colleague knows very well that with 282 members, after three weeks of debate, we would probably still be stuck on clause 2 or clause 3 and considering a number of subamendments. The consequence of that kind of procedure would have been to paralyse the Canadian Parliament altogether, confuse the public and make the debate completely sterile.

The approach we have chosen allows for three stages: a preliminary stage which we had to interrupt yesterday for reasons which have been thoroughly discussed in the last few days, but that was only one stage. We have not ended the debate for good.

There is the committee stage, the purpose of which is not to have the hon. members travel throughout the country to take the nation's pulse. Again, we have very often followed such a procedure in the past few years. The purpose of the committee stage is to further consideration for this institution and to let us, in an orderly way, smooth out the text, and if needs be, to hear a few witnesses liable to provide us with the precisions we might need. And ultimately, there we will be the formal debate, following presentation of the committee report, and this debate technically will not be limited and is not intended to be limited provided that hon. members show the good faith which they have unfortunately not shown at the first stage when they rejected the delay we had suggested.

Therefore, I repeat it: the debate is far from being over. The purpose of the committee is not to travel—I will not come back on this, as I just explained—and there will be a third stage at which point ample time will be given hon. members to hold a responsible debate. In conclusion, I want to clearly indicate to the hon. member that the government will always be prepared to assume its responsibilities as far as parliamentary procedure is concerned to permit this institution to work. It is a matter of judgment. Canadians will pass judgment on us if we do not abide by the rules. However, we are fully aware of the fact that until now, far from having misused the rules, far from having misused the procedure, we have shown great respect for hon. members opposite, for the people and for the procedure in this chamber. And once again, it must be clear that the debate is not yet over, that this is just another stage and that this will allow us to demonstrate to the public at large that Parliament can play its role by discussing the constitution in committee and by dealing with economic matters on the floor of the House.

● (1250)

[English]

Mr. McGrath: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, that my hon. friend's answer was so unnecessarily argumentative and convoluted. Now that we know that this most important joint committee of the Parliament of Canada on Canada's constitution will not be permitted to travel outside of this capital city to the provinces and territories of our nation, that leads me to my next question.

Now that we have disposed of that, and the hon. member has to take responsibility for that decision on behalf of the government, is he now able to tell the House, in view of the support of this party, the official opposition, and the party to my left, the New Democratic Party, for having the proceedings of that committee telecast as an electronic Hansard in the same way the proceedings of this House are telecast, that the government is now prepared to make that decision, because it is not a subject for negotiation? It is a decision the government has to take on its responsibility. Having taken the decision not to allow the committee to travel in this country, surely it will follow that they will allow for the greatest public scrutiny by permitting the public broadcasting of the committee's proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: My colleague knows full well that the committee system as it is now makes it possible, in principle, to hold public hearings. Exceptionally, the committee may sit behind closed doors. First, I can assure him that we do not intend to hold the meetings on the sly. The meetings will be public. I think the media are sufficiently excited perhaps to show more interest in that committee than in others. So it is wrong and I know that my colleague does not intend to make people think that what happens in committee is secret. It will all be public. People have the right to participate. Accordingly, we will choose a large room and we will try to make the meetings as public as possible. This is my first point because this preamble implied that everything was done in secrecy. On the contrary, sittings are public and though 25 members and senators are designated there is nothing to prevent other members from participating in the sittings of a committee as my colleague must be aware.

As to televising the debates I answered those questions yesterday. The Prime Minister also answered questions from the Leader of the Opposition. I want to show respect for the committee. It is not yet constituted, and the senators who will be part of it will have to be consulted. It will be up to the committee to decide whether the debates should be televised. As to the material organization that would be involved that aspect would come under the responsibility of Madam Speaker.

We have stated that we were prepared to check if it is technically possible but, if it is indeed possible, and if such is the desire of the committee, we do not want this to have the effect of delaying the presentation of the committee report after December 9.

As emphasized by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we insist that if it is technically possible it should be done in conformity with the concept of the electronic Hansard, just as it is the principle that guides the televising of the debates on the floor of the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I direct this to the government House leader and urge him to withhold making a decision on the question of travel until he has reflected on it over the weekend.

The government House leader has completely missed the point. The basis for the feelings expressed last night was expressed to members of Parliament from western Canada by the people in their constituencies, those who live in the cities and small towns of western Canada. Those feelings have been brought forward into this House in a nominal way. About 20 per cent of the members have been able to express their views. It seems that members opposite do not in any way understand the depth of those feelings.

The government House leader made reference to the fact that the feelings of people in western Canada have been known over the past few years and that they understand those feelings. I stress to him that there has been a significant change in the feelings expressed by those in western Canada in the last few weeks and months. It is those feelings which we feel so strongly should be presented to this committee. The only way that can be done is by having that committee travel.

I would also like to remind the government House leader there is a similar committee in the Ontario legislature on the constitution, a special committee, which chose to travel, not just within the province of Ontario but right across Canada. The feelings expressed to that committee were of great interest to the members and were different from what they had understood prior to going out. The depth of those feelings are expressed in their report. I can tell the government House leader that the report caused some stir within the Ontario legislature because it was different from what members had felt.

The government side has only two members to get an assessment of all that is going on in that part of the country, the four provinces and the territories. It is very important for the government House leader to reconsider his decision, if a decision has in fact been made, and report to the House on Monday. I do not think anyone in this House last night was not stunned and astounded by the feelings expressed by the members. It is the same feelings that members from the province of Quebec felt last March, April and May when in their own ridings. That is why they are feeling those sentiments today and that is why they expressed them so strongly last night. It is on that basis that I ask the government House leader to reconsider the decision he has just expressed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, some are impressed by the words of the hon. member, others are more impressed by those of the hon. members from the west or from the New Democratic Party. This is a matter of interpretation. I suggest that he read carefully the constitution proposal before the House and he will realize that it will benefit all Canadians, including western Canadians. Therefore, there is no reason to be concerned even if the committee does not travel; he can be assured that the measures which are proposed here, namely, the entrenchment of the equalization principle in Canada, the individual's rights, the fundamental freedoms, the patriation of the constitution, are not in the least detrimental to the citizens of the west or the east, because they are beneficial to Canada as a whole. We are renewing our federalism. I am convinced that if he listens more carefully to the hon. members from the west, from the New Democratic Party, perhaps he will no longer make the request he has just made to me.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. André Ouellet (for the Prime Minister) moved that Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Madam Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) appointed me for the second time as Postmaster General on March 3, the objectives he set for me were to improve employer-employee relations and to turn the department into a Crown corporation. It became obvious to me that to meet those objectives I would have to have frequent and frank discussions with labour representatives.

In the early seventies, when postal authorities undertook a vast mechanization program, the employees were not sufficiently informed of the process. The system had to be updated otherwise it would have become paralysed because of the ever-increasing volumes of mail to be processed. But more time should have been spent in trying to make everybody aware of the situation so as to achieve this objective with the full co-operation of the postal union leaders. But this was not done and it was without the understanding and endorsement of several of our employees that substantial sums of money were invested in the construction of postal plants, the purchase of highly specialized equipment, and the creation and promotion of a postal code. Ten years later, I can appreciate that the Post Office did what had to be done because it could not stand in the way of progress. But I can also say that the implementation procedure was very wrong and resulted in a decade of labour unrest in the Post Office. Had management explained more clearly to the employees what it intended to do—

Mr. Dinsdale: Mea culpa!

Mr. Ouellet: —had it involved the employees in the change, had it guaranteed, from the very start, everyone's job security, the employees would have understood that the machines were not meant to replace them but rather to help them in their work, and union leaders would have taken part in the operation rather than opposing it. I do not mean this to be merely a criticism of postal management at the beginning of the seventies, those people acted in good faith—

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker I rise on a point of order. I would like to know whether the minister is talking about the constitutional situation in Canada and the need to understand the constitution, or about the Post Office. Is he talking about the important thing called the constitution, or is he talking about a minor thing called the Post Office with this talk about time and so forth?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The order of business is the creation of a Crown corporation for the Post Office, and I suggest the hon. minister is addressing himself to the order of business before the House.

Mr. Dinsdale: He is quoting my speeches.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, what happened in the early seventies was done to a certain extent without the support and especially without the understanding of postal employees. But I do not say this merely to criticize the postal management of the time, because I am sure those people acted in good faith and with good intentions. Of course, it is always easier to judge with the benefit of hindsight, as I am doing now. I mention this because the first major transformation of the postal service was so quick and so thorough in my opinion that the employees often felt pressured and threatened.

In rising to speak in the House on Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post corporation, I can confirm that all the postal unions have been fully consulted and that it is with their complete agreement that we shall proceed with this major transformation. We have had a decade of conflict and I hope that we are now entering a decade of postal harmony. In any case, this second major transformation will take no one by surprise. In fact, the concept of a Canada Post corporation results from several studies. The first recommendations in this regard were made in 1962 by the Glassco commission and in 1966 by the Montpetit commission. In December 1978, Bill C-27, to establish the Canada Post corporation, was introduced in the House of Commons, but it died on the order paper when Parliament was dissolved. This concept was re-examined in 1979 and 1980 by successive governments and postmasters general in consultation with both the postal users and the unions concerned.

Bill C-27 gave me the basis for my discussions with all the major parties involved. In fact, each section of Bill C-42 now under consideration was discussed sentence by sentence and word by word, and all the wording has been well thought out so that there would be no confusion or misinterpretation. I am not suggesting that this bill is perfect, but it represents as never before the collective efforts of the administration and the postal unions. The legislation that Parliament is now asked to approve is the fruit of the efforts of many people. I would first like to thank Mr. Darling of the Privy Council, Mr. Uberig of the Post Office Department, and Mr. Kelly of the Department of Labour, who allowed this project to get under way with the publication of their report in 1978. I also wish to express my gratitude to my two predecessors, Messrs. Lamontagne and Fraser, for their excellent advice and opinions. I am also grateful to Mrs. Shirley Carr, Executive Vice-President of the Canadian Labour Congress, for her support and her unflagging determination to create a postal Crown corporation. I also wish to thank the Deputy Postmaster General, Mr. Jim Corkery, who heads an inter-departmental committee which will be responsible for the enormous and extremely important work of transition and planning required to create this Crown corporation. In summary, Mr. Speaker, what I want to say today is that while I have the honour to sponsor this bill in the House, I would not want all those who have worked directly or indirectly on this project to be forgotten. It is always dangerous to give names because it is easy to forget some. I would like to say in advance that I am sorry if this has happened. However, I would still like to add to those I have already mentioned, the members of the umbrella committee established by the Canadian Labour Congress, first, Mr. Ronald Lang, director of the Research and Legislation Branch of the CLC, then, Mr. McGarry and Mr. Findlay, president and vice-president of the Letter Carriers Union of Canada respectively, Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot, president, and Mr. Jones, of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Mr. Myers, of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Mr. West, executive secretary and Mr. Haulena, of the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

I would also like to mention various representatives of unions not affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress whom I have also met and who have made very useful comments: Mr. Simmons and Mr. Gélinas of the Canadian Postmasters and Assistants Association, Mr. Wilson, president of the Association of Postal Officials of Canada, Mr. Donegani, president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and Mr. Crosby of the Association of Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians. Finally, I must recognize the extraordinary work of a first class team in the Post Office Department, under the brilliant direction of Mr. Rapley, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General for Corporate Affairs. In that team, I must thank particularly Mr. McInenly and Mrs. Walker.

The changeover from a department, Mr. Speaker, to a Crown corporation, has brought about a series of questions. Has this Crown corporation been touted as a panacea for the Post Office?

Will Crown corporation status make the Post Office more efficient? Let me try to answer briefly these questions. I want to say that I strongly believe that the changeover from a department to a Crown corporation will result in three specific benefits, namely, management accountability, financial procedures, and labour negotiations.

As it exists now, the Post Office Department, is answerable, in one way or another, to various other departments. For example, the Department of Public Works owns and maintains the facilities, the Public Service Commission controls hiring and firing, and the Treasury Board has the final say in labour negotiations. As a corporation the board of directors will have the responsibility for the day to day operation of Canada Post. This change in procedure and responsibility will greatly simplify and enhance efficiency.

The financial procedures will also be radically changed by the Post Office becoming a Crown corporation. The Post Office is a government department and operating funds are provided through government general revenues. The result has been that Post Office management could not make system changes and service improvements if additional funds were requested or required. If the Post Office become a Crown corporation, the board of directors will be able to make more decisions regarding expenditures of funds and make them much more quickly.

Labour negotiations will also undergo significant change. All government departments negotiate under the terms of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. If the Post Office were to become a Crown corporation, bargaining would take place under the Canada Labour Code. This means that many items that could not be brought to the bargaining table under the present system would be permitted under the Canada Labour Code. In other words, we would have more latitude to bargain directly with the unions. Needless to say, this change in labour negotiations meets with the approval of the unions concerned.

In summary, the change in status from a government department to a Crown corporation will give Canada Post the independence to function in the marketplace in a way that is not possible now.

Crown corporation status will not remedy all our ills or difficulties. Every organization, be it government or industry, faces normal operational problems. However, with the streamlining of many of the facets of our operations and the support and good will of the employees, the Canada Post Corporation will be able to provide all Canadians with the postal service to which they are entitled and which they deserve.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to explain the legislation in great detail here this afternoon. However, I wish to mention a few points. First, I should like to speak about the mandate of the new corporation as described in clause 5 of the act, and I quote:

5. (1) The objects of the corporation—

—the Canada Post corporation—they are objects of a general nature—

—are to establish and operate a postal service—within Canada—

—and there is a list of the powers and general purposes of the operation of such a service as they existed in the former Post Office Act. However, in creating this Canada Post corporation, we have tried to add something of the utmost importance in clause 5(2) which says, I quote:

(2) While maintaining basic customary postal service, the corporation, in carrying out its objects, shall have a regard to:

—four other factors. And this sentence, Mr. Speaker, is essential to make hon. members of the House and particularly the Canadian public understand that the creation of a Crown corporation does not mean a reduction of services usually assured to the public. We wanted to write down this guarantee in the act so that Canadians, particularly in remote areas of the country and rural sectors which are often affected by decisions made by large Canadian corporations, would not be penalized by the creation of a Canada Post corporation which would operate in the Canadian capital and that would become insensitive to the aspirations of those Canadians, particularly in the rural and remote areas of the country. So I say that clause 5 guarantees that the same level of essential services will be maintained and this is one of the objectives of the legislation for which the new corporation will be responsible.

We know of course that we live in a world where technology is in full swing and that is exactly why we wanted to enable the corporation to benefit developments in the area of communications and why we say in that clause of the Post Office legislation that the corporation shall be at the forefront of technology and new developments in the area of communications in order to serve the Canadian people better. I have often been told, Mr. Speaker, that in many places in the country the Post Office Department was the only representative of the Canadian government. In many small villages, the Canadian flag floats at the end of the pole in front of the post office and may be the only sign of the federal presence. So I can tell hon. members and the Canadian public that in the bill we urge the Crown corporation to maintain and respect a corporate identity as an institution of the Government of Canada.

I think that this provision of the bill clearly demonstrates that while we are going to convert the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation, the corporation will not be allowed to show a corporate symbol or a personal signalization which might obliterate the federal and Canadian symbolization. Consequently that Canadian presence throughout the country will continue to be seen through the new Canada Post corporation instead of the old Post Office Department.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the daily management of that postal service will be assured by a board of directors which will be empowered to establish a general policy and to make decisions concerning finance, personnel management, as independently as possible from departments and without the restrictions now inherent in the public service. That board of Directors will be very important and will consist of the chairman, the president and seven other directors. The chairman and the president will be appointed by the governor in council to hold office during pleasure. Each other director will be appointed by the governor in council for a term of three years.

I want now to reiterate what I have said publicly and privately to union representatives, that is, I intend to have union representatives on the board of directors in order that they can get directly involved and participate fully in the good administration of the corporation.

Moreover, we will try to have various regions of the country represented on the board, from both urban and rural regions. The board will direct and manage the business of the corporation and will be made up of people well aware of the needs and desires of all areas in this country. We will try to appoint to that board very highly qualified people.

The corporation will, of course, be responsible to Parliament and through a designated minister this time. The minister and the governor in council will have the power to set guidelines for the new corporation in the interest of people and to protect the interest and priorities of the Canadian government. Just as the Post Office Department, the Canada Post corporation will have the monopoly to transport letters, so as to have a guaranteed source of revenue allowing it to ensure the universality of services. All postal services in industrialized countries have such a monopoly. It must be a true monopoly and the bill must be very specific about that. I am sure this aspect will be discussed in detail when the bill is taken into consideration, clause by clause, at the committee stage. The postal rates is established by regulations. They will be fair and reasonable and will as much as possible be aimed at self financing.

As the corporation will have the monopoly on the transportation of letters, the rates for this class of mail will be, at the request of any interested person, submitted to the Canadian Transport Commission. This procedure is to protect the interest of the people and to establish the necessary arm's length between the corporation and the government.

The legal framework for collective bargaining will be the Canada Labour Code instead of the Public Service Staff Relations Act as now. To ensure stability from the time the act is implemented until the new corporation becomes fully operational, the bill provides for the continuance of benefits, as well as the rights and contract obligations of both the employees and their bargaining units. A number of provisions will make the transfer of employees to the corporation as painless as possible. Both officials and employees who have been part of the Post Office organization before the implemenation of the new act will become the officials and employees of the corporation as soon as the act is implemented.

The bill ensures that the employees will retain the benefits that they have acquired while they were employees of the Post Office. The unions which had been recognized as bargaining units under the Public Service Staff Relations Act will be recognized also as their bargaining units under the Canada Labour Code for the first round of negotiation.

The postal employees collective agreements in effect when the act is passed will obtain until they expire. The employees of the corporation will have the right to apply for jobs in the public service, and ask for transfers during a three-year period after the creation of the corporation. That provision is meant particularly to protect the employees of the Department of Public Works and Department of Supply and Services who now work indirectly for the Post Office and offer services to it. We feel it is important, if on the one hand we protect the postal employees, that on the other hand we should offer some guarantees and protection to those who serve and work for the Post Office in other departments of the Canadian government.

Finally, the employees of the corporation will still be governed by the Public Service Superannuation Act; that, however, will not prevent the corporation from creating an additional system at a later date. There then, in brief, is a description of the bill. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it deserves to be passed quickly. I say that with all the more conviction that I know two of the most important postal unions, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers Union of Canada will be negotiating their new collective agreement in the very near future. The current agreement for those two groups expires on December 31, 1980.

Obviously we would like to be able to negotiate those new collective agreements under the Canada Labour Code. We shall be unable to do so if the House does not approve, within reasonable time, the bill now before it. I remind all political parties in the House that they agreed, in principle, on converting the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation. I remind the House leaders, that of the loyal opposition and that of the NDP, that they gave the House Leader and myself the assurance that they would co-operate in passing this bill in reasonable time. I would therefore be very disappointed, Mr. Speaker, if hon. members took advantage of the study of that bill to give voice to their recriminations, as legitimate as they might be, against the Post Office.

It is obvious that when this bill which transform the Post Office into a Crown corporation will be under scrutiny all members will be able to take advantage of it to talk about postal services in their riding, about certain postal facilities they would like to have built, about certain rural roads they would like extended, about certain new postal buildings they would like erected in their riding.

I can assure all members that in another place and at another time I will be prepared to answer their questions and receive their representations. The estimates of my department are under study before a standing committee of this House. I will be attending its sitting next Thursday morning and I think that these kinds of remarks and discussions regarding the postal administration can quite properly take place during the study of the estimates of my department. I would rather like the discussion to be limited to commenting on this important proposal to transform a department such as the Post Office into a Crown corporation and that we come as quick as possible to the clause by clause study of the bill in committee where we will be able to call in witnesses and study the various aspects of this bill which will ultimately serve the interest not only of the public and the Post Office but also those of the employees themselves.

I can say right now that on the government side, our remarks and comments will be as limited as possible and that I do hope that the two opposition parties will do the same. To conclude I wish to underline the fact that Bill C-42 is the result of thorough studies and intense consultations with the public, the unions, the employee associations and all concerned groups. All unanimously agree in saying that it is now time for this bill to be passed. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I call upon members of Parliament to give their support to Bill C-42 establishing the new Canada Post corporation.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is good to be back speaking for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition on Post Office affairs. I had this pleasure during almost the whole decade of the seventies when the Post Office Department went from bad to worse, and when I made impassioned speeches urging the successive postmasters general to do something about the deteriorating situation. In those days postmasters general were engaged in a game of musical chairs, there was a new one almost every six months attempting to juggle the various balls in the air.

Listening to the postmaster general (Mr. Ouellet) this afternoon, I am reminded that he is a resurrected Postmaster General. He was a Postmaster General back in 1973 when, notwithstanding all my impassioned speeches and all my good advice, he used to try to assure us that insofar as the Post Office was concerned all was for the best in the best possible of worlds. Memory is a marvellous thing. I remember back in 1973 when we were having a vigorous exchange across this chamber and I was telling the hon. gentleman that if he did not move promptly he would utterly destroy the viability of this very essential service in Canada. He gave his charming smile and said, "Everything is fine in the Post Office; we are getting it nicely under control".

● (1440)

At that moment the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has also been resurrected recently, said loud enough for everyone to hear, "Everybody knows the postal service is lousy". So, even as far back as 1973 the government of the day recognized that there were real problems in the Post Office Department. They say that imitation is the best form of flattery. As I listened to the Postmaster General today, I felt that I was hearing the speeches which I made over the years in almost the same terminology, the same words.

I see my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), is sitting opposite to me. This is what happens to those of us who have been in the House for a long time. It becomes a case of—

[Translation]

The more it changes the more it is the same.

[English]

My hon. friend has become very conservative in recent years.

Mr. Knowles: Order!

Mr. Dinsdale: I remember when the hon. member had fire in his belly, for example, with regard to matters like closure. But since he has become a member of the Privy Council he has turned into a real establishment man and almost a real elitist and Liberal. Perhaps that is the trouble with those of us who have been in the House for a rather long time.

Mr. Knowles: What does this have to do with the Post Office?

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asks what my remarks have to do with the Post Office. The Post Office is one of the most vitally important branches of the government service. It has been tragic for all of us to see it going down hill, notwithstanding the admonitions of successive reports commissioned by the government describing its situation. It has been a part of the general deterioration of public affairs in this country during the past 12 years, which I will endeavour to show through my remarks here today.

It has always amazed me that, notwithstanding the strong protestations from members of the House and the public, postmasters general refuse to act. I know that it was all part of the general deterioration of the economy of Canada over the past 12 years in which we have seen a country with both rich human resources and rich natural resources degenerate to a position, in terms of economic and fiscal status, where it is now in a crisis situation with deficits soaring up to $14 billion, employment soaring up to 8 per cent, and inflation soaring up to the highest level ever.

It is merely typical, and this is my response to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This is why we should be disturbed by what has been occurring in the Post Office and in the House in terms of the breakdown of the feeling of consensus and co-operation, the decline of good will which is so essential to the functioning of this Parliament. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be the first to acknowledge that this is the situation which has prevailed.

I would like to speak now to the actual bill. It is not only my speeches which have been copied and borrowed by the minister who just made his presentation, but the legislation pretty well follows the recommendations that we have been making in this House for almost a decade now. The bill on Crown corporations which was presented by the Liberal government back in 1978 was Bill C-27. It bears absolutely no resemblance to the bill which is before us today, and that was just two years previous. The bill was first tabled in the House on December 11, 1978.

Le me read from that bill to illustrate what it was trying to accomplish. It indicated that the Liberal government was still bent on its destructive program of confrontation in the Post Office. Here are the words of the title of Bill C-27:

An act to establish the Canada Post corporation, to amend the Post Office Act, to confirm certain orders and to make related amendments to other acts.

That was not taking the route which we had been recommending for many years of establishing a Crown corporation that would be distinct and separate from the existing Post Office Department, that would deal in a realistic way with the labour management relations that degenerated so horrendously under the drifting policies of successive postmasters general so that in 1978 we almost had civil disobedience. The president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers was jailed as the result of his defiance of the then Liberal government.

The bill before us today is the bill that was in process during the short regime of the Progressive Conservative government. The hon. gentleman from Papineau was kind enough to express thanks to the union people, whom I know very well and with whom I have had very cordial relations over the years, the Deputy Postmaster General Mr. Corkery, and to officials in the Canadian Labour Congress and others who had a very vital input into the present bill but he said nothing of his debt to the official opposition.

Mr. Ouellet: I said thanks to Mr. Fraser too.

Mr. Dinsdale: You thanked the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), but you did not thank me for my speeches, so I will give some of them back to you today. Bill C-42 is exactly what we have been recommending:

An act to establish the Canada Post corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act—

That is what we wanted. We did not want that monstrous, hybrid two-tier system which was first contemplated and would have been forced upon the public without the consultation of either unions or postal users.

It goes on to say:

—and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts

I missed the Postmaster General's reference in what must have been sotto voce tone when he was complimenting the former postmaster general.

My great concern is that what we are contemplating with this new legislation might have come too late. As the hon. Postmaster General said, the Post Office has been the symbol over the years of the federal presence in every community across Canada. It flies the Canadian flag. Whenever the good citizens of Canada saw the Post Office and saw the flag, they said, "Well, we are safe under the very competent federal government of ours". Unfortunately that has not been the case in recent years. The very presence of the Post Office, as the hon. gentleman knows—and I see that he is smiling—has been the symbol of deterioration in government competence and government efficiency. He knows the Post Office became somewhat of a national joke. The "Canadian Air Farce" got some of its best humour from the tragic deterioration in postal service.

● (1450)

The Post Office Department, once the symbol of the stability and integrity and the competence and the efficiency of the federal government, became the standing joke of the nation under 12 years of disastrous Liberal administration. I think we all have to admit that when an institution of this importance becomes a national joke, that is an indication of the failure of the Government of Canada.

I have looked carefully through the information that is available in the bill, and it seems to me that it includes most of the recommendations this party has made over the years, as well as the recommendations that were included in all the many studies done over the years.

Another great tragedy is that not only is this government incompetent but it is also a government of secrecy. On this side of the House we were never able to get past this barrier, and I am sure the NDP will support me in this statement. When Mr. Rodriguez represented that party in this House, he used to blow this trumpet as loudly as I but unfortunately he was defeated. While he was here, however, he was a good spokesman for the Post Office. He still had fire in his belly.

Mr. Knowles: I think some of his ballots got lost in the mail.

Mr. Dinsdale: He did not become a Conservative! The reports that contain so much valuable information and which were propounding the solution that is finally emerging—almost too late—have been available over the years to ministers and successive postmasters general. The minister went back as far as 1962, to the Glassco commission. That was a great commission authorized by the great Diefenbaker government to look into and reorganize government administration. Unfortunately, however, that great government fell from power in 1963 and so it was not able to implement the recommendations.

Mr. Knowles: It fell apart.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is becoming a Liberal at heart. I can see that. He says it fell apart. Mr. Speaker, we were defeated in Ontario and Quebec but we were never defeated in the west and we were never defeated in eastern Canada. This is the battle that we are fighting on the constitution today. The Conservatives came back to power in Manitoba in 1977, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is not aware of that.

Mr. Orlikow: Then what happened in the last federal election?

Mr. Dinsdale: Let us not get into that; we are not discussing the election. I just want to make the point that we lost power for the same reason that we are struggling with this present arbitrary action on the constitution, which does not take into consideration the wishes of western Canada and the maritime provinces.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is not so.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is purely oriented toward the continuing control of the two central provinces, Quebec and Ontario.

This tendency towards secrecy is regrettable. It is no wonder that a former member, Hon. Jed Baldwin, fought for a freedom of information act for years. Had this information been available to the House and had it been referred to a committee, the problems of the Post Office would have been solved long ago. Now I come to the Montpetit report. I have them all in front of me, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Postmaster General may wonder how I gain access to all these reports. We get them because there are leaks, Mr. Speaker. Through the years this has been the only way we could obtain information that should have been readily available to spokesmen in this House, representing the people of Canada. We should have had access to them by some means or other. This is why it is so important that we proceed with Mr. Baldwin's information act as quickly as possible.

I did not hear the hon. minister refer to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), and I do not think he referred to the Hon. Eric Kierans either. Mr. Kierans was a strong catalytic force in trying to get the Post Office Department on an even keel. He was ahead of his time, however. Not only was he postmaster general in 1969, he was also minister of communications. That was a recognition that the Post Office Department was one of the vital communications links in this country. It was recognized 11 years ago, although this government still has not appreciated the fact that the postal service is inevitably closely related to the revolution in communications technology. Canada has developed the Telidon. Electronic mail is just around the corner, and electronic funds transmission is also just around the corner.

When the government can straighten out its confused policies—and there is no area of greater confusion, although I have mentioned the economy and fiscal policy and the Post Office—in regard to communications, it will be a good thing all around.

Eleven years ago the Hon. Eric Kierans anticipated what should be done. He designed a program which, had it been brought to fruition, would have alleviated all the stress, the trouble and confusion—the bankruptcies and strikes that have plagued the Post Office Department, during the past ten years. Mr. Kierans bailed out of this government, of course, as did the Hon. John Turner and the Hon. Donald Macdonald. Hon. Jim Richardson from Manitoba left the government as well. I think a great deal of credit should be given to Mr. Kierans, who tried to bring some order out of chaos.

The real problem in the Post Office, of course, is the deterioration in labour relations which has occurred because of the failure of the Liberal government to act over the past 12 years or so. I have in front of me the Shime report which was prepared for the minister in 1972. It is the report of the conciliation board arising out of inquiries into labour difficulties in the public service. At that time Mr. Owen Shime was vice-chairman of the Ontario Labour Relations Board. Had the recommendations of the Shime report been accepted, the difficulties and strike problems that have accumulated during the decade of the seventies would have been resolved.

Perhaps I should just put on record what we have gone through in terms of labour disruptions in the seventies because of the Liberal government's failure to act. In February and March, 1970, there were disruptions as a result of a dispute in Montreal involving truck drivers represented by the CNTU. The problem was contracting of mail transport and job security. From May to September, in 1970, there was a series of rotating strikes over the question of wages and job security.

In October and November, 1971, there were several wildcat strikes in southwestern Ontario and the maritimes over the use of casual labour. In January, 1973, there were wildcat strikes after breakdowns in negotiations over wages and job classifications. In April, 1974, there were sporadic local labour disruptions by inside postal workers, culminating in a three-day national strike.

February and March of 1975 saw five weeks of nationwide rotating strikes by maintenance workers. Truck drivers refused to cross picket lines and the dispute was characterized by lay-offs, walkouts and "sickouts". From October to December of the same year there was a seven-week strike engineered by CUPW over questions of technological change. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) is not here today. I was hoping he might be because as a result of his experience in 1975 he produced a great book. I ask everybody to read this book which was published by the Post Office Department in June, 1976. I hope the minister has read it. It has a most revealing title: "What's behind the Lemming Urge? and Other Discourses by Bryce Mackasey". I have read the book many times because the title indicates its contents—we are all going over the precipice together; let us do something to stop it. The author was not referring only to postal affairs but to the general decline and deterioration of values, parliamentary democracy, responsible government and the whole business. I often refer to his closing paragraph which reads:

● (1500)

We're moving beyond ideology; we're responding to necessity. Our choice, as Buckminster Fuller says, is between Utopia and oblivion.

That book resulted from the 1975 seven-week strike by the postal workers. There were many bankruptcies. Small businesses went out of business because it was their harvest period just before Christmas. It was one of the great economic disasters in Canada.

In October, 1976, there were four days of rotating strikes by CUPW over technological change. In September, 1978, there was a three-day strike by letter carriers over contract demands. The inside workers who went on strike in October of that year were ordered back to work by Parliament and the Canadian postal workers' president went to jail as a result. That was the ultimate deterioration in the system.

Finally the government acted and brought in that monstrosity of a bill, Bill C-27 which I have just read. That bill would have perpetuated the chaos. It envisaged a two-tier system having the Postmaster General, his staff, secretariat and all his employees running parallel with a corporation which would have no authority whatsoever. It would be hard to decide where the buck stopped and it would have added confusion upon confusion. Fortunately the government was defeated and we had a chance to bring down in the form of legislation some of the things we had been advocating over the years.

The Uberig report was very important because it was a report of an assistant deputy minister, a deputy postmaster general. This person is still with the Post Office Department and he is one of the most competent people I have encountered in administration. At long last the things which he said in his report of August, 1975, are to be incorporated in this legislation.

I cannot end this discussion without referring to the Finkelman report. Mr. Finkelman made a report through a joint parliamentary committee on which I had the pleasure of serving. We came in with some marvellous recommendations but the report has been gathering dust ever since.

Let me just deal with a few of the details of old Bill C-27 and new Bill C-42. We are now heading in the right direction. The Postmaster General pleaded with hon. members not to debate this issue too long. We have been waiting for years to get our teeth into this discussion. I am sure that no one is going to abuse the privilege that is now afforded to deal with the substance of the deteriorating situation in the Post Office.

In our attempts to get the government to come to grips with the problem, we spent two opposition days trying to point out that the Post Office Department was in serious trouble. Let me at least refer to two motions, which I think hon. members will agree in light of what the Postmaster General has said embrace some of the ideas he brought forward this afternoon.

On June 8, 1973, I moved:

That this House regrets the drastic deterioration of the postal service in Canada during the past six years: including the closure of rural post offices; the reduction of urban service from six days to five days; the headlong costly rush to automation and computerization leading to job insecurity and low morale among employees—all this in the face of sharply increased postal rates which have seriously affected smaller Canadian publications, forcing many of them out of business; and urges the government to take the necessary action to restore this fundamentally important communication system to its former excellence.

That motion was voted down by members of the Liberal party.

On May 18, 1977, we tried again. I moved:

That this House notes with alarm the government's continuing inability to provide Canadians with an efficient postal service, its obsession with secrecy, its illegal use of orders in council to set postal rates, and its chronic ineptness in the field of collective bargaining and industrial relations, and recommends that the operations of the Post Office Department be referred to a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate.

That, too, was voted down by the members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Cullen: Was that moved under Standing Order 43?

Mr. Dinsdale: That was a substantive want of confidence motion, I should tell the hon. member. I am sure he must have been in the House.

Mr. Cullen: At that time, yes.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sure he was aware that we used two of our precious opposition days to try, to the best of our ability, to get some action out of this government.

Bill C-27 was representative of the thinking of successive postmasters general. They were trying to combine both the Post Office Department and the new idea of a Crown corporation. The bill was opposed by everybody: labour and the public. Fortunately it died on the order paper.

Now we have Bill C-42. I do not think I need to add to what the Postmaster General said with regard to what this bill is endeavouring to do. Basically it is taking the important stand of keeping politicians at arm's length. I remember talking to the then postmaster general. I shall not mention names. It is impossible to identify him because there have been so many postmasters general. They seem to have been going around like a merry-go-round. I can refer to this particular gentleman without mentioning any names. No names, no pack drill. But he said to me, "Walter, we have to keep the Post Office Department. It is full of important patronage." That was the thinking behind Bill C-27. It was also one of the reasons why the Post Office was in such a mess and confusion. It has to be an arm's length relationship. This will come about, as I understand the bill.

The board of directors will include members of the unions. This is an idea that we have preached for years. I am sure the hon. Postmaster General is aware of this. It is not a new idea. It is industrial democracy. Our committee travelled to many places to see how others were dealing with problems of the Post Office in this technological revolutionary period. We discovered that in the United Kingdom they had introduced industrial democracy into the post office. Incidentally, they became a Crown corporation in 1969 at the time our Post Office should have become a Crown corporation, had we listened to the Hon. Eric Kierans who had his head screwed on right.

Mr. Cullen: For a very short time.

Mr. Dinsdale: He could not stand it, so he left. He was wise. He bailed out along with John Turner and others who left over the years. The industrial democracy idea goes further than just having representatives from labour on the board of directors. It also calls for representatives from the major postal users. As a matter of fact, in the United Kingdom the postal users organization is formalized. There are three prongs of an efficient and reliable postal service sitting together on the board of directors, representatives from the government, labour and postal users.

I hope the Postmaster General is not going to ignore those who pay—and pay dearly—for the postal service. I hope he will include representatives of the users who have borne the heat and the burden of the day patiently, speaking for the small businessmen who have been going into bankruptcy because of continuing postal strikes and so on.

That is merely one recommendation I would make. I hope the government will go all the way with the industrial democracy concept. We all know that the Crown corporation formula is not a panacea. There are lot of Crown corporations in the federal government service. In fact, there are so many that they are without number. They are not even completely listed.

There are still labour problems in some Crown corporations. It is going to take a long time to establish a feeling of harmony, consensus and mutual trust in the Post Office Department. We have seen a breakdown of trust in this House of Commons, unfortunately, as was demonstrated here last night. However, out there in the great body politic I am sure the Postmaster General will realize that you cannot throw the book at a union leader like Jean-Claude Parrot who spent time in jail because of direct confrontation and aggravation over the years.

That will not be resolved overnight. The government, by its actions and attitudes, will have to reverse itself almost 180 degrees from the confrontationist route it has been taking over the years if we are ever to restore peace and harmony into the postal service. We must take action on the Finkelman report. When are we going to get action on the report of Mr. Justice Jacob Finkelman which was referred to a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, an excellent report that has been gathering dust until this day.

Certainly it is going to be much easier working under the Canada Labour Code than it was under the multiplicity of government departments which had their fingers in the pie. The poor deputy postmaster general, whom I have known over the years, really had no jurisdiction in managing. He was an efficient manager, and Mr. Uberig was an efficient administrator; both of them came from private industry. They could not get anywhere because they were subject to Treasury Board, Public Works, Supply and Services and any number of other government departments which always interfered in what the Post Office Department was trying to do.

Finally, I would ask the Postmaster General to go back to his mentor. I do not know whether he is on friendly terms with the Hon. Eric Kierans. I have read in the newspapers that Mr. Kierans is not too happy with what his former party has been doing in the years since he left. Neither are the other key people who bailed out of that party very happy with what is going on. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might be happy, but they are not.

I go back to what Mr. Kierans was contemplating 11 years ago. He believed that the Post Office Department is an important communications facility in Canada which was being very strongly challenged by competitive communications technology. I see the Postmaster General talking to the current Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox). Possibly they are discussing electronic transmission of funds. If we are going to get that, and the government will have to decide sooner or later, we cannot wait for 12 years, as was done with regard to the post office mess. The government will have to decide soon on changes in legislation with respect to electronic communications.

If we get electronic funds transmission, there goes 75 per cent of the first class mail overnight. Where does that put the Post Office, even though it has become a Crown corporation? There are other competitors such as the private couriers. I know there will be a monopoly on letter carrier service, but that is not the money-making part of the Post Office. The United Parcel Service, UPS, has just received authority to carry out a total service in the province of Ontario. There are all sorts of competitors.

I had a parliamentary return tabled a few years ago which demonstrated that because of unreliable postal service most government departments were switching to private postal carriers rather than depending on the post office. I hope the Postmaster General will give attention to these important matters because if he does not, what he has done here today, which is 11 years too late, will do nothing to solve the problems in communications generally and in the postal service in particular.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), I have been asked to outline the position of our party with regard to this bill which proposes to establish a separate Crown corporation to operate the Post Office. The first point I want to make is that we support this bill in principle and would like to see it go to the committee as quickly as possible. The bill is long overdue.

The concept of a Crown corporation to operate the Post Office has been around for a dozen or more years. In a study commissioned by the Post Office Department 11 years ago entitled "A Blueprint for Change", this was what was said about the idea of a Crown corporation. I quote:

> We believe that the Crown corporation status is the organizational form best suited to the attainment of these objectives . . . As a Crown corporation, the Post Office should have full authority to bargain with the unions representing its employees. It should not be required to seek the approval of any government agency before concluding an agreement with unions. With such freedom, a strong effective staff relations function would be required to guide management in its relationships with unions.

There is no group which is more interested in the passage of this bill and the establishment of a Crown corporation than our unions in the Post Office because they have witnessed such devastating results due to the incompetence of those senior people in the Post Office Department who first negotiated with them back in the days when, as my hon. friend, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), said, Eric Kierans was the minister and, more recently, while the negotiations were carried out by the Treasury Board on behalf of the government.

I was shocked to read the announcement several days ago that the Treasury Board is taking over the negotiations with the letter carriers. There has been a very good and almost completely happy relationship between the Post Office Department and the letter carriers. There has been virtually no trouble, in contrast with relationship experienced between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the Post Office Department.

To a large extent the difficulties the postal workers had with the government arose as a result of the bullheaded, tough-minded and irrational attitude of the people in the Treasury Board. The Treasury Board did not confine that attitude to the postal workers. I remind hon. members that there have been strikes by the air traffic controllers because of the approach taken by the Treasury Board. Recently there was a strike by a group which most people in Canada thought would never strike or ever think of striking, one which would never even think very hard about belonging to a union or an association. I refer to the clerks. Why did the clerks strike? They went on strike because the Treasury Board in its stupidity offered them a 5 per cent increase in a year when the cost of living went up by 10 per cent.

When I read the announcement that the Treasury Board was taking over negotiations with the letter carriers, I almost resigned myself to a strike two or three months down the road. I hope we get this bill passed. I hope we get the Crown corporation set up, because when that happens the workers in the Post Office will no longer come under the jurisdiction of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and have to deal with the stupidities of the Treasury Board. They will come under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code and have all the rights afforded to workers in private industry to negotiate fairly not only on wages but also on working conditions, classification and all the other things which are accepted as commonplace in private industry.

Mr. Deans: Why is the Treasury Board so anti-people?

Mr. Orlikow: My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) asks why the Treasury Board is so anti-people. Having been fortunate enough never to have been a cabinet minister, I cannot tell from personal experience. I can only pass some kind of judgment, based on common sense, on the results of letting the Treasury Board run anything.

I say to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) that the Post Office can be run as it has been, as a department of government, or it can be run as a Crown corporation. It will not make much difference unless the people who deal with the workers concerned use some common sense and compassion. Since 1965 we have had a record of strikes and work stoppages, legal and illegal, every couple of years. What were those about? Most of the public think, because they do not know the details, that they were called because the workers are stupid, stubborn and unreasonable. The evidence does not show this. Were these disruptions caused because union leaders were so militant that they forced workers to go on strike? That is not indicated either. In fact, the exact reverse is true. Every study which has been done—studies carried out by people appointed by the government—has put the blame almost exclusively on the stubborn, unimaginative and uncaring attitude of the senior management in the Post Office.

Let me put on the record again some of the observations made by impartial observers who have had the opportunity to study what has been happening in the Post Office. Let us go back to 1966, a year after the first strike at the Post Office. Mr. Justice Montpetit was appointed to look into what was wrong with the Post Office. He made 262 recommendations dealing with all aspects of employment in the Post Office and, among other things, he said, and I quote:

> A large number of the post office employees' grievances are first and foremost, human relations problems.
> —The attitude of some supervisors and postmasters towards their employees leaves much to be desired. These people have only a vague notion of the importance of maintaining good relations with their staff.
> The action of those in authority has and always will have a tremendous influence on the reactions of employees and on their productivity. Complaints arising from their behaviour can sometimes be difficult to explain.

That was in 1966. In 1969 there was another dispute between the postal workers and the Post Office Department. A well-known and respected expert in the field of labour-management relations, Mr. W. S. Martin of Winnipeg, was asked to adjudicate. He said, among other things, and I quote:

> As assessment of employer attitudes in this matter shows that the employer position is characterized by arrogance and high-handedness. There is lacking a genuine desire to work in the atmosphere of mutal respect and understanding. Hostility, vindictiveness and possibly distrust appear to frustrate any opportunity for effective interrelationships. It would appear that the senior officials in the Post Office Department have not as yet reconciled themselves to operating the postal facilities within a progressive collective bargaining atmosphere.

Then in 1972 a vice-chairman of the Ontario Labour Relations Board, Owen Shime, looking into another dispute, said, and I quote:

> In these negotiations one felt that each time the employer was required to reach a decision it was looking over its shoulder at the remaining government employees. That was an impediment to sound negotiations with respect to the needs and problems of the Post Office and its employees.

I could go on and on, but I think I have given enough illustrations of the kind of situation which has existed in the Post Office and which still exists. I remind the minister that at the time of strike a year or a year and a half ago, there were several tens of thousands of grievances outstanding. How did that happen? When there was a grievance, the union took it through the ordinary channels provided in the collective agreement. The union won at each stage. The government never accepted that the union was right. The government took a particular case to the Federal Court. When it lost in the Federal Court, it took the case to the Supreme Court. When it lost in the Supreme Court, instead of saying that the Supreme Court decision covered all the cases—hundreds of cases of a similar nature—the government said it covered only that particular case.

Is it any wonder the workers were angry? Is it any wonder they were militant? Is it any wonder they went on strike? What surprises me is that they did not strike more often.

While I am talking about that particular strike I want to digress for a moment to make an observation about what I consider to be a very strange situation. After the leader of the CUPW took his people out on strike, when he did not respond immediately to the law passed by Parliament and order his people back to work, it did not take very many days until he was charged, brought to court, tried, convicted and sentenced to serve time in jail. I make no comment about whether or not that was a good idea, but that is what happened. He appealed his case, he lost it, and he has long since served his sentence.

• (1530)

Some years ago, in the city of Hamilton an illegal agreement was made by a number of very important, influential and wealthy businessmen. They decided they would set a high price on their services for dredging the Hamilton harbour. It went on for many years and it cost the people of Canada millions of dollars. Eventually, the businessmen were charged. It took a long time and the trial took months. Finally, they were found guilty and convicted. I have not seen any sign of their having to serve their sentence. Of course, they are appealing their case, as they have the right to do. I merely wish to illustrate why so many ordinary citizens, so many workers and good people, believe, with a good deal of justification, that there is probably one law for the rich and another for the poor, that it depends on whom you know and what kind of lawyer you hire.

In my view, unless the new Crown corporation puts in charge of its relationships with its workers, both inside and outside, people who have an understanding of human relations, people who understand that in the 1980s workers, whether in the private or in the public sector, have a right to be treated with common sense, humaneness, dignity and fairness, changing the Post Office to a Crown corporation will not achieve anything.

I want to speak for a couple of minutes about the conception the public has of the reason the mail service has been so bad in recent years. The public believes that those who work in the Post Office do not try, loaf on the job, stay away, literally try to misdirect the mail, and so on. The facts are entirely different. The facts show that there is a great deal of difficulty about delivering mail because the management of the Post Office Department, in their wisdom or lack of it, have convinced the government and the minister that what we needed was a modern, high speed, efficient system for sorting mail and that the way to bring this about was to install highly-automated machines with computers. This was done in Toronto, through which city, I am told, 70 per cent of the mail for all of Canada has to pass. The fact is, it took close to two years before the difficulties, the bugs in the new, highly sophisticated and complicated system, could be worked out. So great was the disruption that they were taking car loads of letters from the buildings in Toronto, shipping them to Cornwall, having them sorted by hand in the old manual way, and bringing them back to Toronto. The workers were being blamed because the mail delivery was slow and inefficient though in fact it was slow and inefficient because of the decision of the government and the senior management of the postal service to adopt this highly sophisticated system without arrangements for proper back-up and support.

I hope those difficulties have now been eliminated, and I hope the system will work as well as some claimed it would work. I hope the relationship with the employees will be better than it has been. But we still have problems. We have problems because, in our free enterprise system, governments do not want to plan. This government does not want to plan. So we have a situation in which the left hand does not let the right hand know what it is doing. On the one hand we have invested several billion dollars in setting up a very modern, supposedly rapid and efficient mail service, while on the other hand we are encouraging competition, encouraging the private carrier.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris, spoke about the couriers and the United Parcel Service. I wish to talk for a few minutes about the United Parcel Service. I do not think there is any department of government which comes closer to more people in Canada than the postal service which is charged with the responsibility of delivering all sorts of mail, such as private letters, business letters, advertising, books, parcels, you name it, to every person in Canada, no matter how distant and isolated they are from the main centres. Delivering mail or parcels to mining or rural communities, to the high Arctic where the population is scattered and distances are great, is expensive. It is a money loser. The private carriers have no intention of serving the people in those areas. What they are doing successfully, and more successfully each year, is moving into the areas where there are large concentrations of people and skimming off the best customers in the most profitable areas. If that is permitted to continue, it will mean the destruction of the postal system as we have known it and it will mean increasing deficits for the Post Office rather than the elimination of the deficit about which the minister has spoken and which this bill is supposed to bring about.

We need only look at our neighbour to the south, the United States, to learn what the United Postal Service has done in that country. At a hearing held before the Ontario Highway Transport Board in June of 1978, a senior official of the Post Office Department appeared before the board and urged the board not to grant United Postal Service a franchise to operate in Ontario. James Corkery was then the deputy postmaster general. He told the board that between 1962 and 1976 the U.S. postal service saw its volume of parcels drop from 792 million to 385 million, while UPS increased its volume from 182 million to 950 million in that period. He said that the Canadian Post Office here would not repeat the mistake made in the United States of not realizing the threat posed by UPS until it was too late. That is what he said, but in fact UPS has expanded its service. It has purchased two companies in Quebec, and I am sure it will try to operate in Quebec. It has now received permission from the Ontario board to operate in Ontario. A prominent California lawyer, Michael Khourie, who fought and won an anti-trust case against UPS in 1971, predicts that if UPS gets a foothold in this country, they will take over the small parcel delivery business in Canada. If they do that it will jeopardize the financial viability of the Post Office and it will destroy the financial viability of CN-CP express because UPS will concentrate on giving fast and cheap service, probably at a loss in the initial stages, to the vast majority of the customers living in the Quebec City-Windsor corridor, if they get permission in Quebec City. That is what they have done in the United States.

After they have destroyed the parcel services of the Post Office and CN-CP express, they will have an "open sesame" to charge whatever they can. Destroying the ability of the Post Office and CN-CP express to serve customers on whom they can make a bit of money, will adversely affect to a very large extent customers who live in sparsely populated areas in the rest of Canada.

I urge the government to proceed with this bill and set up a Crown corporation for the Post Office. In the field of parcel delivery, I urge the government to do what it has talked about doing with the provinces in terms of the constitution. They should get together with the provinces and point out that the destruction of the ability of the Post Office to deliver parcels will have an adverse effect on the Post Office and on service to the tens of thousands of people who live in small towns and villages in Ontario and Quebec. I suppose if UPS is successful in Ontario and Quebec, it will eventually move across the other eight provinces of Canada, as it moved to take in every state of the United States.

We urge the minister to establish this Crown corporation to operate the Post Office and to learn from the mistakes of the last 12 to 15 years. The board should ensure that the new corporation uses common sense, that it does not buy every new technology which comes along in the hope that somehow there is a magic solution to the problems of communication which are changing so rapidly with new discoveries almost every day, if not every week. It should ensure that the corporation uses some common sense and humane feelings in its relationships with employees. It should try to deal with employees not just once a year in terms of collective bargaining; it should try to enlist its employees in a partnership to provide the better service Canadians want and need. If it does this, it will protect both the interests of the people of Canada and the people who work for the new Crown corporation.

We hope this bill will proceed fairly quickly, that it will be dealt with in committee and passed with a few amendments so that we can get on with the job.

I should like to refer to a couple of details. Clause 5.(2) reads in part as follows:

While maintaining basic customary postal service, the corporation, in carrying out its objects, shall have regard to—

It refers to a number of basic principles including, most important, the need to be self-sufficient in the long term. In our view this is unacceptable. Over the past several years the Post Office has been seriously curtailing services in a number of fields. Currently we are experiencing what amounts to an almost total freeze on the expansion of delivery services to new residential communities.

Mr. Rose: Suburban services.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, suburban services.

Mr. Rose: It is a disservice.

Mr. Orlikow: I remind the minister that it took the imminence of the 1979 election for the then Liberal government to "unfreeze" hiring and to permit the hiring of some new letter carriers so that tens of thousands of people in almost every city of the country, who were quite justifiably complaining about not getting door-to-door service, would receive the same service as those living in older parts of cities. It took the threat of the 1979 election to unblock that freeze.

I hope the new Crown corporation will have the ability to serve new residential communities in every city of Canada, including my city of Winnipeg, with the same kind of service as people in older areas of the city have been receiving for generations.

We are against the elimination of small post offices which has been going ahead at a rapid rate, particularly on the prairies. We know serious consideration has been given to reducing services by rural post offices. We oppose that thinking. Those cutbacks are totally unacceptable and should not be allowed to continue under the Crown corporation. Clause 5.(2) of the bill must be tightened so that it specifically enumerates what makes up a basic customary postal service. This should include the principle of residential daily home delivery to all communities over a certain size; the maintenance of small rural post offices, excepting only under the most exceptional circumstances, and the maintenance of six days a week of service in all communities not served by a post office subbranch, for example, a post office in a drugstore.

I want to voice one more concern, that is, the drive on the part of government departments, including the Post Office, to contract out work. We know what contracting out means. It is an easy way to reduce government expenditure. Of course, the way government expenditure is reduced is by eliminating the jobs of people who work for the government and turning the service over to a private contractor who usually, if not always, pays the minimum wage or ten cents over the minimum wage. The private contractor has no conception of paying for holidays, pensions of anything else. Usually the private contractor is able to make a very substantial profit at the expense of the government, the service to the people and the employees whom he hires on a very casual basis. We will watch very carefully to see that the Crown corporation does not continue to expand the system of contracting out work which up to now has been done by people employed by the Post Office.

I say again to the minister that we support the principle of the establishment of a Crown corporation for the Post Office. We will probably make suggestions and amendments to the bill when it is sent to committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that my first speech in the House since coming back from the summer recess would have dealt with the constitution, but I have an opportunity today to enter debate on another issue which is of great concern to Canadians. I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post corporation.

• (1550)

Although I have serious reservations in principle about creating more Crown corporations, I welcome the creation of this one. The operations of the Post Office have been a concern of mine for the past few years and one needs only to review Hansard to find this out. It hardly needs to be stated that the Post Office has become a great source of frustration to all Canadians. The strikes which have shut down the Post Office over the course of the last few years have had a great and adverse effect on the lives of all Canadians. We all know that no one is immune to these disruptions in service. For businessmen who depend on this service, postal strikes mean loss of income, for various reasons. It means his cash flow is disrupted, payrolls are not met and obligations go unpaid.

Postal strikes affect the pensioner who is dependent upon government assistance as the sole source of his income. None of us in the House can truly appreciate what goes through a pensioner's mind when he hears that another disruption is looming. To be totally cut off from their only source of income is a very frightening experience for these people. Everyone, from every walk of life, is affected either directly or indirectly by postal disruptions. The Post Office is a "people issue." To the businessman, postal strikes and work stoppages can mean the difference between solvency and bankruptcy. To the pensioner the Post Office is all that stands between life and death. And I mean this literally.

There was a time when the Post Office was the object of great admiration. Working for the Post Office was a group of men and women who diligently followed the ideal of delivering mail through rain, sleet and snow. Local history in many centres across Canada is full of examples of postmen who committed great acts of heroism in their attempts to provide the public with good service. I am sure many members of this House could cite examples which constitute service above and beyond the call of duty by today's standards. However, times change and the Post Office is no exception. The esteem in which Canadians once held the Post Office has all but vanished. Gone are the days when a postman would walk miles in a blizzard to deliver one piece of mail.

At this point I think it is only fair to say that not all the people who work for the Post Office deserve the image which is now theirs. I know the Post Office employs many people who are diligent and conscientious and who reflect the image of postmen from days gone by. It only takes a few people to ruin it for everyone. The few who are not overly concerned about providing good service have done a remarkable job of pulling down the image of all the rest.

I personally know people who work for the Post Office. They have been delivering mail for years. In fact, there is a family in my riding whose occupational tradition is delivering mail. Through wind, rain, snow and sleet they have provided the people on their route with the finest of service. You can count on them to deliver the mail through the worst of conditions. They are proud of the mailman's tradition of excellence of service and are committed to keeping that tradition alive. These people are a part of a larger body of postal workers who share their commitment to this tradition. Across this country they serve with distinction 4,991 routes and over a million homes and businesses. Who are these people? They are the rural mailmen. They do not get a half-hour paid lunch break or a boot and glove allowance; they cannot look forward to annual cost of living allowances and, to my knowledge, they have never instigated a strike. Yet the last time they saw a statutory raise was in 1956.

Mr. Dinsdale: Shame!

Mr. Vankoughnet: It was in 1956 that an amendment to the Post Office Act raised the maximum ceiling for rural postal contracts to $10,000. The price of gasoline in 1956 bears no resemblance to the price of gasoline today. The price of repairs to cars and trucks between now and then is equally distorted. The cost of a vehicle today can be well over $10,000. But the rural mailmen have had to live with that provision since 1956.

I was told by an official in the public affairs department of Canada Post in Ottawa that from 1965 to 1979 the letter carriers in urban centres received eight salary increases. I do not know how many times they have gone on strike to get the increases which they demanded. But I do know that while they were on strike, while they tied up the nation's mail and while they stopped working in support of other striking workers in the Post Office, the rural carriers have taken a back seat with respect to their salaries. Their salaries have not been increased beyond an arbitrarily determined ceiling since 1956. That is one year short of a quarter century and, Mr. Speaker, it is a disgrace. To be honest, when this condition was first brought to my attention, shortly after my election to the House in May, 1979, I could hardly believe it was true. After I checked into the matter and found out the facts, I still had trouble believing it. But an official in the Post Office confirmed it was correct. Would Jean-Claude Parrot have settled for such an inequity if the urban letter carriers had been treated in the same way as their rural counterparts? I doubt it very much.

The Post Office administration has known for a number of years that this provision was hopelessly outdated. They know now, as they knew a long time ago, that holding a $10,000 ceiling on rural postal contracts was a provision completely out of line with the costs involved in the delivery of mail to rural Canadians. Yet this ceiling has remained in place for 24 years. The Liberal government, in 1968, had the opportunity to raise the ceiling, but it did not do so. The former postmaster general, my hon. friend from Vancouver South, was aware of this problem. He was also aware of other serious problems in the Post Office and he was working on solutions to them through the preparation of a comprehensive Crown corporation bill. Unfortunately, the February election came between him and the bill. It is therefore my hope that the bill before us today reflects his concerns about the Post Office and will provide concrete solutions to correct the problems.

It now appears that the rural postal carriers, who pride themselves in carrying on the excellent service in the tradition set by Canada's postal employees, are finally going to receive their just reward. And it is about time.

I have a written commitment from the present Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) stating that the new Post Office Crown Corporation Act will rectify the situation. For the purpose of placing the minister's commitment on the record I would like to quote from a letter he sent to me dated July 17, 1980. It reads as follows:

> I have noted that you have written in the past to express your concern regarding the $10,000 limit which currently governs mail contracts, in particular, rural route contracts.
> In this regard, you may be interested to note that passage of the Crown corporation legislation, which I have introduced today, will resolve this difficulty in the future by removing the legislative constraint contained in the Post Office Act. Under the corporation, all contracts, including mail contracts, will be the subject of bylaws. Therefore, it will become far easier to adapt to changes.

I sent the minister a note of thanks for informing me of this and I thank him again today. I hope the authorities charged with the responsibility of correcting this situation will make this one of their top priorities.

Another issue which I hope will be of top priority to the new corporation is the question of closing rural post offices on Saturdays. The former postmaster general, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), gave his assurance that closings would not occur without extensive consultations with those affected. I know the present Postmaster General is concerned about this issue and I understand he plans to adopt the same approach as his predecessor.

ABANDONED RAILWAY LINES ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF CONSERVATION ADVISORY AUTHORITY

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay) moved that Bill C-221, to provide for the establishment of an authority for public use of abandoned railway lines in Canada, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to be able to reintroduce this bill which has been discussed during the last sessions since my election to this House. Unfortunately, the problem addressed by this bill shows a tendency to worsen. I have myself sponsored this bill, which may be cited as the Abandoned Railway Lines Act, not because the means provided in this bill are the best possible to solve the problem or to achieve the desired goal, but because I wanted to urge the government and the two or three commissions acting for the government to proceed in a direction where there could be more protection for the public interest when the railways relinquish their rights of way. The Canadian public is becoming more and more aware of the potential of abandoned railway lines and unused tracks for rapid transit systems and recreation. Too often in the past buildings have been erected on sections that the railroads had sold, which has made it virtually impossible to use them eventually for urban transport, for walkways, or for cycle, snowmobile, ski and nature paths, and so on.

This bill will protect the long-term interests of the public as concerns rapid transit systems and recreation by reserving the use of abandoned railway lines and rights of way.

In a few moments, I shall give a few examples of cases in my constituency where the lack of a bill or a system such as the one I am suggesting has resulted in the loss to the public of any opportunity to use these areas for recreation purposes. In Saint-Lambert, for example, a school was built on an abandoned railway line, which made it impossible to use that right of way in the future for a rapid transit system. Even in the electoral district that you represent, in eastern Ontario, Mr. Speaker, there are some abandoned railway lines that could have been used for snowmobile, cross country skiing or even horseback riding or hiking trails. But instead, the rights of way often went back to the farmers who owned them originally, but also, in some instances, to foreigners, which prevented the public from using these trails which are often in very scenic countryside, behind farms, villages, in nature, and that is what is sad. Up until now we have missed all those opportunities.

[English]

Constituencies that combine cities with countryside, have probably encountered at one time or another lost opportunities that are the direct result of a lack of a set of rules to oblige the railway companies at least to make these abandoned lines available to the general public. I understand that CN now has a policy which allows it to offer an abandoned line to municipal or provincial authorities. That is a step forward.

The problem is that municipal or provincial organizations are often not in a position, for one reason or another, to take advantage of such an offer when it is made. The result is that within a few months some private developer or private owner sees this land vacant or hears that it is about to become vacant and gets into the act sooner than one might expect, with the result that the line is cut up. Once that happens, its potential for recreational purposes is decreased. Gradually, various other parts of the line are sold off and the whole thing becomes quite hopeless. There is really no need for this to occur.

I do not pretend that this bill is the absolute answer. I think we should use the discussion today to urge the government to do what should be done. This is the fourth time I have introduced this bill. Like many other decent ideas introduced around here, it takes an awful long time to convince the bureaucracy to act, and unfortunately, there is no exception in this case.

The way I have phrased the bill, "the establishment of an authority", is designed more to follow the rules of the House than anything else because private members cannot propose anything which will cost money when proposing private members' bills. Whether we use this method or another, the basic idea is to set up a system whereby, when the CTC authorizes the abandonment of a railway line, there is some requirement that the railway company which has asked for authorization of abandonment has an obligation to dispose of that abandoned line right away to a public body, either municipal, non-profit or provincial, for a sum related to its book value, not an inflated value, and having regard to the price originally paid by the railway.

These things should be incorporated in whatever eventual arrangement is made and the offer to these various bodies should be publicized in the same way as the CTC publicizes a lot of other things. For example, notices could be posted in local post offices so that the entire local population might be aware of what is going on. A notice should remain for a sufficient length of time to allow the public to get organized and do something about it. If they still do not do anything about it, then that is tough, because we will have done our duty. I would have no sympathy for a public that failed to act after it had received proper notice and had been given plenty of time in which to act.

What is happening now is completely the reverse of that situation. I can cite an example that happened in my constituency within the last year. A bicycle path was made along the embarkment on the south shore of the St. Lawrence Seaway. I can claim some credit for encouraging Parks Canada to help with this. It is an excellent site and allows the public a fantastic view of the Montreal panorama and the St. Lawrence River. There is also a fair amount of wildlife in the area. The path leads to a location which is only three miles from a railway museum at De Léry, Quebec, which is the best in the world. It is inland from the river, and is reached over a network of road connections. The route is very convenient and we have been asking Parks Canada to link their bicycle paths with the museum. In this way the museum would be made available by bicycle to thousands of people on the south shore of Montreal.

Everyone admits it is a good idea. For three-quarters of a mile of the distance between the dyke and the museum, there is an abandoned railway line. When we got in touch with CPR we were referred to Marathon Realty. The situation was explained to them and their co-operation sought.

To make a long story short, Mr. Speaker, they agreed it was a good idea but—they sold the property to a developer. Now we have to make a bicycle path that will go through the streets instead of on an abandoned right of way, protected from traffic and not interfering with municipal traffic patterns. The proposal made sense, but the CPR felt no obligation to the public nor did its real estate firm. Perhaps the province and the municipality were occupied with other things and did not take action when it might have had some effect, so the project fell through. In my view, the basic responsibility lies with the CPR and Marathon Realty. They should have had the decency to let the others have a chance.

My bill was proposed long before this particular incident but it would prevent such a thing from happening again. I do not really care how we go about this, but I would like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the minister who is responsible for Parks Canada to consider this matter again and see whether they can find a solution. There is no excuse for this sort of thing but it happens all across Canada and recreational sites are lost unnecessarily.

The railways may consider all this as something of a nuisance but I say, that is tough. They should be required to protect the public interest in regard to these routes, not only for recreational purposes. Occasionally in a city, a potential rapid transit route could be developed. Unless we act quickly, that will be lost as well.

I shall not keep talking, Mr. Speaker, as I should like other hon. members to have an opportunity to indicate support for the bill. I realize that it will probably be talked out today but perhaps whoever is here to represent the government House leader would agree to having the subject matter of the bill referred to a committee, at least. I do not know whether that is possible but perhaps some hon. members may indicate their willingness to do so. If that is the case, perhaps we could make such an agreement close to five o'clock. I do not think anyone will quarrel with the objective of the bill so why not get it into committee where we can put a bit more pressure on the government to move in favour of something that makes a lot of sense?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak to Bill C-221, an act to provide for the establishment of an authority for public use of abandoned railway lines in Canada.

This bill was placed on the order paper on another occasion. It was debated during private members' hour on March 16, 1979. At that time, the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson) said the bill would establish a committee to advise on the suitability of using certain rights of way for rapid transit or recreational purposes. The bill itself simply creates the advisory body; it does not give the body power to apply its decision. The NDP is prepared to consider the subject matter of this bill if it goes into committee, as the sponsor requested.

He said he favours this legislation because he wants the option of using abandoned rights of way for rapid transit or recreational use and seeks to ensure that these uses are fully considered at the appropriate time. He seemed to be primarily interested in abandoned lines near large metropolitan centres or between cities. One of my concerns is that this particular legislation may or may not be particularly relevant to the abandoned rail lines in rural areas of western Canada.

The Hall royal commission made specific recommendations about the disposition of rural rail lines on the prairies. The commission said in 1977 that abandoned rights of way should vest in the provincial Crown for disposition as might be mutually agreed to between the relevant province and municipal authorities.

This proposal certainly makes sense. By vesting title in the provincial Crown—instead of letting the railway auction it off to the highest bidder—the province and municipality could determine whether there was a public use for the land. Perhaps this could include use for a power transmission line, or a pipeline, or recreational parkland or for community gardens. In the last few months, some people have suggested that abandoned lines, particularly in an about large metropolitan areas, could provide for a whole range of possibilities. As agriculture becomes more important in Canada and as self-sufficiency in food production takes on greater urgency, there is an interest in community gardens. The possibility of using any land within our urban centres for the growing of food makes sense. Of course, recent studies on park land in Canada, particularly the metropolitan parks have indicated that the traditional large park lands which we find in the central parts of our cities are used inappropriately. Much more appropriate would be a long, thin park spread throughout a metropolitan area. This is the kind of possibility for land use that a committee could consider seriously. If there was no municipal or provincial use for the land, perhaps farmers could put some of the land back into production.

The Hall report recommended that in the interim provincial and municipal authorities should control weeds so that the seeds would not spread to adjacent lands. This is a very serious problem, particularly in western Canada where weeds have spread. One aspect of it is associated with the rights of way, particularly for railways.

The Hall commission report has not been fully implemented. I draw to the attention of the hon. member who proposed the bill the fact that we are still looking for some action on the Hall commission report. The land of certain branch lines was transferred from the railways to the federal government under a gift agreement signed by Otto Lang. That land could be transferred to the provincial authority, as Hall recommended in his report. However, with respect to abandoned rights of way of branch lines not covered by that agreement, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has suggested that the railways auction off the lands in the marketplace. Although the province would be able to buy the land in the open marketplace, this process is not in keeping with the Hall report because the railways are not entitled to any compensation for those abandoned lands. I will return to this point in a moment.

We must also consider whether the branch lines should be abandoned in the first place. There are still several rail lines in the west which elevator companies want kept in operation but which have been left out of the guaranteed network protected to the year 2000 by the previous Conservative government and the present Liberal government.

Abandonment of railway lines shifts costs from railways to farmers, who have to buy trucks, and to municipalities who have to repair roads. In other words, when we abandon a line in western Canada, we are really placing the burden of transporting grains on the farmers as opposed to the rail lines. In many cases abandonment is premature because the railway consumes only 670 Btu's to move one ton of freight one mile compared with 2,400 Btu's for truck transport.

I am certain every member in this House will appreciate the accelerating importance of energy costs. This has to be taken into consideration more than ever before. Perhaps, therefore, the idea of rail line abandonment, which previously has been accepted generally, ought to be reconsidered.

For the most part, the railways were given the lands for their stations and rights of way by the taxpayers of Canada. When the railways abandon the service for which the land was given, the land under an abandoned rail line should revert to the public.

The CPR was given 44 million acres by the taxpayers of Canada. The CNR system was given 8 million acres of land. The CPR, in particular, has been generously treated by the people of Canada. The Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation in a report dating back to 1917 stated that the CPR had received the following public assistance as of June 30, 1916: railroad completed by the government, $37.8 million; cash aid $66.9 million; value of unsold lands, nearly 11.5 million acres, $119.3 million; lands sold minus cost of improvements, $55.5 million for a total identifiable public aid of $279.5 million. In addition, there was unidentifiable aid such as loans, since repaid; exemptions from taxes and exemptions from duties for construction material.

If one was to allow a 5.6 per cent annual rate of return, which is typical of public utilities applying for rate increases since 1916, the present value of those gifts today would be in excess of $8.5 billion. On top of this, since 1967 the CPR has received $900 million in operating subsidies. It now has deferred taxes owing to the extent of $922 million. All together, the total identifiable public aid extended to the CPR amounts to $10.5 billion compared with assets carried in its 1979 annual report of $11 billion. We have already paid for the CPR, Mr. Speaker. That is why the New Democratic Party favours bringing the CPR under public ownership. That is why, in a sense, this bill can be considered irrelevant. However, let us recognize what I have described in the Hall commission report, the role of the CPR and how it needs to be compensated for abandoned lands. I think it is fair to recognize that this is an opportunity for Canadians to have one more chance to utilize abandoned rail lines in Canada. To that end, we are quite prepared on this side of the House to support the reference of this bill to an appropriate committee. In committee it will receive analysis, and hopefully action will be taken.

I close by quoting from the Royal Commission on the Natural Resources of Saskatchewan as follows:

—As time went on, additional land subsidies were promised to the Canadian Pacific Railway for subsidiary lines, and to other railway companies for other projected lines. By 1905, more than 55,000,000 acres of prairie lands had been so pledged, but only two-thirds of this acreage was earned by actual construction. Well before 1905, the policy of subsidizing railway construction by land grants had been discontinued but the process of selecting these lands so earned, and the aftermath of tax exemption, remained for many years to vex the growing communities of the west.

It should be pointed out that practically the whole burden of providing land for these railway subsidies, not only for the railways within the prairie provinces as set up in 1905, but for the railways to the north, as well as for portions of the Canadian Pacific lying in western Ontario and in British Columbia, fell to the lot of the three prairie provinces, chiefly to Saskatchewan.

As Hall indicated in his report, there should be no corporate crying over the return of rights of way to the Crown. As the hon. member who presented this bill has shown, there are some very exciting and dynamic possibilities with regard to the use of these abandoned rail lines both within our cities and adjacent to them. For that reason we would like to see this bill referred to committee as soon as possible for action.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I like the idea behind this bill and I congratulate the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson) for introducing it and for bringing to our attention once again the need to provide protection when a railroad line is abandoned and new uses for the land have to be found.

I come from Mississauga. Since last November, naturally everyone from Mississauga takes considerable interest in railroads and their behaviour, not just in the potential for dangerous accidents but also in the much broader question of good neighbourliness between these large corporations and the local municipality.

As a representative from a large eastern urban riding I particularly enjoyed the examples which the member from Châteauguay presented. I would like to read his explanatory note and put it on the record again. It states:

There is an increasing awareness in Canada of the potential for rapid transit or recreational use of abandoned railway lines or unused railway rights of way. Too often in the past sections of abandoned railways have been sold and buildings erected on the abandoned portion with the result that potential future uses such as urban transit or bicycle, pedestrian or snowmobile trails have been effectively blocked. The proposed bill would safeguard the long-term public interest for both rapid transit and recreational uses of abandoned rail lines and railway rights of way.

● (1630)

As I mentioned, I like the idea of this bill. It proposes that we set up an authority which would advise the governor in council on the disposition of abandoned railway lines. Surprisingly, there is now no official advisory body on this question despite the wide range of regulatory and advisory bodies now in existence, not to mention government departments themselves. Despite all of this, the governor in council does not have some official source of advice on the disposition of abandoned railway property.

Not that the Railway Act is silent on the question of railway lands, or for that matter on the question of abandonment. The Railway Act offers literally dozens of pages dealing with the ways in which the railways may acquire and use lands.

The act contains extensive provisions dealing with applications by railways to the Canadian Transport Commission to abandon a branch line on the grounds that it is uneconomic, and the subsequent procedure, which is long, sensitive and complicated.

What happens when a line is abandoned? To be precise, section 106 of the act refers, not to the abandonment of the line itself, but to the abandonment of operations on a line. The railway must be granted permission to abandon operations on a line, but once that is granted, the jurisdiction of the CTC and of the federal government ceases, even though the track remains. From then on, the railway is empowered to, and I quote section 102(1):

—alienate, sell or dispose of, any lands or property of the company that for any reason have become not necessary for the purposes of the railway.

This power of disposal applies even to lands given by the Crown, with the exception of Crown lands entrusted to CN under section 19 of the CNR Act. In this special case, the land reverts to the Federal Land Management Committee for a recommendation on disposition. I note that Bill C-221 does not make mention of this special situation.

When federal jurisdiction ceases, it would seem that municipal jurisdiction is left to fill the gap with respect to land use. Although I admire the need for sensitivity as expressed by the hon. member for Châteauguay, I also feel we should continue to leave in the hands of the municipalities the final decisions on land use.

Abandoned rights of way are, unfortunately, not easy things to dispose of. In agricultural areas, farmers are often not eager to take the land as it consists largely of gravel and ballast. New roads are sometimes laid across the right of way leaving short, narrow sections of land too small for commercial development or unattractive for recreational use. In the absence of maintenance by the railway, drainage becomes a problem, and more often than not the right of way becomes an overgrown, neglected loss.

I am sympathetic with the need for sensitivity in our disposal of these lands, but it seems that a municipality and a local authority are best able to deal with these concrete problems.

The municipality has the authority and the expertise to handle land use planning within its boundaries. In most cases, the disposition of title to the land is up to the railways, which may sell to the province or private interests as well as to the municipality.

The next step, the use of the land, is the proper decision of the municipality. At the moment, as this bill states, the governor in council does not receive any official advice on the disposition of railway lines. The authority proposed in this bill would perform that function.

There are certain technical aspects to this bill and I would like to comment on some of these specific provisions. I am interested in the rationale for the membership of the proposed authority. First, an employee of the Canadian Transport Commission provides valuable knowledge of the history of the rail line up to abandonment. However, the role of the commission as a regulatory agency is quite strictly circumscribed by law. Participation of one of its employees on a separate statutory body such as the authority could cause problems. Speaking without the benefit of legal advice, I wonder if this participation might require amendment to either the Railway Act or the National Transportation Act.

Second, an employee of the Department of Transport, while raising less of a legal problem, might not be in a position to contribute a great deal in individual cases of abandoned lines. The federal government does have a program of urban transportation assistance, but the determination of priorities with respect to individual operations is left to the provinces and the municipalities. Therefore, the reference here to use for rapid transit would have to come within that context. Third, while the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is included, appropriate representation might also come from Parks Canada, which now reports through the Department of the Environment.

Under the bill, the authority is established to advise the governor in council on, among other things, "the acquisition of title to any abandoned railway line or railway right of way determined by the Canadian Transport Commission to be either abandoned or unlikely to be used for railway purposes in the future".

This responsibility creates difficulties in connection with the CTC's mandate. As described above, the CTC simply makes a decision as to the abandonment of the operation of a railway line. Despite the implication of this section, the CTC makes no judgment on the future of the land itself. The reference to acquisition of title raises yet another problem, repeated later in the bill, of funding. While not explicitly stated, there is a hint that the authority might recommend purchase of some abandoned rights of way by the federal government. This, of course, is a matter that could be clarified.

On the question of the CTC being requested for particulars of abandoned lines, I am advised by the commission that no further records are maintained once operations on a line are approved for abandonment.

Finally, the requirement for a one year's notice of abandonment could work both ways. At present the absolute minimum is three months, and six months, and six months is quite normal, so there is a certain amount of notice under the existing system. There might, however, be situations where quick abandonment would be desirable, in which case the requirement contained in the bill would then become a handicap and not an aid.

I see merit in this bill. The bill makes it clear that careful thinking should be done on the future of abandoned rights of way. However, the question remains, how can this best be done? Each part of the country has unique problems and unique opportunities. In September when the Standing Committee on Transport, of which I am a member, travelled through the maritimes, we heard submissions about the use of abandoned land. In my constituency of Mississauga North our city has a well-developed planning department which undoubtedly prefers to become involved when new land use opportunities are opened up.

It seems to me that the most productive approach to this question would be a reliance on local level decisions. That should not, of course, preclude provincial or federal participation on an advisory basis. The consultative process between levels of government and orders of government is now a fact of life. The key question is whether we need to formalize or enshrine in legislation a special body to deal into this question. In an area like this I am convinced that specific problems can be solved locally with good will, co-operation and imaginative thinking between all three levels of government.

It seems to me that the author of this bill, the hon. member for Châteauguay, has raised an important topic. We need to find ways to make railroads and municipalities better neighbours; we in my area know that well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to comment on this bill. I would like also to congratulate its author for an important start on this interesting question.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this bill implies that we will be continuing to abandon railroad properties. I think the last speaker has touched upon a subject matter which would perhaps bear a little expansion. Not only do we need a policy for the disposition of the rights of way which have been abandoned, but we also need very urgently a long-term policy on transportation as it pertains to Canada as a whole and particularly as it pertains to the rails.

I do not think we have a proper analysis at hand of what is the most viable and serviceable means of transportation. I do not think we have made use of the respective capabilities of the various forms of transportation. Until this is done I do not think there should be anything but a freeze upon the abandonment of rail lines, wherever they may be.

While the Hall commission permitted some abandonment and created some of the lands which are the primary subject of this debate, it did at the same time emphasize that there were certain lines which must be kept in place. A later study suggested that the Hall commission had perhaps given assent to the abandonment of more lines than was really to the advantage of the economy of the community of western Canada, and I think we have to consider that possibility.

I do not mean to be political or critical of the proposition of the last speaker, but if we establish a vehicle for the disposition of land—which would have to be Crown-owned in any instance, I believe—then I think that vehicle should not be interdepartmental. If we get an interdepartmental committee I think we will run into roadblocks with each department having to make its own decision on its own merits. I would take sharp issue with any such proposal as that if it were put before the House on a serious basis. If there is an inclination by the Crown to dispose of its abandoned rights of way, then in my view we should not set up an interdepartmental committee. We should define very clearly the authority and terms and conditions under which such land will become the property of somebody else, and permit that authority to give a quick decision rather than spread the responsibility throughout an interdepartmental structure.

The present transportation commission has so much on its platter now that perhaps we should name a single official who might draw help, if he requires it, from local people. If it is in the city, get the mayor of the city involved and let him appoint a couple of other people—perhaps from the railroad. But let us get down to it so that the decision-making process will not take 18 months to two years when somebody may really be in a hurry—I refer particularly to a municipality.

I think that this subject matter has never been discussed in depth in a committee of the House in a policy-seeking position with a policy-seeking reference as a result of which a decision could be made or a proposal could be offered to government. What do we do with this land? How do we dispose of it? I would add to that, as I have already implied: what are we going to do about the abandonment of rail lines in long-term transportation planning? Whether it be in the west or in Carleton-Charlotte, it needs long-term planning.

There is a relationship between the business available and the abandonment of a line, but there does not seem at this moment to be a pursuit of business by the railroads which would indicate that they wish to keep their lines open.

I know the hon. gentleman from London. I am sorry I cannot name his constituency. I should know it. I know he has some sympathy with my feeling that the railroad officials are not, in fact, pursuing business. I have repeatedly stated that in the province of New Brunswick we are hauling lumber by truck from mills in New Brunswick across the CPR line and across the CNR line to the Bangor and Aroostook railroad in Maine and in other instances to another line in Maine, and it does not pay to truck that lumber to destination if you are within a reasonable distance of a Maine railroad. The ridiculous part of the whole thing is that the little Maine railroads are making money by extending lower rates than our own rail companies in our own country are charging. I submit that the cost of the declining traffic as a result of the diversion of traffic to other sources is making certain rail lines the subject of abandonment at some point in the future. It is foreseeable. There is already one application present. However, I must admit I have digressed from a subject which is very close to my heart. I hope there could be some vehicle by which some study of the best transportation system for Canada could be developed to get the cheapest form of transportation.

Although the motion does not say so, I think we are discussing only Crown land as it relates to rights of way. I do not think we could consider that we are talking about the private property of a company in the transportation industry. We have to be talking about Crown land.

While farmers may not be interested, as the last speaker said, in becoming the owners of a railroad right of way, for obvious reasons, if that railroad happens to intersect their farms it is a prior responsibility that that land do become, if possible, whether private or Crown property, the property of the farmers whose farms are intersected by a railroad right of way. That is a consideration which should be made primary. Those which are in an area of pastureland or otherwise undeveloped, are of interest to the farmer. The typical basis for Crown disposal has often been that if the right of way lies within the property or adjacent to that of another owner, that land may very well revert to the other owner for historic reasons. This is an important matter which we should consider—that if it is adjacent to existing property and if it is Crown property, first the municipality and then the individual should be given priority in eventual ownership.

This is a broad field. There are many options, and many suggestions have been made, but I hope this bill will stimulate the type of interest that is necessary so that some vehicle is established, perhaps a special task force, so that a group of members of the House interested in this subject matter might analyse the long-term transportation requirements and the cheapest possible way of transportation, meld the two together and develop a system to provide the service which we have historically received. I think the mails are an example which can be used in respect of our general transportation facility and the efficiency of our railroads today. Twenty-five years ago if you sent a letter from Ottawa to my home at ten o'clock in the morning, it would be at my home at one o'clock in the afternoon. Today, if I send it from Ottawa to my home, it will take 48 hours, 72 hours or 96 hours to two weeks—there is no regularity or dependability in the mail service today. The same situation has developed with the railroads. The two services are comparable in their capability to deliver service. I think we need to study what changes can be made, and then perhaps the subject of land created by railroad abandonment will not even be on our minds.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset that I share the views expressed by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) on this bill. The hon. member said that each part of the country had its unique problems and unique opportunities with respect to abandoned railway lines. This could not be more true in western Canada.

The bill before us proposes a national authority to advise the governor in council on the public use of abandoned railway lines. Nowhere in the country has there been such a rationalization of the rail network as in the west recently. As a result of a series of commissions, committees and reports on western grain movement over the last five years, we now have a basic rail network, guaranteed to the year 2000, of close to 15,900 miles. But as a result of these commissions, a substantial amount of trackage has been abandoned.

The normal course of events would have been for the Canadian Transport Commission to hear each application for abandonment from the railways, to decide whether to allow it, and to leave the railways free to dispose of the abandoned right of way. But the urgent requirement for rail rationalization in the west demanded that this process be speeded up. The various commissions recommended a number of lines for abandonment. The CTC accelerated its hearing process and abandonment orders began to appear. The federal government agreed with the railways to transfer 1900 miles of abandoned rights of way to the federal Crown. This agreement with the railways, which dates back to September, 1977, was known as the gifting agreement.

With a large volume of abandoned lines suddenly on their hands, the railways conceded that it was in the public interest to have these lands revert to the government. The government had to find a way of disposing of them. At first it appeared preferable to transfer the lands to what were expected to be the ultimate owners, that is, the municipalities and adjacent land owners. A notable exception was made in cases where the rights of way were within or adjacent to native reserves. In these cases, first priority for acquisition was given to the reserves, with the help of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

However, the process became bogged down. In each case, several federal agencies became involved, and detailed legal work was required. The problem was compounded by agreements which the railways had made over the years for the installation of power, telephone, oil and gas lines and the like. It was clear by this time that a different approach had to be taken. During the past year, discussions with the three prairie provinces have taken place on the possibility of transferring the lands directly to the provinces. The provinces could in turn dispose of them as they wished. My understanding is that these discussions are now close to a satisfactory resolution.

As future rights of way become available to abandonment, it is intended that the federal government should not play an intermediary role. The railways would negotiate ownership directly with the provinces. So you see, Mr. Speaker, this is quite a special case. To come back to Bill C-221, one could legitimately ask whether the proposed authority would have been able to advise the governor in council on disposition of abandoned prairie branch lines. The question is hypothetical but interesting anyway. The first thing that is clear is that the membership of the authority as proposed in the bill would not have been appropriate for the task. Other federal agencies would have had to be brought in and extensive consultation with provincial and local governments would have had to take place. It is also likely that the authority, with its proposed mandate of looking at rapid transit and recreation uses, would have been viewed with suspicion by municipalities. They would no doubt feel that someone else was doing their planning for them. This may be overstating the case with respect to the west because virtually none of the abandoned lines are urban, but the comment is probably valid in many other situations.

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that each special case demands a special solution. In an area as closely related to local needs and aspirations, a new federal presence may not be the best solution. Like the previous speaker, I fully support the need for more co-ordinated planning of the use of abandoned rights of way. There is no question that they are a precious resource which is largely wasted, but I am not convinced that the proposed authority would achieve that objective. So I cannot support reference of the bill to the committee in its present form.

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be unanimous consent to the following motion which I should like to move:

That Bill C-221 be not now read a second time but that the bill be withdrawn, the order discharged and the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous agreement to it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is so ordered.

The hour provided for the consideration of private members' hour having expired and it being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until next Monday at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CALL FOR ABANDONMENT OF EXPORT TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing importance to the people of British Columbia. In view of the fact that more than 30,000 British Columbians have now signed a petition opposing the implementation of any form of excise tax against the export of natural gas and hydroelectric power from their province; and whereas many thousands of those signatures were tabled in the House of Commons last Friday, I move, seconded by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook):

That the federal government be directed to abandon immediately any plan it has to impose any form of export tax on the natural resources of British Columbia, as any such tax would violate the terms of British Columbia's entry into confederation and can only serve to fuel the flames of secession which are already burning in British Columbia.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—OPPORTUNITY OF MEMBERS TO SPEAK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the concern in this House that all members who wish will be able to speak and move substantive amendments when the constitutional resolution is reported from committee, and given the government House leader's commitment last Friday to show the same openmindedness as he demonstrated in the first stage of consideration of the constitutional resolution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House instruct the government House leader to refrain from the kind of openmindedness which would urge closure to be used after only 24 hours of debate in which more Liberal members than PCs were allowed to speak.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS FOR CHILEANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in view of the situation in Chile concerning the systematic violation of human rights, and considering the fact that Chileans in both Canada and Chile are suffering hardship because of the Canadian government's decision to stick with the previous government's order in council which exempted Chile from the list of countries whose citizens do not require a visa to enter Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the minister responsible for employment and immigration to revoke this totally inappropriate order in council so that once again Chileans can apply for refugee status.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE REFINERY TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. It has come to my attention that a high ranking government official advised the cabinet through at least one minister to implement an energy refinery tax rather than impose an energy export tax. In a highly politicized memo written by the government's communications co-ordinator, Mr. Mack Erb, to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming)—for the minister's eyes only—Mr. Erb suggests among other things:

—the export tax would negate any potential acceptance on the constitutional front—

—Marc Lalonde will have to eat crow as a result—

And he should. And:

—the Liberals must break election promises on energy matters—

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Minister of State for Multiculturalism be instructed to make a statement on motions today regarding this matter in order to shed light on this most important of issues before he embarks on any further partisan brainwashing campaigns using taxpayers' money.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

CALL FOR TABLING OF POLLS CONCERNING ATTITUDES IN WESTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to western Canadians. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) are constantly pooh-poohing western alienation and dissatisfaction. Rather than being conciliatory, their remarks are inflammatory. After all, these are the same people who made the statement that separatism is dead, just before the election of the PQ government in Quebec.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That they cease and desist fuelling the fires of western alienation with ill-conceived, provocative statements and be asked to table in the House public opinion polls commissioned by this government dealing with the perception of federal-provincial postures and attitudes by the people of western Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

SUGGESTED "AWARD" FOR CANADIANS WHO PAY NO INCOME TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the release of Statistics Canada's analysis of income tax in 1978, revealing that 2,316 Canadians earning more than $50,000 paid no income tax, and of these 96 earned more than $200,000, a fourfold increase since 1977, and in light of the statement of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that "middle and upper income groups in this country are bearing a disproportionate amount of the tax burden", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House honour those middle and upper income Canadians who have successfully avoided the payment of any tax by bestowing upon them a "Golden Loophole Award"; that those who apologize for this systematic avoidance be made honorary members of the "Golden Loophole Club"; and that the President of the Treasury Board be made the honorary chairman of the "Golden Loophole Club".

NEW YORK LUNCHEON OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on what I know the Prime Minister will consider a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is ramming through his constitutional package to suit his own personal timetable and that he used closure in order to make a luncheon date in New York, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the Prime Minister do forthwith report to this House on what must have been a luncheon of most urgent and pressing necessity.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE BUDGET

INCOME TAX—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF INDEXATION OF PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, the urgent and pressing nature of my motion under Standing Order 43 arises because of the introduction tomorrow evening of the budget and, therefore, I hope it will have the unanimous consent of this House.

As it is widely reported that the budget will be eliminating indexation as far as it affects the calculation of personal income taxes, and as this will hurt low income Canadians in

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY WHETHER SECRET CONSULTATIONS HELD WITH NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last Friday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the Minister of Finance whether a story in Friday's The Globe and Mail by Jeff Carruthers resulted from a budget leak and expressed concern that such a leak could, and I quote "have repercussions on the stock market".

Careful reading of the article shows the hon. member's real concern since it reveals that secret consultations were held between the NDP and the government regarding the budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: You are really getting desperate!

Mr. Andre: It seems that the NDP are prepared to accept Mr. Carruthers' article, at least partially.

Can the Minister of Finance indicate to the House that this new organic understanding has reached the point where there are these discussions or consultations with their new partners, albeit surreptitiously, not only on the constitution but also on the budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there was a time when I used to conduct secret consultations with members of the New Democratic Party, but I have not done that in connection with the budget. I rather regret those exchanges which were so beneficial for Parliament.

Mr. Broadbent: That was when you were progressive—six years ago.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. On Friday the Minister of Finance refused to categorically deny that there has been a budget leak when the subject was broached to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It was a very serious accusation. I do not know now if the minister has made a categorical denial or not that there had been discussions with the New Democratic Party. We certainly know that there have been some secret discussions on some very important national questions. Would he here and now categorically deny that there has been any leak or that there have been discussions with the New Democratic Party on questions of a budgetary nature?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in categorically denying that there have been discussions with the New Democratic Party or with any other group with respect to the contents of the budget, except the normal representations that are made by interested groups prior to the budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I have had no representation, except by way of radio, from the New Democratic Party as to what they would like to see in the budget.

Mr. Broadbent: It is pretty secret.

Mr. MacEachen: With respect to the alleged budget leak, it seems to me, Madam Speaker, that it is premature to characterize any statement as a leak until we see the budget. The day following the presentation of the budget the hon. member may wish to complain about the article in question or maybe he will not, but that opportunity will be available to him.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, while accepting the minister's word that he has not had these secret consultations, I would point out that he does need to have consultation in order to learn that the New Democratic Party is opposed to indexing and is in favour of de-indexing the income tax system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Does this new concurrence with the New Democratic Party mean that the minister feels that, with the support of the New Democratic Party, he now has the necessary support to go ahead with this Draconian measure which is most unfair, immoral and improper?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I believe I will have support for the budget, enough to carry it through the House without the support of the New Democratic Party.

INQUIRY RESPECTING OIL PRICING ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. In an August 2 story in the now defunct Ottawa Journal, the Minister of Finance said that a budget is virtually impossible without an oil pricing agreement. In this story the minister said he could not make up a budget without knowing how much money will be coming into the federal coffers, and that without a firm agreement on pricing he cannot be certain about federal income.

Given that no such agreement has been reached, can the minister tell the House what pricing arrangement will be incorporated in the minister's budget tomorrow night?

● (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Not yet, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, the Saskatchewan Power Corporation is presently involved in a lawsuit with TransCanada PipeLines in the Supreme Court of Canada in which the constitutionality of the Petroleum Administration Act is in question. Will the Minister of Finance give us his undertaking that this government will not use the Petroleum Administration Act to impose an oil pricing regime while the question of its legality is subjudice?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I will give the hon. member's representation careful consideration.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hard-working Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who I see is busy at his correspondence. During the campaign of recent vintage, the minister promised that the establishment of an industrial strategy would be the top economic priority of the government, no doubt a promise made just after a Goldfarb poll came in. The minister himself placed before the cabinet last summer a 71-page confidential economic strategy document, a copy of which I have here.

Mr. Nielsen: More consultations.

Mr. Andre: You are on the mailing list.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering recent statements by the Minister of State for Economic Development, who resides in the other place, have made it clear that he wants to do everything possible to emasculate an industrial strategy, would the minister tell the House whether his program has been approved yet by cabinet or whether, in contrast, the appointed senator in the other place who serves as economic development minister has won the support of cabinet?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my efforts are making very good progress in terms of cabinet consideration. I think the hon. member will see the results of this work reflected in government announcements over the coming months, and the Minister of State for Economic Development will now be happy to confirm that what he actually said in his speech is in fact quite in tune with and complementary to the efforts which I am undertaking.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I just happen to have with me a copy of what the senator said in the other place. The senator in the other place when he was speaking to a business group said the following:

> You make the major decisions . . . when the government formulates policy it is to support your enterprises.

That statement comes from the minister in the other place. The minister to whom I put the question is on record as saying that what the government needs is imaginative government leadership, a dynamic new approach promoting industrial development, led by the government. My question to the minister is simply this: I want to know whether the government is wedded to the traditional passive approach, where the government will follow the private sector, or whether it is going to adopt what the minister says is necessary, and that is a government led industrial strategy which has worked so well in other industrial countries? The government cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, this government's Speech from the Throne which opened this session of Parliament spoke of this government's efforts in the area of—and I think I can recall the exact words—a vigorous industrial policy. This is this government's commitment and this will be its achievement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the government is currently running a $17 billion deficit. It has a growth record which is the worst in 26 years. There are more than one million Canadians unemployed. The obvious requirement is a vigorous industrial strategy led by the government. Will the minister assure us this much at least: if he does not get what he promised the people of Canada in the election, he will promise once again to submit his resignation?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I will promise this: in the next election the NDP in my area and across the country will get an even sounder thrashing than it did in the last one as a result of the public belief that our efforts, our potential and our reality of achievement will be far greater than that of the NDP or any opposition party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—REFERENCE TO PROVINCIAL COURTS OF APPEAL

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): My question is addressed to the Minister of Justice, Madam Speaker. The constitutional package of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice has united the leaders of the Yes and No forces in Quebec. The Premier of Quebec, along with two other provinces, is taking the package to their courts of appeal. Will the Minister of Justice tell us whether he is prepared to wait until after these courts of appeal have decided the question? If not, and if he still considers it to be a political rather than a justice or legal matter, will he tell us in what other country of the world does a so-called justice minister consider that a matter before the courts is not a legal question?

● (1425)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, if the Parliament of Canada were to stop because any matter is before the court, we would not be able to operate. We stated a long time ago that this is a matter to be debated in the House of Commons and will be voted on in the House of Commons, and properly so. If the provinces or any citizen of Canada wants to go before the courts, we have a complete separation of the powers of legislation and the judiciary in Canada.

STATEMENT OF MR. RYAN—INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL CHANGE MIND

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

According to Le Devoir the leader of the Quebec Liberal party said during the weekend about his constitutional project that it was:

—unrealistic, unacceptable, senseless and a threat to the balance of Canadian federalism.

In view of that and since he is the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, could the Prime Minister tell us whether he will continue to react as he has up to now or whether he will perhaps change his views on the constitutional future of our country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether Mr. Ryan will change his opinions; I have no way of knowing. I think he is entitled to his own opinions and perhaps he will continue to uphold them.

PRESENTATION OF ADDRESS—INQUIRY WHETHER LEGAL OPINION OBTAINED

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question to direct to the government House leader with respect to matters raised with him last Friday. At page 4057 of Hansard, he indicated that we are dealing with a resolution respecting constitutional revision in an indirect way. Can the government House leader tell us whether he has an opinion from either the Department of Justice or the parliamentary counsel as to whether the Speakers of both Houses can properly sign on behalf of Parliament a resolution of address when Parliament will never have dealt directly with such an address? Can he inform us whether he has had an opinion from either of those sources?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if Parliament, that is the House of Commons and the Senate, were to adopt a joint address to the British parliament, if our two Houses were to send this request, I am convinced that the British parliament in London would have no alternative but to give it consideration.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I do not doubt for one moment the government House leader's conviction with respect to the law. I am specifically asking whether he has obtained an opinion from the Department of Justice or from the parliamentary counsel with respect to that. If he has not obtained an opinion, will he tell us that that is the case. If he has obtained an opinion, is he prepared to table it? In particular, if he has not, is he prepared to put the question in writing to the parliamentary counsel and table his reply in Parliament?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, our mission is to govern this country and we are doing so in accordance with our parliamentary procedure, pursuant to our Standing Orders, and we believe that what we are doing is perfectly in compliance with our Standing Orders. If my learned colleague has definite objections to raise, I will be pleased to look into them and, if necessary, submit them to legal advisers. It happens often that, while administering our procedures, we consult our officials, but we never table the opinions which we may receive on this or that issue under consideration.

As far as the current issue is concerned, we have no indication of any irregularities in the process.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has given a somewhat convoluted answer and he has not answered the question whether he has an opinion, not from the Department of Justice, I put it to him specifically, but the parliamentary counsel as to the propriety of the way in which the government is proceeding. His answer, I think, is that he has not, but he is convinced that he is right.

● (1430)

Is the President of the Privy Council prepared, as government House leader in the House of Commons, to assure us as to the correctness of the opinion and to put the question in writing to the parliamentary counsel, so that that issue can be laid to rest, given the fact that the Speakers of both Houses will have to sign what the government will see as an address but which, if it is not the form of an address, will not be an address to Her Majesty the Queen? This is a very fundamental question as to the appropriate process. Would he obtain this opinion?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as I have said, I am certain that we are proceeding in the proper way. If the hon. member has a major objection to defend, then I invite him to put it forward and we will ascertain it.

But I want to say that in this instance, as in others, we are proceeding according to the advice we have received, and that it is not our custom, every time a bill or a motion is being considered, to table all the advice given to us by our experts, whether in legal matters or in parliamentary procedure.

I therefore remind the hon. member that we are considering a proposed resolution which has been refered to a committee which is being set up. After the Senate has completed its examination, that is by December 9, the committee will report back. After December 9, the House will consider the committee report.

I repeat what I told his party leader on Friday afternoon, namely that during this third phase, the House will have the opportunity, indirectly, to propose amendments by suggesting that the report be sent back to committee. I therefore simply repeat what I told his party leader based on citation 663 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fifth edition, as well as on a quotation from the Journals of December 1, 1964, pages 941 to 947.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES TO FULFIL COMMITMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question which I should like to put to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister, I am sure, has committed to memory the statement made by his leader on February 13, 1980, when he said:

> The Canada Development Corporation, for example, should be revitalized and play in the manufacturing sectors the more positive role that Petro-Canada has played in resources.

Since that time we have seen public participation in the CDC go down from 64 per cent to under 50 per cent; we see that CDC has close to 83 per cent of all its capital invested in the resource industries and only 10 per cent in manufacturing; and we hear from the government economic minister in the other place some views which would seem to indicate, in spite of the minister's protestations, that there is likely to be a swing even further toward the private sector.

What kinds of measures does the minister propose to place before the House that will fulfil the commitment made by the Prime Minister to the people of Canada in February of this year?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance and I are currently actively working on proposals which would lead to the carrying out of that commitment. I think that before too long we will see some initiatives which will go a long way toward the objective of vigorous manufacturing activity that my hon. friend has mentioned. However, there is obviously a difference between my hon. friend and his party and those on this side, because we continue to believe that while there has to be vigorous government leadership in industrial policy, there is at the same time, a very important role for private initiative and for the private marketplace.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The minister, of course, did not answer my question.

An hon. Member: What a pinko!

Mr. Deans: However, given that it is even more difficult today to redress the problem of trying to have a handle on developing industries which want to use the CDC, let me ask the minister a question in relationship to that and to the problems of Canadian development. How would the minister propose to meet another objective stated by his leader in the same speech in February—he was speaking on behalf of the government—when he indicated he would want to expand and strengthen FIRA not weaken it, not weaken FIRA's mandate but broaden it? When can we expect to see some activity on the part of the minister and the government which would put an end to the almost carte blanche approval of applications before FIRA by foreign corporations to take over Canadian operations in Canada?

An hon. Member: Just before the next election.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, where the government, in applying the Foreign Investment Review Act, accepts applications for takeovers, I want to tell my hon. friend and this House that the obligation with respect to significant benefits to Canada is very carefully pursued and ensured. The commitments with respect to FIRA are set out in the throne speech and work is well advanced within the government with a view to having these commitments carried out. I look forward to the enthusiastic support of my hon. friends when these proposals come before the House.

SALT II TREATY—INQUIRY RESPECTING DELAY IN RATIFICATION

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it stems from the fact that this is the beginning of disarmament week in Canada. My question has to do with the strategic arms limitation treaty, commonly known as SALT II, which was signed by President Carter in June of last year but has not yet been ratified by the U.S. Congress. I should like to ask the minister whether he has made recommendations to his counterpart in the U.S. in order to register Canada's concern about the delay on the part of the U.S. Congress to ratify this document and, if not, does the minister intend to raise this matter with the new administration before the end of this year?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have discussed this matter from time to time with U.S. officials but I have not made any recent representations, nor has the government, to the U.S. government in this respect for two reasons. First of all, our position in support of SALT II is already well known; second, the support of the U.S. administration for SALT II is already well known and they are pledged to implement it as soon as they believe conditions warrant. However, I expect that I will probably be discussing the matter with the new U.S. administration, of whatever party, when that administration takes office.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

MEMO RESPECTING ENERGY POLICY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. The minister heard my motion earlier in the question period regarding a document marked "for the minister's eyes only" from his communications co-ordinator, Mr. Mack Erb, regarding changes in the government's energy policies based solely on polls and partisan politics. I should like to ask the minister, first, whether he received such a memo; second, has he read it; and third, what recommendations, if any, has he made to cabinet in this regard?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of that memo. I would appreciate it if he would like to send me a copy of it. I am not sure of the context because I did not hear the whole of his motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I would be glad to pass the memo to him which was marked for his eyes only.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: To jog his memory, Madam Speaker, I should like to quote another part of this very political document which was clearly prepared as a result of further costly government polls and questionnaires. It reads:

If the export tax could be dropped from the energy package by forgetting the western package for one year, it would be damn good politics.

I want to ask the minister how far he will allow partisan politics and advertising to proceed in an effort to distort and politicize the nation's energy policy, a policy which requires a truthful and honest approach. In other words, when will he stop exercising this partisan rip-off on the unsuspecting taxpayer?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I honestly do not believe I have seen such a memo, so I would appreciate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: Hon. members laugh; that is fine. I do not know but perhaps there are inventors on that side of the House. Perhaps in paper which has crossed my desk such a memo has come forward, but I do not recall it. I do not recall seeing it. I am trying to speak the truth in answer to the question. I reject any charge which says that the government has used any moneys to unfairly advertise any policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: I have done my best to ensure that that does not take place. I must say that I do not recall any material coming to my attention that has attempted to do that.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

PROPOSED TARGET FOR 1980-81

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. As we are now six months and more into the current fiscal year 1980-81, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate whether our total outlay expenditure level is right on target? Can he assure the House that expenditures this year will not exceed $58.4 billion, which is approximately a 10 per cent growth over last year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I suggest the hon. member for York-Peel await the statement of the Minister of Finance on the fiscal framework.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has indicated once again who actually controls expenditures in this government, namely, nobody other than the Minister of Finance.

My supplementary question concerns the number of active employees now subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. As that number has climbed to over 300,000—300,015 as of August according to his own figures—compared with 292,-

684 last April, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate whether this 7,000 escalation in the numbers is just a temporary increase, bearing in mind that up to last April when he took office there had been a steady decline in the number totally employed from June, 1979?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am sure the House would be interested to know that as a courtesy to the hon. member for York-Peel I have forwarded him monthly the information he has requested, and my covering correspondence indicates that to be used properly, the variables contributing to reported changes including any pertinent footnotes provided should be taken into account. I think he has ignored the caveat I have sent along with these reports.

However, I would like to point out, since the hon. member has raised the question, that indeed there has been an annual increase—we always look to annual increases—of approximately 1,026 permanent employees from August 31, 1979, through July 31, 1980. I assure the hon. member that I am looking into the reason for this extremely modest increase, but I suspect it is because in certain areas it is necessary for us to provide better service to the public.

THE BUDGET

INCOME TAX—REQUEST FOR DENIAL OF INTENTION TO DE-INDEX PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance and has to do with the continuing speculation that he will de-index personal income taxes in his budget, speculation which his replies earlier today continued to fuel.

Since he has not refuted this speculation and since he knows very well that de-indexing will place the heaviest burden on lower and middle-income earners and on women and single parents, will the minister take this opportunity straight-forwardly—even though it would be an eleventh hour conversion for him—to deny that he intends to go ahead with this punitive measure against Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it would be unwise at this stage to begin to divulge piece by piece what is to be in the budget or not in the budget. Therefore I suggest to the hon. member that the full and comprehensive picture will be revealed tomorrow night, and I look forward to her applause at the conclusion of my statement.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, ministers in this House would get applause if they would only answer a question now and then. The government's plan to de-index taxes has been criticized, as the minister knows, by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, by the Canadian Labour Congress, by the Auditor General, by members in this party, and I presume even by some hon. members on the minister's own back benches. Will the minister listen and pay heed to these representations before it is too late?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have listened to the views which have been expressed by hon. members opposite in the House on the question of de-indexing, the somewhat contrary views which I believe have been expressed by the New Democratic Party as well as the views expressed by widely ranging groups in the country. I have listened to all the representations and the decision will be announced tomorrow night.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEWCASTLE, N.B.—PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF PENITENTIARY

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. On Saturday I was in the city of Newcastle, New Brunswick, and was horrified to learn that the residents of this community have been waiting for several years for work to begin on a new penitentiary. During the past two election campaigns there have been two sod turnings in this area, but so far no work has actually begun.

In light of the fact that 2,500 residents recently turned out at a day of survival in Newcastle, can the minister assure this House that work is going to start on this penitentiary immediately and that the town will not have to wait for the next election before any more dirt is dug?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to inform the House that the plans for this penitentiary are still with us. There still is an intention to proceed, but there never was any firm start-up date which has been passed; the start-up date lies in the future. The commitment we have made is that that institution will be built when the inmate population proceeds to a point where it is justified.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Solicitor General. If, as the minister has apparently indicated, plans are not yet definite as to when construction will proceed, can the minister indicate why his backbencher, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, has promised this facility in no uncertain terms as being a fait accompli and why there have already been two sod-turning ceremonies as a part of that hon. member's past election campaign?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I have been in close touch with that hon. member and the statements he has made have been well justified by government policy.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY WHETHER STEPS TAKEN TO IMPROVE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As industrial productivity, which as the minister knows is production per man per hour, has increased by an average of 3.8 per cent a year ever since the end of the Second World War, and as the minister's own department now is forecasting that this year industrial productivity will decrease by nearly 2 per cent—that is the main reason why costs and selling prices have increased so much this year, which have made it more difficult for our products to sell and caused the slide further into our present recession—would the minister advise the House what steps he and his department are taking to improve productivity and stop this very serious situation from further worsening in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, improved productivity involves a co-operative effort between business and labour as well as both levels of government. We are working to have improved consultative measures in place as well as to have in place new or updated programs under my department and others to help provide the necessary assistance to enable plant and equipment to be renewed and upgraded so as to bring about the kind of productivity improvement which I am glad my hon. friend agrees has to be in place in this country.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, the minister has given a very general answer which really does not answer the question at all. Have he and his officials considered introducing productivity incentives to be paid in direct proportion to increases in productivity and in this way give industry a real and positive incentive to increase productivity and get done what has to be done in the shortest possible space of time?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we have been reviewing actively a range of possible initiatives, including some of the kind my hon. friend has talked about. However, for definite decisions and announcements I hope my hon. friend will be close at hand so that as the months go by he will find himself satisfied with the announcements and achievements which will ensue.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY RESPECTING HEAVIER PENALTIES FOR ILLEGAL POSSESSION OF DRUGS

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that an inquest into the death of a Toronto woman because of a drug overdose revealed that tighter control of dangerous drugs is necessary, and that one of the recommendations of the jury in the inquest was that penalties for obtaining a prescription for narcotic drugs from more than one physician at the same time be changed to an indictable offence from its current status as a summary conviction, can the minister assure the House that changes to the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act will be made to make it more difficult to obtain dangerous drugs and to provide stiffer penalties for those obtaining these drugs illegally?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I take note of the hon. member's recommendation. When revising the act we shall heed his representations.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE TAX-FREE BENEFITS TO WORKERS IN NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As he is aware, it has been the practice of the government with large corporations operating in the northern parts of the provinces and the territories to give incentives and benefits to their employees to attract them to work in these isolated areas. Also there is no provision in the Income Tax Act to allow for these benefits to be earned without being subject to income tax. Can the minister enlighten us today as to whether it is his intention tomorrow night to make reference to this matter in the budget? Is it his intention to bring in a bill which would make the necessary provision in the Income Tax Act to allow for these benefits to be earned by northerners without having to pay tax on them?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I understand the basis of the hon. member's representations, but at this point it is not possible to indicate what will be in the budget statement; otherwise I will be accused of leaking the budget.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, it would really require a bill. I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to introduce such a bill. Would he at least have the decency to commit himself today to saying that the remission order, in place as a result of the May election, will be extended past this tax year so that the anxiety and fear experienced by northerners in respect of this matter can be allayed; and furthermore, that the government will not profit from the high cost of living to which northerners are subjected as a result of geography and isolation?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member and I are thinking of the same provision that was made with respect to northern allowances—

Mr. Nielsen: Only until April.

Mr. MacEachen: —I can tell him that it has been announced or it is the intention of the Minister of National Revenue to announce that these remissions will be extended for another year.

PENSIONS

ALLEGED REINTRODUCTION OF MEANS TEST

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. It is becoming increasingly clear that the government, with the assistance of the New Democratic Party, is determined to bring back into Canada's social policy increased use of the means test. We may remember that the means test is a system whereby people like senior citizens who would like to receive government benefits, pensions and bus passes—

Mr. Chrétien: Order.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hawkes: —have to prove economic need. Could the minister provide the House—I suspect it might be a fiscal measure—with an estimate of how much money he intends to save in the next decade out of the pockets of senior citizens by bringing back increased use of the means test?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am surprised by the hon. member's allegation that it is our intention to bring in the means test to deprive senior citizens of current benefits. Our policy is the exact reverse, that we have applied an income test program through the guaranteed income supplement. We have increased that supplement just recently, so there is absolutely no foundation for the suggestion that we are proposing to reintroduce any form of means test which we were successful in abolishing in our social programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I guess we all have surprises from time to time. I felt the cabinet had reviewed the Constitution Act, 1980, before presenting it before the House. I think the minister might recall the details of sections 15(1) and (2) which indicate that we cannot discriminate on the basis of age, and there is an exception in the case of disadvantaged people. If the minister checks with any university professor in the business of teaching social policy—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I must give some background.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: —I think he will find that the most logical legal ruling will be that they have to provide benefits to senior citizens on the basis of a means test. Will the minister undertake to look over the situation and at some time in the next week or two provide us with an estimate of how many dollars he intends to save out of the pockets of senior citizens because of putting the Constitution Act, 1980, through closure and through the House?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I refuse to provide such an estimate because no such estimate will exist or is intended to exist.

TELEVISION

PROPOSED SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER IN SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO COST

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, and also for information and publicity. Given the fact that television time is being bought in Saskatchewan for the Prime Minister's speech apparently on Wednesday, which is the day following the budget, I wonder if the minister will tell the House who is paying for this advertising that apparently is designed to deal with the very, very delicate climate of politics in Saskatchewan now? Who is paying for this? Is it the public, the Liberal party or the government?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, if I may, I think in all fairness I must say, because there are rules of the House, and not with any incipient pomposity on my part, that I will only answer future questions which are directed to me in my responsibility as Minister of State for Multiculturalism, which is my title.

The answer to the question is that I have no knowledge of any public funds being used to purchase such a program.

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, apparently this speech is being advertised over radio and television. Has the minister hired promoters? Apparently somebody is promoting it. Who is paying for it?

Mr. Fleming: Well, I am glad the hon. member is watching television and listening to radio, but I have told him that I have no knowledge of public funds being used and I have no involvement in the purchase of such a program.

DE HAVILLAND CORPORATION—INQUIRY WHETHER HAMILTON-WENTWORTH AREA CONSIDERED FOR PROPOSED EXPANSION

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell the House if he and the board of directors of the de Havilland Corporation have seriously considered the appropriateness of the Hamilton-Wentworth area for the proposed expansion of the de Havilland facilities?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, certainly this matter remains under active consideration.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—POSSIBLE REFERENCE BACK OF JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question to that put by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton to the government House leader respecting the process being followed in the constitutional matter. Since all phases of the committee reference and report must be passed by both Houses, can the government House leader tell the House how motions to refer parts of the committee report back to the committee would be reconciled with the proceedings of the other place? Could he tell us if he has considered what the status of the report might be if one House referred the report back to committee and the other House took no action; that is, given the possiblity of referral back to a committee which goes out of existence as soon as its report is presented.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): There are many ifs in my hon. colleague's question, Madam Speaker, and instead of speculating and answering purely hypothetical questions, I think we would be much better advised to wait until we know the exact content of the report of the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. We shall then be able together to cross the bridge when we get to the river.

NATURAL GAS AND HYDROELECTRIC POWER

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petitions presented by hon. members on Friday, October 24, 1980, and finds that they meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. PARKER

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Sometimes the role of a member of Parliament is difficult and we all appreciate assistance when we can get it, and I appreciate the assistance offered during the question period by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker). But it would have been much more helpful if the hon. member, before he started his grandstanding act, had gotten his facts straight. Every statement of substance he made in putting his questions to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) was substantially wrong, and therefore he is misleading the House—inadvertently I hope.

Madam Speaker: I do not think I see a question of privilege here. Rather, it is debate. It was my duty to listen to the hon. member but I quite quickly ascertained that it was not a question of privilege.

MR. PARKER—QUESTION DIRECTED TO SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I stated that I was in Newcastle on such and such a date and we met with members of the town council, who were so concerned about the fact that these commitments were made. I reported and asked a question of the Solicitor General on that matter. They were so concerned they had a Day of Survival in that community.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member did make that point in the course of the question period. It is now obvious that his question of privilege is not a question of privilege, but a continuation of the debate. However, he made his point.

MR. MALONE—PROCEEDINGS RESPECTING S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege in order to bring to your attention one of the procedures of the House which you might take into consideration, respecting the numbers of people who were able to present motions under Standing Order 43 today. At 2.15 today there were two members of the Progressive Conservative Party trying to present a motion under Standing Order 43, and a member from the New Democratic Party.

I understand that when 2.15 is reached Your Honour has no alternative but to proceed to the oral question period. However, my concern lies with the fact that following prayers and the establishment of a quorum in the House there always appears to me to be a two, three or four-minute delay—not usually four, but very often two or three—before we start with the proceedings under Standing Order 43. I feel that today my privilege was somewhat abused because I wanted to present a motion under the Standing Order which could only be put this day, as it was a representation regarding capital gains tax and which it was important to make before the budget presentation tomorrow. Because it would affect farmers and small business people, I wanted to present that motion today. But I rise on a question of privilege simply to make representation that immediately a quorum is established in the House we should then call Standing Order 43 so that the maximum number of members can be heard on whatever motions they wish to present.

Madam Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's remarks. Today there were five members from the Conservative party who were able to present motions under Standing Order 43. Some days there is the possibility of having a few more members present motions, but this depends on the length of those motions. I usually start very close to 2.05 p.m. with motions under Standing Order 43, and the hon. member knows that our Standing Orders require me to begin question period at 2.15 sharp, which I usually do. Sometimes I go a little beyond 2.15 if a member has risen a few minutes beforehand, and let him continue. But I do have to cut the motions off at 2.15.

I am sorry the hon. member could not get his motion in today, and I hope he will be luckier another day.

MR. TAYLOR—PROCEEDINGS RESPECTING S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I was in a similar position to that of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) and noticed it was 2.08 before the motions under Standing Order 43 started today.

Madam Speaker: There is no doubt that I have to wait until the House has settled down, as the hon. member will appreciate. If members came in a little earlier and settled down, we could get started. I cannot start the proceedings under Standing Order 43 when I feel the House is too noisy, and this also applies to the galleries. We have to wait until there is a reasonable working atmosphere—if I can call it that—before starting. I agree with you, I did start a little later today, but it was not because I wanted to cut members off. It was just that the circumstances did not allow me to begin earlier. We shall try to start on the dot from now on, if members will co-operate, as I am sure they will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATISTICS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-617, to amend the Statistics Act.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am aware that the introduction is probably both the beginning and the end of this bill because of the procedural gags which are placed on private members' initiatives. Nonetheless, in the struggle to create a more open government which recognizes that public information does, indeed, belong to the public, it is also important to limit public information gathering which employs compulsive, coercive or misleading methods in acquiring that information from private citizens.

The federal government today has at its disposal the means to acquire information from its citizens in a manner that is not at all compatible with the spirit of a free and democratic society. Statistics Canada surveys have come under attack from people all across the country, for very good reasons—they constitute a blatant and legalized invasion of privacy, legal, because an individual can be fined up to $500, imprisonment for three months, or both, for refusing to answer all detailed and personal questions demanded by Statistics Canada surveys. My bill seeks to overcome this shortcoming. An amendment to the Statistics Canada Act would remove the penalty for refusing to answer all but the most fundamental questions pertaining to the household itself. With this change we can take the first steps away from government's Big Brother image by slowing the headlong rush into the dehumanizing world of information banks now being established.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

METRIC CONVERSION CANADA

Question No. 1,287—Mr. Stewart:

Did Metric Commission Canada distribute green looseleaf binders entitled "Metric Conversion Progress: U.S.A.-Canada Status Report" and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the cost of each binder (c) what is the purpose of the binder (d) what was the total cost including the report?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Metric Commission is concerned: The question is concerned with binders:

1. (a) The U.S.A.-Canada Status Report has been distributed since (1980-09-01) stapled without covers. On 1980-03-18 it was mailed along with a notice that future issues would be in looseleaf forms in a binder. Persons on the mailing list were asked if they wished to receive the binder. 1,036 recipients requested and received binders for their copies.
   (b) Each binder costs $1.41 to produce.
   (c) The purpose of the binder is to reduce the cost of updating the U.S.A.-Canada Status Report by merely replacing only those looseleaf sheets which are out of date with new ones as more up to date information becomes available.
   (d) The 1,036 binders were mailed on 1980-06-09. The cost of producing, packaging and distribution was $5,806.62.

Question No. 1,319—Mr. Robinson (Burnaby):

1. Did four persons from the Vancouver Harbours Board and the Port Authority travel to Japan in May, 1980, to discuss with a consortium of Japanese ship owners a number of issues surrounding the recent change in ownership of a terminal operation in Vancouver and, if so (a) what are the full details of the transactions that took place (b) what are their names (c) what is their position (d) what is their annual salary (e) what are the names of the persons or companies that they met with (f) what issues were discussed (g) on what dates were meetings held (h) what was the total cost of the trip (i) who or which department paid for the trip (j) who proposed the trip and who authorized it (k) for what reason were four people sent and what were their roles in the discussions?

2. On what date did the Canadian officials (a) leave for (b) return from Japan?

3. Did the Canadian officials submit a report to the minister or to the department and, if so, is the report publicly available?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. Yes, four persons from the Port Management and Port Authority travelled to Japan, Hong Kong and San Francisco.

(a) No transactions took place, discussions were held with various interested parties concerning the change in ownership of Empire Stevedoring.

(b) Mr. E. M. Strang
Mr. R. Hubber-Richard
Mr. A. A. Shaw
Mr. M. A. Mulholland

(c) Chief Executive Officer, Vancouver Port Authority
Member, Executive Committee, Vancouver Port Authority
Manager Terminal Operations, Port of Vancouver
Manager Port Trade Development, Port of Vancouver.

(d) 15,000 (honorarium)
4,500 (honorarium)
35,600—44,500
32,100—40,125

Order Paper Questions

(e) In Tokyo: Canadian Embassy, Commercial Section
Japan Shippers Council
CP Rail
Canadian National Railway
Japan Six Lines Terminal Operations Committee
In Hong Kong: Canadian High Commission, Commercial Section
Orient Overseas Container Lines
Mr. C. H. Tung
In San Francisco: Johnson Scanstar
Euro Pacific Lines Hapag Lloyd U.S.
Navigation Pacific
Neptune Orient Lines
Bakke Steamship Corporation agents for Columbus and Knutsen Lines

(f) The issues discussed were primarily to do with the change of ownership of Empire Stevedoring Company, and why more Canadian container cargo was not handled through Vancouver.

(g) Tokyo, May 19 and 20
Hong Kong, May 22, 23 and 25
San Francisco, May 27 and 28

(h) $13,700

(i) National Harbours Board Port of Vancouver.

(j) The general manager of the Port of Vancouver and the chief executive officer of the Port Authority.

(k) The discussions were at the executive level and additionally involved technical matters which required a balanced delegation. The roles of various persons in the discussions are illustrated by their functional positions within the port.

2. (a) Departure May 16.
(b) Return May 28.

3. This report is confidential as it relates to the marketing and operational plans of various companies.

MR. DE MONTIGNY MARCHAND

Question No. 1,446—Miss MacDonald:

1. (a) Prior to his appointment as associate under-secretary of state for External Affairs, what position did Mr. de Montigny Marchand hold (b) what was his salary and to whom did he report?

2. During this period, did Mr. de Montigny Marchand live in Europe and, if so, were his expenses paid by the government and what was the total amount?

3. (a) Upon completion of this assignment, did Mr. de Montigny Marchand prepare a report and, if so, to whom did he present the report (b) was the report made public (c) how long is the report?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the reply is as follows:

1. (a) Mr. Marchand was requested to do a study of Canada's relations with France and the Federal Republic of Germany. This study started on May 1, 1979 and was to last for a period of one year.

(b) Mr. Marchand belonged to the SX-4 class, the salary range of which was then $45,000 to $65,500. He reported to the Clerk of the Privy Council.

2. Mr. Marchand lived in Paris, and the government paid his expenses according to the foreign service directives, for a total amount of $50,991.89.

3. Mr. Marchand's mission was cut short by his appointment as associate under-secretary of state for External Affairs on March 25, 1980. He debriefed himself verbally through a series of meetings with senior officials, both federal and provincial, and with representatives of the private sector. Written conclusions of his study are being prepared. It has never been envisaged that these would be made public.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO SUPPORT FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry, as demonstrated

(a) by betraying the interests of Canadian fishermen in its international fisheries negotiations with the United States;

(b) by the imposition of unconscionably high interest rates and other policies which have led to instability in the fishing industry and inadequate income protection for Canadian fishermen;

(c) by its lack of action to devise and implement the long-promised revisions in policies regulating the industry; and

(d) by its lack of action to enforce existing legislation protecting our fisheries.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to be able to introduce this motion. It is an appropriate day to introduce this motion in light of the signing of a Canada-U.S. treaty on the salmon industry at Seattle, Washington, last Friday. The negotiation teams came up with a proposal which they intend to recommend to their respective governments. In view of some of the answers which I received on Friday regarding a commitment from the government to delay any official ratification of that treaty until certain stipulations are met by the United States, I think it is an appropriate discussion for today.

I share the same skepticism as many Canadians when it comes to negotiating treaties with our neighbours to the south. We only need to look at some of the current outstanding issues of concern to Canada to make us a little bit cautious about entering another agreement which may turn out as sour as the east coast fisheries treaty. I would like to refer to several of those outstanding issues, including the issue of acid rain.

This issue has been given a great deal of attention both in the House and the public sector in Canada and the United States. Certainly, environmentalists are concerned about the increase in the use of coal in the United States to generate energy because it is expected that it will increase acid rain in that country and, therefore, because of air currents flowing toward Canada, increase the incidence of acid rain in our country by 25 per cent. Because of this concern it is felt that we should talk with the United States to see if they will not reconsider and give us some assurances that that increase in coal usage will be reduced.

We are also having difficulties with the auto pact and the refusal of the United States to renegotiate that pact. As a result, it has given us a deficit position of $3 billion for last year and very little return for research and development. We need research and development in Canada to employ our technical people and our young people who are hoping to find meaningful jobs in this country.

There is also the Garrison diversion. Many of my colleagues from the prairies are still advocating and lobbying the government to see if the Americans will not curtail that project, which continues to go ahead irrespective of the very dire consequences to our Canadian fishing industry in the prairies.

Last week a delegation from British Columbia expressed its concern about the Skagit Valley. Two successive provincial governments have failed to convince the United States to curtail the flooding of that valley in B.C., which is a very important recreational facility and wildlife area for the residents of the lower mainland of Vancouver.

The east coast fisheries treaty is still in limbo. The United States negotiators and Canadian negotiators signed a treaty which took them two years to negotiate, which would give protection to the fishermen of both countries, provide some stability in the east coast industry, and a joint management program in the disputed areas around Georges Bank. The treaty took two years to negotiate and one month for Canada to approve. Canada approved the agreement in March, 1979, and, as I am sure many hon. members are aware, the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee still has not ratified that treaty. In fact that committee has told Canada bluntly that it will not be ratified without some amendments.

Canada has already made considerable sacrifices in that treaty. It is not too well known that Canadian fishermen on both the east coast and the west coast are in competition for the same fish stocks as the American fishermen. In negotiating the east coast treaty, Canada gave up a considerable amount of the scallop stocks in order to get agreement. At one time the United States caught only 10 per cent of the scallops on the east coast. After negotiations, they were able to catch up to 26 per cent of the scallop stock.

The United States has increased that quota on their own accord by increasing their fleet by 50 per cent and they are now taking 40 per cent of the scallops despite the negotiated allocation of 26 per cent. Canada agreed that we would not negotiate a boundary and that we would take the boundary dispute to arbitration and accept the award. We agreed that we would take no concessions on cod and haddock which also caused our Canadian fishermen to suffer.

We agreed not to fish herring for three years in order to allow stocks to build up. Canada wanted a permanent deal to protect its fishermen and so that they would know what kind of investment they could make in the industry and what stocks they would be able to fish. The United States agreed to a period of ten years, and Canada compromised again. We now have a situation where not even that agreement is good enough. The U.S. again wants to open negotiations after Canada has backed down in at least five very critical areas.

We relayed the attitude of a number of members in this House to the United States through an interparliamentary committee which went to Washington on July 23. At that time we were told in no uncertain terms, as we were told again last week by the Rhode Island Senator Claiborne Pell, that the Americans would not be negotiating on the issue. The representations made by all parties in this House were as equally firm for a treaty ratification by the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee.

In British Columbia we now have what could be a very important treaty for managing the stocks on the west coast to allow Canada to embark on an enhancement program on a very threatened Fraser River chinook and sockeye salmon stock. However, the New Democratic Party would like to make some comments, and caution the government before that treaty is ratified. We would like to make some suggestions which were made to the House last Friday in the form of questions.

Before the government ratifies the west coast treaty, we would like the opportunity to debate this subject in the House to determine if the treaty is indeed in the interests of Canadian west coast salmon fishermen. If one considers that in ratifying the east coast treaty it took the government only one month and that we have been waiting since March, 1979, for ratification by the U.S. Senate, we should seek the assurance, before ratification, that the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee and the U.S. Senate have indeed ratified the west coast treaty so that we are on the same ground. We did not have that on the east coast and, as a result, the fishermen there are suffering a loss of income through a loss of fish. And probably just as important, they are suffering from the long-term effects because the fishery there is being over-exploited by the U.S. fishermen, with the approval of the U.S. Senate.

This debate is equally as important today because the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) is currently on the west coast meeting with a ministerial advisory committee in an attempt to implement some changes in the west coast fishing industry. It is hoped that he will discuss significant policy decisions today and perhaps address some of the concerns that I shall outline in my remarks.

● (1520)

We are not too impressed by the way in which the minister makes decisions. We have been somewhat critical of his appointment of Dr. Peter Pearse and Mr. Doucet who are to take a cursory tour of the province and talk briefly to people in the fishing industry in order to assess—probably to assess the political climate and make political decisions, rather than the real needs of that industry. We reject the use of individuals to make policy statements that the minister and his department should make.

This is particularly critical for the fishermen and shore workers and their families in British Columbia. There has been a serious decline in salmon returns this season and they fear that the stocks are in serious jeopardy and that their livelihood will be at stake. Combined with growing fears that our herring roe fishery cannot withstand the extreme pressure exerted by the size of the fleet, this may result in a more objective examination of the west coast than has been possible in the last three years.

Hon. members will recall the television programs and news reports which showed bags of money being passed around in the fishing fleet, particularly in the herring season. This gave people in Canada the impression that west coast fishermen are wealthy and do not need government assistance, and that they were not in dire straits this year. These sensational stories are really not true; they are an aberration of the true story of fishermen and of the industry in British Columbia. There have been good years in the industry but there have also been years of suffering when the salmon do not return in the numbers that are expected.

In previous years fishermen were aware of what to expect from their fishing year. They had a respect for their fellow fishermen, the resource, and for the fisheries officers and managers, whose task was to see that enough stock escaped to spawn and return a bounty to the ocean which would be harvested again in two to five years.

The tasks for fishermen and managers, were not so complicated when fewer people were fishing and there were fewer boats. There are great pressures in the industry at the present time because of the increased number of boats involved and the types of gear involved.

Recognition of the problems occurred in the mid-1960s when it was obvious that unlimited entry into the industry was resulting in a larger fleet and increasing difficulty in managing stocks to provide an adequate harvest as well as to permit escapement.

The Davis plan for licence limitations and a "buy back" program was introduced. The objective was to limit the size of the fleet and thus provide better income to those fishermen who remained in the industry as well as ensuring ease of management for the department.

The Davis plan has not brought about the desired effects and may have, instead, caused the additional problem of overcapitalization that it hoped to prevent. By licensing the vessels instead of the fishermen, the licence has become a commodity to buy and sell, thus increasing the costs in the industry. Vessels which were unused for years became valuable and were used for licence transfers to new vessels. Several smaller vessels were often utilized to pyramid or to build larger and more efficient vessels with a higher tonnage.

Instead of alleviating the problems of management of stocks and bringing stability to the industry, it now has become evident that the licence limitation and buy back program failed. If the plan itself was not a failure, then the responsibility for failure must rest with the government responsible for its implementation. Failure to curtail the rapid proliferation of larger and more efficient vessels, particularly in the seine fleet, has now resulted in added capacity, making the task of managing the fleet through opening and closings for gear types, an almost impossible task.

The seine fleet has exploded to over 600 vessels from the 370 present in the industry in 1969, at the beginning of the Davis plan. The federal government remained silent and remains today as this fleet increases in size and as larger trollers with freezer capacity are being built.

The build up continues in the face of the Sinclair report on a licensing and fee system for British Columbia. In his report, Sinclair estimates the fleet is three or four times larger than need be, and others estimate the size to be greater than that. Why, then, have we had no action on a moratorium on new boat construction? It will take decades of determined effort in the face of many serious problems before we can hope to provide enough fish adequately to support the investment that fishermen currently have in the salmon industry.

This year's decline in salmon stocks is clear warning that decisions on a variety of matters are long overdue. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans estimate that salmon stocks are down 25 per cent to 30 per cent this year alone. That is evidence enough that our hopes for improving salmon runs through the salmonid enhancement program will be long and difficult. The combination of this year's decline with an equally discouraging ten-year decline demands immediate action to reverse this trend.

Over the last ten years there has been a decline in west coast salmon stocks of approximately 30 per cent. There is a serious problem not only with Atlantic salmon but also with Pacific salmon. That trend is worldwide, but this government must take action immediately to alleviate some of the causes.

It is not only the seine fleet that has increased pressure in the resource. Because of higher prices for salmon, and a growing recreational fishery which includes rapidly growing charter services, the limited resource is being more heavily exploited from all sectors of the industry. The federal fisheries department cannot cope with this massive ability to catch fish.

The continuous failure to limit fleet size is the single most serious factor inhibiting the effective management of the fishery.

The difficulty in reducing the fleet at this late stage has been recognized by the minister and the management advisory council which established a subcommittee on commercial catch division to investigate the fair sharing of salmon amongst gear types. The gear types concerned are seine gear, troll gear and gillnet gear which are all vying for the same salmon. They have difficulty coming to grips with the problem of allocation which, if solved, could bring some stability to the situation. The subcommittee is made up of users of all gear types and most major organizations in the industry. Its purpose was to recommend the allocation to various gear type users and report back to the advisory council.

The complexity of this issue and the controversy of base years between gear types prevented any unanimity. The interim report of May 14, 1980, remains in the present minister's hands. The decision on allocation clearly lies in the domain of the minister and his department who must be made to offer some understanding to each gear type and determine what their quota or allocation should be.

Although the report states that catch allocation is not the panacea for all the industry's ills, it is considered as one means of ensuring the survival of each section of the salmon fleet, consistent with the historical catch performance of each section.

I detect a feeling, both in the fishing industry and in the department, that this year's poor season may offer the opportunity to reduce the fleet size.

I am certain those of us representing west coast constituencies have received phone calls, or letters, outlining the financial plight of individual fishermen and the strain this is putting on their families. They have been faced with a disastrous fishing season as a result of not only poor runs of salmon but several other factors which simply compounded poor fishing.

Costs of fuel and equipment have increased 25 per cent to 30 per cent making operating costs that much greater. Prices paid for salmon by the buyers have been reduced 10 per cent to 20 per cent on average and as much as 50 per cent in specific cases. This may be as a result of a surplus of sockeye in Alaska's Bristol Bay but may also be as a result of the growing concentration of buying power by B.C. Packers, who purchased the major properties of its largest competitor, Canadian Fish Co., last spring. B.C. Packers is not in a position to regulate prices paid to those fishermen. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should be concerned about the centralization of ownership and plant capacity and its effect on west coast fish prices, both to the fishermen and to consumers, and on the employment opportunities in coastal British Columbia.

Centralization of processing has destroyed some of our smaller coastal communities, causing fishermen and their families to move to larger centres to seek jobs in an industry that they understand. This has had a disastrous effect on some of the coastal communities that have a long history in the fishing industry. We would ask the minister to address that problem, not only for the native people who are dependent on fisheries but others who have enjoyed the coastal community life.

Fishermen facing foreclosure on mortgages on their vessels are seeking assistance from the federal government. Their appeals to the fisheries improvement loans fund for new terms of payment are up 30 per cent to 40 per cent over last year already. That figure can be expected to climb as the fishing season comes to a close and more fishermen seek a way of retaining their vessels and remaining in their chosen profession.

When the minister answered my inquiries in the House on October 8 about financial aid to fishermen, he commented that I was slightly exaggerating the problems and that the department was monitoring the situation with the fishing industry. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) had also mentioned the financial difficulties of native fishermen and, indeed, his monitoring device, which consisted of a questionnaire, determined serious problems which resulted in the establishment of $4.2 million aid program to maintain the native fishery at its present state.

I would again request the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to re-evalute the state of the fishing industry and the financial condition of the many fishermen in the industry today.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans must know from the demands on its Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, their own catch statistics, and from the decision of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that serious financial conditions exist for many fishermen to recoup their losses in the next fishing season.

I am fully aware that many fishermen do not want the government subsidizing their industry through an aid program that would take the form of loan guarantees, or a moratorium on interest payments. My party and I are of the opinion that the B.C. salmon industry should not require subsidization, considering the value of the resource. However, the problems of the fisherman are not entirely of his or her own making. The federal government has allowed the fleet to expand, complicating good management procedures. It has let interest rates reach unconscionably high levels, and it has failed to protect the habitat, further leading to declining fish stocks.

We unalterably reject any callous attitude that may exist in the fishing community or in the department which sees the bankruptcy of individual fishermen as a way to fleet reduction. We also view another buy-back plan suspiciously. Considering the value of the newer vessels in the seine fleet, any significant reduction of the fleet would be extremely expensive and would primarily benefit the financial institutions which currently hold mortgages on those expensive vessels.

While the Davis plan failed and the catching capacity expanded rapidly, the department's ability to increase management, research, and enforcement skills, remained virtually stagnant. Government restraint has led to a situation of crisis management leading to understandably conservative estimates of permissible catch, of fleet manipulation, particularly in the herring season; projected openings, then a withdrawal of the opening; openings when few fish were available, and even fewer openings, further reducing the income of many of the fishermen on the west coast.

The New Democratic Party calls for greater research staff and enforcement staff. These calls have been partially answered. However, what we have is far from adequate to meet the challenges facing the fishing industry. Research is virtually all directed to the management program because of the critical state of the salmon and herring industry. Long term and innovative research has been put aside delaying longer-term understanding of this important renewable resource.

The support and enthusiasm which met the announcement in 1977 that the B.C. and the federal government were embarking on a $150 million salmonid enhancement program is now fading. It is fading this year particularly because of low salmon returns, but also because of the growing awareness that our laws really are not working to protect our valuable estuaries, our rivers, streams and lakes from pollutants. Just as Ontario and the Atlantic provinces see acid rain, industrial and municipal pollution destroying valuable recreational water resources, so do people in British Columbia see their efforts in salmon enhancement cancelled by destructive logging operations, hydroelectric dams, municipal and industrial wastes.

We share the enthusiasm for the salmon enhancement program and its particular role in the future for our remote coastal communities and the possibilities it could provide for economic development for our native people seeking economic and employment opportunities for their people. We feel the futility of spending sums of money on enhancement when we see the same governments neglecting to prevent further habitat destruction and fish loss.

The case of the Fraser River should amply illustrate our concerns and our demands that government take seriously the provisions of the Fisheries Act to prosecute violators leading to the degradation of our fishery habitat. The Fraser River coalition, which is an amalgamation of fishermen, environmental groups and community groups concerned about the health of the Fraser River, met with our B.C. federal caucus in Port Coquitlam a week ago Saturday and gave us an excellent slide presentation of the kind of abuse to which we are putting our most valuable salmon producing river. The Fraser River, which is responsible for up to 50 per cent of the salmon catch in British Columbia, and contributes approximately $100 million to the B.C. economy, is under attack from many quarters. The slide presentation pointed out the kinds of abuses that we, as a society, continue to inflict upon our rivers across Canada.

The Fraser River, aside from being a salmon producing river, unfortunately also happens to be a major transportation route for freighters, tugs, barges and log booms. It supplies water and power along its length. It serves as an industrial and municipal sewer practically from its headwaters to the Fraser River delta. The presentation to the caucus leaves one bewildered at the flagrant disregard for the quality of water in our most important fish producing river. We know from the coalition reports that in the lower Fraser River alone there are five forest product mills whose effluent escapes into the Fraser River along with wood fibre and assorted toxic chemicals. There are eight metal industries on the lower Fraser which discharge heavy metals and tons and tons of iron lead and zinc annually into the Fraser River and its estuary. We have at least ten concrete plants which dump waste concrete illegally from time to time along with another toxic chemical, calcium hydroxide, which again affects salmon and its feeding sources.

There are chemical plants which contribute to further pollution in the lower Fraser River. We have at least 20 landfill sites along the Fraser River with leachates, including wood wastes, gyproc dumping, sand fill dumping, auto dumping, and other leachates too numerous to be identified and certainly too numerous to have been detected or any charges laid. There are storm sewers up and down the lower Fraser River resulting in untold chemicals entering the river at that stage. Dredging is carried on. There are dams present. Proposed dyking will change the flow of the river. This will lead to degradation of the salmon habitat. Probably the major cause of pollution in the lower Fraser River is the sewage treatment plants. These are plants which have only primary sewage treatment and again release hundreds of thousands of gallons of chlorine and other toxic chemicals into the Fraser River.

A statement by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has indicated that the Fraser River estuary is down to 30 per cent and, if there is any further loss, there will be no environment left. There will not be any environment if we allow further dredging and industrial development along these river banks. The Fraser River is dying a slow death, as reported in The Fishermen paper in Vancouver. While we spend hundreds of thousands, and indeed, millions of dollars on the salmon enhancement program we allow the Fraser River, which produces those salmon, to be killed by industrial and municipal pollution.

The delta where these wastes are going to end up is where the young salmon become acclimatized to the salt water, feeding in the salt marshes along the sides of the river. This place in all of British Columbia is where it is seen fit to use a river as a major sewer. The residents of the Fraser Valley have been lobbying governments for years and years to no avail.

The record of the government with regard to salmon protection is dismal. The salmon enhancement program has been sold to the people of British Columbia and they have accepted it as a necessary item. We are requesting the government to take action to solve the problems within the fishing industry. Indeed, we are expecting a decision on the east and west coasts licensing problems, the allocation decision on the fleet in British Columbia, a greater contribution to research and enforcement in the fishing industry of British Columbia, and expecting them to implement—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Miller: I thank hon. members. I will not be very long. Decisions have been delayed for three years while we have gone through election after election. Decisions must be made in order to save the salmon resource in British Columbia. They must also be made to save salmon streams, trout streams, and the environment right across this land. We expect the government to act immediately on these recommendations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What do you know about fish?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, this early skepticism from the other side will soon be felled. They forget too soon my year and a half as the parliamentary secretary.

I rise to speak to this motion on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc). He regrets he is not able to participate in this debate, but he does not apologize. Today and tomorrow the minister is in the home province of the previous speaker and mover of this motion, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller), meeting with regional fisheries officials, members of his advisory committee, and the salmonid enhancement board.

The minister does not apologize for his absence from this chamber because he not only advised the mover of this motion of his plans to travel to British Columbia, he sought his views, and those of all members of Parliament from that province, on measures that should be taken to alleviate some of the problems currently facing the west coast fishing industry. Indeed, the minister was grateful to have received valuable input from the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni and, despite the incongruity of the motion before us, has asked me to thank the hon. member for his contribution.

The minister originally planned to be in British Columbia last week. However, pressing business in this House kept him, and virtually all other members, in Ottawa. It seemed logical, and indeed fair to those who were expecting to meet with him, for the minister to reschedule his trip as quickly as possible. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni, however, was not prepared to await the outcome of that visit before condemning this government for what he calls "its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry". I suggest he should have exercised a little patience.

Personally, I am honoured to speak on the minister's behalf. I may represent a Toronto riding, but you do not have to live next door to the ocean to appreciate the value of the fishing industry to this nation's economy, or to be aware of the sense of well being and security its success over the past number of years has brought to so many Canadians on the east and west coasts. In fact, I have had the privilege of serving as parliamentary secretary to the minister. This experience afforded me the opportunity of learning about Canada's fishing industry and to work with the minister and departmental officials. I learned of the long, often turbulent, history of the Canadian fishery and witnessed the dedication and commitment of the minister and his officials.

We on this side of the House welcome this debate and the opportunity it affords us to put a number of facts on the record. We are proud of the recent growth of the Canadian fishing industry and believe that growth has been partly due to the policies and commitment of this government.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that an added benefit of the minister's long-standing commitment to visit British Columbia and his inability to be in the House today, is that it allows me, on behalf of my party, to salute him for his unfaltering support for, and belief in, Canadian fishermen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: Since taking on the awesome portfolio in 1974, the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent has worked selflessly, indeed sometimes stubbornly, in the interests of Canadian fishermen. I say fishermen intentionally, for the minister recognized from his earliest days in that portfolio and consequently educated the rest of us to the fact that his prime responsibility was to the men and women who make their living from the resources of our oceans.

He has been relentless in his efforts to encourage fishermen to organize and achieve a strong voice in the management of their own affairs. His goal has been to ensure the industry can provide its participants with a respectable living and security, and to guarantee that never again would being a fisherman be considered a second-class occupation. I suggest that the vision and commitment of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has gone a long way in the revitalization of the Canadian fishing industry and the pride now so evident in its participants.

Perhaps the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni is too young to remember the state of the Canadian fishery in the early 1970s. Let me remind him. It was in a state of disaster. The industry was in such bad shape that many thought it could not recover. Indeed, over a three-year period it took the injection of $130 million by the people of Canada to keep the fishery from irrevocable collapse.

Prior to the declaration of the 200-mile zone in 1977, the problem was simple. There were not enough fish. That challenge was met and stocks were allowed to rebuild. This was achieved through strict management measures introduced by the government, such as annual fishing plans. These plans, which are still in effect today, are established on the basis of scientific advice provided by government biologists and take into account the limits of catch required to ensure health of the stocks. Further, once the total allowable catch, or TAC, is established, hard, sometimes painful decisions have to be made as to which sector of the industry will be allowed to prosecute a particular fishery. The industry survived the crisis. And I suggest that the record performance this year in landings, value and exports does not reflect a government that has failed to support the Canadian fishing industry.

I do not wish to pretend there are no longer problems, Mr. Speaker. There are. But I also know that this government is not waiting for another crisis to respond. Solutions are being found and the government is working closely with all segments of the industry to ensure that the action taken is reasonable, equitable and successful.

A recent, striking example of this co-operative approach to fisheries management was the three-day Gulf Groundfish Seminar held in New Brunswick in late September. This government-industry seminar brought together more than 100 representatives of fishermen's organizations, processors, and federal and provincial government officials. The object was to review the whole question of groundfish stocks in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and to address the many issues involved in the management and sharing of these stocks.

During the course of the seminar, the minister announced the creation of a separate gulf region. This decision is now being implemented. Critics who try to make a case that the government is not taking action in support of the Canadian fishing industry have either chosen to ignore, or are not listening to, the facts. Have they, for example, followed the progress being made in the revamping of the licensing system of the east coast fishery? May I also remind critics who argue that the Department of Fisheries acts arbitrarily in such matters, that the development of a new licensing scheme involved consultation with a vast cross-section of the industry. In fact representatives of more than 25,000 fishermen and other segments of the industry have participated in the process.

The nature of the new licensing régime is to give fishermen a more direct voice in the management of their industry. Indeed, the changes to the old system are ones put forward by fishermen themselves.

The first step in the new licensing régime will be the categorization of personal fishing licences to reflect full-time and part-time fishermen. As well, local licensing allocation and appeal committees will be created, headed by people who are not members of the federal bureaucracy, and a majority of whose members will be fishermen.

The intention is to implement these two key recommendations early in 1981, with other revisions to the existing licensing system to be adopted subsequently over a phased period.

I referred earlier to the basic problem of the fishery in the early 1970s as being too few fish. I repeat that tremendous progress has been made in rebuilding stocks and, in fact, the limit has been reached in that effort for most stocks. For example, between 1974 and 1979, the catch of Atlantic groundfish increased from 418,000 tons to 686,000 tons, or by 64 per cent. That rate of increase will not continue. Groundfish stocks have generally met the prediction made in 1975 that it would take five years for them to rebuild. With the exception of northern cod, no more than 10 per cent to 15 per cent increases in volume can be expected in the future.

Therefore, the focus of the industry must shift from volume of fish to a concentration of measures to enhance the value of available catch. In this effort, quality of product and orderly marketing go hand in hand.

Here again the government is offering support and guidance, as well as the occasional prod, to the industry. Canadian fish must become known in the international marketplace as the best possible product, and we must produce what the marketplace is looking for. Only when these two criteria are met, can Canadian fish command the best possible price around the world.

In terms of the value of our fish products, Canada is now the largest exporter of fish in the world. In 1979, for example, we earned approximately $1.3 billion from exports of fish and seafood. But, we cannot rest on our laurels. We are a leader today in exports, but to stay there will require concentrated effort on the part of all segments of the industry. The Canadian name on a fish product must be synonymous with top quality, for it is consistent top quality that translates into top prices.

The government has a substantial history of involvement in programs to upgrade the quality of standards of Canadian fish. A comprehensive national fish inspection program aimed at ensuring the health and safety of the consumer, adherence to minimum quality standards, and the prevention of fraudulent practices, has been in effect for many years. As well, the department has provided financial assistance for improved handling and storage facilities, and has implemented assistance programs to provide increased icemaking and cold-storage facilities. For the inshore fishery, improved equipment for on-board handling, offloading, dockside handling and transporting of fish to processing plants have also been provided. Throughout all these programs, the industry has been co-operative and innovative in its efforts to produce a top quality product.

But, all that said and done, the government is now in the process of enhancing its support of programs geared at ensuring consistent quality of Canadian fish. In consultation with fishermen's organizations, processors and provincial governments, the department has established guidelines for quality upgrading initiatives, and has now embarked on a major quality program.

The program is geared to assisting the industry in meeting the greatest challenge before it—achieving and maintaining the best possible product to compete in increasingly competitive markets. Again, bearing in mind that the size of future catches will not be a great deal larger than the levels we have now reached, it is not an easy challenge, for fish is among the most highly perishable of all foods, and spoilage begins the moment it is taken by fishing gear. To minimize the effect of the spoilage process, vessels must be equipped to ensure the fish is handled carefully and quickly. The fish must be protected from weather and contamination and properly stowed and chilled in clean pens, boxes, or other suitable containers.

To this end, existing regulations will be amended to require all vessels to use such facilities. It is hoped certification of vessels over 100 feet can begin this year, with all vessels being certified through a phased program over the next couple of years.

In conjunction with certification, there will be a program of measures designed to encourage good handling practices on board fishing vessels. By basing landed quality grades on on-board handling practices, the government hopes to see an increase in such quality-oriented procedures as on-board bleeding, gutting and icing of fish. As well, storage of fish on board should be at a depth of no more than 90 centimetres, that is three feet, below deck, and the use of forks and pumps for handling fish will be discouraged.

In consultation with fishermen and buyers, the department is also developing quality grades as a basis upon which prices can be related to quality. Grades will be regulated initially on a voluntary basis, and industry graders who apply them will be licensed by the government. Discussions are continuing on this proposal and involve and seek the co-operation of fishermen, buyer's representatives and provincial governments to ensure consistency and uniformity in the application of standards.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Fleming: Certainly not the hon. member opposite.

Another measure in the effort to ensure top quality will be the amendment of existing regulations to prohibit the use of forks for unloading, and to control the use of pumps and other unloading equipment which may damage the edible portion of fish. The regulations will require the upgrading of equipment used at landing sites and the icing or chilling of fish while held at dockside.

While existing transportation requirements with regard to sanitation and chilling are adequate, additional provisions regarding depth of bulk storage and dividers in trucks are needed to further protect quality. Again, extensive consultation with the industry will continue prior to the implementation of any new measures.

The provision of an approved water supply at all unloading ports remains a particularly difficult problem requiring either installation of water systems or modification of existing unloading practices where acceptable water cannot be made available. This problem will be dealt with on a port-by-port basis, with the objective of having fully approved water supplies or modified unloading systems in each port by 1985. In the meantime, an interim standard will be applied to ensure the quality and safety of fish products.

Another step in the process toward achieving the best possible quality for Canadian fish products is the development by the Fisheries Council of Canada, in consultation with the department, of guidelines for good manufacturing practices. As well, at the request of the Fisheries Council, the department is drafting final product grade standards for groundfish fillets, including fillet blocks, frozen herring fillets, and cured herring products.

These forward-thinking measures, Mr. Speaker, are not the product of a government lacking in support of the Canadian fishing industry. They, and others to be enunciated by my colleagues who are also participating in this debate, represent positive action on the part of a government which believes in the vitality and viability of the industry and which, through extensive consultation, believes in developing policy in conjunction with the industry.

The government is proud of those Canadians who participate in this nation's fishing industry and it will continue to work with them and for them in support of their efforts.

I am sure other hon. members look forward, as I do, to hearing not only from a number of hon. members on this side of the House on the great progress made in the Canadian fishing industry, due in good part to the support of the federal government, but also to my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont, the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson) and former minister of fisheries in Prince Edward Island.

● (1600)

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to address myself to the New Democratic Party motion which condemns the government for its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry. The New Democratic Party must have looked long and hard to find an issue on which to condemn the government, yet it found one, the fishing industry. When it comes to managing the fishing industry the record of the Liberal government has been so poor that even the NDP cannot go to bed with the Liberals with regard to this part of our economy.

Last week when the NDP chose, with the Liberals, to handcuff this House by way of ending debate on something as important as our constitution, I thought this House would have to make provision for putting 31 more members on the government side of the House. I say 31, because only one member of the New Democratic Party gave serious thought to what was being done to this House. My friend and colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), put it correctly when he said that the NDP sold its soul for some potash.

Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would like to call the attention of the hon. member to the motion before the House, and the question of relevance is involved at this point.

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, the fishing industry is being managed so poorly by the federal government that if it were not dragging so many people down to subsistence living, it would be a joke. However, the fishermen of Canada do not refer to the fishing industry as a joke. It is deadly serious.

By its lack of action this government has allowed the controversy between Canada and the United States regarding the east coast fishing treaty to go on far too long. This treaty is of the utmost importance to our Canadian fishermen, and this government has been dragging its heels. It is allowing a small number of U.S. senators who are members of the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee to block ratification of the treaty which was negotiated in good faith by both countries. I am sure that the majority of American people do not realize that this issue is a source of strained relations between our two countries.

The Liberal government failed to take advantage of the good feelings which were evident earlier this year. Our Secretary of State of External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) who, incidentally, is the first external affairs minister to be relegated to the second row, speaks of the inadequacies of the American political system. The issue in this matter should not be the deficiencies in the American system of government. Rather, it should be the ratification of the treaty. We, as Canadians, cannot expect to change their system, so we should be attempting to work with it. Our government should be appealing to all members of the U.S. Senate and pointing out to all senators that non-ratification of this treaty is severely straining relations between us.

Added to the problem is our government's attitude toward the United States. This treaty was negotiated to set up a system of co-management of the fishery for the conservation of the stocks. When it appeared that ratification of this treaty may be in jeopardy, our Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) decreed that the Canadian effort would be allowed to increase. This action was taken, supposedly, to show that Canadians will not allow themselves to be pushed around and that we must protect our claims to the fishery.

My concern with this action is that perhaps our goal of conserving our fish stocks for the future may be abandoned. When the treaty was negotiated I am sure that one major consideration in the negotiations was to allow the fishermen to take a maximum amount of fish while maintaining that future stocks will exist. If Canada steps up its effort in the fishery and the Americans retaliate by stepping up their effort, we may find that the only losers in this approach will be the fishermen themselves. If there is too much effort on the resource, the stocks may not exist as required in future years. I plead with the government to proceed carefully because there are literally thousands of people who depend on those stocks to make their living.

Canada should be making this issue of a settled treaty more of a priority. This government appears not to be treating this with the importance it deserves. The fishing community in Canada needs this issue resolved. Any fisherman in Canada today can tell us that fishermen have not been spared by inflation. While operating expenses such as the cost of gear, fuel and maintenance have risen substantially over the years, the fisherman's income has risen much more slowly.

The fishing industry has changed so dramatically over the years that a good fisherman must also be a shrewd businessman. It is not uncommon for a fisherman to have invested $250,000 so that he can work to make $10,000. A vessel which ten years ago cost $20,000 now costs upwards of $100,000. One of the purposes of passing Bill C-28 was to allow the government to guarantee loans of up to $150,000 when, prior to that, the government guaranteed only $75,000 under the fishing vessel assistance program. During debate on this bill the minister indicated that fishermen historically have been good risks, and he felt that Parliament should pass Bill C-28 because fishermen will continue to be good risks. I agree with the minister, but he is making it more and more difficult for the fisherman to maintain his good reputation.

A fisherman who negotiates a loan does so at a rate which is 1 per cent over prime. Unfortunately the rate of interest the fisherman pays changes every month as interest rates change. We all know that the policy of this government has not been to bring interest rates down but, rather, to allow them to rise steadily. The fisherman, after negotiating a loan, does not know how much he will have to pay back.

When the standing committee was studying Bill C-28 I attempted to introduce an amendment which would set the rate of interest charged to a fisherman at the time a loan is negotiated. This set rate of interest would allow the fisherman to know just how much interest he would have to pay. That way the fisherman would be able to determine if indeed he was going to be a good risk. It is unfortunate that a fisherman may become a bad risk because interest rates skyrocket. He may be put into a position where, through no fault of his own, he cannot meet his obligation. The amendment was not accepted, and the fisherman must continue to take his chances. The amendment was not put through because the government did not want it. Because the government could find a technicality, the amendment was ruled out of order. Once again the federal government missed an opportunity to assist the fisherman in a real way. That was unfortunate for the fisherman.

The most important reason for condemning the government for failing to support the Canadian fishing industry is that the minister consistently fails to create his long-promised revisions in policies. Rather than making decisions, the minister appears to be more comfortable sitting on the fence, and when he makes one of his rare decisions he fails to consult all sectors of the fishing industry.

When our government was in power, the minister's predecessor, my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, initiated a full-scale review of fisheries policy. The policy review, which was to be presented in April of this year in the form of a white paper, was entitled "A Fisheries Policy for the Eighties". This review included input from all sectors of the industry including fishermen, processors, unions, provincial governments and the federal government.

In addition, our government defined a licensing policy regarding freezer-trawlers and factory freezer-trawlers, and I challenge the present government to define its policy regarding this issue. I am sure it cannot because it appears that it has no policy at all on this matter.

Our government proposed that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry review and study the findings of the Levelton report on the east coast and the Sinclair report on the west. We in the standing committee are still awaiting these reports under the present minister.

• (1610)

Salmon stocks have long been a problem on the east coast. Our government created a new policy for Atlantic salmon and established the Atlantic Salmon Board. Has the present minister utilized the salmon board? If so, it has been very quietly. Our government negotiated a new international convention protecting Canada's rights on the high seas. These negotiations appear to have been delayed by the new administration. Our government proposed that a new DFO region be created in the maritimes. In July I was told by the minister that he had no plans to create a new region. This fall he announced that a new gulf region will be set up. I wish he would make up his mind. Our government defined a clear policy regarding over-the-side sales which met with the approval of fishermen and processors alike. The present minister changed that policy and was faced with opposition from the three maritime provincial fisheries ministers. Our government reopened the sword fishery in Canada. The present fisheries minister could not make that decision.

Our government inherited a woefully inadequate small craft harbours budget, and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) proposed in the December budget that an additional $14 million should go to small craft harbours to help make up the serious need for harbour and wharf improvements in Atlantic Canada. Our government instituted a comprehensive review of unemployment insurance for fishermen. The fishermen are still awaiting much needed changes in the UIC program.

Our government established a ministerial advisory council on the west coast with the intention of establishing one on the east coast. Just last Friday in the standing committee the deputy minister reported that the minister felt he was not committed to creating one on the east coast. The list of our accomplishments and initiatives in just nine short months goes on and on. We are still awaiting these major decisions by the present minister who has been back in power almost nine months.

The most notable difference between our government and the new government is that we chose to consult with our provincial counterparts concerning major issues in the fishing industry. In speaking with a number of provincial ministers over the last few months, it appears that the new form of federal-provincial consultation means the federal fisheries department phoning the provincial fisheries departments and informing them of the federal decision. Webster will have to amend his definition of "consultation". I should like to inform the House of the dreadful ways in which the Liberal government is managing our fishery.

Just recently the minister announced an allocation of 17,000 metric tons of squid to the Japanese. This is at a time when the world market for squid is facing a glutted situation and our fishermen are getting only five cents per pound. So, we give 17,000 metric tons of squid to the Japanese. What do we get in return? Last Friday in the standing committee I directed this question to the deputy minister responsible for the east. He replied that at the moment we have not received anything. It is just another indication of us giving and not getting. In his remarks Mr. Miller indicated that they needed more staff for fisheries protection officers.

Since there was insufficient money in the budget, just recently on the east coast vehicles and vessels were tied up or grounded because there was no money for gas. I say we need more money in the budget. Possibly we need more staff, but definitely we need more money in the budget for fisheries protection officers. When we talk about more money for fisheries protection, the minister refers to needed cutbacks, but at the same time the present government spends $30 million on advertising its own constitutional package.

Another issue about which I should like to talk is the Makivik Corporation which is owned by Eskimos in the north. It shows up the total inadequate licensing policy of the present minister and government. In 1979 the Makivik Corporation was given a temporary permit for exploratory fishing in the Ungava Bay. They were told verbally, although it was denied later, that they had exclusive rights in the zone, provided they gave the data they were compiling to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I have a copy of the telex sent to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans dated October 17 from which I should like to quote. It refers to the Makivik Corporation fishing in Ungava Bay and reads in part as follows:

> During our operations two weeks ago in Ungava Bay, another of the northern shrimp producing vessels, the MV Pandalus of northeastern New Brunswick turned up next to our vessel and began to fish in the areas of stock concentration we were studying.

They complained to the Department of Fisheries in Halifax and were informed that the Pandalus was fishing without a permit. Also they were informed that the department was ordering the Pandalus to leave that area immediately. The Pandalus ignored that directive. It is hard for me to accept why a law-abiding citizen or corporation would completely ignore a directive from the fisheries department, unless they had prior consultation with the department or the minister and were told that it was okay to fish in that area. Over the weekend by a telephone call to the minister in Ottawa, over the heads of the department in Halifax, they received the permit. I checked into the port from which the Pandalus sailed and it seems it comes out of Caraquet, New Brunswick, which is in the riding of Mr. Herb Breau.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that references to other hon. members in this place is usually by constituency, not by name.

Mr. Gass: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Pandalus received the permit to stay in the area and fish.

The matter which strikes me as being more serious than that is that five more vessels were given permits to fish in that area. After only one year of information and data being compiled by the Makivik Corporation, and over a weekend six more licences being given, it seems to me it is a very poor method of licensing the fishing industry of Atlantic Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I will direct the main body of my comments to two particular issues. One is the Amax Corporation, which is the Alice Arm dumping station, and the other is the Kemano completion. These two issues have a very real impact upon the fishing industry in that they relate to a reduction in salmon spawning and rearing grounds, and, combined with pollution, they are two of the most pressing and serious problems facing the fishing industry in Canada today.

I think it is important all members of the House, particularly those members on the government side, keep in mind what is happening to the Canadian environment in relation to the serious threat posed by acid rain to 20,000 lakes in Ontario and Quebec, the very serious pollution in the Great Lakes and most of the rivers in Canada, and the fact that unless we have some very serious moves in terms of environmental protection, not only in our rivers and lakes but in our near-shore marine areas in the oceans in the maritimes, British Columbia and the Arctic, very soon we will not have a fishing industry on which to stand and debate in the House.

This is not to underplay the serious economic problems which face the industry from overcapitalization, high interest rates and so on, but stock reductions throughout Canada from inadequate environmental and habitat protection are at the core of the disaster facing our fishing industry today. The pollution of our inland waters, the Great Lakes, the maritimes, the Arctic and the Pacific coast, along with the litany of developments ranging from Riley Creek in British Columbia to mercury pollution in the Wabigoon and English River system are signals that the fishery in Canada does not have or use the mandate given to it by the public interest.

Let me first deal with Amax, the Alice Arm situation in British Columbia, which I have raised in this House on a number of occasions in the past year. It relates to a special dumping permit, SOR-79-345, which was brought in April 10, 1979, in mid-election, as a result of a backroom cabinet deal between the Liberal party and the Amax Corporation. This permit allows the direct dumping of 100 million metric tons of effluent into Alice Arm, which is an area of substantial importance to the commercial and native fisheries on the northern B.C. coast. Some of the effluent is composed of arsenic, copper, lead, nickel, zinc, radium-226 and cadmium. I intend to deal in some detail this afternoon with one of those elements.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Department of the Environment, I would point out, have investigated the possibility of on-land tailings disposal and have found it not only feasible but have found that only a 2 per cent difference in return on investment is required to have a relatively benign environmental on-land tailings disposal. The difference, I would point out to hon. members, is $29 million for on-land tailings versus $6 million for direct dumping into the ocean.

I think it is important that all members keep in mind that what the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has decided is adequate for an acute lethality test is to place a number of rainbow trout fingerlings into a tank, run some effluent into it, and if not more than half the fish die within 96 hours, then the bioassay sample passes. I think that is a very questionable way of testing the impact on a commercial or a food fishery resource.

I would like to place on record today some excerpts from the Environmental Health Committee of the British Columbia Medical Association on just one of the elements of this 100 million metric tons federal government dumping. The radium-226 summary says:

—about 1 millionth of a gram (1 microgram-Mg) or 35 billionths of an ounce in the body, can cause bone cancer

—radium leaches into the environment much more readily after the ore is ground up than when it is embedded in solid rock. It is fairly mobile in the environment —chemicals used in the milling process may further increase the leachability of radium-226

—radium-226 is concentrated in the food chain Cancer Causing Dose

—radium-226 is the second most toxic radioactive bone cancer producing substance after radioactive plutonium-239. It is between 10-100 times more carcinogenic than radioactive strontium-90.

—the lowest dose of radium-226 that has been found to cause bone cancer in man is 1.2 micro curies which is equivalent to 1.2 micrograms or 1.2 millionths of a curie or gram.

The summary goes on to refer to "Biological Pathways and Food Chain Concentration", which is crucial—and it is unfortunate the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) is not here today. However, I am sure that members over on that side of the House will transmit this information back to him, which relates to a dumping permit he granted in a backroom cabinet deal with this corporation.

The summary goes on:

A great variety of oceanic organisms accumulate radium far in excess of that present in sea water. Some marine micro-organisms (example diatoms) concentrate radium-226 from 1,000 to 3,000 times seawater levels.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is only requiring that the actual level in the sea water be monitored.

There is a great deal of research needed to demonstrate the mechanisms by which radium is concentrated as it goes up the food chain from increased water levels to aquatic plants, phytoplankton and diatoms, to fish and then to animals and man; or from increased water levels to terrestial plants, then animals and man.

I point out to members opposite that these are questions which have really not been looked into at all by the government in giving out this very unusual permit. As a matter of fact it is the only one of its kind to be granted to a mining corporation in Canada.

I will read from one of the documents upon which the cabinet based its decision. Under the heading, "Existing Regulatory Requirements under the Fisheries Act", it says:

These regulations, which were promulgated in February, 1977, prohibit the deposit of effluents (including tailings) with a suspended solids level greater than 25 ppm.

I would point out that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in his recommendation last year to the cabinet put in 400,000 parts per million in this special dumping permit. The document continues:

Therefore, if the marine disposal option is to be authorized pursuant to the Fisheries Act, a special, site-specific regulation for this operation would have to be developed and passed by the governor in council upon recommendation of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The Department of the Environment and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are, in general, opposed to the unconfined disposal of tailings. However, the policy of the departments has been to acknowledge that the practice can be authorized under special extenuating circumstances.

The most recent departmental position with regard to this issue was presented in January, 1978, to the B.C. Pollution Control Board Inquiry into the development of the province's mining, milling and smelting effluent objectives. I quote from that presentation as follows:

To protect the Canadian fisheries, the federal cabinet endorsed the policy of containment of pollutants at source based on the installation of the best practicable control technology. However, it has been recognized by the Environmental Protection Service of Environment Canada that under special circumstances it is virtually impossible to install the required control technology—

And here we come to the economic factors, the deal on which the Liberals obviously made their decision:

—the Department of the Environment, on the basis of its review of January 1979 data, believes that the construction of such a tailings pond on land can be economically feasible. Regardless of whether the 1978 or the 1979 prices are considered, there is approximately a 2 per cent difference in the return on investment between on-land disposal and marine disposal of tailings.

So the government is on record as saying that a tailings pond can be designed and developed, can be maintained at only 2 per cent return difference on investment, and they opted for the latter, the cheaper $6 million direct-ocean dumping which, as I will point out in a few moments, has a terrible impact on the commercial and food fisheries in that area.

I go on to quote from the same document with respect to submarine disposal into Alice Arm:

—The potential for heavy metal buildup in the food chain to the point where there may be an impact upon the ecosystem, including man.

A report done by a biologist in British Columbia was released last week. It was called the McCart report. I quote from page 18 of that report:

The commercial fishery would be expected to benefit by about $4.25 million over the 26-year life of the mine, ignoring the possibility of price increases.

One of the things which has certainly not been looked at by the Minister of Fisheries and members on that side is the impact of 100 million tonnes of effluent going into the inlet. It is going to smother life on the bottom of the inlet and will spread up to the surface and cause serious problems in terms of heavy metal building and poisoning of various other fish species.

With regard to shrimp densities, I quote from page 29 of the McCart report. This shows some of the very serious flaws in the scientific evidence upon which the government based its decision. In relation to shrimp, I quote:

The confidence limits, expressed as a percentage of the mean, were plus or minus 188.5 per cent.

How anyone in their right mind, particularly the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, could support a proposal going ahead when there was that sort of confidence limits is certainly, at the very best, questionable.

The conclusion of the McCart report says it all in my view. On page 68 it says:

The potential impacts are serious enough to preclude the marine disposal of tailings.

One of the groups which will be most seriously impacted, other than the commercial fishermen, are the Nishga people who live in that area. In the community of Kincolith, for example, its vice-president made a statement a few weeks ago. He is Mr. Rod Robinson of the Nishga Tribal Council, and he said:

The company has offered us a share in the mine. Our share is death.

That is certainly something that neither the Minister of Fisheries nor members on that side have responded to, to date. It was predicted that if the tailings were confined to depths greater than 100 metres the following would probably occur: (a) most of the area of Alice Arm to Hans Point will eventually be blanketed with tailings; (c) the productivity of deep water benthos fauna including commercially exploitable species such as shrimps, prawns, various species of king crab, as well as demersal fish such as halibut, rock fish, crab etc. will be reduced or where deposition is very heavy, entirely eliminated.

At this point I would quote from statements of Mr. Born, President of Amax, and by Mr. Lenton, the General Manager. First, Mr. Born:

The marine disposal, in the opinion of expert marine consultants and federal and provincial environmental officials, will have no detrimental effect on the marine life in the area and will not harm the salmon fishery.

● (1630)

I quote from Mr. Lenton:

The tailing will have no adverse impact on the environment in Alice Arm.

It is interesting to have a look at what other people have said, people who are perhaps not biased by having some tie, as the Liberals do, to the $23 million which they have saved Amax or the corporation in its direct interest. I quote from Stephen Pond, a University of British Columbia physiological oceanographer, who says:

There is evidence that heavier, saltier water from outside the inlet flows in, mixing up the water. The prediction made that the material would go down to the bottom and stay there is not likely to hold true.

In August, 1980, bishops of the Anglican Church and bishops of the Catholic Church in Canada called for a withdrawal of the special order in council and for a moratorium upon development of the resource until technology is developed to dispose of the tailings safely. I point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not responded to either the bishops of the Anglican Church or the bishops of the Catholic Church regarding their very serious questions and allegations on the Amax project in British Columbia.

I quote from Dr. Albright, a microbiologist from Simon Fraser University:

> We cannot accept the argument that aquatic animals have adapted to high turbidities or heavy metal levels as support for the marine disposal option. It is not known what the chronic, long-term effects of heavy metals or turbidities are. There may also be hidden costs such as reduced growth or reproduction. Animals may show temporary adaptation, but increases beyond these levels, or for extended periods of time may exceed their tolerances. Should the worst happen, salmon could avoid their regular migration routes and avoid the mining area.

I quote now from the West Coast Environmental Law Association:

> The Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations seem to run contrary to the over-all intent of the Fisheries Act, which allows exemptions only under extenuating circumstances, and only when minimum impact on fisheries resources has been clearly established.

We in Canada are not without experience in these matters. Just south of the present proposal is the Rupert Inlet operation of Utah Mines Limited which predicted that tailings would remain below 100 metres and settle in the deeper portions. I quote from an abstract regarding that particular operation:

> Present studies have shown that the waste discharge from the copper mine has resulted in the anticipated obliterative effect on the deep benthos and an unpredicted widespread deposition of tailings which has affected the shallower, highly productive regions of the system.

Based on that experience, which is still occurring today, where the effluent is now several hundreds of miles out to sea and having a very serious and unknown impact on the fisheries resource, both the commercial and sport and food fishery, the government should call for a full public inquiry into the situation in Alice Arm.

In my view the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should definitely hang his head in this House. The cost to the commercial fisheries is documented as being in the millions of dollars. The cost to the Nishga native people in that area is death. The company will save $23 million and the Liberal party will receive full credit, along with the Amax Corporation, but at enormous public cost.

Having dealt with just one particularly acute pollution occurrence in this country, I would like to move on to a second area in which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is not upholding his constitutional requirements, the Kemano completion project which began in the 1950s when the government of British Columbia gave to the Aluminum Company of Canada special water rights in northern B.C. Alcan constructed a dam on the Upper Nechako system backing up a double chain of lakes and rivers through the top of Tweedsmuir Park, flooding 925 square miles of land, now called the Nechako Reservoir.

This water was diverted from the Fraser River system, one of the largest salmon spawning rivers in the world, through a 16-kilometre tunnel to an underground power house at Kemano and it takes Fraser River water completely out of that system and pumps it through a tunnel directly into another area of the Pacific Ocean. The Kemano Completion Project intends to virtually shut down the Skins Lake spillway blocking almost all the water released into the Nechako River.

There is also the plan to dam the Nanika River which would flood Kitprice Lake and Nanika Lake, reversing the flow away from the Morice-Bulkley-Skeena system and into the Nechako Reservoir and back again to Kemano and another area of the Pacific. So we see the water rights given by the B.C. government allowing water to be taken from the Fraser system, which is crucially required there now because of pollution and low water, and from the Skeena system, being dumped in a different way by reversing flows into another area of the Pacific.

Alcan presently has two-thirds of the Nechako flows which has reduced the flows at, for example, Fort Fraser by 97 per cent, Vanderhoof by 83 per cent, and Prince George by 40 per cent. The new proposal would have a direct impact on the 1,500 native people on the Bulkley and Skeena systems and they would be directly and negatively impacted by the completion proposal. Last year's fisheries department and International Pacific Salmon Commission's study indicated that damage to salmon stocks would range from somewhere between $88 million and $372 million if Alcan is allowed to go ahead with this proposal. Definitely we are not talking about small peanuts, but from the responses we have received from the Minister of Fisheries it certainly seems that way.

In my view, a full public inquiry is required on this issue as well because mitigation and compensation, something which was espoused both by the previous Conservative government and the present Liberal government, really do little more than look at the impact on the value of salmon. It is a far more complex question when we are talking about flows going into the northern Pacific and down the Fraser River in terms of the impact on everyone in every community all the way down.

For example, this past summer Alcan refused, on the request of the Minister of Fisheries, to raise the levels of the Nechako River as requested for the safety of the in-coming spawning stocks. I think it is important that we question the motivation of a corporation when it refuses to raise the water level for the protection of a resource that has an equal right to be in operation. We must closely scrutinize what the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) have done, and ask why they have not called for a full public inquiry.

In my view, the whole thing comes back to a very similar situation with regard to the Amax question where there seems to be a very close corporate tie between certain members of cabinet and various corporations. To date, there has always been more than enough electrical capacity for expanded smelter activity in the Kitimat area. Since 1950 approximately one third of the power generated has been sold into the general

B.C. hydro grid, and more aluminum production could also be achieved by the conservation of the electricity used in the present smelters by modernizing the pot lines.

Alcan is saying that it wants to produce more aluminum, and it can do it now without going ahead with this other flooding project and the siphoning off of water from another system. The option is there, but it has never gone ahead with that option. I think that it is important that those ministers, and those members in public life who are responsible for the interests of the public, stand up for once and help to preserve an industry which is seriously faltering in Canada.

Ten per cent of the salmon stocks in British Columbia are impacted by Kemano I project and Kemano II project. The minister has the power to modify and prevent construction of the project and, particularly, he has the right to call a full public inquiry into the issue, something which the minister hopscotched around over the past number of years. The 1950 agreement made between Alcan and the government of British Columbia can be readily modified. It was brought in and passed by the B.C. provincial cabinet and can be changed by either an act of the B.C. cabinet or by the provincial legislature. Although I do not think there are many, the Liberals and the Socreds in this particular situation are clearly in cahoots with Alcan on this issue.

In concluding, who within the government stands up for the commercial, native and sport fisheries in this country? Certainly, in my view and in the view of many fishermen in this country, it is not the present Minister of Fisheries. The list grows day by day. The previous speaker touched on the Ungava Bay situation, a very important issue with regard to the giving out of licences when there is a scientific study going on. It is certainly not in the interests of the Inuit with regard to the shrimp fishery. The list grows day by day. There is Arvik in the Arctic, Amax on the B.C. coast, Alcan on the Fraser and Skeena, Riley Creek, the English-Wabigoon pollution, the Great Lakes, the maritimes, and on it goes. All these failures, in my view, are results of bankrupt policies which come from that side of the House, of putting corporate brownie points ahead of public interest in our fish.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today makes me wonder whether the opposition has any knowledge of the real state of Canada's fisheries. To listen to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller), you would think we were on the brink of disaster. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to take the few minutes available to me to set the record straight. I want to tell the House that, while the fisheries are not without problems, their general state is very healthy, and the industry is a vibrant and valuable net contributor to the national economy.

Members opposite may be interested to know that the fisheries last year contributed something in the order of $1 billion to our balance of payments. We have become the biggest exporter in the world, in terms of the value of our fish products. In fact we earned some $1.3 billion from exports of fish and seafood last year. An equally significant statistic is that the landed value of all Canadian fisheries was more than $873 million in 1979, and that is money which helps to support the economies of hundreds of small towns and villages on both coasts.

But the statistics do not tell the whole story. There is a feeling of stability in the fisheries. Catches are more reliable, plant work is steadier and stretches out over more of the year. There is growth in fishermen's organizations, as they gain status in their own communities and take a more direct role in the management of the industry from which they earn their livelihood. No longer is the fishery regarded as the employer of last resort.

The problems and opportunities of Canada's fisheries are certainly different from what they were only five or ten years ago. Throughout the 1970s the problems were problems of quantity. There simply was not enough fish to go around; the stocks were depressed, and a major rebuilding operation was necessary. That operation, which began after the disastrous experience of 1974, was given a major boost when Canada declared a 200-mile coastal fishing zone in 1977.

While I do not want to suggest that the 200-mile zone is the answer to all our problems, it has had a positive impact already. For example, Canadian fishermen's share of total fish catches taken from the Atlantic west of Greenland and north of Cape Cod ranged up to 37 per cent in the decade preceding 1977, but increased to 56 per cent last year.

In the waters within and immediately adjacent to the 200-mile zone, Canadian fishermen have made even more dramatic progress. Canadian catches in these waters increased from 895,000 metric tonnes in 1976 to 1.2 million tonnes in 1979, or an increase from 42 per cent to 73 per cent of the total taken by all fleets operating in the area. The principles of Canadian control and majority share of fishing within the zone have now been firmly established. Foreign fishing is permitted in the zone only after licence from the Canadian government, and is limited to stocks that are surplus to the needs of Canadian fishermen.

After Canada imposed the 200-mile limit there ensued a hue and cry for massive development, massive subsidies, massive fleet expansion. Fortunately this government resisted chasing pie in the sky—in the sea. This government's goal was, and continues to be, the encouragement of a solid industry which cannot only pay its own way but can contribute in a major way to the nation's economy. Nevertheless, we have to stop assuming that the fishery is some kind of gold mine. Instead, it is a garden, and if we care for it through sound management, it will last forever, helping to provide food for the world.

The policies of this government have added new co-ordination to the fishery, and a new degree of stability. We have avoided dictating too much development, by forcing people into boats or factories the government designs. Instead, we have tried to create a framework that sets the people free to work, free to develop their own future, in an industry that only six years ago faced bankruptcy and now can pay its own way.

This government is establishing the co-ordination, the framework, the buffer margins of supply and profit that will let innovations take hold.

But nothing will go right unless, before all else, we protect the foundation and keep a stable supply of fish for a prosperous, dependable fleet. The fish are forever there but forever fragile, requiring careful management. We have begun building up a co-ordinated industry that can reach high. If, however, we fool around with the foundation, the rest will topple.

Because co-ordination has given us a fishery policy that works, I fear the tendencies that would again fragment fisheries management. Many provinces want more fisheries jurisdiction, not in the processing sector or the educational sector where they have every right and reason to do more, but in resource management, the issuing of licences, and the division of quotas.

What is the reasoning behind their demands? The Fathers of Confederation singled out the fishery resource as a special case, and the Fathers of Confederation were right. Herring, cod and even lobster move from province to province and country to country. You could catch all the southern gulf cod in the winter at Cape Breton and catch them all again that summer in the Gulf, if only you could catch the same fish twice. A Quebec salmon swims back to its river from Greenland past St. Pierre and Miquelon and four other provinces. A fish caught in a four-way tug of war is going to be a funny looking fish at the end.

Should provinces control the resource because they are more politically responsive to local needs? The federal system also has local members of Parliament. The federal government also has seven times the provincial number of fishery employees in Newfoundland and the maritimes, and the national government understands local demands and pressures. We also know that, after a point, the more politics, the less fish!

I think the reasons for the positions being put forward by some provincial governments come down to one. Their interest is because they can see fisheries is on the rise, they can see they need more jobs, and everyone has a natural tendency to think he could run the show better if he had the power. The trouble is, a single province can never really have final power. It is impossible to divide up a migratory common property resource in a satisfactory way, in such a limited area, and among so many interests.

Some may say we can have it both ways—provincial jurisdiction over fishing, various committees to co-ordinate matters, and the federal government to deal with research and international negotiations. Some hold up the regional councils in the United States as an example. But the regional councils have great difficulties in regulating fisheries, as we have learned on Georges Bank, and they would have even greater difficulties if their coast had huge internal multiprovincial pools like the Bay of Fundy and the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

I want to turn now to an issue which is one of the most urgent and important aspects of fisheries development, and that is licensing. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) recently announced that his department's process of consultation with fishermen, processors and others in the industry, has been pretty well concluded, and that steps are now under way to implement a new licensing policy on the east coast. I want to welcome this initiative, and to urge members opposite to give the proposals their thoughtful consideration and support.

I should explain that the first move toward a new licensing policy was taken in late 1978, when the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans initiated a thorough review of prevailing conditions. Officials of the department held two rounds of consultations with fishermen during the winter of 1978-79, and the findings and recommendations of that study came to be known as the Levelton report. After that report was made public in June, 1979, another round of consultations was held with fishermen and other representatives of the industry, to assess their reactions and opinions. A broad outline of the government's proposals has already been referred to today by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming).

Over all, the new system should give fishermen a more direct voice in matters having to do with licensing, and make the whole regime more equitable. I know that all hon. members would want to join me in encouraging the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to continue his progress in implementing such a system.

Licences are necessary in the fishery in the same manner as such controls are necessary in other industries, Mr. Speaker. But we should never forget that, like any other resource based industry—mining, forestry, you name it—the fishery is subject to limits. It is an industry based on a finite resource. We tend to understand that about other resource industries. For example, nobody in his right mind would send 50 loggers into a forestry project if only 25 were required, or send 100 miners into a mine that should employ only 50. The same sort of respect for reality needs to be practised in the fishery. And the reality is that there is a good living to be made, but by a finite number of people.

● (1650)

This government's belief in and support of the fishing industry are manifested in many ways, Mr. Speaker. I have already provided the House with some statistics that show Canada's success in the export markets of the world. Our fishery enjoys a high reputation for the quality of its products. But we have to acknowledge that some parts of the industry could do a better job to maintain the consistency of quality. It is for this reason that the government this summer launched a major program to help the industry establish consistently high quality standards. The purpose of this program is to help those engaged in the fishery get more dollars for every pound of fish caught and, at the same time, ensure the consumer of a nutritious and delicious product.

The government's program to adopt new quality requirements has been developed in consultation with the industry. It will include the following main elements: a process of inspecting vessels and certifying them as properly equipped to preserve the quality of fish; an improvement in handling practices on board vessels; the establishment of a system for grading the quality of fish landed; the setting of quality standards for the unloading, handling and transport of fish ashore; the introduction of rigorous quality control programs in fish processing plants; and the introduction of equally demanding standards for final products.

I also want to take this opportunity to welcome the announcement by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to create a new separate management region for the fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This arrangement will provide a co-ordinated focus for management of the fisheries in this area which is, after all, one ecological complex. It makes sense to have a single administration of a resource in which fishermen from five provinces participate.

The new management arrangement, as it has been outlined by the minister, will provide more affective, consistent policy and directional guidance, and help to promote increased co-operation between government and industry. The problems and priorities of the Gulf are often different from those experienced along the Atlantic offshore, so that the new region will be better equipped to meet these concerns.

When one realizes that more than 12,500 fishermen from all five eastern provinces participate in the Gulf fishery, and that the landed value of the main species last year was more than $70 million, we get some idea of the importance of this area to the economy of eastern Canada. Of the 100 processing plants surrounding the Gulf, 17 are operated by co-operatives, and 25 are operated as family businesses. Of the remaining 58, some 17 are branch plant operations of firms whose principal fish processing operations are located outside the Gulf area. Only 13 of the plants are supplied, in part, by company-owned vessels and well over 90 per cent of the raw material is supplied by fishermen who own their own vessels.

Up to 7,400 people find seasonal employment in the Gulf groundfish processing industry. Of these, 2,100 are employed in Newfoundland, 200 on the north shore of the Gulf, and 5,100 in the southwest area of the Gulf. Through the creation of the new management region, more attention can be given to ways of making the groundfishery in the Gulf more competitive by cost-reducing techniques, product development, diversification, market development and extension.

Details of the new region, such as its precise boundaries, the location of the headquarters, and the resources required, have not yet been determined. I am sure all members will be interested in this information when it becomes available.

There are those in the industry who argue that Canada needs more freezer-trawlers, and even factory freezer-trawlers. To those I would point out that, taken together, the inshore and nearshore fleet of independently-owned vessels are the backbone of our fishing industry. These boats far exceed the offshore fleet in value of landings, number of boats, and number of fishermen. They are the basic source of life of the hundreds of fishing communities in whose name this government negotiated the 200-mile limit. When the question is asked for whom the fishery is being developed, we have to think in the first instance of the independent, inshore and nearshore fishermen.

The allocation of the fishery resource has been subject to a tug-of-war for a long time, but care must be taken to avoid parcelling out fish on the basis of "to the strongest, the spoils" Some would defend the rights of large vessels owned by large companies to roam to the very shore, on the basis of "rugged individualism"; but who is a more rugged individual than the small fisherman, owning his own boat, and counting on a fair chance at the nearby fish?

Canada argued before the world for the 200-mile zone, not so a few major companies could earn more dividends, but in the name of the small coastal communities. The shareholders of large corporations deserve their fair returns. The allocating of fish must be done for a variety of reasons, not just because it is economical, but also for community survival, for the preservation of a way of life, for the needs of the marketplace, for the reasonable well-being of fishermen and plant workers, and so on.

We need not worship the idea of a 12-month trawler fishery above all. Nor for that matter need we worship inshore fishery claims to exclusiveness, in a case where allowing only an inshore fishery might mean just six weeks work and nine months of unemployment insurance. Common sense reference points are required in establishing quotas and allocating fish between fleets.

I was pleased the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans convened a seminar this year with representatives of the fishing industry and the provincial governments of the Atlantic region to discuss Gulf of St. Lawrence groundfish. Such meetings have given fishermen, processors and the provincial governments an opportunity to participate in both short and long-range planning for a variety of fisheries. I understand that additional seminars will be held this fall and winter, and I think the minister should be congratulated for this practice of involving the industry representatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henderson: Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about expectations. While it is certainly foolhardy to set our sights too low, we can run into a considerable amount of trouble if we expect too much of the fisheries. We have to resist the temptation to view the fisheries as the cure for all economic ills, to end unemployment, to roll back regional disparities and to work all manner of miracles. The fishery can make an important and a continuing contribution, but not a boundless contribution.

I congratulate the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for his enlightened leadership. I congratulate the government for adopting this enlightened leadership and for adopting policies and programs for the betterment of the industry.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson) entertain a brief question on policy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. However, the question can be asked with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, last Saturday at Pictou, Nova Scotia, I had many inquiries from people in the industry, specifically from Mr. Nickerson and officials of Ferguson Industries Limited. Could the parliamentary secretary give the House any idea what his government's policy will be about the subsidy assistance given for the construction of seiner trawlers and other vessels which are so vital to the success of the industry? The parliamentary secretary has just spoken so comprehensively about this, and many people are depending on it to provide employment to reduce regional disparity.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, normally the parliamentary secretary does not speak on policy matters. I shall leave that to the minister and the hon. member can ask the question of him at a later date.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act, 1980—Inquiry respecting reduction of phasing-in period for veterans' widows; the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby)—Penitentiaries—Hostage-taking incidents—Danger posed to guards—Inquiry as to government action; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Indian Affairs—Funding of band housing.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO SUPPORT FISHING INDUSTRY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Miller:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry, as demonstrated

(a) by betraying the interests of Canadian fishermen in its international fisheries negotiations with the United States;

(b) by the imposition of unconscionably high interest rates and other policies which have led to instability in the fishing industry and inadequate income protection for Canadian fishermen;

(c) by its lack of action to devise and implement the long-promised revisions in policies regulating the industry; and

(d) by its lack of action to enforce existing legislation protecting our fisheries.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate this afternoon and to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller). He has roundly and soundly condemned the government for their negligence in dealing with the fisheries of Canada's Atlantic coast, the west coast and the inland waters as well. I am afraid my remarks will not be quite as complimentary as those made by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson).

What we have seen is 12 years of mismanagement of the fisheries of Canada, aside from a short nine-month period last year when certain initiatives were taken to sort out some of this mess. If hon. members opposite deny the validity of what I just said, perhaps they would be enlightened if I were to read the first sentence of a letter we recently received from the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc). This letter was sent to members of Parliament who represent fishing communities, on October 10, 1980. The first sentence of the letter reads as follows:

As you know, there are serious problems facing the Pacific coast commercial salmon fishery which call for immediate action as well as longer term solutions. To assist me in deciding the best course of action, I recently asked Dr. Peter Pearse and Mr. Fern Doucet to meet with representatives of the provincial government and the Pacific fishing sector in order to examine the principal problems—

What we read is an admission by the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans that there are serious problems in our Pacific coast fishery, resulting from years of mismanagement and neglect. As my colleague from Malpeque pointed out, the previous Progressive Conservative minister, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), initiated as his first act of office, a white paper policy review. Many people in the Department of Fisheries were involved and considerable funds were spent in preparing a new direction for Canada's fishery development in the eighties. For some reason this whole initiative has now been buried. The present minister will not report to this House on the findings of that major policy review which was conducted last year.

It was also an initiative of the previous Conservative government that the Sinclair and Levelton licensing reports were to have been reviewed by the standing committee in consultation with fishermen's groups. The present minister has done very little with regard to adopting, enacting or moving on the recommendations of Drs. Sinclair and Levelton.

The management initiatives that were taken during 1979 were very necessary and long overdue; on both coasts, for example, the establishment of a policy on freezer trawlers, the imposition of a moratorium on sea-licensed vessels on the west coast. The minister will know that, on the verge of our defeat in this House last December, there were a number of very strident and some difficult policy announcements prepared, to be made, about which many of the Conservative minister's colleagues felt uncomfortable. However, they were necessary initiatives. The present minister has completely abdicated on them.

The previous minister also initiated a major review of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation which has been managing, developing and burgeoning into a vertically integrated Crown corporation, dominating the fishery from lakeside to the export of the product. The management practices of that corporation are highly questionable. The previous minister, the hon. member for St. John's East, initiated an in-depth study of that Crown corporation. The findings of that study were to have been presented in April at a meeting of fisheries ministers of the affected provinces. To date we have not heard anything from the present minister.

I commend the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on finally admitting that there is a problem with regard to the west coast fishery in particular, and initiating steps for a solution of that problem. He returned from vacation at the end of August and immediately initiated a study by Messrs. Pearse and Doucet, two gentlemen who are going to solve all of the problems for him.

We commend the initiative reflected in that study. However, we wonder what was happening the previous seven months of that minister's reincarnation. We now see that international negotiations are beginning to bear fruit. The minister was kind enough a couple of weeks ago to invite input and opinions from members on this side of the House, but not until the Pearse-Doucet study had been under way for some six or seven weeks. We were given 48 hours to respond before he was off to a meeting in British Columbia where he would reflect on our recommendations and those of others in meeting the representatives of the west coast industry.

We are also grateful that in recent weeks we learned that the budget for managing the Pacific coast fishery was increased by an additional $3 million on a $60 million budget and that additional funding will be directed toward increasing enforcement personnel in particular. We appreciate that.

I must repeat that it is ludicrous for a minister who was in office since 1974, and granted the opportunity of a brief sabbatical leave, to take seven months to get himself moving again on his return to office. It has been a disappointment to those on this side that he has taken so long in getting to work on the serious problems which face the west coast fisheries industry at least.

The motion put by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni is in four parts. The first two parts deal with international negotiations and the question of high interest rates and the difficulties that poses for fishermen. I will touch on that rather quickly. I really want to deal for most of my talk with the third and fourth parts of the motion which question the management policies of the present government and the minister in his previous incarnation. As well, I want to deal with the lack of adequate enforcement and protection of the habitat of the fishery.

First, with regard to international negotiations, meetings between the Canadian and United States negotiating teams have been far too infrequent. The approach to the problems of halibut and albacore tuna and the salmon interception, particularly affecting the Fraser River, has been piecemeal and reactionary to crises, sort of at the eleventh hour. There has been far too much of this last minute firefighting. For example, we knew in June and July there was a proposal which would have staved a crisis regarding albacore tuna which had been received by the minister and his department. They did nothing with that proposal until the U.S. tuna boats were already en route pursuing the albacore tuna once again into Canadian waters. The only way we avoided having once again to take U.S. fishermen into custody, as the previous minister did a year ago, was to come up with a last minute fix which many fishermen on the west coast feel was a sell out of our interests. It weakened our hand in negotiating with some of the other important concessions, particularly with regard to Fraser River salmon.

A great concern of mine with regard to international negotiations arises from the fact that members of Parliament and U.S. senators are not part of the process and are not even welcome at these negotiating sessions. I believe that slows down the process. It means that after an agreement is reached and signed as a tentative accord, it then has to be subjected to the real world of political pressures, as we saw with the east coast treaty, to the extent that all of that work may have been for naught because the political spokesmen do not fully understand the issues and the complexities behind the negotiations. I was disappointed when I asked in June to be permitted to observe the west coast negotiations which were held in Vancouver. The department, essentially, said no, my presence would not be welcomed there, although members of the fishing industry, members of the canning companies and of the various fishing organizations were welcomed, but it was not appropriate for a member of Parliament to be present. I really question that decision because I think that if we are going to make progress in these talks we must stop sitting back, as Canada usually does, and stop waiting for our American friends to put their cards on the table. We have to seize the initiative and we have to be realistic when it comes to the political factors which enter into these decisions. While we sit back on our complacent butts, the United States goes ahead and does as it wishes.

Although I am pleased to hear today that a tentative agreement is being struck for the west coast salmon interception problem, I am afraid that if we read this agreement carefully we will realize that all future increases of enhanced salmon stocks on the Fraser River will be given to Canada but we will have to pay the shot for enhancing them. That is an easy commitment for the Americans to make if there are no effective means of control to ensure that we do indeed reap the benefits of that enhanced stock.

I will be running short of time, Mr. Speaker, so I will comment quickly on the interest rate matter. The NDP motion implies that the government can regulate interest rates. I suggest that the interest rate problem is a consequence of Canada's very unhealthy economy and our growing, continuing and deepening vulnerability to the deficits that this government is incurring. But the government does have the opportunity, through the Federal Business Development Bank and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, to assist fishermen. In particular, this House would, when we revised the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in June, have demanded that the chartered banks which lend money to fishermen, guarantee an interest rate for at least a five-year term, because at present I have many constituents who come to me saying, "We have a loan with the Federal Business Development Bank at 7 per cent, 8 per cent or 9 per cent. It is expiring and suddenly they want 17 per cent".

I should like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, what the impact of that is on a couple of fishermen who happen to have a loan of a quarter of a million dollars on a seine boat, for example. The impact of an interest rate rising from 9 per cent or 10 per cent to 17 per cent would be in the order of $25,000 in one year. We have to realize that those two fishermen, who are employing a crew, meeting all their expenses and having to contend with dwindling stock levels, are taking home between $8,000 to $15,000 or perhaps $18,000 a year, and suddenly they are hit with an additional $25,000 a year. How will they pay it? They will have to contend with bankruptcy in many cases.

I think there are initiatives which the government can take. The small business development bonds which were proposed in our budget are effective means of bringing down interest rates. They should be extended to the fishery sector. There is also the mechanism of tax credits whereby those who are investing in fishing vessels are allowed to deduct their interest expenses from income immediately before calculating taxable income.

As hon. members on the other side often point out, and as the minister is fond of saying, we have a problem in the west coast fishery of too many vessels chasing too few fish. We have an excess capacity of fishing vessels relative to the available stock level. I have to ask: who created this problem? Why did it come to this point in 1980 when we have far too many vessels and, in particular, when we have five or six hundred of the largest vessels, the seine vessels, which have accumulated tonnages, to some extent, on the basis of vessels which were sold under the federally-sponsored buy-back program in the 1970s? Now we have the ludicrous situation where these large seine vessels are able to fish a few hours a week in the summer if they are lucky, whereas the troll fleet is out fishing seven days a week and for a considerably longer period of time.

We have so much fishing power concentrated in this fleet of large seine vessels that they are only allowed to fish a few hours a week, and they are still economically viable on that basis. They may not be attractive in terms of employing large numbers of people, but the owners argue that they are the best return on investment capital. Perhaps we cannot argue with that if we believe that they are husbanding the resource as effectively as the trawlers and the gillnet vessels do.

We have a number of other problems with the west coast fishery. We have the problem of an inadequate emphasis on the salmon enhancement program, especially with respect to the more choice natural stocks of sockeye, chinook and such species running into the Fraser River system. We are putting a lot of effort into enhancing the cheaper varieties of salmon and none at all into the salmon enhancement facilities which should be built and under way on the Fraser River system.

We have a situation where there is inadequate enforcement, and only $4 million of the west coast fisheries budget, out of some $50 million, is devoted to provision of salaries for enforcement personnel numbering around 115 officers on the whole of the British Columbia coast.

There is too much waste of juvenile fish being thrown overside or being caught as a by-catch or of other species which a fisherman is not allowed to fish which is being caught be accident and thrown overboard because he is not allowed to take it to dockside. One wonders if we are really being wise in encouraging this waste by requiring that fishermen not bring to shore fish which they should not have caught in the first place. One wonders if it might not be much better to require that they not be allowed to throw fish overboard and that they account for their actions when they get to shore if they were fishing out of their zone, in an area where they should not have been. The onus would then be on the fisherman to explain why that happened.

We have a serious problem with poaching and the illegal selling of fish in the lower Fraser Valley in particular, and the ministry seems to be doing very little about that.

With regard to solutions, Mr. Speaker, there are two classes of solutions to the problem of too many vessels chasing too few fish. The minister knows very well that one type of solution has to do with conservation, that is to say, we have to find ways to stop over-fishing. The other solution is to enhance what we have, to increase the supply of fish. On the conservation side, it is, I believe, important that we establish a nominal allocation of the available catch among the three sectors of the salmon fleet and, for want of a better number, I would say that perhaps it should be allocated one-third each way. We must allocate between the two sectors of the herring-roe fishery, the seine and the gillnet fishermen who have been sharing that resource in recent years relatively equally.

To impose an allocation scheme requires a political decision, and I suggest that the present minister must show the courage necessary to take that political decision and tell each sector of the industry that they will fish with one gear type and that this will be allocated in accordance with recent historical precedent. He should tell them that upon completion of each fishing year the department would record the value of catches by these various gear types and plan their management policies for the next year in order to ensure that the allocation is properly met by imposing restrictions and regulations on the size of hooks, whether or not they should be barbless, the net size, and other area restrictions. The department has the power to adjust the relative catch of the various types of gear in order to maintain a fair sharing of the resource among the various gear types.

If I have another moment or two, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it seems to me, if you have a formula for allocating the catch between the gear types, if there is a question of too much fishing power, we should leave it to the investors in those various gear types to decide whether they want to buy out some of their competitors. We should look at the possibility of a voluntary or self-operated buy-back program. If we have 500 of the same vessels and if those owners feel they are not getting enough action individually, perhaps they should pay a portion each year on their licence fee in order to fund the buy-back program. The same boat owners could fund their own buy-back program, and the gillnetters and trollers could do likewise. This would enable the initiative to be placed upon the investors in these vessels to decide for themselves whether they are willing to contend with excess competition, being subject to a specific quota of fish, or whether they want indeed to reduce the number of vessels in their sector of the industry.

● (1720)

On the enhancement side—and I see I do not have any additional time left—I just want to say that we must put much greater emphasis on enhancing the salmon stocks in the Fraser River system. We cannot wait until our friends across the way resolve the problem with the Americans. We have to invest in those important hatchery and enhancement facilities in the Fraser system now if we are going to realize a benefit from them by the end of this decade. So, we must do that. We must finance the enhancement projects, and I believe the fishermen are prepared to assist in financing those projects through some form of cash royalty if it goes into a dedicated fund specifically earmarked for SEP projects and if they have representation on a board of trustees which administers that fund.

Thank you for waiting for an extra moment, Mr. Speaker. I will take my seat.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the motion presented today is very important, and I would like to elaborate on some of the remarks made by my colleagues, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), and also to acknowledge the significant contribution made by other hon. members on this side of the House who have spoken.

Some of the things which disturbed me in this afternoon's debate were the statements by the present Parliament Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson) and those by the previous one. What disturbed me about their comments was the implication that basically all is well in the fishing industry and that things are generally improving. The only conclusion I can draw is that the comments of somebody from downtown Toronto commenting on the fishing industry may be a little distorted, and although such a person may not have the age and experience to have seen the development of the west coast industry or the east coast industry and the way things have progressed over the years, I urge him to consider that the unanimous opinion of most of the people involved, especially in this House, is that it is in very serious jeopardy on the west coast.

The present parliamentary secretary had the fortunate experience of being able to travel to my riding and to take a few of the more choice species on the hook. I have certainly enjoyed the experience and acquired some fairly good insights, but obviously the hon. member must need another trip out there. I encourage him to return and to look more deeply into what appears to be a very serious problem which may not be apparent at first blush.

In my presentation today I would like to deal specifically with things which affect my riding. Some of the comments I have made before, but they could be reinforced here. In my riding there are two basic industries, fishing and forestry. Forestry, of course, is the prime one, but the fishing industry is vitally important to those people who live in small communities. Under the present management practices of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, what has been happening on the west coast is that many small communities are in very serious jeopardy. The only thing many of the Indian communities have had to depend on over the years is forestry, and over the years they have been deprived of access to the forest resource. Unfortunately the only other asset is fishing, and that is being constantly curtailed, which I suggest places them in difficult straits.

In many of those communities we see unemployment rates which hinge around 75 per cent, and in an especially poor season when the canneries are not working and employment is restricted, Indian access to the resource generally and to licences, vessels and processing is minimal, and the picture looks very bleak. I suggest to the present parliamentary secretary that in fact that industry is in a very difficult situation in relation to some consideration of its historic appearance. Some people are doing well, but a very large number are doing poorly under the present system, and the prognosis is very grim.

I would like to deal with four aspects of the problem as I see it, and they deal basically with the management question, the environment question, the enhancement of the Pacific coast species, and the allocation of catch.

First, with regard to the environment, both of my colleagues, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni and the hon. member for Skeena, have outlined their very serious concerns, but in my riding I face a number of serious concerns, as do the fishermen there. For example, there are large areas on the west coast of British Columbia, on Vancouver Island, and on the Queen Charlottes which are very rich in coal, and we are going to see a tremendous resource conflict.

We have the prospect of open-pit coal mining. Studies have been undertaken by the Department of the Environment and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans which say that this open-pit coal mining can go ahead. Proposals are already in. Second-stage studies are completed, and it looks as if we will be having open-pit coal mines. In the future, as we make the transition from oil and gas, we will see a tremendous influx of open-pit coal mines. From my listening at public meetings and in discussions with officials in the department I have learned that we have not even begun to consider the drastic consequences for our fishing resources. As a matter of fact, just southwest of Campbell River an open-pit coal mine will be built in the headwaters to one of the major show hatcheries at Quinsam. I have never heard of such a contradiction; nevertheless, processing and an open-pit coal mine will be allowed. There really is no appreciation of what is going to happen there.

However, that is only the beginning. There will be numerous attempts to develop that coal resource as the pressure on us increases. What will happen is that coal will go in and fisheries will go out.

Another contradiction in developing those open-pit coal mines is that the department and other individuals who are developing them are trying to reassure us that the department has sufficient monitoring and enforcement capabilities to see that those coal developers follow the guidelines laid down, yet we wind up with enforcement people telling us that they do not have the person-years, the budget nor the time to deal with all the problems in the fisheries. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) mentioned a $3 million increase in the enforcement section of the budget. That will not scratch the surface when we consider the tremendous development which will be going on.

There are numerous examples. We have the Amax situation and the pending situation at Campbell River. Mining is only one aspect of it, but the situation will become very serious in the future, and we are completely unprepared to meet what I feel will be the total destruction of our fish-rearing habitat as a result.

The forest industry, the number one industry in British Columbia, has been the number one competitor for land use as between fisheries and forestry, and essentially the predominant industry under provincial control is basically eroding the available habitat for fish rearing.

In the past loggers have come in and logged out the valley bottoms where the quick, cheap timber is available. Erosion and destruction of streams for spawning and juvenile fish rearing has been total. We wind up with flooding. Once the spawning species have gone up, the soil can no longer hold moisture and when there are heavy rains, they simply flush the system out totally. If we head up through the area around Bella Coola, we find that where there once were spawning streams we now just have conduits which run water down, and there is no spawning capability.

The unregulated forest industry has gone a long way in the past toward destroying the habitat on which this resource is based. The Kimsquit Valley will be logged out. In that area chums and a variety of other species are raised. We saw what happened at Riley Creek, and until that conflict is resolved satisfactorily and until the department has the capability of enforcing habitat protection, with laws which are essentially on the books, we will not find that our habitat will be preserved, and the resource will eventually be eroded out from underneath us.

Also with regard to the environment, as we come down the coast of British Columbia and down Vancouver Island, we find that the demand for land use in every estuary is for industrial purposes, for the dumping of municipal sewage or for land fill. Essentially we are giving up an area which is probably far more productive in its food raising capability than any farmland in British Columbia. I would point to the Comox estuary where there have been landfill projects. It was felt that the best place to build a sewage lagoon was right in the middle of that valuable productive estuary. Industries in that particular valley locate right smack in the middle of the estuary. They do not locate in other areas somewhat farther away where it might be slightly more difficult for them to develop. Every single development, every piece of landfill poured in there and every piece of sewage poured in there destroys the capability to raise fish. We are witnessing the destruction of the resource.

I should like to turn to the Campbell River estuary. The municipality of Campbell River appealed to the federal government for assistance in relocating industry, stopping further encroachment and trying to reverse some of the tremendous damage which has been done. We are now in the process of a new project in the Comox estuary which will dump more raw sewage. Basically we need a commitment on the part of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and on the part of the provincial government of British Columbia to move quickly to preserve its extremely valuable fish rearing and food raising capabilities. But I do not see any action. I just see continuous and serious erosion in such areas along the entire coast.

Turning to the Fraser River, in the area in which I was born and raised, I had quite a shock the other day. On various occasions I have walked a good piece of that river from Mission to its mouth on both sides. I was under the impression that it was still in the state it was when I was much younger. The trip up that river in a fish boat the other day scared me, and I say that seriously. Not only is there a tremendous load and discharge of sewage, chemical wastes, poisons of all sorts and varieties into it, but there seems to be a structural change in that river designed to get rid of marshes and fishery habitat competing for land use in its estuary and, I guess, the associated fish-supporting aspects of that river. It has been mentioned before, but I should like to add my voice to it: with the destruction of that river will probably come the destruction of the fishing industry in the province of British Columbia. That river is in such a serious state right now that a parliamentary task force should be set up to study what is taking place.

The provincial government of British Columbia seems committed to asserting its constitutional authority. That is probably the only explanation we could give for some of the more bizarre aspects of its policymaking. It had the recent misfortune of one of the ministers in charge of lands coming out to my riding and stating that they were declaring a moratorium on booming grounds in Baynes Sound, an area located along the shoreline of my riding. They were declaring a moratorium after they had let MacMillan Bloedel build one more big booming ground. The purpose of the press release was to suggest that the moratorium would apply after this big booming ground had been completed. Bark drops and decays and hydrogen sulphide develop and poison the water so that fish and fry can no longer use it and those areas stay poisoned for roughly 25 years. There are areas in the Comox estuary where these same logging companies have deposited a layer of bark and decaying material in which there is no oxygen and a substantial amount of hydrogen sulphide; no fish are capable of living in such waters. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary—and I would suggest it to the minister if he were here—that action on environmental issues associated with the fisheries would bear tremendous benefits, especially assertive action which would protect the base upon which the entire industry is structured. This is extremely important, and I suggest the minister and the government of the country have been negligent in defending that aspect.

We desperately need a coast-line management act to protect foreshore, estuary and habitat. There is not much point in continuing discussion of the Kemano project after the hon. member for Skeena has dealt with it but I should like to suggest one further aspect. The Kemano project is a conflict in resources; electricity has become more valuable than fish. When we look at its location, it is on the central coast of British Columbia. Some of the streams will eventually back up, ensuring a decrease in fishing, fish habitat and fishery capabilities on the central coast of British Columbia. It will be one further erosion of the capacity of people in that area to earn a living, as well as constituting an environmental disaster. Basically we are suffering from a tremendous degree of negligence in terms of preserving the environment upon which the west coast fishing industry relies. When we lose this environment—and we are continuing to lose it at a faster and faster rate—then we will not have to worry about buy-back programs, overcapitalization, a salmon enhancement program, reserving manpower or budgetary requirements, because we will have destroyed the capability to support that industry. It is extremely important that this be recognized and acted upon.

I think the area of management has been covered pretty well today. We have looked at the question of research, enforcement, the licensing scheme, possibilities for the allocation of fish, overcapitalization and so on; we have talked about consultation and concentration. Some key topics were developed today in terms of their impact upon the west coast fishery, but I should like to add a few comments of my own. Research is extremely important. It does not show. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni suggested that it is not a very glamorous aspect and that it takes a lot of input over a long period of time before benefits are developed. It does not show like a new hatchery or a new fishing vessel. But it is absolutely vital. If we cut back long-term research commitments, or if we cut back on research at all, we will pay the price in the long run, because we will not be able to support the industry.

Other bizarre things seem to be happening there. Rather than budgeting or paying out of the budget for a planned research program, we now seem to be bargaining to get fishing vessel owners to undertake support programs for research, and we are paying them with a catch allocation. We seem to have grabbed the Japanese to come in and to research for us, because we are not willing to pay Canadian vessel owners to undertake some of that research. We are exchanging research undertakings for the right to catch fish. I suggest that is absolutely wrong. Since it is one of the pillars that support this very vital industry, we must plan our long-term research commitment and we must allocate the required resources. We should be supporting Canadian vessel owners and Canadian crews in undertaking that research, in developing the expertise within our own industry. Essentially we should be creating that employment and expertise here so that we can improve our own industry and not turn it back to the Japanese. Enough of it is controlled there already.

I would like to express my thoughts on enforcement, as well. We do not have enough fisheries officers. The government seems to be committed to cutbacks in staffing, in support services, in a whole variety of areas. There is a mentality which favours cutting back the civil service which provides these very vital services to the citizens of this country. It appears to me, though, that if we withdraw budget support for these essential programs we are really adopting on a penny wise and pound foolish approach. We should make a solid commitment to enforcement, provide expert fisheries personnel who can monitor these environmental problems, go after violators who degrade the natural habitat, and see to the enforcement of conservation program. Not only that, in the final analysis the government has got to back them up when they lay charges, when they say, for example, that a foreshore should not be paved in order to meet values which are less in the long term than the value of the fisheries. The government should be backing these people up. Without such backing, financial commitment and person-years, we might as well forget it because we will never really know what is developing and what is going wrong in that industry.

Enforcement is an extremely serious part of this process and we are not living up to our full commitment. With respect to the licensing scheme the two parliamentary secretaries who preceded me said it had come out better than sliced bread. Well, judging from the people I dealt with—this is probably the single largest file in my office—there are tremendous problems. People have been put out of the industry and lost their livelihood because of that licensing system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Skelly: I thank hon. members for giving me the opportunity to sum up. The licensing scheme has been a disaster, but I would like to move to the question of allocation, which was dealt with by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni and the hon. member for Skeena. The allocation situation appears to be far more complicated. What will happen is this: we will reach a situation in which there will be allocating between sports fishermen, commercial fishermen and Indian communities. Many coastal Indian communities are absolutely dependent upon that resource. A commitment has to be made to the Indian people which will assure them of access to that resource so that they can support their communities at a financial or economic level which will allow them to lead what we consider to be a decent life. If we are to resolve unemployment and some of these financial problems and give a certain independence to those Indian communities, they must be considered in that allocation program. So when we are speaking of allocation we are not just talking about sports fishing or commercial fishing, we are not just talking about gear-type, we are talking as well about providing an allocation to a group in British Columbia whose only option, in many cases, because of the geographic location in which they find themselves is to resort to that resource.

With those remarks, Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members and resume my seat.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate although I note it is an opposition day. In my opening remarks I would like to refer to the first part of the motion which says:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry, as demonstrated
> (a) by betraying the interests of Canadian fishermen in its international fisheries negotiations with the United States;

Before I deal with that particular topic I would like to clarify a few inconsistencies which I believe have become evident here today. I believe it was the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass) who made some comments in relation to the Atlantic Salmon Advisory Board. He indicated that the minister was not involved in the process, nor in the past was he in the habit of using this particular board. It is my understanding that this is incorrect. I am told that the minister has met with the chairman and vice-chairman of this board on numerous occasions and that he has asked several members of the board to undertake specific consultations regarding the possibility of reopening the fisheries in the areas where a ban was imposed—I believe this took place some time in 1972.

I understand that these consultations have now been completed and that the minister will soon be meeting with those concerned to hear their advice. Dealing with the wider aspect, I believe the minister is prepared to listen to these officials, as well as others, on all aspects of the Atlantic salmon management.

There were also a few comments made by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) with regard to the policy affecting freezer-trawlers and factory freezer-trawlers. The present government has not altered the previous government's policy of licensing vessels to fish underutilized species but otherwise of issuing no further groundfish licenses. And none have been issued. It is my understanding that only one holder of an underutilized species licence has acquired a vessel. Some have suggested that given the economics of fishing such species, the previous government may have given some people a licence to go bankrupt.

I think it would be useful to review the steps and events in our relationship with the United States over the past four years as they relate to fisheries. This review will indicate the efforts which have been made to protect the interests of fishermen on both our coasts. Canada and the United States each extended their fisheries jurisdiction to 200 miles in 1977—Canada on January 1, 1977, for both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and the U.S.A. on March 1, 1977. In the period preceding these extensions, negotiations had been initiated between the two countries to try to develop an agreement which would protect the interests of the fishermen of both countries when extensions of jurisdiction came into effect. These negotiations were under way when the Canadian extension came into force and Canada acted, at that time, to protect the negotiating process by passing an order in council to allow United States vessels to continue fishing in Canadian waters until a reciprocal fisheries agreement was completed. The assumption of the Canadian government at that time was that if negotiations for a reciprocal agreement were not completed by March 1, the date on which the U.S. extension would come into force, Canada would expect interim treatment of the same kind for Canadian fishermen until the negotiations were concluded.

As things worked out, an interim reciprocal fisheries agreement applicable to both east and west coasts was worked out. It was effective from February 14, 1977, to the end of the year. The first reciprocal agreement in the period following extensions of jurisdiction had two primary objectives. The first was to allow fishermen of both countries to continue their existing fishing patterns. The second objective was to avoid conflict or prejudice to legal claims in the boundary regions by ensuring that neither party would licence third countries to fish within the area of overlapping claims and providing for flag state enforcement by Canada and the United States, that is, within the area of overlapping claims Canadian laws would apply to, and be enforced against, only Canadian fishermen and the United States would take similar action with respect to United States vessels. This interim agreement was amended in 1978, subject to ratification by both countries. The amendments were designed to deal with problems which had developed under the fisheries agreement of 1977, particularly those involving troll fishing for salmon on the west coast. However, problems continued over the salmon troll fishery on the west coast while the 1978 agreement was being provisionally applied pending ratification.

Because of these difficulties, the Canadian government suspended provisional implementation of the agreement in June, 1978, and it was never ratified. The result of this suspension was that the U.S. fishermen were excluded from the Canadian fishing zone and Canadian fishermen were excluded from the U.S. fishing zone except for special arrangements for halibut fishing under the halibut fishing treaty on the west coast. Fishing by both countries continued, of course, in the areas of overlapping claims on both coasts.

The supsension of reciprocal fishing by the Canadian government in 1978 was a serious step taken with the full support of the Canadian fishing industry to protect Canadian interests. It had become obvious to both the government and the industry that the U.S. government was subject to powerful influences which were making it difficult or impossible for the United States to live up to its commitment to Canada. The suspension of reciprocal fishing at the initiative of the Canadian government avoided the creation of a situation where U.S. fishermen would be obtaining benefits in Canadian waters out of balance with the benefits Canadian fishermen were obtaining in U.S. waters.

The suspension also served notice to the United States that the Government of Canada would not let the interests of the Canadian fishing industry be eroded under pressure and that any agreement reached with the United States would have to be based on an equitable balancing of benefits and interests. Even though the reciprocal fishing agreement of 1978 never came into force, the arrangement between the two countries on how to handle fishing in the boundary areas was continued under, what I might call a gentleman's agreement.

The gentleman's agreement continued the same regime for the boundary areas as applied under the reciprocal agreements. That is, neither country would licence foreign fishing vessels to fish in the area of overlapping claims and there would be flag state enforcement by the United States and Canada. Canada and the United States now undertook an entirely new initiative to try to resolve both boundaries and fisheries on both coasts through the designation of special negotiators for this purpose, Ambassador Marcel Cadieux for Canada and Mr. Lloyd Cutler for the U.S.A.

I do not wish to dwell at length on the pros and cons of these complex negotiations. Suffice it to say that the negotiations for agreements on boundaries and fisheries on the west coast failed, but after a great deal of work by the special negotiators, the negotiating teams and the fishing industries of both sides, an agreement on the east coast was achieved, and signed on March 29, 1979.

The signing of the complex east coast fisheries agreement may be considered both a tribute to the negotiating teams and a reflection of the painstaking care by the negotiating teams to work out a fair balance between the fishing interests of both countries on a stock by stock and percentage point by percentage point basis.

First of all, the agreement refers the boundary issue to international adjudication. Next, and of overriding significance, the agreement provides for conservation of the fish stocks in the Georges Bank area for the periods both preceding and following the eventual settlement of the boundary by establishing a fisheries commission to manage the stocks, and effective arbitration mechanisms to ensure that those stocks will not suffer from any failure to reach agreement within the commission.

Finally, the agreement provides an insurance policy for the fishermen of both countries. No matter where the boundary is placed as a result of the international adjudication, each country is given a fixed percentage entitlement from the total allowable catch limit to be set each year for each stock. This will provide stability for the fishermen of both countries. But the system also provides for a considerable degree of flexibility. The agreed percentage shares are subject to review every ten years, with reductions in shares possible for a variety of reasons. There are ceilings on the amount of the possible reductions for each decade, and a maximum ceiling to avoid the possibility that any group of fishermen would find itself totally excluded from a stock in which it has had a traditional interest.

The situation on the west coast has progressed somewhat differently. Given the impasse reached in the boundaries and fisheries negotiations, discussions between the two countries have focused on individual stocks and, indeed, individual problems.

The salmon interception negotiations have carried on, continuing along the lines developed since the negotiations began in the early 1970s. A full report on the meeting in Seattle last week, which I understand met with some success, is now in the process of being prepared.

Canadian halibut fishermen continue to have access to U.S. waters off Alaska under arrangements worked out two years ago, which are to terminate on or about March 31, 1981. This was in exchange for allowing the U.S. fishermen access to groundfish off the Canadian Pacific coast. It is difficult to say at this time what is likely to happen to this area of reciprocity in 1981-82, but a major success for both countries is that we have kept the Halibut Commission in existence to provide an institutional framework for co-operation between the two countries on halibut conservation.

Finally, as hon. members know, we have had difficulties with the U.S.A. over albacore tuna in the Pacific coast. However, I believe we are well on the way toward a treaty which will provide substantial benefits to Canadian fishermen through access to U.S. ports to sell their tuna catches.

We should not, of course, overlook the fact that difficult issues lie ahead on the west coast. Boundaries remain to be settled, and we are still considerably short of a comprehensive framework to govern conservation and fisheries between Canada and the U.S.A. The difficulties we have had with the east coast agreement must inevitably give rise to misgivings about the possibilities, but the Government of Canada will continue to press for the adoption of a rational relationship with the U.S.A. on both our coasts so as to protect the interests of all those involved in the fishing industry.

On a final note—and I can see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is coming to a close—I believe the hon. member for Malpeque

(Mr. Gass) indicated that he condemns the government for dragging its heels on the east coast American-Canadian fisheries agreement. I do not know the hon. member would suggest to resolve that particular impasse. That problem lies in the hands of the Senate of the United States. At some point I would be interested to hear a suggestion from him in terms of encouraging the U.S. Senate to approve this particular agreement.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on the motion presently before the House since I represent a constituency in Nova Scotia where more than one-third of my constituents are directly or indirectly involved in the fishing industry.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) states, among other things:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry, as demonstrated
>
> (a) by betraying the interests in Canadian fishermen in its international fisheries negotiations with the United States;

Later, it goes on to say:

> (d) by its lack of action to enforce existing legislation protecting our fisheries.

I well remember the statement made on March 29, 1979, by the then secretary of state for external affairs, the Hon. Don Jamieson and, of course, the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc). The statement, which was released with considerable fanfare, indicated that four agreements had been signed with the United States; two relating to the Atlantic coast and two concerning the Pacific coast. The East Coast Fishery Resource Agreement established a Canada-U.S. fisheries commission and provided for co-operative management and access and entitlement to specific stocks of mutual concern.

The treaty to submit the delineation of the maritime boundary in the Gulf of Maine area to binding dispute settlement provided for the submission of a case to a five-judge chamber of the International Court of Justice for a final decision on the placement of the boundary. In the event that the International Court of Justice was unable to function under the formula mutually agreed upon by the governments of Canada and the United States, the dispute was to be automatically referred to a five-member independent international court of arbitration.

The East Coast Fishery Resource Agreement and the halibut protocol were submitted to the United States administration and to the United States Senate for its advice and consent. Although these treaties were signed by the Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Lloyd Cutler, serving as the special representatives of the President of the United States, and by Canada's ambassador Peter M. Towe and special negotiator Marcel Cadieux, to date no action has been taken on this important matter by the United States Senate.

In my opinion this is a flagrant abuse of power by the United States Senate and today, these ineffective treaties represent the biggest single issue Canada has with any particular country. The fact that our Department of External Affairs and our Department of Fisheries and Oceans have been unable to bring any pressure to bear on the United States Senate such as would lead to ratification and approval of these treaties is a sad commentary on the relations which presently exist between our two countries.

Canada, and Canadians, stand by the agreement as signed by the United States administration. We made that fact abundantly clear to the United States senators and congressmen in Washington on Wednesday July 23, 1980. Concerned as we are over the lack of action by Washington on this important matter, the delegation under the chairmanship of Hon. Hartland Molson, assisted by Hon. Richard Donahoe and Hon. Charles Elman plus nine members of the House of Commons, representative of all parties, met with nine American senators including Senator Claiborne Pell and Senator Edward Kennedy and with 11 congressmen in order to try to clarify our position.

We pointed out that the Canadian government cannot, in effect, accept renegotiation of the agreement with the United States Senate. In our view, if amendments are proposed by the Senate these would likely upset the delicate balance achieved after a year and a half of intensive negotiations and would work to the disadvantage of Canadian fishermen since the United States terms of access would undoubtedly be increased.

We also pointed out that amendment or rejection of the agreement could have a serious effect on Canada's bilateral fisheries relations with the United States and might well raise problems which could spill over into other areas.

Moreover, since the signing of the fishery agreement an increased American effort, especially for Georges Bank scallop, has already substantially diminished the share of Canadian fishermen in that stock at a time when the stock is going through a decreasing phase of its natural cycle.

During our discussion in Washington the U.S. senators argued that the treaty should be for a limited time, rather than permanent. I pointed out to them during my remarks that it allows for renegotiating catch shares every 10 years. The Americans wanted more scallops. In fact, the amendment moved by Senator Kennedy to the East Coast Fishery Resource Agreement stated that the agreement should terminate three years from the date of its entry into force. He also proposed further restrictions on Canadian scallop draggers operating on Georges Bank. Senator Kennedy believes that the United States should control scallop management. Unfortunately, as I speak to you tonight, the United States still has no scallop management plan for its own fishermen. They have a groundfish management plan however, and for yellow tail flounder they set a quota of 10,000 pounds to be caught between October, 1979, and October, 1980.

● (2010)

By July of this year, United States fishermen had caught half as much fish again, which explains why Canadian fishermen have little or no faith in any United States management plan not backed up by an international treaty.

After my visit to Washington, there are some doubts in my mind that United States representatives who are opposing the treaty understand it. Maine governor Joseph Brennan does not agree the treaty is perpetual. He says the fisheries are always changing. This viewpoint overlooks the fact that fish on Georges Bank carry no passports. They can be Canadian today and American tomorrow, or vice versa. It overlooks the fact that the two sides must reconsider quotas every ten years and that the treaty, once approved, builds in joint management and dispute settling procedures.

Today there are more and more suggestions that Canadian fishermen should start taking all the groundfish, herring and scallops they can before the Americans do. Their reasoning is that action of this type would give Canadians more fish for the time being, thus making the United States government more conscious of the need for a long-term management treaty.

I am glad to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) in his seat tonight.—Another suggestion I have, if the treaties as they presently exist, are not soon ratified, would be to delink the boundary settlement from the fisheries treaty. As it is now, the boundary line treaty goes to arbitration only after the United States ratifies the fisheries treaty.

As soon as the presidential elections are over in the United States, I hope that our fisheries minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will go to Washington together for the purpose of recommending to the New England fishing interests, the U.S. senators and congressmen that their interests would best be served by prompt ratification of the treaties which Canada and the United States negotiators drew up with a view to protecting the stocks, as a result of which fishermen of both countries will benefit. Unless such an effort is made, Canada's fishermen will rightly share the view that this government is derelict in its duty, not only to them, but to Canadians generally.

I turn now to another contentious issue presently before the industry, namely the marketing problems faced by many large and small processors operating in Atlantic Canada. The present minister—and I regret he is not in the House this evening—has his own views concerning the industry's marketing problems. He expressed them in a rather uncomplimentary manner in some speeches this spring. These comments did not in any way help the industry in its marketing efforts, nor did they provide any solutions for improvement. To tell the industry that there are possibilities outside downtown Boston, that they need to take out a wider map than the map of Massachusetts, is, if I might say so, through you, Mr. Speaker, somewhat beneath the minister's dignity. That the industry is facing some marketing problems is a known fact. What is equally true is that in some cases these problems are directly due to the actions or inactions of the present Liberal administration. When the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans refers to "solidly organized" marketing organizations which have a great deal of "clout"—and I am using his words—with which Canadians must compete, surely he is well aware that these organizations are highly subsidized by their governments.

Norway, for example, paid direct subsidies to its industry amounting to $180 million in 1979—$120 million in the first four months of 1980—and it has paid similar amounts in every year since 1974. In addition, Norway has an outstanding tariff preference in the very important European Common Market. Canadians have been selling significant quantities in Europe in spite of the tariff disadvantage we face on some major products. However, there is no doubt that the European economic community tariffs are being used in a discriminatory way against Canadian imports, and now their reference price system is also being invoked against Canada.

I would remind the minister and this government that the commercial Canadian fishing industry cannot change tariff and non-tariff barriers. Only the government has this power. It seems to me the whole weight and prestige of the Canadian government in its trade relations with the European economic community should be applied to remove these inequitable trade barriers. That is the clout needed by the Canadian fishing industry.

The minister should also strengthen the muscle of the Canadian fishing industry by using his ministerial strength against the frivolous countervail petitions aimed at Canadian exporters by American fishermens' groups. The minister should be more concerned about these matters, if not for the sake of the fishing industry, then at least for the threat that it poses for governments, shipyards and regional development policies.

Quite frankly, I deplore as loudly as possible the confrontation policies which presently appear to exist between the minister and the fishermen, between the minister and the industry and between the minister and the provincial counterparts in Atlantic Canada. In my opinion, the industry and the government, rather than confronting each other in an adversary posture, should be working together in an effort to mutually solve the problems which come under their collective powers.

One of the policies being followed by the minister of fisheries, which is seriously damaging marketing throughout the industry, is his continued policy of over-the-side sales. This spring, the ministers of our three maritime provinces expressed complete dissatisfaction with the lack of meaningful consultation by the federal government on the issue of indirect or over-the-side sales. They questioned, for example, whether the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has the legal authority to allocate amounts of fish to foreign buyers without the approval of the provinces. They agreed there should be no direct sales involving guarantees unless there was prior consultation with the provinces, and that all conditions and guarantees offered to foreign buyers be offered to Canadian firms as well. This seems only fair, and it would place Canadian firms in the same competitive position as foreign companies getting over-the-side sale permits. The provinces also wanted any participating foreign vessel to be granted a permit from the respective provincial authority.

When endorsing these proposals for consideration by the federal government, I want no misunderstanding about my own position. I am not advocating provincial control over our fisheries. I have stated on previous occasions in this House, and I repeat my stand tonight, that I firmly believe the deep sea fishery must remain under direct control of the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: I am sorry, I did not hear the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) who has just made a remark. He has the right to make a speech, I am sure and I know that whatever he said was complimentary to me because we are old friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: However, federal control does not prohibit provincial consultation and this is one area which can be investigated and expanded.

The present federal policy of authorizing over-the-side sales to communist countries with guarantees of extra squid, mackerel or herring to the ship, in the event its holds are not filled prior to leaving our 200-mile exclusive zone, may, on the surface, appear to be a bonanza to our fishermen. But in actual fact its over-all effect is extremely damaging to our industry. There is a growing concern today about the effect of over-the-side sales and their impact on Canadian efforts to develop markets for our fishing products, in particular, the so-called underutilized species, such as mackerel and squid. The problem seems to be that the Canadian industry keeps running into Canadian fish being sold by the Russians, or other east bloc countries, in our own markets. In fact, prospective sales have been turned down because the buyers anticipated Joint Trawlers Ltd., a Soviet company, would have an over-the-side contract in 1980 and would supply the mackerel cheaper. In fact, this has happened.

Recently I attended a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference in Zambia. While I was there I had an opportunity to meet with delegates from all over the Commonwealth, including some from West Africa. While speaking to a delegate from Nigeria, I learned that Nigeria used to provide a huge market for Canadian mackerel. We still sell some mackerel to that country, but we cannot develop a strong position in the market because of the competition provided by the Russians, selling Canadian mackerel which they buy through over-the-side sales in Canada. They pay more to the fishermen than is possible by Canadian processors due to our unemployment insurance costs and high taxes. Because of their fixed overhead, they must have a certain price for their product. The Russians sell for less in order to get hard currency.

I also learned from another source that a Canadian sales team were shown Canadian mackerel in Egypt which had been bought from the Soviets. The price paid by the Egyptians was well below Canadian costs of production. Consequently, the Egyptian buyers advised that they would not buy any more mackerel from Canada unless we could meet the competition. The competition is provided by a communist country using slave labour which pays no taxes to Canada. It does not matter what prices our processors offer to the fishermen. For example, if it is ten cents a pound, the Soviets will offer 12, and if it is 12 cents a pound, they will offer 14. It is economically impossible for Canadian processors to meet that kind of competition.

The same applies to our sales of squid. Japan is the main market for this product, followed by southern Europe. Here again, Joint Trawlers Limited, a Soviet fishing company, undercuts Canadian exporters in Europe, supplying the market with Canadian squid. Japan has import quotas in place for squid, so every pound of quota supplied by the east bloc countries uses up import quotas that Canadians need for entry into the Japanese market. It is also my understanding that Canadian squid from east bloc sellers is underselling Canadian squid being offered by Canadian exporters to Japan, further damaging our position vis-à-vis the import quota.

These are only a few examples. There are many incidents like this which show that our over-the-side sales are hampering Canadian marketing and market development efforts. The effect on Canadian employment is, of course, obvious. There have been attempts to require the fishermen's groups to supply the shore plants' needs in any over-the-side arrangement, but these have not come to anything.

The Newfoundland union was permitted a foreign vessel in Black Tickle, Labrador this summer to buy cod fish—yes, cod fish—in spite of the fact there is a shore plant there owned by the province, and in spite of the fact that Fishery Products Limited, a Newfoundland company, was prepared to transfer any surplus catch to St. Anthony where the cod fish was needed. This deal was approved by the present fisheries minister on the basis that the local plant at least would be supplied, but this did not happen until the foreign vessel went aground and became a total loss.

I believe we have a responsibility to establish Canadians in a position where they can harvest, process and market the species I have mentioned without facing unfair competition from the communist bloc countries, countries that are not required to operate under the profit system but whose aim instead is to work for the overthrow of western countries and the free enterprise system. In fact, if present over-the-side sales policies continue, we must seriously ask ourselves what is the over-all aim of this government as it applies to the fisheries?

You have taken over the processing and marketing of freshwater fish in western Canada; you have taken over the processing and marketing of cod fish in Newfoundland through the Salt Fish Marketing Corporation. Are you now proposing to destroy the independent fresh fish industry in Atlantic Canada so that you will have the entire industry under your control?

If so, if this is your policy, you should come clean with the Canadian industry and the Canadian people presently involved in its development so that they can plan the best course for their own future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this motion, if for no other reason than to bring the House up to date on the latest developments concerning the fishing industry in my province and, in particular, in my riding.

It is a sad commentary on the knowledge that many Canadians have of their country that many of my colleagues in this House, on both sides, are surprised to learn that there is even a fishing industry on the prairies. Indeed, many members of this House thought I was pulling their legs when I talked of it. Therefore, I would like to inform the House tonight that a fishing industry on the prairies really does exist. It is a multimillion dollar industry, it employs thousands of people, it is the backbone on which many prairie communities were founded and it remains so in many of them to this day.

In the year 1978-79, net sales of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, which markets all fish caught on the prairies and in the Northwest Territories, amounted to over $34 million. I realize that this figure pales beside the coastal fishing industries, but it is nevertheless significant to the areas involved. As well, one must add the sale of rough fish, private sales, sales through co-ops and so on.

For the sake of this debate, let me bring my comments closer to home. In my riding of Selkirk-Interlake, there are over 1,000 fishermen doing roughly $10 million worth of business annually. Fishing has been very important to central Manitoba since the late 1870s when the Icelanders came to settle the shores of Lake Winnipeg. The existence of a large body of water with an abundance of fish meant a continuance of a known way of life to people who had for many years fished the north Atlantic. They did encounter one unknown obstacle, ice. The north Atlantic never froze over, but Lake Winnipeg did. However, with a little instruction from the local Indians, they were able to overcome that.

In a rather ironic turn of events, three years ago a fisherman from my home town of Gimli was hired to teach Newfoundlanders how to fish through the ice. My friends from Newfoundland, I must admit, are a touch embarrassed when I tease them about having to learn how to fish from a prairie boy.

For many communities in Selkirk-Interlake, fishing was for many years the major source of income. Gimli, Riverton, Hecla Island, Hodgson, Grand Rapids come readily to mind. In many communities to this day, fishing is still the main business. This is particularly true in many native communities. On Indian reserves at Easterville, Grand Rapids, Little Saskatchewan, Lake St. Martin, Jackhead, Dauphin River, Fisher River and others, unemployment jumps when the fishing season ends to as high as 95 per cent. I think these few comments indicate just how important the inland fishing industry is. In my opening comments, I said that many Canadians were totally unaware of its existence. Too often it seems that the government opposite is also unaware of its existence. In his comments this afternoon, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism spoke of his government's desire to make famous world wide such Canadian fish as salmon, cod, halibut and so on. I was a bit dismayed when he left out pickerel and whitefish, or the famous Lake Winnipeg smoked goldeye. However, we in the Interlake are long used to this kind of neglect from Liberal governments.

At this point in its history, the Manitoba fishing industry is facing some very serious threats. This is not the first time it has been threatened. In the late sixties, the business was floundering badly after years of abuse at the hands of large corporations, largely American owned, which treated their fishermen employees as little better than indentured serfs. However, the establishment of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Board in 1969 brought an end to this. After a somewhat rocky start, this board brought order to the industry and a much greater degree of prosperity.

A year later, Lake Winnipeg was closed because of possible mercury pollution. However, after considerable study, this proved to be wrong and the lake was reopened. The threats to the industry today are many. As my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller), mentioned in his opening comments, the Garrison diversion unit is one of them. My colleague from Skeena mentioned acid rain. This has not yet had any great effect on Lake Winnipeg, but it will inevitably take its toll.

The biggest problem has been government neglect. I would like to focus briefly on three or four areas and explain what I have in mind. One area is licensing. The system of licensing used on Manitoba lakes at the present time is very unfair to many fishermen. On some lakes there are three seasons—summer, fall and winter. Many fishermen are able to get only one licence, others two, very few fishermen have all three. It is very hard to make a living and support a family on only one licence, or two. Last winter, the Manitoba government produced a new scheme of licensing which would inevitably have meant the wiping out of many small fishermen and a return to the pre-1969 era of big interests controlling much of the lakes. During the winter months, they held meetings throughout the province to introduce or to explain this system. I suppose it is indicative of their lack of understanding that they were rather taken aback when their system met with universal opposition. They withdrew the program quickly.

I realize that licensing is administered by the provinces, but the federal government has the right to make some input into policy. However, it has not done so to date.

Another area of contention to Manitoba fishermen, and indeed to many inland fishermen, is the unemployment insurance regulations which are designed for the needs of coastal fishermen and which do not take into consideration the very different needs of inland fishermen. This is especially hard in many of the communities where there is no other employment in the off-season.

The third area is the vessel subsidy program. As many hon. members know, for many years the government provided 35 per cent of the cost of new fishing boats for fishermen. This was a very good program and it was helpful, especially to natives and to young fishermen trying to get into the business. Last summer the government of the day withdrew this program. This caused much consternation to inland fishermen and it was especially hard on natives and on those people who have only one or two licences and who really cannot afford to buy new equipment. It was also hard on the boatworks. I know of two boatworks in the town of Winnipegosis, which is in the neighbouring riding to mine, which were forced to shut down. Two boatworks in the town of Gimli have had to lay off their employees. Last fall the program was reinstated on a limited basis, but at present we do not really know whether it will continue or where it is going to go, and this is very unsettling for many fishermen in Manitoba.

The single biggest threat is one which I have already mentioned, that is, the Garrison diversion unit. Let me explain briefly what the Garrison diversion is. It is an irrigation scheme in the state of North Dakota. It is a motherhood issue, something that has been dreamed of by North Dakotans for over 100 years now. The idea is to use some of the water from the Missouri River system to irrigate the dry lands of north and central North Dakota. The benefits of this system at present are rather questionable. In order to irrigate 250,000 acres of land, 220,000 acres of land will be taken out of production. The cost benefit factor is definitely negative. However, this is not of concern to Manitobans; it is an internal North Dakotan problem. What is of concern to us is that the Garrison diversion unit as defined will link up the Missouri River water basin with the Hudson Bay water basin and as a result of this link-up through-leaching chemicals will be introduced into the Red River-Hudson Bay system, as well as parasites and strange fish.

A year ago, on the first chance I had to speak to the House, other than in the question period, I introduced to the House two of these strange fish, the rainbow smelt and the gizzard shad. Tonight I would like to add a third, the Utah chub. All three of these fish are rapid breeders, very adaptable to new environments, and would seriously threaten existing fish stocks.

Let me read from a technical report issued by the Fisheries & Marine Service in February, 1979. It is entitled "Potential Effects of Exotic Fishes on Manitoba: An Impact Assessment of the Garrison Diversion Unit." With regard to the rainbow smelt, the report concludes:

—we believe that rainbow smelt will be successfully introduced and established in Manitoba waters . . . We believe that smelt, when introduced to Manitoba, will cause the collapse of lake herring populations in Lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba and Winnipegosis and will have a major negative impact on the lake whitefish fishery in the north basins of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba. Smelt will also have negative impacts on walleye fisheries in certain locales of Lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba and Winnipegosis. Declines in the abundance of higher-valued species will result in decrease in fishermen's incomes such as occurred in Lake Erie during the late 1950s.

With regard to the gizzard shad it says:

—we believe that gizzard shad will be introduced and can be established in Lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba and Winnipegosis. There are suitable environmental and habitat conditions, food supplies and spawning areas for establishment of gizzard shad populations in these waters . . . Magnitude of impact may range from minimal impact to the worst possible impact of total collapse of walleye and sauger populations in these lakes.

With regard to our new friend, the Utah chub, they say:

In summary, Utah chub have a high reproduction potential, a potential for population irruptions and likely can establish in Manitoba waters . . . Furthermore, if in Manitoba waters, Utah chub will have a negative impact on indigenous fishes and may become a nuisance to anglers and commercial fishermen (through sheer volume of catch in the nets). We expect Utah chub will compete with whitefish and walleye for food and likely displace, to a major extent, existing forage species, particularly minnows . . . Therefore, we consider this fish to represent the same potential for major impact as rainbow smelt or gizzard shad.

Now I should like to quote some figures. The report gives a table of the percentage reductions in population size. They use three figures, the lowest, the most likely, and the maximum. I will only use the most likely figures. In the Lake Winnipeg north basin, the effect on the lake whitefish will be a 50 per cent reduction; on lake herring it will be 75 per cent; and on walleye and sauger 50 per cent. In the south basin of Lake Winnipeg, the effect on the lake whitefish will be a 5 per cent reduction; on the lake herring, a 5 per cent reduction; and on walleye and sauger, a 50 per cent reduction. In Lake Manitoba, the effect on the lake whitefish will be a 30 per cent reduction; on the lake herring it will be 75 per cent; and on walleye and sauger, 75 per cent.

The end result of this potential hazard to Manitoba fisheries will be nothing short of disastrous. Let me tell you how seriously people in Manitoba are taking this. I am sure the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would not like to hear this comment, but there are people in my riding who consider the resolution of the Garrison issue to be of greater concern to this country, or at least to Manitoba, than the present constitutional issue. There can be no if's or but's on this issue. No link-up of the Missouri River drainage basin and the Hudson Bay drainage basin can be allowed. It is as simple as that. The actions of governments in Winnipeg and Ottawa have been far less than reassuring. The Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 is quite clear. In article 4 it says:

It is further agreed that the waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other.

Clearly the Garrison diversion unit will break that treaty. We get statements from the state department and the executive branch that the Boundary Waters Treaty will be adhered to, but construction crews in North Dakota continue to dig canals. Just last month a tender call was issued for the construction of the New Rockford canal which runs in the direction south of Jamestown. The New Rockford canal is completely useless unless the Lonetree reservoir is completed. If and when the Lonetree reservoir is completed, the link-up between the Missouri and the Hudson Bay systems will be in effect and the Manitoba fishing industry will go down the drain. Meanwhile, our governments rely on diplomatic niceties. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) knows well of my concerns on this issue. Indeed, I believe he is sympathetic and has been supportive of me and of some of the actions I have taken to oppose the Garrison project. Our ambassador in Washington and his staff have done an exceptional job within the confines of their role to express to the U.S. state department and to U.S. politicians our concerns on this matter. But, damn it, it is just not good enough. I have a premonition of the day when the first gizzard shad swims up the Red River.

● (2040)

On that day I see the United States state department reaffirming its position not to violate the boundary waters treaty and our government sitting there still believing the Americans. But it will be too late then.

As the motion put forward today by my hon. friend indicates, this Liberal government is indeed betraying the interests of Canadian fishermen not only on our coasts, as my colleagues earlier have said, but also on our fresh water lakes. If this betrayal does not end soon, members of this government opposite will be as welcome in Manitoba fishing communities as our friend the gizzard shad.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the comments of my good friend, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). He did a good job during the few months that he was president of the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, and I believe that we had very interesting proceedings during his term in office. I would like to congratulate him on the way that he managed and administered this committee during the few months of the Progressive Conservative administration.

Mr. Speaker, in reading once again the wording of the motion that we have been asked to debate today, it seems to me more and more obvious that our friends opposite have not only missed the target, but more important, that they have misdirected their shot by believing that it would be easy to show the failure of this government in the administration of fisheries and oceans, and especially oceans. If there is one area where the Government of Canada is making its presence felt, achieving remarkable results and making the rest of the world aware of the importance it places on the fishing industry, it is certainly that of ocean management. And if there is one person among us who illustrates the interest shown by the Government of Canada in this area, it is certainly the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc).

Mr. Speaker, we must thank God that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of the Progressive Conservative administration between May, 1979, and February, 1980, did not keep his portfolio any longer. Everyone recalls what happened when the large trawlers entered the Gulf of St. Lawrence. All the in-shore fishermen associations of Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and even Nova Scotia appeared before the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to express their dissatisfaction with this policy of the then minister.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a secret that our country is bordered by three oceans. We have the longest shoreline in the world. The sea which surrounds us and over which we extended our country's jurisdiction for fisheries to 200 nautical miles from our shores in January, 1977, for most people—and also, no doubt, for our friends on the other side—has resources, secrets and mysteries still unknown to us. To quote the words of another great parliamentarian, Sir Winston Churchill, when he was describing the Soviet Union: The sea, a great unknown, a mystery within an enigma—

Mr. Speaker, when it created the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in 1977, the government took on an ambitious task. Not only did it take over the responsibility for managing fisheries, it also took on the responsibility for managing the oceans over which it had already affirmed its jurisdiction. Of course there were relationships between ocean sciences and fisheries, but there was much more than that. There was also the challenge of the eighties, a challenge which extends to the responsibilities of the coastal states for the development of off-shore resources as well as the systematic and responsible development of renewable resources. It was, as it can be easily seen, a considerable task and an exceptional challenge.

As we say, the absent are always in the wrong. And I know today that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is not among us. He had some other commitments. Today he is on the Pacific coast, the bearer of good news to those who are in charge of fisheries in British Columbia. For once, we will prove the proverb wrong. It is not by chance that the minister was entrusted with the portfolio of the Fisheries and Oceans after our return to power in February last.

Let us recall a few facts which are all to his credit. The minister who comes from the maritimes had assumed the responsibility of Fisheries and Oceans when he was minister of the environment. It was not long, however, before he was concerned exclusively with fisheries and oceans. The fisheries file at the time was faced with enormous difficulties. My hon. friends opposite will doubtless remember how we dealt with this painful situation in 1974. The industry was coming out of a period of plenty which had lasted several years. Suddenly, it realized that the halieutic resources were not inexhaustible, that the natural environment was in the grip of serious pollution problems, that the fishing areas could be the object of stubborn dealings between the users, in short, that all was not well in the best of all possible worlds, and that it had better get hold of the situation, impose regulations, and especially obtain from all interested parties the assurance to carry out their activities in a responsible manner, in anticipation of the future.

This is the assignment which the minister took on with determination and success. Our hon. friends cannot say anything to the contrary. The hon. member for Westmorland-Kent got back his portfolio after a short break. There are many people from the industry and the users who have expressed their satisfaction. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the captain was taking back the helm of the ship he himself had built and that he knew well how to sail through the tormented seas he knew so well. Thanks to the work of his officials, the administrators and the scientists of his department, the minister has been able to demonstrate with conviction that this industry that some considered of little importance had its place in our country. Through reasonable management practices and through responsible development and expansion programs based on precise data, he proved that this industry was capable of becoming prosperous.

The first to acknowledge this fact are the fishermen themselves, Mr. Speaker, coming from nowhere or just about, they again found themselves lords and masters of the seas and the oceans. Furthermore it is with a renewed pride that they say that they are fishermen and that they have undertaken without cease to roam a vast expense they had been given the keys, namely the oceans and the new economic zone of 200 nautical miles.

Now, what are the challenges ahead in the eighties? In fact, Mr. Speaker, the fishing industry had to undergo a change not only to maintain its present position but also to develop at the same rate as its competitors to be able to respond to new needs.

Fishing has evolved from a simple family business to a sophisticated industry requiring up-to-date equipment and efficient processing methods. It has recently been able to meet new market demands for non-traditional species of fish, which meant the acquisition of new production techniques.

What is the responsibility of the present Canadian administration? When dealing with ocean management, it is addressing a threefold task:

(a) First, under present conditions, dealing with the management of underwater oil operations.

(b) Second: Preserving a very precarious balance by waging a fight against sea pollution.

(c) Last but not least, managing Canadian fisheries within the 200-mile limit.

To make matters clear, I will recall the criteria by which management performance is rated. Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased, a moment ago, on hearing my good friend, the hon. member for South Shore, state that the administration of fisheries in the Atlantic ocean, within a 200-mile zone, must be the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian government and I told the hon. member to go and see his good Progressive Conservative friends in Newfoundland and impress upon them, as well as on the hon. Premier Peckford, that the management of Atlantic fisheries must remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian government. I laud my good friend, the hon. member for South Shore, for his statement. For once, I am in agreement with him and perhaps with you also, my good friend, the hon. member for British Columbia; and we see here the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass) who supported this motion admit that he agrees with this policy of the Canadian government and especially with that of the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In the field of jurisdiction of the Canadian government, the responsibility—and I am not saying that it should be shared but at least the main responsibility—for the management of the fisheries in the Atlantic area should be maintained.

There will be the cumulative amount of statistics compiled in another area. Furthermore, there will be all the effort of co-ordination of an efficient management system; this combined effort with regard to research in every discipline is directed to the integration of all those efforts to the benefit of the people who are expecting results, the individuals themselves.

That we should be faced with problems of production is easy to conceive; however, there is more. There are problems of transportation, equipment, training of manpower and also this nuisance of our time, problems of pollution. These problems can come up in many ways: a breakage somewhere and we are faced with raw materials being spread in the natural environment. When we reach the stage of processing, or usage we are faced with masses of deleterious gases released in the air. I am thinking of acid rain. I am just giving you an outline, of course, but I want to call your attention to that aspect of the problem which did not escape the Canadian government and which is a source of concern especially for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the monitoring of the environment. This has been translated into a series of programs and specialized activities following the adoption by the Canadian Parliament of legislation concerning the protection of the environment which for the time being meet the needs which have been recognized.

In November, 1978, Canada and the United States signed an agreement on water quality in the Great Lakes. This agreement is aimed at eliminating almost totally all dumpings of toxic substances into the Great Lakes and setting a new limit on the permissible quantity of phosphorus for each lake; joint municipal and industrial programs on dumping of polluting products into the lakes are to become operational according to a very tight schedule. During 1979-80 the federal atmospheric environment service completed a study on sulphur contents in the air over a three million square kilometres area in eastern Canada, including the maritime provinces and a major portion of Quebec and Ontario. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans was actively involved in programs whose findings have revealed a high frequency of acid rains over all that wide territory.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am proud to be a member of the subcommittee on fisheries and forestry which is now studying the effects of acid rains in Canada. I will now comment briefly on fisheries management in Canada's 200-mile zone. We often hear critics of the Canadian government and especially of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans declare without any misgivings that the government has done nothing for the management of fisheries and oceans in the 200-mile zone.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the staff has increased considerably at the Department of Fisheries and Oceans since 1976 and national outlays earmarked for scientific research on fisheries totalled some $112 million annually. In conclusion I should say that the Canadian government has done a lot for oceans and for the administration of fisheries in Canada. It is certainly not a failure as the opposition claims, but indeed this political party, this government has done its best for the management of fisheries and oceans and the minister and member for Westmorland-Kent deserves full marks for that.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) for placing this motion on the order paper for debate today, because it gives us an opportunity which is all too seldom afforded to bring to the fore some of the problems in the east and west coast fisheries.

In thanking him I would not say I agree entirely with every single word he has put into his motion. In fact, I take exception to the word "betraying" which appears in the first paragraph because I think it is a very strong word. The negotiators I know in the international field, particularly those negotiating with the United States, are not the kind who betray. They may not properly take certain things into account; perhaps that is a better way of putting it. I would say the motion should read as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the Canadian fishing industry, as demonstrated
> (a) by its failure to take into account all the interests of Canadian fishermen in its international fisheries negotiations with the United States—

Now the very first one of these I would tie in with section (d) of this motion because the government has demonstrated all too obviously a lack of action to enforce existing legislation and its claim to the 200-mile limit. There has been altogether too little effort made by this government to live up to and enforce the extra maritime territory which was acquired by the decision to extend the fisheries zone out to the 200-mile limit. Therefore I think we do have a way of uniting sections (a) and (d) of this particular resolution, and if possible I may be able to get at one of the others.

One of the things I do wish to speak about this evening is the manner in which international agreements between Canada and the United States are concluded and what happens to them once they are concluded. We have heard from the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) the problems related to the fishing agreement on the east coast. I was not at that special meeting in Washington when a group of members from both sides of the House, and from both Houses, went to Washington to explain to the United States Congress the Canadian position on the ratification procedure related to that particular agreement. However, I was present when the matter was first initiated in San Diego during the visit of the Canada-U.S. parliamentary group. At that meeting the member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) suggested that rather than take up all the time of the meetings in San Diego—there were other topics we were discussing at that time—it might be desirable for a special group to go to Washington. It did that in July.

We read this morning in a press release of recommendations made to the two governments by negotiators on the west coast which it is expected will be adopted as a treaty in due course. There are four, five or six elements in this agreement which I think are worth recording here. One is the recommendation which deals with the problem of interception, that is, which country may catch which fish. Conservation of all five species of Pacific salmon was taken into account during negotiations and recommendations were agreed upon as to who should be able to catch whose fish. Catches of salmon spawned in one country but caught in another should be limited. According to this press release it is generally agreed—as it has been agreed for years—that the division should be equal, although at the present time Canadians take about two million U.S. salmon each year while Americans take five million Canadian-bred salmon. That inequity is one of the problems which the negotiators have been attempting to deal with, and it is one worth noting.

Another matter which was included in the recommendations dealt with the situation which arises when one country wants to allow more salmon to return upstream so as to encourage a greater stock production. In that case there would be a proportionate decrease in the take on the American side resulting in the Americans proportionately reducing their take. Accordingly, there would be a smaller catch of American-bred salmon. Then there is the question of control over the Fraser River, and, finally, the recommendation that Canada should receive credit for fish spawned in northern British Columbia and Yukon rivers but caught in U.S. nets. That is a very special problem because of the panhandle and because of the flow of the rivers. The salmon enter the Yukon River, in American estuaries, swim up the Yukon and eventually breed in Canadian territory. At another Canada-U.S. interparliamentary group meeting we did see some of the escapement going through the fish ladders up in Whitehorse.

These are some of the matters which are dealt with in that particular fishing agreement but there are other agreements in train, agreements concerning the boundaries. There is an agreement on the boundary between the panhandle and British Columbia, the 54° 40′ point, which most of us who studied Canadian history way back can remember. I don't know whether they still talk about 54° 40′ or not. But there the Americans have claimed a great chunk of the waters leading into the Canadian waters at the Dixon entrance and further up north although there has been no positive negotiations on the extension of the 141st meridian, which is the border between the Yukon and Alaska, up to the frozen ocean, as the treaty suggests. There is definitely a U.S. claim to take a larger slice of the Beaufort Sea than is considered appropriate by the Canadian negotiators, the Canadians claiming the extension of the 141st meridian. That is right and proper. That is what the agreement said when it laid down that tortuous division between the Canadian and U.S. territories.

Having gone through all that, one of the things I do want to stress is the role Parliament might be able to play in these negotiations or in some part of the treaty-concluding process. The authorities are quite firm on this subject, and I quote from the present Under-secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Alan Gotlieb, who in 1968 wrote a treatise on Canadian treaty-making, in which he said:

> In Canada, the power to make, or enter into, a treaty is possessed by the Crown.

There is no question about that. Those concerned do draw advisory opinions from the interested parties and in the case of the west coast they obviously take them from the fishermen and from the province. The next stage beyond the conclusion of the treaty, however, is the ratification process. What happens to the treaty once it is concluded by the negotiating parties? The practice has grown up in Canada, of late at least, to consider this, too, as being an executive act, although if one goes back as far as 1928 one will find that in certain cases this House could ratify a treaty. Here I quote Mr. Mackenzie King, then prime minister, who, speaking in the House on April 12, 1928, concerning a convention, said:

> I might say to my honourable friend first with respect to the course of procedure that is being adopted of having Parliament approve this convention, that that course is in accordance with the principle underlying a resolution of this House which was introduced by myself a year or two ago, and at the time unanimously adopted.

In other words, in the conventions of treaty-making and treaty-conclusion and treaty-ratification, this House could ratify a treaty. We see this process in the United States, and it can be stalled in the United States in a way which I think is absolutely unacceptable. It is an executive act, the conclusion of a treaty. In the United States it is an executive act. But ratification is an act of the Senate, of the legislature. Now, I think there are two suggestions that ought to be made because on the United States side the Senate has held up ratification of that east coast treaty. I think we should insist that before we go into any negotiations of this importance with our American neighbours there should be a congressional component on their negotiating team. It is an unusual procedure and an unusual suggestion, but this is an unusual situation. Ratifying the boundaries will be even more difficult and even more unusual. There should be a congressional component from the United States involved in the negotiation process. I also suggest that when treaties of this significance and importance have been concluded, we in this House or in the Senate or perhaps in joint committee, should have an organized procedure for parliamentary ratification and that it should not be left merely to the Crown as has heretofore been the case, with some exceptions. Perhaps some of the very prominent constitutional experts in this House, one of whom claims that distinction now, could look into this particular matter to determine whether in Canadian parliamentary terms we could perform that particular act.

If we could in fact ratify such a treaty, then we could also hold up ratification of an agreement just as the Americans are holding up a particular agreement with Canada. The disaster which is being wrought on the scallops on the Georges Bank because of the failure of the treaty to be ratified in the United States Senate is something for which we may all pay in the near future.

The situation is very distressing, but if that possibility of double hostage-taking, if you like, were in existence, then we might very well have seen these particular treaties ratified. I suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) that this treaty which is now being concluded might very well, as a test case, be submitted to this form of ratification in the Canadian Parliament, once the agreement has been finally put into a form acceptable to the minister.

I would like to go on to make other suggestions and comments, but I feel that if I stop with that one single message it will perhaps be stronger and more emphatic. It would also enable some of my colleagues to take the floor. So I suggest that before entering negotiations with the United States we insist that they have a congressional component in their negotiating team and that we on our side, see to its ratification. I do not suggest that this procedure apply in all cases, but I suggest that Parliament should deal with ratification of particular treaties. For example, there might be good cause for the opposition to say, "This particular treaty deserves ratification by the parliamentary process".

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the argument of the hon. member who just had the floor. Without detracting in any way from his very well presented thesis, I would like to say that the press reports in the last day or two that a west coast salmon treaty is just about ready for signing are entirely erroneous. All that has been discussed so far is what to talk about in the real negotiations.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my thanks to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) for bringing this subject before the House at this time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It was a wonderful surprise.

Mr. Manly: We on the west coast face a real crisis and it is important that we take the time to discuss the matter. My colleague from Nanaimo-Alberni has put forward a comprehensive criticism of the government's failure to support Canada's fishing industry. Among other things, he mentioned its failure to stand up to the United States in negotiating our fishing treaty and its failure to refuse to allow them to push us on the boundary issue.

The hon. member pointed out that the continuing high interest rate policy of this government is an added burden on fishermen who are already facing serious problems of high payments on their boats. He pointed out the government's failure to limit the amount of gear that is going into the water, with the result we continue to have more and more gear chasing fewer fish. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni pointed out the government's failure to develop our research capability at the very time we face growing management difficulties with the fishing industry. Finally, he pointed to the serious neglect of fish habitat.

It is interesting to hear what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) had to say in an interview while in British Columbia last spring. The newspaper report I have here quotes him as saying:

> There are some problems on the west coast but in the past it has shown it can take the knocks.

The fishing industry on the west coast is taking very serious knocks and unless the minister and the department get to work it will receive a knock-out blow from which it will never recover. Along with other members of my party who are vitally concerned about the future of this resource and the industry in British Columbia, I plead with the minister and his department to take some positive action that will alleviate the situation.

Within the broad outlines of the criticism established by my colleague from Nanaimo-Alberni, I would, first of all, like to make some remarks of particular interest to my constituency, Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands. Second, I would like to point to some of the problems which the native Indian people of British Columbia face with regard to fishing. Like fishermen from all along the British Columbia coast, many of those in Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands have experienced a disastrous year. Depleted stocks, low catch prices, rising costs and high interest rates have all worked together to keep fishermen from breaking even, let alone making a profit or even making their wages.

Ten years ago the salmon catch in British Columbia was 280 million pounds. Last year it was half that at 140 million pounds. This year I understand we will be very lucky if we break 100 million pounds. Obviously, something very serious is wrong with the way in which the department has managed the resource. The people who are paying for this mismanagement are the people who have been led to invest money in boats and in gear with the hope of making their livelihood from fishing. They are caught in a vicious cycle of boom and bust.

I submit that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans must manage the resource much better and that we should not be subject at the mercy of periodic slumps. There is need at the present time for immediate help so that fishermen do not lose everything for which they have worked over the past few years. Right now their livelihoods are in jeopardy as they try to make the high interest payments on their investments in boats and gear. Unless action is taken to protect these fishermen, this industry will become controlled more than ever by large corporations, and as anyone who has looked at the industry knows, this has been continuing trend over the last 50 years, more and more power being gathered into the hands of fewer and fewer corporations.

Along with my concern for fishermen who are making high payments on their boats, I would like to make a plea for the shore workers. I would request that the government consider bringing in some kind of special legislation to lower to eight the number of weeks that shore workers must work in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. It is important that these people, on whom the industry depends, on whom our economy depends, should not have to bear the entire brunt of the boom and bust cycle which is a result of the government's failure to act. They should not have to assume the entire burden. I think it would be right and fitting if the government shared that burden.

When I look around my constituency, Mr. Speaker, I become greatly concerned at the government's failure to protect the fish habitat. I welcomed the assurance given the other night by officials of the department that it would continue to protect the fish habitat in the Cowichan estuary regardless of what the provincial task force on the Cowichan estuary will say when it finally reports. We have been waiting for that report for more than two years.

There seems to be a determination on the part of some forces in British Columbia to further industrialize the estuaries. Of course, these are easy places in which to put industry but industry in such sensitive areas would destroy the very basis of our fishing industry and the basis of our present and future prosperity. The federal department should have the gumption to oppose this kind of industrialization which can only lead to the degradation and destruction of the fish habitat. There was federal representation on the task force. We are waiting for the results of its investigation to see whether the department is willing to protect the fish habitat or whether it is going to bow before the demands of those who want to industrialize the estuaries and who have no concern for the habitat of fish. People come to me to talk about the Fraser River and how important it is to the economy of British Columbia—indeed, to the economy of Canada. We regret the failure of this government to protect the Fraser River and keep it from turning into the world's largest sewer.

While the Fraser River is important—and I do not want to underestimate its importance—I want to emphasize that there are numerous smaller rivers and streams which, combined, have a very great fish producing capacity. In my constituency the government has been just as neglectful of these small areas as it has been of the Fraser River. For example, the Cowichan River is in serious trouble at the present time and this is a river that has a fairly major impact on our fisheries. The study done for the Cowichan estuary task force two years ago pointed out that this river is important to Indian food fishing, to commercial fishing and also to sports fishing. I walked the banks of that river with an old-time fisherman last spring and saw how some of the side channels have been allowed to silt over and how the debris has accumulated. These side channels need to be cleared so that the fish can spawn there again. I was shown some of the log jams and the destruction they cause. As the water comes down river, it hits the log jams, and forces its way into other channels and develops swift currents that eat away more and more of the bank. As a result there is less space in which the salmon can spawn. What used to be one of the best salmon rivers in British Columbia is being destroyed by neglect. What we need is some kind of joint federal-provincial arrangement to take care of this river and others like it.

I was disappointed to learn that of the $28.5 million budgeted for the salmonid enhancement program in 1980, only $1 million was put aside for natural enhancement. Too much of the emphasis in the salmonid enhancement program is laid on big engineering projects. When the program was introduced three or four years ago, departmental officials held hearings in small and large communities throughout British Columbia to find out what the people thought was the most necessary aspect of it. The message in one community after another, was that emphasis should be placed on natural methods of enhancement and on stream clearing. Instead, the department has chosen to establish the big engineering projects. Of that $28.5 million allocated to the salmonid enhancement program, only $125,000 is available for public participation projects and small stream work.

In my constituency, the Cowichan Indian band has a salmonid enhancement projet but it is hard pressed to find the funds to carry out the work. In this House we have spoken about the problem of Indian unemployment. This is a program which could help the salmon industry and put people to work at the same time but the funds do not seem to be available. The government has suggested that the band could apply to the Canadian Community Development Project for funds.

Of course, the government knows full well that the money allocated for these projects in all of western Canada, is but a drop in the bucket and does not begin to meet any of the real needs—either of stream clearance, the hatchery project, nor to speak of the need for employment. It is just a cynical public relations move.

I am concerned about the government's failure to protect the fish habitat from spraying by chemicals about which we do not have sufficient evidence, such as the krenite spraying that took place in British Columbia during last summer.

My next area of concern relates to Indian fisheries, Mr. Speaker. I welcomed the announcement made a week ago that $4.2 million would be made available to Indian fishermen in special aid. I think this recognizes an important crisis. Unless help is given now, even more Indian fishermen will be squeezed out of business. Since 1969 when the Davis Licence Limitation Plan was introduced, the Indian people have been squeezed out of the industry. For example, one group of Indian people on the west coast of Vancouver Island found that between 1973 and 1976, the number of Indian-operated trollers declined by 54 per cent. These figures indicate very dramatically how the Indian people are being squeezed out.

We should recognize that a crisis exists at the present time and, we should also recognize that the Indian people face a continuing crisis. We know that 59 per cent of the Indian population is under age 25 yet there is no program to provide jobs for these people, and they are not able to enter the fishing industry. Traditionally, the Indian people on the west coast have been referred to as the salmon people—people who depended on the ocean and on the annual runs of salmon even before there was a commercial industry there.

This has been their culture and life. They are being squeezed out of it. It is important we recognize the significance of this crisis and make money available to help them. We need money for the economic development of the fishing industry on the coast. I thought the Indian fishermen's assistance program was helpful, but there have been severe criticisms of it. Some of the Indian people have asked whether it was right that one small group of people should be allowed to develop themselves while others were being squeezed out of the program. More of the Indian organizations are asking for programs to help the whole Indian community to develop Indian community well-being rather than simply to develop individual well-being. We need training programs for our Indian people, so they can become involved in more of the complex areas of the fishing industry.

Perhaps we should also be looking at a very old method of catching fish by the use of fish traps which the Indian people used. I realize it is heresy to talk about this in our time because we are so committed to the idea of free enterprise in the fishing industry, to the idea of using more and more gear and burning up more and more oil chasing after fish. However, maybe there is a possibility that the old method of establishing fish traps at the mouth of a river, through which mature fish come would eliminate the trouble of catching all the small fish which must be thrown away. Then we would be able to manage individual streams and develop the resource for the entire community. We would be able to take some kind of rational approach to the fishing industry. Perhaps in five or ten years more people might realize that fish traps are a more sensible approach than the present gear-intensified craziness which is presently destroying our resource and making it more difficult for people to make a living from it.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to speak to this motion because the fishery is the lifeblood of my province and it is vital to many of my constituents in Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe.

What we have before us is a motion which condemns the Government of Canada for its failure to support Canada's fishery—condemns us to where, I do not know; nevertheless it condemns the Government of Canada. The motion goes on to accuse the Government of Canada of betrayal, or of following a course of anarchy in its fisheries policy; also it complains of a lack of change in policy and finally it accuses the government of failure to enforce those policies already described as a betrayal to fishermen in the first place. I would suggest the motion in itself is a contradiction in its terms.

Let me suggest to the hon. member in the New Democratic Party who put forward this motion that I respect his right to present it. I respect his right to raise his concerns about Canada's fishery. In fact, I agree, with many of his concerns and I am sure the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) would agree also. I am concerned about large corporations getting control of a bigger chunk of the fishery. I am concerned about companies that would like to monopolize the fishery at the expense of our fishermen. I am concerned too about the threat which industry is posing to Canada's fishery every day.

In my own province, the most stringent environmental guidelines will have to be applied to protect our fishery from offshore oil and gas development. However, I would respectfully submit to my colleague opposite that to offer constructive advice, in other words, to move a motion for the consideration of this House which might bring about important change, would be more productive and positive than any negative motion.

It is my intention to clarify some of the matters raised in this House today by opposition members as they relate to the fishing industry on the west coast of Canada and in my own area on the east coast.

First, dealing with the west coast of Canada, I shall start with a few statistics. Traditionally, the west coast fishing industry represents approximately 35 per cent of the total revenue generated by the fishing industry right across Canada. It is responsible for the direct employment of roughly 22,000 people. The five main species of Pacific salmon are sockeye, chum, pink, chinook and cohoe and they are, of course, the backbone of the fishing industry off the coast of British Columbia. As such they represent a bountiful renewable resource.

Over the years, salmon have provided a good living for many west coast fishermen. Annual income of $50,000 to $70,000 have not been uncommon in recent seasons. If honourable members have any doubts about the state of prosperity of the west coast fishing industry, they have only to cast their eyes over fishing fleets in such places as Steveston or Prince Rupert and contemplate the investment of tens of millions of dollars tied up in boats and gear, much of it the latest and most advanced technology on the market.

Unfortunately, and it is unfortunate, the situation in 1980 is not as buoyant as it has been in previous years. My information is that despite some unexpectedly high chum catches in recent weeks, salmon landings generally in B.C., up to the end of September, were running 22 per cent below those for the corresponding period in 1979. Extrapolating that trend to the year end indicates that 1980 salmon landings will range between 52 per cent and 91 per cent of the ten-year average, depending on the species, with the over-all total at about 77 per cent of the ten-year average. That is not good news. Predictions are that the total landed value of this year's salmon catch will amount to approximately $103 million. This is a 36 per cent drop from the 1979 value of $160.5 million and it is much below the four-year average of $140 million in the period 1976 through 1979. The fact that salmon prices are from 10 per cent to 20 per cent lower than last year is a contributing factor to the over-all decrease in landed value. I might point out that catches of salmon fishermen in the northern part of the province were actually higher than in 1979, both in the troll and the net fisheries. The fishermen who are doing poorly this year are mainly those fishing off the southern part of British Columbia, particularly the trollers.

Making this a worse-than-usual year for the industry in B.C. was a strike earlier this year. Indeed, there was a strike in my province, which will no doubt reflect itself in the figures at the end of the year. Because of the strike by the herring fishermen in British Columbia, most of them did not participate in the previously lucrative roe herring fishery this year.

What will the impact of this downturn be on the average west coast fisherman? Certainly there will be a decrease in the net incomes of many fishermen in 1980. In some cases, this could lead to repossession of vessels—God forbid—where the owners are caught in a credit squeeze. However, because of the healthy earnings of past seasons, there is every expectation that most west coast fishermen will be able to cope with the situation and get through until next season with a little belt tightening.

I have been assured that officials of the department are continuing to closely monitor the impacts of current economic conditions on Pacific fisheries in order to assess whether special assistance may be necessary.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could the hon. member who is speaking answer a short question at this time?

● (2140)

Mr. Tobin: I will accept the hon. member's question when I am finished.

Although the fisheries economic picture on the west coast this year is not as bright as one might have wished, it does forcefully point up the unpredictability which characterizes the fisheries harvest and the extreme complexity of managing the fisheries resource. And nowhere is this task more complex than in the salmon fishery on the west coast.

As an example of this complexity, one might take the Fraser River system which has more than 40 different stocks of chinook salmon, whose movements once they leave the river are still not fully understood. Each stock is unique with its own set of characteristics which allow it to migrate the required distances, to develop in temperatures indigenous to its spawning area and generally to survive in the environment of its home river. For example, McGregor River chinook travel nearly 500 miles to their spawning grounds, compared with Capilano stocks which only swim about four miles upriver. Egg incubation periods differ from stock to stock and so do the rearing times of young fish.

The Fraser is probably one of the most complicated systems that fisheries management personnel must cope with. This is due to the fact that the commercial fleet is concentrated in the areas through which the Fraser stocks must pass, coupled with the long and perilous journey up the main stem of the river which the fish must make to reach their spawning grounds. The intense fishing pressure, the natural hazards facing the salmon's survival and encroachment on the habitat of the salmon as a result of various industrial activities and competing resource uses, all add to the problems of fisheries management. Not only are a few stocks declining in the face of this onslaught, but some are in danger of extinction.

However, our fisheries managers are not ready or willing to throw in the towel in their fight to save and hopefully, enhance, the Fraser chinook stocks. For them and for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the struggle to save the salmon takes on aspects of a religious crusade. They know what they are trying to do is worth while and that the results of their labours will benefit not only the present generation, but generations yet unborn.

A key element in this fight is a massive tagging program which over the next few years is hoped will generate the information that fisheries biologists need to effectively manage the commercial, sport and native food fisheries, and to plan future enhancement programs.

Last year nearly 600,000 three-month-old chinook fry from British Columbia rivers and hatcheries, had a fin clipped off and a coded wire identification tag inserted in the nose cartilage. When sport fishermen catch one of these fin clipped fish, they are asked to turn the heads into depots across the province. The commercial catch is sampled for marks in the processing plants. The nose tags are removed and the number codes read and recorded. In this way it is possible to identify the date and origin of the fish and gain information on where, when and how the fish was caught, thereby assisting biologists in charting the migration patterns of the different stocks of salmon of British Columbia.

The statistics from tagging will also allow fishery managers to pinpoint more accurately the times and places when a fishery should be closed down in order to allow stocks to escape the fishermen's nets or hooks and return to the river to produce the next generation.

However, establishing a fishing plan which will ensure adequate escapements to each river is made even more difficult when stocks from a variety of rivers are mixed together in the same fishery. For example, if a stock from a highly productive river and stock from a river that is not as productive are fished together, too large a percentage of the less productive stock may be caught, thereby furthering the decline of that stock.

A similar problem arises when stocks from an artificial enhancement facility and "wild" or natural, stocks are fished together. This is because enhancement facilities obtain much higher survival rates than occur in the wild. With cohoe salmon stocks, for example, survival rates of 80 per cent from the egg to smolt stage—that is when they first venture into the ocean—are common in hatcheries. By contrast only about 11 per cent or 12 per cent of the cohoe which incubate and rear in the stream in totally natural conditions will survive to the smolt stage. Thus if natural and enhanced stocks are fished together, the fishery manager must choose between the harvesting of fewer fish from the enhancement facility than necessary, or the harvesting of too many wild fish.

I must apologize to hon. members if I have become too technical in attempting to explain what the fishery manager is up against when involved with the west coast salmon fishery. My sole intention is to provide a better insight into the complexities of the matter. And at that, I must admit that I have only just scratched the surface.

The opposition motion seeks to condemn the government for alleged lack of action to devise and implement revised policies to regulate the industry or to enforce existing legislation protecting the fisheries. Certainly as far as the west coast of Canada is concerned, there is little to substantiate such allegations.

Earlier I made brief mention of the problems of safeguarding the habitats where salmon breed and grow from degradation or complete destruction as a result of various industrial activities such as logging, construction of hydroelectric dams, dredging, dumping of wastes, mining operations and so on.

Obviously it makes little sense for the federal government to invest millions of dollars in salmon enchancement schemes to increase the supply of salmon if there is no control over assaults on the basic habitats of the stocks—the cradle of the runs, as it were. For this reason the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has placed a high priority on its habitat management activities, and nowhere more so than on the west coast.

Miss MacDonald: What's his name?

Mr. Tobin: For the hon. lady's information, it is the member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe. I am very much interested in the west coast fishery. I wish the hon. lady were as well.

At this point, it might be of value if I said a few words about the salmonid enchancement program, so important to the people of B.C., particularly fishermen. This ambitious and imaginative program was launched in 1977 by the federal government in co-operation with the government of British Columbia and is designed to double the annual catch of Pacific salmon in the space of 20 years or so, that is, add about 25 million salmon to the current catch. The federal government investment in the initial seven-year phase has been set at approximately $150 million. It is the government's intention to continue this funding, based on the success of the initial phase, to bring about the required objectives.

In economic terms, the objective of the salmonid enchancement program is to increase the landed value of the salmon harvest from the current yearly average of $160 million to $400 million, in 1980 dollars, by the year 2000. This will be achieved by allocating the increased production to its best use and by undertaking cost-effective programs to increase the quality of fish products.

A further objective would be to double direct sport fishing benefits from $50 million to $100 million by the year 2000, as well as continuing to meet the needs of the traditional Indian subsistence fishery.

I realize there are others who would like to say a few words on this motion. I simply want to add as a Newfoundlander and one who is very concerned about Canada's fishery, that I share many of the concerns raised here today, in particular with regard to the environment, on the question of whether to allow industry to grab a bigger chunk and the problem of preventing monopolies from forming.

I repeat, however, that a motion which merely condemns but offers no positive and constructive advice is not good enough. I would suggest that my colleague in the New Democratic Party come back with another motion which makes some concrete suggestions. I would then support his motion.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a serious question to the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe. Almost all of his speech dealt with the west coast salmon fishery. I would like to ask him whether his speech was prepared for him by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans or whether he prepared it himself.

● (2150)

Mr. Tobin: I am quite pleased to tell the hon. member opposite that I have had a great deal of help in preparing this speech. In fact, my good colleague and friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson), provided me with a great deal of research material, and I certainly appreciate it. I am not one of those who would dare venture to rise in the House of Commons without at least having had the opportunity of asking for advice and information which could be useful to me in participating in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to make some remarks in connection with the motion condemning the government for its neglect of the fishing industry. It provides me with an opportunity to make some general remarks about the great importance of the east coast fishery to Nova Scotia and the Atlantic provinces.

First, I should make it clear that in my constituency of Halifax West, less than 5 per cent of our work force is employed in the fisheries industry. Nonetheless, it is a matter of great importance to all of us because in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia we see part of our hope for the future. That industry, along with developments in the field of energy and marine transportation, will bring us, we hope, to a new era in the 1980s.

Let me begin a discussion of the fishing industry in Nova Scotia by listing some facts which underline the magnitude as well as the importance of our industry to the whole of Canada. We rank fifteenth worldwide but first in export sales of fish. There are over 100,000 people directly employed in fishing, and this accounts for $1.3 billion in export sales. That compares favourably with export wheat sales which amount to approximately $2.2 billion. Canadian fish production has an estimated worth of $1.6 billion, and at least $1 billion of this is earned on the east coast where most of the production is centred in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland to the extent of about 80 per cent of the total. There are 600 fish plants along the east coast and they have an effect on over 200 communities.

In the short time remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, let me speak more generally about the fishing industry. First of all, we must note that it is a world-wide industry and that Canada is only a part of it. For that reason, we must deal with other nations and other jurisdictions in order to achieve our great potential in the fishing industry. When I mention the world-wide involvement of the fishing industry, I am mindful of the fact that no treaty affecting the scallop fishery and the fishery on Georges Bank has been signed between the United States and Canada. We along the east coast of Nova Scotia urge the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to take action in this respect. Any delay will cause the disruption of the industry and potential irreparable damage. We deal with other foreign states. Recently one of the assistant deputy ministers in the department brought public attention to the fact that a new treaty must be negotiated with France which will affect the cod allocations in the Gulf of St. Lawrence to prevent the fishing industry operating in the Gulf of St. Lawrence from being jeopardized. We are very conscious of the world-wide connections of the industry and we urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) to be conscious of it as well.

As well as dealing with other nations, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, in his role as supervisor of the fishing industry in Canada, must deal with the provinces, and, as we all know, that has caused a great deal of grief and concern. We in Nova Scotia support the position that the federal authority must take total responsibility for the fishing industry. That is not to say that the provinces should not be consulted in matters of vital interest to them, particularly, as I have mentioned, in the matter of the allocation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence fish stocks.

In 1976, by action of the federal government, Nova Scotia-based fishermen were precluded from entering into the Gulf of St. Lawrence for the purpose of utilizing northern cod stocks. That situation was remedied in 1979 and an allocation was made in the Sydney-Bight area just outside the traditional Gulf of St. Lawrence area. This is a very important segment of the Nova Scotia fishing industry where 1,000 metric tons of cod are caught, producing 35 jobs and around $750,000 in revenue. It has been said that the Nova Scotia fishing fleet could easily take 23,000 metric tons of cod fish without affecting the over-all industry, fish which, instead, are taken by France and other foreign nations.

I do not need to remind the House what a tremendous economic liability we suffer in Nova Scotia from not having access to the Gulf of St. Lawrence stocks. It is up to the minister to resolve these federal-provincial problems. He can only resolve them by conducting negotiations with those concerned, not by confrontation or by putting down those who are legitimately in the fishing industry, whether it be inshore of offshore. But that, I am afraid, is not the course which the minister has pursued in the past. He has said, and I have the quotation here, that he is not running a winter works program, that he cannot react to the needs of the fish plant workers and the employment problems in areas which are dependent on the fishing industry. That is the kind of remark which causes difficulty and destroys understanding, and for which the minister must take responsibility.

Last Sunday I was watching the proceedings in the House as re-telecast on the CBC and I saw the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) making a particularly earthy speech, typical of a person using earthy language. My son, who is only 11 years old, was there listening with me and he asked me, "Who is that?" I said, "That is the Minister of Agriculture", to which my son said, "Thank God he is not the minister of fisheries". But I had to say to him that I am not at all certain that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans possesses a greater understanding of his portfolio than does the Minister of Agriculture, and certainly he lacks the knowledge which it is imperative for him to have if he is properly to supervise the fishing industry in Canada.

I should like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to draw attention to some of the problems of the fishermen in Nova Scotia and elsewhere on the east coast. They are the victims of the lack of a clear licensing policy on the part of the federal government. There are part-time fishermen who have licences and do not fish, but there are also full-time fishermen who cannot get licences and who cannot upgrade their equipment and their vessels because of confusion over licensing. This must be remedied immediately. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has told us that in 1981 he will introduce a new fisheries licence policy, but we have no guarantee that it will be any better than the last.

Another concern of the fishermen in my area is that the government should clarify its policy on loans for vessel construction. Anyone who has delved into this matter knows about the confusion caused by the size of boats and the great number of years before which they qualify for replacement. Action has to be taken in this respect.

With regard to small-craft harbours, the government and the department has a budget of $15 million for this item. But do you know, Mr. Speaker, that they cannot even put a light on a wharf in a small-craft harbour so that the fishermen can utilize the wharf at night, in the early morning and when the sun goes down at six o'clock? A wharf costing thousands of dollars is not much use if it remains unlighted in order to save the federal treasury $100 or $200. This must be changed and we must start paying attention to our small-craft harbours.

There are many other matters which need mentioning—some of them were covered by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). There is the matter of direct sales which has destroyed the squid industry. We must find other ways to get a fair price for our fishermen. There is the matter of aquaculture, in which Norway is way ahead of us. They are already producing tons of valuable fish species through an aquaculture process. With regard to research, we welcome the fact that notwithstanding the closure by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of the fisheries lab, National Sea Products and H.P. Nickerson have formed a company to develop fisheries research. The name of the company is Fishes Resource Development Limited. I hope the minister will give the company some assistance because research is such an important segment of the fishing industry.

In manufacturing, we are spending $130 million on purchasing fish equipment outside Canada. This, too, must be changed. We have to develop an equipment manufacturing sector.

I see that the clock has reached ten. I will terminate my speech by warning the minister that if he does not take action, the motion against him will indeed be supported on all sides of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the house that the proceedings under section (11) of Standing Order 58 are deemed to have terminated.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980—INQUIRY RESPECTING REDUCTION OF PHASING-IN PERIOD FOR VETERANS' WIDOWS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, October 20, as recorded in Hansard at pages 3822 and 3823 I put a couple of questions to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) in his capacity as the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. I am grateful to the minister for being here tonight so that we can discuss again for a few minutes the important issue involved in the question I put to him.

I always hope that in one of these late shows one might get a favourable answer which tells us we are winning in an important cause. If the minister is not able to do that tonight, at least I hope he will leave the door open so that it will not be long before we do win what I regard as a very important issue.

As hon. members are aware, for about 50 years we had a provision in the Pension Act which denied a pension as of right to a widow of a disabled veteran if that disabled veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent. Some of us feel that that provision was wrong through all of those 50 years; we finally got rid of it earlier in this session. Indeed, it was the last activity on the part of the former minister, the Hon. Daniel MacDonald, on July 9, when what was then Bill C-40 was put to the House. It has since become chapter 19 of the statutes of 1980.

That bill did some other things as well, but the main thing it did was to bring to an end that 48 per cent rule and to establish a regime under which pensions can be paid to widows in cases where the veterans' disability rate was below 48 per cent.

That was good. That was an important, red letter day. It was a landmark decision on the part of the Parliament of Canada. However, there was in it a provision which for many widows will spoil it because many of the widows I have in mind will not live to draw the pension to which they are entitled under that piece of legislation.

The reason is that there was included in the bill a phasing-in period which means it will take six and a half years before all the widows given entitlement under that legislation draw their pensions. The phasing-in works on the basis of what the rate of pension was. This month, October, pensions are payable if the disability rate was 38 per cent or more. In April it will come down five more points, and then each year after that it will come down five points until finally, in 1986, the piece of legislation will be fully in effect.

I think this was most unfair. I think it was thoughtless and that this House should not have been asked to include that phasing-in provision in this piece of legislation. I am sure—I know—that the former minister did not like it. In fact, before the House met on April 14 he indicated that he hoped to bring back the bill regarding widows' pensions which had been introduced in the previous session by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) when he was minister of veterans affairs but that he hoped to improve it, particularly with respect to the phasing-in period. However, when he brought down the bill, it was the same bill we had had from the hon. member for Victoria. The result is that in this month of October about 1,500 widows will qualify for the pension we passed in July. But that leaves 24,500 widows who have to wait six months, a year and a half or up to six and a half years. Surely that can be corrected.

I know the argument put forward is that we must consider the costs. The statistics we have been provided show that in the first full year of operation this plan will cost about $6 million and that in the final year when all the widows are covered it will cost about $42 million a year. That is a difference of $36 million a year. To any of us as individuals that is a lot of money, but around here it is not very much. As for the envelope system they have over there, there is nothing sacrosanct about it, that each department gets only so much money. The Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs who is also the Minister of National Defence could recommend to the government a transfer of $36 million a year from the budget of the Department of National Defence to the Department of Veterans Affairs and the people in national defence would not know he had done it. They would have to leave the wing off one airplane or something like that.

There is no logical argument for this. Surely there is a place for compassion and understanding. These women are older women, and I hope we will find a way either to shorten that phasing-in period or to get rid of it altogether. I have had a lot of experience around here writing letters to constituents and to persons all over Canada. I have never had more difficulty that I have in writing to widows who are 75, 77 or 78 years of age who tell me they have written in about their pensions and they have had a letter back from the appropriate official in which he says, "Yes, your entitlement has been established, but please write us again in 1985 and we will see that you get the pension in 1986." How does one say that to a woman who is 77 or 78 years of age and who thought that Parliament had given here entitlement to a pension as a widow of a disabled veteran?

The minister said the other day that the department would take care of urgent cases. The government always puts it that way. We are not asking for charity or welfare. We are asking for what is their right. As I say, I hope the minister will say yes tonight. I know it is in his heart to do so. If somebody is keeping him from doing that, at least I hope he will leave the door open for making this needed change to this session's Bill C-40.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, considering the importance of the subject matter and the well-known interest of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the subject, it is only fitting that the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs should answer his question, even though parliamentary secretaries or other members of Parliament sometimes answer for ministers.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

Mr. Lamontagne: The hon. member knows of the government's commitment to help those Canadians who need it most. This is very important. This pledge was kept last July when the late Hon. Daniel MacDonald introduced Bill C-40 in the House. With the co-operation of all members, the bill received quick passage and made available to the widows of disability pensioners benefits which had not previously been available to them. The hon. member just mentioned that in his remarks.

The Pension Act was amended to ensure that widows of veterans who died while receiving disability pensions of between 5 per cent and 47 per cent were eligible to receive proportionate widows' pensions which amounted to half of what the veterans received prior to death. These new provisions came into effect on October 1 of this year for the widows of veterans who were receiving pensions of 39 per cent to 47 per cent. The approximate 1500 widows in this group, as mentioned by the hon. member, endured hardships as a result of the extent of their spouses' disabilities and may not now be as financially secure as they would have been had the veteran not been disabled. These widows are now eligible for immediate assistance from this government. On April 1 of each succeeding year until 1986 other groups of widows are to become eligible for benefits—

Mr. Knowles: Provided they are still alive.

Mr. Lamontagne: That is what you just mentioned. However, Bill C-40 also amended the War Veterans Allowance Act. This legislation provides income support to veterans, widows and their dependants. Should a widow, who is not yet receiving widows' benefits under the Pension Act, be in financial need, assistance may be sought from the department under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Bill C-40 made substantial amendments to this legislation and corrected many of the inadequacies which had developed over the years.

The veterans under age 65—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am unable to catch the hon. minister's eye. I have to warn him that his allotted time is about to expire.

Mr. Lamontagne: Could I just finish, Mr. Speaker? The veterans under age 65 are presently benefiting from the additional $106 million made available in Bill C-40, which was not available in the veterans bill presented by the previous government last December.

In conclusion, this government is proud of what it has accomplished for veterans in this country and we remain committed to helping those persons who need it most. That is why the War Veterans Allowance Act was amended. Should the economic climate improve we would be prepared to have another look at the implementation strategy and I can assure the hon. member that I will put pressure on when it is possible. To help those who need it most is the essence of our policy.

I know I can count on the collaboration of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and maybe after tomorrow night we might be able to do something more. I can assure you that if we can do it for the veterans we will do it.

PENITENTIARIES—HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENTS—DANGER POSED TO GUARDS—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on October 14, 1980, I asked the Solicitor General what he proposed to do about the situation at Dorchester Penitentiary in the province of New Brunswick. My question followed an incident which had occurred the weekend before which resulted in the death of William Morrison. Mr. Morrison, as you may know, was taken along with another guard as a hostage and in an attempt to rescue both Mr. Morrison and the other guard, Mr. Morrison met his death. This was a most serious and tragic event and one which concerned not only the members of this House but all those involved in the corrections system. However, the incident and the resulting death were not without warning as far as the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) is concerned. Just a few days before, on October 9, acting under Standing Order 43, I asked the House to instruct the minister to conduct an investigation of the activities that were taking place at Dorchester Penitentiary. This was not the first time I had addressed questions to the minister on the subject. In June and July of 1980 there were rumours that there were difficulties in Dorchester Penitentiary which resulted from the transfer to that institution of dangerous persons who had been incarcerated in the British Columbia Penitentiary and other federal institutions. The Solicitor General, in response to this complaint, indicated that such was not the case. But I, nonetheless, gave to the minister my concerns about dangerous offenders who were incarcerated in Dorchester Penitentiary, and in other federal institutions. I asked the minister whether he did not think that all the hard core inmates across the prison system who had demonstrated that they were violent and dangerous should not be gathered into one group and sent to one institution for incarceration. The minister, in reply to my question during the proceedings of the justice committee, said he could not dismiss the hope in connection with any human being that he would not change his attitude and decide that he would like to go straight. The minister went on to suggest to me and to the members of the committee that it was right and proper to keep hard-core, dangerous offenders in institutions where they were in contact with other prisoners, notwithstanding that most people would have given up any hope of reform on their part. He said that one of the objectives of the prison system was to keep inmates, however dangerous, as close as possible to ties they had with the street so that rehabilitation could be reinforced if the inmate did choose to go straight.

● (2215)

The three inmates who caused the incident at Dorchester which resulted in the death of William Morrison can hardly be taken to have made such a decision. All three had been previously charged and convicted of murder and had been denied parole except after the minimum period of 25 years. Yet they were abroad in that institution.

My purpose in speaking again on the matter tonight is to implore the Solicitor General to take some action that will protect prison guards and other employees of our federal national security institutions from dangerous and violent prisoners. The minister said in response to my question that he had now begun to prepare a list of names of those offenders across the system who are the most violent and dangerous and who represent the greatest threat to order in those institutions.

This action comes too late for William Morrison and his family, as well as for other guards who have had such difficulties with other prisoners in the past. Surely, some action must be taken now. It has been said to me by persons who work in the prisons that since the abolition of the death penalty and the imposition of long periods in which a prisoner is not eligible for parole the situation is quite different in maximum security institutions from what it was. Prisoners have no hope of release within a reasonable period of time. They are under no constraint whatever and can suffer no greater punishment than has already been inflicted upon them.

The minister must change his policy, gather up the violent and dangerous prisoners in our institutions and take some action. Perhaps the best action would be to open the doors of the prisons to public scrutiny so that we might know what is going on in those federal institutions. We have asked for an inquiry, and I would repeat our request that the Solicitor General allow a public, independent body to examine our prison system to suggest what I regard as necessary reforms.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I think members on both sides of the House will agree with the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby), that it was a most serious, tragic event that happened at Dorchester. On Tuesday, October 14, 1980, the hon. member raised this issue requesting information with regard to the number of incidents which have occurred in federal institutions and asking what action the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) intends to undertake to respond to these warnings.

The hon. member further asked why the Solicitor General had rendered the correctional officers and staff helpless in the face of obvious danger. I respectfully submit that that is an overstatement, albeit in the form of a question. The Solicitor General rejects the allegation that he has rendered the correctional officers and staff helpless. As he stated to the House on Tuesday, October 14, the correctional service is at present preparing a list of the names of those offenders across the system who are the most violent and dangerous and who represent the greatest threat to order in the institutions.

We are not dealing with a tea-party. Everybody in a correctional institution is there because he has committed a crime, probably several crimes. It is individuals of this type we must sort out. It is a very difficult job. Once the list has been completed, consideration will be given to additional programs within the institution to further protect the correctional officers. We all agree that they have a very difficult job to perform, one that most people do not want to undertake.

All incidents are reported direct to the Solicitor General and a security inquiry is conducted on each serious incident. The service attempts to learn from these incidents by analysing the circumstances and applying solutions, when possible, on a national basis in order to prevent further occurrences.

More specifically, definite action has been taken in terms of the difficult problems which have plagued Dorchester Penitentiary in recent months. The Inspector General, at the request of the Solicitor General, conducted inquiries into every major incident at Dorchester. In that vein, the Solicitor General should have in his hands very soon, the latest report on the tragic hostage-taking incident which resulted in the death of correctional officer William Morrison. These inquiries will no doubt recommend certain actions to be followed. The management team at the institution did develop a plan of action to review and reinforce security measures throughout the institution. In late August, the institution was locked up in order to facilitate cell by cell searches as well as several surprise searches of cells. New security fences were installed inside Dorchester's walls; posts and post duties were also reviewed. Unfortunately, however, the latest tragic incident took place.

The experience acquired as a result of the designing and implementation of this plan will be of benefit to the service on a national basis. Nevertheless, we are not dealing with an exact science; we are dealing with an art. Unless we take every offender out and shoot him, these problems will continue. That is the only way you will not have any repeaters—when they create the offence, just shoot them. That is the guarantee of not having a repeater.

Mr. Crosby: That is not what your minister says.

Mr. Irwin: I suggest that as long as we have people in prison there will be difficulties. Our first and foremost duty is not to rehabilitate but to ensure that the guards and members of the institution who are looking after the people, are protected. After that we have a duty to rehabilitate the offenders.

I want to assure the hon. member that this is of concern to all of us. We regret the incident as much as he does, but it did occur, and we have to find solutions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—FUNDING OF BAND HOUSING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on May 12 I put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development about the subsidy housing program for Indian bands. I wanted to know when the amount of $12,000 per unit would be increased. This question resulted from a number of representations I had received from Indian bands across the Algoma-Manitoulin area.

As everyone knows, the whole Indian housing program has been a top priority in terms of need. A recent survey indicated that 26 per cent of Indian families are doubling or tripling up in order to find accommodation, and 25 per cent of the homes on Indian lands require urgent repairs. A number of other problems of health and safety have been implicated in the lack of adequate housing for Indian bands and that is the reason for the number of representations I have received from the bands in my constituency.

On July 31, the minister announced an increase in the allocation of financial assistance for Indian housing projects from $12,000 per unit to around $20,000 or $22,000 per unit, as well as a certain amount of increased assistance from Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The statement by the minister on that date indicated that this increase in subsidy from $12,000 to approximately $22,000 would be supplemented by job-creation programs. That is really where the problem starts, because although the minister indicated the increase in his press release, the amount of assistance available through the Department of Employment and Immigration has dropped drastically. Although additional funding is available through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the kind of financial assistance available for the labour and construction of band housing has dropped drastically. For instance, in the Algoma constituency our allocation this year for native projects under the Community Development Program was only $115,000 for some 12 Indian bands and some 4,000 to 5,000 status Indians. In past years, for instance, in 1979-1980 under the transitional LEAP program, of the $923,242 we received, much of it went to housing. In 1978-1979 under the Canada Works program, of the $721,386 we received, much of it went to housing and in 1977-1978, we received $743,902. It is very apparent from the kinds of representations I am receiving from bands throughout my constituency that there is inadequate funding for the labour portion in the construction of homes.

● (2225)

It is important for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) who, after all, has the final responsibility for Indian housing and for direct employment programs throughout the winter to thoroughly review the matter and see that additional funding is provided, otherwise the serious housing problem which now exists will not be corrected and a lot of people will be unemployed who should be employed under the direct employment programs over the winter months.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Your plea will fall on deaf ears.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, on July 31, 1980, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) announced that an additional $20 million would be allocated this fiscal year to improve Indian housing on reserves. At that time the housing subsidy was increased from a maximum of $12,000 per unit to a maximum of $22,125. This amount is supplemented by a transportation allowance of up to $7,000 for construction of housing units in very remote areas of Canada.

My hon. friend from Algoma has, I believe, 17 or 18 reserves in his riding and I know he is always concerned about the plight of the Indian. As far as job-creation opportunities are concerned, my friend should also realize that right now it is not just the Indian who is suffering, but also the white man with closures such as those at Chrysler and Massey-Ferguson. Notwithstanding this subsidy, the Indian still does not have enough to build proper housing. I am familiar with the housing that is being built. Therefore, CMHC has made available loans over and above the subsidy. The construction that is being done in my friend's riding is being done quite well, according to CMHC and national housing standards.

There is a thrust toward community-based planning and development of Indian self-government which I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you are well aware presents quite a problem. How far does the government go into telling the Indian what to do? How far does the Indian go in as governing his own affairs? There has been a compromise of sorts following this concept. For example, when a band obtains approval for the construction of ten houses, capital subsidies for ten units will be forwarded to the band. The band will then allocate the subsidy dollars to band members or to band-owned housing projects, or a mixture of both. This will be done in accordance with the chief and council's perceptions of who needs housing units the most. The band's only commitment is to see that at least ten housing units are built for an input of ten units of housing subsidy.

In 1980, after consultation between the Department of Indian Affairs, Indian associations, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and other departments and agencies of the government, a comprehensive set of recommendations concerning this subject was developed. The government is continuing to review means to revise an on-reserve housing policy and program to seek the most effective means to overcome the present backlog of new housing units required and the larger number of existing units in need of repairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—TELEVISING OF JOINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the permission of the House to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the clear statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last Thursday as reported on pages 3965 and 3969 of Hansard that the Special Joint Committee on the constitution could make its own decision on televising its own proceedings, and in view of the fact that on August 22, 1978, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) ruled, when chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, that committees did not have the power to authorize the televising of their own proceedings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Prime Minister direct his House leader to bring a motion before the House authorizing the televising of the proceedings of the proposed Special Joint Committee on the proposed constitutional resolution.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—REPRESENTATION OF SPECIAL INTEREST GROUPS BEFORE JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, this government has denied representation in Parliament through closure. It now seeks to deny representation in committee to minority and special interest groups by preventing the committee from travelling. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That, to use the government's own words in the very first paragraph of the proposed resolution for constitutional change that within the "reasonable limits as are generally accepted in a free and democratic society with a parliamentary system of government" groups of Canadian citizens be recognized and enabled to travel to present their case to this joint committee, and that their travel costs be underwritten by this government using perhaps some of their surplus advertising dollars, since this government refuses to allow the committee to go to the people.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—CALL FOR PUBLIC JUDICIAL INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 in connection with certain recent events at Dorchester Penitentiary in New Brunswick.

In view of the allegation of the shooting of hundreds of prisoners in a crowded gym by a number of prison guards in June of this year, in view of the escapes of four convicted murderers, in view of the tragic death of a prison guard at Dorchester Penitentiary and the suicide of a prisoner, and finally, in view of allegations of beatings and gassings of prisoners both before and after the tragic hostage-taking incident, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House call upon the Solicitor General to commission an independent, public, judicial inquiry into all the recent serious and tragic events at Dorchester Penitentiary in recent months.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—PROTECTION OF WORKERS FROM LAY-OFFS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of national concern and of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of the recent news reports which state that Chrysler Corporation is considering the closing of 16 of its plants, and in light of yesterday's announcement that General Motors had a loss of $567 million, the largest such quarterly loss of any American corporation, and because of the fact that 21,000 Canadian automobile workers have been placed on indefinite lay-off, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That this government take immediate steps to ensure that Canadian automobile workers are protected from further disastrous lay-offs by seeing that no further Canadian auto plants are shut down.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCIAL INCENTIVES TO HOME OWNERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recently all public utilities commissions in Ontario received a bulletin stating that Canadian home owners would be provided a financial incentive to convert from oil to gas, electricity, wood or solar, as the case may be. In view of the fact that there is a very definite need to reduce the consumption of oil in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government confirm its intention to implement such a program and that such a financial incentive be made available to Canadian home owners and businessmen without delay.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INTERNATIONAL AID

CALL FOR INCREASE IN FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the amount of money which the Government of Canada has allocated for the purposes of international emergency relief—$5 million according to the 1980-81 estimates—is less than the $5.2 million which has been misspent on federal government polls since March of 1979, and barely one-sixth the new budget of the Canadian unity propaganda office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House direct the government to be less liberal with itself so that it can be more liberal with the funds which it sets aside for those who are truly in need, as opposed to those only in need of humility.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CALL FOR BAN ON ATMOSPHERIC TESTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I should like to move a motion for which there may be favourable disposition around the House. In view of the recent Chinese atmospheric nuclear testing, recent underground testing by other countries and the reported possibility of an impending series of nuclear tests to be carried out by the French authorities any time now in the Mururoa Atoll, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That this House expresses its deep regret and strongly urges all governments concerned to ban once and for all, for the benefit of mankind, all nuclear testing in all environments.

EFFECT OF CONSTITUTIONAL PATRIATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that the Prime Minister's wilful adherence to an artificial timetable for the patriation of the constitution has caused, and will continue to cause, ruptures in the fabric of Canadian confederation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House censure the Prime Minister for his actions and advise him to wait for the fullness of time, for surely the universe will unfold as it should, without his insistent and divisive prodding.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the government is considering removing the tax exemption on imported essential educational materials, including chemicals, which will increase the costs of education, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER IN VISITING WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman a question, a little sadly but seriously. In 1964 on the university stage as a professor, one Pierre Trudeau wrote:

—federalism is . . . a pact or quasi-treaty in the sense that the terms of that compromise cannot be changed unilaterally.

Earlier this month, on television, the right hon. gentleman said:

Every member of Parliament from every corner of this land is asked to participate in this historic act.

He was referring to the debate. On the political stage, however, the Prime Minister has acted unilaterally and has choked off debate. Could the right hon. gentleman please tell this House what role he intends to play when he goes west tomorrow? I am glad that he is going west and I hope he travels around other parts of the country. However, could the Prime Minister tell the House what role he intends to play and give us one good reason why we should believe anything he says, either in the west or in the east?

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member is satisfied with only one good reason; I could give him very many.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Trudeau: He suggested that my reasons touched at least on two points, first on the nature of confederation and, second, on freedom to debate.

On the nature of confederation, I point out to the hon. member that the resolution before the House does not change the essential balance, Madam Speaker, between the federal and the provincial governments.

Mr. Crosbie: Come off it, Pierre!

Mr. Trudeau: In a very real sense our federal structure rests upon the division of powers between these two levels of government, and there is no shift of power from the provinces to the federal government—

Mr. Crosbie: Bushwhack!

Mr. Trudeau: —or from the federal government to the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear the Tories murmuring their discontent. I would be happy to answer any number of supplementary questions, and particularly any that would show that there is a shift of power.

An hon. Member: Here we are again.

Mr. Trudeau: The pact of 1867 giving certain powers to the provinces and certain powers to the federal government has not been altered in favour of the federal government, which seems to be the suggestion opposite.

So much for the statement I made in 1964, and which I repeat again today. If we had wanted to alter unilaterally some of these powers, Madam Speaker, we would, of course, have considered putting in a section to strengthen the Canadian economic union. This we carefully refrained from doing.

On the second point having to do with cutting off debate, I repeat the offer that was made to the opposition by many people on this side, that is, to have much longer hours.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You did not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The committees are sitting.

Mr. Trudeau: Rather than just proceeding with just one stage, as would be usual, with the resolution coming once before the House, we provided for three stages—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No.

Mr. Trudeau: —so there could be three different occasions on which members of this House and of the other place could debate the subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I suggest that we are all morally certain that if we had proceeded just with a resolution, without a reference to committee and a report then to the full House, with three occasions for debate, people opposite would have been the first to condemn us by saying: how can we examine this lengthy resolution in only one stage? It is because we anticipated these objections—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —and in order to meet the concern of the opposition, we suggested that there be debate here for prolonged hours if necessary.

An hon. Member: Dictator.

Mr. Trudeau: We have then referred it to committee so there could be discussion and the hearing of witnesses. Then there will be a third stage when it will come back to the full Parliament.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think that is living up to the commitment that I made earlier.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, obviously I cannot become engaged in the debate with the Prime Minister. I am very glad he took some time in answering the question; perhaps he has a guilty conscience for not participating in the debate.

Does the right hon. gentleman really think you help the future of the land by breaking faith with some of the past when you change from the tyranny of unanimity—which were the words the Prime Minister used—to what many people are quite rightly saying, namely the tyranny of unilateral action? In that respect, I ask the Prime Minister if he really thinks that the federalist forces would have won the referendum battle in Quebec if in Quebec they knew that the "renewed federalism" was going to be what it is today, a one-man show?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member, whom I respect, to consider his question. He is suggesting that we are being tyrannical by using unilateral action—

Mr. Nowlan: They are both extremes.

Mr. Trudeau: —rather than getting the consent of the ten provinces.

● (1420)

Mr. Clarke: That is not what he said.

Mr. Trudeau: That is exactly what he said. Madam Speaker, I wish there would be a little bit of control on the other side and that they would at least listen to their own questions if they do not want to listen to my answers. That was exactly the statement by the hon. member, that I had gone from the tyranny of unanimity to the tyranny of unilateral action. Therefore, the hon. member behind him should stand corrected or sit corrected, and I hope he will stay sitting a long while.

Now, that being established, I want to point out to the hon. member that he and his party on two occasions supported what he calls the tyranny of unilateral action; once last May or June when all of us in this House voted that we should patriate, and there was nothing in the motion then, which we all approved, saying that we need provincial consent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Second, just last week his own leader and party moved that the House patriate with a certain amending formula without the consent of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I say without the consent of the provinces, and the opposition leader knows that.

Mr. Clark: Not true.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Nowlan: I did not know the Prime Minister was finished. In view of some of the remarks in that answer, I would point out that the motion put forward by my leader last week was between the two extremes of unanimity and unilateral action. It was something called the Vancouver proposal which obviously the government members do not agree with. My question is this. The Prime Minister must have been advised of this by the House leader. Can he now tell this House when closure was invoked by a government—and let us not talk about 1913 when Ichabod Crane was there, many years ago—when more government members had spoken than not only members of the official opposition, but the only opposition?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must correct the hon. member when he refers to the Vancouver formula, which is the Alberta formula. I must tell him that the essence of his argument was that I was proceeding unilaterally without the consent of the provinces. That was the thrust, to patriate the constitution and do other things. I am now telling him and his party that last week that is exactly what they proposed, that without the consent of the provinces this House vote on a resolution to patriate with an amending formula.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY WHETHER DISCUSSIONS HELD BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND LIBERAL LEADER IN QUEBEC

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Might I point out to him that the proposal he made last week at least allowed the constitution to be amended here in Canada, by Canadians, instead of through the intermediary of the British government.

As the Prime Minister is aware of the result of the referendum and is now committed to the promise he made at that time; as Mr. Claude Ryan said, in light of the proposal of the Prime Minister of Canada on the way to patriate the constitution, that if he had been told all he had to do was to listen to what the federal government is now saying, in a letter to the editor of the newspaper Le Devoir which the Prime Minister must surely have read, that he would never have been chairman of the No committee; and as last Sunday, the leader of the opposition in Quebec, Mr. Ryan felt obliged to ask the British parliamentarians to reject the request of Ottawa, I therefore conclude that there has been very little communication with the Prime Minister; and as the Prime Minister repeated yesterday, to a question put to him, that he did not know whether Mr. Ryan would change his mind, that he had no way of knowing; under the circumstances it seems that communications are totally lacking between the Prime Minister of Canada and his Liberal colleague in Quebec, and chairman of the No committee—

Madam Speaker: Order. Is that the question of the hon. member, that is, that communications—would the hon. member put his question?

Mr. La Salle: Right away, Madam Speaker. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether, after the federal-provincial conference, he had the decency to discuss with his Liberal colleague who chaired the No committee, in view of some of the proposals contained in the Beige Paper, his decision to act unilaterally, a decision which had already been contested by his Liberal colleague in Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, since the preamble to the hon. member's question was fairly lengthy, I will reply to it in the terms I have just used to answer his colleague from the maritimes.

The hon. member is blaming us for disagreeing with Mr. Ryan because we are proceeding unilaterally. I think those are the words used by the hon. member for Joliette. I remind him that last May or June the House unanimously passed a motion introduced by one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Edmonton West I believe, which indeed suggested that Parliament move to patriate the constitution. That resolution said nothing about provincial agreement. I indeed suggested that they should at least be consulted, which was done, of course, throughout the summer. But the motion introduced by the hon. member for Joliette and his colleagues asked for patriation by way of a resolution of this House and not by way of a resolution passed by the ten provinces. That is the first point.

The second point is, as I have already mentioned, that last week the hon. member himself voted for a resolution put by his leader asking that this House patriate the constitution, with an amending formula of course, but without the consensus of the provinces. So what is he complaining about? Of a unilateral patriation which he himself and his party have already endorsed?

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, if I may—and this is very important—I shall remind the right hon. Prime Minister that our proposal required that amendments be made here in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians. The Prime Minister stopped short of saying so and he has not answered my question either. Considering the present situation in Quebec, the embarrassment the proposal is causing their Liberal colleagues in Quebec and the respect we have for Mr. Ryan's proposals, does the Prime Minister intend to disregard the appeal Mr. Ryan has made for a re-evaluation and reopening of negotiations with the provinces instead of asking the British parliament to rule on fundamental rights for Canadians, which should be done in Canada? I ask the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker, if it is his intention at least to try to get the support of his Liberal colleague in Quebec instead of dividing the forces, as is now the case.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I cannot hear without being amused the member who pleads that the Liberals should not tear each other to pieces. Madam Speaker, the member has sat on this side of the House as an independent. If he is so much interested in the union of my forces, he should leave his hypocritical party which suggested a unilateral patriation last week and which this week condemns us when we proceed in such a way. As for our intention to make amendments in Canada, Madam Speaker, this is the purpose of our resolution since from 1953 we have been unable to patriate our constitution, so that all major amendments made since then, whether they deal with unemployment insurance, the admission of Newfoundland in confederation, etc., have been legislation passed in England and not in Canada. Now, the procedure which we are following is not new, it has been in effect since 1867. All the amendments voted by the House must be ratified in Great Britain. This is exactly what is being proposed today, that it be considered and put to a vote in the House and then voted on in Great Britain, as has been the case for 113 years.

HEALTH AND SAFETY

PROTECTION OF WORKERS UNDER FEDERAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. As a result of a one-week tour by the NDP caucus committee on occupational health and safety to the maritimes, we were shocked to learn of the state of anarchy in the field of health and safety caused by the fact that jurisdiction over health and safety is spread over 13 government departments and agencies, resulting in neglect of workers' safety and their lives.

I would like to ask the minister what specific measures he plans to correct this jurisdictional problem and to bring federal legislation up to provincial standards so that the one million workers under federal jurisdiction can receive the same level of protection as their provincial counterparts.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question, but I think he will have to be more specific as to his area of concern. It is quite true that the ten provinces under our constitution have substantial responsibilities in areas of safety and health in the workplace because of the limitation of federal jurisdiction in labour. I certainly do not agree with the premise in his question that federal laws provide any less of a level of safeguard to the safety and health of workers than do the provincial jurisdictions' acts. There is a great variety—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: If hon. members opposite would just settle down a bit, they might be able to deal with this matter better. There is a great variety of provisions in the various provinces on the subject, but the hon. member will be aware of the fact that in mining, for instance, as a federal government we are responsible only in the case of the uranium mines in Ontario and Saskatchewan and in the case of coal mining through our ownership of Devco in Nova Scotia. All the rest of the mines, if those are the hon. member's concern, fall under provincial jurisdiction. I can assure the hon. member that the province of Ontario, in exercising for us health and safety inspections, does an excellent job and applies appropriate standards.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, obviously the Minister of Labour has not talked to workers on the job site for a very long time. If he had, he would not have made that response.

My first supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In view of the fact that the government is considering eliminating the federal transportation regulation requiring truck drivers to maintain trip log books, and in view of the fact that these drivers are already forced to drive very long hours, particularly in the private sector in interprovincial traffic, will the minister assure this House that truck drivers' log books will continue to be maintained so that these drivers will not be forced to work or drive inordinately long hours—I am speaking of CN and CP now in particular—thus adding to the threat of death and carnage which already exists on our highways?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member will be aware of the fact that because of the peculiarities of railway legislation in this country and its history the area of responsibility of the Department of Labour has some limitations. However, I can assure the hon. member of two things. The first is that I am wholly confident that there will be no reduction in safety provisions along the line he has indicated. Second, I have occasion to talk to more workers in the workplace in the course of a month than the hon. member has in his lifetime.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the same minister. It was very evident to the members of our committee that the inspectors under the minister's department have been extremely lax in the course of their duties at the CN diesel shop in Moncton. Will the minister instruct his department to inspect the brass and babbitting department as well as the degreasing tanks where there are workers exposed to caustic fumes due to inadequate ventilation? Will the minister also assure the House that measures will be taken to bring health and safety standards and procedures in all aspects of health CN operations in line with the best contemporary health and safety standards? I ask that in view of the fact that over 1,000 workers are killed in their workplace in this country every year.

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I certainly will take under consideration any representation an hon. member makes that I look into a particular situation or shop in relation to the standard of safety being practised there. In relation to the suggestion the hon. member makes about Moncton, I will have that situation investigated promptly. With reference to the other aspect of his question, I repeat that I am satisfied that the federal level of safety standards compares very favourably with those in the provinces. I will have the specifics mentioned by the hon. member fully reviewed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ENERGY PACKAGE—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER LOUGHEED

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It arises from his reply to Premier Lougheed's offer which was contained in a letter to the Prime Minister, delivered to his office on October 17, to the effect that the Premier of Alberta was prepared to fly, within hours' notice, to Ottawa at any time to meet with the Prime Minister in an effort to resume negotiations on arriving at an agreeable energy package.

Given the fact that the Prime Minister's response, as indicated by Mr. Lougheed, was to the effect that there was no room for negotiation, that the federal government had locked up the budget and that the Prime Minister implied that it would be very inconvenient to alter it, why did the Prime Minister refuse any further discussions with Premier Lougheed because they would inconvenience his timetable? Surely this action on the part of the Prime Minister seems to be less than co-operative and conciliatory.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the facts as stated by the hon. member were correct, it would indeed seem a bit strange. I point out to the hon. member that I do not know exactly what has been said by Premier Lougheed. However, quite the contrary, I invited him to come down and meet me in Ottawa. I was prepared to have discussions with him. Though his letter was dated the seventeenth, I do not know at what time it left Alberta. It was sent on a Friday; I received it Monday morning.

An hon. Member: Tell Ouellet about that.

Mr. Trudeau: It is not so unusual that a letter posted at perhaps eleven o'clock in the evening in Alberta would only reach my hands by Monday morning, but those are the facts.

I thereupon considered whether I would meet Premier Lougheed or not, and I repeat that I invited him to come down to meet me yesterday on this subject. The point is that I did not want him to come under the illusion that there would be major changes in the budget made at that point. I think even hon. members opposite will realize that the budget, which was going to be brought down eight days after I received the letter, was pretty far advanced in its preparation. So in fairness I told Premier Lougheed that I would be happy to see him, but if he had really wanted to suggest major changes I imagine he would have written me sooner than eight days before the budget was to be brought down.

There were discussions earlier in the month of October between ministers when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—I believe on October 2 or 3 or thereabouts—went west and made a whole new series of proposals which were turned down. They were still open until, I would say, about the 15th of the month. But the hon. member and the House should realize that by October 20, since the budget was being brought in on the twenty-eighth, we were pretty close to a final package. I had to be quite frank with the premier on that, but I assured him that the budget would contain many pleasant surprises and that if he wanted to have a preview of them, he would be welcome, although it is probably contrary to the principle of budget secrecy. Since our provisions do impact in a very particular way on Alberta, I would have been prepared to give him a preview of the budget yesterday, which is well in advance of the usual timetable.

● (1440)

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, there seems to be some conflicting evidence here, inasmuch as the Minister of Finance, as late as last Friday, indicated in an answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that budgetary options were still being considered at present. Given the fact that the negotiation of an energy package was of the utmost importance to the people of Alberta, and indeed to all Canadians, is it not true that the Prime Minister telephoned the Premier of Alberta Thursday afternoon, October 23, and said that there was absolutely no room for negotiation, that they had locked up the budget, that he implied that it would be very inconvenient to alter it, and that in any event there was no room for negotiation? The answer which the Premier of Alberta gave in the legislature yesterday indicated that the door was absolutely closed, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Finance said last Friday that options were still being considered. The Prime Minister cannot have it both ways, surely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I was not in the House on Friday and therefore I am not quite sure to what suggestion from the NDP that answer was given. But surely no member in this House would think that three days before the budget is brought down such a fundamental question as energy pricing and the whole energy regime could still be renegotiated with any of the provinces. If that is the suggestion, let me point out that it is an absolute impossibility for such a thing to happen. Even the hon. member for St. John's West knows that the very printing of the budget is probably finished, except for very minor details, as long as three days before the budget is brought down.

Those are the facts and that is what I said to Premier Lougheed. I said, "We cannot, at this late stage, reopen the whole question of negotiations on energy; so if you are coming down for that, I am sorry, it is too late, but I am happy to receive you." I told him that he was the premier and he had budgets of his own—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Answers should be shorter. The question period is far advanced and we have not had many questions.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—REPRESENTATION OF NATIVE GROUPS BEFORE JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question as well is for the Prime Minister and it is with regard to the exchange of correspondence between him and the NDP which resulted in the unconditional surrender by the NDP of any principles or commitments they ever had—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: —with respect to human rights, the rights of minorities in our country, and particularly the very special rights which native people have in our society. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it was entirely the letter of the NDP that was the basis of support on which the Prime Minister acted, not only to circumvent Parliament but to circumvent any meaningful further discussions with the provinces and with the native people, the aboriginal people of our country, before this action was taken in Britain, or is he now prepared, in recognition of the response which has been received in the House and from the native people throughout the country, to reopen the discussions and in particular provide access for these minority groups to the committee in a meaningful way?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is not my role to defend the NDP; I am sure they can defend their own actions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They are in your caucus; why don't you defend them?

Mr. Trudeau: I may have defended them many, many years ago, Madam Speaker, and I would have been prepared to defend them again had they accepted my offer to join this party when we formed the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The cat is out of the bag.

An hon. Member: They are an extension.

An hon. Member: You seduced them.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: It still seems difficult to understand how they can be accused of having surrendered their principles when what they asked for was exactly what the western premiers were asking for—

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: False.

An hon. Member: They got nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not saying they did not ask for more. We know that the premiers are insatiable and that they asked for a great deal more. But I am suggesting that what was asked for by the NDP was action in the field of indirect taxation of resources and interprovincial trade on resources, which is certainly not going against the principles of anyone in the House; therefore, I do not see how it can be a surrendering of principles.

As for the entrenchment of the rights of native people, here again I fail to understand the logic of the party opposite. Because what we are doing is bringing back the constitution in the hope that then we will be able to deal with amendments relating to the native people and to many other subjects. I point out to the Tory party that that is exactly what they were doing last week when they proposed to this House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Even the Chair is confused as to whether the question is still being answered or new questions are being asked. I ask hon. members to try to discipline themselves. I think today I cannot go on numbers, I will have to go on time and immediately recognize, in the normal order, members from the NDP and allow the rest of the time to the Conservatives. This question period has to be disciplined to some extent. Does the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River have a supplementary question? Will he make it short, please.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, clearly we have two types of rights which need to be protected in the constitution, the rights as the Prime Minister perceives them—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member put his question immediately without a preamble, please.

Mr. Oberle: Does the Prime Minister depend on the leader of the NDP to write a letter to Her Majesty the Queen and the British parliament to convince them that they should patriate a package, which is clearly a wanton denial of the basic rights of many people in this country, except for those rights which the Prime Minister wishes to entrench for his own purpose?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, put very simply, the Conservative party last week moved that this House adopt—

Mr. Oberle: Bring the constitution home and let us deal with it here.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Patriate the constitution.

An hon. Member: Why don't you sit down; you cannot answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is the Speaker who maintains order in this House. The Right Hon. Prime Minister will continue to answer the question, and I hope he will have peace so he can answer it.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, very simply, the Tory party last week proposed a motion and voted affirmatively on that motion to patriate the constitution with an amending formula. There was nothing in that resolution, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre in the debate, to protect the native people—nothing. The idea was to get the constitution here and then put something in to protect the native people. That is exactly what we want to do, to get it here and then put something in to protect the native people.

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I would have liked to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture, as it is about the federal herd maintenance program. However, in his absence I would like to address my question to the minister's parliamentary secretary or to the minister in charge of regional economic expansion.

As I said, my question concerns the federal herd maintenance program and I have received in excess of 20 complaints from the constituents I represent in the area called Pierceland. The farmers and ranchers there who have applied have been told they would not be considered because they are outside of the designated drought areas, in spite of the fact the drought conditions are actually worse than those inside the drought area, according to local records.

I was wondering if the minister could give us some assurance that the boundaries of the drought areas would be extended to include these areas, specifically the Pierceland area, and generally other areas which have experienced severe drought and are not covered by the boundaries drawn around the major weather stations.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, it is well known that a federal-provincial committee is studying this question. So I am making a note of the hon. member's question and we will reply in the House in due course.

[English]

Mr. Anguish: My supplementary question is this. If the committee decide not to extend the boundaries, will they give some assurance to farmers and ranchers who are so severely affected by drought in those areas that if they must be considered after the applicants from the designated drought areas, can they assure us there will be enough money in the program to cover them under the herd maintenance program?

[Translation]

Mr. Ostiguy: Madam Speaker, I maintain the answer I gave a moment ago. We will advise the House in due time.

PUBLIC WORKS

REPLANNING OF OLD PORT OF MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and has to do with the intentions of the government concerning the replanning of the old port of Montreal. Since this morning's issue of La Presse mentioned that the old port project has now been shelved, could the minister say whether it is true, first, that this project no longer has the agreement of other levels of government and second, that the government is on the verge of implementing a new global approach aimed at reviewing all such undertakings throughout the country, something which obviously would seriously delay the old port project of Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me the opportunity to say that the development of the old port is a ministerial priority with the Department of Public Works, and it is a personal priority with me. I have visited the site and talked to the mayor and officials. My officials and I will be coming forward to cabinet with a document to proceed with development of the port.

I might say that in the past I have visited the old port and it is a favourite of mine as, I am sure, it is of many Canadians. I am certain that many people across this country would like to see that development.

THE CONSTITUTION

BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS OF JOINT COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It relates to his answer as reported on page 3965 of Hansard which I will quote in total:

> The answer to the second question about television is that the committee, I believe, is master of its own procedure in this area—

The Prime Minister was stating his belief and he will now know that his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in another capacity as co-chairman of the committee on the constitution in 1978, ruled that it is not within the powers of the committee to decide itself on that question. The Prime Minister will know he was wrong in his answer of October 23.

That being the case, and hoping that the Prime Minister wants the people of Canada to know what is going on in discussion of this constitutional resolution, will he now agree to present an order to the House of Commons which would allow live and full television and radio broadcasting of the committee sessions on the constitutional resolution?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, since giving my answer I have had the opportunity to check with our House leader, who has asked for opinions on this. It turns out that, exceptionally, I was not wrong and that, indeed, the committee is master of its procedure. We hope that the committee will address itself to this question. I do not know how they will decide but I hope they will address themselves to the question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Are you in favour of it?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it seems that members opposite, including their leader, thought that the committee could not address itself to this question. I suggest it can.

Mr. Nielsen: Are you in favour of it?

Mr. Trudeau: I am also asked by some of the backbenchers if I am in favour of it. I have no preference one way or the other, Madam Speaker. If the committee members make a good case to televise the proceedings, I think it would be a good thing. It will cost a little bit of money, but I am sure everyone will be prepared to chip in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we could undoubtedly cover the cost from the advertising program which the Government of Canada is mounting. I am sure the Prime Minister would admit that this question of having the public of Canada know what is being done about its constitution is sufficiently important that there should be a party position on it. While I do not wish to intrude upon his ground and speak for the NDP, I know that the NDP leader has already indicated his view as a party leader, as I have indicated my view as a party leader, that it would be well to have the proceedings televised and covered by radio. We would recommend that our members on the committee vote for that.

Will the Prime Minister tell us, in his capacity as the leader of the government party, if he will urge his colleagues on that committee to have the proceedings fully covered by radio and television so that Canadians will know what is going on about their constitution?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, that is a repeat of the same question. I just answered that I have no preference. I am not all that keen on television but I have no objection to it. If the members of this party in the committee decide that it is a good thing, and they have the support of our friends in the NDP—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —and our great friends from the Tory party, then it can be done.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY WHETHER SENIOR TRANSLATORS ACCEPTING FREELANCE WORK

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday we were informed by the translators' union that there had been some cases during the strike of senior management types in the Treasury Board doing some freelance translating on their own, drawing their own salary plus a freelance commission or freelance salary for doing the translation work. I wonder if he could confirm that to the House, and if he can confirm it can he tell us what disciplinary action he has taken?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any such circumstances, hence I cannot confirm it to the House.

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder if the minister is aware of a memo dated August 19 from Mr. Roch Blais, who is a director of special operations in the Treasury Board, in which he talks about the need for an internal freelance team to be established by the Treasury Board. I wonder if the hon. gentleman can tell us whether or not he is aware of the memo which went out to all of the translators, a copy of which I have here, and whether or not he thinks it is a violation of the conflict of interest guidelines that have been issued by the Government of Canada governing public servants. It says, and I quote:

> No conflict should exist, or appear to exist, between the private interests of public servants and their official duties.

Is the minister aware of this? If he is aware of it, what disciplinary action has he taken? If he is not aware of it, may we have a commitment from him that he will look into this matter and take some disciplinary action?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of it. Furthermore, I cannot tell from the information which has been put before the House exactly what the nature of the conflict is or exactly what the problem is. Many of us do our own translations. In this part of the House, as a matter of fact, people usually originate their own material in both languages.

THE CONSTITUTION

REPRESENTATION OF SPECIAL INTEREST GROUPS BEFORE JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, we were all saddened these past few days to learn of the intent of the government to spend between $20,000 and $30,000 on advertising for 13 minutes during the Grey Cup. My question is to the Prime Minister. I have received a letter from an Indian reserve, signed and dated October 27 and delivered to my office, which says:

> We will do anything. We will crawl to dignity and recognition in order to be heard in constitutional matters.

Will the Prime Minister answer this House with a simple yes or no. Is he going to make it possible for special interest groups like native people and women's organizations, to come to Ottawa and present their case to the government? Or is the Prime Minister expecting these people, as this native says, "to crawl with dignity" and ask for recognition when they do not have any funds? How are these groups going to get before this committee in order to present their case in the interests of human rights, native land claims, aboriginal rights and women's rights?

• (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, first I would point out that if we had not gone the committee route, a route to which the opposition is now objecting vigorously, there would have been no occasion for the natives to be heard. We are referring the matter to committee so that the natives as well as other special interest groups can be heard on this resolution.

Mr. Blenkarn: How do they get here?

Mr. Trudeau: I am asked how they get here. I indicated in answer to that question last week that I hoped the committee would set funds aside to provide those groups which have no other means of getting here with the funds to get here.

Mr. Andre: You will give them a means test before they come.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, the response of the Prime Minister conjures up in my mind the last election.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I have only said half a sentence, yet members opposite are asking for my question when they have delivered answers which say nothing for two or three minutes. My question to the Prime Minister is this. Is he satisfied that the legitimate concerns of women, who make up 51 per cent of the electorate, have had a fair opportunity for input into his unilateral action to bring in constitutional reform, and is he satisfied that women and native people in Canada have had a fair opportunity to present their cases on human rights before this government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have just been informed that we have already announced that some $400,000 will be available to each of the three native groups so that they can prepare and present their constitutional views. I am sure that out of this $400,000 they can find travelling money to come to Ottawa to present themselves before the committee.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, may I draw to the attention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) the fact that there have been certain discussions about when the recorded divisions might take place during the budget debate. I believe I can say that there has been agreement that instead of taking a vote this Thursday night, the votes on both our subamendment and the Conservative amendment will be taken on Tuesday night and that the final vote will be taken on Thursday night of next week.

Since I believe I am stating what has been agreed to among the House leaders, would the government House leader confirm what I have said and make the necessary designation?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: On that subject, Madam Speaker, indeed we have the intention of designating Friday this week as an opposition day, which indicates that the votes will necessarily be held next week, Tuesday evening and Thursday evening.

To make everything clear I would like to confirm the days for the budget debate. The debate will begin tomorrow morning, after the budget speech this evening, and will continue on Thursday. I understand that the New Democratic Party intends to move a subamendment. The division on that subamendment will be deferred and held the same evening at the same time or imediately before the vote on the amendment of the Progressive Conservative Party, if there is one.

Friday being an allotted day, the third day of debate on the budget will be Monday, the fourth day next Tuesday and the two votes will be taken Tuesday evening if a subamendment and an amendment have been moved. The fifth day of debate will be Wednesday next week and the sixth on Thursday.

I understand that my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre has had the agreement of the House leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. That being so we on this side of the House agree as well and as soon as we are through with this point of order I would advise you, Madam Speaker, that I have another point of order to raise.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think that arrangement is agreeable. While we are discussing House business, with regard to its effect on the televising of the committee hearings and since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated he does not care one way or the other—and I would assume that the government House leader would take a position stronger than that—there would appear to be some considerable doubt, or at least differences of opinion, with respect to whether a House order, or an extension of the reference is required, or whether it can be done in committee.

Apparently there have been rulings both ways. My understanding is, and the government House leader can check, that at one time before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in 1976, the parliamentary counsel, Mr. Joe Maingot, QC, gave evidence to the effect that in his opinion it would require an order of this House to ensure that the committee proceedings would be televised. My colleague can check that out, and I stand corrected if I am wrong.

If the matter is checked out and proved to be correct, given the agreement there is now in this House, at least among the opposition parties, that this constitutional committee be televised, and if it should be the opinion of the parliamentary counsel that an order of this House is required, will the government House leader now undertake to take such steps in the House as are necessary to have that matter resolved once and for all so that it is no longer a matter of debate, but rather a matter brought to conclusion?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, on this point let me first state very clearly that the committee will be public whether or not it is televised.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We know that.

Mr. Pinard: I am glad that hon. members opposite know that, but I would also like to make it clear to the people of this country. With regard to the very nature of the question, I am of the opinion, after consultation, that if we refer back to the order of the House on January 25, 1977, it will be determined that the House of Commons had agreed to the broadcasting of its proceedings not only in the House of Commons but in the committees as well, provided the concept of electronic Hansard was respected.

We have succeeded in implementing broadcasting in the House of Commons, and in my view this decision still holds. Consequently, I am of the opinion that the joint committee which will be established will have the power to determine whether or not it wishes its deliberations or proceedings to be broadcast. If it wishes to be broadcast, then obviously it will cost money to provide for the installations which are necessary if the concept of electronic Hansard is to be respected, because that is the essence and the spirit of the decision which was taken in this House in 1977. If such a request is made, then the matter must be approved by the Senate. We cannot speak in the name of the Senate in this House.

In so far as this House of Commons is concerned, my view is that we are not required to agree or disagree. If the committee wishes to be broadcast, then all that needs to be considered is the financing. The financing will be allowed if it is requested through the Commission of Internal Economy at this level. I for one do not intend to stop the broadcasting of the proceedings of a committee merely for reasons of money. That is my technical answer.

Once again, my views are that we do not need to determine the matter one way or the other in this House. It is up to the committee to make up its mind. If the committee would like to be broadcast, it is up to the Senate to approve the matter. If the Senate approves the matter then the Commission of Internal Economy will be required to approve the expenses and cost of such proceedings to be broadcast if the concept of respect for the electronic Hansard is followed.

Madam Speaker: Is it therefore agreed that the votes should be deferred as determined and explained by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it is about the composition of the special committee following the vote which was held earlier last week. The whip of the official opposition has indicated to me that at 5 p.m. he will be able to provide me with the names of the hon. members from his party who are likely to sit on this committee. As he has suggested, therefore, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions at five o'clock, so that we on this side may proceed with the appropriate motion dealing with the composition of the special committee.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MISS MACDONALD—PROCEDURE IN CHAMBER

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order about which I feel very deeply. Yesterday, at the time when you informed the House about the death of the Hon. Judy LaMarsh, there was some confusion about timing and when members of Parliament might pay the traditional tributes that accompany the passing of a privy councillor, and therefore it was not done. Tributes, of course, have been paid to her outside the House but, Madam Speaker, I would beg your indulgence and the agreement of the House to include in the official record of this chamber—the chamber she served so well—a few words in memory of one who was a friend, a great parliamentarian and a great Canadian. I would do that, Madam Speaker, as an expression of our affection and admiration.

Madam Speaker: I would certainly allow that. But yesterday there was no confusion, in my mind at least. It was just that nobody rose so I could not recognize anyone. If the hon. member now wishes to be recognized I would be glad to do so.

THE LATE HON. JUDY V. LAMARSH

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRIVY COUNCILLOR

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, in the passing of the Hon. Judy LaMarsh, the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada lost a friend, one who served her country well in war and peace.

Judy LaMarsh—or Judy as she was known far and wide—loved this House, loved the cut and thrust of debate, loved the challenges she had to grapple with on behalf of the people of Niagara Falls but, more than that, on behalf of all the people of Canada.

Carrying out her legislative responsibilities, many of them controversial in nature, certainly was not easy for her. She had to battle a tough opposition here in this chamber, and not always across the aisle—sometimes within the ranks of her own party. She had to do battle with the provinces on a number of occasions. She had to do combat with the media. But she was never one to back away from a fight, as anyone who knew her can attest. She approached such challenges with relish. And this, of course, was characteristic of her approach to everything. Grab hold of life was her belief; pour all you can into it, get all you can out of it in the way of real satisfaction.

What made thousands of Canadians Judy LaMarsh fans was her great zest for living, her great humanity, her willingness to pour her heart out for a friend—indeed loyalty to friends was a great part of her credo—but, above all, her gusty, no holds barred performance in the arena of public life.

I said she loved this chamber. She knew how to work with it. Her friendships cut across party lines often, but she was a faithful partisan in the best sense of the word.

As a minister, she had a record of legislative achievement that few others could match. She helped set the social and cultural structures that remain her monument to this day: the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, medicare, the Broadcasting Act, Status of Women in Canada, and the Centennial year celebrations. All of these attest to her ability, her enthusiasm, her concern for people and, above all, her vision of Canada.

It was not always easy for her, but at a time when few women were active political figures she dominated the political scene in Canada. She was an inspiration to many others, and will remain so.

Courageous, controversial, warm-hearted, determined; she was all of these, and more. She always knew she had a job to do and she did not pussy-foot around it. She got on with it. And when things did not always go her way, she came to terms with that and got on with something else.

I saw her several months ago in hospital when she knew that her remaining time was limited. She had come to terms with that also. "After all," she said, "I never wanted to be old and alone and a woman". Judy LaMarsh never will be old and alone. She will be remembered by thousands of Canadians as someone who contributed greatly to the betterment of our society; she will be remembered by members of this Parliament as a loyal friend, a tough opponent, a courageous parliamentarian, a dedicated Canadian. Madam Speaker, she will be sorely missed.

All hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I should like to join in the words you uttered yesterday and with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) in the tribute she paid just now to the memory of Judy LaMarsh. Seldom have I heard words of tribute so well expressed as those just spoken by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. We all join in the sentiments she expressed.

I had the honour of meeting Judy LaMarsh for the first time on the day she took her seat in this House of Commons following a byelection 20 years ago this month. During the time she and I were both members of this House, I had a great deal to do with her because of our interest in social and other legislation. She made a mark on the history of this country that will be remembered for a long time.

As only the second woman to be a member of the federal cabinet, she pioneered in that area and millions of Canadians, for generations to come, will be grateful for the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan which was put through this House because Judy LaMarsh stuck with it in spite of a considerable amount of opposition of which some of us were aware.

We got to know her as a warm and friendly person. It hit us hard to learn that she had to end her days with so much suffering from such a serious illness and to die at such an early age. But life is measured not by its length but by its quality and its contribution. In those terms the name of Judy LaMarsh stands high in Canadian history, and we pay our tribute to her memory today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the government and members on this side of the House, I am very honoured to have the opportunity of offering a few words of respect for the Hon. Judy LaMarsh.

I did not have the pleasure of sharing moments in the House of Commons with Judy because she left Parliament shortly before I arrived in this place. I have known Judy LaMarsh for more than two decades, however. I believe that I would not be in this House today, Madam Speaker, were it not for my activities in my own party at the University of Toronto in 1960, when I had occasion to meet Judy LaMarsh at a meeting in my home town of Kitchener. It was the spirit, the independence and the drive of Judy LaMarsh that led me to believe that if a member of Parliament could have all those traits, have so much fun in her system, be so full of goodness and be so principled, then to follow an interest in politics and perhaps a political career in the future would be a desirable thing.

Judy LaMarsh was a distinguished minister in this party. She was the first woman to serve in a Liberal cabinet. She served in two senior portfolios, as minister of national health and welfare and also as secretary of state, distinguished herself in both, and is particularly remembered for her role in the introduction and passage of the Canada Pension Plan, as other members have mentioned. Perhaps 1967 was the year of the first real awakening among Canadians from coast to coast that they could be proud and could respect our character, culture and diversity. Indeed all the things we seemed to discover about ourselves in centennial year were in the spirit of Judy LaMarsh, the minister who made that such a success.

When I met Judy LaMarsh she was not discouraged by the plight of our political party at that time. She was never discouraged in her fight that women should have a more just position in political life in Canada. In the last year or two she faced a terrible trial. Again, Judy's wonderful courage and ambition to succeed in the things that she believed in, life, health, and caring for others, once more carried her through.

If I may, I would just like to add the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) issued yesterday when we all received the sad news. This statement is dated October 27, 1980, and reads as follows:

I was deeply saddened to learn today that the Honourable Judy LaMarsh had finally lost her courageous struggle with cancer.

We are left, however, with many vivid memories of Judy—as a cabinet minister who developed Canadian social security into a program which is now the envy of the world—as the master impresario of Canada's great centennial celebration—as a successful and respected lawyer—as a committed champion of womens' rights—as a best selling author and, of course, as a deeply involved Liberal partisan.

No tribute from me would be complete without reference to Judy's characterization of me at the 1968 leadership convention. Even when it was at my expense, I could not help admiring her colourful and frank style, which was always accompanied by an ongoing sense of dignity and a large measure of good humour.

Judy LaMarsh lived her life as a Canadian in full measure, and for this we can all be grateful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the people of Niagara Falls riding I wish to thank this House for its condolences on the untimely death of the Hon. Judy LaMarsh. Her passing is a time of great sorrow for Canadians everywhere. She served her country with distinction both in war and in peace. Hon. members will understand when I say that in Niagara Falls her loss is very great indeed among her people. Our feeling of sadness is very personal, and will be with us for a long time.

We appreciate your kind words of sympathy, Madam Speaker, and the tributes expressed to the voice of Niagara, which is now silent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. SHIELDS—PROCEDURE RESPECTING CONSTITUTION PATRIATION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning the matters of closure and government propaganda as they affect members of Parliament. These have been brought to your attention on many occasions in recent weeks, and I am sorry that I have to draw your attention to a very similar situation.

In my capacity as member of Parliament for the riding of Athabasca, I feel it is my responsibility to stimulate discussion and debate regarding the proposed constitutional reform. For this reason I had hoped to provide some of my constituents with material pertaining to the constitution and its reform so that they might make up their own minds.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is raising a question of privilege. He may raise a question of privilege without notice if it follows from today's deliberations. I do not feel that what the hon. member is referring to now follows from the deliberations of today. If he wishes to pursue the matter, the hon. member should send me notice and I could hear him tomorrow. Of course, he knows that a question of privilege not following from the deliberations requires at least one hour's notice, which I have not received.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I will pursue the matter and send you notice, thank you.

McDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DATE REPORT TO BE RECEIVED

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I table, in both official languages a minute of a meeting of the committee of the Privy Council establishing March 31, 1981, as the reporting date for the McDonald royal commission.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who has just tabled this further extension of the sittings of a royal commission which was supposed to have wound down some long time ago, tell us whether he expects this to be the last extension or whether he expects to be back to this House with further extensions? Can the Solicitor General give the House some indication why it is felt necessary to extend the date for the royal commission's report?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, this is the final date being established now. The government does not contemplate any further extension.

As to it being an extension in itself, there was no reporting date provided at the time the McDonald commission was established. I believe it was only since the middle of 1979 that a regular practice was established. A practice has been in effect since then of providing definite termination dates within the order in council establishing all royal commissions. There have been five since that time and all of them have had a termination date.

Considering there has been no termination date for the McDonald royal commission, I do not consider it a reasonable observation, if I may say so, that this is an undue length of time. It provides almost six months which is not long for a commission which had not been looking forward to any particular termination date. On the other hand, it is a sufficient amount of time for the commission to complete matters it thinks should be completed and to put its report together.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: The hon. President of the Privy Council rises on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am advised that I made a mistake when I stated that the first day of debate would be tomorrow morning. If indeed I said that, it was not on purpose. It is clear that the House will sit tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the questions to be answered today are Nos. 1,364, 1,416, 1,435, 1,443 and 1,533.

Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK—ASSISTANCE TO PERSONS IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF OXFORD

Question No. 1,364—Mr. Halliday:

For the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79, how many persons in the constituency of Oxford applied for assistance and received monetary assistance from the Woodstock, Ontario branch of the Federal Business Development Bank?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Federal Business Development Bank advises: The Woodstock, Ontario Branch opened on September 1, 1979. Out of a total of 61 applications, 59 loans were authorized to the end of July 1980. Prior to September 1, 1979, the constituency of Oxford formed a part of the London branch.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE—CONTRIBUTION TO BRANDT COMMISSION

Question No. 1,416—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Did the International Development Research Centre make a contribution to the Brandt commission and, if so, in what amount?

2. Will the recommendations of the Brandt commission cost the Canadian taxpayer any money and, if so, how much?

3. Does the government accept the recommendations of the Brandt commission?

4. Has CIDA made any grants to the North-South Institute in the past four years and, if so (a) what was the amount (b) what were the grants for?

5. Has the International Development Research Centre made any grants to the North-South Institute since 1976 and, if so (a) what was the amount (b) what was the purpose of the grant?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am informed by the Department of External Affairs, the Canadian International Development Agency and the International Development Research Centre as follows:

1. In 1978, the IDRC approved a grant of $100,000 for the Brandt commission in support of its study of the global issues arising from the economic and social disparities of the world community, the identification of desirable and realistic demands for development policy in the next decade and the preparation of proposals for accelerating social and economic progress in the developing countries.

2. The Brandt commission report is still at a preliminary stage of examination within the international community. It is therefore unclear whether any future international agreements may derive directly from the report's recommendations. Canada has made no financial commitments with regard to the implementation of any of the report's proposals.

3. The government has welcomed the Brandt commission report, which provides a comprehensive elaboration of issues currently being addressed in a number of international fora, as a timely and significant contribution to the north-south dialogue. The report, and the proposed emergency action program in particular, will likely prove useful as a frame of reference in the forthcoming United Nations global negotiations. The mutuality of interest between north and south, which is highlighted throughout the report and the emphasis placed on a consensus approach are both themes of considerable importance to Canada. The specific recommendations are being studied carefully. The government will certainly reflect upon the relevant ideas put forward in the report in the ongoing process of policy formulation. We have already indicated our support for the proposed north-south mini-summit which, if held, could be particularly useful in giving impetus to dialogue in general and the UN global negotiations in particular.

4. (a)	1977-78	75,000
	1978-79	88,000
	1979-80	68,300
	1980-81 to date	10,000
(b)	Financial contribution as a "Public Participation Program" N-S Round	225,000
	Table in Sri Lanka Evaluation of	2,800
	Powdered Milk Program	13,500

5. In 1976, the centre approved a grant of $75,000 for the North-South Institute to enable the institute to conduct independent policy-relevant research and analyses in the field of world development. In 1978, IDRC approved an additional grant of $375,000 over four years from 1978 to 1981 to enable the institute to continue to conduct independent policy-relevant research in the field of international development from a Canadian perspective, particularly the financial, political, and cultural relationships among developed and developing countries, and to cover part of the institute's administrative costs.

CTC—REGIONAL AIR POLICY—HALIFAX—TORONTO AIR ROUTE

Question No. 1,435—Mr. Crosby:

1. Did the Minister of Transport take steps to review regional air policy and to establish a new regional air policy in the light of the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission concerning the Halifax-Toronto air route and, if so, what were they?

2. Who is responsible for carrying out the review of regional air policy and how will a new policy be adopted so that it will be binding upon the Canadian Transport Commission?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. I announced on August 5, 1980 that I intend to seek the views of cabinet in the fall on a new regional air carrier policy. This new policy will also include the national and local carriers.

2. Transport Canada is responsible for carrying out the review. After seeking cabinet's views, I intend to seek the views of the airlines, the provinces and other interested parties. I expect that the government will subsequently approve a new domestic air carrier policy, which I anticipate the Canadian Transport Commission will consider in making its decisions, in the same way as it considers other relevant government policies.

PORT OF HALIFAX—MEMBERS APPOINTED TO THE PORT AUTHORITY

Question No. 1,443—Mr. Crosby:

1. Were steps taken to appoint members to the port authority for the port of Halifax following the lapse of appointments to the authority on December 31, 1979 and, if so, what were they?

2. Since January 1, 1980, how many meetings have been held by the port authority and who headed the meetings?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

1. Yes. Members were asked to continue in office until the end of 1980.

2. Two meetings: February 21 and March 14, 1980. Mr. G. E. Simmons, chairman of the port authority chaired both meetings.

PORT OF ST. JOHN—N.B.

Question No. 1,533—Mr. Mazankowski:

Does the National Harbours Board intend to turn over the port of St. John, New Brunswick to private enterprise and, if so, what date is forecast for the turnover and how will it be carried out?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: No.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CROWN CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Friday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet (for the Prime Minister) that Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Madam Speaker, I spoke during debate on this bill last Friday, and I would like to conclude my remarks now.

This legislation contains many of the measures that our party, through my colleague from Brandon-Souris, has advocated for a number of years. As I pointed out on Friday, the best intent of my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), seems also to be reflected in the bill. I repeat that I support this bill and look forward to its passage.

As I said last Friday, I oppose closing rural post offices on Saturdays. They are very important to the people of my riding, and I am sure they are equally important to rural Canadians across Canada. Because of the distances that many rural people must drive to get to post offices, the time constraints of farm life, and often stormy weather of Canadian winters, days of opening of rural post offices should not be curtailed. Rural Canadians depend on their post offices six days a week and I know they will not welcome Saturday closings.

Those members in this House who represent large rural ridings like mine, will know that in many of the towns and villages that dot their constituencies, the local post office is the only visible symbol of the federal government. The red and white sign outside the building names the postal station, and the Canadian flag flies proudly above. To close rural post offices on Saturday would not only cut off access to the mail, it would also serve to drive a wedge between rural Canadians and the only visible symbol of the federal government in their community.

I hope the new corporation will take a look at the condition of some of the rural post offices in Canada. In my riding the Denbigh post office is in a private home. Although I have made representations to post office officials to have a new station built, I believe the new corporation should look closely at this situation and adopt a policy of building post offices to replace postal facilities located in private homes, where the volume warrants.

It is my sincere hope that this bill will address the many serious problems that currently plague the Post Office. The matter of labour-management disputes has to be considered the most important of these problems. Other important issues include electronic funds transmission, as my colleague, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), referred to in his remarks on Friday. Should this new technology become a widely accepted practice, as many people believe it will, the result will be devastating for the Post Office. It will mean a very significant decrease in the volume of first class mail handled by the Post Office. This will result in a great loss of revenue and, perhaps, more important, will mean a loss of many jobs for postal employees.

The tension between labour and management over this issue will become more serious. As management responds to this decrease in the use of the Post Office, they will certainly have to cut jobs that have become obsolete. Job security has always been a thorny issue for labour-management negotiations, and we can expect that situation to continue if the electronic transmission of funds becomes a reality.

If further instability results in the Post Office, it will inevitably mean more lost revenue, pushing the Post Office debt up even higher than its current debt of $485 million. Every time there is a disruption in postal service, the private courier services pick up more customers. Many of these customers are not temporary, they are permanent. This results in even less use of the Post Office, meaning even more lost revenue, less need for postal employees, and more opportunity for labour-management strife. The result is a vicious circle.

I mention this because it is a real problem that the new corporation has to deal with. I might add that I do not envy the responsibilities of the members of the board of the new corporation. They are inheriting a mess. The government has learned the fine art of incompetence over the past decade in its management of the Post Office. It has perfected this art during the debate on the constitutional resolution. It is this legacy which the new corporation will have to address, and I wish them the very best of luck in putting the Post Office back on track.

Before I conclude, I would like to mention that I deeply regretted the day that the government dropped the name of "The Royal Mail" for the Post Office. In the minds of many people this may not be a matter of much significance, but to me, Mr. Speaker, it is a reflection of an attitude which has invaded many quarters of the government that has resulted in the loss of many references to the tradition of the monarchy in Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to state my support for the legislation now before us. It is my sincere hope that turning the Post Office into a Crown corporation will give it a much-needed new start in labour-management negotiations. Hopefully this will result in fewer work stoppages, an increase in productivity, and create in the minds of Canadians a sense of confidence in our mail service.

Finally, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am greatly disappointed that I did not have an opportunity to speak during the constitutional debate because of government closure. I had looked forward to that opportunity and take deep offence that it was denied. However, the Post Office is something like the constitution which affects every Canadian, and I am pleased to have had the opportunity to participate in the debate on this bill.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak on this very important bill, C-42, which will enable the Post Office to operate as a Crown corporation. As many of my colleagues know, I have had the privilege of serving on the Post Office committee on behalf of this party for some six or seven years, working with my colleague, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). Most are aware of the trials and tribulations of the Post Office down through the years. I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and his predecessor in the chamber. Both are aware of what the Post Office has gone through. Possibly when this bill is passed and the new corporation comes into being, it will work to the better for all concerned.

Many major problems have confronted the Post Office in recent years, especially when labour negotiations were going on with the various unions. It proved very difficult to arrive at a suitable settlement because of the interest in and participation by more than one government agency. For example, the Public Service Commission enters into the program when it comes to hiring. Treasury Board takes over when negotiating contracts. When it comes to plant maintenance and so on, we switch over to Public Works. These bureaucratic complications have certainly caused problems in labour-management relations. I hope the conversion of the Post Office into a Crown corporation will reduce many of the problems.

The Clark government was in the process of preparing legislation to create a Crown corporation when the election was called last December. Hon. members will recall Bill C-27 which was introduced by the previous Liberal government, and which we felt did not go far enough, died on order paper. There have been numerous studies since 1962 which recommended converting the Post Office into a Crown corporation. The Liberals continued to ignore this advice until 1978 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced he was going to create a Crown corporation because he was fed up with the labour problems in the Post Office.

As I have already mentioned, Bill C-27 was introduced to convert the Post Office into a Crown corporation. It did not receive second reading. The Progressive Conservative Party objected to the bill because it proposed a two-tier system of management. We felt that such a system would aggravate labour-management relations.

The problem facing the Post Office and some of the reasons for conversion were as follows. First, there was a decline in the reliability and efficiency of the Post Office over the past ten years. I am certain that almost every member of Parliament has received letters and telephone calls from irate constituents lambasting the Post Office for this, that, or the other thing. Something else that does not sit well with the general public is the increase in postal rates. We must be realistic. It costs money to operate and more than it did years ago. Between 1968 and April, 1979, first-class mail rates have increased from six cents to 17 cents.

● (1540)

Earlier this year in a committee meeting, when the estimates of the Post Office were before it, I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General a point blank question. I said that I would make a bet with him, and I will do it again. I said that by April 1, 1981, I was confident that it would cost 20 cents to mail a first-class letter. Would the Postmaster General take that bet now? He is engaged in a conversation, but I will get back to him.

Mr. Ouellet: I am sorry.

Mr. Darling: I am still stating that the Post Office, or the Crown corporation, if it is in effect, will raise the first-class rates to at least 20 cents by April 1. I will bet the Postmaster General a dollar to that effect, if he will take it.

Another matter which has been a cause for great concern and the cause of the increases is the deficit the Post Office has faced through the years from 1968 to 1979. The deficit rose from $67 million a year to $559 million a year. As was mentioned by one of my colleagues, I believe this past year it was in the $400 and some million bracket. One of the reasons for the unrest in the last ten years was the more frequent labour-management disputes. The decision by management in the late 1960s to go ahead with a billion-dollar automation program in order to cope with significant increases in the volume of mail certainly created a real furore with the unions. There was little prior consultation, and I think we are all aware that if one talks things over with employees to straighten the matter out, this certainly would bear a lot more fruit.

Approximately two or three years ago the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and I visited post offices in Europe, principally the post office in Great Britain. We spoke to corporate management heads of the post office there and also with the two unions. It was pointed out to us that there was grave concern at that time because the post office was starting to automate over there. But they ironed things out among themselves and the unions finally said, "All right, we will go ahead with it". The same thing applied in West Germany where we had discussions with the heads of their post office. In both of those jurisdictions the service being given to the public is amazing.

I concede that there is a difference in the sizes of Great Britain and Canada, despite the fact that it is 50-odd million to 24 million people. Therefore we cannot really do the same thing from one corner of Canada to another. The same situation applies in the Federal Republic of West Germany. Germany is a fairly large country with a population of some 60 million people, but I assume they are still operating a 24-hour mail service as they were when we were there. A first-class letter is delivered anywhere in Germany within 24 hours. Then they said—and this came as a shock to me—that they were trying to improve on it. I said, "How in the name of heavens can you improve on a letter being mailed today and delivered tomorrow?" They said they would be improving on it.

Another problem which will face the Crown corporation is the fact that the Post Office now has competition. Certainly some of it is well-deserved because the public could not trust the Post Office to deliver mail within a reasonable time. As a result of that there are now various private couriers delivering mail. This was brought on primarily when there were labour disputes, strikes and so on. Even at the present time, when things are reasonably quiet and moving along in the Post Office, a tremendous amount of important mail is delivered by courier. The Post Office has lost that business.

I presume the new corporation will have to face a frightening situation in the future, that is, electronic mail. It will do away with a great percentage of the existing mail service and the ordinary delivery of letters. Probably the government will be one of the main ones to bring this about when old age pension cheques, family allowance cheques and various cheques are distributed electronically. On a certain date the cheque of an old age pensioner or a person receiving Canada Pension, as the case may be, will be in the bank; there will be no worry about delivery or anything. The Post Office will have to contend with that.

We know that two contracts are coming up for discussion and perhaps renewal by the end of this year, that is, the one with CUPW and the one with the letter carriers. I am not holding any great brief for Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot as the quietest and the most wonderful head of the union through the years of his tenure following that Scotsman, Mr. Joe Davidson. My ancestors came from Scotland, but I think we were glad to be rid of him. I am not sure whether we went from the frying pan into the fire, but he drove a hard bargain and a settlement was reached. Of course the then postmaster general averted a strike and, in the eyes of many, it cost a good deal. When it comes up at the end of this year, let us hope that something can be worked out so that there will not be a disruption in the mail service. Just because it goes to the end of December does not say that there could not be a lot of problems. We know the important time for Her Majesty's mail is during the Christmas period.

Also we are aware that presently letter carriers are discussing their contract. Certainly their union is a very excellent one. Members of the committee have met with their union at various times, and we have found it to be very straightforward. From reading the latest report of Mr. McGarry and company, they will be talking pretty tough this time. Of course this again will cost taxpayers or the users of the Post Office a considerable amount of money.

Members of the committee have been asked time and again about mail services in the rural areas and small post offices. I believe it was mentioned before by one of my colleagues that there is a proposal the Post Office will close its branches in small towns on Saturday morning. As I have mentioned before, and as I have pointed out to the Postmaster General, the five-day week in the cities seems the norm, that is quite in order, but in small towns Saturday is a busy day. A lot of people in small towns work during the week in larger centres. Some of them may be away for the five days and come home on the weekend. They want to be able to go into the post office to purchase money orders, get their mail, or whatever. They would like to see the post office remain open on Saturday morning. I hope the Postmaster General, in his wisdom, as long as it is under his jurisdiction, will see that that continues.

I come from a small town, and in some small towns postmasters encounter some problems. I am not sure whether the Postmaster General is aware of this, but there is vandalism in post offices and post office lobbies. In two or three of the towns in my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka the postmasters have requested permission—and I suppose unilaterally made the decision—to close the lobbies because of young vandals going in at all hours of the night or early in the morning. In one case they set fire to a waste basket. In another they kicked in walls. I ask the Postmaster General whether this is correct or not, but as I understand it, according to the rules post office lobbies are to remain open 24 hours. Is that correct? I am just wondering if the Postmaster General would nod this head as to whether that is correct. When vandalism such as this occurs, I certainly feel that the postmaster of a particular jurisdiction should have the authority to close the post office and let it remain closed until he feels it is wise to open it again.

There is another thing about which I was not too happy. The post offices across Canada in many cases are beautiful old buildings. We might even say they are the most historic buildings in the towns. Two particular post offices in my riding come to mind. A few years ago the government decided to change all the lettering on post offices. Some of them had beautiful lettering carved above the doors. I will cite today the case of the post office in the great village of Burks Falls where I live. On the two doors there were the words "Post Office" and then carved in stone "Burks Falls Post Office". Under the new ruling "Post Office" was chiselled off and replaced with one of those yellow signs, an ugly looking thing compared with what was there.

This was also done in the town of Gravenhurst. There is another beautiful and historic building there. The words "Post Office" and "Gravenhurst" were chiselled off and up went that red or yellow or red, white and blue sign which could hardly be read. It was much smaller, and the other was huge.

Last year I brought this matter to the attention of the then postmaster general, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), and, believe it or not, we were able to get the lettering back on both of those post offices. It was absolutely ridiculous to me that the lettering was removed in the first place, and I hope that something will be done to put the original lettering back on other post offices which have been disfigured that way.

In view of the electronics with which we are faced there is a growing awareness that Canada made a mistake ten years ago when it went to automation. At that time we bought automatic machines. I am thinking of Gateway and the terminal at Alta Vista here, as well as other large post offices. We bought equipment which came from Germany, I believe, which was felt to be obsolete. We paid a pretty big buck for it. I am sure there were hundreds of millions of dollars poured into this automatic equipment, but besides making employees as mad as the dickens, it also did not speed things up, as we are all aware.

Many years ago when I was a small insurance agent I could post my mail at the village of Burks Falls up until midnight, and it would go on the train at midnight to Toronto. I knew that a letter mailed at that time would be delivered at the insurance office by nine or ten o'clock the next morning. If I had to have a policy, I could telephone Toronto, and I knew that if it was prepared and mailed before 4.30 or five o'clock, it would go on the train and be delivered to Burks Falls the next morning just as sure as shooting. Now we know the horror stories. To get mail from my constituency office in Burks Falls to Ottawa during the recess takes five, six or seven days, even under so-called normal conditions. This automatic machinery which was so wonderful certainly is not doing the job it was meant to do, and as I mentioned before, there certainly will be revolutionary ideas in the future with respect to electronic mail equipment. I understand that technology is now in place to do away with communication by mail entirely.

As we know, both the United Kingdom and the United States have set up Crown or state corporations, and we certainly hope a Crown corporation will be set up here. The Postmaster General certainly has the support of this party. We have spoken very strongly in favour of this in the first place. Let us hope that it will be put into place before too long.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I will be as brief as possible this afternoon because it is my hope that we will be able to get this bill into committee as quickly as possible.

Unfortunately I could not be here on Friday afternoon to put forward my party's position on this bill, but I have read the remarks of my respected colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and I must admit that the quality of his speech was such that I could not possibly have matched his eloquence had I been here.

It is my hope this afternoon to enumerate the three areas of concern my party has about this otherwise good piece of legislation. I could, like some of the Conservatives who have preceded me in this debate, go off on a wild harangue against the postal service in Canada, but I do not feel that such a speech would serve the House well. The postal service in Canada is certainly in bad shape.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, I am just wondering if the hon. member who is speaking now could give us examples of the wild harangue he says Conservative speakers to this point have made. I have been here throughout the entire debate, and I do not think I have heard any.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, if there are any questions, I will be prepared to answer them after my speech.

I moved a motion with regard to the poor shape of the postal service just last spring, which led off a debate in this chamber. There is no question that major changes are required especially, as I indicated last spring, in the management structure of Canada Post. However, surely this is not the time to go over old ground. Surely we must use this debate to look to the future rather than to complain about the past. The fact of the matter is that the government has finally accepted a demand which we on this side of the House have been voicing for years, a demand that Canada Post be turned into a Crown corporation. What possible point is served in using the opportunity to discuss such an important proposal once again to make those tired old arguments about how terrible the postal service is? Frankly, the official opposition is once again being obstructionist and leaving the real job of opposition and constructive criticism to the members of my party. We take on the job with pride, and we will leave the braying to the Conservatives to my right.

I said that we will offer constructive criticism, and I meant it. We have three very specific concerns about this legislation, and if the government listens to our arguments I think it will quickly realize that the changes we are recommending will strengthen the bill and make it more effective.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The three are ready, aye ready!

Mr. Parker: The first and most important concern is with respect to clause 5(2) of this legislation. As the minister pointed out in his opening remarks on Friday, this is far and away the most important provision in the bill. This clause guarantees that Canadians will continue to enjoy basic customary postal service. Naturally we agree with that sentiment, but we are not sure what is meant by basic customary postal services. Does the government mean that all Canadians living in residential communities over a certain size will continue to receive daily home delivery of mail, or does it mean that all letters will be sent to some large green box in the middle of the neighbourhood and that Canadians will have to trudge through the ice and snow to pick up their mail? I ask this question in all seriousness because in a large number of large Canadian cities, especially in western Canada, that is what basic customary postal service has come to mean.

● (1600)

Does this phrase mean that rural post offices will continue to stay open six days a week, or does it mean that the new corporation will follow through on this government's promise to reduce service by at least one day a week? Does this phrase mean that some rural towns on the Canadian prairies will be able to keep their post offices and, through that, their only link with the federal government, or does it mean that these small post offices will be closed?

This phrase will be considered very carefully by judges in the not too distant future when they will try to determine whether or not the new corporation is adequately fulfilling its mandate. Quite frankly, we are concerned that a judge might not interpret this wording in quite such a wide manner as the minister did on Friday when he introduced the bill. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, we will be proposing amendments to this clause in committee which would clearly spell out what is meant by customary postal service. I am sure that if the minister is as concerned with this issue as he was on Friday, he will have no problem in supporting our amendments in committee.

Our second major concern with this legislation is in clause 22(2). This clause is very short and, on the surface, does not appear very serious. All it says is that the new corporation will be able to enter into any contracts it likes. The problem with this clause, quite frankly, is that it gives the corporation the power to dismantle the Post Office altogether. Let us say, for example, that the corporation's board decided that it did not like its letter carriers' union. Under this clause it could simply tender a contract with some firm, pay the firm a set amount of money, and let them worry about finding letter carriers and paying them a fair salary. This is not a wild idea since it is already occurring in several communities across the country. We are finding that Canada Post is going into the contract business with unscrupulous businessmen who are hiring cheap labour to deliver the mail at the minimum wage. The government is able to stop worrying about labour relations, the contractors are making money hand over fist, and the workers are being shafted. For there to be any kind of labour co-ordination in the postal service once Canada Post becomes a Crown corporation, it is very important that we look into these problems.

Under this provision in the legislation the corporation will be able to contract out virtually every function with which it is being charged. This is not a reasonable situation and must be corrected before the bill is out of committee. We will be proposing an amendment to the effect that the corporation will not be able to contract out any work which, by its very nature, is an essential part of the postal service.

Our third major concern focuses on clauses 14 and 15 which deal with the exclusive privileges of the corporation. Naturally we agree with the government that the Post Office must have a monopoly over the delivery of letters, but we cannot understand why they have decided to allow the continued use of private parcel post delivery systems. Our argument is very simple and we hope that the government will pay heed to it.

Everyone knows that parcel delivery is the most profitable area of postal service. It is in this field that the Post Office makes up for its losses in the delivery of letters. Clearly, it is more profitable to deliver a parcel across town than it is to deliver a letter to Old Crow in the Yukon. By letting private couriers compete with the Post Office in parcel delivery, we are letting them skim the market. We do not let the railways skim the market, nor do we let the airlines skim the market, so why on earth should we let United Parcel Service and Purolators Courier Service skim profits from the Post Office? All this will mean is that letter rates will go sky high, especially since the government has announced its intention to make the new corporation self-sufficient.

United Parcel Service has decimated the postal system in the United States. I beg the government not to do the same thing here in Canada. I hope that hon. members opposite will support my proposal to amend clause 14 to ensure that parcel post delivery remains the exclusive privilege of Canada Post.

We have other concerns with this bill, Mr. Speaker, but they are not too serious and I am sure they will be dealt with in committee. I am not sure why the government changed the wording in clause 40 so that it is now an offence to open mail without a lawful excuse, rather than just an offence, period, as it is under the current act. In other words, they have added the phrase "without lawful excuse." We hope that this is not a back door attempt to legitimize RCMP openings. We are concerned when the minister talks about union representatives on the board of the corporation and we wonder whether he is not talking about putting the likes of Senator Ed Lawson on the board and claiming that such people represent the average working people.

All in all, Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate that my party supports the thrust of the bill before us and that we are fully prepared to give it speedy passage through committee so long as the government gives our proposed amendments the attention which we are convinced they deserve.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I am not at all excited about this bill. I believe that state ownership, of which the last speaker spoke so highly, has been the cause of the mess in the Post Office today, and that any organization will have a most difficult time to get it back on the tracks again. If the Post Office is an example of state ownership, then I am sure Canadians will never support the NDP in its efforts to nationalize other corporations.

I would like to deal now with two or three clauses in this bill. First I wish to refer to the phrase "maintaining basic customary postal service." I have looked in vain for a definition of that phrase and I do not know whether it means the elimination of the basic service we have today, and whether or not it will put an extra burden on our rural people and on many of our urban people to whom mail is delivered customarily. It is difficult enough now at times without making it any more difficult, and I hope the minister, when he closes the debate on this bill, or in committee, will give us a definition of "maintaining basic customary postal service."

I wonder if the practice that has been followed for many, many years in the Post Office of keeping a post office open when other businesses are open will be included under the definition of basic customary postal service. Today there is a move on foot to close the rural post offices in our towns and villages on Saturdays. These days Saturday is not the business day it once was in many parts of this country. But Saturday is still a very important day and many rural people go to town on Saturday to do their shopping, and expect to get their mail. I strongly urge when this thing is being considered that we don't simply say we are going automatically, and in a blanket way, to close all post offices on Saturdays. Many people work long hours, from the early morning until late at night, to make a livelihood for themselves and their families. I have some correspondence to indicate that the only time a person has to go to the post office and do his postal business is on a Saturday.

Another point in connection with basic service which bothers me is the hours of work. Today, for instance, in our Calgary post office, it operates from 7 a.m. to 5.15 p.m. Out in Airdrie, just a few miles away, the Post Office does not open until 8.45 a.m. So that means workers cannot get there and do their postal work before they go to work, and it is closed by the time they finish their work day.

I would like to suggest that the major aim of the Post Office should be to serve the people of this country, to get them their mail and give them service of which they can be proud. Several years ago there was no difficulty in the Post Office. You mailed a letter with the utmost confidence that it would reach the person to whom you addressed it within a very short period of time. Now we have no such assurance at all; it may get there in three days or it may take 17 days. This is not good enough, and if that is going to be the basic postal service which we have today then we are not going to satisfy anybody by simply calling it a Crown corporation. I think it is very important to realize that changing the name and changing some of the set-up may not have the desired effect. That in itself is not going to give us good postal service. There must be some very basic changes made in the present set-up.

One of the things about this bill which worries me a great deal is the constancy with which I see the words "appointed by the minister", or, "with the approval of the minister", or, "shall be appointed by the governor in council". The president, chairman and directors are all appointed by the governor in council to hold office during pleasure. Are these people going to be responsible to the cabinet or responsible to the people of this country?

We already have a situation where the minister is responsible to the people through this House, and I am wondering if this is going to put them beyond the reach of this House. Will we be able to consider the difficulties which may arise with regard to post office services? Will we be able to represent the people who send us here by having someone to whom to direct our questions? At the present time we may ask the minister, and the minister endeavours to answer our questions. If there is something wrong he can take steps to have it corrected. Are we putting the Post Office beyond the reach of the people, through their elected representatives? If so I am not going to like it at all.

We must have definite assurances that we will be able to make representations, that those representations will be heard, and that those who are appointed as chairman, president and directors are to be responsible to the people by reporting to the members of the House of Commons. I think that is a very basic and important item.

Another point of concern to me is that of the chain of command. If this bill is not going to alter the chain of command I do not think we will see any improvement in our postal service. In my view that is one of the basic things wrong with the present postal service.

A regional post office takes a great deal of blame, such as the Calgary regional post office, and in my cases properly so. The mail from Edmonton is delayed in Calgary for sometimes as long as seven days—I am told—before it gets through Calgary, which is where the bottleneck takes place. But you cannot put the whole blame on the regional post office in Calgary because the director there has no authority. If he has a poor employee who is not doing his job he must write to Ottawa. I was informed, on good authority, that it is sometimes three months before a reply is received from Ottawa. By that time eveyone has forgotten what the incident was about and why the man should have been discharged on the spot.

Unless your employees are responsible right down the chain of command you will not get good service. Whether it is a business or whether it is a government department, there must be a chain of command. The head of that, the president or chairman of the board, should be able to put his finger on the person who is causing the hold-up. Sometimes it is the management at fault, not the workers at all.

I was amazed when I was informed that during the last public service strike the managers of one of the regional post offices in Toronto were all going to work even though there was no mail being delivered. The security was all there even though there was no mail to protect and no employees present to do the work. The upper echelon went each day and played cards, and got paid by the taxpayers. I do not think that is responsible at all. Surely the taxpayers should not be ripped off in that way. If the workers are not in, then we should not be paying the managers to be there. That is one of the difficulties today; there is no chain of command in our Post Office. Almost everything has to be directed to the top in Ottawa. The simplest things have to be done that way, and this costs a lot of money and causes a lot of concern.

No wonder workers get frustrated when they see somebody slacking on the job while they are working full time doing their utmost to earn their pay, while beside them the person sloughing off is getting the same pay. And nothing is done about it because no one is responsible. They must write to Ottawa and say "Mike is not doing his job, may I fire him, please?" Or "May I slap him on the wrist?" Or "May I discipline him?" Surely if we are going to have a Crown corporation we should look to private enterprise as an example. Private enterprise would not put up with that. They would not stay in business if they did. And whether it is a Crown corporation or a government department, we should not put up with it either.

The chain of command is something which I will be watching very carefully as the legislation comes into operation. I hope that the chairman, president, and the board of directors will give that matter a great deal of attention because this is one of the things which today is causing chaos in our post office system.

We invested thousands of dollars to get automation in our Post Office. I am told that there is equipment which has been purchased, costing several thousands of dollars, and it has never been used. It has never been used and it is still sitting there. Again, that tells me there is no chain of command. Nobody is taking the responsibility, and that should not happen. This instance can be supported time and again across this country. I raised the matter in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts two years ago. I was amazed at the representatives of the Post Office who seemed to think that everything was okay.

These occurrences also happen in Toronto. There was an incident there where a little screw caused the shutdown of an automatic machine. The operator went out and bought a screw for 15 cents and installed it in the machine. The machine was fixed and it started to work again. This man was reported to management because it was felt that he had done something terrible.

He was called before management because they wanted to know why he had taken this action. Management told him that the next time he would be discharged if he did such a terrible thing. This individual should have followed procedure, written out a requisition for the screw and taken it to the office. It would probably have been sent to Ottawa, then things would really have been screwed up and the machine would have been out of work for three weeks. When we hear about incidents like this, it is no wonder that we are not getting our mail. A chain of command must be established. If people such as this workman wish to do something well, then let us congratulate and commend them, not tell them they will get fired the next time they go out and buy a 15 cent screw.

Another thing which bothers me about the post office is that there seems to be no vision toward the future. Somebody said the other day that where there is no vision the people perish. I can take hon. members to post offices across this country which were built just two years ago, three years ago and five years ago, and which today are unable to cope with the amount of business. I realize that in some places there is reason for this inability to cope.

For instance, I can cite the town of Airdrie in the province of Alberta. This town has grown probably faster than any other town in the whole of Canada. From a population of between 1,000 and 2,000 people just a few years ago, it now has a population of 10,000 people. It is expanding like a mushroom. The post office is not meeting the situation, nor has it met the situation for the last four years.

Since I have been elected, I have written to each postmaster general, and I always receive the answer from civil servants, "we know that the postal service is bad and that people have to stand in line for 30 minutes to get their mail from the wicket and that there are not enough boxes". But why has something not been done about the matter?

In the case of Airdrie, over half of the population, some 6,000 people, are living on the east side of the highway, and they must cross the highway into the town to get their mail. One drugstore, and perhaps there are a dozen other businesses, has offered to instal a post office. Why is there this dilly-dallying by those who are in command when these people are not receiving their mail and are waiting from 15 to 45 minutes in line because there are no boxes?

There is also the fact that they must travel the distance to the post office. There is an underpass for the people on the east side of the highway, but they still must go the distance to the post office. The underpass is there as a result of the efforts of the Alberta government, not of the federal government. In any event, they are not getting their mail, so they are unhappy and there is discontent.

Again, if there is a chain of command, surely there can be the vision that when a town begins to grow the post office should immediately increase its service, the same as private enterprise would do in such a situation. If a private entrepreneur were operating a store and saw that he could not handle his customers, he would expand and build another store, and another, to serve his customers. That is what the post office should do, serve the people.

Another example is the town of Okotoks. There the post office is in a Crown-owned building, but there are not enough boxes. Again, the town has grown and grown, and there are subdivisions. When subdivisions become evident around a town, why are steps not taken to provide boxes for those subdivisions? There are no boxes, and the people of that town stand in line for general delivery. Yet the Post Office says to people, "You cannot expect to get your mail unless you have a box", and these people cannot buy a box for love nor money. The town of Strathmore is another case. I have pointed out three very definite cases where the evidence was there but nothing was done.

I do not blame those who ten years ago did not foresee this eventuality, but I certainly blame those who did not foresee the occurrence of such a situation in the last two years, three years or four years, when the situation became more evident all the time. Now we have the situation, for example, in the town of Airdrie where 10,000 people are trying to obtain their mail from a little post office. There are no boxes, and these people must stand in line for 45 minutes.

How would the hon. members of this House like to stand in line every day for 45 minutes? Let us bring it down to our own case and see how we would like it. These people have things to do. They are earning a living for their families.

I am also bothered by some of the ridiculous regulations which are introduced, not to give better service to the people, but to give them poorer service. There are post offices which follow the directive from somewhere in Ottawa that if a box number is not on a letter it must be returned. Thank goodness there are also some postmasters who have enough common, ordinary horse sense that when they receive a letter for John Jones without a box number, they say, "Well, I know John Jones because he has lived here for 25 years. I will put it in his box".

There is a postmaster in my own riding who returns the mail because there is no box number. How in the world can Mary Jane living in Toronto know the box number of Harry Jones in Airdrie if it is the first time she has written to him? These postmasters should use a little, ordinary, common horse sense. It would solve an awful lot of problems.

I am also bothered a great deal by the fact that the Post Office chisels on its smaller post offices. The postal workers in these places are not paid the same rate as people in the larger centres, yet they have more responsibility. For instance, there is a post office in my riding of Bow River which has been provided by the postmistress who has pulled in a trailer. This trailer is now costing her a great deal to operate. If the Post Office officials did not want to provide a building and accepted her offer to provide a building, why were the terms of rental not worked out before she pulled the trailer in and had it converted? Rather, the Post Office has told her that they will not even pay her enough to meet the monthly payments on the trailer. There is also the wages of this postmistress who is paid at the rate of $2.50 per hour. In larger centres the employees receive $7.50 per hour.

Larger centres have supervisors and people to audit and check the books. In small post offices the whole thing is done by the postmaster. And because they are a small post office, we chisel on them so that they can hardly make a living. Some businesses depend on how much mail they receive. The mail takes so long to get through the regional post office that those who can afford to pay and who should be doing their business at the post office cannot afford the loss of time, so they rely on private couriers. This has taken a tremendous amount of revenue away from the Post Office.

Each hon. member should look at the matter from the perspective of his own riding. In many small towns in the southern part of my riding some businesses have lost more than half of their business because the mail takes too long to arrive. Businesses such as grain elevators and insurance companies cannot afford to pay the price of couriers. An agent in Turner Valley told me that the Post Office was ruining her business. She said that she could not expect her clients to wait for the assurance that their house, car, or whatever it is they are insuring, is covered. They may wait as long as seven days before the mail arrives, when one could walk the distance in less than a day.

These are the types of things that we have to consider—and we must always consider people. Let us not say that the smaller post offices are hurting the system; in fact, we are hurting them. They provide an excellent service and we need them, and we need to have them open on Saturday as well, Mr. Speaker.

When it comes to the use of automatic equipment, Mr. Speaker, I think we must realize that there will always be parcels that are not properly wrapped. The problem is, however, that even those that are well wrapped take a severe beating as they travel down the delivery trays and bounce along the conveyor belts.

I have here a letter from a friend and constituent, an excellent school teacher, who spent some time in Hawaii. On his return he wrote to me about his problems with the Post Office and I forwarded the letter to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). Among other things, he wrote as follows:

I solicit your aid in seeing that the correct personnel are made aware of the utter disgust I feel toward the Canadian postal system. Not only is it an inept, bungling department of national disgrace, but a large number of its personnel have no ability to work with the public.

He went on to say:

We shipped five parcels and all five arrived damaged, some of them utterly destroyed.

Surely we can expect better than that from our postal service, Mr. Speaker.

The letter continues:

For example, we packed a dried crab shell in feathers in a box 10 times its size. The box was wrapped in brown paper and butcher twine yet the shell arrived in 33 pieces. When I complained, I was told to take my complaints to the U.S. post office. I shipped a box of books on July 25th, totalling 18 books and magazines. The parcel arrived on September 10th, totally demolished and numbering 9 books.

Half the books had disappeared, Mr. Speaker. It is no wonder the Canadian public is disgruntled in the face of such service.

The letter goes on:

How long is this national disaster going to be allowed to waste tax dollars and destroy property?

In turn, I asked the Postmaster General—how long?

Later in his letter he refers to an occasion when he was expecting a letter which took from August 20 to September 10 to reach him in Strathmore from Humboldt. Yet it only takes eight hours to drive to Humboldt, Mr. Speaker. He goes on to say, "I have just about decided to throw in the towel." That is because he thinks no one cares.

Surely the government should sit up and take notice when hard working people who contribute to the good of this country come to the conclusion that no one in the government cares.

At the present time it takes from nine to 17 days for a letter to travel from Edmonton to Strathmore.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Taylor: I could give a lot of other examples, Mr. Speaker, but I shall not go into them now. I am not trying to hurt the people in the Post Office—unless they are responsible for some of these delays. If that is the case, then in my view they should be fired immediately.

I hope that when the Post Office becomes a Crown corporation it will have a chain of command that will get rid of those people who do not care and who take no responsibility for the service. They are no good to the Post Office, no good to themselves, and they are no good to this country.

If the problems of the Post Office are to be solved, some of these situations must be corrected. I hope there will be a difference when it becomes a Crown corporation. Unless radical changes are made, however, we will simply have another Crown corporation to deal with, and no improvement in the service. If things go wrong and the remedy is beyond the reach of members of this House, then we are not living in a democracy, Mr. Speaker, but in a totalitarian state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with some sense of sadness. The last time I tried to rise to make a speech in this House was last Thursday. My freedom of speech in relation to the most important issue facing the country, the patriation of the Constitution of Canada, was denied by the actions of hon. members opposite—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Hawkes: It is something that is hard to forget—

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the House is now studying Bill C-42, not the constitution.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. What the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) observes is correct—the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is not yet addressing himself to the bill. The Chair has to give some leeway to hon. members, however, who may want to make a reference as they proceed. I have been listening to the hon. member's remarks and I am well aware of that possibility, but I do not think hon. members ought to be cut off too quickly.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you for your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate it. I chose that method of introduction because it speaks to the sense of wonderment in me as to whether what I have to say about the Post Office bill might be listened to by hon. members opposite. I have watched the debate proceed, and on relatively few occasions have there been more than ten members present. If we on this side of the House are to fulfil our role as the official opposition, I think it is important that we be able to speak on those parts of a bill that we agree with and also on those parts with which we disagree. I also think there should be enough people in the House who have influence in the government caucus, to listen and pay attention.

We are at second reading stage of this bill—the debate in principle—on the desire of the Government of Canada to change the operation of the Post Office and to create a Crown corporation that will manage and hopefully straighten out the postal service in Canada.

I think it is interesting to note that a version of this bill first appeared in the House of Commons in October, 1978. Now, almost two years later, we are still at the first stage of debate. One of the privileges that we have as members of this House is that of making amendments at this stage. The normal process to be followed with bills is that when we complete debate in principle, the bill then goes to committee where we can speak to it as often as we want. There is no time limit at committee stage and amendments can be accepted. The bill then returns to the House for third reading with full and complete debate and, possibly, some amendments, and there is an opportunity to speak on those amendments. This is the process that has been followed for some four years with the Bank Act and, as you know, Mr. Speaker, that is not yet concluded.

We follow this procedure with government legislation because this House, representing the people of Canada, has a responsibility and a right to examine the legislation for its strength and its weaknesses, so that the laws which govern the people of Canada will have desirable rather than undesirable consequences.

It is interesting to contrast the foregoing with the nine weeks from the time the new constitution first saw the light of day to the use of the Post Office to send a resolution off to England. The most fundamental law in this country was debated for 24 hours in this House of Commons without any guarantee of further debate. That is quite a contrast when dealing with fundamental law versus the care and attention that should rightfully be given to this bill regarding the Post Office.

I appreciate what the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) said when he opened debate a few days ago. With remarkable candor he told the House that ten years ago—and I am almost repeating his words verbatim—the government moved too quickly to institute a modernization program. The consequence of the quickness of that move is plain to everybody in 1980. Are Canadians happy with their postal service? The answer is no. Are Canadian workers who work in the Canadian postal service happy? The answer is no. Is the management of the postal service happy? The answer is no. The present Postmaster General identified for us the irregular, spotty service, which many members could address. Certainly new members of Parliament get many letters on the inadequacy of the Canadian postal service. Strikes and the staff turnover are the outcome".

The minister told us that employees back in 1970 were not sufficiently informed about the changes coming about. He did not tell us that sufficiency of information might not have been enough, or that the quality might be important. In his introductory remarks the other day he said that a wise postmaster general in 1970 would have and should have had the full co-operation of the postal leaders. He neglected to say, although I think he might concur, that with wisdom modernization should have proceeded, not just with the full co-operation of labour leaders, but with the full co-operation of postal workers.

It is self-evident that the Post Office can only succeed if the people who work within it are willing to commit themselves to it. I suggest that is not unlike a nation, a nation intending to undergo radical change as a consequence of an act taken in secret which is not unlike what happened to the postal service of Canada. This is something which the little people—the ordinary people whom my friend from Bow River mentioned in his speech—might begin to resist and rebel against. I wonder then if that kind of thing happened and as that kind of thing grows whether we have the kind of Canada we had before. Certainly our experience in the Post Office suggests that in this decade we have not had the kind of postal service that we had before.

The minister has told us the root cause was an inadequate decision taken in haste, without consultation, co-operation and support. Yet that same minister sat here last Thursday evening and helped to cut off the consultation process and freedom of speech in this chamber so that the resolution would proceed without an opportunity for all points of view to be heard. We are dealing with the fundamental law in this nation which will affect the lives of each and every Canadian in frightening unknown ways. If we knew the ways, I would feel more comfortable.

The minister told us in his introductory remarks that that "procedure was very wrong". I ask him, although he is not paying much attention because he is reading a letter, whether he might just reflect on his introductory remarks and their application to something as fundamental and important as the Constitution of Canada.

The minister told us the treatment in 1970 in the Post Office was so quick that "employees felt threatened and pressured". Quick action, lack of consultation, these things can be applied today to Canada. Canadians each day are feeling more threatened and more pressured. Their political leaders are feeling more threatened and more pressured. If the people who worked in the Post Office of Canada ten years ago were asked whether it was their intention to separate from the Post Office or to quit their jobs, had a Gallup poll been taken the answer would have been no. But the Post Office the workers were committed to was pulled out from under them in secret and without consultation. They resisted. The level of service deteriorated, the number of strikes increased, and with it a terrific turnover in staff. The workers did not leave the Post Office, but a decision arrived at in haste took the Post Office out from under them.

I suggest that we are about to engage in a very similar process with the Constitution of Canada. The patriation process and more important, the amendments which are being smuggled through because they are not well understood, are likely to give us the same kind of consequences.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is referring to the remarks I made in introducing this bill. If one listened carefully to his arguments, they have nothing to do with the bill we are discussing today. He is merely taking out of context remarks that I made dealing with the changeover of the Post Office into a Crown corporation. He has tried to establish that a constitutional discussion should have followed a process of more extension consultations.

I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member's entire remarks so far have nothing to do with the Post Office. He is merely arguing on the constitutional issue. I say to the hon. member that we are getting close to five o'clock and we have a chance to pass the bill in this House. I hope the hon. member will speak to the subject and be fair to the Post Office workers, who are waiting for this bill and hoping that it can pass second reading today, instead of using the time to argue on the constitutional issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why don't you invoke closure?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the hon. minister. No one in this House is more anxious to see this bill brought in than I am. However, I must say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister who is my good friend, and to hon. members on the other side, some of whom are my good friends, that it ill behooves anyone on the government benches to get too nit-picky about any speeches made from this side because they happen to reflect and draw parallels between something the minister said and something which happened last week in this House. I have to say that what happened last week is deeply offensive to this side of the House. I also have to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to all hon. members on the government side, that this bill will go through without any undue debate. But I say clearly that it ill behooves anyone on the government side to come along now and ask for favours after what the government did last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: I know the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) is anxious to put this bill through. I know also that much of what is in this bill is what I was trying to do as a minister of the Crown. I appreciate that, and the minister knows it.

There will not be undue delay with this bill. However, I will not sit here quietly in my seat and have the suggestion made that members from this side of the House cannot clearly and fairly express themselves.

I have been in this House since 1972 and I have seen far more variation on a theme than I have heard so far from the hon. member who has been speaking. I ask Your Honour to keep that in mind. I recognize the fairness of your ruling and understanding of this House. I ask that you understand the mood of this House, and perhaps with a little passage of time we can dispense with some of the rancour which has been exhibited lately. I speak most profoundly to all members of the government who did not care much about our sensibilities last week. I am not going to sit here and have them give any lecture to any member of Parliament on my side.

● (1650)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Maybe the Postmaster General wants to send in the protective staff to get this bill through.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. The difficulty is that it probably is not appropriate for the occupant of the chair to encourage hon. members to make the business of the House go forward. The responsibility of the Chair is to make it possible for the business to go forward, not to encourage it. Therefore I do not think I will assist if I comment on the observations made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser).

As to the point of order raised by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) the issue is whether or not the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is in order in the sense of relevancy. It is an extremely difficult proposition for the Chair. It is particularly difficult because in this House of Commons, in comparison with some others, the most generous interpretation is given to the rule of relevancy.

I might point out the difficulty for the Chair in comparison with the British House of Commons, for example, where the hon. member for Calgary West would have long since been ruled out of order. I have to deal not only with the standing orders, but with the traditions of this House. It is part of the tradition that the occupant of the chair, when he finds himself in that situation, makes an appeal to the good faith of the hon. member. I ask the hon. member to attempt to address himself to the bill before us perhaps a little more narrowly than he has so far.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, if I can respond kindly, I have not been long in this House. If I strayed, it is perhaps because of newness. If I resist any part of your ruling and come to the thin edge of the wedge, perhaps it is because I feel deeply that the lives of Canadians will be changed in dramatic ways by the constitution. I might also indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is difficult to see people sitting in the chair who voted to cut off our rights. I turned around and found policemen behind me. The situation is difficult.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I understand that the situation is difficult, but I now have to ask the hon. member to please address himself to the bill before us.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was encouraged by the Postmaster General's statement that the bill before us today was discussed sentence by sentence and word by word, and all the wording has been well thought out so that there can be no confusion or misinterpretation. He said the bill is not perfect, but it represents the collective efforts of those who will be most affected by it, those who work for and manage the Post Office and who represent the employees through their unions.

It is incumbent upon us to look at Bill C-42 and judge whether the minister's comments about the care and attention of the wording are relevant. We must go one step further and assume, because of our recent history in the House, that the bill before us, as with the constitution act of Canada, will become law. In that light there is a provision which says that that law shall be paramount. Therefore, any other law, including the one before us today to create a Crown corporation, will be subjected to the test of the constitution act, 1980. If the bill we are being asked to consider here today, Bill C-42, to create a Crown corporation for the Post Office, is found to be contradictory to the constitution act of Canada, the bill before us, or relevant portions of it, will be declared to have no force and effect.

If that were to be the final consequence of the passage of this bill, and if it were to have no force and effect, we would have wasted the time of the House. We would then have to reconsider, redraft, and start again. It is in that context that we must begin to wonder whether these carefully crafted and carefully worded sentences really do attend to the will of Canadians as members opposite tell us the constitution act expresses that will.

One of the problems the minister identified is the problem of staff morale. Can we get adequate people, can we keep them, will they be happy and productive? By bringing forward this legislation the minister is telling us that by creating a Crown corporation we will be in a better position to recruit staff, train them, retain them and keep them efficient. However, I have to wonder if these employees will be happy working for a Crown corporation, in effect an extension of the government under the provisions of the constitution act, 1980.

I gave as an example clauses 15 (1) and (2), which deal with discrimination rights. I pull one out of that bill. It says we shall not discriminate on the basis of age. Does that have an implication for employees of the Post Office? I do not know, but some people with legal training have told me that they suspect it will.

I raised the issue of whether the only way to deliver money to senior citizens, those who have retired from the Post Office, in the future might be through the application of a means test because all laws in Canada which put age into them will be discriminatory. Our entire life insurance program and our pension plans will be potentially threatened as a result of that one simple provision.

There are other consequences. If postal employees move to a particular community and expect their child to start school at age six and receive a fairly decent education, what if some parents wanting their children to start at age four sued on the basis of this act and the courts ruled that they could not be denied? Say the funds available to a local community to provide schooling have to be provided for four-year-olds as well as five-year-olds, six-year-olds and up. I wonder whether the morale of postal workers would be affected by that kind of provision. I wonder whether the age to drive and the pensionable age would also be affected.

I raise these matters because we do not do this House of Commons or the people of Canada a service unless we examine legislation in the context in which it comes into being and can be enforced. We are examining a postal bill here today with some sense of fear on this side of the House that the social and cultural climate in Canada, the difficulties created by the constitution act, 1980, will reverberate, that this effort and the considerable expense required to change the postal service of Canada into a Crown corporation may in fact be undermined by the simultaneous entry into the Canadian mosaic of a piece of legislation that was not well thought out.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, you are indicating that I have run out of time. I believe I will have the floor to continue the next time the debate comes up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member is correct. When debate continues on another day, he will be privileged to continue the debate on this bill.

THE CONSTITUTION

MEMBERS DESIGNATED TO SERVE ON CONSTITUTIONAL SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles Turner (London East) moved:

That the members designated to serve on the part of this House on the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada be: Mr. Beatty, Mr. Bockstael, Miss Campbell, Mr. Corbin, Mr. Crombie, Mr. Epp, Mr. Fraser, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Irwin, Mr. Joyal, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Lapierre, Mr. Mackasey, Mr. McGrath and Mr. Nystrom; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours thereof.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order No. 6, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Stand by unanimous consent.

REPRESENTATION AND ELECTORAL DISTRICTS READJUSTMENT ACT (ONTARIO)

ELECTORAL REPRESENTATION OF NORTHERN ONTARIO IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved that Bill C-211, to readjust the representation of Ontario in the House of Commons and to readjust the electoral districts in Ontario, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-211 before the House this afternoon in private members' hour essentially is designed to ensure that the representation of northern Ontario in this House of Commons would not drop below the 11 seats which now exist from that area of our country. It would set a lower limit or a floor under the number of constituencies established in northern Ontario.

The bill is designed especially to counteract the kind of thing which happened in the 1976 redistribution when the number of seats in northern Ontario was reduced from 12 to 11, while at the same time, with the redistribution which took place in the rest of the province, the number of seats was increased from 88 to 95. Of course this bill would not affect the number of seats in any other province. It would only provide a floor of 11 seats as the representation of northern Ontario.

We are concerned with what the Electoral Boundaries Commission, which of course is an independent commission, might do after the 1981 census. Because of the number of seats established after the 1976 redistribution, all but three were in the lower quarter of the population range, that is, the population range in Ontario from 61,000 to 101,000 people. All but three of those constituencies after the 1971 census were in the 60,000 to 70,000 population range.

We are concerned because the population growth between 1971 and 1976 in northern Ontario was .67 of 1 per cent, whereas across the province of Ontario it was 7.2 per cent during the first five years of the decade. Beyond that, the growth trend—of course—would be mainly in the cities, not in the large rural ridings into which most of the constituencies of northern Ontario fall. Even in cities such as Sudbury, which traditionally had a very rapid growth during the early part of the 1970s, in the last couple of years, because of the change in the economics of nickel mining and so on, the population or the number of workers has declined.

Members of the House might ask why we are requesting a floor under the number of seats from northern Ontario. First I point out that northern Ontario is a very distinct geographic area of our country, and certainly of our province. It is important to note that of the geography of the province of Ontario 88.06 per cent of the land mass is located in northern Ontario, and out of the 95 seats for the province only 11 represent that 88.06 per cent of the land mass. It is a big area with 368,800 square miles. For example, the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, which is the largest in the province, has 148,700 square miles and Algoma, which is the fifth smallest riding in northern Ontario has 13,200 square miles. They are very large constituencies.

It is not only that. For example, the Algoma constituency is about 400 miles long. Literally it is made up of dozens of organized townships, hamlets, villages and Indian Reserves strung out along the Trans-Canada Highway, and various geographic areas like Manitoulin Island which in itself is 100 miles long and 40 miles wide. These small rural hamlets deserve representation and service, but with the population not growing nearly as rapidly as in the rest of the province of Ontario, it makes the boundaries grow larger. Most of these people are far away from government offices, agencies and services. They tend to depend upon their member of Parliament for the many government services which are readily available in city constituencies. Any reduction in the number of seats would only exacerbate and make the problem that much more difficult.

This bill is supported by all members from northern Ontario, and I believe by all fair-minded people who want to see a reasonable representation from such a large geographical area. Certainly it is supported by the people of northern Ontario who remember what happened in the 1976 redistribution. During the redistribution from 1972 to 1976 there were a number of appeals; there were private members' bills in the House; there were large court battles in which the redistribution was challenged; thousands of dollars were raised in northwestern Ontario especially to challenge the redistribution. I would hope we could do it here in the House of Commons. After all, we are the masters of our own House. We are able to establish a fair and reasonable redistribution arrangement.

I would point out that the Ontario legislature has established or has seen fit to guarantee some 16 seats for northern Ontario in its legislature. I do not see why we cannot do the same thing here and ensure that there is reasonable representation in the House of Commons from this vast geographical area.

I believe this bill will be a fair and reasonable one. I certainly ask all members of the House to support it, so that it can move to committee for further study and discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add a few comments to my colleague's remarks on Bill C-211. When this matter came before the House a few years ago, I also spoke in support of it. In fact I spoke in support of the suggestion that the 12 seats should remain. Now we are down to 11 seats.

I represent the riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka which, as far as the Ontario government is concerned, is classed as part of northern Ontario. For many years I served on a municipal council. The council would go to Toronto and ask for certain things, and we were told that we were part of northern Ontario. Then when we would go and ask on another basis, we were told that we were part of southern Ontario. I suppose the Parry Sound district is the dividing line between north and south. My colleague will probably get a smile out of this, but I recall at one time saying that we are neither fish nor fowl. I said it seems that the district of Parry Sound is in never-never land.

• (1710)

Northern Ontario is certainly the great bulk of the province, and time and again when I get really annoyed when talking to my southern colleagues, the thing to do is bring out a map of Ontario and point out that little insignificant boot at the south of it which controls the whole thing. I can assure my colleague that I certainly support this floor of no less than 11 seats at all times. Again it is the old story of representation by population. That sounds very good in a great many cases, but the geographic angle should also come in. I have also stated time and again that if we went the other way entirely and went on the basis of geography, northern Ontario would be represented as it should be, and our friends in the south would really be crying.

Many times I have spoken to my colleagues who represent that small village of York on Lake Ontario. I believe there are 22 members of Parliament from there. Some of the ridings there might be 20 blocks long by ten blocks wide, and some of them not even that. I see my hon. colleague from northwestern Ontario listening with some interest because I know he represents a huge riding. Our urban colleagues from Toronto, Hamilton and, yes, from right here in Ottawa, the capital city, do not know what it means to represent a large area, to try to service it and to try to get around it. That is the reason why I feel that the House of Commons is the place to decide, and the House should say definitely that there should be no less than 11 seats representing northern Ontario. At one time I was hoping it would remain at 12.

As I came into the chamber from a committee meeting I was talking with one of my colleagues from the New Democratic Party, and he said, "Well, what the hell are you going over there to speak about?" He pointed out that there are 11 seats representing northern Ontario and that the fewer seats there are the better it is for me. In that case we should reduce the representation to just one large seat! I am quite sure that in the years to come the Conservative party will be represented there, but in my view the people of northern Ontario should be represented on a fair basis.

As the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) mentioned, and as I believe it to be the case, the minimum is 61,000 up to 101,000. Certainly members of Parliament from those ridings which have 61,000 have a great many miles to travel. The people are greatly in need of the services of members of Parliament and of the various departments. It is not a case of picking up a telephone, like it is in Toronto where there is a regional office or a head office. Therefore it is much more important that northern Ontario be properly represented. I see the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) nodding in acquiescence. The hon. minister is from Nickel Belt, not Sudbury, and Nickel Belt is a fairly large riding too.

I certainly support this bill. I hope it will be sent to committee and approved so that down the pike—I believe it is in 1981—when there will be another census there will be no way to carve up northern Ontario again, and again take a seat away from it and give it to Hogtown. I like Toronto too, but Toronto has enough seats, and it is very important that the situation be left as it is. If there are to be more seats in the House, a wall can be kicked out, or something. I find no fault with having perhaps a few more seats, but certainly not at the expense of northern Ontario.

When the number of seats was increased from 88 to 95 many of us took a pretty dim view because, instead of southern Ontario getting seven seats, which was the case before, southern Ontario stole one from northern Ontario and now has eight seats. Let us not have that happen again.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in deference to my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), I want to remind him that I represent a riding in southwestern Ontario from the centre of which one can drive 17 miles in any direction and be outside the riding. However, I am still standing on my feet this afternoon to defend this bill for my friends in northern Ontario. I want the hon. member who just spoke to realize that not everyone in southern Ontario, the land of milk and honey, forgets about northern Ontario and the problems of that part of Canada.

I should also say at this time that I was born in northern Ontario, so perhaps that is the reason I am so sympathetic to this bill.

Before I give my reasons for supporting this bill I want to make one or two very important points. We would not have to be worried about northern Ontario and its representation here in the federal House of Commons, we would not have to be worried about the census in 1981 and we would not have to be worried about people leaving northern Ontario, particularly young people, educated people and skilled tradesmen and women, if the federal Liberal governments over the past 20 or 25 years, and the Progressive Conservative governments at Queen's Park, had introduced, established, and implemented industrial strategies for northern Ontario which would have developed that part of central Canada, provided industry, and expanded mining and primary industries using our resources. This would have kept young northerners in northern Ontario.

Instead, due to Liberal neglect federally, and Conservative neglect provincially, certainly many parts of the regions of northern Ontario are slowly dying. All one has to do is go through some of those small and rather pathetic-looking northern Ontario communities, which 20, 30 or 40 years ago were viable economic units, and see them today. As I say, some of them are literally dying, simply because the one company in most of those communities, having finished its mining operations or its logging operations, has picked up and left. The governments either here in Ottawa or at Queen's Park said nothing, and when the one company from one community left, then the young people began to pack it in too.

I think we should keep those points in mind when we discuss this bill. I do not intend to hold it up. I hope it is referred to committee. In fact, I understand that it or its subject matter will be referred to committee. I feel that it is virtually impossible or it is becoming almost impossible for members of Parliament to give adequate service to their constituents when the constituencies are so large and disparate and so geographically far-flung. This is what is happening in northern Ontario.

If we reduce the number of ridings, those which are left will become even larger than they are now. I hope when the subject matter goes to committee that northern Ontario will be guaranteed the maintenance of at least 11 of the present ridings because if we break up these constituencies or re-draw the boundaries, what will happen is that perhaps one, two or three remote communities which are interlocked socially, ethnically, certainly in a family sense, economically and so forth, will be split off. Heaven knows that today federal members of Parliament with the largest geographic ridings in northern Ontario and indeed in other parts of Canada will find it even more difficult than they find it now to service those communities.

We have talked about long distance telephone service. We have talked about mail and how slow it is in some of those communities. We have talked about driving and flying conditions in the winter, and so forth. It is very difficult. I sympathize with hon. members who represent far-flung constituencies and remote ridings not only in northern Ontario but also in Quebec, north central Canada, the west coast and so forth. Frankly I do not know how they do it. I do not know how they can do a good job much of the time.

• (1720)

But I hark back to what I said at the outset. I hope the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), who is on the government side, and other members on the government side will try to press the government, the cabinet, as well as all the backbenchers over there who represent northern Ontario communities, and will make representations at Queen's Park as well, to try to revitalize the economy of northern Ontario so that more people will stay there, not just in Sudbury because of Inco and not just in the Sault because of Algoma Steel, but in all the other communities as well so that they will revitalize and rebuild a once dynamic economy in northern Ontario. We hope people will remain there and that we will not, in ten years time, have to come back and worry about the next census and about more people leaving what is a truly beautiful part of Canada.

As I said, I was born in Sault Ste Marie, I lived there for a number of years and I often go back to that part of the country for vacations. I have a great deal of respect for northerners, both those in public life and those in private life. I certainly wish northern Ontario well and I hope that the content and intent of this bill will receive the attention it deserves when it goes to committee.

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to rise today to address this bill proposed by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), as this is my first occasion to speak in this House formally, other than to move motions under Standing Order 43 or to ask questions.

First of all, I want to pay tribute to the very hon. gentleman who preceded me and who previously represented the district of Timiskaming in this House. I am referring to my colleague and friend, Arnold Peters from New Liskeard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lonsdale: If I can represent the riding half as well as Mr. Peters did, I am sure that my constituents will not be wanting in terms of constituency service.

Mr. Knowles: If you don't, they will send him back.

Mr. Lonsdale: This bill is of particular urgency to the people of Timiskaming and, indeed, to all the people of northern Ontario. The intent of the legislation, put briefly, is to impose a floor on the number of seats in the north. Over the decades we have watched as our representation in this House has dwindled to, now, 11 seats; 11 seats to represent nearly 800,000 people and 370,000 square miles, eleven seats, Mr. Speaker, to represent an area that is greater in extent than all but two provinces and, indeed, greater than many countries in the world, indeed greater than France and Japan combined, greater than Germany, Great Britain and Sweden combined, and greater than Italy, Spain and Portugal combined.

Why has our representation fallen to this low number? Why have members from the north had to represent progressively larger ridings, which are so very difficult to travel around? Is it because the north has grown smaller? Has our population been leaving for warmer climes and greener pastures? No, Mr. Speaker, our population has been growing steadily, our towns and cities have been expanding, our industries and resources have become even more important to the national economy.

The reason for this serious decline in terms of our representation has been the growth of the southern part of our province, especially the metropolitan Toronto area. It has simply been a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul. Paul, that is, the southern part of Ontario, has 84 members, who do an excellent job of representing their constituents. Peter, that is, northern Ontario, has 11 members, and if the trend continues we will soon have only ten. If that happens, Mr. Speaker, the ridings will get bigger and it will be even more difficult to do an adequate job of representing our people.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, my riding of Timiskaming is 30,000 square miles in area. This weekend I will be travelling to the northernmost part of it to visit my constituents in Moosonee and Moose Factory on the shores of James Bay. To get to Moosonee, I have to fly from Ottawa to Toronto, from Toronto to Timmins—where I have to stay overnight—and then in the morning take the plane from Timmins to Moosonee. The trip takes a day and a half by plane, let alone if I had to drive or take the train out there. I am not complaining, Mr. Speaker, about this travel time. I knew the size of Timiskaming when I ran last winter. Indeed, I travelled over all of it then through the snows of January and February, and I realize the great extent of the territory.

What I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that it is so difficult for me to meet my constituents face to face. All hon. members know that a large part of the job of a member of Parliament is to provide assistance to our constituents with their problems with the various levels of government and in their day to day activities. All members know that this can be next to impossible if personal meetings are not possible. It is very difficult to solve personal problems over the telephone, and our constituents suffer for it. To make it even more difficult for us to reach them is, in my opinion, unjust and unfair.

It is not only in contacting their members of Parliament that our constituents are at a disadvantage. In my riding, for instance, it is impossible to reach the majority of offices administering government programs without incurring long distance telephone charges. I and some northern members have installed inwatts lines in our offices to make ourselves at least more accessible to our constituents. Since most people hesitate to call long distance, many of these calls for information or assistance come to us and we deal with them or pass them along to the proper departments.

If the people in Timiskaming want to discuss an unemployment insurance matter or an immigration matter, they have to go to Timmins. If they want to discuss revenue matters, they have to go to Sudbury. If they want to discuss Canada Mortgage and Housing questions, they have to go to North Bay. But all a person in downtown Toronto has to do is to jump on the subway and get to the regional office downtown.

Our northern Ontario constituents deserve the same level of service from their government as do those Canadians who live in the metropolitan areas. I just had my researcher compile the average size of ridings. My riding is about 30,000 square miles; metropolitan Toronto averages 11 square miles; metropolitan Montreal, 49 square miles.

Perhaps some comparisons might be in order, not just with Toronto or Montreal but with other ridings in this country. The average riding in northern Ontario is 33,544 square miles; in Quebec, excluding the Montreal metropolitan area, it is 11,639 square miles; in Newfoundland, 22,294; Prince Edward Island, 592; Nova Scotia, 1,952; and New Brunswick, 2,841. Moving west, we find the average member in Manitoba representing a riding of 17,779 square miles. Saskatchewan comes to 17,973; Alberta, 12,152, and British Columbia has an average 13,048 square miles, compared to the average riding in northern Ontario of 33,000.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, that the northern Ontario members already have the largest and most widely spread ridings of any province in the country. We do not ask, Mr. Speaker, that our ridings be made smaller. We do not ask that extra ridings be created in the north. We simply ask that the status quo remain, 11 ridings to serve the enormous area of the north, which is so vital to the future development of Canada, 11 members to serve 800,000 people and 370,000 square miles. We are already spread pretty thin across the north. Please do not ask us to spread ourselves any thinner.

Hon. members will recall, as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) mentioned, that this issue arose after the last census as well. At that time northern Ontario had 12 members. The protests of the people of the north were ignored then and the size of their ridings was reduced from 12 seats to 11. Indeed, the former hon. member for Cochrane lost his seat in that redistribution. Now we are faced with the prospect of being reduced even further with this new 1981 census. Where will it end, Mr. Speaker? Will there some day be only one member of Parliament for all of northern Ontario? I sincerely hope not, but avoid that lamentable situation we must draw the line, and we must draw it now.

I therefore urge the House, Mr. Speaker, to allow this bill to proceed to the committee stage. Simple justice and the principles of fair democratic representation demand it. What is more, Mr. Speaker, the people of the north, so often denied equal opportunities in the past, demand it now. They deserve no less representation and services than other Canadians receive in this country. They should not have to settle for less representation in the future, and they do not ask for anything more. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, that that question be now put.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale) moved that the question be now put, I should state perhaps what the government's intention was because I might not have made it clear to him or to other members of the House. If the question is now put, then this bill, unfortunately, will be talked out. For various reasons which I want to outline in the course of the debate, the government is prepared—I understand there is agreement on all sides—for the subject matter of this bill to go to committee. So I ask that the hon. member consider withdrawing his motion pending further discussions.

● (1730)

Mr. Knowles: He did not have a seconder anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think we can sort this out. As has been observed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale) neglected to provide a seconder in this case. So, if I understood it correctly, the parliamentary secretary has indicated that he is prepared to put a motion before the House to the effect that the subject matter of the bill would be referred to the standing committee, moved and seconded—

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In all fairness, it is not my turn to speak and I was planning to wrap up so that we could leave early and put the motion. But there are other members who wish to speak and at the time you recognize me to speak in the debate, Mr. Speaker, then I will move the motion.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure all members of the House that I have no intention of prolonging this debate unduly. I have some brief remarks which I wish to make. As the seconder of the motion, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for bringing forth this bill today.

I think it is important to recognize that the geography of our country has to be taken into consideration when we are designing the representation of the people of Canada in the House of Commons. Certainly the Fathers of Confederation had this in mind when the British North America Act was passed. They wrote into that act a clause which states that no province can have fewer elected representatives in the Parliament of Canada than it has members of the Senate. Some will say that representation in Atlantic Canada is disproportionately high for that very reason when you compare the population of Atlantic Canada to that of other parts of Canada.

While that is true, the argument is false. I say this particularly in light of the comment of the hon. member for Brant

(Mr. Blackburn) who made a plea that an industrial strategy be designed for northern Ontario, to increase the population. I remind hon. members that had it not been for the original industrial strategy of this country the populations of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, particularly, would be much higher than they are today and we would not have to rely on our Senate representation to maintain our representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, we recognized in this House about two years ago, I believe, the principle of making ridings in this country manageable from the point of view of representation, when we passed a bill dividing the Northwest Territories into two federal constituencies instead of one. I think that today we should bear the same principle in mind. I agree with several previous speakers, particularly the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale) when they spoke about the lack of government services in many of these large constituencies.

Compared to Timiskaming, my constituency is very small, but it is still one of the largest in Atlantic Canada. For instance, it is larger than Prince Edward Island and contains half the population of Prince Edward Island. But I do not begrudge the Island its four members in the House of Commons because it is a province and it should have representation which can speak for the interests of that province in the Parliament of Canada.

I close by saying that the lack of services may mean that the federal member and the provincial member, or members, representing a particular rural area are the only elected representatives those people have, because, in many areas, there is no municipal government and there are no government services. The only elected representation they have is in the House of Commons and in the legislature of the province. So I give this measure my wholehearted support, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that we can deal with it very soon in committee.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to support this bill. I think this is the third or fourth time I have spoken on this matter in the House since about 1973. I do want to add one or two comments, but I do not wish to keep the debate going.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale) on a very fine first effort. I think he covered the subject extremely well and there is not much left for me to say. It appears to me that if we in northern Ontario, seat-wise, were in any part of any other province in this country or were a province on our own—and there are many people in northern Ontario who think that is what we should be—we would never have lost the seat in the last redistribution, because between 1966 and 1971 the population of northern Ontario went up by 5.3 per cent. We lost one seat. The population of southern Ontario went up by 11.8 per cent and they gained eight seats. There is something wrong with that.

We are saying there are very good reasons for needing more representation, or at least for keeping the representation we have. I had a smaller constituency before 1979 than I have today. I know the amount of extra work that is involved after picking up one community of 5,000 people who have a lot of problems. I know the time which must be spent. A number of factors are at work here, one of them being the absence of services. A city has regional offices, district offices and various government departments. These offices do not exist in the smaller communities. So those services are provided, for the most part, by the member of Parliament. He is not able to have a constituency office in each community, although I happen to have an office in two communities. That is because we managed to get cheap rent in Thunder Bay and were able to do the same thing in Atikokan. It is not possible if one has five or six such communities. There are all kinds of difficulties this member encounters. For instance, there is the matter of travelling the day and a half the hon. member for Timiskaming talked about to get from one point to another. It is absolutely essential in northern Ontario, which is a very large region, a very different region—not necessarily a homogeneous one, but still very large—that we have more members.

I rise to support the bill. I think that if the people of northern Ontario were to lose more representation they would have to take another look to see whether or not it is fair for them to be in Ontario at all. They would have to say that perhaps this is the reason they should form their own province in order that this should not happen to them.

I am very pleased the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) has introduced the bill before us. I hope it is looked at by the government with favour, and that it goes to committee. I hope the substance of the bill becomes part of the redistribution act of the future.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, rise in support of this bill and congratulate the member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for bringing it before us. I would also like to thank the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) for his support. This shows that when northerners have a cause, we unite.

I would like to bring to your attention a problem which I think might create a very special circumstance for those of us who live in northern Ontario, in view of the fact that the census will take place within a year prior to what I predict will be quite a population growth within the area. Contrary to what the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) said a few moments ago, I would like to state that there is a period of growth predicted during the next decade for northern Ontario.

I would like to cite some of the projects which are currently under consideration. We are looking at the immense expansion of the Texas Gulf operation in the Timmins area. We are looking at a population growth in Elliot Lake from the current 15,000 to what is predicted to be close to 25,000. We are looking at a refinery at Blind River which will be employing 225 people. This project will probably not be in full production until 1983. Our pulp and paper industry is not only stable, it is vital and growing. We are looking at an immense expansion of the Algoma Steel operation, a $300 million expansion creating 500 new jobs. We are looking and examining with the Ontario government the possibility of a generating station based at the Onakawana lignite deposit. That study is under way now. We are looking at a phosphate deposit in the Cargill area and at the development of a gold mine at Detour Lake. All of these projects will bring on stream a great number of construction workers and also a great number of permanent employees who will not be counted in the census of 1981.

They will certainly be part of the population of northern Ontario during that decade and for decades to come. So I, too, support this bill and recommend that it be moved to committee.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise for only a moment because my colleague, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), has already made clear our support of the subject matter of this bill. I am glad to know that the government is prepared to send that subject matter to the appropriate standing committee.

I rise only because when history is recited in this House, I like it to be correct. I am looking at the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). I do not mind his giving all the credit he wants to the Fathers of Confederation, but it was not those old so and so's away back in 1864 or 1867 who wrote into the constitution the provision that no province shall have fewer members than it has senators. That was not done until 1915, just a few years ago. If the hon. member wishes to check his history, he will find that that is the case, that that provision is as recent as 1915 and that the Fathers of Confederation did not think of it.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That makes my argument all the more relevant.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the government is quite prepared to see the subject matter of this bill go to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Before I sit down I will move an amendment to that effect. This whole matter has been discussed a number of times in previous Parliaments. Indeed, I remember in the Thirtieth Parliament that there was agreement among all parties to keep the floor of 12 seats in northern Ontario prior to the last redistribution. Unfortunately, it was not unanimously accepted on all sides of the House. I believe there was a reservation expressed by someone or it was accidentally talked out.

I think it is fair to say that there is a genuine sympathy on all sides of the House toward regions in the country which are losing population or have lost population over the years, and a desire that they not be denied their representation. Some may argue that we should adhere to the traditional British parliamentary principle of representation by population. But as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this principle has become varied in Canada over the years.

In the case of Prince Edward Island, I think there was original constitutional provision made in P.E.I. that there could not be any fewer members of Parliament than Senators.

Mr. Knowles: That did not come until 1915.

Mr. Collenette: My colleague for Winnipeg North Centre says it came about in 1915. The point is that there are regions in the country which have been allowed, through acts of Parliament, to maintain effective representation notwithstanding changes in the population. Perhaps the Northwest Territories is another example. It is a principle which is fairly established in this country. I believe we find in the British North America Act—although it may also be 1915—with respect to Quebec the provision that the floor there be 74 seats. In other words, Quebec has a base of 74 seats notwithstanding the population figure. It must be underlined that this principle has been accepted over the years. That is the reason the government is willing to allow the matter to go to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, in 1982 there will be a report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission after the decennial census. At that time this whole matter will be discussed as it applies to other regions of the country, not just as it applies to northern Ontario.

I would, Mr. Speaker, subject to your approval, move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word 'that' and substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-211, An act to readjust the representation of Ontario in the House of Commons and to readjust the electoral districts in Ontario, be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Knowles: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Shall I dispense?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Dispense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is there agreement to send the matter to committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): A base rumour has reached the Chair that hon. members may have other matters on their minds related to the proceedings later this evening and that there may be a desire to call it six o'clock. Is that the case?

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock!

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Since we are calling it six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.45 p.m. the House took recess.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: That is the last applause you will get, Al.

Mr. MacEachen: —I am honoured to have the opportunity to present to Parliament the first budget of this new decade. It is a budget which sets new directions for the economy, directions which will ensure both energy security and economic security for Canadians in the years ahead.

● (2010)

It would be no service to this House, or to Canadians, to deny that there is a deeply troubling air of uncertainty and anxiety around the world and, I am sure, in the hearts and minds of Canadians. As well, we have inherited many difficulties from the decade of the seventies. But it would be just as wrong to deny that the decade of the eighties provides extraordinary opportunities for Canada and Canadians.

Only ten years ago, the world was riding high on the long wave of postwar economic expansion. While inflation was beginning to creep up in many industrial countries, we all felt confident in our collective abilities to manage growth as the world economies expanded in concert. But ever since the oil crisis of 1973 industrial countries have had to struggle with the problems of inflation and stubbornly high rates of unemployment. In 1979 the world was shaken by a second major oil shock. For the industrial world this has meant a sharp renewal of inflationary forces and real income losses. For the developing world this second oil shock has been a tragedy. Their international deficits are now three to four times the sum they receive in aid from the rest of the world.

The long-heralded recession in the United States has become a reality with a sharp drop in real output in the second quarter and output is drifting downward in almost all OECD countries. The rate of inflation in the U.S. remains disappointingly high despite the recession. Interest rates fell in the early summer but have risen again in recent months.

Barring some new disruption in international oil supplies, it seems reasonable to expect that the period of sharp decline in U.S. output is over, and that the worst of the dramatic surge in international inflation directly associated with the OPEC price increases is behind us. It is widely recognized, however, that the world economy now faces an extended period in which recovery from the recession is likely to proceed at a relatively modest pace and in which gains on the inflation front will only be won slowly.

In this environment the tasks of economic policy obviously present a great challenge. Within industrial countries, we have all learned that we cannot achieve full employment, stable prices and other economic goals simply by influencing the demands for goods and services by cutting taxes or by increasing government expenditure—or alternatively by raising taxes and cutting spending. The problems are obviously deeper and more complex, and they relate to our basic ability to produce. The oil problem is an example of that. The world is having to use higher-cost sources as the cheap ones are used up. Even more generally, the amount of goods and services which each worker produces on average is not growing as fast as it was, because we are not investing enough and because we are not doing enough to keep up the pace of technological improvement. Shortages of resources and slower productivity growth mean that costs go up faster and this makes the problem of inflation more intractable.

We cannot live with double-digit inflation for two fundamental reasons. It is unfair to those who cannot protect themselves, the less fortunate members of society and especially the elderly. It also imposes a very heavy cost in terms of lower output and loss of jobs. It could well endanger our ability to compete in world markets. It means high interest rates. It weakens the incentives for business investment. It undermines consumer spending and slows down the building of houses.

So these two problems of the high real costs of additional output and inflation compound each other. They are not just Canadian problems, Madam Speaker, they are world-wide problems. At the Venice Summit and at meetings of finance ministers of the IMF and OECD, we have seen these new themes emerge—the need to direct attention to the fundamental problems of productivity growth through attention to technological change, investment and incentives to greater effort and the overriding importance of slowing down inflation to lay the basis for the sustained growth of output and jobs.

[Translation]

The economic problems the international community is facing cannot be solved by nations acting on their own. This government fully realizes the difficult challenges posed to international economic co-operation in the unsettled period ahead of us and is ready to assume its full share of responsibilities in achieving an international economic system adapted to the world of the eighties.

[English]

We are particularly concious of the plight of the developing countries and so we must put new momentum behind our aid programs and our support of international lending institutions both public and private. I was most gratified by the welcome given by the Commonwealth finance ministers to our decision to restore the growth in our official development assistance.

As a great trading nation and as a responsible member of the world community, Madam Speaker, we in Canada cannot insulate or isolate ourselves from the rest of the world. I cannot understand why we would wish to do so. In our energy resources, our other natural resources, our developed industrial structures and our people, we are a nation with opportunities second to no other nation.

We have experienced falling output this year. Productivity has dropped quite sharply and the inflation rate has moved back up to 10 per cent. It is time that we moved to realize our great potential. We are more likely to do so if we understand that the problem is not a simple matter of ensuring an appropriate demand for goods and services but is more deep-seated. There are no quick solutions, so we will need to be patient and plan in a longer-term framework. There are no single solutions either, so we need to combine structural, industrial and regional policies with the right setting of fiscal and monetary policy. But we can then feel confident that we are dealing with the fundamental issues and embarking on the new directions which can secure the future of the country.

THE ECONOMIC STRATEGY OF THE GOVERNMENT

Like previous ministers of finance, I have sought and been offered a wide range of advice on the management of our nation's economic affairs. Much of that advice has been, in my view, extreme. Some urge a dramatic retrenchment by government and an almost exclusive reliance on the mechanisms of the private marketplace. Others have urged us to intervene broadly, not only in shaping our industrial purposes, but in controlling the setting of prices, wages and the distribution of economic benefits generally. I reject both these extremes. Instead I have sought a strategy that I fervently believe will serve our national and individual interests while preserving essential individual freedoms.

[Translation]

It is a strategy which balances restraint with essential measures to give support to the growth of productivity and productive capacity. It is a strategy in the best traditions of the Liberal party. It is a strategy totally in keeping with the commitments we made to the Canadian people in recent election.

Its elements in brief are as follows:

the maintenance of government expenditures within the rate of growth in the economy to ensure that the federal government does not take up an ever-growing proportion of the flow of income;

over the period to fiscal 1983-84, a steady reduction in the government deficit and financial requirements;

the avoidance, in so far as possible of personal and corporate tax increases;

a resolve to support the Bank of Canada in its pursuit of monetary policies that will not accommodate inflation;

● (2020)

[English]

within the commitment to expenditure restraint, the need nonetheless to provide for major new expenditures in energy, economic development, industrial adjustment and manpower retraining;

the need, also, to expand our assistance to the developing world;

a resolve to sustain social and economic assistance to those people and those communities most in need; and a resolve to see the competitive forces in our economy strengthened and the weight of government regulation reduced.

These are the central elements. Madam Speaker. They are designed to ensure a steady reduction in the rate of inflation, the resumption of strong investment and productivity growth and the restoration, over time, of a fully-employed, strongly-growing, non-inflationary society. I wish to say a few words about each element of the strategy before developing the principal themes more fully.

One of my main tasks as Minister of Finance will be to reduce the very large deficits in the government's accounts to more manageable proportions. This is important not only to restore our flexibility to meet future needs and to slow growth of our interest payments, it is also essential if the rate of inflation is to be brought down. Otherwise we will run the risk of a new outbreak of inflationary pressure. The immediate outlook is for rather slow growth and I, therefore, judge that only a modest reduction in the deficit is needed next year. But larger declines in the deficit will be required as growth speeds up. I see great disadvantages, however, in general increases in taxation other than those which form part of the energy program. Higher sales taxes have a direct impact on prices. Higher income taxes reduce incentives as well as dampening consumer spending and may well lead to demands for higher increases in wages and salaries. I am glad to say that I have been able to avoid such general increases. Indeed, I am delighted to be able to announce that I have made no changes to the indexing of the personal income tax—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —and, therefore, will be describing later the income tax reductions that flow from this decision.

In order to achieve the essential reduction in the deficit, great restraint over expenditures has, therefore, been required. On the side of monetary policy, the Bank of Canada will have my continuing support in holding down the rate of monetary expansion. This is now widely agreed to be a pre-condition of success in the containment of inflation. It makes it clear that we will not accommodate double-digit rates of inflation.

Perhaps the most critical area demanding an active government role is energy. I have been working closely with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), in the development of our energy policy. I will shortly provide the House with a brief outline of its main features. The new energy policy limits the rise in prices of oil and gas to domestic consumers and thus continues to protect us from the violent shocks of OPEC price increases. It strengthens our specific measures to promote the most economical use of energy and in particular the displacement of oil by other fuels. It provides new impetus to the development of new sources of supply, through direct government programs and through new incentives of particular value to Canadian-owned producers.

[Translation]

Energy policy is only the most urgent element of our new strategy. Renewed growth in productivity and lower costs are needed throughout the economy. Within the over-all expenditure plan which I will lay before the House, we have assigned clear priority to economic development. Sufficient funds have been made available in the expenditure plan to finance major expansion of our activities in such areas as industrial development programs, research and development, export promotion and the improvement of transportation.

[English]

We are also very much aware of the shortage of skills in this country. Even in the midst of recession, those shortages were apparent in many trades and employers have had to look for skilled craftsmen in other countries. Our manpower training and mobility programs will be redirected to deal with this problem.

One of the best ways of ensuring that prices are kept in line and efficiency is maintained is to foster healthy competition. We are seeking to do so in our legislation relating to financial institutions and in our concern over business concentration. We believe that small business makes a vital contribution to the economy by keeping it competitive. Competition means that the most efficient and enterprising will flourish and grow; it also means that the less efficient decline. That should not be prevented, and measures to assist declining industries to adjust to changing economic circumstances should be limited to helping the process of adjustment and easing the social costs.

We intend to reduce the burden imposed on the economy by unnecessary regulation. The work of the Parliamentary Task Force on Regulatory Reform and of the Economic Council of Canada will be of great assistance in this endeavour.

Madam Speaker, I believe that the various elements of our strategy when taken together do indeed create a framework within which we can look forward with confidence to declining inflation and sustained economic recovery. They do not guarantee these results in the short run, however, for we live in an uncertain world in which all forecasts are at risk. We could do better if we enjoy good fortune at home and abroad. But we could also do worse, if we are faced with new shocks coming from the price of oil or food or if the upward momentum of costs and prices proves impervious to the economic climate I am seeking to create.

I have noted suggestions for new measures to limit the growth of prices and incomes, either by direct controls or by the use of the tax system. The objective of reducing the rate of inflation at less cost in lost output is one we can all embrace. I am most reluctant, however, to contemplate the massive degree of government intervention and perceived inequities which would inevitably be required. Moreover, I am conscious of the fact that any new program of controls would be much more difficult than the 1975 program. There is no scope this year and little next for the real income increases that were part of that program. Furthermore, there is little evidence of unreasonable price increases or unreasonable wage demands.

What is important now is that we should continue to act with moderation and work together to make the economy more productive and efficient. I hope I have fostered a wider understanding of the fact that our future prosperity depends on getting the rate of inflation down. I look forward to a further discussion with my provincial colleagues of these fundamental economic issues. It is time to consider how we can broaden the existing processes of consultation among government, business and labour.

● (2030)

[Translation]

I am confident that the strategy I have described tonight is the right one. But I want to make it quite clear that the pre-condition of our success must be the achievement of lower rates of inflation. If continued indexing is interpreted as a readiness to accommodate unlimited inflation rates, I may be faced with no alternative but to impose some limit on the indexing factor. As Canada's national government we have responsibilities and we will not shrink from them.

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Madam Speaker, I would like to speak first, in detail, about energy. To fail to solve our energy dilemmas would be to fail to realize our greatest source of opportunity in this decade. It is, therefore, of utmost strategic importance. As we all know, energy has been the subject of intense debate in Canada for a number of years, and the negotiation of an agreement on oil and gas pricing and revenue sharing with the producing provinces, particularly Alberta, has been a major preoccupation of the last two federal governments. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has made repeated efforts to reach agreement with his provincial colleagues. The Prime Minister carried on intensive discussions with the Premier of Alberta.

Time is running out. While Canada is a net exporter of energy and is dealing from a basic position of strength, the chink in our armour is our dependence on imported oil. Today, we are a net importer of oil and, under a continuation of previous policies, we could expect to become increasingly dependent on foreign supplies and, therefore, unnecessarily subject to the vagaries of the world oil market. The federal government feels compelled to put Canada's energy house in order. On behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I am tabling tonight the Government of Canada's National Energy Program. I would like to present some highlights of what is a very comprehensive program.

It is founded upon three basic principles:

security of supply and ultimate independence from the world oil market; opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the energy industry, particularly oil and gas, and to share in the benefits of its expansion; and fairness, with a pricing and revenue-sharing regime which recognizes the rights and needs of all Canadians.

PRICING

Madam Speaker, at the time of the last federal election we promised to establish a blended pricing regime for oil in Canada. Effective tonight, the framework for such a regime will be put in place. The principle is simple. Henceforth, the price of oil paid by Canadian consumers will be an average of the cost of foreign oil, for which we must pay the world price, and the cost of domestic oil. The mechanism for blending in higher-cost supplies will be a petroleum compensation charge levied on all refiners. The new regime will be phased in so that the increase in the wellhead price plus the import component of the compensation charge will be less than $4 per barrel in 1980.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: A charge of 80 cents will be effective immediately. This will be in addition to the $3 increase in wellhead prices which has occurred this year. The increase in the wellhead price plus the increase in the compensation charge will be $4.50 in each of the three subsequent years. Madam Speaker, this fulfills the government's commitment to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Crude oil price increases will be smaller than those proposed in last December's budget and gasoline prices will be considerably lower. And there will be no increase in the excise tax on gasoline.

For conventional oil, the wellhead price will rise by $1 per barrel every six months, beginning January 1, 1981. Starting January 1, 1984, the semi-annual increase will be $2.25 per barrel and, in 1986, it will be $3.50 per barrel semi-annually and these increases will continue at that pace until the wellhead price reaches the "reference price". The reference price, Madam Speaker, is a special incentive price which will be offered to synthetic crude from the oil sands. Effective January 1, it will be $38 per barrel escalated annually by the consumer price index.

The government is also prepared to offer incentive prices for enhanced oil recovery and for upgraded heavy oil.

The blended oil pricing regime which I have just described should result in a made-in-Canada price which is well below international levels. This made-in-Canada price will rise over the decade and will never be allowed to exceed 85 per cent of the price of imported oil or the price of oil in the United States, whichever is lower. A competitive advantage for Canadian industry will, therefore, be preserved.

To complete the picture on oil pricing, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be taking measures to remove the anomaly that marine and aviation fuels used in international transportation have been eligible for the lower prices available to domestic consumers in Canada. Finally, the government proposes to pay to the producing provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, 50 per cent of our collections from export charges on crude oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The price of natural gas to Canadian consumers will increase less quickly than the price of oil and will, therefore, provide a major incentive for consumers to switch off oil to gas. As in the case of oil, natural gas prices paid by consumers will be significantly less than those proposed in the December budget. Specifically, the price at the Toronto city gate will go up by 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet on November 1, 1980, by 15 cents in 1981 and by 45 cents in 1982 and 1983. The mechanism for bringing this price about in the case of natural gas is different from the one I have described in the case of oil because of our very different situation with regard to the two products. We do not import natural gas, and we, therefore, do not have the problem of sheltering consumers from world prices. On the other hand, we export large quantities of natural gas and the producing companies and provinces gain the benefit from world prices. The logical solution to this problem and our preferred approach was to impose an export tax which would recapture some portion of the difference between the world price and the Canadian consumer price. The producers under this solution would ultimately have received some premium over the price paid by domestic consumers for the gas being sold in Canada. The producing provinces have strongly objected to this proposal, even though export taxes are fully within the federal government's jurisdiction.

● (2040)

In these circumstances and after careful consideration the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I have concluded that it would be desirable to abandon our preferred plan and seek an alternative approach which we hope will meet the concerns of the producing provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Under this alternative approach there will be no reduction in the current returns to producing companies and provinces for gas sold in the U.S. market and they will continue to receive the great bulk of the revenues derived from the higher prices prevailing there.

This alternative approach involves the imposition of a new uniform federal tax on all natural gas. It will also apply to liquefied petroleum gases, except those produced from oil. Initially, the tax will be set at 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, effective November 1, 1980, for domestic sales and February 1, 1981, for sales to U.S. consumers. This tax will be increased by 15 cents on July 1, 1981, January 1, 1982, and January 1, 1983.

Taking account of the increases in consumer prices I have announced, there will be no increase in 1981 in the field price of natural gas sold in the domestic market. Thereafter, the current practice of increasing the producer price by 15 cents per 1,000 cubic feet for every $1 per barrel increase in the wellhead price of conventional oil will be continued.

The new pricing regime for both oil and gas will be established under the Petroleum Administration Act. The relevant parts of the act will be proclaimed in effect as of today. For oil, the regulations governing prices will be effective as of today while for gas the regulations will be effective as of November 1, 1980, the expiry date of our gas pricing agreement with Alberta. For provinces willing to enter into agreements on the basis of prices set out in the National Energy Program, the federal government is prepared to rescind the pricing regulations.

Madam Speaker, before I leave the pricing question let me emphasize again that the prices of both oil and natural gas will be less than the prices proposed in the December budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Indeed, given the changes in OPEC prices that have occurred since that time and given the fact that the prices proposed by the former government would have escalated dramatically because they were tied in the later years to those OPEC prices, our prices will be considerably less.

And as I turn to the question of revenue sharing I would emphasize that the benefits accruing to western Canada over this and the next three years will be at least equal to the $40 billion which was promised in the December budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REVENUE SHARING AND TAXATION

Mr. MacEachen: The question of oil and gas prices is, of course, bound up with the issue of revenue sharing. In the absence of changes in the fiscal regime, rising prices for oil and gas would generate excess profits for the industry and result in an inappropriate balance between governments. The difficulty is that the federal government has borne much of the burden of energy price increases but receives few of the benefits.

The new natural gas tax will yield revenues of $250 million in 1980-81, $1.3 billion in 1981-82 and $6.6 billion over the whole period to 1983-84. I am also announcing tonight a federal tax, effective January 1, 1981, to be levied at a rate of 8 per cent on net revenue from the production of oil and gas in Canada. This will yield $1.4 billion in 1981-82 and $5.1 billion over the next three fiscal years. These new revenues will finance the major federal spending initiatives in the field of energy and the western development fund which I will shortly describe.

In recent years, the federal government has received about 10 per cent of petroleum production income. Producing provinces have received somewhat more than 45 per cent and the industry has received somewhat less than 45 per cent. As a result of the pricing regime and the new tax measures which I am announcing tonight, the federal government's share will increase to about 24 per cent over the four-year period 1980 to 1983. Provinces will receive about 43 per cent and industry about 33 per cent.

In establishing the new fiscal regime, the federal government has been careful not to intrude into areas which provinces regard as their own. The federal taxes reflect the capacity of the oil and gas industry to pay and bring its contributions more closely into line with what other industries are required to pay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I am satisfied that the regime will provide the financial capacity necessary if the national government is to meet its responsibilities for economic management and energy policy. Any additional changes required to the sharing arrangement will be for provinces and the industry to resolve.

PRODUCTION INCENTIVES AND ENERGY INITIATIVES

Madam Speaker, our energy strategy incorporates major new production incentives and expenditure initiatives.

The depletion allowances in the Income Tax Act for oil and gas exploration and development activities have primarily benefited large established corporations which are for the most part foreign owned or controlled. They have been of little use to the smaller Canadian-owned corporations which do not have sufficient income to benefit from tax incentives. As part of the national energy program, these allowances are to be fundamentally altered. Among the most important changes are the elimination of depletion for development expenditures effective January 1, 1981, and the phasing out of depletion for exploration over the next three years. Depletion will be retained only for selected activities, such as tar sands plants, and for frontier exploration. These changes in the depletion allowance will not affect the mining industry.

[Translation]

The government remains committed, however, to providing strong incentives to the industry. The orientation of the incentive regime will be changed in a way which will encourage Canadians to participate more fully in this country's oil and gas future. A petroleum incentives program will be established to provide grants of up to 80 per cent of exploration expenditures in the north and the offshore, and up to 35 per cent in other areas. Grants of up to 20 per cent will also be provided for development expenditures in all areas of the country. The grants will vary according to the level of Canadian ownership and control of enterprises. Details of these changes are described in the documents I am tabling tonight.

[English]

A number of other federal initiatives will help both individual Canadians and industry to meet Canada's energy objectives. For example, grants will be offered to assist home owners to move off oil, and onto natural gas, electricity and other fuels which we have in greater supply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: To ensure the rapid expansion of gas distribution systems, market development bonuses will be provided to distributors as an inducement to vigorous action.

● (2050)

Madam Speaker, because of the nature of our country, any energy program for Canada must have a regional dimension. The program does, therefore, incorporate measures designed to meet the special needs of eastern Canada and the west.

As a matter of national priority, the government will ensure that the natural gas pipeline system is extended beyond Montreal to Quebec City and the maritimes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: To encourage the early penetration of gas in those markets, gas prices in Quebec City and Halifax will be set at the same level as in Toronto and Montreal. Under the new pricing regime the private sector has a strong incentive to proceed with the pipeline's construction. But if an immediate commitment is not forthcoming, the federal government will take whatever steps are necessary.

The Atlantic provinces are more heavily dependent on oil than any other region of the country. For this reason, a fund will be established to support the conversion of oil-fired electrical plants to coal. Financial assistance will continue to be given for interprovincial electrical connections and federal equity will be provided in support of hydro development on the Lower Churchill river in Labrador. Net funds will also be available to find ways in which the large reserves of Cape Breton coal can be used to enhance energy security in the maritimes. The P.E.I. conservation and renewable energy agreement will be extended. An industrial conservation program will be implemented and a housing retrofit program introduced for Newfoundland, P.E.I., the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

The total of our new energy initiatives will cost $8.4 billion between now and 1983-84. They come on top of our existing energy programs which will cost $3.1 billion over the same period.

The resource wealth of western Canada has laid the base for rapid economic growth in that region. This is already occurring, and it is leading in turn to a diversification of the western economy as further processing of the resources develop and as the growth of the market attracts new industries. These trends are being strongly promoted by the provincial governments. The federal government is also anxious to play its part; a number of the growth supporting policies which are required fall within our areas of responsibility. We have, therefore, allocated $4 billion to a western development fund, of which we expect to spend $2 billion over the next three years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Specific development initiatives will be selected in consultation with the governments of the western provinces. They will be designed to address the major economic opportunities and constraints which will challenge the west during this decade. For example, the federal government is hopeful that through consultation with interested groups in the west, agreement can be reached on the modernization of the western grain handling and transportation system which is so vital to the growth and diversification of the prairie economy. We will also consider initiatives relating to industrial diversification and examine ways in which trade and industrial policies can better serve western development. To co-ordinate these efforts and to ensure early action, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has established a special group of ministers led by my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy).

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP

The energy sector is of crucial importance to Canada. It is now dominated by a few large firms, virtually all foreign-owned and controlled. It is the belief of this government that Canadians should be given the opportunity to participate to a greater extent in the energy future of their own country. Specifically, the national energy program establishes the following objectives:

at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of oil and gas production by 1990;

Canadian control of a significant number of the larger oil and gas firms; and an early increase in the share of the oil and gas sector owned by the Government of Canada.

Many of the initiatives in the national energy program, for example, the incentive grants which I have announced tonight, will help to achieve these goals. But we are prepared to go further. Petro-Canada will be charged initially with the task of acquiring the Canadian operations of one or more multinational oil companies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: As in the past, the financing of such acquisitions will be obtained in large part by borrowing in foreign capital markets. But additional infusions of equity capital may be required. To provide that capital the government will establish a Canadian ownership account. Revenue for the account will be provided by a Canadian ownership charge imposed on all oil and gas consumption in Canada which will come into operation as the acquisition program progresses and will be set at a level to ensure that the program will be totally self-financing, and in no way affect the government's deficit.

In summary, Madam Speaker, the national energy program which is being put forth by my colleague is a bold one which establishes a consistent set of policies to meet Canada's energy needs. Taken together, the pricing and expenditure measures will enhance Canada's energy security by reducing oil consumption and, by 1990, ending our reliance on imported supplies. We will accomplish this with a policy which provides for a fair return to the industry, the producing provinces and the federal government without imposing an undue burden on the Canadian consumer. Finally, I expect energy to be a growing source of strength for the economy as a whole. It is, therefore, particularly important that all Canadians have an opportunity to participate in the development of Canada's energy resources and to share in the employment and production benefits which will accrue to other sectors of the economy.

THE EXPENDITURE PLAN

I now turn, Madam Speaker, to the expenditure plan of the government which constitutes a second major element in our over-all strategy.

As I indicated earlier, the achievement of the desirable degree of deficit reduction without general increases in taxation has required strict control over the rate of growth of our spending.

Our expenditure plan fulfils the promises we made in the election campaign. And it does so even though we have responded to the priority needs of energy, economic development, defence and aid. This has required hard choices. They have been facilitated by the development of the new expenditure planning system. The foundations of this new system were laid under the previous Liberal government. Important further advances were made under the Conservative government. Now we have reached the point of being able to set out for the first time the agreed planning levels for each major category of expenditure or envelope in a multi-year time horizon. This new system requires the government to identify its priorities within the framework of over-all restraint. It permits the delegation of responsibility for program decisions to the policy committees of the cabinet. It provides a framework within which departments will be encouraged to develop medium-term plans and increase the efficiency of their operations, and in which choices can be made between cash outlays and tax expenditures. Throughout the decision-making system, it creates an incentive to find ways of saving money in existing programs, in order to finance new high priority activities.

My present estimate is that total outlays this year will amount to just under $60 billion, an increase of 13.2 per cent over 1979-80. This high rate of growth stems from large increases in oil import compensation payments and in public debt charges. These increases, however, are not as large as seemed likely in April, partly because of the decline in interest rates in the early summer and partly because the new blended price policy reduces the net cost of oil compensation for the balance of this year. The only major new spending programs are the enrichment of the guaranteed income supplement for our neediest old people and in the start-up of the new energy initiatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We plan to reduce the rates of growth of our spending to 12.8 per cent in 1981-82, to 10.5 per cent in 1982-83 and to about 10 per cent in 1983-84. This will hold the growth of our spending within the trend growth of GNP. Total outlays, the sum of our budgetary expenditures and loans, investments and advances, amounted to 20.3 per cent of GNP in 1979-80. This ratio rises in 1980-81 and 1981-82 mainly because of the lack of real growth in the economy, but it falls again as economic expansion resumes. By 1983-84 it will be back down to 20.3 per cent. Turning now to the envelopes, or the expenditure groupings in the plan, the details are set out in the tables and notes which I am tabling with this budget and I will just summarize the highlights.

A new energy envelope has been established and this includes the new energy initiatives which I have discussed, as well as the cost of petroleum compensation payments net of revenue from the petroleum compensation charge. Funding for new and existing energy programs, excluding net petroleum compensation payments, will almost triple in 1981-82, and increase by a further 21 per cent in 1982-83 and 17 per cent in 1983-84.

Funds allocated to the economic development envelope increase by 22 per cent in 1981-82.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: This will enable the economic development committee of the cabinet to expand existing programs and launch new initiatives in support of research and development, industrial expansion and export development. These programs which are now under intensive development will contribute to the renewed gains in productivity and to the high levels of business investment on which we depend for our prosperity in the years ahead. This envelope also includes expenditures from the western development fund. The social affairs envelope will continue to be by far the largest block of spending and will remain one of the government's most basic priorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We are pushing forward with a review of the whole area of pensions and retirement income generally. The present system is defective. While many Canadians are well provided for in their later years, many others have to rely on the old age security and guaranteed income supplement. Not only is the present pension system uneven, it also hinders labour mobility. We are going to have to work out the best way of improving the system, and the respective roles of the private sector and such public institutions as the Canada Pension Plan. Even a large role for the CPP would not, however, involve a major call on new expenditures from the social affairs envelope. Our new spending initiatives in the field of social policy will be directed to those individuals who are most in need.

A large element of our expenditures, especially in the social affairs envelope, consists of transfers to the provincial governments. I have already indicated to my provincial colleagues that we will be examining these programs closely as they come up for renewal, and we expect to achieve significant savings here. This will also help to bring about a clearer division of federal and provincial responsibilities which has been one of the stands in recent constitutional discussions. These have also emphasized the high priority we attach to equalization.

[Translation]

I would like to announce at this time that a special allocation of $350 million over four years has been made to promote industrial restructuring and manpower retraining and mobility in areas of particular need. The total amount has been divided equally between the economic development and social affairs envelopes. My colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will soon be announcing program details.

[English]

The envelopes of expenditures administered by the external affairs and defence committee will grow relatively rapidly. We have undertaken to increase our foreign aid programs sufficiently rapidly to reach the target of 0.5 per cent of GNP by mid-decade. Our defence spending will rise by 3 per cent in real terms, reflecting our commitment to our NATO allies to beef up our defence capabilities. We have already contracted to buy the new fighter aircraft and we will be re-equipping our land and naval forces.

General operating expenses of the government will be closely controlled. Departments are being required to meet rising levels of services demanded with no increase in person years apart from those needed for identified purposes like the census. This will require the achievement of further increases in productivity.

I should explain at this point that our expenditure projections make no allowance for the impact of turning the Post Office into a Crown corporation. When this happens, the expenditures of the government will include only the amounts required to cover any deficit of the Post Office, rather than its total expenditures. The new Crown corporation will be expected, however, to cover its costs. For the purposes of my fiscal projections I have, therefore, assumed that postal revenues will rise until they equal postal expenditures.

A major item in the budget is the interest we have to pay on the public debt. This is projected to increase by nearly 19 per cent to $12.4 billion in 1981-82, and will amount to more than one-sixth of total outlays. I am convinced we must slow down the growth of public debt charges, and this is one of the reasons I am determined to reduce the deficit. By 1983-84, the projected rate of growth of public debt charges is less than 13 per cent.

THE TAX STRUCTURE

Madam Speaker, I turn now to questions of taxation. I have a special responsibility to ensure that our tax system is fair and that it contributes to the achievement of our economic and social objectives. On the whole, our tax system is one of the best in the world. Canada's individual and corporate taxes are lower than in many other industrialized countries, including the United States.

One of the reasons for this is our system of indexation. I have already indicated that I have been able to secure an appropriate reduction of the deficit by restraining our spending. I have thus been able to avoid a general tax increase and to continue indexing for 1981. The exemptions, tax bracket limits and the child tax credit will rise by 9.8 per cent over their current levels. The child tax credit will be increased from $238 to $261 per child. As a result, the tax payable by a family of four earning $15,000 will be reduced by $248, or nearly 20 per cent. For 1981 alone, indexing will reduce federal taxes which would otherwise have been paid by $1,580 million. The cumulative reduction of federal taxes since indexing was introduced amounts to $11 billion.

We will only maintain a good tax system, however, if we keep on looking for ways to make it better. I am particularly concerned to ensure that the tax system is fair and seen to be fair. Three areas of the tax system are worth examining from this point of view.

First, tax expenditures. Hon. members will be familiar with the concept, which was described in a paper tabled by my predecessor last year. Within a short period of time I intend to table an updated tax expenditure account. The incentives and preferences identified in the tax expenditure analysis raise important issues. They are expensive and it is incumbent on government to ensure that the incentives are effective and that their cost is justified.

Tax incentives tend to pyramid with the result that a number of profitable corporations or wealthy individuals pay little or no tax. Other countries have responded to this by introducing minimum taxes or special levies on tax preferences. While this approach may be an answer to the problem, perhaps a fundamentally different one would be preferable. We now have a tax system characterized by higher tax rates relieved by a complex network of incentives and tax preferences. One questions whether the economy might not be better served by a tax system with lower rates but with fewer and more selective incentives.

Second, Madam Speaker, let me say a few words about the commodity tax structure. Because the federal sales tax is levied at the manufacturing level, it falls unequally on commodities wherever there are differences in the degree of value added by wholesalers and retailers. It is particularly worrisome that the tax generally falls more heavily on goods produced and sold in Canada than on competing goods imported from abroad. I would hope to be in a position to make a final decision on this fairly important issue in the next budget.

Third, I will be releasing shortly a discussion paper on the taxation of capital gains. The paper notes that, while the system has imperfections, the taxation of capital gains is an important source of government revenue, has important tax structure implications and is essential for the equity and fairness of the system. I look forward to the discussion of the important issues raised in the paper.

I turn now to more immediate matters. In April this year, I tabled a ways and means motion proposing changes to the Income Tax Act and undertook to put forward draft amendments before introducing the legislation. I did so in August, and have received a number of representations and useful suggestions which will be given consideration before the final legislation is introduced.

I wish to announce four important initiatives. First, the small business development bonds will be extended for three months to March 31, 1981. Second, I am proposing to reintroduce the incentive for the construction of multiple-unit residential buildings, the so-called MURB provision, to take effect tonight until the end of 1981. Third, I propose an extension of the extra 4 per cent capital cost allowance incentive for railway track and grading to the end of 1982. This measure, along with the special depreciation allowance of 6 per cent on railway investment and the 7 percent investment tax credit on railway transportation equipment, will provide important incentives to the railways to upgrade their infrastructure, especially in western Canada.

[Translation]

Finally, on the advice of my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), I am proposing a bold and experimental new program to help deal with regional inequalities in this country. For new manufacturing investment in specially designated areas of the country, characterized by high unemployment and low income, I propose an investment tax credit of 50 per cent terminating at the end of 1985.

[English]

SALES AND EXCISE TAXES

Madam Speaker, I am proposing certain changes in the federal sales and excise taxes.

The substantial increase of the tax on fortified wines has had an adverse impact on the industry. I am, therefore, proposing that wines with an alcoholic content of over 14 per cent be taxed on the same basis as table wines. The excise tax on fortified wines will be reduced immediately from $3 per gallon to $1.25 per gallon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It has been customary for excise taxes on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products to be levied as specific amounts per unit of the product rather than on an ad valorem basis. I recognize that when changes are made periodically to specific taxes to maintain their real value, the process can be disruptive, and I am particularly sensitive to the changes in the weight of taxation as between the various products. Accordingly, I am proposing that these levies be automatically adjusted each quarter to reflect changes in the price indexes for these commodities. This measure will commence on April 1, 1981.

● (2120)

I am proposing, at the request of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) an increase of $2.50 in the air transportation tax for international travel and a similar increase in the ceiling on the tax for domestic air travel. These increases will be effective April 1, 1981, for tickets purchased in Canada and July 1, 1981, for tickets purchased outside Canada.

Persons who prepare goods for sale by, for example, assembling, blending or packaging, other than in a retail store, will be required to account for tax on their sales of those goods.

I am extending the sales tax to advertising fliers and catalogues distributed as newspaper inserts. Full details of these and other changes are provided in the ways and means motion and supplementary information I am tabling tonight.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

I am introducing tonight several amendments to the customs tariff.

One set of tariff changes stems from a Tariff Board review related to goods imported by institutions established for scientific, religious, educational and similar purposes. In line with the board's recommendations, I am proposing that the provision for duty-free entry of scientific and educational equipment be modified so as to permit applicatiion of normal customs duties when such equipment is available from production in Canada.

Another Tariff Board report relates to antiques, collectables, amateur radio and other hobby equipment. I propose to provide duty-free entry for most of the goods for which such treatment was recommended by the board, although some departures were made to take account of recent changes in domestic supply capability.

Other tariff changes include removal of the duty on TV captioning devices for the deaf and microfilmed books.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. MacEachen: I am announcing on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, that effective January 1, 1981, the weekly rate of unemployment insurance contributions will be raised to $1.80 per $100 of insurable earnings.

Mr. Broadbent: That is $1 billion per year.

Mr. MacEachen: The employer rate of contribution will be increased to $2.52. These increases largely reflect the changes in the financing of the unemployment insurance program first put forward by my predecessor in his December 11, 1979 budget speech. These changes involve the financing by employer and employee contributions of all the costs of unemployment insurance benefits except those associated with high regional rates of unemployment. In addition, the new premium structure reflects the impact of the extension of the variable entrance requirement and of the reduction in the minimum earnings requirement approved by the House earlier this year.

THE ECONOMIC AND FISCAL SITUATION AND OUTLOOK

Madam Speaker, I will now summarize my forecast of the economy and the federal government's fiscal situation given the measures and spending plans just announced.

In a paper accompanying this budget, our medium-term economic projections are set out in some detail, so I can describe them quite briefly. It now appears that real output for 1980 as a whole will be significantly weaker than expected at the time of my April statement, and may decline by something like 1 per cent. The recession is nearing its end, but the recovery is likely to be rather gradual in the face of the world economic situation, continued high rates of inflation and the recent increase in interest rates stemming from the United States. Thus the real level of output in 1981 may be only about 1 per cent higher than in 1980. However, we are expecting real growth rates in the 4 per cent range to commence in the latter part of 1981 and to continue for some time thereafter.

Exports and business investment are vital to sustaining non-inflationary growth, and we look to them to be the leading forces in the recovery. Canadian industry enjoys a favourable competitive position in the world, given current exchange rates and the fact that many countries have experienced faster inflation than we have. Despite the U.S. recession, our trade surplus has remained very favourable this year because our industry has done well in overseas markets. If we succeed in maintaining our competitive strength, we will be able to take full advantage of world economic recovery. Our industrial and research and development policies will foster the growth of investment and the improvement of our trade balance. Moreover, our new energy policy is designed to provide a framework within which a wide range of energy developments can go forward, with beneficial results.

Despite the reduction in output this year, employment continued to expand, and as a result productivity declined by about 3 per cent. This, of course, was troublesome for our cost position, but it meant that unemployment has risen rather less than I expected in April and remains below 8 per cent. I think it unlikely that this will continue. Unemployment could average about 8.5 per cent next year, and then decline gradually as output picks up.

On the inflation side, the outlook for the remainder of this year and for 1981 is for a continued rate of increase of the consumer price index in the 10 per cent range as higher prices of foods and energy are absorbed. I am confident that the strategy outlined in this budget will contribute to a gradual decline in inflation after 1981. In projecting the government's fiscal position, I have based the revenue forecast on these economic assumptions and have taken into account the tax changes announced earlier including the energy taxes.

Budgetary revenues are forecast to rise by 12.6 per cent in 1980-81 and then by 17.1 per cent in 1981-82 and by 16.4 per cent in 1982-83 before dropping off to less than 13 per cent in 1983-84. These rapid increases reflect the impact of the energy taxes, especially in 1981-82, and the resumption of better rates of economic growth especially in 1982-83.

I expect the budgetary deficit to decline from $14.2 billion this year to $13.7 billion in 1981-82 and then more sharply to $12.1 billion in 1982-83 and to $11.8 billion in 1983-84. These declines result from a growth rate of revenues appreciably higher than that of our planned expenditures.

With rising sources of funds from the non-budgetary accounts, financial requirements decline more rapidly than the budgetary deficit. They decline from $12.2 billion this year to $11 billion in 1981-82, to $8.4 billion in 1982-83 and to $7.2 billion in 1983-84. The financial requirements will drop from 4.3 per cent of GNP in 1980-81 to 1.8 per cent in 1983-84, the lowest level since 1974-75.

It is my intention to introduce a borrowing authority bill for fiscal 1981-82 following completion of the budget debate. Hon. members will then be able to consider the request for borrowing authority in the light of the comprehensive information contained in this budget.

I would now like to table projections of the government's revenues and expenditures together with explanatory notes, the notices of ways and means motions, supplementary information giving details of the measures I have announced tonight and a background paper on the medium-term economic projections. On behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I am tabling his paper setting out the national energy program. I would ask the consent of the House to include in Hansard the tables which provide projections of the government's fiscal position on the public accounts and national accounts basis, and of the principal components of budgetary revenues.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For tables referred to above, see Appendix.]

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should like to conclude by thanking my colleagues for their assistance in preparing this budget. I should also acknowledge the support I received from members on this side and perhaps offer my thanks to members on the other side who have been very ingenious in recommending how I ought to contrive the budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (2130)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should, indeed, say a word of thanks also to the media who have been equally fertile in suggesting what I might include in the budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I have sought in this budget to lay out a strategy which can bring us to a full realization of our opportunities in this decade. I cannot promise instant well-being—that is not the nature of the world, or the nature of the problems that we face. However, I count on the patience and the collaboration of all Canadians. I have avoided those prescriptions in the budget which would have had the Government of Canada retreat from its concerns for issues on unemployment and the distribution of income and wealth among regions and individuals. But I have also resisted those who would urge vastly greater intrusions by the state in the daily lives of Canadians.

I have made it clear on other occasions that the concept of sharing seems to me to be close to the distinctive fibre of the Canadian tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I do not believe the state can be the only agency by which sharing is effected or compelled. On the contrary, I believe our destiny will rest on the acknowledgment by individual Canadians in their private lives of the nobility of our sharing commitment. We have shared in the struggle and victory of achieving a great nation against what many still see to be improbable odds. If our will to share is sustained, great good fortune could still lie ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), is there unanimous consent to append to Hansard the tables referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I suppose I should congratulate the minister opposite for having done his best.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I am glad he is getting loud applause in here because he will get it nowhere else except from his own side of the House.

This could be called the shell game budget. Where is the pea under the shell? During the course of my remarks tonight and tomorrow afternoon, I hope to point out where some of those peas are under the shell.

The hon. minister must have been reading the recent book called "The Northern Magus". He, or course, is the Celtic magus.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The maggot!

Mr. Crosbie: Or maggot—the Celtic maggot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Because this has been a magical budget.

How less can be more and how an increase in spending of 15.2 per cent can become less—the minister talks about it almost as a decline in spending— is beyond me. The minister said in this House several weeks ago on October 10 that he was going to keep and fulfil all the Liberal campaign promises. The Liberal campaign promises were not much. The Liberals did not make many promises. But the ones they made in the economic area have all been sabotaged by the hon. minister. For example, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his famous economic speech in Toronto on January 12, 1980, said:

> We will hold the line on government expenditure growth to under the rate of GNP.

Tonight the minister tells us that the rate of GNP has declined one per cent this year and the budget shows us that the minister's spending has increased 15.2 per cent this year. That is not a decline. That is an increase this year.

The inflation rate is around 10 per cent, a huge increase in real spending. I am not even including the sleight of hand. For example, the Liberals have removed from their spending in these estimates, under the import compensation fund, $1.2 billion which should be there because they netted out the figures. They have imposed a new tax on the Canadian consumer of oil and gas products and expenditures have been reduced by $1.2 billion less than they should have been because that fund this year will cost $3,950 million for the import subsidy. But in these figures that amount, less $1.2 billion, is shown. So on and on it goes through this document. This is a document of deception, a document that attempts to deceive the Canadian public as to what is in it. The promises have not been kept. The Liberals said they would review the tax system to ensure that all sectors of the economy make their fair contribution to future needs. Well, we have made our contribution by preventing the minister from de-indexing the income tax!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Our campaign and the $30,000 we spent on ads—our own money, not the Canadian taxpayers' money—saved the Canadian taxpayers this year $1.6 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The minister still leaves a threat in his budget. He threatens that if things do not turn out very well, he might still have to de-index the Canadian income tax. Well, if he ever attempts that, he will have stout opposition from over here.

The Prime Minister promised the deficit would be reduced in a phased and orderly fashion, but not at the expense of jobs, growth and the attack on inflation. The deficit has not been reduced. The deficit has gone up $3.6 billion, compared to our estimates, to in excess of $14 billion. The financial requirements are up over $12 billion. The deficit has not been reduced. It is neither phased, orderly nor reduced. This is done at the expense of jobs because the minister has forecast unemployment next year at 8.7 per cent. The minister has not done one iota, one jot or tittle in his budget to attempt to fight that unemployment situation next year, and this after the crocodile tears that were shed on the floor of this House last December when our budget was brought down.

What else did the Prime Minister say? He said:

> This party will not simply stand by and let the recession come. We will fight it and overcome it.

We have had a recession for six months. The minister has held his portfolio since February. The Prime Minister, that well-known fighter, that judo expert, has had all of that time to fight this recession and overcome it. What has happened? The recession has worsened. We are losing 1 per cent of our GNP this year and the unemployment next year will be 8.7 per cent. And the growth next year is supposed to be 1 per cent. The minister has let the recession come. He has not fought and overcome it.

The Prime Minister said this, again on January 12:

> We must increase the economic might of Canada by strengthening each of the regions.

Tonight, one of the main features of the budget is to weaken a region, namely the west. And other regions are completely ignored.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister said in his statement on January 12:

> We must endorse the right of every Canadian to have a job.

But 8.7 per cent of the employed in Canada will be out of a job in Canada next year. There are around 800,000 out of work tonight as we sit here in this chamber.

Mr. Broadbent: Let us hear your forecast!

Mr. Crosbie: It is not the same. The peanut gallery on the left will have their turn tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They are the group who threw out our budget for this mess of pottage which they have today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: On January 19, 1980, the Prime Minister said in Vancouver:

> Liberals believe that we should use all the instruments at our disposal to try and stem the tide of the coming recession.

Where are the instruments? Why did Canute not try to stop the tide? Or did King Canute, or the Prime Minister, put his foot out to stop the tide, and the tide would not stop? What happened to old King Canute who was going to stop that recession?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) damned my budget as socially regressive. Tonight he announced a $1 billion increase in contributions to the unemployment insurance fund by the working people of this country. He increased their contribution from $1.35 per $100—not to $1.60 as I suggested last December, which caused the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to have a fit in this House, but to $1.80 per $100. He is going to take $1 billion from the working people of Canada this year through increased unemployment insurance. He said my budget was socially regressive; his budget is socially deformed.

● (2140)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What did the Prime Minister say about the provinces on February 2 in Sudbury, Ontario this year? He said:

> We (the Liberals) would not try to set one province off against another. We would have responsible negotiations with the provinces and we would work out a price.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We see tonight how they have worked out that price since last February. We see how they would not set one province against another. A bribe was given to the province of Saskatchewan. Half of the revenue from the export tax on oil is being given to Saskatchewan, the only real beneficiary.

Mr. Lalonde: Alberta, too.

Mr. Crosbie: Alberta makes nothing off it. The Broadbent pay-off presumably was made to Saskatchewan in that way. There is a tax, not just on exports of natural gas, but on both the exports and domestic sales of natural gas. It is an over-all tax on natural gas, including an export tax on natural gas.

Mr. Nowlan: A consumer tax.

Mr. Crosbie: It is a consumer tax. It is not just on the American consumers. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was just going to lump it to the Americans. He was just going to give them an export tax. However, the Minister of Finance lumps in to the Canadians as well. His tax is imposed on Canadians as well as foreigners. The foreigners will not pay the tax anyway because they are not prepared to pay the price for natural gas that we are trying to get for it.

The whole course of the Prime Minister since February has been to set one province off against the other. His Machiavellian memorandum done by Machiavelli Kirby, or whatever his name is, set out the strategy. We see another example of it here in this budget tonight. We will not have a confederation if we get much more of this in the next three or four years.

Confederation will be dissolved if this kind of tactic is continued, this kind of bullying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The minister has a majority in this House. He has not got the courage of a castrated lemming. This budget does nothing. It does not fight inflation. There is nothing in this budget to fight inflation. There is no control over expenditure. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has surrendered. He has no control over expenditure.

The advice of the Bank of Canada has been ignored. What was the advice of the Bank of Canada? Governor Bouey on May 29, 1980, before the Senate, talking about the deficit, said:

> When they see that deficits are increasing more and more, that tends to feed inflationary expectations so I guess I would say 'let's keep it from increasing, if we can, as a minimum'.

Instead of keeping it from increasing, the minister whopped it up $3,600 million. That is how much attention he is paying to governor Bouey. Governor Bouey fights the fight against inflation alone because this minister has turned his back on him. Even with his big majority in this House, he is not prepared to institute measures that might fight inflation, so inflation will go on. In his economic forecast, the minister says that next year it will go to 10.2 per cent. Well, it will go over 10.2 per cent. We can see that from the figures he gave us for the increases in food and energy costs.

What is the minister doing about this? Where is the thrust against inflation? What is the minister doing to help productivity in this country? This year productivity declined by 3 per cent. What is he doing to help investment in this country? He is doing nothing but slamming the oil and gas industry with savage taxes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Bust the consumer. We can see now what economic geniuses run this country. They cannot even see that the oil and gas industry will pass it all on to the consumer. These taxes are mostly on the consumer in any event. What has the minister done for employment policies and programs? He announced that $250 million extra will be spent over the next three years on some employment and skills training programs. That is not as much as we were going to spend in one year, as we stated in our budget last year.

What has the minister done? Where does the country go, under this budget? The country keeps going down the tube. There is nothing new in his budget. It is just out of control. They say, "We are in power and we do not want to deal with these tough problems. We do not want to deal with these deficits that we have allowed to grow and grow".

Next year we will pay in excess of $12 billion in interest on the debt. Over one out of every four of our tax dollars will go for interest on the debt. The minister does not care about that. Let's come to the oil and gas section of this.

Mr. Regan: It sounds like sour grapes from you.

Mr. Crosbie: It will be very sour grapes for the taxpayers who will have to swallow these oil and gas price increases. It will be very sour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The budget means that the average Canadian will pay at least $125 more to heat his home and $100 more at least to run his car. That is what this means. It means that at the end of four years' time the people of Canada will look back and say, "My God, I wish we had had John Crosbie's budget".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They are going to say, "If only we had accepted that 18 cents. It looks good compared to this $1 a gallon it has cost us over the last four years".

An hon. Member: One dollar, nine.

Mr. Crosbie: Or the $1.09 it will cost. Who can tell what the cost is going to be, because there is to be a new animal, the PetroCan takeover, the multinational tax levy. No one knows what it is going to be or what it will come to. However, the oil and gas consumers of this country are going to pay it. Tonight we heard about a petroleum compensation charge of 80 cents a barrel this year, $2.50 a barrel next year and God knows what it will go to in the future under the spendthrift crowd of les misérables opposite. That, by the way, is going to be paid by the consumer. No one else is going to pay it. That 80 cents a barrel is going to be paid by the man who heats his home, not only by the man who drives his car.

Last year we felt for those who have to heat their homes. But not those people opposite. They do not care if you have to heat your home. They say, "Let them get fur coats. If they cannot heat their homes, let them buy good, heavy fur coats".

An hon. Member: Wear a tux.

Mr. Crosbie: We have the petroleum compensation charge, 80 cents a barrel, going quickly in January to $2.50 a barrel. How do you like that? That is the crowd which did not like the 18 cents. Then we have the new natural gas tax. Well, it is not new to hear about gas from the hon. people opposite, but this is a new natural gas tax. That will raise from the consumers next year $1.3 billion. The consumers of gas will pay, not the companies, not those bad old companies, those oil and gas companies that this government made rich, that this government permitted to pile up billions in profits over the 20 years they have been in power. No, it will be the consumer.

It is that group which permitted this hydra-headed Frankenstein of an oil and gas industry to grow, completely dominated by foreign companies. The government opposite which allowed this to happen now says it is going to take them under control. The consumer is going to pay for this lack of attention by hon. gentlemen opposite for the past 20 years. It will be 30 cents a cubic foot to start off with, and 80 cents a barrel going to $2.50 a barrel. Then there is to be the federal tax on net revenues which the oil and gas companies will collect from the consumer, and after that, the Canadian ownership charge.

We are going to have the "PetroCan at any price" charge imposed on all oil and gas consumed in Canada. Are you an oil consumer? Are you a gas consumer? Get ready, brothers and sisters, you are going to pay for PetroCan hereafter because you are going to pay this. What is the maximum limit of that tax? Four dollars a barrel. Next year we might all be paying $4 a barrel more for PetroCan to take over Petrofina or somebody or other. Who knows what or who they are going to take over, except the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and even he does not know. Robespierre is smiling. I hope his head goes on the block before the consumers have to pay for that!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2150)

Mr. Crosbie: We do not even know how much that tax will cost us. This is another piece of deception. Tonight I am only brushing the surface of the canvas which I will fill tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: In this document here we are told the minister actually assumes that in the hereafter the Post Office will have revenues which balance its expenditures because it will be a Crown corporation. He makes the assumption that he will not have to pony up any money for the Post Office. Well, that means that the Post Office will have to collect $400 million more in revenue next year, is that the figure?

Some hon. Members: $500 million.

Mr. Crosbie: It will be $500 million. Will anyone go for a billion? That is at least $500 million which is not included in these expenditures because as sure as the sun will rise tomorrow over Parliament Hill, there will be a $500-million deficit in the Post Office next year. Either the minister will pony it up from government expenditures or the public will pay it in the price they pay for stamps. How do you like the idea of a 35 cent stamp to send a letter from here to downtown Ottawa? How would that go over? That is just another little omission from this budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: It will never get there anyway.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Now, last year in our budget we over here who were scorned as heartless wretches treading on the poor people of Canada, introduced an energy tax credit because we saw that the people of Canada would have to pay more for oil and gas and the products that come therefrom. We introduced an energy tax credit. It was designed to give medium and low-income people of Canada assistance to meet these increased costs. They were to get $80 for each adult and $30 for each child in a family. Refundable. If you paid in cash, you did not pay income tax; you got the maximum if you earned under $21,380. Did we hear a word from the Minister of Finance tonight about assistance to lower and medium-income Canadians?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, sir.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Crosbie: Is there any energy cash credit in this budget for them? There is no assistance for lower and medium-income people in Canada, but those who work will pay $1 billion more to the unemployment insurance fund. That is how this party opposite acts in office, as compared to the fuss and the furore they caused here last December 11, 12 and 13 and the abuse they heaped on me, sensitive soul that I am.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Everywhere I turn I see another betrayed section of the population, for instance, the home owner and the tenant. Now, last year the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy)—he is not here at the moment; he has gone west with his $4 billion, I suppose.

Mr. Epp: To the Russian front.

Mr. Crosbie: "Yippee-yiyo-kiyay, I'm on my way". But I warn him, don't go to Alberta, brother!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Last year we tried to introduce a plan to help the home owner and those who wanted to buy homes meet their interest costs, and the interest rates now are higher than they were when we were in office. That is another thing hon. members opposite neglected to do when they got into office—to carry out their promise about interest rates.

Mr. Clark: Resign, Herb!

Some hon. Members: Resign, Herb!

Mr. Clark: Keep one promise.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not think the minister will resign. He has a pretty thick hide. They promised last year that they would help the tenant. They were to make a shelter allowance available to tenants. They were to do more for home owners than we skimpy hearts over here were going to do. We are supposed to be conservative. Well, we are 100 times more progressive and we have more heart. One of us here is equal to 100 hearts opposite, when it comes to helping.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Where is the help for the home owner and the tenant in this budget? Not one jot or tittle, but there is $15 million there in MURBs, multiple unit whatever it is. It is a MURB. It is a tax shelter for the wealthy of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Who put a stop to that tax shelter for the wealthy of Canada? Why, old hard-hearted right here that you see before you. He put an end to MURB, but MURB is resurrected and the wealthy of Canada can thank the minister. They have a friend in the Minister of Finance in this country. His heart beats for the "MURBers" of this country.

It will cost the treasury $15 million while the wealthy put their money into building apartment buildings, condominiums, multiple units or whatever they are to get tax relief. Where is the home owner? Where is the home owner and the tenant of Toronto getting help? Now, remember, do not blame all your problems on the hon. gentleman opposite; blame the NDP also. They made it all possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We will vote against this one, too.

An hon. Member: Who cares?

Mr. Crosbie: This is a budget which is a "tricks without treats" budget. It is an apt Hallowe'en budget. There are a lot of tricks in it and we will dissect them and point them out in the budget debate in the next six days. It is a shameful budget. It is a budget that a majority, who have allowed Canada to get into this economic shape over the last ten or 12 years, have not got the courage and the guts, when they have a solid majority in this House, to do anything about it but talk, obscure, be sly and devious and try to pretend they are doing what they are not doing.

It is a "promise-breaking" budget. It is a "shaft the province" budget. It is a "shaft Alberta" budget by the Prime Minister who was going to conciliate all the provinces and would never discriminate between them. This budget is cleverly constructed to shaft Alberta. I do not think this government or this House should prepare anything to shaft anyone, and certainly not one of the provinces. It is not good enough. There is no serious attempt to deal with the oil and energy problems, but it will result in the people of Canada paying far more than they would have when we faced them directly with the policies we put forward last December. It is a "shaft the private sector" budget. This is what it is. It is a "shaft deficit restraint" budget. It is a "shaft oil self-sufficiency" budget. It is a "shaft the Bank of Canada" budget. Poor governor Bouey is probably spinning in his office tonight to see all his advice to the government disregarded. He cannot fight inflation with monetary means alone. He needs fiscal policies adopted also, and he has been ignored. It is a "throw away our potential" budget. It is a "smash and grab" budget. It is a disappointment. It is a heartrending disappointment to the people of this country who thought they were electing a group who would do what they promised. We have seen tonight that on every fundamental aspect they have done nothing they promised and they have made a shame of themselves and a shame of this House. I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: It being ten o'clock, I do not think we need an adjournment motion. This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At ten o'clock the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE BUDGET

CALL FOR CONDEMNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas in these inflationary times senior citizens, pensioners and others on fixed incomes find it very difficult to meet even basic expenditures such as food, shelter and clothing, and because this government's budget failed to cushion the effect of higher gasoline and home heating fuel prices which will be experienced by pensioners and those on fixed incomes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House condemn the government for presenting an inflationary and regressive budget which falls most heavily on those groups in society least able to afford it.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

IMPACT OF TAXATION POLICIES ON OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The oil and gas industry, primarily based in western Canada, has been singled out for a depressing and destructive taxation policy in the Liberal government budget. The government should be condemned for such a short-sighted policy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the government immediately assess the impact of such energy taxation policies on oil and gas exploration, on the exodus of capital and tetchnical manpower and on energy self-sufficiency, and further report its findings to this House.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

THE BUDGET

IMPACT ON NORTHERN RESIDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House condemn the government for its total disregard of even the most basic principles of equity and fairness in the presentation of their budget last night, as it has once again placed the heaviest burden contained in budgetary measures on the shoulders of northern residents who are already suffering from excessively high costs of living for reasons of geographic isolation and uncongenial climatic conditions and who will, for the same reasons, find it most difficult, if not impossible, to cope with further increases in the cost of home heating fuel and gasoline.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FAILURE TO PROVIDE STIMULUS TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a very important matter. Noting that Atlantic Canada, with its high energy costs, high food prices and low average income, has suffered an overwhelming number of lay-offs and plant shutdowns in the past few months, and noting that the projected rate of 8.7 per cent unemployment for all of Canada really means an unemployment rate of over 15 per cent for Atlantic Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House condemn the Cape Breton minister of finance for the failure to provide any real economic stimulus for the region and for again stalling on the need to provide for drastically needed funds to modernize the Sydney Steel Corporation.

S.O. 43

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO ALLEVIATE IMPACT OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Liberals, with great fanfare at a news conference in Regina during the last election campaign, gave a solemn undertaking to the farmers in western Canada that steps would be taken to alleviate the impact of capital gains tax on the sale of farm lands by updating valuation day to 1974, in view of the fact that this promise was not included in last night's budget, and while the west will forgive the government if it breaks its promise to double-track the railway to the west coast, it will never do so for its breach of promise on capital gains, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the government bring in legislation to keep its promise and that the legislation be made retroactive to January 1, 1980.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR GENEROUS TREATMENT FOR QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce an urgent and important motion for the people of Quebec.

Considering that the western and Atlantic provinces will receive substantial assistance from the federal government, more particularly a development fund for the west and grants for various energy projects in the Atlantic provinces, and considering that the budget read last evening by the Minister of Finance does not contain any specific measure for Quebec in the energy sector, I move, seconded by the member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House pass energy measures as generous for Quebec as for the other regions of Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation under Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CALL FOR MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX CREDIT PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Liberal government has completely abandoned the Canadian home owner and the Canadian tenant in the budget, and whereas Canadians everywhere are still faced with the spectre of higher interest rates, higher heating costs and higher inflation, all of which were referred to in the Speech from the Throne, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this government immediately institute a mortgage interest and property tax credit plan so that middle and lower-income Canadians will not be left out in the cold.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—EFFECT OF CONVERSION FROM OIL TO COAL USE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The government's budget has proposed a $175 million fund to convert oil-fired electricity plants to coal. In view of the fact that coal is a major source of sulphur dioxide emissions that cause acid rain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House calls upon the Minister of the Environment to make a statement on motions detailing how the government intends to ensure that its utility off-oil fund will not compound Canada's already critical acid rain problem.

Madam Speaker: For its presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

ENERGY COSTS—INQUIRY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO LOW AND MIDDLE-INCOME CANADIANS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It relates to the betrayal of the Prime Minister's promise, in January of last year that his government would bring in a budget which put people first. He is putting people first on the chopping block, that is all. The minister knows that he has dumped enormous new energy costs upon all the people of Canada. He knows also that in our budget last year we extended to lower and middle-income Canadians an energy tax credit which would help them bear part of the burden of increased energy costs.

● (1415)

Why is there not such help for low and middle-income Canadians in this budget? Why did the minister not propose an energy tax credit or some other means that would help low and middle-income Canadians deal with the heavy burden of the increased energy costs that he is proposing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that question is easy to answer. The reason we did not provide an energy tax credit is that the burden, which is admitted, falling on the consumer as a result of increased energy prices will be considerably lower in this budget than in the budget of last December.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I remind the Leader of the Opposition that his minister of finance imposed an excise tax on gasoline which would have brought into the treasury $3 billion a year, of which $1 billion would be given to the tax credit. We did not bring in that excise tax on gasoline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister knows that by means other than the excise tax, by devious means and by use of trickery, he has imposed upon the people of Canada an unequal burden in energy costs. He does not want to help at least low and middle-income Canadians.

Let me come for a moment to the excise tax. Our excise tax explicitly excluded heating oil. The Minister of Finance should know, if he has not grown too far away from low-income people in Cape Breton, that a higher proportion of the incomes of lower income Canadians is spent on home heating oil than is the case with other Canadians. Will the minister tell us why there was not similar care shown in his budget for the plight of Canadians who have to pay these increased costs for home heating oil, as was shown in our budget? Why does he not recognize the special needs of low-income Canadians in relation to the cost of home heating oil?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I will repeat the answer for the Leader of the Opposition. The reason is that the burden placed upon the Canadian consumer as a result of this budget is considerably lower than the burden imposed on them last December. That applies to the price of oil and to the price of gas. Taken together, the burden is much less.

Let me tell the Leader of the Opposition, in case he has forgotten, that we have already taken action in this Parliament to provide a substantial increase in the guaranteed income supplement to help Canadians most affected by such increases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I remind the minister that an untruth does not become more true simply by repetition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This budget looks out for the wealthy who want to get involved in MURBs but it ignores low-income Canadians on whom extra burdens have been imposed by this minister. It also ignores the obligation to try and create jobs for Canadians and to try and stimulate employment growth across this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We hear now from the NDP who support the rump of the Liberal party. We hear their second thoughts about electing these people to impose heavy burdens upon low-income Canadians. Can the minister tell the House why this government has proposed a job-creation program which is substantially less than the job-creation program that was proposed last December? Where is the government's concern for putting people first?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition ought to re-read the budget. We did not propose in the budget a job-creation program. We proposed a special fund to be established in the social affairs envelope and in the economic development envelope to provide special adjustment assistance in the field of restructuring the economy and in the field of manpower mobility and training. We think that is much more appropriate to the current Canadian situation in the way of increasing productivity and investment than a job-creation program in itself.

• (1420)

May I add this. I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to present facts which show—and he has all the time in the next six days of debate to prove the fact—that we have laid a greater burden on the Canadian consumer. We lived up to our election promises to reduce that burden and that is why the Leader of the Opposition is so frustrated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we accept that challenge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would now like the minister to answer one of the questions which I have put to him—any one. Let us perhaps have him focus particularly on why he has removed the help to low-income and middle-income Canadians that we offered with an energy tax credit. He knows it is not the case that the burden imposed by his increases is much less than that imposed by the budget of my colleague from St. John's West. He knows there will be an unusual burden upon low-income Canadians. Why does he not help them? Why does he not have an energy tax credit, or some other measure, which will offer the same kind of help to those Canadians that he is prepared, with his MURB proposal, to extend to the rich of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is walking into a trap which he is creating for himself. I want to tell him that the price schedules established for energy—oil and gas—will save consumers over $40 billion over the same period compared to the December 11 budget. That is $40 billion better off, which is 12 times better than the amount provided in the energy tax credit. I think the Canadian consumer would prefer that deal to the bad deal which they got last December.

Mr. Clark: We will see.

ENERGY COSTS—ASSISTANCE TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, what the minister now says will provide precious little consolation and, indeed very little heat to the low-income earners of this country, who will have to pay higher fuel oil prices this winter. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, who is guilty of the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people, in my view, since that same government reneged on their promise and brought in wage and price controls in 1974.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: On June 17 in this House the Minister of Finance, in reply to the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, said that whatever tax changes were introduced they would not attempt to solve the economic problems of the country or the fiscal requirements of the government on the backs of the low-income people of this country.

That is precisely what he sets out to do in his budget when he states that the new regime will be phased in, shifting the burden of subsidizing high-priced crude imports from taxpayers to consumers of oil products. I ask the minister what he intends to do for these people this winter, the low-income earners of this country who depend upon oil products to heat their homes, and the old age pensioners who cannot afford to buy them? Does he propose to let them freeze?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member is getting overheated on this subject and maybe he ought to go into the cooler for a while and reflect upon the fact that if he is so interested in the low-income people, as I think he is, and as we all are, globally the burden placed upon all consumers in Canada, including low-income people, is $40 billion less than the burden which he so strongly supported last December. Let him reflect on that fact.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, what a shameful deception from the minister, who represents in this House low-income earners. What he is saying to the low-income earners of this country is, "Let them drink sherry in the cold." That is the only consolation this minister has.

An hon. Member: Fortified wine.

Mr. McGrath: Or fortified wine. They will need it to keep warm this winter.

• (1425)

Given the fact that those on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement spend a disproportionately high amount of their budgets on food and heating fuel, which will not be covered by indexing, the consumer price index notwithstanding, what measures does the minister intend to announce in the House, before this debate is over and before we vote on the budget, to provide some relief to the low-income earners in this country from rising food prices and rising fuel prices?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am disappointed that the hon. member has taken a shot at the relief that we have provided for the grape growers and the wine industry in southern Ontario. The hon. member for St. Catharines has been most active in asking me to take this particular action, and I am surprised that the hon. member would differ with his colleague.

However, I repeat again for the benefit of the House and the country that what we have done for all consumers, including low-income consumers in Canada, is reduce the burden by $40 billion. The burden will be $40 billion less than the burden which the government he supported placed upon the shoulders of the people of Canada and which we removed by getting re-elected and forming a government in this House.

IMPACT OF INCREASED TAXES ON AVERAGE FAMILY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I notice that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not here today. I suppose he has finally resigned after promising to do so so many times.

My question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister took great pleasure last night in saying that there would be no increase in personal income taxes. Considering that the energy price increase will cost the average family some $340 this year and that the 33 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums will cost the average family an additional $100, will the Minister of Finance now give us the total dollar impact of these deceptive taxes on the average family? How much is he taking out of the pocket of the ordinary Canadian?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has stated that there is no general increase in income taxes. That is correct. It had been widely suggested that there ought to be.

Mr. Broadbent: By whom?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is aware that indexing has been maintained in the taxing system, and that has conferred, as he knows, very considerable amounts of money on Canadian taxpayers.

With respect to the changes in unemployment insurance, they arise pursuant to legislation established by the House of Commons. There is nothing devious about it; it was openly stated in the House of Commons last night. What would the hon. member suggest? How should it be announced if not in the House of Commons?

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister took about two and a half minutes not to answer the question and not to make clear that he is increasing indirect taxes probably by about $500 minimum for the average Canadian. That is what he is doing but he is not admitting it.

I would like to ask the minister this question, and perhaps he will answer specifically. The typical family suffered an average net loss of real income last year of some $1,400 because of inflation. Since the minister predicts that inflation will go up in the coming year by some 10 per cent, will he confirm that when this whole series of indirect taxes he is levying is added to the 10 per cent rate of inflation, the average Canadian family in the coming year will probably suffer a net loss in real income of about $2,000? Is that Liberal justice?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member's statistics are quite fanciful and imaginary. I do not know where he gets the idea of indirect taxes. He has not specified them. Perhaps if he would specify them, we might be able to give him an answer. But I want to make it absolutely clear—

Mr. Broadbent: That would be a change.

Mr. MacEachen: —that I have laid out in the budget the facts with respect to the Canadian economy and what is likely to happen over the next number of years. I have laid out in the budget an approach which, in my view, lays the foundation for our economy to participate in the recovery which is likely to take place next year.

• (1430)

I would remind the Leader of the NDP that it would have been easy to accept his view to give a quick fix by giving a rapid stimulus to the economy, to add to the deficit, balloon the deficit even more, and compound the difficulties facing the economy, preventing it from recovering next year.

EFFECT OF INDIRECT TAXES ON WORKING CANADIANS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the real injustice of what the minister proposes will be an increase of more than 100,000 unemployed men and women. That is what his forecast is for next year.

I should like to direct my next question to the Prime Minister, who said during the recent election campaign—one of the few utterances with which he came out when he came out of the skies—that "the basic principle of the Liberal party is to help first those who need it most". Is he now telling the people of Canada that hundreds of dollars in regressive indirect taxes which force ordinary workers to pay proportionately much more than the rich is the definition of Liberal justice? Is that what he is telling the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Tell your buddy, Pierre.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the increase in the contribution is not on the unemployed; it is on the employed, the workers who belong to an insurance scheme, on the one hand, and the companies which employ these workers, on the other hand, which are suffering an even greater increase.

What are we doing for the unemployed? I would remind the hon. member of the many things announced in the budget last night, all the way from the building of pipelines to hydro in the Lower Churchill, and, more particularly, the 50 per cent tax relief for those industries which would locate in the areas of the country where there is a high percentage of unemployment to create jobs there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FOOD AND ENERGY PRICES—INQUIRY RESPECTING ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the NDP should be indicted as a co-conspirator in this move.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: He made it all possible. This raid on the pockets of Canadians was made possible by the Leader of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: They cannot take it, Madam Speaker.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister has predicted that food prices this year will go up 10.1 per cent and next year 12 per cent. He predicted also that energy prices will go up 15.6 per cent this year and 21.9 per cent next year. Is it correct that the minister is going to have an advertising campaign to persuade the public that food and energy prices have not gone up 12 per cent and 21 per cent and that the government will be taxing or taking revenue away from them $40 billion less than they think is being done? Will there be an advertising campaign, and will it feature the goose flying around while being plucked?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not contemplate an advertising campaign to sell the budget; I think it will sell itself over the long term. But I would remind the hon. member, who is concerned about inflation, that the projections which he showed in his budget for next year and the following year with respect to inflation were higher than the projections which I have shown. The lower projection which I have shown is in good measure a result of not imposing the excise tax on gasoline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the minister claims that his projection for inflation next year is lower than mine; 10.2 per cent is his projection. The facts will show whether or not the minister is correct in his projections. By the way, we know that his goose is being cooked while it is being plucked.

If the budget which was presented last December, against which the minister voted together with his friends from the NDP, had been passed, there would have been a $575 million tax relief for projected home owners in Canada this year and a $1,200 million tax relief for them next year, together with another $500 million in relief to everybody, particularly those who are investing $21,000, through an energy tax credit. Does the minister propose to carry out the Prime Minister's campaign commitment and that of his party to assist home owners and lower income people in Canada through these means at some point during the year? Is he keeping these announcements as a surprise financial statement later this year?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has referred to projections because it is worth underlining the fact that these are projections. As he knows, some of his projections were proved to be false because of developing events, and some of mine may have the same fate. I do not think it has anything to do with the honesty of the projections; rather, it has to do with the uncertainty of projecting into the future.

I am surprised that the hon. member raises the spectre of that ill-fated mortgage plan which was brought before the House and which the government failed to pass, although it could have had it passed before its defeat last December. We told the Canadian people that we were against that, and we made it clear that we have no intention of introducing an inequitable plan of that kind.

TAX ON EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance whose debut on the Jack Webster show I watched with interest this morning. Since 30,000 British Columbians signed a petition opposing the imposition of a natural gas tax, and since they will be relieved to know that the minister so took their concerns to heart that he rewrote the budget, I should like to ask the minister the following question: When is the tax on the export of natural gas not a natural gas export tax when it is applied to the export of natural gas?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I noted the petitions which were laid on the table in the House, and I noted the questions which were directed against an export tax on natural gas, a tax exclusively on the exportation of that gas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: At least blush, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: That is the attack that was made, and I notice that hon. members are now attempting, rather belatedly, to shift their ground. I want to assure you, Madam Speaker, that we have levied a tax on natural gas produced and consumed in Canada and produced and consumed in the United States. It is a tax on all natural gas. Are hon. members suggesting that we should levy a tax on Canadian consumers and not levy it on American consumers? Is that their policy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the Minister of Finance. I am sure that the people in British Columbia who will be paying 50 per cent more for their natural gas heating next winter will be warmed by his response.

Since the minister states in his budget papers that he designed his national energy program to "be particularly helpful to B.C.", and since the minister's natural gas export tax will deprive British Columbia of revenues estimated at $30 million annually up to $130 million potentially, could the minister define what he means by "particularly helpful"?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Madam Speaker, I would be glad to define "particularly helpful". The first thing I would say is that in response to the concerns which were expressed in the House of Commons by spokesmen from western Canada the government decided not to proceed with an export tax on natural gas—

An hon. Member: If you repeat it often enough, it becomes the truth.

Mr. MacEachen: —which had become part of the national energy program and part of the budget plan. I want to be very frank and tell the House that that decision was changed; the budget statement was rewritten and the national energy program was rewritten to back away from that particular tax. We thought no one could take exception to a tax levied on all consumers which affects all consumers, whether in Canada or the United States. How could one take objection to that?

● (1440)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: May I add a further point. The hon. member asked what we have done to be helpful to British Columbia. If she looks at the price projections for natural gas proposed in the December 11 budget, she will notice that they are considerably higher than the price for natural gas we are proposing for next year.

Mr. Clark: What colour is black?

INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON PROPOSED DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. One of the documents which has been circulating recently is one dated July 3, 1980. It went out under the sponsorship of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the resigning wonder. On page 69 of that document the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that the option which he thinks would be most favourable for an industrial strategy for Canada—for central Canada, for Atlantic Canada, as well as for western Canada—would be an additional $1.75 billion in government investment over the next three years. It is very hard to perceive, through the smoke and mirrors which the minister threw up before us yesterday, exactly what is contained in the figures, but if I understood the minister correctly, it looks as if it is a figure of half $350 million, which is to say $175 million for industrial restructuring. How can he justify cutting down the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to only 10 per cent? Does he really want to leave the minister in that embarrassing position?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker. If the hon. member will look at the budget statement and the accompanying papers, he will notice that I have provided for a very substantial increase in expenditures for economic development, a 22 per cent increase. Within that very substantial increase there is room not only for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but for the Minister of State for Science and Technology to fund proposals relating to research and development. I believe that is the point the hon. member is making.

In addition to that very substantial increase in the economic development envelope, which seems not to have been noticed, there is an additional $350 million allocated for restructuring and adjustment in the economy. I believe that also is a substantial assistance to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in developing his plans.

Mr. Rae: We will only tell when the smoke and mirrors disappear, Madam Speaker, but I think the record will show that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce from now on should be known as "10 per cent Herb", because that is roughly what he will get.

My supplementary question is to the same minister. It concerns the so-called program of Canadianization in the energy field. The government has stated that in 1990 it wants to see Canadians owning 50 per cent of the oil and gas industry, as compared to current ownership of just under 30 per cent. How can the minister justify an over $12 billion or $13 billion dividend outflow between 1980 and 1990 alone and tens of billions subsequent to 1990? How can he claim that this measure goes any way toward solving the fundamental problem of our country, which he did not include in his budget because he did not care to deal with the problem, the fact that we remain industrial tenants in our own land and that we are still totally reliant for our place in the world on the export of our resources rather than on the development of our industrial base?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I think the budget and the accompanying national energy program underlines the priority we attach to increasing Canadian ownership in the oil and gas field. It is the most ambitious program of repatriation, in a sense, that has ever been presented to the Canadian Parliament. I am surprised the hon. member is not giving us some support for this very major step forward in the oil and gas field.

ENERGY

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROGRAMS TO BENEFIT QUEBEC

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to congratulate him for having applied the basic principles of federalism, for having applied the principle of sharing between the various parts of Canada. Madam Speaker, my question is related to the new national energy program announced last night. We understand there will be expenditures in the field of research, in the field of conservation and particularly in incentives to the energy industry. Can the minister tell the House what proportion of the program that will be announced will be earmarked for the province of Quebec?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to answer the question of the hon. member. In his budget speech last night, the Minister of Finance stressed what major expenditures the government plans for various parts of the country. He mentioned, in particular, the Atlantic region and western Canada, but the budget in no way overlooks central Canada, whether it be Quebec or Ontario.

To answer the question of the hon. member, I should like to point out that the new initiatives alone under the energy program of the Canadian government for the next three years will represent expenditures of some $1.8 billion in the sole province of Quebec. That, of course, does not include the possibility of building an oil upgrading plant in the refineries of east Montreal, which could represent outlays of over $1 billion, nor the construction of a regasifying plant at Gros Cacouna, if the Arctic project materializes and if the National Energy Board and Petro-Canada choose that site as being the best.

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am sure the minister is aware that substantial amounts of capital from the oil industry have been moving to the United States, as well as people and drilling equipment. Has the minister made an assessment of what further losses of this nature can be expected as a result of the budget proposals?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not had the latest report on the stock market, but by eleven o'clock this morning I was told Canadian stocks were holding very well and that some decrease had taken place in the value of the shares of multinationals, although those decreases appeared at that time to be rather small. I think it shows that the business community has indeed examined this budget and found that it was a fair and good budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I have no doubt in my mind that the proposals contained in the budget will reinforce the role, participation and activities of Canadian firms in the oil and gas industry. This is fundamental to our objective, and I am quite confident that the budget tabled last night will achieve that objective, together with our national energy program.

Mr. Thomson: Madam Speaker, I did not think I had asked the minister about the stock market performance today. I asked him if he had made an assessment of what we can expect by way of the loss of capital, people and equipment as a result of the budget proposals. If the minister is so convinced that this will be to the benefit of that element of the oil industry, will he undertake to have the Petroleum Monitoring Agency assess over the next coming months the loss of Canadian capital, Canadian expertise and Canadian oil well drilling companies, and what effect these losses will have in terms of attaining the government's stated goal of self-sufficiency?

● (1450)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House will not subscribe to the gloom and doom predictions of the hon. member or his colleagues on that side. As far as we are concerned, the energy program which has been put forward is one that is good for the industry, good for the producing provinces, good for the consumer and fair to all regions. I am confident that the people of Canada will judge it so.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

EXTENSION OF NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO MARITIMES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who is about to leave the House. I hope he will remain. It concerns the extension of the natural gas pipeline to the maritimes. The Prime Minister said in January, 1980, in Halifax that immediate action would be taken to ensure the construction of a natural gas pipeline if he were elected. The government stated in the Speech from the Throne that it favours the earliest possible construction of a natural gas pipeline. The Deputy Prime Minister said in Halifax that the government was committed to extending the pipeline. And the budget speech last night said that the pipeline extension was a national priority.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources knows that extension of the gas pipeline is subject to the approval of the National Energy Board.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please put his question right now.

Mr. Crosby: I will put my question, Madam Speaker. Is the Prime Minister and his government committed to commencing construction of the natural gas pipeline eastward, or is this matter subject to the approval of the National Energy Board? Who is running this country, the government or the National Energy Board?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance announced last night that in the budget the sum of $500 million had been set aside for the extension of the pipeline through Quebec and the maritimes and, if necessary, to help in the construction of a pipeline to Vancouver Island. This money has been committed by the government and by the Minister of Finance in his budget for this particular purpose, and he declared that the construction of the pipeline to the maritimes was a national priority.

I must advise the hon. member that I received information today from the National Energy Board to the effect that it had denied the application by the province of Nova Scotia for a review of the board's earlier decision. However, the National Energy Board has indicated that it is willing to deal expeditiously with a new application. In the view of the board, there would be fewer delays and fewer legal problems in dealing with a new application and less time would be wasted than if it were to hear an appeal.

As a government we are committed. We will see to it that the Energy Board follows the normal process in terms of making sure that the proper rules and regulations, for instance, with regard to the environment, are respected. But as a matter of national policy, that pipeline will be extended without delay, to be completed by 1983.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, the words of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are very interesting, but the minister knows that the application to extend the gas pipeline was before the NEB for months, and it turned that application down. Now he says—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will not do this twice to me. The questions must be brief.

Mr. Nielsen: And the answers.

Madam Speaker: I had to call the hon. member back to order on the first question. Would he please go straight away to his question.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I must respond in relation to the answer. I would ask the minister how he can assure this House that the National Energy Board will approve this gas pipeline extension? The minister has said it is a matter of national priority, but does the NEB agree with him?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, if necessary, a bill will be introduced in this House to achieve that purpose. However, we have no reason to believe that the National Energy Board will not respect and understand the national priorities set by this government with regard to this particular project, to which it attaches the highest importance.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When are you going to appoint a chairman for that board?

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY RESPECTING STEPS TO PROTECT CANADIANS FROM INFLATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The budget he introduced last night makes practically no effort to contain inflation, which is running rampant in this country and which is generally regarded as the number one problem currently faced by this country. The government has ignored the pleas of the governor of the Bank of Canada who called as a minimum for the maintenance of the level of the budget deficit, rather than a 40 per cent increase from the level which was predicted by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West.

What steps is the minister proposing to take to protect Canadians from the impact of high inflation which will clearly be caused by this budget? I ask my question with particular reference to the responses made by the minister relative to the low and middle-income earners and home owners, all of whom have been virtually neglected by this budget.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the total framework of the budget, including the support for the monetary policy of the governor of the Bank of Canada, including the fiscal plan which foresees a reduction in the deficit over time and a sharp reduction in our financial requirements and including an emphasis on productivity supported by a number of financial programs—all of these are intended to make a contribution to the lowering of the inflation rate.

However, as I said in the statement last night, it is a battle that will not be easily won. It depends a good deal on responses in the Canadian economy by firms and individuals with respect to their expectations in the area of inflation. I believe that the emphasis on the budget has been very much directed to dealing with the problem of inflation.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I think what is needed is some leadership from the government, if the private sector is going to take action and control its own desires respecting increasing inflation in this country. If one looks at the figures, it is hard to believe that there is any degree of control in them. Last January the Liberal party, while in opposition, was saying that it would control spending. Spending for this year will be up over 15 per cent on a budgetary basis.

In view of the lack of control shown by the government in its spending estimates, and in view of the fact that the projections which were put forward in the budget are exactly the same as were seen by us when we came into office last year, with no regard to the actions taken by the hon. member for York-Peel and the hon. member for St. John's West, will the minister review the spending projections in his budget statement against the projections of the hon. member for St. John's West to determine whether or not there is a basis upon which we can reduce the very high level of government spending and have a better degree of control than there is right now?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, what I know is that the former government established a 10 per cent expenditure limit without ever telling us how it would achieve that limit.

Mr. Wilson: It is there in black and white.

Mr. MacEachen: I would like hon. members to tell me how they would have maintained a 10 per cent spending level in fiscal year 1980-81.

Mr. Stevens: You voted us out; you should have left us in.

Mr. MacEachen: I would be delighted to have that particular revelation, which was not included in the budget statement, some time during this debate. I can tell the hon. member that there is very strict expenditure control in the expenditure plan. During the campaign we made the commitment that we would maintain our expenditures within the trend line of the GNP.

Mr. Crosbie: You did not. That is untrue.

Mr. MacEachen: That is what over the medium term we precisely intend to do.

Mr. Clark: That is not what you said, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: Given that expenditure line, we have succeeded in restraining expenditures generally to the point where we have been able to achieve very significant, major new initiatives.

Mr. Clark: This is a new line and a false line, Allan.

ENERGY

INQUIRY RESPECTING ROLE OF CANADIAN COMPANIES IN TAR SANDS DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The budget has left incentives like depletion allowance and others for multinational oil companies in the tar sands and the Canadian north, which as the minister knows is really the heart of Canada's energy future. Because of the magnitude of the tar sands, it is estimated that as a result over-all foreign ownership will actually increase from about 82 per cent to 87 per cent shortly. Would the minister tell the House why the budget did not give Petro-Canada and Canadians a more active role in developing the tar sands and the north?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, if my hon. colleague wishes to read carefully "The National Energy Program, 1980", he will find tables in that program in which there are specific figures, which I cannot cover during question period, clearly indicating that on all accounts Canadian companies will be having a very substantial advantage compared to foreign companies, whether they are going to invest in the tar sands or in frontier areas, whether in the north or offshore. Our proposals are to the effect that Canadian companies will benefit extremely well compared to other companies. They will be in a very advantageous situation. I expect that we can cover the specific figures during the debate on the budget.

Mr. Clark: You have a lot to be sorry for.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, a few minutes ago the Minister of Finance said that we should congratulate the government on this ambitious program of Canadianization. It is the most ambitious since the Liberal throne speech in 1974, and look what we got there—nothing. If we on this side of the House think it is a little phony, I hope the minister will forgive us.

Given the fact that Petro-Canada has tried to buy foreign multinational companies in the recent past and that no one wants to sell to them, is the minister in a position to tell this House whether he is prepared to force the sale of companies and, if so, how is he going to do it?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, first of all I should like to pick up the statement made by the hon. member at the beginning of his second question. Again, I should like to point out to him that there is a whole array of measures to encourage Canadianization of the industry, from direct grants to Canadian industry, which are going to be larger as the proportion of Canadian ownership increases, to a 25 per cent requirement of Canadian ownership that will go to the Government of Canada in terms of the development on Canadian lands in the north and on the offshore. We will require that any development in the north or offshore be at least 50 per cent Canadian-owned. These are only a few of the measures contained in the budget.

Mr. Broadbent: Now deal with the question.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the second aspect of the question raised by the hon. member is concerned—now that I have been interrupted by the Leader of the New Democratic Party I have lost the point of his second question.

An hon. Member: Petro-Canada.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as Petro-Canada is concerned, it has been successful in making two major acquisitions since 1976, as hon. members know. It is true that in the last year it has been more difficult—

Mr. Broadbent: Impossible.

Mr. Lalonde: —to acquire foreign-owned companies because they tend to believe that the future in Canada is so good that they would not consider selling at any price. I think the clear indication—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think that answer was a little long.

INQUIRY RESPECTING FUTURE PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. For the information of consumers, can he say in light of last night's budget what will be the price of a gallon of gas for the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 as compared with the price which would have resulted from the Progressive Conservative budget of last December?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): First of all, Madam Speaker, I would like to emphasize that in no case will there be an additional 18 cents tax as proposed in last year's Progressive Conservative budget. In other words, Canadian consumers now pay and will pay throughout 1980, 18 cents less a gallon than they would have paid under a Progressive Conservative administration, and that is a minimum.

As regards the coming years, we recall that the Progressive Conservatives intended to raise petroleum prices in 1983-84 to 75 per cent and 85 per cent of world prices. Once again petroleum prices for gas consumers in Canada will be very much lower than what was proposed in the Progressive Conservative budget of December 11 last.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARK—ADVERTISEMENT SPONSORED BY PUBLICATIONS CANADA—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On Friday, October 17, 1980, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) raised a question of privilege. As he said in his presentation, it is a little more specific than the one raised October 9 last by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition directs the Chair's attention to two extracts from the government publication entitled "The Canadian Constitution 1980" and submits that they are false within the meaning of that expression as used in my ruling of October 19 last.

Members will appreciate that the expression "false" is subject to but one interpretation in the House of Commons Debates, that is, pejorative, and it is considered unparliamentary when referring to another hon. member. While the word has less sinister meanings, in the context of contempt, it seems to me that to amount to contempt, representations or statements about our proceedings or of the participation of members should not only be erroneous or incorrect, but, rather, should be purposely untrue and improper and import a ring of deceit. To be false in the context of contempt, an interpretation of our proceedings must be an obviously, purposely distorted one. I am supported in this respect by the fact that the House interprets the expression "false" only in the pejorative sense where used in debate.

My role, therefore, is to interpret the extracts of the document in question not in terms of their substance, but to find whether, on their face, they represent such a distorted interpretation of the events or remarks in our proceedings that they obviously attract the characterization of false.

I cannot find that they attract that characterization and accordingly must find that there is no question of privilege.

Privilege—Mr. Beatty

MR. BEATTY—ENERGY ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) raised a question of privilege on Tuesday, October 21, 1980, in which he alleges that a document entitled "National Energy Policy—Communications", written by a public servant, sets out a major energy advertising policy by the government in order to, in the words of the hon. member, "seize control of the energy debate", and he further alleges "that the energy advertising campaign currently being run by the government was, in fact, designed to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money".

The hon. member appreciates that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has, however, pointed out that the thrust of that document was rejected by the government and therefore its contents, at least, do not reflect government policy. Be that as it may, if the campaign or the document referred to by the hon. member nevertheless included a design to interfere with our deliberations so as to constitute a violation of our privilege, that could constitute a prima facie case of privilege. The hon. member is reminded that on Friday, October 17 last, in my remarks recorded at page 3781, of Hansard, I also added that the interference in question "must be such that the member of the House is truly hindered or intimidated".

The principle governing whether a parliamentary privilege is violated is set out in the words of a committee of privileges of the House of Commons in the United Kingdom as follows:

> The nature and extent of any particular privilege claimed by Parliament has to be considered in relation to the circumstances of the time, the underlying test in all cases being, whether the right claimed as a privilege is one which is absolutely necessary for the due execution of the powers of Parliament—

Therefore, all interferences with members' privileges of freedom of speech, such as editorials and other public comment, are not breaches of privilege even though they influence the conduct of members in their parliamentary work. In the words of another committee of privileges of that House—and I quote:

> Not every action by an outside body which may influence the conduct of a member of Parliament as such could now be regarded as a breach of privilege, even if it were calculated and intended to bring pressure on the member to take or to refrain from taking a particular course.

And as another committee of privileges of that House observed in its report:

> —the House has always asserted that any attempt by improper means to influence a member in his parliamentary conduct is a breach of privilege—

● (1510)

What constitutes an improper means of interfering with members' parliamentary work is always a question depending on the facts of each case.

Hon. members will appreciate that there must, first of all, be some connection between the material alleged to contain the interference and the parliamentary proceeding. In this regard, there is little, if any, evidence before me relating either the documents or the advertising campaign to a parliamentary proceeding.

Finally, I am also conscious of the additional plea made last Friday by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) somewhat along the lines of the remarks he made during the course of the question of privilege he raised October 9 last. He expressed concern in these words:

—that we have a new dimension in this country which has a direct bearing and influence upon our proceedings in this House. That new dimension is the mass media and the access of the Government of Canada to that mass media—

He then went on to note:

—the access we have as Parliament to the mass media through the use of television cameras now in the House.

Of course, the House agreed to televise its proceedings. With respect to the use or misuse of the mass media because of access to it by government or, for that matter, by any person or group, when there is evidence of improper means of influence being brought to bear in respect of our proceedings, I can assure all hon. members that the dimension of contempt of Parliament is such that the House will not be constrained in finding a breach of privileges of members, or of the House.

This is precisely for the reason that, while our privileges are defined, contempt of the House has no limits. When new ways are found to interfere with our proceedings, so too will the House, in appropriate cases, be able to find that a contempt of the House has occurred.

THE CONSTITUTION

APPEARANCE OF MEMBER FOR PARKDALE-HIGH PARK BEFORE JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you are aware, the committee to study the constitutional proposals of the government was struck yesterday. Today I, as a member of that committee, and other members of that committee received a letter from the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) in which he requests the right to appear as a member of Parliament before that committee as a witness.

I think this is rather an inappropriate manner in which to proceed before the committee even sits. Many members on this side of the House have raised this question. They, too, wanted the right to appear before that committee in view of the fact that closure had prevented them from speaking in this House.

The point of order that I am raising is quite clear: suspicion has now been raised and we would like to know whether or not members of the government have received an assurance from the House leader that they can appear before that committee, while such an assurance has not been given to other members of this House. It is obviously a double standard and a matter which should be clarified very quickly by the government House leader.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as Liberals we respect the freedom of our members and I must say to the hon. member that the committee is master of its own procedure, that it is not parliamentary tradition for the House of Commons to get involved in organizing the work of the committee, and that in this House we cannot decide any procedural question concerning the committee, unless we get a report from committees. The issue raised by the hon. member therefore is not a point of order and it cannot be entertained in the House.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the government House leader has declined to deal with the point raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) namely, whether or not there has been an instruction given or a signal sent by the government to members on one side of the House only. He neglected to deal with that question which was the substance of the point of order raised by my colleague. We would all like to know whether one story is being told on the government side of the House that is not being told to the public or to other members of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I can assure the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) that no instruction was given to that effect. I am a little surprised that he even dared express doubts on that subject. I can assure him that we are not in the habit of granting more privileges to members of one party rather than to those of another. I for one have always advocated equality among all members in the House and perhaps that explains why we did not prevent our members from taking part in the first phase of the debate.

Madam Speaker: On that point of order I must remind the hon. member that, in my opinion, we all agree that committees are masters of their own procedure and that they have full leeway to call the witnesses they are interested to hear. Therefore I believe that if the hon. member sits on that committee he will be able to ask that question again and get the answer he hopes for from the committee members.

2. For the same years, what was the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse for the rest of the population in the province?

1. For the years (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79, what was the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse in the province of Prince Edward Island for status Indians?

2. For the same years, what was the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse for the rest of the population in the province?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Alcoholism (sic) and drug abuse are not notifiable diseases. No firm data exist from which to calculate a rate of incidence for whole populations, provinces or territories. A number of social indicators exist such as hospital admissions and hospital days for alcohol related illness, alcohol related deaths from accidents and violence, convictions for criminal offenses that are alcohol related, numbers of children taken into care for conditions that may be related to alcohol abuse etc. Many authorities talk of an incidence of alcohol addiction of 5 per cent in the general community and such estimates are often qualified and are regarded as conservative. Anecdotal accounts, observations by health personnel and other derivative opinion evidence suggests that the incidence of alcohol abuse is higher among Indian people than among non-Indians. One has to distinguish between alcohol addiction, which implies acquired tolerance and dependency, from simple alcohol abuse which implies inebriation and intoxication as availability and opportunity permit, but without true addiction.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Question No. 910—Mr. McKnight:

1. What are the names and addresses of the members of the Advisory Council of the Canadian Wheat Board and what is the term of his/her appointment?

2. What are the names of the places where they met to convene a meeting of the council and, in the case of each member, what was the (a) cost and itemization of his/her travel expenses (b) cost of his/her honorarium?

3. How many meetings have been held since the inception of the council?

4. Did any member travel outside or inside Canada on council or Canadian Wheat Board business and, if so, what is his/her name and what was the (a) purpose (b) cost of each trip?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The names and addresses of the members of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee are provided below. All eleven members were elected in the fall of 1978 to take office in January of 1979 for a four-year term.

Mr. R. R. Atkinson
Saskatoon, Saskatchewan

Mr. Lorne E. Parker
Ste. Agathe, Manitoba

Mr. Henry A. Dechant
Fairview, Alberta

Mr. Orville M. Reber
Burdett, Alberta

Mr. Kenneth D. Galloway
Fort Saskatchewan, Alberta

Mr. Avery K. Sahl
Mossbank, Saskatchewan

Mr. Michael G. W. Halyk
Melville, Saskatchewan

Mr. Ted Strain
North Battleford, Saskatchewan

Mr. Clarence A. Hookenson
Kisbey, Saskatchewan

Mr. E. K. Turner
Regina, Saskatchewan

Mr. Donn Mitchell
Douglas, Manitoba

2. Fifteen of the 17 meetings held by the current advisory committee since January, 1979, to May 27, 1980, were held in the Wheat Board offices in Winnipeg. One meeting of the advisory committee was held in Prince Rupert and a joint meeting of the advisory committees of the Wheat Board and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board was held in Montreal, at which four members of the Wheat Board's Advisory Committee were present.

(a) and (b) For each member, up to and including the May 27th meeting, costs have been incurred as follows:

	Expenses	Per diem allowance (committee meetings)
R. R. Atkinson	$4,701.54	$1,600
H. A. Dechant	6,497.48	1,400
K. D. Galloway	5,137.95	1,700
M. G. W. Halyk	5,830.76	1,600
C. A. Hookenson	4,350.11	1,600
Donn Mitchell	1,902.10	1,500
L. E. Parker	828.87	1,500
O. M. Reber	7,270.75	1,600
A. K. Sahl	3,902.30	1,400
Ted Strain	5,007.52	1,600
E. K. Turner	2,481.35	1,200
	$47,910.73	$16,700

In addition to the above, within guidelines established by the advisory committee in November, 1976, and in accordance with Order-in-Council P.C. 1977-101 of January 20, 1977, members of the advisory committee are provided with an allowance of up to $1,800 per crop year to cover expenses in their districts attributable to their position on the advisory committee. These expenses include, but are not limited to, expenses incurred in attending meetings within a member's district on behalf of the advisory committee. During the 17-month period from January, 1979, to May 30, 1980, the expenses claimed under this provision by all members of the advisory committee amounted to a total of $11,893.86.

3. Sixteen formal meetings of the current advisory committee, and one joint meeting of the advisory committee (represented by four of its members) with the Canadian Livestock Feed Board Advisory Committee were held during the period January 1, 1979, to May 27, 1980.

4. (a) and (b) No member of the advisory committee has travelled outside Canada on committee or Wheat Board business. In addition to the travel to and from Winnipeg to attend the regular committee meetings, four members of the committee represented it at the April, 1979, joint meeting at Montreal as indicated in part (2) above. These four members, with their individual expenses, are listed below:

R. R. Atkinson $346.50	D. Mitchell $254.00
K.D. Galloway $418.88	T. Strain $438.00

These expenses and the costs of the advisory committee's meeting in Prince Rupert in June, 1979, are included in totals listed in part (2) above.

DR. FRED KUMMEROW—LARGE DOSES OF VITAMIN D—VASCULAR DISEASES

Question No. 1,337—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware of the opinions held by certain American authorities on vitamins, including Dr. Fred Kummerow, professor of food chemistry at the University of Illinois, to the effect that vitamin D in more than average doses is more dangerous in vascular diseases then cholesterol and, if so (a) has the department investigated this opinion and, if so, what was the result (b) is the department aware of any investigations in Canada or elsewhere that would substantiate such an opinion and, if so, what are all the details?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): The department is aware that Dr. Fred Kummerow and others have speculated that long-term high intakes of vitamin D may increase the risk of cardiovascular disease. It has been known for many years that very large doses of vitamin D can be harmful and can produce arteriosclerosis in experimental animals when fed over a long period of time. In recent experiments, Doctor Kummerow confirmed that huge doses of vitamin D can cause degeneration of artery tissue in young pigs. These observations plus the high levels of vitamin D in animal tissues and the widespread fortification of foods with vitamin D in the United States have led him to suggest that the levels of vitamin D in the American food supply may be a risk factor in cardiovascular disease.

(a) and (b) The department is carrying out analyses of the vitamin D content of Canadian foods, but as far as is known no studies have been carried out in Canada to investigate specifically a possible relationship between dietary vitamin D and vascular disease. Worldwide, data are few. In a small population sample in Norway, it was observed that men and women with heart disease had consumed somewhat larger amounts of vitamin D than those who did not have the disease. However, there were other differences between the two groups. Infants and children require vitamin D for normal bone growth and past experience indicates that there is insufficient naturally occurring vitamin D in the Canadian food supply to protect Canadian children against the vitamin D deficiency disease, rickets. An appropriate quantity of vitamin D is, therefore, added to all milks, infant formulas and margarine in Canada, but essentially to no other foods. Vitamin D levels of fortified foods are continually checked by the department to ensure they are neither too high nor too low. It should be noted that this department has one of the best vitamin D-monitoring programs in the world. In view of the need for vitamin D in the diet, the current levels in the Canadian food supply are not considered harmful to health.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 28, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, in starting the main part of my remarks today—and I may have to go on for a day or two to cover the inadequacies of this budget—I want to remind the House of a statement that was made by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) last year. On October 12, 1979, the Minister of Justice who at that time was the Minister of Finance said:

There is only one thing that matters: to be honest with the public. That is all I ask the government.

Certainly one would not think a Liberal had said that, but it was said by the Minister of Justice when he was in the opposition. He asked only one thing of the government—that we be honest with the public. We were honest with the public and now they are over there and we are over here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Nevertheless, I recommend that advice to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). That is one of the things which is most deplorable about his budget document. He is not, and has not been, honest with the public. It is a tricky document and a deceiving document. It is a deceptive document and that is deplorable. I recommend that he get together with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and have that minister give him the little homily again about being honest with the public, and that he pay some attention to him. In starting, I would like to refer to another quotation. I am reminded of it every time I think of the election results last February. The actress Lily Tomlin said this:

The trouble with the rat race is that even if you win, you are still a rat.

I would ask hon. gentlemen and ladies opposite to remember that. They may have won the rat race, but try to think about what they may or may not still be.

In beginning this afternoon, I want to lay a canard flat dead on the floor, a dead duck, a dead canard, a dead goose, a plucked goose, a cooked goose, and it is this: what was the Prime Minister's commitment in connection with government expenditure growth? I have a transcript of his actual words which came from that very royal figure on January 12, 1980, when he spoke in Toronto to his "campaign college". There could not be a more lofty place for a Liberal to speak than to his own "campaign college". I have the transcript and this is what he said. He made a fivefold pledge. He said there was a five-plank Liberal theme in the election: "Liberals will do what we say we will do and if we cannot do it, we will not say it." That is what he said, he said. He said, he did it. Here is what he said at page 4. This was one of his themes. I quote exactly:

Our commitment is this. We will hold the line on government expenditure growth to under the rate of GNP.

Not to under the theme-line of GNP, not to under the stockings of GNP, not to under anything but this, to under the rate of GNP. And the minister said the GNP this year is declining one per cent. That means, if the Prime Minister's statement was to be carried out, his solemn commitment was that there would not be an increase in government expenditure growth this year beyond—I do not know what the figure would be. It would be less than the inflation rate. The inflation rate at the moment is running around 9.8 or 10 per cent averaged over the year. In actual fact there is in the minister's own papers on budgetary expenditure a 15.2 per cent increase.

The Prime Minister has broken his solemn commitment, the five themes. The Minister of Finance stated in this House two weeks ago he was going to fulfil all promises and pledges the Prime Minister made during the election campaign. I quote now from the Ottawa Citizen, that bible of Liberalism here in Ottawa:

Finance Minister Allan MacEachen said Friday his budget this month will fulfil all the Liberal campaign promises.

This is one he has not fulfilled. For the minister to get up in question period today and try to draw subterfuge and deception over the breaking of that solemn commitment is below him. It is not the trend line. It is not any kind of line at all. It is under the rate of GNP, and the Liberal line, and the advertising line won't work. It is here in black and white.

The Toronto Sun on the day after that solemn occasion had an editorial about the great Liberal economic platform. They printed it in their editorial. The Toronto Sun headed its editorial "A Pile of Poop". I will quote from the Toronto Sun, an eminent Canadian newspaper. The Toronto Sun has been borne out because these positive commitments are not being made.

I mentioned some of the rest last night. I am not going to mention them again. I do not want to be repetitious. However, this is one point I have had to be repetitous about because the Minister of Finance is trying to trick and deceive the people of Canada into thinking there was not that solemn commitment. His Prime Minister made that commitment and he and the President of the Treasury Board, Open Sesame Johnston, are making an open raid on Treasury Board.

In the question period, he talked about how could we have kept to our expenditure limit of 10 per cent. How would we have kept to it? Because we had in the Treasury Board a man who was dedicated to keeping to no more than a 10 per cent increase in expenditures. In fact, he felt that was way too high. He thought it was crazy. He thought it was profligate. He thought the finance department was all wet that we could not hold it down to 5 per cent. I can assure you that Horatio Slasher, my seat companion, would have kept it to 10 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Let us hear no more of this attempt by the Minister of Finance. We know he is astute. The press tells us he is astute. The press tells us he is crafty and strategic, in tactical terms and in strategic terms. What else do they tell us? He is cagey. He is the master of strategy. He put us out of power and he put himself into power, and the ends justify the means. He is a tremendous exponent of that.

The minister will do anything to keep Liberals in power, but at least keep them in power by being a bit truthful, for a change. That is a commitment the Prime Minister made and which has been broken in this budget.

What else is wrong with this budget? It would be easier and shorter to ask what is right with it. I had to refer to our budget of last December because the government is going to refer to it. We heard them refer to it in the question period today. The little tame tabby was brought up from the Liberal ranks to ask a little tame question of the big tiger, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, about what would have happened with oil and gas prices had that horrible Crosbie budget come in as compared to what it is going to be with our present wondrous budget? We heard the foolish answer from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). That minister is not even including in his computation the new tax, the "help PetroCan buy out any foreign company in the nation" tax. He did not even include that in his calculation. It could be $4 a barrel a year. What is that going to do to oil and gas prices in Canada if it is implemented? Never mind these little tame tabbies asking the big pussycat their questions. Let them lick their chops with these false answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Here is what the then finance critic of the government said last December, that gentleman who is certainly resigned to his lot. He is not resigning from it, he is resigned to it. Here is what he said about the budget of last year and I quote from December 12 Hansard at page 2299:

What we should have had... last night was a budget that would reduce inflation, strengthen the economy and create more jobs for Canadians, now, next year, and in the years to come. Instead, this budget brings Canadians a higher cost of living, including higher food prices, more unemployment and no economic growth—

If I had not told hon. members the author of that statement, they would have thought I was speaking about the present budget, I am sure. There is not a redeeming feature in it, because it does not even offer the people of Canada any assistance with the higher costs they face as a result of the budget, costs which have been forecast by the minister. The Canadian people are faced with a budget that does not reduce inflation. It does not strengthen the economy. It does not create more jobs. It brings them a higher cost of living, higher food prices, more unemployment and no economic growth. That is what it brings them. It does not bring them one redeeming feature, nothing to help them meet these additional burdens.

What else is wrong with it? It is an extremely regressive budget. The minister said that my budget was socially regressive. His is socially desperate. In our budget we had certain aims we wanted to accomplish for the good of Canada and all Canadians. What were they? It was summarized in the budget. We said the Canadian economy had great potential. Second, that its economic performance could be improved if we improved economic incentives for private individuals and firms.

Where is that kind of treatment in the budget before us? The private sector is ignored in this budget. The private sector will be the subject of intervention. This is an interventionist budget on a massive scale. The government is drawing to itself here in Ottawa tremendous power from the rest of this country. Now they are going to take power from the private sector. The oil and gas sector is no longer to be called private. If it is private, its privacy has been vastly interfered with. Intervention!

We are told about the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and FIRA and all the muscle he is going to put into FIRA so that any foreign investor in this country will find Mr. Herbie Gray looking down his neck at what he is doing and telling him whether he is doing things right or wrong. Foreign investors are told not just whether they should come into the country, but, after they are here, how they should run their business. This is the same group who have placed Canada in the position where the minister himself says we are going to have a deficit on the current account of the balance of payments of this year in excess of $6 billion. We are supplicants to the rest of the world as a result of the policy, and the lack of policy, of the government opposite over the years since 1968—year after year of deficits on the current account of the balance of payments ending up this year with a deficit in excess of $6 billion. How do we get the deficit back? We ask foreigners to lend us money and to invest money in Canada. That is how we get that deficit back. And if the foreigners will not lend us money and will not invest in Canada we are down the tube because we cannot get the $6 billion. Yet here they are pounding their chests and pretending they are the exponents of Canadian nationalism. They are the exponents of Canadian humiliation, not nationalism.

Then they get on with their ersatz of Canadian nationalism, beating their chests with what they are going to do to the oil and gas industry, how they are going to Canadianize what they permitted to be unCanadianized over these last 20 or 30 years. They are putting on this show for the Canadian people—it will be more show than it will be anything else, but I will come to that later.

Our third point was that we wanted to face realistically the problems of energy costs, shortages and the huge and swelling deficits. We attempted to do that. The minister here does not do that. He says he is going to be bringing the deficit down over the next three or four years, and some people in the press actually swallow it. But before he starts to bring his deficit down he allows it to burgeon up this year, $3,600 million more than was contemplated by us, or would have been permitted by us. And then he starts to bring it down, but every year for the next four years his deficit is $3 billion to $4 billion higher than the deficit would have been had we remained in office. So all this talk that he is controlling the deficit is just that. It is not fact. Then he fictionalizes his estimates to take out items, and I will come to that later. I am sure there is a lot more. He removes $1.2 billion this year for the petroleum import costs, which should be in the estimates, and $500 million for the post office and so on, as I mentioned last night. That is not facing realistically the problems. That is being old Mandrake the magician, trying to hypnotize the public so they do not know what the problems are.

Our fourth point was we must focus on medium and longer-term potential and opportunities rather than short-run tuning and political subterfuges. Well, a lot of people think that we are dumb dodos because we did not go in for the political subterfuges, because in Canada all that seems to be admired is success. If you can worm your way into power no matter how scurvy the tricks you use, that is the thing. Very admirable! But what your aims and objectives are, whether what you are trying to do is good or bad for this country does not seem to matter a darn. It is the means, the means are everything and the ends do not count. Well, that is not our approach. Perhaps we are dumdums and dodos but I would sooner be a dumdum and a dodo than a sleazy trickster.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Let us look, then, at the minister's budget. What does the minister say he is attempting to do in his budget? Let us examine some of his protestations of policy, I believe they are on page 3 under the heading "The Economic Strategy of the Government". This is what it says:

Its elements in brief are as follow:

> The maintenance of government expenditures within the rate of growth in the economy to ensure that the federal government does not take up an ever-growing proportion of the flow of income;

That is not done. That is not done, the rate of growth in the economy. The minister gets up, he is asked a question, and he talks about the trend line and the rate of growth and all that malarkey. Who is he fooling? Okay, that is one principle discarded before we even start. What next? Here is what it says:

> over the period to fiscal 1983-84, a steady reduction in the government deficit and financial requirements;

Poppycock! Poppycock! It is up $3,600 million before the hon. minister even starts. I will venture anything, that there will be no reduction in the government deficit when you add in what should be there as expenditures to keep it in line with past years, there will be no reduction in expenditures or financial requirements. I read again from the budget:

> the avoidance, in so far as possible, of personal and corporate tax increases;

Well, the Canadian public can thank us for that. We saved them $1.6 billion because the minister did not go forward. No wonder it was said today he changed his budget papers. He sure did. He whipped out that indexing measure after the storm we aroused to stop him trying to gouge the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: But look at his threat. I want all Canadian taxpayers to notice this threat on page 6 where he said this:

> —I may be faced with no alternative but to impose some limit on the indexing factor.

Why does he say that? Because he wants to achieve lower rates of inflation. He pretends it is the Canadian people's fault that there are these rates of inflation and he does not want them to think they are going to get away with indexing forever if they continue in their inflationary ways, these bad Canadian people, these bad Canadian taxpayers. If they are naughty, their government is not going to index them any longer, it is going to de-index them. That is his threat to the Canadian people. Well, we will see about that.

Now he says he has resolved to support the Bank of Canada in its pursuit of monetary policies that will not accommodate inflation. What a joke! The Governor of the Bank of Canada has stated time and time again, in as harsh a manner as he can when he is speaking in public—and he cannot be too harsh or too critical of the government—what he feels needs to be done. He sent out a piteous plea. He said that monetary policy, interest rate policy and controlling the rate of growth of money supply are not enough. He said, "The government must help us with its fiscal policies if we are to overcome inflation." That is what he has said. I quoted the governor last night. I will give another quotation now from what he said before the Senate National Finance Committee on May 29, 1980. He said:

Good monetary policy, although absolutely necessary, needs to be accompanied by many other adjustments if we are to achieve our economic objectives—

That is what he said, and I could go on. I gave the House some quotations last night about the deficit. He said:

—let's keep it from increasing, if we can, as a minimum.

What we need is lower government deficits and a reduction in the total size of the government of this country would be helpful. Is that what governor Bouey is getting in this budget? He is not getting that. Since he made that statement he is getting a budget that has increased by $3,600 million in its deficit and financial requirements. He is not getting one iota of help from this government in his battle against inflation. That is why inflation rates next year are going to be far worse than the minister outlines in his economic assumptions, which are worded in very, very general terms. So they are doing nothing. The minister has forgotten that principle. Here is the economic strategy we are talking about. All of these principles have been broken already. Then in the budget he says:

within the commitment to expenditure restraint, the need nonetheless to provide for major new expenditures in energy, economic development, industrial adjustment and manpower retraining;

Those are all just words. We know there are new expenditures in energy. We will have to wait and see where the rest is coming from and whence it comes if the government is going to keep reducing its deficit. The minister says that in his strategy one of the principles is:

the need, also, to expand our assistance to the developing world;

His next principle is this:

a resolve to sustain social and economic assistance to those people and those communities most in need;

That is completely violated in this budget. Mr. Speaker, this is supposed to be a Liberal government. This is supposed to be a government of the heart. But all they think of is the ordinary person, if we listen to them when they are out on the campaign trail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They are giving us this garbage that oil and gas prices are not going up as much in the next three or four years as they would have gone up under us. I do not care if that is the case. Suppose this year they have only gone up $3.80 instead of $4 a barrel. Do you think that the poor people of this country need assistance less because of the 20-cent difference in the price of a barrel of oil? Supposing over the next four years the government's permitted increases were slightly less than ours, or 20 per cent less, or 30 per cent less. Do you think that the lower-income people of this country do not need assistance in any event to meet these and other costs? Of course they do. This minister has forecast that energy costs next year are going up 27 per cent. The flinty-hearted Celtic demagogue has forgotten to do anything to help his people in Cape Breton in connection with that 27 per cent increase.

● (1540)

Food prices are going up 12 per cent next year, according to his economic assumption document. Let us forget energy. Do the ordinary people of this country not need some assistance? Last year the government voted against the assistance we offered. If our budget was now in place, they would be getting assistance this year and next. Lower income Canadians would be getting $500 million in assistance next year and $1 billion after that to assist them. Under our property tax and mortgage interest credit policy they would be receiving this very year $575 million in assistance to meet their housing costs and next year $1.2 billion. And with all of that we kept the deficit down $3.6 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Here is another example of honesty and straightforwardness by this government. We heard the minister of snake oil and energy just half an hour ago answer a question, and instead of answering the question he went on about oil stocks. "Oh," he said, "the oil stocks are holding up very well". I do not have his exact words, but all is well. The chickens in the chicken house do not mind that foxy Lalonde is in there baring his teeth at them. "The prices held up very well in the market today", he said. But here is a note I am handed from the Toronto exchange: "Oil stock index is down 300 points and going down further. The ticker tape is unable to keep up".

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crosbie: How long, oh Lord, how long? There is no social and economic assistance to the people who are going to need it under this program, none. So much for that.

Then we see this, the last principle, "a resolve to see the competitive forces in our economy strengthened and the weight of government regulation reduced". They actually have members on the opposite side, the hon. member for Toronto Willowdale or daily willows or something. What is it?

An hon. Member: Pussy willows.

An hon. Member: Willowdale.

Mr. Crosbie: Willowdale. He is chairing a committee on government regulations. Well, it is this very government which brought in the thousands of pages of regulations, and it is this very government, through its energy policy, that is imposing hundreds of pages of more regulations. And it is this very government that is going to see that the competitive forces in the economy are not strengthened but taken over by the government. So much for competition. The private sector is of no interest or concern to the hon. gentleman opposite. There is not a policy in this document to help the private sector, there is nothing to encourage the Canadian people to invest in equity in their own country, there is nothing to encourage them to buy shares of Canadian companies. There is a suggestion that there is a painless way for us to take over the oil and gas industry and to "Canadianize" it. They are wonderful Canadianizers, the little coterie in Toronto and Windsor or wherever that coterie is. They think it is so easy. There is a painless way to Canadianize the oil and gas industry, they suggest. The minister says it does not even need to appear in his budget. He is going to impose this new tax—I have forgotten what the name of it is. I will have to look it up in one of my many notes. I have so many notes that I have notes coming out of my notes. Canadian ownership. It is not even called a tax. This is a beauty, this one. It is called a Canadian ownership fund.

An hon. Member: Account.

Mr. Crosbie: Canadian ownership account. There is a mysterious Canadian ownership account, and out of thin air it will conjure up billions for Petro-Canada, Sir Galahad PetroCan, to run to the rescue of Canada and take over this huge multinational and take over that huge multinational, and the money will come out of a Canadian—what is called?

An hon. Member: Ownership account.

Mr. Crosbie: Ownership account, a mysterious account up there in the sky.

Mr. Beatty: A Swiss bank account.

Mr. Crosbie: Perhaps it is a Swiss Bank account. That is where the money is coming from, until we look closer and see that this little account is going to be a tax on the Canadian consumers of oil and gas. If Petro-Canada spends $5 billion buying a multinational oil company, then there will be a tax on those who use heating fuels.

The little old lady who calls the fuel company to come and supply some oil for her stove or furnace down in Newfoundland will pay so that Petro-Canada can take over Petrofina or take over this or take over that. That is what is going to happen. And the government hopes the people of Canada will not notice what is causing this increase. Do you know what they are going to say? They are going to say, "The bad old oil and gas companies are gouging you again. They have just put their prices up again, and we are fighting against them, and we are against their putting up their prices". That is what they are going to tell the public, when all the time the prices will be going up because Petro-Canada has gone on a big buying spree to buy up these wicked up old multinationals. That is what the government will attempt to do. The increase per gallon is going to be tremendous.

Mr. Jarvis: Fifteen cents a gallon.

Mr. Crosbie: Every one of those principles of the minister's in his budget has been violated. There they are, the virgin principles violated before we have even had a chance to read them. Rapine ran amuck in the cabinet room before we even got to see those principles, and every one of them is being violated.

I have a suggested note here. There was a statement last year when our budget was brought down: "Short-term pain for long-term gain". Well, there was not much pain in it really, but in an election campaign you do not get a chance to explain a complicated budget. So the short-term pain for the long-term gain did not work out too well, but we have another budget here now and these words have been suggested to me: The Liberal's gain is Canada's pain; short-term gain and long-term pain. That is what this budget is. It might be short-term gain in the short-term for the government politically. It might be what some of the observers have called it, very shrewd and very subtle. The minister has done it again. The Canadian people do not know they have been given the dart. The dart has gone in painlessly. The minister is an expert at the shell game. Which shell is that pea under? The public does not know, but the public will know. The public might not know in the short-term, but in the next two, three or four years the public will know whose dart it was and how painful that dart will become. So the long-term pain will become obvious to the Canadian people before they are finished.

I was going to offer the minister my mukluks to bring down his budget. I thought perhaps he would have the same luck as I did if he wore them. But he should have come into this House without any shoes on at all and wear a sack cloth and ashes even to put this before the House as a budget because it is a budget without any guts. It is a budget without any gumption. It is not a budget at all. It is an energy policy with some other stuff attached to it that does nothing to help the Canadian economy or to help Canadians at all.

I am just going to mention the budget I brought down last December once more because I am interested in this budget and the future.

An hon. Member: Stick around, Allan.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister has been very patient. It is hard to listen to all your faults and errors. I do not blame him for leaving.

Mr. MacEachen: I will be back.

Mr. Crosbie: I just wanted to make this reference. I want all hon. gentlemen to read the next copy of Canadian Taxation, a journal of tax policy which will be coming out within the next two weeks. It is a publication of the National Council of Welfare and of Osgoode Hall Law School. The National Council of Welfare is not known to be a firm friend of the PC Party, although as they see us and what we are truly trying to do, they are going to become much friendlier. Osgoode Hall Law School: of course, we all know that. There is an article in the coming issue, a study done by an eminent economist, Volume II, No. 2 of Canadian Taxation. I want members of the NDP to study that article because what does the article conclude after examining my budget and all the budgets of the 1970s? It says this:

The defeated Conservative budget was more progressive than any budget introduced by Liberal governments over the past ten years.

That is for openers.

Ironically, Crosbie's budget was, as will become evident, by far the most progressive of three budgets under consideration—

Those include the budgets of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). It says:

The Crosbie budget was highly redistributive. Whereas the benefit rate for the lowest income group was plus 3.3 per cent, the benefit rate declined steadily to minus 5.0 per cent in the middle income group where it reached a plateau.

● (1550)

In other words, the Crosbie budget was far better for lower income Canadians than it was for middle and higher income Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Listen to this from an earlier study by Mr. Gillespie:

—the empirical evidence demonstrates that the federal government has not improved the net economic position of the poor relative to the highest income families during the 1970s.

A few sentences later it reads:

The evidence suggests, however, that the PC budget brought down in December of 1979 would have been strongly progressive.

In other words, the Liberal budgets in the 1970s were regressive and did nothing to improve the net economic position of the poor, relative to higher income families. Our budget, which was defeated by the NDP and by the gentlemen opposite, was progressive and, in effect, started to redress the bias of the Liberal party in favour of middle and higher income Canadians. The NDP needs to start some instant analysis and to learn what is good and what is bad.

An hon. Member: We do not need a lecture from you.

Mr. Crosbie: You need a lecture, my friend, because you put us out and now you have this budget to contend with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: By the way, Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in lecturing the NDP. What is the point of wasting words on the NDP? They will not learn. They will neither see nor learn nor listen. They just go on in the same foolish way, and now they are part of the Liberal caucus. They are the little red rump of the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: This is probably too complicated for the NDP to understand. I do not know whether they would even read the article.

Let me go on with the article. It reads:

The December 1979 budget brought down by John Crosbie was a complete contrast.

To those Liberal budgets.

It was a highly deflationary budget increasing average family taxes by $418. Although the impact would have been greatest on upper income earners, the effects reached back through the middle classes and would have meant a substantial reduction in the disposable incomes of the upwardly mobile urban middle class constituency in southern Ontario . . . . Surprisingly, even without the benefit of the refundable energy tax credit, the poorest class would have gained in absolute terms from the Crosbie budget.

Inspection of Panel B reveals that the Crosbie budget was highly redistributive.

I could go on and on. Further on it reads:

Second, the empirical results suggest that Crosbie's 1979 budget would have had a surprisingly progressive impact on incomes . . . it would have produced an important shift of the tax burden from poor and lower middle-income earners to the middle and highest income earners.

This is the budget that the NDP defeated, they who parade in the House as supporters of the poor and lower middle-income earners. Here was a budget that was going to produce an important shift in the tax burden from the poor and lower income earners to the middle and highest income earners, which they stood up to defeat. Every one of them voted with the Liberal opposition to defeat that budget. That shows how smart and astute they are. So much for the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Let us come to the points on energy in this budget. I will not deal with them in detail because our energy critic and other experts will deal with them later. But let us just look at this issue as it stands today. We did nothing to tax heating oil in Canada. Our tax was an excise tax on gasoline. We tried to induce conservation, particularly with reference to transportation. There was no excise tax on heating oil or natural gas, which is used very heavily in western Canada, British Columbia and western Ontario. There was no attempt to tax heating oil, and the effect on heating oil from the increase in the price of oil which we were allowing would certainly have been met by the energy tax credit.

But in this budget there is tax increase after tax increase on heating oil. There is the petroleum compensation charge, which amounts to 80 cents this year and will be $2.50 a barrel next year. That will be a tax on every product that comes out of a barrel of oil. It includes transportation fuels, diesel oil for the farmers, heating oil, and all petrochemical products, such as fertilizer and so on. That is what that petroleum compensation charge will be. It will be 80 cents a barrel until the end of December this year, or for two months, but in January it will go up to $2.50. It will mean more inflation, but it hits heating oil in particular. It is far more regressive than the excise tax we proposed.

Then we have a new natural gas tax amounting to 30 cents a 1,000 cubic feet, and it will go up in 15 cent increments. It will cost $1,300 million in 1981-82. I do not have the figures at the moment to show how much of that might be from export sales, but by far the largest proportion of that $1,300 million will come from consumers from Ontario to British Columbia. It is they who will pay that amount, no matter what they use that oil for, heating purposes or whatever. So that is another tax on heating fuels.

We do not know what this Canadian ownership charge will be, but it will be imposed on all oil and gas consumption in Canada, and that includes heating oil and everything else. There is no attempt in the budget to help lower and middle-income people meet these increased costs. I have given you the figures for what the relief would have been under our budget. I mentioned the figure of $500 million from the energy tax credit in 1981-82 and another $1.2 billion for home owners. I referred to relief amounting to $1,745 million which the ordinary people of this country would have had next year were we still in power, not to mention that the Minister of Finance has copied me—and I am glad that he did—in such progressive moves as permitting Canadians to deduct the salaries of their spouses who are in their own incorporated businesses. This year it will cost $75 million, and next year it will cost $160 million. That was a great advance for the PC party and it has nothing to do with the Liberal party. It is just that they followed blindly in April, when they came to office, with the small business development bond.

There is nothing in this budget for small business. The small business development bond was hung up for six months by this government because it could not get the regulations out—it was too busy trying to restrict the bond. The bond was unrestricted in our budget. If a small business borrowed money, it could have interest relief from the small business development bond under our budget. But when it was brought down again in April by the minister, he had it restricted, so now it is only allowed on new capital expenditures and it is hard to get it approved. Even that truncated small business development bond will now be extended for three months only. That is some assistance for small business! It comes from the party which used to pretend it was for small business. They are not for business, small, medium or large, unless they stick their own grubby hands in that business, and then they are for the business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: For any energy policy to be a success in Canada, it has to do two things. First, it has to enhance our national security by getting us to a state of oil self-sufficiency as quickly as possible—a day gained is tremendous for Canada, a month gained is terrific; a year gained is even more terrific. But we have lost a year since last December in getting to oil self-sufficiency. Will it enhance our national security, or are Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to be left at the mercy of the Middle East and the trouble that may erupt there at any time? That is one way by which it can be judged. Second, does it preserve the unity of this country? That is an important principle. I could concoct an energy policy of absolute magnificence if this were a unitary state, and I could impose it on Canadians. But when you are concocting an energy policy which has to suit a diverse nation such as Canada, with the various regional interests contained within it, it is not so easy. If you concoct a policy and impose it on the provinces, whether they like it or not, if you take some province and strike at its heart and its life blood, get it up against a wall and put a knife right at its stomach, then you are doing nothing for national unity in this country but endangering it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Crosbie: Where is agriculture in this budget? Where is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan)? We saw him flapping his jowls several nights ago. He told us how, when he travelled outside Canada, he came across people in China and around the world who were very worried because Canada did not have its constitution at home. They were afraid that Canada's constitution was endangered over in Westminster, that they were not looking after it properly. He led us to believe that people around the world were gnawing their fingernails to the bone because of this constitutional situation. Where was he when the Minister of Finance concocted this budget?

An hon. Member: In China.

Mr. Crosbie: I want to be corrected by our agricultural experts if I make a mistake. I am not afraid to admit mistakes, I was once a Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I do not know of any assistance to the agricultural industry. Last year when our budget came down, hon. gentlemen opposite made more noise than a whole barnyard of roosters with only one hen there, because we were not doing enough for agriculture. Well, we gave agriculture a break, with reference to our excise tax. They were to pay a much lower price in agriculture than in other spheres of activity.

An hon. Member: Capital gains.

Mr. Crosbie: Capital gains for farmers. We gave farmers relief in connection with capital gains. Where is it now? We were attacked by members opposite who said we were not doing enough for farmers in connection with capital gains. What is in the budget about capital gains? The Minister of Finance tells us he has had a study done about capital gains and, lo and behold, everything is well with capital gains; nothing should be done to interfere with the capital gains tax, it is a wonderful tax, we are getting wonderful revenues, shaft the farmers as far as capital gains tax or anything else is concerned; we are in power for four years and when four years is over, we will send the Minister of Agriculture around to flapdoodle at the farmers and try to talk them into supporting us again. In this budget he has done nothing to help farmers meet their energy costs, or their other increasing costs.

We saw the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Robespierre, the hon. Robespierre, get up. It is too bad he did not have his head under his arm; it was still on top of his shoulders. Do you know, that minister has adopted our 85 per cent ceiling. We were only going to allow oil price increases, if they ever got that high, to go within 85 per cent of the world or the U.S. level, whichever was the lower. Lo and behold, in these energy documents the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be Horatio at the bridge. He will only allow them to go to 85 per cent of the U.S. or world level. I am sure 85 per cent in my terms is the same as 85 per cent in the terms used by the other side. Or am I wrong? Will there be an advertising campaign to show us that 85 per cent is not 85 per cent, that $40 billion is not $40 billion or that an export tax is not an export tax? The plucked goose is flying along.

It is a funny thing, but during the negotiations with Alberta, the government of Alberta offered an arrangement under which they said that they would be prepared to go to increases which would be only 75 per cent of the world level or the U.S. level, whichever was the lower. That was 10 per cent lower than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What happened to the 75 per cent? When we are giving Alberta the boots, why did we not give Alberta the 75 per cent to boot? Is it because hon. gentlemen opposite just wanted to paint Alberta as being a villian, a tyrant, a selfish, grasping province that is trying to wreck the rest of the country? Is that the picture they were trying to paint? Why do they not paint a clear picture? Why did they not adopt the 75 per cent suggestion of the province of Alberta? We do not hear 75 per cent even mentioned.

Page 10 of the budget contains some energy policies. I want to say a good thing about the budget. It has some good energy policies. For example, the budget indicates—I have to read this because the people of Newfoundland will not believe me. My people down there will not believe me unless I read it. They are watching it there now on cable television. The budget indicates:

> The Atlantic provinces are more heavily dependent on oil than any other region of the country. For this reason, a fund will be established to support the conversion of oil-fired electrical plants to coal.

Have you heard that before? Yes. When? In the December budget. It was part of the PC energy program. Here it crops up again. It continues:

> Financial assistance will continue to be given for interprovincial electrical connections and federal equity will be provided in support of hydro development on the lower Churchill River in Labrador.

That is another plank from the PC energy policy of December, but it is a plank that will never be crossed if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will not act to use his powers under section 92(10) of the BNA Act so that Newfoundland can transport hydroelectric power across the province of Quebec to customers in Ontario, the maritimes and New York. All he has to do is use section 92(10)(a) or (c) to declare that it will work for the general advantage of Canada. Ever since 1965 Newfoundland has asked him to do that, including his friend, the former Premier Smallwood who is down in Newfoundland today boosting his constitutional proposals and opposing Premier Peckford. He is squawking again after being so many years out of politics. Mr. Smallwood tried from 1965 to his demise politically in 1971 to get the government to use its power to give Newfoundland a break so that one of our great natural resources could be utilized and not all of the economic rent would be taken by the province of Quebec. Ever since 1971 the Moore and Peckford PC administrations—for nine long years—have been asking the government to make that decision, and we still see this kind of wording in the budget, that they will give equity. Well, they can give all the equity they like, but the project is going nowhere if they will not use the constitutional powers, as they should, to treat Newfoundland in a similar manner as the other provinces have been treated with regard to transmission facilities for oil and gas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Then it goes on to say:

> New funds will also be available to find ways in which the large reserves of Cape Breton coal can be used to enhance energy security in the maritimes.

That is another PC policy. There will be an industrial conservation program and a housing retrofit program taken directly from our energy proposals. What is needed in this country is a retrofit job done on the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. That is what we need, a new retrofit program.

There are some good things in the budget, but they are taken from the budget of December, 1979. There is nothing new in it.

I have mentioned farmers, and it would be unfair not to mention fishermen. What is in this budget for the fishermen of Canada? There is nothing but increased prices of oil and increased prices of heating fuel. That is all that is in this budget for the fishermen. They will not get any energy tax credit to help them. To the fishermen in my district who supported me in this last election despite the talk of the 18 cents, the fishermen who supported me in ever-increasing numbers because they thought we were trying to do a job for Canada, I say, "You are being let down, gentlemen, not by us, but by the government which promised you that you were not going to face any increases in oil and gas prices."

That is the position, and they will not have anything to help them. In Newfoundland 80 per cent of the population live in their own homes. There will be no help for them. There will be no property tax credit or mortgage interest credit. There will be no energy tax credit for them, but there will be ever-increasing costs of energy for them and ever-increasing costs of food. When I speak to my electorate next, I will ask them to send back seven solid PC citizens to this House in the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What about Canadian ownership? It is just as simple as this: the government of this country controls the oil and gas industry—this government plus provincial governments. In effect this government, this Parliament, has the overriding powers. We do not need to buy the oil and gas industry to control it. If we are to spend dozens of billions of dollars buying out multinational companies because it sounds better to say we are buying out foreign-owned companies, then that means billions and billions of dollars that we will not have available to spend in frontier exploration, that we will not have available to spend in the Beaufort Sea, that we will not have available to spend on offshore Labrador projects.

It is as simple as that. The energy needs of this country are gigantic. I forget the exact figure, but it is in the trillions of dollars which must be spent in the next ten years. Can we afford to try to do that and then borrow tens of billions of dollars to buy companies we do not need? I say, encourage them to open up their share of ownership to Canadians. I am not against giving incentives so that Canadians may have a chance to buy into these companies. We should give Canadians encouragement in this area. We tried to encourage Canadians to invest in the equity of Canadian companies. But this business of allowing Petro-Canada to go on a buying rampage because of some supposed national policy will not bring us one iota closer to oil self-sufficiency in this country. Indeed, it will do the opposite and create strife and disruption; it will slow down exploration development. It is the wrong thing to do and it is being done in the wrong way.

Before leaving the subject of energy, which will be dealt with in a statesmanlike fashion by others, I would like to read some quotations. I cannot resist, because they show the cynicism of the government. I have here a quotation by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce from a statement he made on December 12, 1979, as the finance critic for his party:

> increases in the wellhead price of oil are the equivalent of a new tax.

He was referring to our price increases of $4 per barrel per year and $4.50 per barrel on oil. What do we see in this budget? We see an increase next year of $4.50 including the $2.50 government tax and the figure rising until we get to $7.50 for oil at the wellhead. That is the equivalent of a new tax. The hon. member was so shocked that his remark was punctuated with an exclamation mark. He exclaimed: "Yes, a new tax!" He was so shocked at the realization. He went on to say:

> It takes money out of their pockets just as much as would have been the case had a new tax been announced in this budget last night.

That is the same as what the Minister of Finance is doing, but the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not here to talk about new taxes today. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had this to say on October 24, 1979, as reported at page 551 of Hansard; this is what the hon. Pinocchio had to say—that a $4 increase could cause:

> the price of home heating oil to reach unconscionable levels.

"Unconscionable levels" is what he said. What is the minister's increase for oil next year? Is it $4.50 a barrel? What is his increase for this year? It is $3.80 a barrel. Is $3.80 any worse in permitting the price to reach unconscionable levels and, if it is, what about $4.50? If $4 per barrel causes the price of home heating oil to reach unconscionable levels, then what does $4.50 do? Where is the minister's assistance to the poor and lower-income people of this country to meet this unconscionable level in the price of home heating oil? The minister of energy made that remark on October 24, just one year ago. Now let him live up to it. Let him live up to the statements he made at that time. The minister said, as recorded at page 439 of Hansard on October 22:

> A $4 a barrel increase in the price of oil would mean the average Canadian consumer would be taxed an additional $180 for gas and homeheating oil next year.

The minister complained about $180, so he knows exactly what he is doing with the $4 increase and the $4.50 increase. What he then went on to say tops it all. You will believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am a teller of tall tales, but I am not. That is my problem, I am not sly or crafty.

Mr. Siddon: You're honest.

Mr. Crosbie: They say I am too honest. I do not agree with that. The minister then called a $4 a barrel increase, "unbelievable". What was "unbelievable" last year in opposition, this year becomes extremely believable. He does not even want to help the people of Canada meet these additional costs, these unbelievable additional costs. The price of $4.50 is now believable to the minister and the price of $7 and something is believable when it comes in four years, five years or six years' time. It is arrant, rank hypocrisy, and we will continue to remind the people of Canada about it.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said last December 12, as reported at page 2295 of Hansard:

> The government says it is imposing these higher wellhead prices to encourage energy conservation. However, for millions of Canadians this is something they will react to with nothing more than bitter laughter. The Canadian climate means they will have to use a certain amount of fuel oil to heat their homes adequately no matter what.

Has the Canadian climate changed in the last 12 months? Will the Canadian people not have to use fuel oil to heat their homes adequately or otherwise? What has happened to this hero who struck out so bravely for the Canadian people in this House last year on December 12? Where has he gone? Where was he when this matter was discussed in cabinet? What is he doing about the heating oil costs? What is he doing about the Canadian climate?

Mr. McDermid: Try to do something useful for a change.

Mr. Crosbie: He said:

> However, for millions of Canadians, this is something they will react to with nothing more than bitter laughter.

There are millions of Pagliaccis out there today who will be laughing bitterly as the months and years go by and they see what this government has done to them, despite the statements they made last year and how they bluffed the Canadian people. It is no wonder that their finance critic is not the Minister of Finance. At page 2296 of Hansard the hon. member said:

> The only result of these . . . higher prices of gasoline or fuel oil will lower the standard of living of Canadians. They will have to cut back on what they are now spending for food, clothing and shelter for themselves and their families in order to heat their homes adequately.

Where is the energy tax credit to prevent that from occurring, if it was to happen? If it was to happen last year it will happen this year. The standard of living of Canadians has been lowered and the government is doing nothing to help. We did something to help. But here is the final lugubrious statement of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he was finance critic as reported in Hansard at page 2292:

> Essentially this budget hits the little guy in this country.

The hon. member was discussing my budget and let us not get mixed up. He went on to say:

> If the little guy decides to have a smoke or a drink to find some solace from the impact of this Conservative budget, he will still be reminded of its unfair impact.

And what did the Minister of Finance do on April 21? He increased the taxes on cigarettes and liquor despite what the finance critic had to say, and people cannot find any solace today from the impact of his budget because of those increases. Today the Minister of Finance relents a little in favour of the fortified wines, but I can tell him that I beat him to it. I promised the people of the Niagara Peninsula, months ago, that I would look after their fortified wines. I am glad the minister has carried out my promise.

I do not want to take too long, but what can we do? I will leave the rest of this material for other hon. members. The $40 billion bump will not work. In four years' time Canadians will look back and they will see what actually happened and what would have happened under the Clark-Crosbie program for the future. They will erect statues throughout Canada to Clark and Crosbie.

Mr. Clark: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I hope at least one statue anyway.

Mr. Clark: Cheek to cheek.

Mr. Crosbie: The people will find out that the increases under the minister's regime are considerably higher than our proposed increases. I do not want to touch on this subject too much, but the budget deficit is a matter of no account to the NDP because they do not care about deficits. They have never had anything but deficits in their lives and they do not care if the country is deficit-ridden. The deficit matters because the ever-increasing deficit makes it pretty well impossible to overcome inflation.

If hon. members do not believe me, then I suggest they ask governor Bouey. My authority is governor Bouey and hundreds of other economists. The Minister of Finance is now heart-to-heart, step-to-step and toe-to-toe—and I will not say anything else that he is—with the governor of the Bank of Canada. If he listens to the governor, he will understand why his burgeoning deficit is inflationary. The deficit has gone up to over $14 billion. It is up $3.6 billion from what it would have been under our government. Perhaps our deficit might have gone up—I will concede that—by a few hundred million dollars because the economic turndown is more extensive than we had prophesied. So our deficit might have been up a little bit. It could have been that my confrère at the desk here could not have held down expenditures because we would have lost some revenues. It might have been up, but it would not have been up by $3.6 billion.

What difference does it make? The money has to be borrowed. The government gets some of it from government civil servants who pay into pensions. The government uses that money—borrows it. If I were a government civil servant I would be concerned about the money I am paying into these pension funds because the value of money is steadily declining. Anyway, the government gets its hands on this. In addition to the couple of billion dollars it will be able to use this year from those sources, the government has to go to our financial markets to borrow money—in excess of $12 billion this year, and a huge figure next year and the year after. This means they are going out to compete with the private sector and everyone else who wants to borrow.

Unless the governor of the Bank of Canada increases the money supply, interest rates will go up, because the demand is going to be greater than the supply. Interest rates will have a tendency to go up unless the governor of the Bank of Canada prints more money. The governor of the Bank of Canada says it is wrong to print more money. He says we have to keep the increase in the money supply down to correspond better with the increase in what we produced. But we are not producing more, Mr. Speaker; instead, we have a one per cent decline in GNP this year.

In any event, the governor of the Bank of Canada is going to have to say, "No, I cannot increase the money supply just because you will not listen to me. Just because you will not help me with your fiscal policies to fight inflation, I am not going to increase the money supply. There is no real value in my increasing the money supply." He is going to say, "We did that years earlier, in the first half of the 1970s, and we have changed our policy. We are not going to do it again." That is what he will say and I hope he will stick to it.

This means that interest rates will have to go up, Mr. Speaker, because the government is out there borrowing and taking the room of the private sector. That is why the deficit is inflationary. Why is it inflationary? It is inflationary because it discourages the private sector from investing and building and expanding. Why should they do these things when they have a government that is intervening in all their actions, a government that does not care about whether they make any kind of profit or not, a government that is going to sic FIRA on them and extend this great bureaucracy of FIRA so that it can come into their business if they are foreign-owned or have any element of that at all and peer over their shoulders and tell them what to do. That is why we have to be concerned about the deficit.

Why else do we have to be concerned about the deficit, Mr. Speaker? Because this year $10,250 million is to be spent on interest payments. I am now addressing the taxpayers of Canada, from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia. The trouble with Canada is that part in between! I am addressing these taxpayers, Mr. Speaker, and telling them that one out of every four of their tax dollars is earmarked to pay interest on the government's debt this year. That is a stupendous figure. Next year, interest costs will amount to $12,265 million; in excess of 16 per cent of all government expenditures this year and next year are going to pay interest on the debt. That is the present estimate. It is a huge amount of money.

Do taxpayers wonder why they cannot have new services from the government? Do they wonder why they cannot have better transportation in Newfoundland? Do the fishermen wonder about small crafts and harbours and why they cannot get their harbours and wharves looked after? It is because the Minister of Finance has this huge bill for interest on past debts and it is going to get larger next year. The estimates show that it will go up by a couple of billion dollars every year.

The only way to get that under control, Mr. Speaker, is to reduce the amount being borrowed. It should be remembered, too, that over the last eight years, from 1972 to 1980, this government reduced taxation on every occasion before an election. The amount of those tax reductions this year totals altogether $9 billion—there is another $7.5 billion due to indexing, but this has nothing to do with indexing. I am dealing with tax cuts. There is $9 billion in tax cuts. For example, in November, 1978, the Minister of Justice then the minister of finance, brought in his budget and reduced the sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent which will cost $1,100 million this year.

If the government says it needs more revenue—and the government is not finished yet, because the minister is going to have to get more revenue before he is through—taxpayers should remember that the government fooled them in the last eight years by pretending that they did not need revenue. Going into elections, they pretended that they did not need the $9 billion from the taxpayers of Canada. Now they are safely back in office and ensconced on their voyage for another four years, they are going to start getting that revenue back. We can be sure of that. There will be a bigger revenue grab than has been announced in this budget before the next four years are over. This is why, Mr. Speaker. The deficits for the last eight years total $49,679 million and if we add to that this year's deficit of $14,150 million, there is a total for the eight years, including this one, of $63,829 million in deficits.

I know the government does not worry about deficits because they are not expecting to be here when the final bills come in for payment. I can tell you, however, Mr. Speaker, that this is a grim record. If we look at what the situation was before we got into this mess, when the Prime Minister first wended his weary way off the diving boards into office, we will see what happened. I think I have some of the figures here. At that time, in 1968-69 I believe, the bill for interest was about $1 billion. Now it is the figure that I have already given.

I have so many notes, Mr. Speaker, that I do not know whether I can find a particular note right away or not. But I have great faith that I will, if you will just put up with me. Here is another little note that I found while looking for the first note. Canada is $75 billion in debt to the rest of the world. This is the government that is telling off the rest of the world—telling them "get off the globe". What is that song about the world—"Stop the world, we want to get off!" This government is saying to foreign investors, "You come to Canada, gentlemen, and we are going to have our hands not only in your pockets but somewhere else even worse." That is what they are saying to foreign investors. They are very independent. They have this ersatz Canadian nationalism policy that they want to pretend will not cost anybody anything. But they owe the rest of the world $75 billion. That is what Canada owes the rest of the world and this year the amount is going up. The current account deficit for this year is estimated by the Minister of Finance at $6.2 billion, for last year it was $5.8 billion and the forecast for 1981 is $5.5 billion. So much for the services of these gentlemen! When the people who are owed that money decide to take a stand—look out. They will not be long in changing the minds of this government.

I knew I would find my note, Mr. Speaker. Here it is. There have been two budgets that showed a surplus since the Hon. Douglas Abbott was minister of finance in the early 1950s. There have been two budgets with a surplus out of the last 31 budgets. Mr. Douglas Abbott was minister of finance at the time of the last surplus. From Sir John A. Macdonald to Lester B. Pearson, from confederation to centennial year, the combined budgetary deficits of the federal government totalled $17 billion. With the present budget, the net debt of the government will be over $81 billion by next March. All of that increase is a gift to us from the Prime Minister. He is bequeathing us the difference between $17 billion and $81 billion. The gross debt of the federal government in 1967 was $30 billion; by next March it will be about $122 billion. This is the great legacy of the Trudeau years. In addition to the strain he is putting on the whole confederation now in attempting to mould it in his own fanatical way, this is another part of what he is bequeathing to Canada.

When he ascended his throne in 1968 interest charges on the national debt were $1.2 billion; we know what they are this year and next year the figure will be in excess of $12 billion.

I could give other startling and alarming figures, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to startle and alarm the hon. gentlemen opposite too much. They might wake from their lethargy.

On page 35 of the budget document a lot of other deficits and borrowings are shown that are not included in the government's deficit. Under the heading "Loans, Investments and Advances" there appears the following statement:

In 1980-81 direct market borrowings by agent Crown corporations are expected to increase by a further $1.6 billion, resulting from borrowings by Export Development Corporation— $802 million; Eldorado Nuclear— $80 million, and the Federal Business Development Bank— $755 million, partially offset by repayments of $40 million by Petro-Canada.

That is a fine gesture. Petro-Canada's part is to repay $40 million while oil and gas consumers are asked to pay billions. There it is, Mr. Speaker—another $1.6 billion that the agent Crown corporations are borrowing in 1980-81. This can be added to the government debt because every dollar of the debt of those agent Crown corporations is a debt of the Government of Canada, if any one of them goes belly up.

● (1630)

I just heard a grunt over there in the NDP ranks. They do not agree. They do not agree with anything in the NDP. It is $1.6 billion. They do not like to hear any talk of debts. The hon. member from Winnipeg Birds Nest is getting all stirred up. So there is another $1.6 billion.

Let us pass on from the deficit because it annoys members of the NDP, the little red rump of the Liberal party. I am almost missing points, and they are important points.

I refer now to page 13. Here is what the Minister of Finance speaking for the government promised to do about expenditures. Just listen to this. Hear ye, hear ye! All ten provincial governments please pay attention to this:

A large element of our expenditures especially in the social affairs envelope consists of transfers to the provincial governments. I have already indicated to my provincial colleagues that we will be examining these programs closely as they come up for renewal, and we expect to achieve significant savings here.

Where does this government say it is going to get significant savings from the programs it induced the provinces to enter into in the social service field? It is presumably in Medicare, the Canada welfare plan, hospital insurance and Canada assistance. They are going to put the squeeze on the ten provinces to achieve it. There is no expenditure reduction in these estimates. There is a tremendous burgeoning of expenditures. Where are they going to get some of that money? They are going to squeeze it out of the ten provinces. These ten provinces are supposed to be supermen. We are led to believe that these ten have ganged up on the Prime Minister. As I said the other day, "little granny Trudeau with these ten big brutes, get him in a room and assault him". That is the picture we are given. It is the wrong picture. It is superman Trudeau and the ten midgets. That is the real picture, because the ten provinces have no powers compared to the power of the central government. It is the biggest canard of the century that the federal government is weak or that the federal government does not have power. It has overwhelming power and the government is going to use those overwhelming powers now to squeeze those ten provincial governments. The budget document reads: "We expect to achieve significant savings here". That means the provinces, including the poorest provinces such as my own province of Newfoundland, and the province of Prince Edward Island. All the provinces are going to have to pick up where this government reduces its spending. That is what this government is going to do. It will reduce its spending, even if it does so on the backs of the ten provincial governments. That is this government's great principle of equalization and the great principle of the Prime Minister and how he is going to help strengthen the regions of this country. The man is destroying the regions of this country. He is destroying the country with it.

So this is what the minister promises. This is where he is going to achieve his expenditure reductions. This is the government that inveigled them into it and dangled the bait which they could not refuse politically. It gets them in, keeps them there for years and then gives it to them with significant expenditure reductions for the federal government.

Look at this sick joke on page 13:

I would like to announce at this time a special allocation of $350 million over four years—

Over four years!

—to promote industrial restructuring and manpower retraining and mobility in areas of particular need.

The total amount has been divided equally between economic development and social affairs envelopes. This sum of $350 million over four years—is that $85 million a year? Is it $85 million out of $60 billion this year? Is it $85 million out of $66 billion next year? There is going to be an additional $85 million for manpower, industrial restructuring and manpower retraining. That is called a program? That is not a program. That is not even an excuse for a program. In our budget we had $250 million for youth. This was an employment tax credit for youth alone which was a $150 million increase over what the previous government had. This is supposed to be a great program. It should not have even been in the budget as a footnote. It is an insult to even have that.

There is one other thing I need to refer to under this section. I ask hon. members not to get your hopes up. When I run out of new material, I will sit down, but there is a lot of material here. At page 33 having to do with equalization and fiscal transfers, it reads:

The equalization figures for 1980-81 and 1981-82 assume the passage of Bill C-24 now before Parliament.

The government is assuming that the bill will pass. It is the bill which takes Ontario out of the equalization formula. It will remove hundreds of millions of dollars of revenue which Ontario could have had if the changes had not been made. It is the bill that embodies the PUITTA changes. This assumes that it will pass the House, and the government has therefore reduced its expenditures by that amount.

By the way, anyone who believes that equalization is entrenched in the constitution had better take another look at the document before they continue to think that.

I mentioned unemployment insurance last night. There is an increase there. Let us look at my budget from last year. I want to share it with you. Let us have just one more brief mention of last year's budget with a certain fondness and tender regard. Let us look at page 18 of my budget and at page 17 of the government's budget for this year. What did we do in our budget last year? We explained employment programs and unemployment insurance. At page 18 of the 1979 budget, it reads:

The weekly employee rate of unemployment insurance contributions for 1980 will be increased from $1.35 per $100 of insurable earnings to $1.60. The employer rate will be increased from $1.89 to $2.24.

The howl from the hon. gentlemen then in the opposition was deafening. They said that this was unconscionable. They said it was another unconscionable thing that we should attempt to raise the contributions from employers and employees to help meet the heavy costs of unemployment.

What is in the budget for this year? At page 17, the Minister of Finance said this:

I am announcing on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, that effective January 1, 1981, the weekly rate of unemployment insurance contributions will be raised to $1.80 per $100 of insurable earnings. The employer rate of contribution will be increased to $2.52.

That is 20 cents more than we proposed. The employer rate of contribution will be increased to $2.52. We suggested $2.24. That is 28 cents more. These are very significant increases in both categories in excess of $1 billion this year. That will be taken from employers and employees by the government which last year decried the practice and wept crocodile tears on the floor of this House. There are a few similarities in these two budgets, except that the minister's budget was far more unconscionable than mine when it came to raising revenue.

Other speakers on our side will be dealing with questions such as of research and development and how that has been ignored, as far as we can tell, and how the economic development envelope has been increased. We are told the economic development envelope is supposed to include a western development fund of $4 billion. I assume it will have to be increased if it is going to include that. It is very hard to see what will be increased in the economic development envelope if there is to be an additional $4 billion for the west.

Let me suggest something to hon. gentlemen opposite. Instead of creating this $4 billion fund for the west, so-called, why do you not let the west look after their own development by treating them fairly and squarely with respect to oil and gas? The federal government has certain responsibilities in the west just as it has in the east and in the centre. It has the responsibility for giving them a decent transportation system, a decent system of ports and a decent system of shipping grain, all these things that we have a right to expect everywhere in Canada. There is no need for a special suggestion that there is going to be a $4 billion fund. This is conscience money.

They are thrashing the west. They are bearing down on the west. They are taking control over the oil and gas industry. They are taking away many of their ownership rights. Then they say: gentlemen, we are going to give you a $4 billion fund for western development which we are going to spend on your behalf. It just so happens that westerners would like to have their own $4 billion to spend in accordance with their own priorities. Let the federal government spend its own money, got legitimately in its proper, legitimate areas of policy across Canada in its own jurisdiction. Do not think westerners will thank you for that $4 billion development fund for the west, not at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The government should be leaving $4 billion with the west in its oil and gas regime and energy package. That is something it should be doing for the west, letting them develop themselves, not taking billions and billions from them and then giving them back a little. That is the same situation they want for Newfoundland.

Imagine the Minister of Justice threatening the premier of Newfoundland in this House last week. What is this country coming to when the big $60 billion Government of Canada says that a premier of this country cannot speak his mind on constitutional issues or he is going to suffer, the Government of Canada is not going to give him any assistance if he does not do what he is told—he will get nothing on the Lower Churchill if he does not watch what he says?

Why is it that hon. gentlemen opposite will not recognize the coastal provinces as being the owners of offshore minerals? Why? Because it wants us down there like trained seals, waiting for them to hand us our gifts just like they are now asking the west to put their paws out for $4 billion for a western development fund.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We are not coming to Ottawa cap in hand to this government or anyone else in Ottawa, those of us from Newfoundland or in any of the maritime provinces. We are going to speak our minds. We are full citizens of Canada. We have been here 31 years and we are going to have our say with no threats or bullying by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chretien). They are not going to deter our government, you can depend on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Page 15 is where the minister is so satisfied with the capital gains tax. He is going to release a discussion paper.

It shows that Canada's system of taxing gains is favourable to taxpayers.

How come? Are they not paying any taxes at all? Is the minister going to index the capital gains tax? In all justice, if he is indexing the personal income tax as he should, there is a strong case for the capital gains tax to be indexed. Otherwise he is taxing the families of the poor farmer who dies. He is taxing them on all the inflationary elements of their so-called capital gains tax. The minister does not care about the inflation impact on capital gains. He says it is very favourable to the taxpayer. He said, and I quote:

As well, the taxes on inheritances and wealth in Canada are the lowest among 21 OECD countries surveyed. The paper notes that, while the system has imperfections, the taxation of capital gains is an important source of government revenue, has important tax structure implications and is essential for the equity and fairness of the system.

I wonder what the farmers are going to think of his position on capital gains and what the business sector is going to think. Much of their profit these days is not profit at all. It is because of the effect inflation has on the revenues and their balance sheets, and they are taxed on that. I hope the minister will take a deeper look at the question of capital gains tax and business taxation generally.

I went into housing assistance last night. I will not go into it again. Because I want to have this mentioned in the main body of my address, let me just point out there is nothing for the home owner, nothing for the tenant, no shelter allowance, no mortgage interest and property tax relief. There is not one iota of help for people now buying homes who are paying rates of 15½ and 16 per cent. There is not one element of help for them.

Apparently these people do not deserve help anymore. Why not? Because the Liberal party is in government. They deserved help when the Liberal party was out of government, but they do not deserve it today when the Liberal party is in government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: It is only the MURB. This year the MURB is going to cost the government $15 million. The MURB will be some help in having a few more multiple unit residential dwellings built, but essentially it is a tax relief. It is a tax device which assists those with higher incomes while incidentally helping to build a few more housing units.

Why did I stop it last year? I stopped it because of advice from the Department of Finance. What was the advice? That MURBs are no longer needed. The advice was that the provinces are responsible for housing, property and civil rights and many of the provinces have policies that interfere with and do not give incentive to the building of housing units. Some of them have strict rent controls. They are discouraging investment in housing, apartments and the like. All this MURB business is doing is trying to offset things which the provinces are doing that they should not be doing to give disincentives for housing.

If the Department of Finance gave me that advice ten months ago, how can they now be giving different advice to this minister? The answer is, they cannot be. What is the answer? The answer is this. The minister said to his department, "Gentlemen, there is nothing in this budget for housing. There is no assistance for housing. I have to have something, no matter how tattered. I need to have something to put in for housing so that I can pretend I am concerned about the housing situation in Canada."

We have had the lowest number of housing starts year after year for the last four or five years. I believe this is the worst year ever. Is that correct?

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you. Therefore, the minister came up with a MURB. Resurrect the MURB. If anything needed to be resurrected, that was not one of the most important. The MURB might help this year. It might attract certain wealthy Canadians to put some money into building apartment units and condominiums in certain areas of the country. For example, it will be very useful in British Columbia. There is a strong demand there for the MURB.

It is not even a flea bite in dealing with the housing problem, with the people who occupy houses or who are tenants in this country today. Where we were going to give the home owners this year $575 million in assistance, what are they offering the home industry? They are offering a $15 million deduction in revenue for MURB. Where we were going to give $1.2 billion next year to help the home owners of this country, they are going to give $15 million in MURBs. Enough said. I won't go into that.

I will give just one quotation because I am sick of showing what was said by members opposite when they were in opposition as compared to what they are doing now. One more little plank in the coffin. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) in the House of Commons on November 19, 1979, said:

> The government could have started where the real problem lies and could have provided something for rental assistance.

Did the Minister of Employment and Immigration, once he was in power, go to the Minister of Finance and say that the real problem is there and something should be provided for rental assistance? He spent all his time in the couple of brief months in opposition saying that to us, that what was needed was assistance for the renters in Canada. Now this minister has not done anything.

There are a lot of other areas I could cover. I suppose we do want the members of the New Democratic Party to get on today so that they can move their subamendment. They are so good at subamendments. Their last subamendment—what an excuse for an opposition party that was over begging the government for favours.

● (1650)

The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), just like a trained seal, went over begging for a scrap from the Prime Minister. He says: "Give me a scrap. Give me a scrap to help me in my problem. I have dissidents in my caucus. My caucus is all westerners except for a little, tiny pink rump here in Ontario. The Ontario rump is three people and the western rump is a big, healthy, steak-like rump. I have a dispute in my caucus and the western people in my caucus are very, very agitated about what you are doing in the energy field. They do not like this constitutional package and I have got to try to get them quietened down because I am from Ontario, from a district in Ontario. I am seriously worried that my position is going to be in jeopardy in the next election. Please help me, Prime Minister. What can you do to help?" That was the Leader of the NDP in his conspirators' meeting with the Prime Minister a week or ten days ago. And the Prime Minister said: "Don't worry about this, Ed. I offered to take you in with me after the election, you refused me, nevertheless, I, in my wisdom, am going to help you, Ed. I am going to give the right of indirect taxation to Saskatchewan and I am going to pretend that I am going to help you in the resource area, when really I am only endangering the whole resource structure for the ten provinces across Canada." So, Mr. Broadbent threw in the hat. When he threw in the hat he threw in Mr. Nystrom with it. He went with the hat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: It is not a ten-gallon hat now, it is a ten-pint hat because Mr. Nystrom is not going to be in that hat and he has already lost another member from the hat. So that was a mad hatter's tea party that the Leader of the NDP had with the Prime Minister. Now his credentials are gone. Now that his credentials are gone they should all go over there and join them. The Social Credit party used to be over there. That is about right where the NDP fits, over where the Social Credit were.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Their last subamendment destroyed a budget that was going to help Canada in the short term and the long term. It was going to help the medium and lower-income people of Canada. I demonstrated that earlier today. They are so blind in their NDP fanaticism that they destroyed a budget which would have helped the people they say they represent. Now they do not represent them one iota more than I do and they have not got any more of a heart than I have got. But I do not go around every day beating my gums about the great heart I have got. I do not wear it on my sleeve like the NDP.

Why do we in this party want to help the Canadian economy? Why is it we seem to have a fixation with the economy and producing more and more? Why? Because that is the only way we can give the people of Canada who need more, more. You cannot give them more if the pie is shrinking and not expanding. That is why we are concerned with the economy. So if we do not wear our hearts on our sleeve like the NDP it is not because we are not thinking of the little people of this country. The little people of this country are not going to have a thing if the economy of this country goes on for the next four or five years as it has gone on over the last four or five. There will be nothing for those people and we will be in a mad fight because the pie does not grow, it is diminishing. The groups who are suffering will be fighting one another for a piece of the pie and the people who are going to get the pie are the organized sections of society; the senior citizens are not going to get it. The defenceless and the unorganized are not going to get a piece of the pie. That is why we are concerned about the economy. That is why we wanted to take a long-term look, because if we do not take a long-term look there is going to be nothing for anyone. That is why we are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: That is why I am hoping, with the moving of this motion, that we are going to destroy this government next Tuesday. Do not laugh, there may be 30 or 40 statesmen on the other side—there might be. After all, I was a statesman myself once and a member of the Liberal party and I left it. There may be 20 or 30 over there who will take the step to save Canada next Tuesday by voting for this motion. That is why I have couched it in extremely diplomatic terms, with the assistance of our House leader. So, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This House condemns the government for the regressive nature of its budget and rejects the budget because it fails to assist monetary policy to combat inflation, fails to meet the campaign commitments of the Prime Minister, fails to control government spending, fails to reduce unemployment, fails to help low or middle-income Canadians meet increasing living costs, fails to advance effective policies to achieve oil self-sufficiency and fails to maintain national unity".

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, after that exercise in primal therapy I thought I would concentrate on this year's budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: It is a Liberal budget. I think it was Woody Guthrie who said that some rob you with a six-gun and some with a fountain pen. If the Canadian public was held up by the budget last year there is little question it is being held up by the budget this year. The techniques are different. I do not agree with those people who say there is no difference between the Conservative party and the Liberal party. There is a difference of style. There is some difference of substance.

This is a budget which in its own way is just as unacceptable, just as harsh, just as regressive and just as reactionary as the one which was rejected not only by the NDP last year—surely the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) could hardly have expected us to support his budget— not simply by the Liberal party united strangely in the thought they could win power. I would remind those members of the Conservative party, who continue to return to those halcyon days prior to February, that between the defeat of the budget and the return of the Liberal government there was an event of some significance. That event was an election.

If you want to take your case to anybody, in terms of blaming them for what happened, I suggest to those members of the Conservative party that they take their case once again to the Canadian people. There are to those who say, "Well, the NDP can hardly be expected to criticize the economic policies of the Liberal party because they were opposed to the economic policies of the Conservative party." I have heard comments such as that. It is a strange and wonderous thing that a person can be opposed to cholera in 1979 and be opposed to leprosy in 1980.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: It is a strange and wonderous thing that we can attack one party of government for following policies which inflict great hardship on Canadian people and provide no economic leadership, and once again when another party takes power we can be just as critical of that same party for following exactly the same trend and the same thrust of policies. In fact, far from it being an inconsistency it is the height of consistency and, I think, the height of a commitment to a certain number of principles which I hope to outline.

● (1700)

In my view this budget represents the three Ds of Liberalism. This budget is profoundly disappointing. It represents an opportunity missed. This budget is duplicitous. This budget, most important, is damaging to the Canadian economy, to the Canadian worker and to the future of our country.

In terms of our disappointment, I think all of us as members of Parliament should focus not simply on the balance sheet which has been presented, not simply on what is there and not simply on the number of issues which were raised by the hon. member for St. John's West but perhaps most clearly on our own constituencies and constituents. We should be thinking of the people who day in and day out work in those constituencies, cities and communities. When we return to our ridings on weekends or whenever we can to meet with our constituents, we should think of what it is that strikes at the hearts of those people. The thing which struck me about this budget is that just as in the other budget there was no mention of the unemployed. There was mention of unemployment. We have projections of what it will be this year, next year and the year after. Incidentally, it will be higher this year than it was last year and it will be over one million in the five years to come.

That is the kind of projection we are getting from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but I am not speaking about unemployment as a concept or idea. I am speaking of and thinking of the unemployed. As I am sure many hon. members do, I am thinking of young people, old people, not so young people, not so old people and the men and women who come in constantly and say, "Mr. Rae"—or whoever, Mr. Rose or Mr. Nystrom—"I would like you to help me find a job". We must constantly respond, if we are not members of the government party, if we are not living in that part of the world where patronage is a way of life, as is my case in the city of Toronto, by referring people to Manpower or trying to get them interviews or seeing if we can do something through the manpower system. But basically the force which dictates the level of unemployment and the fate of unemployed people is not whether the individual member of Parliament can make a telephone call and get somebody a job. It is whether or not there is a government in Ottawa which demonstrates leadership. I define leadership quite simply as an ability to respond to the deepest anxieties of the people, and ability to respond with compassion and direction and an ability to respond in a way which gives hope and strength to the Canadian people.

One thinks of a government like that of Roosevelt in 1932. One thinks of the Labour government in Britain in 1945. One thinks of those governments which decided they could change some things and some circumstances. They could tell people in certain situations that unemployment was not like the weather and not a function of climate but that unemployment was something which could be affected by the policies of government. We have never had such a government in this country. We have never had a "New Deal". We have never had a democratic socialist government. We have had the policies of Mackenzie King, the policies of Mr. Trudeau, the policies of R. B. Bennett. We have had policies which have consistently told unemployed people that there was nothing which could be done. That is a very old message and basically a very mean message, a message of intellectual bankruptcy and precisely the message which is contained in the budget which has been put forward by the Minister of Finance. On September 9 in Halifax when the minister was making one of his few public speeches prior to the budget he said that a budget is more than a statement of economic accounts and more than a statement of how much we will spend and how much we will tax. "A budget must be an accounting of commitments, a statement of priorities and a blueprint for achieving our goals".

Measured by that very test which the Minister of Finance set out for us six short weeks ago, this budget is a failure. It is not an accounting of commitments. It is not a statement of priorities, and it is certainly not a blueprint for achieving our goals. Instead, the minister has made fun, as he is wont to do, of our party for talking about serious commitment. We asked him to make certain serious commitments, and he in his own way perhaps correctly said, "We in our party do not take ourselves quite so seriously. We are not in the habit of making serious commitments". The minister is in the habit of giving us lugubrious evasion, and I think what is represented in the budget today is lugubrious evasion. It fails to respond to the need for economic insecurity which racks so many of our communities. It fails to respond to unemployment levels in central, eastern and Atlantic Canada which are unacceptable. It fails to recognize the fact that Canada now has, has had for some time and will continue to have under this government, because of its projections and because of the policies it is making, the highest level of unemployment in the industrial world.

That is the only economic record in the OECD which we can claim to hold. We do not spend more than anybody else on research and development. We do not yet have the highest rate of inflation. We do not have the highest per capita income. We have one achievement and one achievement alone, and that is, we continue to have the highest rate of unemployment in the western world.

I am not going to refer to duplicity at the moment. Hon. members opposite said some things when in opposition and now say something else when in government. We have seen governments come and go and change a number of times in the past couple of years. Believe me, if we did not have a program we would not know who the players are. When the Tories are in opposition, they suddenly become the workers' friend. Mr. Crosbie suddenly portrays himself as a friend of the poor and disadvantaged. That is an unique role for him. In opposition we saw that Mr. Gray was the opponent of high interest rates. As Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I do not want to overdo the business of some of the House rules, but I should remind the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) that when referring to other members of Parliament the custom is that he refer to them indirectly as "the hon. member for" whatever rather than by name.

Mr. Rae: I am sure you will use the same standard for all members, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I do not know whether the hon. member is questioning whether or not the Chair applies the same standards to all hon. members, but that certainly is not a comment that is appreciated by any occupant of this chair. In the meantime, the rule stands for all hon. members, and I would appreciate it if the hon. member would observe it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: When he was the hon. member for Windsor West and finance critic of the Liberal party, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray)—and I happened to be on the same television program—promised that he would resign if interest rates continued to rise, which they have done. They went down, and now they are going up again. However, that is not the principal point I want to make. The point I want to make is that there is a commitment and a consensus that unemployment will remain high. There is a consensus that inflation will remain high, and an examination of the budgets of the present Minister of Finance and the previous minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, will indicate that that consensus exists and will continue to exist.

We can talk about a co-conspiracy. It is against that consensus that we in this party are speaking, and it is about the fact of unemployment and about the difficulties and the human cost of unemployment that we have to speak. I am constantly amazed that budgets can refer to unemployment statistics, but budgets can never mention the cost in human terms of being unemployed. Yet that is as much a reality as the statistics mentioned in the tables which are distributed with such glee and fervour by the Minister of Finance and his associates. We would have looked, for example, for a budget which recognized that because of the rates of inflation and unemployment there have been dramatic changes in our society.

There has been, for example, a dramatic loss in wages right across the country, with only two provinces being exceptions, a loss of wages of $200 on an average in the province of Ontario and $450 in the province of Newfoundland, nearly $1,200 a year. We have to deal with the fact that this very budget, rather than attempting to reverse the direction, attempting to establish a cost of living tax credit which would provide for advantages, for credits, and for income where income is needed most, the most progressive form of indexation that can be devised, the minister has continued with the old system of indexation which will guarantee that the average wage earner will fall further and further behind the cost of living.

We have to recognize that in this economy in the last year there have been 1,000 lay-offs a day. Every working day, 1,000 people are laid off right across Canada. One has to laugh rather than cry when one reads the response of the minister to this kind of situation. On page 13 of the budget he refers to the pension system which he describes, not as a disgrace or as tragedy for workers who have been laid off and left without pensions, not as something that affects the very justice of our system when workers in their fifties are laid off and are not able to find jobs, but as "defective in many ways". He describes the present pension system as "uneven". But then he has a final criticism. He says that not only is it uneven, it also hinders labour mobility. What about labour security, Mr. Speaker? What about the fundamental principle of economic rights, the rights in the constitution? What about the fundamental principle that, as well as being mobile, people also want to be secure? People also want the assurance, not that they have to move from Newfoundland, from Cape Breton or even from Toronto to go to Alberta in order to find a job, but that their government will be concerned to see that they get a job in the communities where they want to raise their families. That is the principle which is at stake when the minister talks about pensions and refers to the fact that there is no labour mobility.

The budget is a disappointment because it reads almost as if the minister had decided not to take so many critical decisions. For example, one reads the paragraph on the country's tax system and one wonders whether this is a statement by the Minister of Finance or a statement by a professor of economic theory talking about what kind of a budget it might be a good idea to bring in one day. This is what he has to say on page 15 of the budget. He observes that we have created a mammoth system, a grotesque system of tax expenditures, with tax expenditures now worth well over last year's figure of $32 billion. The minister says:

> Tax incentives tend to pyramid with the result that a number of profitable corporations or wealthy individuals pay little or no tax.

The fact is that in 1978 there were 96 Canadians, and right now we know we have well over 100 Canadians, making over $200,000 a year who pay not a penny in tax, and the minister says this is what tends to happen. He tells us that other countries have responded by introducing minimum rates. He says:

> While this approach may be an answer to the problem, perhaps a fundamentally different one would be preferable.

Is the minister going to tell us? I thought his job as Minister of Finance was to respond to the family making $15,000 a year which sees the inequity, which sees a stratum of people being subsidized by average taxpayers so they can spend their winters in Florida and their summers wherever they please. That is the system which the Minister of Finance is perpetrating and defending. He says:

> One questions whether the economy might not be better served by a tax system with lower rates—

He says "one questions". What is this, an academic seminar? I would have thought the minister would have said not that "one questions" but that this is an abuse which has grown, that they recognize their mistakes, they see they were at fault and they are prepared now to do something about it. But that is not their response. Their response is that they question whether it might not be better for the economy. There is not a mention of social justice, not a mention of the disease of envy that is created in a society where you have such inequality. That does not feature in this budget. Those words are not trendy at the moment. It is not done to talk about equality in our society. It is all supply economics and what is good for the macro-economy, and it may not be good for the macro-economy to have so much money being sheltered from the tax system.

One can say the same for capital gains. The minister tells us he is looking forward to a good discussion on the problem of capital gains. There is no mention in this budget of the problem of equity. There is no mention in this document of an industrial strategy for our country. It is amazing that a government should have laboured so long and produced a document which says nothing about the problems of our industries. We have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is desperate for funds, who is faced with crises week after week. He comes to the House looking exhausted and worn out. He has been in negotiations giving away the sink to Chrysler Corporation and to Massey-Ferguson. He comes to the House desperately trying to explain what he has been doing. Is there a mention in this document of industrial strategy? Is there a mention in this document of the problems faced by central Canada, by Quebec and by Atlantic Canada? Is there a mention of runaway plants and workers left abandoned? They talk about spending $350 million over four years, $85 million a year. That is a lot of money these days, Mr. Speaker, and it will go far to deal with the problem of industrial restructuring. There is no mention of the underlying disease, no analysis of what is causing this problem, no mention of the fact that there are people in every industrial city in this country and in every community who are looking for leadership, who are looking to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Minister of Finance to show leadership, to show that just as much as they are prepared to take steps on the constitution, just as much as they are concerned with our becoming politically whole, so too are they concerned about the country becoming economically whole once again.

I can think of no greater condemnation of this government than that they have learned nothing in opposition, that they have seen nothing of what is demanded of Canadian people, and that they continue with a policy which lacks direction, which lacks compassion and which does not speak to the Canadian people in the language and in terms they can understand, in terms that will allay the anxieties which exist in far too many homes. I could mention the fact that this document says nothing about a science policy for Canada, the fact that scientists are leaving by the dozens and by the hundreds from our universities, the fact that we suffer now from an intellectual brain drain, that we have to constantly import scientists from overseas, the fact that there are fields of research and science into which our young people will not go any more because there is no hope, no industry, no determination for the government to say, "Yes, we have a technological policy, yes, we have a scientific policy, and we are prepared here to provide employment for people coming out of our universities."

This is a disappointing document because it is fundamentally empty. It is a duplicitous document because it is doing things it claims it is not doing and because it is not doing things which it claims to be doing. It is doing things it claims not to be doing; it is claiming that it is not increasing taxes. But what are unemployment insurance contributions if they are not a tax on payroll, if they are not a tax which comes out of the salary of every salaried employee and which comes out of the payroll of every employer who hires an employee? What are they, if not a labour cost for the employer just as much as if the employee paid for those costs himself? The minister understands what I am talking about. The minister knows perfectly well that the unemployment insurance contribution is a tax just as surely as any other form of tax. Also he knows that it is a regressive tax, and because of the upper limit of $15,000, he knows that the average working Canadian pays for his own unemployment. No one else pays, and they call that redistribution and equalization. It is redistribution among the working people of Canada. It is not redistribution from those who have to those who do not have. It is duplicitous because they are saying there is no tax and then they are imposing a tax, only they are doing it another way.

The hon. member for St. John's West did not mention one interesting contrast between his budget and that of the Minister of Finance. In the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West, they increased unemployment insurance contributions. That is true, but in their explanation they said, "We are increasing them from $1.30 to $1.60." Mr. Speaker, do you want to know what the minister said in this budget? He said, "We are increasing unemployment insurance contributions to $1.80." From where? Do the press know from where? Does the average citizen reading the budget know from where? Would it have taken anything other than a commitment to openness to say that they were raising them from such and such to such and such which represents a net increase of 33⅓ per cent? That is all it would have required, yet it is symbolic. It is a small thing, it is not a major thing, but it is symbolic of this government that they will not even tell us in their own budget what the net increase is. Everyone must figure it out for himself.

This has got to be the height of chutzpah. They tell us there will not be a natural gas export tax. The minister said they received so much opposition from the producing provinces, Alberta and British Columbia, that they decided not to impose an export tax and as an alternative, which is the way the minister described it in his budget, he was proposing a very different kind of tax. He was not going to tax the export of gas, he was going to tax all gas. I see the minister nodding his head. I would simply say to him that what he proposed is not an alternative, it is an addition. I woke up to the CBC news on the radio this morning and heard the press solemnly saying, "There is no export tax on natural gas; the government has handed out an olive branch to the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia." It is not an olive branch. Who is the minister trying to kid? He is simply providing a natural gas tax and in addition he will tax everybody else. That is all it is. I think this should be said clearly. They are taxing the exports of natural gas, they are taxing domestic consumption of natural gas and all forms of natural gas.

I understand I need to move the subamendment in order to gain some extra time. I should like to move a subamendment to the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's West. I do not think any cannons will go off if I move it. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

and this House condemns the government for continuing the Liberal-Conservative policies that have brought Canada to its most serious recession since 1954, in particular for its policies of high interest rates, indifference to the poor, punitive taxes, and inflated prices; and this House further condemns the government for its failure to introduce in this budget a program of capital investment, a fair prices commission, cost of living tax credits and a serious commitment to public ownership in the oil industry to ensure that Canadians would no longer be industrial tenants in their own land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: I will leave the question of energy as the key example of the government not doing things it claims to be doing. I do not want to spend a great deal of time on this because of the limitations of time and because the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) will be dealing with this question, but I want to make clear to the minister the nature of our objection. I am glad the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is here. In the question period today I mentioned the cost to the Canadian economy of this phony goal of 50 per cent Canadian ownership. We are trading David Rockefeller for Conrad Black. So what? What is the importance of this?

Mr. Blaikie: Big deal.
