Encyclopedia Britannica. We live in a reading age, which is distinguished for the almost interminable multiplication of books.

Poetry. Sunshine and Shadow. Only a bank of weeds, of simple weeds, Of sweet wild thyme and yellow, scented brown.

Only a narrow mound, a long, low mound, Snow-covered, 'neath a winter, leaden sky.

Oh, golden bank, where sunbeams glint and play, Bloom out in fragrance with a hundred flowers!

Oh, narrow mound, keep till the Judgment day, The mournful secrets of these hearts of ours!

There is a light and love and sorrow fade, For 'neath his brightness both alike are shad.

More Bitter Than Death. (Continued.) She turned away from him. It was useless to tell him that life without her was living death—it was useless to appeal to him.

When the season was over they went back to Bainesdell. There could be no greater success than hers was.

There was a triumph and a home-party at Bainesdell—very little, Miss Rose Lorimer, the daughter of a distant cousin of Lord Lauraine.

It was a party of the kind which she had longed for, and she was glad to see her husband as dearly as ever, yet she was not every day the creature which he had done.

When she was relieved to find it was a burglar, he saw the beautiful face of the Earl's secretary, and he was glad to see her as he had done.

his papers were kept in the library; and just now his secretary, Mr. Danmore, was away.

The keys of the various drawers and safes were often left lying on the table; she must trust to chance, and some day, when Philip had gone out, she would look amongst his papers and see if there was no memorandum or note which would give her a clue as to where her child was.

If she found such a clue, she would start at once, regardless of consequences, and see him. If the Earl found out, she would submit to whatever punishment he chose to inflict. But she must see her child—the very strings of his heart seemed to draw her to him. She must see him or she would die.

She had to wait some days before an opportunity presented itself to her to search the library. One morning the Earl came to her and said— "I am going to drive over to Hillstone, Gladys; will you come with me? I shall be away the greater part of the day."

Her heart beat quickly; this was her opportunity—she must embrace it. She thanked him, but declined—the morning was warm, and she was not inclined to leave the house. He always admired her pretty imperious ways, and he never admired her more when she was better than when she asserted her own will. He touched her fair hair caressingly with his hand.

"I thought you always liked going out with me, Gladys," he said. "So I do; but I have something important to attend to this morning; Philip and I am not inclined to leave the house."

"You are quite sure that it is not because you love me less?" he asked. "To herself she thought, 'No, but it is because you love me more, aloud she said, 'I shall never love you less, Philip!'"

"Could you ever love me more?" he asked. "And again the sweet and eyes raised to his told their own story—how she would love him a thousand times more if he would give her back her child."

He read her thoughts, but he said nothing. Bending down, he kissed her lips and went away without a word. That hardened her in her purpose; if she had felt any scruples before, she had now none. The man who could expect her so entirely to forget her child could not be surprised if she tried to find out what he resolutely kept from her.

Yet she did not like her self-imposed task when she reached the library. The keys lay upon the table and there was no one in the room. She believed herself to be alone in that part of the house. She had forgotten that Albert Lauraine had not gone with the Earl.

She did not like her task; there was something about it not quite honorable; yet it was the only way in which she could hope to find news of Leo. She took up the keys and opened the drawer after drawer. He was better now. The man who could expect her so entirely to forget her child could not be surprised if she tried to find out what he resolutely kept from her.

She was so intent on her task that she did not perceive the door open. She did not know that any one had entered the room.

CHAPTER VIII. The little heir entered and grew. It was a strange fact that he should be like Leo; but he was. Both had the mother's beautiful form, rounded at the temples, with the blue veins showing under the white skin—both had the same golden-brown hair and sweet mouth.

When Lady Lauraine looked on Leo, she saw Leo; and when he was two years old, the age at which she had lost Leo, the likeness of her first-born was almost more than she could bear.

She had made a vow to herself, after the last scene—five years before—that she would never induce her to refer to the child again, because for many days afterwards Philip had not spoken to her, except for the ordinary civilities of the household. She loved him very dearly, and she had found his silence very hard to bear. It was a terrible thing to her that she should not have the love of her husband and child.

She had borne her love well until Leo had reached the age at which she had lost Leo, and then Gladys's anguish became intolerable. "Mamma" was so like Leo's; the way in which he kissed her and caressed her, the little clinging hands, the patting of the feet, the ordinary civilities of the household, all brought her deserted child as forcibly to her mind that her life was a misery to her.

While the Earl's heir was pampered and fondled, cradled in luxury, loved and worshipped, where was Leo? He had full faith in the Earl's honor. She felt sure that Leo was well cared for, well fed, well clothed; but who fondled him—whose hands held his at night when he said the simple prayers she had taught him—whose face bent over him when he woke at night frightened or ill—who kissed him in his childish troubles? Her heart yearned for him—she called his name aloud—she cried to Heaven to forgive her sin and give her back her child. Information that she might once more have her child. The subject was never mentioned now between husband and wife. He loved her with the same passionate love, but it never entered his mind to let her see her back her child. So time wore on, the Earl's love for his fair wife deepening mean while.

The passionate intensity of Gladys's desire to behold her child grew too strong to be borne. At last she felt that it would drive her mad or kill her. It was useless to ask her husband about her child. She would get her information. She surely possible find out all herself. Surely amongst his papers there must be a memorandum of where he had sent the child—there must be a note of money paid, or something of the kind. There could be no harm in looking through Philip's papers—the heart of her husband—she would have no secrets, save this one, from her. All

The Testament of Peter the Great. From the Russian Illustrated News. We hope that we shall be mistaken, but present indications are ominous of a war in Europe, provoked by Russia, before the year is out.

Correspondence.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions of our correspondents. A correspondent in the last Moscow, under pretence of giving you information which you had asked for relative to the Russian Atlantic Central Railway took occasion to show his animosity toward the road and those connected with it, and that he should have signed his communication with another word attached, should have added "nothing" to the end of "One who knows" for his letter proves that he knows nothing about the road, and I am very certain he does not know Mr. Stearns, if he did he would not say the road is "dead" and "dead"!!! Now I can read Mr. "One who knows" that arranged to have been made by which all have been remunerated for the services they have rendered, and that if the Government will throw no further obstacle in the way, it is probable that the road will be completed during the coming summer.

London, Jan. 24.—The distress in Ireland is intensifying, under the influence of a hard frost and a biting cold which, during the last four days, have succeeded mild weather, which had prevailed since Christmas. Paris and Vienna correspondents state that the proposed increase in the German army is attracting much attention at the moment. A correspondent says the increase is received in financial and liberal political circles with some apprehension, because it has been better to have necessary to carry it into effect.

The Tay Bridge Disaster.

DUNDEE, Jan. 7. ABOUT MORE BOOMS MOVING. It would appear that notwithstanding the want of success at first attending the towing operations, a considerable number of bodies were really lying in the water. The trawlers brought to the surface to-day no fewer than eight. All rises to the eastward of the bridge, and which at the time of the disaster would be so extensive above water, as the boats were not by a large and excited crowd, among whom were many of the relatives of the missing, and the bodies were identified almost immediately on their arrival at the mortuary.
