To the feareder of Columbia, the home of freedom true.

Now, a length, his fame is blazoned in the tand his gentua earned.

And his name the highest, grandest on her deathless page is burned.

And when Time shall count her noblest from the heroes of the land, Chief among her gathered offspring shall Columbus proudly stand.

To the world's greatest benefactors we shall ever homage pay.

But Columbus, prince of heroes, is the name we sing to day.

Well, said Lady Catlerine, tears in her eyes for the second time. I believe, on second thought, that we noble people are never asked to take an oath. It's part of the floaves and fishes' business; we merely say 'upon my honor. I will do as you wish, and say nothing at all.'

It was her way to talk lightle on the floaves and to the sear dead of the sear dead of the control of t y nothing at all.'
It was her way to talk lightly on time, said Lady Catherine, looking a little bewildered, 'and hardly ever mentioned his name to me. I fancied you had not often met and does he tell you in that letter, Moy, that he loves you?'

'Yes,' cried Moy, happy tears filling her eyes. 'Oh, when I think of all he has suffered, and all the hard thoughts he must have had about me. I long to fly to him, bold though it may scund. Oh, Catherine, don't you pity us? Speak to me, Catherine.'

For her friend was looking at her with almost an expression of terror in her face. At last she spoke:

'Oh, Moy, my dear child, it is too late. How can I tell you? I only bear and her brother to come late. How can I tell you? I only bear and her brother to come spening fishing. 'Now,' bear at her brother to come late. How can I tell you? I only bear and her brother to come spening fishing. 'Now,' bear at her brother to come late. How can I tell you? I only bear did her brother to come spening fishing. Why have I done the thousand and one things I have but to get a chance of seeing you and speaking to you just alone like this in your own nome? Do you know now, I say, Miss Moy?'

Here Kitty brought in the tea Moy had ordered. Her young mistress said in a clear, haughty voice—'Anion of California; Married Women in Society; When Ireland was a Natior; a story of an old Christmastide, and Christmastide, and control of the subjects she felt the most. CHAPTER XXIII.

Moy had hardly said the last word when Mr. Hackney with one stride was beside her, and had seized her by the wrist, while he looked savagely in her face.

"Fim ! Tim O'Leary!" cried Moy. and the next instant Mr. Ilackney had crossed the room and stepper out of the window on to the lawn, as out of the window on to the lawn, as Tun threw the door of the dining-room wide open, and sprang in, the very personation of the old Irist Slogan—'Faugh a Ballagh.' As with flashing eyes he awept the room ready to 'clear the way' of Mr. Hackney's hateful presence, Moy heard that individual speaking in a burried voice to the driver of the car, the man having come back for orders.

Moy's one thought now was to stop
Tim from following up the retreating "Waere is he gone?' cried Tim,

But Tim was off before she had finished speaking, not through the window, but out through the hall and window, but out intought the back door.

'Where's he gone, Miss?' cried Kitty, who had followed close upon her lover's steps as he entered the room. Oh, M.ss,' she added, in an agony of fear, 'they'll kill each other!'

'Where, indeed, has be gone?' repeated Moy, for Tim, snatching a horsewhip, had disappeared out of the
