By the gods, she'll run us down!"

So she will, sir."

The stranger now approached nearer and nearer, until we were able to perceive that she was a clipper of much more tonnage than the Greyhound. Her look-outs, if any she had, evidently did not keep a good eye to wind ard, for she kept on her course which would bring her across our bows.—

A collision seemed inevitable, for at this moment I espied an iceberg on our weather bow. The only course of, action for us to pursue was to endeavor to pass the point we should meet before she came down upon us. One hing targets.

The sailors with the second mate, ran up the rigging, and lay out on the yard At this moment the look-out on the other ship caught sight of us, and her course was altered so that she could pass us, but it would prove a very " close shave."

In a few moments our main topsail swung out to the breeze; but at the same moment the top mast cracked, and as the men reached the deck, with a loud clear, shap, it parted from the mainmast, and lay over the side.

"Cut away that wreck!" cried the captain through his trumpet.

"Man overboard!" yelled one of the men. "Let him go !" answered the skipper. "The second mate's killed !" was the next

The weather was extremely cold, and ice in large quantities had collected on the deck. The rigging was one of ice; indeed, so completely frozen were the braces, that the cook was compelled to keep a cauldron of water continually boiling, to use in thawing the ice that collected on the mand in the brace blocks. The gale continued in all its fury, and it was evidently on the increase, but the Greyhound bore on with, as it were, a stern resolution never to say die.
