

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION—TWENTY EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

17 ELIZABETH II

VOLUME II, 1968

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF OCTOBER, 1968, TO THE THIRTY FIRST DAY OF OCTOBER, 1968, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 15, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m. PRIVILEGE

MR. MACINNIS (CAPE BRETON-EAST RICH-MOND)—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all hon. member of the house with reference to their efforts to obtain information from the government benches. It deals also with the question of the schedule for the attendance of ministers as provided by the government and the question of who is an acting minister and when he is an acting minister; because we have had an acting minister of public works while the actual minister was in his office on the third floor, and we have had an acting minister when the President of the Treasury Board was in his office on the floor below. It also involves the question of whether members are entitled to direct questions to ministers in capacities other than of departments they represent.

Here I would refer to a previous ruling in this house by Mr. Speaker on April 1, 1966. I quote from the fourth paragraph, second column, at page 3756 of Hansard for that date:

I still feel today just as strongly as I did a few days ago that it should not be the policy in the house that ministers be asked to answer questions, whether written questions or verbal questions, in any capacity other than in their official capacities.

It would follow, Mr. Speaker, that if members are denied the privilege of asking such questions, then no minister should be entitled to answer in any other capacity than in that of the department for which he is responsible.

On the question of acting ministers Mr. Speaker's ruling on April 1, 1966 went on to say:

While considering this matter in recent days it was brought to my attention—and I must say I understood this—that in some instances certain ministers are given areas of responsibility. For example, I might say that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner) in the present government is given, by acknowledgement on the part of the government, that portion of government responsibility in the realm of transport, is asked questions in that regard, and is expected to answer questions about the Department of Transport although he is not the Minister of Transport.

It would follow, Mr. Speaker, that rather than what happened on Friday last, when eight ministers were trying to answer questions that were correctly the responsibility of 29 ministers, acting ministers should be predesignated by the government. That, sir, is the interpretation, and rightly or wrongly I do not see any other possible interpretation that could be taken from Mr. Speaker's ruling of April 1, 1966.

With respect to the scheduling of the attendance of ministers, we all realize that this is an experiment which the government is conducting. But surely, Mr. Speaker, members of the government should acknowledge the fact that the experiment is not working. Today members received a release dated October 11, 1968, giving a revised schedule of attendance. But, Mr. Speaker, errors can clearly be seen in it which will make it very difficult for members of the opposition to obtain the information they may be seeking.

I wish to call the attention of the government to the fact that on Mondays the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Benson), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the minister of National Revenue (Mr. Coté) are all absent. I would think that normally in the absence of one of these ministers any one of the other three would be able to take his place in an acting capacity. Nevertheless all four are to be absent on Mondays. This means that questions in the realm of trade and commerce and finance would have to be taken by the government as notice for reply on another day. In this event it would not be possible to treat the questions as matters of urgency.

I referred to this matter of urgency previously. If any given member should have a question of urgent importance he could have to wait from Wednesday until Tuesday in order to have the question answered because the minister concerned would be absent on Thursday and Friday, This, as I say, again would remove it from the urgency bracket.

Attendance of Ministers in House

I might point out also in respect of the rescheduling that on Fridays the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) are absent, and this at a time when we have set up a committee involving both these departments. In respect of departments which relate closely one to another I might say that also on Fridays the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) are absent.

Mr. Speaker, I move this motion in order to bring about a more consistent approach by the government to its responsibility to the house, as has been the practice of past governments throughout the years.

I, therefore, move seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken):

That the matter of scheduling of ministers in the house and the general conditions affecting the daily question period be referred to the special committee on procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Chair can even consider putting the motion before the house there are a number of conditions which must be fulfilled. One is that the Chair must be satisfied that in the matter brought up by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) there is a prima facie question of privilege. Perhaps hon. members might like to enlighten the Chair on this particular point.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter raised by the hon. member received a good deal of attention on Friday during consideration of the estimates of the Privy Council. I do not believe we need repeat the arguments today.

However, two situations have arisen which affect the whole question. First, we no longer appear to have acting ministers in the house to replace those who are absent. On several occasions when a question was asked of the Prime Minister he consulted his roster and requested that the question be asked when the minister was present. This would indicate that no acting minister had been designated on that occasion. Likewise it has always been the practice, or at least the understanding, that when a minister is absent from Ottawa there would be an acting minister to take over his duties. The question the hon, member has raised is whether the absence of a minister from the chamber when he is actually within the precincts of the building is sufficient to necessitate having an acting minister in the chamber during the question period.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

There is also a question in respect of amending the duty roster which provides for a programmed absence by ministers who might logically be acting for others who are absent. For example, on Mondays the roster which has been distributed to us indicates that the ministers of finance, national revenue, industry and trade and commerce and the President of the Treasury Board will all be absent. Any one of those might logically be the acting minister prepared to accept questions in the general area of their responsibility. Likewise on Fridays the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General will be absent. Again the person who might logically be the acting minister will also be absent.

This whole question of acting ministers and their presence in the house is one that deserves scrutiny by the committee on procedure, in that there is a new situation which affects the rights of all members to direct questions to the members of the ministry. While this is not really part of the program, we have a special committee on procedure with the task at the moment of reviewing various reforms in our procedures. I believe we must take a much different approach to this whole matter of the question period. These are matters which are of concern to that committee. I think the motion which has been made is logical and fair under the circumstances.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the only question which I believe you are asked to deal with now is whether there is a matter of privilege involved. I think the simplest answer is that this whole matter is not dealt with specifically in the standing rules; hon. members are not deprived of any privilege in view of the fact that we have not altered any standing order which affects their privileges or rights.

Let me repeat once more that we are merely trying an experiment to find a solution to a situation which exists in fact. Ministers are bound to be away during a parliamentary session on matters pertaining to the administration and in discharge of their duties throughout the country. The purpose of this innovation is to ensure that there will always be ministers, acting ministers or parliamentary secretaries in the house on specific days who are able to answer in respect of subject matters falling within the jurisdiction and administration of those departments.

If while dealing with the substance of the matter, sir, you want to cut me short I will accept your suggestion, but perhaps I might be permitted to say on the substance of the matter, however, that members of the opposition have not all understood the intention of this change. The two hon. members opposite argued that we were in a difficult and untenable position because ministers might be in their offices upstairs and there would be no acting minister to answer for them. My reply is that it is not our intention, if a minister is in his office upstairs or attending a cabinet committee, which is more likely, to have an acting minister answer questions on the specific days when it is not intended that questions on departmental matters under the jurisdiction of that minister be answered during the question period. There would be no acting minister or parliamentary secretary speaking for that minister on specific days.

When a minister is away from Ottawa, or unable to attend for reasons of business or ill health on the days which have been attributed to that minister, members of the opposition know there will be an acting minister or a parliamentary secretary here to answer questions. Therefore the argument that it is improper to have an acting minister here if the minister is in his office does not really apply.

We do not intend to have an acting minister here on a day that is not a day set for a minister to answer questions in respect of his department or his responsibilities. Having regard to the suggestion that there might not be the right combination of ministers here on Mondays, for example, I can only say that we prepared to discuss this with opposition. If hon. members desire a different type of roster, so that on some days the Minister of Finance will be here whereas on other days the President of the Treasury Board will be here, we are prepared to be as accommodating as possible. The system is based upon a desire to ensure that the members of the opposition will have days on which they know they can obtain answers from the minister, if he is in Ottawa, and from an acting minister if the minister has been called away from Ottawa.

This is the basis of the proposed reform. I can only suggest again that we have not actually tried it for very long; therefore I would plead with members of the opposition not to oppose this system before they understand how it works. It is apparent from the two statements just made that they do not understand how we intend making it work.

Attendance of Ministers in House Mr. Bell: No one does.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, certainly you do not. Perhaps the system is a bit complicated, but it should not be beyond the ingenuity of members of the opposition to realize that to have 29 ministers here every day of the week just in case a question might happen to come their way, when they could be in their department or speaking to a cabinet committee—

Mr. Forrestall: Or golfing.

Mr. Trudeau: —would be an inefficient use of parliamentary resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Just because it has been done in that way for hundreds of years does not mean that we have to continue doing it in that way for hundreds of years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I think any type of profession, business or enterprise which every day of the week would require 29 members of a board of administration present when perhaps an average of only 10 or 12 were needed, would be an inefficient way of employing these people. It is also an inefficient way of employing the people the electors of Canada sent here to work for them. That is why we are proposing a more efficient use of these resources.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the question that arises is, have our privileges been interfered with? There can be no question of that. The Prime Minister unilaterally declared that the rules of parliament, as they now are, are not what he would like them to be, and therefore made a decision binding upon the house. This to me is an extraordinary position. I have not the reference before me, but I seem to recollect that the first prime minister of the United Kingdom, Sir Robert Walpole, took the stand that questions were out of order. That has not been parliamentary procedure in that country since the days of the Pitts, nor has it been in Canada from the earliest days of our parliamentary system.

What has happened? The Prime Minister says they have 29 ministers now, and that is so. There is a multiplicity of ministers. They are growing faster than rabbits. At the rate of increase we have seen in recent months I can Attendance of Ministers in House ministers over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad the Prime Minister applauds, because that is what I had in mind as being a reason for the increase. So they will all be placed in two categories; those who have achieved, and those who hope to achieve, having started as parliamentary secretaries.

What has happened in the last week or ten days? Simply the government has decided that we shall not have our rights under the rules except as the Prime Minister may designate. It is natural that ministers will be absent. It is expected that from time to time they will be away on business and will not be able to be here. But, sir, when they are in Ottawa and this house is in session, during the period that is called the period of the orders of the day they should be here. Already the roster of ministers has had to be altered. What has happened in the last week or ten days has made a nightmare of the parliamentary rules in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to hear the backbenchers jeer, but this is a fact. I have sat on both sides of the house, and I know there is nothing more trying than wondering day after day what the opposition is going to raise that day. I had that experience when the opposition was very small in number, but we did not try to throttle them. I can recall certain members whom I can call by name now, such as Mr. Pearson, Mr. Martin and Mr. Pickersgill, who made our lives far from enjoyable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The applause from the back benches indicates that what was right when we were in government is wrong now that they are in government. I appreciate their assistance in clarifying the situation.

This system is wrong. I think in his heart of hearts, as he realizes the responsibility of the prime ministership and what it entails, the Prime Minister is beginning to realize that this system makes a caricature of the rules. It should certainly be referred to a committee. I would not have supported this in the beginning. I would have said that we as members have the right to demand that such see the day when they will practically all be matters be decided by the House of Commons, not by a coterie within the government. But the hon, member who made the motion and the seconder of the motion want to refer the matter to the committee on procedure. I say this has all the earmarks of translation into actuality of the immortal words of the Prime Minister last February following the defeat of the government when he said in effect, "We are your masters". Sir, we do not intend to be the government's servants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made one point quite clear to us. He has made it in two ways. First, when he submitted to us the revised roster of attendance he made it clear that on certain days there is to be in the house no minister for certain departments, as for example when the Minister of Transport and the Minister without Portfolio from Winnipeg are both absent on the same days. Second, he has made it clear in his statement today that the intention is that questions may be directed respecting certain departments only on certain days. I see the Prime Minister nodding his head that I am stating correctly what he is trying to do.

I will not repeat the things I have said before about what I think this does to the question period, but rather will simply refer in these few remarks to the kind of facts that you, Mr. Speaker, have to deal with in ruling on this question of privilege. The question which faces Your Honour is whether the government by itself, unilaterally, has the right to make this kind of change, to tell the house that for whatever period of time this system is in effect we may ask questions of certain ministers only on certain days.

The Prime Minister says no rule is being changed, and in a technical sense he could substantiate that point. The rule which I must cite, I must admit, is not as clear as we thought it was when we drafted it. I say "we" because it is a contemporary rule that has been introduced in our generation. I refer to standing order 39(5), which reads:

Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, questions on matters of urgency may be addressed orally to ministers of the crown-

There are many more words in addition about what Mr. Speaker may do if he feels the questions are not urgent, and so on. However, the pith of this order, so far as this discussion is concerned, relates to the right of members to address questions orally to ministers of the crown.

I suppose we will have to consult language specialists, lawyers, and all the other experts as to what that means. Certainly this rule does not refer to some ministers of the crown. It does not say a few ministers of the crown. It does not say those ministers of the crown that the Prime Minister permits to be here. It says that before the orders of the day are proceeded with, and this is under the routine proceedings for every day of the week, members may address questions orally to ministers of the crown.

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, this is not an old rule. For 95 years or more in this parliament's history we did not have any rule that provided for questions before orders of the day. The practice or tradition of asking questions at this time had become so imbedded in our parliamentary way of life that we regularized it by this temporary rule which was introduced three or four years ago. When we drafted it we certainly had no thought that we were drafting a rule covering certain ministers only on certain days. During the few years the rule has been in effect we have had the right to ask questions every day of any minister of the crown.

I submit that for the government to decree that on certain days certain ministers are not going to be here is to deny to members of the house a right that is theirs by practice, a right that is theirs by direction of this standing order. I must admit that the standing order does not say "any and all" ministers of the crown. I suppose that is the sort of argument that will be used. However, the rule does not say, either, that we can ask questions only of those ministers who happen to be here, only of those ministers the Prime Minister permits to be here, or only of certain ministers on certain days. The standing order says that on every day we have a right to address questions to ministers of the crown. I submit that if the government is cutting down on that right, taking away from that right to any extent at all, it is interfering with the privileges of the house.

As Your Honour knows, this whole question of defining privileges is as difficult a one as you have to deal with in the chair. However, there are some interesting words in citation 108(1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads:

Anything which may be considered a contempt of court by a tribunal, is a breach of privilege if 29180—73

Attendance of Ministers in House perpetrated against parliament, such as wilful disobedience to, or open disrespect of, the valid rules, orders or process—

I submit that this action of the government in saying that some of its ministers will not be here on certain days of the week, whether or not we want them, is open disrespect of the valid rules, orders or process of this house. The citation continues:

-or the dignity and authority of the house-

There is no doubt that the dignity of the house has suffered as a result of this action.

I continue reading:

—whether by disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent language, or behaviour, or other disturbing conduct, or by a mere failure to obey this order.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the clear meaning of standing order 39(5) is that this whole house has decreed that members have a right to ask questions of ministers of the crown, and that means all the ministers. I submit that if this right is being curtailed or interfered with by fiat by the Prime Minister, then it is a matter of privilege; that something is being perpetrated against this house that we ought not to have to take.

It seems to me that in this discussion, comments about the merits of the proposal are irrelevant. Having said that, however, I do want to echo the sentiment that has been expressed a good many times, namely that it seems strange for this to be done unilaterally the day after the house agreed to setting up the procedure committee. I think a good deal of the trouble we have had has come from the way this action has been taken.

What Your Honour is faced with right now is the problem, have the privileges of the house been interfered with? The rule under which we operate is a modern rule, not something 100 years old. It is a rule which was established only three or four years ago. Those clearly defined rights are being interfered with, and in that sense action has been taken which is against the privileges of this house.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): The sole question before the house at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I respectfully submit that the matter which has been discussed since the opening of the sitting today is not a matter of privilege but rather a matter of the opposition indicating it does not like a practice that has been started in the house. If their view is correct, then it is arguable by them as a matter of confidence which would warrant them taking appropriate action by way of a want of confidence motion at the appropriate time. This is the system of government we have. Whether the non-attendance of certain ministers on certain days is desirable is for the members of parliament, and ultimately for the electorate to decide. It is not right to argue that it is a question of privilege affecting hon. members. It is a matter of the government using the time of its ministers in the most efficient way in the interests of the government and the country.

It is not so many years ago that we had a government, which members of the official opposition should remember or at least read about, which appointed ministers from the other place. Those ministers not only were not in this chamber to answer questions, but were not able to come into this chamber at all.

Hon. members opposite are arguing that the rules should provide what the internal distribution of ministers should be in relation to their duties. With great deference I say that is not our parliamentary system. The Prime Minister may well wish to have certain of his ministers in another part of the country today at some very important national function. If the argument of hon. members prevailed, that would be a breach of the privileges of the house; they could not go. They would have to be here to answer questions. Surely the Prime Minister and the government must have control of the attendance of ministers, and if those ministers do not appear in the chamber of the house when it is thought proper they should, that is a matter for the commons to indicate by way of a lack of confidence motion. It is something which, if it were pursued, would be a matter concerning lack of confidence, and the way to indicate this disapproval would be by a want of confidence motion.

I also want to address myself for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the argument about rule 39. Rule 39 has no bearing on the question one way or the other. Rule 39 (5) which was quoted by the hon. gentleman was put in at his instigation in order to provide the point of time during our daily proceedings for the asking of oral questions. The rule goes on to provide that if in certain circumstances the answers received are not satisfactory, an hon. member may take action by way of what we proceedings on the motion for adjournment. deplored. Looking at the revised list given us

That is the effect of rule 39. The significance of the words "at this stage" to be found throughout rule 39 is that it is the point in time at which oral questions may be asked. The rule does not deal with or attempt to designate the individual ministers who will be available in the house to answer questions. Hon. members are still free to put such questions as they wish at any time they wish provided it is at this period in the day.

There is one other question, Mr. Speaker. Surely the efficiency of parliament, its reputation and its acceptance in the country, are not to be improved by the commons seeking to turn itself into an administrative body to manage the internal affairs of the government. Surely the efficiency of parliament is something for which the government must answer. The requirements of our time demand that the government seek to use the time of its ministers to the best advantage of the country and of parliament itself. Using its time to the best advantage of parliament is not, I submit, to demand that the 29 ministers be here during the question hour each day of each week. At a rate of questioning of two questions per month it is neither necessary nor desirable in the interests of the country or in the interests of the government of the country to keep a minister in this chamber during every one of the 23 sitting days we have had so far.

The proposition, Mr. Speaker, with deference to the argument of the opposition, is not only ridiculous on its merits but clearly illustrates that the matter is not one of privilege but one of the internal administration of government, for which of course the government is always answerable to the house and ultimately to the voters.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the government could have avoided all our criticisms today and last week, and those in the newspapers, about the new proposal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dealing with the schedule of attendance of ministers in the house. Since that procedure was imposed on us, it has been obvious that the house, except for some government members, is not happy.

In the past, the poor attendance of hon. members in the opposition as well as on the side of the government in office was criticized on various occasions, and today the adoption of a schedule according to which ministers now call in the vernacular the late show, the will automatically be absent from the house is this morning, I notice that on Monday, 11 out of 29 ministers will be in the house, on Tuesday, there will be 13, on Thursday, 18, and on Friday, 14; an average of 14 ministers for these four days.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Attendance of Ministers in House

An hon. Member: And Wednesday?

Mr. Rondeau: On Wednesday, all ministers are supposed to be in the house. But last week, we noticed that many ministers whose names were on the list for Wednesday were absent; that is why I say that within a few weeks, when we will be used to this timetable, the average will not be 14 ministers out of 29 in the house, but there will be fewer than 10 of them, so that we will have an average of one minister out of 3 in the house every day. This means a very weak representation of those responsible for the various departments.

Mr. Speaker, in this connection, I should like to quote an article published in the newspaper Dimanche-Matin, of October 13:

The case of the Minister of Transport, Mr. Paul Hellyer, is typical. This minister administers the largest department in the country. Furthermore, he is responsible for the housing policy. To that end, he conducts personally an inquiry across the country.

Half of the questions asked in the house deal with transportation problems or housing problems. At the present time, the minister is unable to sit in the house the three days assigned to him. Several Liberals are quite unhappy with the Prime Minister's decision.

I think that the motion to refer that decision to the committee on procedure should be passed, because had that decision not been taken unilaterally by the right hon. Prime Minister, he might have avoided all the criticisms put forward up to now, or in the future. We would thus have saved the house considerable time to end up probably with the same results, while the committee on procedure will have to decide in the last resort upon a procedure with regard to the attendance of the ministers in the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not my desire to limit the contributions to this debate, but I have the impression that I have heard most of the arguments for and against the motion, be they valid, invalid, relevant or irrelevant. However, I am pleased to hear hon. members who feel they may have something new to add to the debate.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the discussion of this important question of privilege, but there is one matter that I think has not been brought to Your Honour's attention. It is this. This afternoon, if I heard the right hon. gentleman correctly, the Prime Minister clarified the position of the government inasmuch as he pointed out in his remarks that it was not the intention of the government to have questions directed to certain departments of government on certain sitting days of this house, something which perhaps was not clear before.

Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that this creates a dilemma under our rules. It has always been my understanding in the years I have been in this house that questions on the orders of the day must have two basic qualifications: first, they must be urgent; second, they must be of national importance.

The schedule that has been distributed by the government house leader to all hon. members of the house indicates that on Mondays and Tuesdays of each week the Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary secretary will not be present to answer questions. As a result, Mr. Speaker, an anomaly is created. For example, following the rule of urgency, recently a number of questions were asked in the house of the Minister of Agriculture in connection with imports of corn from the United States and their effect on the Canadian market. This, Mr. Speaker, is an urgent matter; the price of corn in this country fluctuates daily and affects the livelihood of many people in Canada.

Last Friday the Minister of Agriculture was asked what remedies were being proposed to meet this problem and the minister replied to the effect that discussions were taking place with the government of the United States of America and that he hoped some recommendations would be ready very soon.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Well, Your Honour, that was last Friday. It is now Tuesday and the Minister of Agriculture is not in the house, nor would he have been in the house yesterday, according to the rota, if we had been sitting. It is true he will be here tomorrow unless, of course, he is prevented by government duties elsewhere.

Mr. Knowles: He will be here later today to deal with his legislation.

Mr. Nesbitt: We have seen that other ministers who are supposed to be here do not Canadian farmers.

Attendance of Ministers in House of grain. It affects not only corn but other varieties of grain, yet no question can be put to the minister from Friday until the following Wednesday, at least. This situation could lead to a great deal of disturbance and uncertainty in markets affecting the livelihood of

Then again, by the time the minister returns, if he is not permitted to answer for a number of days, a great many developments may have taken place and the element of urgency may have gone. Indeed, it might be easier and faster to get an answer by placing a question on the order paper than by raising it in the house.

While I am on my feet there are one or two other items on which I should like to comment, since they were mentioned by the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General pointed out that a few years ago in the days of another government, not of his party, members of the other place took part in the administration and could not, therefore, answer questions in this house. I can only reply that I was a member of this house in 1954 when Hon. Mr. Marler was minister of transport and served in that capacity for a long time before the government of the day was able to find him a seat in this chamber.

The Solicitor General then told us it was not reasonable that 29 ministers should be required to be here every day when they might well be needed to attend to urgent government business elsewhere. No would suggest that all ministers should be present every day. It was my understanding several years ago when the post of parliamentary secretary was created and, prior to that, when the position of parliamentary assistant was established, that hon. members so designated were appointed for the very purpose of answering questions in this house on behalf of their ministers when their ministers were engaged on business elsewhere. I pass this on for Your Honour's consideration.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): I shall be very brief. If I say this change is unpopular with the opposition I may be right, but the question before Your Honour is not to decide whether it is popular, but whether it is an interference with privilege. If the opposition could point to a rule which says that all ministers shall be present in the house during attend. My point is that here is a matter of have some justification for saying that it conurgent national importance involving imports stitutes an interference with privilege. But there is no such rule.

> Nor is there a rule that any minister must answer questions addressed to him. A question may be directed to a minister, but he need not answer it.

Mr. Baldwin: Don't tell us that.

Mr. Otto: In these two brief comments I have made I believe lie the answers to the motion which is proposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), who has just resumed his seat, reminds us that nothing in our rules states that a minister must be in the house. In that case, could the hon. member also point out that no section in the standing orders makes it compulsory for a member to be in the house? A member might be in his office as well as a minister, but that is not the point.

The motion before us wants to refer this matter to the committee on procedure. Now, before this approach was introduced or imposed on us by the new Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) everyone had noticed that all the ministers were not necessarily in the house, but that when a minister was absent, his acting minister or his parliamentary secretary could answer questions.

Now, with the new rule, in the minister's absence, the whole department disappears. If the minister is not in the house but in his office in Ottawa, then his parliamentary secretary or the acting minister has the right to answer. Why do we not follow the same procedure as before? This would not require that all ministers be present at the same time. When a minister had to be away, outside the house, somebody else could answer us. But today, even though the Prime Minister has told us that the rules have not changed, I say that they have. What happens is that there is only one day in the week, on Wednesday, when we can ask questions of any minister. Even if a minister is not in the house, we are allowed to ask him questions, because he is supposed to be present, and in his absence, our questions will be answered by his parliamentary secretary or the acting minister.

But if the minister is absent on a day when he is allowed to be, the acting minister can sit in his place and stay as mute as a fish. Indeed, his parliamentary secretary can also the question period, then Your Honour might stay as mute as a fish, while holding all the information. That is what we want to change or not change. Very well, let the minister be absent; but let the acting minister or his parliamentary secretary answer the questions of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the government, which feels that it holds the majority is not acting according to usage. A while ago, the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) said: Let us have a vote of confidence. A majority government can exist for three years but we have no guarantee that the situation will be the same in three years. Furthermore, that pretext must not be used to reply arrogantly to the opposition, for we are the representatives of the people. As members of the opposition, we have the right to put questions to the ministers—whether they are in the house or not-but the questions of the opposition should be answered.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their assistance in connection with the motion proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. I may say it would have been easier for me to have reached a decision nearly an hour ago, but having heard the sound arguments presented by hon. members both in favour of the motion and in opposition to it I am wondering whether it would not be wise for me to give the matter some additional thought and postpone a decision.

I may say that the provisions of citation 104 of Beauchesne, paragraph 5, occurred to me immediately. I read as follows:

As a motion taken at the time for matters of privilege is thereby given precedence over the prearranged program of public business, the Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed, and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.

The question of raising the matter at the first opportunity is defined further in subparagraph 3 of the same citation. The allusion there is to a matter which occurred during a recess; it was refused precedence because it was not raised on the first day of the session. If hon, members study the precedents they will find that Speakers have always enforced this aspect of a motion on a question of privilege rather stringently, and I am somewhat concerned about this procedural aspect in determining whether this motion should be allowed.

Another difficulty I find arises in connection with the motion itself. The motion moved evolved into the Canadian atomic energy pro-question of privilege, and I have the impression that perhaps the wording as submitted to the house, inasmuch as the hon. member and those who supported him have suggested that this matter be referred to the special committee on procedure, makes it a substantive motion and therefore subject to the limitations of standing order 41. This is another difficulty with which I am faced.

In any event, if hon. members will allow me I will take the matter under advisement, seek the guidance of the Holy Ghost, and render a decision.

ATOMIC ENERGY

CO-OPERATION BETWEEN FRENCH AND CANADIAN AGENCIES RESPECTING NUCLEAR POWER REACTORS

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware of the close and cordial association that has existed for many years between the national atomic energy agencies of France and of Canada, the Commissariat à l'Energie Atomique, and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I am pleased to inform the house that this association has now moved a further step forward with the conclusion by the C.E.A. and A.E.C.L. of an agreement to extend the co-operation between them in research and development and in information exchanges relating to water cooled, heavy water moderated nuclear power reactors.

The agreement provides for the exchange of existing technical information in this field and that which will be obtained during the next five years from A.E.C.L. and C.E.A. programs. The parties will also assist each other in the development of nuclear power reactor systems of this type. The exchange does not include full design details of specific nuclear power stations such as the Douglas Point, Pickering and Gentilly nuclear power stations in Canada and the EL-4 power station in France.

The agreement includes the exchange of information of commercial value and, as a consequence, provides a payment by the C.E.A. to A.E.C.L. to balance the agreed difference in value of the initial exchange of technology.

Co-operation between A.E.C.L. and the C.E.A. dates from the second world war, when French, British and Canadian scientists worked together in Canada to launch what by the hon, member is an essential part of the gram. The first heavy water for the early Canada by French scientists.

Although close scientific ties have been maintained between the two organizations since that time, the extent of technical cooperation was limited primarily because the French had concentrated on the development of the gas-cooled type of nuclear power system, a system that is not in the Canadian program. However, with a growing interest on the part of C.E.A. in the water cooled, heavy water moderated reactor systems, coupled with an extensive C.E.A. development program, particularly in materials research, it became clear that expanded technical cooperation between A.E.C.L. and C.E.A. would be of mutual benefit. Both parties are looking forward to an active program and closer ties involving exchanges of technical personnel as well as information and technical data.

The Canadian nuclear power system—we call it CANDU, short for Canada Deuterium Uranium-has a number of important features, foremost of which is its efficient use of uranium as fuel. For a natural uranium, heavy water reactor of the CANDU type, the fuel cost is far below-by as much as 50 per cent or more—that of reactors of comparable size burning enriched uranium.

Should the price of uranium increase, the fuel cost differential becomes even greater, for the CANDU reactor requires only about one-third as much uranium for its initial charge as does an enriched reactor and from one-half to two-thirds as much fuel in the course of its lifetime.

Another important feature of the natural uranium system is that it does not tie the user to a specific source of fuel, as is the case with enriched uranium reactors where the U.S.A. is the only practical source today for most of the world. Many countries have indigenous supplies of uranium on which they can draw; for others uranium is widely available, at competitive prices, on the world market.

So efficient is the CANDU system that the spent fuel can be simply and safely consigned to storage and treated as waste. However, it does contain a by-product-plutonium-which very definitely is an asset and, when conditions warrant, can be reprocessed and burned as fuel in CANDU reactors, or can be sold if it is more profitable to do so. The fact that the CANDU type of reactor produces a substantial amount of plutonium and can make efficient use of plutonium on a recycle basis is another attractive feature of the system. In addition, because of the characteristics of heavy water, thorium-another potential Canadian reactor experiments was brought to nuclear fuel—can be economically introduced as uranium resources diminish or become more expensive, thus ensuring adequate energy reserves far into the future.

> Competitive electric power costs from the CANDU system, coupled with the very low fuel costs of the natural uranium reactor, the independence of fuel supply through the life of the plant and the flexibility of the fuel cycle which allows efficient burning of not only the initial uranium but later the plutonium produced and eventually the abundant reserves of thorium, have made this system appear attractive to many areas of the world. A.E.C.L. has a vigorous international power reactor marketing program under way and prospects of sales in several areas of the world are very promising.

> Canada has long been acknowledged as a world leader in the development of heavy water moderated reactors. Other countries, however—notably Britain, the Republic of Germany, Sweden, Japan and Italy—have embarked on significant heavy water reactor programs. The British have developed for domestic and export use a reactor concept which uses boiling light water as the coolant and slightly enriched uranium as the fuel and has, I understand, a natural uranium fuel version now in the final design stage.

> Japan is developing its own heavy water moderated reactor which may, in its final form, be similar to Gentilly, the CANDU/ B.L.W. station under construction in the province of Quebec.

> The Federal Republic of Germany has successfully offered a heavy water moderated, natural uranium fuelled reactor for sale in Argentina and is vigorously trying to market similar units in other countries.

> In Italy a concept similar to the Gentilly station is under development, and co-operative programs between Canada and Italy in specific field are being considered. A.E.C.L. will be bidding next year on a large nuclear station for installation in Italy, using a reactor similar to the Pickering units.

> In the light of these developments abroad, I am sure the house will recognize the significance of French interest in the Canadian nuclear power system, and of the agreement extend appreciably the co-operation between Canada and France in the field of nuclear power. I am therefore taking this first opportunity of making this announcement in the house, this announcement being made at the same moment in France.

[Mr. Greene.]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): wait for an explanation concerning what Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement has indicated that an agreement has been made for the exchange of information on atomic energy between France and Canada. Beyond that his statement was a nice lecture on the basics of our nuclear reactor power program, and for the life of me I could not see the purpose of most of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Aiken: I felt that the minister was trying to build up a case for something, but the action never came. While the announcement itself may be very significant it was not expanded upon in any way by which we could understand what the agreement really

• (3:40 p.m.)

In view of our admitted superiority in water cooled, heavy water moderated reactors I am sure there will be a good deal of information passed from Canada to France. Presumably this is a business arrangement, but the statement leaves several things unanswered. First, what information will come from France to Canada in this exchange? France, apparently, has no technology in the field of heavy water moderated reactors. Second, are we in Canada considering a gas cooled type of reactor such as France has developed? The statement would seem to indicate that that is not the case. Third, what is the basis of payment for information we will provide to France? The statement has been made that there will be some adjustment. It seems most difficult to calculate what would be the basis of payment for such an exchange of information. We have sold 20 years of development research in the heavy water reactor field and it would seem to me to be very difficult to calculate a financial return. This is unexplained in the long statement the minister has made. A number of other things have been explained, but they did not go to the real meat of the issue.

Finally, I should like to know whether the government has some real prospect of selling natural uranium heavy water power units to France or is this merely a service to accompany our sales of uranium? To the extent that the exchange may improve our opportunity for sales of nuclear power units and the fuel for them we welcome the statement. If this exchange will assist in the development of peaceful uses for atomic energy it is also a useful step. However, no such objectives were set forth in the statement and we can merely exchange of information will develop and what prices will be paid for it.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, what is strange about this ministerial statement is that although it is quite long it does not elaborate or define with any precision the nature of the agreement governing this exchange of information. It would seem that the greater part of the statement was given over to an explanation concerning the ways in which the Canadian nuclear power system is better in terms of cost and cost efficiency than the nuclear power systems of others countries. That would seem to be rather aside from the point in respect of the subject matter of which we are being asked to take note today.

I have two brief comments I should like to make in connection with the substance of this statement. The first is a comment of approval of what is being done. The other is a comment of disapproval. In a general way what the minister has announced today is a welcome development, not only in terms of its prospects with regard to the advancement of scientific knowledge in this field but also perhaps in terms of diplomatic relations between the two countries involved. This might enable both countries, without sacrificing any of the quality or quantity of their science research, to realize savings by avoiding in some way some duplication of effort.

I believe hon, members must bear in mind that over the past decade or more there has been some criticism voiced to the effect that Canada has been spending a disproportionate amount of time, effort and money on research in high energy physics. Any step we can take, without sacrificing the quality of this research, to minimize or reduce expenditures in this field should be welcomed.

The second element of the statement on which I wish to comment has to do with the reference to the fact that some monetary consideration is involved. There is a provision in the agreement for a payment by the atomic energy authority in France to our atomic energy commission. In this connection I should like to say that the fact that up until now there has been a non-availability of information relative to cost or financing as between Canada and other countries is a matter of regret. I noticed a few days ago that one of the metropolitan newspapers in this country commented editorially on the fact that members of this house were refused information concerning the financial transaction involved in the sale of plutonium by Canada to France. In a like manner, when there is to be an agreement for the exchange of technical scientific information with an accompanying financial transaction, apparently we are not to receive any information concerning how much is involved.

I wish to take this opportunity to say that this is an undesirable development in respect of which the battle will have to be joined some time soon. The government can have no excuse, unless security or the defence of the state is involved, for withholding mundane information like the amount of money that is to change hands.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement is causing confusion rather than making matters clear.

First, he says, towards the end of his statement:

In the light of these developments abroad, I am sure the house will recognize the significance of French interest in the Canadian nuclear power system, and of the agreement to extend appreciably the co-operation between Canada and France in the field of nuclear power.

As the spokesman for the official opposition party pointed out a while ago, what do we get from France in return for the information we are giving her on atomic energy?

At the outset of his statement the minister states and I quote:

The first heavy water for the early Canadian reactor experiments was brought to Canada by French scientists.

The fact remains that France never used such a method and the statement says that the French had primarily concentrated on the development of the gas-cooled type system, which costs twice as much as the Canadian cooling system. In fact, it says here:

—a system that is not in the Canadian program.

—as regards the French system.

Then instead of reading us a five-page document to tell us that there are unilateral exchanges, that we are going to supply information being unaware of what we will receive, the minister should consult his experts and tell us what France is offering us in return for what we have to offer her. We are going to help her. Mind you, I have no objection to helping France, far from it—however, we ought to know what we will get in return. Can French technicians supply us with better information than that we have had up to now, in Canada, in the electronuclear field, or shall we simply be satisfied to supply information, even if we get nothing in return. It would be advisable, in my opinion, for the minister to consult his experts, as I said earlier, and to make a clearer, more specific, more intelligible statement for the benefit of the house. Mr. Speaker, rhetorical statements, are all very well, but they do not help to get things done.

If there are any exchanges, what are they? I think that Canada has the right to know.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

PROVISION FOR LABELLING OF POTENTIALLY DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved the first reading of Bill No. C-118, concerning the labelling of hazardous household products.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is simply to require the labelling of hazardous products, particularly detergents, as being potentially dangerous to the health of those who may accidentally ingest or inhale them, notably children and housewives.

NATIONAL TRADE MARK AND TRUE LABELLING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LABELLING OF CLOTHING FIBRES

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved the first reading of Bill No. C-119, to amend the National Trade Mark and True Labelling Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require garment manufacturers to clearly label their products with the true fibre content. This is important for two reasons, first, in respect of dry cleaning. Unless garments are properly marked dry cleaners do not know how they should be handled having regard to fibre content. The second reason is inflammability. It is a scandal that in Canada children's garments are being sold which are inflammable when there is no indication of this on the labels.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway to make capital expenditures including investment in securities of affiliated companies in the calendar year 1968 not exceeding in the aggregate $264,400,000, to make capital expenditures in the first six months of the calendar year 1969 not exceeding in the aggregate $75,000,000 for discharging obligations incurred prior to the 1st day of January, 1969, to enter into contracts prior to the 1st day of July, 1969, for equipment, additions and conversions requiring payments after the calendar year 1968 not exceeding $90,000,000, to borrow either from Her Majesty or by means of issues of securities guaranteed by Her Majesty an amount not exceeding $75,000,000 for investing in securities of Air Canada and a further amount not exceeding $16 .-000,000 for construction of branch lines; to authorize Her Majesty to make loans directly to Air Canada or to guarantee issues of securities of Air Canada not exceeding $130,000,000 for discharging obligations of the airline that become due and payable prior to the 1st day of July 1969; to authorize Her Majesty to continue to purchase until December 31st, 1969, Canadian National Railway Company 4 per cent preferred stock in an annual amount not exceeding 3 per cent of the gross revenues of the company; to extend until December 31, 1969, the moratorium on interest on the loan of $100,000,000 to the company authorized by the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952; to authorize Her Majesty to make loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and Air Canada to meet deficiencies in operating revenues to June 30, 1969, any such loans to be repaid from revenues of the railway company and Air Canada or, if revenues prove insufficient, by subsequent deficit appropriation by Parliament.

FINANCE

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INTER-NATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND EXCHANGE FUND ACCOUNT

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act so as to enable Canada to participate in a new arrangement in the International Monetary Fund to create new reserve assets that would supplement gold and reserve currencies in the participating countries foreign exchange reserves and would effect certain administrative and operational changes

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify a number of urgent matters of national importance surrounding the Roberts Bank port development, is the Prime Minister in a position today to tell the house in what respects of this development the federal government proposes to exercise jurisdiction and what respects it proposes to leave to provincial control?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is an area of joint jurisdiction, as the hon. member has suggested. We propose to exercise jurisdiction in all areas coming under federal jurisdiction and leave to provincial control those matters under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport prepared to make a full statement this week indicating where the government of Canada proposes to exercise jurisdiction? In particular, could the Prime Minister or the responsible minister indicate whether the government of Canada has agreed with the province of British Columbia that the province shall have jurisdiction over the proposed railway link from the port to existing railways under federal jurisdiction and, if so, what assurance has the government of Canada received from the provincial government in respect of access to this port over a provincially controlled railway? This is of obvious national concern.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure the Minister of Transport is prepared to consider making a statement in this regard on a day he is in the house.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government, when considering the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, will also take into consideration that under section 92(10)(c) of the British North America Act there is provision for federal intervention in this field?

WHEAT—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING SALES TO CHINA AND RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport will the Prime Minister tell the house when negotiations will commence in regard to sales of wheat to China and Russia?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be in the house on one of the following days.

Mr. Gleave: Will the Prime Minister also ask the minister to make a statement on motions as to the outcome of the recent deliberations of the international wheat council in regard to maintenance of minimum prices under the international grains arrangement?

Mr. Trudeau: I would prefer to let the hon. member ask the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA-SALE OF ARMS BY GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell us whether his government has made representations to Great Britain asking her to stop its sales of offensive weapons to the federal Nigerian troops?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister answered the same question the other day.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has the minister protested to Russia against the sale of offensive weapons to Nigerian troops?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INDIAN HEALTH SERVICES—DISPENSING OF DRUGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, what action does the Minister of National Health and Welfare plan to improve drug dispensing to Indians, in view of the very inadequate knowledge exhibited by these people on a television program last Sunday night?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in a statement I made earlier in the house, this whole program is under review. More resources are being made available for the dispensing of drugs to Indians, and we hope the situation will improve in the future.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, does the minister have cause now to reflect on the assurance he gave in the house on October 2 that lay dispensers are operating only under the effective direction of qualified nurses with whom they can be in easy communication?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition will check my statement I am sure he will realize I did not say that. I did say that lay dispensers were to be ministers' wives, certain Indians, and school teachers as well as nurses. That was clearly my statement. I also indicated that in some of these isolated communities where there are very few people the quality of these services being provided to Indians are not even made available to white communities, in similar circumstances, so there can be no suggestion of discrimination. I might add that the services in this regard are often superior to those offered other people in some communities.

We are looking into the allegation on Sunday night to the effect that there were lay dispensers who could not even read, to which I believe the Leader of the Opposition has referred. The dispensing program has been going on for about 50 years and in the overall picture it is working out very well.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in order to arrest the deaths and suffering now occurring will the minister introduce special emergency measures to improve the lay dispensers program while this review is in progress?

Mr. Munro: We are both extending and improving this program at the same time.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A few minutes ago I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he had cause to retract the assurance he gave the house on October 2 that lay dispensers were operating as qualified nurses. He suggested to the house he had said something different. I direct the minister's attention to the following sentence on page 693 of Hansard, and I relate my question to it:

The dispensers are trained to give first aid and may dispense simple drugs only on the directions of the nurses in the area with whom they get in contact by telephone to have prescriptions given. If the case is serious the nurse has the patient sent in to the nearest nursing station.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition. I thought he was referring to the lay dispensers themselves being registered nurses.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister now state whether he has cause to retract this statement?

Mr. Munro: I have no cause to retract because I do not know to what incident the Leader of the Opposition is referring. If he is saying that lay dispensers have dispensed drugs without such direction, I wish he would cite a specific instance and I will look into it.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister gave an assurance to the house on October 2. Is he standing by that assurance?

Mr. Munro: Yes, I am, Mr. Speaker. If some incident has come to light which would indicate this is not the case and the Leader of the Opposition would point it out, I would look into it right away.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence, in the ministerial charade, of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the very serious situation on the prairies, brought about as a result of climatic conditions, is an investigation or assessment by the Department of Agriculture or other departments now taking place to ascertain what action can be taken in order to assist the western farmers in a situation that has assumed almost catastrophic proportions?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister of Agriculture would be delighted to answer this question when he is in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is here, and my question covered two departments. I ask the Prime Minister, is he not in a position to let the house know something about this question, in the absence of the two ministers? Surely parliament is entitled to a better attempt at an answer than that. I say with great respect to the Prime Minister that he is playing with parliament by answering in this way.

Mr. Trudeau: I will make an attempt at a better answer, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman asked a question about what was happening in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Trudeau: And in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am sure the right hon. gentleman knows there are two ministers who know what is going on in those departments better than I do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If that is the best answer the Prime Minister can give, it shows the wrongness of what he has done.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC—COVERAGE GIVEN FORMATION OF SEPARATIST PARTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Everyone knows—and he must, too—that two important conventions took place in the province of Quebec last week-end: that which saw the creation of a new provincial political party and that of the Ralliement Créditiste.

Since the C.B.C. gave twice as much broadcast time to those who want to destroy Canada than to those who want to build it up and unite it, could the Prime Minister tell us whether he will order an investigation to find out the reason for this behaviour on the part of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I am not responsible for C.B.C. programming and the powers of the minister responsible for Inquiries of the Ministry

(Mr. Pelletier) will be glad to read the mem- haps I might make a statement on motions. ber's representation in Hansard and to make report, if he deems it advisable.

COMMUNICATIONS

CO-OPERATION WITH FRANCE IN SPACE AND SATELLITE RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the minister-designate for communications. Will he advise whether officials of the Canadian government are now in Paris holding discussions with French government officials on the question of Franco-Canadian co-operation in space and satellite telecommunications research? If so, can he indicate the specific area to which the discussions are being directed?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there is a mission, including some members of the department of communications, which is exploring sources of supply for the buying of the various components needed for the construction of satellites. We are exploring all possible markets and at the present time are concentrating on the European market.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have made a couple of statements on this question. I am not quite sure whether some of them were made in the house, but I have made them freely available to organizations.

Mr. Fairweather: Could the minister mention them to the members of parliament?

Mr. Sharp: Yesterday and on Sunday in Winnipeg I spoke about this subject particularly, but I do not know whether Your [Mr. Trudeau.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION RESPECTING SNIFFING OF AEROPLANE GLUE, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation regulating the sale of harmful substances such as glue for model aeroplanes, which caused an unfortunate death in Ottawa recently?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, legislation of this nature will be introduced. We will decide at that time whether this type of product should be placed within the ambit of the legislation. I would like to point out that perhaps this is one area in which legislation is not the over-all cure. Not only glue sniffing but, as has been indicated, fingernail polish, gasoline and cleaning fluids as well, are involved in this question. There are several products in this area where the government must consider whether legislation is an appropriate remedy.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Solicitor General. In view of the growing incidence of glue sniffing and its serious effects, will he introduce amendments to the Criminal Code making glue sniffing an unlawful act subject to control by law enforcement agencies?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. gentleman's suggestion under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General which is supplementary to the questions asked earlier today regarding matters affecting juveniles, questions having to do with glue sniffing, and so on. Is the government considering the introduction at this session of legislation along the lines of a juvenile act similar to the draft that was presented to us in the last session by the minister's predecessor, the hon. Mr. Pennell?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, new legislation is in the course of preparation, though I do not think the bill will be called the juvenile act; at least, I do not expect it will. Owing to the amount of business before the house I doubt very much that we will be able to receive it at this session. The matter is progressing quite well.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PARTICIPATION IN DESIGN AND DEVELOP-MENT OF NEW PLANE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It arises from an answer given previously in the house and the fact that today, October 15, is the deadline for Canada to join the European fighter aircraft consortium. Will the Minister of National Defence say what decision has been made by the government in this respect?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): There is no decision yet, Mr. Speaker. The extension to October 15 has been further extended to November 1.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister expect to make a statement in this regard in the house prior to November 1?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I expect so, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF OBSERVER TEAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): .Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the suggestion made in the most recent report of the observers' team in Nigeria that the organization of their operation leaves something to be desired in respect of the efficacy of the operation, will the government give consideration to changing the terms of reference of the observer team?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I read this morning the report of the visit of the observers team to the third Nigerian marine commando division. As soon as I read the remarks in which the observers themselves suggested that their operation should be extended in this way I gave instructions that we should send a message to the Nigerian government supporting the suggestion and saying that we were ready to supply additional observers.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR DELAY OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING NEWSPAPER RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Since Bill No. C-116 will have a direct effect on the distribution of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and its 33,000 readers who receive their paper by mail each day, will the minister postpone second reading of the bill until this Canadian newspaper and others drastically affected have an opportunity to present their case?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the question although its basis is perhaps not correct. I understand that a number of hon. members have made similar representations. I do not think the basis of the question is in order but in any event I will allow the minister to reply.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker. As soon as the matter can be brought before the house I would welcome a debate. At the present time, of course, newspapers across the country are greatly exercised by the increases proposed for second class mail. I might remind hon members that our present subsidy to newspaper publishers amounts to approximately $37 million. Some weeks ago when the Post Office Department announced that it had every intention of trying to bring its budget into balance we were happy to receive the almost universal editorial approval of the newspapers across the country. Now apparently the question is, who pays for it? Me?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question. Would the minister review his decision not to have this bill sent to a committee, so that thousands of people all over Canada who want to express their dissent will have a forum in which to do so?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, they will have the forum in this house. I think all the briefs that have been presented have also been presented to previous governments. Everyone wants to see the government and the Post Office Department reduce their deficits, but it is also true that everyone wants everybody else to be the victim of any such measures rather than themselves.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General concerning his reference to the $37 million deficit. What portion of that sum is made up by so-called Canadian editions of U.S. magazines?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think this is a point of debate.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. Can he say whether representations have been made to him objecting to the five day delivery rather than to the increase in rates?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Liberal caucus has formed a group of 35 people who are studying this matter, not just protesting against it, and I am having meetings with them and listening to arguments, not to emotion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Why not send it to a house committee?

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary and unemotional question. Will the minister say what plans he has to see that daily newspapers are received by people six days of the week?

our present subsidy to newspaper publishers amounts to approximately $37 million. Some to answer that after two or three more discussions with members of the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a supplementary question. Would the minister give consideration to exempting from the increases on second class profit oriented mail those publications which are not profit oriented, such as educational newspapers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind hon. members that we are now discussing a matter which is on the order paper and is already before the house. It is certainly irregular to be spending the time of the house in asking questions of the minister about a legislative proposal which is before the house and which I assume, will in due course come before hon. members for study and consideration. It seems to me that that would be the normal time to submit representations to the minister.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister arising out of the answers given by the Postmaster General. In the light of these answers could he indicate of what value parliament is?

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer of the Postmaster General, which was most interesting and illuminating, certainly members of this house will carry on an unemotional debate on a bill which will affect most people in Canada rather severely if it goes through unamended. My original intention was to put a question to the Postmaster General but since you, Mr. Speaker, will not allow any more supplementary questions I rise on a point of order to say to the Postmaster General that if the house is to continue an unemotional debate on the bill and if the Postmaster General will be absent from the house on the two or three days when he is not scheduled to be here in the question period so as to enable him to meet with the Liberal caucus, could he also take into his confidence in an unemotional way some hon. members on this side who will be debating the merits of this bill and present to the house some of the surveys and reports from his officials which have gone into his decisions in drafting the bill he has presented to the house? This would certainly make for a more logical, unemotional and rational debate on legislation which is pretty drastic.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: I was trying to make my point on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his point but I doubt that it was a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I appreciate the limits of a point of order. My question is directed to the Postmaster General. In order to provide as much information as possible on this rather drastic bill, could he table the reports or the surveys of his department which were partly the basis of the bill?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday we prepared a series of financial statements and supporting documents which I hope will be ready for distribution to all members of this house no later than Thursday.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the Postmaster General's recognition of the desirability of this bill being studied by a selected group of members of this house, does he not feel that that group should include members of all parties and should it not therefore go to a standing committee of the house?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kierans: I referred to a particular initiative on the part of some members of the Liberal caucus. I would be quite glad to be invited to any other group or caucus in this house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is there not such a thing as parliament around here?

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

A while ago a member asked the honourable minister whether or not he had received complaints from the public or from some groups in connection with the bill he intends to introduce in the house.

I also received a telegram today which is quite interesting from the Quebec newspaper Le Soleil. May I ask him whether or not he has received a copy of same and, if so, whether or not he considers it to be a complaint.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question asked by the hon. member for Lotbinière indicates that perhaps I was right in my fears about the question as it was posed originally.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I will be a little less emotional in my supplementary question than was the Postmaster General. When can we expect a statement emanating from the discussions being held presently among the 35 Liberal members? I am receiving quite a number of telegrams from people who are anxious to hear a statement resulting from the deliberations of the Liberal members. When can we expect the statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The question of the hon. member is not in order but I will hear him on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact that I am receiving quite a number of requests I wish to ask the Postmaster General when we can expect a statement resulting from the deliberations taking place right now?

Mr. Speaker: That was the question the hon, member asked in the first instance.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Since the Postmaster General expressed a willingness to meet with any hon. members who represent constituencies faced with post office problems, and since a number of members have expressed an interest in this offer, will the minister make himself available at five o'clock in my office and, if not, when?

[Later:]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Recalling his willingness to take a second look I ask him whether, upon reflecting that the rights of parliament transcend the rights of any party, he will not agree that the standing committee might be a more suitable and appropriate forum to discuss Bill No. C-116 than the committee of the whole house?

Inquiries of the Ministry EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA-ORGANIZATION OF INFORMATION SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to change this most interesting area of questioning but I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the minister's repeated statements that Canada will not interfere or comment on the political aspects of the Nigeria-Biafra war, will the minister tell the house if his remarks on the nature of the Biafran information services on the C.B.C. news last night reflect a change in his public position or in the government's policy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I was simply referring to what is well known; that is, that the information services of the Biafran authorities are extremely well organized.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

QUEBEC-JURISDICTION OVER INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Can he tell us if he will soon hold talks with the Quebec Minister of Natural Resources about the management of Indian affairs in Quebec? Can he tell us also if the transfer of certain powers to Quebec will be discussed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to meet immediately with the Quebec Minister of Natural Resources because he has not asked to meet me, but should he want to do so, I would be most happy to discuss with him all aspects of Indian affairs in the province of Quebec.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PAY INCREASES FOR ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the [Mr. Macquarrie.]

gentleman advise whether pay increases for the Canadian armed forces will be announced before the budget next week and, if not, when?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the increases will not be announced before the budget. I expect that we might have an announcement some time in the course of the next three or four weeks. It should be emphasized, however, that whenever the announcement is made the increases will be retroactive to October 1.

[Later:]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence supplementary to the one he answered a few minutes ago in relation to the statement he would make concerning service pay. Will this statement also include a statement with regard to a possible increase in the service pensions of retired military personnel who retired when rates of pay were much lower than they are at present, with special consideration for those in the lower ranks?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): First of all, I must say I did not undertake to make a statement. I said that the pay increases would be announced. I undertook to make a statement about the multi-role aircraft. It is not expected we are going to study at the same time both the pensions and the pay increases. What we are trying to do is to adjust the salaries of service personnel and also to do some catching up.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER-REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He was here a few minutes ago and I took it for granted this was his day in the house. However, perhaps one of the other ministers will take the question as notice. Has the minister had any discussions with the government of Manitoba concerning the Pembina river development recommended by the International Joint Commission in its submission to the governments of Canada and the United States?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Minister of National Defence. Can the hon. I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

PENSIONS

SUGGESTED USE OF COST OF LIVING BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In the review of the various social security and allowance programs which the government is carrying out, will the principle be adopted of basing federal pensions and allowances on the actual cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon, member would not agree that the question as asked is very wide in scope and should not be asked in those terms at this time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the plans being made relating to consultations in connection with the Indian Act, would the Prime Minister make arrangements to ensure the organization of the appropriate standing committee of the house on Indian affairs and northern development and, particularly, would he use his good offices to see that a draft of the proposed amendments to the Indian Act is placed before the committee for consideration so that the committee could give full consideration to the members of the house participating in these consultations?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to take that up with the house leader.

FISHERIES

GREAT LAKES-ESTIMATE OF DAMAGE FROM POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the government any plans to do the necessary research so an estimate can be made of the damage being done to great lakes fisheries by pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have some information in the Department of Fisheries and more is being collected in co-operation with other Mr. Speaker, the minister just indicated there departments of the federal government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Noble: May I ask a supplementary question? When can we expect a report to the house on this matter? It is assuming quite serious proportions.

Mr. Davis: Soon, I hope, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

WHITE PAPER ON DEVELOPMENT OF RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, In view of the statement made by him in Yellowknife recently, can he tell the house whether the government has now changed its policy and abandoned the idea of tabling a white paper on the development of responsible government for the Yukon and Northwest Territories?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, during my visit to Yellowknife, after discussing with members of the Territories council, I told them that it might not be necessary to prepare a White Paper on the constitutional future of the Northwest Territories. I have not discussed the same problem concerning the Yukon Territory, and I intend to meet the Yukon Territorial council during the week end to find out about their particular problem.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask a supplementary question? Is it, then, government policy that the idea of the white paper has been abandoned?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the communication he has received from members or a member of the Yukon legislative council with regard to participation of the elected representatives in the federal-provincial conference, can he say whether or not government policy will allow such representation at the forthcoming conference?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): would be a white paper on this matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry DRUGS

PROTECTION AGAINST COUNTERFEIT PRODUCTS—CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he can enlighten the house further on the replies he gave two or three weeks ago about the existence of counterfeit drugs on the Canadian market? Can he say whether or not they have been all located and collected so that these drugs are no longer available to the public? Has the food and drug directorate taken any action with regard to laying charges in this connection?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I advised earlier, the department is satisfied that there are no more counterfeit drugs on the market available to the Canadian public. In so far as any charges are concerned, these are under investigation now. However, no conclusions have been reached on whether there is sufficient evidence for laying charges.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, perhaps my question can be taken as notice. Will the government reconsider its decision to extend $20 million in aid to a company known as Melville Pulp and Paper Company, inasmuch as this company is owned principally by a fugitive from United States justice?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper.

NATIONAL PARKS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR SECOND PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, related to the minister's stategovernment has set a goal of 40 to 60 new national parks by 1985. Can the minister in-Saskatchewan, which was promised by his mal interest rate on the market.

predecessor on April 22, 1965, will be developed at an early date?

Mr. Speaker: The hon, member cannot ask the question in this way since it relates to a statement made outside the house. I must recognize that when the hon. member for Yukon asked a question that perhaps was not in order I was a bit late in rising to the occasion to remind him that the question as asked was not in order. I have to remind the hon. member that the only way this type of question can be asked is by posing it to the Prime Minister and asking whether the statement made outside the house represents government policy.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING PERIOD, RESPECT-ING INTEREST RATES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, October 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-111, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act—Mr. Olson (for Mr. Benson)—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-111, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. When the committee rose on Thursday, October 10, clause 2 was under consideration. Shall clause 2 carry?

On clause 2—

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, we could not let clause 2 of Bill No. C-111 go through without saying what we really think about that clause which we consider as the most important.

I do not need, at this point, to dwell on the importance of agriculture in Canada, in the province of Quebec or in eastern Canada. That would be unnecessary, since all members are well aware of that.

Consideration of Bill No. C-111 leads us to discuss the importance of the financing of agriculture in Canada. It is unfortunate that the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), with the first bill he introduces in this house, ask us to ment last Thursday to the national parks increase the maximum rate of interest from 5 conference at Calgary to the effect that the per cent to a level which they cannot disclose. The Minister of Agriculture told us the other day in this house that he did not know this dicate whether the second national park for interest rate, but that this would be the nor-

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, if this clause is passed and the interest rate on farm loans is left to the whim of financiers or chartered banks, we will not be able to support it. We are sorry to see the difficulties facing our Canadian farmers and, at the same time, to see that the first legislation dealing with farmers is intended to abolish the present interest rate in such a way that it may double within two years. That is why it was impossible for us to swallow the whole without saying a word.

However, the hon. Minister of Agriculture tells us that if the 5 per cent maximum interest rate on farm loans is not raised, financial sources will be all the more restricted and the financiers will refuse to lend any money at all. Even though the income of Canadian farmers has been decreasing for several years, they have not stopped feeding the Canadian people. However, financiers refuse to put money at the disposal of Canadian agriculture. It is strange to realize that, during the farmers' march on the hill last year, as well as during the marches on Quebec and other provincial legislatures, the hon. Minister of Agriculture was able to say no to the farmers when they asked for new subsidies or for the increase of subsidies to the dairy industry, for example. We are able to say no to the Canadian farmers when it is a question of selling their products with a reasonable profit. But when it comes to financing agriculture or to say no to those who have provided farmers or other professional groups, with money, we have not yet learned to do so.

It is unfortunate to note that our governments, whatever they may be are on hands and knees before the farmers on the eve of an election to beg for votes, but the following day or 3 or 4 months later, they already have both hands in the farmers' pockets to take their money away and repay financiers for their contributions to the election fund during the last six months. It is distasteful for me today to have to blame our Minister of Agriculture.

In my opinion, the present minister of Agriculture has more knowledge than any other of his predecessors, in the fields of both agriculture and financial administration. We find it hard to believe that today he should be forced to introduce a bill to abolish the 5 per cent interest rate, when he knows of other solutions. I shall be pleased to suggest a few solutions in a moment or two.

Farm Improvement Loans Act

Why increase the interest rate for our farmers? Are past and present lenders bankrupt or short on profits? Before increasing the revenue of those who lend to farmers, we should really establish who makes profits and who does not.

When we see the relevant figures, we realize that past or present lenders are not those who had to suffer from a reduction of their interest rate. On the contrary, it is the farmers' margin of profits which decreases constantly, whereas that of finance companies and banks keeps rising. But instead of being discouraged, the finance companies and the banks are encouraged, while farmers are not.

If we consider the effects of a loan for example of $25,000, at an interest rate of 5 per cent for 30 years, it represents a total interest cost of $15,315. On the other hand, if we examine Bill No. C-111, where the future rate of interest for farming investments is not indicated, we can easily assume that the rate of interest will before long be set at least at 9 per cent on $25,000 for a 30 year period. which means a total of $27,565.50 for the interest alone. Therefore, the surplus of interest which farmers will have to pay on a farming investment of $25,000 in six months or a year, according to the loan which they will have been granted, will be exactly $12,-250.50, as compared with what they previously paid on a farming loan of $25,000 for a 25 year period.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is $12,250 more in interest only on his investments. According to the newspaper La Terre de chez nous for the month of June, a farmer, with agricultural investments of $25,000 a year, does not net a profit of more than $450 a year; that is the return on his work and his investments. He makes a salary of $450 on investments of $25,000; and now we are on the point of asking him $600 to $700 more in interest each year.

Mr. Chairman, that is why we cannot support this bill, because we have our say in the matter of interest rates. When the rate of interest is being discussed in this house, we are discussing something which falls within our responsibility.

At this point, I wish to refer to three official documents of the House of Commons, in support of my argument.

First, in the famous B.N.A. Act of 1867, which is considered to be the charter of the Canadian Constitution, in connection with the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments, it is stipulated specifically, in section 91, subsection 19, that the federal government has jurisdiction in all matters concerning:

Interest.

We are the federal government, not the stock market or the whims of the banking interests. Let us then begin by determining exactly and legally who is empowered to fix the interest rate and let us accordingly establish ourselves the interest rate on money, which falls within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. The parliament of Canada is the government of the people, the elected representatives of the people. Let us then assume our responsibilities and not allow the interest rate to fluctuate according to the whims of the big interests, of those who control the banks and combines.

Mr. Chairman, the Bank of Canada was created in 1934 by an act of parliament. After many years of investigation and many royal commissions, the Bank of Canada fixed its basic interest rate at 2 per cent and maintained it at that level for 22 years, in spite of the period of economic recession during the war and the post-war boom. This line of action, as far as the 2 p. 100 interest rate is concerned, has been maintained with the approval of the Parliament of Canada which has supreme authority over the Bank of Canada.

In 1956, 1957 and 1958, we heard that there might be changes in the interest rate; the 2 p. 100 rate helped to maintain at a low level the other rates of bonds and bank loans.

It is interesting to note, in the annual report of the Bank of Canada for 1956, the statement of the then governor, Mr. J. E. Coyne, which is on page 49, and I quote:

"In its day-to-day operations the Bank generally offers some resistance to changes in interest rates (in either direction) in the interests of maintaining orderly conditions in financial markets—"

Mr. Chairman, to maintain order on the financial market, the governor of the Bank of Canada fought in 1956 against too many changes in the interest rates. There must be a basic rate in Canada—there must be a basis somewhere—and the Bank of Canada was created to regulate money and credit to the advantage of the nation as a whole. Moreover, it is under the power of parliament.

Why then was Mr. Coyne removed from his post and replaced by another governor in 1957 right after saying those words which appear in the annual report? Why did the rates of the Bank of Canada start to fluctuate from 2 to 6.35 per cent during the same year? Why did the federal government later proceed with the conversion of up to \$6.4 billion in war bonds bearing interest between $2\frac{1}{4}$ and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to rates of $3\frac{1}{2}$, 4 and 4.18 per cent? The federal government saw fit to stop maintaining order on the financial market and to allow speculation which has been going on ever since, that is for the last ten years.

In June 1968, our present government renewed \$500 million of bonds at rates of $6\frac{1}{4}$, $6\frac{1}{2}$, 7 and $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent to redeem matured bonds at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. In October 1968, it issued another \$500 million in bonds at $6\frac{1}{4}$, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the greater part of which is only to renew bonds at 5 per cent.

Let us mention that in all that, the government of Canada, rather than the transferable securities market, has full and sole jurisdiction on interest. In principle, from the legal point of view, that is true, but in practice, we are now at a point where it is the brokers, the banks, the financial agencies that are forcing the government to submit to their whims, so that they can increase the rates of interest and enlarge their profits.

I have here before me the reports for three consecutive years of the chartered banks of Canada. If I look at the report for 1965, published in The Gazette of Canada at the end of the financial year ending December 31, 1965, the banks were showing total assets in the amount of $25,874,000,000. The following year, that is at the end of 1966, these assets amounted to $27,773,000,000. Therefore, their assets had increased by more than $2,000,000,000 during these two years.

The financial report of 1967, for the eight chartered banks of Canada, which was published in February 1968, shows total assets of $31,845,000,000. And if I look at the last banks' report, published on August 31, 1968 in The Gazette of Canada, I see assets for the eight chartered banks of Canada totalling $34,332,000,000. This means that within eight months, Canadian banks have made profits of more than $3 billion.

On the other hand I read on the back of the same reports, that the subscribed capital of banks, the paid-up capital, amounts to only $287 million, and that from 1967 to 1968, the increase of the paid-up capital was only $6 million. At the end of 1967, the total paid-up amounts of money in banks, from the viewpoint of shareholders, was $287 million and, at the present time, the total amount paid up by shareholders reached $293 million. However, with a $6 million increase of the paid-up capital they had capital gains. The assets increased, in a period of ten months, by more than $3 billion, while the subscribed capital was more than $6 million.

Mr. Chairman, I say all this to prove that today finance companies and banks particularly cannot claim that they do not make profits. It is strange however that the cost of living should increase in the same proportion as banks pile up benefits.

On page 312 of the book entitled Le Canada au XX^e siècle, there is a passage dealing with Alberta, home province of the honourable Minister of Agriculture, and it is stated that the government of that province reduced the rate on its bonds in order to pay off its provincial indebtedness. I quote:

Alberta reduced the rate of interest on its bonds from 7 per cent to 3 per cent and the Alberta government is now clear of any debt.

In order to pay its debts, the Alberta government has lowered the rate on its bonds, whereas in Ottawa we are about to increase the rate of the bonds and of the interest on farm loans. The situation has been more acute since October 30, 1967. The total bank assets exceed $31 billion. The total public deposits amount to $21,226 million with the chartered banks, but there is only $350 million in coinage and $2,850 million in banknotes. That makes a total of about $3,400 million in money visible to the naked eye, palpable and transportable, made of metal or paper, however deposits in the banks were still over $21 billion. Therefore—and the Minister of Agriculture knows the answer-where does the difference of $18 billion come from? This is the big question the people have been asking themselves for a long time. If, at the present time, there is only $3 billion in circulation, in Canada coinage and paper money, can we say who created the other $18 billion which are deposited in the banks? That question was already asked in the committee on finance, trade and commerce and economic matters by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) on February 6, 1967 and it appears on page 3012 of the proceedings of the committee. The question was put to the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), and here is his answer:

Mr. Sharp: The system used to create credit is well known. Banks grant loans; the money is deposited in banks and becomes part of the money supply. This is a way to create it. This is a widely known method. I think this is one of the methods assailed by the Social Credit members who call it not very natural.

So, Mr. Chairman, even with low investments, the banks can, thanks to the reserve they are bound by law to keep—which is 6% nowadays—with $6 in hand, grant loans up to $100.

I have here another article which was published in the Montreal Gazette of September 30, 1958, which the Minister of Agriculture will surely find well thought out, and I quote:

[English]

Why Does the Government Borrow Private Money? Sir—Why have all three of the major political parties remained completely silent on what is by far the most important economic problem facing Canada today? I refer to the private control of the nation's money system.

The constitution already gives to the federal government complete authority to use the Bank of Canada to issue interest-free loans for public projects and for housing. Instead of doing so, the government allows the private banks to create about 95 per cent of our entire money supply and to lend it out at interest, for their own profit, regardless of the primary needs of the people. Even the government itself goes hand in hand to borrow from the private money lenders.

The government's incredibly stupid and utterly needless practice of borrowing Canadian money, at interest, means that the taxpayers are saddled with the burden of paying about $1,500 millions in interest, each year, for which they receive virtually nothing whatever in return. This payment of huge amounts of unearned interest, which represents no corresponding new production, is a major cause of the present inflation and is largely responsible for our excessive taxes.

The problems of inflation, excessive taxation, unemployment and exorbitant cost of housing will be solved when the federal government decies to use the Bank of Canada to issue interest-free loans for a construction program of needed public projects, also for housing (up to an available standard), just sufficient to provide and maintain full employment opportunities for all who desire to work and earn.

Let the money lenders get their profits by investing in private productive enterprise, instead of in public projects and housing which should be made available to the people at the actual cost of construction (labour and materials).

Can any person, anywhere, suggest even one good reason why the government should continue to borrow Canadian money, at interest? The people of Canada are being made the victims of the worst racket the world has ever known, the bankers' private money monopoly. What is Prime Minister Trudeau going to do about it?

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, it is all very well to speak of a just society, but when we consider Bill C-111 and particularly clause 2 of that bill, we cannot see how we can possibly establish Farm Improvement Loans Act a just society and allow the financiers to increase or double their profits when they already have a very good profit margin.

If it had been proved to us that the banks really show a deficit or are moving towards one, that they make no profits and have reason to complain of their existing interest rate, we would perhaps be more understanding and amenable. However, nothing of the sort has been proved.

On the other hand, in view of the very small profits of the farmers, of the existing situation in our rural regions and of the difficulties which they have to face with regard to obtaining a farm loan, it is obvious that our farmers cannot stay on their farms.

Last night, I received in my office a farmer who wanted to get a farm loan. He asked me where to apply, and so on, and he is solvent. But when I told him that, if the bill passed, the interest rate might be—the hon. minister does not know and I do not know either—8 or 9 per cent, according to the whims of the bankers and money handlers, he did not feel encouraged to buy the land he wanted.

In view of these considerations and because it has not been proved to us that those who lend money have to face financial difficulties, the hon. minister would have three solutions.

First of all, maintain the present interest rate on farm loans. Secondly, take from the consolidated revenue fund the surplus interest demanded by finance companies or banks. Thirdly, the most logical solution would be for the Minister of Finance to allow a Bank of Canada loan—as is done in other countries—without interest, to the Farm Credit Corporation.

If, tomorrow morning, the Bank of Canada were to grant a loan of about $9 billion to the Farm Credit Corporation as mentioned in Bill No. C-111, and if that loan were granted without interest, we would stop talking in this house about interest rate increases to the farmers. We would also stop talking about the rising cost of living, and our farmers could keep on being real farmers and stay on their farms.

Therefore, since no solution is offered except an increase in the interest rate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), that in subparagraph (e) of clause 2 be added after the words "by the terms thereof" the following words:

"That the rate of interest charged by the bank on the loan did not exceed 5 per cent per annum simple interest;"

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Mr. Chairman, this would simply mean that the farm loan would be left as it was in the past pending a more serious study of the farm problem by the Minister of Agriculture. In the meantime, the honourable minister should consider two other suggestions which I made. As for the latter, I think that he understands me and there is no need for me to explain it to him.

Let the Bank of Canada grant to the Farm Credit Corporation an interest free loan and then our farmers will be happier. I think that the hon. Minister of Agriculture would also be happier and a better Minister of Agriculture.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to advise the hon. member that there would be no purpose in bringing in this act for amendment at all if we were to accept his amendment because the rate of interest was 5 per cent up until the end of June, 1968, but several months before that the banks had stopped making loans to farmers at that rate of interest. The whole purpose of bringing in these amendments is to make adjustments so that the banks and other financial institutions will in fact lend their money to the farmers at a government guaranteed rate something below the going commercial rate at the present time. For that reason, therefore, we could not accept this amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we believe that the amendment is in order. This goes without saying, since we believe that now is the time to give farmers the opportunity to make profits rather than always give the chance to bankers.

I would like to make a remark to the minister and that is why I am pleased to second the motion of the member for Shefford.

We know for a fact that the six biggest banks in Canada have made greater profits in the last six months ended on April 30, 1968 than ever before in their history and the minister asks us permission to beg that high finance, which grows at the expense of the little people, to condescend to make excessive profits at the expense of small farmers. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we find that a 5 per cent interest rate would be a mitigated solution, between the excessive rate he wants to give to chartered banks and a 3 per cent interest rate, as proposed by the Créditiste program, which the minister keeps refusing.

We feel that our mitigated amendment should be acceptable to the members of the opposition and the government.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, we are going around in a vicious circle. An attempt is being made to increase the interest rate so that money lenders can make added profits.

Farmers are asking for more reasonable prices for their produce. In those circumstances, and since the trade is unable to meet our legitimate requests, we turn to the government which seldom meets those requests.

Last year, I came with all the other farmers to ask the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) and the government for more reasonable prices, especially in the dairy industry. We spent the day negotiating, trying to convince the authorities of the merits of our requests. We went to them at 7 o'clock that night to get the promise that the government would continue to study the matter and that, later on, a longterm legislative measure would be introduced to comply with the legitimate requests of manufacturing and fluid milk producers. We have been waiting ever since. The situation has not improved or barely. Although a higher price was guaranteed, the cost of production has increased.

Now, today, in order to be able to meet the money lenders' request for higher rates on their dollars, we should take the necessary steps to enable the borrowers to have additional income that it might be possible for them to pay the higher rate of interest and to pay back their loans.

Mr. Chairman, it may be that in some quarters the Canadian farmer is accused of always making the same requests, of always repeating the same thing. That is completely in order.

When we have children, they always ask us the same questions and always come with the same requests until such time as their requests are met and their legitimate needs are satisfied.

We will keep at it as long as the government does not take the necessary steps to assure the producers of a reasonable income as a reward for their work and their untiring efforts. The Canadian farming community has always worked hard to supply the products needed by the whole population. We must the banks and lending instruction money available at 5 per control will not get it. Under econt today money is an essential farmers in order to make the ations successful. For this reparty cannot support the am by the Ralliement Créditiste.

keep at it of course and repeat our demands. That is why we are here in this house.

In some circles people found it hard to understand why the rural ridings voted for the Ralliement Créditiste. Here is one of the reasons, Mr. Chairman. It is because the voice of agriculture was not sufficiently heard in our parliament, because our demands were left unanswered. That is one of the main reasons why the rural population sent to this parliament people who will make their demands heard.

I commend those who promote the interests of banks and other lending institutions. They have the right to do so. But it is our right to demand fair prices for farmers.

Some time ago, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to tell us whether steps would be taken to increase the price of industrial milk during the next fiscal year. His answer was extremely short; it was no. Then, no increase can be expected for that production; so, having no assurance of receiving more, no more can be given. It is for that reason that the amendment moved by the member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) is in order.

If one is not capable to receive more, one is not capable to give more, and this is the reason why one objects, logically I think, to the increase of the interest rate when it is not known how much it will be increased.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, we in the official opposition are in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the hon. member to our left. His amendment suggests that the interest rate should remain at 5 per cent. During this debate we in this party have made several attempts to get the minister to set a definite interest rate or outline the formula he intends to use for this purpose.

The members of this party are trying to look after the interests of the farmers. It has been shown quite adequately that farmers are unable to obtain money at 5 per cent. Unless the terms of the bills are changed in such a way that pressure can be brought to bear on the banks and lending institutions to make money available at 5 per cent the farmers will not get it. Under economic conditions today money is an essential requirement of farmers in order to make their farming operations successful. For this reason we in this party cannot support the amendment moved by the Ralliement Créditiste.

Farm Improvement Loans Act [Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks to the honourable Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and ask him a question.

Why does the minister want to suppress the 5 per cent interest rate that now exists? Is it because the farmers implored him to increase it so as to pay more? I answer no, and he knows why. Is it because the chartered banks and the finance companies discover that they could make profits and that, consequently, they have ordered the minister—the member of a government that is not only a majority government but also an authoritarian one—to change the existing legislation to enable them to make more profits? Let the government take its responsibilities.

I now ask my question. Does the minister intend to assume his responsibilities during the next four years in the agricultural field as far as eastern farmers are concerned?

[English]

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Chairman, I will undoubtedly be allowed to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that I cannot understand that being an expert on western farming, he has not any more consideration for eastern farmers.

We have mentioned in this corner of the house on several occasions that farming is in a terrible state of stagnation at the present time. Now, through interest rates which may reach 8½ and 9 per cent—we will never know—an attempt is being made to exploit even more a class which is already overly exploited. Now is the time to look more fully into this problem. I deeply regret that the Conservative party does not support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), a very timely amendment justified by the explanations he gave about the excessive profits now being made by chartered banks.

There is no question at this time, of demanding a preferential treatment but at least a fair treatment. We demand that justice be done also, with respect to agriculture in eastern Canada through helpful legislation. However, instead of helping eastern farmers, we are trying to exploit them.

I think it would be time for the hon. minister of Agriculture to have real farmers as assistants, as we find in this part of the time and passed.

house, so that eastern farmers would be well understood, and would be helped by understanding men, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) made it so clear earlier.

That is why I fully support the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford, because I know that if the farmers were all here as they were a few years ago, they would demand that this measure establishing a predetermined interest rate be withdrawn, because once again there will be a shameful exploitation on the part of those who do not allow others to breathe.

We therefore feel the amendment is in order, and we ask that justice be done to eastern farmers.

FARM CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBLE CLASSES, AMOUNT OF CAPITAL, INTEREST RATES, ETC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture moved the second reading of Bill No. C-110, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have here a fairly extensive explanation in connection with this bill. I am prepared to make that explanation at this stage but would prefer that the bill be given second reading and at the committee stage I could deal with the details of the various clauses. I am sure hon, members on both sides of the house realize that there has been a fairly extensive discussion regarding the amendments contained in Bill No. C-110, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

The government is extremely anxious that we pass the bill as quickly as possible. This additional capitalization is needed so that the Farm Credit Corporation may continue its service to the farmers of Canada. In addition, immediately following the passage of Bill No. C-110 we want to bring in the next but one item on the order paper, Bill No. C-113 concerning cash advances on farm stored grain. It is essential that this measure also be passed as soon as possible.

Honourable members will realize that we have spent almost all this session, with the exception of housekeeping measures with which we have to deal such as supply and one or two other minor pieces of legislation, on agricultural bills. I am sure hon. members appreciate that the government has, therefore, given very high and in fact top priority to amending the Farm Credit legislation and the cash advances act in order that the facilities and services under these measures will be immediately available to the farmers.

So much time has gone by that we have now reached the stage where it is extremely important, in fact essential, that we get on to other pieces of legislation. Hon. members realize that the budget will be introduced in a few days and there are before parliament other bills, resolutions and so on that are equally urgent. Therefore I shall confine my remarks to these few words so we will have time today to pass Bill No. C-110 and continue the operations of the corporation without any interruption and, second, so we will have an opportunity to pass Bill No. C-113 in order that the increase in cash advances on farm stored grain will be available to the agriculthe very severe weather conditions that have prevented a reasonable harvest, which has meant that there is an increased need for the facilities to be provided under the amendments to this bill.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while I could give an explanation of the bill at this time, in view of the fact that we have had a reasonably long debate on the general principles involved in the Farm Credit Corporation I shall resume my seat now in the hope that we may pass these two bills before ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's great concern in having these bills pass the house in double-quick time. It is very interesting to note that he now believes there is a necessity to provide money with which to fill the coffers of the Farm Credit Corporation because its funds are rapidly dissipating. However, Mr. Speaker, you will recall that early in the spring we continually brought to the attention of the government the fact that this situation existed, but the government in its wisdom felt that the problem did not need to be dealt with at that time. They offered to deal with this legislation provided that we in the opposition would confine the debate to one day. Knowing that some major changes would be included in the bill, we could not at that time agree to that proposition.

Your Honour will also recall that through our leader we pleaded for parliament to be reconvened almost 30 days before the government in fact called parliament. We said at that time we were well aware that the farm picture was deteriorating from coast to coast. However, we found it impossible to prevail upon the government to accept our plea. Now, at this late date, the minister stands in his place and pleads with the opposition to pass this measure in double-quick time because the government in its wisdom feels it is convenient to them, not the farmers, to pass the measure now. The government will do this provided, once again, the opposition agrees to passing the legislation in doublequick time without having time to peruse the various clauses which incorporate rather drastic changes in the basic form of this legislation.

I do not propose to speak at any length at this time, but I assure the minister that we shall have quite a bit to say on the various clauses of the bill. We shall try to amend some of its provisions in order to make it tural industry. We want to do this in view of what we consider to be a better bill and one in the best interests of the farmers of this country.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speaker I do not intend to take a great deal of the time of the house at this stage of the bill. When the measure was first discussed I pointed out the advisability of referring it to a standing committee in order that its provisions could be fully discussed and updated. I asked that this be done in order that farm organizations could come before the committee and give the government the benefit of their advice and the position they take in regard to farm credit. I pointed out that advice was available to the government from at least one consultative body for which they have paid and which was being largely disregarded.

The government says there is urgency. Undoubtedly there is urgency. There is urgency of a real nature, as described by hon. members to my left and as described in the Globe and Mail which says there is a dark year ahead for the wheat farmers. It says that many small operators may fail. This appeared in a publication which is not noted for its exaggeration of the circumstances. I may say that very likely it is right. This is unfortunate, as I know because I happen to farm in that area and so do some of my colleagues. Any credit legislation that we pass should take into account these circumstances. What concerns me is that I do not think we can do justice in a hurry, particularly in the farm credit legislation before us, to the circumstances which farming faces in the long haul. We can rush in and make more money available at a higher rate of interest, but this will not meet the real needs.

Despite the continuous questioning from this side of the house we have not been able to elicit from the minister any information on the exact rate of interest which farmers will be expected to pay. I can understand the minister's urgent pleas for immediate passage of this legislation and I recognize the fact that he is justified. But we who respresent the farmers are also justified in our position, and what will we say to our constituents if we agree to what the minister has put before us? We should know what the rate of interest will be, more so in the long term term the outlook is bad enough. We face a Farm Credit Corporation will not be so dark future immediately ahead, but what circumstances will we be facing in the long term? We do not know.

The government has not been able since this session started to say confidently that it will move the production of these farms. It is hedging on this matter, and I can understand it. Are we going to have to retool some of the farms, will we have to switch production and, if we do, will credit not be necessary? The farmer will have to pay for that credit out of his production. He will have to meet the credit terms. This is why I say to the minister he should be prepared to refer this legislation to the standing committee. It is true that the farmers will have to wait. He says so, and he should know. They will have to wait until more money is made available to the Farm Credit Corporation. Once a farmer signs an agreement with the Farm Credit Corporation his waiting period will not last a few months but 20 or 30 years during which he will carry that burden. I agree with the minister it is urgent that we pass the cash advances bill. I suggest we could leapfrog ahead of the legislation before us to pass the bill on the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, if it is so desired.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that a more important package of legislation so far as the farmer is concerned has come before the house for some time. Not only is it important to the farmer but it is probably more important to the general economy of the country and in particular to the various manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers who supply farm products and the other necessities which a farmer requires from time to time in order to upgrade his facilities or increase production with the intention of creating an economic and viable farm unit.

I would like to commend the minister for broadening the act to provide for a father and son business relationship whereby young men may become active participants in the business of farming with their fathers with the idea of creating an economic unit.

I welcome the amendment which deals with Indian farmers situated on reserves, under which they too may have the opportunity of becoming actively engaged in farming and in the creation of viable farm units. I do hope, however, that the red tape which is likely to lending program envisaged in this bill that in occur in negotiating such a measure between the short term lending program. In the short the department of Indian affairs and the complicated as to impair the full implementation of such an important provision. In this regard I hope that the minister in charge of Indian affairs will see that this measure becomes operative and thereby place people before policy.

There is one provision, however, with which I am not in complete agreement because it violates the principle under which the Farm Credit Corporation was to operate. The fact that two individuals carrying on a single farming operation may borrow up to $100,000 as I am led to believe, would reveal that we are moving a further step toward the elimination of small farm units. What we are doing in essence is to expand successful farm units rather than to assist small economic units in becoming viable economic ventures. I do not believe this was the original intention of the act.

Perhaps it is difficult for some people to realize why credit should play such an important part in farming operations. The reason is that we now live in a cash society, and if the farmer is to be able to acquire those things which he needs, both to operate efficiently and to enjoy the benefits of the society to which he is still a major contributor, he too must acquire credit. In that sense he is like many businessmen, both in large and small ventures, who are required to finance present operations out of future profits.

Perhaps the situation becomes clearer when one compares what has been happening to farm income in the last year with what has been happening to corporation income.

According to the Canadian Statistical Review, September, 1968, farm income for 1966 stood at $2,204 million. For 1967 the figure for farm income was $1,698 million. Corporation income in 1966 was $2,949 million, while corporation income in 1967 was $3,194 million.

This is certainly not an encouraging picture for Canada's farmers and for those who believe as I do, that farming remains a basic necessity for the economic prosperity of this nation and that the continuing deterioration of farm income represents a threat to our national economy. I know that there are some economists—and they are very close to the present government—who regard farming as simply another collection of statistics. It is more than that to me; it is a way of life. There are some in government who hold the principle that the cure for the farm problem 29180—74½ is to remove the farmers, to take them off the farm. Let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you do not cure rural poverty by importing it into the city; you merely create urban poverty. I was born and raised on a farm in Alberta. So far as I am concerned, that is the greatest heritage I have. Those were the happiest days of my life, the most carefree. Today I see a decrease in our rural population. I see the rundown, decayed condition of our small towns. I have talked to many young people who would like to go back to farming but because of the great amount of capital involved in starting a farm operation and because of the uncertainty that exists in this industry, these young people are working in our big cities.

The solutions to these problems are not easy, but I submit that if this government were really dedicated to preserving the traditional family farm unit and the normal life of such families, solutions could be found. Some say the farmer is not efficient or that some farmers are not efficient. According to the fifth report of the Economic Council of Canada, page 82, the average output of agricultural workers has trebled in the past 20 years. What other industry can show the same results? There are those who say that because employment in agriculture is down to less than 10 per cent of the labour force, agriculture is no longer a major factor. I submit this is a dangerous philosophy. When agriculture can bring into the economy of this nation an income in the neighbourhood of $2 billion per year, that is a major factor in our economic well-being. Agriculture is the only area in which income has not kept pace with rising productivity. The economic council, page 82 of its report, says:

However, average farm incomes have remained significantly lower than average non-farm incomes.

The sad fact remains that the fate of this report will probably be the same as the others which preceded it. It will be shoved to one side by the government and placed on a shelf. In spite of the fact that agriculture is a major contributor to the economic welfare of this nation and to the gross national product, despite the fact that the prices farmers have to pay for the things they must buy have more than doubled while the prices of the things they sell have remained stationary, and despite constantly increasing taxes, we now have a government which comes along at a time when it cannot move wheat and tells the farmer he must accept higher interest rates for farm credit. The imposition of higher interest rates on the farmer at this time, as these bills propose, shows a complete disregard for the efforts the farmers put forth. At the same time it indicates a complete disregard for both the economic factors and the importance of agriculture to the economy of this nation.

At a time when our wheat carryover is nearly 700 million bushels, and when there is no indication from the government of any likelihood of a sale to Russia or China, no sign of active interest by the minister and no realization by the government of the serious economic situation which will result from the failure to sell our wheat, the government comes along with this solution to soak the farmer. This is a rather easy way of dealing with the problem. Shortly we will have a budget in which, no doubt, everyone will be soaked. It will be a sort of stormy weather budget. However, the government is not waiting for that budget; it is going to soak the farmer now.

We all know that when there is a Liberal government in power the western farmers suffer, the east coast fishermen suffer and the urban poor suffer. We know also that under the Liberal government in 1957 wheat piled up so high it could have been used for the Olympic games. We are back in that situation now. I invite the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) to come with me to Alberta, or anywhere in western Canada, and view the situation at first hand. The problem is urgent and something must be done to move our wheat or to see that our farmers are provided with cash in order to obligations, rather than being meet their prosecuted for delivering grain over their quota. This indicates the desperation of these farmers at this time. Let me illustrate. The Wheat Pool Budget of October 4, under the heading "Quota Situation", reports:

The grain delivery quota situation across the prairies as at September 30, showed a large number of stations still on initial unit quotas. No stations had yet reached 2 bushels per specific acre.

Let me turn now to farm stored grain. This report reads:

Stocks of wheat held on Alberta farms at July 31 were considerably above levels of the past three years, and the 1957-68 average.

For example, referring to wheat specifically, I point out that the average amount in farm storage between the years 1958-67 was 28.5 million bushels. This year it is 52 million bushels. Turning to barley, the average amount in farm storage during 1958-67 was 20.8 million bushels. Today it stands at 29 million bushels. We are further warned by the president of United Grain Growers that there is little likelihood of the 1968-69 crop year delivery quota exceeding five bushels per specified acre. The best wheat growers can hope to realize by next May, he said, is $10 an acre, out of which the farmer has to pay his food and clothing bills, this fall's taxes, his machinery repairs, his fuel and fertilizer bills, and in many cases his Farm Credit Corporation mortgage.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of the government to provide the climate and the opportunity which will ensure profitable markets for the crops this country's farmers produce. In 1966 we were told by the wheat experts that the Canadian farmer could look forward with a degree of optimism to a strong market for high quality Canadian wheat. At the same time the Dominion Bureau of Statistics was forecasting wheat exports in the neighbourhood of 475 million to 550 million bushels through to 1970. We were further told that Canada's future problem would not be a lack of grain markets abroad but rather an inability to meet export demands. As a matter of fact, a well known agricultural economist said that Canada, in order to meet its share of world markets, would be required to produce some 700 million bushels in 1970, 850 million in 1975 and 1 billion by 1980.

But what has happened? The latest figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicate that our wheat exports in 1967-68 have fallen to 335 million bushels. This is almost the lowest level in the past ten years. Why has this happened? It has happened because this government lacked imagination and foresight in developing an active, aggressive wheat selling campaign. They have failed to expand the sales force to meet the challenge of available markets and have lost a good portion of our traditional markets. They have failed to face up to aggressive competition from other countries and react in a business-like manner.

United States wheat producers, through a market developing organization, are developing and servicing markets for their wheat in Asia. They have been active in Japan for ten years and have several Japanese firms working for them. The program of this organization includes training in the latest techniques of bread and pastry production, exchange visits of industry and government personnel, campaigns to improve nutritional standards and, in general, an all-out promotional campaign designed to increase the usage of wheat products. As a result of this and other aggressive sales efforts, United States commercial wheat exports for the year 1966-67 increased by some 28 per cent over the preceding year. This took place during a period in which an overall decrease in world demand was experienced. In comparison, I am told that we have only two agencies actively engaged in soliciting markets for our wheat in Europe and Asia, they being in Tokyo and London, both covering large areas. The selling of wheat is a competitive and challenging field and to meet this challenge we must have a force which must be aggressive, flexible and thorough.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member in his very interesting and informative speech but it seems to me that an effort should be made by him, and also by other hon. members taking part in this debate, to relate his remarks to the principle of the bill now before us, which is to amend the Farm Credit Act. I recognize that the remarks now being made by the hon. member are of importance, but I have some qualms whether they relate as closely as they ought to the principle of the bill now before us.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When you examine the philosophy behind the Farm Credit Corporation you find that it was established under a Conservative government in 1959, not to make a profit for the government, not to provide handouts for the farmers, but as a stimulus to the economy. It is not necessary to go back to 1959. One has only to look at the minister's words in introducing this bill on September 30, when with that eloquence and feeling for which he is noted he spoke in the following words, as reported on page 599 of Hansard:

The objectives of the program are to provide the capital to facilitate the organization of Canadian agriculture into viable farm units in the hands of our competent farmers so that agriculture may make the greatest possible contribution to the Canadian economy and provide farmers with equitable returns for their investment of capital, work and skills.

In those remarks the minister showed a good grasp of the philosophy behind this measure which was brought in by the Conservative government. But one must ask at this point, how can agriculture make the greatest possible contribution to the economy if the farmer once again is going to be penalized? The minister knows, as everyone in this house knows, that his complaint about interest rates and the Farm Credit Corporation being required to recoup its loss to the finance department is just a matter of bookkeeping between the departments. If the finance department does not charge a rate of interest to the Farm Credit Corporation, then the Farm Credit Corporation does not have to increase its charge to the farmer. On that basis there is a very good argument for farm credit being provided to the farmer absolutely interest free. It was never the intention of the legislation that the government should make a profit out of the farmer, and the corporation is only subject to loss when the finance department charges the going rate of interest, as it does now.

I am not going to insist at this time that loans should be made to the farmers interest free, but I am certainly suggesting that the minister carefully examine that possibility. The farmer has been paying 5 per cent, and he may be willing to continue to pay that amount on the rather flimsy argument that land prices will go up if there is no interest whatsoever. The fact of the matter is that land prices are going up anyway, and the minister is quite well aware of that too. Therefore it is a bit of a fairy tale for the minister to tell the house and the farmers that because the finance department lends money to the corporation at the going rate of interest the corporation must now turn round and lend to the farmers at an increased rate in order to show a profit, particularly when the going rate was increased in the first place directly as a result of the action of the government.

It was not the farmer who raised the interest rate on government borrowing, it was the Minister of Finance. Now the farmer is expected to pay. The farmer is paying too many people now and has very little prospect, as a result of this government's failure to sell his products, of acquiring the income to pay his present debts. Therefore this measure should not be allowed to pass at this time. If it does, one can only conclude that this government's "just society" just is not for farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I shall only say a few words.

I have just heard the previous speaker oppose the increase of the interest rate to be paid by farmers who will need to borrow money in order to buy farm machinery or to help farm units, family or social units, or others.

When it is suggested that the interest rate be fixed at 5 per cent, these same people vote against the suggestion. That means that we have some professional hypocrites in the house. They are ready to blame the government when it introduces legislation increasing the interest rate, and when the matter is put to a vote, they vote against it. It seems to me that we should set the record straight.

As for us, we continue to say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) that he knows the solution to the problem and that he can help the farmer. It is not by running him further into debt, that we will save agriculture.

When the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) suggested to the Minister of Agriculture to borrow or to allow the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to borrow from the Bank of Canada the necessary funds or appropriations to help farmers, the Créditistes today are as justified as the former Social Credit member, now the Minister of Agriculture, was when he spoke likewise.

Mr. Speaker, those are the points which I wanted to draw to the minister's attention, because he knows that the draft of Bill No. C-110 leaves much to be desired. It is not the solution to the farming problems of Canada, and he should, since he is the minister, ensure the application in this house of what he has been advocating for some ten years.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin)—Canadian National Railways—Victoriaville, Quebec—Discontinuance of passenger service; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Agriculture—deterioration of situation on the prairies; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Industry—Newfoundland—Proposed assistance for lumbering.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper. As there are no private bills on today's order paper, the house will proceed to the consideration of public bills.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PROVISION FOR BETTER ACCESS TO PUBLIC DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-6, to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration (administrative disclosure).

He said: Mr. Speaker, after I introduced this bill into the house in the last parliament it was a matter of some regret to me that it never got high enough on the list of private members' bills to be given consideration on second reading. However, I feel it may be even more timely for us to be concerned now with the general ideas and principles which are set forth in this measure. On one hand we have heard statements from a high official source in the government to the effect that it is desirable for the public to become more and more involved in public affairs. Since have heard statements then we representatives of the press to the effect that they find more and more difficulty in obtaining access to public information on behalf of the public. So it may be that tonight is a good time to take a good look at this proposal.

As the bill states, this would be an act to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration of public business. The bill is a short one, containing only four clauses. But it does embody the main elements of the legislation which has for so long been in effect in Sweden in this area. The first clause states:

Every administrative or ministerial commission, power, and authority shall make its records and information concerning its doings available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time.

The second clause provides the basic excep- this field more fully known, perhaps in the tions to the rule by saying that clause 1 does not apply to records and information affecting national security, or to matters which are exempted by statute from disclosure, or to trade secrets, or to matters which concern private interest to the degree that the right to personal privacy excludes the public interest. Clause 3 contains an important principle that the courts should determine whether any particular record or information is to be made public on application for the same.

I referred a few moments ago to what has long been the rule in Sweden, a country with a long record of freedom of access by the public to public business. In that country the kind of thing we are considering here has been provided for by legislation for a great many years. In brief, whereas in this country we follow the general rule that whatever is not specifically said to be public is secret, the Swedes do exactly the opposite and make it work. They say that whatever is not specifically stated to be secret is public. The courts are there to see that this idea is carried out in practice, and they take this obligation most seriously in accordance with the legislation.

In addition to making documents and records public, the Swedes publish the great bulk of the documents and submissions received by their departments and agencies. I am informed that every day in the great buildings of Stockholm the documents or submissions received by the administration are laid out for inspection. From these a wave of information goes out across the country. Thus the Swedish public is kept closely in touch with the way in which the administration is handling public business and the nature of the submissions to the administration which the public is making.

In bringing forward this bill I have been inspired and encouraged by the work and studies of a notable Canadian, Professor Donald Rowat of Carleton University, who has for years conducted a one-man campaign to make more documents available to the Canadian people to indicate how their affairs are being handled. Dr. Rowat is the professor who has done so much to help popularize in this country the idea of establishing an ombudsman service. Both he and I share the idea that there should be some intermediate steps taken toward what would ultimately be accomplished. These steps are, first, that the government should be far less hush, hush about its security and secrecy classification procedures. It should make its procedures in form of a white paper, or possibly a task force could be established to look into this matter. Second, immediate steps should be taken to make documents more readily available to scholars. Until now the government has followed the practice of departmental discretion, with trusted favourites and no rules except meticulous adherence to the rules of other countries.

I recommend that there should be a much shorter time before classified documents are released, say 12 years instead of 35 years or 48 years. A very few documents might be held for 48 years in exceptional cases.

My third point is that there should be a limit on the government's unfettered right to withhold documents from the courts. A decision in this area should not be left to the sole discretion of a minister of the crown. It should be left to a judge.

I conclude with a quotation from what I consider to be a good source in support of my bill. It is from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail. I have condensed it but it is all favourable to the introduction and passage of this measure. This is what it says:

A private bill has been presented to the House of Commons which could do much to open closed doors and keep the public informed about what is, after all, its own business.

It is proposed that the Exchequer Court be empowered to force the federal government to disclose any unclassified records and information to interested persons. The bill would require that "every administrative or ministerial commission, power and authority shall make its records and information available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time"

• (6:10 p.m.)

Exceptions would be made for matters of national security-

As I have indicated, as well as private matters.

It could be assumed that the court would exercise its discretion to prevent witch hunts, and that in general the effect of the bill would be to ensure the public's access to information which properly belongs to it, as well as the access of interested persons to historical material that ought to be in the public domain but has been withheld.

It is entirely probable that the court would not often be called upon to act, for the very existence of such legislation would dispose ernment officials and bureaucrats to overcome their habits of secrecy, since they would know that if they did not yield willingly they could be compelled. It would also tend to restrain them from arbitrary acts which they would not care to have become the subject of public discussion. There is nothing like the spotlight of publicity to improve a man's democratic manners.

—the bill would enact "the basic parliamentary rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly." The government should put its blessing on the bill and ensure its passage.

As a member of this assembly who has been here long enough to know that 99%10 of the private members' bills presented over the last seven to ten years have been talked out without any decision having been made on them, I regret this procedure, as do all hon, members. I urge upon the government the idea that private members' bills should be brought to some decision, either accepted or rejected or, what I think would be better, referred to a committee for further study. I think that the idea in this bill should be sent to the committee that has already been established to deal with the procedures of this house. I hope hon. members will see to it that this proposal does not die and that at least it is referred to a committee for further consideration.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Mather: Certainly.

Mr. McCleave: Does clause 1 include such emanations from parliament as the C.B.C. and the C.N.R., and in another category does it include such emanations from parliament as the National Energy Board?

Mr. Mather: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. The bill says that information shall be made public except for those parts of public information which are classified under national defence or where the private concern takes precedence over the public concern. In the case of the agencies which the hon. member mentioned I would certainly hope that they would be included in the over-all effect of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is certainly worthwhile and I congratulate the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) for giving us the opportunity of discussing the problem.

The matter is most important at the present time. It has been discussed in the public forum, particularly during the last election. I trust that perhaps in the near future the government can improve the present system; for there certainly is room for improvement in our present system of keeping the public informed on the various operations in the departments of the government as well as throughout its corporations and agencies.

Besides, I believe the Glassco commission had pointed out the seriousness of the problem, which was also recognized by both the former and the present governments.

The former prime minister, the right honourable Lester B. Pearson, had ordered that an inquiry be made into the matter. This was started but, unfortunately the person in charge of the committee was the victim of a fatal accident before having had time to present preliminary reports. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), also aware of the importance of improving communications the governing and governed, between appointed, shortly after he was elected, a commission or a task force composed of three competent persons who were joined by others familiar with the matter under study. This group is to report within a few months after having looked into the work and the structure of the government information services, both in Canada and abroad.

In my opinion, our government is aware that the public must be better informed beforehand, at least in general, about the government's programs and policies. The public must be able also to express his ideas, opinions to the right people before the policy is elaborated and put into force.

An active modern democracy certainly requires the best communications possible between the governments and the voters while taking into account, of course, as mentioned by the hon. member, several exceptions, in particular with regard to security, efficiency, etc. because it will always be difficult to draw a clear dividing line between a government's need to hold discussions and deliberations in a confidential manner and, on the other hand, the public's need for information.

This bill entitled: An act to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration is an effort to clarify, to ask or even to codify, as it were, the conditions regulating the production of documents. In my opinion, however, it is far from being precise or clear enough and it is not precise enough to be applicable.

Indeed, according to section 1 of Bill No. C-6, its scope seems very broad, for it stipulates, and I quote:

1. Every administrative or ministerial commission, power, and authority shall make its records and information concerning its doings available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time

This is indeed a very broad scope especially when referring to the activity of a commission or some administrative or departmental authority. That would appear to include departments, commissions, agencies or corporations of federal, provincial or even municipal governments. It could also include authorities of professional organizations, trade union or others. For that particular reason, it appears that we would not have constitutional or legislative power to pass such a legislation, at least as soon as this bill would propose.

I refer to the text of the bill:

-records and information concerning its doings-

—and I insist on "doings" of administrative and or ministerial authorities. Such a vocabulary, in my opinion, can have several different interpretations.

Considering that this clause deals with organizations, specific bodies, one may venture to ask if there are activities or documents of the organization itself as opposed to those of the officials or the staff? Or still, a quite broad interpretation can be given and it is possible to conclude that it must include any document available to the organization or to the executive body concerned.

Allow me also to point out, by the way, that this clause provides that the information or the records must be made and I quote:

—available to any person at his request in a reasonable manner and time.

Now, I suppose that the individual would not even show a certain interest in obtaining the information and I suppose that those words were wilfully used by the hon. member, because public right—the public at large I suppose—to obtain publication of the required information is referred to in the bill and the interest in such a case would not be a criteria.

And evidently, all provisions are subject to the reservations mentioned in clause 2 of the bill. I feel that subclauses (a) and (b) of clause 2 are clear enough and do not lend to much discussion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must call the parliamentary secretary to order and point out to him that when on the second reading of a bill, it is not usually allowed to refer to specific provisions of the bill.

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. Forest: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will keep to more general considerations. I submit that when the bill speaks of:

—trade secrets and commercial or financial matters of a privileged or confidential nature, obtained from private persons—

—it would be rather difficult to determine the extent of the privileged or confidential nature of the secrets or matters concerned. It would not be easy either to determine to what extent the public interest must exceed the private interest of the individuals who could finally be affected in various ways if certain information or actions were made public.

And, as mentioned by the hon, member, it is possible of course to answer that the court—that is the exchequer court in this case—would decide whether the requested information should be published. But one can wonder on what basis and in the light of what information the court could render judgment when it would not have at its disposal all the information needed to render a decision, especially in a private matter.

The present bill does not exclude the production before the court of files or documents affecting national security because it seems that the bill does not provide for any exception. It is easy of course to realize all the danger that such a procedure would entail. It would be a new and rather unusual procedure, Mr. Speaker, when without any special reason or cause one could simply refer, in a way which is not clearly stated, to the exchequer court in this case, any refusal by any commission or authority to hand over documents or divulge information to any person requesting it.

If Bill No. C-6 were passed in its present form, a special administrative court would have to be established, to consider the countless requests submitted and to decide whether or not the documents requested should be made public.

In the context of administrative law, judicial institutions necessarily play an incidental and subordinate role. The administrative system must be more than a compilation of judicial decisions, and evidently, government authorities' role is to rule and administer. If every decision made by the administration has to be reviewed and considered, without any limitation, by any court, whatever its importance or competence, it is clear to me that the administrative process could then be crippled.

Finally, this bill does not give enough importance to a generally accepted principle according to which the efficient operation of a public service necessitates complete freedom of expression and also of communication between the members of the administration at the various levels, and particularly from lower to senior officials. In my opinion, the contrary could reduce the efficiency of our whole administrative system as we know it.

It is up to the executive power, which has all the relevant data, to decide if national interest or public safety require that certain documents or acts be not made public.

Moreover, I believe that it would be neither legitimate, practical, nor even rational to transfer this decision, in all cases, to any court whatsoever, in spite of the great respect I feel for our courts of law.

It is only logical to believe that a person, a citizen and a taxpayer, can have the right of freedom of access to documents of particular concern to him, but between that and disclosing without discretion to him some information concerning other people, the disclosure of which could be prejudiciable to the latter, I believe there is a rule of caution that ought to be respected while considering this bill.

This bill would give the public more extensive rights than those exercised by parliament itself, according to a long standing custom and tradition.

Mr. Speaker, for all these various reasons and in spite of the commendable purpose pursued by the hon. member, I believe it would be very dangerous to pass this bill, especially in its present form I hope the hon. member may be able during the next session, to introduce another bill, that will be more appropriate, and also that the commission appointed by the government, by the right non. Prime Minister, will present their report; the hon. members will then be more able to come to a conclusion on that important question of the relations and communications that should exist between the government and the general public.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? He has indicated agreement in principle with regard to the bill but has criticized the structure and procedure outlined in it. I am wondering whether he would agree to have the bill referred to the appropriate committee for study concerning the structure and procedure.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: I do not think that it is up to me to decide. Furthermore, I think that we should wait, as I have already mentioned in closing my remarks for the report which should be submitted, as was mentioned by the right hon. Prime Minister, within a few months, by experts in the field, who will be able to make relevant suggestions as to how to improve communications and information which must exist between the government and the public in general.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate, even if only briefly, to support the proposal of the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather). Like myself he has a journalistic background. I suspect he has spent many difficult hours beating his head against massive stone walls, erected by establishments in this country, in an effort to ascertain what in fact is going on. It is a very commendable effort on his part to attempt to include the natural journalistic capacity for trying to find out what is going on in a measure such as this. Furthermore, I was intrigued when I saw in my hon. friend's explanatory note that the bill enacts Bentham's basic parliamentary rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly. For the enlightenment of my hon. friends opposite the Bentham referred to is Jeremy Bentham who was one of the great philosophers of liberalism. Upon his death he made the rather curious provision that his body should be preserved, stuffed and put on public display for a good number of years. I much prefer the philosophy of the stuffed Bentham and its relation to liberalism to that of the speech we have just heard in this chamber.

• (6:30 p.m.)

I think the rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly is a fair and just one, and it should find its adherents in those who support the so-called just society. I noticed that the house leader was in for a while during at least the opening of the debate. During these curious times he does not have to be with us at all times, but at least he was here to listen to the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) present what I thought was a fair and eloquent plea on behalf of his bill. I would ask the hon. member for Surrey whether the provisions of this bill would apply also to emanations from crown corporations such as the C.B.C., the C.N.R. and other bodies of perhaps lesser importance, such as the National Energy Board. The hon. member indicates by a nod of his head that they do. I am not sure that the language of the bill covers all the situations I have envisaged. None the less, this fact does not prevent me from supporting the measure in principle.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a point, which I believe appealed to many Canadians, during the time which led up to that melancholy decision of late June. He made the point, and I think very effectively, that there should be more participation by the citizens of Canada with those who govern the affairs of Canada. I think a measure such as the one before us is designed to bring about exactly that type of liaison.

Without a measure such as this people tend to be reinforced in their paranoia about the conduct of governments in this country. They think government is run by big business and those who have access to certain ministerial ears. They begin to think that government is run for the advantage of the elite in Canada, rather than in the interests of all Canadians. Of course this is not correct in every aspect. The government and this parliament are quite capable of adopting altruistic measures of great benefit to the citizens of Canada. However, any time there is concealment of even one bit of information from the ordinary taxpayer, he does not draw the noble inference that it is not being done to protect somebody who has an interest about which he does not want his competitors to know. This is not the sort of inference drawn by the ordinary citizen. It is, rather, that if you close the door on information and shove it under the rug, as it were, it is because of some evil or malevolent purpose, and the information must be covered up.

The hon. member has made a point in moving this bill, and I am sorry it has not received the support of the spokesman from the government side. The hon. member for Surrey suggests that we should have some measure such as this in Canada, and he also made the point that if, because of its language, this bill does not exactly achieve its purpose, and requires some tempering or changing, we should get to work on it in some way instead of just waiting. How long are we supposed to wait—five years, ten years, 20 years, a hundred years? The bill does refer to ministerial powers and authority. These have been around for a long time and they will be with us for even longer.

Why should we be expected to wait? If we feel that the principle is good, and I certainly do, let us get on with this and make the necessary changes.

We launched, or hoped we launched a committee of this house into action, with all due solemnity, at the very start of this parliament, almost as though this were the most important single thing we could spend our time on during this new parliament. The committee is in existence, and a measure such as the one proposed by the hon. member for Surrey could be placed before it. It could deal with that measure, change its language if necessary, and reinforce it. If we want more participation on the part of the ordinary citizen in governing the affairs of this country, then I suggest a measure of this magnitude is in order.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the bill before the house I feel I should urge that there is a certain philosophy in this bill which, if carried to its ultimate, would be a perfect example of free information. The Prime Minister in his wisdom has sent out a task force to cover the whole of Canada and ascertain how the public can be better informed through the channeling of government information. It has been asked to suggest changes in the outmoded methods of providing information, thus making it easier for people to receive information. They will receive it simply by asking for it from information officers within the various departments. Surely this is the sound and wise course to follow.

The point in favour of free access to government documents seems to be based on the notion that large scale government secrecy leads to distrust and fear, and is incompatible with democracy. The point has been made that access to administrative information is essential in the development and continuation of democracy. The Swedish system has been pointed out as the model that we should adopt. One must consider the Swedish system, however, in the context of a central form of government in Europe, involving small countries where distances are not great.

I suggest that the Exchequer Court would have great difficulty in holding hearings throughout this nation to hear all the requests that might be made. I think the other course, that of the government going to the people and offering to provide channels of communication in the various ridings of this country, is far superior to the one suggested in the bill.

In arguing against the bill I suggest that if official files are opened to the public scrutiny too much administrative caution will result, which will seriously inhibit the effective functioning of civil servants. No one likes to work with someone leaning over his shoulder reading what he is writing. There is such a thing as freedom of thought, and the freedom to exchange ideas. We all know that civil servants, like businessmen and other responsible persons, try to plan schemes for the future and work out employment schedules; but they do not want to broadcast these ideas to the world. Government papers that are used in preparing legislation should not be the object of public scrutiny. If they are, I suggest you will have a frightened civil service and one that feels there is eavesdropping or spying going on right under their noses. Today we are concerned about eavesdropping and listening devices. I suggest that this type of legislation, if carried to the extreme, will inhibit the civil service and reduce its freedom to work in peace. It will also reduce freedom of thought and freedom of exchange of ideas in the civil service.

The rule of law is, in effect, that all persons are equal in the eyes of the law. Our office files are not scrutinized. Why should the files of the civil service be scrutinized? They are working on plans that might well get into the news media in the wrong context. Should the first thoughts about government legislation be bandied about on television, for example, prior to their being carefully considered by people who have been trained for many years to consider them? I suggest that would be a foolish course to adopt.

There are practical difficulties and dangers involved in a scheme that would provide wide-open access to files. I submit that it is difficult to distinguish between a witch-hunt in connection with a civil servant and a legitimate desire to obtain information. In addition, there would be administrative problems of fantastic complexity if this measure were put into effect. You would have to screen every document. You would have to say, "This is secret because it comes under the clause in the bill dealing with matters of national security." Then you would come to another paragraph and ask yourself, "Is this a matter of personal privacy, or one of a privileged or confidential nature?" The official himself would have difficulty deciding that question, and you would toss into a big arena very large distracting force at the civil service.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am solidly against this bill. We have heard of memoranda headed, "Destroy before reading." This practice would increase. You would have a furtive, secretive burning of letters. You would have inhibitions creeping into the civil service, and I suggest it is not desirable that this take place. We have been elected as members of parliament. Surely this house is the place to commence the seeking of access to documents. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if a member of parliament cannot get the information, there is something wrong with our society, with the way in which we are operating and with parliament itself as an institution. We are the ones to get the information. If constituents want information, why should they not get their member of parliament to obtain it?

In the short time I have been here I have found the research facilities of the libraries and the information officers of the departments extremely helpful. Perhaps they cannot give all the information one wants, but they seem to be acting in a spirit of constructive aid. They seem to want to communicate. The ministers seem to want to help, as do the opposition members. I found that with matters dealing with, say, the maritimes, hon. members have often been helpful in providing information. There is a spirit of real progress in this field. I submit it could emanate from this chamber right into the offices of ministers. This, in my view, is the best way to tackle this extremely interesting problem, one which has taxed many people for many years.

With regard to the reference to Mr. Bentham, I suggest that Mr. Bentham did not deal in an age of computerized telegrams and orders in council. He would have hesitated, in fact he would have refused to go along with a bill as sweeping as this one. If this measure were passed, it would be most impractical to make the Exchequer Court the forum for deciding these issues. I submit that any county court judge, supreme court judge or even our magistrates might well have sufficient training and experience to make the required rulings.

say, "This is secret because it comes under the clause in the bill dealing with matters of national security." Then you would come to another paragraph and ask yourself, "Is this a matter of personal privacy, or one of a privileged or confidential nature?" The official himself would have difficulty deciding that our own House of Commons to provide rules which will make information readily available. I submit that prodding by hon. members, such as the one who proposed this bill, would bring about an improvement in the practice in this house, and that before long we would have rules that are much more in keeping with twentieth century ideals and procedures.

These ideals and practices can be introduced in many different ways; but I submit the one suggested by the hon. member for Surrey is a very cumbersome and expensive way of attempting to solve the problem. It is expensive because it requires more judges in this huge country, stretching 3,000 miles from coast to coast and with 20 million people. Will they write in and make their requests? How will such a program be administered? I do not see anything in the bill which indicates a clear cut system for carrying out the practical suggestions contained in clauses 1, 2 and 3.

We have all had frustrations in attempting to get information at some stage, and I would be less than frank if I said there is no problem in this regard. I recognize the problem; but I believe most sincerely that steps have already been taken toward reaching our goal in this respect. This has been done by sending out the task force which the Prime Minister sent out recently. If that task force can come back with concrete, solid ideas whereby everyone will know whom to contact and in what department, they will make great strides toward reform in this area.

Therefore, sir, I conclude by commending the hon, member for-

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gibson: I mean that seriously, sir. I conclude by commending the hon. member for a forward looking idea, but I submit that the method proposed is not the best.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. In view of the remarks in his maiden speech last week, that private members public bills were ridiculous, a waste of time and should be done away with, I am wondering why he is participating in this debate today-because this is the second time within a week.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, this is the only forum I have. As a young member, I hesitate to try to speak on important legislation such as the agrarian acts, the farm acts. I know very little about these subjects, and I do not some program or policy or other, whether the mind admitting it. I have been advised by public should read about it.

other hon. members, with more experience than I have that the private members hour is the best place to express views, and to attempt to gain experience in thinking out and planning so as to conform with the rules of debate. That is the main reason I have taken part in the debate, although I am extremely interested in this topic.

The suggestion I made last week was not to abolish private members bills, but rather that there be a more effective way of using this hour for the discussion of controversial topics, having six speeches of ten minutes each. I think we would all find it more interesting and exciting; the press would enjoy it, and the public would find it more provocative.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate because the bill proposes something new, a new way from the government to approach the public.

First of all, I must say that I do not fully agree with those who believe that the politisation of Canadians will improve relations between the government and the public, or encourage the public to approach the government and to take an interest in some department or other.

It goes without saying that people would of course derive some benefit from such an act because, first of all, the information would be free. What I mean is that anyone who wanted information, for the specific purpose of criticizing certain departments or, as I said, of pursuing the politisation of the people would be free to do so, and quite easily at that. For instance, anyone who wanted to tear down certain government programs for personal reasons could obtain information on the topics discussed during their preparation and then use this information to fight against the program, and in some cases, to compete against it.

Now, as I was saying, I do not fully agree that it will necessarily help the people, but I am concerned about the fact that it might give rise to dissension amongst Canadians and give rise to doubts. There are, no doubt, people who would wonder, when a department is in process of studying the pros and cons of

On the other hand, those who take part in the discussion who merely want to strengthen their arguments in favour of or against a program, or who want to look at both sides of the question, could leave with ideas that have no bearing on the situation.

Furthermore, I do not agree with the principle of the bill. Should the bill be adopted, it would create a lot of administrative problems. First of all, it is true that section 2 of the bill stipulates that the law would not apply to documents on national security, or to documents benefitting from legal exemption, or again to documents of a confidential nature on business companies. It is easy to enumerate the type of documents. There should be someone in the department, some high official, some very important person, who would be in a position to establish what can be disclosed to the public and what cannot.

I think that, from an administrative point of view, it would involve extraordinary intricacies. For example, how can a civil servant in a department decide whether a discussion or a correspondence exchanged between a minister, a deputy minister or a civil servant of another country or province, can be made public or not? Therefore, the officials of a department would simply have to decide whether those matters should be revealed or not. As far as we are concerned, what will come out of it? It will not bring about much result, because certain information is already provided by the government.

Then, I am wondering how the provisions of the bill can be helpful. Obviously, to promote this administrative measure, a new kind of publicity is needed. A new reclassification of all departments would probably be necessary to bring together the factors that affect national security. Also, when we speak of business corporations, one must be very careful. There again a whole set of files would be needed for the various business corporations or various contracts or various communications.

I feel that all this would require tremendous expenditures and there again, I am wondering to what extent these espenditures are warranted. It is well for the government to spend money on worthwhile causes, but, otherwise I do not think it is justifiable.

As I said earlier, this would create confusion in the minds of people. The problem as to morale or frame of mind may exist in a department. For instance, if the Department lished at an early date, was considering a interest that we have been experiencing as a plan concerning my province, New Brunswick, at least certain areas of it, we can be sure such an idea or philosophy as regards area development could be a good one, but there must be also some disadvantages.

Now let us suppose the problem would concern a civil service employee, or a person from outside is given the responsibility of preparing a report. He goes to a certain area and makes a report. He would probably bring arguments that may not be agreeable to everybody but they should nevertheless be taken into account so as to come to something worthwhile.

Mr. Speaker, can we imagine a person bringing arguments against area development, against the development of a given area? Such a person might hang for that, there is no question about it. I repeat once more that the arguments put forward by that person may be good, but advantages or disadvantages must necessarily be considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being seven o'clock, the time allowed for private members hour has expired. If the house agrees we will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

FARM CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBLE CLAUSES, AMOUNT OF CAPITAL, INTEREST RATES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-110 to amend the Farm Credit Act-Mr. Olson-Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: It being seven o'clock, I do now leave the chair, to resume at eight o'clock.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Danforth: Before we pass clause 1, Mr. Chairman, I should like, on behalf of this party, to make a few comments on the basic principles of this bill that were not covered at the resolution stage. One of the facts that is apparent in the bill is that the government has two prime purposes in mind. Number one is to broaden the base and to enlarge that part of the agricultural segment that would be eligible to receive these loans. Number two of Area Development, that is to be estab- is an attempt to change the prevailing rate of farm community since the inception of this course of that time, interest rates are going to measure. I think very few persons will take vary up and down the scale. It has been our objection to the active consideration by the experience during the years this measure has government to enlarging the company of individuals who are eligible for these loans.

I wonder, however, if the government has considered that to the very degree by which they enlarge the scope of this measure they will be subjecting the farm community, in my considered opinion, to a great deal more vertical integration. In listening to the minister and in reading the provisions of the bill, it is quite apparent that the previous definition of farmer, as one who is actively engaged in farming, has been changed to such a degree that almost anyone in the business world today could become eligible to obtain a loan. A person could become eligible by obtaining shares in a co-operative farm. The bill itself refers to a person who either has the intention of farming or the basic ability to farm.

When these pieces of legislation were first introduced the prime purpose was to enable young farmers and established farmers to either enlarge their holdings or to start farming in an economic manner. The fact that these measures were used to such an extent, and such large sums of money were borrowed by those engaged in agriculture, is an indication of the success of this type of legislation. I am wondering, sir, in the light of the economic chaos through which agriculture is struggling today, if such legislation as we have before us will not enable large business interests with large sums of money at their disposal, whether they be from this country or from other countries, to move into the farm industry?

Such business interests could take up large tracts of our land, either through corporate farms or by vertical integration. In this fashion, we would see a good deal of our farm land pass out of the control of the younger farmers of this nation, and instead of having tracts of land in Canada administered by farmers and farm families, I venture to say that in an extreme case we would see large tracts of farm land administered by boards of directors, such as we have in corporations.

Having said this, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that many of us on this side of the house believe that there should not be a change in the method by which interest is determined or charged in respect of those who wish to borrow money under this type of legislation. This is not the same type of legislation as we were dealing with in Bill No. C-111. This measure relates to long term borrowing, 10 years, 15 years or up to 30 years. In the and equipment and installing concrete feed been in force that you see at one time very low interest rates, and at another, extremely high interest rates. With interest rates on the way down, as they are at the moment, we feel that the 5 per cent rate prescribed in the former legislation provides ample recompense for those who wish to lend money in this fashion.

We feel that this money is being provided by the government, and not through a banking institution, so that places this type of legislation in a category by itself. We feel that although the government did have to subsidize the interest rate under which money was obtained to lend to farmers, an examination of interest rates throughout the years would reveal that in a period of 20 to 25 years the cost of these loans to the government would be almost negligible. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, when those who wish to obtain money through this legislation are able to do so at a prescribed interest rate, one which they feel would enable them to borrow money in the large amounts necessary to work into the farming industry, farmers would be more attracted to it and would borrow enough to obtain economic units. This might not be the case if the interest rate were set too high. As I say, this is the second point in the bill that is causing some concern.

The third point that is causing great concern is the fact that the categories of people who may borrow money are defined and limited. We have the age limit of 21 to 45 prescribed and the different rates at which money may be borrowed either by individual farmers or collectively.

I have been wondering, Mr. Chairman, whether consideration should be given to allowing individual farmers to borrow up to the gross amount that the bill provides can be borrowed by three farmers collectively. I make this suggestion because a tremendous amount of money is needed today in order to bring what is and has been a viable economic farm unit into the position of remaining such in the future.

I use as an example, Mr. Chairman, a dairy farm that today has about 60 to 100 cows, run by a single farmer who wishes to become more competitive and to change over to automatic feeding, perhaps to silage instead of hay, to using the new type of milking stalls lots, with all that that entails. Such a changeover could very cost $100,000 to $125,000, as it does in some instances.

It would be unfortunate indeed if an endeavour of this size could not qualify under the act. As I read the act, the very most that can be borrowed by an individual farmer under optimum circumstances is $55,000; unless the circumstances are of the very best the maximum is $40,000. It is true that if the farmer has a son over 21 years of age this amount may be doubled. However, there are many farmers whose sons are not 21 years of age, who have no son or son-in-law, or whose sons are engaged upon some other endeavour. Are we to lose this type of farm enterprise that has been so successful over the years, which has been built up over generations, because under this bill they will no longer be eligible for this type of loan, or will some attempt be made to make it possible for these farmers to borrow such sums of money at a reasonable rate of interest?

All of these questions, Mr. Chairman, we should like the minister to deal with. From his knowledge and advice he can give us the very information we are seeking. There is no doubt from the way the clauses have been drafted that this bill has received very serious consideration and has been subjected to very intimate and searching examination. However, we feel that before we can let the bill pass tonight we should be given a lot more information than that provided in the terms of the bill, and in the introductory remarks of the minister. As the debate develops we may offer some amendments for the consideration of the government, or we may find that some clauses, even as amended, are unacceptable to us at this time.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I have to agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that there are some points of concern in this bill which require further explanation and consideration. Before commencing I might say that I found rather interesting this afternoon the minister's appeal to the house to try to speed this legislation through. It would appear that the time allotted to him by the government has pretty well run out, and at the same time he has not been able to pilot this bill through the house.

There have been some suggestions on his part and on the part of other hon. members that this, Mr. Chairman, is due to the somewhat lengthy debate that has been conducted by members of the opposition who wanted to take up a number of points. This is true; we have been engaged in fairly lengthy debate on some of the questions involved in the farm credit legislation. I suggest that the implications of the changes in the legislation we are discussing mean millions of dollars for farmers all across Canada, and they are changes of the sort that we cannot let go by lightly.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the minister that had he gone along with some of the changes we proposed and been somewhat more responsive to our suggestions, perhaps this legislation could have been put through in a shorter time. I hope that he will be more responsive to some of the changes that we may propose in dealing with the amendments to the Farm Credit Act. I say that because I am sure he will agree that there are some differences in the situation we are considering under this bill, as compared to the bill we completed this afternoon, the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I also have to agree with the speaker who has just taken his seat, that there are some valid concerns about the amount of capital that is required at the present time to carry on an economic farm operation. Capital requirements for farming operations have escalated at a very rapid rate for more than one reason, and I am sure that the minister is aware of this. At the same time I would like to offer a word of caution. It seems to me that the primary concern of the government in terms of public policy is to bring as many agricultural units as possible up to a minimum standard of economic efficiency and satisfactory operation; that this should be the primary objective in allocating capital to farmers.

Mr. Chairman, there is one aspect of clause 1 which bothers me, and this is the change in definition of what is a farmer. The expression "farmer" refers, of course, to those people who are eligible to receive loans from the Farm Credit Corporation. I was particularly concerned with the change in the definition of the term "family farming corporation", which is defined by regulation, to the term "farming corporation". It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the implications of this change require examination.

I note that in the regulations made pursuant to the Farm Credit Act a family farming corporation is defined as:

—a corporation the principal object of which is the carrying on of an enterprise devoted to the production of agricultural products, and at least 95 per cent of the shares of which are owned by persons that are related to one another either through blood relationship, marriage or adoption, with not less than 51 per cent of the shares owned by the actual operator or operators of the farm.

I concede, Mr. Chairman, that there could be some deficiency, in terms of this regulation and its application, in the use of the term "family farming corporation" with emphasis on the word "family". Some people carrying on joint farming operations are not related in the way prescribed in the regulations but certainly should be entitled to as good consideration as those who are related in some way stipulated in the regulations.

However, Mr. Chairman, when the term is contracted simply to "farming corporation", it seems to me that the danger with which we have to be concerned is the possibility of operations under the Farm Credit Act being extended to large industrial ventures. This may not be the objective at the present time, and I see the minister shaking his head in dissent. I am quite prepared to accept his word that this is not what he intends.

I suggest, however, that this might open the door to large industrial operators who would crowd out a good many of the farm operators, even though they might be carrying on an efficient type of business. One example which occurs to me is that of the National Grain Company which is presently undertaking a large venture in hog raising. I recognize it is not the intention of the Farm Credit Corporation or of the government to allow such an organization to qualify for public assistance at the present time, but it seems to me that as legislators we should be concerned that we do not open the door to such a possibility at some time in the future.

Mr. Olson: In reply to the hon, member for Kent-Essex may I suggest to him that by changing the provision under consideration in clause 1 of this bill we are putting farmers who are owner-operators in a far stronger position to compete with the integrated operators, where producers and financial interests are involved. I say with respect that this will hamper rather than help these virtually integrated companies, because it will give actual owner-operators of farm units a better opportunity to join together in such a way as to compete with the integrated operations.

The act has been amended by changing the word "person" to "individual" so as to provide a distinction between individuals and corporations, the latter being, in the legal sense, persons. The change provides a way of dealing with the problem the hon, member raised.

Another point raised both by the hon. member for Kent-Essex and by the hon.

member for Regina East concerns the replacement of the term "family farm corporation" by "farming corporation", to permit loans to farming corporations regardless of whether families are related by blood or adoption. This particular clause caused some concern to those who fear the expansion of corporate farming. It is not the intention, however, that this would allow persons who are not actual farm operators to become primary beneficiaries of loans from the corporation. I am sure what has been done here will satisfy both the hon. member for Regina East and the hon. member for Kent-Essex. We have sought to make certain that for individuals to benefit, even though they may be in a corporation or a co-operative, must in fact be owners principally engaged in the business of farming.

Mr. Danforth: Suppose one or more individuals concerned with a corporate farm or a co-operative have a large investment in such an undertaking. Would this make the entire co-operative ineligible for loans under this legislation?

Mr. Olson: Yes, if there were an investment at a level so high as to remove control from the actual operators of the farm, in which case the corporation would be ineligible. We want to prevent absentee persons who may own the majority of shares from becoming beneficiaries of the legislation.

As to the other point raised by the two hon. members I have mentioned, we believe we should bring as many farm units as possible up to economic viability with the amount of money we have. This is one of the reasons we say that if two or more farmers are in a co-operative or in a corporation they should be entitled to as much aid within the $100,000 limit as they would have been, had they been farming separately. We are not proposing amendments in this bill to raise the individual limit on funds; hon. gentlemen know those limits, now.

One other comment which I think will allay some apprehension. In clause 7 there is a provision that should the shares of a co-operative or corporation change in such a way that a majority go out of the hands of the actual owners, the corporation reserves the right to demand repayment of the loan. The purpose is the same; we want the benefits of this act to flow to the actual operators, not to anyone outside the operation. We wish to safeguard the situation should control be transferred from the hands of the actual operators later on.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on Bill No. C-110 which is somewhat of the same nature as the one passed this afternoon concerning farm improvement loans. Tonight we are considering Bill No. C-110 concerning farm machinery loans.

I would have liked the minister to tell us where matters stand in the investigation mentioned in the revised estimates for 1969, page 385, under expenses of the royal commission on farm machinery. Before introducing his new bill, it would have been normal, it seems to me, for this royal commission which has already cost $508,100 in 1967-68 and for which an expenditure of about $382,000 will have to be authorized for 1968-69, for a total amount of approximately $900,000 in two years to investigate on the cost of farm machinery in Canada, to have served some useful purpose.

Nearly one million has been spent up to now and as yet we have no indication or report concerning that inquiry.

Before introducing this bill, I think that the minister could have told us this royal commission will have completed its job within one or two months and, in the light of that inquiry, we might be able to better study the bill which is before us today.

I should like tonight to join the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) when he said, not so long ago, on April 26, 1966 when he sat on this side of the house and stated clearly his thinking about the implication of the legislation which was introduced that day, regarding the prices of farm machinery and the farm situation in Canada.

As shown on page 4324, of the Debates of the House of Commons, April 26, 1966 the hon. member for Medicine Hat, now Minister of Agriculture said, and I quote:

The minister said that the government anticipates this expansion of money available to the Farm Credit Corporation will be sufficient for two and a half years. I suggest to him that if the price of land and farm machinery continues to rise as rapidly during the next two and a half years as it rise in the last two and a half years the extension will not provide the capital required by farmers in the next two and a half years.

I think that perhaps one of the real problemsand paradoxes in the extension of farm credit under the Farm Credit Corporation is that every time parliament increases the amount of money available to individual farmers you find there is an almost concurrent or immediately following increase in the price of land.

I have come to believe that one of the reasons for the increase in the price of land is that very recently the maximum amount available from the Farm Credit Corporation to an individual applicant was increased. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we are partially defeating the purpose of the act in increasing the maximum amount available.

[Mr. Olson.]

Thus, at that time, the maximum was wrong, and today it is all right.

One of the problems that follows these increases and the high prices paid for land and machinery is, of course, that the capital cost, interest charges and other things that a farmer must bear increase substantially.

One of the greatest problems...is that we need to be even more concerned about finding ways and means of seeing that farmers have an opportunity to repay these loans.

And he was right.

One of the greatest problems...is that we need to be even more concerned about finding ways and means of seeing that farmers have an opportunity to repay these loans.

It was a problem then and it still is today. I continue:

I know that an increasing number of wellestablished farmers are today getting into financial difficulty and have been for the last two or three years because of the so-called cost-price squeeze.

• (8:30 p.m.)

The problem the minister discussed at that time, as reported on page 4324, the "costprice squeeze", is still with us today.

I doubt that increasing the interest on loans for the purchase of farm machinery—as we did this afternoon for farm loans-which he denounced at that time, will remedy the situation that he then wanted to change.

The situation is perhaps not so difficult for well established farmers-–again he is the one who says so–

-who have accumulated the necessary capital, but it is extremely difficult for a young farmer to obtain this amount of capital. If the young farmer does not obtain the capital he is unable to obtain the productivity necessary to provide a reasonable standard of living; his net income is not sufficient.

He concluded with his two main points:

-I should like to impress upon the minister that we in this part of the house are very concerned about the deteriorating net income of farmers across the country, because from this net income they will have to repay these loans in the future.

I wonder whether the minister is as concerned on the other side of the house as he was on April 26, 1966. He added:

Finally, I want to say that there has been-

And this is where we come to the same point where we are today, some two and a half years after later,

Finally, I want to say that there has been an alarming increase in the price of farm machinery.

It was a problem two and a half years ago. In the meantime, a royal commission has been set up, and it has cost nearly a million dollars. However, prices have been constantly increasing.

I wonder whether one of the first steps-

It was the present minister who was then speaking.

—the minister could take in connection with this matter would be to have the people responsible for combines investigations look into the situation to ascertain if there has been any agreements made between the various farm machinery companies to raise prices. If there has not been, it seems a little difficult to understand—

We still do not understand.

—why all of them decided to raise their prices substantially within the last 15 to 18 months.

The problems of that time are still the same in October 1968.

I conclude by saying-

I am quoting the words said by the minister in 1966, and I would like him to remember.

I conclude by saying that I feel the minister has a responsibility to do something to convince farmers across the country that there is some justifiable cause for the very large and significant increase in farm machinery prices which we have noted recently.

At that time, there were complaints about the increase in farm machinery prices. So how will the minister convince all the farmers in this country that the interest increase on farm loans and the interest on farm machinery purchases, we want to increase tonight, are acceptable?

I should like, at this stage, to make a comment concerning the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) who, a while ago, denounced the interest rate on farm loans and farm machinery, saying they were intended to be profitable to banks only. This afternoon, however, less than twelve hours ago, that same member voted for the increase in the rate of interest.

Again, it is not the farmers, as I have shown this afternoon, who are getting returns and whose returns are increasing. It is precisely the rates of interest charged to those people we are preparing to increase tonight and those loans will be profitable to individuals who are at present in the financial world and in favour of whom this new act will mostly work, as the hon, member for Kent-Essex has pointed out in his complaints.

I take for instance the case of Mr. George Arnold Harp, President of the Bank of Montreal, who is administrator of a finance company and of trust companies, who is involved with farm machinery companies, who is a member of farm machinery unions, who has invested in funds, who administered in 1966 a total of $14,387,000,000 and who caused the profits of the companies he was administering in 1966 to show an increase of $1,249,968,000. This afternoon we voted against a legislation for which the government and the conservatives have voted unanimously so as to increase the profits of those gentlemen. The same M.P.'s will probably vote again unanimously, following the same logical reasoning they have brought forth this afternoon, to increase the rate of interest on loans granted for the purchase of farm machinery, although the hon. member for Kent-Essex has spoken against such plan this afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, I could also consider the balance-sheet of companies administered by Mr. Earl McNaughton, chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada and executive of several finance companies, especially Capital Investment Corporation, Niagara Insurance, Canadian Pacific Railway, General Motors, Royal Victoria Hospital and many others, as the Montreal Trust, etc.

The asset of the companies which he administered in 1967 amounted to $33,759 million and still, not one of their balance-sheet shows a deficit. Nevertheless, this evening we are on the verge of doubling the interests of those gentlemen, since the Minister of Agriculture has not yet said no to the financiers.

At this point, I would like to remind him that a few years ago, he knew how to say no to financiers. Now he is saying no to the farmers, and he says yes to the finance corporations and banks which to-morrow could double the interests on loans for the purchase of farming implements and thus raise problems for many hundreds of thousands of farmers.

As the minister was not here this afternoon when I made the remark regarding a farmer who last night was to make a loan at 5 per cent, I will remind him that the same farmer will not be ready, within a few days, to borrow at 8 or 9 per cent. Canada will count one farmer less, which will make our national product go down by as much and the Minister of Agriculture will be responsible for this situation.

It is unfortunate that we have to repeat all this to the Minister of Agriculture who is an expert in agriculture as well as in finance. That is why we cannot pass without objecting, a bill which is so important for the farmers and which will cause a serious prejudice to them in years to come.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on the bill which is now before us. I was particularly pleased to see the farm improvement loans legislation pass through the house this afternoon. I wish to comment that the measure of worth of the Minister of Agriculture will depend on how low he can convince his cohorts to set the interest rate and still have the banks lend money. We on this side of the house will watch very closely the formula that derives and how successful it is.

I should like to take exception to what has been said by the hon. member for Shefford, who has just spoken, when he suggests that we in this party voted for higher interest rates on this very point. We voted to establish a formula so that the interest rate could go only so high. The government did not accept the suggestion; I suppose it thought our formula was too low. However, we voted for the measure in an attempt to encourage the banks to lend money to the farmers so that they could make a profit, and not necessarily so that the banks could make a profit. We were in no way concerned whether the banks made a profit or not, but we were concerned about the agricultural industry. I think my friends on this side dealt with that point quite extensively.

I am a little disappointed because the minister proceeded with this legislation. Forgive me for saying so, but over the Thanksgiving week end I made an extensive tour of central Alberta. I can only say that I was depressed when I saw the weather conditions as bad as they were. The farmers have not turned a wheel for two weeks; crops are still lying out in the weather. There is snow in some fields, while other fields are too wet to enable a machine to get on them at all. I am a little disappointed that the minister did not bring in the cash advances legislation before the farm credit legislation, because the one represents immediate cash and the other represents long term credit.

Mr. Olson: We have it ready to go on with immediately.

Mr. Horner: I realize the minister is prepared, but I was somewhat concerned this afternoon when he said that this legislation must go through, and hinted to the house that he has used up all the time his government a little disappointed when he threw out the misinterpreting their remarks. This is what [Mr. Rondeau.]

hint this afternoon about his time running out. In earlier days the minister had the whole department; now it is split into three sections under three ministers. One would think that three ministers would command some position in the government and that agricultural legislation would not be allowed only a limited number of days.

Mr. Olson: We have had priority of time that has been available.

Mr. Horner: I would hate to think that we were hamstrung in dealing with as important an issue as long term agricultural credit. This is an important issue, because certainly, when one considers the plight of the farmers today and in the immediate future he can only say that credit must play a major part in the revamping of the whole agricultural industry.

Clause I of this bill defines a farmer as one whose principal occupation is that of farming. In answering a question of the hon. member for Kent-Essex the minister said that we must acknowledge the fact that farmers should be encouraged to join together in order to compete better with vertical integration. Where has the family farm gone? Has it become non-existent; has it passed from the sight of all politicians, including the Minister of Agriculture? Why is this legislation not primarily for the purpose of strengthening and enlarging the family farm?

Mr. Olson: It is.

Mr. Horner: Why is it necessary for us to become involved in the whole complex matter of joining farmers together? Have we admitted that the agriculture industry is beyond hope unless the farmers band together? I would like to think this is not so. On June 4 the Winnipeg Free Press quoted the Prime Minister as saying this:

The government proposes to amend the farm credit legislation to provide for broadened applicability and to stimulate the entry into the industry of younger people. These amendments would provide increased coverage for farmers desirous of acting in partnership, would improve the ability of farmers to enter into agreements with their sons-

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: This is a quotation from a speech by the Prime Minister. I hear somebody over there saying "hear, hear". I am glad that someone in the Liberal party agrees with my interpretation of someone else's will allow him for his farm legislation. I was remarks, because sometimes I am accused of the Prime Minister dealt with, as reported by the Winnipeg Free Press on June 4. He said that we must direct farm credit in such a way that farmers will be desirous of acting in partnership.

An hon. Member: I cannot hear you.

Mr. Horner: He said he would direct-

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Horner: He said he would direct farmers to enter into agreement with their sons in a farming partnership. This is what the Prime Minister said. At the same time he also had an interesting theory. In the same news item he suggested that we must set up two categories of farmers, the big and the small, with special help to the small. I have looked through this whole bill in an effort to find some help for the small acreage farmer.

An hon. Member: What did you find?

Mr. Horner: In answer to the smart replies over there I must say that I did not find anything. You know, we have a new rump here tonight. If one could measure the amount of brains by the amount of noise one might think there was a pretty intelligent rump over on that side.

An hon. Member: You are right.

Mr. Horner: I should like to say-

An hon. Member: Why don't you?

Mr. Horner: The only person here who has a time limit is the Minister of Agriculture. He pleaded with members of the house to get this legislation through tonight. I am in no particular hurry. If hon, gentlemen over there wish to prolong this debate, I am quite in agreement, because I believe the question of long term credit for the agricultural industry deserves more than a few scant hours of hurried scanning in this house. I should like to ask the minister where the family farm has gone. Has he lost sight of it altogether?

Mr. Olson: Not at all.

Mr. Horner: This legislation purports to aid those farmers who will join together. I do not deny that two farmers who have joined together can compete better in the agricultural world in which we find ourselves today. I am not denying that fact; but it has always been my belief, and the belief of the Conservative party, that it is the duty of the government to promote the greatest opportunity for the greatest number of people.

If we accept the philosophy and promote the idea that farmers must join together, that a father and son must join together, or that two or three brothers must join together, then we immediately accept the philosophy that it is government's duty to aid the big and say "to heck" with the small.

• (8:50 p.m.)

That is what this bill does.

Mr. Olson: It does exactly the opposite.

Mr. Horner: I should like to ask the minister whether this long term credit plan is not doing exactly the same thing the Prime Minister suggested, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 4, when he said:

Because government assistance programs to farmers have, in the past, tended to do least for the people who need help most—the smaller, less efficient farmers—the Liberals are suggesting that farms be divided into two categories, with the operator deciding in which category he wishes to be. The greatest assistance would go to small, marginal farmers; the least would go to large, commercial operators. But the small farmer would pay a price. In return for government aid he would have to promise not to sell his farm, except for incorporation into a larger, more economic unit, or to a public authority—to be used for a community pasture or parkland.

Let me deal with the first part of the Prime Minister's comment. The greatest amount of assistance is to be given to the small farmer; but this bill allows the governor in council to set the interest rates. The minister has not said there will be two interest rates, one for the corporate farmer and one for the family farmer; or one for two brothers, or a father and son, and another for a family farm. He has not said what this particular clause will do for the individual farmer.

The minister did say to the hon. member for Kent-Essex that the individual would have to own the land; but how do you determine whether the man who owns the land is actually farming it?

Mr. Olson: He would have to make a declaration that he was farming it.

Mr. Horner: Would he have to live on the land? The minister does not answer because he does not know. He himself would have difficulty in qualifying as a farmer if that were the case. These are the points that should be cleared up before this clause is passed.

There is no hesitation on my part in saying that long term credit is of utmost importance to the agricultural industry today. Never before has this industry been so badly in need of long term credit. Let me commend the operations of the Farm Credit Corporation in the past. If I had any criticism to offer I would say it has asked for too much guarantee and has not approved a sufficient number of loans to support the individual farmer.

I have not known of two brothers who were farming together who had much trouble getting money. There always seems to be money available for this type of operation, which is of a concentrated nature. They are not necessarily the most efficient farmers, but certainly the government is promoting the establishment of this type of farm through this type of farm credit legislation.

In my own area and throughout the constituency of Crowfoot there are brothers who farm together. I commend them for this, and there is very little that can be said against this type of operation. However, the backbone of the agricultural industry is the family farm. This bill and the proposed amendments will change the situation drastically. There will be a tendency on the part of farmers to create corporate farms. In this way they will be able to qualify for loans of $100,000 or more, whereas the maximum an individual farmer might obtain will be something in the neighbourhood of $40,000.

The hon. member for Shefford quoted the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, which I quoted earlier, in which the minister suggested that the cost of land would go up if money was made available. He suggested that this in fact has been the case, and I agree with him. Let me take this one step further. If this has been the case in the past, what will happen in the future when the government is prepared to give $100,000 to two or three brothers who farm together in order to purchase property? The individual farmer will be able to obtain only $40,000. Who do you suppose will be able to pay the extra $1, $2 or $5 per acre for that piece of land? There is no doubt in my mind that the corporate or single family unit, as the minister likes to describe it, will have the money to buy that acreage. That type of operation will grow, because brothers will be in a position to pay the extra money wanted by the farmer who is selling out. That farmer wants the highest price he can get, and I do not hold that against him. If the minister makes more money available to this type of operation he will increase the cost of land.

If this is what he wants, and feels is best, he will eventually end up with state farms like they have in Russia. Two farmers will not be able to farm together as successfully as five farmers, and five farmers will not farm as effectively together as ten. In ten or 20 years from now we will have state farms, and as a result of this legislation they will actually be state farms because of the money the units will owe the government.

The minister shakes his head in a negative fashion, but he has not changed my views by the remarks he has made. I asked him whether the individuals applying for loans would have to be engaged actively in farming and living on the farms, and he replied that they would have to be actively engaged. I suppose these people could go to the banks and borrow money, and then turn it over to managers. I am not sure that is the case, and I am not sure that would constitute being actively engaged.

At this time we must be very careful about where we are going as a result of clause 1 of this particular bill. Let us not forget the value of family farms. I am in complete agreement with the Minister of Agriculture that farmers may tend to join together to survive. I cannot accept this policy of the government which seems to indicate that the family farm is not an efficient operation and cannot survive. I firmly believe that these are efficient operations, and that an equal opportunity should be given to the individual farmer.

Let me remind the minister of the permit book system adopted by the Wheat Board. Two brothers farming together on a single farm unit receive one permit book, and an individual farmer on a single unit right alongside would also have one permit book. The minister has come up with a bill which will allow the corporate farm units to obtain loans of $100,000, whereas individual farmers may only obtain a maximum loan of $40,000. This will invariably put a group of farmers in a better position to buy the land in a particular area and it will inevitably increase the cost.

When talking to officials of the minister's department I have been told that two farmers operating together are better off financially than an individual farmer, and as a result are in a better position to pay back their loan. I do not disagree with that suggestion. Two or more farmers operating together have a built-in labour force, and more initiative because they are directly involved. I do not believe the government should go out of its way to promote one operation against another. It has been my belief that the government should provide equal opportunity. If we follow the idea outlined by the minister we will ultiof business.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could help the hon. member.

Mr. Horner: I see that the minister is eager to rise, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Crowfoot has made the point several times, or has attempted to do so, that this measure will force family farms into a disadvantageous position relative to some other form of entity, whether it be a co-operative or corporation set-up. The fact of the matter is that exactly the opposite is true. If there is a family farm where there is more than one owner-operator, father-son, or father and more than one son, and if there is a partnership or family corporation or co-operative-indeed it does not have to be in that form as long as it is operated as one business, as a family unit-$100.-000 is available to them. It would be $80,000 if there are two, and $100,000 if there are three.

All these changes will do will be to recognize every farmer, whether he belongs to a family unit or is in business for himself as having a right, as a bona fide farmer and a citizen of Canada, to apply for $40,000. He can then organize himself, whether it be in a family unit or some other arrangement, with those around him into operating the most efficient, economic unit. In this way he can take advantage of what my hon. friend has attempted to put forward as an economic disadvantage; that is, he can enter into a corporate arrangement and he would not be denied borrowing up to $40,000 because he belonged to a larger business than a singlyowned proprietorship type of farm.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is very, very difficult for me to follow the argument of the hon. member, because what he is arguing against, in so far as a family farm is concerned, is actually being provided for in this measure to make it easier and better for family farms and other small groups to in fact take advantage of the efficiency of operating a larger unit.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister's definition is quite convincing to those who are not aware of the actual conditions and practical application of the agricultural industry, and what is happening in it.

The minister did not enunciate how the famimately force more and more family farms out ly had to be made up in order to borrow the $120,000, I think it is, that he mentioned. The minister was referring to a farmer operating a family farm with sons of 21 years of age or 18 years of age. He did not in any way refer to a farmer who has daughters.

> Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member would agree that they are not partners until they become of age, whether it be 18 years of age or 21 years of age.

> Mr. Horner: Now the minister has put the picture very, very clearly. Supposing there are one, two or three brothers farming together, and a piece of land is for sale, and supposing also that a family operating a very efficient unit has children who are not 18 years of age or 19 years of age—they may be 6, 7, or 8 years of age; perhaps there are a few young farmers still in this country who have been brave enough in the last few years to try to establish a farm-I ask, who will be able to buy the piece of land available for sale in the neighbourhood?

> Under the provisions of this bill, those able to buy the land will be the established, two, three or four brothers farming together who have formed a company. Perhaps two or three of the brothers are still in the city or have gone back to the towns and are doctors. or what have you; but they are considered to be farmers because they were able to borrow the money. The minister did not say they have to live on the farm, but as long as they are operating the farm-perhaps drive out at week ends to supervise it—they are eligible to take advantage of this bill.

Mr. Olson: The act says occupation".

Mr. Horner: That is a difficult one to determine, Mr. Chairman. "Principal occupation" is a very difficult term to define.

An hon. Member: It is defined all the time.

Mr. Horner: Now we have the learned expert entering the debate. I wish that more of the backbenchers on the other side of the house would enter this debate, because we would benefit so much from the knowledge that they are sitting on. "Principal occupation" does not give a clear definition as to his degree of occupation in that field. It depends upon whether he is actively engaged in the agricultural industry. He might be an auctioneer making far more than the earnings of his farm.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to quote the interpretation of "principal occupation" which was put into the act by his party when in government. It says:

Where a person has two or more major occupations, one of which is farming, the corporation may determine which of such occupations is his principal occupation for the purposes of this act.

That was the definition put into the act by his party when in government.

Mr. Horner: That points out very vividly, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty in trying to define "principal occupation". The minister has substantiated my argument as to why it is not properly defined. In the opinion of the Farm Credit Corporation, what is a person's "principal occupation"? In other words, it is left to the corporation to decide this question and there is no real definition of the term. I am not disputing that particular point. The minister has in effect sidetracked me. He has not defined what is meant by "principal occupation". He has tried to define a family farm as one operated by a father and three sons, or a father and two sons, or a daughter, who has a contract. How many farms in western Canada would the minister describe as family farms which have no contract among the family?

Mr. Olson: You do not need a contract.

Mr. Horner: Ninety per cent of the family farms are operated as one person, that is, by the breadwinner of the family. The rest of the family contribute, no matter what their age, to the productive capacity of the farm. They do this beyond a shadow of a doubt. They do it in more ways than one. They may well not be old enough to sign a contract, such as the minister wants them to do under the provisions of this legislation. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I go back to my own boyhood in this respect. Without a doubt I worked harder at age 16 than I did at age 22. This exemplifies the point I have been trying to make, which is that this bill specifically helps and encourages the joining together, under a contract, of individual farmers.

The minister knows well the company of which I speak. Supposing that a piece of land comes up for sale and three or four people get together and buy it, they run the cattle jointly and form and operate a company, but they are still operating individual farms, the question that arises is: Would that be a company of bona fide farmers whose principal occupation is farming, because in that case they would have a distinct advantage over a family farm that is also looking at that grazing land with envious eyes. The company formed in this way would be able to borrow $120,000 under this bill.

Mr. Olson: That figure is wrong, Mr. Chairman; $100,000 is the limit.

Mr. Horner: The minister would suggest that there is not too much difference between $40,000 and $100,000, but to the family farm there is a great deal of difference. I want it clearly understood by every member in the house, by the backbenchers of the minister's party and everybody else, that this bill denies the right to the family farm to compete equally with groups of persons banding or joining together in order to borrow money. It denies this right to a family farm, particularly if that farm is not incorporated and if the children on it are not old enough to sign a contract. This bill specifically spells out that such an arrangment cannot be considered a partnership. To qualify for a loan under the provisions of the bill, you must have children and they must be of age 18 or 21, and all boys. This must be the situation for such a farmer to compete with a joint operation. So let it be clearly understood that this bill is designed to take away any advantage that the family farmer has. This is what the minister is doing.

I would like very much to hear the minister dispute that argument far better than he has done so far tonight. He has not done so in any way, and I say to all members of this house it is my belief that the family farm is still the backbone of the industry, and it is the government's duty to maintain it, particularly in this bill which deals with long term credit.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take up too much time this evening but there are one or two questions that I would like to direct to the minister. I think most of the pertinent facts dealing with the legislation before us have been covered by one speaker or another during this debate, which has lasted for several days. There is one point however which does bear a great deal of repetition. I am referring to the change which has been made in the setting of the interest rates. I think this proposed change is the most objectionable feature of the amending legislation, and it is this particular point which has caused more debate than any other. There are two objections to the change with which I would like to deal. First, instead of the rate being written into the act we see that the government intends to ask the house to change the regulations so that the interest rate would be set by governor in council. Personally I object to this change, and there are several reasons for my objections.

My first objection is to the fact that once again it is proposed that the regulating powers of this house be taken away from the members and handed over to the cabinet. I think this increasing trend toward government by order in council is not good, whether it is in the House of Commons, in the provincial legislature or wherever it may take place. There is far too much government by order in council, so that the elected representatives of the people do not have a voice in the decisions that are made. Handing this power over to the cabinet, no matter how good their intentions may be, is a step in the wrong direction.

The second reason for my objection, and one which I think will affect farmers most of all, is that we are going to see an increase in the interest rate which will be charged for loans under this act. It seems to me that in the old act the rate was set at 5 per cent. Farmers knew what they would have to pay when they went to the corporation for a loan. Today the minister is suggesting that we hand over to the cabinet the right to set the rate of interest on loans granted under this piece of legislation.

Mr. Olson: I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to suggest that he deal with this matter when we get to clause 5 where the interest rate in embodied. It is not included in clause 1.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have only a minute or two left and I might as well complete the point I am making right now, rather than bring it up later on. I want to point out that as a new member I have been impressed by the number of members from all sides of the house who have taken part in the debate and who have told us of the trouble in which farmers all over the country find themselves. There have been references to the corn growers in Ontario and the grain farmers on the prairies, for whom this is one of the very bad years.

Here we are debating the interest rate, and the minister has assured us that in his opinion it will come down. I have one or two suggestions which I would like to make to him. I think the interest rate should be kept at 5 per cent, that it should be written into the act, and that we should subsidize the difference, if necessary. Perhaps we should put a ceiling on the amount of loan to be subsidized. This can be done.

The suggestion was made the other day that it would not be possible to put a ceiling on the amount of loan to be subsidized, because of the difficulties we would have with banks. However, in this case we are dealing with a crown corporation, so that subsidization can take place very easily. I want to point out to the minister the case of a farmer desperately in need of money. He borrows money at 7 or 8 per cent, and six months hence the interest rate could drop. This farmer, however, will be stuck for many years with a high interest loan which will amount to many thousands of dollars. Hon. members must be aware of the trouble in the field of housing under the N.H.A. where the interest rates went sky high and thus a terrific cost was inflicted on people trying to build homes, and borrow money at these exceptionally high rates.

Again I appeal to the minister and to the members of this house that we take another look at this matter. We can afford to subsidize loans for one year under this act. This will not break the government. Already there are many fields where money is being wasted. This money could, instead, be applied to give the farmers in a bad year at least an opportunity to get loans at 5 per cent interest rate, and even that in my opinion is too high.

Mr. Burion: Mr. Chairman, I would like to come back to a point raised earlier by me, and on which the minister commented with respect to the term "farming corporation" as qualifying under the definition of "farmer". I want to make it quite clear that I do not question the minister's word or the government's intention with respect to the extension of the term "farmer" to mean also a farming corporation, but it seems to me we as legislators have the responsibility of providing some protection in the legislation to prevent so far as possible the possible future subversion of the intent of this legislation, which could result in harm to the industry which we are trying to help.

In paragraph (e) of subclause 1 of clause 1 the term "farmer" includes three different categories: First, an individual whose principal occupation is farming, second, a farming corporation as defined by regulation—this is left completely open—and third, an individual who is the owner of farm land that is being farmed by a farming corporation, where that individual is a shareholder of the corporation and is principally occupied in the farming operations of that corporation.

So since under subparagraphs (i) and (iii) it is possible to refer to "principal occupation is farming" or "principally occupied in the farming operations of that corporation", it should also be possible to add such a provision in subparagraph (ii). Consequently I should like to move the following amendment:

That the following words be added to clause 1 subclause (1) immediately after the word "regulation," in line 12: "provided that at least 95 per cent of the shares are owned by individuals who are principally occupied in the farming operations of that corporation".

I might elaborate on this amendment by pointing out, first of all, that the reference to a 95 per cent share requirement is consistent with the present regulations under the Farm Credit Act. The definition of a family farm corporation in these regulations provides that 95 per cent of the shares must be owned by those who are actually actively participating in the operation of the family farm corporation. The last part of the wording is similar to the last words of subparagraph (3) of this particular paragraph. I move the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Horner: Before the amendment is dealt with, I feel we should have an explanation from either the minister or the mover of the amendment. As I understand it, the suggestion is that 95 per cent of the shares must be owned by individuals who are principally occupied in the farm operation of that corporation. I should like the matter cleared up in my mind. It seems to me this wording suggests that you cannot have a farmer owning a farm and getting involved in another corporation. I should like the minister to give his interpretation of this amendment before we vote on it so quickly. I should like more information from the mover of this amendment because it suggests that the individual must be principally occupied in the farm corporation, and no other family farm or corporation.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, it is intended that a similar provision to this will be contained in the regulations. However, I would say to the hon. member that the amendment would cause some hardship if we use the figure of 95 per cent. The reason is that it would be necessary then, for example, in a father and son relationship, for one to buy the other out if the farm changed hands. We believe the figure should be substantial, certainly well over 50 per cent. When I say that, I do not mean close to 50 per cent; I mean well above it. From the practical standpoint, we would find such a provision would cause some hardship when attempts were made to find the money to buy out all of the shares up to 95 per cent.

We have to bear in mind one or two other things. The amount of money that can be borrowed from the corporation does not go up to 95 per cent of the value of the farm unit. While we are certainly going to do something of this nature in the regulations, since such a provision has been used before, we feel that 95 per cent would be restrictive. This provision would necessitate a young farmer raising a substantial amount of cash, and this would be difficult. The shareholder may be his father or some other relative who could hold some of these shares, but he would not then be principally occupied in the farm operation of that corporation. This is the reason it would be difficult to accept this high percentage.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister why he does not put the definition in the act, rather than simply say he is going to deal with it by regulation? Is there any valid excuse for not having the provision incorporated in the act?

Mr. Olson: Yes, there is, because we need to gain some experience with the various kinds of corporate and co-operative structures and the shareholdings that would be involved. There are many different kinds of arrangements, and there are many people involved in the farm business. We would like to have enough flexibility so we could make provision, first of all to meet these problems and at the same time make certain it is only actual owner-borrowers who are benefiting from this finance facility.

Mr. Stanfield: What assurance has the house that the regulations will in fact provide what the minister is now suggesting?

Mr. Olson: I am advised that when the family farm concept was put into the act in the first place, the definiton of "family farm" was left to be defined in the regulations on the basis of some experience in the various arrangements and structures of the ownership, control and operation of family farms. We believe that we need to have some experience with these more formal arrangeements of family farm corporations and other farm corporations where the members participating are actual operators. There are partnerships and there are many other arrangements that are envisaged here. We feel we need some time to gain experience, at least in the first instance, to find out what variations there are in the structures.

Mr. Stanfield: The house has no assurance in this regard. In so far as the family farm is concerned, there is some room for latitude in the definition of a family farm. However, the latitude would be within a quite narrow variation. When you move into the area of corporations, I may say I am not so enamoured of the amendment put forward because it is not narrowing the definition. It does not really prevent a corporation from being involved in many farm operations. The amendment put forward is not really very restrictive. What I am protesting against is the minister asking for a blank cheque and simply trying to soothe the committee by saying it is proposed to do this or that. We have had a number of other instances in which assurances have been given-and I do not want to be offensive—but the actualities turned out to be very different from the assurances given.

Mr. Olson: I accept that reason for raising this point. I would have to say, though, that there were a number of definitions and interpretations that were left to the regulations each time the act has been amended. Indeed, when the act came into force in the first place on July 18, 1939, the definition of a "farmer" was a person whose principal occupation is farming and, for the purpose of part II, included co-operative farm associations and family farm corporations as defined by the regulations. This is not new to the act, it has been in the act for nine or ten years.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, in reality, the proposed amendment does not mean much. However, that does not mean that I accept the definition or the words of the hon. minister the sort of figure he has in mind as being reasonable, taking into account the variety of circumstances that might arise new system of financing, and it would be difficult to accept this amendment which means that 95 per cent of the shares would be held by individuals or by the individual contracting the loan under the new legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister knows this. The mover of the amendment must know it, too. They know that one has to own 95 per cent of a farm in order to borrow $40,000, $80,000 or $100,000. This means that when the loan is made, when the farmer has given his farm or property as guarantee, the financial system which finances the purchase or loan holds or controls 95 per cent of the shares of that farm. In other words, we are going in circles, always within the same system.

Here, according to the definition given by the hon. minister and which we see in the bill, it is obvious that some people thought very hard in order to come to the conclusion that a farmer is someone who works his farm. I suppose they had to take special courses to understand that a farmer is a man who works his farm and whose main occupation is agriculture.

For the purpose of Part II, this term includes a co-operative farm association and a family farming corporation as defined by the clause.

Mr. Chairman, I had something else to say on the bill itself, but since we are now considering the amendment—that is the subject under discussion—I must say that it means nothing at all under the circumstances, even if the shares are held on a 50 or 60 per cent basis by someone engaged in farming. Evidently, those people can borrow as well as those who hold 95 per cent of the shares. Nowadays, one rather seldom sees people holding 95 per cent of the shares in farming operations, even in western or in eastern Canada, because farms are mortgaged and because land is controlled at present not by the farmer but by those very people whom the minister wants us to accept as lenders to the Canadian farmers.

[English]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I recognize the difficulties pointed out by the minister regarding the 95 per cent figure that is proposed in my amendment. I simply took the figure in the regulations made under the act, which have applied up to the present time. I should be interested in hearing from the minister the sort of figure he has in mind as being reasonable, taking into account the variety of circumstances that might arise.

I also recognize the point made by the Leader of the Opposition, that this in fact is not the final word in closing the door to the undesirable entry of corporations into farming operations, with the assistance of the public. However, I would ask the minister whether he is prepared to give the committee an undertaking that it is the intention of the government to pass regulations that do fulfil the intent of this amendment, namely that any public assistance given through the Farm Credit Corporation to help people to become established in farming, to established farming operations or to extend farming operations will be restricted to those who are principally engaged in the occupation of farming.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I can reply to the hon. member. He referred to the 95 per cent figure contained in the present regulations. While the regulations provide that 95 per cent of the ownership must be with members of the family, the regulations also provide that only 51 per cent shall be held by the actual operators. I can give the hon. member the undertaking that when the regulations are drawn they will provide that 51 per cent or even a larger share of the shares must be held by actual operators.

I would not like to give the hon. member the exact figure at this stage because there are such things as voting shares, preferred shares and other aspects involved in the structure of these companies. However, I can give the hon. member opposite the assurance that a majority, and indeed much more than a majority, of the shares will have to be held by the owner operators.

Then there is the problem that arises in corporate family farm structures which include young people who cannot be defined as operators, but may have an interest in the family farm corporation. We should like to leave enough room here so that this would not defeat some of the objectives in strengthening the competitive ability of the family farm unit.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, on the basis of the explanation given by the minister and his undertaking to me, I ask the leave of the committee to withdraw my amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn. [Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with clause 1, since the minister was discussing the regulations a minute ago would he say whether they still declare that the prime purpose of the Farm Credit Corporation is to aid farmers not now operating an economic unit? When the Farm Credit Corporation was first established in 1959 the regulations provided that loans could not be made to farmers who were already established on an economic farm unit. The corporation's basic purpose was to help farmers become established on economic units, putting them on a sounder footing. Would the minister say whether this provision, or one like it, is still in the regulations?

Mr. Olson: Yes, it is.

Mr. Horner: Then, Mr. Chairman, what is the minister's definition of an economic unit, if he is prepared to lend up to $100,000 to two, three or more farmers who are farming together a joint operation? Anyone with enough credit to borrow $100,000 today would be considered in the agricultural industry to be operating an established farm as an economic unit. Would the minister explain this regulation?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am sure the hon. gentleman will recognize at once that three individuals have to apply for the loan through a corporation, a partnership, a cooperative or some other structure. I presume it takes nearly three times as much to support three families as to support one, and this is the justification for that amount. Each farmer, or citizen who wants to become a farmer, whether a member of one of these co-operations or associations or not, is entitled to equal consideration.

The regulations which were drafted are still applicable, Mr. Chairman. Regulation 12 (2) provides:

Where, in the judgment of the Corporation, an applicant for a loan has the resources required to complete an economic farm unit the corporation may decline to make a loan to him or limit the amount of the loan to be made to him.

This regulation would apply in this case, Mr. Chairman. I repeat for emphasis that if there is more than one family—and in many cases there will be—living off the same farm unit, the size of the farm, to become an economic unit, must go up proportionately.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I am not concerned with those farmers already living on a farm, the example cited by the minister. I am concerned, in broadening the scope of this legislation, that the change in the definition of what is a farmer would make money available to corporations or co-operative farm associations that are already established units, units that to all intents and purposes are quite productive but want to enlarge. I am concerned that money will be taken out of the public treasury, in effect, and given primarily to those already engaged in farming on a sound financial basis. The lending of money to these sound economic units will mean depriving somebody else of a loan to assist him in his operations.

Mr. Olson: But the same regulation applies. The key phrase is "if, in the judgment of the corporation...". It is the same phrase as has been used in the past. Where an individual or a corporation has the resources to complete an economic farm unit the corporation has a right to decline a loan on that basis.

Mr. Horner: This brings us to the crux of the problem. The regulations may be the same but they are now to be interpreted in line with a new act. The corporation can well interpret the intent of the government and of parliament in passing it, and the intent is to help corporations and co-operatives which are already established. So the interpretation of the regulation will definitely change. It is not the regulation which was in effect in the past will continue to be in effect in the future, because it applies now to a different act. As we would say, using a colloquialism, it is a horse of another colour.

In the amendment which was withdrawn, an attempt was made to limit the use of this act in relation to corporate entities. It is a difficult thing to do. The minister knows that in recent years the Farm Credit Corporation, using its judgment, has made loans to what both he and I would consider to be economic units. I should like further assurance that it is still the intention of the government to lend money to farmers who are not yet operating economic units, so that they may be in a better position to compete within the industry.

Mr. Olson: I do not know how I can make the position more clear. I have answered that question in the affirmative three times. That is precisely what this part of the regulations means, and they are in effect. Mr. Horner: Then why is the hon. gentleman changing the definition of "persons" and using the word "individuals" if it is the intention of the government to lend money in respect of non-economic units?

Mr. Olson: I did not altogether follow the question.

Mr. Horner: Why the change in the definition of "farmers" if it is the intention of the government to lend money to owners of non-economic units? What is the difference between "persons" and "individuals"?

Mr. Olson: It is a legal term, because corporations under law can be regarded as persons and we wanted to make sure that we were dealing here with individuals—two or three, as the case might be, applying for the grant. Therefore it is preferable to use the word "individuals" rather than "persons".

Mr. Horner: Would the minister give us some idea of what he considers to be an economic unit? Let him classify it in terms of gross income, or as net income, or in any other way. Let him just give us some idea of what he has in mind.

Mr. Olson: The hon. gentleman knows very well that I could not begin to define that, taking into consideration all the factors which are applicable in the different regions, or in the context of the various commodities produced across this country. It would take hours to make that kind of explanation. The field men of the Farm Credit Corporation are skilled in this work and have been doing a good job; they take into account the various conditions and regions in determining the size of unit which will return a decent living to the operator involved.

Mr. Horner: There have been suggestions from the government benches that two classes of farmers, small farmers and big farmers, are to be considered. This is clear from the quotations from the Prime Minister's speech in Winnipeg this year, to which I have drawn attention. The minister should clear up this question concerning the nature of economic units. He has told us the government is trying to help those who are farming non-economic units. Would he consider a net income of $4,-500 a year to meet his definition? What would the gross figure be? Surely he must have some idea. Surely he should be bold enough to say: I shall not rest until all farmers in Canada have an income of such and such a figure, and I will do my utmost to ensure that this bill helps toward that goal. I believe the minister should tell us clearly: I do not consider a farm to be an economic unit until it returns an income on such and such a level. Let the hon. gentleman make his position clear so that we may better understand what the Prime Minister meant in Winnipeg, and better understand what he refers to as an economic unit.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, in the last few days the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has introduced for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) a series of bills favourable or detrimental to the farmer, and one of those is Bill No. C-110.

Even though the ability of the present minister of Agriculture have never been questioned, I dare say that his way of piloting his bills ranks him among the four predominant figures of this house, even well ahead of the Prime Minister. (Mr. Trudeau). The Minister of Agriculture, as a head of family, has acquired a maturity which the present Prime Minister lacks. As you all know, the Minister of Agriculture is also a full-fledged businessman, because while the Prime Minister was travelling all over the world, the Minister of Agriculture was building a successful business in his own province, and the measly three years experience acquired in this house by the Prime Minister is more than compensated by the 11 years spent in this house by the honourable Minister of Agriculture, who does not have to learn about farming problems, as he is himself a farmer. However, in spite of all his knowledge, the bill proposed by the honourable minister creates a few problems. We are concerned about the bad effects the passing of this bill will have on the farm people.

It is unfortunate that the farmer has to be subjected, by a government which is on the payroll of the big financiers of the country, to a bill which will strangle the farmer and do away with him. For the farmer, producer of the food needed for the survival of human beings, there is no hesitation, after the elections, in introducing bills such as the one now before us. However, according to circumstances, it is possible to introduce other sorts of bills and for the purveyors of election campaign funds, there was no hesitation in getting passed bill C-191, entitled "An act to amend the Excise Tax Act."

[Mr. Horner.]

• (9:50 p.m.)

And for the information of the new members in this house, you might allow me, Mr. Chairman, to quote a few excerpts:

All the following:

Machinery and apparatus sold to or imported by manufacturers or producers for use by them—

A little further one reads:

—gasoline powered and diesel powered selfpropelled trucks mounted on rubber-tired wheels for off-highway use exclusively at mines and quarries;

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he should confine his remarks to clause 1 of Bill C-110 under consideration, without referring to another bill recently passed by the house.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your remarks but I think it is important to point out to the newcomers the difference between the protection granted to companies which contribute to election funds and the way our farmers are treated.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we will have to know what profits the farmers will have to make in order to pay their taxes, I take the liberty of continuing the quotation:

—internal combustion tractors, other than highway truck tractors, for use exclusively in the operation of logging, such operation to include the removal of the log from stump to skidway—are exempted from the 12 per cent federal tax.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that the government is suggesting to its Minister of Agriculture unconditional loans, that is to say the farmers will not know now what interest rates they will be charged for the money they will have to borrow, for example to pay the sales tax on a third of the price of their tractors. It is not a secret for the farm machinery dealers-and the Minister of Agriculture is aware of it-that the farmers have to pay the 12 per cent federal tax on all the electrical system in their tractors, they have to pay the 10 per cent federal tax on what is called a grader. Those farmers who pay taxes on the purchase of farm equipment must think that they need profits to finance all that.

Farmers will have to borrow money to pay the sales tax on the hydraulic system, that is the system which feeds the plough, the harrow and all the other equipment. Mr. Chairman, the federal government sales tax also applies to that part of the tractor. It also applies to the pulley that is fastened to the tractor—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Business of the House

Olson) knows what I am talking about—that it is possible to forget it sometimes. It is pulley through which all the farm equipment is steered, whether it be the threshing machine or any other machine. The federal government sales tax of 12 per cent applies as well, I insist to the shovel which is used to load the grain, or fertilizer, or earth.

A while ago, I pointed out in Bill No. C-191, with which we are well acquainted, the following:

-pipes or tubes commonly known as "oil-country goods", being casing or tubing-including accessories, all the material required for the development of natural gas and mining. For the development of the agricultural produce required to feed the population, if the farmer can get water by gravity for his cattle, for the house, his home, the 12 per cent tax applies to the pipes. Otherwise, if he needs a pump, again he has to pay the 12 per cent tax on the pump. For all these things I am sorry Mr. Chairman, but the farmer has to pay sales tax.

In election time, the big companies are freed from excise taxes, and sales taxes. The farmer is not allowed to fade into the background: he always has to pay taxes. While our woods companies develop our forests to their advantage and that of foreign financiers, the farmer must purchase trucks on which the federal sales tax will always apply. All this will push him deeper into debt. If he wants to expand, he will have to go into debt. Of course he is not obliged to borrow because nothing forces him to expand his farm, but when time comes to seed, to bring in the crop, if machinery breaks down, he has to borrow. I feel that the Minister of Agriculture should act now and delete Section 8, subsection 2, paragraph (1a) which reads as follows:

"(1a) The Governor in Council may from time to time by regulation prescribe the rate or rates of interest to be paid in respect of any loan made under this Act."

Mr. Chairman, I do not think this makes sense. I think the farmer should know where he is going. The farmer cannot think that he will always pay beyond his means. He has lived long enough on the depreciation of his buildings. He must now make little profit, otherwise it will be the end of agriculture. The bill under consideration is the best means, the most hypocritical, the quietest, and the most conventional one to enable the government to seize the land of our farmers. Farms were seized in Poland and in Russia members on the other side of the house to by all sorts of means, but today, the way the give us the chance to fulfil our democratic really regrettable that one of ours should be forced to come to that, Mr. Chairman.

Ancient history teaches us all sorts of things, and, about treason, one recalls the story of Joseph who was sold by his brothers.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is time for the honourable minister to change his approach so as to prevent our young people and the coming generation to repeat or to think...

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being 10 p.m. it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the late shows, could the government house leader indicate to all of us what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The business tomorrow will be second reading and, we hope, committee stage of the bill to amend the Judges Act, to be followed by second reading stage of the drug bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And Thursday remains as announced some days ago?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Thursday remains as announced last Thursday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS-VICTORIA-VILLE, QUE.-PROPOSED ABANDONMENT OF PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that many members should leave the house, because I think that all members should be interested in national matters. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention, as I have done, by asking the government does it is so well presented that obligation and to exercise our right to speak.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Thus, I revert to my speech which follows my comments of October 11.

I was then asking the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), if the unfortunate decision taken by the C.N.R. management that passenger service at Victoriaville would be discontinued completely, was irreversible.

Tonight, my remarks will be brief and especially directed to shed some light on a situation that has brought out a general outcry among the population of the area of Bois-Francs.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the minister was absent and you suggested that I put this question on the order paper. If I want to discuss it tonight, it is on account of the obvious urgency of the matter, because if I put it on the order paper, I would not get a reply until way after October 27.

Mr. Speaker, we know that this decision will be in force on October 27. That is a very serious matter. The Bois-Francs area, including the cities of Princeville, Arthabaska, Warwick and Victoriaville, as well as the rural and neighbouring regions, has a population of over 35,000. The whole area has a national reputation, I would say, thanks to the size of its manpower, its industry and its trade.

As a matter of fact, the Bois-Francs area is a furniture and textile centre. Its trade is extremely important. I wish to point out that the people there voted créditiste, but the increasing prosperity of the Bois-Francs area is now threatened because the road and communications network is out of date.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, Victoriaville is located about 100 miles from Montreal and the C.N.R. trains take over three and a half hours to cover the distance.

Secondly, Victoriaville is less than 75 miles away from Quebec City and there again, the Canadian National passenger service is absolutely unacceptable.

Thirdly, we have no direct junction line with the Trans-Canada highway, and it is not necessarily my intention to get elected to Quebec to acquaint them with the problem, as they are not even aware of it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at this point that we are told that the Canadian National passenger services are uneconomical in Victoriaville. I would like to ask the minister or his representative what are the grounds for asserting that the services in Victoriaville are uneconomical. Is it because the present services are out-of-date and unsuitable? Is it because the people do not use them?

I believe it is a good reason for people not to use it; it is because the existing services are outmoded and inadequate.

Mr. Speaker, before removing such an essential service as that one in an area where railways are the only important means of communication, have the heads of the Canadian National Railways conducted a responsible and thorough inquiry with the people? What was their decision based upon? That is what I should like to know and what I am asking on behalf of the people, who want an answer without delay.

I am therefore asking first, that the minister order an inquiry if it has not yet been done, in order to clearly establish the economic viability or non-viability of this passenger transportation service.

Secondly, that the minister inquire about the possibility—and that is the point I am driving at—of improving that service, taking into account the needs of modern society.

Thirdly, it is not necessarily through the abandonment of all uneconomic services that an enterprise can necessarily be made a profitable one if beforehand—and I start from such a principle—we have not made sure whether the service could be made economic by improving and modernizing it.

Fourth, let the minister order the immediate revision of this most unfortunate decision which will certainly not promote the expansion and development of the region of Bois-Francs which has a most dynamic population.

Fifth, I would ask the minister to have a more modern railway station built, one better adapted to the needs of these areas, since the present one is falling in ruins.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks by maintaining that the C.N.R. should be there to serve the people and their interests. It must adapt its administrative policy to the present needs of our society; it must try to improve its services continually, whereas in Victoriaville, as elsewhere, services have in fact become worse. Since the C.N.R. is a Crown corporation, financed by the money of the taxpayers, it must serve the taxpayers and must be adapted in such a way that important regions such as that of Victoriaville are not neglected.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the population of this region very much affected by the decision which is to come into force of October 27th, I would appreciate some comments and a positive reply from the department, the minister or any other spokesman.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the interest shown in this matter by the hon. member when many people of the region of Victoriaville have heard that the Canadian National Railways intended to discontinue completely their passenger service in the region.

However, when we consider the situation, we hear that at no time have the Canadian National Railways proposed to discontinue their passenger service but rather that they anticipate a reduction in the service.

I may also add that because of the complaints that were received concerning the proposed reduction, the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission is now considering the situation. The result of their study and their recommendations will be available in the near future and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) will be happy to report on the subject to the hon. member.

AGRICULTURE—DETERIORATION OF SITUATION ON THE PRAIRIES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) the following question:

—is the government carrying on consultations with the provinces and other interested parties to consider measures to alleviate the serious income problem now facing the prairie farmers and also to counteract the deteriorating crop conditions which are getting worse by the day?

The minister in his answer could only refer to the cash advances proposal of which the house is already aware.

Today the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) also addressed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on this problem. The Prime Minister evaded an answer by referring the problem to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), both of whom were absent.

This crisis situation has developed over the past month as a result of unusually large amounts of rainfall and prolonged periods of inclement weather, which have prevented farmers from completing their harvest. The latest report of the Saskatchewan wheat pool states that 56 per cent of the harvest had been completed by October 4. Since that time there has been very little favourable weather. Over the past week end some districts received one inch of rainfall or more to add to the existing surplus of moisture.

The Globe and Mail today stated:

At the end of last week...about one-quarter of the crop in Manitoba, more than one-third in Saskatchewan and two-thirds in Alberta remained in the field.

The lack of progress in harvesting has been felt most severely in the northern half of the agricultural area in Saskatchewan, in areas of Manitoba, and in most of Alberta. In most of these areas, reports indicate that from 25 per cent to 40 per cent of the crop has been harvested, compared to some 80 per cent in some southern areas. With short, cool days and a surplus of moisture, it is probable that a large number of farmers will have to leave part of their crops in the field over the winter.

In addition, many farmers have sizable carryovers of grain stocks from last year. Quotas ranged from five to six bushels and grain officials estimate that this year a five bushel quota is the most that can be expected, with more pessimistic estimates suggesting four bushels. The continuing tight international market situation shows no promise of change. Today's Globe and Mail comments:

Farmers in the prairie provinces will have little spare money in the coming year. Farm income in the area is heading into a period of depression brought about by the combination of weakness in the world wheat market and crop damage from a wet harvesting season. "A lot of smaller farmers will be squeezed out this year," a Saskatchewan Wheat Pool official said in Regina.

Farm costs continue to rise at a level of 4 per cent to 5 per cent per year, while farm prices have dropped sharply. In particular, wheat prices dropped by some 22 cents per bushel in 1967 when farmers were left exposed during the period between the expiry of the old international wheat agreement and the beginning of the new international grains arrangement.

There are a number of measures the government might consider to alleviate the problem. True, the situation could improve somewhat before freeze-up, but it is now clear that much of the crop will stay out in the field, much of the crop being harvested is in tough or damp condition, and in numerous cases there are problems involved in moving tough and damp grain to drying facilities.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Some of the measures the government should consider include:

- 1. Special over-delivery quotas to enable tough and damp grain to move to terminals.
- 2. Special action to clear space at elevator points now plugged with dry grain, which prevents facilities being used to move tough and damp grain.
- 3. Special payments to farmers who are forced to leave part of their crop in the field.
- 4. Adequate co-ordination and control to ensure that drying facilities are used to the maximum, and to develop emergency facilities as needed.
- 5. Special depreciation allowances for storage and drying facilities.
- 6. A guaranteed price of $2.12 per bushel for No. 1 wheat, basis lakehead.
- 7. Effective back-up and support to the Canadian Wheat Board in dealing with the present difficult world market situation.
- 8. Action to control farm costs, including special action to control farm machinery costs and interest costs on borrowed money.

To deal with the serious problem facing prairie farmers, action must be taken now.

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) will perhaps allow me to answer and to offer a few suggestions with regard to the problem he raises in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) who is now on his way to Winnipeg in order to attend the first meeting of the National Grains Council. The minister will try solve problems.

Here, there is a slight difference between Motion agreech and deed. I feel the Minister of at 10.17 p.m.

Agriculture understands quite well the problem set forth by the member for Regina East, and I should like to point out to him that last Friday, the Minister of Agriculture answered a similar question put by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam). I shall quote the answer given by the minister to that hon. member:

Mr. Speaker, there is a possible or a potential serious loss to the farmers of western Canada, but I think the hon. member will realize that until the harvest season is completed it would be difficult to ascertain what the loss will be.

That is before the harvesting is over.

There are several days, perhaps even weeks, left this fall when much of this harvesting could be done, providing the weather turns better.

I feel it would be premature—and this is the gist of my reply—to attempt to determine losses at this time.

The hon, member must also be aware that western farmers have purchased for about $115 million worth of crop insurance and that the government's share amounts to 50 per cent of administrative costs and 25 per cent of premiums costs. Many other measures have been introduced in the advanced payments legislation, which is now before the house, as the hon, member has just said.

As regards other programs, all will depend on the circumstances and the hon. member will perhaps understand that the minister fairly tries to solve farm problems. He will also understand that, in conjunction with the provinces—

FRENCH VERSION OF B.N.A. ACT

Question No. 13-Mr. Caouette:

Is the government taking any measures to provide an official French version of the British North America Act and, if so, when will such version be available?

[Translation]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): While there is in use in Canada a generally recognized and accepted official translation of the British North America Act passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom in 1867, an official French version of the original Act of 1867 could, under the present constitution of Canada, only be provided by formal legislative action on the part of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. This would apply equally to the various amendments to the Act from 1867 to the present, except, of course, designed in conjunction with the 1 cent, 2 those amendments that by virtue of head 1 cents, 3 cents, and the 4 cents series at a total of section 91 or head 1 of section 92 may be cost of $3,400. Thus the amendment to the British North America Act that was enacted by the Parliament of Canada in 1965 relating to the retirement age of senators was enacted in both official language versions, English and French.

More recently, where an agreement requiring legislative implementation has been entered into between the Government of Canada on the one hand and the Government of the United Kingdom on the other hand, the agreement has been executed in both languages, both texts being stated to be equally authentic, and has been sanctioned accordingly in that form not only by our own Parliament but also by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. See for example the Canada-United Kingdom Income Tax Agreement approved by chapter 14 of the Statutes of 1966-67. The intention of the Government of Canada is to continue this practice, and to seek to extend it to whatever future legislation the Parliament of the United Kingdom may be requested to enact relating to Canada and its constitution.

Canada for relief of the area of Nigeria affected by hostilities has been expended?

2. What supplies have in fact been sent to Nigeria?

3. What portion of such supplies has been actually used in the area affected by the hostilities for the relief of the victims?

4. Is it contemplated that further allocations will be made?

5. What steps have been taken by the Canadian Government to remove obstacles to adequate distribution of Canadian and other supplies to the victims of the Nigerian hostilities?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Approximately $50,000 has been disbursed. (See also answer to question 4 below regarding expenditure commitments.)

- 2. Drugs, vaccines, antibiotics and dried salted codfish have been sent.
 - 3. All the supplies have been used.

Questions

- 4. An additional allocation of $500,000 was announced by the Prime Minister on September 17. $875,000 has been committed to orders for additional shipments of fish and $75,000 for freight and wharfage charges.
- 5. The Canadian government has supported the efforts of the international committee of the Red Cross to arrange for delivery corridors into the areas of greatest need from outside distribution points. This support has included diplomatic interventions with the federal Nigerian government and public appeals to the Biafran authorities, with whom Canada has no official relations.

MANPOWER PLACEMENT SERVICES

Question No. 88-Mr. McCleave:

- 1. What were the total placements by the National Employment Service and its successor, the Department of Manpower and Immigration in 1965, 1966 and 1967?
- 2. How many vacancies were notified to such offices by employers in each of those years?
- 3. How many persons were employed on the staff of such offices in each of those years?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Recorded placements were: 1,257,700 for 1965; 1,166,300 for 1966; 1,071,700 for 1967.

2. Registered vacancies were: 1,634,700 for 1965; 1,544,200 for 1966; 1,435,800 for 1967.

3. Staff: 4,904 as of April 1, 1965; 5,089 as of April 1, 1966; 5,288 as of April 30, 1967.

The data on staff for all three years include employees of regional and Ottawa headquarters as, for the years 1965 and 1966, it was not possible to segregate the field staff from the total staff of the organization which existed then. Moreover, it is important to note that these data are not comparable in meaning over the period as the manpower services being provided changed considerably. Emphasis shifted from the operation of a simple placement service to the provision of a range of manpower services which include referral to training courses (these totalled 294,000 in the fiscal year 1967-68), manpower mobility grants (these totalled 28,547 in 1967-68), more extensive labour market and job vacancy information, and fuller employment counselling.

BELL ISLAND HOUSING AND MANPOWER PROGRAMS

Question No. 112-Mr. McGrath:

1. What is the total expenditure to date by the Atlantic Development Board under the Bell Island Special Housing Assistance Program?

- 2. What is the total expenditure to date and how many persons have been moved from Bell Island under the Manpower Mobility Program for Bell Island?
- Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Forestry and Rural Development and Manpower and Immigration as follows: 1. $284,625.
- 2. From the inception of the program on December 28, 1965, to September 23, 1968, this department authorized a total of $431,549 for the purpose of moving workers from Bell Island. This expenditure relates to 440 workers with 1,314 dependents.

WINTER WORKS EXPENDITURES LOTBINIÈRE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 165-Mr. Fortin:

- 1. In the years 1962-63-64-65-66-67-68, how much did the government spend on the Winter Works Program in the federal constituency of Lotbinière?
 - 2. How much was spent in each parish?

HIGHWAYS INTO INDIAN RESERVES

Question No. 177-Mr. McCleave:

- 1. Does the federal government take responsibility for the building and maintenance of highways into Indian reserves and, if so, on what arrangements, if any, with other levels of government?
- 2. If the federal government has such a policy, are there plans to widen and/or pave the road into the Shubenacadie Indian Reserve?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian federal government does not take responsibity them by the Indian and Eskimo people.

for the building and maintenance of highways into Indian reserves, however in certain cases, the department may negotiate for construction and maintenance of access roads to Indian reserves with the provincial or municipal authorities. The negotiations are based on the extent to which the reserve is expected to use the road in proportion to the use to be made of the road by residents off the reserve.

2. A portion of the road continuing through the Shubenacadie Indian reserve was widened and built up in 1967, for a distance of 3.5 miles. The department plans to apply and compact a layer of fine gravel on the road during the current construction season, and next year it is planned to seal coat the road. The department of highways, province of Nova Scotia, are responsible for and have paved the road into the reserve up to the reserve boundary line.

ADMINISTRATION OF INDIANS AND ESKIMOS, QUEBEC

Question No. 187-Mr. Laprise:

- 1. Is the transfer of the federal administration of New Quebec to the Government of the Province of Quebec still continuing?
- 2. Have the Indians and Eskimos of that region been consulted and, if so (a) in what manner (b) what was the reply?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. There has been no transfer of powers with respect to Indians and Eskimos from the federal government to any provincial government.

2. The policy of the federal government is to try to make it possible for Indians and Eskimos to receive services provided by departments and agencies of the provincial government to all other residents in the province. In pursuit of this policy, consultation with the Indian and Eskimo people affected is an essential and basic element. In Quebec the province has begun to extend services in recent years to the more remote and northern areas where previously only federal services have been available. As these provincial services become established there are opportunities for Indians and Eskimos, both as individuals and as entire communities, to participate. Federal services are continued so Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The long as there is a demand and a need for

Question No. 196-Mr. Latulippe:

What was the cost of the issue of Government Bonds in the amount of \$500,000,000 as advertised in newspapers of September 15, 1968, for delivery on October 1, 1968, and bearing interest of 6%, $6\frac{1}{4}\%$ and $6\frac{1}{2}\%$ (a) for brokers' fees (b) for newspaper advertising (c) for lawyers' fees (d) for other expenses (e) for printing of the Bonds?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The amount of the government of Canada loan dated October 1, 1968 was set by the Minister of Finance at $535,000,000. The costs incurred under each of the specified categories are as follows: (a) $1,454,082.00; (b) $20,018.80; (c) nil; (d) $19,931.17; (e) $37,622.50.

SPECIAL CLAIMS, NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE

Question No. 205-Mr. Schreyer:

- 1. Subsequent to the construction of the Northern Ontario Natural Gas Pipeline, were any special claims submitted to the government of Canada by contractors involved in the construction thereof?
- 2. If so (a) were any of these claims accepted as valid and consequently paid (b) what were the amounts of special payment in each of these cases (c) was Treasury Board approval obtained in each case?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. Yes.

2. (a) Yes. (b) $6,681.68; $17,956.40; $420,222.38; $65,243.00; $692,496.01; $112,950.00. (c) Yes.

Note: While the government of Canada initially paid these claims, all these payments were recognized costs of the pipeline and reimbursement therefor was made to the government of Canada by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO UNITED NATIONS

Question No. 214-Mr. Schreyer:

1. What was the cost to the Government of Canada for the maintenance of the Canadian Delegation at the 22nd Session of the United Nations General Assembly?

2. What was the size of the Canadian Delegation?
3. How many persons on this Delegation were recruited from outside of the Canadian Civil Service and the Parliament of Canada?

4. What was the cost to the Government of Canada (showing both emolument and expense allowance) of maintaining each of them in New York during the 22nd Session of the U.N. General Assembly?

5. What is the budgetary allowance for 1968 to cover the cost of maintaining the Canadian Delegation at the 23rd Session of the United Nations General Assembly and, specifically, what is budgeted to cover the cost of maintaining those members of the Canadian Delegation who are not members of the Canadian Civil Service?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. $158,090.

- 2. The official delegation, approved by cabinet, comprised a chairman, a vice-chairman, three representatives, and five alternates. The delegation was assisted by advisers from the Departments of External Affairs and Finance and administrative support staff. Also attending for periods of approximately two weeks each were twenty eight parliamentary observers.
 - 3. Two.
- 4. No emoluments were paid. Travel expenses for a period of 90 days, including accommodation and meals, were $4,971.33 and $4,813.62, respectively.
- 5. $175,000. It has been estimated that $22,000 will be required out of the 1968 budgetary allowance for five members of the delegation who are not members of the Canadian public service.

- 2. If so, when will invitations to submit bids on this ship be issued?
- 3. Will bidding be restricted to west coast shipyards as the Minister of Transport announced on June 19?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1, 2 and 3. Decision to restrict tenders for any replacement of C.C.G.S. Estevan to west coast shipyards, as previously announced, has not been changed. However, budgetary considerations required a review during the summer of coast guard shipbuilding program priorities. Also, the results of an operations research study on coast guard vessel use, initiated earlier, became available and suggested that the marine work of the coast guard on the west coast could be handled to the same standard of service through the use of new techniques and programming of ships and other vehicles without the present replacement of the Estevan. Therefore, for the present, this project has been set aside.

CHARTER OF STEAMSHIP "CABATEAL"

Question No. 301-Mr. Dumont:

Did any government agency charter the ship Cabateal, registered in the Bahamas whose crew is Spanish and agent is "Transworld Shipping", to transport cargo to the Canadian East Arctic?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): As a result of a tender call, a contract was awarded to a Canadian company, Transworld Shipping for employment of the vessel Cabateal in connection with Arctic supply work this summer. No suitable Canadian vessel was offered as the Federal Pioneer (Canadian) the only other 10,000 ton ship offered was chartered for the Dew line. The Cabateal is a vessel of Bahamian registry. The Department of Transport does not have detailed knowledge of the composition of the crew, but it is understood that the captain is of Canadian nationality and the chief engineer is of British nationality.

EMPLOYMENT OF FORMER HUDSON BAY COMPANY PERSONNEL

Question No. 306-Mr. Dumont:

How many persons, formerly employed by the Hudson Bay Company, were hired by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in 1965-66-67-68?

SALE TO CUBA OF TUNA FISHING SHIPS

Question No. 308-Mr. Crouse:

- 1. Are negotiations under way for export credit financing from a Canadian tuna company in connection with the possible sale of five modern Canadian tuna fishing vessels to Cuba?
- 2. If so, what are the details of this proposal?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Export Credits Insurance Corporation reports that: 1. It has not been approached by a Canadian tuna company in that connection.

2. N/A.

CONSTRUCTION OF ASTROPHYSICAL LABORATORY IN SAUDI ARABIA

Question No. 309-Mr. Anderson:

- 1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce received inquiries from Saudi Arabia concerning the construction of an astrophysical observatory in that country by a Canadian firm or firms?
- 2. If so, is it still the intention of the Department of Trade and Commerce to continue with these negotiations?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. No. However, knowledge of this telescope project was obtained by a Canadian firm working in Saudi Arabia. This firm, along with others, received official confirmation and information on the status of the project from the Saudi Arabian authorities through our Beirut office.

2. While we have not entered into any negotiations, the department stands ready to assist these Canadian firms.

CONTROL OF BUD WORM INFESTATION, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 326-Mr. Flemming:

- 1. Has the Government of Canada received representations from the Government of New Brunswick and/or the forest products industry of that Province relative to the serious condition of the forests of New Brunswick which many knowledgeable people consider is caused by a recurrence of budworm infestation?
- 2. If so, is it the intention of the Government of Canada to co-operate with the Province and private industry in their campaign to maintain the condition of this most vital natural resource?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): No.

2. Not applicable.

Questions

ACCESS ROAD TO FORT RODD PARK

Question No. 330-Mr. Anderson:

- 1. What was the total cost of the new access road from the Island Highway near Colwood, B.C. to Fort Rodd National Historic Park?
- 2. Who were the contractors engaged to build the road and what was each contractor paid?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The contract for the new access road was included with the construction of a parking lot for visitors to Fort Rodd Hill national historic

PILOTAGE COMMISSION LEGAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 339-Mr. McCleave:

- 1. What legal fees have been paid by the Royal Commission on Pilotage to its counsel since November 1, 1962?
- 2. What individuals outside government employ were retained as counsel and what were their fees and expenses?
- 3. Has the counsel work been completed?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the Mines and Resources): No. [Mr. Whelan.]

royal commission on pilotage as follows: 1. The legal fees paid by the royal commission on pilotage to its counsel for the period November 1, 1962 to August 31, 1968 total $72,250.

- 2. Mr. Maurice Jacques of Quebec city was the only person outside government employ whose services were retained as counsel for the commission. The total fees paid to him were as stated in 1 above, while the travelling expenses paid to him during the same period total $16,006.08, approximately half of which is for transportation.
- 3. Subject to occasional verification of draft texts for the final report of the commission, counsel work may be considered completed.

STUDY OF HEARING AIDS

Question No. 341-Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway):

- 1. Is the government now conducting a study concerning hearing aids?
- 2. If so (a) when will it be made available (b) when will the report be made available to the public?
- 3. If not, will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs initiate such a study this Session?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Yes. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs decided last year to proceed with a research inquiry into hearing aids.

- 2. (a) Early in 1969. (b) Under section 6(2) of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act the minister may undertake research into matters to which the powers, duties and functions of the minister extend and publish so much of the results of any such research as he deems appropriate and in the public interest. It is not the intention to make public the internal report but consideration will be given to publishing the recommendations.
 - 3. Not applicable.

REVIVAL OF QUEEN ELIZABETH OBSERVATORY PROJECT

Question No. 344-Mr. Anderson:

Has the government entered into negotiations with a number of Western Canadian university scientists on the possibility of reviving the Queen Elizabeth II Observatory project?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy,

*RIVERS, MAN.—DELEGATION RESPECTING ARMED FORCES BASE

Question No. 353-Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

1. Did the Minister of National Defence meet with a delegation of concerned citizens from Manitoba on August 27, 1968, with respect to the future role of the Canadian Forces Base at Rivers, Manitoba and if so, did the Minister inform the delegation that the Defence Committee had recommended the closing of the Rivers Base?

2. Was any other Minister present during the meeting?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes. I met with a delegation from Manitoba on Tuesday, August 27, 1968. I did not tell the delegation that the defence committee had recommended the closing of the Rivers base. I did say that the whole question of base consolidation was under study and that this subject would be discussed at defence council at some future date.

The answer to part 2 is no.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH ONTARIO FOR NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 357-Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Is the government negotiating with the Province of Ontario with a view to establishing a National Park in that Province and, if so, what area is under consideration?

2. When is it expected that an agreement will be reached?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The studies are continuing between officials of the department and provincial officials with a view to establishing a national park in the area of the Canadian shield.

2. The province is studying the matter and we are awaiting their decision.

POST OFFICE IMPROVEMENTS, CHRISTMAS ISLAND, N.S.

Question No. 358—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. On what date were the plans and specifications prepared to improve the disposal field and improve the surface draining system at the Christmas Island Post Office?

2. Have tenders been called for the performance of such improvements to the said Post Office and when are such improvements expected to be completed?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. June 10, 1968.

2. Yes. A contract was awarded on July 17, 1968, and will be completed momentarily.

Questions THREE POINT SEAT BELTS

Question No. 360-Mr. Mather:

Have representations been received from car importers protesting the lack of a federal safety standard respecting 3-point seat belts?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No. There is already available a standard for seat belt assemblies, No. 97-GP-209: Seat belt assemblies—passenger cars, multipurpose passenger vehicles, trucks and buses, issued by the Canadian government specifications board. The board has also issued three supplementary standards: 97-GP-208: Anchorages of seats, passenger cars; 97-GP-208: Seat belt installations, passenger cars; 97-GP-210: Seat belt assembly anchorages, passenger cars.

SAFETY STANDARDS OF IMPORTED AUTOMOBILES

Question No. 361-Mr. Mather:

Are automobiles imported into Canada, for sale in Canada, required to conform to federal safety standards?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No. Vehicles purchased by the federal government for use by its departments and agencies are however required to conform to the motor vehicles safety standards issued by the Canadian government specifications board. Vehicles made in, and imported from the United States, conform to all these standards because the technical requirements in the United States, where compliance is mandatory, and in Canada are identical.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ON HIGHWAY SAFETY

Question No. 362-Mr. Mather:

Will consideration be given at this Session to establishing a Parliamentary Committee to concern itself with the subject of the human and economic toll taken by automobile accidents and the need to develop protective procedures and devices to reduce this attrition of our resources?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Full attention will be given to the suggestion put forward by the hon. member and the government's decision will be made known in due course; in any case, as indicated by earlier statements and answers to other questions raised by the hon. member, this general area is receiving active consideration by the government.

Questions

SALE OF PLUTONIUM TO FRANCE

Question No. 365-Mr. Harkness:

 Was the sale of plutonium to France made at a very substantial reduction from the going price?
 At what price was the plutonium sold?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. No.

2. $22.00 per gram.

IMPROVEMENT OF POST OFFICE FACILITIES, ST. JOHN'S WEST, NFLD.

Question No. 367-Mr. Carter:

Does the government intend to provide improved post office facilities in St. John's West, Newfoundland and, if so, when will construction commence?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Yes, improvements are planned, but it has not yet been decided how these will be provided.

WORK ON DUNVILLE-ARGENTIA ROAD, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 369-Mr. Carter:

1. Will the proposed paving of that section of the Argentia Access Road from Dunville to Argentia be completed this year?

2. Does the government intend to upgrade the remaining section from Dunville to the Trans-Canada Highway this fall to permit its use by people travelling to and from Newfoundland on the Argentia-North Sydney Ferry?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. Weather conditions make it unlikely that the proposed paving between Dunville and Argentia will be completed this year.

2. Yes.

CAPITAL PROJECTS, HUMBER-ST. GEORGES-ST. BARBE DISTRICT, NFLD.

Question No. 372-Mr. Marshall:

What capital projects will be carried out by the Department of Public Works in the year 1968-69 in the Humber-St. Georges-St. Barbe district, Newfoundland?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Planning is underway for harbour improvements at Corner Brook.

COLLECTIVE AGREEMENTS UNDER DEVCO

Question No. 380-Mr. Skoberg:

1. Has the right to bargain collectively been taken away from the employees of the former Cumberland Railway Company, now known as the Cape

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Breton Development Corporation (Coal Division) Railroad, by the establishment of the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

2. Are the Collective Agreements between the employees and the former owners to be honoured by Devco, until such time as they are specifically changed or renewed?

3. Will the representatives of all unions involved be consulted before any material changes are instituted in their working agreements or conditions, including a retirement plan?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. No.

2. Yes, with effect from March 31, 1968, the date of the takeover.

3. Yes.

PORTRAYAL OF INDIANS IN SCHOOL TEXT BOOKS

Question No. 386-Mr. Dinsdale:

What steps have been taken by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to ensure that a more adequate presentation of the role of Indians in Canadian society is available in our school text books?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In 1968 all teachers in federal schools were invited to comment on the material dealing with the history of the Indian people in school textbooks in current use. The comments received were gathered together in a report which was circulated to the supervisory staff. The ministers of education were informed of the content of the report and were asked to pass this information to officials concerned with curriculum building in each province. Replies received so far indicate a willingness to remedy deficiencies in information on the Indian people. Departmental officials have held consultations with university personnel to promote research and to engage the universities in Indian studies. Several universities are now actively involved in intercultural courses for teachers. The department has prepared a new library catalogue for federal schools in which many books on Indian lore and legend are listed.

*ENTRANCES TO NORTH SIDE OF CENTRE BLOCK

Question No. 387-Mr. Nowlan:

1. What is the cost to date and what is the total estimated cost of the new pedestrian entrance to the north side of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings?

2. What was the reason for this new entrance?

3. With the completion of this entrance, how many doors for freight and people are there in the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings and are any others contemplated?

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows: 1. Cost to date, $13,500. Estimated cost, $16,910.

- 2. To provide access for members of parliament who park in the areas north of the centre block.
- 3. One freight entrance and nine pedestrian entrances. No others are contemplated.

BUILDING PROGRAM, FROBISHER BAY

Question No. 390-Mr. Dinsdale:

- 1. Have tenders been called for a major building program at Frobisher Bay and, if so (a) what companies submitted tenders (b) who was the successful tenderer and at what price?
- 2. Does the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development operate the building taken over from S.A.C. and, if so (a) what accommodation is available in this building (b) is it fully utilized?
- 3. What supplementary facilities will be made available under the new building program?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) Tenders were submitted by the following: Ron Engineering and Construction Ltd., Ottawa; Solar Construction, Lockerbie & Hole & Batoni-Humford, Edmonton; Janin-Tower Co., (joint venture) Montreal 16; A. H. MacLeod & Son (Contractors) Ltd., North Vancouver, B.C.; Tankoos Yarman Ltd., Pitts Quebec Ltd., Fruchter & Kagan Real Estate Ltd., and W. Sefton & Associates Ltd. (b) The tenders are still under assessment.

- 2. (a) The S.A.C. building has been taken over by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and operated as a federal building. It is providing accommodation for 144 single personnel, office space, stores, sub-division of the R.C.M.P.; Department of Transport airport services, and vehicle storage and maintenance of vehicles for the Department of Transport and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. (b) The building is fully utilized.
- 3. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is planning a vocational school and hostel at Frobisher Bay and it is the intention to convert the existing federal building into a hostel. This made it necessary to provide an apartment building, office and housing called for in the tender referred to in part 1. In addition, the tenderers have submitted proposals for supplementary facilities such as a hotel, shopping centre, recreational facilities and additional housing.

*SECOND NATIONAL PARK, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 407-Mr. Southam:

Has the government's statement on April 22, 1965, that a second National Park would be established in Saskatchewan at an early date, been implemented and, if not, when does the government intend to commence this development?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No. The government would be prepared to commence development of a second National Park following agreement being reached with the province of Saskatchewan as to the site and the necessary lands being made available by the province.

SECURITIES COMMISSION

Question No. 423-Mr. Fortin:

- 1. What is the present status of the plans for the establishment of a Canadian Securities Commission?
- 2. Will the government lay before the House the report of studies prepared in this respect?
- 3. Will legislation concerning securities be presented at this session?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. These plans are to be discussed at a meeting of the federal-provincial committee of officials on financial institutions and securities regulation on October 25.

- 2. No. These studies are confidential reports prepared for the minister, of the kind that are normally regarded as privileged.
 - 3. Yes.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

WINTER WORKS BENEFITS TO MUNICIPALITIES, MOOSE JAW AND SWIFT CURRENT CONSTITUENCIES

Question No. 73-Mr. Skoberg:

1. What was the total amount of benefits received by each municipality lying within the boundaries of the federal constituency of Moose Jaw through participation in special projects under the Municipal Winter Works Incentive Program since its inception in the winter of 1958-59?

2. What was the total amount of benefits received by each municipality lying within the boundaries of the federal constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek, through participation in special projects under the Municipal Winter Works Incentive Program since its inception in the winter of 1958-59?

Return tabled.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to direct the attention of the government to question 275, which reads:

In the report of the Company of Young Canadians for 1967-68 there is an item that $489,019 was expended for consulting and professional fees during the year.

From the time the report was made requests have been made of the Company of Young Canadians for information as to how this amount was made up, and the answer given is that no one will be furnished with the information unless parliament requests it. This question has now been on the order paper for three weeks. Having regard to the flagrant expenditure made by this group which has been unaccounted for I should like to ask the government to assure that an answer will be given at once.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question was passed on to the Company of Young Canadians as soon as it was asked. The Company of Young Canadians told us that they would need at least three weeks to prepare a statement of these figures from their accounts. We should now receive this statement quite soon.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be permitted to ask the minister of regional development when I can expect an answer to question 82 on the order paper. This matter is very vital to my constituency.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while the minister of regional development is looking up question 82 I should like to bring to the attention of the house that the record discloses we have so far answered 48.2 per cent of all questions on the order paper, which we think is pretty good.

Mr. Woolliams: That was a failure when I went to school.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, motions for papers Nos. 20 and 25 are acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning privileged papers and authorization of the governmental authorities concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I understand there are a number of documents of a confidential nature; but it seems to me, and I hope I am not being excessively technical, when such a request is made in respect of the production of certain documents, an explanation in some detail should be given so the house will be aware of the situation, rather than a blanket permission being extended to the government to withhold documents. I make that suggestion at this time, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will bear that in mind.

DIRECTIVES RESPECTING NORTHERN HEALTH SERVICES

Motion No. 20-Mr. Dinsdale:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the directives issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare last February and March indicating that health services to Eskimos and Indians were to be cut back in the interest of economy and the further directive issued in April rescinding the original order and restoring traditional health services and finally the further directive issued on July 15 restoring the earlier cut backs.

Motion agreed to.

SALE OF CAMP MUSKWA, ALASKA HIGHWAY Motion No. 25—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the government or any agency or department thereof and any other person, company organization or group relative to the sale of buildings and equipment comprising the former Department of Public Works property known as Camp Muskwa at Mile 295 on the Alaska Highway.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the contents of the report of the royal commission on security are already public knowledge, could the Prime Minister inform the house whether he has received a copy of the report and when it will be tabled in the house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received a copy of the report, nor do I admit the truth of the premise that it is of public knowledge.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister inform the house how it is that the London Times, a foreign newspaper, carried some facts about the report and passed some reflection on the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not qualified to speak for the London Times, but I will ask the minister to check whether there is any truth in these allegations.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Prime Minister is qualified to tell us whether any member of his government or the head of the commission gave this information to the press.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have the utmost confidence in the members of this commission.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance which the right hon. gentleman has attached to the proposed reorganization of some departments, and since this reorganization affects pressing matters such as regional disparity and poverty, would the Prime Minister inform the house how soon he intends to bring the legislation governing departmental or government reorganization before the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have said before in the house, many of these matters have already been attended to, in the sense that many of them could be dealt with by order in council or by transfers between departments, and so do not require legislation. I understand that the legislation itself will come in early in the new year.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's answer I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. On the assumption that some of the duties respecting regional development have already been placed in his hands, would the minister consider making an early statement to parliament on the establishment he has set up and the programs he is developing to deal with the problem of regional disparity?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, in a few weeks I should be in a position to introduce in the house the bill to create the department and at that time I can give the requested details.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The "projet de loi" of which the minister speaks will be the bill dealing with government reorganization. The Prime Minister has already informed us that duties have been assigned to various ministers, and I am sure I make the correct assumption when I assume that the duties assigned to this minister are very important. I ask whether he will make a statement about those duties before the bill is introduced.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the powers vested in me already existed in statutes and in various programs divided between departments. No other power was granted to me.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC—COVERAGE GIVEN FORMATION OF SEPARATIST PARTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the hon. Secretary of State.

Yesterday afternoon, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister if the government or the Inquiries of the Ministry department intended to order an investigation to determine why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation gives twice as much broadcasting time to those who want to destroy Canada than to those who want to build and unite it?

Since the hon. Secretary of State is here today, could he tell us whether he intends to order an investigation and to make recommendations to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to discharge its responsibilities in a more appropriate manner.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the basis of the allegations used to introduce that question, but the hon. member may rest assured that the C.B.C. reminds itself every day of its own responsibilities in the field of information.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING WITHDRAWAL OF SATURDAY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Will the minister advise if as a result of representations from the committee of 35, or other more broadly based bodies, he has decided not to pursue the obviously unpopular measure of Saturday closing of the post offices of this country?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): May I beg the indulgence of the house, Mr. Speaker, and ask the hon. member to repeat his question? I am sorry to have to do this.

Mr. Macquarrie: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister advise if, as a result of representations from the committee of 35, or other more broadly based bodies he has decided not to pursue the obviously unpopular measure of the Saturday closing of the post offices of this country.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, all efforts to reduce costs or improve efficiency will undoubtedly be received unfavourably by the people who are affected. So far as having come to any conclusion is concerned, I may say I am meeting continuously with all sorts of bodies but have not as yet received any formal invitation or representations from the members of the opposition. But I expect, when we begin second reading of this bill, to be in a position to make a declaration.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Macquarrie: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since all other avenues toward participatory democracy seem to be blocked, will the minister lend his good offices to members of this party in setting up a meeting which will not be held behind closed doors and before which interested members of the public may make representations on this vital matter?

Mr. Kierans: I expect that all such discussions will take place on second reading and in the clause by clause analysis of the bill. I assume also that all the direct mail associations, newspaper publishers and so on who are making representations to me daily are making the same representations to hon. members opposite.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that there is no reference in Bill No. C-116 to the stopping of mail delivery on Saturdays, can the Postmaster General say by what authority he has made this decision?

Mr. Kierans: Under the authority of the powers vested in the Postmaster General. Under the authority parliament has given to him, including the setting of rates on third and fourth class mail without reference to parliament, he can deal with a number of items. He is not doing this on his own authority; these are the regulations of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will admit there is some doubt as to the legality of the question he has asked. The hon. member cannot ask questions about the legal interpretation of the powers of the ministers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I then put the following supplementary question to the Postmaster General. In view of the considerable protest there is against elimination of the Saturday mail service, does the Postmaster General not feel that this matter should be submitted for a decision by parliament?

Mr. Kierans: I think after I make the declaration hon. members will undoubtedly explore—the justification for this decision on second reading.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is not directly related to the topic of the previous questions, but due to the urgency of the matter I believe it is in order. I wonder if the Postmaster General is aware of the pornographic literature which is being circulated through the mails, and whether any action is being taken about it.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, the department has been aware of this since last Thursday. I may say that the material is certainly pornographic; it is obscene and disgusting. The department is taking the following steps: Any person who fills in and returns the card in an attempt to purchase from Evicco Film Company of Copenhagen, Denmark, this kind of film will find he is wasting his time and postage. The various main post offices across the country have been alerted. We are also going to take special steps to prevent the transmission of any such mail to Denmark through the international airports at Montreal and Toronto.

Second, Mr. Speaker, though this material is being distributed in plain envelopes with first class postage affixed and no identification, we are making every attempt to find its source. Of course we would pursue the persons concerned under the appropriate section of the Post Office Act.

Third, and I think I may express a personal opinion, I am so overwhelmed with the nastiness of the material that I certainly would ask the Department of Justice to give serious thought to taking criminal proceedings against the people if we find those responsible.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): May I ask a supplementary question. I realize there have been meetings going on with regard to Saturday delivery, and I wonder if at the commencement of the second reading stage of the post office bill we could be given an indication by the minister that he will be able to announce some measure that will make rural mail subscribers happy. This question can be answered by yes or no.

Mr. Kierans: I will make a declaration at that time, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of, I assume it Inquiries of the Ministry

Affairs in respect of this pornographic literature that was referred to earlier in a question put to the Postmaster General. Has the Danish government been informed that the return address of this material is in Denmark?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not so informed our ambassador in Denmark, but I will investigate and see whether this would be a useful thing to do.

[Translation] [Later:]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Postmaster General.

As Saturday seems to be the least appropriate day to close post offices, has the minister thought about a different day to apply this new policy?

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.-INQUIRY AS TO JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport, and I welcome him back in the house. Pursuant to the undertaking given to the house yesterday by the Prime Minister in answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, is the minister today in a position to make a statement regarding the Roberts Bank development, and specifically where the federal government exercises jurisdiction and where the provincial government exercises jurisdiction?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be back in the house, and to see my hon. friend in his place.

An hon. Member: He has been in the house all the time.

Mr. Hellyer: In reply to the question I may say that some time ago I advised the house we in the department have undertaken studies in conjunction with the Canadian Transport Commission to determine what changes, if any, there should be with regard to port administration and control in so far as the future is concerned. At the present time there would be, the Secretary of State for External are different systems in operation in different Inquiries of the Ministry parts of the country. Each has its advantages and each has its disadvantages. It is considered desirable to look at all these various alternatives in deciding whether a new system should be made applicable to ports such as the one under development at Roberts Bank in British Columbia, and perhaps other ports such as Montreal as well.

I expect this report will be ready for consideration by the end of November. I will take under advisement the possibility of having the report studied by the House of Commons committee on transport and letting them decide, on the basis of evidence that can be brought before them, what action should be taken in respect of it. Subsequent to that I would hope to undertake joint meetings with British Columbia to decide who should administer the various aspects of the port and its development, and perhaps not just that port but all the various ports of the lower mainland.

Mr. Nowlan: May I ask a supplementary question, though I hesitate to do so if it has to cover the whole answer given by the minister. Are we to understand from this answer the present situation is that there is no federal jurisdiction or control over the access that links the port development with the other federal railways, and that there is no undertaking between the provincial government and the federal government respecting that access? Do we have to wait a month or so until this report is received?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In my view the supplementary question is argumentative.

Mr. Nowlan: May I put the question in another way. I was trying to simplify it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. member to ask the supplementary question, but I remind him that we have only 30 minutes today and there are many other members who are seeking to ask questions.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but this is of particular concern to the people on the west coast. I should like to ask the minister specifically whether the federal government has agreed to allow provincial jurisdiction over the access between the port facilities and the federal railways. Has there been a firm agreement that the provincial government will control this access?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I completely understood the purport of [Mr. Hellyer.]

my hon. friend's question. If he is asking whether there will be equal access to the port by all Canadian railways without discrimination, protecting the shippers in all parts of Canada, the answer is yes.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question that I have no hesitation in asking. On Friday of last week I asked the Prime Minister about this matter and he suggested I ask the minister when he was back. Therefore I ask him whether as a result of his investigations the questions of financing and jurisdiction are going to be settled.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope so, Mr. Speaker. That is the purpose of the inquiry.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked a question regarding the very serious economic condition of farmers in western Canada. The question was directed to the Minister of Agriculture and also to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would ask either of these ministers now, who according to the revised roster should be in the house, whether they can answer my question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, both these ministers are attending the national grains council in Winnipeg, but there are in the house ministers who will either answer the question or take it as notice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to know to whom to direct a question. These ministers, according to the roster, are supposed to be here.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as Acting Minister of Agriculture I would deem it a great privilege to answer that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now we have it shuffled out, Mr. Speaker; the roster has been rerevised. I know the minister's interest in the west and in agriculture in general, and I should like to ask him what has been done regarding an assessment of the situation in western Canada at the present time by way of preparation for action to be taken to meet this very serious problem.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has indicated there is an initial Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplemeeting being held of the national grains mentary question for the Prime Minister. time, I can assure the right hon. gentleman, is under very active consideration by the Minister of Agriculture and his entire department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, could the minister let the house know what action in particular is being taken? As far as the grains council is concerned, this council will not meet the problem faced by the farmers in western Canada today.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, with regard to any specific action requiring legislative authority, or any specific action that the house should be informed of to meet the very serious situation that exists in the west, if special action is necessary, I am sure the Minister of Agriculture would make an announcement in this house in due course. It may well be that with P.F.A.A. and other emergency measures that are currently available under federal legislation the problem can be met under existing agencies.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to direct to the Prime Minister or the Acting Minister of Agriculture. Will either of these gentlemen confirm the rumour that Canada's best wheat salesman will be appointed to head the grains council, namely Hon. Alvin Hamilton?

Mr. Greene: You would not like me to answer that idle rumour.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the acting minister. Have any plans been made for the delivery of out of condition tough and damp grain and, if so, are they ready for implementation? In addition, has a special allocation of railway stock been made for the movement of that grain to the terminals for drying?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I believe arrangements have been made with the railways. Also I understand arrangements have been made to use the interior elevators in order to plementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the help ease the difficult situation that currently exists.

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since a situation of extreme urgency is arising from water developments now taking place in British Columbia, as evidenced by urgent requests from civic bodies in British Columbia, can the minister assure the house that the Canada water act will be introduced in the near future?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this matter is of urgent concern not only to my hon. friend but also to my department and to the government. I wish to assure the hon. member that it is the intention of the government to seek an early opportunity, consonant with the demands on the time of the house, to bring such a water act before this house.

Mr. Pringle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister refer the subject matter of water use to the standing committee on natural resources and public works?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, we will consider appropriate action as to the direction of the bill to a committee when the bill comes before the house.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, last week the hon, member for Fraser Valley West asked whether progress has been made in the setting of Canadian standards on water pollution to include biological, chemical and physical aspects of the question. As the house knows, the federal government has offered to establish a national advisory committee on water pollution to study and recommend national water quality objectives. I wish to inform him that discussions on this matter have been held with the provinces, and that these discussions are continuing.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Since item No. 24 on today's order paper gives Air Canada the right to enter the capital market and sell its own securities, and since this underlines the need for having as president of that air line a man of great ability in air transport matters, is the minister now in a position to advise the house when we may expect the announcement of the appointment of such a man?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to draw the hon. member's question to the attention of the board

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REPORT RESPECTING GROCERY PRICES ON PRAIRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the report of the director of investigation and research made pursuant to the Combines Investigation Act that the Batten report contains no convincing evidence of excessive grocery prices on the prairies and that consequently no prosecution is warranted, and in view of the director's further finding that a few of the largest grocery chains have a degree of economic power-

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Three weeks ago today I asked whether he would be placing on the order paper a bill to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, since some hon, members might wish to study this complex legislation. The minister said that would be done. Could he indicate to the house when it will be done, since on that previous occasion he said it would be done in two or three weeks.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I shall be able to do so within the next few weeks, but I am unable to specify the date to the hon. member.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN FRENCH AND CANADIAN AGENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister prepared to table the agreement between A.E.C.L. and the French C.E.A. on the exchange of nuclear power information? If not, what portions of the agreement are considered secret?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government is not prepared to table the agreement, which is looked upon as a matter of internal management of A.E.C.L. with respect Speaker, I am putting it as shortly as I can, to the upholding of its competitive position in but there is no use putting a question unless world markets. It is deemed that in order to you know what it is about so I will go straight maintain the efficiency and competitive posion—in some regions, which calls for vigilance tion of A.E.C.L., it is in the best interest of by the public authorities, what measures is that body to keep this agreement and similar agreements within the ambit of the internal management of that corporation.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the financial terms of the agreement with Britain are known and have been published, has a money figure been agreed on and can it be announced?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the financial arrangements under the agreement, the dollar terms, cannot be announced. It is deemed by the corporation that the financial considerations are such as to be really part of the business agreement between the two atomic energy agencies. Therefore it would not be in the interest of the competitive position of A.E.C.L. to disclose financial arrangements.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—REDUCTION IN FREIGHT AND EXPRESS OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Proposed further cut-backs in employment at North Sydney by the Canadian National will affect freight and express operations. May I ask the minister if he will make representations to the railway and urge that they reconsider their action and not add to the loss of several hundred jobs that has been brought about by the actions of this government and the Canadian National?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a representation. I do not think he has asked a question.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, this is a most important matter. Far be it for me to question your wise counsel, sir, but this question has to do with the livelihood of many people. May I submit with the greatest deference that it has been the practice in this house over the years, when there are questions regarding curtailment of C.N.R. operations, the closing of branch lines and stations and the disruptions that have resulted therefrom, to direct those questions to the Minister of Transport. With respect, I am asking a straightforward question and I am not making a representation. I am asking the minister if he will make representations to the Canadian National to see whether the situation I have spoken of can be averted.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his representation twice. I can only hope it has been noted that many times.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROPOSED QUEEN ELIZABETH OBSERVATORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture but in his capacity as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Some time ago I asked the minister if he would be prepared to table the report of the scientists relative to the Mount Kobau Queen Elizabeth observatory. The minister said he would take the matter under consideration. I have not had an opportunity to determine what decision the minister has arrived at. Will he make the report public?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the hon. member is still under consideration and is being discussed with all parties we feel ought to have a voice in the ultimate decision as to whether this report should be tabled. No decision has yet been arrived at as to whether it would be in the public interest to table this report.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate how long it might take before a conclusion will be reached?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, in parliamentary terms it will be in the not too distant future.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

COUNSEL FOR INDIANS AT CONFERENCES ON AMENDMENT OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On September 13 last I asked the minister if the government would consider paying the cost of legal counsel of the Indian people's choice with respect to the consultations going on having to do with amendments to the Indian Act. The minister said he would consider that request. Could he say what decision has been arrived at?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have considered that possibility but, at the present time, we do not think that it would be appropriate to do so. If, later on, during the second round of negotiations there is a change in the situation, we might reconsider our decision.

FISHERIES

DEFICIENCY PAYMENT TO EAST COAST FROZEN FISH INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank D. Moores (Bonavista-Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is it the intention of the government to renew the deficiency payment to the east coast frozen fish industry when this program expires in the near future?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we shall have to develop another program to take its place. The current program will terminate at the end of this month.

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SALT SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, considering the serious economic situation facing Newfoundland fishermen, is the government considering reinstating the salt rebate that was granted to our east coast fishermen?

Hon, Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I ought to inform hon. members that we have already gone beyond the time allotted to the question period, by a few minutes. I felt that hon. members who did not sit in the front benches and who had not had an opportunity to ask questions ought to have the opportunity to do so. That is why today we went beyond the time allotted to the question period, by a few minutes.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACINNIS (CAPE BRETON-EAST RICH-MOND)—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: If hon, members will allow me perhap I might be permitted to unburden myself of a weighty opinion relating to a point raised yesterday in the house on a question of privilege.

At the opening of the sitting yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), rising on a question of privilege concerning the attendance in the house of ministers during the question period, proposed to move:

That the matter of scheduling of ministers in the house and the general conditions affecting the daily question period be referred to the special committee on procedure.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

In the course of his argument the hon. member raised two distinct questions. On the one hand the hon. member referred to rulings of the Chair dealing with questions directed to ministers "in capacities other than of departments they represent". He has raised as a second point the question of the scheduling of attendance of ministers in the house.

In considering the first point I have read carefully the reference at page 3756 of Hansard for June 1, 1966, the page to which the hon. member alluded. On that occasion a notice of question had been filed seeking information from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, presumably in his capacity as minister for Nova Scotia. A ruling was then made to the effect that a question must be addressed to a minister in relation to his administrative responsibilities.

It seems to the Chair that there is nothing inconsistent between the ruling made on that occasion and any decision or ruling of the Chair in relation to the recent procedure in asking questions of acting ministers.

The very limited ambit of the previous ruling was to the effect that a minister may be asked questions relating to a department for which he has ministerial responsibility or acting ministerial responsibility, but a minister cannot be asked nor can he answer questions in another capacity, such as being responsible for a province, or part of a province or, again, as spokesman for a racial or religious group.

As I stated when this very point was raised by the hon. member on Friday last as a point of order, it has been a common occurrence for many years to have ministers reply to questions dealing with departments for which they have an acting responsibility.

With reference to the second argument advanced by the hon. member, I expressed my concern yesterday about two aspects of the proposed question of privilege and the motion based thereon. In the first instance I referred to citation 104(3) of Beauchesne's fourth edition wherein it is stated in part:

• (3:20 p.m.)

A matter of privilege which claims precedence over other public business should be a subject which has recently arisen and which calls for the immediate interposition of the house.

The Chair might again refer to and read part of citation 104(5) of the same authority, as follows:

As a motion taken at the time for matters of privilege is thereby given precedence over the pre-arranged program of public business, the Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that there is a prime facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed, and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.

The attendance system to which objection is taken was proposed to the house approximately two weeks ago. Since then the proposal has been referred to daily by a number of hon. members. Questions have been asked about it, and it has been the subject of a number of points of order. It was also considered at length in connection with the estimates of the President of the Privy Council. However, it has not been advanced until now as a question of privilege. I find it rather difficult to disregard the many precedents to the effect that a question of privilege must be raised at the first opportunity.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the course of his argument reminded the Chair that there is no specific provision in the rules for the attendance of ministers on specific days. Provisional standing order 39(5), as well as long established practice, provide for the right of hon. members to ask oral questions, over and above written questions consigned to the order paper, in urgent circumstances. At the same time the citations and precedents are clear on the point that while a member has a right to ask a question he cannot insist on an answer. On this point I refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 181(3), which states "A refusal to answer cannot be raised as a question of privilege nor is it regular to comment on such refusal."

The third point I would like to make has reference to the motion itself which would be put to the house for debate and determination if the procedural requirements were satisfied. As hon, members know, a motion of this nature forms part and parcel of the suggested question of privilege. The redress sought by the motion has to be considered in determining whether the question can be accepted as a valid prima facie question of privilege and if the motion is to be put to the house for debate.

The specific motion proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is in my view more in the nature of a substantive motion. What is being proposed is not so much that an alleged breach of hon. members' privileges be considered, possibly by the committee on privileges and elections, but that the proposed system of ministerial attendance during the question period be considered, along with other procedural changes, by the special committee on procedure.

With respect, I submit that this type of motion is essentially a substantive motion and one which therefore cannot be moved without notice as provided by standing order 41.

For these reasons—and I can assure hon. members after giving the matter much serious thought—I do not find it possible to put the hon. member's motion to the house.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-114, to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the resolution stage of this bill I undertook to make a short statement at the second reading stage and, as best I could, to answer the questions that were put to me while we were in committee. I think, sir, that hon. members are well aware that the British North America Act provides that the provinces have responsibility for the "administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction . . . " The salaries, allowances and pensions of superior and county court judges, pursuant to the British North America Act. are to be fixed and provided by the parliament of Canada. Those two provisions are found in articles 92(14) and 100 of the British North America Act.

The legislature of Ontario earlier this year amended The County Judges Act of the province of Ontario to provide three additional judicial positions for the counties of Lincoln, Middlesex and Essex. The amendment received royal assent in Ontario on March 28 of this year. I am informed by the department of the provincial attorney general that these three additional positions are required largely because of the increasing work load carried by the county courts, in large part due to the recent introduction of the Ontario legal aid plan.

[Translation]

As to the amendments to the Courts of Justice Act of the province of Quebec, a similar situation arose because of the new jurisdiction of the Superior Court in divorce matters which has increased a work load which was already extremely heavy.

The Quebec legislature provided for 11 new judgeships for the Superior Court of Quebec, namely three for the judicial appeal district in Quebec and eight for the judicial appeal district in Montreal.

As far as the judicial appeal district in Quebec is concerned, I understand that one of the three judges will be assigned to the new jurisdiction assumed by the province in divorce matters. And in the judicial appeal district of Montreal, I am advised that five of the eight judges will be assigned to that new jurisdiction.

The other appointments result from the increased work load of the courts. The Quebec law authorizing the appointment of eleven new judges was given royal assent on July 5, 1968 and the section dealing with the increase in the number of Superior Court judges is to become effective on the day of proclamation which, I am told, will be within a few days.

Hon members are aware, Mr. Speaker, that such amendments to the Judges Act are part of the ordinary business of a session, since the work of the courts reflects to a large extent the population increase as well as other factors affecting the life of a community.

In the two cases in question, the provinces have asked us to proceed with the necessary appointments to fill the new posts within a short period.

The proposed legislation will authorize the payment of the prescribed salaries and will thus make it possible to proceed with the appointments.

[English]

I might say that the associate chief justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec advised me that he estimates that the number of divorce petitions that will be presented in the province of Quebec, in the first year of the assumption of jurisdiction by that province, will be 3,000 to 4,000, and that 80 per cent of these petitions, roughly 2,500, will probably be presented in the judicial appeal district in Montreal.

I should now like to deal briefly with some of the points that were raised by hon. members at the resolution stage. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said he had some concern about the habit of some judges reserving decisions for an inordinate length of time. I think every practising lawyer has undergone the burden of having the decisions in cases he has pleaded before the courts reserved for a year, two years, and sometimes longer.

I am sure the hon. member knows that the immediate responsibility in the administration of justice would lie with the attorney general of the province concerned and, of course, in so far as the administration of a particular court is concerned, with the chief justice. I can assure him that if I were to receive any complaints about the time elapsing between the hearing of a case and the rendering of a judgment I would of course refer this matter to the attorney general of the province and the chief justice concerned, in so far as my jurisdiction allows, and ask for a report. There is a good deal of substance in what the hon, member says.

I am afraid at this stage I cannot make any comment upon what he said at the resolution stage about the amendment to the Supreme Court Act which is now before the other place. He referred to some remarks made by Senator Roebuck. There will be an opportunity in the proper forum for me to address myself to that subject. I am sure he understands that the privileges of the other house need to be respected. In this case the legislation is currently before the other place.

The hon, member referred to the confusion which seems to have arisen in Ontario between two conflicting judgments at first instance on the matter of divorce. I understand the judgments have now been referred to the court of appeal for Ontario. They relate to the rules of procedure of the Supreme Court of Ontario involving substituted service in the case of a desertion. As I have said, if the Divorce Act itself turns out to have gaps and ineffective provisions in it, then, of course, I would consider it my duty to introduce amendments to the act after a sufficient period had elapsed to give the act a fair trial. I also suggest it is my view that there might be latitude within the present rules of procedure of the Supreme Court of Ontario to remedy any defect in the rules as they affect the administration of the Divorce Act.

I wish to take issue with the hon, member for Calgary North in respect of one aspect of his speech. This has to do with his remarks concerning the Exchequer Court of Canada. When he said that the judgments of the exchequer court tend to lean toward the crown I am sure he did not mean any reflection upon the independence or impartiality of those judges. I am sure also that when he described this court as a costly one he probably was referring to the taxation process before the court which perhaps does not accord to counsel the same costs that would be accorded to them before a court of provincial jurisdiction. He might like to make that clear when he replies on second reading. I want to stress in the strongest terms my confidence in the Exchequer Court of Canada. I must rebut him with all the vigour I can summon.

With the greatest respect I must say that I think the accusation that the procedure of the exchequer court is cumbersome and costly should be rebutted also. It is my view, particularly in view of the recent revision of the rules undertaken by the president of the court, that it is probably the easiest court in the country, from a procedural point of view, for a private practitioner to practice before. Certainly in practice it was my experience that the proceedings moved faster and that the issues in a trial were reached quicker than in comparable courts of concurrent jurisdiction.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit a question. I can understand why he is now, as the Minister of Justice, making a defence of the court, but would he not admit that in cases of expropriation where land is taken by the crown from citizens of the country it is most costly to get experts to valuate the land and come into court to give evidence? Would he not also agree that there is a great deal of expense involved because of the necessity of making chambers applications in Ottawa from as far away as Vancouver and Calgary?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I should like to take issue with the first example given by the hon. member. Surely any professional expenses incurred in an expropriation case relating to the fees of an assessor or the fees of a professional witness would be incurred by any litigant who would appear before any court. This does not relate to the procedure of the exchequer court but rather to the fact that professional witnesses are called by one or more of the litigants. On the question of counsel having to come to Ottawa, I may say that there is something to be said for decentralization of the administration of the court—

Mr. Woolliams: And the cost.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —and I am looking into that. It has been my experience that it is easier for counsel and the parties to arrive at the real substance of the matter in this court which is free from procedural wrangles and technical difficulties than it is before any other court of first instance.

As a matter of fact, I think it is worth considering the use of the exchequer court as a tribunal with general jurisdiction in appeal from administrative tribunals in this country. At the moment an appeal from the Canadian Transport Commission or from the tariff board can be made on a question of law or on a question of mixed fact and law only by way of a petition for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I think a good deal could be said for widening the jurisdiction of the exchequer court to give it a trial division and an appeal division. It seems to me that the right of appeal from fact-finding bodies is inadequate under our present law. I believe that if the exchequer court were broadened to include an appeal division this would fill that gap and also take some of the onus off the Supreme Court of Canada.

The hon. member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Fairweather) asked me how many county court judges in Ontario now occupy dual positions. He was speaking of judges who might assume temporary positions on boards and so on. I am afraid I cannot answer that question directly because no recent inventory along the line suggested by the the hon. member has been taken. So far as I know, however, we are not aware of any abuses and have had no complaints. I think the hon, member will recall that when the Judges Act was last amended it defined the position of judges fairly clearly. There is now a general provision in section 39 of the Judges Act which precludes a judge from receiving any additional salary or remuneration for performing any duty or service, whether judicial or executive, on behalf of the government of Canada or the government of a province, although of course he is entitled to reasonable travelling and other expenses while he is away from his ordinary place of residence.

The hon. member for Fundy Royal asked me what I thought of the ethics of retired judges returning to practice law before the courts. I should say that the practice has caused a good deal of controversy. I have found myself before the courts in an embarrassing situation against lawyers who have recently sat as judges on the bench of a court and are now practising again before that court. A good many barristers and judges feel that retired judges ought not to practice before the courts again and certainly not before courts of which they were once a member. There is no departmental policy in this regard. Naturally this is a matter for the courts themselves and for the provincial attorneys general in respect of the administration of justice within their province. I think any judge who reassumes practice, if that is his intent, would have to rely on his own tact and propriety with regard to which court he decides to practice before.

The hon, member for Fundy Royal also asked me about reserved judgments. I hope I have dealt with this question fairly in my answer to the hon, member for Calgary North.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Finally, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) asked me what my general criteria were in the selection of judges.

An hon. Member: That is a good question.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am not going to duck this question, but I did hear a friendly snicker from the other side. I think members will agree that one of the most delicate of the functions of the Minister of Justice is the recommendation to the governor in council of the appointment of judges.

I have adopted a consultative process with members of the bar and in certain cases with members of the bench who have had an opportunity to observe the lawyers practising before them. I have consulted leading citizens everywhere and a special committee of the Canadian Bar Association. Before I submit names to my colleagues in the government I am satisfied that on the basis of professional qualifications the men, and I hope some day the women, I am prepared to nominate have received the professional approval not only of that committee of the Canadian Bar Association but of the committees of the provincial associations and in many cases leading lawyers who have-

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether this procedure was followed in respect of the recent appointments to the bench in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Indeed it was, Mr. Speaker, and I think for obvious reasons the hon. member ought to be delighted with the appointment of a judge to the court of appeal, the retired president of the Canadian Bar Association. I am prepared to say that was a good appointment.

An hon. Member: Take it easy, John. [Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. MacEwan: You cannot say that about one of the other two. I just wanted to know whether the minister had consultations in respect of all three appointments.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I had consultations in respect of all four appointments. There was a promotion from the trial division to the court of appeal. I consulted about all four and they are all first rate lawyers. My hon. friend may not agree with this estimation of all of them but I can assure him as a lawyer that I was satisfied.

Mr. MacEwan: Two of them were my classmates, so they are not bad.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What they have not got in the way of public prominence they now have in the way of security.

Let me say with all sincerity that as far as I am concerned the chief criterion is competence. So long as I am able to hold this portfolio, no one who is not competent will receive an appointment to a court in this country, and I give that undertaking to members of this house.

The hon, member asked me what I looked for. I ask hon. members what they would look for if they were trying to nominate somebody from their communities to an appointment to a superior court bench. I think we would all want to see integrity and honesty. We would all look for moral courage, because some of the decisions that face our judges are difficult. I am sure we would all want decisiveness and legal ability. I look particularly for men with experience before the courts. I think that is a condition precedent that we all agree on. If a man is going to preside over a tribunal he should have practiced in as many different jursdictions as possible. A judge must have patience, and good health is a requisite. Certainly he must have consideration for others. These qualities commend themselves to me in great measure.

I should like to say also that as far as I am concerned the following characteristics are less relevant. They include past political activity, high earnings in the practice of law, civic activity and activity in professional associations. I expect to be judged in turn by the members of this house on the appointments that this government makes. Judges should be selected on merit and competence. I think they should be independent and not appointed on the basis of reward or favour. As Thomas Jefferson said:

Judges should always be men of learning...they should not be dependent upon any man or body of men.

Since the quality of our justice will be measured by the quality of our judges, there will be no other aspect of the responsibility of this department which will involve more of my time and my conscience than this.

Let me draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that the English high courts of justice have for centuries been the centre of English justice. Those of us who are dedicated to the law cherish the invaluable traditions and enlightened jurisprudence that it has spawned. I see on the other side a number of learned counsel, some of whom I have pleaded against.

Mr. Nielsen: And with.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, and with. In 1882 the home of the law courts was moved to its new building. At the end of the dedicatory ceremony Queen Victoria concluded her address with these words. I do not know who wrote them; it might have been the Lord Chancellor. She said:

The independence and learning of the judges supported by the integrity and ability of the other members of the profession of law are the chief security for the rights of the crown and the liberties of the people.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the comments of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), of course, as he was giving us the reasons for his introducing an act to appoint eleven additional judges of the Superior Court of Quebec and three additional judges for county and district courts of Ontario.

The reasons given by the minister are based mostly on the fact that since the provinces have assumed the responsibility of divorce courts, a number of additional judges must be appointed. Some of the actual judges could help those who go before those courts. In my opinion, there are reasons other than the ones given by the minister, namely to follow the recommendations of the provinces which have requested the appointment of additional judges, because as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, more judges have been needed for a long time.

Let us consider the situation prevailing in four years to the study of the matter, the the districts where we practise our law. I hearing of witnesses and the submission of might talk about the district of Saguenay his report to the government.

where I practise law more actively. Cases have been entered on the docket of the Superior Court which have been in abeyance for four or five years. Similar representations have already been made to the government in this house. I did so myself last year when we considered legislation aimed at increasing the judges' salaries.

It is obvious that if the provinces are entrusted with the administration of divorce courts, the result will be for some time an added work load for our Superior Court judges. The minister will admit however that the cases now before divorce courts are latent cases which have been there for a long time, and since the reasons for divorce have been extended, people with problems have naturally decided suddenly and immediately to bring them before the courts. I do not agree with the minister when he says that, according to his information, there would be approximately 3,000 to 4,000 cases on the docket for the first year—

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There are not that many until now, but it is expected that 3,000 cases will be put on the docket during the first year.

Mr. Asselin: Is the minister talking only about the district of Montreal, the district of Quebec or the whole province?

It is obvious, as I said earlier, that the fact that the provinces have been entrusted with the administration of the divorce courts will give more work to the Superior Court judges. But those courts must try to decide quickly the cases which are submitted to them.

I think also that corrective measures can be taken. The minister is responsible for the appointment of the Superior Court judges in the provinces, but the provinces administer justice under the constitution.

The minister, the federal government are often consulted on the appointment of judges of the Superior Court to federal or provincial royal commissions. We have had examples of that in the past, when judges of the Superior Court presided over royal commissions, federal or provincial, and were absent from the bench for three or four years. In fact, this happened in the case of the inquiry instituted on pilotage. That commission was instituted by us, and we saw a judge devote three or four years to the study of the matter, the hearing of witnesses and the submission of his report to the government.

I think that the federal Minister of Justice should, during meetings of the attorneys general of the provinces, bring the provinces to understand that Superior Court judges should not accept functions other than those to which they have been appointed by the governor in council or by the minister himself. Indeed, when one, two or three district judges are assigned to pseudo-judicial matters, the whole organization, the operation of justice of the province changes immediately in the areas to which those judges were formerly assigned. The backlog of cases to be heard can be blamed on the fact that, often, with the agreement of the Minister of Justice-not the one we now have but some of the former ministers-judges of the Suprior Court were loaned to the provinces for an indefinite length of time to study matters which do not fall within the jurisdiction of the courts or justice, but which are really pseudo-judical.

The Minister of Justice must, when he meets the provincial attorneys general, tell them very clearly that in the future, when the provinces or even the federal government, need someone to preside over an inquiry, they must appoint an expert in the field concerned, swear him in for the duration of the inquiry and give him the powers enabling him to have the same prestige and the same authority as Superior Court judges. To my mind, this would not affect the administration or organization of our courts of justice.

I insist on repeating what I have already said a few times in the house: it is imperative for the minister, our Minister of Justice, to impress upon the provincial attorneys general and the ministers of justice, that this practice must come to an end. Each time we want to establish a commission of inquiry in a province, a judge of the Superior Court has to be loaned for a period of three to four years.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are not opposed to the appointment of judges, as provided in Bill No. C-114. The hon. minister has just said that he had set criteria for choosing judges who would be appointed following his recommendation to the governor in council.

It is obvious that the first criterion which must guide the minister, when he chooses a judge of the Superior Court, is the latter's good knowledge of the law. At this stage, I would like to point out that even if, in the past—it may also happen in the future—the minister has appointed a judge who was once a politician, that was not a reason to come to the conclusion that he did not know the law.

On the contrary, very often he shows himself more human because of that.

I do not mean to say that the minister should eliminate a candidate who was involved in politics and who possesses the qualifications described by the minister a few moments ago. A competent man, an honest man, one who knows the law, has a good reputation as barrister and is capable of dispensing justice in a humanitarian way should be considered as a good candidate.

Before continuing my remarks, I should like to ask the minister a question. In his opinion, is the fact that a lawyer was once actively engaged in politics an obstacle to his appointment as judge? As was said earlier, perhaps that depends on the political affiliation.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a job in the public service is naturally not an obstacle.

Mr. Asselin: That is the answer I wanted to hear from the minister. The fact that a man served his country or his province, or that he was a civil servant, is not an obstacle if he possesses as well the basic qualities mentioned by the minister earlier.

One of my colleagues tells me that it depends on the political affiliation. I hope that when the minister makes his recommendations to the cabinet, he will be able to think of candidates other than those who have served in his party. There are people who have left parliament, who were members of political parties other than the Liberal party, and who are competent lawyers; it would be a gracious gesture on the part of the minister if we could see a few of those names on the list of judges that he will appoint under the legislation he has introduced.

There is also another problem, Mr. Speaker. It is very difficult in several cases, for the minister, to convince a judge who is ill to hand in his resignation, because he is unable to render the services expected of him. I am not talking about the judges on the bench at the present time, but in the past we all know that in order to remove from office a judge who did not want to resign, a petition of both houses was required, and it was a rather complicated procedure. Often the Minister of Justice is placed in a rather difficult position. I think that the minister should also consult the provincial attorneys general to devise a formula or to introduce new legislation so that three or four judges of the Appeal Court be empowered or have the necessary prestige to say to a judge: Your health makes it impossible for you, on the basis of the reports know about the just society, about the desire we have received, to carry out your duties on the bench and you have to resign. I do not know how we could introduce such legislation, but I think that we will have to consider, some day, bringing about a change in the way the judges can be removed from office, so that the purposes of justice may be attained.

At the present time, judges can be retired at 75 when companies put their officers or their employees on retirement at 65. I do not suggest that somebody who is 65 years old and over is not clear-headed, is unable to judge and occupy a judge's position but I say that we should consider retiring our judges at 70.

I think that the Minister of Justice should also consider appointing younger people as judges. In the past, we appointed judges when they reached the age of 50, 55 and over, but today the minister should feel free to appoint people in their forties who have all their ability and their health to render the services they will be called upon to perform.

Of course, we agree to the passing of this legislation but, at the same time, we should like the minister to take into consideration the representations which we made concerning the appointment of judges, the administration of the tribunals jointly with the provinces. When federal-provincial conferences are called, he might discuss these matters with the attorneys general because I think that the minister, like everyone else in this house, wants justice to be dispensed in the interest of the ordinary people so as to better serve our society.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that one enters a debate filled with speeches by gentlemen who have the classification "learned" attached to them. I hope I may be able, in ordinary layman's language, to express some views which are understood. Whenever I see a bill of this nature involving justice and appointments by the crown-by the minister or by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—I cannot help but be reminded of the campaign slogan of the Prime Minister: "Come, work with me".

We want to tell the government and the minister that, regardless of all that we know. the Canadian people love Pierre, they trust him and they know he is going to do the right could go down the list and recite the names for the new look and about the new politics of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. The era is fast approaching when adherence to a political faith will not be the criterion for appointments to boards and commissions, to the bench, to the Senate and to all of the other places which by tradition have been a haven for those who have been faithful to the party in office. We know this is not going to exist any more.

In that regard I was very pleased to hear the Minister of Justice say that the prime consideration in the appointment of members to the bench will be their competence and abilities. Of course, other ministers before him have said the same thing. Saying it does not mean it is going to be true, but we trust that Pierre and his cohorts will do the right thing and will bring about the new politics.

We hope that the practice of past governments of appointing to boards and commissions only people of their own political stripe will come to an end. We believe, like the government does, in the new era of politics. But we know that there are some Liberals who do not believe in it and do not want to put it into practice. One of them, for instance, is John Matheson who was parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister. He does not believe in the just society. He believes that there should be political appointments, and that is why he accepted one not too long ago as a county court judge. However, Mr. Matheson is a rare individual.

Paul Tardif is another rare individual in the Liberal party. I gather that Paul Tardif did not run again as a candidate in the area now represented by the Minister of Justice and that he is one of those rare individuals who believe in political appointments. That is why he accepted an appointment as a judge of the citizenship court. This is not a political appointment but one based purely on competence. Of course, with all respect to Paul Tardif, during the time he was here he did not prove his competence to any marked degree.

There is also James Byrne, the former member for Kootenay East, who did not run again. He does not believe in the just society but he does believe in political appointments. He does not believe in the new politics because he accepted a $19,000 a year membership on the immigration appeal board. I know the minister does not like to hear this but I thing in terms of such appointments. We of many others like Roger Teillet, Jacques

Mr. Robichaud. The list is interminable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do not forget Jack Pickersgill.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes, but at least Mr. Pickersgill had the honesty to come to parliament and say, "I want to set up a commission so I can be appointed as its head".

An hon. Member: Does the hon. member know of a better man for the job?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): We say, go ahead Jack, that is the way to do it.

An hon. Member: Is he incompetent?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Quite frankly, I wish that every member of this government had the competence of Mr. Pickersgill. We would be a lot better off in this nation because I have great admiration for Mr. Pickersgill's ability. It is too bad he is gone and there is for him in the present no substitute government.

We know the Prime Minister does not want to follow the old practice. However, more is required than just saying that political adherence is a less valuable asset than some of the other assets considered in appointments. Action of the proper kind is required not only in regard to the appointment of 14 additional judges now but with respect to future appointments not only to the bench but to boards and commissions. We hope this will take place. We hope the Prime Minister will resist the opportunity of appointing his friends to boards and commissions, which of course he has not resisted with too much vigour up to now. But we live in hope and we trust Pierre. We believe that the words of the Prime Minister, "come, work with me", will not only apply to his political friends but will also apply to other people, and we will wait to see whether or not this will be so.

One important point with respect to the bill concerns the matter of justice before the courts. I spoke to a couple of my colleagues in the New Democratic party who are lawyers and they told me that, generally speaking, they try to refrain from using the word "justice" in regard to appearances before the courts because in fact it does not always prevail. There is a legal saw to the effect that for justice to prevail it should not be delayed. In other words, there should be ready access to the courts, whatever the point of litigation or case may be. There should be no impediment in the way of an individual or individuals Tremblay, Lloyd Axworthy, Paul Martin, and coming to court and receiving a speedy hearing and a speedy decision, regardless of what it may be.

Although I have no personal experience in this matter I have spoken with lawyers who have told me-perhaps the Minister of Justice has also had this experience, as well as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who spoke at the resolution stage and the hon, member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) who is a lawyer—that it is not difficult to find cases being delayed for months before they receive a hearing before the courts. In many cases people who are charged with a criminal offence linger in jail waiting for their case to come to trial. In the case of people involved in civil cases there is often an interminably long delay in having their cases brought before the courts, partly because of the calendar of the court, partly because of the fact that judges are overworked and overloaded with cases and also partly because of requests for delays on the part of counsel for either of the parties.

The last factor is one with which I do not think we can deal here because a lawyer has to operate in the best interests of his client and if it is necessary to ask for a postponement he should be able to do so within certain limits. We know there are abuses in this area also and that lawyers with what they consider to be poor cases will ask for remands, delays or postponements hoping that someone will get weary, that they will be able to make an out of court settlement, or will amass some new information to strengthen their case. This is not something with which we can concern ourselves except perhaps in an academic way. We can concern ourselves with court calendars, the work load of judges and so on which result in people being unable to get a proper or speedy hearing of their cases. How this can be done the Minister of Justice will be better able to decide than I because of his familiarity with the structure of the courts and his position now as Minister of Justice. It may require some consultation with the provinces because the administration of justice is in their hands. It may require some amendments to federal statutes or some action on the part of the minister under the authority he has now. I put this forward only as a general proposition about which some action should be taken.

It seems to me too that the proposition should be self-evident that in order for a person to be a good judge he should have it works differently from the roster the Prime been an active participant in cases before the Minister announced for the attendance of courts. This would give him some under- ministers during the question period. Incidenstanding of how the court system works, how tally, I want to say jokingly that the attendthe judges operate and so on. This should be a requirement before a person is appointed a judge.

Perhaps it might be helpful in this regard to have a system of apprentice judges. These persons would not be appointed as full judges who would immediately start to make decisions on cases but would spend their time as assistants to full-fledged judges. They would spend their time in research and study of the various types of jurisprudence with which a particular court is involved. In addition to adversary training in court such persons would also get some training in the theoretical approach by studying case histories, the way courts operate, the way judges operate and this sort of thing. In this way such a person would work his way into the court system and would then be more competent and a better judge than might otherwise be the case.

I should like to mention a point which is perhaps a bit afield from the bill before us. It concerns a part of our judicial system and I think it could perhaps be dealt with at this time. I shall be brief so I hope Your Honour will not stop me. The provinces of British Columbia and Ontario, and I do not know how many others, have a legal aid system in effect. The system provides legal aid to people who cannot afford to employ a lawyer.

Some time ago the hon, member for Calgary North made quite a telling statement on this subject, the validity of which I accept because of his experience in the field of law. He referred to the fact there are two types of justice meted out in our courts, namely, that which is received by the rich and something else which is received by the poor. I gather that if you are involved in a court case and have lots of money you have the ability to hire top-flight lawyers and expert witnesses who may be required. Ultimately, I understand, you get fair consideration for the money you pay. However, if you are some poor slob who does not have any dough and you have to appear before the courts, the chances are you will not have the financial ability to employ the necessary legal talent to ensure that your case is properly presented to the court. As a consequence the legal aid system came into being under which an individual can obtain the benefit of a lawyer. I gather er, our contribution to the study of Bill No.

ance system instituted by the Prime Minister is not too bad because it allows some incompetent ministers to be out of the house some of the time, so they do not embarrass the government. I do not include the Minister of Justice in that category.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The three who are here now are not bad.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): In any event, the legal aid system means that a person charged with an offence—I assume this is just in criminal cases and I do not suppose it applies in civil actions—even though he cannot afford a lawyer, is provided with a lawyer. This lawyer receives from some source certain fees. Perhaps I am wrong there, but I have been given to understand that certain fees are paid. I do not know the source of this money. It may come from the provincial government or partly from the bar society. I believe that if money is available from the provincial government for this legal aid system and from the bar association, the federal government, having concern for the quality of justice, should be able to participate with the provinces in financing the legal aid system. Perhaps the system could be expanded into areas where it does not now operate. I do not know whether it is now in effect in all the provinces and the Northwest Territories. I believe the federal government certainly has a moral obligation in this field, particularly because we enact the criminal law. We say what will be a criminal offence. We set up the system for the appointment of judges.

The federal government should be concerned also about ready access to the courts, and particularly that an individual may have qualified legal advice available to him when he appears in a court. I believe the federal government could help this system and expand it by putting up a little bit of the money and working out some co-operative venture with the provinces. I believe this is the sum and substance of what we wish to say. I cannot wind up my speech with a quotation from Mr. Jefferson, as did the Minister of Justice. I can only wind up by hoping that what the minister says he is going to do he will, in fact, do.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speakthere is a roster or a rotating process. I hope C-114 perhaps will not be negative since this ment of eleven new judges of the Superior Court, is insufficient in our view. We are certainly in favour of the bill, but we say to the minister that eleven new judges will not be enough to settle the cases pending in the various courts.

Today, the image of justice unfortunately leaves much to be desired, because of the slow administrative procedure, at least so far as the judicial districts of Montreal, Bedford, Sherbrooke and even Quebec-which know-are concerned. The delays of the legal process gives the people a distorted image of justice. As a matter of fact, the addition of eleven new judges will not be sufficient to help speed up the hearing of cases.

Having consulted with many lawyers in various Quebec judicial districts, because those are the districts I know best, I reached the conclusion that we do not need eleven new judges to solve Quebec's problems, but rather one hundred. So that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) does not feel this figure to be unduly high, I advise him to look at the docket of cases which have been pending not for six months, but for two, three or four years, which are ready to be heard and in respect of which hearing procedures have been completed. However, there is a shortage of judges and, for that reason, the administration of justice drags on and on, and both defendants and claimants are deprived of the justice they ask for. From a legal standpoint, this has become a scandalous situation.

Some friends of mine who are lawyers have had for years some of their cases pending before the Montreal courts where, in the meantime, solvent defendants have become insolvent before their cases could be heard by the Superior Court. The same situation prevails in almost all the tribunals of the province of Quebec judicial districts. From time to time, it is said that this is due to a space shortage and that there are not enough court facilities. However, some judicial districts have developed a good system whereby, in some places municipal halls have been rented in order to help the judges solve the space problems. This is the case in the judicial district of Bedford, where one or two judges of the Superior Court hold sittings two or three times a week in the Granby city hall, in order to render judgments and to expedite cases on the docket. This method should be adopted in several other judicial districts.

and court buildings, it strikes me that after 1 procedures are so complex and lingering that bill, which makes provision for the appoint- p.m. most courts are deserted. Court sittings begin at 10.30 a.m. and adjourn at 1 p.m. I admit that after hearings judges must refer to the statutes, review their notes, write their decisions and that it is impossible for them to sit during the afternoons. I can understand this situation, but it seeems to me that the Minister of Justice and Attorney General should make representations to the provincial ministers of justice in order to have justice administered in a more expeditious manner. It should be suggested to the latter, if possible, that a number of judges sit in the afternoon and prepare their decision in the evening. Also, other judges could sit during the evening and make out their decision the next day. This method would permit the hearing of three times as many cases in the same amount of time. Yet they would have time to prepare their judgments, to refer to case law and to deliver a just sentence to both the defendant and the plaintiff in a given case. Countless witnesses, subpoenaed for 10.30 a.m. on a Monday or a Tuesday, have to return home without having been called upon because of the slow progress of justice. They have to be called again; a much greater number could be brought in during night sittings.

I know many lawyers who would not mind acting as counsels during evening sittings under such arrangements. Hearings would therefore take place in the evening as lawyers have office work to do during the day. They would appear in court in the evening, and their cases would be heard much faster instead of having them on the cause-list for three or four years running. Often their cases which were good at the beginning became less so or poor because of the slowness of justice.

The hon. Frédéric Dorion, chief justice of the Quebec Superior Court has been complaining about that situation for years. His assistant judge Challies has also been complaining for several years about the shortage of judges for our courts. I am convinced that it is not by appointing only eleven judges today, and especially after giving them another duty to perform, namely divorce cases that they will have to hear in the future, that we will solve the problem of our courts.

For a government which is proud to claim as its motto "a just society", I say that the first duty of a just society is to see to it that When I hear about the shortage of space justice works more quickly. If our judicial plaintiffs cannot see the day when a judge this afternoon because I think we have can here their case, then justice deservedly already had quite a lot of discussion on this projects the poor image to which Canadians measure. are unfortunately accustomed.

I think of the numerous cases of car accidents where insurance companies take advantage of the snail's pace of our justice to drag on cases in the courts. The plaintiff who had an accident faces problems; he must pay hospital bills, doctor's bills, the cost of automobile repairs, dentist bills, and though he is often unable to work as a result of an accident; he must go on. But if his case is in the hands of the insurance company with which he is insured and drags on before the court, he can face extreme financial hardships.

This snail's pace allows Insurance companies to drag on and on, and to drive the plaintiff to a position where, before the hearing of his case, and owing to the troubles caused by his accident-and this is but one example—he will have to reduce the amount of his claim, maybe from $25,000 to $5,000. I have seen it happen. This enables the insurance companies to settle for a mere song. And in those cases, plaintiffs are deprived of their right to justice because their patience is exhausted, because they are beset by financial problems, and because they could not come before the court. They have a legitimate claim, but they give it away for a song. Besides, when insurance companies make dilatory pleas to delay the hearing of a case for two or three years, they save interest. Indeed, when a case is settled out of court with the plaintiff, those companies save huge amounts of interest money. As attorneys in this house know, interest applies when a judgment is passed. But when there is no decision, and the case is settled out of court, in most cases insurance companies save interest. Those companies which loaned the money they would be called to pay some day, loaned their money with interest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is my argument. When the course of justice is delayed far too long, as is the case at present, that becomes an injustice; only by appointing eleven new judges can we manage to settle thousands of cases pending before the Superior Court in the Montreal area, for instance, and the hundreds of others which lawyers are ready to plead but cannot for lack of judges to hear the cases.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I shall only take a few moments we expect him to defend the R.C.M.P. when 29180-781

First of all, I should like to deal briefly with a report that appeared in the Canadian Press stating that in some previous remarks of mine I had criticized the Supreme Court of Canada. I did not raise this matter as a question of privilege but I should like at this stage to refer to what I said, as reported at page 879 of Hansard:

In defence of the Supreme Court of Canada may I say that I think its judges are overworked. The judges of that court do not receive the assistance given to judges of the supreme court of the United States, who have many lawyers behind them to help them in research. In this country our judges have no such facilities and that is why they are overworked, no doubt.

I went on to say that instead of cutting down the number of cases coming before that court we ought to increase the number of judges.

There was another mistake in the article. It reported that I had referred to the question of jurisdiction as being based on a minimum of $2,000. Actually I think I said that the old minimum was $2,000 and that one could appeal on a question of law or of fact and law. In the new act this will be narrowed down to a question of law. When I read the article it seemed to me that the wrong impression was left on the question of jurisdiction.

As I understand the new legislation which is before the other place and which Senator Roebuck has discussed, it seeks to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada to cases involving a minimum of $10,000. The jurisdiction of that court is also narrowed considerably to questions of law only. The whole point of my previous speech was, as Senator Roebuck said, that by setting that amount with respect to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada, the ordinary people of Canada are debarred from obtaining justice. In other words, jurisdiction is being set on a materialistic basis. Anyone wishing to appeal an action for $10,000 where questions of fact and law are mixed would not be able to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I now want to reply to some of the remarks the Minister of Justice made about the exchequer court. We expect the Minister of Justice to defend the exchequer court, just as that body is attacked. Without doubt, someone in the minister's department looked into the matter I am about to raise. Let it be understood that in talking of the exchequer court I am not trying to slight the personnel of that court.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear some hon. member muttering. If he has something to say, let him stand up and say it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: Too many people speak from the bottoms of their pants rather than from the tops of their heads.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): What's the difference?

Mr. Woolliams: If the exchequer court is so full of equity let the Minister of Justice say why the claim of the Indians on the Blackfoot reservation, a claim respecting oil rights, has been before that court for a number of years. I will tell the minister the reason. The Indians cannot obtain money from the Department of Indian Affairs to pay the costs of a very expensive lawsuit. They cannot obtain justice. Let the minister answer that.

Many lawyers would not raise the points I am raising; they are frightened. No doubt I shall appear before that court again and someone will refer to what I have been saying. I am not afraid. I am not one of those who will stand up and say that everything is fine. I do not believe that all institutions are sacred cows. Sometimes some matters have to be spoken of frankly. That is what democracy is about. If we are to have a just society we must have reforms. We must not allow the status quo to continue if it does not suit our purposes, and here I differ with our conservative Minister of Justice.

The minister cannot in all honesty say that the average citizen of this country is able to litigate in the exchequer court. It is not so difficult for those living in central Canada but for those living in Vancouver, Alberta or even Saskatchewan—

An hon. Member: Or Newfoundland.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, or in Newfoundland it is extremely difficult to fight expropriation proceedings. Our citizens must come here and fight the Department of Justice itself.

I remember one instance where officers of tried in provincial courts they wo the department refused to answer certain better day in court at less expense.

questions on examination for discovery. I do not know how many questions one officer objected to answering. Finally we had to obtain a judge's order forcing the department's officers to answer our questions. That was expensive.

Who pays for a lawyer to fly the 2,600-odd miles from Calgary to Ottawa? Who else but the poor old client. The point is that if jurisdiction in these matters were given to the trial divisions of the superior or supreme courts of the province, the average citizen could afford to litigate. At present he cannot afford to.

Our conservative Minister of Justice may not have been the kind of lawyer who represents the average man. He may have dealt with corporations, and corporations can afford the luxury of litigation. The average man cannot. We need reforms in this area if our society is to become a just society.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Go on.

Mr. Hees: That is quite true.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Go on.

Mr. Woolliams: That is not all. Everyone knows that the lawyers assigned to defend poor people under legal aid are not of the same calibre as those who are retained by corporations.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: We must have reforms in our exchequer court. I could easily say that it is the greatest court in the world and, when I appeared before that court, expect someone to say, "Good old Eldon, isn't he wonderful?" We must have reforms if we are to arrive at a just society and if we are not to have one law for the rich and another for the poor.

Frankly, I am shocked by the rules governing the court and I say to the Minister of Justice that those rules are identical with rules governing certain British courts. Similar rules governing the trial divisions of certain provincial courts were rescinded several years ago. The rules set out how one must come before the court and what steps one must take to do so. Those rules ought to be rescinded and jurisdiction in exchequer court matters given to our supreme and superior courts. The exchequer court, in a manner of speaking, was set up for the benefit of the crown and as such, as many lawyers will tell you, it is pro-crown. If litigants had cases tried in provincial courts they would have a

In case the Minister of Justice says: We are not holding anyone up; anyone who wishes may litigate before this court, I ask this question. How many cases having to do with the Green Belt have come before the exchequer court recently? How many people have had to litigate in that court to recover money they were entitled to as compensation for land taken?

The Minister of Justice talks about justice, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, how they took land for the national parks. They filed an order in council with a map in the land titles offices in the prairie provinces. They never notified the owners. The owners only got to know about it when they searched the titles.

I know of one lawyer—I shall not mention any names—who for four or five months asked a simple question with respect to an opinion from the legal officers of the Department of Justice. He never received an answer. Prying out information in order to get into the Exchequer Court is pretty difficult. I have had that experience, and I speak with some experience.

When I say that that court is pro-crown naturally I am not passing a slight on the judges of the court, but I do say that court is set up more to serve the crown than to serve Canadian citizens. I do not think people have really thought about these rules and about how much it costs the average citizen to litigate in that court. The routine is that one draws pleadings as in any court and then one has to make an appearance to find out what the issues are. Then the court makes an order. Some of the judges in that court will assist counsel by travelling to various areas throughout Canada. In that regard they have been most gracious, but the procedure is still costly.

Why do the judges of the trial divisions of the supreme and county courts not have the jurisdiction? Why is this jurisdiction lodged in a special court called the Exchequer Court? I would like the Minister of Justice to say why it must have the jurisdiction. What would be wrong with the trial divisions of the Queen's Bench in the various provinces having that jurisdiction? What is the crown afraid of? What are the great governments that have the staff, the power and the money afraid of when they are litigating? If the minister can answer that question then I will listen to him on reform because I believe in legal reform.

Before he became Minister of Justice the minister made a great speech—I read it in the newspapers—on the subject of legal care. This is something that will come; the minister says it has to come. I point out that this country is having trouble finding enough money for medicare, but we might cut down on legal care costs if we provided less costly litigation procedures whereby the average man could arrive at the door of justice. That is what I am talking about.

When I made one point of criticism of the Supreme Court of Canada I was not criticizing the court itself. I was speaking about a decision in reference to the interpretation of a contract. Lawyers have been criticizing the decisions in cases for years but that does not mean they are criticizing the court. I have said that the court is overworked, that it needs more judges and that in my opinion it has done a great job. I am very thankful for the fact that that court was established in Canada. It was a Liberal government that established it, and it is now the final court of Canada. We no longer need to go to the judicial committee of the privy council in England. That was an important legal reform.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, there is one other hon. member who wants to say something on this bill. We would like to see it receive second reading and, if the other parties agree, there is no reason why we cannot give third reading to it today and pass it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I will make a few brief comments. First of all, I would like to tell the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that the viewpoints expressed by the member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) are, of course, shared by all the members of the Ralliement Créditiste.

As was also mentioned by the hon. member for Shefford, I would like to remind the hon. minister about the problem of the administrative tribunals. I am deeply interested in this subject on which I have tabled a motion that will be discussed at some future date. I would like at this time to discuss this matter and, briefly, the administration of justice generally.

Mr. Speaker, justice has now become a political question. This is a regrettable situation in our organized society where every-body has now in mind the "just society" motto. Mr. Speaker, justice must be free of politics in order to ensure its efficiency and its survival. I was quite interested a few minutes ago, to hear a comment voiced by a member of the New Democratic party who said that justice should be accessible to all whatever their social rank, their economic status and especially to those less fortunate economically. I agree with this concept. Justice must be available to all.

Nowadays, the administration of justice is directly proportional to the money involved and the property at stake. This is inconceivable and I would like the minister to consider this problem. It is often said that justice should at no time be related to a person's economic standing.

The Minister of Justice has already made several speeches proposing a judicial reform which would include the provision of legal aid to the needy. I should like to tell the minister that we support him completely in this and that we insist that he take steps quickly to carry this suggestion into effect.

Mr. Speaker, the Glassco commission suggested that the government give careful and thorough consideration to the matter and introduce clearly defined legislation on administrative tribunals. This legislation, which I am asking the minister to table as soon as possible, would aim at giving effect to the recommendations of the Glassco commission concerning administrative tribunals, for the government is not discharging its responsibilities at the present time. Therefore it is the responsibility of the members of the opposition to study this subject, so that the rights of the individuals may be respected.

Mr. Speaker, I said that this motion implements the recommendations of the Glassco commission and I want to quote a few for the benefit of the honourable members of this house because I think that it is worth-while:

The administrative tribunals of the federal government have never, to the knowledge of your Commissioners, been the subject of systematic study. Nor does there exist a definition of what bodies should be considered under this heading... There are widespread differences in the procedures followed by the tribunals, either as a result of differing statutory requirements or because of decisions taken by the boards themselves. No uniformity or consistency of principle was observed among them in respect of such matters as the obtaining of evidence and its disclosure to interested parties, the examination of petitioners and witnesses, the publicity to hearings and other proceedings, and the form and publications of decisions, rulings or reports.

And that is serious, Mr. Speaker. I continue:

Generally, your commissioners—

[Mr. Fortin.]

The commissioners of the Glassco Commission

—have been struck by the lack of uniformity that is characteristic of the legal status, the composition and the procedures of such courts. They have noticed that these questions have been very much discussed for 30 years or so, that they were the subject of inquiries in the United Kingdom as well as in the United States, and that the legislator has tried to give uniformity to the principles on which the commissions are based as well as their constitution and their procedures. Nothing similar has been done in Canada and, after some observations by the commissioners in this important field, a comprehensive inquiry would be necessary.

I have been quoting from pages 72 to 75, volume 5, of the 24th report of the Royal Commission on Government Organization.

Mr. Speaker, that recommendation was made in 1963 and since then absolutely nothing has been done in that regard. In view of the inertia of the government when it comes to defending the rights of the citizens, we have to take the initiative.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that other countries have acted long ago in that field. France, for instance, has a highly developed system of administrative courts. In England, the British government set up a royal commission which reported in 1932 and its report is known as the Report of the Lord Chancellor's Committee on Minister's Powers. The Frank committee, set up in 1955, submitted its report in 1957. It is known as the Report of the Committee on Administrative Tribunals and Inquiries. It resulted in the creation in 1958 of a permanent body to supervise administrative tribunals which is called the Council on Tribunals.

I will not bore the house by reading the whole document, but one could go on and on giving further examples of what is being done in other countries as far as this important problem is concerned. I think that the implementation of a clear and specific legislation concerning administrative courts could easily and happily come within the judicial reform contemplated by the minister. We have a great deal to do in that field and it is time we assumed our responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something else. In a way, justice must have all the time needed to make sure that its decision is valid. However, because of the dilatoriness of our institutions, the settlement of a case should not be delayed, since that is inevitably prejudicial to both parties. Justice must be cautious and efficient at the same time, and in that connection, I support the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) who urges the minister to appoint a greater number of judges to speed up justice and increase its efficiency.

In concluding my remarks, I should like to congratulate the minister for introducing bill C-114, and I hope he will introduce other bills of this kind, so that justice will be a reality, especially in the case of underprivileged people.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I shall forgo the speech I had planned to make because I think we can pass this measure before five o'clock. I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question but first of all I should like to preface it in this manner. The remarks of the hon, and learned member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), about the Exchequer Court of Canada were quite impressive. I believe it is important that justice not be remote from the people and that the courts be as close to the people as they can possibly be. This is a point we made without success during the consideration of the divorce bill. We attempted to have a provision included that would automatically give county court judges jurisdiction in divorce matters.

I should like to ask the minister whether these 11 new judges of the Superior Court of Quebec will all be charged with jurisdiction in divorce cases. If he nods his head "yes" I will have completed my speech. He does not nod his head and therefore I shall ask him during the committee stage to give an explanation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, is the Minister of Justice prepared to answer my question at this point?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): During the second reading stage the hon. member asked me whether the 11 new judges would all be employed in the divorce division. As I understand it, one out of the three judges in the Quebec appeal district is being appointed because of the increased jurisdiction relating to divorce, and five out of the eight judges in the Montreal appeal district. They will not be divorce judges. As judges of the superior court they will be assigned on a rotating basis to various divisions of the court as is the case now in respect of the bankruptcy division and so on.

Mr. McCleave: I compliment the minister on that answer. The fact is that none of them is a divorce judge per se. They will simply be assigned to that duty. The minister nods his head indicating he is content with what I have said and therefore I also am content.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Has the minister or the government looked at the possibility of participating with the provinces in helping to finance the legal aid program and extend it if necessary?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are reviewing the legal aid programs in the provinces at the moment to see what distinctions there are in the various systems. I shall not be in a position to answer this question until we have the factual background.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, since the administration of justice comes under provincial jurisdiction, I should like the minister to tell me whether the provincial ministers of justice or attorneys general make recommendations to him, as regards the appointment of judges.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I have understood the question correctly. Does the hon. member want to know whether the provincial attorneys general recommend certain appointments?

Mr. Asselin: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, it does not happen too often.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if the provinces decided to make such recommendations, whether the hon. minister would consider them.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I receive suggestions from everywhere.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to say that I come from a rural area, and it can be said that good lawyers of rural law associations have not always been treated fairly with regard to the appointment of judges to the Superior Court as made by the Department of Justice. In view of the fact that eight judges will be appointed in the Montreal area, I should like the minister to tell us whether he also intends to accept the recommendations coming from rural areas in the vicinity of Montreal?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, it is wise to continue to appoint members from rural law associations, because I feel that they are entitled to a certain percentage of the appointments in the two districts.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to know whether the minister intends to bring up at the next conference of provincial attorneys general the matter I mentioned on second reading of the bill, namely the problem of judges who are appointed to judicial and not pseudo-judicial posts?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I have already mentally accepted the good suggestion of the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Benjamin: For my edification, if for no one else's, could the minister say what the difference is between judges and junior judges? My understanding is that both receive the same remuneration.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): They both receive the same remuneration but when there are two or more judges in a judicial district it is customary that one be perhaps the chief judge of a district and the others junior judges.

Mr. Benjamin: Is there any difference in the work they handle?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The chief judge has the additional duty of administering the court and assigning roles to the various junior judges.

Clause agreed to.
Clause 2 agreed to.
Title agreed to.
Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Asselin.]

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

EXPROPRIATION ACT

SUGGESTED MORE BUSINESSLIKE AND JUST TREATMENT OF PROPERTY OWNERS

Mr. Hyliard Chappell (Peel South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of giving immediate consideration to amending the Expropriation Act so that an owner whose property is expropriated will be dealt with in a more business-like and just manner, and more particularly so as to provide for a notice before the expropriation takes place, for a substantial advance of money at the time of taking property, for the spelling out of measures of compensation, for the change of interest rate to the bank rate of interest, and, finally, to provide that if property is affected or invaded in part by an act on the part of expropriating authorities, the owner may call upon authorities to take all his land or property.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my motion relates to the need to change our attitude in matters of expropriation. On September 19 I spoke of the shortcomings and the antiquity of the federal Expropriation Act, born in the agrarian atmosphere of the last century and static ever since. While we all agree that law should be stable, it is wrong for it to stand still. A law that is out of date does not warrant respect, and if any one of our laws is in this disrespect a shadow of disrepute falls over the whole process of government. I then asked that the principles upon which governments act in taking land be reviewed and made compatible with concepts of today so that all Canadians who may be affected by federal expropriations will be confident that they will be dealt with in a more reasonable, prompt and just manner. The motion before this house is to further that aim.

In this century, as the need for public projects increased, expropriation of property by all levels of government accelerated and multiplied. Apparently, Hon. J. C. McRuer, formerly chief justice of the high court of Ontario, points out in his 1968 report to the Ontario government that under Ontario laws, lands may be expropriated under 36 acts, by 8,017 separate authorities. In Quebec they have done even better—308 acts give the power to expropriate to innumerable authorities. Today no citizen can expect immunity for his lands and home. This enormous power, often in the hands of delegated authority, can be exercised without warning and led one irate citizen to say, "It is as though every public servant carries the Great Seal".

While all recognize the necessity to expropriate for public good, this is a trust for the public benefit and public benefit cannot be served unless the public is convinced that individuals' rights are respected. There must be a rational relationship between the individual and his government. With the informed public of today, anxious to participate in political issues and increasingly sensitive to its legal rights, nothing less will do.

For a comparison with our laws on the forcible taking of land, I shall refer to the recognition of basic principles in other jurisdictions. In France, no one can be compelled to give up his property except for public utility and in consideration of a just indemnity previously paid. In the United States, Denmark, Australia and India there are constitutional guarantees of just compensation.

Our federal statute, on the other hand, allows expropriation by the simple registration of a plan in the land registry office without notice and without payment. The Bill of Rights as interpreted by our courts is not applicable to prevent it. This gap in the law, this breach in what we all regard as our inviolable right, led the Hon. J. C. McRuer to restate a criticism made by the Hon. Joseph Thorson while president of the Exchequer Court in 1955:

I have frequently called attention to these provisions of the law and stated that Canada has the most arbitrary system of expropriation of land in the whole of the civilized world. I am not aware of any other country in the civilized world that exercises its rights of eminent domain in the arbitrary manner that Canada does. And unfortunately, the example set by Canada has infected several of the Canadian provinces in which a similar system of expropriation has been adopted.

In default of leadership by parliament, the provinces allowed their expropriation laws to remain basically unchanged and out of date until about 1960. Since then, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba Ontario and Quebec have been studying the deficiencies of their laws and have taken steps to bring them up to date, having been influenced no doubt by the revisions in England, Australia, New Zealand and some parts of the United States.

It is urgent that we take a fresh look and restate the principles of expropriation in light of today's needs and in line with contemporary methods of business, as foreign jurisdictions have done. Surely we can be confident that if we express accurately and soundly a concept that is fair to the individual and fair to government, and so take a giant step forward, the provinces will follow our example. This could lead to uniform expropriation codes in Canada.

It is inherent in modern thinking that each person is entitled to freedom of speech, freedom of religion and quiet enjoyment of his property. It is therefore incomprehensible that governments should have the power to deprive a man of his home or livelihood without notice and with nothing more than the filing of a document. It is not surprising that when it occurs the owner regards this appropriation with fear and resents the indignity of such abrupt intrusion into his private rights. With such feelings of injury and thought of unfair advantage he instinctively hates and fights the government.

What can we do about this? The taking of private property against the will of the owner is so serious an infringement of his rights there should be, except in cases of emergency, notice of a pre-expropriation hearing which, along with his right to fair compensation, should be assured by constitutional authority.

The right to be heard before one's land is taken is fundamental justice and is supported by common sense. The facts disclosed at a preliminary hearing would produce decisions reflecting more consideration for the rights of individuals without sacrificing the public interest. It is fallacious to think that this would cause governments any disadvantage. At worst, officials might be embarrassed for having failed to consider a more suitable alternative.

In one case an expropriation authority took a very valuable experimental orchard in order to build a garbage incinerator. Protests from the owner went unheard. However, after a united outcry from the press, another incinerator site was found at much less cost. A hearing would have avoided this.

We have all told the Canadian people repeatedly that we wish to involve them in politics. What is more natural than a pre-expropriation hearing so that those affected may be heard and submit alternatives, or point out errors in choice of selection and, failing these, adjust the planning of their affairs or businesses. This has been the rule in England for years.

It is gratifying that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), who recently announced plans relating to the possible enlargement of the Toronto international airport at Malton, held a pre-expropriation hearing with representatives of the municipalities concerned and has agreed to hold further meetings with those more directly affected. This recognizes a basic principle, and I hope establishes a precedent, to be incorporated in the new act.

What should the second step be? After such a hearing, if the minister decides to proceed, prompt notice should be given. It should indicate to the owner that he is entitled to and should obtain the services of an appraiser and a solicitor, and that reasonable costs will be borne by the authority. It should also state that the authority's appraisal is complete and available to the owner, in order that his advisers may consider it and meet with the authority's experts as soon as they have completed their own appraisals so that settlement may be discussed. There is no room in an expropriation case, where an owner has been deprived of his property and drawn into this contest through no fault of his own, for any sporting theory of justice where each side holds back his information. There should be full disclosure, and it should start with the authority.

In one case an authority offered $900 for land taken and later increased the offer to $5,000, which was accepted. This created distrust. In another case where several blocks of houses were taken for a redevelopment scheme, the authority had each house appraised by the same appraiser for a small fixed fee per home, which resulted in a low, uniform valuation for all. When an offer based upon this appraisal was refused by one owner of several homes, the authority undertook considerable further expense in an attempt to support this cursory valuation and involved the owner in costly and burdensome litigation. In that case the tribunal awarded twice the amount offered. Those who could not afford the legal struggle and accepted the offer, which was 50 per cent of the court's value, were rightly resentful. It should not be a matter of how cheaply the authority can acquire land, but rather of finding a figure that is fair and just and one which would allow the owner to re-establish himself promptly without months or years of disruption and fear.

What about possession? The authority should, at the time notice of expropriation is given, state the date at which possession will affairs accordingly. It might be said that this approach would create too big a work load for the department. But is it reasonable for them to have taken the land in the first place, unless they knew the cost, and are they just in making an offer that is not, to the best of their ability, honest and fair?

The term "businesslike" is made up of these attributes: efficiency, reliability, integrity, and a sense of values. Why should not governmental authority set the example?

As our act stands today, the federal authority is not required to pay any amount at the time of expropriating the land or when possession is taken. Even if the authority volunteers to pay part of the amount it says the property is worth, that advance, of course, must be applied against the mortgage, and the owner is without funds to re-establish himself. If the authority is required to pay the full amount of its evaluation at the time of expropriation, as is recommended by the McRuer report in Ontario and the provincial committee report in Quebec, the owner could re-establish himself immediately. This is especially important when the cost of relocation has increased by as much as 26 per cent in 18 months in some areas.

What should be the measure of compensation? The present law says an owner is entitled to "value to him", which is usually expressed as "value to the owner". This was developed as a test over 100 years ago to prevent an owner from claiming the amount his land was worth to the expropriating authority, which could be away out of line if it was the last parcel in an assemblage of land. This test is long out of date. Other countries provide that the owner is entitled to market value, plus extra items to compensate him for the disturbance, business loss, moving expenses, etc. With such guide lines appraisals would be more businesslike and predictable, and would thus lend to early settlement.

There is one type of case that requires special mention. Suppose the owner of a small house, who has lost it because of a redevelopment scheme, is offered $8,000. In one sense that is all the house may be worth, but each such scheme substantially diminishes the supply of houses in that price range, and the price immediately goes up; or, if he cannot find a house of the same age, he may have to pay two or three times as much for a new home which is no larger. It should be spelled out that account must be taken of the cost to be required, so that the owner may adjust his reinstate in similar shelter; otherwise he will be displaced and without a home, through no fault of his own.

The new act must include safeguards so that rumours or threats of expropriation or zoning for a less valuable use cannot be used to depreciate the value of the property to the benefit of the expropriating authority. Just recently I received a letter from a solicitor telling me what was happening in one of our largest cities. An authority has written owners advising that their lands will be required in 1975. As this information becomes public it means that the owners cannot sell to anyone but the authority and, of course, at its price. If the owners refuse to accept the authority's offer, their property will be evaluated as of the date of the taking in 1975. By then the value will have decreased because of the deterioration in individual houses and the area, caused by the notice of intention to expropriate.

Further, we need to make it plain that if the expropriation of rights over an owner's land, or land use zoning for a particular government purpose, has made it impossible to sell the property at what would have been a fair price in the absence of encroachments, the owner may call on the government to buy the whole parcel. My notice of motion says, "is affected or invaded in part", but obviously that should be, "is affected or invaded to any substantial degree." I think that is a reasonable interpretation. In one case in my riding the owner's land was invaded nine times in this manner by the federal government and he was helpless to prevent it. The laws of the United Kingdom protect the individual in both such cases.

The converse should be equally true; that is, if only part of the owner's land is required for the plan that is to be carried out, the expropriating authority should not take more than it needs, unless the owner consents. This is in accordance with the principle that a person's rights should not be taken from him, except as may be specifically required for the public work. If the authority should take more than it needs, the owner should be able to claim the return of the balance.

In the event that the parties are unable to come to a settlement, by whom should the compensation be determined? It is an important element of justice that claims should be heard with an absolute minimum of delay. At the moment federal expropriation cases are heard in the Exchequer Court, where the owner is disadvantaged by expense and delay. In other nations, to overcome delays 29180—793 special tribunals hear such claims, and this is a recommendation in the McRuer report and the special committee in Quebec. I propose that the new act provide that the owner should have the option of proceeding in the Exchequer Court or any lands tribunal court which may be set up in the province in question. Land tribunals should be encouraged, so that all expropriation cases come before the same tribunal. In this way compensation would not vary from case to case.

Interest rates paid on money owing to the former owner are equally out of date. The act was amended in 1900 to reduce interest to 5 per cent from the date the owner is forced to give up possession to the date he obtains judgment from the courts, and after that date to 4 per cent. This cheap rate of interest leads to this paradox: it may very well be advantageous to the authority to appeal the judgment in order to extend the period of borrowing from the owner at 4 per cent, while the owner is left to forage for other funds at interest rates at least twice as high. It seems only reasonable that the interest should be at the discretion of the tribunal or at the prevailing bank interest rate.

With regard to costs, I have always felt it to be iniquitous that the person expropriated is not given his full legal costs and all reasonable disbursements for expert witnesses when he has succeeded in establishing that he is entitled to more compensation than was offered. His legitimate expenses in establishing that fundamental right should not be borne in any part by himself. If the expropriating authority offered $20,000 and the individual established a true value, after a five day hearing, of $25,000 but receives only part of his costs, he could easily end up with no more than he was originally offered, although the property is worth $5,000 more. The present legislation, provincial and federal, puts the individual in an inferior position from the beginning, and the inclination is to accept the low figure rather than to spend all the energy, money and time in securing a proper figure which in the end nets him no more than he was originally offered.

In conclusion may I just say that if we can say that the prime task of expropriation law is to see that after notice the best site is selected with prompt payment of compensation which is just, not only to the owner but also to the acquiring authority, and with as little disruption as possible to the owner, then we must concede that our present law falls far short of achieving this result.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to support the resolution of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell). The hon, member and myself have shared in the frustrating experience of being unable to bring about justice in the case of a professional educational institution in Toronto which had its property expropriated and had no recourse except to go before the courts of the land in a costly and prolonged procedure that not only disrupted that institution for some six years but in the end failed to bring about justice and fair remuneration. For five consecutive years I have had a similar motion on the order paper, and again this year I have a similar resolution, No. 23, on the order paper. Therefore I share the concern of the hon. member for Peel South. I would only hope that the Minister of Justice will take very careful note of what is being said. I would also hope that he will permit this motion to go to the appropriate committee where it can be discussed.

I realize that the minister has expressed his intention of revising the expropriation laws, but I have heard this for seven years from successive ministers of justice. In fact, it has been expressed by his predecessors back to at least 1959, always with the one intent, that the expropriation laws should be revised but seemingly never able to come to the necessary conclusion to bring those revisions before the house.

The history of parliament is a record of the resistance of representatives of the people to the usurpation of the powers of the crown or of its agencies. I believe it would be foolish indeed to think that because we have a constitutional parliamentary government Canada we as the representatives of the people are not faced with the duty and responsibility of keeping the powers of the crown under control. It might be reasonable that in times of war or imminent danger to our country the federal government should have such powers, but today such powers belong in the War Measures Act and not in any peacetime legislation. We already have far too many punitive federal laws on our statute books. I am thinking in particular of some of the provisions of the Income Tax Act and of the Excise Act which are an open threat to the liberty and the property of the citizen.

I say to the house that the laws of this land as they concern the expropriation of private property were designed for a time of emergency and certainly not for a time of peace such as we are living in now. As I interpret the Expropriation Act, parliament has given to officers of the civil service down to a very junior level the right to deprive a citizen of the land he owns merely by filing a plan in the registry office and leave the citizen with nothing but the right to go to court to receive just payment for his property. Again I say that powers like those contained in the act relating to the expropriation of the land belong only in the War Measures Act, certainly not in civil legislation. There is no requirement to follow the usual practice that is followed in most provinces, although not all of them, as the McRuer report brought out very clearly a few months ago. Where there is a transfer of title there is need for a public hearing to ascertain whether or not any particular parcel of land is needed for public purposes.

Here in Ottawa over the last number of years many a home owner has awakened to read in the newspaper that his home has been included in the expropriation plans of the day or the week before. This should not be so. I have in my files a number of letters concerning cases which bear evidence to the fact that here in the capital city of Ottawa, under the authority of the National Capital Commission using the expropriation laws of Canada, property owners have been deprived of their property without due recourse to the law or to ordinary procedures that are required of private institutions or citizens in purchasing land. Many of the citizens of this city feel that the power of expropriation is a flagrant abuse of governmental power. I say further that the time has come when the expropriation laws which concern the right of the government to take a man's property should be altered so that property cannot be taken away from him without due notice being given.

It also seems to me it should be required that a plan or a description of the property be filed before the crown becomes owner of the land. The rightful owner must not be denied his rights. An owner whose property has been expropriated by the crown all too often is left waiting for years before he actually receives the money due him. If time would permit I could give the house illustrations of such occurrences which have taken place right here in Ottawa.

[Mr. Chappell.]

If a customer buys a pound of sugar off the shelf in a store he has to pay cash before being allowed to carry it home. Therefore, why should the crown be considered any different, particularly if we value the rights of property ownership which to me are one of the prerequisites of a strong democracy?

In a nation which has placed the legislative field of property and civil rights within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures, the powers granted by this act seem to border on the unconstitutional, and on this point alone the government has a responsibility to see that the expropriation laws are revised. Unfortunately the expropriation of land by the government is often a necessity. In the planned development of our cities and towns this becomes all the more necessary. But the rules which govern expropriation should require that the needs of the property owner be weighed against the needs of the state. Not only must there be an assurance of fair compensation and an adequate forewarning to property owners that their land is to be expropriated, but public hearings must also be held before a judge to determine whether the action is necessary and is in the public interest. Beyond this it is imperative that every citizen be guaranteed the right to his own day in court. Justice demands that no citizen be deprived of his property without such hearings. Expropriation powers which permit the filing of a plan to take away the ownership of a man's land when his certificate of title tells him he is still the owner certainly do not reflect justice.

I believe it would be very easy and proper to provide a better law so that before any land is taken for a public purpose by expropriation a public hearing should be held before a judge. In this way, everyone could be satisfied it was in the public interest that the land be taken. It is not good enough that we go on and on saying the law is not right and that we must revise it, but never do so. We simply have not enacted legislation to amend the expropriation law of Canada to make it as just as it should be and as just as every citizen in our country expects our laws to be.

I believe also that an exact method of expropriation should be spelled out by law, such as a certain number of days' notice and disclosure of the intent of the authority. In addition, a safeguard should be provided so that no land would be expropriated unnecessarily or by mistake. I can cite a number of cases of expropriation in the capital here where land was expropriated and then it was discovered later this land was not required. However, the land has never been returned to the rightful owners.

Mr. Woolliams: Like the parks.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): I suggest also that a clause be inserted elsewhere in the statutes of Canada guaranteeing Canadian citizens the right to own property, and that this clause should be specifically in the Expropriation Act. If we did this we would be protecting the rights of Canadian citizens as they deserve to be protected. I am sure all of us who have read the McRuer report as it relates to the expropriation laws of Ontario would agree with the remarks of that distinguish justice. He expressed in no uncertain terms his belief that the expropriation laws of Ontario should be revised.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the words of Abraham Lincoln as they relate to property ownership could well be heeded. I pass them on the the Minister of Justice. It was Abraham Lincoln who said that when individual rights and property rights are in question, the right of the individual must be given first place. This is what makes a democracy a democracy. I am convinced that the expropriation laws of this land must be revised. I sincerely hope our present Minister of Justice, who has made a public commitment to this end, will see that this revision is made during this session. Certainly, this law has been on the statute books far too long and does not reflect the true nature of what is expected from us as legislators.

I should like to close my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by quoting these words of the former President of the Exchequer Court, Mr. Justice Thorson. He had heard a case between Ethel Grayson and the Queen concerning the expropriation of property belonging to that lady, and he had this to day:

I have frequently called attention to these provisions of the law and stated that Canada has the most arbitrary system of expropriation of land in the whole of the civilized world. I am not aware of any other country in the civilized world that exercises its right of eminent domain in the arbitrary manner that Canada does. And unfortunately, the example set by Canada has infected several of the Canadian provinces in which a similar system of expropriation has been adopted.

disclosure of the intent of the authority. In So, Mr. Speaker, I again urge the minister addition, a safeguard should be provided so to take heed of the words that have been spoken by the hon. member for Peel South, which I believe represent a consensus of all members in this house. I urge that he take the action we expect him to take now.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think all members of the house would want to congratulate the hon, member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) on introducing this resolution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not compliment him by letting the resolution pass?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will hear me out he may be more satisfied with this speech than he imagines at the moment.

I congratulate also the hon, member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). I want to congratulate both hon. members on the amount of research, thought and industry that went into their two speeches on this important subject. I am sure that if former President Thorson were able to hear himself quoted with approval from both sides of the house, and if he had seen the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) nod in approval, the former president of the exchequer court would have been mightily pleased indeed.

I want to say that we have been giving a good deal of thought to the Expropriation Act. It has been substantially in its present form since 1886 in the Revised Statutes of Canada. In fact, it was not even new in 1886 because it was adopted from some of the earlier statutes in force since confederation and in the union government before that. My own view is that the present act is confusing. I can understand the dissatisfaction of property owners in the country whose land has been expropriated under its provisions. I believe a general revision of the statute is required to provide a clear and consistent legislative scheme.

I would hope that I would be able to present in this house for first reading within the next six weeks or before Christmas a new, completely revised Expropriation Act. We hope to be able to ameliorate the arbitrariness inherent in the present statute, which was so well illustrated by the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Peel South. I have read a good deal of the criticism of the present statute contained in decisions from the bench, as expressed by members of the bar and the bar committee of the report of the hearing officer, could proceed Canadian Bar Association of which the hon. member for Peel South has been a member and chairman, as well as by interested members of the public generally. As the hon. member for Red Deer has said, this measure has been before the house several times.

In my opinion the present act is insufficient in that a government department can arbitrarily take a parcel of land and the owner has no right to be heard. A person's land can be expropriated without any prior notice. A person whose land has been expropriated can be required to give up possession immediately, prior to the payment of any compensation. No definite negotiation procedure is prescribed. It is either court or nothing or a type of informal negotiation that does not really have any arm's length or fair dealing about it.

Finally, there are no rules prescribed under the present statute for the determination of the amount of compensation payable. Criteria for determining the amount are found in the judgments of the courts, and sometimes these are hard to correlate and difficult to reconcile. believe that any statute which would remedy these difficulties would have to contain a number of provisions, and I should like to deal with them in general terms. The bill will have to await first reading in the house, but here are some of the ideas I feel should be incorporated in any bill to revise the present Expropriation Act.

I feel there would have to be notice given prior to expropriation. I believe the minister would have to give notice in writing of his intention to expropriate a particular interest in land and state the public purpose for which the expropriation is required. I feel that any person objecting to the proposed expropriation should have a period of time from the giving of the notice to file an objection in writing, stating his name, address and the nature and grounds of his objection, as well as the particular interest he has in the land to which the notice of expropriation relates. Then there should be a public hearing. The minister will be able to state his case and those who object will be able to make their case. The hearing officer should then present a report.

After the expiry of the period of time during which objections could be received, or after the hearing had been concluded, the minister, after receiving and considering the

[Mr. Thompson (Red Deer).]

with the expropriation of the land in question. In that event, Mr. Speaker, if the expropriation were proceeded with the relevant date for the determination of the amount of compensation payable should be the date on which the notice of intention to expropriate was given.

The minister might decide to abandon the property expropriated, or if he did not proceed with the expropriation after a certain time had elapsed from the date of the notice of intention to expropriate he would be deemed to have abandoned. In that event I believe the owner of the land in question who had had the land isolated and neutralized by notice of expropriation should be entitled to compensation.

I believe that the implementation of this type of proposal should go a long way toward assuring owners of land and the people of Canada that their lands are not to be expropriated except for good reason. Moreover, this will enable the minister-indeed, it would compel the minister concerned—to be satisfied that he is aware of all of the relevant facts before deciding whether to expropriate a given property.

There are other matters mentioned in the resolution moved by the hon, member for Peel South. I have talked about the question of notice. The hon, member also calls for a substantial advance of money at the time of the taking of the property. I believe that compensation should be paid at the time the property is expropriated and be based on the estimate by the minister of the value of that property, subject to review by the negotiating board or by the courts. But surely, Mr. Speaker, the minister's estimate of the value of the property ought to be paid over at the time of expropriation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when could the crown take possession? I believe that in any statute a certain period of notice prior to the taking of possession should be provided-shorter notice in special circumstances allowed by regulation is something we would have to contemplate—and at the time the property was expropriated the minister's estimate of the compensation should be paid. If the property was required on shorter notice, then further compensation should be paid for the additional inconvenience occasioned to the owner. That is also something we might well contemplate and goes even beyond the optimistic view expressed by the hon. member for Peel South. He asked for the spelling for instance, that allowance be made for legal out of measures regarding compensation. I agree that the rules for compensation ought to be spelled out in the statute.

The hon. member also calls in his resolution for the change of interest rate to the bank rate of interest. Having heard the debate on some of the agricultural measures recently before the house I can only say at this stage that there will have to be some formula worked out for payment of interest; and so I cannot be any more precise with regard to that part of the hon. member's resolution.

The hon. member's final suggestion is that the statute should provide that if property is affected or invaded in part by an act on the part of expropriation authorities, then the owner may call upon the authorities to take all of his land or property. The hon, member has since amended that part of his resolution. In his speech today he said that that is only reasonable if a substantial part of the property is expropriated, in which case the owner should be free to call upon the crown to expropriate it all.

I do not want to use a pun here, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot buy all of that. We would have to watch such a situation. For example, we could have the ridiculous situation where the crown merely wanted to expropriate an easement or a servitude. Surely the owner of the property should not be able to force the crown to expropriate all of his property under such circumstances. However, this matter might well go to compensation, the owner being rewarded for expropriation of a lesser interest in his property. Perhaps the hon. member's point could be satisfied in terms of compensation rather than in terms of compelling the crown to expropriate the entire interest in his property.

I did mention in passing that the statute should provide for some type of negotiating procedure between the crown and the person whose land is expropriated. If the negotiating procedure did not succeed in adducing agreement, then freedom to litigate in the ordinary manner would be preserved.

The matters to be considered in arriving at the compensation payable will, of course, appear in the statute. I think there is a good argument to be made for saying that the current rules of the court should be broadened to provide fair treatment for persons whose land has been expropriated. It might be suggested, should like to consider. I do not want this just to be an increment to the legal profession, but it may be that fees incurred by an owner of land in trying to negotiate or in resisting expropriation should in certain circumstances be allowable.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are some of the comments that I should like to make at this stage. However, I do want to refer again to the last proposal in the hon. member's resolution, where he talks about the owner calling on the authorities to take all his land or property. The department has also read former chief justice McRuer's report. I cannot presume what the thoughts of the former chief justice might be if he were listening to this debate, but a good many of his recommendations are reflected in the remarks that I have just made and which I hope the statute will introduce. The last recommendation made in the hon. member's resolution was not made either by the Clyne or the McRuer commissions. The most that Chief Justice McRuer said is to be found at page 1078 of the report and is as follows:

-we recommend that expropriating authorities should not be empowered to expropriate more land than is necessary for the proposed work, except where this can be shown to be in the interests of the owner of the unnecessary land.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, since I have given an undertaking to the house to introduce a new revised Expropriation Act envisaging the principles that I have outlined in a general way, which I hope would be available for first reading around the end of the year, perhaps sooner, perhaps later, I must say to the hon, member that we could not accept his resolution exactly in the form proposed.

The standing committee, would have the more precise task of considering the terms of any new statute. I would also hope that an opportunity would be given to the members of the house on second reading and in committee to review the ideas that I have set forth, as they would appear in statutory form, in some further detail. In general the principles that are outlined in the resolution and supported by the hon. member for Red Deer meet with my agreement, and I should like to congratulate these members of the house who have taken the time to research and to present this matter to the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. [Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

and appraisal fees, and this is something I down I wonder whether he would permit a question. In view of his statement, which seemed to suggest that the government is prepared to do what the hon. member for Peel South requests, namely, to consider the advisability of amending the Expropriation Act, may we assume that the government is willing to let this resolution pass? Would he also be willing to allow a private member, the hon. member for Peel South, to have the prestige of having a resolution like this supported by the house?

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think the hon, member for Peel South already enjoys a good deal of prestige in his profession and will obtain credit for introducing a measure which, I can assure him, meets with the general approval of the government. He will have that prestige in full measure. However, since there are certain elements with which, as I have said, we are not in accord and since a more fruitful use might be made of the time of the house and of the committee than trying to put the present motion in precise form, I suggest that the better alternative is to await first reading of the bill which, I assure the hon, member, will not be long delayed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister not aware that passing this resolution does not effect legislation? It is merely an expression of opinion.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): But it commits the house in certain areas to certain words, and I am not prepared to be committed to all the words.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): Since the minister is not willing to lend the government's prestige to the hon, member for Peel South-

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He does not need any.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): —and since I am not in his position of not needing prestige, perhaps the minister would be willing to lend the government's prestige to private members' notice of motion No. 23 which stands in my name. The contentious wording the minister referred to in the present motion does not appear in my motion. Could the minister therefore do as I ask?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Since the Speaker, before the Minister of Justice sits hon. member for Red Deer had prestige enough to allow him to move from one political persuasion to another without trouble, because the people of his area so respected him, I do not think anything I say here today will add one whit to his prestige.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell), the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) for what they have said. When the new legislation is considered I hope that the question of jurisdiction will be looked at so that the average man can afford to litigate in his own province. That is my first point. I realize that this afternoon my hon. friend seemed to be in love with the exchequer court. I hope his love extends to the ordinary, average people of Canada who cannot now afford to litigate in the exchequer court.

In the few moments remaining may I raise the matter of appeal. One case I was involved in was to go to appeal. The action was to be appealed from the exchequer court to the Supreme Court of Canada and the evidence would have cost around $16,000. These people had been litigating for ten years and could not afford that outlay. Some way must be found to cheapen appeals and to bring them within the reach of anyone. To show what can happen may I refer to the case of Fraser and the Queen, reported in 1963 Canada Supreme Court Reports, page 463. Cameron J. of the exchequer court made an assessment of $40,640 with respect to certain lands. The matter went to the Supreme Court of Canada. The exchequer court refused to consider the principle of future potential-

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member was not working for peanuts in that case.

Mr. Woolliams: I did not get peanuts, not even salt for the peanuts. The point is that the appeal was allowed and the crown's crossappeal was dismissed with costs. The last paragraph of the judgment says in part:

In the result, I would allow this appeal, dismiss the main cross-appeal, and vary the judgment of the learned trial judge by fixing the amount to which the appellant is entitled for the expropriation of his property and for all damages resulting therefrom at the sum of $360,640 together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum—

There is quite a difference between $360,640 and $40,640. I hope the point is clear. I hope the question of jurisdiction is examined so that people may litigate at the place of taking, no matter whether it is in Alberta, Ontario, Quebec or elsewhere in Canada.

At present our appeal procedure is such that the average man cannot afford to appeal. If he is not satisfied with the exchequer court's decision he cannot afford to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. Since the state is all-powerful and since it has most of the brains because it can afford to pay the money, I ask that it make available for examination for discovery the reports of its appraisers and pay for independent appraisals to be carried out. Also, the state ought to make certain that litigants are properly represented by counsel. When that happens I shall be satisfied with the new law.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, in the remaining few minutes I want—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To congratulate the hon. member and talk the resolution out.

Mr. Honey: -to congratulate the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) who, I know, has spent much time on this matter. He is a learned member of the bar of Ontario and was chairman of the appropriate committee of the Canadian Bar Association that looked into this matter. He has worked closely with those of us who, in common with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams and others in this house, are anxious to see the introduction of new legislation dealing with expropriation. We are heartened by the minister's remarks and hopeful that the legislation may be introduced before the end of the year. We also hope that the new legislation will filter down to provincial jurisdictions and that across Canada in our respective federal and provincial jurisdictions we shall see an enlightened approach to expropriation.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): Question.

Mr. Honey: I echo the sentiment of the hon. member for Red Deer, who is anxious for the question to be put. I think we must recognize the undertaking of the minister that a statute in precise form following the general principles of this resolution will be introduced within the new few weeks. The inference I drew from the minister's remarks was that the bill

Refer Estimates to Standing Committees would be referred to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs. When that happens we shall be able to sit down and discuss the question of jurisdiction at some length. There is no partisanship in this matter. We are all concerned about improvements in the expropriation law and the procedure to be followed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

ESTIMATES

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN DEPARTMENTS TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have the consent of the house to revert to motions so that I could refer estimates to the standing committees.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the estimates relating to the Privy Council, Governor General and the Lieutenant Governors have already been dealt with by the committee of supply. It has already been agreed by hon. gentlemen opposite that the other estimates to be reserved for the committee of supply are those relating to the Auditor General, finance, industry, justice, labour, legislation, the National Capital Commission, national health and welfare, public works, supply and service, transport, and the Treasury Board. Those departments, as I say, were reserved for committee of supply. My motion, therefore, refers all the other estimates to designated standing committees, but would reserve the powers of the committee of supply. Accordingly I move:

That, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys, the items listed in the revised main estimates for 1968-69, relating to the enumerated departments be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee of this house as follows.

An enumeration follows. I think there is general consent to dealing with this matter in this way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is general consent on the understanding that the contents of the long list the minister is holding in his hand will appear in Hansard.

[Mr. Honey.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I certainly hope that it will.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Business of the House
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could have an indication of tomorrow's business.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The business for tomorrow will be as indicated last Thursday, the resolution preceding the bill to enact the official languages act. If by close of business tomorrow the resolution stage has been dealt with, we shall proceed to the drug bill which was called as the second item for today's business. On Friday we would return to committee of supply, and the estimates to be considered in committee of supply will be those of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

presented by the Honourable Edgar J. Benson, M.P., Minister of Finance for the information of Parliament in connection with the Budget of 1968-1969

FUDGET PAPERS

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

- to present a general economic review of 1967 and the first half of 1968, bringing together in one place and in convenient form some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Bank of Canada and other government agencies, together with some comments;
- 2. to present a preliminary review of the Government Accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968.

Part I

ECONOMIC WHITE PAPER FOR 1968

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY: REVIEW AND OUTLOOK

In the course of the past two years, Canada has passed through a period of economic adjustment while still in the midst of the longest and strongest expansion in its history. During 1967 many of the adjustments taking place resembled that of a mild cyclical recession, but other expansionary forces more than offset these movements, and production, income and employment continued to rise. Some serious industrial disputes have occurred in 1968, but despite these it seems clear that a moderate acceleration of growth was established in the early months of this year.

Cyclical Developments

Business profits reached a peak early in 1966 and declined to a trough in the first quarter of 1967, recovering thereafter. Excess capacity emerged in some manufacturing industries. Strains developed in the markets for capital, beginning in 1966 and persisting, in varying degree, throughout 1967 and early 1968. In response to these developments, business expenditures on plant and equipment first levelled off and then turned down; the trough was reached in late 1967 and an improved first-quarter 1968 level appeared. This renewed expansion was maintained in the second quarter. The business inventory pattern has also followed a characteristic cyclical form. Accumulation rose to peak rates in mid-1966, after which it fell back. In early 1967 only nominal accumulation occurred, but a third-quarter pickup was followed by a very substantial swing to actual decline in the fourth. Inventories may now have completed their cyclical correction, and seem likely to resume a normal growth pattern in coming months.

In the personal sector, 1967 was a year of continued increase in both hourly earnings and the unemployment rate. This pattern has persisted in the first half of 1968. During 1967, wage settlements under collective bargaining produced a quarterly record of increases which, on the whole, exceeded gains made in the corresponding quarters of 1966. However, some signs of moderation appeared towards year-end and have persisted in the first and second quarters of 1968, although current gains are still excessive in relation to productivity. Throughout this period, consumers have continued to increase their spending at rates little changed from those of 1966. Price increases, however, particularly in consumer services, accelerated in 1967, except in the case of food prices. Some easing in the rate of advance took place in 1968, but it is not sufficiently strong to suggest that recent pressures have been completely checked.

Expansionary Forces

The mild recessionary pattern of 1967 described above was almost totally obscured by the continuation of a number of strong expansionary forces, including the special events of Centennial year, particularly Expo. These special events contributed substantially to the maintenance of relatively high levels of employment and output, mainly in the service industries, during the second and third quarters. Tourist expenditures in Canada by non-residents, included in the statistics relating to exports of services, expanded very sharply during the Expo period, while tourist expenditures by Canadians in Canada were also above normal levels.

Other sources of strength in 1967 which overshadowed the cyclical weaknesses were a strong merchandise export performance, the continued very large increases in expenditures by governments, and the recovery of residential construction from its 1966 levels. These demand factors were accompanied by further increases in employment, which arose partly from uninterrupted advances in the number of women at work, and partly from higher immigration. The growth in the labour force slowed significantly after mid-1967, reflecting the reduced rate of growth in non-farm employment which began to show at the end of the first quarter.

Developments in the first two quarters of 1968 have been dominated by the continued strength of these factors. Consumer expenditures and labour income both recorded substantial gains in this period, while exports of goods and services advanced at an exceptional rate. Government sector expenditures have continued to increase. In conjunction with the mild cyclical changes discussed above, these factors have thus led to fairly strong quarterly increases in the various national accounts income and expenditure totals. However, the employment increases accompanying this growth in output have fallen short of the rapid growth in the labour force. Accordingly, the seasonally-adjusted unemployment rate has risen, and in mid-1968 it was running at about five per cent of the labour force.

The Canadian economy at the present time therefore has the physical capability of continuing on a sustained period of growth. Having regard to the continued large increases in money incomes still occurring, current cost and price developments are of crucial importance. The price pressures generated by the 1965–66 boom, although lessening somewhat, have persisted throughout the period of adjustment. Accordingly, the extent to which sustained growth may occur must be viewed against the problem of price and cost stability.

Gross national product rose by 6.8 per cent during 1967 to an annual level of $62.1 billion, and, with prices increasing by 3.9 per cent, real GNP rose by 2.8 per cent. In the first half of 1968, the value of GNP rose by 6.8 per cent compared to the same period a year earlier; price advances of 3.3 per cent reduced the gain in real terms to 3.5 per cent.

The income side of the 1967 accounts reflected a large fall in the accrued net income of farm operators from the record 1966 level, which made a difference of approximately one per cent on the overall GNP gain. The statistical assumption of return to a normal crop in 1968 was responsible for a sharp rise in farm income between the fourth and first quarters. The final effect of weather on the 1968 prairie grain crop is not yet reflected in the national accounts. The more moderate pace of advance in the non-farm economy in 1967 compared to 1966 was accompanied by a smaller increase in aggregate labour income, although the advance was still large, while corporation profits in 1967 fell fractionally after a virtually flat year in 1966. (Details on income developments are shown in reference tables 2 to 5, beginning on page 76).

On the expenditure side, personal expenditure on goods and services by Canadians (excluding expenditures in Canada by foreign visitors) advanced by over eight per cent in 1967. (Expenditure details are summarized in reference tables 6 to 15). Though fractionally less than that of 1966, this advance provided steady support for the economy through the year. (Statistical adjustments made to separate expenditures made by foreign visitors from those made by Canadians may have led to some understatement of consumer outlays on services in the second and third quarters, and hence to an overstatement of the advance in the fourth quarter). Total outlays, however, made stronger gains in these quarters than in either the first or fourth. First half 1968 gains in current dollar personal outlays were strong.

Government expenditures have continued to rise. However, the 1967 advance for all governments combined, at just under ten per cent, was much more moderate than the 17 per cent rise of 1966. The slowing down was greater at the federal level than at the provincial-municipal. In the first half of 1968, a further rise of 7.9 per cent occurred, compared to the same period a year earlier.

Exports were a major source of strength in 1967 as a whole. Tourist expenditures are included with exports of services, and made a very notable contribution to the general level of economic activity during the summer months. Exports of goods were higher in the year by over one billion dollars, or around ten per cent; about three-quarters of the increase reflected higher shipments of automotive products, largely balanced by imports of such products. Further strong gains in exports have occurred during the first eight months of 1968.

Business expenditure on plant and equipment declined by three per cent in 1967. This development, after three successive years in which unusually large annual increases of 20, 20 and 21 per cent respectively occurred, acted significantly to moderate the excessive pressures in some areas, notably construction, which had built up since mid-1965. At the same time, a very marked drop occurred in accumulation of non-farm business inventories; the final quarter of 1967 saw a remarkable swing of nearly one billion dollars, from accumulation of $684 million to an inventory rundown of $312 million, expressed at annual rates. Changes in the business sector in the first half of 1968 include a 10.5 per cent gain, at annual rates, in expenditure on plant and equipment over the second half 1967 level, substantially reversing the decline which had taken place in 1967. Non-farm business inventories were virtually unchanged in the half year.

Output, Employment and Productivity

The gain in real domestic product¹ excluding agriculture in 1967 amounted to 3.6 per cent. Because of the sharp drop in the prairie wheat crop, which returned to more normal levels after the record crop of 1966, total real product rose by only 2.7 per cent. The number of persons at work in the non-agricultural economy rose by 3.2 per cent in the year, and for the first time since 1954 there was an increase in farm employment. The labour force as a whole, employed and unemployed, rose by 3.7 per cent, all of this increase representing jobs in the total service sector. Because employment increased less rapidly than the labour force, the unemployment rate for the year rose.

Changes in employment in the different sectors, in conjunction with changes in output, provide the indications of changes in output per man (productivity) shown in reference tables 25 and 26. In the year as a whole, and in the private non-farm economy as a whole, productivity rose by 1.3 per cent from the preceding year.

This figure, which is below the long-term trend, partly reflected a shift in the pattern of output, of which a larger share was contributed by the service industries where the level of productivity per person employed is low, or for which the conventional statistical measurements are inadequate. On the other hand, there was a rise in productivity in manufacturing during the course of the year as employers reduced their labour force while output was rising.

The combination of income and production figures provides an indication of cost changes. Wage costs per unit of output continued to increase in 1967, both for manufacturing and for the entire economy. Profits per unit of output continued to decline in 1967, although less sharply than in 1966. This trend persisted in spite of the widespread price advance of 1967.

In the first two quarters of 1968, despite strikes in the automotive and other industries, real domestic product rose at an annual rate of 3.9 per cent from the last half of 1967. Productivity across the total commercial non-agricultural economy was unchanged in the first quarter, but improved in manufacturing and construction. The pattern in the second quarter was much the same.

Wage settlements under collective bargaining continue to record very large increases in base rates and other benefits. Increases in average hourly earnings for the country as a whole have been somewhat smaller but are affected by these settlements.

Prices

Prices continued to advance at unacceptable rates in 1967 and the first half of 1968. The average of the Consumer Price Index in 1967 rose by 3.5 per cent over the average 1966 level, which compares with the 3.7 per cent rise the year before. However, in 1967 the food component changed little, while advances were widespread and strong in other non-durable and durable goods, and, particularly, in consumer services. It may also be noted that changes in sales taxes and property taxes contributed an estimated 0.8 per cent to the overall 1967 rise—nearly one-quarter of the total increase in consumer prices. The GNE deflator, which represents price changes in the economy as a whole, rose by 3.9 per cent over 1966 (4.5 per cent the previous year).

In the course of first eight months of 1968 the consumer price index has continued to moderate its rate of advance compared to each month a year earlier. Whereas in January the increase over a year earlier was 4.5 per cent, in August the increase was 3.4 per cent. As the months have passed the changing pattern of gains among components shows that housing costs have become the leading contributor. Shelter costs account for about 18 per cent of the consumer budget that is measured by the C.P.I. Consumer services excluding shelter, which showed the largest advance in the previous twelve months, are now advancing somewhat less rapidly. Food prices in August were 1.6 per cent higher than a year earlier.

Review of 1967 Expectations

The government in early 1967 anticipated some slowdown in the rate of growth for the year, which led it to relax some of the restraints which had earlier been imposed, particularly those affecting investment expenditures by the business sector, and to introduce measures to encourage residential construction. These adjustments appear in retrospect to have been appropriate. The continued increase in government expenditures, and the continuation of unduly high price and wage increases, led to proposals in the Budget of November 30, 1967, for certain tax increases to take effect late in 1967 and early in 1968.

With regard to the balance of payments, 1967 exports of goods and services to the United States were higher than had been foreseen. As expected, imports rose considerably less than in the preceding year.

As a result of these developments, the current external deficit (on a national accounts basis) registered a sharp decline to some $670 million from the 1966 total of $1,230 million.

The combined expenditures of all governments on goods and services rose rather more than had been expected, partly owing to continued strong pay and price advances in this sector. Residential starts, earlier foreseen as being in the region of 160,000 for the year, actually amounted to 164,000. About 63,000 of these were financed by NHA mortgages, 65,000 by conventional mortgages, and the balance by other means, such as "non-institutional" and personal lending. Outlays on business plant and equipment, according to the early-1967 outlook, would decline by "under one per cent", but in fact a decline of just over three per cent occurred. This decline in value resulted partly from the accelerated removal of federal sales tax on production machinery and equipment, which caused an actual price decline in the middle two quarters, and from the continued moderation in the rate of increase of non-residential building prices. As expected, the mild cyclical pause did not on this occasion cause further downward revisions in business investment intentions at the time of the midyear review; moreover, the rather unexpected degree of credit stringency which developed during the year also failed to bring about any significant reduction of the 1967 programme. As it turned out, early 1967 expectations that total private and public capital expenditures would level off in the year were borne out by events.

The increase in labour income was about as expected, although costs and prices rose slightly more, and non-farm employment rose slightly less, than expected.

It was observed that corporation profits are related to trends in costs, prices and productivity, and for the year of adjustment in 1967, corporation profits declined slightly. However, for some quarters now profits have been increasing.

Outlook from mid-1968 to mid-1969

A rapid increase in GNP in the first two quarters of 1968 is expected to give way to more moderate rates of increase in the third and fourth quarters of the current year. While it is too early as yet to forecast the full year 1969, there are indications that moderate rates of growth will persist in the first half of 1969.

Canada's economic growth over the next twelve months will depend in part on economic conditions in the United States and certain overseas countries. The U.S. economy passed through a period of very rapid expansion in the first half of 1968 and is now expected to experience less expansion in the second half of the current year and in the first half of 1969. This expectation is based in part on the effects of the tax increases in June of this year which, together with federal government expenditure cutbacks, will combine to exert a considerable degree of restraint in coming months. In the light of these changes, unofficial projections show forthcoming rates of increase in total real output at about two per cent per annum in the United States in the year ending mid-1969.

In other industrial countries also, a slower rate of growth is expected for late 1968 and early 1969. In the United Kingdom, continued efforts to check domestic demand and imports, and to curb continued price and wage increases, are expected to be accompanied by a modest increase in real output. Japan is expected to slow down from the very high rates of growth of over ten per cent per annum in real output that have been achieved in the recent past. France is confronted with large wage and price pressures as a result of events in May; there exists some margin of unused resources in that country, but potential price and cost problems make it difficult to judge the extent of increases in real output. Recent favourable output and export trends in Germany are expected to continue in the coming year but at slightly reduced rates.

For the combined economies of all countries belonging to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), which includes Canada and the U.S.A. as well as European countries and Japan, an expansion of only three per cent in real output is expected in the second half of 1968, compared with over five per cent in the first half. This reduced rate of growth is common to nearly all member countries of OECD, and is expected to continue in the first half of 1969.

There are a number of important differences between the Canadian and U.S. situations which combine to suggest that the expected slowdown in expansion will be less marked in Canada than in the United States. One significant difference between the two countries is that price and cost pressures have already begun to ease in Canada, whereas they have been accelerating in the United States. Another difference is that Canadian inventory accumulation has been negligible or negative for some time past, while there has been a large accumulation in the United States. A moderate degree of inventory accumulation should now contribute to overall demand strength in Canada. Further, the mid-year investment intentions survey in Canada indicates a small improvement over earlier surveys. In contrast to declines in business investment in 1967, small increases in value are now beginning to take place. Business investment is expected to be up about three per cent in the current year, and the total of public and private investment is expected to increase six per cent. Unlike the situation in the United States, where official surveys indicate a deceleration of business investment during 1968, the Canadian investment outlook appears to be one of continued if modest improvement. Offsetting to some extent these favourable developments, Canada's exports to the United States cannot be expected to maintain the rapid rate of increase attained in the first eight months of the current year.

The housing outlook is also favourable, with the high level of housing outlays in 1968 likely to be exceeded in the coming year. The tension in the capital market has eased somewhat in recent months, and since business investment requirements are only moderate, there should exist both the physical and financial capacity to create more new housing accommodation in the coming year. Outlays on goods and services by governments at all levels, although moderating in the past year, are again expected to increase faster than total output of the economy.

The largest expenditure category, accounting for well over half of GNP, is that of personal expenditure on goods and services. These outlays have been sustained by the continued rapid increases in personal disposable income referred to earlier. Although consumer price increases until comparatively recently were in excess of four per cent per annum, the latest figures on the Consumer Price Index have indicated some easing in the rate of advance. Thus, the substantial increases in real disposable income and in the real volume of consumption of recent years are expected to continue in the coming year and to constitute a sustaining force in total effective demand.

On the supply side, the labour force has been augmented recently by a very large number of young people leaving school and by continued increase in the proportion of women working. As noted, rapid increases in both labour force and total employment took place in the summer of 1968, but unemployment also grew, mainly as a result of the very large influx of students seeking jobs during the summer months. Some of these students returned to school in September, while others have found jobs and will remain in the labour force. The enlarged technical and vocational training facilities for these students, as well as re-training and mobility programmes for older workers, will contribute to the efficiency of the labour force growth in the coming year. The period of most rapid acceleration in labour force growth may have been reached in 1967, but Canada in 1969 will still have one of the highest labour force growth rates among the industrial countries of the world.

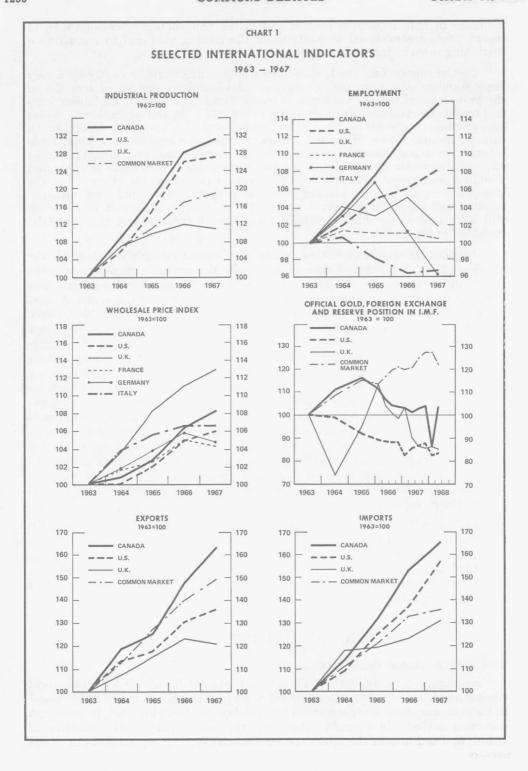

Another factor of importance relating to Canada's supply capability is the physical stock of plant and equipment. While the available measures of plant and equipment capacity are inadequate, there are at least some indications that capacity utilization rates are now not far below normal for the economy as a whole. The reduced rate of investment expenditure in 1967 and 1968, while modest increases in output were continuing, suggests that excess capacity is not extensive. The recent increase in investment intentions, as reported in the midyear survey, tends to confirm this view. It may be concluded that future increases in real demand and output will increasingly call forth new additions to capacity in the form of investments in plant and equipment. Since the long-term relationship between the stock of physical capital and real output has not changed significantly, it can be expected that increases in real output will require approximately similar rates of increase in the stock of capital; this situation is approximated when new investment and output advance at similar rates. Recent small improvements in corporation profits, which tend as a statistical series to lead that of new expenditures on plant and equipment, are consistent with the view that a moderate expansion of new investment, in line with sales and output, might be expected in the coming year.

The overall demand and supply picture suggests a rate of increase in GNP over the next nine to twelve months not much different from that of 1968 as a whole, compared to that of 1967. However, more of the increase should be in quantity, and less in prices, than in 1967 and 1968. The significant easing of interest rates apparent since the exchange crisis of last spring, which is described in detail later in this paper, should assist in this advance.

THE WORLD ENVIRONMENT

The International Economy

Economic developments in Canada are profoundly affected by the world environment. Because exports represent a very substantial part of total demand in Canada, events in other countries can quickly affect employment, incomes and economic activity in Canada. This country, too, is particularly sensitive to strains and tensions in the international financial system; capital flows in or out 29180—80 of Canada, whether of domestic or foreign origin, can be of such magnitude relative to Canada's economy as to pose difficult problems of economic management.

The economy of the western world in 1967 recorded a definite slow-down in growth as compared with 1966.

In the North American hemisphere this weakening occurred in the course of the longest period of expansion since the war. Signs of strain had been in evidence since the second half of 1965 and were aggravated by expansion of inventories in 1966. Mounting pressures on prices and costs then began to erode profits, resulting in some decline in the volume of private investment from the beginning of the fourth quarter of 1966.

The U.S. economy in 1967 went through two clearly defined phases. In the first half of the year there were two dominant factors: a temporary check to growth and growing concern about inflation. The inflationary and financial pressures had as their basis the unusually high budgetary deficit, the slow-down in tax revenue receipts, and the resultant heavy government borrowings in the capital market. In the second half of 1967, continued increases in military expenditures and the failure of Congress to act upon the President's proposal for tax increases aggravated the inflationary atmosphere. From July onwards renewed expansion of the economy was clearly evident as a result of the renewed accumulation of inventories; furthermore, consumer demand was firm, especially for durable goods, and housing construction moved up sharply.

Quarterly movements in the U.S. gross national product reflected these trends. In the first three months of 1967 GNP advanced only slightly; in the second quarter of the year the progress was somewhat more marked, but beginning in the third quarter GNP resumed relatively rapid growth, accelerating again in the first two quarters of 1968. The fiscal restraints upon income which came into force from July 1968 are expected to slow down economic activity in the two last quarters of 1968, contributing both to the stabilization of costs and prices and to better external balance.

The balance of payments, despite a certain improvement in capital flows from the U.S. point of view, remains in deficit because of the deterioration in the merchandise trade balance. Exports appear to be rising rather more rapidly in 1968 than in 1967, but merchandise imports are expected to grow even more rapidly.

In the United Kingdom, 1967 was a year of growing crisis. The war in the Middle East, the world-wide rise in interest rates, and the dockers' strike all reinforced the country's economic difficulties, while the need to restore stability in the payments position became increasingly more pressing. The November 1967 devaluation of the pound and the strengthening of the measures of reform were intended both to bring about a better balance in the British economy and to restore the balance of payments.

The course of economic events in the United Kingdom in 1967 had made such steps unavoidable. The growth rate of gross domestic product for the year as a whole was only a little over one per cent, while the overall production index had remained almost stationary since 1966. Unemployment had risen from a level of one per cent of the labour force in the second quarter of 1966 to reach 2.4 per cent in the third quarter of 1967. Moreover, in 1967 exports declined while imports increased.

Developments in the U.K. economy resulting from the combination of devaluation and anti-inflationary measures were expected to lead to a rapid improvement in the balance of payments and to increase Britain's share of international trade. An increase of 4.5 per cent in industrial production was forecast for 1968, with total economic growth expected to be about three per cent. Observers expect that the increase in activity will be in non-consumption sectors

In the European Economic Community, the levelling-off in economic growth which began in mid-1966 continued throughout the first six months of 1967. Despite signs of recovery in the majority of member countries from the beginning of the third quarter, the growth figure of about 2.5 per cent for 1967 is still the lowest since 1958. A sustained growth in the Italian and Dutch economies was not sufficient to make up for the recession in Germany.

The easing in the EEC countries brought some easing in the European labour market and on the whole a slackening in the escalation of costs and prices. Since mid-1967, the cyclical trough, signs of a recovery have been increasingly in evidence, especially in the economy of the Federal German Republic. This acceleration of economic activity, through its effect on trade within the community, will be a dynamic element in the growth of other member countries. In France, judgments about the extent of price, cost and output changes this year have been obscured by the events of the spring.

Having regard to all these circumstances, it is generally accepted that the level of economic activity in the Community as a whole will be higher in 1968 than in 1967.

In Japan, the economic growth rate over the past ten years has averaged ten per cent. In 1967 it was more than 13 per cent. The rapid growth of 1967 had the effect of increasing demand for imported products, and added to existing pressure on the capital markets. In order to moderate this steep rate of growth and improve the balance of payments, the Bank of Japan increased the Bank rate in 1967 and again in 1968 and has limited loans by the chief banks. In addition, the government found itself obliged to postpone a great many public investment projects. In 1968 the growth of the economy is therefore expected to be much reduced from the 1967 rate.

The year 1967 thus saw financial constraints affecting economic activity in many countries. Indeed, there was persistent and prolonged pressure on international capital markets. Within countries there was a bidding-up of the price of money between the public and private sectors on the one hand, and between individual borrowers on the other. The resulting increase in interest rates became world-wide through international transactions. Due to inflationary expectations this condition persisted in spite of slack in most countries. Cyclical credit contraction is customarily short and sharp, and is followed by a decline in interest rates, but the adjustment, due to the intense competition for funds and problems of confidence, was slow to develop in 1968. However, some easing of interest rates has occurred in recent months.

Problems of the International Financial System

The international monetary arrangements developed since the second world war have, on the whole, worked well, making it possible for world trade to grow at an unprecedented rate. It has been apparent for some time, however, that fundamental changes in the existing arrangements would be necessary during the foreseeable future if world trade was to continue to expand rapidly. The knowledge of the imminent need for such a change and the uncertainty as to the form that it might take have therefore had an unsettling effect on the international financial community during recent years.

The essence of the problem concerns the future growth of international reserves with which to finance a growing volume of world trade. During the post-war period these reserves, i.e. the total of countries' holdings of gold, foreign exchange, and certain types of claims on the International Monetary Fund, grew much less rapidly than the volume of world trade which they helped to finance. This was made possible by the increased efficiency of the system due to improved co-operation between monetary authorities, and by the redistribution of reserve assets from the United States to other countries, particularly in Europe.

The dominant element in the growth of international reserves during the period has been the accumulation of reserve currencies, particularly U.S. dollars, by the monetary authorities of other countries. Claims on the International Monetary Fund, though growing more rapidly in relative terms, were much less significant in absolute terms because of their narrow base. Finally, although gold has continued to be by far the largest component of total reserves, yearly additions to official reserves from newly mined production were increasingly less significant in the overall picture and in the past couple of years gold has actually flowed out of official reserves into private hands.

The accumulation of U.S. dollars by other countries had been a welcome development during most of the fifties, when foreign monetary authorities were still intent on restoring their depleted foreign exchange reserves. As this process neared completion, however, the continuation by the United States on a substantial scale of a deficit on international transactions became a cause for concern, heightened by the already existing chronic balance of payments problems of the United Kingdom, the other major reserve currency country.

Thus it became essential to confidence in the international monetary system for the United States and Britain to bring their payments into balance. But success would have meant that the reserve currencies would thereby cease to be a significant source of liquidity growth, and it was most improbable that this would be completely offset by further increases in gold holdings and claims on the IMF. Consequently, to help ensure a healthy continued growth of world trade, a major international effort was begun to develop a plan for the creation of a new reserve asset that would be subject to rational control in an established international forum. Studies and negotiations directed towards this end were carried out during the four years preceding 1967. During this period recurrent disturbances occurred which underlined the seriousness of the situation and the need to develop a contingency plan.

The growing unwillingness of some countries to increase further their holdings of reserve currencies meant that financial flows, the counterpart of real economic activities such as international trade and investment in productive plant and equipment, became the target of selective restrictive measures by both surplus and deficit countries. While these measures have included statutory or "guideline" directives aimed at specific activities, they also have taken the form of the traditional means of affecting the volume and direction of capital flows, that is, changes in interest rates and in the availability of capital funds for use in international financial transactions. Competitive reliance on the interest rate as a means of controlling international capital flows, and the entry of speculators into the picture at times of particular stress, thus became increasingly a feature of the international economy during the middle sixties. Speculation contributed heavily to world currency pressures in both 1967 and 1968.

During the spring and summer of 1967 the British pound remained under intermittent pressure which became persistent after the Middle East crisis. Despite major support operations mounted by the IMF, the Bank for International Settlements and individual central banks, pressure on the pound became overwhelming during November, and a 14.3 per cent devaluation took place on November 18. At the same time the Bank of England Bank Rate was increased from 6½ to 8 per cent and the government announced a series of deflationary measures. It is a credit to international co-operation that no major trading nation followed the British devaluation and its unsettling effect was thus minimized.

The devaluation of the pound deflected bearish sentiments against the U.S. dollar and a run into gold began which was to cost the United States $2.4 billion of gold in the five months beginning in November 1967 and ending in March 1968. Pressure on the capital markets in the United States during most of 1967 remained intense and towards the end of the year long term rates reached their highest level in over 40 years. A worsening U.S. balance of payments deficit, the failure of Congress to act on the Administration's proposal for temporary tax surcharges on personal and corporate incomes, and the devaluation of the pound with its consequences for the U.S. dollar all tended to worsen the U.S. financial markets. Consequently, long-term rates reached still higher levels in March 1968 and short-term rates continued their steep climb which had begun in mid-1967.

These interest rate developments, with increases in one country feeding on increases in another, had certain economic repercussions in Canada in 1967 and 1968. While domestic factors affecting the cost and availability of capital to some Canadian borrowers were of primary importance, the international situation exacerbated the problem.

At the annual meeting of the IMF which took place at Rio de Janiero in September 1967, the Governors gave their approval to the outline of a proposal to establish a new facility in the IMF for the creation of a new reserve asset. The new asset, referred to as Special Drawing Rights (SDR), will supplement, rather than replace, existing reserve assets and will be used in transactions between monetary authorities alone and in conjunction with "traditional" reserve assets. This facility will permit the orderly expansion of monetary reserves, and machinery has been set in motion in many member countries to secure the necessary legislative authority for participation in the new arrangements.

These long-term developments, however, had little immediate impact on world financial difficulties in late 1967, and the new pressures building up against the U.S. dollar following the devaluation of sterling led the President, on January 1, 1968, to introduce a stringent new balance of payments program intended to bring about a major improvement in the U.S. balance of payments. Its main provisions were directed at reducing direct investment outflows, increasing the repatriation of funds by U.S. subsidiaries abroad and discouraging U.S. tourists from travelling outside the western hemisphere.

In the absence of any headway in Congress on the President's long-delayed tax proposal to reduce the budgetary deficit, the President's announcement failed to have any lasting effect towards restoring confidence in the U.S. dollar and hence in the system as a whole. Instead, speculation again developed shortly after the New Year, directed against the Canadian dollar and certain other currencies and a little later spilling over into a renewal of massive speculative and hedging activities in the gold market. Gold losses from international reserves became so large by March 17, 1968, exceeding $3 billion since the devaluation of sterling in November, that the Gold Pool ceased to support the private gold market and established a "two-tier" price system. Under this arrangement the former Gold Pool members agreed that henceforth officially-held gold should be used only to effect transfers among monetary authorities, and therefore they decided no longer to supply gold to the London gold market or any other gold market. Moreover, since the existing stock of monetary gold was sufficient in view of the prospective establishment of the IMF Special Drawing Rights facility, they no longer felt it necessary to buy gold from the market. Finally, they agreed that henceforth they would not sell gold to monetary authorities to replace gold sold in private markets. The subsequent settling of the "free" gold price at only a moderate premium over the official price was instrumental in reducing speculative activity very markedly.

At the end of March the remaining aspects of the SDR proposal still outstanding were settled at a meeting in Stockholm of Ministers of Finance and Central Bank Governors of the Group of Ten. Whereas the establishment of the two-tier gold system had been intended to solve an immediate problem, the Stockholm meeting had a reassuring effect by illustrating the progress being made towards a long-term solution to the problem of ensuring the adequacy of international liquidity.

The progress thus made on both of these fronts substantially reduced the earlier crisis atmosphere in the international monetary system. Further progress in this direction was made in June 1968 with the long awaited passage of the U.S. tax bill. Passage of the tax surcharge legislation was taken by foreign observers as a real indication of the U.S. determination to restore confidence in the U.S. dollar, and as such was influential in further restoring order in the system.

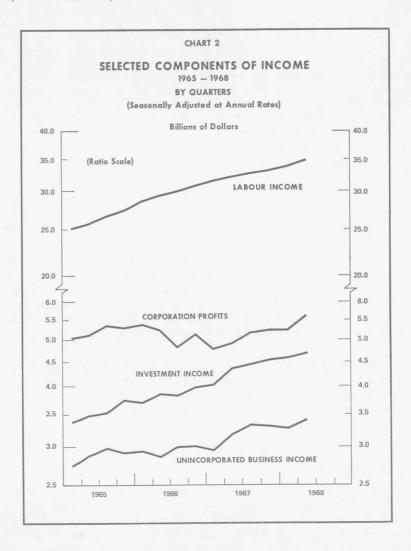

The response of the Canadian financial system to these events is discussed in detail in a later section. The process of the 1967 readjustment and continued growth of the economy which took place within this framework of events is now reviewed, in some detail, in the following pages.

READJUSTMENT 1967 and 1968

Income Developments

In 1967 as a whole the growth in aggregate wages, salaries and supplementary labour income moderated from the exceptionally rapid rate of 1966, and in the first half of 1968 the more moderate trend continued. (Statistical details are set out in reference tables 2 and 3). This slower rate of growth principally reflected a less rapid increase in employment, as average earnings of employed workers have continued to advance sharply. Average weekly hours worked in many industries were marginally less throughout 1967 than in 1966, and have shown no widespread tendency to increase in 1968.

The levelling-off in construction activity, after the sharp increases of 1965 and 1966, brought about a decline in employment and a much smaller advance in average income per employee in this sector (see reference table 4). In manufacturing, employment was virtually unchanged while average incomes slightly accelerated their advance. Among the service industries trends were mixed. On the whole, the increase in average earnings in 1967 exceeded that of the previous year mainly by reason of the substantial advances agreed upon in new labour contracts, which have had a growing impact upon employee remuneration across entire industrial sectors, although the greater degree of slack in the labour market, reviewed below, slowed the advances in certain service industries.

Corporation profits before taxes, which declined fractionally in 1966, recorded a further decline in 1967. A substantial recovery occurred during the first half of 1968, although labour contract disputes in some industries make it difficult to assess the actual underlying strength of the profit position. In manufacturing, the profit pattern overall was one of slow improvement from the low point reached in the first quarter of 1967, with declines in some industries being offset by advances in others (see reference table 5). The mining group recorded good gains in almost all quarters, but trends were mixed in the service, trade and other non-manufacturing groups. Over the year, and continuing into 1968, the transportation, storage and communication group showed persistent hesitancy; but wholesale and retail trade together, after a slower year in 1967, recorded stronger profits during the early part of the present year.

Corporate profits before taxes in the first half of 1968 represented 11.1 per cent of net national income. In 1967 as a whole they amounted to 10.8 per cent; in recent years, the share of corporate profits in the total reached a peak of 13.6 per cent in 1964, and since then it has been declining.

Net income of non-farm unincorporated business, after advancing slightly in 1966, picked up strength as 1967 were on and achieved a year-over-year gain of over eight per cent. This group, which includes a large number of small enterprises engaged in construction activity, again showed growing strength towards the mid-year mark in 1968. Interest, dividends and other property income has advanced rapidly in 1967 and 1968, partly due to the relatively high interest rates and rising rentals prevalent during this period.

Expenditure Trends

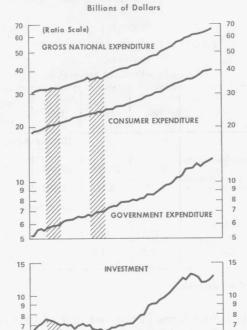

On the expenditure side, as on the income side, some components have revealed cyclical characteristics over the past eighteen months. Similarly, however, this mild recessionary pattern has been almost totally obscured by the continuation of strong expansionary trends in other forces of demand, and by the impact of the special events of Centennial year. In the aggregate, therefore, expenditures have grown at rates which, while more moderate than those of 1966, have remained strong. Quarterly expenditure developments are set out in detail in reference tables 6 and 7, and depicted graphically in Chart 3.

CHANGE IN BUSINESS INVENTORIES

Among the expenditures revealing mild cyclical features, business fixed capital outlays including housing have been the most important. On a national accounts basis, a decline of about one per cent in value and four per cent in volume occurred in this sector in 1967 as a whole; the quarterly pattern for total investment expenditure showed small but almost uninterrupted declines from mid-1966 to end-1967; strengthening in this sector now is apparent although some of this represents higher costs. (These developments are shown in Chart 4). The movement of business expenditure on plant and equipment reveals even more sharply a cyclical-type pattern. This component reached a peak in the fourth quarter of 1966, and fell to its trough in the fourth quarter of 1967, since when it has again moved up. It may be observed that as the actual decline in this component was of such modest proportions the recovery would not have to be very sharp to resume an appropriate long-term trend.

Housing expenditures, too, showed a cyclical pattern. Conditions in the financial markets brought about a very marked decrease in the funds available for mortgage investment in 1966, and residential construction outlays fell through that year from a first-quarter peak. This trend was sharply reversed in 1967, and quarterly gains were substantial until some hesitation again became apparent in late 1967 and early 1968. Growth in this expenditure component has been re-established following a high level of new starts early in the present year. The recent pattern of housing starts is shown in Chart 19, on page 60.

Another indication of the cyclical nature of recent capital expenditure may be found in the changing composition of the programme. Thus, at a peak period of business expansion the contribution of business capital expenditure to the total rises to a maximum. The share of governments and housing becomes more significant at times of slower growth. Recent trends are set forth in table 3 and depicted graphically in Chart 5.

The full nature of this readjustment in capital expenditures may be brought out by placing the changes which have occurred into a longer-term context, and by consideration both of the capital stock position and the impact of financial strains upon the liquidity of Canadian corporations. The timing of some investment activity, too, was governed by non-economic factors.

The slight decline of business capital expenditures in 1967 and the modest reversal in 1968 has represented a relatively smooth adjustment following several years of extremely rapid growth up to 1966. Indeed, the rate of growth of capital expenditures from 1961 to 1966 was about 40 per cent greater than that of GNP. This high rate of growth was not sustainable in the long run; by the end of 1966, the capital stock of the economy was adequate for current levels of output and, in general, there was no excess capacity.

From this viewpoint, the recent slower pace of business investment, which has been in fact nothing more severe than a levelling-off, sharply contrasts with the situation following the 1955–57 investment boom. On that occasion the boom had continued over-long, excess capacity had been built up, and total capital expenditures fell sharply and remained at low levels relative to GNP for many years thereafter, as indicated in table 2 and reference table 12.

The impact of financial constraints on business capital expenditures has taken the form of hesitation in making new plans rather than in failure to complete projects begun earlier. Some major developments in which large-scale financing plays a part have been stretched out, including some major hydroelectric projects. These financial developments have also been reflected in the postponement of some institutional construction. Finally, it should be borne in mind that 1966 saw the virtual completion of a number of major projects whose timing had reflected particular circumstances; among these were some large paper mills in British Columbia.

Among the other components of expenditure, non-farm business inventories also have displayed cyclical characteristics. Accumulation rose to peak rates in mid-1966, after which quarterly gains were more moderate. However, inventory levels remained high throughout most of 1967 until an actual decline occurred in the final quarter. In the first half of 1968 there has been virtually no accumulation of inventories.

Among the expenditure components showing continued expansion, consumer outlays have been an important sustaining force. The growth has been rapid during the last four years, with an annual growth rate averaging somewhat more than eight per cent; this rate was maintained during the first half of 1968. However, as the annual increase in consumer prices advanced from 1.6 per cent in 1964 to more than three per cent in 1967, the growth in real terms has declined from a very high rate of 6.3 per cent in 1964 (when economic slack was being taken up) to an annual rate of 4.8 per cent in 1967. This latter rate was approximately maintained in the first quarter of 1968, although a rather lower rate developed in the second.

Consumer expenditure on durable goods increased by nearly five per cent in 1967. A price increase of over $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent reduced the real growth to two per cent. The $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent price increase was in contrast to virtually unchanged prices for consumer durables over the previous several years. The quarterly pattern of these expenditures has been erratic, as is typical of this volatile element of personal spending, and has continued to be irregular in 1968.

In real terms, 1967 personal expenditure on non-durable goods increased by over seven per cent while the volume of expenditures on services grew at less than three per cent. Part of this sharp divergence in real growth rates was related to the statistical treatment of very large 1967 expenditures by foreign tourists, to which reference has already been made. This adjustment, which was large in Centennial year, is conventionally attributed to personal expenditure on services, when in fact some of the expenditures were for purchases of non-durable goods.

Expenditures on goods and services by governments have also been a major element within the total demand pattern. The federal, provincial and municipal governments together increased their outlays by just under ten per cent in 1967 from the 1966 level. While this advance represented a sharply reduced rate of growth from the gains of the two previous years (in 1966 the advance was around 17½ per cent), the share of the government sector in gross national expenditure has continued to increase. Thus, in 1967 and the first half of 1968 government purchases of goods and services represented some 20 per cent of total national expenditures; the ratios were 19.4 and 18.4 per cent in 1966 and 1965 respectively.

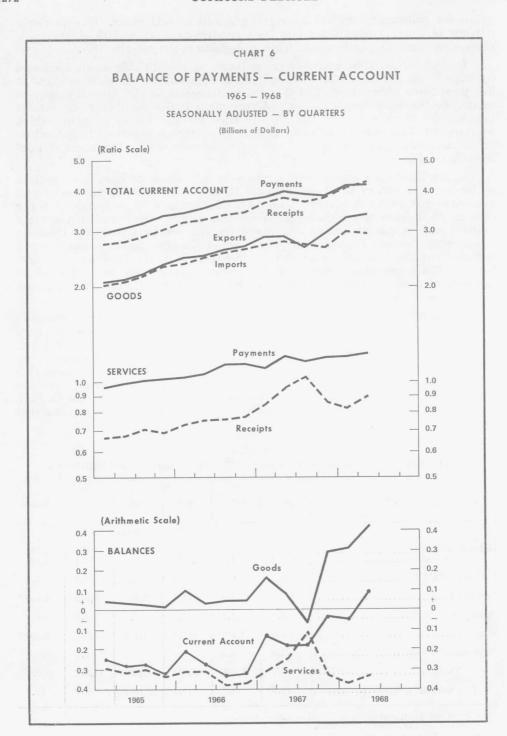

Purchases of goods and services by provincial and municipal governments form about two-thirds of all government expenditure on goods and services. These rose by 10.2 per cent in 1967. During the first half of 1968 they reached an annual rate of $8,740 million, some 9.5 per cent above the corresponding period in 1967. Federal outlays on non-defence goods and services rose 11.0 per cent in 1967 and 7.6 per cent in the first half of 1968. A smaller rise in defence outlays reduced the growth in total federal purchases to 8.6 per cent in 1967 and 4.9 per cent in the first half of 1968. These developments are summarized in table 5.

The expansion of demand for the type of services provided by government is of course related to the rapid growth in the economy and the increasing complexity caused by urbanization, rising demand for technological skills and continuing rapid gains in population and labour force. These changes also have had an impact on government capital investment, which similarly has increased rapidly as outlays on such things as transportation facilities and schools have become greater. In 1965 and 1966, fixed capital formation by all governments increased by close to 20 per cent annually; in 1967 and during the first half of 1968 this receded to an increase of around eight per cent, but this still represents a growth rate of almost twice the average recorded prior to 1965.

Foreign Trade and the Current Account of the Balance of Payments

On a national accounts basis, exports of goods and services, which comprise more than one-fifth of GNP, provided a considerable stimulus to the rapid economic expansion of the 1960s. With the exception of 1962 and 1965, they have increased more rapidly than GNP. This remained true in 1967, even though their growth in that year, at 12.3 per cent, was less than the 16.5 per cent gain of the preceding year. Strong quarter-to-quarter gains of 10.0 per cent and 3.7 per cent respectively were recorded in the first two quarters of 1968. In 1967 there was a 17 per cent increase in service receipts and a smaller growth of about 10 per cent in goods exports. The large increase in 1967 service receipts reflected greatly increased tourist receipts related to Expo '67 and Centennial year activities.

It is generally true that the current account deficit in the Canadian balance of payments tends to increase during an expansionary period, and to decline with a moderation in domestic demand. There are, however, sufficient non-cyclical factors present at all times either to obscure this relationship (as between 1962 and 1964) or to exaggerate the effect, as during the period of adjustment which was experienced in 1967.

On a balance of payments basis, the reduction in the current account to $543 million in 1967 owed over three-quarters to a swing in the travel account, but the contribution of merchandise transactions to the improvement was also substantial. As table 7 shows, Canadian expenditure on foreign goods and services in 1967 rose at less than half the rate of the previous year, in accordance with domestic economic conditions, and the more moderate growth in current payments was reflected in every account except inheritances and emigrants' funds.

Exports of merchandise, which rose more rapidly than imports of merchandise, led to an improvement in the merchandise balance. The smaller rate of increase in 1967 than in 1966 was a reflection of the generally less buoyant market conditions abroad in 1967. Towards the end of the year, however, there was a marked acceleration in economic activity in the United States and Europe, which had a very beneficial effect on the Canadian trade balance, as it coincided with a period of progressive deceleration in Canadian imports. The recovery in exports in the fourth quarter was linked with a number of special factors in the United States, which led to the first quarterly merchandise trade surplus with that country since 1951.

It is of interest to trace the substantial changes in exports throughout 1967 and 1968. A rapid growth in exports had begun in the fourth quarter of 1965 and continued into the first half of 1967. Wheat exports, despite large aid shipments to India in the second quarter, were barely above the level of a year earlier, but exports of automobiles and products were still running at twice the 1966 level and helped to maintain the momentum of the export expansion. Canadian shipments of goods other than wheat and automobiles were by mid-year still rising at the same rate as a year earlier, although the trend throughout the first half of the year had been clearly moderating. A slight deceleration in exports to the United States in the second quarter was largely offset by a recovery in shipments to the U.K., the European Economic Community, and elsewhere. Of particular strength throughout the first half of 1967 were exports to Japan and Australia.

The break in the trend occurred in the third quarter. With the close of the 1966–67 wheat season (and purchase agreements thereunder) at the end of July, wheat exports fell to less than 40 per cent of the 1966 level. Motor vehicle shipments continued to rise at a rapid rate in July and August, but from September onwards were affected by a strike in the United States which caused a shortage of parts in Canadian plants. Export of goods other than wheat and automobiles fell below the level of a year earlier in August and September, as exports to Europe and South Africa and Japan declined. Shipments to Japan, which until the end of July had maintained a level some 60 per cent higher than in the previous year, showed only eight per cent increases in August and September. Similarly, there was a sharp deceleration in exports to the United States which was only partly accounted for by the strike. Indeed, the third quarter levelling was remarkable for its pervasiveness. Isolated elements of strength were exports to Australia and the higher demand for Canadian petroleum arising out of the Middle East Crisis.

The recovery in exports in the fourth quarter was extraordinary in the sense that it occurred in the face of continued low levels of wheat exports and strike-affected export levels of automotive products. Other exports, however, rose about 13 per cent in the quarter. In part, this development was associated with a general strengthening of foreign demand, as the U.S. and European economies began to take on more buoyant characteristics; but the most dynamic elements of the fourth quarter export performance were copper and iron and steel. The former was affected by the prolonged copper strike in the United States, and the latter by hedging operations on the part of U.S. companies against a possible steel strike in the summer of 1968.

The deceleration in imports in the second half of the year was very pronounced. Imports of machinery, iron and steel and non-ferrous metals were all below the level of the previous year. Imports of motor vehicles and parts rose less rapidly than before, particularly in the fourth quarter. Imports of foodstuffs and consumer durables rose twice as rapidly as in 1966, and imports of aircraft and parts, and of petroleum from Venezuela, also increased.

In general, there was a progressive moderation in import demand for producer durables and certain raw materials, reflecting the adjustment to a lower rate of economic growth during 1967. The trade deficit for motor vehicles and parts declined by about $150 million, but this was more than offset by the $350 million shortfall in wheat and flour exports. The increase in the overall trade surplus was, therefore, due entirely to the turnabout in the balance on goods other than wheat and automobiles, from a deficit of over $300 million in 1966 to a substantial surplus in 1967. On a geographical basis, the major changes were an improvement in the bilateral trade balance with the United States, which was considerably larger than the reduction in the deficit on motor vehicles and parts alone, and a decline of about the same magnitude in the trade balance with the state-trading countries, which accounted for nearly the entire shortfall in wheat sales. There was a further improvement in the terms of trade, though not as pronounced as in 1966, which added approximately $155 million to the overall trade surplus in 1967.

In the first half of 1968, there was a further substantial improvement in the current account as a result of the large increase in the merchandise trade surplus. The deficit on non-merchandise transactions rose moderately in the first quarter due largely to higher payments of interest and dividends, and more rapidly in the second quarter as a result of the adjustment to more normal levels of tourist receipts from the corresponding quarter of last year. Canadian merchandise trade expanded rapidly during the first half of the year; exports of goods rose by $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, while the increase in imports was about 8 per cent. Many of the same factors which helped to bring about the recovery of exports in the fourth quarter were still operative in the first part of the current year. However, following the fiscal changes passed by the U.S. Congress in June, and with the settlement of labour problems in the U.S. steel and copper industries, it can be expected that U.S. purchases will be scaled down substantially in the second half of the year.

Exports to Italy and Japan have been declining, and the rate of shipments to the U.K., a feature of the recovery of exports in the fourth quarter, has also slackened. As a result, the accelerated export expansion during the first half of the current year has polarized increasingly on shipments to the United States.

Imports resumed their advance in the new year. The strong demand for consumer goods continued and imports of motor vehicles and parts bounded upward as the backlog of orders began to be filled, but imports of iron and steel and of machinery continued to decline. Despite this rise in imports, the merchandise trade surplus has increased to an annual rate of over one billion dollars, which is similar to the fourth quarter performance, but represents twice the level of the first six months of 1967. The deficit for motor vehicles and parts was about the same for both periods, while shipments of wheat were still nearly 30 per cent lower than in the first half of last year. The trade balance for other commodities, however, showed a surplus of nearly $400 million, compared to a deficit of over $60 million in 1967.

The Labour Force

The Canadian labour force in 1967 again grew at an exceptionally rapid rate compared to that of other industrialized countries of the free world. However, the actual increase of 3.7 per cent was slightly less than that of 1966, and the changes which occurred among the component groups were indicative of the adjustments taking place across the entire economy. These changes continued in the first half of 1968.

One of the clearest indicators of the slackened labour market pressure in 1967 was the turnaround in the movement of workers off the farms. The movement out of agriculture, which has been a feature of the entire postwar period, has characteristically accelerated during periods of rapid growth in the non-farm economy, and has been less marked during recession or periods of less rapid economic growth. The last occasion upon which an actual increase in the agricultural labour force occurred was during the brief but sharp recession of 1954; at that time, however, the labour force itself was growing at less than half its 1967 rate. The decline in the agricultural labour force resumed during the first half of 1968.

As table 8 indicates, the growth of the female labour force also experienced a change of pace in 1967, after a particularly sharp advance in 1966, and this slower pace has been accentuated in 1968. The actual 1967 increase, however, was still very substantial, as Expo and other Centennial activities created employment opportunities in a wide range of occupations of interest to women. Young people also, as their numbers continued to expand, were attracted into the labour market by the widespread demand for relatively unskilled and inexperienced workers.

The 1967 labour force growth reflected higher immigration than in 1966, although the inflow slowed during the later months of the year. The first half of 1968 also showed a reduced movement of newcomers into Canada compared to the first two quarters of 1967. Recent labour force trends are set out in detail in reference table 19, and the changes of recent years are shown in Chart 7.

Employment

Employment rose by 3.2 per cent in 1967 and advanced by a further 1.6 per cent in the first eight months of 1968. The rate of increase in employment thus has declined quite sharply from the 4.2 per cent peak of 1966, and has fallen short of the increase in the labour force in both 1967 and 1968.

⁽¹⁾ First eight months, compared to the same period in 1967.

In terms of numbers, employment rose by 227,000 in 1967 and a further 117,000 in the first eight months of 1968, or by 344,000 altogether in the twenty months. During this period, the total labour force increased by 468,000. The unemployment rate rose from an average of 3.6 per cent in 1966 to 4.1 per cent in 1967, and to 4.8 per cent in the first half of 1968. The unemployment rate for teenagers rose from 8.3 per cent in 1966 to 13.2 per cent in 1967, as the increase in teenage employment, although large, was not sufficient to absorb the extremely sharp increase in the teenage labour force.

Regional Employment Trends

By regions, the growth of labour force and employment continued the same broad pattern in 1967 and 1968 as occurred in 1966, although the cyclical changes and the impact of Expo influenced this pattern to some extent in 1967 (Chart 8). British Columbia has again shown the most rapid growth in labour force and employment. The year 1967 saw an exceptionally large movement of labour into the region, and employment also rose unusually rapidly. However, in common with other regions, British Columbia recorded a rise in the unemployment rate in 1967, and this has continued to rise in 1968 as employment gains have slowed down (see reference table 20 and Chart 9).

The Prairie region in 1967 experienced slower growth of both labour force and employment, possibly reflecting movement of workers to British Columbia. During the first half of 1968 signs of change became apparent, as the Prairie labour force (and particularly the non-farm labour force) climbed relatively sharply. Partially reflecting this, the Prairie region unemployment rate rose from the 1967 rate of 2.4 per cent to 3.4 per cent in 1968. At the same time, the flow of workers off the farms into the non-agricultural labour force, which had been temporarily arrested in 1967, resumed in 1968, as non-farm employment in this region returned to a more rapid rate of growth.

In Ontario, the total labour force reached a peak rate of expansion in 1967, with a gain of 4.2 per cent over 1966. The non-agricultural labour force slowed its rate of growth from the peak of the previous year, as the outflow of workers from agriculture slowed down here also. In 1968, as the economy has been readjusting from the activities of Centennial year, all the labour force components have shown smaller advances. Non-farm employment, which rose by 4.7 per cent in 1966 and 3.5 per cent in 1967, rose by 2.6 per cent in the first half of 1968 (compared to a year earlier). Labour force growth has fallen to 3.1 per cent. As a result, the unemployment rate, which had remained at 2.5 per cent in 1965 and 1966, rose to 3.1 per cent in 1967 and 3.6 per cent in the first half of 1968.

Developments in Quebec have been affected both by the impact of Expo in 1967 and by the readjustments which have followed. As in all other regions except British Columbia, the peak rate of growth in employment occurred in 1966, but the advance in 1967 was still very substantial, at 3.2 per cent. Partly as a reaction to this, Quebec recorded a small decline in employment in the first half of 1968 compared to a year earlier, and the growth in the labour force was only slight. The unemployment rate, despite the employment created by Expo and related activities, rose to 5.3 per cent in 1967, second only to the Atlantic region, and rose again to 6.4 per cent in the first half of 1968.

The Atlantic region has continued to record slower growth in employment than other regions except Quebec, and the regional participation rates also remain lower than elsewhere in Canada. In addition, although the Atlantic region currently is experiencing higher unemployment rates than was the case in 1967 it is noteworthy that the spread between the Atlantic rate and those in other regions has narrowed since 1965. Thus, although the readjustments now taking place in the economy are resulting in higher unemployment in all regions, the Atlantic provinces are not experiencing the relative worsening of their position that has been apparent in similar circumstances in the past.

Output, Productivity, Costs and Prices

The year 1967 was a period in which real output increased less rapidly, as capital investment outlays levelled off and the private non-farm sector completed some major expansion programmes. With continued rapid labour force growth and the emergence of a margin of reserve capacity, the pressures on resources which had become marked in 1966 began to recede. However, the sustained demand for labour associated with Centennial year activities, and the continued (if more moderate) growth in total expenditures, maintained conditions in which costs continued to rise. The general level of prices (GNE deflator) rose by 3.9 per cent in 1967, after a rise of 4.5 per cent in 1966; the rise in the first half of 1968 over the first half of 1967 was about 3.3 per cent.

Production of Goods and Services

The rise in real domestic product in 1967, excluding agriculture, was 3.6 per cent, and in the first half of 1968 it continued to rise at about the same rate. With the exception of the second quarter of the year quarterly gains in 1967 and into early 1968 were moderate, but there was evidence of greater strength in the second quarter of 1968, as shown in Chart 10.

The manufacturing sector revealed some weakness through the first nine months of 1967, but picked up strength in the fourth quarter. This new trend was temporarily halted in early 1968, as industrial disputes restricted the growth in output in some industries, but was resumed in the second quarter.

The construction industry, which had reached a peak in output in early 1966, operated at a lower rate during the second half of that year, but picked up again in 1967. In part this reflected the pattern of residential construction, as housing starts declined throughout 1966 until the final months of the year before turning up, but it also reflected the timing of a wide range of projects, both public and private, associated with preparations for Expo and other Centennial activities. Strong gains occurred in the first half of 1968. The service industries taken together experienced higher levels of activity in late 1966 and the first half of 1967, but have advanced more slowly since then. The slower pace has persisted in the first half of 1968.

In total, the commercial sector excluding agriculture showed relatively modest quarterly gains from mid-1966 (except during the Expo-stimulated second quarter of 1967) until early 1968, but developments during the second quarter of the present year brought about a sharper advance in this measure of total economic activity.

Employment gains in the total non-agricultural commercial sector reflected this overall trend in 1966 and 1967, showing a generally slower rate of advance during this period than in the preceding quarters of continued rapid growth.

However, some variations are apparent; thus, the increase in service employment in the second quarter of 1967 was insufficient to offset the decline in construction and manufacturing, and the sharp increase in total output in the second quarter of 1967 was not matched by a similar advance in total commercial non-agricultural employment, as the output gains were largely achieved through improved productivity. Within the sectors, the postwar pattern of continued growth of service employment and relative stability or decline in manufacturing employment continued in evidence, with the readjustment process in the economy bringing about some streamlining in manufacturing employment during 1967 and early 1968. The construction industry and mining recorded fluctuations which reflected, to some extent, the specific trends in activity in these industries.

Changes in productivity, or output per worker, calculated from the changes in output and employment reviewed above, continued to be slow through 1967 and early 1968.¹

⁽¹⁾ Changes in productivity calculated by use of these two series are affected to the extent that real output includes the product of the self-employed and of those who work less than one full day during the week, whereas the employment data refer only to paid workers who work at least one day per week. A more precise representation of productivity change, on an annual basis, is published in DBS Aggregate Productivity Trends, 1946-1966, Annual, Cat. 14-201, and DBS Daily Bulletin, June 17, 1968.

With respect to some of the productivity changes shown for some of the service industries, it should be pointed out that there are both statistical and conceptual problems which make interpretation of trends difficult. Fluctuations in productivity in construction were large, as this industry readjusted from its earlier high levels of activity. The mining sector generally showed significant gains in productivity.

The readjustment process was, however, reflected more consistently in the manufacturing sector, as the labour force was progressively streamlined and redeployed following the overheated situation of 1965 and early 1966. In the non-durables industries, productivity gains were sizable in most quarters after a slow start in early 1967. Gains in the durables industries were affected in early 1968 by labour disputes in some areas, but otherwise also showed a general advance. Second-quarter gains in this sector were substantial. As a result of these mixed trends, the total non-agricultural commercial sector recorded relatively poor productivity gains from mid-1966 to early 1968, except during the unusual second quarter of 1967.

A comparison of income and production data (table 13) provides an indication of changes in wage costs and profits per unit of output. This table shows a continued rise in total unit labour costs. Trends are depicted graphically in Chart 11. For the first half of 1968, the increase over the first half of 1967 was 2.5 per cent. This compared with an increase of 5.6 per cent in 1967, over 1966.

The continued strong advance in overall unit labour costs reflects both the modest gains in total productivity and the sustained rapidity of the rise in wage rates discussed on earlier pages. Quarterly changes in the manufacturing sector have shown greater tendency to variability than the overall total. Both series, however, have recorded generally more moderate quarterly advances than were observed during the period of peak pressures around mid-1966.

Corporation profits per unit of output in the non-farm economy as a whole have varied sharply since late 1965. Since mid-1966, however, when there was a sharp fall in unit profits, there has been some increase. In the manufacturing sector since early 1967, in association with productivity improvements, unit profits have advanced. Industrial conflict in the first quarter of 1968 slowed this move towards higher unit profits.

Price Developments

The forces principally bearing upon price changes in 1967 were a continued but much more moderate upward movement of food prices, a rise in the price of services as higher wage and other costs worked through the service sectors, a rapidly-developing shortage of serviced land and of housing, and higher indirect taxes at both the federal and the provincial levels. As a result of these various developments the overall measure of price change, as recorded in the national accounts, rose by 3.9 per cent in 1967. This represented a decline from the 4.5 per cent gain of the previous year, and was followed by a further moderation in the first half of this year, when the GNE price deflator averaged about 3.3 per cent higher than the first half of the preceding year.

After the extremely strong advances in food prices in 1966, there was a levelling-off in this component during the first half of 1967. A sharp third-quarter rise was followed by a further period of relatively little change, apart from normal seasonal patterns. In the early part of 1968 changes in taxes at all levels of government caused a sharp rise in the prices of non-durables other than food, and services.

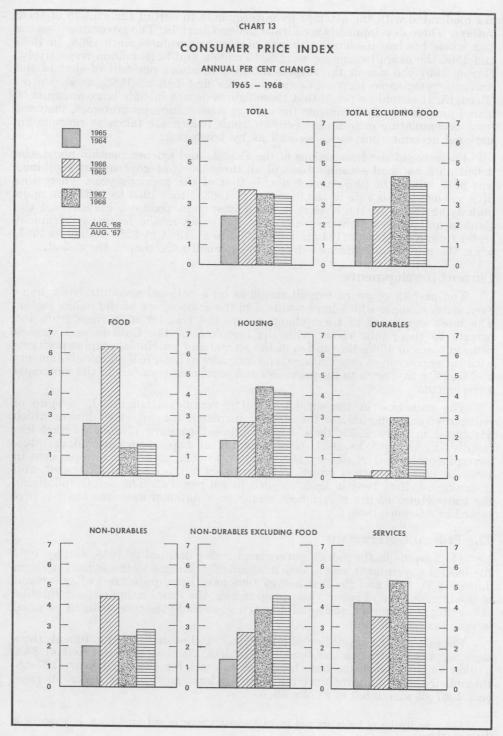

During the past two years, increases in indirect taxes, including retail sales taxes levied at the provincial level, accounted for about one-fifth of the increase in the prices of goods and services as measured in the Consumer Price Index.

Consumer service prices recorded their largest gain of recent years in the second quarter of 1967, although further gains occurred in subsequent quarters to bring about a very rapid advance in this component over the period under review. (Annual changes in consumer prices are summarized in reference table 31 and Chart 13).

Residential construction costs, which showed some large gains in the course of 1966 and 1967, continued to rise, although more moderately, in early 1968; the rise in the non-residential sector, although generally less sharp, has followed a similar path. Machinery prices fell in 1967, reflecting the final removal of federal sales tax from these items. Export prices strengthened at year-end and have risen again in 1968, as did import prices.

THE GOVERNMENT SECTOR

Revenues of the total government sector on a national accounts basis, inclusive of the Canada and Quebec pension plans, have increased rapidly in recent years as a result of both economic growth and tax changes. Government expenditures also have risen rapidly in this period although recently this trend has moderated with the attempt by governments to curtail the growth of their outlays. These developments are illustrated on Chart 14. The government sector as a whole has had moderate although decreasing surpluses since 1965. In 1965 and 1966 the overall surpluses were $325 million and $348 million respectively. During 1967 the size of the surplus dropped to about one-half of that of the previous year; some increase occurred in the first half of 1968, as shown on Chart 15. It should be noted that these figures do not include large amounts of loans, provided by governments for various construction programmes, financed from accumulating government pension funds (which are taken as revenue for national accounts purposes), as well as by borrowing.

Exclusive of the transactions of the Canada and Quebec pension plans, the deficit on a national accounts basis of all three levels of government combined was $729 million in 1967, almost double that of the previous year. There was little change in this rate in the first half of 1968. From 1966 to 1967, the main underlying factor in the change in the government position, exclusive of the Canada and Quebec pension plans, was the swing in the federal government sector from a surplus of $164 million in 1966 to a deficit of $256 million in 1967, while the provincial-municipal change was a small reduction in the deficit.

Current Developments

The past three years' overall surpluses on a national accounts basis, however, mask changes which have occurred in the composition of the public sector. The most significant of these changes were the transfer of savings from the private to the public sector with the inception of the Canada and Quebec pension plans in 1966, the erosion of the federal and provincial surplus positions with the expansion of expenditures, and increases in both federal tax abatements and transfer payments to the provinces and provincial transfers to the municipal governments.

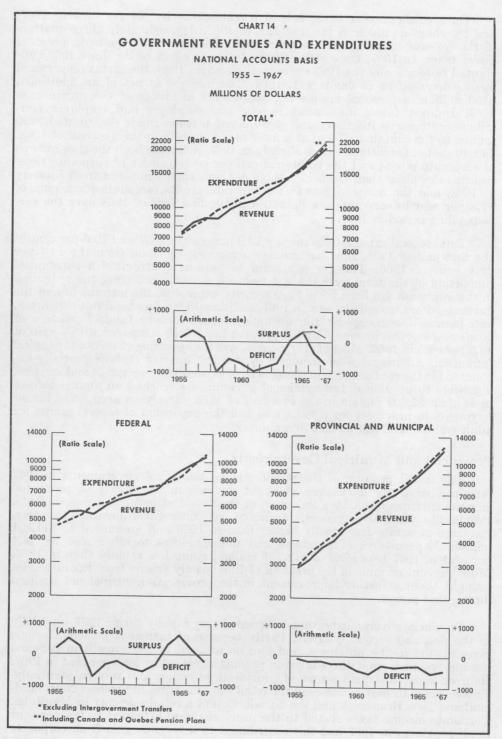

The reduction in the surplus of all governments combined, in spite of rising revenues, emphasizes the sharply increased rate of expenditures which developed in early 1966; these have continued to grow although rather less rapidly. From 1965 to 1966, total government expenditure excluding intergovernmental transfers rose by 15.8 per cent, as compared with 11.6 per cent in 1965. In 1967, the rate of growth of government outlays was 11.4 per cent, and in the first half of 1968 it again receded to 9.6 per cent. The detail underlying the transactions of the government sector on a national accounts basis is presented in reference table 33.

The Federal Government

The surplus in the federal government sector declined in 1965, and by 1967 the federal government was in deficit. Quarterly changes in the federal position during 1966, 1967 and the first half of 1968 have been quite marked as a result of the introduction of several new programmes, the termination or consolidation of existing programmes, and administrative changes in the processing of personal income tax refunds.

Because of the expectation of a more balanced economic environment, there were few tax changes in the June 1967 budget. At that time a deficit of $300 million on a national accounts basis was forecast for the fiscal year 1967–68. Preliminary data indicate that the actual federal government deficit in fiscal year 1967–68 amounted to $423 million.¹

On a calendar year basis, federal revenues rose by 8.4 per cent in 1967, and by about as much in the first half of 1968. Approximately three-quarters of the revenue increase in these years was accounted for by gains in personal direct taxes. In 1967, these reflected the full year effect of the June 1966 substantial restoration of the 1965 tax reduction and, in 1968, the surtax on personal income imposed as of January 1, 1968. The increase is net of an additional $150 million in personal income tax abatements in favour of the provinces in 1967. Indirect taxes, investment income and employer and employee contributions to social insurance and government pension funds contributed $250 million to the gain in 1967 and at a more moderate rate in the first half of 1968. Corporate tax liabilities declined slightly in 1967, reflecting both the slow growth of corporate profits and the additional one per cent transfer of corporate taxes to provinces other than Quebec. A three per cent surtax imposed from January 1, 1968, and the resumed growth in corporate profits, accounts for a gain of 11.8 per cent in corporate tax liabilities in the first half of 1968 over the corresponding period in 1967.

Total federal expenditures rose by 12.9 per cent in 1967 and 10.6 per cent in the first half of 1968, thus maintaining a moderating trend from the 14.4 per cent gain of 1966. Transfer payments to persons contributed a substantial proportion of the total over the last eighteen months, reflecting the reduction in the minimum age limit for old age security payments, the introduction of the guaranteed income supplement in 1967, additional transfers for adult education, and increased coverage by the unemployment insurance fund. Purchases of goods and services increased by 8.6 per cent in 1967 as compared with a gain of 19.0 per cent in 1966. Most of this increase was for operating costs not for capital formation. Additional wage increases in the first quarter of 1968 partially accounted for the continuation in the growth of expenditures on goods and services. Transfers to provincial and municipal governments reached an annual rate of more than $2,400 million in the first half of 1968, largely on account of higher payments to provinces for equalization and the expansion of federal grants for adult training and shared-cost programmes.

Provincial and Municipal Governments

The deficit position of the provincial and municipal governments in 1967 remained relatively unchanged. A slight increase in the deficit of provincial governments was offset by a reduction in the deficit of municipal governments. Provincial-municipal revenues, exclusive of inter-governmental transfers, increased at a rate fractionally higher than in 1966 and amounted to $11,801 million. Expenditures of provinces and municipalities together rose by 14.4 per cent in 1967 to a level of $12,274 million, rising less rapidly than in 1966. More buoyant revenue in the first half of 1968, partly arising from tax increases, brought about a further improvement in the provincial-municipal net position during that period.

Provincial government revenues increased very rapidly during 1967, especially in the first and second quarters. Partly because of increased personal income taxes abated to the provinces, and also on account of the growth in personal income, revenues from direct taxes on persons increased by 26.3 per cent in 1967. Indirect taxes, the main source of provincial revenues, also rose substantially. This reflected in part increases in the retail sales tax rates of Quebec, Newfoundland and New Brunswick and the introduction of a retail sales tax in Manitoba. Corporate income taxes abated to the provinces were extended to ten per cent in all provinces in 1967 and this contributed to a revenue gain from corporate tax liabilities, despite a levelling-off in corporate profits. Transfers from the federal government, which account for more than 20 per cent of total provincial revenues, increased by $330 million to reach a level close to $2 billion.

Expenditures of provincial governments continued to increase in 1967 at a rapid rate, as they have since 1964. In 1967, total provincial outlays amounted to $8,785 million, more than 21 per cent above their 1966 level. Purchases of goods and services, however, were up by only 13 per cent, compared to an abnormally large increase of 21.7 per cent in 1966, although there was a very rapid growth in wages, salaries and supplementary labour income. These increased by 18 per cent in 1967 as compared to increases of 13.6 and 12.1 per cent in 1966 and 1965 respectively. Transfers to persons rose by 29 per cent from 1966 to 1967, reflecting again a substantial increase in grants to non-commercial institutions such as hospitals, universities and schools, which are included in this category. In the first half of this year, the deficit position of provincial governments has shown some reduction, largely as a result of increased taxes.

Revenues of municipalities increased by 14.9 per cent in 1967 and by about 11 per cent in the first half of 1968. This has largely reflected the continuing rapid increase in transfers from provincial governments; these now provide over 40 per cent of all municipal revenues. Municipal expenditures increased at a slightly less rapid rate than in previous years, largely on account of a reduced rate of capital formation.

Financial Transactions of Governments

At the present time, the existing national accounts framework covers only income and expenditure transactions, and the important economic impact of government borrowing and lending cannot be analysed within this framework. To fill this gap it is necessary to examine the public accounts of the various governments, wherever feasible, and to supplement this by reference to other data such as new loan issues. Some analysis follows.

Generally speaking, the public accounts records are oriented to the administrative and legislative needs of the different units of government. This results in a variety of presentations and often of accounting techniques, with the result that the combined figures, including government agencies, are difficult to interpret. In addition, at the municipal level, the size and number of local units of governments give rise to problems in obtaining up-to-date information. In these circumstances, it is not yet possible to obtain a consolidated figure of financial requirements of all levels of government, although it is possible to make some general observations.

In the case of the federal government it had become evident by early 1967 that there was some relaxation in the pressure of demand in the economy, and relatively small cuts in tax revenues were provided for in the federal budget in June, 1967. A budgetary deficit of $740 million plus a net non-budgetary cash requirement of about $850 million for loans and advances to certain crown corporations was forecast for the then current fiscal year, excluding any forecast of Exchange Fund transactions. By late fall, however, it was felt desirable to bring down a second budget, and tax increases were introduced to restrain demand in order to moderate the increases in costs and prices that were taking place and to provide some relief from severe strains by then evident in the capital markets. Revenue measures proposed in the fall budget included increased taxes on liquor and tobacco, a surcharge of five per cent on personal income tax and the acceleration of corporate income tax payments. The bill containing the last two measures was defeated in the House of Commons, and in March 1968 the government introduced another income tax bill to replace the bulk of the revenues that would have been provided by the measures earlier proposed. The new bill, which was passed, provided for a three per cent temporary surcharge on personal and corporate income taxes as well as an acceleration of corporate tax payments.

The federal government's actual financial requirement for 1967–68 amounted to $587 million, taking into account non-budgetary outlays and cash realized from foreign exchange transactions. This was considerably lower than the forecast, which had explicitly excluded these exchange transactions, but was about ten per cent higher than that reported for 1966–67. The difference between the budget forecast on June 1, 1967, and the realized result was largely accounted for by the Canadian dollar proceeds resulting from the decline in foreign exchange reserves in the first calendar quarter of 1968. Details of the financing of these cash requirements are set out in the pages on federal government debt

Cash requirements of the provincial governments based on public accounts and other sources are estimated to have risen from a little under $900 million in 1966–67 to over $1,250 million in fiscal 1967–68. The increase between the two fiscal years was accounted for almost equally by increases in provincial budgetary deficits and increased loans and advances to their agencies and enterprises. Almost all of the increases shown in both of these categories were accounted for by Ontario.

A major portion of the financing needed to meet the increased requirements for 1967–68 came from increases in the direct funded debt of the provinces, a larger volume of funds from the Canada and Quebec pension plans and the running down of bank balances. There was a sharp drop in provincial Treasury bill issues in 1967–68.

Only scattered information is available at the municipal level. Municipal deficits on a national accounts basis increased by 13 per cent between 1965 and 1966, to a level of $602 million, but dropped sharply to $349 million in 1967. Net new issues of municipal direct and guaranteed bonds rose from $263 million in 1965 to $506 million in 1966 and to $603 million in 1967.

SOURCE AND DISPOSITION OF SAVING

Total domestic investment in 1967, including that in inventories (on a national accounts basis), was $12,526 million, $667 million below the level recorded in the previous year. This change was mainly due to a substantial decline in the addition to inventories. On the side of the saving required to finance this investment, most of the decline took place in net borrowing from abroad; there was also a decline in the government sector surplus. Business gross saving rose fractionally, as a decline in corporate undistributed profits was slightly more than offset by a rise in capital consumption allowances and small valuation adjustments.

This levelling-off in gross business saving (shown in table 14) after a period of year-to-year growth reflected the reduction of profits before taxes and before dividends, which had occurred as a result of the 1967 slowdown, and the continued rise in costs. Developments in the first half of 1968 reflect some increase in business gross saving, little change in the government sector surplus (including the Canada and Quebec pension plans), and a further fall in the use of foreign saving as measured by the current account deficit; however, these changes virtually cancel out, and total saving shows little movement from 1967 levels.

Personal saving, which includes household saving, the saving of unincorporated business and saving in the agricultural sector, did not increase as rapidly in 1967 as they had in 1966, and fell slightly in the first half of 1968. The main reasons for this change are that because of a substantial increase in total disposable income, households have been increasing purchases of durable goods, particularly cars, and, in addition, they have maintained normal growth in real expenditures on non-durable goods and services at a time when prices have been increasing rapidly. While the income of unincorporated business enterprises has continued to rise, this has been more than offset by the decline in accrued farm income, the latter resulting from a return to an average harvest in 1967 after the record of

The disposition of saving in 1967 showed declines in both gross fixed capital formation and additions to inventories. It may be noted from table 15 that the decline in the use of foreign saving is in keeping with the experience of recent years, whereby a greater proportion of investment has been met, on a net basis, from Canadian saving. It should be noted that these tables portray the net position only, and do not record the gross international flows of capital funds, which are substantial, nor do these tables portray the flows of funds as between the domestic sectors of the economy.

With these qualifications in mind, the tables illustrate that over the past two years most of the saving generated by Canadians has arisen from the personal and business sectors. The transactions of all governments, including the Canada and Quebec pension plans, have, in total, shown a modest surplus. This modest government surplus does not take into account the substantial investments made by government business enterprises, so that governments have made extensive use of capital markets, as discussed on a later page. Business, also, has contined to make extensive use of the financial markets.

Table 15 shows the proportions of total saving supplied by the business sector, other Canadian sources, and from abroad. Gross saving by business enterprises in 1967 accounted for 64.3 per cent of their capital spending. Given the quicker pace of economic activity this year, the saving of business corporations is now showing a definite increase which will facilitate the financing of their planned investments.

FINANCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

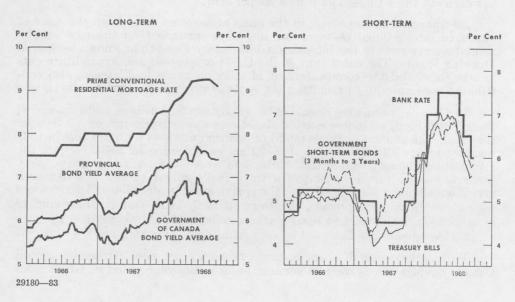

The sharp rise in interest rates in Canada last winter, with some subsequent moderating tendencies, occurred in an environment in which international financial tensions have been an important element. Canadian economic growth in 1967, as these pages have shown, was marked by a transition from the very fast pace of 1965–66 and resulting price and cost pressures, to a slower and more sustainable rate of growth. However, during much of 1967, while inflationary forces were still strong, and investors were taking a view that the adjustment in North America would not be protracted, interest rates began to rise noticeably from the spring of 1967. Strength in Canadian reserves of gold and foreign exchange during mid-1967 permitted the narrowing of the Canada–U.S. interest rate differential during the summer, and this reduced the upward pressure on the external value of the dollar and Canadian reserves.

Concern about inflationary trends on the part of investors intensified as 1967 progressed, and was reflected in a preference for liquid short-term assets such as bank term deposits, in contrast to such longer-term instruments as bonds, and also in a preference for equity investments in real estate and in Canadian and U.S. corporations. This investors' search for liquidity was aided by the more aggressive competition for deposits among chartered banks, trust and mortgage loan companies and other deposit institutions following the coming into effect of the new Bank Act in May, 1967.

In an environment of tightening U.S. credit conditions and general inflationary expectations, the Canadian bank rate was raised by one half per cent to five per cent in early fall 1967, and Canadian banks started to experience difficulty in meeting the credit demands of their customers without running down their liquidity. About this time, Canadian long-term bond yields moved decisively above previous peaks.

1966 – 1968

By Months

Following the Middle East crisis in June 1967, the intermittent pressures on the pound sterling became more persistent and, despite international support operations, eventually became overwhelming. The 14.3 per cent devaluation of the pound sterling on November 18 was accompanied by bank rate increases in many countries, including a further one per cent increase to six per cent in Canada. By the end of the year Canada–U.S. yield spreads were widening significantly.

Early in 1968 a combination of factors, including concern about the international monetary system, some pessimism about Canada's competitive position in international markets and the effects of new U.S. restrictions on business investment abroad gave rise to a severe speculative run on the Canadian dollar. In defence, the Bank rate was raised to seven per cent in January and an extensive network of international standby credits and support was arranged. In addition, the liquidity of Canadian chartered banks was further reduced, and they co-operated successfully to aid the short-term flows position in the balance of payments capital account. In March, in return for complete exemption from U.S. balance of payments programmes affecting capital flows into Canada, the Government of Canada undertook to take any steps necessary to ensure that the exemption from the U.S. programme would not result in Canada's being used as a "pass-through" by which the purpose of the U.S. balance of payments programme would be frustrated. The Canadian government has since introduced guidelines for this purpose for banks, other Canadian financial institutions, and non-financial corporations. Fiscal measures of restraint secured passage through Parliament in mid-March. During the unstable period immediately prior to the establishment on March 17 of the new two-price system for gold, both the U.S. and Canadian monetary authorities raised central bank rates by a further one-half per cent. In the exchange market the tide turned in mid-March, and the task of rebuilding Canada's foreign exchange reserves began. This included borrowing by the Government of Canada in Europe.

By late May the renewed strength of the Canadian dollar was evident. The Government of Canada long-term bond yield average has since fallen from a historic peak of seven per cent and other rates have also fallen. The Bank rate has been cut three times, and is now six per cent.

Instrumental in the easing in the crisis atmosphere have been the signs of improved international co-operation, including agreement on the new supplemental reserve asset in the International Monetary Fund to be known as Special Drawing Rights. The enactment of the U.S. tax increase and expenditure cuts in late June, and the commencement of talks on peace in Vietnam, also contributed substantially to removing the sense of crisis in financial markets.

In Canada, borrowing demands by governments, business and consumers, though still high, no longer exerted the strong upward pressure on yields that they had. The amount of funds raised in financial markets by borrowers in 1967 regained nearly all of the more than 20 per cent decline in 1966. Despite the international financial crisis last winter and associated tight monetary policy there was some further advance in total funds raised in the twelve-month period ended mid-1968 compared to the twelve months preceding. (See reference table 36). Mortgage approvals, the trend in bank loans and the new climate of cautious convalescence in bond markets indicate that through 1968 the rate of total loanable funds disbursed is being maintained at a high level.

Within these overall changes, funds raised by net new market issues and Canada Savings Bonds were 28 per cent lower in the year ended mid-1968 than in the preceding twelve months. On the other hand, bank loan growth accelerated from seven per cent in 1966 to over 14 per cent in 1967 and early 1968 before flattening out more recently. Private sector institutional mortgage loan disbursements, which dropped drastically in 1966, advanced in momentum after mid-1967 and have continued to increase.

The Effect of Financial Developments Abroad

During most of 1967 the main effect in Canada of international developments was on interest rates, which moved up quite sharply as part of a general, almost worldwide, trend. The Canadian dollar tended to be strong, generally fluctuating in a range above its U.S. $.925 parity value. During the period of upheaval following the sterling devaluation in November, some of this strength was eroded and the dollar moved closer to its parity value, where it stabilized until year end.

The January 1, 1968 announcement of the new U.S. balance of payments programme gave rise to widespread concern about its possible impact on the Canadian economy. The resultant pressure on the Canadian dollar caused a rapid drop in the exchange value to the bottom of the one per cent range on either side of parity value which is consequent upon Canada's membership in the International Monetary Fund (Chart 18). This was accompanied by unusually heavy losses of foreign exchange by the Exchange Fund Account as it purchased Canadian dollars in the market. These pressures continued with varying intensity throughout most of the first quarter and were particularly strong and persistent from the middle of February onward.

As a result of a number of developments discussed below, a turnaround occurred in late March; the situation then reversed itself so completely that the Canadian dollar rose quickly to a value well above parity, and the Exchange Fund Account has recouped its earlier exchange losses. The following table shows the effect on the overall exchange reserve position.

Heavy exchange losses occurred towards the middle of January, causing a number of defensive measures to be taken to restore confidence. On January 21, the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury issued a statement that the new U.S. balance of payments programme had not been intended to cause abnormal transfers of funds from Canada to the United States, and that it did in fact provide scope for continued large flows of capital from the United States to Canada. Almost simultaneously the Bank of Canada raised the bank rate from six to seven per cent, and announced that the chartered banks had agreed to discourage the use of bank credit by Canadian subsidiaries for the purpose of facilitating abnormal transfers of funds abroad or meeting financing requirements which in the past had normally been met by the parent companies. Although these measures 29180—834 reduced the speculation against the dollar the loss of reserves continued, and during January the loss amounted to U.S. $348 million. This loss was largely offset by a U.S. $250 million drawing by the Bank of Canada on the Federal Reserve System under a reciprocal currency facility.

Towards the middle of February heavy speculative pressures were renewed, and at month end a U.S. $426 million drawing by Canada on the IMF was announced. This drawing consisted of U.S. $241 million representing Canada's creditor position in the IMF and of a U.S. $185 million gold tranche drawing. It was made to illustrate the extent of the additional resources, over and above the foreign exchange reserves, available to maintain the existing parity value of the Canadian dollar, and to reconstitute the liquidity of the Exchange Fund. Month end reserve figures showed an increase in official holdings of gold and U.S. dollars of $315 million, after giving effect to the IMF transaction, thus indicating a loss of reserves during the month of $111 million.

Uneasiness continued to prevail in the market. On March 4 the Governor of the Bank of Canada requested banks and other financial intermediaries for the time being not to facilitate swapped deposit transactions, and the Minister of Finance issued a similar request to Canadian investors not to initiate such transactions. Swapped deposits come about when a Canadian investor deposits Canadian funds with a financial intermediary to be converted into a foreign currency and placed on deposit in that currency, with the intermediary undertaking through a forward contract to convert the foreign currency proceeds back into Canadian dollars at maturity. The Canadian investor then receives the interest earned on the foreign currency deposit plus the amount of the discount on the forward Canadian dollar or less the amount of the premium as the case may be.

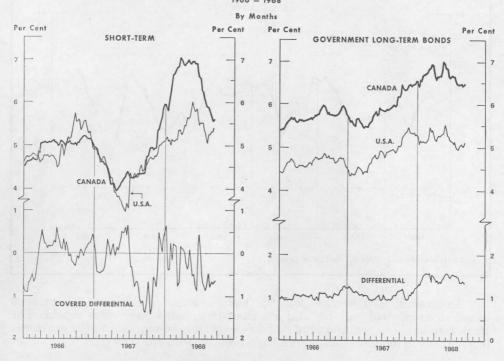

Between mid-1967 and the end of February 1968 the total of swapped deposits outstanding had almost doubled, to a level of approximately $900 million, thus giving rise to a large capital outflow from Canada. Under the circumstances prevailing in early March, it was considered desirable to ensure that further outflows of this nature should not take place, and to attempt to repatriate some of the funds already outstanding. The March 4 requests concerning swapped deposits were withdrawn on June 12, by which time the total of swapped deposits outstanding had fallen steadily to about $350 million.

On March 7 an exchange of letters was published between the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury and the Minister of Finance, stating that Canada would be exempt from the balance of payments programmes affecting capital flows administered by the U.S. Department of Commerce and the Federal Reserve System. This move made clear that Canada's position would not be weakened by the features of the January 1 programme which had contributed to the concern about its effect on the Canadian economy. In return, the Canadian government undertook to invest a major portion of its U.S. dollar assets in U.S. Government securities which would not constitute a liquid claim on the United States, and further undertook to take any steps necessary to ensure that Canada would not be used as a pass-through to circumvent the U.S. balance of payments programme. To carry out this second undertaking, the Government has since introduced guidelines for banks, non-bank financial institutions and non-financial corporations.

Also on March 7, the Minister of Finance announced that arrangements had been made for $900 million of stand-by credits to support the Canadian dollar. These consisted of certain central bank arrangements and a $500 million line of credit with the U.S. Export-Import Bank, which were never used.

During the first two weeks of March, general concern about the stability of the international monetary system reached crisis levels and was reflected in a renewed flight from currencies into gold. The massive proportions of this flight led to the termination of the Gold Pool arrangements on March 17. In the wake of the Gold Pool announcement the Bank of Canada raised its Bank rate by one-half of one per cent to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, at the same time that the U.S. authorities increased the Federal Reserve discount rate to 5 per cent. The Bank of Canada also announced an increase in its reciprocal currency facility with the Federal Reserve System by \$250 million to \$1 billion.

The crisis conditions of early March in the international financial system were such that the measures announced in Ottawa on March 7 were insufficient by themselves to restore confidence in the Canadian dollar. Following the midmonth developments, however, and the passage by Parliament of new tax legislation, relative calm returned to the Canadian exchange market. A moderate build-up of reserves commenced during the second half of March, although this was not immediately sufficient to offset earlier losses, as indicated by the fact that the overall March decline in official holdings of gold and U.S. dollars amounted to $246 million.

Since March, confidence in the international system has been restored to a marked degree. The general atmosphere in the system improved partly as a result of the Stockholm agreement late in March on the final details of the Special Drawing Rights proposals. It also benefitted from the evidence, as the two-tier gold market became operational, that gold in the free market would demand only a limited premium over the official $35 price. In this new climate of confidence, Canada's exemption from the January 1 U.S. balance of payments programme has had its intended effect. The improvement in Canada's position has been given further impetus by the normal seasonal improvement in the balance of international payments and by a strong export performance.

As a result, all the credit facilities mobilized during this period have been cancelled or allowed to lapse and the short-term loans have been repaid. The Bank rate has been reduced from its crisis level and the requests to the chartered banks made in January and March have been withdrawn.

Bond Market Financing

In the twelve-month period ending July 1968, net new issues of bonds by all Canadian debtors in domestic and foreign markets, at $2.7 billion, were running about $1 billion or 28 per cent below the very heavy issue rate of $3.8 billion in the preceding twelve months. Heavy capital market borrowing, especially by governments, from late 1966 through 1967 was a major source of upward pressure on interest rates, reinforcing the rise due to inflationary expectations and international tensions. Details of changes in market bonds outstanding over the years 1963 to 1968 are shown in reference table 37.

The flow of fund changes in the bond market during last fall and winter were substantial. In the year ending mid-1968, the $675 million increase in non-bank resident holdings of market bonds and Canada Savings Bonds contrasts with the $1,500–1,900 million increases observed throughout earlier years of the decade. Half of this change was attributable to non-bank resident holders of marketable bonds, and the other half to the $500 million turnaround in CSB flows from the $200–500 million increases of earlier years to the $169 million decrease in the twelve months ended mid-1968. The net increase in the Canadian banking system's holdings, at $574 million for the whole period, was about midway in the prior years' range from net reductions in some years to increases of over $1,200 million in years such as 1967. Partially offsetting these factors was the fact that Canadian placements abroad—in the United States, and for the first time in decades on a significant scale in Europe—were about double the $600–800 million range of earlier years in this decade.

The 1967 shifts in financial investment patterns on a calendar year basis were thus severe in comparison with average flows earlier in the decade; however, a comparison of the twelve-month period ending July 1968 shows an even more pronounced shift. In the latter period, investment shifts by three key investor groups lay behind the $1 billion reduction in the net flow of funds into bonds. The increase in Canadian banking system bond holdings of $574 million was about $500 million less than its $1,124 million increase in the previous twelve-month period ended July 1967. Similarly, the decreases in growth in non-bank resident holdings of marketable bonds and Canada Savings Bonds amounted to $1,250 million. Partially offsetting these slower flows was an increase in the annual flow of funds into Canadian foreign-pay bond issues of over $700 million. The net effect of the changes in holdings of these three investor groups was a slowdown of more than $1 billion in the flows of funds into Canadian governments and business issues. By contrast, the supply of credit for consumer purchases and mortgages has been well maintained although the cost of such credit has risen markedly.

The return to slower growth in the flow of funds into Canadian bonds occurred during the international crisis in financial confidence last winter and the associated tightening in monetary policy in the United States, Canada and elsewhere. The speculative run on the Canadian dollar which developed in the foreign exchange market in the first quarter of 1968 made it necessary to give top priority to checking the speculative outflow of capital and, once the tide had turned in mid-March, to rebuilding Canada's foreign exchange reserves. Achievement of these objectives involved a widening of the spread of Canadian interest rates over U.S. rates which themselves were rising sharply.

In recent months access to bond markets has improved, interest rates have eased somewhat, and market bond holdings by the banking system and other residents have increased, while foreign holdings of Canadian bonds have risen further. Canada Savings Bond holders since mid-1968 have continued to switch into bank and non-bank term instruments, corporate and other bonds, and equities. However, the monthly rate of net decline in CSBs outstanding has fallen from the June peak of $159 million to a rate well below the $89 million average monthly decline experienced in the first seven months of calendar 1968.

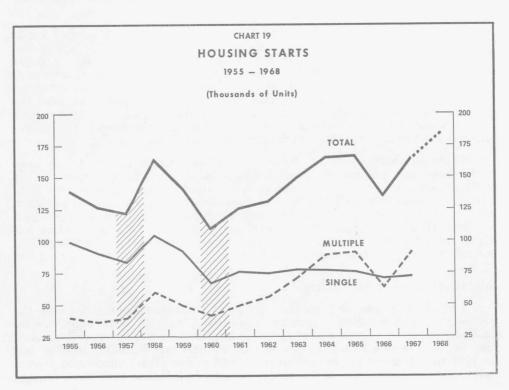

Mortgage Market Financing

One of the economic highlights in the past eighteen months has been the recovery in house building activity, shown in Chart 19. Loan approvals by institutional lenders, which lead actual loan disbursements by several months, had declined from a $3 billion rate in 1965 to little over $2 billion in 1966, but in 1967 they rose by 30 per cent to reach $2.8 billion. Total public and private mortgage loan approvals in the twelve months ended June 1968 were running slightly below the $2.8 billion level, reflecting some downturn in approvals since the turn of this year (see reference table 39). There are three fundamental reasons for this overall improvement. Firstly, business investment has not been claiming as big a share of gross national expenditure since 1966. Secondly, the Government of Canada has by changing the interest rate formula in respect of NHA mortgages provided for a wider spread for mortgage yields over competing instruments. Thirdly, the flow of private sector funds into mortgages has been very significantly augmented by the re-entry of the banks into mortgage lending following the Bank Act changes in 1967.

Total private conventional and NHA loan approvals rose about $600 million in the twelve-month period ended June 1968. This increase was shared equally between banks and non-bank financial institutions. Direct loan commitments by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation fell $464 million, from $910 million to $446 million, in the year ended June 1968, with a decline in the flow of public funds into private housing being partly offset by increased CMHC outlays for public and low-income housing.

In the past year or so there has also been a significant increase in new residential construction financed by means other than institutional mortgages or public financing. These other means include mortgage loans from Caisses Populaires, credit unions and private individuals, as well as construction undertaken without recourse to mortgage loans. There seems to have been an increase in funds channelled into the mortgage market from sources other than trust, life and mortgage loan companies and banks.

The general improvement in the flow of funds into mortgages has occurred in circumstances of severe tightness of credit conditions generally during much of the period under review. In the past the bank interest ceiling and other restrictions faced by financial institutions in attracting funds, by limiting their ability to raise deposit and lending rates fully in line with other market interest rates, had contributed to the sharp curtailment of the availability of mortgage loans. In the past year and a half there has been increased reliance on interest rates in the determination of mortgage investment, and less reliance than formerly on various rationing devices employed by the private sector. Mortgage interest rates have increased sharply. Average rates on prime residential conventional mortgage loans rose from about eight per cent at the beginning of 1967 to over nine per cent by the spring of 1968. Actual NHA interest rates, as distinct from the maximum or ceiling rate, similarly increased from 7½ per cent to a peak of nearly 9 per cent. Like rates on other instruments, mortgage interest rates have come down somewhat in recent months.

To encourage a larger and relatively more stable flow of private funds into the mortgage market, the maximum interest rate on NHA insured mortgage loans was fixed at 7½ per cent in November 1966, with the provision that beginning in 1967 this rate was to be adjusted automatically at the end of each calendar quarter to a level of 1½ per cent above the average yield on long-term Government of Canada bonds. This move to a flexible NHA rate related to market conditions had significant effects on the flow of institutional funds into NHA mortgages in early 1967 but provided little stimulus to investment in NHA mortgages in the second and third calendar quarters of that year. In view of the large financial resources already committed by the Government of Canada for housing and other areas, and a need to conserve government funds to a greater extent for low-income housing, the government took further action in September to stimulate the flow of private mortgage money. The quarterly adjustment formula was altered to establish the maximum NHA rate at a level of $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent above the long-term Government of Canada bond average, the widest spread permitted by the National Housing Act, with the intention of allowing the actual rate to be set by market forces within this limit. Following this action the spread not only between NHA mortgages and competing bonds, but also for conventional mortgages, widened, and this has provided a stimulus to mortgage investment by lending institutions. In 1967, the setting of the rate of interest on home improvement loans which are made by the banks and guaranteed by the government, was brought under the same formula.

The National Housing Act was amended in March 1968 to increase the ratio for home-ownership loans on new housing from 95 per cent of the first $13,000 of lending value and 70 per cent of the balance, to 95 per cent of the first $18,000 and 70 per cent of the balance, thereby reducing the down payment required. No changes were made in the $18,000 per unit maximum. In February, the NHA loan regulations had been amended to raise the maximum loan for apartment units from $12,000 to $18,000. The regulations were also changed to permit the lender, where a rental loan is made to a corporate borrower, to increase the period of the lock-in from the previous maximum of ten years to a new, higher lock-in that may extend to within ten years of the term of the loan.

Consumer Finance

The rate of growth of consumer credit balances outstanding quickened in the past eighteen months, although it did not reach the pace of earlier years of the decade. The annual increase, which had been 8.3 per cent in 1966, was 10.9 per cent in 1967 and 11.9 per cent in the twelve months ended May 1968. From 1962 to 1965 the annual growth rates in consumer credit had been 12.5 per cent to 16.4 per cent. The increased tempo in the past year was associated primarily with increasing expenditure on consumer durables, generally bought "on time".

As indicated in reference table 40, the banks and consumer loan companies experienced faster-than-average growth in consumer loans in the period from May, 1967 to May, 1968. Policy loans of life insurance companies continued to expand rapidly.

During 1967 federal and provincial legislation came into effect requiring disclosure on a consistent basis of the overall costs of credit extended to personal borrowers. The parallel provisions of the Bank Act, which came into effect in October, 1967, cover all personal loans to $25,000.

Business Finance

Investment in physical plant and equipment by the corporate sector reached a peak in 1966 and, as noted earlier, declined moderately during 1967; it has begun to recover in 1968. Corporations used both their own accumulated liquid resources and the bond markets to finance the 1963–1966 expansion, with the customary use of short-term sources to facilitate inventory accumulation and the orderly financing of investment programmes. Budgetary measures affecting the liquidity of corporations in the spring of 1966, the development of credit stringency throughout North America in the latter part of that year, and conditions in the bond market led to greatly increased reliance on shorter-term financing, while internal liquidity declined. (These trends are summarized in reference table 41). By the end of 1966 the ruling uncertainties in the financial markets had brought about a mood of caution in the corporate sector, and financial planning was concerned with the need to rebuild corporate liquidity as rapidly as conditions would permit.

Internal sources of funds since early 1967 have displayed an overall flat trend. Retained profits, after taxes and dividends, fell in 1966, but a lack of growth in dividend payments since that time permitted much of the lost ground to be made up during 1967 and 1968. Meanwhile, as a reflection of the substantial additions to physical capital of recent years, reserves for depreciation have been advancing steadily. The net effect of these developments has been, as noted, modest change in the level of internally-generated funds over the past eighteen months.

As investment outlays fell off, the need for external financing to make up the shortfall between internal funds and capital expenditures became less pressing. However, the external financing carried out between early 1967 and early 1968 remained much higher, both absolutely and relative to earlier financing, than that prevailing throughout the period subsequent to the resources boom of the mid-fifties. This partly reflected the fact that the post-boom decline in actual expenditures in 1967 was marginal, whereas after 1958 it was substantial and prolonged. However, it also reflected concern over the need to rebuild liquidity with all reasonable speed.

Accordingly, corporate sector financing remained active in 1967 and 1968, although the volume fell for a while and the structure of the new liabilities issued was dictated to some extent by market conditions. Thus, long-term business borrowing through net new bond and stock issues was 24 per cent below 1966 levels last year, but in the twelve month period ended mid-1968 it was four per cent above the comparable preceding period.

Bank loans and certain other short-term business borrowings, which fell markedly in 1966, have since recovered somewhat the distance lost, despite the slower pace of inventory accumulation, which is financed by short-term debt. The pickup in short-term business debt reflected postponement of bond issues in the past year in expectation of eventually lower interest rates. Short-term borrowings also helped to finance businesses' increased preference for rebuilding liquid asset portfolios. Conditions may also have faced businesses with receivables which were not declining as fast as payables, and, therefore, with further increases in net receivables to be financed.

Federal Government Debt Operations

The general environment and special circumstances which affected federal government debt management policies and operations during fiscal year 1967-68 and the early months of the current fiscal year have been described earlier. At the time of the budget in June 1967, cash requirements of the federal government in the fiscal year 1967-68 were estimated at $1.6 billion compared with actual requirements of $530 million in the previous fiscal year. In the first nine months of the 1967-68 fiscal year, the federal government raised over $650 million in new cash through the issue of marketable securities in the Canadian capital market, while refunding maturing issues which totalled $1.5 billion. During the same period net sales of CSBs totalled $283 million. These relatively heavy demands were made on the capital markets during a period of generally rising interest rates and when demands on the capital markets by other governments and industry were also very large. The government's concern about the disturbing strains on the capital markets and the measures proposed to alleviate the situation were outlined in the budget speech of November 30, 1967. In presenting the tax and fiscal measures the Minister of Finance repeated that the government would hold its overall net cash requirements and its consequent demands on the capital market to less than $750 million in the next fiscal year, apart from unforeseen changes in exchange reserves.

The speculative pressure on the Canadian dollar during the last quarter of the 1967–68 fiscal year, with the accompanying heavy losses of foreign exchange provided substantial cash receipts, amounting to $770 million in the three month period. This special development made it possible for the government to finance its requirements during the remainder of the fiscal year with little additional borrowing from the capital market during this very unsettled period. During the fiscal year as a whole, net borrowing in Canada by the federal government through marketable securities amounted to $725 million, and net sales of Canada Savings Bonds amounted to $80 million. Government net cash requirements totalled only $485 million, and cash balances at the end of the fiscal year were at the relatively high level of $997 million.

In the early months of the current fiscal year two factors had considerable influence on government cash requirements and debt operations. In the first place, the rebuilding of the foreign exchange position, as confidence in the Canadian dollar was restored, involved large cash outlays of Canadian dollars. Secondly, the sharp rise which had occurred in interest rates and their subsequent maintenance at relatively high levels to facilitate the reconstitution of foreign exchange reserves presented holders of Canada Savings Bonds with investment alternatives at significantly higher interest yields. The abnormally high redemption of savings bonds which took place in these circumstances was financed from government cash resources. These special factors, in addition to the normal requirements of government, produced heavy cash requirements in the early months of the current fiscal year. Notwithstanding the relatively high level of cash balances at the beginning of the year, it was therefore necessary to resume borrowings in the capital market. In the first four months, up to the end of July, net new issues of marketable securities in Canada totalled $349 million, during which period the level of outstanding CSBs declined by $408 million. The financing of exchange transactions during the four-month period totalled $551 million, including foreign borrowing. These developments are summarized in table 16.

The federal government in the conduct of its debt operations was faced with generally rising interest rates for most of the period under review. During the second quarter of 1968 some Canadian interest rates reached their highest levels in a century. Government bonds, like other fixed income securities, were generally more difficult to sell during the period under review, in spite of more attractive terms and conditions. As illustrated in the schedule of details of debt operations (reference table 42), both coupons and prices on new bonds were made progressively more attractive to buyers while the terms to maturity were shortened. The following paragraphs trace the main features of the Government's debt management program through 1967 and up to the beginning of August, 1968.

As the first quarter of 1967 began it appeared that interest rates had peaked in late 1966 and that the economies of both the United States and Canada were experiencing moderating demand pressures. Long and short term rates fell dramatically and the Bank rate was reduced in two stages from 5½ per cent to 4½ per cent by April 7. The Bank of Canada, to avoid an excessive tightening of credit conditions for both domestic and external reasons, had since mid-1966 permitted a rapid expansion of the money supply which was reflected in a sharp increase in the liquidity of the chartered banks in the first part of 1967. During this time the government placed three issues with the market, raising $217 million in new cash, and refunded out of cash balances CNR bonds totalling $122 million. On February 1, 1967 there was a special issue of 303-day Treasury bills for $100 million. By April, however, the bond market had become less optimistic and the government was faced with high and rising interest rates over most of the remaining period.

In view of the heavy cash requirements and the relatively few opportunities available to raise new money as a result of the large refundings due during 1967, the government placed a \$175 million cash issue on August 1. In the face of a much deteriorated market the offering was restricted to the short and medium terms, with the mid-term bond priced to yield over six per cent. By October yields had risen further, and dealer expectations in both Canada and the United States were for continued upward pressure on interest rates. The October 1 issue refunded the large amount maturing on that date and, once again, the terms to maturity of the three-tranche issue were shortened. By year-end most interest rates had passed the peaks reached in 1966 and the Bank rate had been raised, in two stages, to six per cent. In view of the large amount of bonds taken up by the banking system in 1967, the December 1 refunding was designed in particular to attract other investors, by the issue of only a 6-year $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent bond. With this issue the government raised net proceeds of \$120 million. Also on December 1 there was a 364-day Treasury bill issue of \$125 million to refund the special February issue and raise \$25 million new cash.

In view of the attractive alternatives available to the individual investor in the fall of 1967, the Canada Savings Bond campaign was designed to stem the rate of outstanding CSB redemptions and also to provide new cash. The "double-your-money" feature on Canada Savings Bonds which originated with the Centennial Series was continued in 1967. The 1967–68 series offered the same interest yield to maturity as the 1966 Series, but, to make it more attractive relative to comparable investments, the initial coupon was raised from 5 to $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Corporations and other businesses, churches, charities and other associations were made eligible to purchase CSBs for the first time and the maximum amount permitted for each purchaser was increased to \$50,000.

In the first part of 1968, as in 1967, the Canadian financial markets were heavily influenced by international factors. In addition, as a result of continuing rising costs and prices in Canada and the United States, there remained a strong desire for liquidity on the part of private and corporate investors. In the United States, and to a lesser degree in Canada, credit conditions were tightening significantly. There was a brief recovery in the bond market in the first two weeks of 1968, but this proved to be only temporary and most interest rates in Canada resumed their climb to unprecedented highs.

At the time of the large January 15 refunding the raising of net new cash was limited to \$50 million, in view of market conditions. Short and long term rates rose to new peaks during this period as a result of the monetary stance taken to stem the speculative run on the Canadian dollar. The Bank rate was raised to 7 per cent and then to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent by mid-March. The April 1 refunding carried the first 7 per cent coupon on a Government bond since Confederation and, with a five-year term, was priced to yield 7.30 per cent. Even with this high yield, institutional investors were not attracted to the issue, and the tone of the market outlook continued pessimistic.

To reconstitute reserves and broaden the external market for government securities, the federal government in May floated two loans in Europe. This followed the ending of the exchange crisis described earlier. A loan in Italian lire equivalent to Canadian $108 million was placed directly with the Italian Exchange Office and a loan, payable in German marks, equivalent to Canadian $68 million, was sold in the Eurobond market. Finally, a loan for U.S. $100 million, subject to delayed delivery contracts, was issued in the United States in June.

A substantial rally in the Canadian bond market occurred in April as world events appeared to take a more favourable turn. However, this did not last. Higher gold prices, the unfavourable response to the Administration's fiscal bill by U.S. legislators and rising pessimism regarding Vietnam peace talks caused bond prices once again to turn downward. The June 15 refunding was a three-tranche issue, two of which carried 7 per cent coupons. To replenish dwindling government cash balances, this issue raised $105 million in new cash.

In May 1968 the government, in the interest of orderly debt management, offered a Special Replacement Series of Canada Savings Bonds to refund in advance the large outstanding 1959 series of Canada Savings Bonds which were due to mature in November 1968. On January 1, 1968 there were $722 million of these bonds outstanding. Effective March 28, Special Replacement Bonds were offered only to holders of the 1959 series in exchange for their 1959 bonds. Subsequently, beginning May 15, the bonds were also offered to the general public for cash for a short period. The offer was withdrawn on May 23, 1968. The new bonds carried an annual average yield of 6.88 per cent, the most attractive ever offered on a Canada Savings Bond. Like the previous two issues of Canada Savings Bonds, the new bonds also offered compound interest so that the investor could double his money in 10 years and 5 months. The issue was very successful, with sales totalling $850 million, of which $538 million was exchanged; this helped to alleviate somewhat the concern the CSB redemptions were causing the financial markets.

By summer the Canadian bond market had improved considerably in both price and tone and the government was able to replenish declining cash balances. The improvement reflected a similar development in the United States following the passage of the Administration's tax bill. On June 28 the government sold at tender a special 364-day Treasury bill issue which provided $150 million in new money. The August 1 loan stimulated considerable activity in the market. Receipts from the cash offer amounted to $400 million, of which $100 million represented bonds exchanged directly with the Bank of Canada.

The August 1 issue repeated a feature used several times during 1968. The government, by exchanging new bonds directly with the Bank of Canada for bonds in its portfolio maturing later in the year, was able, in effect, to prerefund these issues. On April 1 $100 million and on June 15 $75 million of bonds maturing in 1968 were cancelled. On the last occasion, August 1, $100 million of bonds maturing in 1968 were not immediately cancelled but were held in the Securities Investment Account. They have since been cancelled.

The Capital Account of the Balance of Payments

Capital flows between Canada and the rest of the world during the past year and a half have been profoundly affected by the significant developments that occurred in the international monetary and exchange-rate field, as well as by the influence of cyclical economic factors upon credit conditions and by the pressure which developed in a number of the world's capital markets as they attempted to reconcile the liquidity requirements of the public and private sectors.

The net saving made available to Canada in 1967 by the rest of the world through the deficit on Canada's current account transactions was, at $543 million, among the lowest in the fifteen consecutive years for which deficits have now been recorded. It also represented a particularly sharp swing from the $1,162 million of the previous year. (A summary and details of capital movements in the balance of international payments are shown in reference tables 43 and 44). The net inflow into Canada resulting from all long-term capital transactions in 1967 was $1,339 million, the second highest level recorded since the second world war.

Over the year as a whole, the net outflow of short-term funds, $778 million, was nearly as large as the surplus of $796 million on current and long-term capital accounts, and only the difference of $18 million accrued to Canada's total of international reserve assets. Less than half ($286 million) of this very large net outflow of short-term funds reflected the switching of bank balances and like interest-arbitrage transactions. Roughly half a billion dollars, in other words, was accounted for by miscellaneous and to some extent unidentified short-term transactions, in which the termination and in some cases reversal of normal inter-corporate financing flows must have played a significant role.

A particularly interesting aspect of this outflow of "short-term" funds is that a majority of it (over $300 million) appears to have occurred in the first quarter of 1967, a period in which interest rates abroad tended to fall faster and further than in Canada, and the movements in bank balances and other interest-sensitive funds were strongly inwards into Canada. Apart from the international de-escalation of interest rates which was in progress, this was a period of comparative calm; neither the U.S. nor the U.K. payments position was giving cause for particular concern, nor was likely to occasion exceptional repatriation of corporate funds at that time. The Canadian dollar was particularly strong in the exchange markets during January 1967 although it weakened moderately thereafter.

The explanation of this substantial movement of non-banking funds therefore seems to be the divergence that was then already developing between the trends in corporate physical investment in Canada and the United States. While the cyclical trend in investment in Canada, as in most components of national expenditure, has normally tended to be quite closely parallel to that in the United States and slightly advanced in timing, 1967 saw an exceptionally pronounced and prolonged parting of the ways of the two economies. Shifts of working capital from Canadian subsidiaries to U.S. parent corporations would be a very likely consequence of such a development; normally, such capital is in many cases provided continuously by the parent to the subsidiary through the rolling-over of short-term advances.

The effect of this divergence in investment trends is also to be seen, though it is less marked, in the long-term capital account. Net direct investment in Canada by non-residents, though at the historically high level of $620 million, was nevertheless $90 million lower than in 1966. Borrowing through sales abroad of new issues of Canadian securities was also some $165 million lower, though again high in absolute terms ($1,300 million). The fact that the total net inflow of long-term capital was so high, and so much higher than in 1966, was due principally to factors unconnected with either private or public fixed investment during 1967 itself, namely: a much smaller schedule of retirements of earlier borrowings abroad, smaller outflows on portfolio transactions involving the repurchase of Canadian securities and large repayments to Canada of export credits extended in earlier years, particularly on wheat sales to communist countries.

Although net government borrowing abroad rose to an all-time peak in 1967, owing to a record volume of net provincial issues, the increase was offset entirely by a decline in net issues of corporate bonds. (Details of net new issues of bonds and debentures to non-residents are shown in reference table 45). There was also a small decline in net proceeds from stock issues which, together with the reduction in the inflow for direct investment, contributed to a marked contraction in financing by the business sector from abroad. In aggregate, proceeds from new issues placed abroad declined for the first time since 1960, but because there was also a smaller volume of retirements by the federal government (including special repurchases in connection with management of international reserves), net receipts remained virtually unchanged. However, the record volume of offerings in the United States raised the balance remaining for later delivery at the end of the year by some $248 million. Although long-term interest rates in Canada were rising substantially, the differential between Canadian provincial and U.S. long-term corporate rates did not change appreciably. The greater recourse to the U.S. capital market by governments was due as much to the problem of availability of funds in the domestic market, which worsened towards the end of the year, as to the lower cost of borrowing in the United States.

The lower level of net repurchases of outstanding Canadian securities contributed some $200 million to the rise in the total long-term capital inflow. Repurchases of Canadian stocks from non-residents were at the lowest level since 1960, and after the second quarter were exceeded by sales, leading to an inflow of capital in the second half of the year and also, for the first time since 1961, for the year as a whole. Net sales to U.S. residents at $83 million represented a swing of $178 million from the previous year. In total, the reversal from net repurchases to net sales of Canadian stocks was of the order of $148 million, to which was added $48 million as a result of smaller net repurchases of outstanding Canadian bonds, particularly those of the federal government.

The large increase in the inflow resulting from residual long-term capital transactions was largely associated with the sharp decline in wheat exports in 1967. Advances of export credits for wheat fell by $100 million, while repayments rose $66 million. Repayments of credits exceeded advances in every quarter of the year, and the total of net repayments amounted to $128 million. Export credit transactions for other commodities produced a slightly larger capital outflow. Other transactions yielded a capital inflow of $161 million, $104 million higher than in the previous year.

The long-term capital account showed one very clear effect of the pressure against the Canadian dollar and other currencies in the first quarter of 1968: net direct investment in Canada by non-residents fell away to a bare $5 million, and this was wholly accounted for by overseas interests, since there was net disinvestment on the part of U.S. residents. The first quarter is not a seasonally weak period for inward direct investment, which has never been much less than $80 million in that quarter of the last fifteen years, and had averaged about $130 million in 1965, 1966 and 1967. However, in the second quarter of the year the net direct investment flow into Canada amounted to $190 million.

Direct investment abroad by Canadians, on the other hand, was at the record level of $85 million in the first quarter of 1968, and this was not the result of one or a few outstandingly large individual transactions. Clearly, inward flows were delayed or cut as a result of the crisis, and outward flows accelerated or stepped-up. Other elements of the long-term capital account were less disrupted in the early months of 1968: new issues and retirements of Canadian securities both continued at about the (relatively high) levels of the fourth quarter of 1967; the net outflow resulting from trade in outstanding Canadian securities was again relatively small in the first quarter (by the standards of recent years) as a result of continuing net sales of common and preference stocks; the net outflow for the purchase of foreign securities was also, at $69 million, markedly lower than the $137 million average of the last two quarters of 1967, reflecting the liquidation of the federal government's holding of bonds of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. There were further net repayments to Canada of export credits in the first quarter, but a largely offsetting outflow in respect of other residual longer-term transactions.

The large unspecified element in short-term capital flows in 1967 has already been noted. Virtually the whole of the net identified outflow of about $300 million was accounted for by the foreign currency operations of the Canadian chartered banks, as net changes in foreigners' holdings of Canadian dollars and short-term money market instruments were small over the year as a whole. There were net inflows in both of these sectors of the account, however, in the last quarter of the year, as in all recent years except 1965. A seasonal pattern in corporate financing now appears to exert greater influence on these items than interest arbitrage considerations.

Banking flows, on the other hand, responded decisively to the rapid rundown in Eurodollar interest rates in the earlier part of 1967. Foreign currency swapped deposits by Canadian residents, which had already fallen away heavily in the last quarter of 1966, continued to decline through May; and other foreign currency deposits at the chartered banks by Canadians, which had risen enough in the fourth quarter of 1966 to offset most of the decline in swapped deposits, were now also run down in the first and second quarters of the new year. The banks, too, which had considerably increased their own net asset position abroad in the closing months of 1966, ran down this position in the first quarter, and increased it very little again over the second. The net result of these changes for the first half of 1967 was a $285 million decrease in foreign currency assets of Canadians and the net position of the banks, taken together (a net capital inflow into Canada of $376 million by the somewhat broader balance of payments definition). Partly offsetting this, however, was an outflow arising from a decrease of $92 million in the banks' foreign currency assets with Canadian residents.

By the end of the second quarter of 1967, the picture had changed drastically. Eurodollar rates had started to rise again early in May, and were soon followed in Canada by the rate on swapped deposits. At the same time, the money supply as conventionally defined had started a steep rise which was to continue for most of the rest of the year. In part this reflected structural changes resulting from the Bank Act, but in part also the efforts of the monetary authorities to temper the wind of international interest rate movements, as they had done during the rise of mid-1966 and the decline of early 1967. One virtually inevitable result, however, was a swing in banking flows across the exchanges which yielded net outflows of more than $300 million (balance of payments definitions) in both the third and fourth quarters. In the third quarter, swapped deposits were a relatively minor factor in the outflow abroad, which must rather have been fed by the proceeds of new issues of U.S.-pay securities. In the fourth quarter, however, swapped deposits rose by nearly a quarter of a billion dollars and accounted for the majority of the outflow.

By the end of the year, the net foreign currency asset position of the chartered banks with non-residents was approaching $1.3 billion, and it rose by a further $200 million during the first two months of 1968. In early March as one of a number of measures to strengthen the Canadian dollar (as noted earlier) the banks were requested not to facilitate further swap deposit business, and a fairly rapid run-down of such deposits then began.

A noteworthy feature of the Canadian exchange crisis, however, and of the whole of the first quarter of 1968 in which international monetary conditions were so unsettled, was the relatively slight effect it appears to have had on banking flows across the exchanges, and the modest part these flows played in the total outflow of funds from Canada. The only significant movement revealed by the quarterly figures, as shown in reference table 46, was a $200 million switch of foreign currency assets by the Canadian banks from U.S. to overseas (mainly U.K.) residents. Their net claims on all non-residents rose by only $49 million. Nor is it the case that the quarterly figures conceal particularly large ebbs and flows on a monthly basis. In terms of the balance of payments accounts "bank balances and other short-term funds abroad" showed an outflow of only $126 million, of which only a minor part is accounted for by the banking flows.

The total loss of $621 million in short-term funds during the first quarter (to which, in estimating the dollar effects of the exchange crisis, must be added at least $100 million of delayed inflows and accelerated outflows on long-term capital account) was in largest part accounted for by some $460 million of miscellaneous, and in many cases presumed, short-term transactions, including the balancing item.

Net short-term capital movements in the second quarter of 1968 were very small. Banking data for the period show a fairly substantial continued buildup of both assets and liabilities with non-residents, which involved little net change in the overall position over the period as a whole. During the quarter, however, there was a marked flow into and then again out of Canada as liabilities to Canadian residents in the form of swapped deposits were first run down sharply in accordance with the request made in March, and then up again by some quarter of a billion dollars in June, after the request was withdrawn.

(b) These miscellaneous adjustments largely represent revenues from miscellaneous direct and indirect taxes and adjustments for the supplementary period. In the National Accounts, revenues in the supplementary period are shifted into the following fiscal quarter.

(a) In the National Accounts, budgetary appropriations to various funds and agencies are replaced by the outlays actually made by these federal agencies.

(b) The largest components of this item consists of revenue from sales of goods and services by the government. These sales appear as final expenditure of the private sector and are deducted to avoid double counting.

(c) This item includes the supplementary period adjustment. In the National Accounts, expenditures on goods and services in the supplementary period are split evenly between adjacent fiscal quarters. Most other expenditure items are shifted entirely to the next fiscal quarter.

PART II REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1967-68

INTRODUCTION

This Part of the Budget Papers presents in summary form a review of the accounts of the Government of Canada for the fiscal year 1967–68. The fiscal year of the government ends on March 31 but the books must remain open for some time after that date to record various adjusting entries.

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1967-68

This section outlines the financial operations of the government in 1967–68 giving a brief summary of the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions, the unmatured debt transactions and the changes in the cash position and the debt position during the fiscal year. More detailed explanations are given in subsequent sections of this review.

The following table summarizes the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions for 1967–68 with comparative figures for 1966–67 and indicates how these transactions affected the government's cash balances.

Budgetary transactions

The budgetary revenue, expenditure and deficit as forecast in the budget speech of June 1, 1967, the revised figures as forecast on November 30, 1967 and the actual figures are shown in the following table:

Revenue

Budgetary revenue of the government amounted to $9,077 million for 1967–68. This was $38 million or about half of one per cent less than the revised figure of $9,115 million forecast on November 30, 1967 and $719 million or 9 per cent more than the total collected in 1966–67.

Tax revenue accounted for $577 million of the increase and non-tax revenue accounted for $142 million of the increase over 1966-67 receipts.

The yield from the income taxes was $470 million higher and from sales tax $88 million higher than in 1966-67.

Expenditure

Budgetary expenditure amounted to $9,869 million, $31 million or approximately one third of one per cent less than the revised figure of $9,900 million forecast on November 30, 1967 and $1,089 million or 12 per cent higher than expenditure in 1966–67.

Defence expenditure of $1,813 million was 18 per cent of total budgetary expenditure compared with $1,696 million or 19 per cent in 1966-67 and was again the largest category.

Civil or non-defence expenditure was $8,056 million compared with $7,084 million in 1966–67, an increase of $972 million. The main changes were increases of $222 million in fiscal, subsidy and other payments to provinces, $110 million in public debt charges, $71 million in the government's contributions to the provinces under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and $51 million in the net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board. Payments to provinces under the Canada assistance plan increased by $215 million in 1967–68, offset by a decrease of $137 million in respect of unemployment assistance. In addition to the above increases, expenditures of $106 million were made in respect of the new adult occupational training program for which there was no comparable expenditure in the previous fiscal year.

Deficit

On the basis of these preliminary figures, expenditures of $9,869 million exceeded revenues of $9,077 million resulting in a deficit of $792 million compared with a deficit of $785 million as forecast on November 30, 1967 and a deficit of $422 million in 1966-67.

Non-budgetary transactions (excluding unmatured debt transactions)

Non-budgetary transactions are those which increase or decrease the government's asset and liability accounts and do not enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit.

In 1967–68 net receipts and credits of $2,415 million exceeded net disbursements and charges of $2,210 million, resulting in a net receipt of $205 million. In 1966–67 net disbursements and charges totalled $2,565 million and net receipts and credits totalled $2,456 million, resulting in a net requirement of $109 million.

Old age security fund

Receipts by the fund during 1967–68 of $1,495 million exceeded payments of $1,388 million by $107 million. In 1966–67 receipts were $1,285 million and payments were $1,073 million.

The transactions in the fund during 1967-68 compared with those for 1966-67 were as follows:

Canada pension plan account

Receipts during 1967-68 were $685 million and disbursements were $13 million. In 1966-67 receipts were $600 million and disbursements were $8 million.

The transactions in the account during 1967-68 compared with those in 1966-67 were as follows:

	Fiscal year end 1968 (preliminary)	ed March 31 1967

Balance at April 1	681	89
Receipts	685	600
Disbursements	-13	-8

At March 31, 1968 the balance in the account consisted of an operating balance of $72 million on deposit with the government and provincial securities, purchased on instructions from the provinces, in the amount of $1,275 million and Government of Canada securities in the amount of $6 million recorded in the Canada pension plan investment fund.

Unmatured debt transactions

Unmatured debt transactions in 1967–68 reflected an increase of $788 million in unmatured debt outstanding in the hands of the public compared with an increase of $711 million in 1966–67.

Change in cash position

Receiver General bank balances in current deposits were $201 million more at March 31, 1968 than at March 31, 1967. This is the amount by which the increase of $788 million in outstanding unmatured debt plus the net receipt of $205 million from non-budgetary transactions exceeded the budgetary deficit of $792 million.

Change in debt position

As a result of budgetary and non-budgetary transactions the gross liabilities increased by $2,586 million to $32,926 million at March 31, 1968, net recorded assets increased by $1,794 million to $16,169 million and net debt increased by $792 million to $16,757 million.

THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

Total budgetary revenue was $9,077 million in 1967–68, budgetary expenditure was $9,869 million and the budgetary deficit was $792 million.

In 1967–68 a change in practice was introduced whereby revenues arising from Royal Canadian Mounted Police expenditures were credited thereto. This revenue totalled $31 million in 1967–68.

The figures shown in the following table for prior years have not been changed to reflect the effect of this new practice.

REVENUE

Budgetary revenue in 1967–68 was $9,077 million, $719 million or 9 per cent over the total of $8,358 million received in 1966–67. Tax revenue at $8,017 million accounted for 88 per cent of the total revenue for the fiscal year and non-tax revenue at $1,060 million accounted for 12 per cent.

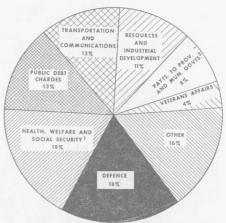

The more important items were increases of $376 million in personal income tax collections, $88 million in sales tax receipts, $77 million in corporation income taxes and $93 million in return on investments.

BUDGETARY REVENUE BY SOURCE

TAX REVENUE

Federal-provincial fiscal arrangements

Under fiscal arrangements, that became operative in 1962, the federal government withdrew in part from the field of direct taxation and left the vacated area to the provinces. The federal government offered to collect the provincial income taxes without charge provided that provincial personal income tax was expressed as a percentage of federal personal income tax otherwise payable and provincial corporation income tax applied to taxable income calculated in the same way as for federal income tax purposes. To allow for the imposition of the provincial income taxes, the Income Tax Act was amended to abate the federal income tax otherwise payable by individuals in all provinces by 24 per cent in 1966 and 28 per cent in 1967 and 1968. For 1966 the abatements of federal income tax otherwise payable in the Province of Quebec was 47 per cent; for 1967 and 1968, the corresponding abatement was 50 per cent. These higher abatements for Quebec are in compensation of the fact that the payment of youth allowances and the full cost of certain programs which are supported jointly by federal and provincial governments in the other provinces have been assumed by that province. For the year 1966 the federal corporation income tax rates were abated by 9 percentage points for taxable income earned in a province other than Quebec and by 10 percentage points for taxable income earned in Quebec. For 1967 and 1968 the corresponding abatement was 10 per cent for all provinces. The federal government has entered into tax-collection agreements under which it collects the provincial personal income taxes of all provinces except Quebec and the provincial corporation income taxes of all provinces except Ontario and Quebec.

Under these collection agreements, payments are made monthly to each province based on an estimate of that province's tax revenue. When the actual amounts of assessed returns are established, usually in the month of December following the end of the fiscal year, adjustments are made with the provinces.

Under the present fiscal arrangements, the federal government agreed to abate its estate tax by 50 per cent in the fiscal years 1962–63 and 1963–64, and by 75 per cent thereafter, in any province that imposed its own succession duties. To a province that did not wish to re-enter the succession duty field the federal government agreed to pay 50 per cent of the federal estate tax revenue in 1962–63 and 1963–64 and 75 per cent thereafter. During 1962–63, Quebec and Ontario collected their own succession duties while the other provinces received a payment in lieu of imposing duties. Starting in 1963–64 British Columbia joined Ontario and Quebec in imposing its own succession duties. When the estate tax abatement was raised to 75 per cent in 1964–65, British Columbia increased its succession duty rates accordingly but Quebec and Ontario preferred to take in lieu of the extra abatement a payment equivalent to 25 per cent of the federal estate tax in those provinces. This arrangement also carried into 1965–66, 1966–67 and 1967–68.

Tax on personal income

In 1967–68 personal income tax was again the largest source of government revenue. Its yield (excluding the old age security tax) was $2,850 million or 31 per cent of all budgetary revenue compared with $2,474 million or 30 per cent in 1966–67. The increase of $376 million was due mainly to a higher level of personal incomes in 1967–68 and partly due to a temporary surtax of 3 per cent on the basic tax in excess of $200. This temporary surtax applied in respect of tax imposed on 1968 and 1969 income.

In addition to the federal revenue, $961 million was allocated to the provincial tax collection agreements account under the terms of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements compared with $697 million in 1966-67.

The tax on personal incomes levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund was $800 million compared with $576 million in 1966–67. This increase of $224 million was due in part to higher levels of personal income in 1967–68 and in part to the fact that the maximum amount payable on account of this levy was raised from $120 to $240 per year effective January 1, 1967.

Corporation income tax

Corporation income tax was the second largest source of government revenue. The yield (excluding the old age security tax) was $1,671 million or 18 per cent of total budgetary revenue compared with $1,593 million or 19 per cent in 1966–67. The increase of $78 million was due mainly to the termination of the accelerated depreciation programs at the end of 1966 and early in 1967 and to the three year curtailment of capital cost allowances for certain classes of assets purchased between March 30, 1966 and April 1, 1967.

In addition to the federal revenue, $167 million was allocated to the provincial tax collection agreements account under terms of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements compared with $132 million in 1966–67.

The tax on incomes of corporations levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund was $150 million, the same amount as in 1966-67.

Taxes on dividends, interest, etc., going abroad

Revenue in this category was derived from taxes withheld from payments of dividends, interest, rents, royalties, alimony and income from estates and trusts paid to non-residents. Collections for 1967–68 were $221 million, an increase of $17 million or 8 per cent over the 1966–67 total.

PRINCIPAL SOURCES OF TAX REVENUE Fiscal Years Ended March 31 Millions of Dollars

Excise taxes

From a revenue standpoint the general sales tax was the most important tax levied under the Excise Tax Act. Receipts (excluding the old age security tax) were $1,601 million, $88 million or 6 per cent higher than 1966–67 receipts of $1,514 million. The increase was due in large part to an increase from 11 per cent to 12 per cent effective January 1, 1967, in the rate of the tax. The increase did not apply to building materials. Partially offsetting the revenue gain from this rate change was the exemption for drugs effective September 1, 1967 and the reduction of the rate of tax on production machinery and equipment to 6 per cent on April 1, 1967 and its elimination on June 2, 1967.

The rates of sales tax referred to above include a 3 per cent tax on sales levied under the Old Age Security Act. Revenue from this tax was $545 million compared with $560 million in 1966–67. Most of the decrease resulted from the elimination of the tax on production machinery and on drugs.

The yield from other excise taxes levied under the Excise Tax Act was $337 million, $21 million more than in 1966-67. The increase was due mainly to increased rates in the excise taxes on wines and tobacco and tobacco products.

Customs import duties

Receipts from this source were $746 million compared with $777 million in 1966-67, a decrease of $31 million.

Excise duties

Excise duties are levied on alcoholic beverages (other than wines) and tobacco products. (Additional taxes on tobacco products were levied under the Excise Tax Act.) Net receipts in 1967–68 were $489 million compared with $461 million in 1966–67. The increase of $28 million was due mainly to increased rates of duty effective December 1, 1967.

Gross receipts of $301 million from duties on alcoholic beverages consisted of $181 million in respect of spirits and $120 million in respect of beer and were $28 million higher than collections of $272 million in 1966–67 of which $158 million was in respect of spirits and $114 million in respect of beer.

Gross receipts of $195 million from duties on tobacco products were $1 million less than collections of $196 million in 1966-67.

Refunds and drawbacks of $7 million resulted in net excise duty collections of $489 million in 1967–68. In 1966–67 refunds and drawbacks were also $7 million and net receipts were $461 million.

Estate tax

Revenue in this category was derived under the Estate Tax Act. Net receipts of $102 million were $1 million more than in 1966-67.

Other taxes

Revenue under this heading during the fiscal year was $300 thousand compared with $200 thousand in 1966-67.

NON-TAX REVENUE

Non-tax revenue totalled $1,060 million compared with $918 million in 1966-67. The increase of $142 million was due mainly to increases of $93 million in return on investments and $28 million in post office revenue.

It is noted that Solicitor General vote 15, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1967, which covered administration, operation and maintenance costs of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, gave authority to credit thereto all revenue arising from services provided thereunder. Consequently such revenue, which consists mainly of services and service fees, proceeds from sales, and privileges, licences and permits, is not reflected in the accounts as revenue. For purposes of comparison the 1966–67 figures have been amended accordingly.

Receipts from Crown corporations at $448 million were $77 million more than in the previous year. The main changes were increases of $34 million in payments by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and $26 million in the Bank of Canada profits paid to the government.

The yield from other loans and investments at $164 million was $16 million more than the 1966–67 total. The main changes were increases of $13 million in earnings of the securities investment account and $7 million in interest on loans to the Municipal Development and Loan Board and a decrease of $5 million in profits from the exchange fund account.

Post office revenue

Gross receipts from post office operations were $327 million but authorized disbursements from revenue for salaries and rent allowances, other allowances and commissions at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub-offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through and delivered in foreign countries, etc. in the amount of $45 million brought net revenue to $282 million. In 1966–67 gross revenue was $295 million, authorized disbursements were $42 million and net revenue was $253 million.

Net costs of operating the Post Office Department during 1967–68 (excluding the $45 million charged to revenue) were $302 million. As net revenue was $282 million there was a net operating deficit of $20 million. In 1966–67 net revenue was $253 million, net operating costs were $268 million and the net operating deficit was $15 million. The higher receipts in 1967–68 resulted from increased postal rates and the increase in costs was due mainly to higher salary rates and to normal staff growth.

However, it should be noted that the total shown for post office revenue does not reflect any payment for the franking privilege covering parliamentary and departmental mail or for certain miscellaneous services provided for other government departments and agencies, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office Department or for accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

Services and service fees

Revenue from this source was $59 million compared with $49 million in 1966-67.

The Department of Transport received $27 million including aircraft landing fees of $15 million, marine steamers earnings of $5 million and harbour dues and wharfage of $2 million; the Department of Agriculture received $9 million of which $5 million was for services in connection with the inspection, weighing, storage and elevation of grain and $2 million for race track supervision; the Department of Finance received $7 million mainly from numismatic revenue; the Department of National Health and Welfare received $5 million including a $3 million reimbursement by the provinces for treatment of Indians in federal government hospitals and the Department of Trade and Commerce received $2 million, mainly from weights and measures and electricity and gas inspection fees.

Privileges, licences and permits

Revenue from this category totalled $42 million for 1967-68, $3 million more than in the previous fiscal year.

The Department of Transport received $19 million mainly from rentals, concessions and radio licence fees; the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development received $8 million of which $2 million was from fees, leases and royalties in respect of oil, gas and gold and $1 million from transient motor vehicle licences; the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs received $5 million from patents, trade marks, charters, etc. and the Department of Public Works received $4 million for rental of public buildings and sites.

Proceeds from sales

Receipts of $19 million were $3 million less than the total for 1966-67.

The Department of Defence Production received $4 million mainly from the sale of surplus Crown assets, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation received $3 million from the sales of properties and the Department of Public Printing and Stationery received $3 million mainly from the sales of publications.

Refunds of previous years' expenditure

Refunds in 1967-68 of expenditures made in prior years were $22 million, $5 million more than in 1966-67.

The Department of National Defence received $7 million of which $2 million was due to cost audits and $2 million was due to adjustments on contracts with the United States government and the Department of Veterans Affairs received $7 million in refunds of veterans' pensions, allowances and re-establishment credits.

Bullion and coinage

Revenue of $11 million derived from the operation of the Royal Canadian Mint consisted mainly of a net gain on coinage. Small amounts were also obtained from gold refining charges, handling charges and gain on gold refining. In 1966–67 revenue from the operation of the Mint totalled $5 million.

Premium, discount and exchange

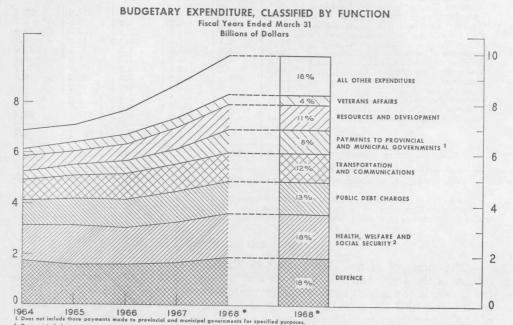

Premium, discount and exchange resulted in a net expenditure of $615 thousand in 1967–68 compared with a net revenue of $242 thousand in 1966–67.

Other non-tax revenue

Other non-tax revenue of $15 million was approximately the same amount as in 1966–67.

EXPENDITURE

Budgetary expenditure amounted to $9,869 million for 1967-68, $1,089 million or 12 per cent higher than in 1966-67.

2. Does not include pension payments out of the old age security fund not charged to budgetary expenditure in the year in which they were paid.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

Expenditures of the Department of National Defence and defence expenditures of the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Industry are again the largest category of government expenditure. The total of $1,813 million for 1967–68 was 18 per cent of the aggregate budgetary expenditure of the government for the year and was $117 million more than the total for 1966–67 when it was 19 per cent of total expenditure.

National Defence

Expenditures of the Department of National Defence were $1,754 million compared with $1,640 million for 1966-67, an increase of $113 million.

Expenditures of $1,528 million for defence services included $1,237 million for operation and maintenance, $278 million for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment and $13 million for development. In 1966-67 expenditures of $1,435 million for defence services included $1,183 million for operation and maintenance, $235 million for construction or acquisition and $17 million for development.

Expenditures for pensions and other benefits totalled $149 million and included $131 million in respect of the Canadian forces superannuation account, $8 million for the government's contribution as an employer to the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan and $9 million in payments under Parts I-IV of the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act. In 1966-67 expenditures totalled $135 million of which $115 million was in respect of the superannuation account, $10 million for the government's contribution as an employer to the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan and $9 million for payments under Parts I-IV of the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act.

The government's contribution to the Canadian forces superannuation account, of an amount equal to 12 times the contributions of the permanent services personnel, was $58 million compared with $43 million in 1966-67. An amount of $73 million, equal to one fifth of the actuarial deficiency arising out of pay increases was also charged to budgetary expenditure in 1967-68.

Defence research costs of $50 million reflected an increase of $6 million over the 1966-67 total.

Mutual aid to NATO countries including contributions towards military costs of NATO at $18 million were $1 million less than in 1966-67.

Defence Production

Defence expenditures of the Department of Defence Production including those for the Canada Emergency Measures Organization, the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the Canadian Arsenals Limited totalled $26 million compared with $25 million in 1966–67.

Payments to assist defence contractors with defence plant modernization and in connection with the establishment of production capacity and qualified sources for production of component parts and materials, which in previous years were included under expenditures of this department, are now included in defence expenditures of the Department of Industry. Previous year's figures have been adjusted for purposes of comparison.

Canada Emergency Measures Organization

Expenditures of the Canada Emergency Measures Organization at $8 million were $1 million less than in the previous fiscal year.

Canadian Commercial Corporation

Payments to the Department of Defence Production for administrative services in respect of this corporation totalled $2 million in 1967–68. There were no expenditures in the previous year.

Industry

Defence expenditures of the Department of Industry totalled $34 million in 1967–68, an increase of $3 million over the previous year's total.

Outlays of $23 million in connection with the government program instituted in 1959–60 of supporting selected defence development programs in order to sustain technological capability in Canadian industry were the same as the previous year's total and payments of $11 million to assist defence manufacturers with defence plant modernization and establishment of production capacity and qualified sources, which in previous years were included under defence expenditures of the Department of Defence Production, reflected an increase of $3 million during 1967-68. Previous year's figures have been amended for purposes of comparison.

Cash outlays for defence

In addition to these budgetary expenditures for defence, there are other cash outlays which must be considered in arriving at the cost of Canada's defence program.

Under authority of the Department of National Defence vote 48, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1966, as amended, an account which has been named "surplus Crown assets" is to be credited with: (a) all revenues received during the current and subsequent fiscal years from the sale of surplus materials, supplies and equipment; and (b) revenues received during the current and subsequent fiscal years from the sale during the current year of surplus buildings, works and land not exceeding an aggregate amount of $10 million. Expenditures are subject to the approval of Treasury Board for any purposes of the Department of National Defence. During 1967–68 proceeds from sales amounted to $9 million and expenditures were $2 million, resulting in a balance in the account of $31 million.

The Department of Defence Production also makes cash disbursements for the procurement of materials for use in the manufacture of defence equipment which are not recorded as budgetary expenditures. For purposes of accounting and control, these amounts are charged to the defence production revolving fund and are treated as assets on the books of the government until they are charged to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. During 1967–68 purchases of $35 million exceeded proceeds from sales of $30 million resulting in a balance of $39 million as at March 31, 1968.

NON-DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

Agriculture

Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture amounted to $277 million, an increase of $46 million over the total for 1966-67.

Outlays for production and marketing were $177 million compared with $139 million in 1966-67. The 1967-68 net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board at $140 million was $51 million higher than the 1966-67 operating loss of $89 million, due mainly to payments for stabilization of prices in respect of milk and milk products; the 1967-68 net operating loss of the agricultural products board at $1 million was $4 million lower than the 1966-67 net operating loss of $5 million; and outlays of $8 million in respect of plant and plant products were $12 million lower than 1966-67 outlays of $20 million.

Expenditures for research were $40 million compared with $35 million in 1966-67, for land rehabilitation, irrigation and water storage projects $22 million compared with $25 million, for health of animals $19 million compared with $16 million and for the Board of Grain Commissioners $10 million compared with $8 million.

Atomic Energy

Expenditures by the government in respect of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Atomic Energy Control Board amounted to $69 million compared with $60 million in 1966–67.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited received $66 million in respect of its research program, of which $57 million was for operation and maintenance and $9 million for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment. In 1966–67 the company received $58 million of which $48 million was for operation and maintenance and $10 million for construction or acquisition.

The Atomic Energy Control Board received $3 million, approximately $1 million more than in the previous fiscal year, mainly for grants for researches and investigations.

In addition, loans in the amount of $33 million were made to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

Payments of $143 million by the government to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and charged to budgetary expenditure were $28 million more than the total of $115 million in 1966–67 due in part to special Centennial and EXPO 67 activities which totalled $11 million in 1967–68 compared with $5 million in 1966–67.

Grants for net operating requirements in respect of the national broadcasting service were $140 million, $27 million more than in the previous fiscal year.

In addition, loans to the corporation for capital expenditure amounted to $21 million in 1967–68 and repayments of loans were $3 million.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation

Budgetary expenditure of the government in respect of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at $23 million was $3 million more than in 1966-67.

Payments of $10 million to provinces or municipalities for urban renewal were $2 million more than in 1966-67.

Loans in the amount of $8 million, originally made to municipalities and municipal sewerage corporations, were forgiven by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pursuant to section 36G of the National Housing Act, the same amount as in 1966–67.

In addition, loans in the amount of $767 million were made to the corporation in 1967-68 and repayments by the corporation were $133 million.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics

Expenditures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics totalled $23 million in 1967–68 compared with $27 million in the previous fiscal year.

Administration and operation expenditures at $23 million were $5 million higher than in 1966-67 but this increase was more than offset by the fact that there were no expenditures in 1967-68 for the 1966 Quinquennial Census which were $9 million in 1966-67.

Energy, Mines and Resources

Expenditures of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources including the Dominion Coal Board and the National Energy Board were $137 million compared with $130 million in 1966–67.

The increase was due mainly to outlays of $20 million in respect of research and investigations on water resources compared with $15 million in 1966-67 and $20 million in respect of marine surveys and research compared with $16 million in the previous fiscal year.

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs amounted to $216 million for 1967-68, $15 million less than the total for the previous fiscal year.

Expenditures of the external aid office were $135 million compared with $160 million in 1966–67. The decrease was due mainly to a decrease of $21 million in outlays under the international food aid program and to the fact that there was no expenditure in 1967–68 comparable to the $9 million in 1966–67 for forgiveness of the payment of principal re the purchase of wheat and flour by India.

Assessments for membership in international commissions and organizations were $13 million compared with $12 million in 1966–67, costs for construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings were $6 million compared with $3 million and administration, operation, maintenance and general costs were $42 million compared with $36 million.

Finance

Expenditures of the Department of Finance were $2,148 million, $312 million more than the previous year's total of $1,836 million, due mainly to increases of $110 million in public debt charges and $222 million in payments to provinces and a decrease of $25 million in forgiveness of indebtedness in respect of the municipal development and loan board.

Public debt charges

Public debt charges are again the third largest item of budgetary expenditure, exceeded only by those for defence and those for health, welfare and social security.

Public debt charges consist of interest on the public debt, the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, the cost of issuing new loans and other costs incurred in servicing the public debt. These charges were $1,301 million for 1967–68 or 13 per cent of all budgetary expenditure compared with $1,191 million or 14 per cent for 1966–67.

Interest on public debt totalled $1,270 million of which $981 million was in respect of unmatured debt and $289 million in respect of other liabilities. In 1966–67 total interest was $1,156 million of which $902 million was for unmatured debt and $254 million for other liabilities.

The increase of $79 million in interest on unmatured debt reflected higher interest rates and an increase in unmatured debt. The increase in interest on other liabilities was due mainly to increases of $13 million in respect of the public service superannuation account and $13 million in respect of the Canadian forces superannuation account.

Other public debt charges at $31 million were $4 million less than in 1966-67.

When considering the magnitude of these public debt charges and the burden they place upon the public treasury, it must be borne in mind that a substantial portion of the debt is attributable to, or is invested in, productive or earning assets. Therefore, in calculating the net burden of the government's annual interest charges, the income derived from loans, investments and other productive assets must be taken into account. This income totalled $612 million for 1967–68 as shown in the non-tax revenue section under the heading "return on investments". This amount deducted from the gross total of $1,270 million for interest as shown in the table leaves a net amount of $658 million compared with a net of $637 million in 1966–67. Measured as a percentage of the net debt the burden of the net annual interest charges was 3.92 per cent in 1967–68 compared with 3.99 per cent in 1966–67.

Fiscal, subsidy and other payments to provinces

Payments to provinces in the amount of $737 million were $222 million more than in 1966-67.

However, in addition to the above payments, $1,128 million in provincial income taxes collected by the federal government on behalf of the provinces has been allocated to the provincial tax collection agreements account under the terms of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. A more detailed explanation of these arrangements is given in the tax revenue section of this Part.

(3) Recovered from payments under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act.

Forgiveness of indebtedness, the municipal development and loan board

Under the Municipal Development and Loan Act, advances are made to the municipal development and loan board to provide financial assistance by way of loans to municipalities to augment or accelerate capital works programs. The act also provides that the board shall, under certain conditions, forgive payment by the municipality of 25 per cent of the principal amount of the loan. During 1967–68 payments forgiven amounted to $17 million compared with $42 million in the previous year.

Fisheries

Expenditures of the Department of Fisheries totalled $52 million, an increase of $10 million over the 1966–67 total, due to increases of $7 million in respect of fisheries management and development and $3 million in respect of the fisheries research board.

Forestry and Rural Development

Expenditures of the Department of Forestry and Rural Development totalled $81 million compared with $67 million in the previous fiscal year.

The increase was due mainly to payments of $27 million to provinces in respect of projects and programs under the Agricultural and Rural Development Act which were $9 million more than comparable payments of $18 million in 1966–67 in respect of the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act and $6 million in respect of progress payments for rural economic development for which there were no comparable expenditures in 1966–67.

Outlays for freight assistance and grain storage costs on western feed grains amounted to $21 million, the same as in the previous fiscal year.

Expenditures of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development amounted to $231 million compared with $197 million in 1966–67.

Outlays in respect of Indian affairs were $123 million compared with $103 million in 1966–67. There were increases of $11 million in outlays for development and maintenance of Indian communities and $7 million in education costs.

Outlays in respect of the northern program were $70 million compared with $57 million in 1966-67. There were increases of $4 million in outlays for regional development, $3 million in payments to governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and $3 million in respect of northern mineral assistance grants for which there was no comparative expenditure in 1966-67.

Conservation expenditures totalled $37 million compared with $36 million in 1966–67. Administration, operation and maintenance costs were $3 million compared with $2 million in 1966–67.

Industry

Non-defence expenditures of the Department of Industry were $85 million compared with $48 million in 1966-67.

The increase was due mainly to expenditures of $26 million to provide incentives for the development of industrial employment opportunities in designated areas in Canada compared with $1 million in 1966–67.

Previous year's figures have been adjusted for purposes of comparison. Expenditures amounted to $39 million compared with $36 million in the previous fiscal year.

Justice

Expenditures of the Department of Justice were $15 million compared with $12 million in 1966-67.

Judges salaries, allowances and pensions totalled $12 million compared with $9 million in 1966-67 and administration and general costs were $4 million compared with $3 million.

Manpower and Immigration

Expenditures of the Department of Manpower and Immigration were $422 million compared with $321 million in 1966-67.

Expenditures in respect of development and utilization of manpower totalled $389 million compared with $295 million in the previous fiscal year. These expenditures included payments of $86 million to provinces under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act compared with $85 million in the previous fiscal year, payments of $119 million for capital assistance in the provision of training facilities and for assistance in manpower training research compared with $136 million, payments of $106 million to and in respect of persons who are being afforded occupational training under the adult occupational training program, for which there was no comparable expenditures in 1966–67, payments of $31 million to provinces and in respect of Indian bands under the municipal winter works incentive program, $8 million less than in 1966–67, and outlays of $32 million for employment services compared with $33 million in the previous fiscal year.

Outlays of $21 million in respect of immigration were $1 million more than in 1966-67 and outlays in respect of program development totalled $7 million compared with $1 million in the previous fiscal year.

National Health and Welfare

Expenditures of the Department of National Health and Welfare at $1,488 million were $172 million more than the previous year's total of $1,316 million, due mainly to increases of $65 million for welfare services and $101 million in respect of health insurance and resources.

Outlays for welfare services amounted to $877 million compared with $812 million in 1966-67; outlays for health insurance and resources were $549 million compared with $447 million; and outlays for medical services were $43 million compared with $39 million in the previous fiscal year.

Family allowances

Family allowances are payable in respect of all children under sixteen years of age, resident in Canada, with minor exceptions such as in the case of children of immigrants who must reside in Canada one year before an allowance is payable. The monthly allowance is $6 if the child is under 10 years of age and $8 in the age group 10 to 15. Children of immigrants receive family assistance at the same rates during their first year of residence in Canada.

In 1967-68 payments of $559 million accounted for 6 per cent of all budgetary expenditure compared with $556 million and 7 per cent in 1966-67.

Youth allowances

Under provision of the Youth Allowances Act allowances of $10 per month are payable in respect of persons resident in Canada who have attained the age of 16 years and have not attained the age of 18 years who are in full time attendance at a school or university or are by reason of mental or physical infirmity precluded from attending school or university. In 1967–68 payments totalled $49 million, $2 million more than in 1966–67.

No payments were made under this act in respect of persons resident in the Province of Quebec. However, under authority of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 abatements in federal income taxes otherwise payable by individuals resident in the Province of Quebec were allowed in compensation of the fact that the payment of youth allowances had been assumed by the province and to allow for the imposition of the required provincial income taxes.

Canada assistance plan

The Canada assistance plan was enacted in 1966 authorizing the making of contributions to provinces by Canada towards the cost of programs for the provision of assistance and welfare services to and in respect of persons in need.

The act authorizes the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for sharing the costs of assistance and welfare services provided by provinces, territories and municipalities to persons in need, including care of such persons in welfare institutions, health care services, care of children in foster homes and costs of extending and improving welfare services.

Payments to provinces under the Canada assistance plan amounted to $226 million compared with $11 million in the previous fiscal year. The substantial increase of $215 million was partially offset by decreases in payments in respect of unemployment assistance ($137 million), old age assistance ($11 million), disabled persons allowances ($8 million) and blind persons allowances ($1 million).

Old age assistance, blind persons allowances, disabled persons allowances and unemployment assistance

Under the Old Age Assistance Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $75 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who have attained the age of 65 years. (Under the Old Age Security Act, as amended, all persons who satisfy the residence requirements of the act may receive a pension of $76.50 ($75 up to January 1, 1968) per month from the federal government out of the old age security fund provided that no pension is paid in any month before January 1966 in which the person had not attained 70 years of age, the age limit being reduced by one in each subsequent year until 1970. An amendment to the Old Age Security Act authorized, effective January 1, 1967, the payment of a monthly guaranteed income supplement to eligible pensioners. The amount of the supplement that may be paid to a pensioner for a month is (a) in the year 1967, $30, and (b) in any year after 1967, 40 per cent of the amount of the pension that may be paid to him for that month, dependent upon the amount of his income for the preceding year.)

Similarly, the federal government reimburses the provinces under the Blind Persons Act for allowances of not more than $75 per month to blind persons in need 18 years of age or over by paying 75 per cent of the total payments, and under the Disabled Persons Act by paying 50 per cent of not more than $75 per month for allowances to disabled persons in need 18 years of age or over.

In 1967–68 payments for old age assistance amounted to $9 million, for disabled persons allowances $7 million and for blind persons allowances $2 million. In 1966–67 payments were $20 million for old age assistance, $15 million for disabled persons allowances and $3 million for blind persons allowances. The Province of Quebec has opted out of these programs under federal-provincial agreement.

Under the Unemployment Assistance Act, the Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into an agreement with any province for the payment by Canada to the province of contributions not exceeding 50 per cent of unemployment assistance costs in the province. Contributions in 1967–68 were $6 million compared with $143 million in 1966–67. Under federal-provincial agreement the Province of Quebec has opted out of a portion of this program.

The decreases noted above were due mainly to the fact that certain contributions to the provinces which in prior years were made under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Unemployment Assistance Act are now being made under the Canada Assistance Plan. The decrease in old age assistance payments was also due to the lowering of the age limit for old age security benefits.

The following table presents a distribution of these payments to provinces for 1967–68:

Post Office

Costs of the Post Office Department charged to budgetary expenditure at $302 million were $33 million more than in 1966-67 due mainly to normal staff growth and to salary increases.

Costs of operations at $206 million were $24 million more than in the previous fiscal year and costs of movement of mail at $87 million were $8 million more.

Remuneration of postmasters and staffs at revenue and semi-staff offices and certain other authorized disbursements are paid from revenue. These payments at $45 million ($3 million more than in 1966-67) brought gross post office expenditures to $347 million in 1967-68.

Public Works

Expenditures of the Department of Public Works totalled $309 million, $14 million more than in 1966-67.

Accommodation services

Expenditures for these services were $134 million, $25 million higher than the 1966-67 total.

Costs of maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds were $85 million compared with $76 million in 1966-67, costs of construction or acquisition of buildings, etc. were $48 million compared with $32 million and costs of acquisition of equipment and furnishings other than office furnishings were $1 million compared with $1 million in 1966-67.

Roads, bridges and other engineering services

Expenditures for these services totalled $84 million, $12 million less than in 1966-67. Contributions of $65 million to provinces in respect of the Trans-Canada highway were $16 million less than in 1966-67.

Harbours and rivers engineering services

Expenditures for these services totalled $44 million, $6 million higher than in 1966–67 due mainly to an increase of $6 million in outlays for construction or acquisition, etc. of harbour and river works which amounted to $35 million in 1967–68.

National Capital Commission

Expenditures of the National Capital Commission were $23 million compared with $33 million in the previous fiscal year.

Payments into the national capital fund were $15 million, $10 million less than in 1966-67. Outlays for the operation and maintenance of parks, parkways, etc. at $5 million and interest charges of $3 million were slightly higher than in the previous year.

Secretary of State

Expenditures of the Department of the Secretary of State were $190 million compared with $134 million in 1966-67.

Payments to provinces for post-secondary education, pursuant to Part II of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1967, totalled $108 million. In prior years the government made comparable payments to the association of universities and colleges of Canada for the purpose of making grants to universities of higher learning. These payments amounted to $87 million in 1966-67.

Centennial Commission expenditures of $31 million were $1 million higher than in 1966-67 due mainly to an increase in outlays for programs and projects of national significance.

The Canada Council received a grant of $17 million in 1967-68 for the purposes of the arts, humanities and social sciences, for which there was no comparable expenditure in the previous year.

Expenditures of the National Arts Centre for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment were $20 million, $13 million higher than in 1966-67.

Outlays of $4 million in respect of the translation bureau, $4 million in respect of the National Museum of Canada and $3 million in respect of citizenship were in each case $1 million more than in the previous fiscal year.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Net expenditures of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were $88 million, $4 million more than in 1966-67.

However, in 1967–68 authority was granted by Vote 15, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1967, which covers expenditures for administration, operation and maintenance, to credit thereto revenue arising from expenditures under that vote. This revenue amounted to $31 million and included $30 million for policing certain provinces, territories and municipalities. In 1966–67 revenue amounted to $18 million of which $17 million was for policing services. The increase in revenue from policing services was due to an increase in the rates and in the number of employees required for these services and due to payments of $4 million collected in 1967–68 which were applicable to the previous year.

Correctional services

Expenditures of $65 million in respect of correctional services were $5 million more than in 1966-67 and included outlays of $39 million for operation and maintenance of penitentiaries compared with $37 million in 1966-67 and outlays of $23 million for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment compared with $20 million in the previous fiscal year.

Trade and Commerce

Expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce including the Canadian Wheat Board were $81 million compared with $73 million in 1966-67. The main changes were increases of $4 million in outlays in respect of the Canadian Wheat Board and $2 million in administration and general costs.

Transport

Expenditures of the Department of Transport including the Atlantic Development Board, the Canadian Transport Commission and the National Harbours Board totalled $607 million compared with $568 million in 1966-67.

Expenditures in respect of the Air Transport Board, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and the Canadian Maritime Commission were transferred to the control of the Canadian Transport Commission under this department and capital subsidies for the construction of commercial and fishing vessels, which were previously included under expenditures of the Canadian Maritime Commission, are now included under non-defence expenditure of the Department of Industry. Previous year's figures have been adjusted for purposes of comparison.

(2) Less than $50,000.

Air services

Outlays of $175 million for air services were $10 million higher than in 1966-67. There was an increase of $15 million in respect of administration, operation and maintenance and a decrease of $6 million in respect of construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment.

Canadian Transport Commission

Expenditures of $157 million in respect of the Canadian Transport Commission included $126 million for payments under the National Transportation Act, $15 million for contributions to the railway grade crossing fund, $11 million for steamship subventions, $1 million for subsidies to air carriers and $4 million for administration and general. In 1966–67 total expenditures were $150 million which included $116 million for payments to the railways for the maintenance of the rates of freight traffic, $15 million for contributions to the railway grade crossing fund, $11 million for steamship subventions, $5 million for maintenance of trackage, $3 million for administration and general and $355 thousand for subsidies to air carriers.

Railways and steamships

Expenditures for these services totalled $109 million compared with $87 million in the previous fiscal year.

Costs of construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land, dock and terminal facilities at $25 million were $3 million less than in 1966–67; payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act at $14 million were the same as in 1966–67; and the subsidy of $5 million in respect of a railway to Great Slave Lake was $3 million higher than in the previous year.

The charge of $36 million to budgetary expenditure in 1967-68 to cover the 1967 operating deficit of the Canadian National Railways was $11 million more than the charge of $25 million in 1966-67 to cover the railway's 1966 operating deficit.

Marine services

Outlays of $101 million for marine services were $1 million more than in 1966-67. Included in these expenditures were $55 million for administration, operation and maintenance compared with $51 million in 1966-67 and $46 million for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land, vessels and equipment compared with $49 million in the previous year.

Atlantic Development Board

Outlays of $42 million in respect of the Atlantic Development Board were $2 million higher than in 1966–67. Outlays for the federal share of the cost of a trunk highway program for the Atlantic provinces totalled $19 million compared with $9 million in 1966–67 and payments to the Atlantic Development Fund were $19 million compared with $30 million in 1966–67.

Canals and works entrusted to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority

Expenditures of $11 million were $2 million less than in 1966–67. The 1967 operating deficit of the Welland Canal, in the amount of $8 million, charged to budgetary expenditure was $2 million less than the 1966 deficit of $10 million which was charged to 1966–67 expenditures.

National Harbours Board

Non-active advances to the board which were charged to budgetary expenditure totalled $5 million, $2 million less than in 1966–67. The net decrease reflects decreases in respect of reconstruction and capital expenditures of the Halifax harbour and $1 million in the operating deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge, Montreal, offset by an increase of $1 million in respect of reconstruction and capital expenditure of the Quebec harbour.

Treasury Board

Expenditures of the Treasury Board amounted to $159 million, an increase of $5 million over the total for 1966-67.

Public service superannuation account

The government's contribution to the public service superannuation account, in an amount equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1966-67, was $60 million, the same as in 1966-67.

A further amount of $61 million, equal to one fifth of the actuarial deficiencies arising out of pay increases, was also charged to budgetary expenditure, compared with $56 million in 1966-67.

Canada's contributions as an employer

These contributions totalled $21 million compared with $20 million in 1966-67. The main item was $17 million to the Canada and Quebec pension plans compared with $17 million in 1966-67.

All Other Departments

Expenditures of the departments not dealt with individually amounted to $72 million, an increase of $15 million over the total for 1966–67.

Expenditures which in previous years were shown under the Department of the Registrar General are now under the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which was established by the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act, as passed by the House of Commons on November 27, 1967.

The main changes were increases of $5 million for the Privy Council Office due mainly to increases of $2 million in outlays for state visits and $2 million in respect of the Company of Young Canadians, and $3 million for the Public Service Commission due mainly to increased expenditures in respect of the bilingual and bicultural development program.

SUMMARY

The gross liabilities of the government totalled $32,926 million at March 31, 1968 compared with $30,340 million at March 31, 1967. The main changes were increases of $1,137 million in annuity, insurance and pension accounts, $640 million in unmatured debt, $639 million in current and demand liabilities and $103 million in deposit and trust accounts.

Net recorded assets totalled $16,169 million at March 31, 1968 compared with $14,375 million at March 31, 1967. The main changes were increases of $1,211 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations, $665 million in the Canada pension plan investment fund, $232 million in other loans and investments and $136 million in current assets, and decreases of $322 million in advances to the exchange fund account and $90 million in deferred charges.

The net debt of Canada, or the excess of liabilities over net recorded assets, was $16,757 million at March 31, 1968 compared with $15,965 million at March 31, 1967.

LIABILITY ACCOUNTS

Current and demand liabilities

These liabilities, which consist of obligations of the government payable currently or on demand, in the amount of $2,311 million were $639 million more than the total at March 31, 1967.

The main changes were increases of $450 million in non-interest-bearing notes, $66 million in accounts payable, $45 million in outstanding treasury cheques and $50 million in interest due and outstanding.

Non-interest-bearing notes represent those portions of Canada's equities in the capital of certain international agencies which are not covered by cash or gold. Notes in respect of the international monetary fund in the amount of $791 million were $452 million more than at March 31, 1967 and notes in respect of the international development association were $3 million less than at March 31, 1967.

Public service superannuation account

The balance of $2,876 million in this account was $186 million higher than the balance at the end of the previous fiscal year.

Receipts of $270 million during the year included credits of $22 million to provide for additional liabilities arising out of salary revisions made in 1967–68, contributions of $72 million by individuals, the government's contribution of $60 million, contributions of $5 million by certain Crown corporations and interest of $111 million credited to the account by the government. Contributions by the government were equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1966–67. Contributions by Crown corporations were equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1967–68. Interest at 4 per cent per annum is credited to the account quarterly and is computed quarterly on the outstanding balance at the end of the previous quarter.

The credit of $22 million to provide for additional liabilities arising out of salary increases was charged to the asset account "unamortized portions of actuarial deficiencies".

Disbursements totalled $84 million and included $68 million in annuities and $11 million in withdrawals of contributions.

In 1966–67 receipts totalled $374 million and disbursements totalled $75 million.

Receipts of $198 million included $34 million in contributions by personnel, $58 million in regular government contributions and $105 million in interest credited by the government. Regular government contributions are made at the rate of one and two-thirds times the current and prior service contributions by personnel. Interest at 4 per cent per annum is credited to the account quarterly and is computed quarterly on the outstanding balance at the end of the previous quarter.

Disbursements of $52 million included $46 million in pensions and retiring allowances and $6 million in cash termination allowances and return of contributions.

In 1966-67 receipts were $439 million and disbursements were $46 million.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account

The balance of $105 million in this account as at March 31, 1968 was $20 million more than the previous fiscal year-end balance of $85 million.

Receipts during the year of $21 million consisted of $3 million in contributions by personnel, $3 million in interest credited to the account, $4 million in contributions by the government and $10 million as a result of actuarial evaluations.

The credit of $10 million for actuarial evaluation, which consisted of $8 million as a result of the quinquennial actuarial valuation made as at December 31, 1964 and $2 million arising from salary increases, was charged to the asset account "unamortized portions of actuarial deficiencies".

Disbursements of $1 million consisted of annuities and allowances, cash termination allowances and return of contributions.

In 1966-67 receipts were $21 million and disbursements were $1 million.

Government annuities account

The balance in this account of $1,326 million was $2 million higher than the balance at March 31, 1967. Receipts of $70 million included $19 million from premiums and $51 million in interest from the government. Disbursements of $68 million consisted mainly of vested annuity and commuted value payments and refunds of premiums. In 1966-67 receipts amounted to $72 million and disbursements were $65 million.

Old age security fund

Under the Old Age Security Act, as amended, all persons who satisfy the residence requirements of the act may receive a pension of $76.50 ($75 up to January 1, 1968) per month from the federal government out of the old age security fund provided that no pension is paid in any month before January 1966 in which the person had not attained 70 years of age, the age limit being reduced 29180-91 by one in each subsequent year until 1970. A further amendment to the act in 1966–67 authorized the payment of a monthly guaranteed supplement to eligible pensioners of $30 per month in 1967 and, in any year thereafter, 40 per cent of the amount of the pension that may be paid to him dependent upon the amount of his income for the preceding year.

Receipts of $1,495 million exceeded pension payments of $1,388 million by $107 million bringing the balance in the fund to $536 million at March 31, 1968.

In 1966-67 receipts of $1,286 million exceeded pension payments of $1,073 million by $213 million, bringing the balance in the fund to $430 million at March 31, 1967.

Undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts

These special accounts record the undisbursed balances of appropriations for which moneys have been appropriated by parliament and from which disbursements may be made for authorized purposes in periods subsequent to that in which the appropriation was made. The balance of $93 million was $17 million more than the balance at March 31, 1967.

The balance of $65 million in the international assistance account was $3 million more than the balance at March 31, 1967. Disbursements of $47 million from the fund were more than offset by a credit of $50 million which amount was charged to budgetary expenditure of the Department of External Affairs.

The balance of $10 million in the railway grade crossing fund was $1 million less than the balance at the previous year-end. There was a credit of $15 million to the fund (charged to budgetary expenditure of the Department of Transport) and disbursements from the fund were $16 million.

The balance of $7 million in the centennial of confederation fund was $3 million more than the balance at March 31, 1967. The credit of $13 million to the fund (charged to budgetary expenditure of the Department of the Secretary of State) was partly offset by disbursements of $10 million.

The balance of $11 million in the area development account resulted from credits to the account of $26 million (charged to the budgetary expenditures of the Department of Industry) being partly offset by disbursements of $15 million. There was a nil balance in the account at March 31, 1967.

Refundable corporation tax

This account records the refundable corporation tax on cash profits of businesses, and is payable by all corporations not exempt from tax under section 62 of the Income Tax Act and by certain types of trusts on specified types of income. During the year, $39 million was collected, bringing the balance at March 31, 1968 to $235 million.

Provision for estimated premium on redemption of bonds

This records the estimated amount of the prorated provision to March 31, 1968 for the premium due at maturity on the then outstanding 1959 series of Canada savings bonds and the estimated amount of the prorated provision to March 31, 1968 for the special compound interest feature applicable to the centennial series of Canada savings bonds.

Deferred credits

Recorded in these accounts are amounts due the government in respect of which payment is deferred. These are contra accounts to corresponding items under the following asset categories: "loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations", "loans to national governments" and "other loans and investments". The balance of $150 million was $7 million more than the balance at March 31, 1967.

Also included in this category are premiums, received on the issue of Government of Canada bonds, which are being credited to interest on public debt on a monthly amortization basis.

Deferred interest in respect of The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, which is a contra account to a corresponding item in "loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations", increased by $7 million during the year bringing the balance at March 31, 1968 to $55 million.

The government equity in the agency account of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is a contra account to a corresponding asset account under "other loans and investments". The balance in the account of $7 million was the same as at the end of the previous fiscal year.

The stockpiling of uranium concentrates account records the acquisition of uranium concentrates in accordance with contracts entered into with the approval of the Governor in Council by the Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada with certain mining companies. The balance at March 31, 1968 was $75 million, $18 million higher than the balance at the previous year-end.

Cash in blocked currency

The balance in this account was $2 million, the same as at March 31, 1967.

Notes of Industrias Forestales, S.A. and Compania Manufacturera de Papeles y Cartones, S.A., held by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, and which were due in 1965 and 1966, could not be paid in accordance with their terms because the Chilean Government was unable to make available the necessary Canadian currency. An alternative scheme was devised whereby the debtors could make their payments on the notes.

The Export Credits Insurance Corporation received the payments in Chile in Canadian dollars and the amount upon receipt was paid to the Receiver General of Canada into a blocked account established by the Receiver General with the Central Bank of Chile, the Government of Chile to pay interest of 6 per cent per annum on the sums held in this account in dollars directly to the Receiver General of Canada in Ottawa.

The Government of Chile agreed to the withdrawal of these funds from this account of 20 per cent of the deposits made to the account in 1965 in each of the years 1968 to 1972 and 20 per cent of the deposits made to the account in 1966 in each of the years 1969 to 1973.

Advances to the exchange fund account

Advances during the year to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange amounted to $1,508 million and repayments were $1,830 million, resulting in a net decrease of $322 million bringing the outstanding advances to $2,033 million at March 31, 1968.

During 1966-67 advances of $1,098 million and repayments of $1,439 million resulted in a balance of $2,355 million at March 31, 1967.

Investments in United States dollar securities issued by other than the Government of Canada

This account includes the special securities issued by the Government of the United States of America and purchased by Canada pursuant to agreements made to carry out the Columbia River Treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada. During 1967–68 securities in the amount of $32 million were redeemed leaving a balance of $123 million.

Also included at March 31, 1967 was an investment in bonds of the international bank for reconstruction and development, which amounted to $25 million. During 1967–68 these bonds were liquidated leaving a nil balance at March 31, 1968.

Canada pension plan investment fund

The Canada pension plan investment fund records securities purchased under the Canada Pension Plan Act and the sale of these securities. The amount by which the operating balance of the Canada pension plan account in any month exceeds the estimated amount required to meet all payments in the following three-month period is available for the purchase of securities of participating provinces. Securities of Canada shall be purchased with the excess remaining after purchasing securities of each province as required. The holdings in the account at March 31, 1968 totalled $1,281 million of which $6 million was in federal government securities.

There was a balance of $139 million in this account at March 31, 1968 consisting of an investment of $15 million by the government in capital stock and loans of $124 million of which $70 million was in respect of the Douglas Point generating station. Comparable amounts at March 31, 1967 were $106 million consisting of $15 million in capital stock and loans of $91 million of which $67 million was for the Douglas Point generating station.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

There was no change in the advances for working capital during 1967–68, the balance remaining at $9 million at March 31, 1968. During the year advances to the corporation for the purpose of capital expenditures were $18 million, bringing the total of advances to $74 million at the fiscal year-end. Recovery of these advances is likely to require parliamentary appropriations in subsequent fiscal years.

Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition

This account records the acquisition of securities issued by the corporation in accordance with the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act. The balance in the account at March 31, 1968 was $205 million compared with $175 million at March 31, 1967. Recovery of these advances is likely to require parliamentary appropriations in subsequent fiscal years.

Canadian National Railways (including Air Canada)

Outstanding advances to the Canadian National Railways at March 31, 1968 of $1,785 million were $164 million more than the balance of $1,621 million at the previous fiscal year-end.

In 1967-68 the government advanced to the company $121 million for capital purposes and the refunding of debt in the hands of the public.

To assist the company to finance further capital expenditure during the year, the government purchased $30 million of the 4 per cent preferred stock of the company. This stock is issued under the authority of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, in an amount equal to 3 per cent of the gross revenue of the company.

The government provided the company with temporary loans of $36 million in respect of its 1967 deficit which were repaid when the company's income deficit of $36 million was charged to the 1967–68 budgetary expenditures and $13 million in respect of its 1968 operations.

At March 31, 1967 temporary loans of $7 million were outstanding to Air Canada in respect of its 1967 operations. An additional $4 million was advanced during the year for its 1967 operations. These were repaid by the company during 1967–68. However, additional loans of $8 million were made in 1967–68 in respect of the company's 1968 operations.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation

The balance of $3,575 million in this account at March 31, 1968 was $634 million higher than at March 31, 1967, and comprised the Crown's investment of $25 million in the capital of the corporation and $3,550 million in loans and advances.

Loans and advances to the corporation during 1967–68 were $767 million and repayments were $133 million. In 1966–67 advances were $615 million and repayments were $126 million.

Advances comprised $680 million for direct lending and limited dividend housing, $14 million for federal-provincial projects, $29 million in respect of municipal sewage treatment, $43 million for university housing and $1 million for urban renewal.

Repayments of $133 million included $100 million for direct lending and limited dividend housing, $3 million for federal-provincial projects, $15 million for the loan and mortgage purchase fund, $12 million for sewage treatment and $2 million in respect of acquisition or construction of real estate.

Export Credits Insurance Corporation

The outstanding balance of $199 million in this account at March 31, 1968 consisted of $5 million for capital stock, $5 million for working capital and $189 million for loans under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act. This section of the act authorizes the making of loans, on security of a guaranteed instrument, to the corporation by the Minister of Finance. Comparable amounts in 1966–67 were $5 million for capital stock, $5 million for working capital and $154 million for loans.

Farm Credit Corporation

The government provides loans to the corporation which makes loans on farm property. The balance of $922 million in the account at March 31, 1968 consisted of the Crown's investment of $36 million in the capital of the corporation and $886 million in loans and advances. At March 31, 1967 the balance was $753 million consisting of capital investment of $29 million and loans and advances of $724 million.

The 1967-68 transactions in the account consisted of additional subscriptions by the government of $7 million to the capital of the corporation, loans and advances of $195 million and repayments by the corporation of $33 million. In 1966-67 additional subscriptions were $6 million, loans and advances were $183 million and repayments were $25 million.

National Capital Commission

Loans to acquire property in the "Greenbelt" area increased by $1 million during the year bringing the balance to $38 million. Recovery of these loans is likely to require parliamentary appropriations in subsequent fiscal years.

Loans to acquire property excluding the "Greenbelt" area totalled $37 million at March 31, 1968, the same as at March 31, 1967.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority

Outstanding obligations in this account at March 31, 1968 amounted to $492 million and comprised $363 million in interest-bearing loans, $75 million in interest-free loans and $54 million in deferred interest. At March 31, 1967 outstanding obligations were $465 million consisting of $345 million in interest-bearing loans, $72 million in interest-free loans and $48 million in deferred interest.

Other Crown Corporations

Advances to the Canadian Commercial Corporation increased by $7 million during 1967-68 and advances to the National Harbours Board increased by $28 million.

Loans to national governments

There was an increase of $4 million in this category bringing the total balance to $1,206 million at March 31, 1968.

The United Kingdom repaid $19 million of the $1,185 million loan made under the $1,250 million credit authorized by the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, reducing the principal to $957 million at March 31, 1968.

Advances under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act to Belgium, France and The Netherlands to assist them in the purchasing of goods in Canada were reduced by a repayment of $2 million, bringing the balance at March 31, 1968 to $120 million. The decrease of $2 million is the regular annual payment by the Government of Belgium. There were no repayments by the Governments of France and The Netherlands as each of these countries had made advance payments in 1962–63 covering instalments up to and including the 1969 instalment.

Loans to India for the purchase in Canada of aircraft and associated spare parts at $1 million were $3 million less than at March 31, 1967.

The special loan assistance—developing countries account is an account which records loans which are subject to terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, for the purpose of undertaking agreed-upon economic, educational and technical projects. The balance in the account at March 31, 1968 was $44 million, an increase of $29 million over the balance at the previous year-end.

Canada's subscriptions to the capital of international organizations were $17 million higher due mainly to additional subscriptions of $15 million to the international development association. Working capital advances and loans to international organizations at $7 million were approximately the same as at the previous fiscal year-end.

Loans to provincial governments totalled $188 million at March 31, 1968, an increase of $64 million over the total at the previous fiscal year-end due mainly to increases of $10 million in loans to Newfoundland, $11 million to Nova Scotia and $8 million to New Brunswick pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act and to the setting up as loans overpayments of $38 million arising out of payments made under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

The veterans land act fund was established by An Act to amend the Veterans' Land Act, assented to June 30, 1965, to record advances made under the Veterans' Land Act, for the acquisition, by the Director, of properties, buildings, materials, livestock, farm equipment and commercial fishing equipment for purposes of the act, for sale to qualified veterans of world war 2 and Korea under sales agreements which carry specified conditional benefits if the terms of such agreements are adhered to by the veterans, and for progress payments to veterans during construction of housing. Advances during the year of $103 million and repayments of $30 million brought outstanding advances at March 31, 1968 to $406 million. This was partly offset by a reserve for conditional benefits amounting to $23 million, resulting in a net balance of $383 million at the fiscal year-end.

Under the Municipal Development and Loan Act advances are made to the Municipal Development and Loan Board to provide financial assistance by way of loans to municipalities to augment or accelerate municipal capital works programs. Where the municipal project in respect of which a loan is made is completed on or before September 30, 1966, the board shall forgive payment by the municipality of 25 per cent of the principal amount of the loan. If a project is not completed as at September 30, 1966, the board shall forgive 25 per cent of that portion of the loan that has been advanced to the municipality as of September 30, 1966. At March 31, 1968, advances totalled $281 million, an increase of $44 million over the total at March 31, 1967. These advances were partly offset by a reserve for forgiveness of indebtedness consisting of amounts charged to budgetary expenditure to cover 25 per cent of the amounts of the advances. At March 31, 1968, there was a reserve of $200 thousand compared with $5 million at March 31, 1967.

Miscellaneous loans and investments totalled $121 million at March 31, 1968, an increase of $30 million over the balance at March 31, 1967, due mainly to loans of $10 million for defence plant modernization and an increase of $8 million in loans to manufacturers of automotive products in Canada.

Loans to manufacturers of automotive products in Canada were made in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council, to assist manufacturers of automotive products in Canada affected by the Canada–United States Agreement on Automotive Products to adjust and expand their production; such loans to be made for the purpose of acquisition, construction, installation, modernization, development, conversion or expansion of land, buildings, equipment, facilities or machinery and for working capital. Loans to these manufacturers amounted to $21 million compared with $13 million at March 31, 1967.

Loans for defence plant modernization, which is a new account, records advances made subject to the approval of the Treasury Board to assist defence manufacturers with defence plant modernization. During 1967–68 net advances totalling $10 million were made.

Securities held in trust

Recorded herein are the security holdings in connection with various deposit and trust accounts and annuity, insurance and pension accounts. Bonds and certified cheques held in connection with contractors' securities included in the deposit and trust category are also recorded under this heading. The balance at March 31, 1968 was $60 million, an increase of $9 million over the previous fiscal year-end balance.

Deferred charges

These consist of the unamortized balances of actuarial deficiencies in the Canadian forces superannuation account, the public service superannuation account and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account and the outstanding unamortized loan flotation costs.

The balances in these accounts totalled $492 million at March 31, 1968 compared with $582 million at March 31, 1967.

Unamortized portions of actuarial deficiencies

At March 31, 1968 these totalled $354 million compared with $461 million at March 31, 1967, a decrease of $107 million.

Any actuarial deficiencies revealed by quinquennial valuations are credited to the superannuation accounts and charged to this account and amortized to budgetary expenditure in five equal annual instalments commencing in the fiscal year in which the report is laid before parliament. Also, the cost of benefits payable under the superannuation acts as a result of the authorization of salary increases are credited to the superannuation accounts and charged to this account and amortized to budgetary expenditure over a period of five years commencing in the year in which the increase is authorized.

The unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the Canadian forces superannuation account was $188 million compared with $260 million at March 31, 1967. During the year $73 million was amortized as a charge to budgetary expenditure.

The unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the public service superannuation account was $150 million compared with $189 million at March 31, 1967. During the year $22 million was charged thereto as a result of salary increases and $61 million was amortized as a charge to budgetary expenditure.

The unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account was $16 million compared with $11 million at March 31, 1967. During the year $8 million was charged thereto as a result of the quinquennial actuarial valuation made as at December 31, 1964 and $2 million due to salary revisions and $5 million was amortized as a charge to budgetary expenditure.

Unamortized loan flotation costs

This account records the residual balances of discounts, commissions, redemption bonuses and conversion premiums on loan flotations that have not been charged to budgetary expenditures. The balance of $138 million was $17 million more than the previous fiscal year-end balance.

⁽¹⁾ Adjustments due to cancellations and additional issues of existing loans.

Cost of new loans issued during 1967–68 and charged to the account amounted to $64 million, of which $30 million was in respect of treasury bills discounts which will be charged to interest on public debt in 1968–69. Credits to the account were $47 million, of which $26 million was a charge to the budgetary item "annual amortization costs" and $21 million (representing discount applicable to 1967–68 on treasury bills sold in 1966–67) was a charge to the budgetary item "interest on public debt".

Treasury bills discounts applicable to the current fiscal year are charged to interest on public debt at time of sale. That portion of the discounts applicable to the subsequent fiscal year is charged to this account and transferred to interest on public debt in the following year.

Capital assets

Assets of the government such as land, buildings, works and equipment, etc., that are charged to budgetary expenditure at the time of acquisition or construction, are included in this category and are shown on the statement of assets and liabilities at a nominal value of $1.

Inactive loans and investments

Loans and investments which are not currently revenue-producing or realizable are recorded herein. Included are the loan of $49 million to China under the Export Credits Insurance Act, loans totalling $24 million and $7 million made to Roumania and Greece, respectively, in 1919–20 and 1920–21 and advances of $15 million in respect of the implementation of guarantees (Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited).

Reserve for losses on realization of assets

There has been no change in this reserve since the fiscal year 1956-57. The balance at March 31, 1968 was $546 million.

NET DEBT

The net debt of Canada, or the excess of liabilities over net recorded assets, was $16,757 million at March 31, 1968 compared with $15,965 million at March 31, 1967. The increase of $792 million reflects the 1967–68 budgetary deficit.

THE CASH POSITION

The government's bank balances represent current deposits to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada in the Bank of Canada, chartered banks in Canada and certain banks in London, New York, Paris, Brussels and Bonn. These balances totalled $1,015 million at March 31, 1968, an increase of $201 million over the balance of $814 million at March 31, 1967.

The cash position of the government is affected not only by budgetary transactions but also by changes in the government's unmatured debt and other non-budgetary transactions. Non-budgetary transactions are those which affect the government's asset and liability accounts and must be taken into account when considering the full scope of the government's financial operations and their effect on the economy of the country.

On the asset side, the non-budgetary transactions consist, for the most part, of loans and advances to, and repayments by, Crown corporations and other government agencies and funds (including the old age security fund), national, provincial and municipal governments, international organizations, veterans and other borrowers. On the liability side they relate mainly to receipts and payments in connection with the many deposit and trust accounts, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the government.

The following statement summarizes both the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions for 1967–68 and indicates how they affected the government's cash position. For purposes of comparison the corresponding figures for 1966–67 are also shown.

Note: In 1967-68 a change in practice was introduced whereby revenues arising from Royal Canadian Mounted Police expenditures were credited thereto. For purposes of comparision 1966-67 figures have been adjusted.

In 1967–68 a deficit of $792 million in budgetary transactions and net receipts of $205 million for non-budgetary transactions (excluding unmatured debt transactions) resulted in a net cash requirement of $587 million for the fiscal year. As transactions in unmatured debt during the year resulted in an increase of $788 million in outstanding unmatured debt as at March 31, 1968, Receiver General bank balances were increased by $201 million. In 1966–67 the budgetary deficit of $422 million and net disbursements of $109 million from non-budgetary transactions resulted in a cash requirement of $531 million. As outstanding unmatured debt increased by $711 million, Receiver General bank balances were increased by $180 million.

Non-budgetary receipts and credits (excluding unmatured debt transactions)

Non-budgetary receipts and credits of $2,415 million in 1967–68 included $1,137 million in respect of annuity, insurance and pension accounts, $379 million in repayments of loans, investments and advances and $899 million in sundry other accounts.

THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and net debt

The gross debt of Canada, or the total of liabilities as recorded on the statement of assets and liabilities, was $32,926 million at March 31, 1968, an increase of $2,586 million over the total at March 31, 1967. The main changes were increases of $1,137 million in annuity, insurance and pension accounts, $640 million in unmatured debt and $639 million in current and demand liabilities. Unmatured debt at $20,580 million represented 63 per cent of the total and annuity, insurance and pension accounts at $9,053 million represented 27 per cent. At March 31, 1967 unmatured debt was $19,940 million or 66 per cent and annuity, insurance and pension accounts totalled $7,916 million or 26 per cent.

The government's net recorded assets were $16,169 million at March 31, 1968 an increase of $1,794 million over the total at March 31, 1967. The main changes were increases of $1,211 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations, $665 million in the Canada pension plan investment fund and $232 million in other loans and investments and a decrease of $322 million in advances to the exchange fund account. Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations represented 49 per cent of the total and advances to the exchange fund represented 12 per cent. At March 31, 1967 loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations were $6,729 million or 47 per cent and advances to the exchange fund were $2,355 million or 16 per cent.

The net debt of Canada was $16,757 million at March 31, 1968 reflecting an increase of $792 million, equivalent to the 1967-68 budgetary deficit.

Unmatured debt

Total unmatured debt of $20,580 million was $640 million more than the balance at March 31, 1967.

The government's holdings of its own securities as at March 31, 1968 was comprised of $44 million in the securities investment account (of which $41 million was Canada savings bonds held in respect of the employees instalment purchase plan) and $8 million in investments held for retirement of unmatured debt. This was a decrease of $149 million from the previous fiscal year-end total when holdings were $198 million in the securities investment account (of which $36 million was in respect of the employees instalment purchase plan) and $3 million in investments held for retirement of unmatured debt.

Of the total unmatured debt, $20,420 million is payable in Canada and $160 million in New York. Securities payable in New York have been valued at the official parity rate of $1 U.S. = $1.08108 Canadian.

Indirect debt or contingent liabilities

In addition to the direct debt as set out in the statement of assets and liabilities, the government has assumed certain indirect or contingent liabilities. These consist of securities of the Canadian National Railways, guaranteed as to principal and interest, the guarantees of insured loans made by chartered banks and other approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act, deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada, advances under the Export Credits Insurance Act and bank loans under a number of Federal Statutes.

DRUGS

STATEMENT ON ACTION TO CONTROL INCREASED NARCOTICS TRAFFIC

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as requested about two weeks ago I should like to make a statement with reference to drug abuses.

The programs being pursued by the Department of National Health and Welfare to deal with the problem of the use of hallucinogenic drugs by young people fall within two broad categories, educational programs and control programs. While the ideal forum for programs designed to inform young people as to the dangers inherent in the use of various hallucinogenic drugs is the schools, the availability of this forum to us is, of course, strictly limited by the fact of education being a matter within provincial jurisdiction. What we can do and are doing in this regard is making informational materials available for use by schools as well as by community organizations.

of copies of a movie, produced in the United grants program, and has provided assistance States, called LSD: Insight or Insanity which in pharmacological research being undertaken it is making available to schools and other in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia. The subinterested groups. As well, we have brought ject of drug abuse among young people will this film to the attention of the provincial be on the agenda of the federal-provincial departments of health and a number of these health ministers' conference to be held early making available within their respective provinces. A film called Marijuana has also been obtained, and additional prints are on order. As soon as these are received they will be made available to schools and community groups as well.

A number of publications dealing with LSD and marijuana have been produced by the department in recent months and a major pamphlet, designed for mass distribution, is in its final stages of production. This pamphlet will be provided to the provincial departments of health. The distribution of the pamphlet within the provinces will be in the hands of the respective provincial health departments and departments of education.

It is our intention to expand this informational program in every was possible. We believe the most effective control is an informed public. As well as control by way of education, however, the department is continually reassessing and updating its legislative controls as new hallucinogenic drugs come into use among young people. By order in council P.C. 1968-1736, schedule H of the Food and Drugs Act was amended last month by the addition of DET, DMT and STP. This amendment prohibits the sale of these substances, as well as LSD which was added to this schedule some time ago. Item 29 in the list of bills enumerated by the government house leader on September 12, "A bill to amend the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Criminal Code", the omnibus health bill, is designed to further increase our capacity to control the use of hallucinogenic drugs by making possession of these drugs an offence.

The department is involved in chemical research in the field of hallucinogens through studies being conducted in its food and drug directorate. It is involved in support of sociological research being conducted in British The department has purchased a number Columbia under the department's health have ordered copies which they are also in November, and it is hoped that further

Control of Increased Narcotics Traffic proposals of both an informational and a control nature will come out of that meeting.

Because drug abuse is a problem which involves may different aspects and functions of the Department of National Health and Welfare, an intradepartmental committee has been established involving representatives of each of the branches of the department having a role to play in dealing with the problem. As well, we are in the process of establishing a special secretariat which will work with this intradepartmental committee in coordinating all our efforts in this area and developing plans for their expansion.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker the fact that the minister has made a statement is indeed most welcome. The contents of the statement, however, must be subject to careful scrutiny. Back in August the minister, when speaking in Regina, discussed the possibility of taking marijuana out of the category of narcotics and placing it in the category of restricted drugs, which would automatically have the effect of reducing penalties. He was quoted as follows by the Canadian Press:

The teenager who tries pot at a Saturday night party because someone has some and passes it around and everyone else tries it, may be very foolish but he isn't a criminal, at least not in the sense that I think of criminals

He was also quoted as saying:

Nor does it seem to me that giving criminal records to several thousand curious kids each year serves any worth-while purpose.

The minister noted a huge increase in the use of marijuana as an argument in favour of a step in the direction of permissiveness. Others may view it in an opposite light. I am prepared to concede the validity of the minister's argument that curious kids, as he describes them, should not be turned into criminals on account of that curiosity; and whether the answer lies in lessening the penalties for possession is certainly worth considering.

The major offender in the increase in the use of marijuana is, of course, the distributor: and in relation to the distributor, the individual who deliberately sets out for profit to "hook" young people on the use of danwhatsoever of penalties; they should in fact be tightened up.

resulting from a tremendous increase in distribution on an organized basis, through the use of teenagers as distributors. Some of these were marijuana users who, having been introduced to this drug, have been persuaded to introduced it to others. I am sure that not even the minister will assert that it is a beneficial thing for our society to condone the widespread use of marijuana or other drugs, nor to encourage the spread of such drugs. Yet that is what is going on. Young people are being introduced in a systematic way to these drugs. They are being used to "hook" others, and then in many cases they are induced to try for a bigger kick with a bigger drug, such as heroin and others.

The only ones to benefit from this procedure are the behind the scenes peddlers working on behalf of the international crime syndicates for whom the illegal distribution of drugs brings in many millions of dollars annually, and who in pursuit of financial returns do not hesitate to destroy a whole generation of young people.

I am sure the minister must know something of the ramifications of this subject. He must know that he is playing with a force in some cases more explosive than dynamite. He must know that the accumulated experience of the ages in every country has been that these drugs, once released, cannot be controlled, and that each user is automatically a proselytizer of others. He must know that the distribution is carefully and systematically organized to create as many users as possible and to introduce them to progressively habit forming drugs. He must know that behind the teenage pusher of a few sticks of marijuana is the syndicate operator and organizer.

In August the minister talked about Saturday night parties where someone had marijuana and passed it around and everyone tried it. Does he think this is socially constructive or useful? Is this what he is trying to condone or perpetuate? We have had any number of teenagers picked up for both using and peddling marijuana. We have had teenagers picked up in increasing numbers for using other far more serious drugs. We have had an increasing number in our criminal courts destroyed mentally and physically by drug addiction at below 21 years of age. For these there must be pity and indeed some gerous drugs, there should be no lessening sympathy and understanding. But what of those responsible for making these drugs available to the teenagers? What of those who We have been witnessing in recent months for gain deliberately set out to destroy young a tremendous increase in the use of marijuana minds? Surely we are not going to make life easier for them. Surely the government is going to do more to deal with this situation than simply making it easier to have access to marijuana.

I assume the minister must be aware that the use of marijuana is the classical entry into the addiction category. Not all those who use marijuana end up using destructive narcotics, but a great number using narcotics such as heroin began with marijuana. Is it a chance worth taking? It is the distributors and syndicate agents whom the government must bring to book and upon whom very heavy penalties indeed must be inflicted if we are to accept our responsibility to the young people of this nation.

A report of the United States treasury department dealing with the effect of marijuana upon the mind says:

Its continued use produces pronounced mental deterioration in many cases. Its more immediate effect apparently is to remove the normal inhibitions of the individual and release any anti-social tendencies which may be present.

Few of us are without such tendencies in one form or another. It is not enough to lighten the penalties imposed on marijuana users. If the penalties are to be lightened, then distribution must be rigorously curtailed. To lighten the penalties without taking steps to halt distribution can benefit only the international drug peddlers. Distribution can only be halted by exacting severe penalties on those who make marijuana available and who engage or hire others to distribute it.

We must face the fact that marijuana is a drug the use of which divorces the mind from reality and produces personality changes as well as a tolerance and willingness for further narcotic experimentation and sometimes addiction. To expose young people to its effects while at the same time neglecting to put a stop to the operations of those who purvey marijuana for the purpose of creating a market for this and for more destructive drugs would be an indefensible failure in carrying out our responsibility.

To control the use of marijuana we need, as the minister has stated, educational and control programs. There are four interrelated approaches to the problems created by the use of marijuana. They are research, education, treatment of the addict and legislation. Legislation or education of themselves do not constitute effective answers. There must also be treatment of the chronic user. But we need far more than this. We need a medical research committee which will come up with answers concerning the effect of marijuana on the individual. The evidence we have to date points to a conflict in the assessment of the effect of this drug on the personality.

The law courts desperately need scientific guidance in the handling of the victims of marijuana, and this is a municipal, provincial and federal problem. It is not acceptable to the Canadian people for the federal government to slough off even part of the problem by saying it is a provincial matter. The fact remains that no government agency has yet set up a medical research committee to investigate the matter and report on it.

The findings of such a medical research committee should then be brought before a meeting of the provincial-federal authorities for discussion, evaluation and joint action at all levels. Then and only then will we be attacking this serious and distressing problem with all the forces at our command.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before continuing this discussion I think it is my duty to remind hon. members again, more particularly with regard to a statement made yesterday and to the comments made today, that they should not disregard entirely the provisions of standing order 15 (2a) to the effect that statements made by ministers should be limited to certain facts which it is necessary to make known to the house, and that spokesmen for each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment on them briefly. I have said before and I will say again that brevity is a relative standard. It may be that my standards are slightly old fashioned.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly try my best to comply with your standards. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the minister and to the comments of the hon. member for Simcoe East, because this is an extremely important subject confronting not only people in the younger generation but society in its entirety. When we look at the fact that from January 1, 1967 to October 31, 1967, the number of arrests for possession of marijuana was in the neighbourhood of 1,300, up 300 per cent over the year before, we can realize the enormity of the problem.

This statement relates only to the so-called hallucinogenic substances, but I think there is a parallel here in terms of the attitude we have adopted to the hard line narcotic drugs Control of Increased Narcotics Traffic

Canada but in the United States with regard the individual and upon society is concerned. to narcotics may be a guide as to what our attitude should be in relation to the so-called hallucinogenic substances.

The procedure we have followed in dealing with narcotics control in Canada does not carry with it any real proof that this procedure has been effective in either controlling the trafficking in narcotics or in reducing the number of narcotics addicts. Our approach has been a sustained hard line approach involving harsher and harsher sentences and even the use of the habitual criminal section. However, the use of the habitual criminal section of the code has not had the effect it was hoped it would have.

Even the limited recognition we give medical attention in the field of narcotic drugs must follow the arrest, conviction and penalty process. It comes as an aftermath of the more severe and harsher penalty. Probably there will always be those in our society who will look for this false paradise, who will use amphetamines, lysergic acid, marijuana, dried banana peels, nutmeg and so on. The list is interminable. In fact some people are now inhaling poisonous insecticides like Raid which people use to kill off mosquitoes. They fill a room with this spray and then inhale it. There is probably no limit to the substances people will use. In attempting to deal with the use of such substances by going to stiffer and stiffer enforcement with harsher penalties, more illegalities, more restrictions, we will find we have adopted a futile course.

As past experience has shown, such a course could be ludicrous in its application. We need only look at the types of substances the minister listed in the answer he gave yesterday when he referred to nail polish, gasoline and such substances, to realize the number of substances with which we are dealing.

I do not believe, however, we can abandon that control system. I think it is necessary. In addition, however, we have to embark on a program of research and public education. The minister's statement was much too narrow, because he said the form of education must be through the schools to our younger people. In my opinion this question of education is a much broader one. We must separate myth from fact. In so far, as marijuana is concerned there is a great deal of myth about it. We have to get to the stage some day of looking at marijuana as probably one of those Mr. Speaker, there are over 100,000 alcoholics which are dealt with under the Narcotics substances which are less harmful than Control Act. The experience not only in alcohol in so far as its deleterious effect upon

There is probably no single answer to this problem, Mr. Speaker, because we are dealing with individuals, and I feel we are dealing with individuals who have an illness. I believe the great increase in the use of hallucinogenics should point out to us that the illness is not confined to the individual but is an illness of society and will have to be coped with in that way. In that context the minister's statement was barren. There was no realization of the fact that it is a social illness with which we are dealing. His statement was barren of any reference to the necessity of freeing the medical profession, for the sake of argument, from any impingement upon the so-called doctor-patient relationship, upon which the profession looks with some delight. We should free ourselves from this relationship and permit the medical profession to search for treatments and for opportunities which will in turn provide answers and cures.

We have also, Mr. Speaker, to embark upon the total research and education fields. I submit that in our so-called "live it up" society where everything is done to suit the pleasures of the individual, something that seems paramount today, a few pamphlets and films referred to by the minister will not provide what is required.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the wish you expressed earlier, I should like to make some very brief remarks so as not to prolong the debate.

First, I should like to say that the statement just made by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) can but please us, because the minister tackles a major problem which tomorrow will overcome us if we do not assume our responsibilities since we are already far behind in this field. Secondly, I should like to say that the minister's statement cannot solve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, what I regret in the minister's statement, is the fact that he says the provinces are responsible for the problem, because if you ask the provincial authorities to deal with it, they will tell you that it comes under federal jurisdiction.

It seems that the problem of the distribution of hallucinogens is going to be dealt with in exactly the same way as the problem of alcoholism in Canada these last 25 years.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

in Quebec alone, and when you bring up the problem, people point a finger at you. When you put the problem to the provincial government, they say: That falls within the jurisdiction of Ottawa. On the other hand, when Ottawa is asked to do something about it, they say: that falls within the Quebec jurisdiction. In the meantime, people stay convinced that alcoholism is a vice instead of the disease it is proved to be.

I do not wish to hold up the debate any further, but I should like to tell the minister that although his statement pleases us to some extent, it cannot solve the problem. Indeed, we would be very happy if he were to submit to the standing committee on health and welfare legislation that could be studied in depth, so that we could really come to grips with the problem of the distribution of hallucinogens. It seems to me we should delve deeply into our methods, our ideas, our policy and our philosophy, in the field of research as well as in the fields of information, education, legislation and cure, since it is more of an illness than a vice.

I would not like attacks to be made against the young under the pretext that they use hallucinatory drugs. I think they should be directed instead against the adults who use those young people to attain their own ends

I therefore ask the minister to take immediately effective measures to protect our young generation against certain adults who think they are the only ones who have discovered America, who exploit the possibilities of our children and who will bring about tomorrow the degradation of our children, if we do not assume our responsibilities.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister to introduce specific measures to enable us to assume our responsibilities in that field. We should stop passing the buck from one government to another. We should work hand in hand to treat those people as they deserve.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIVATE AND OFFICIAL EXCHANGES WITH WARSAW PACT COUNTRIES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on October 15 the Leader of the Opposition asked whether I would make a statement on exchanges of a

When the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet union, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria and East Germany took place, Canada condemned it unequivocally. Our condemnation, if it was not to be simply a matter of words, clearly required concrete expression as well. Since much of the substance of our relations with the invading countries has been in exchanges of visits and information under official auspices in various technical and scientific fields, it was in this area that our position could be most clearly demonstrated.

In the case of departments and agencies of the government, this policy has been applied directly. In the case of individuals and private organizations we have naturally left the decisions to them to make, while giving advice on request.

The government decided first that planned exchanges having political content, that is those at a ministerial level, should not take place for the time being. Among these, for example, was the attendance of a Soviet delegation at the convention of the Canadian Institute of Forestry in St. John's, Newfoundland. This delegation was to have been headed by a minister of the so called Latvian Soviet Socialist Republic, a government which I may say is the product of an earlier Soviet military occupation, the legality of which Canada has never recognized. Our decision in this case was taken in consultation with the government of Newfoundland and the interested private companies. Certain other visits, proposed or contemplated, which would have involved other Soviet ministers have also been set aside for the time being.

The government decided, second, that under the circumstances created by the invasion of Czechoslovakia it would be inopportune to embark on new exchange projects for the present, irrespective of their political content. Certain existing and ongoing exchanges of a purely technical, cultural or academic nature. some of which are of long standing and of considerable value to Canada, are nevertheless continuing. Most of these are, of course, carried out under private auspices. Among them I might mention the established exchanges of students between certain Canadian and Soviet universities.

A number of private Canadian firms and organizations which had planned shorter term visits or exchanges have postponed or cancelled them on their own initiative, since political nature with Warsaw pact countries. they, like other Canadians, were shocked by Changes in Standing Committees Personnel the invasion of Czechoslovakia. In some cases these organizations have sought the advice of the government and have taken their decisions in the light of government policy as it was explained to them. As I have indicated, however, where private organizations or individuals have decided that for various reasons they wish to continue existing arrangements, it is not the government's policy to put obstacles in their way.

In adopting the policy I have described we have borne in mind that the exchanges which have grown up and flourished in recent years between Canada and the communist countries can be of considerable intrinsic value to Canada commercially, technologically, culturally and in other ways.

We have made it clear to the U.S.S.R. and its allies that our relations have been damaged by their action, and that the continued presence of their occupying forces in Czechoslovakia is an obstacle to their restoration. In doing so I wish to make clear we remain convinced that genuine and peaceful co-operation between east and west is in fact possible without the abandonment of principles on either side, but will not be possible as long as one side believes it can do violence to the principles of the other. Human survival itself may depend on the recognition of that fact.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take the time of the house this afternoon to make any particular comment about the minister's statement. I only wish to say that I do not think the measures he is discussing will take the matter very far.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief comment about the minister's statement. We, like other members of the house, were deeply shocked by the military intervention of the Soviet forces in the internal affairs of Czechoslovakia. It is perfectly obvious that that move must damage international relations. Nevertheless we suggest that there should be no overreacting to this event. One of the reasons for this occurrence may have been the internal situation and fear within the U.S.S.R. which, we believe, is not as monolithic as it looks from the outside. We hope this occasion will not be used in any way to cut down or cut off the contacts between this country and other countries and those countries behind the so called iron curtain.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the name of Mr. Lind be substituted for the name of Mr. Borrie on the standing committee on agriculture.

That the name of Mr. Stafford be substituted for the name of Mr. Hymmen on the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts.

Mr. Lind: Mr. Speaker-

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly allow me to put the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have had the privilege of speaking before the motion was adopted by the house, because I have a grievance. Originally I was placed on the committee on agriculture. I received notice to attend the agriculture committee meeting at 9.30 yesterday morning. When I arrived at the committee meeting I was told I was no longer a member of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lind: I realize now that my name was removed from the committee on agriculture at six o'clock on October 15. I should like an explanation of why that was done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lind: Mr. Speaker, I think whoever is in charge of this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lind: —should give an explanation why this was done. I was taken off the committee; now I am being replaced, but I have never been consulted in the matter, and I think I deserve that explanation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that the motion placed before the house was carried. It is not debatable. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege, but I suggest there should be no debate, since it is rather a grievance than a question of privilege. The hon. member himself termed it a grievance. He told the house he had a grievance and essentially this is not a question of privilege. According to the rules the hon. member is required to give written notice if he proposes to raise a question of privilege which he has not done. I suggest therefore that this matter should not that the house has approved his being on that be debated at this time.

Mr. Lind: On a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Middlesex rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lind: I was wondering if the man in charge could explain why this has taken place.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have his reasons for asking for an explanation, but I suggest it should not be given to him in the house at this time. Perhaps there might be private consultations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that backbenchers of the opposition parties are not permitted to come to the aid of a Liberal backbencher?

Mr. Lind: Mr. Speaker-

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat for one moment. He must resume his seat if he wants to give me the opportunity to recognize him.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lind: I did telephone the minister in charge but he didn't see fit to reply.

Some hon. Members: Oh. oh.

Mr. Lind: So I think I deserve an answer in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is there unanimous consent to allow the minister to give an explanation?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I returned the hon. member's telephone call, Mr. Speaker, but there was no answer at the other end.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

the house. I said "Jim, you were calling me. You have something to say?" and he said "No, I don't." So I am pleased to hear from the hon. member further even at this late date. He is anxious to be a member of the agriculture committee, and I am delighted committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege-

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already ruled that there is no question of privilege. It may be that by unanimous agreement the house would allow the right hon. gentleman to speak.

An hon. Member: No. It is a private fight.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): This is a matter which affects every member of the house. As soon as a person is chosen to be a member of a committee an order of the house is made and no person, not even the leader of the house, has any right to remove that member's name from the list. This is a serious question of privilege affecting the rights of members of this house. They cannot be pushed around by anyone once the house has reached a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am sure Your Honour is interested in this new question of privilege raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I recall that this practice has been followed in past years. House leaders and others in similar positions have at the request of opposition whips replaced opposition members on committees, and I take it the practice is still to continue.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): But that has always been at the request of the individual member concerned. I say this so that the minister's statement shall not go unchallenged.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT-MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 26, I ask leave to propose that the house now adjourn its Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I spoke to my proceedings to discuss an urgent and pressing

Post Office Department

On October 10, 1968, the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) who is not in the house today, forwarded to senators and to members of the House of Commons a letter concerning changes in postal rates.

My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, concerns the fact that the Postmaster General says at the beginning of his letter, and I quote:

Changes in postal rates

I refer to the statement already made with regard to adjustments in postal rates and certain changes in the rules which will come into force on November 1, 1968, under the authority given to me by the post office act.

The following changes will be of special interest to members of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that under the standing orders, he should indicate to the Chair the terms of the motion that he wishes to introduce. A while ago, he himself stated that he wished to suggest adjournment of the business of the house under standing order 26, and not as a question of privilege. In that case, he must abide by the provisions of standing order 26.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, as it happened, I was reading what the Postmaster General wrote to the hon. members, and I submit that he is mistaken, since the Post Office Act does not allow him to modify any of the privileges that the hon. members have voted for themselves.

In fact, it is not up to the Postmaster General to grant us privileges, or to modify or take away those which we already possess. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the house adjourn its business at this time to study this matter, and in referring to the letter of the Postmaster General—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The standing orders require the hon. member to submit to the Chair a copy of the motion, so that it may be debated at this time.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like, in order to co-operate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member allow me to examine for a moment the motion which he wants to introduce in this house?

Would the hon. member now indicate to the house and to the Chair the reasons for holding the debate now, that is, the urgency of the matter?

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Mr. Rondeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is because the Postmaster General tells us that this rule will become effective on November 1, and I feel that this house ought to study the problem today, because this decision is contrary to the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, Chap. 212, section 17 (3), page 12, and I quote:

A member of the Senate or House of Commons may during a recess of Parliament, send from Ottawa, free of postage, any papers printed by order of either the Senate or the House of Commons.

I feel that this new change in postal rates that the Postmaster General announced on October 10, and which will become effective on November 1, is contrary to our legislation and that he has no right to interfere with the rights already acquired by the hon. members who voted them.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the business of the house to consider this interference of the Postmaster General in a field which does not concern him.

Mr. Speaker: Should other honourable members wish to express their opinion at this stage on the urgency of debate I will hear them. Otherwise, I will give my ruling.

I must remind honourable members of the terms of subsection (2) and others of standing order 100 in the Fourth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. The author refers to the circumstances that should prevail in order to warrant adjournment of debate in the house under standing order 26. Subsection (2) states the following:

The "definite matter of urgent public importance" for the discussion of which the adjournment of the house may be moved under standing order 26, must be so pressing that public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention.

I must say to the honourable member that honestly, I wonder whether public interest would suffer from a delay in debate on this question. Some honourable members' interest may possibly suffer from it but I do not believe it would necessarily follow that public interest will also suffer.

For that reason, I do not believe the question asked by the honourable member warrants the adjournment of business slated for today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION TO NIGERIAN FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMISSIONER TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, when the conversation across the aisle is finished I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask whether the minister, anyone in his department, or anyone representing Canada at the United Nations has discussed with Dr. Okoi Arikpo, the Nigerian commissioner for foreign affairs, any suggestion or indication that he come to Canada shortly.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have heard from our delegate in New York that Mr. Arikpo is planning to come to Canada at the end of this month, but I have had no further confirmation.

Mr. Lewis: Did the report which was given to the minister contain the reason anyone invited Dr. Arikpo to come to this country? I am not suggesting that he will not receive the usual warm and courteous reception, but was there any reason suggested for the visit?

Mr. Sharp: No. As I recall the circumstances Mr. Arikpo expressed a desire to come to Canada and, of course, we would be very happy to welcome him.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether our representatives at the United Nations have discussed with anyone the possibility of having a representative of the Biafran authorities come to Canada for the same purpose for which I imagine Dr. Arikpo is coming to this country? If not, will he give consideration to this?

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman knows very well that we do not recognize the government of the republic of Biafra, and therefore it would be impossible for us to extend any such invitation.

Mr. Lewis: I rise now on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister when he answered my original question did not say that an invitation had been extended to Dr. Arikpo. Now he is suggesting that he cannot discuss this matter with the Biafran authorities because he cannot extend an invitation to them.

FINANCE

REPORTED WARNING RESPECTING COST OF JOINT PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Finance. I do not know whether it is his day, but he was here. I will ask the question upon his return.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance relating to the estimates. Has an arrangement been made to table any correspondence from the province of Ontario in which that province warned the federal government that its estimates as to the federal share of certain joint programs were substantially wide of the mark?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This is a question which should be addressed to my colleague the President of the Treasury Board. I believe he has or intends to make a statement in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield: I thought it would be in order to direct it to the Minister of Finance because he was the president of the treasury board at the time. Can he say whether any such correspondence has been received from any other province?

Mr. Benson: No such letter was brought to my attention before the tabling of the estimates.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister say whether at the time of the filing of the prospectus with the securities and exchange commission in the United States on May 28, he was advised or whether he inquired at that time about the rate at which the federal estimates for hospital care and post-secondary education grants were being used up?

Mr. Benson: The document filed with the securities and exchange commission was an historic document. It indicated public statements by the government prior to that time Mr. Sharp: I do not understand the purport with regard to the estimates. I should also Inquiries of the Ministry from people feeling deceived, these bonds are [Translation] now trading at $103 in New York.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not wish to be insistent, but I wonder whether the minister would answer my question concerning whether he made inquiries at the time he gave this representation on behalf of the government of Canada.

Mr. Benson: Of course I made inquiries concerning the position of the government. At that time the position of the government was that we knew certain expenditures would be changed. It was our hope at that time that we could save an equivalent amount in controllable non-statutory expenditures. This proved to be not the case.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I should like to ask the minister if the government has made a decision whether the $116 million federal share of the Expo deficit is to be added to the regular budget deficit or whether some other disposition is to be made of it?

Mr. Benson: A decision has not been made at this time, but my hon. friend knows that the amount involved has been paid by the federal government and that indeed we are recovering cash with regard to the funds advanced to Expo.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to assume from the answer that as of the end of May the government had no indication that expenditures would be running substantially above the estimates tabled in the House of Commons?

Mr. Benson: I can assure my hon. friend that it was the hope of the government that it would be able to stick to the public statements that had been made prior to that time.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Will the minister advise us whether the computers have been of assistance in this area equal to his wild forecasts?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question is acceptable.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was the minister himself who made the assertion that the computers were of great assistance.

Mr. Speaker: This is developing into a debate.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF EXPO EXPRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the honorable Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Is it his intention to obtain a revision of the decision regarding the sale of Expo Express, a decision which did not please the president of the executive council of the city of Montreal and which was reached on the vote of the federal representative to the World Exhibition Corporation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to ask that the decision be reconsidered. In December 1967 and March 1968, if I remember well, the federal and the provincial government issued orders in council asking the corporation to sell Expo Express by public tender.

Since then, and particularly since last June 25, the city of Montreal could have made representations to the federal or provincial governments to ask for reconsideration of the decision. The city of Montreal could very well have tendered also. She did neither, except at the very last minute.

However, those who had submitted bona fide tenders had I think gained certain rights the more so as they had been assured that the selection of tenders would be made on a commercial basis.

The only reason why we could change our decision now would be the consideration of the price quoted by the selected tenderer. However, the price quoted has been deemed, from a commercial viewpoint, to be acceptable to the company. It seems to me therefore there is no reason why the company's decision should be changed.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question concerning the site of the World Exhibition?

Has the honourable Minister of Industry and Trade and Commerce been advised that an offer was made by the Fondation Molière? Has he read the brief asking that Cité du Havre not be demolished and that it be handed over to the Fondation Molière for the purpose of setting up a film centre?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, I have received no such letter.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The letters were sent to the right honourable Prime Minister and to the Minister of Transport asking them to intervene with the cabinet.

As the three ministers concerned are the Minister of Industry and Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Transport, and the right honourable Prime Minister, I wonder whether the hon. Minister of Industry and Trade and Commerce could not go over the matter again with his colleagues and give another answer to the house within the next few days?

Mr. Pepin: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED CHANGE RESPECTING RURAL MAIL DELIVERY ON SATURDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Postmaster General was expressing government policy when he announced in London last night that changes in the decision to cancel Saturday rural mail deliveries would be forthcoming.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know exactly what the Postmaster General said last night in London, Mr. Speaker, but I know he has been considering the decision and intends to present the bill to the house for second reading when the time arrives, I believe next Monday.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the heads of daily and weekly newspapers in Canada asked to meet the Prime Minister in reference to the cutting off of service and the increase in rates? Has the Prime Minister seen them and did he suggest he may change the decision in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, they have not asked to see me, but I do know there has been quite a bit of discussion with the Postmaster General.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister to give us a little more information in this regard. There is no reference to a five day week in the post office legislation and I am wondering why it is necessary to postpone the decision until the time of presentation of the bill?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: As the hon. member knows, second reading of this bill will take place on Monday.

Mr. McCutcheon: The five day week is not mentioned in the bill.

Mr. Trudeau: The Postmaster General will be discussing it at that time.

Mr. McCutcheon: That is the whole point of the question. This is not in the bill.

Mr. Trudeau: The position of the Postmaster General will be outlined in his statement on second reading. That will be when hon. members will learn about this matter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NANAIMO-COWICHAN-THE ISLANDS—INQUIRY AS TO BY-ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister when, in view of the continuing lack of a representative in this house for the constituency of Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, he envisages a by-election? Will it be held during the present year?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am carefully considering that question, Mr. Speaker, but I have not yet reached a decision.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Quebec has reimbursed the $100 million it owed to British Columbia and considering the deficit of close to $1 billion incurred by Canada, has your government, Mr. Prime Minister, given consideration to borrowing from British Columbia the $8 million it wants to lend to Nigeria?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. member that he must address the Chair when asking questions.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. I was not given the floor earlier when I wished to ask a supplementary question regarding Nigeria; what I have to say is about Nigeria, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the question?

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Hull.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF DISALLOWANCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND COMPANY LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the loss of income tax and the possible serious disruption to the Canadian petroleum industry which may result from the projected refinery complex of the Newfoundland government and the Shaheen corporation, has the government given consideration to disallowing the Newfoundland legislation which is the basis of this dangerous situation?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have considered that, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance is prepared to answer the question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned when this question was raised previously in the house, matters of this kind are not limited to the Shaheen corporation. We have been investigating this and similar corporations which have been set up in that province. I hope to have a report in this regard within a week or so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA-STEPS TO HALT SHIPMENTS OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker in view of the growing world opinion that a stoppage of arms shipments is the quickest way to achieve the cease fire we all want in Nigeria and Biafra, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate what recent steps the government has taken toward reaching this objective with the great powers concerned?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that when the Prime Minister of Canada expresses the view of the Canadian government it is well known around the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Speaker, as I said earlier, I wanted to direct a supplementary question and now the opportunity offers itself.

I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the $8 millions loaned to Nigeria will contribute to pay for the bombs that England sells to that country to murder the Biafrans?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I have already ruled that question out of order.

[English]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what reaction the government has received to the most interesting statement by the Prime Minister regarding the stopping of arms shipments? What have Britain, the U.S.S.R. and France said?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, arms shipments have not yet stopped.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether relief supplies to be distributed by aircraft are piling up on the docks at Lagos because of the lack of transportation from the docks to the airport?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the information we have from Lagos is not to that effect but rather that the food is being distributed.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, will the minister tell the house how many Hercules aircraft the Red Cross is flying into territory held by the Biafran authorities?

Mr. Sharp: So far as the International Red Cross is concerned, it has one Hercules at its disposal. It has not been flying very regularly into Biafra. When we complied with the request of the International Red Cross we responded in such a way that our aircraft could fly continuously once permission was granted to allow it to fly at all.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the reference in the British Hansard to the fact that Jeremy Thorpe, the leader of the Liberal party in Britain, contacted the Prime Minister and asked him to use his influence to achieve a cease-fire and a halt in the supply of arms by all nations to Nigeria, has the Prime Minister responded to this request and to what effect?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have not been seized with this request and know nothing about it. I am not a regular reader of British Hansard. I expressed a few days ago in this house the government's thoughts in respect of the supply of arms to Nigeria and Biafra. I hope the members of the N.D.P. will contact the leader of the Liberal party in Britain and express a view to the same effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: Let me assure the Prime Minister that we have communicated with the British government.

An hon. Member: Which you have not done.

Mr. Hellyer: What did they say to you?

Mr. Brewin: If the Prime Minister is not a regular reader of British Hansard, I should like to suggest that he read the copy of July 22 in which this statement was made by the leader of the Liberal party there.

Mr. Trudeau: I will be pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker, and I would be interested to know what answer was received by members of the N.D.P.

Mr. Lewis: Unfortunately you are the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: You mean fortunately.

Mr. Lewis: That is a pretty smart-aleck response to an important question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to allude to a question asked a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Greenwood. I have had an opportunity to check with my office and have learned that a letter was received in my office from Mr. Thorpe and some of his Liberal colleagues during the summer.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I find that according to the revised roster the Minister of Agriculture is supposed to be here today, but in fact he is not. You will have to revise the roster again. Let me direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he advise what steps, if any were decided upon yesterday in Winnipeg regarding the setting up of a grains council? As a result of his pilgrimage to the west is the minister able to indicate what serious action the government of Canada intends to take regarding the difficult position in which western farmers find themselves as a result of climatic conditions?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there are really two questions there, and I hope you will give me double time to answer them. The first question has to do with the grains council. Indeed we had an excellent meeting yesterday in Winnipeg. I think there was unanimous or fairly unanimous agreement that such a council should be created. We discussed at length the composition, terms of reference and the financing of the council. There was quite an amount of consensus with regard to each one of these points. The federal government is now going to put all these consensuses on paper for reference to the various organizations which took part in the meeting yesterday, and we hope this will be the basis for the creation of the council in the next month or so.

With respect to the second question, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that one of the things that could be done would be passage by this house of the cash advance payment legislation which is awaiting final approval.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pepin: The wheat board is carrying on an intensified search for markets round the world. I pray every morning, like the hon. member for Prince Albert, that this will result in fantastic or at least very interesting sales. We are studying at this time ways and means by which we might further improve the competitive position of the wheat board in world markets.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to find out what answer has been given to the minister's prayers. Where have any markets been secured in the last three months that will reduce the fabulous carryover of wheat in western Canada? Second, what action will be taken in those areas where farmers have little or no hope of securing, when the threshing is done or the harvesting completed, a crop other than damp wheat which is virtually unsaleable?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is very close to God—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crouse: How close is God to you?

Mr. Pepin: —and it is well known that God has been kind to ministers of trade and commerce in the past under any administration, and I hope he is going to pull a new trick

Inquiries of the Ministry

once again as He did for my hon, friend back in 1961.

With respect to possible sales by the wheat board, I thought I answered this question last week when I said that parliament was not a market place and that one of the conditions for success in world wheat marketing is not to divulge too generously the whereabouts of your salesmen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman is so close to the Deity—and he turned to the right when he said that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I would ask him whether the western farmers have anything else to depend upon in regard to the securing of markets than this close affiliation with the Almighty?

Mr. R. R. Southam (Ou'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On October 9 the minister promised to inquire into the report that the French government was selling wheat to Japan at prices below the international minimum. Has he done so, and with what result?

Mr. Pepin: I have done so, Mr. Speaker. There have been no recent purchases of wheat by Japan from France other than a part cargo during the latter part of August. We are assured that France is offering wheat to Japan at prices in accordance with the pricing provisions of the international grains arrangement.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister is unable to obtain a favourable answer to his prayers, would he consult one of his distinguished colleagues on the fine art of osculation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would he use his good offices to convince the house leader that the question of cash advances should be debated today and tomorrow if necessary so that this necessary legislation may be passed? We have been asking unsuccessfully for some time that this be done.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I understand that it would have been passed the other day had the hon. member not objected.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has imputed motives to my speaking in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: I have repeatedly requested the government to do this. On one occasion through the house leader on this side of the house and on a number of other occasions I myself have asked the government house leader to bring on the cash advances legislation before the farm credit bill was debated or even begun. I have repeatedly asked that this be done but with no success or co-operation from the other side of the house. I ask the minister to use his good offices to bring in this legislation as quickly as possible. There is no question of our holding it up.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell us if, in his discussions with some of the members of the wheat board yesterday, they said whether they are considering suspending temporarily any movement of dry grain from country elevators. This would be an inducement to farmers to thresh damp grain and move the damp grain instead.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I did take up this question yesterday with the wheat board. To sum up the report I got, three things are now being done: first, the terminals are readying their equipment to handle the expected large quantities of damp grain; second, some grain has already been moved from the inland terminals to provide space for damp grain which can be dried in these facilities; third, on October 15 the Canadian Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners issued instructions to the trade authorizing priority to the shipment of damp grain from country elevators to terminal positions.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Following the minister's discussions with the wheat board with regard to the movement of tough and damp grain, will the wheat board be specifying that delivery quotas will be for tough and damp grain in relation to any grade?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROGRAMS TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC REGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for regional development. In view of the fact that the Atlantic region is experiencing a much higher rate of unemployment this year than was the case in 1967, as acknowledged by the Minister of Finance in the economic white paper for 1968, can the minister say whether his department and the government have any specially designed program to offset the effect of economic readjustment by the government on the unemployment situation in the Atlantic region?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have on-going programs.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say when he is prepared to give a statement to the house on pending programs of development?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): When my estimates are before the house, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEWFOUNDLAND-EXPENDITURES ON REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister ready to answer the question I posed to him yesterday, No. 82 on the order paper, which has to do with regional development?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Perhaps I might take the opportunity to deal with this question, Mr. Speaker. When the hon, member asked it yesterday the minister asked me to make inquiries. It is a detailed question, and we are hoping the information will be available probably on Monday next.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, this answer has been promised to me daily since last month. The details were going to be given to me every day since September 19, and I still do Having asked earlier in the week for a statenot have them.

Inquiries of the Ministry WATER RESOURCES

BRITISH COLUMBIA-INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Following the meeting of resource ministers last week, I would like to know whether there has been any progress on negotiations with the province of British Columbia toward the commencement of a study of water resources and pollution abatement in the Okanagan-Shuswap water basins?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the house that there have been such negotiations with the province, and I am now assured that the provincial and federal officials of the respective departments will be meeting shortly to consider the ambit and the cost of a survey in this region.

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK-PROPOSED NEW ACCESS ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the "second look" proposals tabled yesterday in British Columbia relating to the Roberts Bank port development, and what action does he propose at this point?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was informally advised of the proposed new route. I have asked to be provided with a map showing the exact routing with all other pertinent information in order that I may study it.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the urgency of obtaining information related to this development, can the minister say when he will be in a position to deal with my notice of motion for the production of papers No. 12 of September 24?

Mr. Hellyer: Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. ment of the position of the government with Inquiries of the Ministry regard to the exercise of jurisdiction over the Roberts Bank development, am I correct in assuming from the statement given in the house yesterday by the minister that the federal government does not propose to make any decision as to its position with regard to this port until the completion of a study which the government expects to receive early in November?

Mr. Hellyer: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. In the meantime we are going ahead with construction in order to facilitate the contract which has been signed between the Kaiser coal company and the Japanese interests and which we feel is important to the people of this country. The National Harbours Board has let contracts for the creation of the necessary port facility and the railways involved have made plans to provide access. Everything is going along pretty well on schedule. As soon as we have this report and the chance to consider how best the port should be administered in the years ahead we will be glad to have further discussions with the province of British Columbia to see if we can reach some mutually satisfactory arrangement.

Mr. Stanfield: In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, is it correct to assume that the government of Canada is leaving it entirely up in the air as to who has jurisdiction over what in connection with the port?

Mr. Hellyer: It is not up in the air at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question with respect to the minister's intimation yesterday that certain other ports may be included in a possible study by the transport committee regarding administration. Will the minister give every assurance that this study or assessment will include all ports in Canada under the National Harbours Board? Will he also say whether port officials will be given an opportunity to appear in some way because of their great fears concerning the new transportation concepts that are involved in this whole matter?

Mr. Hellyer: The purpose of this study is to consider the principles of port administration and control. Once the principles have been decided and agreed upon, as I suggested yesterday perhaps by a committee of the house, apply best in each individual circumstance.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Bell: Will the minister give us an assurance he will cease his activities in the unsuccessful housing task force and get to work on the eastern ports?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED MISSION TO SOUTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Could he say when the proposed ministerial mission is to leave for South America, what its duration and purpose will be and what ministers are to participate in this very worth-while venture?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the ministerial mission which is to visit many of the Latin American countries is to leave toward the end of the month. We will announce the names of the ministers who will be on the mission very soon.

Mr. Forrestall: I have a brief supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Can he say now whether any members of parliament will accompany this mission on their excursion?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, neither parliament members of nor defeated candidates.

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received the report of the royal commission on pilotage on the great lakes? If so, are any important changes to be made in the administration?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend is referring to the report of the royal commission on pilotage which covered the entire area, the answer is of course yes. Interim changes in the law are being proposed for consideration at this sesthey can be applied equally to ports in all sion, and following further study and comparts of the country depending on which ones munication with the interested parties we hope to introduce substantial amendments.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING HULL-OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of great urgency to put to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Can he tell the house whether he stated last night, during a conference given before the members of the Hull Chamber of Commerce, that it was intended to turn Hull into a district of Ottawa, as mentioned today in a headline on page 23 of the Montreal newspaper La Presse.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask such a question with reference to a statement made outside the house.

[Later:]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development if he will soon make to the house a statement about the government's policy with regard to the creation of the national capital.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): To the house?

Mr. Asselin: Yes.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am supposed to meet the representatives of the province of Quebec and as soon as an agreement has been reached with the parties concerned—I know that a tripartite committee is to report to the various governments—I will probably be able to make a statement then.

Mr. Asselin: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Should we understand that the statement made previously by the minister indicates government policy?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the heading of the article reproduced in La Presse is completely erroneous, false and misleading.

CHURCHILL, MAN.—NEGOTIATIONS ON DEVELOPMENT OF TOWN SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in relation to the responsibilities of the federal and provincial governments with regard to the development of the town site of Churchill, Manitoba. Could the Prime Minister say what progress if any has taken place in the discussions between the two governments on this subject? I ask this question because on September 13 the Prime Minister said he would do everything to cut down the red tape and expedite this matter.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member for Churchill or another hon. member asked me several days ago if I had followed up on the meeting with the premier of Manitoba about which I told the house. The answer is yes. Since that meeting with the premier I have written to him making certain suggestions.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State of which I have given notice. Can the minister report on the steps being taken by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in their negotiations with their unions to avert a possible nation-wide strike?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for giving me notice of that question.

If my information is correct, the report of the conciliation board is to be submitted to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) this week. Any comment I could make now would only complicate the situation. The hon. member will no doubt understand my refraining from any comment other than what I have just said.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS FROM RUSSIA RESPECTING ACTION IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister will recall that just before his departure to the United Nations he stated, in reply to a question of mine, that whatever representation we received from the U.S.S.R. at the time of their intrusion into Czechoslovakia was in oral form. Would the minister be prepared to table whatever notes were received from the U.S.S.R. through the NATO command, copies of which Canada has received?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that there is anything of that sort on the record. Any communications between the U.S.S.R. and Canada would come to me and would certainly not go through our representative on NATO.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the government house leader to indicate at this time the nature of the business to come before us for the balance of this week and next week?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As indicated, tomorrow the house will again be in committee of supply to deal with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. On Tuesday next at eight o'clock, as hon, members know, the Minister of Finance will be making his budget address. Thereafter the budget debate will be continued the following week, that is, the week of Monday, October 28. Starting Monday of next week, therefore, we will commence with second reading of the Post Office Act and thereafter deal with the Farm Credit Act. The next order of business will be the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The next order of business will be amendments to the Patent will depend on the progress made at any particular time.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Would the house leader give serious consideration to moving ahead the cash advances legislation which has been unanimously accepted in the house and should receive quick passage either tomorrow or Monday? Perhaps this measure could be moved ahead of the long term credit financing bill which has to have a thorough examination because of the new provisions being implemented.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to discuss with house leaders opposite the possibility of moving legislation ahead rapidly. I should like to have the co-operation of the hon, member on every piece of legislation so we could move ahead quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

PEMBINA RIVER—REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the last three days I have been trying to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might have unanimous agreement to allow the hon. member to ask the question now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I have raised this point of order because the Prime Minister said he would take the question as notice. Can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources answer the inquiry I made on Tuesday about whether he has had any consultations with the government of Manitoba with regard to the Pembina river development project as recommended by the International Joint Commission?

deal with the Farm Credit Act. The next order of business will be the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The next order of business will be amendments to the Patent and Trade Marks Acts with regard to drugs. When these bills will be called, of course, will depend on the progress made at any particular time.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any personal negotiations, although I understand my predecessor discussed the recommendations of the I.J.C. with the government of Manitoba. These discussions have gone on and are still going on at the official level.

PROVISIONS RESPECTING STATUS AND USE-APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER, ETC.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the status of the English and French languages as the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the parliament and government of Canada and respecting the use of those languages in the administration of the affairs of the parliament and government of Canada and the several institutions thereof; to provide, in connection with the administration and operation of the said measure, for the appoinment of a commissioner of official languages and such other officers, employees and advisers as are necessary for the proper conduct of the work of the office of the commissioner, and for the payment of the remuneration and expenses of the commissioner and such other persons; and to provide further for other related or incidental matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, many of the bills which are placed before the house are concerned with a specific problem, or a single occupation, or one region of the country. The measure now before us, concerning the official languages, is a reflection of the nature of this country as a whole, and of a conscious choice we are making about our future.

Canada is an immense country, but it is not an easy country to know. Even under modern conditions, it is a long and expensive trip from St. John's to Vancouver, or from Windsor to Inuvik. The great differences of geography, history and economics within our country have produced a rich diversity of temperament, viewpoint and culture.

This is easy to state, Mr. Chairman, and it has been repeated in hundreds of patriotic speeches; but without the direct experience which has not been available to most Canadians, it is difficult to appreciate it fully.

The most important example of this diversity is undoubtedly the existence of the two major language groups, both of which are strong enough in numbers and in material and intellectual resources to resist the forces of assimilation. In the past this underlying reality of our country has not been adequately reflected in many of our public institutions.

major countries of western Europe. It so happens that the majority of these countries are relatively homogeneous in language and culture. It has been practical for many of them to operate on the principle of one state, one language. For Canadian descendants of west Europeans this has often appeared to be the normal situation, subject to a few unimportant exceptions. Even today, it is not unknown for a European statesman to offer advice on the future of this country based on such old world ideas.

Looked at from a contemporary world viewpoint, it is the apparently homogeneous states of western Europe which are the exception. Many eastern European, Asian and African states contain within a single political unit a great variety of languages, religions and cultures. In many of them this diversity is reflected in a federal system of government and in two or more official languages. In the past, multi-cultural states have often resulted from conquest or colonialism. In the modern world, many are based on a conscious appreciation of the facts of history, geography and economics.

This latter case is the case of Canada, a country blessed with more prosperity and political stability than most other countries, and where we are making our choices methodically and democratically. In all parts of the country, within both language groups, there are those who call for uniformity. It will be simpler and cheaper, they argue. In the case of the French minority, isolation is prescribed as necessary for survival. We must never underestimate the strength or the durability of these appeals to profound human emotions. But surely these arguments are based on fear, on a narrow view of human nature, and on a defeatist appraisal of our capacity to adapt our society and its institutions to the demands of its citizens. Those who argue for separation, in whatever form, are prisoners of past injustice, blind to the possibilities of the future.

We in this house, we who have chosen to sit in the federal parliament, have rejected this view of our country. We believe in two official languages and in a pluralist society, not merely as a political necessity but as an enrichment. We want to live in a country in which French Canadians can choose to live among English Canadians and English Canadians can choose to live among French Canadians without abandoning their cultural heritage.

Those of us who have some experience of the difficulties and opportunities of this course are conscious of the risk. But we are convinced that, as a country and as individuals, we must take it. French Canada can survive not by turning in on itself but by reaching out to claim its full share of every aspect of Canadian life. English Canada ought to attempt to understand this, and I believe it is doing so to an increasing degree. English Canada should not of course, attempt to absorb French Canada. All Canadians should capitalize on the advantages of living in a country which has learned to speak in two great world languages.

Such a country will be able to make full use of the skills and energy of all its citizens. Such a country will be more interesting, more stimulating and, in many ways, richer than it has ever been. Such a country will be much better equipped to play a useful role in the world of today and tomorrow.

How can we realize these aspirations? We believe that this bill is one step in that direction. It is not the first step, as this house knows, and to place it in context I will mention some other steps which have been taken since the appointment of the royal commission under Mr. Dunton and Mr. Laurendeau in 1963.

A program of language training for federal public servants was started in 1964 and has since been greatly expanded to develop proficiency in both languages in those centres where it is required. The government recognizes that its objectives in this field can only be accomplished progressively and that their fulfilment must not involve any prejudice to the careers of civil servants who are not bilingual and who have devoted many years of their lives to the public service. Nevertheless substantial progress has been made.

About 5,000 hours of language training per day are now available for public servants. I am happy to note that a number of members of this house have been taking advantage of these facilities.

Because we are engaged in a project that, as far as we know, is unique in the world in both size and scope, the rapid growth of this program resulted for a period in serious problems of administration. As the demand for training has far exceeded the capacity of the system, priority has been given to training executive and administrative officers. The government intends to expand the language

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Those of us who have some experience of the difficulties and opportunities of this purse are conscious of the risk. But we are convenient take it. French Canada can surely we must take it. French Ca

There is no easy way to competence in a second language, but in three and a half years enough such competence has been acquired by many senior officials to permit both English and French speaking participants in conferences and committees to use their mother tongue, confident that they will be understood. We have every assurance from this experience that the objectives of the public service language training program will be reached.

[Translation]

On April 6, 1966, Mr. Pearson made a policy announcement in this house on bilingualism in the public service of Canada. He stated then:

The government "expects that within a reasonable period of years a state of affairs in the public service will be reached whereby: (a) it will be normal practice for oral or written communications within the service to be made in either official language at the option of the person making them...

(b) communications with the public will normally be in either language having regard to the person being served".

At that time he announced a number of measures to promote these objectives. I should like to mention the progress to date on three of them.

Firstly, a salary differential has been paid since 1966 to those holding secretarial, stenographic and typist positions in which both languages are required and where both are used.

Secondly, a special program for improving bilingualism among senior executive officers was also begun in 1966.

Under this program each year some twenty English-speaking civil servants with their families spend a year in Quebec City while some ten French-speaking civil servants and their families spend a year in Toronto.

Thirdly, in 1967 reasonable proficiency in the two official languages, or willingness to acquire it through appropriate training at public expense, became an element of merit in the selection of university graduates recruited for administrative trainee positions where the need for bilingualism exists.

commission issued the first volume of its sion's recommendations which lie within the report which made a number of important jurisdiction of parliament. As the resolution recommendations on language rights. The indicates, these will include provisions to report stated:

We take as a guiding principle the recognition of both official languages, in law and in practice, wherever the minority is numerous enough to be viable as a group.

At the constitutional conference held in February of this year, the federal government announced that it accepted the objectives set by the royal commission, that it would take steps to implement the proposals applicable to the federal government, and that it hoped the provinces would implement those requiring provincial action. We also stated:

The government of Canada will be prepared to help in the implementation of these proposals if we are asked to do so. We will be glad to join the provincial governments in devising the methods which our assistance could be made most effective.

During the February meeting, Mr. Chairman, the constitutional conference reached the following consensus on language rights:

Firstly, French-speaking Canadians outside of Quebec should have the same rights as English-speaking Canadians in Quebec.

Secondly, each government should take the necessary actions in this field as speedily as possible, in ways most appropriate to its jurisdiction and without diminishing existing rights recognized by law or usage.

Thirdly, the conference established a special committee to examine the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism and other matters relating to language rights and their effective provision in practice, and to consult on methods of implementation, including the nature of possible federal assistance, and on the form and the method of constitutional amendment.

In addition to reaching a consensus on the three points I have just mentioned, Mr. Chairman, that conference also established a continuing committee of officials which met in May, July and September and will meet again next month. Later, to implement as much as possible those recommendations and the measures studied by the officials, there will be another meeting of Prime Minister and premiers, that is to say there will be on December 16 to 18 next a federal-provincial conference on constitutional matters.

[English]

Today's resolution describes the official languages bill which will provide for the not violate the principle of equality of status. 29180-941

At the end of 1967 the Laurendeau-Dunton implementation of those of the royal commisestablish the status of the French and English languages as the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the parliament and government of Canada, and will also provide for the appointment of a commissioner of official languages with the duty of ensuring recognition of the status of the two languages. It sets out for the first time the language rights of citizens in their dealings with parliament, with the federal government and with federal institutions, and the duties of those institutions toward the citizen in matters of language.

We do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that this bill will take care of all of Canada's needs in respect of French and English or other languages. It is important to point out some of the areas to which it does not apply. bill does not, of course, amend the constitution. I have often stated my belief that such amendment is necessary to guarantee the fundamental language rights of our citizens, and this is one of the subjects which is before the continuing conference on the constitution. It does not affect provincial jurisdiction over the administration of justice, nor can it do so. The bill does not affect any other matter within provincial jurisdiction, nor can it do so. It does contain an enabling provision relating to proceedings in criminal matters, but discretion is left to the courts over its implementation. It does not regulate the internal operations of the government—an important matter, as I have said, and one which has evolved in many ways. There are other statutes and there are policy statements which deal with such matters as internal operations of the government. They also deal with matters having to do with communications between the government and employee and deal with other areas where the question of bilingualism is a factor in employment.

In drafting this particular bill we have not ignored the practical limitations of manpower and equipment. There are provisions for periods of adaptation, where necessary. The bill does not require every government document to be produced in both languages in certain cases where production in one language does any rights which Canadians may enjoy by law or custom. It does not, for example, affect the rights of non-French or non-English speaking defendants in criminal proceedings to testify in their own languages and to obtain court interpreters.

[Translation]

When this bill is placed before the house, I propose to discuss its objectives and its main provisions in greater detail. I shall say no more about it at this time except to commend it to the earnest attention of honourable members and also of the general public of Canada.

I believe that there will be widespread agreement among members and their constituents in all parts of Canada that this bill is of the greatest importance in promoting national unity.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, as leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition I wish to say that I and my colleagues will vote in favour of this resolution which asks the house to agree, and we do agree, to the presentation of a bill which would officially designate English and French as the official languages of this parliament and of the government. We will also be asked to agree to the appointment of a commissioner of official languages who presumably will be asked to oversee the administration of this act.

Inasmuch as this measure would give further legislative effect, legislative authority, to something that is already a fact in the eastern part of the country at least, we will want to examine the authority that it is proposed to give this commissioner, and his duties. In passing I may say that I hope we are not laying the cornerstone for another expensive exercise in empire building. We will examine with an open mind the provisions made in the bill to implement this aspect of the resolution.

But there are two other, related observations that I think I should make very clear at this time. First, I trust there is a strong determination on the part of the government, and I think we are entitled to have some declaration to this effect at the appropriate time, that nothing in this bill or in any other similar measure will encourage or permit the creation of any new inequalities in Canada.

and maximum efficiency the government of in achieving a consensus with the provinces

Finally, in relation to languages other than Canada must be able to operate effectively in English or French, the bill does not diminish both official languages. I hope we are also agreed that it would be unjust to penalize thousands of individuals who have followed careers in the public service, and that in respect of future recruitments it would be detrimental to the maintenance of a talented and effective public service to cut off unilingual Canadians from a career in the public service or restrict their opportunities for promotions.

In this connection I hope the government is well aware of the difficulties encountered by Canadians in most parts of English speaking Canada in learning to use the French language effectively, since very limited opportunities are available to do so. The Prime Minister referred to the efforts being made within the government service. I may say, with respect to officials and politicians as well as others who wish to learn French, that the federal language bureau is very co-operative, helpful and patient. That was my experience.

As the Prime Minister has indicated, the acquisition of a second language is a long, difficult process for most of us. Certainly this resolution is based on a policy that is founded on justice and directed toward effective administration. But it must be administered with equity and realism.

This resolution, preceding what has been called an official languages bill, is part of the much larger question of national unity and of constitutional agreements that will be devised for the future of our country. Within the framework of Canada's constitutional evolution and of the problems we still have to resolve, this resolution can hardly be regarded as a very significant or decisive step. As I have said, it is quite a small part of the over-all question, and from the point of view of the government it is the easiest part. All that is required is the drafting and presentation of a resolution and a bill in this house. It is one of the few aspects of the over-all question that requires only unilateral action by the federal government and the federal parliament.

From the legislative point of view, therefore, it is a simple matter relatively and no test at all of the capacity of the government to further the cause of national unity. The real test of the capacity of this government to further the cause of national unity will be found in the extent to which the government We are agreed that for reasons of justice succeeds, by its own leadership and initiative, on matters that require joint action or provincial action. So far, I must say, that record is not very encouraging.

After many years a real and positive breakthrough—I am speaking of last winter—was begun at the Confederation of Tomorrow conference and achieved at the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa some nine months ago. As the Prime Minister has reminded us, a consensus was then reached on language rights between the prime minister of the day and the provincial premiers. It is a matter of the greatest regret to me, Mr. Chairman, and to many if not most Canadians, that the spirit and practical progress of that conference have been allowed to dissipate in the months that have intervened. A further meeting between the Prime Minister and the premiers ought to have been held long before this. We have learned today that it has been called for mid-December.

Meanwhile, it appears that there has been a deliberate attempt to keep the public from knowing what is going on with regard to ongoing discussions with respect to constitutional arrangements and, indeed, to discourage public discussion by keeping the subject as far below the surface as possible. I think this is unfortunate and it may even be tragic, because no permanent or satisfactory arrangements can ever be made unless they are founded not only on legal accord among governments-and Lord knows, these are hard enough to obtain—but on a genuine consensus among the people of all parts of Canada. And this consensus among people, among our citizens, can only be achieved by way of full and open discussion by and with the leaders of the government and the people. The people must know what is going on.

I am aware that officials representing the federal government and the various provincial governments have been meeting in the interim. But it is a matter of regret and concern to me that there has been no attempt to inform the public, even partially, on what is taking place.

The Prime Minister told the house recently that the provinces and the federal government had exchanged working papers and that the only agreement was that it would be left to the discretion of each of the parties to the discussion to decide whether to make its own presentation public. This is not good enough. In the absence of any official communiques claim to represent or express the national and misunderstanding feeding on speculation. It has been impossible even to obtain information on what subjects are under discussion, what is on the agenda, or what progress is being made. I fully recognize the need for a proper measure of confidentiality in discussions among governments, but the extremes to which this has been carried in the current discussions can only be harmful to the objectives of national unity which we all support and are eager to attain.

Finally, I want to emphasize in the strongest possible way the urgent need to establish a parliamentary committee on constitutional matters. I deplore the fact that an opportunity has not been presented long since for the members of this house to participate in the discussions leading to new constitutional arrangements.

We have had federal-provincial conferences and meetings among officials. For some years, there has been a continuing and prominent discussion in the information media, among academics, labour unions, service clubs, fraternal organizations, professional associations, and business groups. Books have been written. Draft constitutions have been published by the score. That may be a slight exaggeration but at least a number of draft constitutions have been published. It seems that everybody of any importance in the country is already on the record as to the process of constitutional change.

Only the parliament of Canada, the highest institution in our land, the one institution which is responsible to all of Canada, seems officially to have ignored the on-going discussion of constitutional evolution in Canada. While constitutional matters have been accorded primacy in almost every other forum of public discussion in the country, only the parliament of Canada seems to have stood aloof and above the controversy. It is incredible to me how this institution can assert the slightest claim to represent a national consensus or to provide a vital forum for the discussion of the most important issues in the country, and at the same time carry on from day to day and year to year seemingly oblivious of the controversies and the discussions which are engaging public attention outside.

I have raised this issue before, in this house and outside it. My hon. friend from Peace River has urged this course upon the government at least twice during the present session. If this institution has any we have had speculation feeding on rumour, interest, it should buckle down to a serious discussion of constitutional matters. That we have let it go so long is a sad commentary on the relevance of this institution to Canadian life today.

I am very happy to indicate our support for the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of my hon. friends and myself I welcome the resolution which the Prime Minister has introduced and it gives me sincere pleasure to add that I also welcome the words with which he introduced it this afternoon. Naturally we reserve the right to study the provisions in the bill when it comes before us to ensure that the purpose of bringing about linguistic equality is achieved without discrimination and without compulsion, without creating some new injustice.

I want this afternoon, in the few minutes which the rules give me, to deal only with the subject matter of the resolution and to leave some of the other questions which are equally important for later consideration. I look upon the measure which the resolution forecasts in the light both of our country's history and of its future. I regard this measure as redressing a profound oversight which has haunted Canadians for the first century of our existence as a country, an oversight which has harmed harmonious development among the citizens of this nation. I consider it as a step long overdue.

[Translation]

I want to repeat, Mr. Chairman, what he said in the house on April 6, 1966, as shown on page 3920 of Hansard, and I quote:

—the one who fully understands the history of Canada can have any doubt that one of the deepest and most legitimate grievances suffered by Frenchspeaking Canadians is that they did not feel at home even in their own federal capital.

I also said and I say it again:

—it is to be deeply regretted also that we had to face a grave national crisis before we had the common sense and understanding—

—to introduce bilingualism within the public service and to consider taking the necessary measures to give official status to bilingualism in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I consider this resolution as:

—the first step in a direction that will lead us toward a true and rewarding unity that will hold the brightest prospects for the future of our country.

[English]

Anyone acquainted with Canadian history has learned to know and to regret the fact [Mr. Stanfield.]

that it has taken us an entire century to tackle the problem with which this resolution deals. I say this not to seek to lay blame on any person, any party or any institution but merely to recognize that it is important to emphasize to the Canadian people of all languages and origins that this resolution envisages nothing more than a state of affairs which ought to have been realized from the first day of our existence.

I think the most significant facts in this long national travail are those indicated by the Prime Minister, although he referred to them in a different context. That is to say, it took until 1964, the 97th year of confederation, before we considered introducing bilingualism as a reality in the public service. It took until 1966, the 99th year of confederation, to introduce a plan to deal with bilingualism in the civil service. We must remind ourselves too-and I have said this both in this chamber and outside before audiences across the country in both English speaking and French speaking Canada—that neglect of this basic aspect of Canadian history and Canadian life has not been characteristic of English speaking prime ministers alone but has been equally characteristic of prime ministers who were distinguished leaders among French speaking Canadians.

The fact is that justice in this case has been measured out as in most other cases. It did not come with spontaneous generosity but only in response to the despairing cries of those in Canada who have been aggrieved by the injustice. Because it has not come with spontaneous and generous recognition of one by the other, the result has been that prejudice and misunderstanding have developed across Canada which neither this resolution nor the bill will erase.

I say to my fellow Canadians whose mother tongue, like mine, was neither English nor French that this country is a bilingual country, that Canada is a country of mosaic design and is not a melting pot. I say to my fellow Canadians with origins other than English or French that it is precisely because Canada is a bilingual country, and has always been, that communities in Canada with languages and cultures other than English and French have been able to develop within an economic, intellectual and moral concepts much higher than such communities have achieved in any other country in the world.

I emphasize to my fellow Canadians whose origins are other than English or French that they would not have these rights, this kind of recognition, or the enthusiastic acceptance of their rights in this democratic country were it not for the basic fact that this country is not unilingual, is not unicultural and never has been. The fact is that while this country recognizes two languages and two cultures as official there is opportunity for the recognition of other languages and other cultures as well. The neglect of this basic fact of Canada has resulted in a great sense of insecurity across this country. Citizens who have jobs which until now have been unilingual are afraid they will lose these jobs if bilingualism becomes a requirement. This is a very natural feeling. Citizens who do not understand what we are trying to do are afraid that they will all be made to speak two languages. Many of them are at a stage in life when they do not wish to be forced to do so, and we must make clear that they will not have to.

We must recognize the value of the B and B commission. The other day some members of this house, including a colleague in my own caucus, were critical of this commission. It deserves some criticism even though, as hon. members here know, some members on the commission are good friends of mine. It deserves criticism for having taken so long to do the job. It might have been much better had it only done a part of the job so that it would have been able to do it quickly and easily. The members of the commission deserve some criticism for the delay and, therefore, the huge expense involved.

The important fact in my view, however, is that the B and B commission has served an immensely valuable purpose. It has initiated for the first time a serious dialogue on the question of bilingualism and biculturalism. In some cases this dialogue has served merely to harden already existing prejudices but in most cases it has served the valuable purpose of opening people's eyes and bringing great understanding for the first time in the history of this country. For the first time in the 40odd years I have lived here there is an atmosphere and climate in English speaking Canada which makes possible the acceptance of the fact that bilingualism is a part of the Canadian mosaic. This is something which, until we had the B and B commission, would not have been possible to expect in many parts of this country. There is, therefore, the greatest hope on this issue.

I should like to state some aspects of a personal and deeply felt credo. I believe that bilingualism is one of the great bulwarks in protecting this country from being completely swallowed by the country to the south of us. It is my duty, of course, to be friendly to our friendly neighbour, at least when I am not dealing with the subject of Viet Nam, but when I listen to radio and watch television in the English language and become somewhat depressed by the amount of "art" we receive through the airwaves from the south I turn to a French language station or a French language channel and realize that this country is blessed because of the fact that we have one language and one culture which cannot be overwhelmed by the powerful voice from the south.

Those who know a little—and I hasten to say I am well aware that I know all too little—about French Canadian writing, music, folk singing, theatre and art, cannot but have profound admiration for this immense contribution to our national life and culture. We are richer because we are bilingual. If we have the imagination and understanding to erase or at least isolate prejudice and bigotry, we can become unique among the democracies of the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that the fundamental problem of national unity cannot be solved unless we attack it on several fronts at the same time. Attaining linguistic equality in the federal field is the first step. Then, it is hoped that English-speaking provinces will create, as quickly as possible, a linguistic and cultural climate which will allow French Canadians to feel at home everywhere in Canada. Above all, it is hoped that the responsible authorities in Quebec will not allow the erosion of the privileges and rights enjoyed by English-speaking citizens in that province since the inception of our federation.

I should also like to point out that, to my mind, one of our most serious problems stems from the social and economic disparity to be found everywhere to some extent. Governments at all levels, and especially at the federal level, have the urgent duty of implementing such legislation and programs as will eliminate the regional disparities that undermine the integrity of Canada and threaten its unity.

[English]

I wish to emphasize that it is a dangerous illusion to think that this resolution and the bill which will follow are the most important aspects of the problem of Canadian unity, important though they are. Even more important is the problem of poverty and of economic and social inequality across this country. It is the continuation of inequality and poverty that creates a real threat to our future. It is a well established sociological fact that nothing so much as economic and social insecurity produces deep prejudice which expresses itself in language and in social and racial disorder.

In conclusion I should also like to say, without belittling the importance of the commissioner that the resolution forecasts, that perhaps more important than a commissioner to supervise the implementation of the official languages act is a program of education across the country for the acceptance of the principles and objectives of this legislation. I have always thought that the threat of separatism in Canada, both in English speaking Canada and French speaking Canada, whatever aspect it takes, is not that separatism will succeed in any part of the country because I am absolutely confident that it will fail in Quebec or anywhere else that it is proposed. I hope and believe with all my heart that my confidence is justified. The threat of separatist influence is much greater because of the disunity it creates, because of the evil reactions it produces in every part of the country, because of the prejudice on which it feeds and because of the roorback and backlash it almost always produces.

I suggest that all of us in the federal parliament, perhaps more than in any other legislature in this country, have a duty to explain the objectives of recognizing bilingualism as a fact to the people of this country. We must do this with patience and with profound sincerity, and we must proceed to the necessary constitutional changes and the elimination of inequality and poverty in this land so that Canada can realize the tremendous, almost unimaginable greatness of which it is capable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, with your permission, at the outset I should like to relate a small incident which happened this morning and which will acquaint the house with the tremendous task which we have to perform if we want to achieve the purpose explained to us earlier by the Prime Minister.

This morning, three members of our group were on their way to parliament; we were stopped by an Ottawa police officer and once again we had to put up with the pertness of this strictly English-speaking police officer who treated us in an absolutely unacceptable manner in the capital of a so-called bilingual country.

At the outset, I will therefore refer to the B.N.A. Act, because I still fear that this resolution which we are now studying will not bring a great deal. That is why the environment must be such that we can really operate a change in this country. In section 133 of the B.N.A. Act, it is stated in two paragraphs that the parliament of Canada and the Quebec parliament are bilingual.

It is a well-known fact that those principles have been applied to their full extent in the province of Quebec. On the other hand, I do not intend to relate, at this stage, all the struggles that had to be fought to get tangible and concrete results. Allow me simply to point out that we have witnessed some kind of resurgence of the French fact in this house, more especially when the Créditistes from Quebec made their entry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Matte: I think we must congratulate that political group for having brought to this house more French than used to be spoken. They deserve all the credit, and I think we should express to them our most heartfelt congratulations.

The British North America Act is too often considered as something sacred that cannot be changed. We should be less strict in this connection and bear in mind that the act—I am not sure whether everybody is aware of that—officially, is a unilingual English act. The French part of this act is not official. We can already see the problem facing us. We also know that bill passed in the London parliament—I am still referring to the British North America Act—was passed at an extraordinary pace, because there was a more important bill to be disposed of, namely a bill dealing with rules concerning dogs.

Therefore, we should consider the resolution now before us having in mind that this time it should bring a real hope of deep and concrete change. It is even unfortunate, as pointed out by the honourable member who spoke before me, that we should have waited so long to legislate on this matter and I am afraid that, once again, people in the province of Quebec will say, too little and too late, especially on account of a limitation, and I quote:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the status of the English and French languages as the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the Parliament and Government of Canada and respecting the use of those languages in the administration of the affairs of the Parliament and Government of Canada and the several institutions thereof;—

I wonder why there is that limitation—and the several institutions thereof—

The situation in Canada at present was reported to us in a rather realistic way, I think, in the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

A crisis exists in Canada and I will refer to Book I of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, where the existence of such a crisis was conceded. I quote:

Canada, without being fully conscious of the fact, is passing through the greatest crisis in its history.

The term "crisis" which we employed at that time shocked many Canadians. Some associated it with only the more superficial manifestations of social unrest. For others, who were unaware of the nature and extent of Quebec's dissatisfactions, it was an exaggeration. It was our conviction, however, that the problem was deep seated, and that in the gravest sense of the term Canada was facing a national crisis "a time when decisions must be taken and developments must occur leading either to its break-up, or to a new set of conditions for its future existence".

And this paragraph concludes: This is still the situation.

Therefore, English Canada should not keep on turning a deaf ear.

• (5:00 p.m.)

We must examine the real problem calmly and frankly, once and for all. My remarks are based on the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. Bilingualism seems to operate in one direction only; according to the 1961 census, 1.5 million French Canadians are bilingual as against only 300,000 English Canadians.

This reminds me of certain definitions often heard in Quebec, and particularly in my region, where they say: a multilingual person is one who speaks several languages; a bilingual person is one who speaks two languages; and a unilingual person is someone who speaks English. This definition shows the atmosphere which exists in the province of Quebec.

For instance, the Laurendeau-Dunton report mentions and I quote:

Naturally, a bilingual institution, province, or country can function efficiently only if there is a sufficient number of bilingual people to maintain contact between the two language groups.

We find that it is a situation which unconstitutes the fortunately prevailed and which seems to be to Quebeckers.

going on at the present time. We see that bilingualism is a one-way street. Further on, they say:

It is not surprising then that any community which is governed through the medium of a language other than its own has usually felt itself to some extent disenfranchised and that this feeling has always been a potential focus for the political agitation.

Therefore, we can see that the problem with which we are dealing at the present time is the most important problem in Canada, and that is why we ought to consider the situation in concrete terms, when dealing with a bill such as is proposed to us now.

This situation results from disparities, from the fact that our own mother tongue is losing ground in Quebec and again I shall now quote another part of the report:

We have deliberately outlined this ideal in absolute terms, which some people will consider over-simplified, in order to emphasize the great lag which separates the cultural groups. The members of a privileged group living under almost perfect conditions are tempted to take this situation for granted and not to stop to consider what others are missing. Members of the underprivileged group may reach a greater or lesser degree of alienation, and so become unaware of their cultural underdevelopment or of the hybrid nature of their culture, not to mention the inferiority complex which so often inhibits them and makes them feel inadequate.

There are causes for political unrest and it is these real causes that we ought to consider.

The report further adds:

—have unequal opportunities for work. In a plural society, two consequences follow from the dominance of one language: a limited utilization of the potential skills of those who do not know the dominant language perfectly and a disengagement of the other mother tongues from important aspects of social reality. These two consequences may well lead to a third: the unequal development of the various groups' human resources.

These are arguments which explain the situation and I have taken them from the Laurendeau-Dunton report, in order to make it clear that they express the views of the French Canadian people as a whole.

The crisis that Canada is going through in that respect is due to all kinds of situations brought about by various positions being taken.

Let us examine, for example, the situation in the House of Commons itself. There are now only 18 French-speaking members in the opposition. The fact is worth mentioning since, in fact, the Ralliement Créditiste even constitutes the official opposition with regard to Quebeckers.

That being the situation, parliament is almost exclusively English-speaking. I figured it out, and realized that almost 90 per cent of the debates go on in English as against 10 per cent in French. The reason for that situation obviously lies in the fact that the opposition, which usually instigates the debate, has only 18 French-speaking members since, unfortunately, the vast majority of French-speaking members sit on the government side, and that restricts the use of French in the house. That is precisely one of the errors Quebec made in always supporting so intensively the party now in power.

I have already mentioned that about 10 per cent of the discussion go on in French in this house, but yesterday, I learned that in the other place, French was used for only 8 per cent of the proceedings. Such is the situation.

And so, the humble Quebecker, who comes from the backwoods of Quebec or from the riding of Champlain, like me, does not feel completely at home here. The situation all around him explains the political unrest we have to face.

There is also a special crisis in Quebec, where being bilingual means speaking "joual" or "franglais" rather than French and English. We are aware of the situation.

I quote again from the Laurendeau-Dunton report:

—even a great cultural language, even an international language like French, under certain sociological conditions, can wither away to the point where, for certain groups, it no longer expresses the essentials of contemporary civilization. In such a case the culture itself is in mortal danger; for nobody will maintain that a group still has a living culture, in the full sense of the term, when it is forced to use another language in order to express to itself the realities which make up a large part of its daily life.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, those remarks were made by the Laurendeau-Dunton commission.

That particular crisis in Quebec is a vital matter for the people of Quebec; it is so important, in fact, that, as far as bilingualism is concerned, it must be remembered that "anglicization" in Quebec itself is so prevalent that people do not even notice it. French words are used, yes, but the syntax and the construction of the sentences are English. I am a teacher myself and I have noticed that syntactic anglicism has become quite serious among French-speaking people.

The Quebecers are therefore rather unsure about their future, and the bill which will be considered must not disappoint them. In fact,

That being the situation, parliament is alit should not be another way for the governost exclusively English-speaking. I figured ment to deceive the French Canadians much out, and realized that almost 90 per cent of longer.

This was an easy thing for the Liberal party in Quebec. A tradition became established. The choice of a French-speaking Prime Minister was enough; Quebecers heavily supported the party of the Prime Minister. That is how we continue the tradition.

The representations of French Canadians who complain about these hundred years of dissatisfaction should be taken seriously. From the beginning, we have always been submissive, under the French, the English or the Confederative regimes. Now that French Canadians are really anxious to assume their responsibilities, to develop themselves and to bring an appreciable contribution to the whole country, we should definitely do something and that is becoming a most important matter.

Something must be done. In order to prove that the proposed bilingualism is a matter much more complex than the mere fact of speaking two languages, let us just consider the Vancouver incident where after much publicity in the newspapers, it was reported that the French government was donating $5,000, the federal government $6,000 and the British Columbia government, $5,000—I think there was still another contributionfor the establishment of a French nursery school in Vancouver. Those things bore Quebec. Why? Because the incident received much publicity. What happened? The school had scarcely opened that it had to close, for lack of pupils. Therefore, bilingualism must be considered from a different point of view. We must be realistic. It is a fact that Montreal, the national metropolis, is being fiercely anglicized.

The incidents in St. Leonard have simply brought into the open an abnormal situation which existed in a Quebec French-Canadian locality. The intention was to anglicize that locality. It is a matter of fact. We cannot hide from it; these are concrete facts.

Therefore, there is a danger, if the language declines, that we might lose all our own characteristics and, by that very fact, prevent the country from being culturally stronger and richer. One cannot have at the same time two personalities or two styles. That is why it seems to me that we should aim—and it should be the objective of every Canadian—for the full emancipation of the French language by carrying out the proper calls true bilingualism? Will the act spell out principle. If we really seek the development what the departments are to do in every of French Canadians and their real and prof- phase of their work? If it does, then it will itable contribution to our country, mutual mean that the civil service may be subjected help is required in order to promote that to compulsion. It has always been my belief emancipation. Efficient means have to be applied so that the French-Canadian people may remain themselves.

Again, in the Laurendeau-Dunton commission we find this: A bilingual country is not one where all the inhabitants necessarily have to speak two languages; rather, it is a country where the principal public and private institutions must provide services in two languages to citizens, the vast majority of whom may very well be unilingual.

I think this is the way we should approach the changes concerning bilingualism or biculturalism. There would be a way to promote the study of French in the whole country thanks to manpower mobility. The mobility of our manpower should be planned in such a way that neither the French-speaking nor the English-speaking Canadian would be isolated so that, as is always advocated in the report, everybody will really feel at home.

As we know, Quebeckers do not want any longer to be recognized in Canada as ordinary shock absorbers against the invasion of American culture. They want to be something else. They want to be themselves as was so often repeated by the head of the Railliement Créditiste. We want to be ourselves and to accept us just because our particular culture is a buffer against the invasion of the American culture is, in 1968, I think, an insult. We want to participate in the progress of the country by giving our best, that is, by staying ourselves.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I can hardly let this resolution go by without making some comment in an attempt to place western Canada's position on the record. Of all those who have spoken so far no one has referred to that vast area which plays such an important part in the economic life of Canada. The other day the Prime Minister referred to it as a country. Certainly we in the west consider it a very major part of our country. On looking very closely at this resolution I cannot help but wonder why the Prime Minister feels it is necessary to legislate on this matter and to introduce an act with respect to it. Is it going to be that difficult for the departments of this government to implement what he 29180-951 that it is much easier to get people to accept an idea without attempting to use force.

This resolution and the bill which will follow will undoubtedly place all the western Canada at a disadvantage. When one looks at the percentage of French speaking people in Alberta one sees that approximately only 3.5 per cent claim a working knowledge of that language. In the province of Manitoba, which has quite a large French settlement, less than 7 per cent speak French while 14 per cent speak Ukrainian. In the whole of western Canada including British Columbia only 5 per cent of the population has a working knowledge of the French language.

I make this abundantly clear because in the government today two of the prime concerns of western Canada are in the hands of ministers from the province of Quebec. If this bill is passed and implemented I can foresee that all civil servants will be bilingual. If this happens, in what position will western Canada find itself when only 5 per cent of our population has a working knowledge of French? It will make it very difficult for people from western Canada to acquire jobs in the civil service.

The Prime Minister may well say that people from western Canada who apply for jobs in the civil service will have to learn French. Let me give an illustration of the situation there so far as learning French is concerned. My children go to school in Alberta. Last year my son graduated from grade 12. None of my children had teachers to teach them French at school, and this is still so in that school and in many other parts of western Canada. Before this legislation was prepared surely the Prime Minister and those who share his views should have ensured that an opportunity would be given to people in the whole of Canada to acquire a working knowledge of French.

I have been a member of parliament for 11 years and I realize very well that members of parliament try to direct the policies of the government but in many cases the administration of those policies is carried out by the civil service. Let us envisage a completely bilingual civil service operating and managing the affairs of western Canada. Without a doubt that civil service will be predominantly from regions where the French language is commonly spoken. So instead of having two know very little. If this legislation is carried out to the letter it will deprive western Canadians in our generation of active participation in the administration of their affairs in the federal field. It may be said that I am attempting to make a mountain out of a molehill, but this is the way I see it.

Too often in my daily concerns here in Ottawa I have found civil servants doing their utmost to carry out the wishes of the government in various fields of administration. I have no complaint about this, but they are doing their work without any knowledge of the area they are attempting to administer. In my opinion this measure will have to be handled very carefully. The Prime Minister says he has a majority and can force it on us; we have to accept it. However, as the Leader of the Opposition said, if it is not handled with a great deal of care and some degree of responsibility it could create many injustices.

The previous speaker mentioned the assimilation of the French language. One must bear in mind also that the percentage of people of French origin who can no longer speak the French language has increased in the past number of years. Proof of this statement is found in the 1961 census figures. This measure is an attempt to reverse this natural trend. I am not saving whether the attempt should be made but I am saying this is what has been happening in Canada. Whether the Prime Minister likes it, whether the country likes it, it is a fact. Any time a government legislates against an obvious trend, great care must be used in the administration of that legislation. If care is not used there are bound to be many injustices.

For example, the Prime Minister has stated there will be a continuation of the confederation conference in December. Has he really considered the position of the province of Alberta in so far as a December conference is concerned? The party in power in that province is choosing a new leader and he will have just assumed office when the conference takes place. How can he become familiar with all the duties of his office and participate actively in the confederation conference one week after he has been chosen as leader? It is going to be very difficult.

[Mr. Horner.]

In view of the position taken by the present cabinet ministers from the province of Que- premier of Alberta at the constitutional conbec managing the affairs of western Canada ference held a year ago, I would much prefer we will have a whole bureaucracy adminis- that the Prime Minister hold the conference tering the affairs of an area about which they in February rather than December. This would give Alberta a far greater chance to accumulate the facts and to ensure an understanding of what the position of the province really is. In my opinion the Prime Minister is not treating Alberta very justly in calling this conference for December. Alberta really spearheaded the objections voiced at the last conference and received mild support from Saskatchewan and British Columbia. The Prime Minister has hurriedly called another conference at the very time the province which objected to some constitutional changes will be at its weakest. This is not a very fair way to carry on the dialogue which has been taking place for a number of years.

I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that this question has been debated by provincial leaders and on television and should be debated in this House of Commons. In my opinion this is a serious step and we must take it very carefully. If this measure is approved it must be administered with a great deal of realism or, I repeat, many injustices may be created rather than problems solved.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak on this measure because I felt that for the good of Canada this kind of thing would be accepted by all people and by all parties. I was encouraged to hear the comments of the Leader of the Opposition. I was particularly impressed by the remarks of the house leader of the New Democratic party. However, I was frankly disturbed by the comments of the hon. member for Champlain and particularly disturbed by the comments of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

I grew up in a home where the attitude of my parents could, I believe, have resulted in my being called a wasp. My father was an Englishman who hated the French. I do not believe my mother was particularly fond of Roman Catholics. I grew up in the community of Sudbury and played baseball for the Catholic youth organization. After playing in that organization I realized that these other people did not all have horns, nor were they as bad as I had been led to believe. I worked underground with French Canadians, men who spoke nothing but French. Somehow or other we managed to get along.

The opinions expressed by the hon. member for Champlain and the hon. member for Crowfoot point out, I think, the problems we have in achieving a united Canada today. We do not seem to want to try to see the other fellow's point of view. I am embarrassed by the fact that as a member of the House of Commons I am not fluently bilingual. I hope the member who follows me, no matter to which party he belongs, will be able to stand up in this house and address it in both languages.

I whole-heartedly support this legislation. I recognize there are going to be difficulties. There always will be difficulties when we try something new in this country. For once in my life I am convinced Canada is prepared to put aside all these old prejudices. I understand that the right to use the French language was given to the French speaking people by the Quebec Act, and that is fine with me. All we are doing now is recognizing a fact.

We are not imposing French on anyone. If you speak only English you should go to northern Quebec and find out how much of a stranger you feel. If you have had occasion to go into court in Quebec, as one of the memtried, convicted and fined in a language you do not understand, you will realize what the problem is that we are trying to overcome. It is not going to be done by legislation in the House of Commons. If civil servants in the constituency of Crowfoot speak French and you want to get your unemployment insurance cheque you will have to learn to speak French. I do not see anything wrong with that.

I say that this legislation is one of the steps. Nobody suggests that it is going to answer all of our problems; it simply points the way. Surely this is what we as members of the House of Commons are required to do. When I heard the leaders of all parties speak I understood that this was a bill with which everybody agreed. We all recognize that there will be problems, Mr. Chairman, but for heaven's sake let us do something to put this country on the map.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, the resolution now before the house is of major importance, since if the government proposes, and I quote:

-to introduce a measure respecting the status of the English and French languages as the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the Parliament and Government of Canada and respecting the use of those languages in the administration of the affairs of the Parliament and Government of Canada and the several institutions thereof; to provide, in connection with the administration and operation of the said measure, for the appointment of a Commissioner of Official Languages-

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just resumed his seat was disturbed by the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte). There is nothing strange in that. The description made a moment ago by the hon. member concerning Sudbury, where he has worked, could well apply to Rouyn-Noranda, my own area, the counterpart of Sudbury, where exactly the same situation prevails. Nevertheless, whatever the situation might be in my constituency or in that of the hon. member, the fact remains that French-speaking people have been treated as poor relatives in the House of Commons of Canada since 1867.

For the last few years, we have had simultaneous interpretation. From the beginning of the present session until now, the bills have been printed in both languages for our benefit. Before, we experienced difficulty even in getting the French translation of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the bers of the New Democratic party did, and be committees. We had to refuse concurrence in the reports of the committees to obtain the French text of the said minutes. We have always had to make claims and demands, not by practising discrimination, but by insisting that our rights be respected on an equal basis with those of English-speaking members. We want exactly the same rights, no more and no less.

> That is our attitude. We have suffered from discrimination much more than we have discriminated against others. Here, in the Canadian parliament, in our national parliament, people who speak English only and know not a word of French have been hired as guides or as guards at the centre doors. However, Mr. Chairman, I defy any member in this house to prove to me that a single French Canadian has been hired without knowing English. One man had to be bilingual, but the other did not. That is discrimination. I will say it in the province of Quebec, in the western part of the country and in the riding of my hon. friend. That discrimination has made a certain group of citizens in the province of Quebec angry, and they are being criticized. However, nobody gets to the root of the problem, to the reasons which gave rise to those feelings in the province of Quebec and even among the French Canadians of Sarnia. There are French-speaking people in your riding, Mr. Chairman, in that of my hon. friend and even in my own riding. This does not mean, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution is unjustified, far from it.

Mr. Chairman, I have just received a note suggesting that I repeat my remarks in English. I can do so, if it will please my hon. friend, the member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen).

"What I just said in French-the simultaneous interpretation into English is good-

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, may I just say that I have been listening to the hon. member's speech on the simultaneous translation system and that I heard every word.

Mr. Caouette: Very well. Then I will go on in French, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

An hon. Member: It is not necessary.

Mr. Caouette: So I go on in French. Mr. Chairman, that is not saying that French Canadians are without faults of their own. We have faults too, we are not infallible, we are not angels either, we are human beings like others, and that is why I say it is possible to co-exist, to be united but with respect for one another, not only in a oneway fashion. That means that we must recognize the same rights to the French Canadians that we are prepared to recognize to the English Canadians. This situation exists in the province of Quebec since confederation, since 1867.

of troubles; I am thinking of the Manitoba schools, the Ontario schools during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's time who has only deluded French Canadians for 75 years, because people were saying that he had a silver tongue. But, when the problems of the Manitoba schools or the Ontario schools were raised in the house, the silver tongue did not have much to say. Nevertheless, French Canadians have been deluded with Sir Wilfrid. They made a myth of him, almost a religion.

When I was a small boy, my father who was an ardent Liberal,-

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: In the living-room at home, Mr. Chairman, since we were Catholics, we had a print of the Sacred Heart and right beside it, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's picture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Caouette: Then, when the time came to say the evening prayers, we were wondering if we should kneel before Sir Wilfrid Laurier or before the Sacred Heart. seemed to have the same importance.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, the Liberals are aware of the methods used to deceive the French Canadians in the province of Quebec. Mind you, another successful attempt was made during the last election to deceive the French Canadians in saying about the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau): "Look, he is just like Sir Wilfrid Laurier".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: The Prime Minister was flown all over the country in a helicopter. He would land in school yards where the children would look at him and think the Holy Ghost was coming down.

Mr. Chairman, again a great many people of the province of Quebec have been deceived-

Mr. Trudeau: By the Holy Ghost.

Mr. Caouette: This is what was done and it is still going on.

Mr. Chairman, our struggle has been going on for a hundred years. It does not follow that we trying to correct our mistakes but we had qualities as well.

The resolution now before the house is well In other provinces, we have seen all kinds meant, but an old proverb says: The road to hell is paved with good intentions. From intention to action there is a difference. Since our election to this parliament, in 1962, we have heard about intentions. Since then, we have not been progressing so quickly and intentions are not being materialized too quickly. So, we want to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister and the government the possibility for both languages to be respected fully everywhere.

A while ago, my fellow member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) was reporting a fact which occurred this morning. There were three members in the same automobile coming from Eastview to parliament. Then they arrived to a pedestrian crossing where there is a square road sign on which there is an X meaning stop. The sign says: "Pedestrian Crossing". The member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) who is not too familiar with English was stopped. I know that the constable who stopped him is not a member of the R.C.M.P., he is an Ottawa policeman who speaks English only. This is a case where the federal authority is not involved and it must be admitted nevertheless that Ottawa is a national capital of Canada. Ottawa is mostly the home of civil servants whose salary is paid by the English as well as by the French, and by the Ukranians, the Poles, the Chinese and by all those living in Canada. This is how Ottawa is made up.

The policeman speaks only English to my colleague for Portneuf. The latter says: I do not understand English, speak to me in French. The policeman says that he does not speak French and that he must admonish him in English because it is his language. He then motions the member for Portneuf to pull over to the curb, but the latter moves on towards parliament. The policeman keeps after him and stops him a second time.

He was stopped four times from Eastview to Ottawa. When at last the policeman realized that he could not be understood in English, he went to his patrol car radio to call for help. A French-speaking policeman came over. This French-speaking policeman was tall, big enough and husky and furthermore he was ill-mannered. This made two qualities.

An hon. Member: A common occurrence.

Mr. Caouette: Naturally the hon. member for Portneuf was rather insulted because the policeman was talking to him with arrogance. Then he told him: Moreover, you ran away. He asked his name but he did not ask his profession. He did not know he was talking to a member of parliament and he does not know it yet. He may know it when he reads our speeches today and he may then know that the three persons were members of parliament.

In any case, Mr. Chairman, it is unthinkable that, in 1968, a town like Ottawa, which is the national capital—I would not make any comment if it were Toronto-which has many people attached to various federal departments, should have no bilingual street signs. Bilingualism should be everywhere in Ottawa, Mr. Chairman, and its absence is really shameful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Ottawa, Charlotte Whitton was reluctant to ed to so-called bilingual officials, and when learn French, but the new mayor elected several years ago, does not appear the grasp the situation either. If those people went to French.

Montreal, Quebec City, Chicoutimi or Rouyn-Noranda, they would find that in cities where barely one per cent of the population is English-speaking, there are bilingual signs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: In Ottawa, the national capital, the mayor says: There is no hurry. And if a bilingual sign is put up on a street corner, some English-speaking separatists splash paint on it.

The same kind of separatists is found in some regions of Quebec. There is no difference but no one wants to understand that, in Quebec, more respect is shown for the freedom of English Canadians than for the freedom of French Canadians in any of the other provinces.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to the resolution which will make English and French the official languages of Canada and the government of Canada, I would like to say that such a policy should have been implemented long ago. Earlier I spoke about the guards who are hired; they are unilingual. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) talked of those who have been working for parliament for 25 years. They should not be discriminated against. I agree. No discrimination must be shown, no one who has been in the service of parliament for 25 years should lose his job because he cannot speak French. That was the practice at that time. However, he should not be replaced by a unilingual person when time comes to replace him. Bilingualism should be a requisite, and to be bilingual, Mr. Chairman, is to speak fluently both languages.

The Prime Minister is thoroughly bilingual, it is a fact. The parliamentary leader of the N.D.P., the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), is truly bilingual I congratulate him for he speaks French very well. We know others. Now as far as the Leader of the Official Opposition is concerned, do not tell me he is bilingual; it is not true, even though he had immersion courses. They nearly immersed him completely. He is not perfectly bilingual. That does not mean that we bear him a grudge for that. But let them stop playing upon words and saying: So-and-so is bilingual. I know that in some departments-Mr. Caouette: I know that the mayor of I could give names-functions were entrustwe have to get in touch with them, we find that they cannot hold a conversation in

You will not run into that amongst French Canadians in the employ of the federal government, or of the federal parliament because, as I said a while ago, when time comes to hire a fellow by the name of Louis Lamoureux, if he is not perfectly bilingual, he does not get the job. But, if the applicant, even of the very same name, speaks English only, he can have the job. That is discrimination, that is what we object to, especially at the federal level where parliament and the government must use both official languages, or the two languages which are supposed to be official.

Mr. Chairman, in another vein, though some believe or fear that the French language will disappear from Canada or the province of Quebec, I do not. Why? Because I know there are enough French Canadians who are enlightened, experienced and willing to assume their responsibilities and ensure that our tongue is safeguarded, that our culture survives. Of that I am convinced. That our French is not that of Paris, Versailles or Marseille, I agree; but that is not the same thing. One fact remains however: The quality of our oral French, of our written French, has improved considerably in the last 25 or 30 years and we need not go that far back to notice the difference. About thirty years ago, let us say, most of our parents could not get more than 3 or 4 years of schooling. As to our great-grandparents or our grandparents, most of them could neither write nor read and in spite of that the French language has survived in Canada. On my mother's side, my relatives have all settled in southern Saskatchewan, in Ponteix, Gravelbourg, since 1909 and they still speak French. All my relatives on my mother's side have settled there. This means that when you want to survive, you do.

This is what led me yesterday to tell students of Sir George Williams University, in Montreal, that we are only a minority in Canada—we are only 6 million against 20 million—but that every country of the world is also a minority in the world. We are not only living within the limits of Quebec, we are not only living within the limits of Canada, we are living in the whole world.

In this world, every country is a minority. China, the United States, Russia, France and England are minorities. Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the following point: a minority composed of cowards, of people shirking their responsibilities, of notorious good-for-nothing, is doomed to extinction anywhere in the world, because it allows itself to be assimilated.

But a minority made up of strong men, of fiery men, of men, women and young people who have the courage of their convictions, of their identity, who are bold enough to speak out, such a minority, Mr. Chairman, will survive anywhere in the world, in Canada or elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: The province of Quebec had one day the visit of a general, who was president of his country and who said: "Long live free Quebec!" That stirred up enthusiasm and excessive emotionalism. Now, I would like to quote from the Canadian History by Robert Lacour-Gayet, where is related the history of Canada in 1855. From it, it can be seen that history repeats itself, that it is always the same thing, that the same events crop up every 30 or 35 years, and that after a century, the same things happen.

Here is what he says about the history of Canada:

Napoleon III was not the kind of man to disregard the vague possibilities Canada had to offer for the realization of his dreams.

Napoleon III was French.

—It was decided that a warship would be sent. Flying Commander de Belvèze's colours, the corvette La Capricieuse—

-today, we would say the Colbert-—reached Quebec city on July 13, 1855, a few weeks after the opening, in Paris, of the lower Canada pavilion.

Lower Canada's building or that of Quebec, in Paris, at that time, in 1855, that is to say 113 years ago.

—at the World's Fair. This was the first time since 1760—

That is one hundred years later.

—that the French flag was flying over the St. Lawrence. The imperial government had made a point of specifying that this mission had a strictly commercial purpose; however instructions given to its head disclose more complex intentions. Belvèze was "to re-establish our influence—

French influence, that is.

—in the colony which still had strong feelings of friendship for France, to avoid hurting the susceptibilities of the English, to develop our trade agreements."

[Mr. Caouette.]

This was in 1865. Is not the same thing happening again nowadays, in 1968.

Is it any wonder that when he was entrusted with those rather irreconciliable tasks he was enjoined to "show himself of a superior mind..."

It seems that the first class sailor forgot rather quickly the official niceties. Besides there was something to lose one's head about judging from the accounts he left of his trip: "I am back from Canada where I made the most fantastic journey that can be told. Imagine the flag of France reappearing after a hundred years—

Today it is after 200 or 300 years.

—and finding, dormant in people's hearts, the memory of the old mother country and love for it and that strong feeling bursting forth everywhere, even among the English population which, thanks to the alliance, cheered wildly the arrival of the representative of the "powerful ally of Her Gracious Majesty". That is how they speak about your humble friend. Thus I have travelled like a prince along eight hundred miles of rivers, lakes, railways, riding under countless triumphal arches, finding people waiting for me night and day at the gates of their towns with a formal address in their hands and I, poor devil, had to acknowledge all that with flowery speeches and later spin them out at pleasure at banquets, toasts, etc. How much eloquence I expended during those three weeks."

Mr. Chairman-

[English]

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon, member but his time has expired. Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon, member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and I am grateful to my fellow members—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Vous êtes formidable.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks French very well.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Merci, yous êtes très gentil.

Mr. Caouette: He has just said that I am great.

Mr. Chairman, I will not abuse of this courtesy extended to me by my fellow members.

I would like, however, to remind the house that history is being repeated. Considering general de Gaulle's visit and the events of 1855, we have an identical situation.

It does not follow that others who came visiting Canada have behaved themselves better. This is the same thing for them. This is why I have said in this house and elsewhere that I will not tolerate an unimportant France to tell us what to do, nor for that matter an unimportant England. We, as Canadians, have enough maturity to decide, on our own, what our fate will be as Canadians, English-speaking as well as French-speaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: That, to my mind, is what counts. Back home, some people may cling to France. Alas, some also cling to England.

Those Canadians whose hearts are overseas and whose bodies only are in Canada, do not help Canadian national unity. Let the hearts join the bodies here in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I shall close my remarks saying that the resolution now before us offers possibilities not only for the rights of one group to be better respected but for the rights of all Canadians.

Even though my friend for Sarnia was upset by the remarks of the member from Champlain, he should understand what the situation has been in Quebec for a long time, far too long. In Quebec—the member is aware of it—our English-speaking minority was treated exactly in the same way as the majority. Everyone must recognize that. Until recently, we had no problems with our schools. For the English-speaking people to have their children educated in their mother tongue or the tongue of their choice, English, was never a problem. There were no problems. In my area, there are no problems either, but there are some elsewhere.

Now, there are some people who have been saying for some time that in Quebec the French language should come first. I believe that parliament as a whole or all the members will accept the fact that in Quebec, where there are from five and a half to six million Canadians of French origin, the French language should have the same priority as the English language in Ontario, without the English speaking people being discriminated against.

If in Ontario somebody suggested that French should be the working language, that we should start teaching everybody in French he would not find himself too popular. People would say that the working language here in Ontario is the English language, just like in Alberta, in British Columbia and in most other provinces. Therefore in Quebec, let us require the same. Let the French language have a prior right. There is nothing wrong must be respected.

Mr. Chairman, once again, I should like to thank my colleagues for the opportunity that was given to me to conclude my remarks and I am convinced that when the bill is introduced, we shall at last be able to establish in Canada a national policy giving equal, fair and just treatment to the French and English languages.

[English]

The Chairman: Before calling it six o'clock may I read the proceedings which will arise at ten o'clock.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Pensions—suggested use of cost of living base; the hon, member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis)—Post Office Department-Canadian editions of United States magazines; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)-Post Office Department—representations respecting withdrawal of Saturday service.

Before I leave the chair may I say that in accordance with section 4 of standing order 15 private members' business will not be considered at this sitting. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair-

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, are there any more speakers on the resolution?

The Chairman: I believe I saw the hon. member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Bell: I believe that on second thought he might forgo his comments until the second reading stage.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe the hon. member for Selkirk would like to say a few words.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair to resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Crowfoot who spoke earlier in this debate, I too come from western Canada. Unlike that hon. member, however, I do not find it necessary to oppose this resolution, nor do I wish to. I find the resolution easy to support in spirit, intent and in purpose. I find with that, but on the other hand minorities it laudable. The only thing I would add is that what we are being asked to do by this resolution we should have done years ago. Perhaps if we had done this the advocates of separatism would not have gained as much momentum as they enjoy at the present time.

> In a sense however we are deluding ourselves if we think there is much substance to this resolution. As I understand it there are four features. The first calls for parity of status for the French and English languages in parliament, the government of Canada and the public service. This simply asks us to give statutory confirmation to something which is already in effect, or which is fast becoming the practice in this country. There is nothing wrong with this, but there is nothing very substantive about it, either.

> The other two features of the four which I see in this resolution call for the establishment of an office of a commissioner of official languages, who would act as a sort of watchdog or czar of official languages. It is pretty difficult to comment on this proposal until we have a clearly defined and elaborated description of the duties and responsibilities this servant shall exercise. The fourth feature is to provide further for other related or incidental matters. Obviously one cannot comment on that at this time. Again we will have to wait until the details are before us.

> What we are doing in this measure by way of helping to solve the problem of language rights in this country is really of little or no substance. There is nothing very tangible in the resolution. For whatever it is worth, the spirit and the intent is praiseworthy and I have no problem supporting it.

> I have had in mind the intent embodied in the resolution for many years. Since 1958 I have had the honour of representing the people of eastern Manitoba both here and in the legislature of that province. At least on two occasions I have had the opportunity to speak in the legislature on the question of language rights and the rights of French-speaking citizens in Canada and in that province. I should like to quote one or two paragraphs of my observations which directly relate to this subject matter, as they are reported in the Manitoba legislature's Hansard of May 11, 1965:

> I'm a Manitoban, but I consider myself first a Canadian. It surely must distress members here to see the prolonged disenchantment and dissatis-faction on the part of many people in our country —and with some justification I must say—because many of them have come to the opinion if not the conclusion, at least the opinion, that many of their rights which they thought they enjoyed under the constitution seemed to be vaporizing, seemed to be of insufficient substance. I'm referring to the French Canadians, particularly in Quebec, but outside Quebec as well. There is little doubt that the B.N.A. Act and other parts of our constitution, did provide certain fundamental guarantees of minority rights back in 1867. The rights may not have been openly broached or abrogated but in the interval between then and now, the rights of French Canadians in our country have seemed to become reduced slightly year by year. And we must not think of the minority right provision of the B.N.A. Act as applying only to the French Canadians in Quebec. They are, I am convinced, that the spirit of the B.N.A. Act in those regards, with regard to section 93 and 133, are intended to apply to the minority all across Canada.

Let me say in parentheses that these observations were made in reference to a bill which embodied a principle, supported by a member of the Liberal party in the legislature of Manitoba at that time, calling for the government of that province to extend the right of French instruction in the schools of Manitoba. It is in that connection I make these comments. To continue, the quotation, I said:

I believe that this bill is seeking simply to restore a right that was once enjoyed here in this province, but which was, for whatever reasons which we needn't go into now, abrogated and taken away back in 1888, and 1890. I believe that that action was wrong and I think that now in 1965 it is not too late to show that, no matter how long the lapse of time, we are prepared to restore at least some of this right once taken away.

Let me digress briefly to refer to the overall problem of language rights in this country. Surely it must be conceded that there is something substantial to be done at the federal level. This has been the case in the past few years, and now we are going to do something in statutory form. Some of the measures we have adopted in the past few years relate to the greater problem of language rights in this country, and can be dealt with only as a result of provincial action. Several provinces hold the key to the realization in Canada in the next few years of equality in language rights, so far as the status of the two official languages is concerned.

Some people may have the impression that some western provinces are out of date, or that they are recalcitrant or stubborn in taking action of the type needed. I do not share that view. About two years ago in the province of Manitoba the majority of the legislators voted in favour of legislation restoring to French speaking Canadians in that province the right to use French as a language of instruction in their schools. So in the past two years this has become a reality. Approximate- ince of Manitoba I have never at any time ly 5,000 students of French speaking families stated that the action taken by that province in that province are using the French language as a language of instruction in their schools for a significant part of the day. It is no longer a case in which French is simply taught as a subject unto itself; it is now possible under the law to use it as a language of instruction to teach other subjects.

The same is true of Alberta. It is my understanding that in Alberta approximately 5,500 students are attending schools in which they are able to use French as a language of instruction for other subjects during a significant part of the day. The same is true of Saskatchewan. This is a development of the past two to three years, and is a matter of great importance. This being so, it does give plausibility to those who argue that one case of grievance the separatists may have felt they had a few years ago is being removed, and removed quickly. This does not mean that more should not be done. I hasten to add that in Manitoba, in every district in which French speaking families form a significant proportion of the population, 10 per cent or more, it is now possible under the law to use French as a language of instruction; and what is more important, it is already being done. It is also being done in our two sister prairie provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Therefore, it seems to me there is reason to be less pessimistic as to what the provinces of western Canada would be prepared to do, so far as concerns making their contribution toward solving the problem of language rights in this country.

Unfortunately I do not have any accurate, hard information as to the situation in British Columbia, but I thought it was most significant that I should relate what has transpired in the prairie provinces since 1966. That, coupled with the efforts that have been made at the federal level to promote bilingualism in the civil service, in cabinet circles and among parliamentarians, would seem to indicate that we are moving in a substantial and meaningful way toward dealing effectively with this problem of language rights, and dealing effectively with the problem of the feeling of alienation on the part of the French speaking minority, which one must assume, many felt over the decades and until recently.

I hope that in the last few years everyone can see that progress has been made, wrongs have been righted and grievances have been redressed. Even though I am from the prov-back in 1890 and in 1916 was right. I have on every occasion said it was wrong in a most fundamental way.

There is one other aspect of this subject of language rights to which I should like to refer, and which is not contained within the resolution. I refer to a statement, made by our Prime Minister when as a candidate he was in Winnipeg last March, as reported in an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star. The same article appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. It is datelined March 11, 1968 and is captioned, "Trudeau sees 4 official tongues if French given recognition". We know that sometimes headlines are written in haste and are misleading, so I go on to the body of the article, which reads in part as follows:

Justice Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau-

Bear in mind that this was six months ago.
—said last night Canada may one day have a third and even fourth official language in addition to English and French.

I take it that so far this is accurate. Trudeau, 46-

Perhaps that is not so accurate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Schreyer: The article continues:

Trudeau, 46, who becomes prime minister...said official status should be granted any language spoken by a sufficient number of people.

The justice minister...was addressing about 600 Liberals including representatives of Winnipeg's Ukrainian and other large ethnic minorities.

Trudeau rejected the common notion that French deserves official recognition in Canada because the French were one of the "two founding groups" which built the country...

The only justification for having French as official language was that French Canadians made up one third of the population, he added.

And to which I add: So this is what it comes down to. Language rights are to be based not on the spirit of confederation but on sheer numbers, and their ratios. I quote again:

"I would even be prepared to say that if in the immediate future or the far future a third important group speaking a third language... wanted to use their language to communicate with the state, this third language will have to be recognized."

Finally:

[Mr. Schreyer.]

He said a fourth official language was also conceivable although "you can't go on for ever." But Switzerland, he pointed out, functioned with four languages.

I am glad the right hon. Prime Minister, then minister of justice, took the opportunity to touch on what is to me an important enough problem when he was making this address to a gathering in Winnipeg six months ago. As hon. members well know, when the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism handed down its interim report there was an addendum attached thereto written by Professor Rudnyckyj of the University of Manitoba. I do not concur with the recommendations of entirely Professor Rudnyckyj as contained in that addendum, but I sincerely believe that, although it may not be practical to extend an official status to other languages, nevertheless it is desirable, since we are talking about the desirability of having and maintaining in Canada a pluralistic society, to aid through the instrumentality of the state, federal or provincial, the sustenance of the other languages. It is not enough to pay lipservice to it, on the one hand; it is not necessary to go so far as giving official status, on the other hand. But somewhere in the middle is the happy, golden medium.

I hope that between now and two or three years hence members of the cabinet, the public service and their advisers will give serious consideration to the extension of some measure of material support to schools in which the other languages spoken in this country can be used as languages of instruction for at least certain periods of the day; and with the advent of E.T.V. this becomes a practicality.

Inferring from what the right hon. Prime Minister said at this public meeting six months ago, it would seem he is prepared—I hope he is willing to try to persuade his colleagues about this—that consideration should be given to declaring a third, fourth and possibly a fifth language as official languages in this country. If he is prepared to go to that extent, I would plead with him at least to give consideration to ways and means in which these other languages could be materially supported by assistance through the schools.

I know some hon. members will say that since education is entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces it should not concern us here in the federal parliament. At the same time I agree with some of the statements made by other hon. members of that party, particularly with what was said by the former member for Kamloops a year and a half or two years ago, to the effect that we should be doing more to provide more French language schools in this country outside the province of Quebec, and that if we are going to tackle this task, specific financial assistance should be provided for this purpose by the federal government.

It is a sentiment and a point of view with which I agree. It seems to me that the same concept could be applied with respect to the provision of assistance to schools using other languages of instruction for a few hours each day. Such schools could and should exist in every district where an ethnic group is of significant size.

I know that since we are asked to consider here a matter more specific than that, having to do with the appointment of a commissioner of official languages and with trying to achieve a parity of status for the two languages in the public service, many hon. members will not give much consideration to what has been stated in the addendum to the B and B report by Professor Rudnyckyj. But it is a matter which in all fairness must be seriously considered soon. I do not want to start naming the other ethnic groups which form a sizeable proportion of the population of this country; but in western Canada, in Toronto and in Montreal it would be correct to say that there are ethnic groups which form a proportion of district populations that is in excess of 10 or 20 per cent. It is in such circumstances that we should seriously consider doing something to assist in the maintenance of the language of these groups. I know that the hon. member for Témiscamingue said earlier today-

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, if I could have another two minutes I could complete my statement.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to allow the hon. member more time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Schreyer: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was going to refer to the remarks which the hon. member for Témiscamingue made earlier this day, most of which I agreed with and felt moved by. There is one comment he made, however, which is rather difficult to accept completely, and that is his reference to the fact that it is only those minority groups that are courageous and have a will and determination that are able to maintain their culture and their language in perpetuity. Of course one can find evidence of that in the pages of our history books. But I think it also needs to be said that no matter how courageous and determined a minority group might be, if they simply do not have the organized opportunity and the institutions in which to maintain their language it is only a matter of time before their cultural heritage or distinctiveness will begin to disappear. In our time an ethnic group that depends on home and parish is likely to see its language slowly disappear.

If we really mean what we say, that it is good for Canada to have a pluralistic society and to have a multiplicity of ethnic groups, each with its own distinctive culture to contribute to the whole, then we will want to give consideration to the possibility, not of giving an official status-no one is really asking for that except perhaps for the Prime Minister and a few others—but to doing something concrete to enable schools to provide the teachers, to provide the audio-visual aids and books which would make it possible to teach the various ethnic languages, and to amend the law in the several provinces so that it will be possible to use those languages as languages of instruction in the schools for at least part of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Chairman, I wish first to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for having tabled this bill, a resolution which will eventually lead to official recognition of both English and French. If two official languages were recognized in Canada if they were adopted, we would come still closer to our ideal of justice and this country could retain its present stature.

We, the Ralliement créditiste, who have become the official opposition of Quebec, say that Canada will endure, if such legislation were enacted.

I shall add my comments to those of the previous speaker who called for a pluralist country; I cannot imagine myself in a Canada, where in addition to French and English, we would have to learn Chinese, Russian, Spanish and maybe ten more languages. We are instead, and everybody likes to say so, a country where bilingualism should be recognized. However, there is the very real danger presented by separatists. Where are those separatists to be found?

I have here an article entitled: "Le bilinguisme, mais à quel prix" which appeared in the October 3, 1968 edition of Le Droit and which I shall now quote:

From its ivory tower, the Professional Institute of the public service of Canada is casting doubt on the value of the bilingual policy implemented by the former prime minister, Mr. Lester B. Pearson, and followed by his successor, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

According to the Institute, bilingualism in the public service is extremely costly. This gratuitous statement is to be found in an article signed by the general director, Mr. L.W.C.S. Barnes, and entitled "Bilingualism—but at what cost?" That is not the only statement of that kind: the three paragraphs which he devotes to this topic are full of allegations of that sort.

Either Mr. Barnes is not familiar with functionarism in Ottawa, or he is very naive...we have just started to make things better. The bilingual government employee has always had to work twice as much, because his fellow worker was usually unilingual.

The rash remarks of Mr. Barnes will cast a shadow on the honesty of his unionized colleagues, bilingual as well as unilingual, in the government and the public service.

The article is signed by Mr. Louis Rocque.

Mr. Chairman, after hearing the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), I dare hope that he is not the spokesman of all Conservatives because, in my opinion, he is one of those die-hard separatists who can prevent Canada from rising to the occasion as we all expect it to do. Here is the answer the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) gave our leader and I quote from an article published on October 17 in La Presse under the heading:

Canada needs London to provide translation of the constitution (John Turner)

Only the government of the United Kingdom can authorize the publication of an official French version of the British North America Act.

That specific information was given yesterday by the Minister of Justice, Mr. John Turner, in answer to a question put on the order paper of the House of Commons by the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, Mr. Réal Caouette, who wanted to know when the Canadian government would publish a French version of the BNA Act.

While there is in use in Canada a generally recognized and accepted official translation of the British North America Act passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom in 1867, an official French version of the original Act of 1867 could, under the present constitution of Canada, only be provided by formal legislative action on the part of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

If the Minister of Justice is still the spokesman of the Liberals in that field, I say that in spite of his authority within the cabinet, he must see to it that this situation is corrected immediately.

Canada has weathered in the past other less and English-speaking Canadians. It has been found that the memory of that event is still very fresh. Thus after each conflict, no matter how it was settled, both parties have come out of it with a feeling of injustice. Canada was born of the conflicts between its two founding peoples and the imposing by the white man of his culture on its indigenous peoples, the Indians and the Eskimos. From the point of view of the Indian, the French and the English hold the same right of property through the conquest. Quebec tends to think of the French as the colonizers and of the English as the invaders.

As we have already pointed out, those ancient wars have not ceased to influence the present behaviour on the one side as well as on the other. The young people who destroy monuments in Quebec want history to be rewritten, at least taking the future into consideration. The English Canadian, when he recalls former times, usually wishes to restore the monument and thus symbolize a return to the status quo; or else, he still has in mind, above all, the achievement of a representative government, then of a responsible government and the other constitutional victories which shaped the Canada of today. He wants Canada to be and remain a "nation", to give its citizens the possibility of achieving what will enable them to hold a high rank amongst the nations. To the French, Lord Durham was the great assimilator, to the English, he was the great decolonizer.

We are well aware of the conflicts since confederation. Still, the two partners see them in an entirely different light. Riel, the murderer, was hanged; Riel, the defender of the rights of the minorities, was the victim of a judicial murder. A federal parliament, predominantly English, gave Manitoba at the time of its foundation two official languages and separate schools.

The Manitobans themselves revoked those rights and when the government in office in Ottawa suggested that the situation be restored with regard to schools despite the opposition of that province, the Quebec population gave a majority vote to Laurier, who had refused to resort to compulsion. In the eyes of Quebecers, the Manitoba experience shows that "the English" are unreliable wherever they are, and that at critical moments, the majority is always triumphant.

Regulation 17 enacted in 1913 in Ontario which severely restricted the use of French as a teaching language in separate schools, was severe crises which brought to light very dif- repealed later by another Ontario governferent points of view between French-speaking ment; but that change in attitude did little to dispel the animosity generated by the enactment of the regulation.

The 1917 and 1942 conscriptions appear to many English Canadians as a necessity for a country engaged in crucial wars until victory was won. But it seemed that such action in Quebec pushed a peace-minded people into conflicts involving essentially Canadians of British descent.

Canada is more than many other countries the work of human will. It has been called a geographical absurdity, an appendix to the United States, a 4,000-mile main street interspersed with empty spaces. The fact is that this country has lasted for a long time because some men have always wanted her to last.

Each generation is obsessed by the difficulties it must face, and this is why most of them have to go through periods of uncertainty. The Canada of today is no exception. But is it easier to maintain her today and to change her structure than it was to give her birth yesterday?

Canada will last, will progress and flourish; she will survive to the present crisis, because Canadians want it to be so with the same willpower that inspired the men who built her.

The present crisis reminds one of the situation referred to by Lord Durham in 1838: "I found two nations at strife within one state." To-day circumstances are very different. We are not the day after a bloody revolt. On the contrary, one of the problems is that a fraction of the Canadian people does not realize that the gap is widening between both partners and that we must reconsider the concept of Canadia.

The authority we were referring to must not be inflexible and arbitrary. It must take into account new developments. As every living being, it must constantly adapt itself to new situations, and it must have a solid grasp of reality.

...Public opinion seems to evolve rapidly, especially in Quebec, and we are unable to foresee what its new orientations will be. Nevertheless, in spite of the importance of those events and of those adjustments, we are convinced that representations made to us are based on attitudes that are too deeply rooted to have been changed in a significant or permanent manner. Again we say: there is indisputable evidence that Canada's future is facing a serious threat.

Furthermore, we cannot fail to visualize that there are reasons for hope also and this feeling should be shared by all Canadians. Canadians of various origins have much in common although they see things differently. In many respects, they have inherited one great common European tradition with which they keep in contact across the seas. For over 200 years, they have lived together and they are influenced by geography and the North American way of life. All share the same love for their country. On trips abroad, English and French-speaking Canadians often realize that they have more in common with one another than with the people of foreign countries. All Canadians live in a modern, technologically advanced, society, with the attendant problems and advantages. In Quebec, progress may sharpen the sense of competition between Canadians of both languages; but because of this, they have, more than ever. a lot to say to each other.

To a certain point, some Canadians attribute this situation to the economic superiority of the English-speaking people, first on the local plane, but more so on the provincial and Canadian plane.

Some will say: the whole system is British. That is why the English-speaking people do not find it necessary to learn French and are entrenched here like an imperial army occupying a colony.

Therefore, the inequalities which are a matter for complaint throughout the country, political as well as business, are envisaged through local inequalities which they have experienced and which we know. We will be the first to become for many the reality of tomorrow, and the feelings it inspires are deep. As concerns the public service, for instance, a union official reports that, as a member of a labour delegation, he went to a country where the language was neither English or French. Our hosts knew we were French Canadians. Everywhere we went they made arrangements in order that someone there would be able to speak French. Thus, everywhere it has been possible for us to be understood, except at the Canadian embassy.

The question of French minorities in other provinces concerned a part of the population, but only a part. How can they be so illtreated, when we are so generous towards ours (the English), generous to the extent that we let them anglicize us. On the other hand, such remarks lead many people to conclude that these French minorities are condemned to extinction on account of the behaviour of their English compatriots and, as a consequence, French Canadians must concentrate their efforts towards an unilingual Quebec.

How can we change such a situation and, particularly, how can we put an end to this servile position of the French language in Quebec? Most of the young people whom we meet think that the system should be abolished, that Quebec should separate from the the rest of the country. Others want the province to acquire more extensive powers and demand a new constitution or substantial amendments to the existing one. There is talk of a unilingual Quebec, or at least a wish expressed that French become the leading language of the province. It is very difficult to isolate problems considered as forming a whole: political problems, economic problems, social problems. These men live in a situation which they dislike and which frustrates them; they ask for sweeping reforms and they are impatient.

Here is an extract from the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism:

In our opinion, Canadians today face problems which are as serious as those which existed at the time of Confederation. Particularly in the province of Quebec, but also in other parts of the country, groups of people are demanding more and more insistently that Confederation be revised in the light of a deeper understanding of the fundamental association of the two founding peoples and of the growing contribution of Canadians of other origins. Some even question the confederative system.

The Canadian crisis is not unique, it is universal. Very few states are perfectly homogenous: in Asia, in Africa, in America and even in Europe, relations between groups of various cultures and languages are a source of deep concern and raise constitutional problems. If we manage to solve our difficulties, we will contribute to the world peace.

Following a sitting of the Royal Commission on Biculturalism and Bilingualism in Quebec, a very young separatist gave to one of the commissioners a copy of an old magazine. "Read that", he said. "I have found it in my grandfather's library. Yes in my grandfather's, he added with a sardonic smile. Everything the federalists say today is already written there and nothing came out of it."

It is a Montreal magazine Action française which in 1925 published a series of articles on bilingualism. The young separatist indicated to us some underlined excerpts contained in a study on federal bilingualism—legal aspect, published in February 1925: "English is spoken by the majority of the Canadian people, French by the minority. Therefore, it is the latter which is constantly called upon to justify its survival."

Mr. Chairman, we always talk like that interlocutor. This has been going on for at least forty years. The separatist went on to say: "Read that also", pointing at another excerpt of the review, to the effect that despite the surrender, French is not an intruder, but, as well as English, is at home in Canada.

A young audience is surrounding us now, still members of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission; it is for them that the separatist shouts a last quotation: "A few English Canadians seem willing to give a broad interpretation to the 1867 act, and recognize that Canada after confederation is an Anglo-French country." And the youngster exclaims, that that was written in 1925, and his pals burst out laughing.

Equal partnership, cultural equality: that is not a notion which will compel recognition by itself, [Mr. Dumont.]

even after most thorough studies. In order to expand, it needs the ready support of a free people——and since it is the future that is at stake, the participation of youth becomes essential: we shall listen to them with increased attention and interest.

As good old Aristotle said, friendship is the soul of the city. Today, human sciences state that the nation exists inasmuch as its members share a collective will to live. Basically, it is the same thought and it sheds on our undertaking a rather searching light. That "friendship", that "collective will to live", do they exist in Canada among all the national entities, and especially among the two founding groups of confederation? Are they ready both of them to accept the conditions which will make social life here possible and enjoyable?

In that same report on the inquiry on bilingualism, everyone can read the letter of the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, and I quote:

In a speech I made in the House of Commons on Dec. 17, 1962-

It is the letter he sent to all provincial premiers.

—about the problems and advantages brought about in our country by the duality of language and culture established by confederation, I proposed an extensive inquiry on bilingualism and biculturalism, in consultation with provincial governments. That proposal was readily approved by parliament and I believe also throughout the country.

He had to answer. I have here the reply from the premier at that time, Mr. Jean Lesage, and this is what he replied to Mr. Pearson:

I am happy to tell you that the Quebec government is very much in favour of such an inquiry in consultation with provincial governments, as you propose.

Then there is the letter from Premier Manning, of Alberta. This is what Mr. Manning, the Social Crediter, had to say and I quote:

In respect of bilinguism, if the commission's purpose is to incite Canadian citizens to express themselves freely in two or several languages, it would surely be welcomed by most Canadians.

And we could continue-

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired. Unless he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue? Does the committee agree to let the hon. member continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dumont: I thank the hon. members for letting me continue. I only have a few quotations to put on the record.

province who, I believe, informs us that we on an equal footing. must consider the problem very seriously.

I have on hand the letter of Mr. Duff Roblin. It reads in part:

—I wish to inform you that Manitoba has already taken steps to improve and to extend the teaching of French in public schools. Without underestimatfact that the educational aspect of bilingualism is of prime importance, I doubt however that it could be effectively separated from its constitutional aspects.

If we have such important statements from our provincial premiers, it is high time. I think, that the citizens of Canada tackle the job themselves and try to do what Mr. Laurendeau said in his report on bilingualism. I quote:

• (8:50 p.m.)

First of all, as you will have noticed yourselves, there are vast and various fields open to systematic research. In the field of public health, taxation or education, the problems are both serious and ticklish, but they are easily defined, whereas it is particularly difficult to determine the boundaries of our research projects. What is culture, and how can two cultures coexist in equality, "taking into account the contribution made by the other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada"?

The problem is certainly not a new one, and many Canadians have grappled with it.

Nevertheless, to summarize, the fact remains that today we mature Canadians must be able to say that many French Canadians are deeply convinced of their rights and that they are entitled to have their claims recognized by special measures.

In the meantime, the other Canadians hesitate or differ because they cannot assess the intensity of that feeling in French Canada, not being able to understand its motives.

As I am part of the Canadian parliament, the representative of the riding of Frontenac, I personally want to feel at home everywhere in Canada. I do not want the spirit of bilingualism that animates now and will animate tomorrow the main departments to be a superficial bilingualism; on the contrary, it must analyze in depths what reforms must be made so that French Canadians as well as English Canadians can feel at home and be happy to live in Canada.

Chairman, this resolution is of great importance to me.

debates and statements on the necessity of well.

This is the reply of the premier of the putting the two founding cultures of Canada

Recently, we passed legislation for the achievement of those aspirations. This resolution goes beyond words. It promises action. It promises legislation for the advancement of the linguistic rights of our fellow-citizens whose mother tongue is the French language. We, whose mother tongue or adopted tongue is the English language, heartily welcome this resolution.

[English]

We welcome this resolution warmly. Naturally we wish to see the bill and shall study its provisions closely. For the resolution we have nothing but a warm welcome.

This afternoon the hon. member for Crowfoot said that as a westerner he spoke for western Canada. Another westerner is speaking this evening, one who comes from the real west, as hon. members will realize when they hear the tones of one coming from British Columbia. British Columbia has been known to vie with Quebec as being the major separatist province in Canada. Of course in both cases there is much exaggera-

I believe I have the right to speak for western Canada, having been born and brought up in Winnipeg. Most of my life has been spent between western Canada and Ottawa. Probably I have a right to speak not only as a westerner but, latterly, as a full Canadian.

Obviously, a number of people in western Canada and in British Columbia feel as the hon. member for Crowfoot feels. They are afraid, worried, upset and have all sorts of other suspicions preying on their minds. But there are other kinds of people in western Canada. No one who knows the people of western Canada will disagree when I say that there is one quality the people from the lakehead, right through to Victoria, have in common, and that is generosity of spirit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Vancouver-Kingsway): Mrs. MacInnis When your westerner understands something, he really goes to meet you and is generous. We have already proven that we can assimilate many kinds of culture, language and cus-Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. tom without losing our identity. We have not become a melting pot but a mosaic and, in addition, we have attained something that is For a long time we have been busy with unique in the world: We all get along pretty

It must be explained that western Canada and British Columbia did not know the rest of the country very well until recently, because this is a big country. Our vast geography has been at once our pride and our prejudice. We are so vast that our country is really a series of regions and, until the coming of the electronic age, we did not know each other very well. Last year, with Expo, we really came of age. All those who were members of this house then no doubt will remember the processions of people from the different provinces who came to our offices, came to see parliament, and came to see Expo. All those who saw Expo, whether they were from the Pacific coast or the Atlantic, were thrilled.

At that time we realized that we did not have to lose our cultural heritages in Canada. Above all, we did not need to lose sight of the big pieces of our mosaic, the French part and the Anglo Saxon part of it. That is because we were able to use the pieces of our mosaic to build a fine structure which would enable us to live in harmony and brotherhood. We realized then, I think, that it will be easier to build one Canada, because now we have modern communications and transportation. The aeroplane and other forms of communications will tie us closely together and will make a reality, this business of building a single country out of all the pieces. That is why we welcome this resolution now.

I want to explain something about western Canada, and I wish that those hon. members from the west would listen. In western Canada we have people from all over the world—Germans, Austrians, Danish, Chinese and many other nationalities. These people are apt to ask, "Why should French speaking people have special privileges that the Chinese, East Indians, Danish, German and other peoples do not have?" I think I have the right answer.

Apart from the Eskimos and Indians—and the Prime Minister was probably thinking of these people when earlier he talked of four languages—everybody else came here from somewhere else. If one thinks of the Indians and Eskimos as not being parties to the signing of confederation, it is easy to see that in this country there were originally two groups of people, the French and the English. As everyone knows, they warred within the bosom of a single country and the winner won by an accident. The British came out on top, and not the French; and that was an accident. I know that some to my right will say that is an awful thing to say, because we have been brought up with the story of General Wolfe, and how smart he was to climb the cliffs at Quebec. His victory was an accident of history, and it well might have been the other way around.

It must be explained to westerners that when this country became a country, not at confederation but much earlier, two groups of people were left here when the wars were over, and these are the founding groups of our modern Canada. Consequently the French speaking and the English speaking groups have a prior right to have their languages and cultures recognized officially.

I believe westerners will understand this. It has not been brought home to westerners and other Canadians who have been exposed to the conquest theory that the French speaking people were on a footing of equality with all others in this country from the very beginning. The conquest theory is a very bad theory which should have been scrapped long ago. For too long it has maintained its place in the history books.

Like my colleague who spoke a few minutes ago, I wish to see preserved as much as possible of all the other cultures of all groups of people who have come here, and who have made such a rich cultural mosaic in Canada. Nevertheless, I am content that there be two official languages and two official cultures in this country, founding languages and cultures that shall be recognized as such.

I believe western Canada welcomes this resolution. A number of younger members spoke today, saying that today's young people have no intention of continuing the old feuds and harbouring the old religious or racial prejudices. They are all old wives' tales which ought to have been left behind in the dark ages or at least in the nineteenth century.

Why do I think that this resolution will find a welcome among the peoples of western Canada, as indeed it will all across Canada? First, as my leader pointed out this afternoon and my colleague this evening I believe it is long overdue.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Second, it is only on the basis of equality, and nothing short of equality, accorded to the language and cultural rights of French speaking Canada that we shall ever have a harmonious country. I want us to get on with the job of building Canada instead of quarrelling everlastingly among ourselves, and the only way in which this can be done is through increasing recognition of the rights of French speaking Canadians. In the third place, I think all Canadians have a right to feel at home-chez eux-in any part of the country. A French speaking person does not feel at ease if he is met by a unilingual policeman in the City of Ottawa. In the fourth place, I believe we shall benefit by a richer culture and a much greater Canadian heritage if we place our two founding language groups on a footing of complete equality.

[Translation]

This afternoon the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) spoke about the Vancouver nursery which, although subsidized, had to close because there were not enough children.

But he is not aware perhaps that in Maillardville, near Vancouver, there is now a nursery where French-speaking children are looked after by a fully bilingual woman teacher of English origin, from Montreal. That is an example that I want to call to the attention of all Canada, it is an example that must be followed.

[English]

In British Columbia we have the first French language radio station on the west coast—station CBUF-FM—and we would not have had that station no matter how badly the French speaking people out there wanted it, but for a whole lot of people of non-French speaking origin who said: We want to enrich our culture on the west coast. And these people fought for the establishment of the station side by side with people of French origin.

[Translation]

I would like now to say a few words to my French-speaking compatriots. I know very well that you, of French origin, think of yourselves as Canadians rather than French. Your ancestors were French. You are proud of it. But you are Canadians.

It is the same with us whose ancestors The hon. lady ha came fram England, Holland, Sweden, China probably a myth.

or any other country. We speak English but we are not English. I am tired of hearing people from French origin call us English. I am not English, I am the end result of a mixture of three or four other races. I could give you the English word which can express that, but it cannot be said in French. It is not a parliamentary expression, but you know what I mean.

I would like it so much if our French-speaking fellow-citizens of French origin soon started calling us Canadians too, because we all live in this beautiful country which is Canada. Together, while each retaining his own language and founding culture, we can build a country of which we could all be proud because this country will be the result of our harmonious efforts so that we may enjoy living and working together as partners and friends.

It is with that spirit that I address you tonight. As for me, I am a Canadian and you, you are Canadians regardless of our origin. We are Canadians and I hope we are going to stop quarelling. We have to live together. Let us forget our differences and let us work altogether in order to build and develop a beautiful country, a friendly Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Chairman, I am pleased tonight to say a few words about that resolution. I did not want to pass up this opportunity to speak briefly because I spent a good part of my life fighting for the principle of bilingualism.

I was brought up in an English-speaking family but I chose to carry on my studies in a French university because I have always felt that a complete Canadian is a bilingual Canadian. I have always felt that as much as possible all Canadians should try not only to speak the two languages of our country, but also to understand the mentality of the two main groups in Canada. I think that is even more important than the matter of language.

[English]

I was happy to hear so many encouraging words from the previous speaker, particularly as she comes from the far end of the country, a region which many of us think as being not entirely in sympathy with French Canada. The hon. lady has shown us that this idea is probably a myth.

I am glad a royal commission has suggested the appointment of a commissioner of languages. This is long overdue. I cast no aspersions on those engaged in the public service when I say I hope the person appointed will not be a civil servant. I am thinking of the appointment of someone like the late Mr. Laurendeau, an outstanding Canadian; this is the type of person we should choose to be commissioner of languages.

I hope the new commissioner will have responsibility for everything to do with this field. For example, there is the school of languages, there is the secretariat which was set up some time ago on a temporary basis, I believe, and whose staff has been depleted considerably in recent months. Then there are advisers on bilingualism in most of the departments, and I believe that the remainder should be appointed as quickly as possible. Unfortunately, some of the advisers feel their work is floundering somewhat because there are so many different steps to be followed at the moment—the secretariat, the school of languages, and so on. We also employ translators. In this regard I believe there is a need in every department not only of translators but of an editor. An editor is necessary. There are, for instance, in the public service many people who have never had the opportunity in past years to use their own language. Therefore they have become very rusty. As a result, if they were to attempt to write memoranda and letters in their own language they would find that an editor in the translation department would be very helpful to them. Also people who have learned a certain amount of French from having gone through immersion courses, and the like come back to their departments and find themselves in the position of being unable to put into practice what they have learned. If they were to attempt to write memoranda and letters, an editor in the translation branch would be able to correct their mistakes and fix up the text for them. I think this would be a very good service. I believe also it would mean that there would be a great deal more writing in the other language within our public service.

When I mentioned that I would like to see the commissioner of languages taken from outside the public service, I did not intend to create the feeling that there is anything derogatory about the public service. I do wish to say however that sometimes appointments certain legal Minister legal to determine the commissioner of languages taken from the Minister legal to determine the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal to determine the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal to determine the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal to determine the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal to determine the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal taken from the minister legal taken from the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal taken from the commissioner of determine the commissioner of languages taken from the minister legal taken from the commissioner of determine the commissioner of det within the public service are not exactly as they should be, and I believe I have a very good example in this regard. We have heard a good deal about the necessity to have bilingual persons occupy certain positions. We have a school of languages, and yet the director general of this school of languages is not bilingual. From my point of view this is completely unacceptable, and I do not believe it should be tolerated in Canada at all. If there is any position in the public service which calls for a bilingual person it certainly is the position of director general of the school of languages. I hope this situation will be rectified before very long.

There is another example I should like to cite. Sometimes we become involved in bureaucratic considerations. The book says that such and such is the figure and that therefore it must govern the decision. In my riding there is a town called Chapleau. More than half the people in this town are French speaking, but according to the former census only 39 per cent of them are French speaking. Recently there was a competition for the position of postmaster in that area. I recommended that the requirements of this position were such that it should be filled by a bilingual person, not just as a desirable qualification but as an absolute necessity. The answer I received was that if 40 per cent of the people were French speaking this would be the requirement, but when only 39 per cent of the people were French speaking this requirement could not be included. This is an example of the kind of thinking we do not want. I know that in that particular area the figure is higher than 39 per cent, but that is not the point. The point is that for a figure of one per cent we would let our principles in respect of bilingualism go down the drain. I do not believe that is the correct attitude.

Within two principal departments of government we have the position of foreign service officer. We say that Canada is officially a bilingual country. The image we present abroad should be that of a bilingual country. Yet we allow foreign service officers who are not bilingual to go abroad. It is true that in recent years and recent months steps have been taken to ensure that new foreign service officers are efficient in a second language in a certain length of time. I believe the Prime Minister left to the civil servants the matter of determining what that prescribed period of time should be. As of now, no one within the public service has stated what that period should be.

In the Department of Trade and Commerce answer a person who happened to have new foreign service officers must undergo a French as his mother tongue. As a matter of period of training for one year before they are sent abroad. During that time they attend an intensive course in French. My contention is that even if it is necessary for them to spend a longer period in initial training they should not leave this country until they are bilingual. I do not believe there would be too much difficulty involved in this, because from my personal experience in the Department of Trade and Commerce last year I am aware that those who had the greatest amount of success in becoming French speaking were five students from the province of British Columbia. I think this is very significant. It shows that people from a completely anglophile area are able to do better even than people from a province such as Ontario, who would have heard French before attending university. Therefore, I can see absolutely no reason for any officer in our foreign service being permitted to go abroad unless he is bilingual.

I should also like to make the point that in this House of Commons, the seat of government in Canada, we should set the example for the rest of the country. I was somewhat appalled when I first came here to see that such things as letterheads in one language or another were used instead of letterheads in both languages. At every committee meeting the question arises as to when the minutes of proceedings and evidence will be available in the French language. Members wonder why the minutes of proceedings and evidence cannot be made available in both languages at the same time. They are told that there are technical problems involved in this. I do not think that is a reasonable excuse. As a matter of fact this is the type of excuse that has been given for hundreds of years. It is no wonder that French speaking Canadians who come to Ottawa have the feeling they are not being treated on an equal basis when they see this type of situation existing at the seat of government.

I think it is high time that we decide whether or not we are a bilingual country. If we decide that we are, then let us adopt measures that will show that we are. If this requires an extra effort on the part of those who are looking after the administration, then let them use a little bit of imagination and start getting these things on the road.

This applies also to ministers' offices. I thought it strange when not long ago I discovered that the persons answering the phones in some ministers' offices could not many of whom were here during the last fact, recently a survey was made. I felt that in one minister's office the situation had developed perhaps a little too far the other way. In the survey it was found that of the persons who answered the telephones in the minister's offices three answered in French only, nine answered in English only and the remainder were bilingual. It would seem to me that in every case there should be no question about this. There should be a person in a minister's office at all times who is ready to answer questions in either language.

I do not know whether the government envisages this or not, but it would seem to me that one thing which contributed most toward unity in this country during our centennial year was the exchange visits of students between one province and another, particularly in the two main language groups. I believe that was one of the greatest unifying forces. It permitted the young people to become acquainted with each other. The only way in which we can learn to understand each other in this country is by getting to know each other. If these exchange visits could be continued and placed perhaps under the aegis of the commissioner of languages. I believe this would be a great boon to Canada. I do not wish to speak at too great length because I realize we are only at the resolution stage of the bill. However, I wish to say that I commend this measure very highly and I am sure hon, members on all sides of the house will agree that this is one of the greatest steps taken in Canada today.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Trudeau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-120, respecting the status of the official languages of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PATENT ACT—TRADE MARKS ACT EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO GRANT LICENCES

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-102, to amend the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and the Food and Drugs Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, parliament will recall that on February 12 of this year my predecessor, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), moved the second reading of Bill No. C-190, to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act. For the benefit of hon. members who were not present in the house at that time, I would refer them to page 6615 of Hansard wherein my colleague clearly set out the government's position in respect of the high cost of prescription drugs to Canadian consumers.

A study of the retail prices of patented drugs by three inquiries—one being an inquiry by a special committee of this house—reached the conclusion that drug prices in this country were unduly high or, at least, higher than they need be. In consequence, the government determined to do what it could at the federal level to reduce drug prices and, at the same time, maintain a situation where drug manufacturing in this country would not be unduly restrained, where pharmaceutical research in Canada would not be discouraged and where continued safety for the Canadian public would be preserved.

Hon, members will recall that, although the then Bill No. C-190 passed second reading, it died on the order paper due to the dissolution of the house, and it is now re-introduced under the title of Bill No. C-102. May I say immediately that the government has in no way retreated from its original position and that during the interval between the introduction of both bills nothing has come to the attention of the government which would indicate that it should modify or change its general position as set forth late last winter. However, certain amendments have been introduced, notably with respect to safety, as a result of the previous debate and presentations that have been made, including some of my own, which I shall comment upon later.

I should like to make it abundantly clear at the beginning that the bill of which I am now the sponsor is only one measure of a package designed to reduce the costs of patented drugs to the consumer, and hence in no sense should be considered as the only attempt to be made to alleviate costs to drug users. There are five measures in this package; five points in the government program. The first step has already been taken; the removal of the sales tax from drugs; reduction of customs duty on these products from 20 per cent to 15 per cent and narrowing of the application of dumping duty to drug imports.

[Mr. Basford.]

The second step in the government's program is that contained in the present measure before the house, namely amendments to the Patent Act and Trade Marks Act to permit the issue of compulsory licences for import under patents relating to drugs. This will complete the remaining legislative steps required to implement the over-all program designed to reduce the price of drugs.

The two legislative steps, and the others which I shall describe in a moment, were recommended by the special committee of the House of Commons on drug costs and prices, known to you more familiarly as the Harley report. Since the dissolution of the last parliament, Dr. Harry C. Harley, who was chairman of that committee, has ceased to be actively engaged in political life. He did not seek nomination or run for re-election. I should like to take this opportunity of publicly recognizing the devoted work of Dr. Harley in the affairs of this house, and particularly his work as chairman of the special committee from which this bill originated.

The third step in the over-all program is development of an information service to doctors, which was recommended by the special committee.

The food and drug directorate, with the assistance of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, is undertaking a program of providing objective information to the medical profession about the properties and prices of drugs, so that the prescribing physicians will be aware of the price differential between competing drug products of demonstrated quality, safety and effectiveness. The object of this program will be to enable the physician to know that choice of drugs is available to him on the Canadian market for his requirements. While a decision as to what he will prescribe is to remain with him, the intention is that he should be made aware that there is a choice to be made in many cases between competing products and prices. Resources have been provided for this purpose to the Department of National Health and Welfare, and it is at present expected that the first monthly information bulletin will appear toward the end of next summer.

The fourth step in the over-all program is the pharmaceutical industry development assistance program commonly known as PIDA.

The pharmaceutical industry development assistance program, which is administered by the Department of Industry, is a direct loan program designed to strengthen and improve the efficiency of the sector of the pharmaceutical industry which manufactures and sells prescription drugs at lower prices. These companies, most of which are Canadian owned, engage in or are prepared to engage in, effective price competition against the international drug firms. However, many of them are unable to obtain sufficient financial assistance on reasonable terms in order to extend their operations. PIDA is intended to fill this need. These firms will of course have to compete with drugs imported under compulsory licences. But where it is economically feasible to make these drugs in Canada at lower prices, or at least at prices competitive with the imported drugs, it is the government's view that these firms should be given encouragement to do so, thus providing further supplies of drugs to the Canadian market at lower prices. Resources have been provided for this program and the department is now in a position to consider applications.

The fifth step in the over-all program involves discussions with the provinces, designed to tackle the problem of the high cost of the retail distribution of drugs, important aspects of which are within provincial jurisdiction. The government recognizes, as did the special committee, that it is not sufficient to inject price competition at the manufacturing level only; an important element in the cost of drugs to the consumer lies in distribution and pricing practices at the retail level. This is a matter which, now that the federal government is completing the steps that can be taken within federal jurisdiction, is on our agenda for future federalprovincial conferences.

Reverting now to the bill before us, I should explain very briefly its purpose. The various public inquiries were satisfied that one of the reasons for the high cost of drugs in Canada lies in the lack of price competition in this industry. This arises because of the unusual degree of protection accorded the invention without subjecting himself to an industry through the combined effect of the action for damages. The patent owner may tariff, the patent and trade marks laws, and to inject price competition into the Canadian market, by making it possible for firms in Canada to import drugs without fear of being subjected to infringement actions for breach of patent and trade mark rights. The machinery to accomplish this will be explained in greater detail later. At the same time the bill makes it clear that such imports are not to take place at the expense of the safety, quality and efficacy of drugs reaching the Canadian market.

Bill No. C-102 now before the house is essentially the same as Bill No. C-190 of the last parliament. There is, however, some revision which, for the assistance of hon. members, I will explain. We have provided for some flexibility in the computation of the royalty by the patent commissioner under a compulsory licence; the governor in council will be able to adjust the royalty formula in the light of experience, and the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada, which is studying the patent legislation. The bill makes it clear that the issue of a compulsory licence does not relieve the licensee of the obligation of complying with the Food and Drugs Act and regulations. Provision is made for additional protection against hazards to health in the case of an imported, trade marked drug, and widest powers are given to the governor in council to regulate both the importation and distribution of drugs manufactured outside Canada for the protection of the public in relation to safety and quality. These are the main changes. In addition, there are some technical provisions unrelated to drugs, concerning periods when the patent and trade mark offices are closed for business.

A word of explanation about the patent and trade mark system may be of assistance to hon. members. The owner of a drug patent has, by statute, the exclusive right for 17 years from the issue of the patent to make, use or sell the invention which is patented. The statute gives him a complete monopoly. Without the permission of the patent owner another person is not at liberty to import, make, use or sell a drug resulting from the grant a licence to another person to use the the new drug regulations. The bill is designed patent or he may be required to accept a compulsory licence if the statute so provides. The Patent Act at present provides for a compulsory licence to manufacture a drug in Canada, and the bill will extend this facility to importation of drugs.

Likewise, the Trade Marks Act provides that the owner of a trade mark in Canada has the exclusive right to use the trade mark, which includes selling a product which bears it. The Canadian trade mark owner can, in law, prohibit others from importing or selling a drug bearing his trade mark even if it comes from a foreign company related to the trade mark owner. This is a further measure of protection which has inhibited price competition, and one purpose of the bill is to limit the monopoly power accorded to the trade mark owner in Canada. As in the case of the patent, an importer who imports a trade marked product lays himself open to an infringement action in the courts for unauthorized use of the trade mark unless he has permission to use it either from the trade mark owner or by statute.

I wish to emphasize that the importation of a patented or trade-marked product is not in itself a crime; it is a breach of a civil right of the patent or trade mark owner. But patent and trade mark litigation is expensive and this bill merely establishes a right to use the patent and trade mark in a special way which at present could give rise to civil action by the owner.

My predecessor, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), when introducing Bill No. C-190 made it clear, beyond the shadow of a doubt, in the introduction to his address that the government accepted unequivocally the conclusion arrived at by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission in 1963, the Royal Commission on Health Services in 1964, and the special committee of this house dealing with drug costs and prices which reported in April, 1967, namely, that the prices of drugs to the Canadian consumer were unduly high or, as it was stated to the special committee of the house, such prices were "higher than they need be".

My colleague introduced tables which, with the agreement of hon. members, were inserted in Hansard of the last session of the last parliament on pages 6616 to 6621 inclusive. They set forth comparative prices to the [Mr. Basford.]

retailer of some of the most commonly used prescription drugs in different countries in the world. All of these tables, without exception, indicated that the conclusions of the commissions and the special committee were accurate. There was no reason to believe that in the last months any vital change had occurred which would indicate those original comparisons had moved significantly one way or another. Nevertheless I obtained from the same sources as were used by the Harley committee the current prices of the same patented prescription drugs to the retailer in Canada, the United States, and in five European countries as were set out in the last table commencing on page 6620 of Hansard of the last session, and I would ask for the indulgence of the house to have this table bearing date of August 23, 1968 printed in Hansard, at this point in my observations, to bring these statistics up to date.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Reid): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Generally speaking, a strict comparison of the tables indicates quite clearly that Canadian prices are high and the conclusions of the two commissions and the special committee with respect to these prices have not been altered by the passage of time.

Arguments have been made by the drug companies that high Canadian prices are in fact due to higher labour costs in Canada than in, for example, Italy or other European 29180—96 countries, and hence the generally higher price range is not out of the way. I might say that the Harley committee thoroughly studied this argument and rejected it completely and unanimously. Merely because Canada has a higher standard of living than other countries does not support the contention that automatically drug prices, or any prices in fact, should be higher for that reason alone. The government accepts the views of the Harley committee in this respect.

The purpose of the legislation is, of course, quite clear, and that is to engender or, if you will, to inject more price competition into the Canadian drug industry. Patents and trade marks, by their very nature, are restrictive in character and tend to limit competition. That this in some circumstances is a good thing, that this alone may stimulate research and promote industrial growth, very few will deny. Yet even here economists may differ as they relate the problem to the economic situation of the country concerned. However, in the area of medicines it is a long held view that full monopoly protection runs counter to the public interest; and Canada is by no means the only country where medicines under patent systems are treated in a manner that derogates from the normal monopolistic character bestowed upon new inventions, processes and products.

In some countries patents on drugs are not permitted at all, and in other countries licensing or working conditions are attached to the patent grant which prevent the patent monopoly from taking its normal full effect. In a moment or two I shall dwell in more detail upon the present licensing aspects of patented drugs in Canada which have sought to balance the public interest with the rewards due the inventor or patentee for his contribution to society.

I have no hesitation, as a new minister, in saying that the bill is a complex piece of legislation. It is designed, first to permit the commissioner of patents to grant compulsory licences to applicants who wish to import patented drugs into this country of any nature or kind, whether such drugs are represented by active ingredients in bulk form, or medicines in final dosage form. Second, it is designed to permit the importation by third parties of certain trade marked drugs from the foreign parent companies of Canadian subsidiaries without fear of infringement.

These, very briefly, are the specific objects of the bill. The bill, in the case of the higher priced drugs, is intended to force the Canadian drug manufacturers to meet competition by the paring down of their present monopoly prices.

Compulsory licensing of drug patents, of course, is not new to Canada. That was the purpose that lay behind the 1923 amendment to the Patent Act in connection with section 41 (3), which we now propose to amend again, and which permitted the commissioner of patents to grant licences to applicants who wished to manufacture patented foods and drugs in this country, provided the commissioner saw no "good reason to the contrary". For more than 40 years, therefore, it has been parliament's well recognized intention to modify and limit patent monopolies as applied to foods and medicines. The present bill is introduced to extend this limitation of the normal protection afforded by the patent system in so far as medicines are concerned.

Compulsory licences to manufacture under the 1923 amendment provided in the present section 41 (3) of the Patent Act, as it turned out, were not sought in substantial numbers. Hindsight reveals that the amendment did not by itself fulfil the intention of parliament at the time, whether because prospective applicants anticipated that costly litigation would precede the issue of a licence or because in most instances it was not economic to manufacture in Canada the basic drug or active ingredient of the drug under the particular patent concerned. Even now, as pointed out by the Harley committee and admitted by the drug industry, pharmaceutical corporations in Canada, taken together, import some 85 per cent of the active ingredients from their parent corporations or other foreign producers; and the manufacture of patented drugs in this country involves to a great extent a change or conversion from the particular bulk active imported ingredient to the final dosage form, whether pill, liquid or capsule, together with routine packaging and labelling.

I might add that the passage of this bill, in effect, in some respects clarifies and makes certain the existing authority of the commissioner of patents. Legal opinion already exists that section 41 (3) at present authorizes the however, did take the view that this right did such a step in itself would leave Canada open not lie within their jurisdiction, and hence the present legislative enactment will now definitely remove any legal doubt with respect to the law.

What this bill will bring about, then is an incentive to permit responsible third parties to import drugs in any form to compete with patented and trade marked drugs manufactured by the companies at present dominating the Canadian market. These companies, as I have said, in fact import even now up to 85 per cent of the basic or active drug ingredients.

I repeat that the introduction of price competition into this industry is the underlying object of this bill; and those who considered this particular method of reducing prices to consumers, either in the two commissions to which I previously referred or in the special committee of this house, concluded that by so doing the existing pharmaceutical industry in Canada would not be prejudiced to an unfair or unreasonable extent. I do not think I need mention that the special committee's report, a committee represented by all parties in the house, was unanimous. Indeed, all studies have led to one single conclusion: Namely, that a lowering in drug prices to the ultimate consumer would certainly result if price competition were made effective at the manufacturing level.

It was the view of the three major inquiries that this will work. The government has every expectation that in conjunction with the remainder of the program I have outlined at the beginning of my speech, the economic pressure on prices will result in drug prices being lowered at the manufacturing level in the first instance, and ultimately to the consumer. If, however, it should turn out that the measures proposed do not have the desired result, then we are prepared to take further measures because the government is determined to bring about a lowering of drug prices in Canada.

Much was said during the debate on the original Bill C-190, by pharmaceutical corporations and proponents of the patent system, that the introduction of such a bill was a retrograde step, that such a bill merely placed a foot in the door for those who wished to abolish the patent system, that research incentives would be partially if not totally destroyed thereby, that research would commissioner to issue compulsory licences for cease and trained scientific personnel the importation of patented drugs for further throughout the Canadian drug industry would processing in Canada. Former commissioners, leave the country in numbers and finally, that to possible retaliation by other countries which are members of the Paris union, that is, the international convention respecting patents, of which Canada is a member.

All these objections have been brought many times to the attention of the two commissions and the special committee of this house, and the evidence seems clear that this is unfounded. Every argument, every statement and every remark to this effect that has been put forward by pharmaceutical corporations and their associations, and by the patent and trade mark institute of Canada—through their executives, counsel and accountantshave been studied and carefully considered. Every argument put forward against the original Bill C-190 that could have been advanced has been advanced, not only to the two commissions and the special committee but also to hon. members of this house during the last session of the previous parliament and, indeed, since that time I, too, have been available to anyone who wished to make representations or discuss ideas on this subject.

When dealing with manufacturers' prices and contending that these are excessive, we must consider the various factors, of course, that, taken together, make up the final price to the consumer. One of these is profit. The special committee noted that the average rate of return on investment in the Canadian drug industry was 20 per cent compared with about 10 per cent for all manufacturing. The comparison was made over a period of 12 years. It would appear therefore that there is a "cushion" here that is capable of adjustment to increased price competition.

Second, I now wish to emphasize certain costs deliberately assumed by the drug industry itself which we feel an injection of competition will undoubtedly reduce. The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada, which is an association speaking for some 57 members—and which is representative of the largest group of drug manufacturers in this country—reported to the Harley committee that for the year 1964 some 30 per cent of the manufacturers' sales dollar—as reported by 41 of its members—was spent on sales promotion.

No figures have since been given to us that would indicate this percentage has substantially changed. This, incidentally, compares with 7 per cent of the sales dollar spent by the industry for research and development. I repeat that-30 per cent was spent on promotion, 7 per cent on research and development. from these figures: First, that over four times as much money is spent on promotion, advertising and public relations by the industry as is spent on research; and, second, that the economics of the industry are such that almost one third of the manufacturers' sales dollar is spent in an attempt to demonstrate to physicians, pharmacists and buyers of drugs that the product of one company is superior to that of another. As pointed out by the special committee, the simple reason that lies behind the large amounts of money spent on marketing is that the drug industry differs uniquely from other industries.

Hon. members are aware that the consumer of drugs has no choice of purchase. The physician chooses and must choose the drug for his patient, he writes out the prescription and the pharmacist fills out the prescription as ordered. In fact, the consumer very rarely knows the name of the drug he is taking, and the labels on the bottles containing his prescription do not ordinarily inform him. All the promotional activities by the drug industry are directed either to the physician or to the pharmacist, or to the purchasing agents of hospitals and government departments. And, as I have said, this form of marketing accounts for some 30 per cent of the manufacturers' sales dollar. The fact is that this situation can be remedied only by injecting real price competition in the open marketplace, so that conditions are created whereby the companies will be forced to minimize these costs.

It is the government's considered view, therefore, that we should open up the drug market to price competition by allowing imports of drugs under compulsory licence and under the control of the food and drug directorate, as this bill is designed to bring about, and thereby reduce as much as is practicable these marketing costs.

I come now to the question of the safety and quality of imported drugs. Certainly it is absolutely essential in the public interest that high quality and safe drugs be made available to Canadians, whether manufactured in Canada or imported. The high price of a drug does not guarantee safety and quality. Lower price drugs can also be of a high quality and safe. A brand name drug is not necessarily safer or of higher quality than any other drug. The question of safety, together with high quality, has been dealt with by every member of this house who took part in the debate on Bill C-190. The two commissions and the special committee heard many witnesses on this sub-Two interesting observations can be made ject, and these included Canadian officials responsible for seeing that all the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act and its regulations are met.

Safety and high quality do not spring from any name attached to a drug product, whether brand or non-brand; they come about through the integrity of the particular manufacturer of that drug, be he Canadian or otherwise, and the vigilance of the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Yet the assumption is continually being made and asserted, one which we cannot accept, namely that importation of drugs from countries other than Canada would be unsafe, in that they would not be pharmaceutically or clinically equivalent to similar drugs manufactured in Canada.

The safety factor, I repeat, is of prime importance. Drug safety is the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare through the food and drug directorate. And any drug that is sought to be manufactured in Canada or imported into Canada, whether under a patent licence or not, can be excluded from the Canadian market if it does not meet the high standards of that directorate. It again should be borne in mind that 85 per cent of the basic drugs for the Canadian market are already being imported.

I expect that during the course of this debate the question of safety and efficacy of drugs will be referred to time and time again by hon. members; and that repeated efforts will be made to tie in the responsibility granted the commissioner of patents under this bill to that responsibility which solely belongs to the food and drug directorate. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), is fully prepared to deal with all questions arising concerning the safety and efficacy of drugs, and his department's program of safety and quality control. Hon. members will observe that the bill contains provisions in addition to those that were in Bill C-190 to provide additional authority to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to enable him to discharge his responsibilities in respect of safety.

The drug companies maintain that this bill, when enacted, will notably affect a continuthe Trade Marks Act are designed to encourage increased price competition at the per cent of sales. This figure is unlikely to expense of excessive sales promotion, not at the expense of research. In any event, a significant part of the research spending which has taken place in this industry is attributable, not to the patent system in Canada but to government incentives of various kinds.

In its report, the special committee of the House of Commons on drug costs and prices came to the conclusion that the drug industry in Canada would continue in the foreseeable future to remain largely within the international framework, that the larger Canadian companies would remain subsidiaries of international corporations, and that any further noticeable increase in research in Canada by these subsidiaries would in all likelihood derive from the stimulus of the incentives the government provides for research and development. It is perhaps worth recalling that the Canadian market is of relatively minor importance to anyone wishing to market a new drug discovery. Drug research is predicated on the idea of supplying a new discovery to the world. Some evidence of this is provided by the fact that 95 per cent of Canadian patents are owned by non-residents. I therefore see no reason why the proposed patent amendments should change the locus of any research undertaking which is contemplated, if there are otherwise good economic reasons for locating it in Canada.

At this juncture I should like to join my predecessor, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), in paying tribute to Charles E. Frosst and to Ayerst, McKenna and Harrison, two of the original Canadian manufacturers who did in fact conduct, and still do, fundamental drug research in this country. Nor am I overlooking the excellent research work of academic and other non-commercial institutions in Canada. The hope always remains that other manufacturers will do likewise but, as I have suggested, as long as the international framework of this industry persists meaningful drug research in Canada will depend on government and other government incentives.

There is another aspect of the Canadian drug industry which should be brought to the attention of hon. members. This industry is primarily concerned with the domestic marance or growth of pharmaceutical research in ket. Exports are comparatively few. In Canada. I have no such apprehensions. The fairness, however, I would point out that the proposed amendments to the Patent Act and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada now claims that exports approach 10 increase significantly because of the unique new drug status, for the expense involved character of the industry and its embodiment in an international scheme. As one manufacturer said to the special committee: We have so many plants all over the world I just do not know where we would export to.

In view of the time, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house would like to sit until I finish, or to stop now? I will not be very long.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house agree to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: I thank the house, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to complete my remarks so that the official speaker for the Conservative party can start his remarks the next time the subject is debated.

I have endeavoured to show that there is ample room for the Canadian drug manufacturers to meet competition from importers as designed by this bill. Apart from the above. the Canadian drug manufacturer, as a patentee of a drug, has three specific advantages over importers of the same drug. First, he will still enjoy a preferred tariff position. Second, he will receive a royalty required to be paid to him by the licensed importer in an amount to be decided upon by the commissioner of patents. Third, he will, as a practical matter, have a period of complete monopoly protection from the time his newly innovated drug is placed on the market, until such drug loses its "new drug status", except in the unlikely event that a competitor also clears the product as a new drug.

The regulations under the Food and Drugs Act require a manufacturer, before any sale of a new drug is permitted, to carry out costly and intensive tests, the results of which must satisfy the food and drug directorate as to the safety and efficacy of the drug. When so satisfied, the directorate issues a notice of compliance which allows the manufacturer to market the drug in quantity, and for that length of time necessary to ensure that no serious side effects of the drug may show up. This period of time is generally not less than five years, and during that time the product remains in new drug status. During this time no other manufacturer can enter the market and sell the same drug until he, too, receives a notice of compliance from the directorate. Experience has shown that a competing manufacturer will not normally seek a com-would not make such a procedure worth while.

In addition, quite apart from this expense, a competing manufacturer would doubtless have difficulty in interesting the limited number of doctors available who are qualified to do clinical testing in the job of repeating tests on a product, the results of which already would be basically known. For a period of approximately five years, therefore, the original manufacturer or creator of the drug enjoys full protection and can carry out his promotional program in a manner to gain for him maximum acceptance in the market.

I turn now to that other aspect of the bill which proposes an amendment to the Trade Marks Act. The present law is clear that an importer of a trade marked product into Canada may be sued for infringement by the Canadian owner of that trade mark, if the owner is manufacturing in Canada, whether that owner is a subsidiary of a foreign corporation or not and whether or not the product has been purchased by the importer from the foreign parent. This could apply in cases where an importer purchased drugs from a foreign country in their final dosage forms and which were labelled as trade marked products.

The proposed amendment deals with this situation. It provides that no infringement can be claimed where drugs bearing the trade mark of and manufactured by a related company in a foreign country are imported into Canada. For example, when a Canadian subsidiary and its foreign parent sell a drug product under the same trade mark in Canada and the foreign country, the Canadian subsidiary could not sue the importer for infringement when the importer purchases that product from the parent corporation for sale in Canada. This amendment will, however, apply in practice only in a limited number of cases where a wide margin of price disparity would have to occur before it would be worth while for the importer to consider the importing of such a drug as a reasonable business venture.

The Canadian drug manufacturers argue that many drugs, although identically trade marked and put on the market by their related companies in other countries, differ in composition, that their strengths may vary, pulsory licence during the time a drug is in and that inert substances used in the pill or or even cause harm to the consumer. Again, this is a question of safety, and after the debate on C-190 we amended the old bill C-190 to meet this situation. As I stated before, this is the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare; and I would repeat that my colleague, the minister, will explain how this new amendment works.

May I thank hon. members, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to go on for a few minutes after ten o'clock, and I apologize to them for this lengthy résumé of the principle of this bill and the reasons which lie beneath its introduction. However, the debate under the original bill C-190 was so lengthy and inspired that I considered I would be remiss in my responsibilities to the house were I to make this statement on second reading too abbreviated. My impression has always been that there appears to be needless concern within the drug industry about the effects of the bill. We are merely seeking to make the competitive market work more effectively. I have also had in mind the large number of new honorable members in this parliament, and for their benefit, too, I have elaborated my remarks.

It has now been more than five years since the first recommendations on the high costs of drugs were reported, Mr. Speaker, and even more since it first became clear that drug prices in Canada were among the highest, if not the highest, in the world. I believe firmly that, following all that has been said, and after receiving almost identical recommendations from two commissions and a special committee of this house, we would indeed be failing in our duty as members if we were not to take this action in the public interest, with a minimum of delay.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government house leader has any exciting news to give us tonight about the business for tomorrow and Monday?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Nothing exciting, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we will continue, as announced, with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. and on Monday we shall continue with the bill to amend the Post Office Act, taking the second reading and following stages.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government house [Mr. Basford.]

capsule form of the drug may alter its efficacy leader if this means that the negotiations of the last two or three hours have come to naught. It is no secret when I say that we have been discussing the possibility of dealing with the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act tomorrow on the understanding that it would finish tomorrow and that we would deal with the Farm Credit Act on Monday on a similar basis. If there has not been agreement as to the entire package we were discussing, I make the plea that at least we take the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act tomorrow and have an order of the house tonight that all of its stages are to be concluded by five o'clock tomorrow.

> Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite agreeable to having an order of the house that all stages of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act be dealt with at five o'clock tomorrow, and that all stages of the Farm Credit bill, which is now before the committee, be dealt with before the close of business on Monday. Perhaps we might have agreement about that.

> The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is that agreed?

> Mr. Horner: No, Mr. Speaker. I agree with the house leader that there is a necessity to pass this legislation, but we believe in taking one step at a time. We agree to there being an order of the house tonight to deal with the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act tomorrow, with all stages to be completed at five o'clock. That we agree to. Let us take one day at a time.

> Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think we ought to deal with both matters. It would be to the advantage of the house.

Mr. Crouse: No, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

PENSIONS—SUGGESTED USE OF COST OF LIVING BASE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Two afternoons ago I asked the Prime Trudeau) the Minister (Mr. following question:

In the review of the various social security and allowance programs which the government is carrying out, will the principle be adopted of basing federal pensions and allowances on the actual cost of living?

• (10:10 p.m.)

In the past there has been no attempt to base pensions and allowances on either the cost of living or the current standard of living. I think both these factors should be taken into account when reviewing base pensions and government allowances in the future. In the past, provision has been made on a basis of political expediency rather than social need.

Take old age pensions. There is not much relation between what it costs to live and what the old age pensioners get. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out a few weeks ago that nearly 60 per cent of Canadians 67 years and over have nothing to live on but their old age assistance pension, with the supplementary allowance to $105 a month. That is a large percentage of Canadians 67 years of age and over. The amount of the old age security pension plus the allowance totals $105 a month. Three years ago a committee of the Canadian Welfare Council stated that a single person at that time required $138 a month in order to live. The pension provided today for a single person is $105.

Consider the case of retired public servants. In May of 1967 a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate unanimously recommended that their pensions should be increased. My hon, friend from Winnipeg North Centre has made attempt after attempt to get this question dealt with, and on each occasion he has been answered to the effect that the matter is under consideration—which means precisely nothing in terms of action.

Take war veterans allowances: In my own constituency there are many families headed by veterans who scarcely have sufficient resources on which to exist. It is not only a matter of basic food and shelter. Other people are living in a modern way; the pensioners know it, and they are appalled at the manner in which the rising cost of living is leaving them completely helpless because they can do nothing to raise their own standards-standards which depend entirely upon what is cent. Some day perhaps adjusting that 2 per done here by the federal government.

As I say, the basis upon which pensions are fixed is wrong in the first place, because persons of 65 years of age will receive the the structure depends on political expediency pension by 1970, some form of adjustment is and pressure from outside. In the 11 years being applied in the case of persons of 65 to between 1957 and 1968, according to govern- 70 years of age; this increases the number ment figures, transportation costs have risen of pensioners and people who can benefit by 19.2 per cent, the cost of shelter has risen by 19.3 per cent, the cost of clothing by 22.8 per cent. The cost of health services has risen by 33.3 per cent and the cost of food by 34.6 per cent. Pensions have never kept pace with these increases.

I therefore feel that on the ground of concern for people as well as for the sake of efficiency the government should start from the ground up and see that in future pension rates are determined, first, by what is necessary for a modern if modest standard of living and, second, by the cost of living itself. There should be an escalator clause to provide that when the cost of living increases the amount of a pension or allowance also increases automatically. This has not been provided for even in the payment of old age supplementary payments, which increase by a certain percentage regardless of what happens to the cost of living. There should be an attempt to place these things on a footing of what it costs to live in the light of the general standard of living and the capacity of our country to produce.

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all the members share the ideal proposed by the member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. Mac-Innis).

It goes without saying that on the government side it is not always possible to wholly translate one's ideal, one's good intentions into facts, since financial resources are required to implement those programs. Just as the most beautiful woman in the world can only give what she has, so with the government of the nation. The hon. member will surely admit that although the increase in the cost of living has not been checked completely, some corrective measures are being applied.

The old age security paid to 1,300,000 persons is adjusted according to the cost of living index subject to a 2 per cent maximum. The hon. member may perhaps object to the 2 per cent ceiling may be indicated.

It must also be recognized that since all gram, because it depends on a needs test, the adjustments to the cost of living are automatic.

Needless to say, all the governments in the world are now in the process of planning some co-ordination between their various welfare programs, with a view to covering the whole spectrum of needs and problems. I believe the hon. member will also agree that the Liberal government has been, not only in Canada but also in foreign countries, an inspiration in the field of social welfare.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—DEFICIT ATTRIB-UTABLE TO CANADIAN EDITIONS OF U.S. MAGAZINES

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last something in the order of 18 or 20 questions were addressed to the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans). To my knowledge not one member has been satisfied with an answer. Certainly no members of this party have received any information whatsoever as a result of the questions put to the minister. I might say that on that particular day the minister stated that he would welcome an opportunity to debate this issue. Why then does he withhold information from members when they request it? He refers to the members on this side of the house approaching this question on a motion. Representations have been made by all members who are concerned with this particular matter and the bill which the minister will be introducing in the house.

Representations have been made such as those of the hon, member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) on behalf of the 33,000 people who receive the Halifax Herald through the mails. The minister has flatly refused to provide any information to these members.

The minister has flatly refused to give members any information. He speaks on motions and talks about the fact that 35 Liberal members gathered to make representations. The inference left by the Postmaster General is that he has met with these people from those services. Add to this the new legis- and discussed this matter. Not too long ago he lation on the minimum guaranteed income referred in this house to the warm reception supplement by which 735,000 persons profit. he received. I suggested at that time it was In the case of the Canada public welfare pro- probably a hot one. I indicate, as did members of the press, in reference to this Liberal caucus, that the minister was probably on the hot seat. There is no reason to believe that matters of departmental responsibility are considered any differently by Conservative members of the house than by the 35 members of that meeting. I suppose this indicates that we can no longer call at least those 35 members trained seals, because at least they have done their duty by bringing this matter to the attention of the minister.

> Let me remind the Postmaster General, who is now smirking again, that he enters this house by the same process that every other member enters it, and it is time he began to realize that fact, get off his high horse and get down to business.

> Mr. Perrault: That is an unparliamentary inference, and you know it.

> Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): We have now heard from the competing leader of the government. Having used my privileges, I do not intend to persist in explaining the facts to the satisfaction of my hon. friend here to the right. I will try to stay as close to parliamentary language as this situation permits.

> What the minister stated in the house on Wednesday was far removed from the truth, and this fact is supported by Hansard at page 1151. He referred to the emotional approach of hon. members on this side of the house, and to his meeting with 35 Liberal members rather than a house committee. However, he did not make his later announcement in the house, but rather went to London, Ontario, and made a statement regarding his withdrawal from his earlier stated position.

> His statement in the house was as follows: I referred to a particular initiative on the part of some members of the Liberal caucus. I would be quite glad to be invited to any other group or caucus in this house.

> And in the next column, almost directly opposite on the same page, I said:

> Since the Postmaster General expressed a willingness to meet with any hon, members who represent constituencies faced with post office problems, and since a number of members have expressed an interest in this offer, will the minister make himself available at five o'clock in my office and, if not, when?

[Mr. Gendron.]

The minister smirked and laughed. It would not be proper for me to invite myself to his office. He asked for the invitation and he was offered one. The next day he came back into the house and made another statement, which was far removed from the truth, regarding this invitation which was offered him. This can be found at page 1210 of Hansard for October 16. Let me read part of the last paragraph in the first column, which states:

-I may say I am meeting continuously with all sorts of bodies but have not as yet received any formal invitation or representations from the members of the opposition.

He said that despite the fact that the day before he was invited to a meeting with a group interested in this particular matter. Does the minister see anything in that to laugh and smirk about, in view of this statement which indicates a complete reversal of what he has said? What does the minister mean by a "formal invitation"? Must I come down to the house in a black tie, or present a formal document through whatever channels the minister decides are proper and formal?

It is time he realized that the members of this house are interested in this matter. They have suggested that he is on a hot seat as a result of his proposed withdrawal from a position he took in the house. He did not make the withdrawal in this house, but went to London, Ontario, to make public a fact which should have been made known to the members of this house. We should receive truthful statements from the minister, rather than complete denials or reversals of what he has said.

I would suggest that the minister adopt in this house an attitude that I understand is very difficult for the Liberals, in their arrogance; that is, he must come around, he must humble himself and stop talking down his nose and taking this attitude with members of the house. He should not come forward the day following this particular incident in the house and completely deny himself.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this comes rather as a surprise to me. I think most members of the house were witnesses to the invitation. It was not an invitation in the ordinary sense of the word, where two people try to get together and tre): Mr. Speaker, by coincidence my question arrange a time that is mutually convenient follows rather naturally the concluding words for a group to meet. It was simply: Will you that the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) has come at five o'clock this afternoon?-when I used in answering the last question, and I had other meetings to attend.

I repeat that I would be very glad if the leader of the hon. member's caucus, whom I understand is the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), would extend an invitation. I would be very glad to discuss clause by clause the articles in the bill, exactly as I have been doing, as is the Liberal custom, with the members of our caucus who are interested in this bill and demand explanations of particular articles, their meanings and possible effects. This is what I have been

The 35 members referred to are a constructive group. They are very interested in understanding the bill, in making clear whatever differences they might have and asking if there are other ways in which we could approach the various objectives of the minister. I may say they are tremendously co-operative and have aided me enormously. This is the kind of constructive meeting to which I look forward-not a facetious invitation to "Come up and see me some time."

With reference to my dinner speech in London last evening, I would like to make it quite clear that this was arranged. The people of London invited me last August to be the speaker at their first annual civic dinner. I also have copies of that speech, from which I can prove that I said nothing more there, regardless of whatever interpretation may have been made, than I have said in this house.

I simply want to resume my position. Some weeks ago I made a declaration that the Post Office intended on February 1 to introduce a five day week. Since that time it has been pointed out to me by a number of people that this would have varying effects on different parts of Canada because we are a peculiar nation, geographically speaking; that in certain areas, rural areas in particular, this would have a different effect than in urban areas. A great deal of detail has been gone into, so that I may reconsider this entire position. This has been as a result of the constructive proposals put forward to me. We have not yet reached a decision.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT-REPRESENTA-TIONS RESPECTING WITHDRAWAL OF SATURDAY SERVICE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Cenhope he will say more when I have had my few minutes. Yesterday during the question period I asked him whether, since there is no reference in Bill No. C-116 to the stopping of mail delivery on Saturdays, he could tell us under what authority he had made this decision.

The Postmaster General replied, quite properly, that this was under the authority of the powers vested in the Postmaster General. I was aware of this, but as the Postmaster General recognized from my supplementary question, I was trying to make the point that when you get to a matter that concerns people as much as this one does, a minister should be very careful about exercising, without reference to parliament, such authority as he may feel he has.

I have checked, both before and since yesterday, the Post Office Act to try to find under what sections he exercises this authority. I find nothing very specific, although I do find that the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada Post Office, and that he may do a lot of things. One of the things is, with the consent of the governor in council, to provide for the door to door delivery of mail. I find that he may, as I said, do many other things, one of them, which I suppose he has read a thousand times, being that he may make regulations for the efficient operation of the Canada Post Office. I freely admit that in the absence of any limiting phrases these general rights which are given to the Postmaster General do give him a good deal of latitude.

I suppose it is under this general authority that the previous postmaster general dropped the delivery service in urban areas from twice a day to once a day. Now this Postmaster General proposes to discontinue the Saturday service. By the same token he could go on and cut it down to four, three or one delivery a week. He could have mail delivered in certain cities on Mondays and in other cities on Tuesdays, and so on. I realize that I am stating the ridiculous, but I am doing it to make my point, that even though the Postmaster General can argue that he has the legal authority to make changes of this kind, when a matter is as serious as this one he ought somehow to bring it before parliament.

The Postmaster General keeps telling us that we can discuss this matter when we get to the second reading and further stages of bill No. C-116. I can also anticipate some hon. members raising points of order if we try to do that because there is nothing in bill No.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

C-116 about the five day week delivery, or anything of that nature.

However, in the meantime there is some dialogue between parliament and the Postmaster General with respect to questions that have been raised. We have had that dialogue on the floor and he has had it with the 35 good men and true. He has also had it in the correspondence he received from across the country. I am just pleading with him to go on a step further from the position he had reached when he sat down, just before I got up. He admitted that since he announced the decision that there would be a five day week, commencing on February 1, a lot of matters had to be considered and perhaps that decision will be modified. I am interested to learn that he realizes that this creates a problem in rural areas. I suggest this will also create a problem in many urban areas. If the Postmaster General feels that some deliveries have to be cut down to five days, such as deliveries in business areas for example, I suggest that he reconsider the delivery in home areas and the matter of keeping post offices open on Saturdays.

I might remind him that in some countries of the world some post offices are open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. I do not see the logic of his proposal, bearing in mind that the job of the post office is to provide service.

I suppose it is partly because the Postmaster General has had his quota of strong language from my friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) that I am speaking in these more modest terms, or perhaps it is because of my sore throat which keeps me from getting quite so excited tonight. However, I feel very strongly about the changes that are proposed and about the unilateral way in which this is being done, simply by an announcement to parliament. We did not get many promises during the last election campaign but we did get the promise of involvement; the people were going to be in the government of the country. It is not possible to get them all here. We cannot have 20 million people down here; but 264 of us are here, and I think that we should be consulted by this government more than has been the case. I am not going to cite the other things that have happened already in the course of this session. However, I think on this one the Postmaster General ought to reconsider his position.

Before I sit down, I should say I welcome his statement that he is reviewing the matter.

I hope he will be a big enough man to review it all the way if necessary and, if he feels the tions of the population who are not interested review leads him to that position, say that the announcement was a mistake and that he will leave the six day service for the people of Canada. The Post Office has a record of service. Let us not spoil it, as some of us think would be the case if this announced decision is put into effect. I am glad to learn the Postmaster General is paying attention to the representations made to him by Liberals and by members of the public generally. I hope he will pay attention also to this representation I make to him again tonight.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I appreciate the moderate language of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As he knows, I have a great admiration for him and for his service to the Canadian people, which goes back a long time. I should like to say this, that a five day week does involve a considerable saving in the cost of operation of the post office. It involves also. of course, some disadvantages to some or all sections of the population who expect delivery service. At the same time, I think one can reasonably make a distinction between those who have a real need, let us say, for delivery of their weekly newspaper or Saturay editions of their daily newspaper, and those secin having their mail delivered on Saturday, particularly the business section. We must weigh the advantages against the possible costs. In other words, if one can save $13 million or $8 million by a partial introduction of such a delivery system, is it worth while doing so?

One can always spend whatever one saves when the needs are so many and so pressing in so many different areas, whether they be education or health and welfare. One can always spend money equitably and put it to advantage. The problem, therefore, is how much we will save by a complete cessation of Saturday service; how much will we save by a partial cessation of Saturday service? We have people in the department working on this problem now.

I expect to make a statement on Monday at the second reading stage of the bill. This will give all hon. members an opportunity to debate the soundness of that decision or declaration. As I have said, each member will have an opportunity in the house to interpret the statement, comment on it, applaud it or criticize it.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.41 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 18, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate have passed Bill No. C-109, an act respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta by Canadian National Railway Company, without any amendment.

INDIAN LANDS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROVISION FOR DISCUSSION AND NEGOTIATION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-121, relating to Indian lands in British Columbia.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the aboriginal title to lands in British Columbia, tribal and community property and other rights, were never extinguished by treaty, purchase or anything else except in one situation. The purpose of this bill is to give parliamentary recognition to the historical fact that the aboriginal and hereditary ownership of the lands still rests in the hands of the native people of British Columbia, and to give the governor in council authority to enter into discussions and negotiations to see that a mutually satisfactory agreement is reached in this respect, thus solving a problem that has existed for many decades.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR WHITE PAPER ON PRICES REVIEW BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, but before I do perhaps I might be permitted to congratulate him and wish him continued health and every happiness on his birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: How old is he?

Mr. Hees: Will he tell us that by way of a statement on motions?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Prime Minister every happiness as he enters his fiftieth year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: The question I ask him is a repeat. I want to make it clear that I am not criticizing the Prime Minister, because I find that as I age somewhat my memory is not as good as it used to be. My question arises from the repeated urgings of the governor of the Bank of Canada for some kind of guide lines relating to inflation, contained again in the speech of last night. Would the Prime Minister indicate when the house might expect the promised white paper relating to the proposed prices review board?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer this question. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for mentioning my birthday. I was hoping that the occasion would pass unnoticed, because I have never paid much attention to the question of age. I rather thought the same attitude existed on the other side of the house, but I suppose the longer I put off discussing my age, the worse it will get.

My memory has not yet slipped, however, on the point of the white paper on the stabilization of prices, costs and incomes. I had a meeting with the governor of the Bank of Canada this week and we discussed the subject. I was able to finalize in my own mind the action we should be taking on this matter. I think it is fair to speculate that within three weeks such a white paper, or a statement on this subject, will be made by the government.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question. Is there no prospect of receiving this white paper before the Minister of Finance presents his budget, as it might be related to the position taken by the minister?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The budget will deal with inflation in the usual way in which fiscal policy is tackled, but our thinking on this kind of stabilization or review board is that inflation has to be attacked by other than budgetary means. In a sense it is unrelated to the budget speech.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Prime Minister could indicate whether he feels that the introduction of the budget will not make it even more essential to produce the white paper as soon as possible.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that after the glee with which the budget will be met we might take much more time in introducing this white paper.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was stating government policy when he suggested he was in favour of a cost board rather than a prices and review board.

AGRICULTURE

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF NATIONAL GRAINS COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will the minister inform the house now as to the terms of reference of the national grains council?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I think I referred to them yesterday, Mr. Speaker. In the proposed terms of reference we enumerated all the different aspects of the work which the grains council is expected to perform. One, for example, has to do with marketing, another with research, and still another with information. But I think I stated yesterday that everyone at the meeting held two days ago seemed to agree that the main function of the council would be a co-ordinating one, bringing together all the sections of that important industry.

Mr. Gleave: I have a supplementary question. Could we also have some information at the minister's convenience on the proposed method of financing the operations of the council?

Mr. Pepin: This was also studied in Winnipeg two days ago. Different formulas were advanced by the participants at the meeting and by the ministers present and, as I said yesterday, we are now trying to bring all these elements together and provide the participants with a new document which will be subject to their representations.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will the national grains council be looking into the problems of western Canada resulting from the severe weather conditions there in trying to find some immediate solutions?

Mr. Pepin: I do not think the council will be created soon enough to allow views to be expressed on the current situation, but definitely the purpose of the grains council will be to analyse, digest and criticize the sometimes conflicting opinions that are advanced by very learned people and worth-while organizations on the interests of the grain industry.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, can the minister say whether it is the intention to give a full time salary or emolument to members of the grains council?

 $\mathbf{Mr.}$ Pepin: That will be discussed under financing.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I would direct a question to the minister of trade and industry. The hon. gentleman mentioned that the council which is being set up will not be operative or effective, as the case may be, for a couple of months. In view of the serious emergency facing the farmers of western Canada is the hon. gentleman giving consideration to convening a meeting of representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the farm unions and municipal organizations to discuss and consider what action the federal government might take to meet this emergency, and to give consideration also to action which might be taken with respect to sales which are going on outside the wheat board of feed grain and the like at inordinately low prices?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, this is always in my mind and in the mind of the Minister of Agriculture. We are trying to move both on the short term and on the longer term, the longer term being represented by the creation of the grains council. On the short term I have endeavoured to indicate yesterday and two weeks ago the support we are giving to the Canadian Wheat Board. There is no doubt, however, that the policies with regard to orientations, i.e., should it be hard grain,

[Mr. Trudeau.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CONSIDERATION OF INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. As minimum wages in this country range as low as 80 cents an hour, and the recipients of most minimum wages and their families are required to live in conditions of poverty, will the Prime Minister give consideration to calling a meeting of the provincial premiers to discuss the possibility of raising all minimum wages in this country above the poverty level?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, we have arranged for meetings of federal-provincial ministers of finance, health and welfare, and later of prime ministers. The agendas are quite full, and I do not believe that at the meeting of prime ministers we will be able to discuss this particular matter. We are meeting on constitutional matters.

[Translation]

While I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) for his good wishes and tell him that, like Maurice Chevalier, I do not relish the idea of getting old, but I feel better when I think of the alternative.

[English]

Mr. Hees: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the Prime Minister's reluctance to take any action or to give leadership in this regard, are we to take it the just society envisages built-in poverty?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—REPORTED INCREASE IN MILITARY BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence I will address it to the Prime Minister. My question arises out of reports that the military budget of NATO is to be increased to the sum of $172.8 billion for the next five year period. Will the Prime Minister say what representations, if any, have been made to Canada to increase its financial contribution to NATO?

I shall look into this and endeavour to give him a reply, either personally or in the house. I wonder if the hon. member would mind softer grain, or concentration on feed grain and so on, are policies that require a good deal of discussion. I thought, and the Minister of Agriculture thought, that the proper place for these debates would be in the grains council, where all sectors of the industry will be represented and where the representatives would have an opportunity to sort of check the value of their own views against the views of their colleagues in the same industry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I will read the answer. I should like to ask the minister, under the circumstances that this council will not be effective for a couple of months, and in view of the serious situation on the prairies as well as the spirit of desperation among many farmers, whether he will do something now to give these farmers an opportunity to have at least a hope that action will be taken, not two or three months hence but now.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I will read the questions. I was endeavouring to say that efforts are being made now. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture was yesterday and is today involved in consultations of that kind. When we were in Winnipeg the other day—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MAPLE SYRUP—REPORTED SURPLUS IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to offer my best birthday greetings to the Prime Minister. I have no questions to put to him for the time being, but I should like to put one to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin).

Has he started negotiating disposal of the Beauce maple syrup surplus of approximately one million pounds? Does the minister expect that it would be possible to sell that production?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether that question is particularly urgent but under the circumstances, it might be well to allow the minister to reply.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that no one had yet brought the matter to my attention, but now that I know, thanks to the good offices of the hon. member, I shall look into this and endeavour to give him a reply, either personally or in the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

asking this question of the minister when he is in the house?

Mr. MacLean: I have a supplementary question which perhaps may also be passed on to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the house and the country have been waiting for several weeks now for a clear statement of the government's position with regard to NATO, and such a statement has been promised both by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, can we now be given assurance that such a statement will be made without further delay on the return of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence to the house?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. MacLean: I should like to say further, Mr. Speaker, that since this statement has been promised by the Prime Minister on several occasions, he might like to make some reply.

Mr. Trudeau: As I have told the house, Mr. Speaker, the question of the review of our defence and external policy is under way. It is not envisaged that in the immediate future we will have any announcement to make. Once again, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be in the house next week, when the hon. member will be welcome to ask him any questions.

TRADE

BARLEY—REPORTED LOSS OF MARKETS IN FRANCE AND AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What action will the minister take in view of the almost complete loss of our traditional barley markets in France and Australia in the past six months, reportedly as a result of the rigid pricing policy of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I cannot declare war on France; that is one thing I cannot do.

An hon. Member: What about your prayers?

Mr. Pepin: The barley market is one in which competition exists. As I said yesterday in answer to a question, we are trying to help by every means available to improve the [Mr. Trudeau.]

position of the wheat board in that competitive race around the world for wheat and barley markets. I mentioned yesterday that one of the important marketing factors was credit terms, and we are trying to improve upon that as well.

FROZEN COD FISH-LOSS OF U.S. MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is in a way supplementary, and it is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, whose day this seems to be. Will the minister tell the house what trade initiatives either his department or the government are taking to offset the serious decline in the Unitd States market for Canadian fish, with the disastrous consequences this is having on the industry in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the importance of the question asked by the hon. member, but I suggest to him that perhaps what he would want the minister to do is to make a statement on motions rather than give a general statement on policy at this time.

Mr. McGrath: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, this is a very urgent question. The Fisheries Council of Canada will be meeting in Ottawa on Monday and this is a serious topic that the council will have under discussion. Perhaps the minister will give consideration to making a statement on the matter on motions on Monday.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire whether my hon. friend is referring to his favourite subject, which is Greenland halibut, or is he referring to fish in general?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to fresh frozen cod fish generally.

Mr. Pepin: In that case, the question being so wide, Mr. Speaker, I will take it as notice.

[Later:]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should address this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as a supplementary to the question asked by the member for St. John's East. With regard to the question concerning the frozen fresh fish market in the United States, can the minister give some assurance that this question will result in a statement on Monday prior to the meeting of the fisheries council?

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

Mr. Lundrigan: I did not catch the answer.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, I will give it a try.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—REPORTED DELAY IN OPENING OF NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to reiterate what has been said, but after the very generous words which were expressed by the Prime Minister one month ago today I am happy to tell him sincerely how glad I am that he is in such good health. May I also congratulate him on his birthday and affix thereto a question.

May I ask the Prime Minister whether he can now advise that the opening of the national arts centre has been postponed from its original date of opening, so that he will be in his fifty-second year before the centre is opened; and may I ask him whether the delay in this regard is due to the fact that it will be necessary to secure further supply in the 1968-69 year before the alterations that are now being made to that building can be completed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the question is urgent, but since this is the Prime Minister's birthday perhaps he should not be deprived of an opportunity to answer the question.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Thank you very much for your kind gift, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: On the question of the arts centre may I say I have had no news that the opening will be delayed, as the right hon. gentleman mentions. The Secretary of State is not in the house today, so I will call this question to his attention. The last I heard was that the opening would take place as scheduled and that there would be no difficulty.

May I also thank the right hon. gentleman for his good wishes. I am not an Indian chief or a long experienced and respected member of the house, but I am sensitive to the good wishes which have been addressed to me by the right hon. gentleman. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I do not mind when the gentlemen of this house call attention to my age, but I do hope the ladies will not notice it too much.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Is it not a fact that a few months ago when the Prime Minister visited the Stratford festival the same question was asked of him by various artists who were doubtful as to the reason for the postponement of the opening of the centre? Is it also not a fact that it was said, after an aide had left to get the information, that one of the reasons for the delay was that the necessary supply had not been voted?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps as the hon. Leader of the Opposition said a moment ago, my memory is failing. I have no recollection of this, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FLIGHTS TO MOSCOW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Salisman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the flying schedule of Air Canada to Moscow. Since both Air Canada and Pan Am now leave for Moscow less than two hours apart on the same evening, making it difficult for either air line to make the route pay, is Air Canada negotiating with Pan Am to bring some order to this senseless situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that question might be placed on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALCOHOLISM—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN STUDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall put a question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Can he tell us whether any division of his department is considering now or will consider in the near future the possible participation of the federal government, at the information level, in the serious problem of alcoholism in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the question of the hon. member could be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Later:]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Yesterday, he told us in a speech that the question of hallucinogens would be on the agenda of a future federal-provincial conference. Could he tell us whether alcoholism, which is becoming a national problem, will also be on the agenda.

I see that the minister is prepared to answer, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is not specifically on the agenda for discussion, although it may be introduced by interested parties from the provinces.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED REPLACEMENT OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell us if it is the government's intention to replace in the near future our Canadian ambassador in Paris and to appoint Mr. Leger to the position of Under-Secretary of State?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be prepared, next week, to make an announcement on this matter.

TRANSPORTATION

COMMITTEE HEARINGS TO ESTABLISH RAILWAY COSTING FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister intervene in the present hearings being held before the railway transport committee to establish a rail costing formula in order to lift the cloud of secrecy hiding railway costing figures, secrecy that is preventing the provinces from preparing a proper case for the railway transport committee hearing?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether I have any right to intervene, but I shall be glad to bring my hon. friend's representation to the attention of the president of the Canadian Transportation Commission.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has yet received the report of the Canadian Transportation Commission dealing with less than carload rates in Atlantic Canada. If so, when can action be taken thereon?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge I have not yet received this report.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give some indication to the people of the Atlantic provinces when we are to have some action from the minister's committee in the field of transportation? We are certainly fed up with the lack of action.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

COMMUNICATIONS

CANADIAN MISSION IN FRANCE RESPECTING SATELLITE RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether a delegation of federal officials is now in Paris trying to prevent an agreement in the field of communication satellites between the province of Quebec and France?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. The question, as the Prime Minister of France said concerning another subject, is perfidious.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us if a mission is now in Paris to discuss satellite communications between Canada and France?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can answer the question.

There is such a mission whose object is sim- referred to, and has he told them that the ply to contact people interested in communi- service is to be continued as it is today and cations, either in France, Belgium or in other European countries.

[English] [Later:]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, from one forty niner to another. Considering the great importance and possible implications of the discussions now in progress in Paris between the officials of France and Canada in respect of the telecommunications satellite, will the Prime Minister ask one of the ministers to make a statement on motions at an early date on this pretty important matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if a statement is made it will likely be made by the Postmaster General, who will be the minister responsible for communications. I will gladly discuss it with him.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISCUSSIONS WITH NEWSPAPER REPRE-SENTATIVES ON PROPOSED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Potsmaster General which arises out of a question I directed to the Prime Minister yesterday. I asked the Prime Minister whether the heads of certain daily and weekly newspapers have asked to meet him and discuss the questions of the cut off of service and the increase of rates. Yesterday morning the Prime Minister said those people had seen you. If they have contacted you, could you say what decision you have come to?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that questions ought to be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: I will address the question through you, sir. Have you seen the heads of these newspapers with regard to the matter I have just raised?

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the hon. member that I have not seen the people he has referred to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Postmaster General whether he has seen the policies of the department, but I would think heads of the daily and weekly newspapers I the normal place to do this, the place which

Inquiries of the Ministry

that there will be no increase in rates?

Hon. Eric Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I was beginning to feel a little neglected today. I met with the representatives of the Quebec daily newspapers association yesterday morning for about one hour and a half, and I think a summary of this meeting appeared in various newspapers today. Last evening I met for about one hour and three quarters with the president and general manager of the Canadian daily newspapers association, and I listened.

Mr. Woolliams: I am happy that the Postmaster General listened. Having listened, has he reached any conclusion with reference to the submissions presented to him during those interviews?

Mr. Kierans: I think the debate on this bill begins on Monday, and I hope the hon. member has enough patience to wait until then.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question.

About the motion to adjourn the business of the house which was introduced yesterday in his absence, can the minister tell us if he intends to reconsider the decision he made known to us in his letter of October 10 with regard to his intention to set new postal rates starting November 1, thus altering the franking privileges enjoyed by the members of the house and the Senate? Can he give us an answer today?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement on second reading and then we can discuss whether such a statement is justified.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): As the minister seems alarmed at the prospect of a parliamentary committee examing this question, would he have any objection to his officials appearing before a standing committee at the time their estimates are being considered, which could well be contemporaneous with the introduction of the bill?

Mr. Kierans: I have no objection to discuss-Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the ing this bill nor the principles underlying the Inquiries of the Ministry would give the opportunity for the fullest discussion, would be in committee of the whole.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister has had these long interviews and listened to these representations. Would he consent to these people appearing before the standing committee so they could air their views and in order that hon. members might be well informed and placed in a better position to discuss this unusual bill when it comes before the house?

Mr. Kierans: I have no doubt at all that the people who have made representations to me have also made representations to hon. members opposite, who are well aware of their nature.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Bearing in mind the vigorous press campaign against the proposed increase in second class rates, can the minister assure us that he intends to stand firm on this point and make the newspapers pay their way?

Mr. Kierans: I am glad to receive that expression of support from the hon. member opposite.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—COURT DECISION RESPECTING LEASED RESERVE LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In the absence of the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, the minister responsible for Indian affairs and the hon. member for Port Arthur, who is Minister without Portfolio, I should like to direct a question to any acting minister who may feel he has authority in the following urgent circumstances, and ask him whether the government has knowledge of an important decision by the supreme court of British Columbia that Indian reserve land surrendered for lease is no longer considered to be reserve land as such, and is lost to the Indian people. Is it intended to take any action to correct this injustice?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The three ministers mentioned by the hon. member are not scheduled to appear in the house today according to the roster, but I am sure they will be pleased to receive the question when they are here.

[Mr. Kierans.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF 12 MILE FISHERIES LIMIT TO ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In the light of an indication yesterday in a speech by the Minister of Fisheries that he was advocating an extension of the 12-mile fishing limit, may I ask how the right hon. gentleman reconciles this proposal with French sovereignty over the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question asked by the hon, member appears to be argumentative.

Mr. McGrath: But Your Honour, this speech was made yesterday at Boston by the Minister of Fisheries, and it concerned the 12-mile limit. Some doubt exists in the minds of Canadians, particularly on the east coast, as to whether the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon would be within the proposed new limit, and I would redirect my question to the Prime Minister and ask him how the government reconciles this new policy with French sovereignty over the islands mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to protest on a point of order. In 1964 the government of this country passed legislation establishing a 12-mile limit for Canada. This was done to preserve certain fishing areas including areas in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the bay of Fundy. At the present time our fishing industry on the east coast is going through a difficult period of readjustment. There is a shortage of fish, and implementation of this decision would help establish conservation areas for the fishermen of Canada. I would ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition.

FINANCE

REPORTED WARNING RESPECTING COST OF JOINT PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): The President of the Treasury Board is on the roster today and must not feel neglected. I wonder whether he is in a position to answer a question he has been asked previously, namely whether he has been in touch with the province of Ontario with a view to making public any communication from that province calling into question the accurancy of the federal estimates for the current year which were tabled last November, relating in particular to the federal share of the joint cost programs.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I have made inquiries and the answer as to whether there was a formal warning would have to be clarified. I hoped to be able to present a somewhat lengthy statement outlining all the facts but was unable to agree on a procedure for doing this. As the estimates of the Treasury Board are to be called this afternoon, perhaps this will provide a suitable occasion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But it is health and welfare today.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY-REPRESENTATIONS FROM N.B. PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncion): My question is for the Prime Minister; it is prompted by the information that Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island and his cabinet are coming to Ottawa to press for the construction of the Northumberland strait causeway. Can the Prime Minister advise us whether he is receiving representations from Premier Robichaud in connection with this important project?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The hon, member asks whether representations have been received, definitive opinion was being sought in respect and I suggest that in those terms the question of federal jurisdiction in the Roberts Bank is not in order.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON ASSISTANCE TO MÉTIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to say whether the government has any plan to confer with the provinces in respect of the setting up of joint financial assistance in the field of Métis housing?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): This question is under study. As my hon. friend is aware we already have an arrangement with the province of Saskatchewan. One is under review at the moment with the province of Manitoba. This is a problem which is being given active consideration, and plans are moving forward.

Mr. Simpson: Can the minister say how long he believes it will be before the plan is finalized so some action may be taken?

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot say, but I shall be glad to inquire and let my hon. friend know.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

RHODESIA—SUGGESTED GUARANTEE OF AFRICAN RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada has been approached to join with Australia, Britain and Rhodesia in a four-nation treaty with the object of guaranteeing African rights in Rhodesia, and whether Canada would react fabourably to such a proposal.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know of no such representation. I would have to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.-LEGAL OPINION RESPECTING FEDERAL JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, some little time ago I asked the Minister of Transport whether a affair. Is he now in a position to say whether that decision has been given, what it is, and what action may be expected?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): We have asked for such an opinion from the legal officers of the crown, but it has not as yet been received.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Minister of Transport say whether the chairman of the National Harbours Board was stating the minister's policy and that of the government when he Inquiries of the Ministry said the federal government cannot provide any major developments to handle containers and unit trains at any particular port until the shipping companies make a decision concerning which port they wish to designate for international container traffic?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister may wish to answer the question, but it is not quite within the rules. It is in order to ask whether statements made by ministers outside the house are in accord with government policy, but it is not in order to ask whether statements made by officials are in accord with government policy. In any event I might allow the minister to answer the question.

Mr. Stanfield: The justification for the question is its extreme urgency.

Mr. Hellyer: I have not seen the statement by the chairman of the National Harbours Board to which my hon. friend refers. I would not like to make any comment until I have seen it. There certainly is a relationship between the provision of facilities and the demand for their use.

Mr. Stanfield: Has the minister or the government given any undertakings to any of the shipping conferences or any foreign shippers which would ensure their confidence in Canada's ability and intention to meet the requirements of international container traffic?

Mr. Hellyer: In general I would say we would assure all shippers that we will make an effort to provide the facilities necessary to facilitate the movement of goods in the most economical manner. If my hon, friend has a more specific case in mind I would be glad to look into it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ORGANIZATION OF TRANSPORT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister of Transport is still here, and on the days when he will not be here next week, will he use his good offices to discuss with the acting house leader the organization of the committee on transport and communications, which committee could define many of the problems about which he has been asked?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I am sure we will have the full co-operation of the house leader in this connection.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

SHIPPING

CHURCHILL—INQUIRY INTO EXTENSION OF SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Transport now in a position to indicate whether the study of which he spoke on December 13 with regard to extension of the season at Churchill is now available and will be made public?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I would have to take that question as notice. I am not sure whether it falls into the category of public documents.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES— REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's long, strong personal record of support for increases in the pensions of retired civil servants, can he say whether this matter is actually under consideration by the government of which he is now a member?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to a similar question a very short time ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since the answer was that the matter is under consideration, will there be an anouncement about this matter at an early date?

Mr. Benson: Probably in due course.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. May I join with others in wishing him happy birthday. In view of the absence all this week of the Minister of Defence Production would the Prime Minister give the people and the employees of Fairey Aviation in Canada some assurance that this company will not go down the drain before the minister gets back to work?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The house again in committee of supply, revised estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969. Vote 1 will be found at page 340 of the blue book. The details thereof are listed at page 343.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

1. Departmental administration including recoverable expenditures on behalf of the Canada Pension Plan, and $500,000 for health grants and welfare grants, under terms and conditions approved by the Treasury Board for research and demonstration activities in the field of mental retardation, $4,466,000.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman and members of the house, this parliament and its predecessors have charged the Department of National Health and Welfare with responsibility for promoting, preserving and improving the health, social security and social welfare of all Canadians. The five years that ended in 1967 saw the introduction of new, major programs such as the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, medicare, the health resources fund, the guaranteed income supplement and youth allowances.

These estimates for the fiscal year 1968-69 which are now before the committee do not contain additional moneys for new programs, other than the first fragments under medicare, but rather additional moneys for the improvement and extension of current programs. At $3.2 billion they are 26.3 per cent of the comparable federal government expenditures forecast for this same year, a true indication of the emphasis which this government places on programs designed to improve the health and well-being of the Canadian people.

This $3.2 billion has three major components: $1.6 billion for forecast expenditures from the non-budgetary old age security fund; $1.5 billion for budgeted statutory items, and $133 million to be voted by parliament. These show an increase of $403.2 million of 14 per cent over 1967-68. By major component they are: a $149 million or 10 per cent increase in payments from the old age security fund; a $253.8 million or 20 per cent increase in budgeted statutory items, and a $1.4 million or 1 per cent increase in voted items.

Supply-National Health and Welfare

The $149 million increase in payments from the old age security fund reflects the lowering of the eligibility age to 67 on January 1, 1968 and to 66 on January 1, 1969.

The $253.8 million increase in budgeted statutory items includes: a $136.4 million increase in hospital insurance reflecting an increase in both outpatient and inpatient rates as well as a net increase in population; a $91.9 million increase for the Canada Assistance Plan which is due to a greater utilization of the plan by the provinces for such items as increased costs of institutional care for both adults and children, improvement in child welfare programs and increases in foster home payments for children. It also includes an extension of health services for persons in need, plus improvements in the level of benefits.

There is also a $35 million increase to provide the federal share of costs under medicare; a $7.5 million increase in funds required by the provinces from the health resources fund; a $2.2 million increase in payments under the youth allowances program which reflect both the effect of high birth rates in the early 1950's and the fact that a large proportion of youths are continuing their education beyond age 16; an $11.2 million decrease in old age assistance reflecting the reduction in the eligibility age for payments from the old age security fund; and a $9.8 million decrease in blind persons and disabled persons allowances reflecting the transfer of payments under these categorical programs to the Canada Assistance Act.

The $1.4 million increase in voted items includes: a $1.8 million increase in the cost of operating the medical services program which reflects a general increase in most activities of the program; a $1.4 million increase in the cost of providing food and drug services which reflects a further strengthening of the inspection and enforcement activities basic to its program; a $1.5 million increase in family assistance payments reflecting a forecast increase in the number of immigrant children not eligible under the family allowance programs; a $1 million decrease in the health services program reflecting mainly the phasing out of further additions to the emergency health services medical stockpiling program, and a $2 million decrease in the hospital construction grants program reflecting a lowering of payments against construction in the year. I would point out that while the forecast payments Supply—National Health and Welfare have decreased, the funds required for commitment to projects has increased by $4 million.

In the foregoing analysis I have attempted to highlight significant changes in the department's proposed expenditures for 1968-69. I stated at the outset that these estimates did not contain additional moneys for new programs but rather additional moneys for the improvement and extension of current programs. Examples of this are to be found in the Canada Assistance Plan, where agreements have been entered into with all provinces under part 1 of the plan the part which covers assistance and welfare services for the general public. Negotiations have also been carried on with the Yukon and Northwest territories to enter into such agreements. Provision is made under part 2 of the plan for the federal-provincial agreement to cover the extension of the provincial assistance and welfare services program to Indians living on reservations, crown lands or unorganized territory. Active negotiations have been carried out on this matter with all the provinces. Although no agreements have yet been signed, the final stages of including an agreement under part 2 of the plan with the province of Ontario are at present under way.

Provision is made under part 3 of this act for contributions toward work activity projects that are designed to benefit persons who have unusual difficulty in obtaining or holding employment or participating in training or rehabilitation programs. Considerable discussions have been held with the provinces and to date six have signed agreements under part 3. Another example of improvement and extension of existing programs that falls under the Canada Pension Plan is the payment of survivors' benefits which started for the first time in February of this year. Payment of disability pensions is scheduled to come into effect early in 1970 and all planning in the area of survivors' benefits has been carried out jointly with the Quebec Pension Plan. Further planning and organization in relation to the administration of disability pensions will proceed on schedule in order that the payment of these pensions may be made, in accordance with the act, in 1970. One last example, Mr. Chairman, is the Indian health activity of medical services. Members of this committee are aware, from previous statements in the house, that the resources required for Indian health will be provided.

• (12 noon)

There are many other areas of the department's operations where improvement or extension of services is being actively pursued. Rather than continuing at length on each, I cite these three examples and leave it to individual members of the committee to pursue, as I am sure they will, those programs which hold special interest for them.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question. Before we begin an examination of the estimates of the minister's department, can he tell us whether any really serious consideration has been given to financial priorities in respect of the programs which come under his department, and in particular to increasing the old age pensions of those people across the nation who are in dire need? I believe this is one of the most important things facing the government today.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member is well aware of all the measures we have taken during the last two or three years to improve the situation of these people. We have increased the old age pension, and we have tied it to the cost of living index. There is the guaranteed income supplement under which we have provided an additional $30 to those people who can show they do not have an adequate income, bringing the total pension up to $105. When the increase based on the cost of living is counted it is higher than that. I think we have moved forward very strongly in this area in order to help these people, but for the forthcoming year this is not one of our priorities.

Mr. Woolliams: I thank the minister for his frankness.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to congratulate the minister upon his appointment and say to him that he has a department that spends a tremendous amount of money. I believe the spending by his department is next to that of the defence department. The Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for many growing, open-end programs. I realize that costs tend to increase when carrying out such programs.

The cost of the medical insurance plan operating in the province of Ontario is increasing at the rate of $2 million per week, or an increase of $1 a month for every man, woman and child in the province. This gives us all a great deal of cause for concern. Where does it stop? When do we reach the point of being unable to provide these services? Somewhere along the line will the government have to say that they have to put off essential services or have to put off a program with top priority, such as education in our medical schools and universities?

I believe my own profession should take a look into the future. When I say this I am fully aware of the tremendous advances that have been made in research by doctors. Their long and patient hours of tedious work have benefited mankind beyond anything I can say. This has been a tremendous century of medical progress. Prior to 1900 comfort, solace and the strengthening of the patient's will and determination to get well was the big asset of a doctor. I believe it was Osler, the great teacher, who cited the case of the footman who cured his pneumonia in a stable without medical care. That was around 1900.

We did have vaccination prior to this century, and today we have an armament of vaccines, toxoids and injectables to prevent and cure disease. We also have antibiotics for curing diseases, thus saving millions of dollars to the economy. I do not know whether anybody has estimated the actual amount saved because of these wonder drugs. A great many people have been restored to health and returned to work because of them. Millions of people who are living, working and contributing to the economy would not be alive without the medical discoveries of this century.

We are now in the era of organ transplants. This is comparable to placing a man on the moon, and it is tremendously expensive. Osler, to whom I have already referred, used to say that pneumonia was the old person's friend; it was a blessing in disguise because in a few days the suffering from all life's ailments was over. Today antibiotics, diuretics and oxygen are given, and soon the patient is better. The point is that today millions of people are living who a few years ago would have passed on. Today these people are with us, some of them living an enjoyable life and some even working. Some require further chronic care.

I have noted that in 1967-68 the estimate for hospitalization and diagnostic services was $423 million. That is to be found at page 355 of the revised estimates. For 1968-69 the estimate is $560 million, an increase of $71 million. I also noted that in the budget white paper the figure for 1968 is $468 million and for 1967, $397 million. An increase of $71 million represents just under 20 per cent.

This is a shared program with the provinces, and taking the budget paper figures this means in effect an increase to the federal government of approximately $87 million, to the provinces another $87 million, and to the public who pay about one-third, another $87 million. It is an increase, as I have said before, of about 18 per cent. The likelihood is—and this is something one should keep in mind—that this amount will increase faster than our gross national product. Over the years we have seen the figure increase by 15 per cent and 16 per cent; yet governments continue to estimate the increase at 7 per cent. To my mind this is completely unrealistic.

The point I am making is that the older we get, the more hospital beds we use and the more physician's care we need. This increases the cost of medicare. As a matter of fact, after the age of 35 the rate of illness starts to climb. From one year to 35 years the most common cause of death is by accidental means. Prior to the advent of scientific discoveries in this era there were far more deaths by illness from the age of one year to 35 years because of motor car accidents, motorcycle accidents, drownings, and so forth. Today these accidents kill over 5,000 people a year in Canada and mean that one hospital bed in ten is occupied by an accident victim.

This is a real challenge to all of us because we should be able to cut down the accident rate. If we can do this, many more beds will be available in our hospitals. Every effort must be made by the government to cut down the accident rate. Action must be taken by the federal, provincial and municipal governments to solve this problem. As I have already said, from age 35 on illness and medical care increase. By the age of 50 one person in ten has some cardiovascular disease, and cancer takes a frightening toll.

The one way in which we can reduce the requirement for hospital beds is by preventing accidents. This means that more research is necessary to find the causes of accidents and prevent them. The present government is niggardly in its financial assistance for research, and only one-tenth of what is spent in the United States for this purpose is spent in Canada. This also means that our bright young graduates who wish to go into research do not have the job opportunities in Canada, so they simply go across the border. This is the most penny wise and pound foolish policy

Supply—National Health and Welfare we could devise. In my own profession of medicine it costs $50,000 for each young graduate to go through medical school, to say nothing of what it costs to raise them to the age at which they are ready to go to medical school.

Hospital and diagnostic services schemes are a decade old and their cost is rapidly increasing. I am sure the minister is as concerned about this as I am.

Another thing which concerns me greatly is the sharp difference in costs among the provinces. I wonder what the reason for this is. The daily cost per bed in Quebec is $47.53 while in Saskatchewan the cost is $42. In large metropolitan hospitals the daily cost per bed is $69 in Quebec and $48 in Ontario. There is probably some explanation for this divergence but I would like to know the reason for it. In 1965 physicians' services cost $545 million, while in 1968 they were estimated at over $800 million, an increase in the three years of nearly 50 per cent. Fee schedules did not increase that much, but there was a sharp increase in referrals, X-rays and diagnostic tests. The immediate question which comes to one's mind is whether this is not partly due to new equipment, to the fact that we are making diagnoses which we were not able to make before and are utilizing new equipment to a larger extent in this scientific age.

The question arises whether or not there is overutilization of services. This opinion has been voiced. This is something that the Minister of National Health and Welfare should take up with the provinces and discuss with the ministers of health in every province to find out whether the increase in costs is wholly due to the scientific upsurge or whether there is an overutilization of medical services. It has been stated by a previous minister of national health and welfare that the incomes of doctors could go up by as much as 20 per cent as there would be no bad accounts. I think it was Mr. Douglas, the former member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in the last parliament, whom we all miss here-

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He will be back.

Mr. Rynard: —and who was first to bring in hospitalization and diagnostic services in any province, who stated that in Saskatchewan utilization went up by 25.5 per cent. It appears to me that with the advent of medicare there will be an increase all across the country and I wonder how well prepared we are for it.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Do we not have too many open-end programs whereby large amounts of money are spent as a result of which we will have to cut down on research or other programs which are not so noticeable? This will result in great harm being done to medical training and scientific research. We must give much thought to this matter because I am sure everyone in this house realizes that there is only so much money to be spent, and there comes a point beyond which people cannot be taxed.

Let me come back to what I said before, that doctors must take a close look at this whole matter and give serious thought to the future. This also applies to hospital administrators, hospital boards and, above all, governments which will be taxing the public. If these open-end programs cost too much, some essential services may well suffer as a result. We do not want to find ourselves in a situation where the government will lay down the rules and stifle incentive. Therefore I suggest that every avenue should be examined, including hospital costs, hospital administration and hospital construction.

I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare realizes that in 1958 the Conservative government doubled the grant per bed for hospital construction. I think it is a shame that with all the growth in our gross national product the figure is still $2,000. I say it is time to wake up. The minister should take a close look at the costs of hospital construction together with the health ministers of the provinces and the municipalities where the hospitals are being built. The cost is several times what it was ten years ago.

Most probably we will not be able to make any significant cut-backs with regard to active treatment beds. However, I also believe that when a patient reaches a certain point in his convalescence he could be transferred to another part of the hospital which is not equipped with all the new scientific apparatus and could be cared for there for half the cost. A few weeks ago I was south of the border and I visited some hospitals and saw there motels where patients were transferred after recovering sufficiently following an illness or surgery. This is cheaper than keeping them in hospitals. These motels are staffed by nurses aides, which also cuts down on the cost. I am sure this could be considered here.

Another matter which has concerned me is why the federal government has not given more grants in the field of mental health. I do not think there is one province which has been given assistance in the capital construction of mental hospitals. Yet we find that 50 per cent of all hospital beds in Canada are occupied by mental patients. The very fact that medicine has moved into the ultrascientific field makes the equipment for first class care particularly expensive. No one denies this and I believe everyone agrees that it is absolutely essential to save lives, to restore health and to bring back individuals to a state where they can carry on normal lives and participate in the economy of the country. Therefore we must not skimp on the money that is spent on scientific equipment. In our free enterprise system we have been able to develop one of the best types of medicare programs anywhere in the world.

To revert to the matter of hospital construction, let me say again that patients recovering from an illness could be treated in a much cheaper way than is the case now. This is where some savings could be made. Another way is to prevent illnesses and accidents. As I have said, it is regrettable that one out of every ten people who reach the age of 50 suffers from a cardiovascular disease. Such diseases start about age 35 just when the accident rate goes down. The graph for these diseases climbs higher and higher the older a person becomes. These are the areas we have to tackle, the places where we have to prevent diseases and prevent accidents. In this way we can cut costs.

• (12:20 p.m.)

I believe that in my own province hospitals are continuing to be built. If I recall correctly the province has spent most, if not all, of its grant from the federal government. In other words, the provincial government is left in the position of carrying the cost of hospital construction. If I am wrong in this statement I stand to be corrected. However, I believe I am correct. The same situation applies to the health resources fund in my province. I am not speaking for other provinces because I do not know their situation as well. However, the province of Ontario has used up and is using up the health resources funds faster than they are being received. The province is going to be seriously short of funds. In my opinion the health resources fund is essential, and the grants should be increased, not reduced.

We in this parliament are introducing medicare but we are failing to provide the doctors to give the people the service they Supply—National Health and Welfare need. This is hypocrisy; it is not fair or honest.

To recapitulate, I should like the minister to tell us how much the federal government has given to the province of Ontario under the health resources program. Have they given as much as the province has requested or could spend? These are the things I should like to know. Probably the same situation applies in other provinces. I should like to know also whether the federal government will take a more active role in operating some of these facilities. I want to say that health manpower needs and education are not provincial problems; they are federal problems. A man may live in Ontario and may go to British Columbia but he is the same man with the same education, and the same health manpower considerations apply.

There is another thing that bothers me. Yesterday the minister made a statement on marijuana. The minister lives in Ontario, not very far from Toronto, and probably knows as well as I do that they are building an alcoholic and drug addiction hospital there. However, Ontario is not getting one nickel from the federal government toward the cost of construction of this hospital, which will amount to about $10 million. It is going to cost almost another $2 million to operate it.

These are the things that are causing me grave concern. According to a reply to a question asked by the hon, member for Surrey, the federal government makes a grant of $15,000 annually to the Canadian Foundation on Alcoholism. However, the federal government also receives in tax revenue from alcohol the sum of $296 million. This figure can be found on page 1201 of Hansard. When the federal government is making this amount of money from alcohol, why can it not share the cost of the program covering alcoholism and drug addiction? This problem crosses provincial borders. It is nonsense to say it is a provincial matter. If a man is an alcoholic in Ontario he will be an alcoholic in Manitoba. If he is a drug user in Ontario, he will be a drug user in British Columbia. It is ridiculous for the federal government to hide behind that screen.

This problem is not to be treated lightly because I believe the number of alcoholics in the Dominion of Canada is somewhere around 3 per cent of the adult population or about 300,000 people. In addition, there are many drug addicts, but I do not have the figures for them. I am wondering, too, what the minister is doing about the cigarette problem. Has the Supply—National Health and Welfare minister set an example by quitting smoking? I believe the two previous ministers did, so I am wondering whether he has. If he has, I congratulate him upon setting an example.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And if he has not?

Mr. Rynard: I will leave that to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The point is, what results has the government achieved from its anti-smoking campaign? I am indebted to the hon. member for Surrey for asking a question on this problem because the information relating to it can be found on page 1201 of Hansard. I find that the tax revenue the federal government receives from tobacco amounts to $461 million. However, the government spent only $2,000 on a program aimed at the reduction of cigarette smoking.

Mr. Munro: No, no.

Mr. Rynard: I mean $200,000. That information is given on page 1201 of Hansard if the minister wants to turn it up. I do not believe the government has taken this problem seriously enough. It is admitted that the chances of a cigarette smoker contracting lung cancer are five to one vis-à-vis the non-smoker. Here is an excellent opportunity for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to have his name blazened across the country for cutting down the number of deaths from lung cancer. Have you ever seen a lung removed, Mr. Chairman? I have seen too many of them. The minister knows as well as I do, because he is intelligent and studies statistics, that coronary arterial diseases and cardiovascular diseases are also affected by the use of cigarettes. Here is an excellent chance for the minister to cut down on the number of beds that will be utilized for cases of lung cancer. Hundreds of dollars are spent on tests on these patients, not to mention the suffering the disease causes.

I want to ask the minister what he did with the film which was allowed to come into Canada recently and was viewed by the cancer society. Is that film going to be shown across Canada? Is he going to bring it to the House of Commons and show it here? I should like him to tell us what he proposes to do about it because the subject of the film asked to have it made in view of the fact he had not taken the advice of his doctors to quit smoking. I believe he left a wife and six children. This is one of the most emotional films that one could view and I think would be well worth showing to members of parliament, doctors and others across the country in any educational program.

I should like to ask the minister by how much cigarette smoking has decreased as a result of his program. If the results are not good, perhaps the program should be revamped. The minister has been asked question after question about this subject, and sometimes he has probably wanted to answer but has not taken the opportunity. This happens to other ministers as well so I do not blame him. Nevertheless we should like to hear him tell us how his program is proceeding. Many members of the house are vitally interested in health care and in the prevention of disease.

I want to say a few words about the Canada Pension Plan. I received a very interesting letter, a copy of which I suppose all members received, from a lady living in western Ontario and it illustrated quite a paradox. This lady's husband died when he was about 40 years of age from a coronary, leaving a couple of children. When this lady's assets were totalled her Canada pension was taken into account for succession duty purposes and she was also called upon to pay income tax every month on it. I should like to know why in the world this is so. This is double taxation. I would ask the minister to explain it.

We must also remember that there are many people who cannot help themselves, for example, the old age pensioners. Why do these people have to live in poverty? They are the citizens who built this country; yet they are kept in poverty. I wonder how well the minister or I would live on $108.50 a month. Many of these people are beyond the age of helping themselves, and such a situation is not fair or right.

I understand that the minister is going to speak on the new drug bill, which is all to the good. We shall appreciate hearing from him. However, I am wondering why the old age pensioners and others who are subsidized by the provinces as to medicare do not have part or all of their drug bills paid for them. I have already stated that care increases as one gets older. So does medication. Medication to a man under 50 ordinarily is not a problem but many old age pensioners do require to purchase drugs.

Why cannot the minister consider purchasing drugs in bulk, as do some hospitals in Canada? Perhaps there are insufficient old age pensioners' votes—about one million of them-or perhaps it is easier to deal with more pressing problems than with the problems of our elderly people. However, I do feel keenly about this matter and I do not apologize for raising it. I suggest that many people who are on the supplement should be provided with free drugs. It is just as vital to keep them out of hospital through the use of lifesaving drugs as to pay for their care in hospital. Perhaps their being kept in hospital is why hospitalization costs are on the increase. Sometimes patients have nothing but their old age pension.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon, member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: I thank the committee very much; I will take only a minute or two longer. As I was saying, many of these elderly people require antibiotics, cardiovascular drugs in general, and so on. These drugs are expensive and have to be taken day in and day out.

The minister is a nice fellow and is, I believe sympathetic to this problem. I am wondering whether in some way the cost of drugs might be shared with the provinces so that drugs could be made available to such people. The minister comes from my home province and knows that 28 per cent of the people in Ontario either have their medicare paid by OMSIP or have the cost supplemented. If my figures are wrong I stand to be corrected, but I believe they are correct.

power in the drug field. I realize the federal government would have to join with the province in such an undertaking, but when the minister meets the ministers of health from the various provinces perhaps he will raise this point. If such a scheme should eventuate, life for our old age pensioners and other pensioners who are on the borderline of poverty would be made much easier.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the hon. member for Simcoe North in extending my both in and out of parliament, is contained in congratulations to the Minister of National the announcement that all of our programs Health and Welfare on his appointment. He are being critically examined, that they are knows that I regard this department as one of the most important in the government; and I am also sure he is aware of both the responsibility and the privilege that it is to preside over the department. I enjoyed very much his reference in one of his first speeches after becoming minister to the fact that on the first occasion after his appointment when he went back to the office at night to work apparently the nightwatchman would not let him into the building. I suppose that the nightwatchman thought he looked like a suspicious agitator.

I mention that, Mr. Chairman, to express the hope that he is. As I recall, during the past six years that the hon. member has been in this house he has been a member of several of the cliques and groups who have done their best to get the Liberal party to move a little faster than its traditional snail's pace. In particular, I recall that he was one of the activists who believed that medicare should have been brought in by July 1, 1967, rather than 1968. Even though he has now become an Honourable with a capital "H" and has the prestige of being in the cabinet, I hope he will still be an agitator for further progress in this very important field.

While I am in indulging in these niceties, which I express warmly and sincerely, I should like once again to tell the minister what a privilege it is for him to preside over a department that has so many competent and dedicated people working for him. I know that some of those people are present in the gallery and listening to what I say but, apart from that, all through the department there are devoted and dedicated servants who have played a very important role in developing the programs that have made this department the important one it is in the life of this country.

I have already made a reference that will Such a scheme, would mean bigger buying let the minister know that somehow or other I do find time to read some of his speeches. I cannot read them all. There are only 24 hours in the day and I do not know how he produces so many of them. They are so good that I suspect some speech writing assistants in his department who assisted previous ministers have been kept on, and I am glad.

• (12:40 p.m.)

A note that comes out in some of his speeches that concerns me, and it has been expressed by the Prime Minister and others Supply-National Health and Welfare up for evaulation or for possible alteration or even discontinuance, if they do not serve the needs of our day and age as they ought to. I hope, in expressing that kind of concern, I do not sound like a Conservative. God forbid.

I agree that we must have improvements in all our programs. We have not yet heard the last word in social welfare programs or in plans which are for the benefit and welfare of all our people. The thing that concerns me about the minister's approach to our programs is, so it seems to me, his readiness to say that the programs are not what they ought to be, his readiness to consider discarding them, particularly those programs which are jointly financed, because they cost too much money, but his failure to give any indication of what is to be put in their place.

One of the most interesting speeches the minister made, and I suppose he retained his best writers for it, was the one he delivered in Hamilton on October 9 before the Hamilton Chamber of Commerce town meeting. I was so interested that I read it all the way through. I stuck with it because on the opening page or two I was given the impression that this re-evaluation of programs was the minister's concern and, therefore, that if I looked I might find some answer to my ques-What tion: do you mean by re-evaluation?

I went through the speech and found it dealt colourfully and interestingly with the generation gaps, and I used the plural, that are part of today's society. I found some excellent sentences in the speech. In particular I liked the reference to the fact that in this society we still think sex is obscene but violence is not. The other day the Postmaster General became concerned about certain pornographic literature going through the mails. I wish we were equally concerned about war materials going from this country to the United States and on to Viet Nam. Though I enjoyed reading the speech the answers were not in it. There is no suggestion in it of what is to be put in place of the programs that we now have.

I submit to the minister that unless he has some ideas to bring forward he should not frighten the daylights out of us by delivering such speeches. When the Prime Minister stands up and says, "We will discuss these things at federal-provincial conferences; we have gone far enough in universal programs like medicare," and when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance say, "We must begin to save money and balance the budget"—and these remarks come from people who call themselves Liberals—you cannot blame us for wondering whether pension programs will be cut back, the Canada Assistance program will not be proceeded with as we thought it would be, and medicare is again to be questioned. The other day the Prime Minister said that the question of whether medicare should be extended could be discussed.

When we hear such words from the minister they do not sound as if they came from that suspicious looking agitator who came to work here the other day. I do not want this minister to be a striped pants minister of the crown who just administers. I want him to show some concern for moving ahead. I want him to be concerned about the things he expressed and was well known for when he was a private member around this place.

I was pleased to note that in his speech the minister referred to gaps we must still fill. It is obvious that he read the report of the economic council on poverty. Let me quote one or two sentences from his speech that I think are particularly good. On page 2 he says:

Only a multi-faceted, flexible approach will meet the needs of poverty among farmers in eastern Quebec and unemployed in downtown Toronto, of the deserted mother and children in Vancouver and the fisherman in Newfoundland.

That is good. We must be up to date. We must span the generation gaps that trouble our society. We must realize that some of the things happening in the United States could happen to us. The minister says we must be up to date, I know, but up to date in what way? He gives no answer in his speech. He only succeeded in scaring some of us with the thought that this government would cut down on its welfare programs because of the reactionary cry that is heard that the budget must be balanced inasmuch as some are afraid we are spending too much in these areas.

Mr. Francis: Will the hon. member permit a question? I have listened with interest to the hon. member's remarks and he knows I have a high regard for him. When he says he is scared about something, is there any particular item in the estimates before this committee that gives him this concern?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, it is what is not in the estimates that concerns me. The minister stands up, this young, suspicious looking agitator, and says,

"At this point we have no new programs in the field. We are proud of what we have done but we have nothing new."

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is like Alice in Wonderland. You must keep running as fast as you can to stay where you are. If we are not to branch out into new areas, bearing in mind what is happening to our cost of living and our standard of living, we shall arrive at a position where our people will not benefit adequately from our social welfare programs because they will be deteriorating. Above all I am concerned about the minister's smugness and his satisfaction that all is well and that we can stay where we are.

Mr. Francis: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Ottawa West shakes his head. He used to be among those in the department I was complimenting a few minutes ago. Perhaps that is where he ought to be instead of in this place where he tells us everything is well and good.

Every time the topic of improving our welfare programs arises my hon. friend from Simcoe North takes the opportunity to talk about the cost of medicare programs and other, various open-end programs. When we argue that pensions ought to be increased—as a matter of fact, a week or so ago I presented a motion that had to do with raising the old age pension to $125 a month—the hon. member and others like him say we cannot afford to do so because we must balance the budget.

This is not the time to make a budget speech, but I should like to take this opportunity to comment briefly about some of the things the hon, member for Simcoe North talked about. Some day we must realize that in the kind of society we have in North America it is false and fictitious to draw a line between public and private funds. People complain bitterly when they read in the Auditor General's report that there has been waste and extravagance of the taxpayers' money. It is very popular to say we must not waste the taxpayers' money, and I agree, but we have the kind of society that pays $100,000 a year to some of our hockey players. That is not public money but private money; all the same it is part of the money which our society generates.

Considering the astronomical amounts we spend on liquor, tobacco, automobiles, and so on, I make no apology for pleading that we should spend all we have to spend on the health of our people, all we have to spend on Supply—National Health and Welfare their welfare and on the opportunity to give them a decent life. I plead with the minister again to be that suspicious looking agitator he was that first night he went back to work.

• (12:50 p.m.)

All of us face limited time in the discussion of the estimates, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friends and I have divided up the subjects to be considered and in order that hon. members may know the program, there will be other speeches. One of my hon. friends will deal with hallucinogenics, another with liquor and tobacco, another with Indian health, another with the medical field and another with various pension matters, provided there is time for all these speeches to be made.

For my part, I want to ask the minister to address himself to one of the gaps in our pension and welfare system. It is not a gap which he himself has pinpointed but he has admitted that there are gaps, and I would ask him to attend to this one. He and other hon. members who are here have heard me times without number plead the case of retired civil servants. I tried again this morning to get some kind of hopeful answer from the Minister of Finance who in the last parliament said publicly and privately many times that he was all in favour of something being done.

I am not now zeroing in on that group alone. I would make the point to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that one of the most important things we have to cope with is the need to escalate pensions generally after they have been put in pay. This applies to retired members of the civil service, retired members of the armed forces, retired members of the R.C.M.P., retired employees of the C.N.R. It also applies to people receiving old age security pensions and to those receiving pensions from private companies and corporations. One might ask: was not this problem always present? The answer is: no, not to the extent that it is today. A number of things have happened. For one thing, far more people are receiving pensions. In the second place, thanks to medical science and the support it has received form the state, longevity has been increasing. I have one reasonably reliable document here which suggests that the average retired person has about 15 years to live. Some, of course, are living a good deal longer than that. In our type of economy a person just cannot live for 15 years on a fixed income pension even if his income is fairly good at the point of retirement.

Supply-National Health and Welfare

Many senior civil servants who have held responsible positions with the Government of Canada are today experiencing a poverty of life, if not actual poverty as far as bread and butter and lodging are concerned. An average life after retirement of 15 years means 20 or 25 years in some cases. I had a talk the other day with a schoolteacher who had just retired at the age of 60 on what appeared to be a reasonable pension. I said to him: "You are in good health. How do you think you will be able to live 30 years from now on that pension?" The question threw him.

This problem is a very real one. The federal government has given it a little attentiona very little; provision has been made for a cost of living increase on an automatic basis under the Canada Pension Plan. But this only amounts to 2 per cent per year, no matter how much the cost of living goes up. I believe that the minister and all others responsible ought not to settle merely for pensions which keep up with the cost of living. After all, we do not ask society generally to do this. We do not want our children or our grandchildren merely to have enough extra money to keep up with the cost of goods and services we presently enjoy.

We live in a society in which there is material progress. We expect our children and those who come after us to enjoy a better life because society is capable of producing more and better things and services. Then why, in the name of heaven, is there this notion that in the case of retired people there is a point at which they cease to share in the rising standard of living, the increased abundance we are producing? Unless we do something about this situation the whole spectrum of pensions is in danger. The minister spoke about our programs being inadequate. What he said in this respect may turn out to be more true than he thought was the case. Our whole pension program could become a farce if inflation, a rising cost of living and rising standards are such that decade after decade we find a whole section of our population condemned to a life in which there is no chance for improvement, no chance for advancement, no chance to share enjoyment of all the goods and services our society can make or produce.

I do not need to press the point that I have argued the case of retired civil servants for the last 25 years because I believe they have a sound claim on the government as an

of the joint committee made on May 8, 1967, also recommended that increases be granted. I have pressed that case on its own merit, but-and there is no secret about this-I want it to be done in order that we might get this principle accepted. The minister should not try to tell us that the principle has been accepted in any real way already because of the 2 per cent automatic increase built in the old age security pension, an arrangement under which it would take ten years to get a $15 increase in a $75 pension. Meanwhile there are increases taking place in both the cost of living and in the standard of living, and this is the area in which we ought to be doing something.

I have a few more words I want to say on this subject and perhaps I can do so after we come back at 2.30. This is the area in the pension field which really deserves the minister's interest and endeavour. I should like him to go out to his office and not merely look like a suspicious agitator but be one.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, when the committee was interrupted at one o'clock I had just about used the time allotted to me. There are just one or two more things I should like to say. One is simply a matter of emphasizing the main point I was attempting to get across to the minister. I stress that a major subject for research and action on the part of his department should be with regard to the question of what happens to the pensions of people who live for a period of 15 or 20 years on retirement and try to get by on a fixed income. I hope I made the argument when I was speaking before the luncheon recess.

Perhaps I might draw attention to a document that came to my desk a few days ago which emphasizes the point I am making. I refer to the Mercer Actuarial Bulletin which I am sure is familiar to all of us who are interested in this field. William M. Mercer Limited is, of course, in the business of pensions. It is not a social welfare organization. It looks at the whole problem from a very employer and because their needs are such practical standpoint. This bulletin dated Septhat this claim should be met. And it has tember, 1968, deals with the adequacy of penbeen established that my voice is not just a sions. Initially it deals with the question of voice in the wilderness; a unanimous report what should be the level of pension provided at the age of retirement, that is, whether it should be 40 per cent, 50 per cent or 100 per cent of the person's wages. The article deals mainly with this point but comes up against the fact that adequacy at retirement is an illusion if something is not done about the later years. Let me read a few sentences:

Moreover, a pensioner's income is generally fixed at the time of retirement and not therafter changed whether he has a lifetime of 10, 20 or 30 years. A fixed dollar pension is obviously not responsive to changing social standards or to the changing value of money, as pensioners have become painfully aware in recent years. How large a pension should be in the first place and how it should be maintained in value are matters of great concern to pensioners and those nearing retirement.

Later on the article, after discussing one or two actual cases of people who retired on what seemed to be reasonable pensions, at least at the time of retirement, has this to say:

Unfortunately the nicest calculation of the proper level of initial adequacy will seem to be little more than a waste of effort if after some years the pension has depreciated due to inflation. The average pensioner can look forward to 15 years of life and at current rates of inflation his pension will lose 40 per cent of its value before he dies.

The officials in the ministers' department can make contact with retired civil servants on a very high level who can substantiate this view.

Escalation of government benefit, limited to 2 per cent a year, is only a partial offset. In these circumstances it is not surprising that pensions of even 100 per cent of previous earnings are not considered ridiculous.

Later, after a few more comments, the bulletin says in very straightforward language:

There is a clear need to find some way of increasing pensions after payments have commenced.

I should like to make it clear that I am talking about pensions across the board. I include government pensions, allowances of all kinds, pensions of private corporations and the whole works. If there is anything that some of us believe in about government it is that government has a role of leadership to play. I believe our government should be playing a leadership role in this very important field.

This is the reason I ask the Minister of Finance to get cracking on the matter of raising the pensions of retired civil servants, but I also ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to become interested in it not only as a member of the cabinet but because of his responsibility for the subject of pensions generally. I point out that there are companies which have accepted this idea. Across the years I have known of a number. A piece of literature came to my desk a few years ago telling about how Lever Brothers has built into its pension plan an automatic escalation after retirement. There are a number of these.

I think this is the most serious gap in our pension structure so far as the future is concerned. I ask for an all-out study of the matter. If the minister thinks he may have some difficulty persuading some of those good people in his department—and he knows how good I think they are—to spend their time on this, I suggest that all he need do is ask them to figure out what their own pensions will be on retirement at age 60 or 65 and how they will get by on that pension after having been on retirement for a period of 20 or 25 years.

My other point at this time is in the same general field. I should like to plead with the minister as strongly as I can—and I am still sticking to my text—that he will be the same suspicious looking agitator he has been and will realize that we will not have a just society if our pensioners are told that they will just have to get by on $75 plus $30, $105 or $109 a month, because the program is being reassessed and the government will come up with something different or better 10 or 15 years from now. These people are alive now and have rights just as have people in any other section of our society.

I wish to tell the minister that this government is not going to get away with inaction in the whole field of old age security pensions, youth allowances, family allowances, and all the things we do to soften the blow and try to bring about and maintain an adequate level of income for our people. If the minister will present to us as members something in writing which tells us of better plans than we have, then fine; we will look at them and consider them with wholehearted enthusiasm. But until that time let us not scare people with the suggestion that their pensions are to be cut off or the suggestion that the plans they have are to be discarded. Our people deserve not just the knowledge that a few years hence life will be better; they are entitled to a decent retirement now.

I urge the minister and his department to work on these problems. To return to my main point today, I urge the minister to seize himself with the problem of escalating the pension payments that are in effect. This is, I assure him, urgent and pressing business.

Supply—National Health and Welfare [Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity of saying a few words on social welfare which has cost the government of Canada the amount $1,710,600,-000. That budget is extravagant.

However, Canada has the required revenues to pay those expenditures.

When money is spent on social welfare, people complain that it is expensive, because the Canadian economy is not balanced and because many citizens who could work and earn an income do not, on account of the present economic situation, and instead they live off the state. I would say that almost 40 per cent of unemployed Canadian citizens could work. In addition, a large number could provide for their welfare, their needs and development, whether physical, intellectual or material.

In view of the present situation, we have surplus products and people are kept from working because we do not want to increase production. Production is abundant in Canada, but the distribution is not well balanced. Production is abundant but consumption demands some purchasing power which is not being made available to families.

At the present time, we have all sorts of plans, all sorts of rub-a-dubs and welfare legislation: old age pensions, widows pensions, this and that type of pensions, in addition to family allowances which are far from adequate, far from being made available to the people, in short which are not commensurate with the needs of the people.

We have a lot of social welfare legislation, but what a muddle. We could substitute to all that, a real welfare legislation, a real family allowance legislation, call it what you will. But we could distribute the income to each citizen, each child, each student, each unemployed person and even each family head. We distribute income compatible with Canadian revenues and production. The citizens do not need money; you do not use money for clothes. You do not stitch up dollar bills to make a suit. The citizens need production, foodstuffs, clothes, buildings, housing, to live decently. The citizens are born with needs and those needs must be met in a country like Canada which is now bursting with wealth.

We are the highest authority in Canada, we belong to an institution which comes before all others in the country. We are the only ones with the power to pass legislation or amend the existing legislation. Even if the 29 government ministers are the ones who administer the existing legislation in Canada, the people who do the work in the house are the 264 members elected by the people of Canada and they are the only ones who can pass new legislation or amend the present legislation.

The government does not produce anything but it administers everything. Under the law, parliament, which is made up of 264 members elected by the people, passes or amends legislation that the ministers are then called upon to administer throughout Canada. Therefore, each of these 264 members Canadian must be asked, as representatives of the people, to amend the Family Allowances Act or to pass a new one to increase the amount to $1 per day per child under 16, instead of the $6 or $8 paid since 1944. The family allowances have not changed since the measure was passed, whereas the economy has improved to the extent that the present needs of the various sectors have increased by 8, 10, 12, 25 and even 30 per cent. Yet the family allowance rate has remained at the same level since 1944.

That does not make sense, since Canada's national production has increased and it would not allow an increase in family allowances. If Canada's national production increases, the government should increase family allowances accordingly, to be more realistic. In fact, it must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the family is the foundation of society. If there were no families, there would be no parliament. Without families, there would be no nation, no province, no construction. Nothing of that would be needed. But if we want to maintain the present order of things, we must maintain the families. Now families cannot be maintained with a cheese-paring economy as we are now doing, rightly or wrongly, by all sorts of mean policies, by refusing to give children what they are entitled to and bring family allowances in line with the cost of living. To adjust them in keeping with the cost of living, at least $1 a day should be granted to every child.

By so doing, we would maintain an adequate purchasing power, to enable the disposal of part of the production surplus. Production is made to be consumed, and if it is not, it does not meet the needs. Then our economy needs to be mended.

• (2:50 p.m.)

It is necessary to mend our economy and it is high time, in 1968, in the twentieth century to do something about that, especially when we do not know what to do with surpluses of products, when people are prevented from working by all sorts of means, which is very costly to the people, and when businesses are prevented from manufacturing goods because there are already enough. When out of niggardliness, families are not given the purchasing power they need, proportionate to the increase in production, it is illogic to condone a parliament responsible for that.

If we do, we are not assuming our responsibilities. We must react and immediately provide in our legislation modernization of our economic system concerning family allowances.

It is up to the 264 members to pass a new legislation or amend the present act, increasing allowances to $1 a day for all children under 16 years of age.

It should be the first act, the first legislative move in the present session. I refer to a first move, because it is the first measure related to the budget of social welfare. This is the first opportunity that we have to talk about it, because since 1944, the allowance rates have remained unchanged, while every other element of the economy in Canada has multiplied 5, 8, 10 or 15 times that of the allowances, as can be seen in the table that will be available later.

That should be the first practical gesture of the new parliament of Canada, which endeavoured to officially create a just society in a united country. Nothing in the world, nor in Canada, can prevent 134 Canadian members from increasing family allowances to $1 a day, or $30 a month, if they really want to do so. Those 134 members represent the majority required to pass legislation in parliament. Even if the Liberal party was against the measure, because of the ministers' refusal, the 110 members of the opposition, joined by 24 liberal members, could vote to increase family allowances to $30 a month, from the amount of $5 or $6 in effect since 1944.

We are in 1968. Our governments allot $60 or $120 a month to foster homes and orphanages for children of the same age. Then why not give at least $30 a month to normal families? This is where we should begin if we attempt to establish a just society in Canada. It would only cost less than 4 per cent of national production compared to 33 per cent of people or $2,500 billion for 7 million children, from a same national production of $68 billion.

Supply-National Health and Welfare

It would only cost $210 millions a month out of the total assets of the eight Canadian chartered banks, money in circulation, compared to their bank assets of $33,460 million, to give $30 a month to the 7 millions Canadian children. The assets of the eight chartered banks would go down to $33,250 million but within a few days the amount of $210 million would all be returned to the banks so that their total assets would reach $33,460 million again.

It is simply a matter of balance, a game with figures; that is something which we could put forward. It would create almost no imbalance. Let us look at bank assets. If we made the banks pay for the cost of the allowances, their assets would not be affected, since that money would go into circulation only for a few days. That is one of the ways I suggest of finding the necessary funds.

Mr. Chairman, work and capital are the twin pillars of production. Production is regulated by the consumption of the population. It comes from the work of 7,700,000 citizens. It is regulated by 20,700,000 consumers and by 13 million dependent citizens. The above mentioned 7,700,000 citizens have purchasing power through work and capital; 13 million have no income, but have a right to live. We must therefore provide them with the purchasing power they need.

We must therefore guarantee the citizen purchasing power, a minimum personal income, which I shall illustrate by using a table which has been prepared and a calculation made establishing the possibility of providing a guaranteed annual income for all. My suggestion goes beyond family allowances, for I am talking here of a minimum income which we could guarantee for everybody of $30, $60, $90 or $120 per month, according to the age of each one of those 13 million dependent citizens. That is the way to provide a balanced personal family income for all families and homes in Canada. There are 7 million children, and if each were given $1 a day, this would amount to $360 a year, or $2,520,000,000. There are 1,500,000 students; if they were given each an income of $2 a day, or $60 a month, this would amount to $720 a year per student, or $1,080,000,000. We have 3 million adults, and if they were each given $90 a month or $1,080 per year, this would cost the government $3,240,000,000. We have 1,500,000 retired citizens, old people and all those who are in any way pensioners of the state. We have fixed a guaranteed monthly income of $120 per person, which would Supply—National Health and Welfare amount to $1,440 a year per person, or a total of $2,160,000,000 a year.

For the 13 million dependents, the total guaranteed income we could grant them in the present circumstances will cost approximately $9 billion to the Canadian people. And we could deduct therefrom all the welfare, benefit, pension plans and rub-a-dubs, and the whole caboodle. All our plans and rub-a-dubs now in force cost nearly $5 billion to the Canadian people, whereas with $4 billion more, we could guarantee an income to every citizen.

Canada's national production in 1968 amounts to $68 billion. All we have to do is to retain an amount of $9 billion or 14 per cent from the national production for the 13 million dependent citizens. There would be more than $59 billion left with which to pay for the labour and capital of the 7,700,000 citizens making up that production.

If we calculate the averages of this distribution, we realize that the dependants receive an average of $700 a year, while the producers receive $7,700 a year. There are 7,700,000 producers and 13 million dependants.

In this way, each Canadian citizen will profit by a purchasing power through his work, his capital or his right to live. Nobody would be forgotten, nobody would be abandoned. Each citizen would have at least an income representing the vital minimum. Those who have neither work nor capital, will always have a guaranteed minimum income.

As for those who are afraid of any increase in taxes, duties, prices or the cost of living, to pay that personal minimum income to citizens without work or money, it is enough to know that those amounts will be taken out of the national production of $68 billion or out of the recapitalized surplus of $28 billion, after taxes are paid, in the context of the everyday economic life of the nation.

You do not need to be a university graduate, an economist or an expert in administration to know that every citizen has the right to live and that production must first serve the consumer before being used as surplus capitalization.

Before capitalizing in excess, Mr. Chairman, one must first of all consume enough.

Eeverybody will understand that. All members will understand that. Everybody would like it to be so. Everybody demands it from our large company managers and especially [Mr. Latulippe.]

from our 264 members and ministers of the government of Canada. Even though people are not able to understand the mechanism and intricacies of the money circulation, everybody knows that every citizen has the right to live and that you need money to live.

To the 20,700,000 Canadians, 20,700,000 purchasing powers should be given because of the work of some, the capital of others and the individual right to live of citizens without work or capital. These are the three kinds of revenue which all Canadian citizens would enjoy: work, capital and right to live. They could be achieved immediately within the framework the regular mechanism of our monetary, economic and political system.

Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I think I have expressed these opinions many times and in many ways here, in this house. I present logical pictures, I speak of a financial situation which would be viable, because there is a surplus production amounting to $28 billion in 1968. As far as this surplus is concerned, $4 billion are capitalized by individuals and the remainder by big corporations.

Therefore, if capitalization is too high, something must be done about it. We must get from that surplus of capital, which is not even taxed, the money needed to pay the cost of a normal program of social allowances that would meet the economic needs and realities of our country.

If we fail to do it, it will be because we have not understood the situation. Those tables and that information are available to the house. If some hon. member wants more details, he can ask me and I will let him have all the necessary documentation about that matter. We are in a position to prove—and besides I have proved it many times—that we can give our citizens, our families, enough to live and to pay to each family a normal and adequate income to enable it to live decently in a wealthy country like Canada.

Just think, Mr. Chairman, that if, after having produced a surplus of $28 billion in 1968, we had put to work all those who are able to work, we could have increased our production to close to $100 billion.

If we were to put this purchasing power directly at the service of those who need it, that is the consumers, within two years we would see an unprecedented upsurge of activity in the Canadian economy.

The only thing lacking in Canada is purchasing power at the service of the consumers. Families need this purchasing power most of all and they are the ones we should help.

It is illogical to tolerate the existing situation any longer, when we could produce enough in Canada to support 100 million people. We barely manage to support 20 million people, by accumulating exorbitant surpluses everywhere by restricting production and preventing those who are able to work from working.

Mr. Chairman, I will conclude my remarks by asking each member of this house to think logically and, above all, ask the minister to do his best to find the necessary and viable solutions, if he finds ours unacceptable. If our solutions are no good let him at least find others.

We criticize the administration but, at the same time, we suggest solutions which are easy as pie. There is a production surplus; let us grant more purchasing power in order to get rid of this surplus. We will then witness an upsurge of activity in industry and business throughout the country.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman and relatives— Some hon. Members: Oh. oh.

Mr. Danson: —this is no longer my maiden speech after my previous appearances. I had actually prepared a more comprehensive maiden speech to be delivered during the throne speech debate, but in a rare show of wisdom and good fellowship that debate was cut short before I had an opportunity to delight this house with that great speech. That was to be an historic occasion and in a sense this one is to a certain extent because through the fortunes or misfortunes of war I am probably the first person who has addressed this august body half blind since Sir John A. Macdonald.

I wish at this time to speak on the matter of pollution which is of concern to all of us in all of its aspects. While not wishing to be parochial, I think that the question of pollution in my constituency poses some very special problems and responsibilities, as it would in any area with the same set of conditions.

York North sits on the northern edge of the great metropolitan area of Toronto, and a portion of it is actually inside the border of metro Toronto. It is largely rural, with a number of attractive small towns and villages. My belief is that regardless of present planning, or perhaps more properly lack of planning, the explosive growth of Toronto

Supply—National Health and Welfare will continue into this very pleasant and attractive area.

I could praise York North but my predecessors have done this in the past, great men such as William Lyon Mackenzie King and Sir William Mulock, and in an earlier legislature the grandfather of William Lyon Mackenzie King, William Lyon Mackenzie, the little rebel.

We have fields, streams and woodlands in York North which are very precious assets, as is the relatively clean air that still exists there. I believe that in such areas where urbanization and industrialization are imminent we must take very special care to preserve these gifts of nature in concert with both imaginative and orderly development.

In spite of long range plans and excellent research facilities for pollution control we are in grave danger of destroying our natural assets or contaminating them to an extent that they will be lost for all time. This would be a tragedy which we cannot afford and for which future generations would hardly thank us. The task force on housing and urban development will be finding ways to increase our housing inventory. In so doing they must keep the question of pollution in the forefront at all times.

I have had the experience of flying over the entire planning area of Metro Toronto in a helicopter, and it is really a shocking experience. You do not notice the cloud from the ground as you look up to the sky on a clear day-you just see the clear blue skybut if you fly over the area you see a massive yellow and stinking cloud hanging like a pall over the entire area. I hope you do not mind this indelicacy but may I say that not only do you see it, you also smell it. Even on a clear day visibility at the southern end of my constituency is sometimes limited to one and a half miles. You see the once quite beautiful streams spewing masses of mud and filth into lake Ontario.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The reason for this flight was that during the election campaign I had been speaking to a group of ladies in a beautiful suburban subdivision. This subdivision contains many houses with a type of siding that is supposed to be impervious to the elements and to last about 100 years. I said that we had to attack the problem of pollution before it reached crisis proportions. Well, the crisis began right then. A great deal of trouble was being experienced with this siding in a region

Supply—National Health and Welfare which was some distance from the industrialized area.

About that time I was to make an address over a local radio station and I went up in a helicopter which belonged to the station. My talk was to be taped at the radio station but because of the shortage of time I had written it out before I took this flight. When we came down I was so mad that I tore up my speech. The helicopter has a little propeller at the back, which I understand is very important in so far as the stability of flight is concerned. Before we went up the pilot of the helicopter cleaned one of the blades of the propeller and when we landed he ran his thumb along this blade to show that it was dirty and sticky.

This is an indication of what has been taking place over this area. Before the problem escalates, I wish to plead with the minister concerned to give the matter of pollution control and abatement priority of the highest order. While the economy is rightly a paramount concern of this government, I suggest that the preservation of our natural environment, of our health as well as that of our children, is a priority upon which we cannot compromise on any account. These considerations of health apply, of course, to all areas of our country, and there is less excuse for pollution in the more remote areas.

There is, however, urgency in so far as this problem relates to York North which is unparalleled elsewhere. I should like to see a very special task force on pollution, comprised of the representatives of the various and jurisdictions involved, departments formed immediately to attack these problems on a crisis and crash basis. The metropolitan Toronto conservation authority is an excellent organization, particularly well informed on the situation in York North and other areas bordering metropolitan Toronto. This organization can be of special service if we here can provide the initiative and the funds it so desperately needs. The job these highly qualified and dedicated citizens are doing is worthy of the highest praise.

It is my belief that with adequate support from interested bodies and government agencies at all levels the problem can be attacked and controlled. The key is awareness of the crisis nature of the problem and a desire to get on with the job immediately. The support must not only be financial but moral and legislative. Such organizations must have the power, or at least access to the power, to put teeth into their recommendations. If we do this we will be doing no more than our job so that our children and theirs will bless us. But if we dare to fail, Mr. Chairman, we will be rightly condemned. I believe we should get on with the job right now.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, this morning I asked the President of the Treasury Board whether he had engaged in consultations with the government of Ontario with regard to making available to the house any warnings that the treasury board, the government of Canada or appropriate ministers had received in respect of errors in the current estimates for the shared cost programs. The minister indicated he had a statement to make this afternoon at the appropriate moment. Since an important part of the shared cost programs comes within the Department of National Health and Welfare, I should like to ask the minister whether he would make that statement at this time.

Mr. Drury: I am glad to do so. As I mentioned this morning, I had hoped to be able to find a suitable occasion to make this statement earlier but such an occasion did not arise. The statement is in answer to a question asked a week ago Friday by the hon. member for Edmonton West relating to the federal forecasts of the total cost for 1968-69 of the post-secondary education and hospitalization programs.

The program for post-secondary education payments to the provinces came into operation on April 1, 1967. The first estimate of the requirements under this item for the fiscal year 1968-69 was prepared in the spring of 1967. Because this program was new and there were only several weeks' experience with it, the estimates submitted by the department of the Secretary of State were based on the previous year's estimates adjusted upward by 20 per cent, the rate of increase of university costs in the years immediately prior to 1967.

During the intervening months between the spring of 1967 and January 12, 1968, when the estimates blue book was sent to the printer, extensive consultations took place between officials of the department of the Secretary of State and the provincial departments of education. At no time during these consultations was there any claim that the estimates for 1968-69 were low or, indeed, any indication that the monthly payments which were being made for 1967-68 were inadequate.

The first indication that these figures were low did not come to the department of the Secretary of State from the Ontario department of education but rather was contained in an informal letter from an official of the Ontario office of the treasurer to an official of the federal Department of Finance. This letter, received in the Department of Finance on February 5, 1968, outlined the difficulties for Ontario in arriving at accurate estimates for this program, requested additional payments for the year 1967-68, indicated that the figures for 1986-69 would be higher than the original estimates and suggested that federal and provincial officials should get together for the purpose of arriving at a new agreed estimate.

I am informed that a meeting took place in Toronto on February 21 between officials of the department of the Secretary of State and the Ontario department of education and other provincial officials. This meeting indicated that on the basis of the still tentative figures discussed, the estimates for 1967-68 were low in respect of Ontario. As a consequence, the estimates for 1968-69, which were based on the previous year's estimates plus 20 per cent, would also be low.

The first official and formal confirmation from the government of Ontario to the government of Canada was contained in a letter dated June 20, 1968, enclosing interim statistical returns indicating post-secondary education operating expenditures for the province of Ontario for the years 1967-68 and 1968-69 at a slightly higher level than had been discussed earlier. This letter also indicated that, and perhaps this is most significant, in future all financial returns regarding post-secondary operating expenditures for Ontario would be sent to the federal government through the office of the deputy provincial treasurer. These official figures from Ontario, made available formally late in June, were reflected in the revised main estimates which I tabled two weeks ago. I will not burden the house with the details of the representations and consultations that took place with the other nine provinces that also participated in this program.

I should like now to turn to the matter of the hospital insurance program. Prior to the preparation in the spring of 1967 of its forecasts for 1968-69, the Department of National Health and Welfare asked all provinces for long range expenditure forecasts under this program for the period 1967-74. On the basis of information submitted by the provinces, the estimated federal contribution for 1968-69 was printed in the main estimates at $515 million. The figure used for Ontario in this calculation was approximately $560 million, of which the federal government pays about half.

Supply—National Health and Welfare

• (3:20 p.m.)

I have been informed that at no time between the spring of 1967 and January of 1968, a period when there were continuing discussions between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the provincial counterparts, was any revision whatever made by any province to its original estimates. In the preparation of forecasts for 1969-70 the provinces were again asked for their most recent expenditure estimates, including estimates for 1968-69. This information was received at varying times in the late winter and spring of 1968, as a result of which the federal forecast of cash requirements for this program for 1968-69 was updated to the figure of $560 million which appeared in the revised estimates tabled on September 25 last.

This information from Ontario was received by the Department of National Health and Welfare in a letter dated February 27, 1968 and the new cost estimate for that province in so far as the federal share is concerned was raised from $267 million to $274 million, or roughly 2 per cent.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the minister for his statement and for giving the house information about the various formal and informal consultations regarding the estimates.

To deal first, with the estimates of health and welfare which are now before the committee, I do not want to put words into the minister's mouth but I understood him to say that the revised estimates for 1968 came in from the provinces in the late winter and spring, and that the letter from the province of Ontario which was received in February, 1968, indicated that that province was forecasting substantially higher expenditures than had been initially contemplated, and on which the initial estimates for the current year were based and tabled in the house last November or December.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to endeavour to correct the hon. gentleman, but that last statement related to health and welfare costs only. These indicated revisions, in the case of Ontario an increase from $267 million to $274 million, which could hardly be described as substantial.

Mr. Stanfield: That is right, Mr. Chairman. This information from the provinces came in at varying times, as the minister indicated. He specifically mentioned Ontario because Supply—National Health and Welfare questions had been asked about that province. The letter from Ontario containing the estimates revised upward was received in Ottawa in February, 1968.

To deal with that by itself for a moment, Mr. Chairman, it was during that very month of February, 1968, a time of financial crisis in connection with the House of Commons, that extensive debates were taking place about the financial affairs of this country. It was during that same month that the House of Commons was given an assurance that federal expenditures would not exceed $10,225 million, apart from medicare and the Expo deficit.

How does one reconcile this situation, with prudent behaviour? How does one reconcile it with the efficient machinery of which the present Minister of Finance and the former president of the treasury board boasted last November and December? As I say, Mr. Chairman, at the time this information was being received from the various provinces this house was given an assurance. And not only that, Mr. Chairman, but assurances continued to be given to the house, not necessarily by the present President of the Treasury Board but by the Minister of Finance and the government generally.

The committee knows that we have had given to us a statement filed with the securities exchange commission. The provinces have indicated a very substantial upward revision in their estimates. Although we have not discussed the Canada Assistance Plan, a similar situation obtains of higher estimates than those originally brought in. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we must be frank with one another and I must say that I find it difficult to understand how a responsible minister of the government, particularly through May and June, continued to believe that the assurances given to this house in February were by any stretch of the imagination valid.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance indicated he was aware in May that there were discrepancies in the estimates and that some were running above what had been anticipated. However, he hoped that these might be made up by savings on controllable expenditures. I am sorry that the minister is not in the house; we will have to have this out with him on another occasion. However, no one took very seriously the prospects of saving anything like $400 million in the current fiscal year on controllable expenditures. The best indicated by the government was that it would try to save $75 million.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

The information that the President of the Treasury Board has given to us this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, indicates that after the month of February, 1968, there was no justification at all for responsible ministers to believe that the estimates initially tabled for the Department of National Health and Welfare were by any stretch of the imagination valid. The subsequent estimates have been based on information that came in partly ir February and partly during the spring.

Not to wander too far afield but to comment briefly on what the President of the Treasury Board said about post-secondary education expenditures, here again an indication was given to an official of the federal government that the estimates tabled in the house were perhaps out of order. I would assume this to be a matter of concern to that official and that he would report it up the line, particularly in view of the very serious financial situation in which the country found itself at that time. I would have thought that following this immediate efforts would have been made to review the situation, in consultation with the provinces; and, indeed, this is what happened. As a result of requests from one side or the other, conferences were held at the official level on February 21, I think it was, at which time it was indicated that the estimates were very low indeed.

Without going further with the matter at this time, Mr. Chairman, the information that the President of the Treasury Board has given to this committee this afternoon clearly indicates that the government must have known, either at the time these debates to which I have referred took place last February or very shortly afterwards, that the estimates which had been placed before the house were seriously out of line, and that the government had been given good warning that the assurances it had given were in fact not validly based.

I want to close, by saying that for members of the government, the Minister of Finance and others, to continue through the spring to give assurances and to repeat assurances previously given that expenditures would in fact be held to $10\frac{1}{4}$ billion, and with a budget brought down, is behaviour on the part of the government that I do not think the Canadian people would find difficult to describe.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: I have one or two words to say, Mr. Chairman. I do not think the hon. gentleman would wish to be accused of exaggeration. The one specific change which had been indicated in the early spring was the one I mentioned here. It was a formal notification by the government of Ontario that their previous estimate was in error, and on the low side by about $7 million, or 2 per cent. I do not think one would describe this as substantially or dreadfully low. That is the one piece of concrete information that was given.

Perhaps the cause of our trouble is that estimates were submitted, not by provincial governments but by departments of provincial governments. Steps are being taken by the government of Ontario to rectify this in future. They are making sure that all estimates of this character henceforth will not be put forward by officials of the department directly interested but by officials of the Department of Finance of the province, who might be expected to take a more disinterested view, shall I say.

The hon. gentleman has been a premier of a province and he knows well how estimates are prepared by provincial government departments. He knows of the problems connected with obtaining from all departments accurate figures. Those figures are prepared initially not, perhaps, with the objective of minimum necessity in mind. Other matters are included in the figures, and those figures must be discounted when first examined. It is such figures that the officials of the federal government had to work with. They could only be certain that the figures were uncertain.

During the winter of 1967-68 the indications were that those figures were on the low rather than on the high side, and it took us until about June to reduce these figures to realistic and precise ones. That holds true, with the exception of those figures dealing with health matters for the government of Ontario, where the figure of $7 million only was agreed on.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not wish to prolong this discussion unduly. As I understood from the President of the Treasury Board, the letter that was received from the province of Ontario relating to health expenses in February, 1968, contained new estimates that were in line with the revised estimates tabled in the house a few weeks ago. The minister has been talking about direct communication between officials and ministers. I may point out that Supply—National Health and Welfare during the period in question provincial governments were tabling their estimates in their legislatures.

I understand that in the month of March the government of Ontario tabled estimates in the legislature of Ontario. These estimates involved the higher estimates upon which the government of Canada is now basing its revised estimates. What has been going on, I wonder? Is the government of Canada pleading ignorance? Is it trying to avoid the charge of bad faith by pleading ignorance of what has been going on?

The relevant information is tabled in the provincial legislature across the country in the spring. I suggest that the Minister of Finance, for one, will find it difficult to persuade the people of Canada that the federal government acted in good faith and treated the House of Commons frankly and in good faith during the spring or early summer of this year.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman referred to the tabling of estimates in provincial legislatures. It is true that provincial governments do as we do when tabling estimates. Perhaps one ought not to criticize their formats in so doing, without criticizing our own. I think the hon, gentleman shares the dissatisfaction I feel for the form in which our estimates are entered. It is difficult, when one looks through these estimates, to determine precisely what amounts of money are to be devoted to specific purposes. In the government of Ontario estimates, for instance, it is difficult to determine what amounts are attributable to federal-provincial cost shared programs. I do not think the hon. member could determine this.

We propose, on our part, to try to rectify what has been going on by devising a new form of estimates which will be more illuminating. I only hope that provincial governments will follow our example and make it possible for officials in Ottawa to discover from provincial government estimates precisely what is our share of the cost in relation to shared cost programs. That is not so today.

Mr. Stanfield: I realize it is difficult to read accounts correctly. I am not an expert in this field, yet I understand that the present Minister of Finance said in the house last winter that there are many skilled people associated with Treasury Board who, with the benefit of their equipment, are able to see far into the future.

Supply-National Health and Welfare

Bearing that in mind, surely all an official in Ottawa who wishes to obtain an answer to a question needs to do is place a few telephone calls around the country. He can call the deputy provincial treasurers or others in their departments and obtain the necessary information quickly, particularly if estimates have been tabled in the provincial legislature.

I say in all sincerity that, considering all the skilled officials who are associated with Treasury Board and can perform the sophisticated procedures which have been outlined by the former President of the Treasury Board, the government cannot plead that it acted in ignorance or that there was difficulty in obtaining facts. In the light of this, Mr. Chairman, for the government of Canada to file as late as the end of May a prospectus involving the good faith of this country in the United States, and for the government to stand by its old assurances, which it must have known were hundreds of millions of dollars out, is inexcusable.

Mr. Forrestall: I do not wish to prolong the debate on the estimates of the Department of Health and Welfare. I should like, however, to make a few comments which are directed towards the 150 odd athletes partaking in the Olympic games in Mexico City. I and my fellow Canadians congratulate them for the part they have played, a part we have been privileged to watch whenever the C.B.C. has seen fit to give us the opportunity to do so. Many of us are disappointed that our athletes have not performed as well as might be hoped. The games are not over yet however, and we still hope that some medals will be brought back to this country. I extend my congratulations sincerely on behalf of all Canadians.

• (3:40 p.m.)

At the same time, as I think about what is happening in Mexico City, I wonder about the true depth of our participation as a nation in what led up to this tremendous event. I wonder, too, as I look ahead to 1976, with a knowledge of the bids which are being made, whether we are doing everything we can to make certain—and I hesitate about saying this since the games are still in progress that Canada gets some athletes on the world scene. We are capable of doing better. One of the reasons for our failure to do as well as we might have done is that as a nation we have neglected to do enough to help our athletes. One of my concerns, and I am sure it is [Mr. Stanfield.] have failed to build up a professional coaching staff, in depth.

The system of direct contributions through the fitness program is now five or six years old. It was introduced by my hon. friend from Perth, when he was minister of health in another administration. The act establishing the council placed a limitation on the amount to be granted to the council and, through that body, to the various athletic associations across Canada. The grant was set at $5 million, and I believe it was only last year that this money was fully utilized for the first time. This year again the same amount is earmarked. If we hope to do any better in international competition in the future I suggest we should now consider amending this act so as to make it easier for the council to do the job of work which needs to be done, in other words to bring our track and field athletes, our swimmers, our fencers, our scullers, our weight lifters and so on to true Olympic levels, which will reflect the pride we have in them and reinforce their ability to participate on an equal footing with athletes from all the other countries in the world.

I think it is wrong and a bit shameful that we should have any athletes in Mexico City who did not enjoy the benefit of working with professional coaches in their own fields. The only way round this situation is to open up our pocketbooks a little in connection with the grant I have mentioned. I shall not seek to suggest how much it should be. The council itself must be in a better position than is the Department of National Health and Welfare to judge what would be an appropriate amount of money. I think the act should be amended so as to make more generous provision. Canada has about 150 athletes in Mexico City entered in 30 or 40 events. This stands up well in comparison with other national teams. The United States and Russia have managed to field teams of 400 or more, but in comparison with countries of similar population and financial resources to our own we have done well and I think we can all be justly proud of our efforts. It is unfortunate that in many respects our team has gone there without full or proper training, and in some cases at tremendous personal cost to the athletes themselves, in terms of dollars and cents. I do not think this should be necessary in 1968, and I would ask the minister to think about these things. Whether he does anything about them is, of course, beyond our control.

One of my concerns, and I am sure it is There is one other matter I should like to shared by a great many Canadians, is that we raise—I may say it is also in the mind of one of my hon. friends who had hoped to comment on it this afternoon but who has been obliged to leave the chamber. This is the first opportunity I have had of discussing it, and it is one of the better ones. What I am about to say involves the importance of consultation between the federal government and the provinces, and touches the point which was raised during the exchanges between the President of the Treasury Board and my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition. The former prime minister, Right Hon. Lester Pearson remarked, with some justification I think, that we were living today in one of the most forward-looking welfare minded countries in the world. I think we are all very concerned with the effectiveness of the programs which have been introduced. The comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in this regard are apropos and many of his opinions are shared by everyone in this house.

We have reached a point, now, at which the full thrust of the welfare program is being met by the Canadian taxpayer. Let me cite one particular incident which might have been avoided had there been closer consultation between the departments and the provinces in the field of health and welfare. I refer to the so-called deterrent scheme introduced in Saskatchewan under the medical insurance plan. It seems to me this is the type of thing we should be careful to guard against in Canada. Taxpayers in Nova Scotia, for example, are paying money into a fund which is used to support provincial plans, but they are doing so, now, in accordance with terms different from the understanding which was initially reached when the scheme was proposed. I do not mind paying into a program, but I do not want to be told that because of a provincial move somebody is being deprived of full access to the benefits which were intended from medicare. This is the type of thing which has led to misunderstanding throughout the country, and I believe it could have been avoided if there had been close and continuing consultation between the federal government and the provinces.

I wish to make another comment or two with regard to the growing cost of medical and hospital insurance programs. In the past five years in numerous municipalities and civic areas throughout Canada we have no- two things. First of all, there is the opening ticed an undue amount of concern and costly up of the act by way of an amendment to delay in the matter of programming hospital permit greater flexibility in respect of the 29180-993 construction. There has been delay in terms of what type of bed space should be provided, whether it should be convalescent bed space or active treatment, where it should be, what type of facilities should be included in terms of technical developments and so on. I am sure there have been cases where many thousands, or perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars have been wasted on unnecessary feasibility studies. These are studies which have been wanted by a specific municipality or province so that it would have something upon which to base its hospital building program and equipment purchasing program. The minister has said that there is nothing here in terms of new programs, and it would seem to me that this is one area in which the government might play a part which would not cost the federal government too much money.

I think a reasonable amount of money might be expended in this area in an effort to overcome a continuing difficulty on the part of some of the municipalities and provinces in Canada. I suggest that the minister might consider calling together some of the outstanding medical people in Canada to establish a centre of information within the department which could be tapped by municipalities and provinces as they proceed with their building programs. I do not suggest that a task force be set up in this regard, because before too long task forces will fall into the same rut royal commissions have fallen into. I do not want to see that happen. I believe it would be most useful to start thinking now about the type of hospitals we might need in 1970 and what their role might be in 1980. We might look at the matter of what type of equipment we should buy now, what equipment is obsolete now in terms of its useful life and how we can balance out medical equipment and medical buildings in a given province so that we do not have a continuing wastage of money.

It is not sufficient for the provinces merely to meet certain standards from time to time. Something more must be added during this particular pause we have now in respect of federal participation in hospital construction grants. It seems to me that some slack might be taken up in this field of providing a source of information to municipalities and civic authorities.

I hope the minister will think about these

Supply-National Health and Welfare

fitness council, so that we may look forward hopefully not only to the 1976 Olympics but beyond. Meantime the minister might tell us whether we have any chance of getting the 1976 Olympics. I suggest that we should be looking forward generally, and not only to the 1976 Olympics, by making better provision for the fitness council to equip the natural talents of our athletes.

Mr. Munro: Do not forget about our contribution to the Canada games in Halifax.

Mr. Forrestall: I must extend my warmest thanks to the government for the 1969 winter games. I extend a very warm invitation to everyone in this house to make their vacation plans in such a way that they include a quick trip through Prince Edward Island, a quick scoot around the Cabot trail and a week end in Halifax in 1969.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words this afternoon following the remarks by the minister when he introduced the estimates, which I think were very ably presented to the committee. The first two official spokesmen for the opposition, the hon. member for Simcoe North and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who unfortunately is not now in the house, made a number of remarks concerning the department and its operations. I wish to deal in the best way I can with what they have said.

If one looks at the operations of the Department of National Health and Welfare, as indicated in the summary at page 342, he will see that there is something like $1,600 million in the estimates, of which $132 million are to be voted. The remaining amount is statutory. I suggest also that we might look at the expenditures under the old age security fund which are to be found at the bottom of page 5 in the estimates and which are fairly substantial. There is a total of $1,581 million. It is very interesting to note that the leading spokesmen for the opposition parties dealt in general terms with what they thought the function of the department should be and where additional priorities should go. May I suggest that their statements were in rather marked contrast to the tone of the exchange between the President of the Privy Council and the Leader of the Opposition which took place later in this debate. The earlier speeches were concerned only about areas where the department should spend more. The later statement concerned the budget and other commitments of the department.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

In particular the hon, member for Simcoe North in a statement which I am sure we all enjoyed very much, referred, for example, to the fact that the department is not doing enough in the field of mental health. In his remarks he overlooked the mental health grant which has been administered by that department since 1947. I presume he was referring to the lack of a general extension of federal activity in respect of the sharing of the costs of mental institutions. This has reference to the operating cost and not the capital cost. A number of references were made to the need for additional research. Some very strong remarks were made about the lack of research in the field of ways in which to deter people from smoking, such as showing the harmful effects of one type of activity or another. There is no question but that members on all sides of this house are most anxious that the areas to which the hon. member for Simcoe North very ably pointed should receive high priority in the budget and should receive additional sums, wherever this is possible.

• (4:00 p.m.)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went very much further and indicated that he thought there should be priority in respect of research, and such matters, as to what is an adequate pension, and what are appropriate measures to compensate for inflation, and so on.

This calls to my mind what I think is really the major limitation of the group of which the member for Winnipeg North Centre is a member. He and his group are very good when it comes to distributing wealth. The whole emphasis of their platform and political organization is based on terms of where additional money should be spent for a number of measures that certainly would be beneficial; but there is much less emphasis on how to create wealth. In the total disposition of the estimates, members of this institution must be responsible and must look at the total spending picture.

I know the hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre is going to say that the country can always afford these expenditures. At various times there is a solution which comes from that hon, member and other members of this house which goes something like this: Expenditures on health and welfare are an investment. Then, somehow, automatically these expenditures are not inflationary because they generate increased productivity in proportion to the amount spent, and there is no net inflationary aspect. This is their argument.

I listened to the hon. member debate a private member's motion by which he was going to increase pensions immediately to $125 per month without a means test, and incorporate the guaranteed supplement into the basic pension. He was going to reduce the age for payment to 65 immediately. By my calculations—I have not done the refinements that may have been done by the hon. member, and there is no amount in the supporting speech by the hon. member for Perth, a former minister of national health and welfareit amounted to something like $750 millions of additional expenditures. I can see that the hon. member does not apparently quarrel with the estimate I am presenting.

Expenditures from the old age security fund amount to something like $1,500 million, and this would add something like a 50 per cent increase to these expenditures, in one bite. Mr. Chairman, we have to bear in mind the point of priorities, and I submit to you and the members of this house that the program the member for Winnipeg North Centre and members of his group have placed before us is a program of inflation. In the next breath they talk about programs of research to find a means of establishing adequate pensions and how to counter inflation.

Research does not have to be that extensive, if you listen to the speech made yesterday in Victoria by Mr. Rasminsky, governor of the Bank of Canada. He pointed to the very imminent dangers of inflation and the need for responsibility in respect of fiscal matters by the government.

This is considered to be right wing. There are various other references that can be pointed to when you have to think of inflationary consequences and the government at this time has to put forward a program which does relate to inflation. May I submit that the program which the hon, member put forward was the equivalent of throwing gasoline on a fire, in the theory that this was the way to put it out more quickly. Certainly with this program, which he and his group have put before this house, if it were adopted at this stage the inflationary consequences would be very serious, indeed. The need to have more and more research, to find more and more measures, to provide a basic pension and to compensate for inflation would become greater. This is a difficult and vicious circle. There appears to be no end to it.

Supply-National Health and Welfare

There is no question that in concentrating on the methods by which social welfare and health benefits should be looked after, and we all agree that they should be—we are not complacent about these matters—we must consider the inflationary results. We do not suggest that the program we have presented is the complete answer. We all know that much more has to be done.

No one is a more vigourous spokesman on this behalf than the minister himself, when he spoke in introducing the estimates before this house. There is no magic by which we can produce $700 million to cover the costs of the suggested resolution, which the hon. member put forth in good faith. There is no means by which we can touch on all the programs very ably described by the hon. member for Simcoe North. There is no means by which we can do the very many things we want done and still meet the requirements of the President of the Treasury Board which have been placed before this house, particularly on the basis of what the governor of the Bank of Canada has said about this stage in the development of our Canadian economy. This is true of the advice in respect of measures that must be taken on the broader front of balancing incentives for growth, and the increase of national income in this country, and some measures which may reduce inflation and restore price stability.

In the course of the last election campaign in my own constituency the positions taken by my Conservative opponent and by my New Democratic opponent were almost precisely the same on this matter. They both agreed on the kind of resolution which was presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, supported by the hon. member for Perth. That hon. member defended that resolution before this house not very long ago. They also said at the same time they were against inflation. They said they were going to fight inflation. They said there should be tremendous energy and resources used to bring stability to the economy so that the older people who were living on fixed incomes and retirement pensions should not have to suffer this grave injustice and the erosion of their standard of living because of increased prices. In the very next breath they advocated programs which would contribute to inflation to a degree which would be almost unbelievable.

In looking at the estimates which are before us, please remember that we cannot be schizophrenic about this matter. We cannot Supply—National Health and Welfare and say we should spend more here, that we should spend more there, that we should do this here and that we should do that there, that we should do more for old age pensioners; that we should find more ways of helping these people. All these things are desirable. We then have the next group of speakers at a different stage of the debate and in a different context criticize the government because it is spending too much money and creating inflation.

We cannot do this and split ourselves into little packages, hoping that the packages are never put together in a way which will make things very embarrassing. I believe that the estimates now placed before this house and the program we are now considering represent considerably less than many of us would like to see. There is no question about that. But like many other things that come before us, this is a compromise and the result of many considerations the government must face. It is a responsible presentation on behalf of the department whose employees, I am happy to say, well deserve the tribute paid to them by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. For some years I have had the privilege of joining with those employees who prepare these estimates and I am glad the hon. member said that. He went on to say he regretted I had left that service and presented myself as a candidate for public life. To return the compliment, if I may, much as I respect the way in which he has contributed his concern and interest to government expenditure, I cannot thank him for the interest he has taken in the measures the government is proposing in respect of fiscal stability.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare I am aware of the tremendous change that has taken place in our social attitudes to health and to various forms of social services. Society, from its very beginning in time, has been concerned with some type of community health service. Indeed the very wealthy people of last century discharged some of their social awareness by donating large sums of money to hospitals, and other institutions which provide service to needy people. Illness often affects those of the aged who are unable to earn money and have no resources of their own.

The medical services in Canada in the first part of this century were largely the result of care and to what extent health services [Mr. Francis.]

have one group of speakers come forward private initiative. Most people paid their doctor and hospital bills if they could. If they could not, the bill was either not paid or it was absorbed by an institution as a charge on those who could pay, or it was subsidized by the community by donations or government subsidy, local or provincial.

> The government has increasingly become involved in the health care field. At the present time there is little health care which does not involve the government in whole or in part. This is in line with the experience of almost all the countries of the western world. The sophistication of the health resources of the various countries of the western world, especially in the west, largely depends on the general industrial development of the country. In the North American continent there has developed a very high level of medical service and care, and the volume of research and knowledge emanating from the medical complex of the U.S.A. and Canada far outstrips the whole of the rest of the world. However, there have been arguments that this medical knowledge and these medical resources have not been applied as well as they should be, to give the general public the service that modern medical science has evolved for their care.

This discussion has been centred on the fact that, as many of the health services were paid from the patient's own resources, the individual did not have the necessary income to maintain proper health care, and that if these facilities were taken over by the government with the institution personnel being paid directly by the government, these people would have proper medical care.

The aim of this is laudable, and there is agreement that the best health services should be available to all, regardless of the ability to pay, or the circumstances. However, this in effect is far too simple, because the mere allocation of money does not procure health service for an individual. When the patient paid for his health services out of his own resources there was an automatic barrier beyond which he could not go, or he had to depend on charity for the provision of these services.

Now that the government has entered the field and has made available to its citizens most, if not all, of the health services, various and important problems have arisen, and decisions have to be taken as to how much should be provided. Much has been written and said about the right to health. This I feel has clouded the discussions and arguments on the vital points as to how much health care the community's willing to provide. In essence the term "the right to health" is one used by the general public. We would be better served if the phrase was "the right to the best available care" in the circumstances in which the individual finds himself.

The individual may have the right to remain young forever, but there is no medicine in the world that can guarantee this. Health care, leaving aside the infectious diseases that affect the whole community, is largely the care of one's own self. In other words, like grooming, health care is of little interest except to the individual or his immediate family. Indeed, much of the major health care is directed to looking after and making confortable the elderly section of our population who are nearing the end of their lives and for most of whom their productive days are over. Nevertheless, as a society we do our utmost for these people and most workers in the health field follow the principle of doing the most for as many as possible.

Government having largely taken over the health care field, whereby health care is free at the point of usage, has created enormous difficulties and problems with which we are only now coming face to face. What is perhaps not generally understood is that the scope of health care is so vast that all the resources of the community, all the producin a community, could be tive people involved and there would still be a great deal of work left undone. When the individual paid for his own health care there was a limit beyond which he could not go, or charity could support him. Similarly there is a limit to where the nation can go in the health care field.

It is interesting to note that it is estimated that the countries of western Europe and North America spend about the same percentage of their gross national product on health care. The U.S.A. spends the largest amount and is generally conceded to have the most people still buying their own medical care. With this in mind, it is obvious that health housekeeping records and administration. care must be rigidly rationed in some manner. If it is not rationed by the patient's pocketbook, it will be rationed in some other way, usually by a queue. When medical care is free at the point of usage, most of this rationing fields, but in the health care field there is occurs at the two main introductions to health little or any of it. The cost of health care is and in the hospital. The problem that arises is, what care should the doctor provide for his patients at this point of entry, and how and under what terms of service shall he function?

The physician gives to his work knowledge and experience, but the most important commodity he sells is time and attention. It is, for instance, generally considered that a doctor should provide somewhere in the neighbourhood of 15 minutes for the average consultation, but the demands on his time are so great that he may have to spend much less time with a patient, and in some cases two or three minutes is all that a patient will receive on an initial visit. The doctor, being true to his professional code, must within limits see all those who wish to see him, because the last patient of the day may be the one who most needs his services.

A similar situation exists at the hospital level, should a patient wish to be admitted to hospital. No one needs to be admitted to hospital, or all can be admitted to hospital, depending on the point of view taken. Hospital needs in the past have been based on the number of beds required when people had to pay for them out of their own pocket, but now the hospital being free at the point of usage, it is overcrowded, long waiting lists have developed and many patients who would benefit from hospitalization have to be refused admission.

Of course various methods have been developed to attempt to curtail these admissions and to arrive at a decision as to what is right or needful, but this is extremely difficult and hard to assess and in the main it is largely catch-as-catch-can, particularly in some phases of illness. Coincident with the overflowing of hospitals there has been a marked rise in the number of employees per bed. In the case of hospitals my experience was that .9 employees per bed was considered adequate before government hospitalization. Now it is up to 2.5 employees per patient. It might be considered that this would increase patient care, but an analysis will show that the employees are largely employed in areas outside patient care, that is, in the field of Indeed, it often seems that the demands of administration and records are so great as seriously to compromise patient care.

Automation may be taking over in some care facilities, that is, at the doctor's office growing rapidly, much more rapidly than our Supply—National Health and Welfare general economy. Decisions will shortly have to be made to limit health care in some manner. The recent introduction of utilization fees by provinces for obtaining care indicates some evidence of a return to having the patient pay to some degree for the protection of his health.

Indeed it has been argued that a patient should pay something at least, because he is receiving food while in the hospital. The imminent introduction of medicare has created considerable discussion as to the effect of our health facilities, especially when at this time, with costs a matter of increasing concern to all Canadians, the government is proceeding, in the face of provincial objections, on a set medicare course. The federal government has often accused the provinces of overspending, but in this field at least the provinces have been reluctant to enter medicare on the basis established by the act. As the federal government intends to opt out of the medicare plan in five years, and leave the provinces to their own resources, it appears that their objections should be taken into account.

At this time I would like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper that has been markedly Liberal in its leanings:

If Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and Mr. Benson are in a mood even to contemplate cutting existing programs—and they have hinted they are—then they have no honest recourse but to postpone medicare. Anything else would be a betrayal of the provinces—most of which don't want it at this time anyway. It would be to say, in the cruel language of dollars and cents at a period when tax burdens are already excessive, that it is the federal intention to start programs which it knows the provinces cannot afford to finance alone and then—having accustomed the electorate to their benefits—to load the whole burden of them on already overburdened provincial treasuries.

A better means of further embittering federalprovincial relations could not be designed.

With that in mind, I would hope that the health minister, meeting with his counterparts the federal and provincial finance and health ministers in Ottawa on November 4 and 5, will give this matter of medicare urgent consideration, and it is to be hoped that a program which will be acceptable to the provinces can be worked out.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, in a moment I want to ask the minister about several specific matters, and I hope he will be available to take note of my requests.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

• (4:20 p.m.)

I want to take just a few moments first to say that I am very hopeful that the new minister will live up to the hopes and aspirations some of us have had for him. As the hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated this morning, we had the idea in the last parliament that he was a man who would be able to withstand pressure and to hold firm to a course which now has been decided upon.

Perhaps it would not be correct to say that I was upset-because it did not surprise mebut I have found it very distasteful, and somewhat alarming, to hear an attempt made here this afternoon to sabotage medicare on the excuse that it would be an added expense to the taxpayers a large section of whom, may I say, can afford to pay taxes. We have already heard this attempt in the last parliament, but in spite of difficulties this house had the courage to put medicare on the books. The program was researched exceedingly carefully, was discussed, and a royal commission was set up to study it. It was proven over and over again beyond the shadow of a doubt that medicare is literally a life saving necessity for people in this country who cannot pay their own medical bills.

If medicare were not implemented, these people would have to suffer various stages of misery and distress, with no means of alleviating it. This has now been proven. I am pleased to note that the minister was one of those who held firmly to the belief that medicare was necessary and who helped to get the legislation through. Now we find here in the house spokesmen of a very unholy trinity of big business, big medical and big political concerns, which are determined to sabotage this piece of legislation which is already on the statute books, which two provinces have already implemented, and which two more have signified their intention of implementing. So far as I can see, the strongest pressure comes from the province of Ontario, and I deplore it. It means that we are willing to pass a language bill which speaks about the need of building one Canada with equality of opportunity for language and culture, while at the same time there are some provinces which are wealthy and better off than others whose spokesmen say they do not wish to join the medicare program because they would have to bear more of the share of the costs. So they want to sink medicare before it gets under way.

Supply-National Health and Welfare

In my view it is deplorable that we should pass a language bill on the one hand and on the other destroy any opportunity for equality of the health and well-being of thousands of Canadians. I do not think there is any justification for this. Once the Canadian people realize what is going on they will not be slow in making their feelings felt about medicare.

This trend is not new. When I heard the hon. member on the government side who preceded the last speaker refer to this subject I wished he had looked up some of the records in the history books of this country. He would find that a former minister of labour, when he had the plight of the unemployed people drawn to his attention, made the statement that it was quite impossible to put the unemployed to work, that it would bankrupt the country and would cost millions of dollars. He said we could not afford to do anything to prevent people from rotting in idleness. Adolf Hitler did, by making us go to war. When war was declared, we discovered that in a country which could not afford to keep the young people working, happy and well, where there was no money to provide a decent civilian job for our young citizens, we could spend $28,000 to train an aeroplane pilot and $25,000 to train a navigator, as many of them as we needed. We could also find sufficient money for war equipment and defence because, we knew we had to find it.

I find that a great many people in this house-I see some of them in front of me and some to the side of me-do not know yet that we have to plan for a healthy and industrial population, for a population that has some faith in this country, or else we shall have to pay a price that no country can afford. If we do not pay the price of keeping people healthy through medicare we will not have a healthy population, because a very large percentage of our people are not able to bear the costs of their own medical bills. If we allow our population to suffer poor health and misery we shall find ourselves in a situation similar to that which is to be found among the Indians, whose health standards we are desperately trying to improve and bring up to the standard of the rest of the country. Although our health standard is far above that of the Indian people, it too is in jeopardy today because of the attempt to kill the medicare program.

If we can afford to look after people in their old age, we could also save in medicare costs by giving people enough to live on, and remain self respecting. Surely we are not in such desperate straits as to say, as some hon. members have said in effect today, that we cannot afford to care for sick people in Canada, that there is just not enough money to look after them, that those people who can afford to pay for a doctor can keep well, but let the other people stay sick or in a state of ill health indefinitely. We have heard some hon. members say today, in effect, that we cannot afford to look after old people: Let us sweep them under rug or put them away somewhere, where it will cost very little and thus rid ourselves of the whole problem, because we cannot afford to give them enough to live on. When I hear people complaining about the enormity and atrocity of asking for pensions of $125 a month I am reminded of the Canadian welfare council which said three years ago that the minimum on which a single individual could live in health and decency was $138 a month.

Surely members of parliament should not be abdicating their responsibility in this fashion, because if they do, then they are betraying the trust which was put in them by the electors of this country. It is true that we have in our ridings many affluent taxpayers, but there is not one of us here who has not also large numbers of people in his constituency who depend on what we can do co-operatively through medicare, old age security and other forms of social security.

I say that some of us here are not asking for anything out of the way. We are simply saying that, either we have a government which will ensure that people will have what they need in the way of social security, and which will ensure that we have the industry for the gross national product necessary to finance these measures, or else we must resign ourselves to a divided population half healthy and half sick, half free and half slave. I do not think there is any way around that equation. I, for one, am not going to try to shove Canada back into the nineteenth century. There are too many people who want to do just that; but some of us have to try to keep moving forward, toward the goal which most people want.

I was interested in one member from the other side who said that this party seems to have a lot of experts in such matters as health and welfare. We are not experts. However, we have a lot of people who are concerned about people and the things that people need. We believe that these things should have a high priority. It is all very well to have one's heart bleed, and bleed in public, but if one does not make the necessary arrangements to achieve the goal of social well-being, all of that blood is wasted.

I should like now to deal with two or three specific matters upon which I should like some information from the minister. The first of these is the Canada Pension Plan. Other members will have similar cases to the one I am going to cite. This man worked for 27 years for a large company on the west coast, and he has qualified for the Canada Pension Plan. As a matter of fact, he had a good pension plan with this company, but it was integrated with the Canada Pension Plan. This has resulted in his pension being decreased somewhat. For the past year he has been laid off as the result of a stroke, and will never work again. He has a little investment income and would like very much to be able to pay in to the Canada Pension Plan in order to build up his pension. I know he cannot do so under existing Canada Pension Plan regulations. However, I wish the minister would explore ways and means of caring for people who are in this position. Here is a man who has paid into the Canada Pension Plan in good faith and who, because of an accident over which he had no control, now finds himself in a position where he will not receive the pension he thought he would receive. This man wants to build up his pension by his own efforts.

There is another feature about the Canada Pension Plan that I should like to mention. I do not know how the minister can work this out, but I wish he would explore the possibility with some of his officials. I have had many, many cases of this kind. There is a cut-off date, and a person must have paid into the Canada Pension Plan for three different years in order to qualify. Hon. members would be astonished if they knew how many people die before they can qualify, and whose dependants therefore are unable to qualify.

I know that if people do not meet the deadline and qualify, you cannot include them in the scheme without destroying the scheme. Surely, though, there should be some way of protecting the interest of a person who almost qualifies; there ought to be some special emergency fund or some way of meeting that situation.

Another point I want to raise is connected with the food and drug directorate. On several occasions a group of women from the Ottawa area have approached me with a problem, and this goes back to the minister's predecessor. These women assure me that there are pills being distributed in the Ottawa area which are supposed to induce an abortion, and which do no such thing. The pills are being distributed by physicians, whose names these women have. They want these pills analysed by the food and drug directorate because it is felt the women ought to be advised that the pills do not induce an abortion. These women have checked and the pills have not brought on abortions. They are afraid the pills may have a very deleterious effect on body tissues or on general health. I should like to find out whether it would be possible for the food and drug directorate to make an analysis in such cases. It seems to me if there are such things being done and these women assure me they have documents to support their contention the food and drug directorate ought to be available to analyse the pills so the women could be told whether they are safe or harmful.

I have one more suggestion to make to the minister, which is not going to cost a great deal of money to the department or anyone else but would make a great deal of difference to the elderly people in this country. I know elderly people who are still vigorous enough that they desire to do small jobs such as babysitting or working around gardens. They do need every bit of extra revenue they can get. It seems to me that individual initiative would be encouraged if the means test ceiling were removed. If these people earn enough extra income to get into the category of regular taxpayers, then by all means tax them, the same as anybody else. However, over and over again people come to me and say, "I cannot take this job; if I do my pension will be cut."

The same situation applies to veterans and their dependants. It seems to me also that we waste a lot of money on social assistance because we will not allow these people to get off social assistance by their own efforts. We may say we do not have to pay social assistance because it comes out of the provincial treasury, but in the final analysis this money still comes from John Q. Public and Jane Q. Public. Why do we not remove this ceiling, so these people can go out and do whatever chores they can perform. Then, if they earn sufficient to get into the regular income tax bracket, just tax them the same as anyone else. I believe this makes good sense.

Ottawa area have approached me with a The government talks about making problem, and this goes back to the minister's Canadians into first class citizens, and cutting out this business of fencing them behind provincial walls or language barriers. I want this income barrier taken down. It seems to me this is a logical step toward a just society. We should let people exercise their initiative and earn what they can, then let them pay taxes the same as anyone else. Our attitude indicates the survival of the old poorhouse mentality. It is bad enough to have people who are elderly and poor without reminding them they are second class citizens. I would appreciate a reply from the minister on these points.

Mr. Perrault: I believe hon. members of the house, on both sides, Mr. Chairman-and this has been expressed in recent hours—are impressed by the minister and his approach to the problems of health and welfare of the Canadian people. All of us have great hopes for health and welfare in this nation, under the direction and guidance of the new minister. I find myself in sympathy with some of the problems raised by members on both sides of this house during the discussion of these estimates. In my opinion, one of the great tragedies facing many Canadians today is the diminution in the purchasing power of the dollar, and the disastrous effect this is having on those living on fixed incomes, namely retired civil servants, retired members of the R.C.M.P. and other pensioners. These people put their dollars away in savings, having earned their salaries at a time when a dollar was worth a dollar in terms of purchasing power.

They now find, Mr. Chairman, after years of being good citizens and taxpayers, that they are receiving dollars that simply do not purchase the means to maintain a decent standard of living. This is a matter that should be the concern of all of us, regardless of party; it is not a partisan question. We should do everything in our power within the ability of the nation to improve the level of compensation for those on pension, regardless of where they live in the country and the amount of pension they enjoy.

In actual fact, Mr. Chairman, all of us have a responsibility to these people, who in a have to do, as far as our young people and sense, have been legally deprived of their society generally are concerned, is to invest means. If they had had money stolen from more money in a positive program to promote their bank accounts, then this would have and advance the intellectual, cultural and, been an indictable offence. But society has yes, the athletic development of our youth. I condoned and given a kind of legal sanction think this would be worth a hundred times as the dollar. We all bear a collective responsibility to help these people within the ability of the economy to provide for them.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman—and this was well stated by the hon, member for Ottawa West-if we provide increases in social welfare payments, with an utter disregard for the state of the economy and the effect that such increases may have upon inflation, then it could well be that many of these increases would be self-defeating, that any increase in purchasing power would be illusory and be eroded by inflation. I think that all members of the house are sympathetic to the problems of our elderly people, our senior citizens, many of whom are suffering from physical disability. We should be very mindful of their plight.

Shortly, Mr. Chairman, we are going to engage in our quadrennial orgy of selfrecrimination about our failure at the Olympic games. Every year we undergo an exercise in national anguish when we stumble at the world hockey tournament. On a cyclical basis we engage in breast beating about our commonwealth games humiliations. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we have to do far more to extend assistance to health and welfare programs in the area of athletic development and physical fitness.

On looking at the estimates for this year,and I say this not by way of criticism-I find that we are budgeting for an increase of over $3 million in grants to the Canada Council. The level of support for fitness and amateur sport remains exactly the same. The total dedicated to the Canada Council is $20.5 million; the amount to fitness and amateur sport is the same. I am not opposed to the advancement of culture in our country, Mr. Chairman, but I am one of those critics, I am afraid, who does not think that public funds are being well spent when we import people from New York to smash pianos in Vancouver and pour blood over the result. This, Mr. Chairman, is supposed to provide some sort of experience for the audience. As I say, this is not money well spent.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that what we to the diminution of the purchasing power of much as any expenditure for the creation of Supply—National Health and Welfare new facilities to incarcerate youthful adventurers. Government estimates across the country, whether provincial or federal, show a vast increase in the amounts budgeted to imprison youthful offenders. Yet we seem to hold the line in almost every level of government on programs to rehabilitate our young people and prevent social problems before they begin. I think that this situation is really scandalous. We intend to invest $5 million in the promotion of fitness and amateur sport, an amount equivalent to that which would be required to construct five miles of roadway in the Fraser canyon in the province of British Columbia. This, Mr. Chairman, is not good enough.

A nationwide fitness program, a program of physical development to promote amateur sport, entered into in conjunction with provincial governments and local organizations, is one of the best areas in which to invest our money. I believe that the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport should be granted powers beyond its present limit of merely being an advisory body. The council should become semi-autonomous. What we need is the establishment of a Canada-wide sports foundation. This should act as a depository for individual donations for the advancement of Canadian athletics, such donations to be deductible for income tax purposes up to a certain figure.

Every time Canada fails at the Olympics, Mr. Chairman, there are people who say that the game is the thing, that it really does not matter who wins. This is nonsense, and we really do not believe it at all. We should like a Canadian hockey team to win an international competition once in a while. We have sent our valiant athletes to Mexico City-and they are valiant, Mr. Chairman, because in order to get them there we had to have a tin can collection in Vancouver. We had to beg people for their assistance in getting our athletes to Mexico City, and this is why they are valiant athletes. These men and women are racing down there and carrying the flag of Canada under the most difficult possible conditions.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I believe that we need a semi-autonomous body to promote fitness and amateur sport. Specific programs should be directed to the promotion of competitive athletics. A general fitness research program for the country, a program to promote useful leisure time activities and recreation, should be a separate program under the minister's department.

[Mr. Perrault.]

As I say, at the present time the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport is an advisory body only, not an action-taking body. I hope the minister will change its status. All of us are encouraged by the fact that a study of sport is now under way in this country, and it is to the minister's credit that he supports and sponsors the study and has made a number of announcements about it. We need a semi-autonomous body to direct and administer a program based on policies that are recommended by the advisory council and approved by the minister. We need long range planning and the establishment of goals. We need an adequate budget for this competitive program and for the general fitness program.

When we talk in terms of $5 million for fitness and amateur sport, Mr. Chairman, I am impressed by the fact that, according to some figures given to me, Canadians from coast to coast spent the sum of $1,129,310,000 on alcohol, wine and beer and other spirits. A fantastic amount, Mr. Chairman: Over $1 billion is spent on booze. Yet $5 million appropriated to fitness and amateur sport, money spent to help people direct their efforts into constructive channels, is the limit of our capability.

The tax revenue received by the federal government in 1967 by way of tobacco sales tax amounted to $461,266,414. I am not indicting the federal government or the minister; he is just starting out with this program. However, we do need an entirely new approach toward our priorities. For example, figures are presented each year in the province of British Columbia showing the profits derived from the sale of alcohol. Last year the premier of British Columbia said that the province had made a profit of $40 million from the sale of liquor. Yet alcohol in the province of British Columbia causes $85 million worth of social damage each year.

If we project that situation into the national scene we find we are heavy losers in the whole area of alleged "revenue" from tobacco sales and the sale of alcoholic beverages. Surely some of the profits that are derived from such sales should be spent to a greater extent on the promotion of fitness and amateur sport. I hope that the department engages in a far more vigorous program of education in the months and years to come.

A few years ago in Manitoba a study of alcoholism was conducted. May I quote from page 66 of the report of the royal commission on the health of the Canadian people:

• (4:50 p.m.)

—it appears to be firmly established now that further progress can be made and lasting success achieved only, as in the case of smoking, by an effective educational campaign. As the Honourable John Bracken recommended in a personal addendum to the exhaustive report of his commission inquiring into the use of alcoholic beverages in Manitoba in 1955:

The part that follows is a quotation within a quotation. The words are taken from the 1955 report in Manitoba, and are as follows:

Make known the truth about liquor and thus explode the myths and folklore and unfounded propaganda on both sides of the liquor problem... Maintain an informed public opinion based on the lessons of experience and the facts of science; a restoration of faith in what is said about liquor is overdue.

This is not a call for prohibition. It is a suggestion that we ought to examine social ills like these and see what can be done about their amelioration by the federal government. It seems to me that we ought to be devoting millions more dollars each year to providing constructive programs that will prevent social ills, such as the ones I have talked of, from arising.

Earlier I said that I believed the government ought to provide tax credits for individuals who contribute money for the purposes of amateur sport. We must have facilities that will promote fitness, during the leisure of our people. Right now our fitness and amateur sport programs seemed to be tailored to the production of athletes; our facilities do not benefit those people who wish to take up fitness and amateur sport activities in their leisure. The present act must be fully implemented if we are to have amateur and recreational sports. We must concentrate our programs in such a way that they will benefit our national athletes. Our programs must benefit those who take part in hockey tournaments, in the Olympic games and in activities such as the Pan-American games. Our Canadian athletes must have opportunities to compete equally with other athletes of the Problems to do with recreation in sport ought to be handled differently than at present. In order to implement our programs to their fullest extent there must be co-operation between the appropriate levels of all provincial governments. Last year under our fitness and amateur sport program we spent, on amateur sport, a total of $3,465,222. Approximately $2 million went to the Pan-American games in Winnipeg, a very successful endeavour, and, under federal-provincial cost-shared programs, $669,289 went to all provinces taking part in that program, with the exception of Quebec. The province of British Columbia in 1966-67 received $88,000. I do not think these figures are adequate, Mr. Chairman, and I hope the minister feels as I do. I hope that under his direction grants for the purposes of fitness and amateur sport will be increased.

Many in Canada believe that the government ought to match contributions of provincial governments in the building of facilities to be used in sports. If we are to produce outstanding athletes in this country we must have the facilities in which they can be trained and in which they can compete.

Let us remember that last year $188,675 went to 110 university students in postgraduate bursaries in physical education and recreation. That is not enough, when one considers the enormous profits derived from the sale of tobacco, alcohol and various substances, the consumption of which gives rise ultimately to social problems.

We invested $153,995 among 586 students in undergraduate scholarships and bursaries with respect to physical education and recreation. That amount is one-tenth of the cost of constructing one mile of highway in British Columbia. I do not wish to dwell on the point at length. I hope I have made the point that we ought to do more for fitness and amateur sport in this country. I know that if the minister is anxious to bring about reforms in this area he will have the support of many members in this house.

Mr. Lundrigan: Though it is close to five o'clock, may I say that I have enjoyed listening to hon. members. I have not all the time at my disposal I should have liked to have, nevertheless, that will not prevent my congratulating the minister on his appointment to a most challenging portfolio in national health and welfare. As one of the new members of parliament, I have been most impressed by him, and I feel that he will acquit himself well in the challenges he is facing.

If there had been time I should have gone at length into the question of improvements in social welfare programs. There are some in this country who have not benefited as much as they might from our social welfare programs. I am thinking of those who may be too old to be employed by private companies and too young to benefit from some of the government's old age programs. There are quite a Supply-National Health and Welfare have been left out in the cold, so to speak, and I commend them to the government for its consideration.

I also wish to speak of certain people who, because of certain physical characteristics or handicaps, are not able to be fully or adequately employed. I expect many members ran into this situation when campaigning in their ridings. If I had had time I should have dealt at length with the plight of these people.

Also, if I had had time, I should have wished to talk about our young people who, because of special disabilities, need special training. I know that $40,000 is being allocated in these estimates to the Canadian Association for Retarded Children. If I had had time to question the minister I imagine I would have been told of the ways in which, through the media of hospitals and other institutions, the federal government is helping disabled or handicapped people to become useful members of society. I urge the government to consider ways and means of helping our disabled people make their way through society.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The time being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, before the committee rises, may I make one or two more comments?

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lundrigan: I wanted to ask the minister whether he would consider, through his department, assisting with respect to the construction of the hospital in St. John's, Newfoundland. I hope the matter of the hospital receives the minister's consideration.

My last point is-and I do not wish to abuse the privilege extended to me-that I hope the minister's estimates pass the committee. So far as I know there are no major objections to them. We have made our points, and we wish the minister well in the consideration of his estimates.

Progress reported.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO FACILITATE EXERCISE OF FRANCHISE BY STUDENTS

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-16 to amend the Canada Elections Act (students' franchise).

He said: The little bill which I am presenting to the house today asks for a very simple amendment to the elections act for the purpose of seeing that university students entering university at the time of the issue of a writ of election are not in the situation in which students were put in 1965, when many thousands of them moving from their homes to other constituencies where they would be residents in universities found themselves disfranchised. At the time the election writ was issued on September 8 many Canadian students-and I am thinking particularly of students in small communities—were moving to university cities and university constituencies. If they were not in residence and registered at the university at the time of the issue of the writ they were deprived of the opportunity to vote in the election in their university constituency, although they might have sity constituency, although they might have arrived there only a few days after the writ was issued, indeed while the lists were still open and while, under the elections act, there were opportunities for them to be enrolled.

This is the result of an anomaly in the elections act which deprives many young people of their vote for the first time when a situation such as the one which occurred in 1965 arises at the time of a general election. In my own constituency is located the University of British Columbia which today has a student enrolment in excess of 20,000 in regular courses during the winter months. At the time of the election of 1965, enrolment was in the neighbourhood of 16,000 students and we estimated that between 2,500 and 3,500 of them lost their votes because of the peculiarities of the elections act, to which I have referred. Today of course, with an enrolment in excess of 20,000 the number would be even larger, and across the country the number of students disfranchised would naturally be far greater still.

It is a peculiarity of the elections act that commonwealth students attending universities in Canada did, in 1965, have an opportunity to vote in that election, while many Canadians moving from their homes to the universities, did not. The circumstances are that commonwealth students, once they have gained residency after six months or a year-I do not have the act in front of me-are permitted to vote. Also it is the habit of many commonwealth students not to return to their home countries while they are pursuing their studies but to remain in this country for several years. So Canadian students saw their colleagues from commonwealth countries enfranchised, while they themselves were denied an opportunity to vote.

I wish to deal with what the act presently provides in the cases of clergymen and teachers, in respect of whom this problem has already been recognized. I refer to chapter III of the Canada Elections Act, revised statutes of 1952, section 16, subsection (7) which reads as follows:

• (5:10 p.m.)

For the purpose of a general election, any of the following persons who, in the interval between the date of the issue of the writ of election and polling day, changes his place of ordinary residence from one electoral district to another, is if otherwise qualified, entitled, if he so elects, to be included in the list of electors for the polling division in which he is ordinarily resident at the time of his application, and to vote at the polling station establish therein, if,

(a) being a minister, priest or ecclesiastic of any religious faith or denomination, he is in charge of or permanently attached to an established place of worship or recognized mission of his church situate in the electoral district to which he has removed; or (b) being a teacher, he is employed under a contract with the appropriate educational authority and is engaged in teaching at a school situate in the electoral district to which he has removed.

So, the act already recognizes the problem in the case of ministers, priests or teachers who move from one electoral district to another to take up a new post. It is under subsection (7) that I believe we can make a very simple amendment which would take care once and for all of the problem of disfranchised students. I brought this little bill into the house after the incident of 1965, and it was debated in the house. I made every effort to determine whether or not this little amendment could be passed. Unfortunately the bill did not pass at that time. There was some debate about it and a number of bills were referred to the committee on privileges and elections.

Time has passed however, and here we are in another parliament. Nothing has been done about enfranchising the students. Therefore I am presenting my little bill again, one which contains a simple amendment. I am sure this amendment would not rock the boat of the chief electoral officer. I am also sure that it would correct the problem which faces students at the time of a September election.

I should now like to read to hon. members how I believe subsection (7) of section 16 could be amended. It would be necessary simply to add after the end of paragraph (b) another paragraph (c) which would read:

(c) being a student, he is duly registered and in attendance at a recognized educational institution, and for the purpose of this subsection such student shall be deemed to reside in the electoral district in which he has temporary residence and not in the electoral district in which he would otherwise have his ordinary residence.

This is a very simple amendment which could be made to the Canada Elections Act. I submit that it would not bring down the wrath of the Almighty on our heads, or cause any harm, and that, at last, it would allow students, after the procrastination in respect of the disaster of 1965, to be enfranchised. That is all I am pleading for this afternoon. In closing I should like to say that the Canada Elections Act is a curious old antique. It was written in the days of our fathers when they campaigned by buggy in the snow and ice of Ontario and Quebec during elections of that period. It has been updated very little since that time. It is rather like the rules of our own House of Commons, very slow to yield and very slow to change.

I should like to suggest that there is an easy way in which we could bring about improvements of this kind to the Canada Elections Act, without having to procrastinate and pass them along from parliament to parliament. We should include in it a clause which says in effect that in the first session following a general election the Canada Elections Act should be referred to the committee on privileges and elections of the House of Commons, and there be amended and updated.

There are no people who are more concerned, and more able to deal, with this piece of legislation than the members of the House of Commons themselves. They are the ones who are affected. They are the ones who understand what the act is about and who understand what happens in respect of the votes of the people when the act is not properly amended and updated. I submit that legislation such as this, in our changing times, should, for the protection of the electorate of Canada, have built into it a clause of this nature so that the act would automatically be referred to the committee on privileges and elections in the first session following a general election. If this had been done, for example if this little clause for which I plead had been passed during the parliament of 1965-68, I am sure we would not be here this afternoon pleading for this small amendment. If you, sir, were to pick up the routine proceedings and orders of the day and look at the public bills that are before the House of Commons today you would find a number of them on the subject of changes to the Canada Elections Act. These are all good bills which contain good proposals, requiring the attention of the house for the purpose of improving the Canada Elections Act.

My plea, therefore, is that we find a way automatically to upgrade this act at every election. My specific plea this afternoon is that we settle now the problem of these students by inserting this clause in the Canada Elections Act, so that the students will be able to vote during the next election, if it happens to be called at a time when they are moving to the universities.

member for bringing to the attention of the house in this private members hour a matter of great importance. I recall very well the disappointment among the university community during the 1965 election. Many of our young people were disfranchised. It is unfortunate when any Canadian, student or otherwise, is disfranchised and unable to cast his vote. It is particularly regrettable when young people, who would otherwise be casting their first vote, find that they are prevented from doing so, as was the case during the election of 1965, one which was hastily called to bring about a certain desired situation which it did not bring about.

One aspect of the hon, member's bill which comes immediately to mind is that it is a suggested amelioration, and a good one; but as with so many aspects of the electoral machinery it is merely a stop gap. It is a bandaid where we need a significant restructuring of the whole organism. I realize also that every session in preceding parliaments we have had a number of private members bills which have suggested changes to the Canada Elections Act. Many of them have been good; many of them have been overdue. I would suggest, however, that while there is merit in making some improvement, we must face up to the fact that the Canada Elections Act is in basic need of overhaul, redrafting, amendment, and revision.

To be specific, I suggest that the hon. member's suggested improvement could add a safeguard for students at Canadian universities. But there are many students who are not studying at Canadian universities. A student who is taking postgraduate work at McGill University would be protected by this legislation, but if he happened to be at the London School of Economics or Harvard University he would be disfranchised.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I mention these facts to indicate that we are moving toward some basic improvement in our election machinery, but we are constantly going to discover after the fact, or after an election, to be more precise, that certain segments of the Canadian society have not been able to cast a vote.

These things have been tried in other jurisdictions and they have worked, but there are measures whereby the broadest possible participation of the potential electorate may be guaranteed. One of these is the system of Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. absentee voting. Under such a system a stu-Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. dent at Harvard would be entitled to cast his vote, whether or not he happened to be in the middle of an academic year or within the confines of the Dominion of Canada.

I suggest that the absentee voting system is the kind of thing that would embrace all of these categories of people. It strikes me that we suffer gravely from a lack of attention to the Canada Elections Act. Some of us during the preceding two parliaments have suggested and requested that the committee on privileges and elections consider amendments to it. Every election brings out all sorts of problems in respect of the machinery, and after three or four elections it is now time to consider seriously substantial amendments to bring this act up to date.

The hon, member is concerned about what happened to students in 1965; but there are other problems. We must look at the whole question of permanent lists. I do not believe the absentee voting system can work unless there is a permanent list. It is our job as legislators to be observant and to make sure that when an election is held it is held under circumstances allowing as many Canadians as possible, and without hardship, to exercise their franchise. Elections should be free and they should, in the sense of participation, be full. There is much we can do.

We must make improvements. We now have provisions whereby young men and women in the military forces may vote in any part of the world where they are stationed. It is suggested that this should also be true of individuals in the Department of External Affairs stationed outside the country. Why should these civil servants be disfranchised when people in military forces are able to cast a vote? This is an anomaly which can be corrected by the use of an absentee voting system. But this should not only apply to civil servants and military personnel, it should apply to people who are employed by companies such as Brazilian Light and Power, and stationed abroad. If they are still Canadians they should be able to cast a vote.

While I like what the hon, gentleman has suggested—and if a miracle happens and it comes to a vote I will vote for it—I am inclined to think he is moving one step in a direction in which we have to take several giant steps. I hope he will use his great influence within the Liberal caucus—perhaps within a committee of 35—to see whether we can get the Canada Elections Act referred to the appropriate committee. After the last election, when these things are fresh in our minds, we should give appropriate attention to a thorough consideration of this act and the machinery provided by it.

Mr. Deachman: I hope the hon, member will not mind my reminder that a journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in support of what I think is a rather innocuous amendment, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and indicate that he has my complete support. One of the difficulties of being the third speaker is that the ideas one wishes to express have usually been expressed before. This makes these expressions redundant and repetitive. Perhaps this is not true of a new member of the house, or at least that is as it has appeared to me since my arrival.

I thought the mover of this bill was going to be guilty of talking it out, but he did give us a very thorough explanation as to why this amendment should be made. He also suggested that because his riding embraces the University of British Columbia this matter was of particular concern to him. He referred to the disfranchisement of students on that campus, where the enrolment is between 17,000 and 18,000.

The hon. member felt there was an anomalous situation in that many of these young persons who were eligible to vote for the first time were deprived of that privilege. I support him, in that some arrangement might be made so that university students away from home may vote at election time, between the date of the issuing of the writ and the election date. They should not be deprived of this right, and something should be done to correct the situation.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra seemed happy to think that most of these young people at the university would vote for him. I know I will be forgiven if I suggest that a great number of them may vote for the N.D.P. candidate. I am sure the hon. member will not criticize me for taking this view.

He mentioned the 1965 election, which was held on November 8, and suggested that a calamity occurred at that time. A great number of university students were disfranchised at that time because they had moved from their homes to the university for the purpose of registration. A similar problem occurred during the last election. On April 23 the writ was issued and a number of students were at university at the time of enumeration. They were deprived of their vote because of the difficulty involved in travelling to remote areas in the provinces on election day.

There is another matter of concern to me in this regard, a problem which involves fishermen. A great number of them have been disfranchised during the years because there is no provision for absentee polls, except in the case of servicemen. There is no transferring of a ballot to take care of the situation which exists when people are required to be away from home on election day. Certainly the advance poll system is a step in the right direction; but in this day of great mobility many people other than clergymen are obliged to move around the country.

We should always be concerned about any move which will increase participation in the election process. My colleague, the hon. member to my right, has just handed me a note which would indicate that because of the provisions of the Canada Elections Act he was deprived of his vote during the last election. I do not suppose he minds too much, because he received a vote of confidence in that neighbouring riding.

Another thing we might look into when we are examining this whole aspect of elections, as was suggested by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) in his very articulate and eloquent manner, is the matter of election expenses. I think we should do a great deal more in this regard. While we are discussing generally the provisions of the elections act, it seems to me-and I certainly agree with the hon, member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) on this point—that many of our procedures under the act are anachronistic. One that comes to mind, and there are a number of problems associated with it, is the matter of a poll clerk being required to live in the riding in which he acts on election day. This causes a great deal of difficulty, and the chief electoral officer has refused to issue warrants in order to pay poll clerks who worked on election day but were not resident in the riding.

Once upon a time, when everybody knew everybody else in the rural areas, the matter of identification was important. I think it is irrelevant in an urban riding. I shall not prolong this line of argument, Mr. Speaker, because I see you are getting ready to call me to order. I shall get back to the central point on the bill, because I think it would be in order to proceed with this matter forthwith. It appears to me that there is unanimous, or almost unanimous agreement on both sides of the house that this small step might be proceeded with, and with the utmost despatch. I close by saying that I hope there will be no further speakers on this bill and that it will be allowed to come to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: May I also say that as a new member of parliament, with minimal experience here, there seems to be a great deal of wasted effort associated with private members public bills. While we are considering a review of our parliamentary procedures I think we might also consider the question of the disposition of these bills. Many of them are very interesting and enlightening, but it seems to me that the only prospect for most of them is to be talked out. If we are looking for one way in which to improve our parliament, it might be to suggest some disposition of private members bills other than that of being talked out. I hope the question will be called on this bill and that the house will pass

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the mover of the bill a question. What does this bill do to a college student who is resident at a college or university at the time of enumeration, who completes his session at the college before voting day and in the ordinary course of events would return to his home constituency and would not be at the university or college on election day? What would this bill do, if passed, in such a situation?

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon, gentleman's question correctly, we are dealing with the case of a student who has been enumerated, whose term ends and who then returns to his constituency. I think when we reverse the process of what we have been discussing this afternoon, we find that the student has been, under the act, as would be the case following my amendment, registered to vote at the university and not at his own residence elsewhere in the country. In that case he would find himself again disfranchised, I presume. All the amendment does, as I see it, is to provide the simplest way of enfranchising those who were disfranchised by this peculiar situation in 1965, by including them as a class with clergymen and teachers moving to new positions.

Mr. Stanfield: I am very happy to participate in anything to enfranchise students who were disfranchised in 1965, but I am very unhappy to be asked to take part in passing a measure which might disfranchise students at the next election, when they have a vote under the existing arrangements.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I find this is not the first time I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). I think this is a good bill and I am going to vote for it. However, before I resume my seat—and I shall take only a few minutes, so that the bill may come to a vote-I would like to point out that there are a number of other amendments in the Canada Elections Act which also bear consideration and should be revised in the very near future. Some of these have been mentioned in passing by other speakers, but I believe they bear repetition.

With regard to people who happen to be in hospital, surely in this day and age we should be able to find some means of allowing them to vote in their home riding and not in the riding in which they happen to be in bed. I believe a study of this situation could resolve the matter and an amendment could be incorporated in a revision of the Canada Elections Act.

Then there is the matter of absentee voters, people who will be out of the country and know ahead of time that they will be out of the country at the time of the election. It should be a fairly simple matter today, particularly when we have the advantage of computers and every other known mechanical device, to register these people to enable them to cast their vote before they go away.

I come now to persons—and I am not exactly sure of my ground in this case—on embassy staffs abroad. I know that service—men abroad are permitted to vote, and so are their wives, but I am not absolutely sure of the status of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I must tell the hon. member that the bill under study deals with the franchise of students. The hon. member must restrict his remarks to this point.

Mr. Groos: Thank you for bringing my attention to that, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking, of course, of students at embassies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Groos: I would also like to mention the question of servicemen, many of whom are also students, I might say, and their wives.

When they return from abroad, the husbands having carried out the duty required of them by their country, they find they are not permitted to vote unless they have been back from abroad for the minimum period of six months. I believe this matter bears looking into. I agree once again with the hon. member for Hillsborough, and I shall not oppose the passage of this bill. I shall vote for it. However, I believe the complete Canada Elections Act is in need of something more than the bandaid repairs to which the hon. member referred, of which this bill is but one example.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, could I offer the floor to my colleague, who was on his feet before me?

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon because it is not very often that I can support a Liberal bill. I want to congratulate the hon, member who introduced it, and it will certainly receive my support, because I believe it is very important. In what I shall have to say I shall require only a few minutes.

As has been said, this bill is very important not only to the student population but to many other people in this country. We often speak about young people and we want to get them interested in Canadian affairs. We want them to play a more active part in Canadian politics, and yet we prevent them from voting. This is not justice. Students would be a lot more responsible if they were allowed to vote. It is perhaps through lack of interest in Canadian politics, or because they are not allowed to vote in some instances, or maybe because of a lack of understanding that students have turned to other ways of participating, such as demonstrations. It is through voting and through exercising their franchise that students can become more responsible and more interested in Canadian affairs and politics. This is great, so let us allow students to exercise their franchise.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make but a couple of points. I do not think what I shall say has been underscored by anyone who has taken part in the debate thus far. I shall get directly to my first point, that I wish to support the bill because I think its merit must be obvious to all.

However it seems to me that the main urgency of a bill like this has to do with the fact that it appears to many of us, among whom I wish to be counted, that within a very short time we will be lowering the voting age in Canada to below the present level of 21. If and when we should do this it seems to me that, whereas there are some thousands of people now who are able to vote while they are at university since many go to university at the age of 17 or 18 it is obvious that many thousands more of them are involved. Therefore this bill takes on an even greater urgency and seems to me to be even more important. I think all members of the house will agree that this is a most desirable measure on two counts, the first of which is that we enable as many people to vote as possible. especially the younger people, and second, that if possible we lower the voting age.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), who introduced the bill, referred to the Canada Elections Act as an antique. It seems to me that antiques are something that should be placed in museums and looked at but not handled, used and worked with. All hon, members know that the whole point of the Canada Elections Act is that it shall serve a useful purpose, not only in the present but in the future. Therefore I am concerned that this bill is a rather small item in what seems to me to be a very large cause. In other words, we should be entering into a rather significant revision of the act rather than altering a small section of it.

The third point I want to make is this, that to be against this bill would make one seem to be against youth, and in a culture such as ours to be against youth is rather like being against motherhood. Everybody is for youth. I will therefore underscore the fact that we must continually do what we can to give all young people in Canada a sense involvement.

Earlier on in the day reference was made in the house to the very outstanding speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare on October 9 in the city of Hamilton, one that I would urge all hon. members to read if they have not already done so. In it the minister spoke about the sense of isolation, of phoniness and of meaninglessness that is espebrought out as long ago as in 1951, when review the Canada Elections Act in detail he Salinger's book entitled "Catcher in the Rye" came out and caused many lifted eyebrows. The whole point of the book was that a young man by the name of Holden Caulfield perceived the essential phoniness of the society surrounding him. Anything we can do in the parliament of Canada that will say to the young people, come and share with us in shaping the destiny of our country, in becoming involved and committed, I think is a good thing.

It is only on rare occasions that I agree with the approach of the government of the province of Alberta. However, I believe there is one useful thing they have done, and that is to establish a department of youth within that province. The second of their aims and objectives reads as follows:

To stimulate interest in youth training for leadership in social, cultural, business and public affairs.

I wish to emphasize particularly the last term "public affairs" because it seems to me to be one of the paramount purposes of parliament, namely to encourage greater interest in public affairs among the young people of Canada. And I think this measure goes a long way toward doing that. This is a small bill and it does not do enough of what needs to be done to the Canada Elections Act, but it is useful and in a sense it honours youth. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support the bill.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member opened a tin of worms when he brought up today the matter of the Canada Elections Act. In the few weeks recently when I was engaged in electioneering I do not think there was anything which came to my attention as frequently as the matter of the Canada Elections Act, which gives the Canadian people the right to vote, to elect their representatives and to choose a form of government.

I think the whole business of people who are in the process of moving from one place to another should receive attention through amendments to the Canada Elections Act. I remember that during the last election quite a few construction workers in my constituency who had moved into the surrounding communities were disfranchised as a result of not being able to get back home in the few hours in which they were relieved from employment that day. Quite a number of people in cially common to young people. It seems to the maritime areas are at sea during periods me that this is not new, because it was of elections. Again I say that if one were to would find that people who are hospitalized during elections find great difficulty in voting.

I would not like to make a guess as to the political leanings of students at the University of British Columbia. However, I would say instead that in our Newfoundland and east coast ridings students are very adept at judging the political affairs of the nation, and I would have no reluctance in allowing these people to vote in any riding in which I might be represented.

I would not like to say that the particular amendment to the act which we are considering was precipitated by any selfish motive, because I am quite aware that the hon. member who sponsored the bill is very interested in trying to promote student franchise across the whole dominion. However, I am not quite certain that the sole criterion of residence will in any way be a solution or even a major step on the thousand mile journey referred to by the hon. member. I found that one of the major problems of disfranchised students during the election was with regard to people moving from university back to their places of residence.

As we all remember, in the last election many students found themselves back home on June 25 after having left the university. This was the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and I think this is one of the major points which should receive consideration with regard to any amendment of the act governing the affairs of students. If we were to appoint a committee, it would have to spend a year going into all the numerous ramifications of student voting privileges, and even then we would have difficulty in resolving our problems.

I am sure the minister is very concerned about bringing in changes which will benefit students. My only criticism is that I do not feel all the factors governing student voting have been taken into consideration. For example, if I were introducing such an amendment or trying to change the present elections act to bring it into the twentieth century-right now in a good many respects it is mediaeval-I would like to get the opinion of students across the dominion. I should like to know the feeling of students on some of the amendments they would like to see introduced. I do not believe I would fool anybody if I were to stand here today and try to point out to students the way in which the elections act should be modified in order to help some of the people in my constituency. I feel therefore that the opinion of students should certainly be sought in trying to bring about the changes we deem necessary.

In view of the interest the hon. member has in student voting, I would recommend that perhaps he begin to move in the direction of seeking the advice of students right across the whole dominion. He could point out the nature of the present Canada Elections Act and ask for recommendations from student bodies. It has been my experience in dealing with student bodies in universities that the young people have a good deal of knowledge about the voting privileges of Canadians. The young people in the universities are quite aware that some of their rights are being trampled upon, and some of the benefits which should be enjoyed by all Canadians are being taken away from them. You must seek the advice of students in order to clarify some of these issues.

My only comment, Mr. Speaker, is that I feel with this particular amendment we are leaning in the direction of greater benefits for students in Canada. My criticism is that I do not feel we are going far enough. I would have been much happier if the amendment had been more general in nature. Right now one can think of points across Canada such as Edmonton, Calgary, the University of British Columbia and many eastern communities in which there are 10,000 or 12,000 university students.

I do not know all the ramifications of this particular amendment, and I should like a bit more investigation to be undertaken. We should initiate some kind of program which would gather a consensus from the thousands of students across Canada as to the changes they feel should be brought about in the Canada Elections Act. If we did so, we would be heading in a much better direction. We feel that this amendment and other general amendments should be referred to a committee so that this matter could be settled. I should like to say this is a step in the right direction, but certainly it is not going to satisfy many of the students I know.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I think it is evident, Mr. Speaker, from certain questions by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house that there is no unanimity on the subject matter of the bill. I feel it would be useful if the question could be studied further. My suggestion therefore would be that instead of passing second reading of this bill, we should refer it to the standing committee on privileges and elections in which we will, later on, begin consideration of the elections act in general. Perhaps this suggestion in this bill could be considered in connection with certain other suggestions we will be receiving in respect of the elections act.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have listened to remarks of hon. members in support of this amendment this afternoon, and they made no mention of being against this particular move.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think the hon. member in back of the hon. gentleman expressed some doubt about it. In addition, I may say the hon. gentleman's leader has a certain hesitation about the bill.

Mr. Lundrigan: It was quite obvious from my remarks I was expressing, not reluctance but support for the hon. member, it was equally obvious that I said this was a good beginning. If the minister checks the record he will find I said it was a good beginning, but will have to be taken further. I am all for making good beginnings.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Nevertheless, I think I am right in saying there is a certain number who would like to refer the subject matter to the committee. I should like to move, therefore:

That Bill No. C-16, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before this motion carries, and we hope it will, may I ask the President of the Privy Council if he will give an undertaking that he will also be referring to the committee on privileges and elections at this session the elections act itself, and the report of the committee on election expenses?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have already indicated to the hon, gentleman's house leader that the government will be making a statement in that regard. I hope the committee will also give consideration to the not inconsiderable number of bills introduced by other private members of the house, some of which will not have the benefit of debate as this one has.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the President of the Privy Council be big enough also to include in such consideration the electoral boundaries as well, since there are two or three private bills concerned with this matter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is a very useful suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to, and bill referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hour for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps before the house adjourns I should indicate, for the benefit of hon. members, that the business for Monday will be as announced yesterday, namely second reading and committee stage of the bill to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. Baldwin: On Monday?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was the order for all next week, I take it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, that is the order for Monday; the farm bills will be dealt with on Tuesday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 21, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PARLIAMEN-TARIANS FROM INDIA

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of the very distinguished Speaker of the Indian lower house, the Lôk Sabha, Dr. the Hon. N. Sanjiva Reddy. Mr. Speaker Reddy is on his first official visit to Canada and is accompanied by the eminent secretary general of the Lôk Sabha, Mr. S. L. Shakdher. Hon. members will be pleased to know that Mr. Speaker Reddy will be with us as our guest until his departure on Friday morning for the commonwealth parliamentary conference in the West Indies. In the intervening period I hope that as many hon. members as possible will be able to meet our guests. I might draw to the attention of all hon, members the fact that a reception has been arranged for this purpose tonight at 6 p.m. in the railway committee room.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members would want me to say on their behalf that we are indeed deeply honoured by this visit from such a distinguished parliamentarian from our great commonwealth partner in India, a country that shares with us all our traditions of parliamentary democracy.

EXPO '67-JAPANESE RADIO STATION

Question No. 90-Mr. McCleave:

- 1. Was a request submitted by Japanese sources to set up an amateur radio station at Expo?
- 2. Was the request refused and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pépin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition reports that: 1. Informal verbal requests were received from Japan and other countries to set up amateur radio stations at Expo.

2. The exhibition corporation did not encourage these requests because: (a) it was felt that if amateur stations were set up by one or two nations, there would be many other similar requests and (b) this would result in a proliferation of unsightly aerials. The Japanese representatives recognized the good sense of these arguments and, therefore, did not make a formal request.

STRIKES IN CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 100-Mr. Fortin:

- 1. During the last five years, what strikes occurred in Proprietary Crown Corporations?
- 2. How many days did each strike last and how many employees were affected by each strike?
- 3. In the case of each such strike, did the government or a Minister of the Crown intervene directly or indirectly to hasten the settlement of the strike and, if so, what was the nature of such intervention?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Minister of Transport as follows: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. One.

- 2. Seven days; 65,000 employees.
- 3. Yes; act of parliament.

The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. One strike, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers.

- 2. 14 days. 9,400.
- 3. No.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1. One strike from June 21st to July 14th, 1968, inclusive.

- 2. The strike lasted 24 days and affected 1,308 employees.
 - 3. No.

[Mr. Honey.]

BILINGUAL POLICY, NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

Question No. 104-Mr. Coates:

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION, COLD STORAGE PLANT, ST. BRUNO, QUE.

Question No. 116—Mr. Gauthier:

Did the federal government participate financially in the construction of the cold storage plant in St-Bruno, County of Lac St-Jean, and if so, how much was contributed?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Forestry and Rural Development as follows: Yes. $446,809 to date.

WORKS UNDER SECTION 92, B.N.A. ACT

Question No. 122-Mr. Fortin:

What works have been declared to be to the general advantage of Canada in the sense of the B.N.A. Act (section 92) since 1867?

[Translation]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No list of such works has been maintained.

*ASSISTANCE IN COMBATING DUTCH ELM DISEASE

Question No. 127-Mr. Alkenbrack:

Since the government has cancelled any further federal assistance in Winter Works programs, what will the government do to assist the municipalities in their very expensive fight in combating Dutch Elm Disease, which is taking a terrible toll in the White and Grey Elm species in Central Canada?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the programs undertaken by the federal government on the Dutch elm disease are carried out by the forestry branch of the Department of Fisheries and comprise surveys to detect the presence and spread of the disease, research and factors influencing susceptibility of elm trees to the causal fungus and on methods of control, and technical advisory services to municipalities on the application of control methods. The forestry branch also provides diagnostic services to municipalities and individuals to assist in the identification of trees that are affected by the disease and that should be removed promptly to limit the spread. These extensive technical and consultative services will be continued.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES, LOTBINIERE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 166-Mr. Fortin:

How many federal civil servants were employed in the federal constituency of Lotbinière in 1962-63-64-65-66-67-68?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): It is impossible to compile the data sought in this question because the duties of public employees are not assigned on the basis of electoral constituencies.

CANADIAN DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS

Question No. 174-Mr. Peddle:

- 1. How many Canadian defence installations are there in Canada and where are they located?
- 2. How many military personnel are in each and, how many civilian?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. It is not departmental policy to make public lists of all defence establishments in Canada giving precise locations. However, the following is a list of major bases and stations, showing the number of military and civilian personnel attached to each as of June 30, 1968.

AIR POLLUTION FROM AIRCRAFT ENGINES

Bases and Stations Personnel Personnel

Question No. 184-Mr. Gillespie:

- 1. How is the degree of air pollution from aircraft engine exhausts determined and what measurements are made?
- 2. What is considered a dangerous level of concentration?
- 3. Have measurements been taken at Malton International Airport and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Air contaminant emissions from aircraft engines are similar to those from other combustion sources, especially motor vehicles. The degree of air pollution is, therefore, measured with the same kind of instrumentation as is used in the general assessment of community air pollution problems. The important constituents of aircraft engine exhausts are particulates, carbon monoxide, nitrogen dioxide, hydrocarbons, and aldehydes.

- 2. Exposure of persons working near aircraft engine exhausts is limited by tolerance to concentrations of either carbon monoxide or nitrogen dioxide. Concentrations of 50 parts per million carbon monoxide and 5 parts nitrogen dioxide are not considered injurious to health in continuous exposure at work for an eight hour day, five days a week.
- 3. No air pollution measurements have been made at Malton airport by air pollution officers of the occupational health division, Department of National Health and Welfare, or the Ontario air pollution control service.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE STATISTICS, LOTBINIERE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 190-Mr. Fortin:

- 1. How many Unemployment Insurance Commission offices are there in the federal constituency of Lothinière?
- 2. How many claims for unemployment insurance benefits were filed at each of these offices, by year, since January 1, 1965, by persons residing in the federal constituency of Lotbinière?
- 3. What were the number of claims accepted in each of these offices, by year, since 1965?
- 4. How many persons residing in the federal constituency of Lotbinière registered for employment, each year, since 1965?
- 5. How many of the registered persons received employment, each year, since 1965?
- Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration as follows: 1. There are no offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission located in the federal constituency of Lotbinière.
- 2. The information is not available. There was an office of the commission located at Victoriaville in the federal constituency of Lotbinière until 18 September, 1967. The territory served by the Victoriaville office included most of Arthabaska county and part of Nicolet, Wolfe and Mégantic counties and no records were maintained as to the number of claims filed at the Victoriaville office from residents of the Lotbinière county.
- 3. The total number of claims filed at the Victoriaville office and for which the contribution requirements were met were: 4,374 in 1965; 4,120 in 1966 and 1,485 in 1967 (until 18 September, 1967).

 $29180 - 100\frac{1}{2}$

Questions

4. and 5. This information is not available because statistics on registrations for employment and placements are compiled for Canada manpower centre areas, not for electoral districts.

Figures on new registrations and on placements made are available for the three Canada manpower centres of Lévis, Trois-Rivières and Victoriaville which include, within their areas, the electoral district of Lotbinière. The population of the electoral district of Lotbinière is approximately twenty per cent of the total population of the three Canada manpower centre areas, based on 1966 census figures.

New registrations for employment were:

	-			7 0
			Lévis	Trois- Rivières	Victoria- ville
		1965	5,606	6,863	3,561
		1966	6,935	7,455	3,785
		1967	5,438	8,671	4,797
To Au	g. 31	1968	4,194	5,307	2,485

Placements in employment were:

			Lévis	Trois- Rivières	Victoria- ville
		1965	5,061	5,819	2,845
		1966	3,910	4,847	2,496
		1967	2,921	3,120	1,971
To Aug.	31	1968	2,397	1,483	1,071

It is important to note that these data are not comparable in meaning over the period as the manpower services being provided changed considerably. Emphasis shifted from the operation of a simple placement service to the provision of a range of manpower services which include referral to training courses (these totalled 4,986 for the three Canada manpower centre areas, from January 1, 1967 to September 30, 1968), manpower mobility grants, more extensive labour market and job vacancy information, and fuller employment counselling.

BORDEN-CAPE TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE

Question No. 202-Mr. Macquarrie:

- 1. When is it expected that the SS Prince Edward Island will be withdrawn from the Borden-Cape Tormentine ferry service?
- 2. What use will be made of this ship thereafter?
 3. When will the ferry John Hamilton Gray come into regular service on the run?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1 and 2. The SS Prince Edward Island will be withdrawn substantial expenditure that would decision has as yet been made as to its eventual disposition.

3. Current expectations are about mid-October, 1968.

SECURITY FILES ON FRANÇOIS DORLOT

Question No. 211-Mr. Orlikow:

- 1. Was information in connection with François Dorlot contained in Immigration, Security and R.C.M.P. files made available to any persons outside of the aforementioned Departments, including members of the Press, Radio and T.V. media?
- 2. If so, by whom, and was this done with the knowledge and/or approval of the Departmental Minister concerned?
- 3. Do the Security or R.C.M.P. files show that Mr. Dorlot is or was a member of the Mouvement Souveraineté-Association?
- Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1 and 3. It is not in the public interest to discuss or to disclose the contents of R.C.M.P. files or files of other departments containing security information. No information, therefore, can be given as to whether or not the name of Mr. François Dorlot is contained in them. However, while no inference is to be drawn as to whether or not such files do contain information pertaining to François Dorlot, assurance can be given that, so far as can be determined, no persons connected with immigration, security or R.C.M.P. have given any information concerning him to the press, radio or T.V. media.
 - 2. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN COMMUNICATION SATELLITE

Question No. 212-Mr. Schreyer:

- 1. Has the Government of Canada made the necessary arrangements to secure the required frequencies and orbital positions for a Canadian domestic communication satellite?
 - 2. If not, what is the nature of the difficulty?
- 3. Has the Government of Canada established the necessary criteria under which a domestic satellite communication system can be established and made operational?
- 4. If so, what are these criteria (other than engineering and technical)?
- 5. What form of ownership will the domestic satellite communication corporation have?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): In so far as telecommunications is concerned, [Mr. Hellyer.]

- from service upon the commencement of 1. Preliminary action has been taken but regular service by the MV John Hamilton further steps will be necessary. These further Gray. Subsequently, because of its age and the steps will be carried out in accordance with be ITU agreements when the technical characterrequired to continue operating the vessel, the istics of our satellites are more fully deter-P.E.I. will be retired from the service. No mined as a result of the planning process now in progress in my Department and in Canadian industry. The use by Canada of radio frequencies on a domestic communication satellite requires co-ordination with other countries and eventual formal clearance through the International Telecommunications Union.
 - 2. Answered in 1 above.
 - 3. and 4. Yes. These are described in the white paper on "A Domestic Satellite Communication System for Canada" published by the Minister of Industry, on March 28, 1968.
 - 5. The form of ownership will be prescribed in the legislation expected to be introduced during the current session relating to the proposed corporation.

BLANKET SALES BY CROWN ASSETS

Question No. 218-Mr. Marshall:

When the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation sold blankets to Fortier and Associated Services Limited of Edmonton for $8,250 and to Hercules Sales Limited of Toronto for $5,113 (a) what was the number of blankets involved in each sale (b) what was the sale price per blanket in each transaction (c) what was the original cost of the blankets to the Canadian Government and, (d) why was it found necessary to dispose of them?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Defence Production and National Defence as follows: (a) No. of blankets sold to Fortier and Associated Services Limited, Edmonton, 5,000; No. of blankets sold to Hercules Sales Limited, Toronto, 2,734; (b) Sale price per blanket sold to Fortier and Associated Services Limited, Edmonton, $1.65; Sale price per blanket sold to Hercules Sales Limited, Toronto, $1.87; (c) $6.00 each; (d) The blankets were procured prior to 1949 and continuous usage had resulted in shrinkage rendering them unfit for further use.

U.S. HARMON AIR FORCE BASE, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 219-Mr. Marshall:

1. When the United States Government deactivated Harmon Air Force Base in the Province of Newfoundland (a) to whom did ownership and control of the installation revert (b) did the United States retain any rights or interest in the property (c) did ownership of buildings, machinery and other facilities on the base remain with the United States or was it transferred elsewhere?

2. If ownership and control of the base was given back to Canada, did the federal government subsequently transfer it to the Government of Newfoundland and, if so (a) did the transfer include such physical properties as buildings, etc (b) did the federal government make any proviso as to what use the property and facilities should be put to by the provincial government (c) did the federal government pay a lump sum or agree to make regular payments to meet part or all of the costs of maintenance of the former air base?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. (a) The crown. The legal technicalities of the provincial or federal reversionary interests in lands occupied by the U.S. forces under the leased bases agreement of 1941 has never been resolved. (b) No. (c) The ownership of buildings and appurtenant base machinery related to power, heating and water systems were abandoned by the U.S. as required by the terms of the leased bases agreement of 1941. Ownership of operational and other movable equipment remained vested in the U.S. However, a sizeable catalogue of maintenance equipment and housekeeping supplies were declared surplus by the U.S. and were purchased by the province of Newfoundland.

2. Ownership and control of the base was not given back to Canada. However, on 7 June 1966, an order in council transferred to the government of Newfoundland such interest as the government of Canada may have had in the Harmon base property; (a) Yes, to the extent of federal interest; (b) No; (c) No.

- Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and National Health and Welfare as follows: 1. April 1, 1966—March 31, 1967, $190,549; April 1, 1967—March 31, 1968, $108,971.
- 2. For the Saddle Lake Indian reserve at St. Paul, Alberta, health services costs for the fiscal years 1966-67 and 1967-68 were as follows: April 1, 1966—March 31, 1967, $271,400. April 1, 1967—March 31, 1968, $324.600.

,		1966-67	1967-68
(a)	Housing	$22,600	$62,020
(b)	Water Supply	$27,841	$27,567
(c)	Roads		$ 5,384

In addition to the above, $140,108 was spent for electrification on the Saddle Lake reserve during the fiscal year 1966-67 and $14,000 was spent during 1967-68 for the same purpose.

3. As of October 1, 1968, 103 students from the Saddle Lake reserve were attending high school. Sixty-six were attending during the academic year September 1, 1966 to June 30, 1967, and 66 attended during the academic year September 1, 1967 to June 30, 1968.

[Mr. Forest.]

4. As of October 1, 1968, 15 students from the Saddle Lake reserve are enrolled in post-school programs which include technical schools and universities. Nine were attending during the academic year September 1, 1966 to June 30, 1967, and 32 were attending during the academic year September 1, 1967 to June 30, 1968.

QUALIFICATIONS OF NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION CHAIRMAN

Question No. 312-Mr. Thompson (Red Deer):

What are the qualifications of the Chairman of the National Capital Commission, which resulted in his appointment?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The qualifications of the chairman of the National Capital Commission which were taken into account by the government prior to his appointment and which the government considers as being a proper and desirable blend of work with the commission and a wideranging background of experience in legal, accounting and executive activities are as follows: Acting chairman of the National Capital Commission from September 1, 1967 to January 5, 1968; Vice-chairman from February 16, 1967 until October 1967; Member, National Capital Commission on April 29, 1966; Member National Capital Commission land advisory committee from February 1965 to April 1966; Ottawa branch manager and assistant general manager of Guaranty Trust Company of Canada from 1963 to 1966, with general supervision over the financial operations which included mortgage and real estate matters. Toronto General Trusts Corporation from 1940 to 1959; Toronto General Trusts Corporation from 1941 to 1951, comptroller and executive administrator for the corporation; 1952-1959, Ottawa branch manager responsible for financial matters including real estate and mortgage departments; Graduate of Queen's University in commerce in 1930; A Fellow of the Ontario Institute of Chartered Accountants; A member of the Institute of Chartered Financial Analysts; A member of the Law Society of Upper Canada; Resident of the national capital region.

PETITION RESPECTING FLOAT PLANE BASE, ST. ANDREWS, MAN.

Question No. 324-Mr. Schreyer:

1. Has the Minister of Transport received a petition signed by residents of the St. Andrews and St. Clements municipalities complaining of the procedure by which permission was granted to port of this petition?

allow the establishment of a float plane base on the Red River at St. Andrews, Manitoba?

- Red River at St. Andrews, Manitoba?
 2. If so, how many signatures are there in sup-
- 3. When and where was the petition received by the Department of Transport or the Minister?
- 4. What decision, if any, has been reached relative to this petition?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport):
1. Yes. "Petition of property owners of land affected by operations of air base Northland Airlines Limited in the rural municipality of St. Andrews."

- 2. 265.
- 3. The petition was received by the Minister of Transport on June 10, 1968.
- 4. Northland Airlines applied to the Department of Transport for a licence to operate a water airport on lot 34 River road, St. Andrews, Manitoba. A letter was received by the department's Winnipeg regional office from the metropolitan corporation of greater Winnipeg which stated that they had no objection to the establishment of a water airport on lot 34 River road.

In general, when licensing an airport, the Department of Transport finds it satisfactory to deal only with the responsible governing body which, it is assumed, speaks for all the local residents. If the governing body has no objection and the applicant has met all the Department's other requirements, as was the case with Northland Airlines, an airport licence is issued.

"HABITAT '67"

Question No. 327-Mr. McIntosh:

- 1. What was the cost of constructing "Habitat" '67" for the 1967 World's Fair in Montreal?
- 2. When was "Habitat '67" turned back to the federal government by the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World's Fair?
- 3. How many units are now available for occupancy?
- 4. How many units are rented to tenants as of October 1, 1968 (a) furnished (b) unfurnished?
- 5. What rental fees are currently being charged for accommodation in "Habitat '67"?
- 6. What has been the cost to the federal government since taking over control of "Habitat '67" for (a) heat, light and water services (b) renovation and repairs (c) completion of unfinished units (d) furnishing and decorating units of all types (e) advertising in connection with soliciting occupants (f) snow removal and maintenance of grounds (g) window cleaning (h) limousine service for tenants (i) protective service (j) managerial and other administrative services?
- 7. What is the estimated annual surplus or deficit on the operation of "Habitat '67" this year?

29180-101

Questions

- 8. Is there any expectation that operation of "Habitat '67" will eventually recover the capital cost of construction, improvement and maintenance?
- 9. Has consideration been given to turning over "Habitat '67" to the City of Montreal for use as a low-rent housing project?
- 10. Has consideration been given to demolition of "Habitat '67"?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. $22,569,350.

- 2. January 1, 1968.
- 3. 115.
- 4. (a) 2; (b) 35.
- 5. 1-bedroom, $190; 2-bedroom, range, $275-$310; 3-bedroom, range, $380-$420; 4-bedroom, range, $395-$460; Penthouse, $600.
- 6. (a) $28,265; (b) $85,712; (c) nil; (d) $24,123; (e) $17,468.88; (f) $21,040; (g) nil; (h) $10,100; (i) $54,382; (j) $34,200.
 - 7. $442,088 deficit.
 - 8. No.
 - 9. No.
 - 10. No.

FREQUENCY OF RURAL MAIL DELIVERIES

Question No. 336-Mr. McCleave:

- 1. How many box holders on rural routes in Canada now receive mail deliveries less than five days a week?
- 2. How many of such now receive such deliveries on Saturday?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): 1. 36,240.

2. Information not available, however, service to these people would not be reduced in the event of a change to a five day per week mail delivery as schedules would be changed to provide same frequency on alternate days.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION SECRETARY

Question No. 337-Mr. McCleave:

- 1. Who is the Secretary of the National Capital Commission?
 - 2. What is his salary?
 - 3. What are his qualifications?
- 4. What position did he hold before achieving his present position?
 - 5. How was he appointed to the Commission?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. A. E. Morin.

2. It has not been customary to require crown corporations to disclose detailed information related to their internal management and administration.

- 3. University graduate, bilingual, with administrative and journalistic background.
- 4. Acting director, information services, Department of Public Works.
- 5. Selection board of National Capital Commission management committee.

Question No. 340-Mr. Mazankowski:

- 1. Of the total of $612,865,000 payable in family and youth allowances, as shown in the revised estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, what portion will be paid to (a) Quebec (b) Ontario (c) Atlantic Provinces (d) Manitoba (e) Saskatchewan (f) Alberta and (g) British Columbia?
- 2. What is the estimate for these payments for the fiscal year 1969-1970?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) Quebec, $164,326,000; (b) Ontario, $214,753,000; (c) Atlantic Provinces, $67,907,000; (d) Manitoba, $28,968,000; (e) Saskatchewan, $30,391,000; (f)* Alberta, $49,066,000; (g) British Columbia, $57,454,000.

*The amount for Alberta includes the estimates for the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

2. No estimate for the fiscal year 1969-70 is available at the present time.

REPAIRS TO H.M.C.S. "SASKATCHEWAN"

Question No. 345-Mr. Anderson:

- 1. Have repairs to HMCS Saskatchewan, damaged when run onto a rock in Active Pass on September 8, 1968, been completed?
 - 2. If so, what was the cost of these repairs?
 - 3. If not, what is the estimated cost of repairs?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2 and 3. Emergency repairs were carried out in H.M.C. Dockyard Esquimalt at a cost of $13,545. Further repairs will be made in 1969, at an estimated cost of $75,000.

RECALLS OF DEFECTIVE MOTOR VEHICLES

Question No. 359-Mr. Mather:

Is the automobile industry required to report "call backs" of defective vehicles to the government and, if so, what departments are advised and what use is made of the information?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No, but the manufacturers have been voluntarily reporting on their call back campaigns. [Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

This matter is now under discussion with the industry to develop a permanent procedure for submitting their reports.

*COMPLETION OF POST OFFICE, PORT-AUX-CHOIX, NFLD.

Question No. 378-Mr. Marshall:

What steps are being taken to complete the Post Office at Port-Aux-Choix in Newfoundland now that the contractors have defaulted through bank-ruptcy?

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, tenders for the completion of the work were called and a contract has now been awarded.

REMOVAL OF HARBOUR WRECKS, SYDNEY, N.S.

Question No. 382—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

- 1. Did the Department of Transport, in 1965, contemplate the removal of wrecks in Sydney Harbour and, if so (a) how many were included in the project (b) were tenders called for their removal and what was the departmental estimate of cost for the job (c) how many bids were received and what was the amount in each case?
- 2. If tenders were called and bids received, what is the reason for not proceeding with the work?
- 3. Were alternate plans considered as, for instance, the removal only of those appearing above low water mark?
- 4. Did the Department regard the removal of these wrecks strictly on the ground that they might constitute a hazard to navigation or was the problem considered in the light of unsightliness and general harbour improvement?
- 5. Did the Department at anytime in recent years consider removal of the remains of old wharfs and other waterfront debris?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. (a) 14; (b) Yes, $30,000; (c) Four, $94,500; $177,000; $210,930; $234,000.

- 2. The lowest bid was more than three times the estimate and was considered excessive for the work to be performed.
 - 3. No.
- 4. The removal of these wrecks was regarded strictly on the ground that they might constitute a hazard to navigation.
 - 5. No.

HARBOUR WRECK REMOVAL, SYDNEY, N.S.

Question No. 383—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. Did the Department of National Defence authorize the removal of defence structures at Petrie Point by the Royal Canadian Engineers as a "training exercise"?

- 2. Was consideration and approval given by the Department within the past year to instituting a similar "training exercise" for the Royal Canadian Navy using R.C.N. underwater personnel to remove wrecks in Sydney Harbour and, if not, for what reasons?
- 3. On what basis did the Department decide (a) that the Petrie Point demolition project was a "suitable" training exercise (b) that the Sydney Harbour job was an "unsuitable" one?
- 4. Did the Department view the Sydney Harbour project as one where all wrecks and obstructions above and below water mark, would be demolished or did it envisage only removal of those wrecks appearing above water at low tide?
- 5. In estimating the cost of the proposed Sydney Harbour job, was consideration given to the fact that expenses connected with the operation of an R.C.N. underwater team would have to be met in large part wherever they were carrying on routine training and operations, whether it be at Sydney Harbour, Halifax or elsewhere?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

- 2. Yes; however, it was not approved as it was understood that private diving companies had tendered bids and it was felt that the Canadian armed forces should not enter into a project which might conflict with local commercial interests. In addition, it was not considered that any valuable or progressive training could be derived from this work.
- 3. (a) Of several defence structures at Petrie Point only a three storey concrete tower was selected for demolition. This provided an opportunity at a minimal cost for military engineers to practice a demolition technique that would not otherwise have been possible. (b) The evaluation of the project was based on a survey carried out by divers of the maritime command. The hulks were too rotten and dilapidated for reflotation techniques and very little explosive demolition work would be involved.
 - 4. Both were considered.
 - 5. Yes.

TRAINING IN UNDERWATER DEMOLITION

Question No. 384—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

- 1. Where do Royal Canadian Navy personnel receive training in underwater demolition and what is the average cost in round figures of training a single R.C.N. diver in such work?
- 2. Does this training consist of theoretical problems or does it include actual demolition of wrecks and do R.C.N. divers receive continuing training in underwater demolition in Canadian harbours and coastal waters or do they receive "refresher" courses?

 $29180 - 101\frac{1}{2}$

Questions

- 3. How often in the past ten years have R.C.N. divers been used to demolish wrecks in Canadian waters and at what locations?
- 4. Does the Department consider it necessary to restrict R.C.N. underwater personnel to the Halifax area to effectively meet emergency requirements rather than employ them on routine tasks along the Eastern seaboard?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. Halifax, Nova Scotia, approximately $600.00.

- 2. The training involved prepares the diver to carry out the following tasks: (a) sandbar removal and channel widening; (b) demolishing concrete, brick, masonary and wooden structures; (c) ice removal; (d) rock blasting; (e) remove propellors; (f) cut wood, metal or other materials explosively; (g) excavate explosively; and consists of both theoretical and practical problems but does not include the demolition of wrecks by explosives. The diver's continuing training requirement is met through an annual operational commitment with the Department of Transport, DEW line replenishment program.
- 3. Twice, in 1959, the approaches to Halifax harbour and in 1965, Trois-Rivières harbour. Both incidents were to remove navigational hazards.
- 4. Yes, this permits the maritime commander to effect more economical control in meeting operational and emergency requirements. Within the operational diving unit there is a mobile element which is available to meet emergency demands along the eastern seaboard and elsewhere.

JURISDICTION OVER WRECK REMOVAL, SYDNEY HARBOUR

Question No. 385—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

Did the Department of Justice receive a request from the Cape Breton Regional Planning Commission for an opinion as to the jurisdiction in which removal of wrecks in Sydney Harbour might fall as between governments and/or departments of government and, if so, has this opinion been rendered and what were its terms?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No.

SALARY INCREASES FOR SEMI-STAFF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Question No. 391-Mr. Peddle:

Has the government given consideration to salary increases for postal employees in "semi-staff offices" in view of recent increases granted to employees in "staff offices" and, if so, when will such increase become effective?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Postal employees in semi staff offices are in the revenue postal operations group in the operational category. The Canadian Postmasters Association was certified by the public service staff relations board on April 18, 1968, as the bargaining agent for the employees in this group. Negotiations with the C.P.A. commenced on May 29, 1968. Agreement was reached on all matters, including pay, on October 17, 1968. Increases will be made effective retroactive to October 1, 1966.

STUDENT LOAN PLAN

Question No. 414-Mr. Harding:

For each fiscal year since the inception of the Student Loan Plan (a) how many students from each province received loans (b) what was the total amount for each province (c) how many applicants were refused loans (d) what was the actual cost to the federal government?

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES, RICHMOND CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 436-Mr. Beaudoin:

How many federal civil servants, by department or agency, were employed in the constituency of Richmond in each of the years from 1962 to 1967 inclusive and how many are working there in 1968?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): It is impossible to compile the data sought in this question because the duties of public employees are not assigned on the basis of electoral constituencies.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES, RICHMOND CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 438-Mr. Beaudoin:

- 1. What has the federal government spent in the constituency of Richmond for each fiscal year from 1962 to 1968 inclusive, and what is the estimated amount for the current fiscal year?
- 2. For each of these fiscal years, in what fields were such funds spent, and what are the estimates, by field, for the current fiscal year?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): It is impossible to provide a general statement of expenditures by the government of Canada in entities such as constituencies and municipalities. The budgetary estimates are not prepared in relation to such entities; nor are expenditures recorded in this way. It would be possible to give information concerning expenditures when a definite work, program, or beneficiary is mentioned in the question. In some cases, of course, these concern a particular constituency or a particular municipality.

Questions

ARDA ASSISTANCE, RICHMOND CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 441-Mr. Beaudoin:

- 1. How many companies will receive government help under ARDA in the federal constituency of Richmond?
- 2. What companies?
- 3. What amount will be provided for each of them?

[Translation]

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): None.

POPULATION STATISTICS, RICHMOND CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 442-Mr. Beaudoin:

- 1. According to the last census, how many persons are there in the constituency of Richmond?
- 2. How many live in rural areas, and how many in urban areas?
- 3. How many are less than twenty-one years of age and how many are twenty-one or over?
- 4. Does the Dominion Bureau of Statistics foresee major changes in the number of people living in urban areas or rural areas and, if so, what will be the trend?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: According to the 1966 Census of Canada, there were 64,150 persons living in the riding of Richmond. Of this total 33,206 were living in rural areas and 30,944 in urban areas, based on rural-urban census definitions. By age of distribution, 33,211 were under 21 years of age, and 30,939 were 21 years or over.

While precise data on which to base projections as to future rural-urban ratios are not available, possibly the trend between 1961 and 1966 provides an indication of prospects in the immediate future if the same trend continues. The total population of the riding declined by 2,800 in the 1961-66 period—urban dropped by 600 and rural by 2,200. Rural comprised 53% of the total population in 1961 and 52% in 1966.

LEGAL OPINION ON MONTREAL TAX CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 449-Mr. Valade:

During the period April 4, 1967 to July 4, 1968, did Mayor Jean Drapeau request an opinion on the legality of the "Voluntary Contribution to Montreal taxes" from the Minister of Justice or the Department of Justice and, if so, what was the substance of this opinion and when was it given?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—DELAY IN USE OF HERCULES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would explain to the house why the Hercules planes do not appear to be actually engaged in flying food and medical supplies into Nigeria. According to the reports we were led to believe the government of Nigeria had, in fact, no objection and had approved of food and medical supplies being flown to Biafra.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the problem is that the International Red Cross has not been able to obtain the necessary clearance from all the governments involved. We have expressed our concern to the International Red Cross in the strongest possible terms. Our planes are there; they are available, and we want them to fly supplies. We feel that the Red Cross are doing the best they can to obtain the necessary clearance.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the government of Canada making any representations directly to the government of Nigeria in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition will remember that the arrangement was that we would supply our aircraft to the Red Cross, and the Red Cross undertook to obtain the necessary clearances. The personnel are there. There are advance crews which have done as much advance work as they can, but they are now waiting for clearance. There are important matters involved other than merely clearing with the Nigerian authorities. Overflight and landing permission has to be obtained from the Biafran authorities and also from the new state of Equatorial Guinea. These are the things which are bogging down the Red Cross.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I follow up these questions, Mr. Speaker, by asking the right hon. gentleman whether, in view of the hold-up at Lagos and other places, the government would not consider making the Hercules available to the church organizations at Sao Tome, from which planes have been flying into Biafra quite regularly.

Mr. Trudeau: We can, of course, always consider this. However, I do not think it is the time now to believe that the Red Cross will fail in its attempt to achieve these clearances. We have to select a channel and assume that it will succeed. We cannot tell the Red Cross we are going to supply them with planes and then tell them we are going to take them back and supply the planes to some other body. If the Red Cross are working for clearances for our planes we have to assume they are doing the best they can.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: Has the Prime Minister any reason for confidence that the Red Cross will succeed without the assistance of governments, such as the government of Canada, in bringing pressure upon the authorities in Nigeria to make the necessary arrangements?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course we do not have any assurance of that, Mr. Speaker, but our whole position all along on this, which I still believe is the right one, is that since Nigeria is a friendly country we do not want to take initiatives of our own in this area. I think everyone agreed—this was the kind of pressure brought to bear by the opposition and by various sections of the informed public—that we should put planes at the disposition of the Red Cross authorities, and this we have done after receiving certain assurances from the government at Lagos. Now, Mr. Speaker, we can only be optimistic that the Red Cross will succeed.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, arising out of the answer of the Prime Minister and the telegram that was sent to U Thant by the head of the World Council of Churches in respect to their relief program for Biafra, which suggested that only a cease fire could now prevent acute mass starvation.

Would the Prime Minister not reconsider the position taken by his government and directly bring pressure to bear on Great Britain and other countries to stop shipping arms into Nigeria? Would he also not reconsider his position and take action to bring the matter before the United Nations with a view to preventing this mass starvation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, not only are we prepared to reconsider our position but we do reconsider it every day, and we keep coming to the conclusion that our position is the only realistic one.

I would ask the members of the house, and the members of the Canadian public to reflect on our position here. After all, very often the same people who blame us now blame the United States for involving itself in a civil Inquiries of the Ministry war in Viet Nam and helping one side, when a few years ago the United States thought it would only send a few observers there. I do not think hon. members would want this country to become involved in the same kind of civil war and face the same kind of conflict.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that it involves participation in the war for the government of Canada to bring this matter before the United Nations, or to bring pressure upon Great Britain and other countries to cease shipping arms into Nigeria?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that. The Leader of the Opposition's question was a broader one, and was asking us to reconsider our whole policy. Our whole policy is based on this presumption, that civil wars have happened before, and that when other foreign countries intervene in civil wars to seek a solution in their own way they generally find they are drawn into the civil war in a way they do not desire.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, there is no more reason to think Canada has any justification for telling the Nigerian government how to settle its civil war than the United States might have for telling some other government how to settle theirs. I am sure the house knows the logic behind some of the positions that have been taken by, among others, distinguished members of the New Democratic party, which now seem to lead them to think that we should be shipping arms to Biafra. This is the kind of logic, Mr. Speaker, that you get into when you try to settle other people's internal affairs.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

According to news reports which he must have heard as we did, airplanes carrying food supplies to Biafra also had thousands of beer bottles on board. Is the Prime Minister in a position to tell us whether this beer is intended for the Biafrans, the Red Cross representatives, or simply for the Canadian staff which is taking it to Biafra?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with the Minister of National Defence and as he is more qualified than I am in to deal with this kind of problem, I yield him the floor.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I hope everyone is not being too unfair towards the personnel of the Canadian air force.

One of the three planes which is now in Recife carried 400 half cases of beer, that is, 3,600 bottles, to the 71 members of the personnel which is to operate out of Santa Isabella, where there is no drinking water. That, Mr. Speaker, comes to an average of two bottles of beer per man per month, not counting week-ends.

It has also been said in some circles, Mr. Speaker—I insist on this because it should be corrected and I heard it myself on television—that we were guilty of criminal negligence by transporting beer instead of food. I must point out that we have never asked that Canadian planes carry food from Canada into Biafra, but merely that they be ready to carry relief supplies for the victims of disaster from Fernando Po or inside Nigeria itself. I think it is very important, at this time, not to be unfair towards the personnel which is now over there.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I put my question in the form of an appeal to the Prime Minister in connection with the shipment of food and medicines to the tens of thousands who stand in imminent danger of an early death. Since the government either by intention or through inertia will not act to bring this matter before the United Nations, will the Prime Minister set aside a day-say the day after tomorrow —and have a resolution brought before this house so the Canadian people can express to the government and to the world the need for action? Set aside these legal technicalities and niceties which can only result, if they are followed, in the extermination of a people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: However great its humanitarian objectives may be, is there not a desire on the part of the government to do something? This house will give you the power to act. Will you place the matter before us?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the question phrased by way of an appeal by the right hon. gentleman really is an indication that opposition members on his side of the house do not know how to solve this problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Give us a chance.

this house to set up a parliamentary committee to look into all aspects of this situation. The parliamentary committee is meeting. It has heard all kinds of arguments from all sides. I do not think there is any reason to suppose that we should go beyond or beside what the parliamentary committee is doing, before hearing its report. I think it is a great mistake to leave with the Canadian people the feeling that there is an easy solution to any of this, or that we should in any sense intervene in a civil war in Africa. If we were to do that we should be faced with the consequence similar to that faced by other white nations which are intervening in Viet Nam. Those white nations are being accused of telling the yellow races what to do. We should be in the same position in Africa if we went in there and told them how to settle their civil war.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister's answer certainly did not deserve the applause of an almost overwhelming number of Liberal members in this house.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman seems to be making a little speech instead of asking a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I like audience participation, particularly from those who do not usually take part on these occasions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. If he will permit me to say so, may I suggest that we are asking for an answer to a question and not to a straw man the Prime Minister has set up. I say that because no member of this parliament has suggested that Canada should intervene directly or indirectly to find a solution to the problem in Nigeria.

Has the Prime Minister on that basis, not on any basis he has set up or which anyone may have suggested to him, reconsidered placing the matter before the appropriate agency of the United Nations for a discussion of the possibility of a cease fire, something which both sides in Nigeria might welcome and which all members of the O.A.U. might welcome? This is the question we are placing before the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: It is hardly a straw man, Mr. that if the de Speaker, because some persons very well will be taken?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: A few days ago they asked known to the hon. member are not asking for is house to set up a parliamentary commit-

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that no member of this house, not even the Prime Minister, has a right to refer to evidence given before a committee of this parliament—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: Hold your horses before you bray.

An hon. Member: Cheaper and cheaper.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly state his point of order.

Mr. Lewis: I suggest that no member of this house, not even the Prime Minister, has a right to refer to evidence given to a parliamentary committee and to distort that evidence when replying in the house. No witness appearing before that committee, certainly not the one who is well known to me, as the Prime Minister said, suggested an increase in fire. What was suggested was that if arms are to continue to be delivered to one side the only way to produce a stalemate and an end to the war might be through the provision of arms to the other side.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the Prime Minister's earlier statement about difficulties in connection with Hercules aircraft in providing relief supplies direct to Biafra, may I ask whether special efforts are now being made by the government or the Red Cross to have these aircraft deliver supplies to that area of Biafra now under Nigerian control, particularly in the south where there have been many reports of serious starvation?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, some efforts are being made in that direction. We were asking whether the Red Cross had been able to arrange for permission to proceed to Port Harcourt, but we understand this has not yet been granted; clearance has not been obtained there. However, we are given to understand there is some possibility that flights to Calabar in the same area will begin tomorrow.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Has the government considered giving notice to the Red Cross that a deadline will be imposed, and that if the deadline is not met other action will be taken?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: The idea of a deadline is an interesting one, though I am not sure it could operate as the hon. member suggests. If the Red Cross were to report that it was unable to carry out this operation within a specific number of days it might be reasonable to suggest that our aircraft should proceed to other areas, including Canada, where they might be more useful. If on the other hand the Red Cross is doing its best, and we have no reason to believe that any other organization could do better, there does not seem much reason why a deadline should operate in an attempt to force the Red Cross to do more than its best. We must assume they are doing all they can to solve this problem.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Can the right hon, gentleman advise the house why these Canadian Hercules airplanes were allowed to leave Canada before clearance had been arranged?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence another question.

I wish to refer again to the beer aboard the Hercules. The minister told us earlier that there were only 3,600 bottles of beer meant for 71 people working in a spot where there is no drinking water. Would it not have been as easy to send them drinking water, which would have been better for their health than beer that might help them to become intoxicated while over there?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that question was asked, because it gives me the opportunity to clear up a point I should have mentioned earlier. The beer sent there was bought with private and not public funds, and I think that is a very important distinction.

Now, as to providing water instead of beer, we have tried to do for the best and we have also sent soft drinks.

[English]

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to pursue the analogy given by the Prime Minister, but I would like to ask him whether the United States at any time brought the question of the Vietnamese war before the United Nations prior to sending in armed forces. Did it in fact call for a cease fire before the United Nations?

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Prime Minister is as a result of what he has said this afternoon. Does he agree that the theory of peace restoring as advocated by the Minister of Transport, formerly the minister of national defence, is no longer tenable?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN EFFORTS TO EFFECT SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the government presently making an intervention in order to bring about a settlement of the basic Near East problems between Israel and the Arab states, with particular reference to the lingering Arab refugee problem and the question of disputed boundaries? I ask this question in view of the recent visit to Canada by the foreign minister of the United Arab Republic and the present visit by the foreign minister of Israel.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that members of the government, including myself, have been meeting with the foreign ministers of these two countries. We are doing everything we can to ensure that there will be a continuation of the Jarring mission at the United Nations in the hope that a solution will be found to these problems.

APPLICATION OF 12 MILE FISHERIES LIMIT TO ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement that a major territorial battle is shaping up between Canadian vessels and French trawlers operating out of France's territorial islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, will the Prime Minister indicate what action his government is contemplating to resolve this jurisdictional dispute over fishery limits?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will consult his roster he will find that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is due to be here tomorrow.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—COURT DECISION RESPECTING LEASED RESERVE LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question on a domestic matter to the Minister of Justice. I posed it on Friday but was not able to get an answer. If I could rephrase my question in case the minister has not read it, it related to a decision by county court judge Kirke Smith of British Columbia that Indian reserve land surrendered for lease is in fact no longer reserve land. Because of the dangerous precedent set by this decision, what action is the government taking to cope with this situation and perhaps reverse the decision?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will look into that judgment, Mr. Speaker. I must see whether it is going to be appealed before making any definitive statement here.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STUDY OF TELEVISING HOUSE OR COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw a question to the attention of either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State. Could encouragement be given at this session of the house to a study by a committee of the house, perhaps by the committee on procedure, into the question of televising at least some of the proceedings of the House of Commons or of some of its committees?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I certainly think that consideration can be given to that question, but I do not think I am wrong in saying that this comes mainly within your own authority, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DIFFERENCE IN RATES FOR NEWSPAPERS AND OTHER SECOND CLASS MAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speakdaily newspapers and a flat rate for all other of the alliance, and there I suppose we can publications sent as second class mail?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think we are going to be discussing that later on in the day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF ZWEIBRUCKEN BASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I think it was on October 4 that the minister said the government was reconsidering its decision to close the Canadian base at Zweibrucken in Germany. Will the minister say whether this review has been completed and, if so, what decision has been reached?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to check what I said on October 4. I would be very surprised if I said we were reconsidering this question. This is part of the over-all review of the national defence and external affairs policy, and no decision has been arrived at yet. No conclusions have been drawn from that study; therefore there is no change in the position we have taken about Zweibrucken.

NATO-REPORTED INCREASE IN MILITARY BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to pose a supplementary question. On Friday I addressed it to the Prime Minister, and perhaps the Minister of National Defence could either answer it now or take it as notice. It was with regard to reports that the budget of NATO will be increased over the next five years. Have representations been made to Canada to increase its NATO budget over the next period of years and, if so, what has been Canada's response?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I know that some representations were made to Canada concerning the NATO commitment. Naturally by implication that would mean an increased budget, but the study we are going on with is not completed yet, and as far as the eventual position that Canada can take is concerned I think we will er, I would like to direct a question to the have to wait until the NATO alliance meeting Postmaster General. Could the minister tell takes place in November, at which we will the house why there will be a split rate for discuss the over-all problems with members establish what the position is.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Minister of National Defence. Is he aware of recent statements that there is a great difference emerging between the United States and Canadian defence departments interpretation of NORAD and its relationship to the A.B.M. system? In view of this will the minister undertake to make a statement to the house tomorrow?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this question is very clear. The situation now is that the United States government has decided to proceed with what is called the sentinel system, in which some A.B.M.'s would be installed on American soil. Our interest concerns how the sentinel system is correlated with the further development of North American air defence. We are keeping informed of the technological developments taking place, because we know that as a country Canada could eventually get involved in the North American defence system.

Mr. Schreyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if the minister would like clarification of my question I would be happy to oblige and rephrase it.

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK-FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT CONFERENCE ON RAIL LINK

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Same answer.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): In view of Premier Bennett's statement that he will be glad to hear from all interested parties at the hearing tomorrow to discuss the Roberts Bank missing rail link, will the federal government be represented at this meeting?

Mr. Trudeau: I can only give the same answer. The Minister of Transport is not here according to the roster today.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In [Mr. Cadieux (Labelle).]

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I name is not on the roster, was he given spewish to direct a related question to the cial permission to be here for today's question period?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker-

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt if the question is in order.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON CONCENTRATION OF OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In the light of the C.R.T.C. decision concerning radio station CHSJ at Saint John, New Brunswick, is it the policy of the government to break up concentration of ownership and control over communications media serving specific communities in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he is now asking for a general policy statement which should be made on motions rather than by way of answer to a question at this time.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might rephrase my question to bring it into line with your ruling. If the government has plans to break up monopolies in mass communications media in Canada in specific communities, would the responsible minister make such a statement in the house outlining the guide lines that have been established, and make these available to the house and to the general public of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The question is under consideration, Mr. Speaker. As soon as the policy has been defined concerning the instructions to be given to the C.R.T.C. in that connection, I will be happy to make a statement in the house, as requested by the member.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION RESPECTING SNIFFING OF AEROPLANE GLUE, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. It is in connection with a view of the fact that the Postmaster General's question I asked him on October 15 regarding

Inquiries of the Ministry will the government bring forward glue sniffing, to which I believe he replied that he would take the question under consideration. Since that time another death has occurred in Ottawa as the result of a similar type of activity. Could the minister now give us further information as to what action his department is considering?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the question concerning whether the law is to be changed to make glue sniffing an offence is not one which comes directly under my responsibility. The inference I take from the question is that presumably it should be made an offence under the Criminal Code. That would be a matter for the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Saltsman: I wonder then whether I might direct the question to the Minister of Justice and ask him whether his department is giving consideration to the question of legislation that would make glue sniffing an illegal offence.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): We are. I believe the hazardous substances legislation which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would have some bearing on the subject of a remedy such as that sought by the hon. member and other hon. members of the house.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister designated as the minister of regional development. Will the minister answer my question of September 19 regarding whether a committee of the house will be established to deal with matters concerning the national capital?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Eventually, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FERRY SERV-ICES, SAINT JOHN, N.B.-DIGBY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask this question of the acting minister of transport but will ask it instead of the acting acting minister of transport. Further to the questions asked in this house on September 16 and 20 will the minister indicate the intentions of the government with regard to the Saint John-Digby ferry service?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am afraid I will have to explain again how the roster system is intended to work. Even if the acting minister were here it would not be up to him to answer the question. The idea is to have questions in respect of departmental areas answered on a given day.

Mr. Bell: I thank the Prime Minister for explaining this, but will the Prime Minister also explain why the people of Saint John and Digby are expected to wait, after the promises he made in the last election on this matter, whether ministers are here or not?

COMBINES

REPORTED STATEMENT BY DIRECTOR ON SALES OF CALIFORNIA GRAPES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, and arises from a statement made last Friday by the director of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act. He is reported as having said, and I quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask questions in this manner. He must ask the question directly.

Mr. Schreyer: In view of the fact that the director of investigation has said that if a large number of Canadian retail stores were to stop buying California grapes he would be compelled to launch an immediate investigation, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether this public servant in making this remark was acting with the advice or consent of the government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated that the question cannot be accepted in this manner.

Inquiries of the Ministry INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Is the minister considering moving the northern desk in his department from Ottawa to the Yukon?

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In the realization that the Prime Minister is getting older I should like to ask whether the government will accede to the request of several thousand older people in Montreal that a company of elderly Canadians be established to engage in social action programs.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister tell the house whether the Minister of Fisheries speaks on Canadian policy with one voice within Canada and another voice when addressing audiences in the United States, as was the case recently when he addressed a banquet in Boston, I believe it was, on Friday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is argumentative, and is certainly not in the proper form.

CANADIAN YOUTH PARLIAMENT

REQUEST FOR RECONVENING OF AD HOC COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question for the right hon. Prime Minister arises out of an undertaking given to the house on October 1 to the effect that the Prime Minister would discuss with the house leader the possibility of reconvening the ad hoc committee on the proposed Canadian youth parliament. Will the Prime Minister now say whether a decision has been reached on this matter?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No decision has been reached yet.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Can the Prime Minister indicate to the house when he will reach a decision with regard to the youth parliament?

[Mr. Speaker.]

DRUGS

AVAILABILITY OF VACCINE TO COMBAT INFLUENZA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On September 27 the minister indicated that he would undertake to look into the question of the availability of vaccine to combat a possible influenza epidemic. Is the minister as yet in a position to report to the house?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, I have a reply which I forwarded to the hon. member for Simcoe North. Unfortunately he is not in the house today.

Mr. Monteith: Did I understand the Minister to say that he has given a reply in the house?

Mr. Munro: No. I have forwarded a reply to the hon, member for Simcoe North.

TRADE

FROZEN COD FISH-LOSS OF U.S. MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On Friday last the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs agreed to give a statement today in respect of the declining market conditions in the United States with relation to one of the staple products of the eastern Atlantic. Could the Prime Minister say who has been designated to make the statement today in view of the absence of the minister?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The statement will be given by the minister when he is in the house.

Mr. Lundrigan: The Fisheries Council of Canada is meeting today, and it was imperative that some statement be given by the government in relation to the marketing of this particular product. We posed questions to the minister on Friday, and he agreed that he would make a statement today. This is on record in Friday's Hansard. We were hoping that if the minister were not here, since he is not obliged to be here according to the roster, some person would be designated to make such a statement.

FINANCE

CONSULTATIONS RESPECTING PROPOSED SECURITIES COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the designated absence of the different ministers concerned I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has been in consultation with his colleagues the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Finance concerning the establishment of a national securities commission, as advocated by many provincial authorities and many financial organizations in this country.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether the hon, member can ask if there has been a consultation between members of the cabinet. Perhaps he might like to phrase the question in another way.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Under the rules now imposed by the Prime Minister there is no other possible way. If the Prime Minister will not assume his reponsibilities we must—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT PLAN FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the designated minister of regional development. I should like to ask him whether it is still the intention that the Atlantic Development Board will bring forward a plan for the economic development of the Atlantic provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Atlantic Development Board will submit its report as usual.

Inquiries of the Ministry

General. In view of the decision not to reappoint a joint committee on penitentiaries, is it the intention of the minister to have the estimates of his department referred to the appropriate committee as speedily as possible, in order that penitentiary matters can be discussed?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that they already had been referred to the committee.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East, the estimates of the Solicitor General were referred to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs on October 16.

CONTINUATION OF HOUSE DISCUSSION ON POST OFFICE BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the President of the Privy Council. To clear up an ambiguity and assuage the anxiety of the Postmaster General, could the President of the Privy Council inform the house the intentions of the government with regard to the post office bill, and tell us whether it will be proceeded with today and tomorrow or just today, as appears from Hansard of Friday?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it would be the intention to continue with the post office bill until it has been completed. We are hopeful that we might complete the committee stage by tonight, but if that is not the case we will continue with it as the first order of business tomorrow and thereafter until it is completed, interrupted only by the budget speech tomorrow night.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon, gentleman indicate when we will be proceeding with the farm loan bills, which this party has twice agreed to facilitate in order that the benefits thereof may be available at once to the farmers?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, both bills would have been passed by this evening if hon. members opposite had been agreeable to that being done. We will proceed with these bills just as soon as we have completed the post office bill.

Inquiries of the Ministry have a question for the President of the Privy is a speech made by Mr. Masse. Council. I wonder whether, as house leader, he would consider bringing in the cash advances legislation ahead of the farm credit bill. The cash advances legislation is non-controversial and could be passed quite easily this evening; then the money would quickly be made available to the farmers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, both bills could have been passed by this evening if hon. gentlemen opposite had agreed to the formula we discussed the other night.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it should be made clear that publicly, in the house, this party agreed that the cash advances bill could be put through last Friday in one day. We agreed that all stages of the bill could be put through at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TELEVISION

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION ON EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State.

Can the hon, minister tell us when he will be able to introduce in the house his bill concerning school telecasts?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the introduction of the bill itself, I could not give a specific answer to the hon. member. With regard to an announcement on that subject, it will be made very soon in the house before the end of this week.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, with regard to this proposal which the hon. minister has just referred to, can he tell us whether the Quebec provincial authorities have been approached about this matter and whether the details have been discussed?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, the project was made public more than a year ago and I do not know whether this answers the hon. member's question. A public speech has been

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I of the province on that subject. In this case it

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to state my question precisely. Has the government or the minister responsible been himself in communication with the Quebec authorities.

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, when I came to this department, we had passed the stage of communication and consultations. I do not know what my predecessor had done.

HIGHWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works who, according to the roster, is here today. I ask the minister whether he has any plans for a national highway building conference, in order that we can deal with the prospects of a second trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AFFECTING RATES, ADMINISTRATION, SAVINGS BANK

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-116, to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I listened to hon. members during the debate on the resolution preceding the bill to amend the Post Office Act, I was impressed and pleased by the interest shown by hon. members on both sides of this house in the Post Office Department. Their interest reflects an understanding, I believe, of what the Glassco royal commission on government organization called the post office's role as a unifying force throughout the country.

The legislation before the house incorporates certain administrative changes and certain changes in rates on those classes of mail the responsibility for which rests with parliament, namely, first and second class mail. The details of those changes in rates have made by an hon. minister of the province of already been announced. At this stage I pro-Quebec, which seems to express the position pose to give the house as much information as possible on the background to those changes, the reasons for them and the implications of them. To that end all hon, members have received copies of a financial statement which sets out in greater detail than I would be able to do in a set speech the statistical background to these changes. Copies were distributed to all members of the house on Friday morning, I believe, and others are still available.

Perhaps I can deal first with principle and then move on to a discussion of specific practice. The post office account, that is, revenues compared to expenditures, was last in balance in the fiscal year 1956-57. This fiscal year, assuming no change in rates, we forecast a deficit of $100 million. Next fiscal year, again assuming no change, the deficit is anticipated to be in the order of $130 million. Exact comparisons between the figures of today and those of the past cannot be made because, as the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has noted, there has been a change in the basis of cost accounting, the essential effect of which is to charge the post office for all its real expenditures such as depreciation of buildings and equipment. However, as stated in the 1968 annual report issued by my prodecessor, "The recording of these figures by the Canada Post Office gives an accurate picture of the financial situation as it is today." In other words, we are dealing with a real deficit of $100 million this year and a real deficit of about $130 million next fiscal year.

Hon. members have raised, and rightly so, the question of whether and why a particular government agency should strive toward a balance between revenues and expenditures. In explanation I would make these points: First, the post office deficit, while it has always existed, is in the process today of reaching critical as well as chronic proportions. A deficit such as the $130 million envisaged next year is simply unsupportable. Unless controlled it will escalate out of sight.

Second, this bill is aimed not at striking a balance but at reducing the deficit to manageable proportions. A balance is not to be achieved solely by raising rates. The new projected deficit for 1969-70 is $40 million, after the adoption of these changes, not $130 million. This gap of $40 million we hope to close by substantially increasing our productivity and efficiency.

Third, while the post office is aiming toward a narrowing of the gap between revenues and expenditures, it is not our intention to do so in every area of the service. As I shall explain more fully in a moment, as a matter of social policy we intend to accept at this time to run a deficit, that is, to extend a subsidy to certain areas and services, notably to Canadians living in rural areas and to the Canadian publishing industry.

Fourth, the consequences of a deficit, even when the deficit has assumed the proportions we are now facing, are more serious and more damaging to the country as a whole than the size of the deficit itself would suggest. Quite simply, the money has to come from somewhere and that somewhere is the taxpayer. If the post office runs a chronic and substantial deficit, the result is that taxpayers who make little use of the post office services are required to subsidize, either directly through taxes or indirectly through lowered government expenditures in other areas, such as health, education or whatever it may be, those Canadian individuals and business concerns who do make an extensive use of the post office. It means in effect that the financial burden is being distributed unfairly, and this I intend to stop.

Having taken the decision to reduce the post office deficit, we in the department have operated on two bedrock principles, both of which are incorporated in the legislation before you. The first is that the user shall pay for what he uses; the second is that social justice and national need require specific subsidies for specific areas or organizations.

The principle that the user shall pay for what he uses is an extension of the point I made a moment ago. If the user does not pay, then non-users will. This concept was enunciated on page after page of the Glassco commission report, and among many examples I would like to cite the commission's declaration at page 383 of volume 3. It reads as follows:

—charges be made for all services rendered to the public and the amounts thereof be so established as to recover the full cost to the government of the service supplied.

Now there has been for many years one instance of non-users subsidizing the users of the postal services which has given me considerable concern. In studying the graph of post office sales and costs contained on page 4 of the background financial statement, hon. members will have noted that the gap, while always present, has assumed its present critical proportions only within the last several years. The principal reason for this is that wages, salaries and fringe benefits for the 48,000 post office employees now amount to 63.9 per cent of our total annual costs; in other words, 64 per cent of our total costs are labour. The settlement of last summer's major dispute alone amounted to over $30 million. Other collective agreements signed recently for supervisors, and only last Friday for postmasters, raise the figure to over $40 million. In other words, post office employees want wages and salaries commensurate with the services they render to the users of postal services. They refuse to subsidize those users through their wages, and I agree with them.

We in the Post Office Department are now faced with a real world. Our costs, in accounting terms, are real; so is our wage bill. We intend by this legislation to cope with that real world.

In our approach to this problem we have utilized a combination of three well known techniques for bringing deficits into line. We have improved and will improve even more our efficiency; we have cut unnecessary services so the public is no longer charged for a service it neither needs nor uses; and, finally, we have increased our rates.

Believe me, as a freshman minister I would have been delighted to escape the firing line, provided that efficiency and reduced services could by themselves solve the problem. They cannot, however, and to pretend otherwise would be to mislead the public and this house.

We are taking the following steps to reduce operating costs:

We have instituted a program to close down smaller post offices where expenditures clearly are much more than revenues.

We are amalgamating rural routes wherever it is clearly more economical to do so. This has the advantage of providing the mail contractors with a relatively more remunerative contract.

We are establishing distribution centres across Canada which will make the handling of mail more economical and more efficient.

As new post office buildings are erected new mechanized mail handling equipment is installed, providing for easier and faster movement of mail within postal installations while facilitating the work of our employees.

In the planning of post office buildings care is taken to provide for better and more economical plant utilization.

[Mr. Kierans.]

Letter carriers use small trucks to deliver mail where conditions so warrant.

Experiments are being carried out to find the most economical means of transporting mail within the larger urban centres.

New zoning systems are being implemented in larger urban centres which will be integrated into a code system if and when such a code is warranted on the basis of costs and service.

There are many other areas where efforts are made to reduce costs: In particular, in better financial management, in the review and preparation of departmental estimates for the next year and for five years ahead; in the organization of a long range planning division; in the installation of a total information service so that decisions will be taken on the basis of statistics, data and facts gathered through scientific modern systems; and in research and development in the communications field.

Hon. members may justifiably question why all of these steps taken together are yet insufficient. The immutable problems lie in the nature of the post office itself. We enjoy few economies of scale, and in this we are diffierent from most other industries and businesses but this is the nature of the post office. Each individual letter has to be individually handled and individually brought to the door of the recipient. The awaited breakthrough of automation in postal services has not come. Machines have been developed and tested but still problems remain. Not until optical scanners are perfected beyond their present stage of development, which will allow the reading of handwriting, can much greater savings be made in staff, and productivity in sorting substantially proved. I intend to request the scientists in the research branch of the new department of communications to tackle this problem as a matter of urgency to help the post office meet the challenge of change.

As part of this program, and as part of the drive to make our post office the most efficient in the world, I might mention two steps under way. First, we have initiated a thorough study of the post office by a task force composed of consultants and departmental officials to study every aspect of its operations and to consider the feasibility and/or desirability of establishing it as a crown corporation. At this point I can say no more except to assure hon. member that the

they will be kept informed. Second, we intend from this point forward to consider the post office not as an institution but as a function, that is, not so much as an organization in the business of moving mail but as an organization in the business of communications and therefore as one arm of the over-all communications industry. Perhaps the most immediate effect of this change in outlook will be in the field of research and in the prevention of possible overlapping of communications services and hence waste.

Before moving on to consider a reduction of unnecessary services, I should explain to hon. members that changes in efficiency are geared also to better serving the public. Currently the rural mail contractor may seek an increase once during the life of his contract if the costs incurred by him in rendering that contract have risen. Under the new legislation he will be able to apply for an increase three times during the life of that contract. This will result inevitably in an increased cost burden on the post office, but it will benefit rural mail contractors who have in the past, on occasion, been seriously inconvenienced by current cost increases for which they lack the means or the power to compensate.

Since 1954, when the last adjustment of first class rates was made, "all up" air service has been restricted to letters weighing eight ounces or less. We intend to improve the service for first class letters over eight ounces. At present, an eight ounce letter prepaid at the regular surface rate is given air transmission, whereas the sender of a letter weighing nine ounces must prepay his letter at the air mail rate to get the same service. While this situation could be justified originally because of a problem of space availability on aircraft, this no longer applies.

In terms of reduction of unnecessary services, and hence of a lowering of the over-all cost burden to the general public, the house is aware of the principal steps we have taken. We have decided to abolish the post office savings bank for which no apparent need any longer exists. We have decided to abolish the six day delivery schedule.

However, Mr. Speaker, in respect of the latter reduction in service it has become apparent as a result of representations made covered by the legislation before you, a foredirectly to me, and by members here including the 35 men good and true and the hon. a surplus of $12.4 million. Second class mail, member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), that a five day also covered by the bill, will shift from a delivery will cause serious hardship to forecast deficit of $54.6 million to $39.1 mil-Canadians living in rural areas who depend lion. The specific changes proposed for first progress of these studies will be rapid and upon Saturday delivery for, in particular, they will be kept informed. Second, we their newspapers. Hence, the six day delivery schedule will be maintained in rural areas. In making this decision we have been governed by the needs of our clients, the citizens living in rural areas, not by those of the newspapers though they will naturally be coincidental beneficiaries. As important as the principle that the user should pay for what he uses is the principle that Canadians, no matter where they are living, are entitled to equal government services to the maximum extent possible. This is why we charge the same amount for a letter sent from one address to another in Ottawa as for a letter sent from Ottawa to Resolute Bay, although in the latter instance we incur a loss. This is why, on the basis of social need and justice, I have instructed my officials to proceed with the discontinuance of Saturday delivery in urban centres where demand is minimal and to continue Saturday delivery in rural areas where the demand is substantial. Plainly this will reduce the gross amount of the projected savings, but I am confident some of the net loss can be recovered by our program already mentioned to amalgamate rural routes. In addition no matter the cost, the service is justified.

> Let me say that we have already made efforts, and more will be made, to increase productivity and reduce unnecessary expenditures. A wide gap remains. It is of the order, as I have stated, of $100 million this year and $130 million next year. To close this gap taking into account the need for subsidies for those in rural areas and continued subsidies to the publishing industry, we have constructed an integrated scale of increases. Each individual increase is related, I would remain hon. members, to the others.

> Third class mail rates, which are at the discretion of the minister, have already been increased. As hon, members will note on page 3.2 of the financial statement, which sets out the effect of those changes in a full fiscal year, the two categories of third class mail, domestic and international and unaddressed householder, which would have been in a net deficit position of just under $30 million next year will be brought almost to balance at a deficit of $1.5 million.

> In the instance of first class mail, which is cast deficit of $28.7 million will be changed to will be abolished. Second, the rate for letters will be raised to six cents for the first ounce and four cents for the second ounce.

The local letter rate from a cost point of view can no longer be justified in Canada. It has become an anomaly. Initially a lower rate for local letters was charged on the grounds that such letters were received, sorted and delivered at the same post office. That is what a local letter rate meant. At that time most people had to go to the post office to receive their mail and the transfer was a simple one. This situation has now been changed considerably by the development of Canada and the establishment of letter carrier delivery and rural mail delivery. The increased revenue for first class mails anticipated by this legislation is $17.8 million for the remainder of 1968-69 and $42.7 million for the full fiscal year of 1969-70.

The letter rate moves up from five to six cents. I should like to repeat that there has been no substantial legislation affecting first class mail rates since 1954. Those were the days of the five cent pay telephone call and the five cent cup of coffee. We are now in the era of the 10 cent pay telephone call and, unfortunately, of the 15 cent cup of coffee. Yet we remain in the era of the five cent stamp.

Since first class rates affect every Canadian, I can perhaps usefully give the house background information on which to base its decision. About 75 per cent of first class mail originates from commercial concerns and only 25 per cent from private citizens. So that the bulk of the burden will fall on business, which can bear it, rather than on the man in the street. The average Canadian mails just one piece of mail a week, and the total cost to the average Canadian of this increase will be 49 cents a year, or $2 for the average-sized family. We are confident, Mr. Speaker, that this increase can be borne and, for those reasons. To assess the impact of the six cent rate on Canadians we have on page 1 and 2 of the appendix to the financial statement calculated first class rates as a percentage of average hourly earnings in manufacturing industries. In 1959, a decade ago, first class mail rates as a percentage of average hourly earnings stood at 2.9 per cent. In 1968 the six class mail are: First, the local drop letter rate cents. Obviously it is at its present level higher than for the post three years, when it was five cents. It is higher as an inevitable consequence of that increase. But given the increase in Canadian wages that will result from the sound economic policies of this administration, I am confident that the percentage will once again soon be at a post-war low.

> A secondary reason, Mr. Speaker, that we are confident the increase can be borne is the comparisons contained on pages 9.1 and 9.2 of the financial statement between first class rates in Canada and those in comparable countries. At the new level Canadians will mail letters to each other proportionately more cheaply by one half than citizens in Britain and West Germany, and more cheaply by one quarter than citizens of France. The only comparable country better off than ourselves is the United States, and here the difference is subfractional-2.4 per cent in Canada compared to 2.1 per cent in the United States. Everyone knows that this difference can be accounted for, given our geography and population distribution.

> I now want to deal at some length with the proposed increase in second class rates. This increase has been the subject of a great many representations to me personally and to members on both sides of the house. It has also been, as we are all aware, the subject of a great many editorials.

> Subsidization of Canadian publishing dates back to 1867 and confederation. This practice, undertaken to help disseminate information and ideas, is common to many countries, though I might mention that in Britain the post office, in an attempt to bring expenditures and revenues into balance, has recently abolished all preferential treatment for newspapers and periodicals.

In my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of all hon. members, there are sound reasons for subsidizing an industry which, as said in the O'Leary commission report, adds to the richness and vitality of Canadian life. To quote myself-and I ask the house's indulgence for so doing-the communication of ideas and information is the glue of confederation and the subsidy amounts to an additive to that glue. It is, nevertheless, sound practice, and, more than that, an essential democratic principle for the government to account cent rate stands at 2.41 per cent. At this level for all its expenditures to the taxpayers who it is lower than in any post-war year up to ultimately foot the bill. All subsidies to any 1964. It is lower even with the increase to six institution, however worthy, should be clearly identified as such, and justified on their own merits.

And, Mr. Speaker, this is what the house will be asked to do. The merit, need and purpose of the subsidy to the publishing industry might, at some other time, be the subject of debate by this house. That is a long term concern; our immediate concern is not the subsidy itself-it exists, it always has and I suppose it will continue to exist for a short time—but the amount of that subsidy.

That amount, I have to report, is reaching a staggering size. Second class rates were last altered in 1951, an even longer period than for first class rates. In that year the deficit, or subsidy, amounted to $13.5 million; by 1965-66 the sum had roughly doubled to $28.2 million. That doubling occurred over a span of 15 years. By next year, fiscal 1969-70, assuming no change in rates, we estimate a deficit or subsidy to the publishing industry of $54 million. But note this, Mr. Speaker: this time the doubling of the size of the subsidy has taken place over a span of only four years, not 15 years.

This rate of progression cannot be allowed to continue. Over the past 10 years alone the Canadian public has disbursed a total of approximately $300 million to publishers by way of a subsidy on second class mail rates, and all of this without debate or with very little debate by members of this house.

That, however, as I have just said, is not our present concern. What we propose to do in this bill is to cap the subsidy, to bring it under control for the first time in 17 years. At present our cost coverage for all types of publications, that is, revenues received as a percentage of audited costs, is 20.5 per cent. We recover approximately one-fifth of our costs in revenue. For some categories of publications—and I cite weekly newspapers as an example—we recover less than 10 per cent of our cost, 9.7 per cent to be exact. As a result of the changes incorporated in the bill, Mr. Speaker, our cost coverage for all types of publications will rise from 20.5 per cent to 53.5 per cent.

Here I would refer hon. members to page 11 of the financial statement distributed to them. They will note that we have graduated the cost coverage ratio according to different literal chaos in the transmission of internatypes of publications. In the case of weekly newspapers, which by their nature are the most economically vulnerable, the new cost the universal postal congresses to introduce coverage is only 13.2 per cent. These publica- some system of payment to compensate countions obviously will continue to be heavily tries for the expenses incurred in the delivery subsidized. For magazines, that segment of the industry most vulnerable to foreign competition, the cost coverage rises to 33 per cent. Finally, and here I am dealing with broad categories, for daily newspapers which in most instances enjoy a monopoly or virtual monopoly in their own area, the cost coverage is now set at 79.8 per cent.

In a parallel attempt to spread the burden as equitably as possible hon. members will have noted that while the per pound rate on the reading content of a daily newspaper is increased from 21 cents to 5 cents, or doubled, the per pound rate on the advertising content has been increased from 4 cents to 15 cents, or almost quadrupled. If these increases sound large, it is only because we are working up from such a low base. Newspapers with a low advertising content and who are therefore more vulnerable for financial terms will gain relative to their better off competitors. As a result, the second class rate increases, in other words, comprise an integrated package.

Here I might mention one particular problem raised by the hon. member for Surrey which concerns the imbalance on second class mail between Canada and other countries. He asked, and I quote from Hansard page 935, "That the government renegotiate the international treaty which has involved us in losses and bring about parity with the United States..." My answer is a simple one: Sorry, no, not just yet. This loss is comprised in large part, as hon. members correctly assumed, by our imbalance of postal trade with the United States.

The principle of non-sharing of charges and of non-payment of terminal expenses to the administrations of other countries, as compensation for services provided on arrival of foreign mail, applies to all items of letter-post in the international service.

Since the foundation of the Universal Postal Union almost 100 years ago, this concept has been viewed as basic by its 137 member countries and their territories. Obviously the introduction of terminal charges by one country would mean that that country would be expelled from that union. There would be tional mail.

While many attempts have been made at study of the cost prices of forwarding, transthe international service. The problem is very the setting up of expensive and time consumthe dispatching and receiving ends in Canada and the other member nations of the Universal Postal Union. There is no immediate solution in sight, but a serious study is currently under way and the results will be placed before the next congress to be held in Tokyo in late 1969. Therefore, there is no avenue open to us to solve the problem in relation to the United States or, for that matter, with any other country such as France, Great Britain and the Netherlands, with whom we also are at a disadvantage.

I should point out that in terms of total volume of second and third class mail handled in our service, the imbalance of international traffic, if we exclude that originating in the United States, represents very little. In fact, it has been estimated that this imbalance accounts for less than one-third of one per cent of our total traffic in terms of number of pieces handled. Our deficit attributable to the imbalance of traffic with the United States for second class mail is estimated at approximately $3.5 million annually. With third class mail, however, the latest survey indicated that the flow of exchange seems to be in Canada's favour. Unfortunately, we have no recent figures on this particular type of traffic, but tests made four years ago showed that the imbalance favoured Canada by a margin of 13 per cent.

To return, Mr. Speaker, to the issue before the house; on second class mail rates my position is simple and I now sum it up. The deficit has continued too long; it is now at an unmanageable level; the time therefore has come to cap it.

Such a step involves certain inescapable difficulties. A situation unchanged for 17 years permits what is a privilege to be regarded as a right. In their representations to me, members of the publishing industry have argued that the increase even if justified—and here as readers of the Ottawa Citizen, Toronto Telegram, Montreal Star and of international mail, these have always been any headway at all. The percentage increases rejected. However, the last universal congress appear large but are so only because the base in 1964 adopted a resolution authorizing a rates until now have been so low. I am aware, and sympathetically so, that certain mitting and distributing letter-post items in publications, simply because they have assumed a privilege was a right and was complex because any system would require therefore immutable, have perhaps allowed themselves to become over-extended in cering control and accounting procedures at both tain areas. This is the reason why the increase is proposed to come into effect April 1, 1969, rather than on passage of this legislation, as is the case with first class mail. As for the allegation that the increase is sudden, this I cannot accept. This issue was raised in the house in 1964 and again during consideration of legislation last year. The publishing industry, I submit, has been well aware for some time that changes were coming and were long overdue.

> The legislation before you will continue the subsidy on second class mail, not eliminate it. In fiscal year 1969-70 the sum, because of the increased rates, will be about $39 million. At that figure of $39 million the deficit on second class mail will comprise all but about $1 million of the total deficit of the post office on all its operations. The figure is $40 million on all our operations and $39 million on second class mail. Also, the $39 million figure will be substantially larger than sums disbursed by the government to other industries in the private sector such as shipbuilding and gold mining.

> I am convinced that the amount of the increase, after a close study of all individual cases, is equitable both to the industry and to the general public. Anything more left as a deficit becomes unmanageable again and therefore becomes an inequitable burden upon the general taxpayer. The timing of the increase will, I believe, allow all publications enough time to take any action that may be needed to absorb the increased cost in the same manner as they regularly absorb unplanned increases in the costs of such items as wages and newsprint.

In the legislation before the house other amendments to sections 11 and 12 of the act have been proposed which would: (a) restrict the conditions for statutory mail rates; (b) reduce and simplify rate categories; (c) establish minimum piece charges; (d) increase rates; (e) restrict the free zone to weekly newspapers with circulation of 10,000 and to the copies of these papers that are addressed many other newspapers know or may have to post offices with no letter carrier delivery noticed, there is a division in the ranks—is service; (f) abolish the preferred rates; (g) still too much too suddenly. The increase is repeal existing local second class rate; (h) considerable, and it must be if we are to make discontinue statutory rates for sample copies of newspapers and periodicals and publica- issue will be handled free of postage to nonnews dealers.

• (4:10 p.m.)

statutory rates to those newspapers and periodicals which—(a) have not more than 70 per cent of the paper devoted to advertising; (b) have a subscription price of not less than 50 cents per annum; (c) have a paid circulation of not less than 50 per cent of the total circulation, and (d) are registered for second class rates with the Post Office Department.

Another purpose of the amendment is to exclude from the statutory rate publications published as an auxiliary to, or for the purpose of, publicizing the main purpose or calling of the publisher. Excluded would be house organs, church bulletins, trade, fraterprofessional and other association publications.

There are now ten rate groups of newspapers and periodicals based on frequency of issue and size of circulation. Since neither factor is related to the cost, rate anomalies exist which cannot be explained within the context of postal operations. For example, a large weekly periodical is currently subject to a rate of 3 cents per pound, but a monthly periodical pays only 1.75 cents per pound. Furthermore, the number of rate categories is in excess of what is required for efficient administration and accounting.

The new legislation provides for three rate groups—(a) Daily newspapers, (b) Weekly newspapers, and (c) Other newspapers and periodicals.

At the moment, rates on newspapers and periodicals are bulk or pound rates covering an entire mailing. This results in sorting, transporting and delivering some newspapers and periodicals for as little as 1/20th and 1/30th of a cent per copy. The new minimum per item rate of 2 cents per piece will result in a more equitable distribution of postal charges among the users of second class mail and among all post offices patrons.

The rate change for a daily newspaper, which includes all newspapers published more frequently than weekly, will be 5 cents a pound on the news content and 15 cents a pound on the advertising content.

The rate for a weekly newspaper will be 5 cents a pound, and if the weekly newspaper has a circulation of 10,000 or less and is published and mailed in a community of not tions of newspapers and periodicals mailed by letter carrier offices within a 40 mile radius of the place of publication. This weekly rate is recognized support of the little weekly newspapers which continue to play an important Other proposed changes would restrict role in local news dissemination in rural parts of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kierans: The third rate, which applies to all other newspapers and periodicals, will be 5 cents per pound with a minimum charge of 2 cents per item.

I have spoken at length, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to thank hon. members for having listened to me with such care and attention. I am aware of their keen interest in the Post Office Department affecting, as it does, literally every Canadian. I am also aware that we are attempting to correct a situation which has been unchanged for 17 years and which, because of that long span, requires some relatively drastic steps.

This legislation will reduce the projected post office deficit for 1969-70 to $40 million from the $130 million it would have been without this bill. We will be back in the land of common sense and of equity, since it will mean that, with specified exceptions, users will pay for what they use and non-users will not bear a burden they did not create.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the minister's statement. It was more nearly adequate, of course, than the one he made on the resolution stage, not totally enlightening, perhaps, but helpful in that direction.

When I spoke on the resolution stage I expressed my views on Saturday closing and on the general question, which now seems to have become one of principle, of whether the Post Office Department, unique among departments of government, should pay its way. I begin today by congratulating the minister for changing his mind with regard to one aspect of the Saturday closing question. I said when we were discussing this subject on the resolution stage that by offering the people of Canada increased cost and decreased services he was giving them a double whammy. Since then he has flickered one eyelid and announced that some areas of Canada, some rural residents, will be excepted from his proposal. I am not one of those who are so unreasonable as to criticize a minister for not being willing to more than 10,000 persons, 2,500 copies of each change his view and then, when he does made a change, denounce him for being weak and irresolute. I commend the hon. gentleman for being sensitive to the urging of many hon. members on this side of the house as well as to his own noble committee of 35 members from the caucus of the Liberal party.

Having spent all my political career as a backbencher in the conclaves of caucus, I know how important it is that a minister be sensitive to the views of backbenchers, his parliamentary colleagues. Indeed, a good minister should be sensitive both before and after he takes important decisions-decisions for which he will expect the undying support of his parliamentary friends. But the minister will not expect me to avoid noting my disappointment that he was not more forthcoming to parliament in connection with his change of mind. Caucus is important, and so are caucus committees, but there is one body which is more important than caucus, more important then any caucus committee, and that is parliament itself. This is the place in which to make announcements. This is the place in which to indicate changes of ministerial intention.

I am glad the minister dropped a hint at the city of London. I am very fond of the city of London; it happens to be the home of outstanding political leaders in this country. But I would like him to recall that this house is the arena in which to make the kind of hints he made on that occasion; they should be made here rather than in the course of public speeches.

I presume the hon. gentleman has reflected upon the changed circumstances. I presume he knows the dangers which are before him as he makes this partial reversal of his previous point of view. I was interested in his statement that there was no demand for mail delivery on Saturday in urban areas. I presume that urban dwellers hand back their mail to the postman as he comes along. I am inclined to think that people living in the cities still like to get mail. I suppose that a communication from a loved one is as well received by a person living in a city of 25,000 as one living in a village of 150. Possibly the minister has made some calculations about this and knows what the distinction is. Incidentally, he may find considerable difficulty in a country like Canada where the shading between urban, suburban and rural is not easy to appreciate.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I am wondering who will be involved in getting the mail out to the rural areas. Most [Mr. Macquarrie.]

rural routes emanate from a fairly large centre. If the people in the large centres are freed from work on Saturday, who is going to process and sort the mail which the lucky ruralites are going to get on Saturday? No doubt these are things which the minister has thought out very carefully, but as yet we have not been illuminated or enlightened on the subject of just what this will all mean.

A few days ago I asked the minister if he would not agree that a committee of this house was a better forum for dealing with these important postal matters than a committee of his own caucus, however eminent. It may be interesting to recall that the Hansard reporter did not catch that. Mr. Speaker, I never think my utterances are so vital that they need be corrected for posterity but the reporter had me down as asking if a standing committee was not a better vehicle than the committee of the whole house. I was convinced that this very important, tremendously important piece of legislation, should be referred to a committee of the house.

This was obvious from the time we first heard about the minister's far-sweeping changes and widespread alterations and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that recent events, recent communications and recent protests have made such a course of action of all the more compelling. There has been widespread criticism from the press and the public. Interested parties have sought to have their views heard. There is widespread concern and confusion as to what is involved in this very elaborate piece of legislation. There has been insufficient time for some seriously affected groups to give thorough study to the impact of the new rates.

The minister is right when he said that there have been tremendously interesting editorials on the subject. He said once that the newspapers seemed to be pretty well on his side, but I do not note that type of response from the newspapers I read. I did notice an interesting editorial in the Journal-Pioneer, published in Summerside, P.E.I., headed "Poorer Mail Service At Higher Rates." It reads:

If we keep on getting doses of the just society we are going to start yearning for a bit of old fashioned injustice. Somehow life wasn't all bad in those bad old unjust days—

It is true that we are becoming more and more a five day work week society with two days of leisure on the week end. Yet it is kind of silly, as we said in this space once before, to go to the expense of rushing a letter by air from Vancouver to Summerside, to take an example, and then to have it lie in the Summerside post office undelivered from Friday evening until some time on Monday. What Mr. Kierans is proposing—and what he will undoubtedly get away with—is less service at higher rates.

The government is doing a great job of cutting expenditures and slashing services. We doubt that most people will feel that this was the mandate given it on June 25.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members have been receiving complaints and anxious inquiries from their constituents. Some veteran members of this chamber have told me they are receiving more mail about this matter than about any of the controversial issues of which this house has been seized in the last decade—and we have had some really sizzling issues—because this is a fundamental matter which touches all Canadians and there are reasons for concern.

Naturally people tend to ask why, when they are presented with a heavier bill for anything, and this bill does impose heavy gouges on the public, a 20 per cent increase in five cent letter mail and a 50 per cent increase in local first class mail. It may be said that if the minister gets his way he will have made the nickel obsolete. It is a long time since much could be bought for a nickel, but we used to be able to buy a stamp.

I note the minister's constant reference to the great bulk of mail as being business mail. But as my colleague sitting in front of me said, as he heard the minister's statement, "Who in the world keeps business going"? You always get back to that group of people collectively responsible for all of us sitting in this house. The increases for newspapers are in some cases higher than 300 per cent.

Not surprisingly this combination decreased service and increased rates is an unpopular mixture and an unpalatable brew. But apart from the heavy bite which the public understands all too well, other questions are coming to the fore. How serious is the financial situation in the post office? It is a long time since I have heard anyone sing such a triumphant song from such a dismal score as the minister has succeeded in doing. He said that the deficit will escalate out of sight if something drastic is not done. I noted his reference to high labour costs. I cannot believe that labour is so heavily responsible for these rapidly escalating costs.

The white paper to which the minister referred and which was made available only on Friday, I believe, makes dreary reading. I read it on Sunday. We continuing Presbyterians are very careful what we do on the Sabbath but we are allowed to read the Scriptures and are fond of the Old Testament. I thought that reading this white paper would not be different from reading about some of the tribulations of the Israelites, and my conscience was salved thereby. It is confusing reading.

I am not a cost accountant, or a former professor of economics as the minister is. I studied a great deal of economics and was always convinced that an ancient description of it as a dismal science was a very apt one. I found it a very dismal science. I found the white paper dismal. I found it pretty complex, pretty confusing. It is quite a demand to take a document of this kind, digest it by Monday, and then come along and say aye to the minister and have the bill shooed through.

Sir Robert Borden records that at the Paris peace conference the then president of Poland tabled a document which graphically illustrated the demographic pattern in Upper Silesia. Prime Minister Hughes, the outspoken prime minister of Australia, looked at it for a long time and then handed his copy back to Paderewski saying, "Perhaps you can play this on your piano but I'll be damned if I understand it." I do not share Prime Minister Hughes point of view but I can understand what he had in mind when he reacted in that way.

I looked at some of the statistics. As a result I wonder how ample is the explanation that is being given. I wonder how much farther advanced we are over where we were at the resolution stage. I would like to know what this expanded all-up service really means. This is dropped in as one of the little plums. Mail over eight ounces will now go all up. How many people will benefit? What does this mean? How big a bonanza is this?

I look at the deficit figures on first class mail alone. The deficit in 1968-69, without passage of these new rates, would be $16,148,000. For the fiscal year 1969-70 it would rise to $28,698,000 without the rate increases projected in this bill. These are vast and frightening figures, but how did they get that way so soon?

The ministers' predecessor said on June 2, 1967, as recorded at page 1098 of Hansard:

I can tell hon. members that at the five cent rate for letters we still make money. At four cents we still make some money although we are on the verge of losing.

Three months later, on September 29, 1967, less than a year before the present minister began his crusade for a black ledger, the minister's predecessor said, as recorded on page 2689 of Hansard:

We are starting right now to have a deficit on first class mail. Our estimates forecast, with regard to the first class, indicates a deficit of over $5 million right now. I can tell hon. members that next year the deficit will be up to $7.7 million and costs are continuing to rise.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The estimated deficit was $7.7 million, but the figure I have just quoted for 1968-69, extracted from the elaborate white paper, is $16,148,000. This is a substantial gap. In June, first class mail was making money, But in September the red ink was flowing freely. Perhaps the adverb "freely" is not a good one to use. My hon. friend says "liberally". Now we are talking about a figure of $16 million plus. This is not exactly precision forecasting. I wonder whether the former minister was using those up to date sophisticated computers used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or, and this is even more harrowing, was the present minister using those sophisticated predictors whose advanced calculations were going to make Einstein's work look like child's play? Of course, they were out about $400 million. But I am wondering about the computation. What about these elaborate figures in the white paper? They may be as solid as the rock of Gibraltar or as reliable as the Holy Writ, but because of the former minister's trouble in this connection and the substantial miscalculations of the Minister of Finance I submit that further elucidation and a little more sustained examples would be in

I should like these figures to be discussed and examined in full before a house committee. I should also like a chance for the experts to discuss them, not the experts in the post office but the particular users of the post office who will get it in the neck if this legislation goes through. Some of these figures are fascinating. I looked at the breakdown of costs and I discovered that for the sortation of United States publications it takes the sum of $2,223,888. How precise that figure is!

An hon. Member: And no cents.

Mr. Macquarrie: And no cents. There are no figures in that column in this document. I have a picture of sorters in some large post offices who do nothing but sort the New York Times and Life magazine. If any of these newspapers should be on strike, and it often happens, I suppose these persons would be laid off immediately and we would have a little saving. Or I can think of the little postmistress in the rural area who is paid so much a day for sorting copies of the Christian Science Monitor. This is the kind of calculation that causes one to wonder. I want to speak as moderately as I can because I think so much of the minister who is piloting this bill through the house. When I look at some of the charts my eye focuses on Time magazine.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, that pet.

Mr. Macquarrie: I wonder whether Time magazine has perhaps been a little more kindly treated in this elaborate calculation than our Canadian daily newspapers. Having asked that question I ask myself why, because we started out by being invoked to think in terms of principle, equity, and so on.

An hon. Member: And a just society.

Mr. Macquarrie: Surely these are matters which in a just society we must reflect upon for more than half a day or part of an afternoon. Do I see in this white paper a recognition of what the Post Office Department does for other departments? Are these charges being entered in the accounts and estimates of other departments or are they still charged to the post office? If this is the case, it seems hardly fair to raise a hue and cry about the appalling deficit in this department if in fact others should share it. The minister recognized this in his annual report for 1968, page 9, as follows:

The Canada Post Office has also taken credit for the services provided to other departments; these services do not compensate for the costs assumed from the other departments.

I am not sure what that statement means but I think it means something close to what I am trying to suggest. We want to plan realistically; we must have realistic figures and must have an opportunity to examine these figures fully and carefully. I am not departing one iota from my suggestion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the minister wish to ask a question? It is entirely up to the hon. member for Hillsborough to accept or reject the question.

Mr. Kierans: The hon, member says he wants reliable figures. Is he suggesting that these figures are not reliable?

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I must say span was far too short a measure by which to that I used the expression "realistic". I have adopted the policy in this house for 11 years that no matter what I might wish to say I would always wait until the hon. gentleman speaking had finished. I would ask that the same courtesy be returned to me. The quotation from the minister's annual report was the last I have read in that particular connection. I would say that in our search for realistic figures, figures which can be translated to the reality of the day, we want a further examination of the document which the minister made available to us.

But apart from statistics there are broad areas for concern for the members of this house and the people whom we represent. This bill is far more important than a mere increase in the price of stamps. Flippant people may say the minister is suggesting that the people of Canada can lick their way into prosperity by paying more for stamps. But much more is involved than an appraisal of the stamp rate. The bill recognizes that the government has an important degree of involvement in the newspaper field.

I was impressed by the minister's remarks in respect of this very important field. This bill in a sense defines what is a Canadian newspaper. It sets an elaborate scale of rates. It becomes very much involved in the communication of ideas. The bill even invokes considerations of an international character. It singles out foreign publications and sets special rates for them. Some people would say that it sets preferential rates for some of them. It is, therefore, a tremendously important field. The newspapers in this country are very much concerned. Far be it for a member of this party to be overly solicitous about the welfare of Canadian newspapers. They have not been remarkably solicitous of our welfare in the last couple of decades. But they are important in any democracy.

The freedom of the press is not a new or esoteric concept. The minister has heard the views of many people in the newspaper field, as have most of us. One who has written to him is that always thoughtful and perceptive publisher of Le Devoir, Mr. Claude Ryan. I should like to quote a few portions from an open letter to the minister which appeared in this excellent newspaper, Le Devoir, on October 12. It begins with a great deal of well deserved praise for the minister. In fact, as I read the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning I was convinced that six cubits and a national radio and television network for assess the real stature of this man. I was so impressed that I almost withdrew from the discourse altogether, but not quite. Mr. Ryan writes:

• (4:40 p.m.)

You have put in the position of a sacred fundamental the principle of having a postal service which pays for itself. On this subject (certain) M.P.'s have asked you pertinent questions. While accepting the principle of a necessary equilibrium in the accounts of the government, they asked you by what criteria you decided particularly at this moment to penalize excessively certain very limited sectors of the groups which benefit every day from the ensemble of government activity. Why, for example, did you put in the position of a sacred principle the goal of a postal service which pays for itself when you will vote soon on considerable subsidies which have the intention of meeting the deficits of other sectors of government which could also have been chosen as activity areas of activity for your rationalizing abilities?

Let us first speak of the raise in the postal rates for second class mail, which includes a newspaper like Le Devoir. If the figures which appeared in certain journals are well founded, you will double the cost of sending published material and you will change from four cents to fifteen cents per pound the cost of sending advertising material. Quick calculations have allowed us to establish that in the case of a newspaper like Le Devoir, these increases would bring with them a rise of approximately 275 per cent, compared with the costs which we have been used to.

Mr. Ryan argues his case with eloquence and, I think, with fairness. He makes a case to which the minister seems not overly sympathetic. He ends by saying:

Even if you had wanted, Mr. Kierans, to give to the daily newspapers with an average circulation a mortal blow, you would have had difficulty in imagining a more ingenious suggestion than that of which you have become the godfather. I know well your attachment to liberty of the press and to the right of citizens to have information. I know very well too your aptitude for changing your views when you are mistaken. It is for this that I hope that you will be able to revise in time the unacceptable and inequitable suggestions which you have revealed in Bill C-116.

The letter of Mr. Ryan and the presentations of many like him have raised some very, important questions. It is all very well to talk about the publishers, but we know what will happen when these rates are increased. We know who will end up paying the increases. It will be the citizen, the subscriber or, in the context of this debate, the patron of the post office. We cannot cast aside casually and lightly such representations as those of Mr. Ryan.

We spend millions trying to establish a splendid words of then prime minister Bennett when the Canadian radio commission, as it was then called, was set up, and its worthy purposes, the development of national unity and a national consensus. But what of other media? If by these rates we are preventing a Canadian newspaper becoming a worthy organ of national opinion, are we not taking a course directly opposed to that which we are following in dealing with our radio and television services?

Many of us have regretted that in Canada there has not yet developed a great national newspaper which is truly Canadian and accepted by Canadians all across the country, a newspaper of the calibre of the London Times, the New York Times, the Christian Science Monitor or La Presna of Buenos Aires, a paper national in scope, a paper for all Canadians. I believe there are some newspapers in this country which are capable of reaching such a status. These rates will militate against just such a development. The newspaper with nothing but local appeal will be far less injuriously harmed than the one dealing with national issues, ranging over national problems, seeking to apply itself to national questions. This is the one which will suffer by the imposition of these rates.

Can we say it is all a matter of accounting when we spend millions to develop one media which brings the views of radio and television commentators into the living rooms of the nation but make it well nigh impossible for the opinions of highly qualified newspapers and their editors to get into the mail boxes of the nation? I do not want to invite a comparison of the value to Canadian society of the opinions of Claude Ryan versus Lister Sinclair, or Shaun Herron versus James Bannerman, but reflection upon the matter should underline the importance of the potentialities of this legislation.

One of my colleagues, I think semihumorously, said the other day what a saving there would be if we shut down the C.B.C. for one day a week, and another even more critically said what a saving it would be if we shut it down for one day, period. I do not want to get into the C.B.C. phobia group because that is not where I belong, but when we talk about principle and equity we should reflect a little upon questions of this kind.

The minister and the members of the house know the vast increases in subscription rates which will be forced upon newspapers all good and worthy purposes. We all recall the across the country as a result of this legislation. That splendid journal of prairie Liberalism, the Winnipeg Free Press, points out that their subscribers will have to pay an extra $25 or $35 a year. Some people might think this is not a tragedy, but I think the Winnipeg Free Press, with all its faults, did develop beyond a city base, beyond a provincial base, and became a regional journal of opinion. Despite its Liberal proclivities, I do not think it will do the country good to have it inhibited in its coverage of the prairies.

> Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We could not get along without it.

> Mr. Dinsdale: It has been printing the truth more recently.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, my colleagues on both the right and the left seem to regard the Winnipeg Free Press more highly than I used to when I knew Manitoba well. It is said that newspapers should pay their way. Perhaps increased rates are in order. I have never taken the point of view that we cannot or should not have an increase in these rates; not for a moment do I make that suggestion. I would not suggest that any increase is injurious, but I again reject the suggestion that this department or any sector of its users, in this case the newspapers, must pay their way. The expression "cap the subsidy" is an interesting one, but let us have no delusions that we are going to soak the publishers. In the end it will be the public that pays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macquarrie: In other areas we have abandoned the pay as you go policy. I am old enough to remember, and certainly the minister is as well, the days when we used to charge a licence fee to everybody who bought a radio set. The idea was that the people who used the radio service would pay for it. We have long since abandoned that policy. We have said that it is a public service, and I think this was a proper move. We pay the bill for radio and television, and what a bill it is!

There are many areas of uncertainty here. I wonder about the savings. I wonder about what is going to happen to the personnel. In the Gazette of September 28, page 1, the minister is quoted as saying:

• (4:50 p.m.)

-the decision to go onto a five day week will mean the elimination of 1,499 post office jobs, and will save the taxpayers at least $13 million a year.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

You will note it is 1,499 post office jobs, not 1,500. He said:

—although almost 1,500 jobs are being done away with, few men will actually be laid off. The normal expansion of the post office will absorb about 1,100 workers, and the normal attrition of staff caused by retirements and resignations should account for most of the balance.

This impressed me. I was brought up under the old fable that you cannot have your cake and eat it too. Yet we are told in one paragraph we are going to save at least $13 million a year and 1,499 jobs will be done away with, and then that hardly anyone holding a job is really going to lose it. I hope I will not offend anyone if I ask again for realistic figures.

The following was written in the Canadian Postal Worker of June, July and August 1968, volume 4, No. 4, headed "5 Day Week—Who Pays?". I may say that many of these people live in urban areas and will not be affected by the announcement made a while ago by the minister. The article reads:

A continuing source of wonder and dismay to us in Vancouver is the naivete of national officers.

For instance, when the Postmaster General announced the initiation of the five day business week in the post office, effective next February, not one national officer's voice was heard in protest.

It should have been obvious that a change as far-reaching as this had to be planned a long time in advance. It could even have started before negotiations did, which means the government had no intention of announcing it before the contract was signed. Razor sharp thinkin; on their part.

It must also be obvious that a great many members of both unions are going to be affected. Until we know the details and methods of adjustment, and what guarantees we have against lay-offs, we are certainly not prepared to say that the members will like it.

Nor are we prepared to trust the intentions or actions of the Postmaster General who appears hell bent on reforming the post office. We can understand the government's wanting to make some profit out of the post office operation. But we also want to know at whose expense these reforms will be made, and out of whose hides the profits will be sweated.

The postal workers who will be displaced, and those who will be doing six days' work in five would no doubt like to know, too.

Some time ago I read the minister's announced intention to have his department in the black in two years' time. It is a laudable intention, and I wish him well in all his endeavours to improve the administration of his important department. But I am suspicious of what I might describe as deadline achievers. I remember the 60 days of decision and what days those were!

I would like to comment on one or two more items, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat. The bill is not all bad. I find nothing to complain about in connection with the savings bank. I have no deposits there that will be lost. I see some improvements in reference to rural routes and I also see some dangers there. I would like to hear a little more about some special cases such as the very good case which was presented by the church press.

I wonder whether the minister is going to move a little more imaginatively in the philately section than some of his predecessors? If he is scrounging around to make the odd dollar, even that can be used more effectively. If he could issue a stamp in honour of the great Robert Burns perhaps he might improve the cost situation. I know my colleague from Nova Scotia would be with him on that.

The thing that disturbs me is the shortage of time in reference to a measure of such importance. It is said in the bill that one section is to go into effect on November 1. This presumes that this body and another body in another part of the constitutional apparatus will have reacted before that date because there is no use chasing down Mr. and Mrs. Smith after November 1 if they have spent four and five cents for their stamps; you cannot collect the extra pennies then. We do not have time to deal with this important legislation, and I think it is a presumptuous suggestion that we do so.

I wish to make a motion but before I make it I should like to indicate briefly the spirit in which it is made. We believe that this measure must go to a standing committee. It is our hope that the committee would be instructed, or that it would be formally or informally understood, that it sit for a limited time. We would like to have the second reading of the measure stay on the order paper. We have no desire to thrust in an inordinate delay at this time. It is in this spirit that I would like to move the following motion which is presented in an effort to expedite passage of this legislation and in an effort to guarantee wider information on behalf of the public we represent. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent McCutcheon):

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"The further consideration of this bill be deferred until the standing committee on transportation and communications has considered the subject matter thereof.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The amendment is before the house. With the indulgence of the house I will take it under consideration and report later.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, it is customary sometimes to summarize one's point of view and one's ideas at the conclusion of one's remarks. The press of the country uses an entirely different procedure; they summarize right at the beginning what was said or proposed. In my case I intend to summarize my ideas at the start of my remarks. To put the position of my party and my own on this important subject on the record I summarize our position as follows:

First, we wish the proposed post office legislation referred to a standing committee of this house for detailed study and report.

Second, we are opposed to the increase to six cents in the ordinary or consumer mail rates of Canada.

Third, we welcome the move to increase the second class rates on publications published for a profit as being generally in the right direction, but here again we wish a committee study to be made to ensure that the proposed rate increases are sufficient and are borne by those by whom they should be and do not fall upon publications which are not published for commercial profit but rather for the service of some particular educational, health or co-operative association or union.

While welcoming the announcement made today by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) that rural mail delivery will be continued on a six day a week basis, we oppose the reduction in delivery service in urban areas. We think there is no reason in this year for a substandard service such as would result from reducing delivery from six to five days a week to be inflicted on the urban areas or any other area in Canada. On this point it seems strange to us that while we as a group of people meeting in the house are entitled to discuss what is proposed in the way of legislation on rates or prices, we are actually not able to do anything right now in regard to the service that those rates or prices are going to buy. Something along that line could well be studied by a committee studying the whole postal situation.

Mr. Speaker, this is a personal proposal by myself. I should like to see a study made of what is in effect a subsidy in the form of an exemption from taxation which is given to very lifeblood of many publications in this country. This exemption from taxation for advertising would have an effect on what the public is called upon to pay, either in the form of a subsidy or increased postal rates.

October 21, 1968

• (5:00 p.m.)

The post office legislation before us is massive and yet very detailed in all its respects. The proposals made are of such a nature that in my view they should be referred for detailed study by a standing committee of the house, where adequate representations could be made both by the post office officials and those who are going to be affected by the principal changes in postal procedures. I believe it is true to say that the post office handles, and does it very well, something like 5 billion pieces of mail each year. It employs approximately 47,000 or 48,000 people and deals with a great many categories of postage. The whole matter, therefore, is technical.

It would make a great deal more sense if we and the people of the country had more time to delve into all the aspects of what we are being asked to do. It is all right to say that we in this house can meet as a committee to discuss what is being proposed but really, as I say, the matter before us is so technical that it is very difficult for us in an assembly of this type to come to any real decision on these detailed proposals.

In the previous parliament when we dealt with matters affecting broadcasting in the country, the whole set of recommendations was referred to the standing committee on broadcasting. That committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, met many times, heard many witnesses and finally brought in its report. We believe the same sort of thing could logically be done with regard to this other important channel of communications, the postal system.

For many years my party and its predecessor, the C.C.F., have urged the government and specifically the Postmaster General to take one of the steps he now proposes to take, namely, to bring about a realistic rate for business mail, periodicals and publications published for a profit. I am glad to see that finally, after all these years, the logic of what not only my party but many other groups in the country have long urged has gotten through. I am glad to find that among the proposals, some of which we do not approve, the Postmaster General is saying that while the commercial press of Canada will not be advertisers. Advertising, of course, is the asked to pay their full delivery costs they will at least be asked to begin to pay something more of the cost to which their profit-motivated efforts have put the taxpayer and the ordinary letter writer all these years.

bills from hydro, telephone and other concerns. This is very true, but it is equally true that an increase in the costs of these business concerns, which for some will be 50 per cent

If we look at the financial statements and details of proposed rate adjustments, distributed the other day by the Post Office Department, we see that second class mail deficits, which have all along been carried by the public of Canada, between 1950 and now totaled approximately $400 million. This sum is almost equivalent to that which I understand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will be asking us to try to make up tomorrow night in his representations with regard to taxation or borrowing.

What are the relative figures, Mr. Speaker? In respect of second class mail, mail published basically for a profit, we see that it now pays not much more than one-fifth, 22 per cent, of its way. The public is stuck with the rest or a subsidy of about 77 per cent. In my view this is a strange commentary on the alleged independence of private enterprise. What do we see when we look at the cost to us of, say, Reader's Digest and Time magazine? My reading of the figures supplied by the Post Office Department indicates that these publishers pay respectively 15.7 per cent and 21.8 per cent of the cost of carrying their publications to Canadians. The taxpayers, most of whom do not read these publications, pay the other three-quarters of the cost of getting these magazines to their readers. Even with the proposed increases in second class rates, the taxpayers will still be subsidizing the deficit caused by these private operations. I commend the Postmaster General for at least taking a step in the right general direction.

I oppose his proposal to increase by 50 per cent the rate for ordinary, first class locally mailed and delivered letters, and by 20 per cent the rate for forward or air mail. I ask him also to reconsider the idea of increasing rates while decreasing service. He may possibly do one or the other, but surely it is a curious situation when the government expects to move in two different directions at the same time. I say, in the meantime leave the first class rate as it is, where it has been carrying itself for many years. Give it another year or two and let us see, with the new second class rates and some other reforms made which I should like to see, whether we need to increase the ordinary letter rate. It is quite true, as the minister points out, that a bills from hydro, telephone and other concerns. This is very true, but it is equally true that an increase in the costs of these business concerns, which for some will be 50 per cent for locally mailed letters, will be promptly passed on by those concerns to the consumer. They will do so very quickly, perhaps even by special delivery.

If this legislation were sent to a committee for study it might be that consideration could be given to the idea of applying the 5 cent rate to all first class mail in Canada. This question is an involved one relating to the whole system of rates, and in my opinion this is another reason for us to have a look at the whole situation in depth in a committee. We certainly support the motion put forward by the official opposition for the reference of this legislation to a standing committee.

I should like to refer now to a proposal which is not really before us but which the Postmaster General has acted upon. I refer to the reduction in our mail service in so far as urban areas are concerned to five days a week. I do not know of another country in the world which is putting up with that kind of substandard service, and I do not know why Canadians should be asked to do so. We do not have five day police, fire, health or broadcast services. The newspapers do not publish just five days a week. In our view the present postal service and the ability of our people to communicate on a six day schedule are important and must be retained. Again, it seems to me to be a curious thing that while we can discuss the prices which people are going to pay to have mail delivered, there is really no legislation before us at the moment concerning what that money will buy in the way of service. Again I say that this is the type of thing that could be looked at by a committee. The very fact that this legislation allows the post office itself to make changes in the standard of delivery while compelling it to refer to the house the second class mail rate is another reason for studying the whole problem in committee.

first class rate as it is, where it has been carrying itself for many years. Give it another year or two and let us see, with the new second class rates and some other reforms made which I should like to see, whether we need to increase the ordinary letter rate. It is quite true, as the minister points out, that a great deal of first class mail is made up of which has an agreement concerning the carrying of mail all over the world at certain rates. In regard to second class mail coming to Canada from the United States, I think the minister indicated that this involved a cost to us of some $3.5 million a year. So to that extent that question was answered.

Another question is: What is the cost of handling bulk mail, such as money, comparing the post office rate with that of private security services? By how much do the taxpayers or the ordinary first class mail users subsidize the special delivery service, which under the proposal now made, as I understand it, to close post offices in cities an extra day of the week will have to be stepped up since regular delivery is to be reduced?

Why is there a different rate for second class mail between the Americas, and between Canada and Great Britain? What percentage of second class mail delivered in Canada originates from American publications or wholly owned American subsidiaries in Canada? What was the value of printed matter imported into Canada in the last ten years and carried by our post office without remuneration under the terms of the universal postal convention?

To those questions, Mr. Speaker, I would add another. Ten years ago Canada had the reputation of being in the first rank of those countries working in the field of postal service mechanization. We were at that time experimenting with machinery which I understand was capable of sorting thousands of letters per hour. The minister said something on this general subject but I would encourage him to give more consideration to this subject. My question is: What has happened to the modernization and our technological progress? In this ever-growing computerized world it seems that the Canadian post office, at one time in the van of such progress, has now dropped behind. What is the reason for this, and what is proposed to bring our post office back to its leading and very necessary role in that area?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I reiterate my wish and the wish of the members of my party that this whole complex question affecting readers, correspondents and publishers be referred for detailed study to a standing committee of this house. I hope that this will be done. If it is not, then I want to make one last recommendation. I should like to see a review body established to hear from the representatives of the non-profit publications the case that those publications may make for exemption from, or subsidy against, the proposed second class mail rate increases.

I began by saying that I would reverse the usual procedure; instead of summarizing my remarks at the end I did so at the beginning. The main point we wish to make is that we support what we think is a very good step proposed at this time by the official opposition, that of having the whole matter referred to a standing committee.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, ever since the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) started leaking tidbits about his proposed reforms in the department there has certainly been a rising storm of criticism about the various details of the scheme. I hasten to point out that it is not my intention to add my voice to this storm. My chief concern at the moment is with the minister's basic concept and with what I believe is his confused thinking in regard to economy in the public service.

Everybody wants the government to cut unnecessary spending, Mr. Speaker. Everybody would welcome greater responsibility on the part of this government when it comes to the disposal of tax dollars. But I would point out that at the same time everybody expects the government to supply to the public those services which are both the excuse for a central bureaucracy and its duty to render to the citizenry. Trying to do away with an essential public service is a peculiar way indeed to proceed.

I have never heard it preached anywhere that public services, such as postal services, were supposed to be a device to raise revenue. If so, Mr. Speaker, what about our publicly owned railway, our publicly owned air line and, above all, our publicly owned Canadian broadcasting service? Why indeed should one public service be expected to make money and these others to run at a loss?

I think it is sensible, for anybody administering a public service such as the post office to try to do the job as economically as possible. I think it would be a reasonable aim to try to break even on the operation. But I cannot conceive that a public service such as the post office should be run like a profit-seeking, private business.

It is perhaps conceivable, that the present Postmaster General should regard his new responsibilities in the light of a private enterprise where profit is God and shareholders must be paid off. After all, he did spend some considerable time as head of the Montreal Stock Exchange, an institution that might easily be equated with the temple of profit. I am delighted, however, to see that obviously the Postmaster General has taken note of some of the message and that he is now operating within the demands of a just society; nothing could be more unjust than to put an essential public service beyond the reach of ordinary people. Furthermore, I believe that the concept that government should make a profit from a public service is not only misguided but flies in the face of our theory of government, a theory that supposes that the chief purpose of government is to guard the interests of the people and to supply their needs.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I also believe that the Postmaster General deserves some credit. While he may be misguided in his efforts he has tried to break the spendthrift pattern set by many of his colleagues. He at least professes to want to save money; the rest of them make no such pretence. I am thinking now of the expenditures that have gone into providing the Oriental splendour of the new offices of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), the socalled "Greene rooms". In case any other ministers try to take comfort from mention of only one of their number, let me hasten to assure them, that it is not too difficult to collect instances of general extravagance and disregard for public moneys by members of this government.

I sincerely hope, that the house will see fit to adopt the suggestion of my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). I think that justice demands that before such arbitrary and sweeping changes are made in a vitally necessary public service every interested citizen should be heard.

• (5:20 p.m.)

It is quite true that the loudest and most vehement protest against some of the minister's proposals has come really from a group deserving the least sympathy. I am referring to the publishers of our Canadian daily newspapers, a group for whom it is difficult to have much sympathy. We were told by the minister, and we must take his word for it, that for years they have enjoyed a generous subsidy from Canadian taxpayers. If the minister's statement can be accepted at its face value, then the subsidy amounts to some $37 million per year. Personally I question the figure and the accuracy of the minister's statement.

I do not know whether the Postmaster General really understands the way small country post offices operate. I should like to know how a computer can determine the cost of handling a newspaper at some of our small country post offices. May I cite an example I am familiar with personally. Around five o'clock in the morning newspapers that go out on ordinary rural mail routes from the small post office are deposited on the front steps of the post office by a truck that comes from the London Free Press. These trucks deliver their newspapers to the front steps of our rural post offices. The papers are neatly bundled and addressed. They are already in some sort of order. So many are for rural route 2, so many for rural route 3, and so on.

Around eight o'clock the postmaster appears on the front steps, takes a deep breath of air, yawns probably, picks up the bundle of newspapers and takes them into the sorting room where they are placed on the rural carriers' desks. The carriers then pick up those newspapers. They have 10 papers for this route, 25 for another, and so on. The newspapers are in the hands of paid post office workers for a matter of minutes only. The rural carriers place the newspapers in their automobiles and deposit them at the rural mail boxes.

It must be remembered that these carriers are contractors and they are going to make their rounds anyway. I therefore submit that the cost of delivering 18,000 copies of the London Free Press in southwestern Ontario adds very little to the department's deficit. I cite this as an example to show that in my opinion the entire white paper is questionable. Yes, I would say that it is even suspect.

In the circumstances under which daily newspapers in Canada are published today perhaps our chief concern should be saved for others more in need of consideration, and here I speak of mail subscribers. I became alarmed when I heard the hon. member for Hillsborough mention the fantastic increases in subscription rates to be charged by the Winnipeg Free Press. I believe it was he who mentioned that newspaper. I believe others mentioned increases that would be applicable to newspapers such as the Citizen and the Journal.

Writing in Le Devoir, Mr. Ryan, the editor, said:

Quick calculations have allowed us to establish that in the case of a newspaper like Le Devoir these increases would bring with them a rise of approximately 275 per cent, compared with the costs which we have been used to.

I know that the postal rate increases are severe, but are they that severe?

Recently I saw a financial report relating to the Southam news services. The report shows that the publishers increased their revenue during the first nine months of this year by approximately 15 per cent. I think we ought to be more concerned about publications other than daily papers which may need assistance, and there are many like that. I am thinking particularly of publications such as the Canadian Church Press and the daily and weekly newspapers that are entirely or almost entirely dependent on mail subscriptions for their circulation and, likewise, for their advertising revenue. The revenue of such publications cannot equal, on any proportionate basis, that of the huge dailies.

There are others, too, who must be mentioned at this time, and here I am thinking of the members of the Canadian direct mail association. I know that many in this house and in this country regard direct advertising circulars that are delivered through the mail as a nuisance which ought to be curtailed. Those who think that way are not interested in the case for direct mail advertising. That is not the point here. Regardless of whether we are sympathetic toward the grievances of this body, we must bear in mind that its members take part in legitimate Canadian enterprises and they are entitled to the same consideration that is extended to other individual Canadians or groups of citizens. In this body are Canadians who have a vested interest in the postal service of their country. In all fairness and decency we ought to give them an opportunity to be heard.

Nothing in the constitution or in the Canada Elections Act transforms the Postmaster General or any other cabinet minister into a god. He is responsible for his actions to the people who entrusted him with the task of providing a postal service with their money, and he ought to have enough sense of responsibility to listen to submissions before imposing radical new changes on the post office. I see no argument against hearing the case for the defence unless someone in high places is afraid to. A consideration of the changes encompassed in this bill along the lines sug-

General is a public servant. Anything he does he does by permission of and in the interests of the public who entrusted him with his job.

The minister's actions might be more understandable if he were running a private company. Then he could make such arbitrary changes as his judgment told him to be in the interest of the company and its shareholders. In this instance the minister is playing God. He is saying in fact; I know what is good for you; shut up and take it. That is a most highhanded and democratic attitude for a government not noted for being sensitive to the rights of individual Canadians to take.

• (5:30 p.m.)

COMMONS DEBATES

Compare this attitude with the approach of the United Kingdom when the British post office department was recently overhauled. The legislation there envisages a national users' council representing all those who use the mails in Britain. This council will make representations about services, it will consider complaints by users of the services and it will be consulted with regard to fees and rates. It is, therefore, more than a body having only nominal functions; it will be truly consultative and effective in its operations. The minister will appoint the chairman and members of the council and is responsible for policy direction. This is an entirely different approach from what we see here in Canada where in effect the government says: Here it is; take it and like it.

The minister is actually following a course which in my opinion could well lead to silencing those voices which this country most needs to hear. They are voices with which all Canadians do not agree. They are voices of dissent, voices which express varying points of view. They are voices which represent minority views, voices speaking for the many segments of our society which must eventually be reconciled if we are to remain a strong, united nation. They are voices which symbolize what democracy is all about.

These voices are heard in many publications which happen to be among those most closely affected by the proposed changes in postal services and rates. Some of these publications face distinction as a result of these proposals. Their spokesmen must be allowed to make representations fairly and openly before any step is taken which will still these gested by my colleague for Hillsborough publications forever. I think of the case I ought to be the minimum amount of justice mentioned earlier, the case of the French lanthat the cabinet and the Postmaster General guage newspaper Le Devoir and the clear, if should extend to us. After all, the Postmaster sometimes jarring, voice of its editor, Claude

[Mr. McCutcheon.]

Ryan. Does the government intend to silence such a voice as this by ministerial regulation while at the same time heavily subsidizing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to provide a platform for other voices such as that of Tiny Tim?

Whatever may be said by the minister about economies and savings in the operations of his department, these proposals smell of discrimination. The minister has boasted that his reforms will save $13 million. But at what cost? One cost will be 1,499 jobs in the Post Office Department; at a time when unemployment is heavy and increasing, 1,500 jobs are to be thrown away just to balance the books.

The minister made some comments about changing the system of tenders in connection with rural contractors, bringing them into the just society. But the new measure still uses the tendering system which generally means recommendation by the local patronage chairmen. How many members of this house have seen the one-sided contract which allows the Postmaster General arbitrarily to cut off remuneration as was done by the current occupant of that portfolio? How many have seen the penalties for failure to get through impossible roads, and so on? Every postmaster general since I have been here—and there have been several during that time—has talked about a new deal for the rural contractor. But I submit it is all talk; the legislation has certainly not changed that much.

Normally a contract runs for four years. I understand from the minister's announcement today that a contract can be renegotiated three times. This is a tremendous change in favour of the rural mail carriers. But why, in view of all the information on costs which the department must have on hand, can we not do away with the tendering system and pay the rural contractors their going rate? Why should it be necessary for rural carriers to come on bended knees to the great white father and ask for relief? If the department really wanted to help it would establish rates and judge couriers on the basis of their dependability and integrity rather than on how little they are willing to tender for.

I do not wish to labour the point, Mr. Speaker. I could talk at length about the shortcommings in this bill and the changes it proposes to bring about. To sum up, I would say that the measure before us ought to go to a committee for the most exhaustive examination before any action is taken on it. It is a hasty, ill-judged and misjudged piece of legislation, one which reflects the attempt of a new broom to make a dramatic sweep rather than a sincere attempt to run the essential postal services of Canada effectively and efficiently. I hope the minister will have the good judgment to suspend these radical and arbitrary changes until such time as those Canadians most closely affected have had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps hon, members would wish at this time to address themselves to the procedural aspects of the amendment proposed by the hon, member for Hillsborough.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the principle that all things are deemed regular and in order until the contrary is shown, I suggest that if the government feels that the motion is not in order we might hear from one of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes. It seems to me it is established—and I would refer to May, seventeenth edition, page 526, and to the current edition of Beauchesne, citation 386 and thereafter—that the procedures to be followed on second reading for amending the motion or expressing disagreement with it are relatively stereotyped.

The courses open to hon, gentlemen opposite are, first of all, to vote against the motion for second reading without proposing an amendment. Alternatively they could take a course of action which the editor of Erskine May refers to as being the most courteous proceeding open to them, that is, they could move that the bill be not now read a second time but that it be read six months hence. This has come to be accepted as equivalent to stopping further parliamentary action. A third course is one we have seen followed frequently in this house in recent years; it was used as recently as Friday last. It is the motion that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a committee. It would have been open to the hon. member for Hillsborough to have moved an amendment of that sort, if that had been his intention, in line with established procedure. However, the hon. member has not expressed himself in that way. He has asked that further consideration of the bill be deferred until the standing committee on transport and communications has considered the subject matter thereof. Therefore his amendment has really failed to deal with the principal question before the house at the moment, whether or not the bill shall be read a second time.

I suggest that if the hon, member had wished to achieve the result of having a committee study the subject matter included in the bill he should have moved his amendment in the well established form that has been provided in the rules. He has not chosen to do so. He has moved it in a form which fails to deal with the question before us, whether there shall be second reading or not. For that reason, and since he has failed to adopt one of the recognized procedures of the house, I suggest that the amendment should not be accepted in this form. I submit it is not in order and should be rejected for that particular reason.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, when the President of the Privy Council used the word "stereotyped" it confirmed my suspicion that, despite all the whining and whimpering we have heard about our objections to the question period, this is really a government which is very reactionary in respect of its approach to the rules.

I would like to draw Your Honour's attention to page 396 of the fourth edition of Beauchesne. There are provided there a number of precedents to use which I have been following for some time, as have other hon. members, secure in the thought that these had been disclosed as suitable vehicles by which amendments could be moved. I point to form No. 93 which is as follows:

The question being proposed "That Bill No. intituled an Act be now read a second time"; Mr. moves in amendment thereto that all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "The further consideration of this bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.'

Despite all the defects which my hon. friend from Hillsborough has discerned in this bill we are not suggesting that it should be submitted to the electors of Canada, but for the reasons we have given we think it should be submitted to a committee of this house. All we are doing is following a precedent which appears in Beauchesne and which apparently has been followed in the past. I use that as the first approach to argue with you, sir, that the amendment should be acceptable.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Second, as the President of the Privy Council has said, a practice has been followed from time to time of referring the subject matters of bills to a committee, but in so doing they lose their place in the order of business. I hope that our committee on procedure will be able to amend that so as to permit them to retain their place. However, we must accept the rules as they are. It is the practice that the subject matter of a bill may be referred to a standing committee, after the use of the usual words "that it be not now read a second time," but I suggest there is no difference between that and what the hon. member for Hillsborough has suggested.

The words "that it be not now read a second time" are surely the equivalent of the words "that consideration be deferred," and the words "that consideration be deferred" have been sanctified by their appearance in Beauchesne. In addition the amendment contains a principle declaratory of some adverse view to the one contained in the motion proposed by the Postmaster General. I am reinforced in my view of that by an examination of Beauchesne, citation 386:

On the second reading of a bill, the house may decide to refer the subject matter thereof to a commission although the bill could not be referred to a committee of the house before its second reading. (The subject matter of a bill and the bill itself are two different things.) On the 17th April, 1934, the following amendment was moved to the second reading of a bill to amend the Railway Act in respect of rates on grain: "That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada." This amendment was as much a declaration of policy as if it stated that the question of adjusting the railway rates on grain should be investigated by the railway board.

This is precisely what the hon, member for Hillsborough is now saying, that it is a declaration of policy that the various details and issues involved in this bill should be investigated by the standing committee, precisely as was indicated by the decision, if my memory serves me right, of Mr. Speaker Black in 1934.

I am reinforced in this view by citation No. 332 in Beauchesne's fourth edition:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction—

This is precisely what the hon, member for Hillsborough is doing, and merely because he has not used words which the President of the Privy Council said are stereotyped his amendment should not be ruled out of order. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to be stereotyped in our approach to the type of motions we move in this house I think it will be a sorry day that we do so decide or, with due respect, that Your Honour so decides. As long as we are establishing, through any combination of words, a principle which is declaratory of an idea adverse to the principle contained in the motion, then the amendment should be accepted.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the swinging party over there, looking forward to the just society, would be most happy to see this matter considered in detail if it has all the virtues that the minister says it has.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear at the outset of these brief remarks that I have on my desk several copies of a proposed amendment which, believe it or not, is drafted in the stereotyped form referred to by the President of the Privy Council. As a matter of fact I had even shown it to the hon. member for Hillsborough in case he wanted to take it, and I indicated that if he did not propose an amendment I would pass it to the hon. member for Surrey.

In the light of all this it is obvious that if the amendment of the hon. member for Hillsborough is ruled out of order then the first member of this party who gets the floor will be moving that Bill No. C-116 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should be quite partisan and express the hope that you will rule this amendment out of order so that we will have a chance to move ours. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not take that course.

I think Your Honour should realize that these two proposed amendments say precisely the same thing. They say it in different words. The forms are a little different but they say precisely the same thing, and would produce precisely the same result. Let me begin with the stereotyped form, the one we have ready. It says two things, first that Bill C-116 be not now read a second time and, second, that the subject matter of the bill be referred to a committee.

What does the amendment of my hon. friend from Hillsborough say? It says two things. In the first place it moves to strike out "all the words after "that", and the words in the motion after the word "that" are that the bill be read a second time. So that part of this amendment is saying precisely the same thing as mine is saying, that the bill be not now read a second time.

e (5:50 p.m.)

The second thing that the hon. member's amendment says is that the subject matter of the bill be referred for consideration to the standing committee on transport and communications. I think our form is perhaps a little better, because it is stereotyped, because it gets by the house and by the Speaker. But in the plain, practical language of this modern, swinging parliament surely there is no difference at all between what is proposed in the amendment of the hon. member for Hillsborough and what is proposed in the wording that I have here on my desk. If there is a difference, I suppose it is because my Conservative friend does not like to hit quite so hard. Its wording is a little softer. My hon. friend does not like to say that the bill be not read a second time. Instead he says, "send the matter elsewhere". It seems to have the effect of taking the present order off the order paper, just as mine does. My friend the hon. member for Hillsborough comes from the maritimes, instead of Manitoba, although he lived for a number of years in Manitoba. He is being a little softer on the minister, that is

Mr. Bell: He is soft because he was in Manitoba.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are people who disagree with that. At any rate, that is my point. The house is going to face this issue one way or another. There really is no point in wasting time on this. If this amendment is ruled out of order, I will hand this to the next New Democratic member who takes the floor, or move it myself at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: I am now in a position to give a decision on the basis of the comments made by hon. members. I, of course, have had an opportunity to study the amendment and look at precedents. I had a few minutes before the question was raised in the house at 5.30 to study the precedents and look into the matter as closely as possible in the circumstances.

The proposed amendment of the hon. member for Hillsborough reads as follows:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The further consideration of this bill be deferred until the standing committee on transportation and communications has considered the subject matter thereof.

The question before the house on second reading is the principle of the bill. This, of course, is well known and recognized by all members. An amendment at this point must oppose the principle by way of a reasoned amendment or otherwise. It seems to me that the hon. member for Hillsborough is proposing an amendment which does not oppose the principle of the bill nor does it support it. It merely asks to set the bill aside while the subject matter is considered.

I am in full agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that effectively the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough would produce the same result as an amendment in the usual form. On the other hand the Chair must give a decision on the basis of the amendment as proposed for the consideration of the Chair. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, along with the hon. member for Peace River, claims that this is a reasoned amendment which effectively opposes the principle of the bill. I suggest to hon. members that this is not the effect of the proposed amendment. It merely seeks to postpone a decision until such time as certain conditions have been fulfilled.

I am also appreciative of the difficulty arising out of the fact that there is a form, No. 93, which is quoted at page 396 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. I have studied this form and it has caused me some concern. Hon. members will realize, however, that it is not exactly in the same terms as the amendment now before us. For one thing it does not propose the same type of remedy. I suggest there is, on this basis, a substantial difference between the form set out by Beauchesne at page 396 and the form of the amendment the hon. member advanced by Hillsborough.

The form of amendment No. 93 actually opposes the principle of the bill. If hon. members will study this paragraph closely they will see that if this amendment as proposed in form No. 93 were carried the bill would effectively be taken out of the consideration of the house and to all intents and purposes it would be in my view in opposition to the principle of the bill. On the contrary, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough merely attaches a condition that is not an amendment in opposition to the principle of the bill and is not a reasoned amendment.

Again I realize we are cutting things a bit fine, if I may use this expression, because in practice the result of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough would be exactly the same as if this amendment were proposed in the usual words which are contained in the stereotyped form of amendment on second reading to the effect that the subject matter of a bill be referred to a committee. I am just wondering whether in the circumstances hon. members would allow the hon. member for Hillsborough to change his amendment to read according to the usual form. If he does not wish to do this, I would be rather suspicious that there is a substantial between the amendment he difference proposed and the one the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to advance.

In the circumstances, with much regret, I do not think it possible to accept the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, since it is six o'clock I wonder whether the hon. member for Hillsborough could have until eight o'clock to decide whether he wishes to be stereotyped or would prefer to be swinging.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would have risen at this point in any event. Hon. members in all corners of the house have expressed considerable interest in the function to be given by Your Honour at six o'clock this evening. In order to assist the hon. member for Hillsborough in his reflections I wonder whether an order of this house could be made that the house not sit between six and seven o'clock this evening in private members' hour but that the opposition not, of course, lose the hour involved.

Mr. Baldwin: And the priority.

Mr. Speaker: If this is agreed, it is so ordered. The house would then allow the hon. member for Hillsborough the opportunity to speak to a point of order at eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Consumer Affairs—report respecting grocery prices on prairies; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Public Service—superannuated federal employees—request for increased pensions.

It being six o'clock, pursuant to the order of the house I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AFFECTING RATES, ADMINISTRATION, SAVINGS BANK

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kierans for the second reading of Bill No. C-116, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie).

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, reflecting over the adjournment period I have come to the conclusion, having listened carefully to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to the suggestion of His Honour that while it might be possible for me to abandon the phraseology of my amendment, in doing so I should not abandon the principle nor my purpose. I would beg Your Honour's leave and that of the house to substitute for the discussed amendment an amendment in the following terms:

That Bill C-116 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications.

I so move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Post Office Act

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) wishes to speak.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the post office bill, along with other hon. members I am greatly concerned about the changes in rates in the bill and also in the reduction of services that it proposes. I come from a riding that is largely rural in nature; therefore the reduction in services is of prime importance and the rate structure is also of great interest, particularly for farm magazines, periodicals and local papers.

In discussing the various forms of communication it would be unfair to attempt to separate post office communication from other forms of communication such as the telephone, telegraph, radio, television, etc. To some extent the post office has competed with other forms of communication, and I think this is more evident with the telephone especially. A great deal of business is still transacted by letter and much communication is still carried forward in this way, but alternatively much of this communication can be carried out by telephone, such as the placing of business orders, and so on. The written word has the advantage of being exact and subject to copy in a permanent record. Although the cost of a business letter is not inconsiderable, it is an acceptable means of business communication and as such is very valuable.

If the five day week promotes the use of alternative means of communication, particularly in the business world, the post office may lose business that it may never recover. I feel that the five day week will cause some reduction in the efficiency of our industrial and economic machine. In this day, when Canadians are facing ever increasing government expenditures, when we as a nation are embarking upon ever expanding social programs for the benefit of our people and we are being exhorted to increase the productivity of our industrial and agricultural apparatus, it seems to me that we should look with extreme care to not diminishing the means by which the nation carries on its business.

In view of the fact that the post office has a virtual monopoly in the distribution of mail, and because it is very necessary for this means of communication to be adequate to serve the public, the post office has a duty to see that with its monopoly position in its eagerness to arrive at a balanced budget it does not cause considerable dislocation to the economic health and efficiency of the business of the community it serves, especially the productive portion of our economy. In these days of inflation and the increased wages that are necessary, I am sure that rates must be increased to bring the postal deficit more closely in line; but the curtailment of services is also of great importance, and as I have stated previously, before major changes are made there should be a considerable study of this problem.

For many people in rural areas Saturday is the biggest day of the week and on this day much business is transacted. Indeed, should there be only a five day week in rural communities it would seem that Saturday closing should fit in with the general business of the community and should not be subject to an arbitrary ruling by Ottawa in respect of the number of business days in a week.

With this in mind, I believe that this whole problem should be referred to committee, wherein various interested people and business interests could put forward their representations. Possible rate increases over a period of years could be considered. This would be of special value to small newspapers because they would be able to absorb increased rates and their subscribers would become accustomed to them.

The doubling of the subscription rate of $20 for a subscription to a daily newspaper carried in the mail is very high, especially in the year in which the increased rate is imposed. Whether people living in rural communities should have this very large increase suddenly thrust upon them is a question to which considerable attention should be given. For many magazines, particularly rural magazines, it will amount to an increase of 350 per cent. Should this rate increase come about suddenly, it is possible that many businesses will not function any longer. There is an irreducible minimum below which the post office cannot function. Few business ventures thrive by increasing their charges and decreasing their service at the same time. It might well be that the post office will be pricing itself out of business in certain areas.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

River, the Swan River Star and Times. The editorial appeared in the issue of July 8, 1968 and states:

We find that a letter mailed in Mafeking, addressed to Birch River (15 miles) passes through its destination, on to Swan River (50 miles) untouched, then on to Dauphin, 110 miles south, to be sorted and returned to Swan River where it is picked up by a second carrier for delivery in Birch River the next day.

This can be said for a letter from Kenville addressed to Swan River (11 miles), which is carried west to Durban, then to Benito, then back to Swan River and on to Dauphin, to be returned for delivery in Swan River the next day. What sort of nonsense is this?

Mail from this area cannot cross the border of Saskatchewan to points en route to Yorkton, Arran, Pelly, Whitebeech and elsewhere. These villages and towns make up part of the vast shopping area centered by Swan River. The mail for these points must again travel from Swan River to Dauphin to be routed to Yorkton for sorting and distribution, travelling some 400 miles to reach its destination, at times less than 25 miles away from the mailing point in Swan River. It is not hard to realize the inconvenience to people in the matter of mailing drugs and other important items of necessity to everyday life.

If present methods of handling local intercommunity mail cannot be improved, we appeal to the Postmaster General to reinstitute the pony express which, we are confident, will meet local need with credit and give the public the service it rightfully deserves at considerable reduction in

Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) has said that the post office is no longer an institution but a function. Many of the rates have not been raised for 17 years, and it seems incongruous to move so quickly to institute new rates which will drastically change the pattern of the mail within a few days. I would strongly urge that this bill be referred to committee, where many interested people who will be very seriously affected by this measure can have their day in court.

[Translation]

Mr. C .- A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I quite frankly did not intend to take part in the debate about the Post Office Department because I felt that enough speeches had been made already. But after listening to those who have held the floor for many hours, I will say simply that the days and the hours follow one another. Since I came to the house—this is my seventh year here—I have Indeed, we may well look at some of the learned to do my homework before getting up mechanics of the post office. I have here an to speak, especially when we are dealing with editorial from a small newspaper in Swan a new minister from our province. It is always interesting to watch his first steps in parliament and we hope to find something new always.

This is a new minister but not a new department and after the many hours I spent listening to speeches, and especially to the minister's replies, I realized that the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) is still the spokesman of the faithful—and they just have to be faithful—senior officials led by other senior officials of the Post Office Department because it is absolutely necessary that the minister should be able to fulfil his duties and perpetuate that line of old timers, as the English would say, within that department which is, in my opinion, a particularly fruitful field of patronage, at least in my riding, and throughout the province, I would imagine.

The old game is still being played; nothing has changed. I feel that, in spite of his good will, the minister will not be able to do anything. He was put there and he will have to do the work he is told to do. Sometimes, when I see him looking up at the gallery where senior officials are sitting, while he is reading statements prepared by them, I get the impression that if I were in his shoes I would say: But what are you making me read?

Mr. Speaker, I respect the minister and I feel sorry for him because he has a heavy burden to carry. I do not know if the government put him there to destroy him or to eliminate him but I think that the measures he is asked to take are not of a nature to get him much sympathy in his province.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to tell you on behalf of our party that we are in favour of the amendment just moved. We think that the statements made to date by the minister are dictatorial. He simply asks the house to give him a free hand to do anything he wishes in the Post Office Department. However, Mr. Speaker, I still believe that we can act democratically, that we still live in a period of democratic government, but I do not think that the majority of the members even on the government side, would agree to pass to dictatorship, and that is precisely what the minister has been doing since he told us of his intention to introduce this bill. I think he would be more at ease in a dictatorship, like Russia for instance, to take such decisions. In fact, I will never admit that a minister is given unlimited powers to administer his department.

I say that we are here to protect democra-urge the minister, if he still enjoys some prestige with his senior officials, or if he can free himself from the ties that bind him today, to give us at least one thing, namely, convince the house, through the will of its members, to refer the bill to the committee, as is suggested in the amendment, so that we can hear the voice of the people really concerned and play our part, in attending the meetings of the committee.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister is merely the victim today. because I saw the way he behaved in the past, and surely he does not have the qualities of a socialist dictator. However, the decision he just took and the position he maintains in this house are indicative of the most authentic socialistic attitude of our times. And that is why, this evening, I should like at least to urge him to come back to a more wholesome democracy, in this supposedly just society, for I have never seen a one-way just society or a just socialist society.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the minister still turns a deaf ear to all the opposition expressed in the house, as well as outside the house, when he has surely received the same telegrams that we did. He may have spent hours answering the telephone, trying to calm down the people, because this bill does not only concern newspapers, it concerns the whole population.

An attempt is being made, today, to tax the whole population and the people are fed up with taxes. We are interested in protecting our papers, both our dailies and weeklies. In my riding, we only have weeklies but we want them to be able to survive in this socalled democracy. The situation which is now being created for our weeklies, and our large newspapers as well, will no longer allow them to ask high enough rates for them to survive.

We, as well as the people in all the other areas-although I must say ours is fairly remote—are entitled to our papers and we are also entitled to having the government allow them to continue to exist. The government does not help them, and I do not think it has ever subsidized our newspapers as it has perhaps done in the case of the large dailies during election time by giving them rather large sums of money.

However, if we were dealing today with cy. We must progress democratically and I the C.B.C., with the whole system of state ment, then we could indeed speak of patronage, but the newspapers have never benefited from any patronage on the part of the federal government. What we want to safeguard are industries and advertising media used by private enterprise, because we do not want some day to have a state-controlled press, and that is what is going to happen if the present situation persists. If our privately owned newspapers are continually harassed the way they are now, the day will come-and I am convinced that that is what the socialists in this house are hoping forwhen we will have a state-controlled press, completely under the thumb of the government, which will say only what the government allows it to say.

• (8:20 p.m.)

This is now happening in the C.B.C. and when questions are asked about the C.B.C. the minister all but tells us that it none of our business. If we had such crown corporations, can one imagine how difficult it would be for the people to obtain trustworthy information? It would be difficult to live in such a democracy and it would be almost impossible to have so-called just society.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention at this stage a few telegrams which I have received and which the minister must also have received from our leading newspapers. I have here a telegram from the Soleil stating that 18 owners and directors of Quebec dailies have met with the minister and his officials.

I hope that the minister admits it.

Mr. Kierans: Yes.

Mr. Gauthier: The telegram adds that several ministers were also approached. I am sure that they went and knocked at his door and it seems that it did not change anything at all. The minister maintained his position. He decided that on his own, secretly in his office and I would say that he was prompted by his officials who are against private enterprise and who probably told him: "Do that, this is what you must do, you should tax the taxpayer again". It is again private enterprise which becomes the fall guy of this whole ill-planned administration and it is always the same tune: "Curses on the jackass!" let us fight against private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, I have told the minister that we have received many telegrams from the directors of the leading newspapers-I need propaganda heavily subsidized by the govern- not read them for he is motioning to me that he has received them—even from the directors of the Étoile du Lac a weekly paper of my riding, who have also protested against the decision of the department. I think that the weekly papers are even more concerned, because I have heard that as a result of the adoption of such a measure at least 50 publications in the province of Quebec would disappear.

> If that is the goal the minister is aiming at he only has to continue—he is well on his way-and, within two or three years, we will have only State newspapers to read. I have in hand a brief presented on October 17, 1968 which the minister had certainly received, as it was directed to him and I quote:

> I have the honour, in my capacity of president of the Corporation des Quotidiens du Québec Inc., to represent here the French and English daily newspapers of Quebec. On their behalf, I wish to thank you for welcoming us-

> The minister can see how polite they are. They begin by thanking him after they have received that staggering blow on the head.

> We understand your concern for a healthy administration of government services under your jurisdiction and you know that the press is unanimous in encouraging this. Therefore, we do not intend stand in the way of the reasonable measures which are under consideration to improve, if necessary, the postal services.

A normal increase would be acceptable; but no one wants to see the rates tripled.

We believe, however, that the proposed reforms, or some of them rather, should be studied again in order to avoid real injustices being perpetrated, even in good faith, or irrevocably damageable measures being adopted.

To set the records straight, let us say first of all that the recent consultation of the officials of your department concerning, particularly, the cancellation of Saturday deliveries, did not receive, on our part, the "extremely warm welcome" which you alluded, in the house, on October 8th last. The decision of your department rather had the effect of a bomb on the Quebec newspaper publishers, as proved by the letters, invited by your officials, commenting on the decision. Copy of each one of those letters from the circulation department heads of the Quebec newspapers are herewith enclosed. We regret that we cannot confirm your words of October 8th last in this regard.

But the purpose of the meeting we have asked is far more serious. This morning, we will try to analyse briefly the situation that may stem from the passing or the continued application of the measures already announced by your department.

1. Increase in postal rates for second-class mail. Taking for granted that the figures supplied by your high officials are accurate, i.e. that the mailing rates for printed matter were being increased from $0.025 to $0.05 per pound, and from $0.04 to $0.15 per pound for publicity material, the results would be disastrous here.

Some Quebec newspapers deliver over half their United States so often, why our high-ranking papers by mail.

In addition, in the case of some dailies, mailing costs would be tripled or even quadrupled; this would necessarily lead to an unjustifiable and unreasonable increase in subscription rates (which barely cover the cost of paper and mailing in most cases) and, as will readily be understood, a radical falling off in circulation with ensuing loss in advertising income, the cost of which is directly related to the circulation.

The following table shows better than any argument the increase in newspapers mailing rates and their extravagant and excessive character.

Mr. Speaker, here we are given a table of the mailing rates, which the minister also received:

Sherbrooke's Tribune which has 6,978 subscribers and whose subscription rate is $4.60 at present, would be $13.70 at the new rates.

As far as Montréal-Matin is concerned, the cost would jump from $6 to $9.

In the case of Le Soleil, the subscription rate would be increased from $7.30 to $24.75. There would be less difference in price for Montréal-Matin, because the distribution is made in greater Montreal area. But if we consider the position of Le Soleil, which serves its subscribers across the province of Quebec, you have an idea of the variation of rates, since the subscription rate at present is $7.30, and it would climb up to $24.75. I need not give the names of all newspapers, the minister has certainly considered many times the position of all of them before going to sleep.

I continue to read the brief, Mr. Speaker but I shall not take very long:

• (8:30 p.m.)

As those figures indicate, the annual cost for the above mentioned newspapers...would increase from $615,507 to $1,812,552-

The most surprising aspect of the proposed reforms, is the disproportion between the mailing rates of this class of mail in Canada and those in effect in the United States. In fact, in the United States, since January 1968, the rates on advertising portion are as follows:

(Destination within 150 miles) 1968—$0.046 per pound 1969—$0.049 per pound 1970—$0.053 per pound

(Destination within 500 miles) 1968—$0.057 per pound 1969—$0.06 per pound 1970—$0.064 per pound

The mailing rates for the reading portion (no limited area) are the following:

1968—$0.03 per pound 1969—$0.032 per pound 1970—$0.034 per pound

These are called reasonable and normal increases. I wonder, when we copy the United States so often, why our high-ranking officials have not, once more, tried to imitate our neighbours, at least in order to keep rates within the limits of reason.

Should the forwarding charges on second class mail be the same for all publications in the category? Should no distinction be made between the role or nature of publications and their usefulness to society? Do we not burden some class of publications with costs out of proportion with those supported by the department in connection with their handling?

The particular situation of the Quebec dailies (proportionally few, with a large circulation) the above-mentioned chart, the comparison with the rates in the United States mentioned above, and the questions raised here, as well as in the various editorials published, and in the house, are quite enough to show the need for a more detailed study of the conditions of the increase which might have become necessary.

We are ready to participate in it and to provide you with any information you may require.

The writer of this editorial is not asking for anything impossible; he is merely making a reasonable and a sensible request.

Before their taxes are increased threefold, they should at least be allowed to put their case before a government committee, to appear before this government, which is supposed to be the government of the people.

As to the discontinuance of mail delivery on Saturdays, I wish to say that in our areas most weekly papers are delivered on Saturday. We will therefore have to read Friday papers on Monday. The news will by then be pretty stale, and I think that subscriptions to our weekly papers would fall off greatly. This problem is mentioned in the brief. That is the main argument put forward by the representatives of the weekly papers, and I think the committee should give consideration to this question if it wants these weekly papers to survive and their subscribers to be able to pay a fair subscription rate instead of three times that price in order to get news that are four day late.

Mr. Speaker, we find the following passage on page 6 of the brief:

In a democratic system, the citizen has a right to be informed.

That is exactly what I have been saying in my remarks.

The role of the press—especially of the written press—is to collect and to circulate information.

However, the measures which your Department is contemplating now, in order to settle an administrative problem, will result in hindering the right of the citizen to be informed and the freedom of the press to circulate that information.

Therefore, we suggest that these reforms be delayed in order to allow a more detailed study of the problem causing them and of the opportunity and the possible application of corrective, efficient and just measures.

We express again our desire to participate in this study-

Mr. Speaker, if the Minister dutifully reads all those reports, as well as all the reports and letters we get, I don't think he can do anything else but accept that this proposal be referred to a committee. For the sake of democracy and of simple social justice, we ask of him this evening to allow those affected to be heard by a committee, even if his decision is irretrievable, even if there is nothing he can do about it, as we know that high officials-tools of Canadian high finance-carry more weight than a mere minister. Even if he has to get off the beaten paths followed by his predecessors, let him try for once, here in this house. Let him take his own decision, a human and democratic decision, by allowing this bill to be referred to a committee for study.

We know that the minister belongs to a majority government and that it is almost impossible for him to be a true democrat. However, if he bows to the opposition's wishes, there would have been at least a few hours of democracy in this house, and the people would be grateful to him for that, since they already detect the monumental blunder.

I sympathize with the big dailies who fought for such a government. As for those big daily newspapers who battled to the end in the last election, I would be inclined to apply to them La Fontaine's fable "The Ant and the Grasshopper" and to ask them: "What did you do when the election days were come? You sang? Well, now you go and have a dance."

[English]

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this bill is to provide for the increase in postal rates in this country, and I can honestly say that in some respects I do not entirely disagree with that. I said in some respects, Mr. Speaker, because in the situation we are facing today we are going to get more and pay less.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Asselin: The minister is smiling.

Mr. Kierans: He was right the first time. [Mr. Gauthier.]

Mr. McKinley: The cost of our service is going to increase and the extent of the service will diminish. I think that we in this house must make a very careful examination of the course and conduct of the department and the minister in this respect. The minister has come to his department fresh and full of vigour, and for that I think we should commend him. I want to congratulate him and welcome him to this house.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Undoubtedly, as a result of his former association with the government of Quebec, with which he served as minister of revenue. he has become concerned with revenue matters. As a result he wishes to increase the revenues of his department and make it pay. In this regard may I suggest as a starter that he revert to ordinary black and white notepaper when sending out replies from his office, instead of using the expensive gold embossed paper currently being used. I also suggest that his previous association with the Montreal stock exchange may have left him with the impression that the suspension of Saturday mail deliveries would not occasion any hardship. I am happy that he has announced a change of policy in this regard.

In this connection may I read a letter I received, just to show the minister that he is heading in the right direction. It says in part:

We have had rural mail delivery for over fifty years. It has become a basic right. The Saturday newspaper is by far the most valuable newspaper of the week. We contract for its delivery by the year in advance and we resent the intrusion of the government into this contract. This is a retrograde step on the part of Mr. Kierans and will be resented by all who have been paying for rural mail delivery over these many years. After rural mail delivery had been established fifty some years ago it was found and publicly stated in the newspaper that the increased stamp sales more than paid for rural mail delivery. Mr. Kierans action is a betrayal of trust. He is being paid for Saturday delivery on routes but is refusing to make delivery.

Perhaps the suspension of Saturday mail delivery would not have caused hardship to members of the Montreal stock exchange, but it would have caused hardship to my constituents. We, in the rural areas, are a little tired of being made the goat every time this government decides to cut back on anything. A recent example of this was the measure to Mr. McKinley: I mean, pay more and get make the farmer pay a higher interest rate for farm credit. It was the government, not the farmer, which caused interest rates to go up to a high level in the first place. The spending policies of this government brought about that increase in rates. It should have in Ottawa. Few from my constituency will been doing away back, when there were high attend any performances at the arts centre, employment levels as the result of Conservative government policies, what it is seeking to do now.

The minister has also received a number of recommendations, such as the Montpetit report. Some of these ought to be implemented in order to make the department more efficient, so that we may have happier people in the public service. We should look into these reports before reducing services. As I said before, we now have less service for which we are paying more.

I now wish to read these few sentences from "Sound Off" by Gordon Sanderson:

What's happening to the mail service in this country?

Every week Sound Off investigates problems that have arisen between customers and firms which are traceable to the same cause: "We didn't get the letter

This can be a pat excuse for internal inefficiency in some firms. Incorrectly addressed mail may also be responsible. The post office is unjustly blamed for much that is not its doing.

Yet how does the post office explain cases of registered mail going astray or correctly addressed letter and pension cheques being delivered to the wrong house?

It would be unfair to make a blanket condemnation of letter carriers or the whole system, but complaints about lost or undelivered mail-once a rarity—are becoming numerous enough to shake public confidence and trust in this most essential government service.

Before raising rates and allowing old inefficiencies to continue the government ought to examine the workings of the department. The government's attitudes towards raising rates is wrong, and I want to explain why I think it is wrong. First, the post office of Canada is a government monopoly. It is a government service and there is no competition. Businessmen, industrialists, farmers, and householders must accept what the government offers, or go without. That in itself may breed inefficiencies. The department is a monopoly that is supported by the people. I therefore think that the government is under an obligation to provide the people with the highest possible level of service.

The government refused to pay the rural mail carriers for being on stand-by during the last postal strike. I am glad to learn that the minister has changed his mind in some aspects of the matter. I ask, why should the letter regardless of sleet or storm or dark of night, carriers not be paid? This is the government it would go through at much higher cost to that is to spend $50 million on an arts centre those who were paying the shot.

but nearly all of them will feel the pinch from the increased postal rates. The minister's attitude toward the rural mail carriers was that he would not pay them for six days work when they worked only five days. I think he has changed his mind. Has anyone noticed the ministerial attendance roster? The ministers work in the house on three days a week, yet they all expect to be paid for a full

Mr. Perrault: That is a ridiculous statement to make.

Mr. McKinley: The roster is right in front of us.

The minister has changed his attitude, and I am glad. The rural mail carriers in my riding are not organized into a union, but they have a contract with the government which they expect the government to honour. It has been said that rural mail routes are to be amalgamated. It seems to me this would not save a great deal of money and that it would have the effect of putting some mail carriers out of work. In addition, some of the mail would take longer to deliver.

• (8:50 p.m.)

I am glad to know that the Postmaster General has himself lived in a rural area. I ask him to put himself in the position of some of these people who will be deprived of certain services and who will have to pay higher rates. I should like to think that he will take note of what has been said during the debate and consider having this bill sent to a committee, as hon. members have proposed. I well remember the transport bill which was considered in committee with extreme thoroughness, and was reported back with some 70 amendments. I maintain we should have a chance to listen to those whose interests will be seriously affected by this measure, and give it a thorough examination in order to make sure that it will do what is intended without causing extreme hardship to anyone.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the minister's very adequate address this afternoon I could not but think that neither sleet nor storm nor dark of night would stop the mail from going through. I also got the impression that,

I am not critical of the Postmaster General for trying to create confidence in his department but I do suggest that members of the government should use tact and wisdom when applying their powers, when those powers affect the lives of individuals and the enterprises in which they are engaged. I should like to refer in particular to one sector of the economy which is affected by these proposed increases in postal rates, the weekly newspapers. I have been told by the president of a weekly newspaper association in Canada that he knew nothing at all about details of this bill until he got a copy of it from myself.

Did the government not consider that these associations were important enough to be informed in advance of what was happening, or was it an attempt to outmanoeuvre those who would be expected to object to an increase in rates? It is obvious that the Postmaster General did not consult with the newspaper associations. I should like to point out that many of the newspapers in Canada are in financial difficulties. Recently we saw the Family Herald fold up; the Western Producer has been in financial trouble for a long time. Competition for advertising is hard, and these papers are not in a good position to compete for advertising with television and the larger dailies.

Specifically I object to the arbitrary decision by the department to class as dailies newspapers put out in towns or cities whose population exceeds 10,000. There are at least 79 such papers in Canada—almost as many weeklies as there are daily papers, so this is an important section of our newspaper production. The suggestion has been made to me that a 400 per cent increase in rates is being imposed in connection with these papers. In the case of one paper alone it means an increase of about $1,800 in postal rates.

These people should have the opportunity to express their views and explain how the provisions of the bill would affect them. I am not a newspaperman; I am a farmer. Some members of this house may have worked on newspapers, but I do not think there are many here have had the experience of running a newspaper. I wonder whether we are qualified to judge whether the minister's proposals are desirable on the basis of the facts we have before us. That is why I think it is only fair we should refer this bill to a committee where those affected could make representations or where, for that matter, anyone who objected to these increases could explain his case. As I say, I do not feel competent to assess this situation and I have

I am not critical of the Postmaster General or trying to create confidence in his department but I do suggest that members of the overnment should use tact and wisdom when oplying their powers, when those powers feet the lives of individuals and the enterrises in which they are engaged. I should the feeling that many other hon, members are not competent to do so, either. I find myself wondering whether the department has considered all the angles in this field. In these circumstances the first thing to do would be to refer this subject to a committee, hear representations, and go on from there.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Like my hon. friend from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) I spent the week end looking at the so-called white paper or the financial statement detailing the proposed rate adjustments, along with other documentation put out by the minister in support of Bill C-116. While we can understand the tables and so forth which have been put forward, none of it is backed up by evidence to show that the tables are right.

I put it to the minister. He is the one who is asking for the change, and the burden of proof is upon him. I maintain that having regard to the paucity of information given us in connection with many of the changes which are proposed, this bill must go to committee, as my hon. friend suggests, in order that we may get at the root of these financial difficulties and ascertain why money is being lost at certain levels.

We ought not to rely merely on the fact that the minister says so. The word of the minister is not necessarily the truth of the matter. After all, my hon. friend did show that somebody's computer, or the hand that was guiding it, was way out of line as between six months ago and the present time. All sorts of figures have been put forward as to what might be the results of the operations of the Post Office Department.

No doubt the minister does face a certain problem in connection with the operation, but I am wondering whether he has chosen the correct remedies. On the one hand they propose to reduce services and on the other to increase the cost to the public. Frankly I think that is the bankrupt way of running a business. What should be done is sell the services, increase the volume and make the operation more efficient.

proposals are desirable on the basis of the facts we have before us. That is why I think it is only fair we should refer this bill to a committee where those affected could make representations or where, for that matter, anyone who objected to these increases could explain his case. As I say, I do not feel competent to assess this situation and I have tell the minister right now that the relationship between the upper level and the lower level of employees just stinks. Employees are dissatisfied with some of the practices that have been prevalent in the department. Some efforts have been made to improve them, but how on earth can you have an efficient operation where the bottom, or main base of the operation, is not pulling along with the top?

We also want to know whether the minister is satisfied that the increased wages paid to postal clerks, delivery men and other employees will be matched by an increase in productivity. If it is not, then all we are doing is stoking the furnace of inflation. The settlements, the strike, and all that took place last summer will go for naught. As an aside, Mr. Speaker, may I say I think the strike was unnecessary. Aside from certain legitimate grievances I think it could be blamed on dilatoriness on the part of the government in dealing with grievances, and also on lust for power on the part of certain union officials. We can do without both. The government must pick up its socks in dealing with its employees, but this must be matched by a certain degree of responsibility on the part of those who lead the employees.

We are told that we will get a five day postal service for parts of Canada. In a matter of public service I do not see one iota of justification for a distinction to be made between rural and urban residents. In saying that I acknowledge that the rural residents are fully entitled to what they are going to get, but urban residents are entitled to the same degree of service. They have the same claim with regard to mail. They have the same status with regard to legal consequences.

As a classic example I cite a rule of the Immigration Appeal Board which states that the period for appeal shall expire within 15 days, I believe, following the making of an order, not 15 days after receipt of the order by the person concerned. To a person living out in northern Alberta, British Columbia, or some other distant urban point from Ottawa, this means that when a decision of the Immigration Appeal Board is sent to him it will remain in the city post office from Friday until Monday before delivery to him, and three days of the 15 day period will be lost to that person.

First of all, I think that Immigration Appeal Board regulation is wrong. It is a made-in-Ottawa ruling that should have no application across the country. But under the new postal regulations its effect on persons living in urban areas at a distance from Ottawa will be worse than on those living in rural areas. The minister and his officials may blithely ignore the effect, but I point out that their proposed step does affect the legal rights of citizens.

There are many other instances where legal matters are not dependant upon the receipt of a letter, but upon the time of its dispatch. In a case such as this the postal authorities may well say, "It is tough luck that you happen to live in a city or urban area." I ask the minister and his officials what relief they will provide in such a case. The minister is quite prepared to provide relief against the hardship of rural residents not receiving their Friday newspapers, but that is a small thing compared to the legal rights of someone who may be adversely affected by the decision to suspend Saturday mail deliveries.

Admittedly there would be no grave danger if other existing legislation were changed to take account of this change in postal deliveries. But the other legislation is not being changed, and no one has told us that it will be changed. I would like the officials of the department to give a detailed answer on this matter, so that we may see whether they have thought it our or not.

I wish to make two more points, Mr. Speaker, with respect to city businessmen. I have here a copy of a letter written to the minister by a national merchandising and warehousing firm which does freight distribution for the Canadian National Railways in many communities both in the west and east. This is what the president of that company wrote with regard to curtailment of the Saturday mail service:

Frankly, it will work a real hardship on us if we are unable to do so— $\,$

Meaning to pick up their mail on Saturdays.

—and in addition, a hardship on the shipping public as it will not be possible for us to deliver merchandise arriving in cars on Friday night, Saturday night and Sunday night in our various locations—

And these are listed in Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Ontario.

The billings that we receive from the east represent a good portion of our mail for Saturday. The envelopes might almost be described as small parcels and it is imperative that we have these for preparation on Saturday in order that we can be ready to open cars on Monday morning and make delivery. Some of the merchandise is perishable, arriving in refrigerated and heated cars. If they are not unloaded it is necessary to maintain refrigeration or heat, all of which would add considerably to the cost and increase the cost of the merchandise to the public.

At the present time firms such as this pick up their mail at the post office either from a very large lock box, or as in the case of this particular firm, through a sack arrangement whereby they can pick it up at the counter.

Mr. Kierans: The service will still be available.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister received an injunction from my colleague this afternoon and I do not think I need repeat it. If the minister has paid attention to this point, then it is all to the good; but if that service were curtailed or completely eliminated there would be considerable cost and inconvenience. I think it can be said from his gestures that the minister has perhaps modified his stand in this regard. I shall wait for his further answer.

I now wish to deal with the question of the religious press. We are told that under the provisions of this bill a weekly newspaper published in a town of less than 10,000 people will have the first 2,500 copies of its publication handled free of charge if delivered within a radius of 40 miles. Most of the religious publications do not fall in this category. They are not the profit makers. They do not get government advertising in any volume. They do not get lush supermarket advertising. Most of them exist on a hand-to-mouth basis. Yet in the case of one of these publications in western Canada it will have an additional postal charge of $7,000, just about enough to cause it to close its doors unless there is a substantial increase in its subscription rate.

• (9:10 p.m.)

In this regard we run into some other complications. Canadian magazines as a whole will be penalized vis-à-vis United States and foreign publications. For one thing, in order to meet the increased postal costs Canadian magazines will have to increase their subscription rates. United States magazines will not have to do this because there is nothing in the bill which says there will be any greater charge imposed on United States magazines. The postage on United States magazines is paid in the United States, and therefore the Canadian government does not benefit from this. So therefore it is completely irrelevant. What we are concerned with are Canadian magazines and Canadian newspapers. I shall not talk about those pseudo-Canadian magazines, Reader's Digest and Time magazine.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Just another bonus is being given to them as against truly Canadian publications.

The government of Canada has always held to the principle of subsidizing in some way the press in general because of its importance to the Canadian national life. The minister now says we will get rid of that principle, that the principle no longer applies. Surely to goodness it ought to be enough, that Canadian publications are already under the heaviest possible economic competition from the United States. They do not have the built-in advantage of Time and Reader's Digest, which were legitimatized in some fashion by the action of the administration of which the minister is a member.

Secondly I think—and some people have mentioned this today—that since the Canadian public is being asked to subsidize another communication media for the dissemination of ideas, to wit the C.B.C., we should be able to subsidize in some way Canadian newspapers and periodicals which also disseminate Canadian ideas. With regard to the church press, I believe perhaps it would be a desirable objective to assist the dissemination of views which are a counterpoint to some of the irreligious drivel one sees from time to time on the C.B.C. If we are prepared to subsidize some of the programming on the C.B.C., surely there is a real case for subsidizing the counterargument in the church press. The minister has received a very extensive brief from the representatives of the church press. I think this was worth while reading, but I need not repeat it at this time.

I am not sure that this bill meets the problems of the Post Office Department. It is stated that the department will have a deficit, but no factual proof has been put forward, outside of some tables. Nothing has been said about why it costs so much to handle one piece of first class mail, newspaper, or whatever it might be. Nothing has been said, other than the mere statement that it costs a certain amount. Nothing has been said about improving the efficiency of the department. Nothing has been said about meeting the wage increases and so forth with increased productivity. Many questions have been raised by this bill which remain unanswered.

It is for this reason that I entirely support the contention put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough, that this bill must go to a committee for a detailed answer and for the minister to prove his case. It is not up to this house to prove that the minister is wrong.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before us requires that this bill be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications. Why such a request, when the hon. members have all the necessary information to reach at once a just and reasonable decision?

Mr. Speaker, never have the hon. members received for the consideration of a bill, as much material, briefs and working papers as were submitted to us by the hon. minister. In fact, his 21 page document contains all the statistics and every information available to the department. I wonder what else we could learn in committee.

The hon. minister received representations from scores of associations of dailies, weeklies and magazines. Members of the opposition have stated that they have a copy of these requests before them. Mr. Speaker, what else will the representatives of these associations state before a parliamentary committee?

Furthermore, we have also read the editorials and my honourable friends opposite have quoted several this afternoon. All hon. members have also before them a copy of the hundreds of telegrams which were delivered during the weekend.

As was said this afternoon by the hon. minister, newspapers are not taken by surpise, and I quote what he said:

As for the allegation that the increase is sudden, this I cannot accept. This issue was raised in the house in 1964 and again during consideration of legislation last year.

The publishing industry, I submit, has been well aware for some time that changes were coming and were overdue.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition parties ask that the bill be referred to a standing committee for the sole purpose of making a little publicity for themselves. Therefore, let us pass the bill at once and later on, let us suggest to the opposition that it should ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to present a bill to subsidize newspapers. Then the N.D.P. members especially will be able to appear before the committee and bring their witnesses in order to justify that this house can pay a $982,000 subsidy to the Reader's Digest and a $864,000 subsidy to Time.

Mr. Speaker, what will be the response of the taxpayers to such a legislation? Is it not what the opposition wants to do indirectly today?

We have already spent five hours on that resolution and for the last four hours—

Post Office Act

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): If the hon, member will allow me a question—

Mr. Cyr: I will conclude, Mr. Speaker.

We have spent five hours studying that resolution and now we are beginning the fourth hour before giving that bill second reading. Canadians want this house to study the bills quickly and post office patrons, especially all Canadians, approve the increase provided in the bill for first class mail.

Some hon. Members: Ah, ah.

Mr. Cyr: Certainly. I would say to the hon. member opposite that last Friday night on a radio program in Montreal I spent two hours answering questions from Montrealers and that all those who called were in favour of the bill introduced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans).

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am so astounded to hear the words just spoken by the member for Gaspé that I want to clear up the matter in the house. How is it that last week, he was the spokesman of the Liberal members in their opposition to the minister's bill? Why this sudden change of mind?

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the member for Charlevoix for having raised this matter. We are in a democratic country, the party of which I am a member is a democratic party and all members have the right to express their ideas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Asselin: That sounds like a road roller.

Mr. Cyr: It is true that I have been appointed chairman of an ad hoc committee, as the minister reported in the house two weeks ago, but that was to consider the statement he had made concerning the abolition of mail distribution on Saturdays. Today, I congratulate the minister for his statement concerning the mail delivery service in rural areas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration has nothing to do with the mail delivery on Saturday. I feel that if we refer this bill to the standing committee of the house, that will be merely filibustering on the part of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cyr: Let us vote immediately on this amendment, in order that we may achieve something and do what our people have sent us here to do, namely work for the welfare of them all, and I think that the filibustering going on at present will do no good to the country.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at the outset that I intend to be brief.

My colleague the hon, member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) criticized constructively and in detail this afternoon the measure concerning and the operation of the Post Office Department. However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but take advantage of this opportunity tonight to present the views of my constituents concerning Bill C-116.

Mr. Speaker, the measure now before us may greatly and unfavourably affect the taxpayers of my riding as well as others, and I shall pay no heed to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) who has just urged us to support this bill. In my opinion we are here to serve the best interests of our constituents and, by expressing their views and voicing their objections to the measures presented by the minister, we are only doing our duty.

Like many others, we could very well do without the advice of the honourable member for Gaspé, because he changes his mind a little too often. While last week, he was campaigning against his own minister, today he kowtows to him and acts as the spokesman of the very person he was fighting against last week. Mr. Speaker, advice coming from such a frivolous person should be dismissed with the same speed as the one he would like us to use to pass this measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention the fact that during our discussions last week there never was any question about the bill...

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat, please. There can be only one point of order at a time, and I am trying patiently to listen to the point of order, member for Gaspé.

[Mr. Cyr.]

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, what is the merit of his point of order?

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to you that during our discussions in the previous weeks, consideration of Bill C-116 never came up before the minister's statement-

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: That is no point of order.

Mr. Ricard: There is no point of order in that.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: The hon. member who just had the floor did not even tell Mr. Speaker that he was raising a point of order, and he rises on a question of privilege. Therefore, let him resume his seat since he has no reason to raise a point of order. Besides, he is delaying the debate and the passage of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The member for Saint-Hyacinthe Ricard).

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I agree with you that the member for Gaspé had no cause to rise on a point of order and, as my colleague for Charlevoix just said, the member for Gaspé is only holding up the passing of the bill, which he would have us rush through.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, in introducing his measure, the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) referred four or five times to the just society he would like to see in Canada. It would seem that it is in the name of that just society that the Postmaster General wants to increase the postal tariff, to reduce postal services and do away with 1,500 jobs which Canadians now hold. If that is the idea the hon, minister has of a just society, I think he should reconsider what a just society is and reconsider his plans for the future.

As a former provincial minister and in view of the aspirations the minister had last April, it is guite proper that he should try to or the alleged point of order, of the hon. impress the house and the whole country. It is quite understandable that the minister should have chosen as his aim the reorganization of the Post Office Department.

He must be congratulated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: I see that the surplus of Liberal members sitting on this side of the house have been well trained, because every time the word "congratulate" is mentioned, they immediately becomes noisy. They do it by nature.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: You see, Mr. Speaker.

The minister must surely be congratulated for trying to save up tidy sums for the Canadian people. However, he should also take that opportunity to practise what he preaches and encourage his other colleagues of the cabinet to do likewise, because we now have a cabinet which has already gone down in history for allowing exorbitant and rising expenses.

If we compare, Mr. Speaker, the statements made this afternoon by the Postmaster General with those made by his predecessor during the first months of the year, we are justified in pondering over the matter.

Contrary to his predecessor who said that first class mail did cover its cost and even brought profits to the government, the minister claims that first class mail bring no profits. Mr. Speaker, it will certainly be agreed that we are right to demand more information, more light on that question, and it is strange indeed that the minister does not with the request to defer the comply proposed measure to a committee so that those who are the most interested get the opportunity to air their views. We would benefit, I am sure, of the mass of information brought to light by businessmen, newspaper editors, newsmen, in a word, all the people who will have to foot the bill of the increase of rates the hon. minister is proposing.

The proposals made by the minister are so unpopular among the people that, as soon as they were announced, they were met with a general outcry. I have here an article from the Granby newspaper, La Voix de l'Est, which reports the conclusions drawn by Les Quotidiens du Québec Inc., at a meeting held recently. Here is the heading.

"Mr. Kierans must respect the right of the rural population to be informed".

Mr. Speaker, responsible people such as newspapermen and newspaper owners do not make such statements lightly and they claim that with those proposals Mr. Kierans would like to deny the rural population the right to be informed.

There is in that measure something which must necessarily stir up the population and which gives us the opportunity to make representations on behalf of the rural people and, at the same time, say that the people who live in urban areas are entitled also to be informed.

Mr. Speaker, the people who would have been willing to accept a certain increase, if it had been reasonable. But the increases proposed by the hon. minister are simply extravagant. When we refer for instance to 100 per cent, 375 per cent, and 150 per cent increases, there is a reason not only to be concerned but also to object. Besides, it is our right and our privilege in this house, and we are using it at this time, because we want the honourable minister to realize that he is about to do a disservice to the people.

With its majority and the docility of its members—we have not heard a single Liberal member who dared protest—the government is going to use the steam-roller in order to steam up all its supporters and compel them to vote for the proposal which is before them. It is not the first time that we see such a complete reversal of opinion among government members, and we will surely see it again before long.

With regard to the brief recently presented to the Postmaster General, for a minister who wants to make every effort to establish a just society, it is surprising to see that he makes no bones about increases.

I have here a table of the increases proposed by the minister, and I would like to quote a few:

For instance, the Sherbrooke Tribune which is now paying $32,099 a year for the forwarding of its mail will have to pay $59,599 a year for the same service. I say for the same service provided that it is maintained as it is now. If the minister's suggestion is carried out, some readers will not be able to read, as they used to, their daily paper on Saturday, since there will be no distribution in urban districts on that day.

With regard to La Voix de l'Est de Granby, they now pay $12,970 to get their paper delivered; with the rates proposed by the one who would establish a just society, they would have to pay $35,647. Who, in the final analysis, will have to pay the cost of those increases?

The minister would have us believe that the newspapers and the publishers will, but logic has taught us for a long time that when taxes go up the consumers always end up paying the piper.

Mr. Speaker, God knows that the cost of living has increased in such leaps and bounds under the present administration that we should not allow that same administration, under the cover of a just society, to act in such a way that taxes are increased once again, for lack of foresight or lack of ties between the members of the cabinet and the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this legislation should be referred to the committee so that all interested parties can express their points of view on the matter. I am convinced that allowing this bill to be studied in committee would serve the Canadian people well.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have just listened attentively, along with everybody else, to the remarks made first by the member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) and, right after, by the member for Sainte-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard).

The hon, member for Gaspé told us that he had taken part for two hours in a radio broadcast in Montreal and that everybody told him that they were satisfied with the increase in postal rates and taxes. I think the hon, member would find it difficult to tell us who exactly supported this measure, when we are receiving telegrams of protest against Bill No. C-116 from all parts of the province and the country, and when we read in a newspaper that a committee of 35 Liberal members is opposing Bill No. C-116.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Caouette: I think one hon, member has just said that is not true. However, there are others in the lobby who tell us that it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, among the Liberal members who object to a rate increase, not one was courageous enough to rise. Most of the Liberals from Quebec, for example, were elected on the free publicity given to them by the Liberal newspapers of Liberals should be under the circumstances. the province. And today, at a time when they one dares to rise and defend those who made them win their election.

Let us take as an exemple the case of the member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand) who benefited from ample publicity in Le Soleil of Quebec City. Now, we receive loads of telegrams to protest against this measure from none other than Gabriel Gilbert, chief editor of the newspaper Le Soleil. He is sending us rather long telegrams, Mr. Speaker, two pages long. Mr. Gilbert did not send me such long telegrams during the election campaign in order to help me to be elected in my riding.

Now that the hour has come to defend the interests of private enterprise, Mr. Gilbert knows where we are. He knows we are now in the House of Commons and I would like to point out that I share his views, even though he does not share mine in the field of politics. He agrees with the Postmaster General's views. He now complains that the Post Office Department is going to be the death of him.

There are others in the region of Quebec; the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet), for example, who is now in the house and has been well treated by the Quebec newspaper Le Soleil when he was given half page publicity on a free basis. What is the hon. member for Quebec East waiting for? Let him rise and take the defence of his sponsors in Quebec city the newspaper Le Soleil. What is he waiting for?

An hon. Member: He is stuck to his seat.

Mr. Caouette: He is stuck to his seat. This will appear in Hansard to-morrow morning. Mr. Gilbert, of Quebec City, will read that the hon. member was stuck to his seat in front of me this evening.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme), is doing likewise. He is stuck to his seat, he does not move, he does not undertake the defence of those who helped him to get elected.

In the Hull area, it is the same. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) does not rise to his feet to defend Le Droit which entirely supported him when he was elected.

An hon. Member: He is ill!

Mr. Caouette: He is ill, yes, as all the

Mr. Speaker, in another constituency, that should protect the interests of those who of Lévis-in the Quebec area-there is the helped them to be elected to parliament, they problem of the shipyards. The hon. member are glued to their seats with Lepage glue. Not for Lévis (Mr. Guay) is here, but he seems to be away since he never moves when he should rise to defend his supporters of the Quebec area. He stays seated. The member for Lévis knows that he cannot even speak up to defend the newspaper Le Soleil of Quebec City, because the government forbids him. The government stays still and the Liberals remain seated. My friend of the Montreal area is also keeping rather quiet.

Mr. Speaker, the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) who was looking after the interests of his people in the Mauricie district and who the other day was accusing me of not being present in the house, realizes now that I am more present in the house than he is, since he does not have the courage to stand up and fight for Le Nouvelliste of Trois-Rivières.

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The hon. member seems to suggest that I follow dictates contrary to those of my conscience. My attitude proves at least that I am not in the pay of the large circulation newspapers of this province.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege the hon. member has raised shows that he has no political conscience, we know that by experience.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said I had no political conscience. I think he is a very poor judge in that matter.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières is aware of that. Besides, the electors in his constituency also know about it. Whenever it suits him, he supports the Union Nationale; whenever it suits him, he is independent, whenever he can get créditistes votes, he is in favour of Social Credit, and, after all, he is a Liberal—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I should like to ask the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) to stick to the question under consideration.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, such is my intention; nevertheless I was speaking on the question of privilege raised by the member for Trois-Rivières.

Now I am coming to the question before us.

I think that whenever the member for Trois-Rivières raises in the future a question of privilege that is accepted by Your Honour, I will at least be able to reply to the hon. member; I shall be happy to do so, because I know him so well. So that is why I allow myself to reply to his questions of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more on the question of privilege, since the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) is presently as white as a sheet. He finds it hard to swallow what I have just said, because his colleagues in the Liberal party are applauding my charges against him.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now resume my remarks on Bill No. C-116. We have received plenty of telegrams from various newspapers in the province.

I while ago, I mentioned Mr. Gabriel Gilbert, publisher and general manager of Le Soleil. We have also received a telegram from Mr. Eric Perras-not Mr. Eric Kierans, but Mr. Eric Perras-president of the newspaper Le Nouvelliste in Trois-Rivières, who was opposing Bill No. C-116. We have got a telegram from L'Action, of Quebec City, signed by Mr. Fernand Blais, its director of public relations. Another one was sent by Les Quotidiens du Québec, Inc., under the signature of Mr. André Bureau. We have received a telegram from the Quebec Chronicle Telegraph, signed by Mr. J. H. Moonigan. and a second one from Mr. Gabriel Gilbert, who was objecting to that same bill.

Mr. Speaker, we are against that bill. Why? Because we want first of all to protect the democratic rights. We want the public to be informed more completely and we do not want the voice of the information media to be stifled or their power diminished. That does not mean that we accept without reservations what is printed in the newspapers and all the news they publish. We have had cause to complain quite often about the way the newspapers treated us by forgetting our existence. Today we are less easily forgotten; we are reminded of that because we are considering this bill.

The Conservatives, whose stand was explained earlier by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard), criticize the government for wanting to increase the rates. They also criticized the government at the time of the postal strike. The Conservatives

Postmaster General—who was not the present while the postal workers were asking for rather high salary increases. The Conservatives were saying: Settle the strike, grant salary increases. The Conservatives knew then that salary increases would lead us inevitably to Bill No. C-116 now under consideration.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The member for Témiscamingue should tell us when and what members of the Conservative party urged the government to grant increases to postal workers. That is not what we said. We told the government that it had to intervene and settle the postal strike as soon as possible, for the good of the people. Nothing was said about salaries. We said that the government had to develop a salary policy.

When the member for Témiscamingue tells us that all Conservatives—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Charlevoix is in fine fettle tonight. That is exactly what I said a while ago. The Conservatives badgered the government with questions, to settle the strike as quickly as possible when the only way to bring it to an end was to agree with the salary increases. This the member for Charlevoix is well aware of. Only, I would like to know why, when the Conservatives were in power, they did not then solve the postal problem? What about the way Canadian postal employees were treated?

The Conservatives were in power from 1957 to 1962, that is five years, and we had strikes at that time. There was unrest amongst postal employees throughout Canada—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No strikes.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, no strikes. There was a strike as soon as the Conservatives came to the end of their mandate, and there was unrest amongst them at that time. What did the Conservatives suggest to the government to solve the last conflict? Absolutely nothing. But today they are willing to say: We are against increases.

It is obvious that salary increases granted at that time are part of the present costs of area, there is not a single member who is not [Mr. Caouette.]

spent whole days putting questions to the the Post Office Department. We know that, and the minister is right on this point. minister-about the settlement of the strike However, that does not mean, for example, that the Canadian people are able to pay more in taxes than they do now, and that is why we are always saying that we should balance the budget not according to the taxes we collect, but according to the various commodities we are able to produce in Canada, according to the number of services we can provide, and by means of new credit. The Postmaster General is not considering that possibility. Indeed, he told us this afternoon: The only means at our disposal to increase our revenue is to ask the taxpayers for more money. That is the only way we can operate and raise the salaries of Post Office employees.

> Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept such a reply from a responsible minister of a federal government which claims to be sovereign. A sovereign government does not grovel before those who control the economic blood of a nation. If you are sovereign, you manage to control your own economic blood, and this is what the Créditistes ask for. We are not surprised at the protests that came from Canadian and Quebec newspapers. We are not surprised to see the Liberals rooted to the spot. We are not surprised to-

> Mr. Cyr: Would the hon, member allow me a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly.

Mr. Cyr: Does he also take the defence of the owner of the Vers Demain newspaper?

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member's question shows beyond doubt, Mr. Speaker, how much intelligence is to be found between his two ears. Never mind. If he were a reader of Vers Demain, he would have shown perhaps more shrewdness in his questioning.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the newspaper Vers Demain is not even published in my constituency. In fact, it was in a nice Liberal constituency that the Blessed Virgin was recently supposed to appear, that is in Saint-Bruno. She probably did not appear, because the constituency was too Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Ha, ha.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, in the Montreal

Liberal. I think there are 25 or 26 constituencies, but they are all Liberal. Someone is telling me about satiation. Yes indeed, we are satiated. I beg your pardon, he says they are seated, which is not the same thing. It is true that they are seated. The authorities of La Presse from Montreal are also complaining about the new legislation and the minister comes from that area. The minister has taken advantage of the free publicity and now in acknowledgment, the newspapers are subjected to a tax levy which will increase the cost of newspapers for consumers or Canadian readers. Newspapers cannot live on their subscriptions, they live on their advertisements. The price of advertisements will have to be increased. Even though the cost of advertisements can be deducted from the income tax. they still are part of the price and they will result in an increase of prices to consumers. Finally, it is not the newspapers which will pay, it is not the rich who will pay but the common people, those who subscribe, those who pay for ads in the paper, those who buy in the stores which advertise; they will all pay the increase and in the present system, Mr. Speaker, I know it cannot be helped. I also know that nothing is done to beat the system. There are palavers on either side of the house. We know that the bill will be adopted and this allows us at least to vent our feelings. Some have such and such an opinion. Conservatives, who are on your left, Mr. Speaker, would have quite another opinion if they were on your right. And they say they are sincere.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that it is ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS-REPORT RESPECTING GROCERY PRICES ON PRAIRIES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on October 16 I tried, It seems that when the Batten commission rather clumsily I admit, to question the recommends that there be a combines investi-Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs gation to focus particular attention on the

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act that the Batten report "contains no convincing evidence that grocery prices on the prairies are excessive". For this reason, said the director, no prosecution is warranted.

Having again gone over the evidence contained in the Batten report, I am at a loss to understand the director's decision, Mr. Speaker. I am equally at a loss to understand the minister's apparent acquiescence in this decision. The Batten report table 10-26, for example, presenting impeccable data, including bureau of statistics data, makes a comparison between all of Canada, and the five main prairie cities. This comparison shows that for unincorporated grocery stores in those five prairie cities the operating profits are 21 per cent above the Canadian average, and for corporations and co-operatives-which sell at the regular trade prices—the profits are 57.5 per cent above the Canadian average.

How excessive does "excessive" have to be before it becomes excessive, Mr. Speaker? That is what I should like to know. Profits on the prairies having been found to be 21 per cent above the Canadian average in unincorporated grocery stores, and 57.5 per cent above the Canadian average in corporations and co-operatives, no wonder the Batten report found and proved that prices charged for groceries were excessive. In a comparison with United States, prairie grocers have been making between two and three hundred per cent profit above the U.S. level.

Should the combines investigation branch require further convincing evidence that prairie prices are excessive, here is is-and I am quoting from the pages of the Batten report:

The top four firms directly control over twothirds of the market in Regina, Saskatoon and Calgary, and indirectly control through affiliated groups over two-thirds of the market in all five cities. This strongly indicates that the excess profits which are earned on the prairies are due to monopoly power.

Some of us had thought that the purpose of the Combines Investigation Act was to prevent the growth of monopoly power. Perhaps it works that way only with mini-monopolies. about the recent decision of the Director of dominant positions which Canada Safeway Proceedings on Adjournment Motion ear, the excuse being that the Batten commission did not prove its case.

I wish to cite just one more carefully documented set of conclusions from the Batten report, which ought to convince the Combines Director as it does the Canadian consumer of the need for government action. I quote:

Taken together, excess profits and costly excess capacity reduced consumer well-being by $61.28 per family of four in 1966. This is an extremely large loss when it is recalled that the gross margin of retail grocers is only 15 per cent to 20 per cent which means that retail grocers render only about $190 to $250 of service per family of four each vear-

A further loss in consumer well-being occurs through advertising, and again I wish to quote the words of the commission report:

Without judging what is excessive, it may be noted that at present grocery advertising costs the average family of four $14.80 on the groceries it buys.

How much more evidence is required before the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs moves to protect prairie consumers? It seems to me that if further convincing evidence is required the director should be in a position to live up to his title and conduct the sort of investigation and research that will convince him of the truth of the facts cited in the Batten commission report. In his own report the director shows uneasiness about the whole prairie grocery retailing situation, in these words:

However, while the corporate chains by no means have the field to themselves, a few of the largest ones have a degree of economic power in some which calls for vigilance by public regions authorities.

My question, Mr. Speaker, was this: In view of the decision not to prosecute, what measures is the branch or department taking to deal with this situation? I await the minister's reply with interest.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in three minutes it is impossible to deal completely with all the recommendations of the Batten commission. I wish to make it clear that the director's annual report commented on the evidence and recommendations of the report. It said that these recommendations and evidence did not constitute grounds for a prosecution under the act.

The hon, member for Vancouver-Kingsway mentioned a few of the points that were minister's time has expired. [Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

and the Weston companies have secured, the brought out in the Batten report, and perhaps combines investigation director turns a deaf I might deal with them. It may be that there is an alleged overbuilding and underutilization of stores in some prairie cities, but fortunately or unfortunately, that is not an offence under the Combines Investigation Act. The Batten report commented on the building of luxurious stores. That may or may not be the case. But, in any event, that is not an offence under the Combines Investigation Act.

> The Batten report talked about costly advertising campaigns; and again, rightly or wrongly, expensive advertising campaigns are not offences under the Combines Investigation Act. The evidence in the report, and this is really what the director was saying, did not justify an inquiry or a charge under our Combines Investigation Act.

> I am glad the hon, member quoted from that part of the director's report where he expressed uneasiness about conditions on the prairies, and where he said that the situation required and would receive continued vigilance on the part of public authorities. That vigilance has been exercised and is being exercised by the combines branch. The branch conducted a thorough study of concentration in the food industry in 1959. It has followed up that work and made it clear that it would continue to study concentration in the food industry across Canada.

> The hon, member served on the joint Senate-House of Commons committee of which I was co-chairman. It was concerned with this question, and following the recommendation which was made by that committee the branch has been continuing its studies and its policy of vigilance in this field, not only on the prairies but in the whole of Canada. In the press release accompanying the director's annual report I revealed that this vigilance had been exercised and was resulting, for example, in an examination of predatory pricing practices by one of the major chains in one of the prairie cities.

> What we are saying is that the evidence presented in that report did not justify a charge. The branch and its officials are maintaining within the limits of their resources surveillance of conditions on the prairies and throughout Canada, and when evidence is presented to them justifying a charge under the Combines Investigation Act a charge will be laid, as charges have been laid in the past.

PUBLIC SERVICE—SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on October 18, as reported at page 1534 of Hansard I put the following question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson):

In view of the minister's long, strong personal record of support for increases in the pensions of retired civil servants, can he say whether this matter is actually under consideration by the government of which he is now a member.

The minister replied that he had nothing to add to the answer he gave a short while ago to a similar question. I pressed him as to whether there would be an announcement about this matter at an early date, and his reply was: "Probably in due course."

I read that extract from page 1534 of Hansard for Friday, October 18, but as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gray) must know, because I assume he has done some research into this matter and because I realize he is interested in a personal way, that same kind of exchange can be found on scores of pages of Hansard over the past number of years.

Despite the difficulty we face in getting action I rise again tonight to plead with the government to take action on this important matter. I plead with the parliamentary secretary, if he is making the answer to me tonight, not to put us off again with the story that the matter is under consideration. I have been told that for 20 years. The whole house has been told this repeatedly since May 8, 1967, when a joint committee of both houses recommended unanimously that increases be provided for federal superannuates.

I also plead with the parliamentary secretary not to give us the line about inflation, the need to curb expenditure and so on. We know that line very well. But, surely, you don't take this sort of thing out on people who are in the kind of need that faces many of those who are pensioners of the government in various categories.

arguments we have made from time to time Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), the hon. about these employees—that they have a special claim on the government because the government was their employer, and so on. I would remind the parliamentary secretary, I would remind this house and I would remind the New Democratic party, so I need not put

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion I would remind him that there are others who also have a right to have their pensions increased because the cost of living has gone up and because standards of living have gone up. But surely this is a place where the government ought to start. Surely this is a place where the government cannot plead that it is not in a position to give a lead.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that almost every time this question is raised in this house. especially if it is raised by someone else, hon. members look at me as if it is my question. I am glad to have it associated with my name, but I am also pleased to note the growing number of members in this house who take the same stand. The Public Service Alliance of Canada put out a release on October 9 indicating that a number of members had written to the Alliance expressing their support for increases in pensions for retired civil servants. I am sure more letters have been written since then, and in that sense it is unfair to indicate these names; but I think it is significant that the people who support the position I am taking include the following Liberal members: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen), the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) and the hon, member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet). I have already referred to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray). And I see down to my far right is the leader of the rump, the unquestioned leader of the rump tonight, the only one down there, the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) who stood up the other night and added his support to the proposition that something should be done for these people.

This same release names several Conservative members who have written to indicate their support for increased pensions for retired civil servants, and these include the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the hon. member for Calgary It is not necessary for me to go over all the Centre (Mr. Harkness), the hon. member for member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Fairweather). and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock).

The release lists about half the members of the country that the issue does not stop here. their names down because I can speak for all Proceedings on Adjournment Motion of us and say we are all behind this proposition. In recent weeks there have been members from the Créditistes, led by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), also rising in support of this proposition. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, Claude Edwards, president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, is in a position to say, as this release does say:

We are convinced that there is solid support for an increase in public service pensions among members of all parties in the House of Commons and we urge the government to bring forward legislation to increase public service pensions without further delay.

He also points out, as we all know, that there is a tremendous reserve of employee contributions in the superannuation fund. It is a fund that is growing every year and these employees do not see why some of that money, that at least is on the books, cannot be used to give them a touch of the just society.

The last time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was drawn into saying more than a sentence or two on this issue was on October 11 when he answered a question put by the hon. member for Abitibi, as recorded at page 1084 of Hansard. This is what the Prime Minister said on that occasion:

It was answered last week, and I myself stated that the matter was under consideration. Indeed, there has been an exchange of correspondence between the representatives of the civil servants and myself; I indicated that we were not in a position to grant those increases now but that we would consider it as soon as possible.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gray), how much longer do these people have to wait? How many more times do they have to be told that the matter is under consideration? The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) must know, Mr. Speaker, that no points of order are allowed on this late show, but if he is standing because he wants me to include his name as in favour of the proposition I will be glad to do so, and if other hon. members want to stand up to include their names I will be glad to put them on the list as well.

To the young, hopeful, parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance—he can interpret that "hopeful" any way he wants, and he comes from Windsor where there is keen interest in this matter—I say for heaven's sake let us not have this stalling any more. Let us have action on behalf of these former employees, for whom an increase in their pensions was unanimously recommended by a joint committee of both houses of parliament on May 8, 1967.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the ever hopeful hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for what I take to be kind remarks expressed in my direction. I also want to thank him for confirming that interest in this particular problem is not confined to one particular political party. In fact it is one which engages the concern of members both on the government side and on the opposition sides of the house as well. I think this is important to note, because had I risen first and made this assertion, someone might have said that this is a form of self-serving evidence. But coming from the ever hopeful hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this evening it confirms that I can join at this time and on future occasions with others regarding the concern that is felt on all sides of the house about this particular matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now do something about it.

Mr. Gray: I know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would have wanted to be here to comment on this important matter himself. As hon, members know the budget is being presented tomorrow evening and he is involved in putting the finishing touches to his very important budget speech. In reply to the hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre I should like to say that the Minister of Finance on numerous occasions has expressed his sympathy and understanding for the retired civil servants.

Speaking personally I regret I can only say that at the present time this matter is under active consideration by the government. I should point out however that since 1963 Liberal governments have taken important steps to provide further help for the older Canadians, including superannuates. basic old age pension has been increased to $75 a month. Steps are being taken to make it available at age 65 by 1970. A guaranteed income supplement has been put into effect to provide an amount of up to $30 a month for people on old age security pensions who have no other income. The federal government today guarantees to retired Canadians 65 years of age or over, including superannuates, $107 a month. I think this is important to remember at this time.

I am not suggesting that superannuates do not continue to face financial problems. I am not suggesting that their request for increases and changes in the management of the superannuation fund are not worthy of serious and active consideration by the government. However, at the present time I can add noth- provisional standing order 39A the motion to ing further-and I say this with some adjourn the house is now deemed to have regret—other than, as has already been stated been adopted. Accordingly this house stands by the Minister of Finance, that this very important matter continues to be under active and serious consideration by this government.

TABLING OF REPORT FOR 1967-68

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to table, in English and in French, the report for the year 1967-68 of the Canadian International Development Agency.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORTS BY PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the President of the Privy Council, Mr. Speaker, in his capacity as government house leader. In view credit bill will receive priority just as soon as of the fact the last two reports of the Auditor the Post Office Act has been dealt with. General have not been fully considered by the public accounts committee, and a further report of the Auditor General is expected in January of next year, will the house leader proceed as rapidly as possible with arrange-on public accounts and reference to that committee of the reports of the Auditor General which have not been fully considered?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the Leader of the Opposition will consult Votes and Proceedings he will note that the public accounts committee has been called to meet Thursday next for organizational purposes. I will be glad to facilitate the means of referring business to it right away.

REQUEST FOR PRIORITY FOR FARM CREDIT LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): My question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. Will he consider making Bill No. C-113 the first order of the business today so that western farmers can get the increased cash advances on farm stored grain at the earliest possible opportunity? This question is urgent because wheat sales-

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): It was our hope that both Bill No. C-113 and the bill with regard to farm credit might have been passed by last night; in fact that was the proposal we made to hon. gentlemen opposite. I feel we should proceed with today's order of business as called and dispose of the Post Office Act as early as possible and dispose of all stages of the farm credit bill as early as possible. Then I am sure the hon. member will be eager to facilitate that procedure as well as the bill to which he referred.

Mr. Gleave: Could we have an assurance that, of all the farm credit bills to come before us, this particular bill will receive priority as soon as possible?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, the farm

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Will the minister consider giving priority to the cash advances legislation, since it is not controversial?

REPORT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE COMMITTEE IN ENGLISH ONLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, in the hope that he will deal with it.

I have here the English version of fascicule 8, dated October 17, of the proceedings of the committee on external affairs and national defence; however, we have not yet received the report of the first meeting in French.

Could the right hon. Prime Minister take the necessary steps to see to it that translators from English to French be hired on a full-time basis, and not part-time, as is now the case.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to discuss this matter with the minister responsible for translation. As the hon. member knows, the work load is much greater for those who translate from English to French than for those who translate from French to English. That is one of the reasons why there are delays.

APPLICATION OF 12 MILE FISHERIES LIMIT TO ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announcement that a major territorial battle is shaping up between Canadian vessels and French trawlers operating out of France's territorial islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, will the minister indicate what action the government is contemplating to resolve this jurisdictional dispute over fishing limits?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any battle that is shaping up, but we have had some discussions with the French authorities about the application of the straight base line theory, and these negotiations are continuing.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will direct to the Minister of Fisheries. When can we expect wants to reply.

[Mr. Speaker]

the base lines to be drawn from headland to headland, defining our exclusive fishing zones off Nova Scotia and British Columbia, as announced by the minister outside the house in a speech in Boston last Thursday?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, legislation permitting Canada to draw straight base lines was passed in 1964. Some of these straight base lines have been drawn, and I hope that more will be drawn in the near future.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the straight base line question. May I ask the minister whether he would be prepared to appear before the fisheries committee to give a full explanation of the situation with respect to the conversations with other countries concerning these base lines?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am always happy to appear before committees of the house on any subject where I can be useful. I would not think, however, that I would want to reveal all the confidential talks that I have had with representatives of other countries, any more than I should like them to reveal the talks they have had with us.

Mr. Frank Moores (Bonavista-Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. Does the minister intend to implement a scheme of management of Canada's fishing resources over the continental shelf in accordance with his view, expressed recently at Boston, that every maritime nation should undertake such management?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that what he is now asking the minister to do is make a general statement of policy, which should normally be done by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate):
A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister make such a statement to clear up the whole business, so we can have some clarification? Obviously some—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking a question to which the minister now wants to reply.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that of Great Britain by the New Democratic Canada has passed legislation drawing our party in Canada urging the cessation of arms fishing zones as those extending 12 miles beyond straight base lines drawn from headland to headland. We are, of course, concerned about the operations of our own fishermen, and out beyond that of other fishermen, but this is obviously venturing into an area of international concern and negotiations with other countries.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I did not obtain an answer to my question. I asked the minister whether he would be prepared to make a statement on motions on this matter.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to at the appropriate time.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that it is now several months since Air Canada has had a president and the Prime Minister has not given any indication that an announcement is to be made in the foreseeable future, would the right hon. gentleman take the house into his confidence and tell us just what is the main problem that is making it impossible for the government to make up its mind in this connection?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think this question as asked is in order.

Mr. Hees: Then may I ask another question, Mr. Speaker. In view of that, would the Prime Minister get in touch with Professor Marshall McLuhan and ask him whether he would include decision-making in the course he is presently giving the cabinet?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the right hon. gentleman's discussion in connection with communications, has occurred to him that he might more easily communicate with the people of Canada by having himself and his ministers answer questions in this house?

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Minister of Finance, according to the list of players and substitute players published yesterday. Can the minister, the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue, or for that matter any other department, advise whether any companies involved in the COFOMO group, which is in financial difficulties, are now under the supervision of any federal government agency?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I were the minister of finance today and not the Acting Minister of Finance my answer to that kind of question would be that I shall have to make inquiries.

Could the minister confirm or deny the report that officials of his department are now holding consultations with regard to the problems raised by the introduction of Bill No. C-116? If so, who is conducting these consultations?

Prime Minister. Following the Prime Minister's statement equating the Nigerian-Biafran war with the Viet Nam war, is it the intention of the government to supply arms to one of the combatants in the Nigerian conflict or, alternatively, to cease the sale of arms to the United States, thus equating the two situations and making more credible our policy in both situations?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I was not necessarily making the equation the hon. member suggests. I was saying that those who refuse to look at history always repeat the same errors. It so happens that yesterday at the United Nations a speaker for Mali was making the same point. He was telling the "imperialist press" and "opportunist philanthropists" of the western countries to stay out of African affairs because, and I quote:

The African leaders will remember this when we deal with separatist or autonomous movements, Flemish or Walloon conflicts, or 'Free Quebec'.

I suppose he was talking about some other conflicts as well.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We are delighted to know about what happened at the United Nations yesterday. Has the Prime Minister's attention been directed to the speeches of the foreign ministers of Tanzania, the Ivory Coast and Zambia urging that some initiative be taken in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The statistics are well known; I have stated them many times. Within the organization for African unity 29 states have told the other countries to stay out of Africa and African affairs; only four were in favour of intervention.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—HEARING OF BRIEFS BY TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I had wanted to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Since neither the minister nor the Minister without Portfolio is present may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Why has the task force on housing stopped receiving briefs in a major Canadian city such as Montreal after only one day of hearings?

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member will give himself the trouble of looking at the roster he will see that the minister is not due in the house today.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in relation to the remark just made by the Prime Minister, a remark he has made on a number of occasions. I concede the right of the Prime Minister to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that a fellow minister is not here. I even concede his right to tell us that he has asked a fellow minister not to be here. But I maintain it is not within the rules of the house for the Prime Minister to keep referring to a certain document which he calls a roster as a reason for a minister's not being present.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a copy of the document in my hand but if I may parrot legal language I suggest it is not a document of which the Chair should take judicial notice. The Chair has to operate on the basis of the rules, customs and established procedures of this house, and for the Prime Minister to cite a roster as though it were a legal or procedural basis for a minister's absence is contrary to the procedures of this house and contrary to our rights as members of parliament.

I should like Your Honour to take note of citation 7(1) in Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

Another collective right of the house is to settle its own procedure. This is such an obvious right—it has never been directly disputed—that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon it except to say that the house is not responsible to any external authority for following the rules it lays down for itself, but may depart from them at its own discretion.

I submit that when the Prime Minister lays down a new practice he is doing so as an external authority, and that when he hands us a document, and calls attention to it day after day, describing it as a roster, as though it were an excuse or a reason for ministers not being present, he is usurping the right of the house to settle its own procedure.

There is no way in which we can force the ministers to be here. There are rules about absenteeism, and the press does not like it when members are absent. The same should apply to ministers, but there is no way in which we can force them to be here. As I say, I cannot deny the right of the Prime Minister to say, day after day, that a particular minister is not here, or to tell us he gave certain ministers permission to be absent, or to say he told them not to be here—and I suspect this is what the roster means. But to cite the roster as though it were a procedural sanction is not in accordance with the rules of the

One of the reasons I raise this point of order is that I have been here long enough to know that if any practice is followed long enough the Chair will treat it as though it were valid, and that if this practice continues unchallenged month after month it will become as officially accepted as any standing order or precedent. At the present time it is not provided for in our standing orders, it is not in our rules, it is not referred to in May or Beauchesne or Bourinot. The document referred to is merely a document supplied to hon. members through the courtesy of the President of the Privy Council, and I suggest it should not be accepted by Your Honour as having the force of procedural law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: The rooster is going to defend his roster.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: If I were from the constituency of Crowfoot I would not have made that remark.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Really cheap, that.

Mr. Trudeau: Which is cheaper? I will trade mine for his.

I do not mind ceasing to refer to the roster, Mr. Speaker, if that is your ruling. I would comply with such a ruling with great obedience. I would merely say now that the use of this so-called roster is meant as a convenience to hon. members, and I think it comes out from the point of order which was just made that I do not have to refer to it. I can instruct ministers which days they should be attending to business in the house, and which days they should be attending committees of cabinet. This is the way we will continue to proceed in this government, and if it is necessary not to use the word roster I will not use it. But it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that from a member who is always complaining about red tape and formalism this is a pretty thin point Minister began his explanation of his roster to suggest that the rules do not permit us to employ a particular word.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat that it is merely for the convenience of the members, and it has been introduced in order to get the government and parliament working more efficiently. We have looked at the statistics of the last year, and I think on only ten of the 145 sitting days did it happen that more ministers were asked questions than the number of ministers who will be sitting in the house under this system. Therefore-

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But that is the option of the house.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, but we are merely trying to make this parliament and this government as efficient as possible.

Mr. Horner: Oh. oh.

Mr. Trudeau: I wonder who lost his cool that time. It stands to reason that if 28 ministers are sitting in the house, when on the yearly average perhaps only 10 or 12 will be receiving questions each day, then there can be great saving in terms of administration, in terms of the time of the ministers, and in terms of the service of the Canadian people if only 10 or 12 ministers happen to be here to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon, members that there is not much point in going through all the arguments that were submitted at considerable length on a number of occasions during the last few weeks. I will certainly not stand in the way of hon. members who want to express views, but I might say at once that I am in sympathy with the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Certainly a reference to a document—and I agree again with the hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre—that has not been officially recognized as far as the Chair and the house are concerned, cannot be considered to effect, in itself, a change in the rules. To that extent I am in full agreement with the point of order raised by the hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Inquiries of the Ministry the constituency of Crowfoot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: He can make any remarks he likes with regard to the representative of the constituency of Crowfoot but he, and I believe this house, should hold the constituency of Crowfoot in as good esteem as any other constituency represented in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: I would ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the remark he made about that very important constituency in this country of ours.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question of privilege has been noted.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA-DELAY IN USE OF HERCULES AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he inform the house what is happening today with the Hercules aircraft intended to assist with relief in the Nigeria-Biafra tragedy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just before I entered the house I inquired whether there were any developments subsequent to those reported to the house yesterday by the Prime Minister, and I was informed that there have been no further developments. The International Red Cross has not yet been able to secure the necessary approval of the new independent state of Equatorial Guinea or of the Biafran authorities for the use of our aircraft into Biafran-held territory. We hope this will be forthcoming shortly. As to the possible Canadian airlift in Nigerian-held territory, there continues to be difficulty with regard to the federally held forward air fields.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, quite likely the Secretary of State for External Affairs knows this, but yesterday a question was raised by the hon. member for York South concerning the possibility of making the planes available to some of the other relief agencies such as the churches and so on which are operating at Sao Tome. The Prime [Mr. Horner.]

he made an off-hand remark with regard to Minister indicated that this might not be a wise move at this point, but I wonder whether the government is giving consideration to making additional aircraft available for these agencies so that relief materials can get in from Sao Tome to Biafra.

> Mr. Sharp: I think it is premature as yet. It is our hope still that the International Red Cross will be able to make the arrangements. It is better, I believe, for all concerned to work with the agency that has been approved by everyone.

> Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this supplementary question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the difficulty in obtaining permission in respect of the airlift from Fernando Po, has the minister consulted with the Red Cross concerning the statement made by the foreign minister of Nigeria that there would be no opposition to flights in from Sao Tome by the churches using Canadian planes if the Red Cross would supervise or at least look into the operation.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I made some inquiries about that statement. So far I have not been able to confirm that such statement is true, but I am still making inquiries.

Mr. Brewin: Would the minister speak to his own parliamentary secretary, who was present when that statement was made to several members of this house.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps the minister did not clearly hear my question. It was not a matter of dispensing with the services of the Red Cross at this point, but rather whether our government is taking some initiative with regard to making these planes available on the basis outlined by the hon. member for Greenwood to these relief agencies which are carrying on relief efforts nightly into Biafra from Sao Tome.

Mr. Sharp: I still believe it would be desirable to continue with the arrangements we have approved before we take any other action. I am not ruling out the other possibility, but in the meatime I believe we should work with the International Red Cross so long as they have arrangements which are satisfactory to the federal military government.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, will the minister kindly advise us whether the other aircraft which have not think this would be helpful. It would been flying into Biafra regularly for weeks have been involved in all these legal niceties that the minister keeps throwing up from time to time?

Mr. Sharp: Well, if I may speak on that, one of the legal niceties with which they did not have to contend is the fact that we have a new republic. Equatorial Guinea, whose permission we now must obtain.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can give us any indication as to how long these negotiations with Equatorial Guinea and Biafra, as well as other matters, are likely to take.

Mr. Sharp: No, I cannot say. All I know is that we are putting pressure on the authorities to get this airlift approved.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the answer of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the government Canada is today taking the position that it is making representations to the governments of these countries, whereas yesterday the Prime Minister stated that the policy of the government was not to make such representations directly?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I think the Leader of the Opposition missed the significance of my previous reply. One of the obligations we have which has not been encountered by anyone else arises out of the establishment of the new state of Equatorial Guinea in which Fernando Po is involved. In order to have our planes land we must have their permission. This is one of the factors. For the rest, we are putting pressure on the International Red Cross.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might raise with the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question similar to one I raised with the Prime Minister yesterday. In view of the continuing difficulty in obtaining this approval, and in view of the great anxiety on the part of many people of this country to see some action taken with regard to the relief efforts, I wonder whether a deadline could be set for the International Red Cross with regard to its efforts in order that this matter may be facilitated at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Sharp: I agree with the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister. I do Can he tell me whether the agenda of the 29180-105 constitute an ultimatum, which is not what we want. We want to get action.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lewis: I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister indicate to the house, from the reports the Red Cross has given him, whether he has any idea what the difficulties are so far as Equatorial Guinea is concerned? What is the holdup there in respect of obtaining their consent?

Mr. Sharp: Our understanding is that we cannot find the officials who would give us the permission.

Mr. Lewis: They are not on the roster.

Mr. Stanfield: I understood the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say that representations were being made to Equatorial Guinea. Would the minister be good enough to explain to the house the reason that representations can properly be made to Equatorial Guinea but cannot be properly made to the state of Nigeria, for example, with regard to assisting the Red Cross?

Mr. Sharp: I think the Leader of the Opposition has forgotten that we did get the agreement of the government of Nigeria.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand that the policy announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is that the government of Canada has made representations directly to the government of Nigeria, whereas yesterday I understood the Prime Minister to say that it would not be possible for the government of Canada to make such representations to the state of Nigeria?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether this is not an argument rather than a question.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It concerns Canadian affairs.

The Prime Minister recently announced that the next federal-provincial conference will be held about the middle of December. Inquiries of the Ministry conference has been drawn up after consultation with the parties concerned? I should also like to know whether he will propose a new formula for the repatriation of the constitution with which all provinces might agree?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the agenda of that conference to be held from December 16 to 18 is being drawn up by officials who have already met four times to prepare an agenda acceptable to all the governments. But I can say to the hon. member that this agenda is based on the decisions taken at the conference held in February and that we will deal with the matters considered at that conference.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question.

Could he tell us if the government intends to propose to the provinces a new repatriation formula for the constitution?

Mr. Trudeau: Not at this conference, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORTED MIGRATION OF ESKIMOS IN ARCTIC ISLANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Could the minister tell us whether an inquiry is being conducted in order to determine the reasons of an Eskimo migration which is taking place from Sugluk to the islands of the eastern Arctic. Furthermore, if this migration continues, will the government take steps to help those Eskimo families?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear that the Eskimos concerned have been traced and have safely reached the place they were heading for.

To our knowledge the main reason for their migration is that they depend on hunting and fishing to live and they have deemed it advisable to move to another district so as to find new means of subsistence, according to their traditional habits. However, we are investigating the matter in order to see if there could be other reasons for their departure.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago in the house I asked the Minister of Defence Production what action the government intended taking with regard to the matter of shipbuilding in Canada, at which time Your Honour suggested that the minister might like to make a statement on motions. Following Your Honour's excellent suggestion I should like to ask the minister whether, following the meeting with the shipbuilding association of Canada, he would like to make a statement on motions on this important matter during his next appearance in the house.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): Yes, although I do not know whether I would be the appropriate minister. The minister who is organizing the conference at present is the Minister of Transport. However, I am sure this could be arranged.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of National Defence have any plans to divert ships coming under his authority to the St. John's dock-yard to provide badly needed employment for men in that area? On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member state his point of order?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a well known fact that the Minister of National Defence is not the one who actually calls for tenders in respect of shipbuilding. I suggest it is the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, on this question of shipbuilding, since I will probably not be able to get Your Honour's attention tomorrow I should like to give notice of this question to the third acting minister of transport. Will the government indicate what it is doing about this shipbuilding industry and the marine policy that was announced during the last election campaign? Perhaps the minister will make a reply tomorrow when all the ministers are supposed to be here.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STEPS TO CONTROL CIRCULATION OF OBSCENE LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he has anything further to report to the house regarding his efforts to control the circulation of obscene literature through the mails.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmasier General): Mr. Speaker, as of six o'clock last night the department had intercepted 126 letters ordering this filth from Denmark. I am surprised that so many Canadians are interested in it. We are returning each of the 126 letters with a polite note from the department indicating that the mails cannot be used for such a purpose.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Moores (Bonavista-Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Last Wednesday the minister advised this house that deficiency payments to the east coast fishing industry would terminate at the end of October. Is it correct that without forewarning the east coast industry was informed on Friday that this important scheme had terminated at the end of September?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): That is true, and the cause is to be found in the remarkable increase in the production of fish on the east coast. I have just been informed that the overall fish production is up more than 20 per cent this year.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, has the minister any plan to help the Canadian commercial fisheries make a profit for the Canadian community as a whole, or does he now consider this to be a burden on the Canadian community in light of a speech he made in Boston I believe on Friday?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is much too general in nature. Perhaps it could be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Carter: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter to the fisheries of Newfoundland. A great deal of concern has been expressed by fishermen in that area over a speech made by the minister in Boston on Friday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the point of order raised by the hon. member but, as he knows, there is a standing order which provides for a discussion of matters which in the opinion of members ought to be discussed the same day. The hon. member does have an opportunity to discuss this matter later on today.

Mr. Carter: I should like to debate the matter at ten o'clock.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, there are several hundred thousand people in the Atlantic region who are dependent on fisheries, and in Newfoundland there are 25,000 people who are in dire straits.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has stated his point of order. The hon. member should first resume his seat. I should remind the hon. member that, if hon. members do not accept a ruling from the Chair that a question is not urgent and feel that the matter ought to be discussed, the hon. member has an opportunity to discuss the question the very same day during the adjournment proceedings. This was the only suggestion that was made to the hon. member for St. John's West, and he has accepted that suggestion.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I just say on the point of order that one of the reasons for the obvious antagonism which exists, and which has perhaps resulted in an element of uncertainty, is that we are not able to get satisfactory answers to our questions. There has been a controversy created outside this house as to certain policies in relation to fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This, of course, is a point of debate and I fail to see how it can be raised as a point of order.

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FRESH WATER FISH MARKETING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact we were told some months ago that the government of Canada would try to conclude negotiations with the provinces to establish a fresh water fish marketing board by mid-October, will the Minister of Fisheries indicate whether an agreement has been reached on this matter with the governments of the three prairie provinces?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): between representatives of the prairie provinces and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I gather there is one more meeting scheduled. Legislation to establish this marketing board has already been announced in the throne speech.

FINANCE

JOINT COST PROGRAMS-REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board relating to the tabling of communications received from the province of Ontario on the financial estimates of the cost of joint programs.

In view of the fact that the minister has referred to letters of February 5, February 27 and June 20 is he now prepared to table those letters and put the correspondence before us, so we may become familiar with this correspondence for discussion during budget debate?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the government of Ontario I would be delighted to table all the official correspondence. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition would wish to initiate the practice of publishing any informal correspondence which clearly was intended to remain unpublished. In respect of official correspondence and with the consent of the government of Ontario they may be tabled.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact the minister has been asked to seek the approval of the province of Ontario and has referred to the contents of these letters, would it not be appropriate to have them tabled?

Mr. Drury: I am not sure whether the question is addressed to me rhetorically or to you, Your Honour, but I do not think the Leader of the Opposition would wish to initiate a practice of publishing or tabling in the house correspondence of an informal character which has taken place between officials at different levels of government.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, does the minister suggest that letters between officials and that is a very wide and encompassing term- from the deputy minister down should not be tabled in this house?

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should Mr. Speaker, discussions have been held have made it more clear to the hon. member. I did not say no letters should be tabled. I did say that informal letters between officials at various levels of government not intended to be published should not be subsequently published. I suggest this would quite seriously inhibit the full and free exchange of information which we are seeking.

> Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has referred to informal letters between government officials will he kindly advise the house how a determination is made as to what is an informal letter not to be published?

> Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think before we call orders of the day we might allow the hon. member for Marquette to ask a question.

> Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to argue the point, but I want to be sure I am not understood as accepting the point expressed by the President of the Treasury Board. I want to take this opportunity to say I disagree with the position he has taken, and will seek an appropriate opportunity to discuss the matter.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

CONSIDERATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FORMER CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Privy Council. It relates to a question asked in the house on September 18, in reply to which the minister said the government was giving consideration to some means of enabling members to deal with the recommendations of the former chief electoral officer. Will the minister indicate what decision has been reached in this respect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members will have noticed last Friday reference of the subject matter of a bill dealing with the elections act to the committee on privileges and elections. The hon, member will also be aware that this committee will be holding its organizational meeting on Thursday next. It is the government's intention, subject to the business of the committees generally, to call together the committee on privileges and elections for the purpose of examining these various and different questions regarding the election system.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AFFECTING RATES, ADMINISTRATION, SAVINGS BANK

The house resumed, from Monday, October 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kierans for the second reading of Bill No. C-116, to amend the Post Office Act, and the amendment (p. 1623) thereto of Mr. Macquarrie.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening, I think that I had clearly shown the support given by Liberal members to the Canadian dailies which are complaining about Bill No. C-116 as brought before the house by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans).

Mr. Speaker, I would like today to dwell on two points. In the first place, as for the conditions made to our newspapers, our periodicals, I feel that the American periodicals will take advantage of lower mail rates than those now suggested for our Canadian periodicals. In my opinion, this is a flagrant case of injustice, for our periodicals, whether they are dailies, weeklies or monthlies. The other point which I must draw to the minister's attention is the conditions made to our weeklies. Our small regional newspapers will certainly suffer from such provisions as introduced in Bill No. C-116.

Mr. Speaker, we have all received telegrams from managers of English and French publications. I have here a telegram from the Quebec Chronicle Telegraph signed by Mr. Moonigan which states:

[English]

As Canada's oldest surviving newspaper we resent government contention it is subsidizing newspapers. If government proceeds to raise second class mail rates to penalize newspapers, it must also forthwith stop subsidizing C.B.C., C.N.R. and other corporations run on public moneys. We urge reappraisal of government position. Post Office bill direct blow to our existence. It will mean abandoning 30 per cent of our subscribers. Is this just society promised by Prime Minister Trudeau?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we spoke of this "just society promised by Prime Minister Trudeau" before the elections, and the Quebec Chronicle Telegraph "realizes it after the election".

Here, for example, is a telegram from the general manager and editor of the newspaper Le Soleil and I quote:

18 owners and senior staff members of the Quebec dailies met with the minister and Post Office officials Thursday stop Several ministers also Post Office Act seen stop Sending copy of brief to your Ottawa office Monday stop Refer you to our Thursday editorial and report page 3 stop Bill means end of subscriptions and delivery of dailies in rural areas stop Representations also made that subsidies not given to publications but to consumers stop If government policy is to eliminate subsidies it should also apply to state radio and television and others. Gabriel Gilbert, editor and general manager.

I could also quote telegrams from Mr. Blais, of L'Action of Quebec City, and from Mr. André Bureau, of Les Quotidiens du Québec Inc.

Mr. Speaker, the daily newspapers will not necessarily lose subscribers. Why? Because they do not have to increase their subscription rate. Everybody understands that, and they do too. What matters to them are the advertisements in newspapers, and if we look at the facts as they are, we see that the owners of daily newspapers tell us that they will not be able to provide information to the rural districts in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, it is the daily newspapers like Le Soleil of Quebec City, La Presse of Montreal, Montréal-Matin—an unimportant and trivial newspaper of Montreal—and other similar papers which, not only, during election campaigns, but at all times, support the system in which we live. Today, the minister is asking them to pay their share, to pay for the operation of their system, and they are against it. But when the time has come to dot the i's, they are not around. Today we feel sorry for the small people, whereas in fact the law will still allow the big to eat the small.

The little weeklies will have to foot the bill, will lose subscribers, will lose ground in the field of national advertising, because their circulation will not be large enough.

The big newspapers will increase their advertising rates, because they sell advertisements according to their circulation. They will probably keep the subscription rates as they are now but they will increase the advertising rates. The big dailies will stay alive and we will continue to see in Montreal's La Presse full-page advertisements by Simpson's, Eaton's and Morgan's.

Mr. Speaker, a big newspaper like Le Soleil or any other of its kind, will not have to increase its subscription rates. At this time, I would not forgive myself—and it would not be fair for me not to say so—if I failed to mention that, for several years now, Le Soleil of all the Quebec dailies, has probably been the most unbiased towards Social Credit, the Ralliement Créditiste. As to the Quebec Chronicle Telegraph, we have had no publicispeak every day in this house, and we never see the shadow of a line in this newspaper. The Montreal newspaper La Presse gives us zero multiplied by a million, which equals a million of nothing zero. This is what we get from the Montreal La Presse.

These are the people who want to supply information? What information do they supply? What facts does the Montreal La Presse report on the eastern townships, the area in the vicinity of Montreal and Montreal itself? They report what they feel like reporting.

The parliamentary correspondents are not responsible for that, they only write the articles. The Canadian press gives the news, but the potentates of Canadian journalism decide what is to be published and what is to be omitted in the newspapers. They overlook Social Credit, and systematically: yet, they have the nerve to ask us to fight for their interests when they are up against a problem of their own doing.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The minister tells them there may be increases, and they feel their rights are being encroached upon. They feel that democracy is being threatened because they are asked to pay their share. But I say this to them: You have been fighting for 30, 40 or 50 years to keep a majority government in power. During the election campaign, we heard: Elect a majority government, that Canada may progress. We have a majority government and look how the newspapers are treated today by this majority government. If we had a minority government and if we held the balance of power which we requested, this bill would not be before the house today.

When the former Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) introduced in the house a bill raising postal rates, the bill was defeated and the rate of delivery for letters and mail was not increased. Even though the government was defeated the mail service was not stopped. No. How did we continue to provide it?

Today, however, the hon. minister says: If there is no increase, we will not be able to continue providing mail service to the Canadian people. This is nonsense, a lie, and the minister knows that it is possible to find money elsewhere than in the pockets of the Canadian people to continue to improve the Canadian postal service.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Speaker, personally, I have nothing ty from it. Let us take the Montreal Gazette against newspapers. No. All I ask them is to for instance. What do we get from it? We be objective, honest, unprejudiced, and truthful. It is simple. We do not ask them to flatter us, the Ralliement Créditiste. Let them only be fair to us and let them stop blowing bubbles for the government, as they started to do before the election.

> And let newspapers say: Is this the just society promised by the Prime Minister? Mr. Speaker, we will hear all about it tonight. Yes, tonight. We will hear the budget being read, and we will have a foretaste of the just society, and tomorrow morning that will be published in the newspapers.

> Canadian newspapers, Le Soleil, La Presse and all the others will say that, due to unusual circumstances and a monetary deficit, the government is forced to raise taxes. The Postmaster General gave the same reason when introducing Bill No. C-116.

> Mr. Speaker, we already know the answer. As for the honorable minister, he knows how to solve the problem. He told us yesterday that there was only one solution to the problem: raise taxes and get the money from the taxpayer's pockets. However, the honorable minister knows that the majority of the people in his riding cannot afford to pay more taxes than they do now. In order to be elected, the minister never said that he would increase the postal rates. He would never say so before the election, only after, here, in the house. Those people say one thing at election time and another thing after. And we legislate and administer in such a way as to conceal the facts from the Canadian people.

> Mr. Speaker, we shall not endorse the bill. Certainly not. Not because we have any affection for those newspapers, but because we want to safeguard democracy in Canada and prevent the small from being swallowed up by the big.

> We also take the defence of weeklies which will bear the consequences of this legislation since, as I was saying, they do not get national advertising as easily as the dailies I mentioned earlier, namely Le Soleil, La Presse, The Montreal Star, The Gazette, The Toronto Star, The Globe and Mail, The Vancouver Sun or Le Patriote du Manitoba.

> Mr. Speaker, we will support the amendment of the Conservative party asking that the bill be referred to a committee for further consideration, but not because we are very infatuated with the Conservatives. Absolutely not. We know that if the Conservatives were sitting opposite, they would not do better but exactly the same as the Postmaster General. Both parties are similar. Put them in the same bag, shake it and the first one to come out will be exactly the same as the other one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, in my few remarks today I want to speak directly to the amendment before the house, submitted by the members of the official opposition, to the effect that this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to a standing committee for further consideration. What has transpired in the deliberations of the house today has reinforced my thinking in this regard. I had hoped to speak last night but we got into a new aspect of the debate. Actually, however, I am very pleased that I am speaking now following the earlier events today. The house leader in response to a plea that this debate be set aside in favour of a matter that I as a member from western Canada regard as being of much greater priority, namely, the agricultural emergency, confirmed my viewpoint that the government from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) down is out of touch with the priority needs of this nation.

If we were to follow the good precedents that have been established in this house during recent years there is no reason at all why we could not deal with this complex matter in committee. Everybody recognizes that the amendments to the Post Office Act, as they have been brought forward by the minister, involve a complex subject which could be detoured temporarily into the responsible committee to make way for the farm legislation, which has been pending ever since this house opened. We could deal expeditiously and much more intelligently with the subject matter of the post office bill in a committee and in the meantime get on with a subject of greater priority. Then, the post office bill could come back to the house and I am sure the debate would proceed much more expeditiously. Instead, the member of the government charged with the responsibility for guiding the day to day business of the house, the house leader, has used the old threat that we have seen used far too frequently under Liberal administrations. He has said: "You will get the farm legislation as soon as you have dealt with the post office legislation." Mr. Speaker, this is a complete misunderstanding and abuse of the whole matter of priorities, and my intention to devote my remarks entirely to the amendment before the house has been reconfirmed by what has already transpired here today.

The minister made a comprehensive statement yesterday which indicated that as the member of the cabinet responsible for the administration of the Post Office Department he had approached the subject from a very narrow perspective. As I listened to his remarks he sounded more like a voice from the board room rather than vox populi. I was not in the house when the initial debate on the resolution took place; I was away at the United Nations at the time. As I reviewed the debate, however, it seemed to me that the same emphasis was given to the matter by the minister at that time; it was an urban-oriented approach. Now the minister has partially backed down and has conceded that there are special communications problems in the more outlying areas of the country, particularly in the rural areas. But he still has not come to grips with what I and the members associated with me in this party regard as the fundamental issue, that is, the purpose and the functions of such an important service as the post office.

It is obvious from press statements and from what the minister himself has said that there has been unhappiness within the Liberal caucus. The hon, member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) indicated in his excellent speech yesterday that the committee of 35 was formed to approach the minister on this important matter. It is obvious that the minister is amenable to suggestions because he responded to some of the requests of that committee. How much more important it is that this matter be taken into a much larger committee arena than the committee of 35 and referred to a committee drawn from all parties in the house so its members might put the Postmaster General in touch with the viewpoint held in various parts of the country and draw him away from his urban-oriented viewpoint and what I feel is his complete misunderstanding of the important fuction of the Post Office Department as a communications system in this nation. How much more effective it would be if a committee were brought into operation for this purpose.

Over the past ten years, because of the growing complexity of national affairs we have been gradually resorting to a greater, more effective and efficient use of the committee system of the House of Commons. The experts tell us that this is an essential and inevitable trend, and we have been moving gradually toward this desired objective. I would have thought that this government, which during the recent election campaign prattled incessantly about the necessity for greater participation and involvement in the affairs of the nation, would have been the first to support this theme. But what did we hear yesterday? We heard the government house leader resort to some of the most outmoded precedents in defending the government's stubborn refusal to take the logical step in dealing with this legislation, namely, referral to a committee.

One of the first breakthroughs in broader and more effective use of the committee system was ten years ago when the members of the veterans affairs committee, in a long series of discussions and deliberations, undertook a comprehensive review of the veterans charter, as a result of which many necessary amendments were made. More recently we have followed the same practice in transportation matters during the reorganization of this fundamental communications system. I am sure that any of those still members of the house who had the privilege of taking part in that interesting dialogue will agree that the resulting transportation act has been a much more effective document than it would have been had it not been referred to a committee before receiving second reading in the house.

I could mention other similar developments that have taken place. Suffice it to say that I am sure it is a disappointment to members on both sides of the house and particularly to the people of Canada, following the pious pronouncements of the members of the Liberal party during the recent election campaign about greater involvement of parliament and the people in participatory democracy, that the spokesman for the government yesterday took a completely reactionary approach.

The Postmaster General indicated when he spoke yesterday that he regards the postal service as an industry. I think I am quoting him correctly when I say that he used words to the effect that the Post Office Department is not an institution but a function. That, too Mr. Speaker, sounds like a voice from the board room and not vox populi. Anyone who understands the principles of responsible parliamentary democracy will acknowledge that communications are basic to nationhood, that they are part and parcel of national policy. I am sure we will all agree that in a diverse country such as Canada national policy is of the utmost importance, particularly in the experts tell us that this is an essential and communications field. We have long recognized in many communications areas that any gradually toward this desired objective. I would have thought that this government, which during the recent election campaign communications field. We have long recognized in many communications areas that any function of this kind, to use the Postmaster General's term, must be a part of national policy.

I suppose, that in democratic nations post office services were the first to come under a public utility operation because of the importance of communications in holding nations together. We subsidize the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's electronic communication to a substantial extent. We subsidize our railroad system. In some years we have subsidized Air Canada. We subsidize the operations of the Canada Council. In fact, the grant to the Canada Council is being increased this year over last year. We do all this in the interest of broader communication and understanding, in the interest of development toward nationhood in Canada.

The minister has missed the point as a result of his own personal background. The Postmaster General comes from an environment of many newspapers, with several radio and television stations within easy reach, a teletype service and a private messenger and delivery service. Therefore I believe that his viewpoint has been distorted and he has completely lost contact with the special needs of the rural community.

While the minister has made the gesture of restoring six day service to rural areas, I think this will only confuse the issue. In some constituencies like my own which are half urban, half rural it means that the Post Office Department will still have to function six days a week in order to serve the surrounding rural area, whereas the urban community apparently will be without the six day service. I do not know how this will be arranged in terms of administrative efficiency. Some of the post office workers will have to be on the job to serve the surrounding rural neighbourhood. Notwithstanding this, in the city of Brandon I presume the people will be deprived of six day service.

Another aspect of the government's approach to the matter which amazes me and confuses the public of Canada is that this action flies in the face of another of the Liberal party campaign slogans—the necessity for redressing the balance of regional disparity in Canada. We must remember that Canada is a nation from sea to sea and that all parts must be treated equally in terms of services and facilities. Here we have a complete inconsistency in government policy. I might just go through one or two of these items, Mr. Speaker, to point out what should be abundantly clear and obvious. There are so many inconsistencies in the legislation that has been brought before us that we must, if we are to have any sort of policy that makes sense or any amendments that make sense, refer this matter to a committee so that we may have the necessary dialogue between those of the body public who have been raising the issues and members of parliament who have the responsibility to bring about legislation that is in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

The main point the Postmaster General made in his presentation yesterday in defence of the amendments was that since there has been such a long delay in making amendments to the act increases in rates are necessary. But associated with that basic point was what the hon, member for Hillsborough termed a double whammy. We are to have an increase in rates and a decrease in services. No wonder the Canadian public has become confused.

No one will deny that there must be some increase in rates, if only to meet the problems caused by the rising cost of living in this country. It was mentioned, for instance, that there has been no change in second class mail rates since 1951 and no change in first class mail rates since 1954. In the interval the cost of living in this country has increased substantially and we are today feeling the continuing effects of what is sometimes called liberal inflation. I am sure this will be demonstrated when the budget comes down tonight because since 1963 we experienced an inflationary trend that, without exaggeration, may be described as runaway inflation. The cost of everything has gone up. All the staples of life, bread, butter, milk, transportation rates and so on, have become more expensive.

In this house recently we have been preoccupied with the matter of increasing interest rates generally, which would add to the cost of living. So strong did the outcries and protests by Canadian consumers become that the government established a special department to deal with those protests, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The establishment of that department will add to the increasing costs of government, one of the main contributors to the rising cost of living. This all relates to the general problem of fiscal mismanagement over recent years.

increased postal rates, the arbitrary manner be considered in a committee discussion.

in which the problem has been approached by the minister is not, I think, in the best interests of participatory democracy. The original bill brought before the house in the last parliament dealt with an increase in rates without all the other drastic changes which have been introduced. Without labouring the matter I think it is crystal clear to the people of Canada and, surely, to all members of the house and to the minister that we shall obtain a much more effective reorganization of the department if hon, members have a chance to look at the matter in depth in committee.

It was mentioned that the post office savings bank is to be discontinued. This is an obvious change. I do not think that the Canadian public, following the announcement in the budget tonight of increased taxes which must inevitably come, will have much in the way of savings to put in that bank.

Finally, to sum up the case I have been making in support of the amendment let me say that what the government is doing and the way it is doing it is a reversal in government policy that indicates schizophrenia in the cabinet and is bound to cause confusion in the country. It is like facing both ways at once. It might even be described as paranoia because there are delusions of grandeur associated with it. We were told that the government was going to usher in a just society. On the one hand it subsidizes, to the astronominal tune of some $150 million, the electronic media of communication. I will not spend much time on that point because the C.B.C. was inaugurated by a Conservative government in the 1930's to bring about improved means of communication in this nation. Yet there comes a time when we must pause to consider whether the electronic mass media and the printed word are in balance in improved efficiency bringing about communication.

The government obviously has decided that the mass media should receive the support of government subsidies at the expense of the printed word. In this there are overtones of authoritarianism since, compared with the effectiveness of the printed word, there is an emotional content in the mass media message. Authoritarian régimes, those that move forward in public policy with a minimum of contract with the public or responsibility to it, do so by an emphasized use of radio and television as propaganda media. As I say, While we admit that there is a necessity for there are serious overtones here that ought to of information in the nation claim that under the terms of the bill as it stands now many newspapers cannot survive. We have seen how in recent years independently owned newspapers have gone out of business one by one until, in order to survive, the newspaper industry in Canada has come under the control of large syndicates. I am sure that the drastic and sudden increase in rates, coupled with the attempt of the government to do in one, fell stroke what it has neglected to do in recent years to adjust costs of post office operations, will have a further deleterious effect on the survival of some independent newspapers in Canada.

The other day I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) if he plans to move against monopolies in mass media electronic communication. He indicated that this was the government's intention and that an announcement would be forthcoming in due course. Yet the government is introducing a policy that is bound to bring about a further monopolistic situation in the newspaper industry. Some newspapers which are economically marginal in their operations have candidly admitted that they cannot survive in the face of this drastic and sudden increase in costs.

To ensure the survival of parliamentary democracy in Canada I appeal to the minister to follow the precedents which have been established in recent years for intelligent discussion and to have this matter referred to a parliamentary committee before second reading. This parliament has been in session for about a month and I have listened already to many instant experts on parliament who decry any waste of time. They have been here for about a month and they say that any discussion in this house is a waste of time. The impression they leave is that it would be much better to allow the cabinet to decide because the cabinet knows best.

We are facing a generation of instant exhave come across in recent times goes something like this: "X", an unknown quantity, and "spurt", a drip under pressure. One cannot appraise the value of the institution of parliament by an exposure of one or two weeks to this high court of public opinion.

I believe that the printed word is still the achieve consensus by discussion. This is the main medium of communication in this coun- last hope of redress of wrongs, of justice for try. Newspapers and other responsible sources the citizens of Canada. We have no ombudsman, and if we are ever to bring about a just society it can only be done by recognizing the vital principle of parliamentary democracyexecutive responsibility of the elected representatives.

> A few minutes ago we heard in this house an exchange between the first minister of the crown and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who is a recognized expert-and I use the word "expert" in the best sense of the term—on the principles and practices of our parliamentary system. I was distressed to hear the Prime Minister, who after all is only a peer among equals in our parliamentary system, indicate that he is practising a system of selective attendance for members of the cabinet because he believes they could use their time much better in the offices of the bureaucrats than listening to the representations made in this house by the representatives of the people. This is the sort of trend we must avoid in this parliament. In the last month the trend has increased to an alarming extent and I hope that the Postmaster General, who has had experience in legislatures in other parts of Canada, will accept the recommendation broadly supported by members of the opposition and, I am sure, supported by his own friends, particularly the committee of 35, that this matter be referred to a committee.

> It is true enough that the parliament of Canada has more and more business to get through in this complex age. But this still does not lessen the importance of parliament as the ultimate sounding board for all government policy. When the first minister says he has decided that his cabinet colleagues can more effectively discharge their responsibilities by hobnobbing with the bureaucrats rather than with elected representatives, it is time to review our values and the emphasis we place on priorities.

Ministers are also members of parliament. Under our regulations, if they do not attend the house I suppose they will lose their per perts. I think the best definition of an expert I diem allowances in due course, as would the rest of us in the case of non-attendance. We are all aware that because of the growing complexity of business in the past few years power is moving from this place to the offices of the bureaucrats.

Let me repeat, in conclusion, that if we are This is the place where we endeavor to to make this parliament effective, if we are to slow down or reverse the drift to an all-powerful cabinet and the shift to authoritarianism, we must use our system of parliamentary committees more effectively. I plead with the Postmaster General to accept the recommendation of the opposition, put forward responsibly, in order that we may go on with other matters of greater priority which, as the government house leader has indicated, are being held up until we finish our discussion of the post office legislation. We can do what I suggest without even voting on the amendment if the Postmaster General will only give the word.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, naturally there has been much talk about Bill No. C-116. The honourable minister has covered the subject quite well, and I would not be surprised if he should himself propose some amendments during consideration of the legislation. I listened to quite a number of objections from some opposition members and I fail to understand their reasoning when they blame the government for showing a $400 million budget deficit and then for taking measures in order to offset that deficit.

An increase in the cost of government services is not, of course, a pleasant prospect and nobody likes it. I do not think that the minister was happy to introduce those measures, because I know that he has enough experience and intelligence to realize that a proposed increase in the price of government services is never popular.

I also think, Mr. Speaker, that we live in times when the vast majority of Canadian citizens realize that empty promises are totally irresponsible and that someone has to pay for every service. There may be two schools of thought on the subject, that is to say some services must be paid for by the community, while others have to be paid for by the people who use them. The minister and his advisers—a good many of us agree—believe that, with regard to postal services, the first people who should absorb this portion of the deficit which should disappear, must be those who benefit from these services.

Other measures will probably stem from this one, but I still believe that it is a sound theory by which the users of a service pay for its cost. Beside, the rates have not been increased for a long time and we wonder, for instance, if the cost of 6 cents for a letter today is not equivalent to its cost of 2 or 3 cents, 10 or 15 years ago. Everyone knows that nowadays money does not have the same value.

Members on the opposition side have advanced all kinds of arguments that I shall not try to refute, because I would have to hold the floor too long. But evidently, the minister and ourselves were expecting that newspapers would protest, as would anyone who is called upon to pay more taxes.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Indeed it hurts us, as well as our friends opposite, when we see our income tax going up. Of course, we do not protest, because that would be unbecoming of members of parliament. The members of the Ralliement Créditiste only can afford to do so; they protested against the increase of rates on mail forwarded by members. They are the only ones who did, as far as I know; I heard nothing from the official opposition nor from the New Democratic party.

But it is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that all such things hurt. I do not say they are not right because they hurt; there comes a time when, whatever the party in office, the government has to face such a situation.

Everyone who reads the newspapers knows that there is now all over the world a sort of monetary crisis, which is even worse in other countries. I have here-I am sure my colleagues have it also—the latest report of the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Louis Rasminsky; it explains how the government succeeded in avoiding a severe financial crisis. While other countries were forced to devaluate their currency, Canada was able to restore confidence among investors here, and maintain a reasonable prosperity and prevent an increase in unemployment. According to what the governor of the Bank of Canada says in the report, Mr. Speaker, it was imperative for the government to take all possible means to balance its budget.

As everyone else I skimmed through the report of Les Quotidiens du Québec Inc.—Quebec dailies—and indeed, what they had to say was predictable. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the chance of proving that some of those assertions are exaggerated, that some figures are not realistic.

Besides, members of the opposition pointed out a while ago that newspapers are going through some form of modernization crisis. Some of them have gone out of business, and have us believe that they did because their costs are too high. I know, because I once owned a newspaper and had occasion to deal closely with its administration, that the problem is one of streamlining their operations. The minister, I believe, told us that some newspaper owners stated that if they could not benefit from those special rates, that form of subsidy from the government, they would go bankrupt and would be forced out of business.

Meanwhile, several newspapers throughout Canada will not be affected by the increase in rates. For instance, the Montreal Dimanche Matin has a circulation of 325,000 copies, hardly any of which are mailed. The paper is delivered otherwise. And so, in spite of a high circulation, that newspaper will not be affected.

I believe this conclusion can be reached: the problem for newspapers is more one of streamlining than one of increased rates. I therefore urge our newspaper friends to have a close look at their production and distribution system with a view to lowering costs instead of asking the government to subsidize them and pass on the costs to the small taxpayers. I fail to see the logic of the member Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who accuses the government of squeezing the small taxpayer while asking the government to have him pay for the deficits of some $100 million, which by next year will reach $125 or $150 million, in order to allow newspapers to continue to prosper. Mr. Speaker, there is a lack of logic somewhere.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I presume that I shall be allowed to make a remark since my friend, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, has done me the honour of quoting me several times in this house last night, thus giving me free publicity. I hope that I may be allowed to express my views on the interventions of the hon, member for Témiscamingue, since it is the second time he speaks.

I am still waiting for the opportunity to answer him fully and, perhaps, in the same terms as he uses, because I would like to remind him-I am sorry that he is not in the house, but his colleagues will tell him what I said—that invectives and accusations do not bother me. I have met much larger and much greater opponents than the hon. member for Témiscamingue in my political career. If, in the last few years, I have perhaps become a little more moderate in answering those who those who studied the situation closely would attack me, the hon. member for Témiscamingue should not forget that I nevertheless still have a rich enough vocabulary to follow him in all the intricacies of his arguments and in his mania of hurling invectives and insults at those who do not think the way he does, even to the point of questioning their conscience.

> This reminds me, Mr. Speaker-and I hope I will be forgiven for quoting something which perhaps is not a very elegant comparison—of a remark made by that firebrand, Mr. Armand Lavergne, who was a member of this house and also of the provincial legislature, and who, when once attacked by someone who was more pro-British than he, had answered, as a starter, and in a much more elaborate way:

> I declare! This British bull is suddenly attacking me. Upon my word, since he is asking for it, I cannot resist playing the picador.

> I am almost tempted to plagiarize the late Armand Lavergne and to say to my friend, the hon, member for Témiscamingue: If it is not this créditiste bull breathing defiance and pawing the ground. Since he seems so keen to fight, I cannot resist playing the picador and telling him that it is easy for him, during the discussion of a measure such as the one which we are now considering, or many others which he discussed throughout the province, in all areas where people are misinformed and destitute, thus giving more weight to this rather commonly known proverb: "It is no use preaching to a hungry man" to criticize, because he has no responsibility. He knows that he will not be called upon to solve the problems of Canada to-morrow, but I say, that he cannot pass all limits, Mr. Speaker.

> One should not make political capital, lure the poor with false expectations, and act like those pirates who used to lure boats onto the reefs with flashes of light during the storm so as to grow rich on their cargo. The hon. member knows quite well that he cannot make political capital by deluding people into believing that thanks to a mysterious, magic and miraculous formula, he can solve all the problems of the citizens of Quebec or Canada. Moreover, he admits it, since he says that he has been advocating that for 35 years and others had tried to do so in other provinces and countries, but it has never been implemented.

> Then, he gives rise to false expectations and delusions among the poor who need bread and concrete measures rather than airy promises and demagogic behaviours or comments of which the hon. member for Témiscamingue is fond. He wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, and I quote his words, so to be sure not to forget anything of that thoroughly affected prose. Besides, he has attended classes with Mrs. Gilberte Côté-Mercier and it is there he learned to use bland words. Madame Gilberte Côté-Mercier dubbed him a louse, a traitor, a turncoat and many other epithets. That was printed in the newspaper Vers Demain, and it is probably there that he learned his humanities. That is why he loves that kind of style.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mongrain: "The hon. member for Trois-Rivières", and I quote—

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that if the purpose of his spiteful innuendos is to defend the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) on the subject of the Post Office Act, we should like him to prove what he said at the beginning of his speech, when he said that he would prove that some of the statements contained in the brief submitted by the Association des quotidiens du Québec are false. Therefore, I ask the hon. member for Trois-Rivières to prove his statements rather than be satisfied with—

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I think this is rather a question than a point of order. I recognize the hon. member for Trois-Rivières.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to let the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) dictate to me the speech I should make. He should rather be proud I am quoting his leader. Of course, I am quoting him verbatim as it is on that I want to make some comments. The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) said yesterday evening:

Mr. Speaker, the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) who was looking after the interests of his people in the Mauricie district—

I thank him for testifying in my favour. I was and still am looking after the interests of my people.

—and who the other day was accusing me of not being present in the house—

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Témiscamingue was called to order and told he was out of order. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) has been doing exactly the same for the last few minutes and you did not call him to order. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should be called to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. Mongrain: I agree with the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) when he says the member for Témiscamingue was out of order yesterday evening. However, I think it is only fair to let me answer him since he was attacking me without the slightest provocation.

It will not take long. I know we have too many serious matters to discuss. I am taking it up where I left off.

—who was looking after the interests of his people in the Mauricie district—

It is the Gospel truth.

—who the other day was accusing me of not being present in the house— $\,$

True again, he is not here today.

—realizes now that I am more present in the house than he is, since he does not have the courage to stand up and fight for Le Nouvelliste of Trois-Rivières.

If I wanted to be rather rude, I would say that this is an idiotic assertion, but I am not saying it, as I would be told that such language is unparliamentary. I have seldom seen anything as childish as that.

He is more present in the house than I am because he has the floor. But if I had asked before him to be recognized, I would have been. It was my intention to speak this afternoon only and I am not allowed to do so. He could not be more present in the house than I was last night since I was here as well.

I believe I do not have in this house either to praise or to curse Le Nouvelliste or La Presse for not giving me a due amount of publicity. This is not what I am here for. And I quoted that excerpt from the speech of the hon. member for Témiscamingue to show the shallowness of his remarks. He made an exhibition of himself and played the fool. It is amusing at times, especially in the evening, when we are tired. We would find it more amusing if he did not resort to such cheap agree with him.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I will not labour that point further because, once again, there are serious things to be discussed and we shall try rather to cover that serious aspect of the discussion; I repeat that differences of opinion are surely legitimate, as to the way of financing services, and that the formula advocated by the minister, namely to have them paid by the users, seems to be acceptable.

Everyone wants to make suggestions in the discussion which is now taking place but the opposition has not yet made any constructive suggestions as to how to make up the deficit; all they have said is: "Refer the matter to the committee of the house".

Now, we in the house are doing the work of the committee of the house and, if there are any constructive suggestions, I am sure the minister will be ready to accept them for he had already said so. He told the members of the opposition: "A group of Liberals have made suggestions to me; do the same and I will listen to you". He is still ready to do so, Mr. Speaker.

The minister has still time to amend his bill, if the matter is to be taken seriously, of course. But if there is to be opposition just for the sake of opposition, the subject, in my opinion, is shrewdly chosen; demagoguery can have a field day, because the public readily applauds any opposition to tariff or tax increases. It is all too easy, but will this settle the problem the nation has to face? I wonder, because if we take into account that a $100 million deficit in one department, may increase next year by 25 or 30 millions or more, I think that all those who reason objectively and set aside all personal and party considerations, probably feel that something should be done to settle the question.

Instead of putting the blame on the minister, we should, on the contrary, admire his courage, for he has enough political experience to know that the measure he is proposing is not popular. However, it is a must; he has done his duty come tide or high water.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said during this debate that we were expressing the views of our constituents. I have 54,000 constituents and, during the week-end, we have had many meetings and consultations, concerning various measures which are introduced in this house. The question has been raised, but I bers in the house. The question was raised, would have been deprived of that monument tricks to try and run down those who do not explanations were asked for, and when I told the people in my riding the amount of the deficit of the Postmaster General's department, and told them that it would increase at the same rate in the future, they said: Well, somebody has to pay and what not the users; it seems to be the most reasonable formula.

> Some tried to say that it was an injustice, Mr. Speaker. Some pretended that the just society in the making, was in fact unjust. To the contrary, I think we apply distributive justice by making those who use the service pay for it rather than the non-users. If the government took the latter action, it would be accused of charging the taxpayers for the deficit of the postal service.

> Some say it will impair information. Mr. Speaker, the statement is at least grossly exaggerated. In fact, there would be other sources of information, even if all newspapers were to disappear tomorrow morning. Nobody thinks that all newspapers will disappear tomorrow morning, or next month or next year. There will surely be ways to relay the information. Newspapers will not be bothered and they will be able to say what they like to the Ralliement Creditiste, or to the Liberals, we shall not cause them any trouble. However, when it comes to the newsprint the use and sell by means of advertising, they will have to pay for its distribution. This again seems to be perfectly compatible with distributive justice.

> Then the honorable minister was blamed for not having heard those concerned. On the contrary, I know that he has had extensive conversations with all those concerned, not only with newspapermen, but with all kinds of people connected directly or indirectly with the press. They had the opportunity to submit any possible suggestions or criticism. What would be gained by referring this to a parliamentary committee? Things would remain stalled a little longer, Mr. Speaker, and most probably the end result would be the same. It is no secret that in life everything must get paid for and paid by somebody, and it is only normal that those services should be paid by those who use them.

Some more or less serious comments have also been made, for example the comparison by an honourable member with the National Arts Centre. He said that we had invested $50 million which could have been given to the Post Office Department to make up the deficit. It would be a "band-aid". It could have heard no protests as bitter as those of mem- remedied the situation for a year, but Canada which every Canadian, rich or poor, great or humble, will be able to enjoy. This again is a statement, similar to many others which have been made in this house, which must not be taken seriously.

Mr. Speaker, in closing we can say that such a measure really does hurt everyone. However, we must remember the words spoken by the late President Kennedy: Think of what you can do for your country rather than what your country can do for you. If our country must continue to pile up deficits, if our country must continue to subsidize selfsupporting firms by increasing the burden of taxation resting on the shoulders of the poor people and of the little man, the government does not show any distributive justice. But, in a legislation like this one, the government is practising distributive justice; it has the courage to take such actions which enable it to make ends meet and when it will have done it, it will be able to maintain and perhaps to increase this confidence which foreign investors show by investing in Canada, so that our business firms expand and that other firms come into being. There would be less unemployment and misery at home thanks to real money and not through empty promises nor artificially inflated balloons.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I support the bill of the honourable minister generally, while I shall perhaps support some amendments that he will himself propose.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, when the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) rose to give his speech, of course I expected him to support the measure of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans).

Mr. Speaker, I see with astonishment that some of our friends opposite have returned to the fold of the Liberal party; every day some of them practice what I would call a "bootlicking" policy as we have witnessed in the course of the present debate.

The member for Trois-Rivières obviously spoke certain truths and on some points we agree. But when he tells us that the minister had the courage to levy taxes and that to his mind, that is the only way to correct the situation, I come to the conclusion that the member could not possibly have studied the bill in depth to make such gratuitous assertions. Let us dwell on this point. It is easy to say that we have a deficit and that it must be made up by levying taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I read very carefully the speech the minister made when he moved second reading. He then said: For some years now, the Post Office Department has had deficits in various amounts of up to one hundred million dollars. Unless taxes are increased, it will have an even larger deficit next year. The minister also told us what the reasons were in his opinion, for the deficit over the years in the Post Office Department.

It is true that, in the course of his speech, the minister told us that he had entrusted to experts the task of studying the postal services in depth. But I maintain that the minister is going backwards. If he wants to levy a tax to make up the deficit, to my mind, he should start by finding out the reason for the deficit.

The minister immediately applies a "bandaid" by imposing a tax which will not cover the deficit of the Post Office Department. He could at least have given some thought to low income earners who will again be penalized by the tax imposed by the minister. If the minister at least had spread out his tax increase over a period of two or three years, perhaps it would have less inconvenienced those who will have to pay the bill.

The hon, member for Trois-Rivières says that the members of the opposition are against the measure. Naturally, we are against a further increase in the taxes paid by the taxpayers, and when my hon, friend sat in this house as an independent member, he also sometimes opposed a tax increase imposed by the government. He was with us then, I understand that, today, he is bound by party discipline, and I am surprised to see that the hon, member for Trois-Rivières should conform so graciously to this discipline imposed by the Liberal party. I did not know that aspect of his character before.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières told us that the minister shows courage in imposing a tax. I say that neither the minister nor the government is justified in doing this. Before the last election, the Liberals showed much more courage in telling the Canadian people: We will have to impose taxes, and you will have to judge us on our political program. However, there was no question of raising taxes before the general election, and the party in power has shown itself very cunning in the administration of the country for the past thirty or thirty-five years.

At the beginning of a term of office, taxes are imposed in all sectors. At the end of the mandate, near the third year, the voters are given all sorts of goodies and they are asked to vote after being reminded of the goodies they got the previous year. It has always been the same, Mr. Speaker, and I say that if the minister or his government had shown before the election, the true financial picture to the Canadian people, the results would naturally not have been the same.

I see here, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) who nods—

Hon, Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): I was bowing to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Asselin: I apologize, he says that he was bowing to Mr. Speaker.

I know that the minister understands that if his government had been candid with the voters at the time of the last election, if it had simply said to the people what was the financial condition of the government, less Liberal members would have been elected. We will know tonight the impact of this government's improvising policy.

I say to the minister—he has known it for a long time—that a minister of the Crown who wants to have a bill passed by the house must give evidence that he is right in bringing it in. It is not up to the members to prove to the minister that he is wrong in imposing taxes, and if I read carefully the minister's speech given at the stage of second reading of the bill, I find that the only reason he has invoked to increase the postal rates was his wish to make up a deficit. There again, I repeat what I said earlier—that it would have been more logical for the minister to consider what was wrong in the department, and then proceed to the required reorganization. In a few years, the minister will have to face the problem of automation and he will have to take other decisions. Before increasing taxes, the minister ought to know the facts about the Post Office Department and not merely introduce a bill and say what a member of the board of the Montreal Stock Exchange might say: There is a deficit, so much money is needed, such taxes must be imposed. This is more or less what the minister said the other day.

Obviously, some opposition members have objected, and still do, to that measure. We were terribly happy, Mr. Speaker, when we heard there were Liberal members who were also against this bill.

Mr. Mongrain: You are misinformed. [Mr. Asselin.]

Mr. Asselin: No. And yet, it has been published in newspapers. I think that the minister said it himself, as reported in Hansard on page 1603, and I quote:

However, Mr. Speaker, in respect of the latter reduction in service it has become apparent as a result of representations made directly to me, and by members here including the 35 men good and true—

An hon. Member: Liberals.

Mr. Asselin: Obviously they were Liberals.
—and the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr)—

Indeed, the minister had to convey his little political message; we forgive him all that, knowing that it is done in every parliament. We thought it would go no further. But then the flatterer came out; we saw the member for Gaspé rise in the house and say: The opposition should stop talking; we should pass this bill. Then he started showering flattery on the Postmaster General. It was obvious that the member for Gaspé had been under the steam-roller. It was easy to see and to guess. As concerns the 35 others who were with him, we did not hear about them. The member was told: Listen, keep quiet, and make a nice speech to support the bill.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The member for Charlevoix says that 35 Liberal members are objecting to the bill and immediately after, that 35 members are objecting to a clause of the bill. There is a difference on that point and surely the honourable member for Charlevoix should not report innaccuracies.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the honourable member to follow my speech more carefully because he did not understand it.

I only pointed out that, according to the minister—and that has been reported in the press—the honourable member for Gaspé joined 35 liberal members in opposing the minister's bill. If the honourable member for Trois-Rivières could reveal the secrets of his party caucus, he would have to agree that what I said a while ago was accurate. I said that these 35 gentlemen whom the minister mentionned have been made to toe the line. That is why we have seen last night the honourable member for Gaspé bowing and scraping and telling to the minister that he was a smart operator. These people change their mind very quickly.

35 liberal colleagues have changed their mind committee, which would give the opposition son why we, from the opposition should allow discuss with the people and the organizations the minister to push the rate increase involved. Indeed, the minister might even through because we believe that such a step is not justified under the circumstances and that it is going to encourage the increases in the cost of living and inflation.

We are already facing a serious inflation problem in this country. Yet, the government had promised us to take the necessary measures to check inflation, and if the member for Trois-Rivières will follow my reasoning, he will find that if postal rates are increased, the consumer will again foot the bill instead of publishers who will pass on the increase to the consumer. If the consumer has less money to spend and if the price of a product keeps increasing, the member for Trois-Rivières knows perfectly well that inflation will follow.

The measure proposed by the minister is an inflationary one, and considering the economic and financial circumstances now prevailing in the country, the Canadian people cannot afford to support such a measure which, I think, will contribute to increase the cost of living.

Of course, the hon. members have informed the house of the representations they had received. I am convinced that the members of the government as well as those of the opposition have received representations from almost all the newspapers, which complained to the minister and even met him. I shall spare the minister the reading of the brief which has been presented to him, since I am convinced he has read and reread it. This brief informed the minister that the increase was too high under the circumstances. Taxation experts have suggested that the minister might consider, with the officials of his Department, the steps to be taken in order to meet the objectives of the Post Office Department and satisfy, at the same time, the publishers. Those same publishers have met the minister as well as other ministers from Quebec and it seems that their meeting did not give the expected results.

And I think that the present government has not only the right but the obligation to receive and to study thoroughly the claims or briefs submitted last week by some organizations.

If the minister is able to stand up for his bill and all its financial implications, I ask him why he is reluctant to comply with the

The honourable member for Gaspé and his request of the opposition to refer the bill to a within a few hours. However, that is no rea- the opportunity to hear the evidence and to have the pleasant surprise, at the conclusion of such discussions in committee, to find that we can reach an agreement, which would perhaps help him to find a solution to his problem, while at the same time doing justice to the people who feel the rate increase proposed by the minister is inacceptable at the present time.

> Mr. Speaker, the minister will understand that we cannot accept his bill as easily as a letter in the mail.

> I now revert to the remark I made at the beginning. The minister knows very well, since he has been a member, and even a minister, in a provincial legislature, that when a bill is introduced in the house, proof ought to be given that such bill is a must, and the only way the minister can get his department out of a fix. It is not incumbent on us to show the minister that he is wrong, but upon the minister to demonstrate that the whole undertaking is reasonable and that the legislation he is trying to pass at present is the only one that can solve the problem.

> And in this respect, the minister will agree with me that he could have explored many other avenues, instead of following blindly reports from officials telling him: Sir, you can make up the deficits of certain periods of the year only by increasing the rates, whatever the consequences might be from the social or financial standpoints. It is obvious that the officials are not close to the people and that they are unaware of their hardships. However, it is still the minister's responsibility to analyse the advice given to him by his officials so as to know, under these circumstances, whether the legislation is doing a service to the Canadian people.

> The minister should at least consider the advisability of exempting religious publications and granting subsidies to certain associations such as the War Amputees of Canada. Today we received a brief from that organization to the effect that it will have to close its doors and stop publishing if the minister applies the legislation as he intends to do now, with the increases he wants parliament to accept. The War Amputees Association deserves all our sympathy. Here are people who have found themselves a job in spite of their war disabilities. Everyone knows what those people do to earn a living.

Representatives of the War Amputees Association of Canada told us this morning that if the minister proceeds with the proposed rates, they would suffer from the measure, since their costs would increase by 66% per cent. They would have to put an end to their publication, their activities, and their association would disappear. If other newspapers follow suit—and that will happen as mentioned by hon. members—it will mean that unemployment will increase. It is not the situation of a newspaper that is concerned, but that of people who use the postal service—

An hon. Member: It is not a newspaper.

Mr. Asselin: —and who benefit from the rate of third class mail.

The minister's measure also affects Christmas stamps. I refer to the stamps of antituberculosis associations.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have proved quite clearly to the minister, during this debate, that it would be useless for us to read again the telegrams we have here. I am not here to take the defence—as the hon. member for Trois-Rivières put it—of the weeklies and dailies. I am here, first of all, to represent the people who elected me. And I say that the people who elected me are saturated with the municipal, school, provincial, or federal taxes they have to pay, and I think the member for Trois-Rivières will agree on that point.

We wondered a while ago where to find the money. There must be other ways to find some. The minister must have enough imagination; his officials must have a sufficient knowledge of the workings of his department to look thoroughly into the post office area in order to decide where to get the money while cutting down some services and nevertheless maintaining the quality of some services.

In his speech, the minister said he would close down the small post offices that do not show any profits.

If he thinks he is going to make millions by closing down small rural post offices which mean so much to the people, I am of the opinion that postal rates should not be used as a means to balance the Post Office Department budget. Had the minister only been consistent, had his officials only accepted to advise him so that he could have better enlightened the members, he would have told us: We explored every possibility, we created a commitee of experts—this he mentioned in his speech—and here is the report of that committee. Then, we could have seen that the problems had been dealt with in depth. Then, the minister would not have had to improvise as he did today by introducing a bill to overtax the taxpayers.

• (4:50 p.m.)

In closing, I say this Mr. Speaker: the newspaper owners will not be the ones to suffer most from those measures. Once again, it will be the consumer, the taxpayer. I therefore ask the minister, and the government; to tell us when you will put an end to taxes, when our people can look to the future with a faint glimmer of hope. We shall know tonight, the present government will again crush the taxpayers with new taxes.

It was said last May that the country enjoyed an excellent financial position. And tonight, no measure will be proposed to balance next year's budget. I am convinced that we shall again end up with a deficit of about $500 million.

In spite of this, of course, the government, for several years, has been spending foolishly in every field. I would like to give an example to the member of Trois-Rivières. If, instead of buying new uniforms for the members of the armed forces, that money had been assigned to the post office administration, we would probably not be facing a rate increase today.

How many other examples we could quote to show the careless spending of the government since 1963, whereas we, on this side of the house, have asked several times that they legislate according to a stricter order of priorities. In 1968, a responsible government should legislate on a priority basis.

Such are the reasons why, Mr. Speaker, we cannot approve the increase suggested by the Postmaster General. That is also why we urge the minister to be sensible, to accept the suggestion made by our party and to refer this bill to the committee, so that together we may give it thorough consideration and explore every possible avenue leading to some way of balancing the budget of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Mongrain: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member for Charlevoix allow the hon. member for Trois-Rivières a question?

Mr. Asselin: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mongrain: Would the hon. member answer the following question?

Considering that he admitted there was a deficit of some $100 million—I heard indeed the hon, member say there was such a deficit—does the hon. member deem it fairer to have that deficit paid by all Canadian taxpayers rather than by newspaper owners, subscribers and buyers, and those who are using the postal services?

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, the answer would be very easy, I think, and a lot fairer, if the government reduced its expenditures and stopped thinking in a scatter-brained way as it has done since 1963, in short if it had planned its expenditures in order to get more properly balanced budgets in the departments.

[English]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very much of the time of the house, but one thing that concerns me as much as anything else in this proposed legislation is the position of the weekly newspapers. Perhaps I should more closely define them as the weekly farm newspapers. There are two in particular which serve the farming population in western Canada, the Western Producer published in Saskatoon and the Free Press Weekly, I think it is called now, published in Winnipeg. From the information I have had it looks to me that the increased cost in each case is, to say the least, substantial. There is at present an amendment before the house to refer this bill to a standing committee, and the situation of the weekly newspapers and others such as the North Battleford News-Optimist is probably the best reason for doing so.

I do not propose to take the position that there should be no increase in postal rates on these particular publications. As someone else has said this afternoon, I do not suppose that as an individual member I have that much knowledge of the situation. When one reads in an article in the Globe and Mail of October 11, quoting Richard S. Malone, publisher of the Free Press Weekly, it is alleged to be Canada's only remaining weekly although I do not think that is so—as saying that that paper will be faced with additional costs of about $400,000 a year, one gets some under-The Free Press Weekly, of course, has recently department of agriculture.

absorbed the 400,000 circulation Family Herald. The article goes on to say:

"The projected postal increases will have the most serious impact on weekly publications and farm papers," he added. "When the Family Herald folded recently, largely because of rising costs, it was paying $100,000 a year in postal charges.'

My information is that the Western Producer reports about the same rate of increase. The Family Herald has, of course, recently folded and it was, I suppose, one of the oldest farm weeklies in Canada. There may be older ones in the province of Quebec or in the maritimes. The information I have been given by people who publish these weeklies is largely substantiated by the article in the Globe and Mail. Anyone who farms in western Canada knows that the Western Producer, the other major western farm weekly, has been operating at a substantial deficit year after year. I have talked to some of the people responsible and they tell me that it is very unlikely they could increase their advertising rates. The Western Producer depends mostly on national advertising for what one might call its large page advertising. It also has, of course, a great deal of classified advertising.

What concerns me is whether newspapers of this type are going to be able to absorb this increase or are they going to have to cease publication. I don't know. I suppose no one will know for sure until these publishers are presented with the bill and decide either to pay it or just quit. I would think there will certainly be some soul searching by the people responsible for paying the deficit incurred by the Western Producer. These papers serve a purpose which will not be served if they are not there. They carry farm news which otherwise would not be carried.

In the last issue of the Western Producer, for example, we have the news that farm scientists are to visit Japan. There is a story on the shortage of experts in the poor nations. This, one could say, is practically standard news. But there is also a report in this newspaper that Alberta is phasing out its sire purchase policy. This is the type of report you would not find in the large daily standing of the problem. According to the newspapers or over radio or television. In news story, Mr. Malone said that if the in- addition, there is an article advising farmers crease goes into effect it will represent an to check their bins regularly when they are increase of 230 per cent in postal rates for the harvesting out of condition grain. Obviously weekly, which has a circulation of 600,000. such a report emanates from a university or a

Then we are advised, Mr. Speaker, that there is a course in artificial insemination, say, at the University of Saskatchewan. In another story we are informed about the condition of fall pastures and how they can be improved; such a release probably comes from the experimental station of the Department of Agriculture. Then there is another story about pastures and how cattlemen can build an economic operation by better development of pastures. This is the sort of information carried in these farm weeklies and the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa spends a fair amount of money sending releases to the publications that carry them. They also spend a fair amount of money sending smaller releases to individual farmers.

If this type of publication is going to be discontinued, then how and by what method will this information be disseminated? I think that is a fair question to put to the Postmaster General. I also think it is fair to ask him whether or not he feels that this particular type of publication should continue under the new situation, or whether he knows that it will. After all, these publications do fulfil a vital function.

Let me make myself clear, Mr. Speaker. I hold no brief on behalf of these publications. Quite often I do not agree with their editorial policies. But I do say that they perform one particular function in the communications system on the farming scene. This is particularly the case in the farming area from western Ontario—in fact, the Free Press Weekly, I suppose, is distributed farther east than that—through the prairies clear to the Peace river and into the interior valleys of British Columbia. As I say, these papers perform a communications function that is as essential as the function performed by the C.B.C.

I think that this situation should be carefully examined. What strikes me about it from getting information from publications in my area is that the increases affect different publications in different ways. Local newspapers such as the local weeklies face some increased charges but they are not too serious. However, there is a more marked difference in the case of papers like the Union Farmer, house organs published by farm unions and that type of organization. The increases will also affect papers like the North Battleford News-Optimist and similar papers in British Columbia and Manitoba.

I should like to know what will be the effect of this legislation upon major farm newspapers such as the Free Press Weekly and the Western Producer. If these papers can afford to pay the increase, fine and dandy. But if they cannot or will not and this means that we will lose this particular method of communication, then we should consider what is going to replace them. For example, the Western Producer provides what it calls an open forum which for years has been a vehicle for the exchange of views between its readers throughout its circulation area. It provides an open forum of debate, a place where people can say what they think about the issues of the day and where other people can write in and express differing views. This is what I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker, and if the Postmaster General has an answer I would be happy to hear it.

Mr. Kierans: Does the hon, member want it now?

Mr. Gleave: At the minister's convenience.

 $\mathbf{Mr.}$ Kierans: I would be happy to answer now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Monteith: But not close the debate.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker-

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is no fear of closing the debate. The minister is speaking to the amendment.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I thought we were speaking to the debate itself, the subject matter before the house. The hon. member wishes to have some details in connection with the Free Press; we can close the debate later.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want it clearly understood that if the minister answers the question at this time he is not closing the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought I made that clear. The minister is speaking to the amendment, or to the debate arising out of the amendment, and is not closing the debate.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, is there any reason why the debate should not be closed?

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak in this house to defend the interests of my constituents and of all Canadians, and to discuss Bill No. C-116 now before us, amending the Post Office Act.

Mr. Speaker, first, I wish to remind members of the most important role played by journalists and newspapers in the Canadian society. The written press is the most important information medium in our great country at the present time. It truly reflects the opinion of the Canadian people. This information medium is the only one that can reach many Canadians, because many regions in our vast country are still hardly reached by radio or television. The written press is the only way to an all-round education for Canadians, since it conveys ideas and data of a political, financial, local, national, and international nature.

[English]

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, could I rise to make a personal point? The interpretation system does not seem to be working and I am wondering whether the interpreters know this. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member like to continue and we will try to have the interpretation system adjusted.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I feel that an honest newspaperman is an unmatched educator, since he can and truly has the means to convey ideas and information to the public at large. The current of ideas is within his reach and he can strongly influence its orientation. However, he must perforce be honest and he has a right to his information medium, namely the newspapers.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I think that if we recognize that newspapers are a means of informing and educating the people, we must also, consequently, protect them. I do not say we should protect the newspapers themselves, but the subscribers, so that they may get these newspapers at a reasonable price.

I have already said that newspapers are a means of educating people. They allow our young people to discover the problems which exist in the world today. From the age of six or seven on, Canadian children are reading newspapers. They are first interested in pictures, then in cartoons, and finally in local news and so on. Without newspapers, our children will develop late and will not become as attentive to the many aspects of our modern world.

The discovery of printing, as you must know, Mr. Speaker, caused a deep social upheaval. It has served to circulate ideas and has promoted education considerably especially in remote areas. It would be a heavy loss and a regression if all newspapers were to disappear, and it would be heavy going to look after the intellectual needs of our Canadian people, especially of those who live far from the great urban centres.

For all the reasons I have just given, Mr. Speaker, I think we, as legislators, cannot take the risk, to see all our newspapers disappear more or less rapidly, by imposing prohibitive and exorbitant postal rates.

I do understand that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) wants his department to be solvent and I think this is the mark of a good administrator. However, Mr. Speaker, it is not enough to be a good administrator, it is also necessary to have a sense of balance and to think of the welfare of those who are under one's jurisdiction, in the present case, the Canadians and more particularly, the publishers.

The primary purpose of the Post Office Department is to serve the Canadian people and I think the minister is losing sight of this important goal. In fact, if this legislation is accepted by this house in its present form, the Post Office will become a luxury instead of a service for the people. I think therefore that every member will readily understand that we will forget about the Post Office deficit on the one and only condition that it should provide an acceptable service to the Canadian people, because that is the primary purpose of the Post Office and let us not forget it.

Mr. Speaker, who could name one agency in the field of public education able to do its own financing or even to break even?

I maintain that the rates proposed by the Post Office Department are prohibitive and it won't take me long to prove it. I would like to refer as an example to the newspaper, l'Union des Cantons de l'Est which at present pays $12.98 as shipping expenses for 865 pounds of mail. As a result of an increase of 3½ cents per pound proposed under the new legislation, the same shipment will cost $48.29. Is that normal, Mr. Speaker?

In the case of newspapers freely distributed, I would like to refer to the Courrier Sud which for an average copy of 32 pages is now paying about $280 for 800 copies. Under the proposed raise of 7 cents per copy, in the same conditions, the cost will be $560.

Mr. Speaker the shipping costs will double, which is simply unacceptable, considering that already with the present rates, most dailies and weeklies can hardly manage. This legislation means the death in a more or less distant future of all papers distributed free of charge.

Those newspapers will have to resort to advertisement or to have advertising pages that will also be business pages, as they have to have some kind of financing. This will lead to an increase in the cost of living.

I should like to mention a few weekly newspapers that will be affected by this measure: the Sorel La Voie métropolitaine and Le Courrier Riviera, the Granby La nouvelle Revue, the Asbestos Le Citoyen, the Shawinigan Echo du St-Maurice, the Baie Comeau Le Nordic, the Farnham L'Avenir, the Grand-Mère Le Courrier de Laviolette, the La Tuque L'Écho de La Tuque, the Mont-Joli Mont-Joli Nouvelles, the Rimouski Rimouskois, the Lotbinière county La Voix de Lotbinière, the Victoriaville La Voix des Bois Francs, the Shawinigan La Voix de Shawinigan, the Nicolet Courrier Sud, the Abitibi L'Echo Abitibien, the Rouyn La Frontière, the Sherbrooke Le Journal de Sherbrooke.

There is still a huge number of newspapers across Canada I did not mention, Mr. Speaker. Those newspapers will have to bow out and disappear because the Postmaster General decided his department would not have a deficit. In my opinion, this is unacceptable and I think that we should remedy this situation or consider it further.

The Canadian weeklies are prepared to accept a certain increase in their postal rates but certainly not an increase which would double or triple the price at one go. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite unacceptable.

Bill No. C-116 now under consideration provides for an increase of 20 per cent in the postal rate of letters and first class mail. It is a pill which can be swallowed and even digested over a long period, but in the case of weeklies which are delivered free, the increase in the charges would amount to 333 per cent. Is this sensible?

The areas mostly affected are the rural areas which, are reached as we know by weeklies only. Often we hear complaints about the lack of information in some rural areas of Canada. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation will improve the situation?

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Do we have the right to deprive a great part of our population of information? Will this lack of information make for a people aware of its responsibilities, aware of all the problems which require a solution? Who will inform those people on current problems, who will describe to them truthfully the political and economical situation of our country? Some may be led to believe that they will only have to listen to the radio. Yes, of course, they should listen to the radio, but to hear only one side of a question, is that true democracy?

Today, state-owned television is in direct competition with other information media; that state-owned corporation enjoys tremendous advantages. Its deficits are made up out of the government's budget but, Mr. Speaker, I am asking you, what is the government doing for Canadian weeklies?

Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I want to stress the fact that Bill No. C-116 as proposed by the Postmaster General will inevitably bring about the disappearance of many weeklies and other newspapers which, as I said earlier, are absolutely necessary to keep fully informed Canadians who should not be forced to hear only one side of current events.

The soul and education of the Canadian people should not be distorted by a bill designed to balance a budget.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to reconsider its decision and refer Bill No. C-116 to a standing committee.

[English]

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the purport of which is that the proposed legislation now before this house be referred to a committee of the house for further consideration.

While the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) is to be admired for his efforts to save money and streamline our postal operations it seems to me, sir, that slashing an essential public service is a muddleheaded way of doing things. Though I am extremely pleased the Postmaster General has bowed to the pressures exerted by hon. members on this side of the house and others to abandon his plan to discontinue Saturday deliveries in rural areas, I am unable to support the legislation now before the house.

I have received telegrams from several newspapers in my riding. Among them is a telegram from the St. John's Evening Telegram, the largest newspaper in Newfoundland, and a telegram from the Corner Brook Western Star. Each of these papers draws attention to the seriousness of the legislation as it affects them as well as to the fact that it will cost in excess of $30,000 a year in additional mailing and operational charges. It is reasonable to assume that the additional cost to the newspaper publishers will be passed on to the advertisers and subscribers. The net result will be that the extra charge will end up in the lap of the consumer. God knows, the average wage earner in Canada, particularly in the Atlantic provinces and in my own province of Newfoundland, has pretty well reached the breaking point and I cannot in all conscience subscribe to any legislation which would further aggravate his already critical situation.

• (5:20 p.m.)

In my view the increased rates proposed by the Postmaster General are a cowardly way of increasing taxation. As I have already stated, many of the people in my province are in desperate straits. We already face the highest cost of living in Canada. We already have the highest unemployment rate in Canada. What is even worse, we have the lowest income per capita in Canada. As a Newfoundlander and as a Canadian, how can I in all fairness subscribe to legislation which would have the effect of worsening this critical situation?

In part of my riding, as well as in a great many other areas in Newfoundland, it is impossible to receive television broadcasts. The only contact people have with the outside world is through the newspapers. Their only way of learning what is going on in Ottawa, in Biafra, in Washington or in Viet Nam is, by and large, through the newspapers.

I am charging the government here and now with discrimination in bringing in this legislation. The people who rely on newspapers for their information live for the most part in rural areas and must depend on the mails for delivery. City dwellers are able to go to the corner store, pay their money and pick up the papers they want. But the people in my riding who live in Placentia or Come-By-Chance or Trepassey—I could name hundreds of places—have to rely on the mails for newspaper deliveries. Consequently they are indication of the Prime Minister's just society being discriminated against.

I feel that to shut off a valued service of information to a substantial body of people can only be a disservice to democracy. The present low rates charged for the handling of newspapers are based on the desirability of maintaining an informed electorate, as is, I suppose, the annual subsidy to the C.B.C.-I believe the amount is $140 million—which is by and large a medium of entertainment.

While this problem may not seriously affect the city areas it is a matter of vital concern to thousands of isolated Canadians who, if this legislation is passed, will no longer be able to afford to keep abreast of the times. I suggest that such a policy scarcely becomes a government which has paid a lot of lip service recently to a Canada which does not suffer disparities in services and opportunity.

While I am on this subject let me say I was alarmed to learn the other day that a large number of members of the hon, gentleman's own caucus were not informed of the proposal by the Postmaster General to increase these rates. This is an ironic commentary on the kind of democracy about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke so often during the recent election campaign. I contend that this latest piece of muddleheaded legislation is a further mockery of the Prime Minister's just society and his promise to put an end to regional disparities.

While I am on the subject of regional disparity, may I say I am finding it extremely difficult to contain myself while I wait with bated breath to see what the government has in mind to help less fortunate provinces such as mine.

An hon. Member: Don't hold your breath too long.

Mr. Carter: I am not holding my breath now. I don't think I should because I don't know what will happen.

Up to now this government has done nothing to end regional disparity. Indeed, it has taken measures which widen the gap still further between the have and the have-not provinces. Let me give an example. I feel the house is becoming sick and tired of hearing about the salt rebate and fish generally, but hon. members had better get used to it because they are going to hear me talk a great deal about fish in the next few months. Fish should never leave a bad taste in the mouth. So I shall refer to the salt rebate again and draw attention to it as another and his desire to end regional disparity. I notice that the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Jamieson) is laughing. I hope he is listening to what I am saying because it is very important. Right in the middle of the fishing season this great government which is dedicated to the concept of an end to regional disparity eliminated a program with a dire effect on the people of the Atlantic provinces.

Another action on the part of the government which is making a mockery of the Prime Minister's promise of a just society and an end to regional disparity is the discontinuation of the winter works program. Having served as deputy mayor of the city I now represent in this house, I know for a fact that despite what hon. gentlemen opposite say the discontinuance of this program will have a serious effect on the people of St. John's as, indeed, it will have on people in other areas. There will be Newfoundlanders on relief this winter. Newfoundlanders will have to go begging for relief. They will have to draw unemployment insurance. They will have to humble themselves to get handouts to keep body and soul together as a result of the termination of these two programs which the Prime Minister and his government, the champions of the just society, the champions of an end to regional disparity, have discontinued. Because of this, Newfoundlanders will be hungry, except for government relief and handouts given by other agencies. This is sad.

This legislation is further proof of the government's complete disregard for the conditions that exist in the have-not provinces, especially the province of Newfoundland which I have the honour to represent. If the past two or three months are any indication of the government's desire and plan to end regional disparity I say it is not inconceivable that within a certain period separatism will not be confined to the province of Quebec. It is about time that some special consideration and equal rights were given to the have-not provinces. Especially, sir, do I plead for consideration, for equal status and equal rights for the province of Newfoundland.

I should like to bring the Postmaster General up to date on certain conditions with regard to postal services that exist in my riding. In the heart of the city of St. John's we still have post offices that have not been improved to any great extent since confederation. One of the largest post offices in that city is operating out of a temporary war purpose. The main post office in St. John's sure all hon. members are anxious to get the West is housed in a building that should have been condemned decades ago. I challenge the Postmaster General to come with me some time to St. John's and take a look at some of the postal facilities there. Let him look at the post office in St. John's West and then let him tell me that the service which is been given in that post office, because of its inadequate facilities, justifies an increase in postal rates.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to stress the point I have already made, that the new postal rates will have a serious effect on the people of my province, on the people of the other have-not provinces and, I suppose, on all Canadians. I cannot help but think that the Postmaster General has acted with excessive haste in this matter, and I believe that the difficulties of the post office, which undoubtedly require attention, were aggravated by this summer's settlement with the postal workers.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty as the representative of Moose Jaw constituency to speak out on the amendment now before the house. I support in its entirety the amendment moved by the hon, member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I believe it is most important that this bill be referred to a standing committee for thorough consideration by hon. members.

I realize that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has an obligation with respect to piloting bills through the house, but today I was very much surprised to hear him use blackmail as an attempt to have this post office bill passed in order that we might proceed with the agricultural legislation that has been before the house. I believe it was never the intention of parliament to use this system of manipulating procedures in the house in order to get a bill through that is as completely unacceptable to the Canadian people as is this one.

A news item in the Regina Leader-Post of last Friday reported the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) as suggesting that the opposition is delaying help to the farmers. Now we have the President of the Privy Council suggesting to us that if we pass this bill in a hurry we will be able to return to the cash advance legislation which will assist farmers. This makes me wonder where we are going building that is in no way adequate for the in our present-day democratic society. I am post office bill out of the way, but in a satisfactory manner, and then get on with the agricultural bills which I submit should not have been delayed. I am sure there are segments of our society just as concerned about this bill as those of us from western Canada are concerned about the agricultural bills, and we would be remiss in our duty if we did not give this bill thorough consideration by referring it to a standing committee.

Speaking on the resolution stage of this bill, as recorded at page 928 of Hansard for October 8, the Postmaster General referred to a situation that I believe is completely correct. He suggested that Canada has one of the finest postal services in the world and added:

Nothing in my brief experience as Postmaster General would lead me to any different opinion-

I can concur with that 100 per cent, Mr. Speaker, and I believe every member of this house would concur if they could be certain that it would continue to be the finest postal system in the world.

The Postmaster General went on to pay tribute to the 48,000 men and women who operate the system and said their efforts are worthy of the thanks of every Canadian. I concur with that too. These 48,000 people have provided a service to this country second to none in the world. But if we allow this bill to be passed in its present form the service which the Canadian people have enjoyed as a way of life may deteriorate, and postal employees will no longer take pride in working for the postal division of the federal government.

Farther on in his speech the minister said:

It is evident, therefore, that action must be taken to restore a reasonable cost-revenue relationship, and to provide the funds necessary to ensure that our traditional standard of service will be maintained.

We all appreciate the fact that in this modern day there must be streamlining, but that streamlining should not lead to deterioration of service. Hon. members on the government side must accept full responsibility if they allow this bill to pass without agreeing to refer it to a standing committee where it can be intelligently examined as to its merits.

Our postal service has been good but recently it has deteriorated somewhat. I refer specifically to the sorting of mail as we knew it in the past. A news item in a recent issue of the Moose Jaw Times-Herald was headed, "Railway Arrival Of Mail Being Discontinued." Mail used to be sorted in Moose Jaw is being sent to a city 44 miles to the east and being distributed from there. I am sure hon. members realize that to amalgamate and consolidate all these services in a central location is not good so far as distribution is concerned. There is complete congestion at Regina, and if this is an attempt by the Postmaster General to establish a better system of distribution and sorting I must tell him I think it will be a complete failure.

We all know that there is much congestion at airports. Air travel sometimes takes much longer than train travel, especially with respect to the movement of products from one point to another. It is fine and dandy to say that we can get mail into the air and move it from coast to coast. I agree that to move mail by air from country to country is a logical method of transporting it but I do not agree that mail should be transported solely by air from coast to coast. I have often wondered whether the railways themselves wished to get out of their mail handling contracts or whether the government deliberately put them out of that business by taking those contracts away from them. I hope the Postmaster General will clarify this point when he replies.

I know that on days when the weather conditions are poor out west or any other place the movement of mail by air cannot compete with the movement of mail by rail as I have known it in the past. Once winter conditions arrive, distribution of mail by trucks in the western provinces-and I am sure this applies throughout the whole of Canada—slows down or the mail does not go through. We know that when the mail was handled by rail this was not the situation; the mail always went through. We also know of a situation last week in which it took five days for first class mail to travel from Moose Jaw to Ottawa. I should like the Postmaster General to ascertain whether he can speed up the delivery of first class mail because in the last few years, in my opinion, it has been slow compared with the days of the old stage coaches. I do not believe our method of transportation has improved very much in the last few years in particular.

I do know that in a statement the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), that self-appointed leader of a block of members to the right, has made quite an issue of the so-called free enterprise system. The hon. member suggested it is time to put and distributed from that main centre. Now it postal operations in Canada on a sound, efficient and businesslike basis. I suggest to the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour that if we were to follow the lead he suggests we would not cut services. I do not think there is any private, businesslike operation in this country today that would deliberately cut services to the people it is serving and expect to stay in business. I submit that if the Postmaster General would really take this into consideration he would realize that it is not businesslike to cut services.

Another point brought up by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour appears at page 956 of Hansard. The hon. member suggested there were certain inefficiencies in the postal service but that the Glassco royal commission was highly complimentary of the Canadian postal services. Naturally the commission would be complimentary because the service was and could still be a good service if the bill before us is not accepted. The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour said:

But I am sure I speak for the majority in this house when I say that the minister is to be commended for acting decisively to make one of the world's greatest postal systems even more efficient.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a similar situation in the province of Saskatchewan to which I might refer. At one time the province of Saskatchewan had the best mental health plan in North America; it was considered to be one of the best in the world. People came from all over the world to see this program in operation in Saskatchewan. I suggest that with the advent of a new government in that province this program deteriorated to the extent that a commission is required in order to find out what has happened. I suggest once again that this is exactly what will happen in respect of our postal service unless the Postmaster General takes a close look at the situation and at least delays the passage of this bill until it has been examined in its entirety by a committee. We know that if this is not done it will be necessary to set up a royal commission in order to find out what has happened in respect of our postal system. Today we still have an opportunity to do something about it. I suggest that the logical way to handle this situation is to refer this whole matter to a committee.

I realize there are many things one could say about the merits of this bill. Naturally there are some things in the bill with which we do not disagree. Yet it has been suggested that there is to be a deterioration of the service in order to benefit the people of Canada as a whole. I am sure members of this house do not want to see a service of which we have been proud deteriorate to the extent it is likely to if this legislation is passed in its present form. We know that only before a parliamentary committee can we have a full debate on this bill and an intelligent consideration of it.

I should like to refer briefly to some of the direct implications which I consider are contained in the bill which is before us at this time. We know there are many labour and other periodicals and publications which are caught in the cross-fire when the big advertisers and promoters who have been subsidized by the taxpayers too long are being clipped. I do not suggest there is no need for some review but I do suggest that whenever there is a cure it generally is the public who pay the shot. I am referring to trade union and medical publications, for instance, many of which carry no advertising. Church publications and many other publications mentioned by hon. members receive no revenue through advertising.

It is my belief that such publications should be given a postal rate different from that which applies to publications that derive considerable revenue from the advertising contained in them. There should be some allowance or consideration given to any publication which provides a direct service to the people but derives no return from advertising. I am sure no one would disagree that a direct service to the public is the utmost we expect to have in an educated democratic society. It has been pointed out very well by many other speakers that in order to have a democratic society there must be people who participate. One who plans to participate must have the knowledge and material before he can participate in a particular area.

I agree that some of these matters could be left in the hands of the Postmaster General as in the past in respect of certain mail. However, I am sure that the bill before us is too rigid. There should be some leniency in respect of granting concessions to certain publications. In some respects there may not be too much wrong with the bill, although there are certain points with which I do not agree. I feel sure there must be relief from some of the statutory provisions contained in the bill. I believe this is something even hon. members opposite would give consideration to.

I know suggestions have been made that if this bill is allowed to pass in its present form it will mean an increase of 500 per cent—

[Mr. Skoberg.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Moose Jaw wishes to adjourn the debate. It is moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house that the debate be now adjourned?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that we are having royal assent and then proceeding with other business of eight o'clock, I believe there is a general dispensation—disposition—in the house not to proceed with private members' hour this evening. If Your Honour finds there is general agreement, perhaps this could be done on the understanding that all motions would preserve their place on the order paper and also that this hour would be saved for the house as a further private members' hour.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I would rather agree to a general disposition than to a general dispensation.

Mr. Speaker: Is this the desire of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be discussed at the time of adjournment this evening are as follows: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin)—National Health and Welfare—inquiry as to possible participation of federal government in a campaign against alcoholism; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Fisheries—inquiry as to deficiency payments; the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan)—Management of Canada's Fishing Resources—continental shelf.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

The Budget-Mr. Benson

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (5:50 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An act respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta by Canadian National Railway Company from the vicinity of Windfall on the Windfall extension to the Sangudo subdivision of the Canadian National Railway in a westerly direction for a distance of approximately 51 miles to the Bigstone property of Pan American Petroleum Corporation and of a connecting spur extending in a northerly direction for a distance of approximately 9 miles to the South Kaybob property of Hudson's Bay Oil & Gas Company Limited and its associates.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon, E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour and a serious responsibility to present the first budget to this new twenty-eighth parliament of Canada. The government and its strong parliamentary majority have come into office with many new ideas and a desire to look at our problems with a fresh perspective. We have, however, many major commitments. These restrict our freedom of innovation and make it necessary for us to work out our new ideas over time.

I have much to report and to propose in this budget and therefore will not attempt a comprehensive review of our financial affairs and policies tonight. The budget white paper, tabled last Wednesday, provides material on our public accounts for 1967-68, and on the economic and financial conditions prevailing in Canada and elsewhere as of the time when it was prepared. I shall refer occasionally to this paper but I shall try not to weary the house with repetition of detail. In particular I do not propose to comment upon the accounts for 1967-68.

Current Economic Setting

The current economic setting for this budget has been set forth in part I of the White Paper. The Canadian economy continues the expansion that began in 1961, that ran to excess in 1965 and 1966, that slowed down in adjusting for these excesses in 1967, and that has accelerated moderately again this year. We are in a period of widespread prosperity, but it is prosperity with problems. The increase this year in production, in national income, in exports, in housing investment, and in industrial productivity has been encouraging. On the other hand, we are troubled both by the extent of unemployment and by the rate at which prices are increasing. Our balance of trade has been better than expected, but our capital markets continue to be subject to serious strains. These are reflected not only in high interest rates but in problems for many borrowers and for those who sell securities.

In the international economic field, we have in recent years made great advances in freeing trade. We are still engaged in implementing agreements by legislative action. Tonight I shall lay before you some 200 pages of tariff items which implement our part of these international arrangements, together with a resolution asking approval for a new bill on anti-dumping duty which will follow consideration of our white paper on this subject by a committee of this house. These are important and constructive measures. Together with related action by others, they should widen the markets and improve the productivity of Canadian industry. They should also provide to Canadian consumers the benefits of increased competition in domestic markets.

In monetary matters, the period under review has been one of many difficulties but has ended upon a most constructive note. For years the Canadian government, with other western governments, has been working out a plan to supplement gold and foreign exchange balances with new forms of international liquid reserves that could be expanded in accord with the needs of world trade and other transactions. After considerable debate this has now been achieved. Parliament will be asked to approve amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to carry out our part in these new and encouraging arrangements.

• (8:10 p.m.)

completed several major crises occurred dur-markets. Sterling was devalued. There was a prolonged crisis in gold markets which was only resolved by the working out of a new two price system for gold as well as by more stringent measures by the U.S. to safeguard and improve its balance of payments position.

During this period of stress in the international financial markets last winter there was a short but very sharp run on the Canadian dollar, despite an unusually strong position in Canada's current account balance of payments at that time. We were in danger of being forced into an inappropriate devaluation of our currency, which would have brought higher prices and costs to the Canadian economy and the Canadian consumer. Our position was strengthened by monetary and fiscal measures taken at that time. We were fortunate in being able to get from international institutions and from friendly monetary authorities and governments the temporary assistance that we needed to sustain us during this crisis. We also were able to work out with the United States Treasury arrangements which enabled us to safeguard our vital unrestricted access to the U.S. capital market while not endangering or worsening the U.S. balance of payments position. Subsequently we have been able to borrow substantial sums in Italy, in Germany, and in the United States to assist us in restoring our exchange reserves.

Medium Term Outlook

In looking ahead through the prospective life of this Parliament, we can be optimistic regarding both the resources that will be available to sustain vigorous growth in the Canadian economy and the markets that will be available for what we produce. We have a labour force that is growing more rapidly than that of any other industrial country. It is also increasingly well educated and trained for work in modern jobs. Our natural resources are the envy of others and the basis of much of our industry and wealth. We have a large industrial capacity, much of it now relatively modern and little of it in serious excess. We have access to a large supply of savings within Canada, since we save a high proportion of our income by comparison with others. Fortunately we also enjoy a preferred position in securing international capi-Before these new arrangements could be tal, both direct investment associated with modern management, and loan capital in ing the past year in the international financial large amounts. At the same time we can look forward to demands for large scale investment by business in new plant and equipment, growing needs in housing and urban development, and the continued expansion of useful social capital, including hospitals, schools and universities. There should be no dearth of demand during the next four years.

We do face serious problems, however, in organizing our economic advance and expansion, in managing it and in financing it. Both in our public and private activities these tasks are going to require the best brains and work that Canadians can devote to them. Great economic advance is open to us but only if we manage our affairs well.

Short Term Outlook

The outlook for the remainder of 1968 and for next year is discussed in general terms in the first few pages of the White Paper. Conditions in the United States have as usual had a most important influence upon our affairs. This has been true both in the financial markets, where their high interest rates and shortage of capital have affected us directly, and in their markets for our products. Our exports, assisted by the automotive agreements, increased very rapidly early this year. Now that the United States has put into effect its new fiscal policy, approved by Congress in June, we must expect a moderation in their pace of expansion and, we hope, in the rate of price increases which are associated with

In our internal affairs we expect to see continued strength in the sustaining forces of our economy. Business investment in Canada has begun to increase again after the pause of 1967 and I look for a significant advance next year. Expenditures on housing in Canada have risen substantially during this year and should continue to expand significantly in 1969, when demand will be strong and when we would expect more mortgage funds to be available. The market for consumption goods and services in Canada has also been strong this year. Looking ahead, we can expect to see further gains in consumer expenditure in real terms, though perhaps at a more moderate rate in money terms if we can succeed in moderating the rise in prices, costs and money incomes in accordance with our antiinflationary policy. The generally bouyant outlook, however, is marred by regional problems, particularly those now faced by the prairie farmers and the relative lack of employment opportunities in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

I now expect to see a level of gross national product and gross national expenditures this calendar year of approximately \$67 billion, or about 8 per cent over the \$62 billion achieved in 1967. Of this increase, a larger proportion than was the case last year, say about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, should be in real terms, while the average increase in prices reflected in the G.N.P. may average out around $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent as compared to about 4 per cent last year. This is a modest improvement in price performance though it clearly cannot be regarded as satisfactory.

I will not endeavor to put a precise figure to my expectations for 1969 at this very early stage, but in considering the budgetary position for next year I have had to form some views. I should say that over-all we might expect a somewhat better price performance and about the same increase in volume as this year. This implies a growth in G.N.P. from 1968 to 1969 of something between 7 and 8 per cent. I think we shall continue to face a situation where both the level of unemployment in some areas and the rate of increase in prices will continue to give us concern.

Current Fiscal Position

I turn now to review our current fiscal position. The last budget was that of November 30th, 1967, in which my colleague, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, was confronted, as I have been since, with difficult problems in the financial markets. He proposed some tax increases and stated the government's intentions to limit its expenditures this year to $10,300 million, apart from medicare, and to limit its demands on the capital market this fiscal year (apart from requirements to finance foreign exchange purchases) to less than $750 million. Those proposals would have just about balanced the budget this year. Subsequently the proposed revenue measures were not approved by Parliament and had to be changed, which has reduced our prospective revenues. While we succeeded in imposing a vigorous restraint upon those expenditure programs which are within direct control of the government, we substantially underestimated the growth in our expenditures under certain statutory obligations and particularly in several large federal-provincial programs.

• (8:20 p.m.)

After reviewing the reports from the Treasury Board that I have received and taking into account as best we can the supplemenliament, I estimate our total expenditures this year will be $10,780 million, about 4½ per cent higher than our original intention. I now estimate our revenue this year-before taking in the tax changes I am proposing-will turn out to be approximately $10,050 million. This would leave a substantial deficit of $730 million. These figures do not include any writeoff of our share of the Expo deficit, which involves no cash expenditure and which will be the subject of legislation later in this session. This deficit of Expo has been financed in earlier years and we are now recovering a part of the cost from Quebec.

Our extra-budgetary accounts this fiscal year have been complicated by the rundown in our exchange reserves late in the last fiscal year and their restoration in recent months. Early in 1968 the rundown of our exchange reserves produced a temporary swelling of our cash balances—a situation which made it possible and desirable to postpone borrowing during the latter part of last fiscal year. Apart from foreign exchange operations, our loans and investments this year have been a bit less than expected, though in the housing field the slower than expected demand by provincial and local authorities for loans for public and other institutional housing has made it possible to provide a winter program of direct loans for owner-occupied housing. This program will not only help to meet a real need but will also provide a direct stimulus to employment.

Apart from the financing of exchange, our net extra-budgetary requirements for cash during this fiscal year I now forecast at $600 million. This must be added to the budgetary deficit in assessing our total cash requirements, including those being met by reducing our cash balances.

In regard to exchange we have had to utilize $490 million Canadian since April 1st up to the end of last month in order to finance our net purchases of foreign exchange in the market which is evidence of the recovery in strength of the Canadian dollar. This has been added to our reserves. The government has also borrowed the equivalent of $US 234 million outside Canada to be added to our reserves during this period. Part of these new foreign exchange resources has of course been used to pay off in full the short-term international obligations incurred during the exchange crisis.

[Mr. Benson.]

To meet the large Canadian cash requiretary estimates we must still place before Par- ments this year we have been able to draw down the abnormally large balances we had at April 1st-$997 million-mainly arising from the sale of U.S. dollars during the exchange crisis. In addition we have had to borrow very substantial sums, by issues of marketable bonds at June 15th, August 1st and October 1st, by the sale of the special replacement issue of Canada Savings Bonds in May, mainly to refund in advance the large issue maturing this year but also in part providing cash, and by increasing the volume of sales of Treasury Bills. The proceeds of these issues, together with our cash balances, have been used: first, to refund maturing issues; secondly, to meet the very large net redemptions of Canada Savings Bonds (amounting to $556 million up to October 16 this fiscal year); thirdly, to purchase exchange in the market; and, finally, to meet our current budgetary and extra-budgetary requirements. To October 16 this fiscal year we have borrowed $428 million on balance in the Canadian market after taking into account refundings and redemptions both of marketable obligations and of Canada Savings Bonds.

> Our objective in the current Canada Savings Bond campaign is a record sale which will raise a large amount of cash during November. The terms are very attractive in comparison with earlier Series and with other investment possibilities. This savings bond is an excellent investment through which Canadians in all walks of life can conveniently and profitably put their money to work in furthering their own interests and the national interest through the financing of important constructive programs such as housing; nuclear power is another example, and of course farm credit. To achieve a broad placement of the new Series of Canada Savings Bonds, a vigorous effort is underway from coast to coast by a large and experienced payroll savings organization, by the banks and other financial institutions and by investment dealers and stockbrokers. This effort is backed by a first class advertising campaign using all major media. The attractive terms will prompt many holders to convert earlier Series into the new Series. To cover these rollovers and to produce a large amount of cash will require a gross sale during the campaign period in excess of the previous record established in 1966. I believe our savings bond organization is mounting the best operation of its kind in the western world and I look forward to its success as a major element in our financing program this year.

Mr. Harkness: What is your estimate of the amount of money involved?

Mr. Benson: We will need to borrow in the market again before this fiscal year is over in order to refund maturing debt and possibly to raise some additional cash as well but the total of such marketable financing will depend importantly on the outcome of the Savings Bond campaign.

1969-70 Fiscal Outlook

It is difficult to forecast our position in the next fiscal year at such an early date as this, yet I feel I must make some effort to do so in order to develop the tax proposals that I think it is necessary to place before you tonight.

We intend to continue severe restraint upon those direct expenditure programs under the government's control, eliminating what is obsolete and permitting only the degree of growth that is essential. We shall have to resist requests by members on both sides of the house, and from groups and individuals outside, to spend money for worthy purposes which we cannot afford to do along with the other things we are doing. It will also be necessary to maintain a virtual freeze on the size of the public service of Canada. We shall also seek the vigorous cooperation of the provincial governments in the same kind of restraint upon the growth of the jointly financed expenditure programs under their control. Even those programs which we and they agree deserve priority must be carried out with maximum economy, and with a keen eye to what is really essential.

On this basis I am now forecasting budgetary expenditures in the next fiscal year at approximately $11,670 million, including medicare expenditures on the assumption that all provinces will take advantage of the Medical Care Act. This would be an increase of $890 million, of which about $335 million would be for medicare—leaving an increase of less than 5½ percent for all other expenditures. Revenues for next year—before the tax changes I am now proposing or those that may arise from our tax reform program next year-can be estimated at about $10,830 million, a growth of approximately 74 percent over the current year. This takes into account a variety of special factors as well as general economic growth.

We must of course keep in mind the loans and investments to be made next year, as well as our expenditures, in assessing the nature and scale of our fiscal problems. Our detailed budgets in this field are not yet decided. By far the largest element in this total is housing. The capital budget for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation next year should reflect the conclusions of the government after it receives the views of the special task force headed by my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer). It will also include farm credit as a major element, where we must endeavor to take into account the extent to which demands can be met from the banks and other institutional lenders. The revision of the Farm Improvement Loans Act will help in this regard. In addition of course we have a wide variety of loans and investments for nuclear and other special power projects, for the Seaway and Air Canada, the Canadian National Railways and other crown agencies, and for foreign aid and export credits. I would expect the total to be something of the same general level as this year, and partly offset by receipts of cash from outside the budget (from employee pension funds and other accounts for example). The net extra-budgetary requirement for cash would appear likely to be of the order of $600 or $700 million, excluding what may be required for foreign exchange purposes.

These extra-budgetary requirements are demands that we would normally aim to meet by borrowing. At the level indicated, however, they alone will pre-empt most or all of what we should expect to borrow next year in competition with other borrowers in the capital and credit markets.

Control of Public Expenditure

Our experience this past year, and the prospects next year, force us all to recognize the central problem of the control of public expenditures in Canada today. This is a problem that confronts not only the parliament of Canada but also the legislatures of the provinces and the Councils of the municipalities. The past decade has witnessed a very rapid increase in the scale of public expenditures at all levels, and particularly by provinces and municipalities. I will not endeavor to give detailed figures to the house at this point, but we may note briefly that expenditures by all governments as recorded in our national economic accounts have risen from $8.7 billion in 1957 to $21.2 billion in 1967. Of this increase of $12.5 billion some $8.4 billion has been in provincial and municipal final expenditures. Federal transfer payments to provinces, of course, have increased very rapidly to help meet this growth. When these transfers are eliminated, the increase in federal expenditures for its own direct programs over this period has been $4 billion. In 1957 they were 15.1 percent of the G.N.P. By 1967 they had fallen to 14.3 percent of the G.N.P.

It is well known that several large programs that we finance jointly with provincial governments are those that have been found most difficult to control. These include notably the program commenced in 1967 whereby we have provided tax abatements, equalization payments, and direct cash adjustment payments under the Fiscal Arrangements Act to assist the provinces in meeting the costs of university and other post-secondary education. Included in these shareable costs are large sums spent for senior matriculation courses in secondary schools, such as grade 13 in Ontario. Our assistance for such education amounts to one half of the total operating expenditures in the provinces, including those financed by student fees or other sources. These costs are now increasing at an annual rate of about 20 percent, and our adjustment payments must be expected to rise very rapidly to reflect this phenomenal expansion.

The other most rapidly expanding program is hospital insurance, where the current rate of cost increases exceeds 15 percent despite the fact that the program is now well established and reasonably mature. Payments for general welfare purposes under the Canada Assistance Plan are large, but they are not subject to such rapid built-in cost increases and do not cause as much concern. Medicare of course will quickly become a large joint program and will involve growing expenditures for us as well as for the provinces for some time. However, in view of the substantial increases in medical fee schedules in recent years, the new medicare program should not run into cost increases as large as those of hospital insurance, for example. We should note that new government expenditures for medical care will be mainly replacing payments by individuals for the same purpose or payments made through existing private or public plans. Only a fraction of the cost will constitute an increasing demand upon the economy, but the result should be a fairer and more efficient system of assuring health care for all Canadians regardless of income.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At last the government is beginning to realize this.

Mr. Benson:

Discussions with the Provinces

The effective management of all these major services is a matter for the provinces. It is in the mutual interest of all the governments and of the people of Canada to ensure that expenditures under these very important programs are made economically and in accordance with sound judgments as to priorities and rates of growth, taking into account the burdens they place on the taxpayers as well as the objectives of the programs themselves. I plan to meet with the treasurers and finance ministers of the provinces early in November to discuss these questions. I expect that in reviewing this health field we will be joined by our colleagues, the ministers of health who will also be meeting here at the same time. We will consider whether some intensive work should be put in hand on a broad basis to apply modern systems analysis and operational research to improving the efficiency with which health services and facilities are provided to the people of Canada.

In the field of higher education there is the same need for economy and efficiency but one must also take into account major issues of policy. These, of course, are matters of provincial responsibility. The universities and other educational institutions face increasing problems of their own, and we are all more conscious of them now than ever before. Provincial governments are responsible for the evolution of the laws and institutions for higher education. We have no desire to interfere at all in this difficult and delicate responsibility, where each of our provinces will wish to see its institutions develop in a way that suits its own conditions. Our main conof growth involved. In 1965-66 our contribucern in 1966 and 1967 was to ensure that the provinces had additional financial means at their disposal to help meet the abnormally rapid increase in requirements during the current period for the expansion of universities and other post-secondary educational institutions. We recognized this priority, although we have been surprised at the extreme rate tion to the support of higher education, including the special tax abatement to Quebec, amounted to about $40 million. This year the equivalent fiscal transfer and cash payments to the provinces are estimated at about $500 million—over twelve times what they were three years ago.

As the Prime Minister has already indicated, we anticipate that provinces will wish to discuss with us questions related to medicare. We shall be quite prepared to discuss them. We hope that all the provinces will take advantage of that act at the first opportunity. We continue to believe that the provision of medical care services as a publicly financed operation is a matter of high priority in the development of proper health and social services for Canadians.

• (8:40 p.m.)

This government and this House recognize the financial problems being faced by all the provinces—even the wealthiest of them, which is the most outspoken on the subject. Between 1962 and 1967 we reduced the federal personal income tax to make way for the provinces to enlarge their use of this revenue field from 16 percentage points to 28 percentage points. We are now helping all provinces with substantial participation in meeting the cost of broad services in the fields of health, welfare and higher education, and particularly in rapidly growing programs in fields of highest priority. We are giving major assistance to the provinces with less than average taxable capacity by our equalization grants. We are providing hundreds of millions a year in housing finance to provincial and local agencies under the National Housing Act. All the many hundreds of millions of dollars we collect in contributions under the Canada Pension Plan, in excess of current pension payments, are loaned immediately to the provinces. Parliament has proven with action its concern for the financial needs of the provinces. We can legitimately expect recognition by them of our problems, and of the needs for expenditures on national programs for which we as a parliament are responsible.

Emphasis in Economic Policy

Before turning to our immediate fiscal policy and the details of proposed tax measures, it is essential to consider the over-all framework of general economic policy for 1969 and to determine its main emphasis. Needless to say, we shall continue to work toward all the broad goals which are widely accepted in western industrial countries—full employment, economic growth, price stability, balance in external payments, and an equitable sharing of rising incomes.

These general goals comprehend many speket system. A flexible price system cannot cific objectives—the training and mobility of operate properly to allocate resources for 29180—1074 labour, the improvement of productivity, increasing economic efficiency through more vigorous competition, the freeing of international trade, the reduction of regional disparities, the elimination of poverty-indeed, almost all the economic and social virtues we can think of. But the real problem in public policy comes in being specific, in reconciling conflicting objectives, in making choices among competing demands, in deciding how much of each to pursue, and of course in knowing how to do it all effectively and efficiently. There are far more good things to be done in Canada, particularly by governments, than there are resources available to do them.

We are doing a great deal, and will do more next year, in pursuit of all the goals and objectives I have mentioned. Not the least of our efforts, I would emphasize, are the many services and programs to deal effectively, constructively and humanely with poverty. But we cannot do everything at once. Rather, we must try to advance on as broad and balanced a front as possible, and we must be ready at all times to face up to the most urgent priorities among all of our objectives.

Resisting Inflation

In the broad field of economic policy the most urgent need now is to check further the continuing increase in prices and living costs. There appears to have been some easing of inflationary pressure in recent months. But there is little evidence that the damaging upward spiral of prices and costs has been effectively broken. Further, unless our policies are firmly set to resist inflation, there is great danger that continued prosperity in 1969 will cause pressures that will set in train a new round of price and cost increases.

I want to emphasize that a rapid rise in the price level, on the scale experienced in recent years, has many serious and damaging effects. Firstly, it is most unfair to those in our society, mainly the older people and the poor among us, who do not possess the bargaining power necessary to protect themselves against the increase in the cost of living. There is no doubt that recent and current inflation is hurting many more than the number who suffer from unemployment. Secondly, rapid price increases undermine the whole basis of our economic structure and competitive market system. A flexible price system cannot operate properly to allocate resources for maximum production and income unless the price level as a whole is reasonably stable. Thirdly, serious inflation erodes gradually but surely the competitive position of Canadian producers, both in other countries with whom we must trade and in our own markets at home. And fourthly, it makes people, and the institutions through whom they invest their money, increasingly reluctant to lend money except at high interest rates and in decreasing amounts. Yet the growth and development of our economy requires the large scale investment of savings in the form of mortgages and bonds fixed in terms of money. These securities are the only means open to homeowners, school boards, municipalities and governments to borrow funds needed for housing and for all the public purposes essential in our modern society. Unlike large corporations, none of these borrowers can sell equity shares, but their increasing role in the capital markets means that even a moderate degree of inflation poses a larger problem than ever before.

We should not delude ourselves into thinking the choice is between either policies of fiscal ease to counter unemployment or policies of fiscal restraint to fight inflation. In our present circumstances, unchecked inflation would precipitate the kind of economic disruption in which unemployment would surely increase and we would end up with more of both of these evils.

Achieving greater stability in our price level requires action on many fronts. Our fiscal policy must avoid excess demand on production and markets, and keep producers constantly aware of the need to compete vigorously and to prevent cost increases. We need to exercise a wider responsibility to promote competition and minimize restraints on trade. Management must do all it can to improve efficiency and productivity. Workers and governments must cooperate to ensure better training and mobility of the labour force. Business and governments must anticipate bottlenecks and shortages and plan production and demands to minimize them in every way possible. Over the long term the provinces must plan and provide better education. Finally, we must, I feel, do all we can to persuade those who enjoy strong market power to exercise it with due restraint, taking the public interest fully into account. This will require the use of public education, special inquiries into inflationary situations, and the mobilizing of public opinion against practices and actions which endanger the maintenance of price stability in our country.

I expect that my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will have something more to say on plans and measures to combat inflationary cost increases when he participates in the Budget debate. The list I have already given, Mr. Speaker, makes quite a catalogue. Nevertheless they are all measures which Canadians, working together can achieve. Most of them are desirable in themselves, but they should now be given particular attention and focused upon preventing further increases in the cost of living.

Current Fiscal Strategy

In deciding on over-all fiscal strategy for 1968 and '69 we must take into account both the financial prospects I have described and the broad economic situation I have outlined. After doing so we have reached the conclusion that we must raise substantially more revenues in order to bring the budget into balance in 1969-70.

By such action we will be contributing to the restoration of price stability, while at the same time giving support to the economy through investment programs in housing, farm credit and other economic fields. We will be limiting our demands on the capital market to non-inflationary amounts to be used for capital purposes. The provinces and municipalities on their part will be investing one way or another the large funds we turn over to them from the Canada Pension Plan, and borrowing in the market to finance public works and their other lending and investment programs. In accordance with the practice of recent years I shall be meeting at the end of the year with the provincial finance ministers to review the current economic situation and prospects, to assess the impact on the economy of our over-all public financial position, and to consider what are appropriate fiscal policies in this light. I believe however that the general strategy I have proposed is the best one for the federal government in the present circumstances.

Tax Recommendations

In selecting the tax changes to be made to implement this policy I am mindful of the tax reform program which the government proposes to initiate next winter. I have been over with my officials the conclusions which they have reached from a long and comprehensive review of our income tax laws, the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation and the scores of briefs and hundreds of letters which we have received on the subject. After further thought I have reached certain decisions which I have asked my officers to set forth in the form of a draft bill, which I will place before my colleagues for their approval or modification. It is this draft, suitably revised and explained, which will be placed before the house, provincial ministers, and the public for detailed study and discussion early in the new year. It would then be reconsidered and revised by the government for final consideration by the house in the latter part of 1969. By that means I hope we can have a reformed income tax in effect in 1970.

The tax recommendations which I am making tonight are not an integral part of next year's reform package. By that I mean that they stand on their own and should be implemented, whether or not there is to be any further reform. They do not commit us to particular changes in other areas.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Estate Tax and Gift Tax

The first group of recommendations concerns the Estate Tax and the Gift Tax. I have come to the conclusion that transfers of property at death and by gift should not, at least for the present, be included in income like other items that have normally been regarded as income of a recurring nature. While respecting the intellectual coherence and elegance of the case made by the Royal Commission on Taxation on this matter -crudely summed up in the phrase that "a buck is a buck is a buck"-I believe that the overwhelming weight of Canadian opinion is against it now, and many Canadian practices and institutions would be seriously disrupted if we embraced this proposal. Instead, I propose that the estate and gift taxes continue to be levied on the transferor and that they be reformed along different lines.

I am proposing that in respect of deaths after midnight tonight we exempt all amounts left outright to a widow by her husband, and to a widower by his wife. Perhaps I should make it absolutely clear that this estate tax exemption includes pension and annuity benefits. Further, if a husband leaves the entire life interest in a trust to his wife, the assets in that trust will be excluded from his estate, but included in hers, and vice versa. With this reform, we will recognize the contribution made by wives to the accumulation and conservation of the wealth of the family. It will eliminate a deeply felt grievance.

There would also be a $10,000 exemption in respect of the amount left to each child, and additional exemptions for younger children depending on age and income, and for children wholly dependent because of disability. Finally there would be a general exemption of $20,000 to eliminate or reduce the tax on small estates to whomever they may be willed.

I propose that the loss of revenue arising from this long awaited reform of the exemption structure be made up by raising the rates on the rest of the estate. The schedule of rates is set forth in the table included in the resolution: they range from 15 percent at the bottom to 50 percent at the top. The value of taxable gifts made after tonight will, on the donor's death, affect the rates in the tax schedule that are applied to the taxable value of his estate. In effect, taxable gifts made after tonight will use up part of the low rate brackets in the Estate Tax rate schedule.

It is difficult to predict accurately the revenue effects of changes in estate taxes but I have aimed at maintaining the same total over-all revenue while permitting the transmission of property between husband and wife without tax.

It will be recalled that since 1964 the provinces have enjoyed three-quarters of the revenue from the estate tax—either by payment from the federal treasury or by abatement in their favour. I do not propose that this be changed. We recognize the special interest of the provinces in this field of taxation but believe that parliament should keep a share in it for its indirect benefits in the enforcing of the Income Tax Act as well as its direct benefits in revenue. There are some transmissions of property that cannot be taxed by laws within provincial jurisdiction.

I propose that we amend certain of the special statutory rules about situs of property in order to bring the federal rules more in line with those used for purposes of provincial succession duties. I intend to discuss with provincial ministers other means of achieving greater uniformity and simplicity in the laws concerning death duties and their application.

As for the gift tax, effective tonight the exemptions and the rates will be changed, and the new rate schedule will apply progressively to the cumulative total of all future taxable gifts made by the donor.

Straightforward gifts between husband and wife will be completely exempt. Gifts to other individuals will be exempt up to $2,000 per annum for each recipient. There will be no exemption for gifts to trusts or corporations. The present exemption for gifts to registered charities will be continued, as will the oncein-a-lifetime exemption of $10,000 in respect of a gift of a farm by the farmer to his child. The other present exemptions, including that based on income after tax, will be dropped.

The rates of gift tax would range from 12 percent on the cumulative total of taxable gifts until $15,000 is reached, up to a maximum rate of 75 percent on gifts when the cumulative total exceeds $200,000. This 75 percent means in effect a tax rate of threesevenths or about 43 percent, on the total of the gift and the tax on it, the basis on which we normally think of income and estate taxes.

It will be evident to the honourable members that, if the gift tax rate changes were not effective immediately, taxpayers could take advantage of any interim period to make abnormally large gifts before the new cumulative system begins. I believe that members will also agree that the estate tax changes should be made effective immediately so as to exempt property passing to widows on deaths after midnight tonight.

Life Insurance Companies

My second group of proposals concerns the life insurance companies and their policyholders. At present, the business incomes of life insurance companies are largely exempt from tax: the companies are taxed only on the amounts appropriated for shareholders during the year. This is usually only a small fraction of the total business income of the shareholder-owned companies, and of course it produces no taxable income at all for the mutual companies, which now I should point out, dominate the industry, or for the fraternal benefit societies.

I am proposing that we introduce special rules to recognize the problems that arise in measuring income in the life insurance industry, but that, with the exception of these special rules, the general provisions of the Income Tax Act apply to this industry just as they do to all others.

One of the special rules will deal with the deductions from income permitted in order to provide the policy reserves needed to meet future liabilities under policies of insurance. The details of the computation of these reserves will be set out in regulations, and the industry will be consulted in the course of in mind that we would use, in computing the reserves against the various classes of policies, the same interest assumption that is implicit in the tables of cash surrender values.

Policy dividends will be deductible, provided they are paid out of the profits of the participating fund.

• (9:00 p.m.)

All of this will apply only to the Canadian operations of the corporations. The usual rules for determining the profits of a branch of a company will apply except that we will provide by regulation for the computation of the portion of their investment income which is attributable to their Canadian operations.

For Canadian companies, the income producing assets that will be treated as Canadian will be proportionate to the part of their over-all actuarial reserves that relate to Canadian business. This will bring a reasonable portion of their investment income into Canadian taxable income, and at the same time, it will not penalize those companies which choose to keep most of their assets in Canada.

For non-resident companies, the incomeproducing assets that will be treated as Canadian as of January 1, 1969 will be those required to be kept in Canada in accordance with the rules of the Superintendent of Insurance. The income from other Canadian assets of these companies will continue to be subject only to withholding taxes. I want to emphasize that there is nothing in these recommendations to cause these companies to withdraw funds from Canada, nor is there anything to deter them from investing more in Canada.

For the future, the income-producing assets of these companies will be increased by the amounts derived from the Canadian operations, and reduced by the value of the assets which they choose to transfer to withholdingtax status. We will apply our 15 percent branch tax only to these transfers.

It is essential as well, I believe, in terms of equity between those who save in the form of insurance policies and those who save in other forms, to levy some tax on the investment income which policyholders receive through the insurance companies, either in the form of policy dividends or otherwise. The Royal Commission proposed valuing these elements of investment income each year—whether or not received directly by the preparing these regulations. However, I have policyholder-and taxing them directly to him. We have worked out a much simpler and more practical method which should achieve substantially similar equity.

In order to tax those elements of investment income actually received by the policyholder before he dies, either through cashing in his policy or selling it, we propose to include in his taxable income the proceeds of the policy less the net amount he has paid for it. In most cases his cost would be premiums less dividends. For policies already in existence the taxpayer could use as his cost to date the cash surrender value on the next anniversary date of the policy. This will ensure that this tax applies only to investment income earned after today.

The regulations which define the taxable element of annuity payments will be amended so that they are consistent with this treatment of insurance policies. Again, the change will not affect the treatment of interest earned before today.

This will bring to tax the amounts withdrawn by policyholders. There is no comparable simple and practical method of taxing in the policyholders' hands the investment income which benefits them by way of reduced premiums or increased policy dividends. Consequently I am proposing that we levy a 15 percent tax on part of the investment income of insurance companies. This will take the place of a tax on the individual policyholders. I will not attempt to give all of the details of the computation of taxable investment income: they are set out in the resolution. However, I would like to mention that there are several deductions from total investment income to arrive at taxable investment income, including deductions to recognize that some policies are in respect of registered pension plans, and a deduction to recognize the special situation with respect to outstanding non-participating policies.

Since this tax will reduce the investment income available to the companies, it will be a deduction in arriving at taxable income.

I have tried to assess the effects of these taxes on the Canadian life insurance industry. Clearly they will reduce its annual accumulation of income in general contingency reserves—which is as it ought to be, for these are business profits not now being taxed. The tax on investment income may cause a moderate increase in the premium rates in the future, or at least in the net cost after policy dividends, of new policies and it may cause a moderate reduction in the policy dividends to be paid in future on many outstanding participating policies.

On balance however the gain in revenue to us and to the provinces and the gain in equity in treating different channels of savings more fairly would outweigh the disadvantages. The life insurance industry in Canada, both foreign and domestic and those who invest in it will be taxed fairly by comparison with other industries and financial institutions. It will be taxed more logically I believe than that industry is taxed in other countries. including the United States. The industry is already having to adjust to changing conditions and market preferences, and I believe this new tax regime—which should remove the uncertainty about taxes which has been hanging over the industry for years—will speed that process. It could lead to new combinations of basic insurance protection and savings in various forms, perhaps making more effective use of the provisions for registered retirement savings plans.

Estimating the revenue yield from these taxes on life insurance companies and withdrawals is somewhat hazardous but I believe that for the next fiscal year the total revenue yield would be about $95 million, of which about $40 million would come from the indirect tax on investment income. About $10 million would be provincial revenue.

I also propose that non-resident companies carrying on a general insurance business in Canada (that is other than life insurance) will include in Canadian taxable income the investment income attributable to their Canadian operations. This will be the income flowing from the assets related to the Canadian branch computed in the same manner as for non-resident life companies; other Canadian investment income of such companies would continue to be subject only to withholding tax. This will correct a discrimination against Canadian companies carrying on such business here, but will not impede the investment in Canada of reserves against insurance risks elsewhere.

Reserves of Financial Institutions

I have reviewed the reserves allowed to financial institutions for tax purposes in the light of the Report of the Royal Commission on Taxation. As a result, I propose now to reduce the limits both for mortgage lenders and for banks and those cases where the reserves are not determined by a detailed appraisal of individual accounts but on the basis of a general percentage applied to large categories, which is the normal practice.

In view of the loss experience of mortage lenders over the past twenty years, I am proposing to reduce the limit in section 85G of the Income Tax Act from 3 percent of the outstanding total of non-NHA mortgages to 1½ percent. I am prepared to entertain alternative practical proposals to differentiate between mortgages of different type or quality as the Carter Commission proposed, but I have not myself yet found a formula that seemed better than a single percentage when account is taken of the problems of reporting and assessment.

For banks, I am also proposing a limit of 1½ percent applied to the total of the assets that are now eligible to be included in computing reserves. This will represent a cutback of approximately one half from the present level of reserves. I am not persuaded that more elaborate formulas, of the types suggested by the Royal Commission on Taxation, are necessary; but I am prepared to consider alternatives as long as they lead to comparable aggregate results.

The existing reserves of some of these financial institutions, built up over many years, are substantially larger than this new formula would provide. This mainly applies to the banks. The Royal Commission recommended that transitional arrangements extending up to ten years would be appropriate for the gradual adjustment of the reserves to the new limits. I propose that such a transition be authorized. As long as the reserves exceed the limit set by the 11 percent formula they would not be increased. The limit on the reserves for each institution would be reduced year by year on a cumulative basis in such a way as to reduce the authorized excess over the 11 percent ratio by an amount each year equal to one tenth of the excess for that institution at the end of its current taxation year. In most cases a large part of this reduction and in some cases all of it would be brought about by the growth in the assets to which the 1½ percent ratio applies, but insofar as this was not sufficient a portion of the excess would have to be brought back into taxable income to accomplish the gradual transition to the new authorized ratio.

I estimate that this change in permitted reserves will bring in $45 million of budgetary revenue during 1969-70, as well as some revenue to the old age security account, and some increase in provincial revenues.

[Mr. Benson.]

Other Measures

In quite another field I am proposing a change in the law to clearly exclude from the exemption provided for provincial crown corporations those cases where persons or corporations other than Her Majesty or a municipality have options to buy shares held by Her Majesty or a municipality. It is still possible that corporations in respect of which this is true may be held taxable under the present law, since the arrangements in question appear to be facades. However, I think we should put the matter beyond doubt.

• (9:10 p.m.)

At this time I wish to announce a change that will be made in the regulations relating to depletion allowances for the operators of oil and gas wells and mines. The existing scheme contemplates that depletion will be calculated as a percentage of production profits after deducting exploration and development expenses. Unfortunately, as the regulations now read, groups of companies can obtain much greater benefits than were intended by arranging to have their exploration and development activities carried on in one company and their producton activities carried on in another. The regulations are being changed to provide that all exploration and development expenses of the group must be deducted from production profits before depletion is computed.

I should also like to announce that my colleague the Minister of National Revenue intends to enforce more thoroughly and in finer detail the collection of tax on receipts of interest. It has been fairly widely believed in recent years-and noted by the Royal Commission on Taxation—that there appears to have been a large volume of interest payments to individuals that have not been reported or assessed for income tax. It is now feasible to match up much more information by means of computers with individual tax returns than was previously the case, and we intend to secure more such information, particularly in regard to interest and dividends. I believe that such action will produce a notable increase in our revenues and that it will increase the over-all equity of our tax system.

With the introduction of medical care plans in a number of provinces, taxpayers will no longer have to pay certain medical costs which formerly were classified as medical expenses for tax purposes. I propose that we follow the pattern set in 1959 when hospital insurance was introduced and amend the Income Tax Act to provide that medical expenses, as defined in the Act, shall not include amounts which are paid on a taxpayers' behalf, or for which he is reimbursed, under a provincial medical care insurance plan which meets the criteria set forth in the Medical Care Act.

The Income Tax Act will be amended to provide that the present non-resident withholding tax on royalties paid by a resident of Canada to a non-resident shall apply to a somewhat wider range of payments. The proposed amendment will be based on the definition of royalties suggested by the O.E.C.D. fiscal committee and used as a model by Canada in several of its international tax agreements.

A further measure is intended to help farmers who have need of more grain storage capacity on their farms. I am thinking in particular of the farmers in Western Canada who will have to store increased amounts of grain this winter and of the corn growers in Ontario. It is proposed that amounts spent to acquire grain storage facilities may be deducted for tax purposes over a short period. This will be done by an amendment to the income tax regulations and will provide that the capital cost of new buildings, structures and bins designed for the purpose of storing grain on a farm, acquired in the period August 1, 1968 to December 31, 1969, may be written-off for tax purposes over a four year period.

I should note at this point that these various changes in the Income Tax Act, other than those on life insurance companies and financial institutions which I have already reported, should increase budgetary revenues by about $10 million in 1969-70. Because of their nature they will not affect the current fiscal year substantially.

Customs Tariff Resolutions

I turn now to the Customs Tariff. I am reintroducing three sets of resolutions which were tabled by my predecessor in the last session of parliament. The first set formed part of the budget speech which was presented to the house on June 1, 1967. In the budget by that date. Accordingly, it was agreed with of November 30, 1967, the rates of excise duty on domestic spirits and beer were increased. The second set of resolutions provided for an later than January 1 next. As a result of our increase of the same amount in the customs negotiations with the United States, which is duties on imported spirits and beer. The reso- Canada's major supplier of chemicals and lutions of June 1 and November 30 were conplastics, reductions in the rates of duty on a sidered by the committee of ways and means number of chemicals and plastics in terms of last December.

The Budget-Mr. Benson

The third, and by far the largest of these sets of resolutions, were those tabled on November 6, 1967, implementing Canada's commitments, other than those on chemicals and plastics, under the Kennedy Round agreements. The rates set out in these resolutions came into effect on a provisional basis on January 1 of this year. The resolutions were referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. After a series of public hearings the committee recommended them to the house for favourable consideration.

However, parliament was dissolved before they could be enacted and an order in council was therefore passed on April 25 under the authority of section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, continuing in effect the proposed reductions in duty. I announced at the time that collections of the increases in customs duties proposed on a few imported products were being suspended, but that it was the government's intention to ask the next parliament to enact legislation implementing both the reductions and increases, effective from the dates originally proposed in the resolutions. The resolutions I am tabling tonight will, if enacted into law, have this effect.

Chemicals and Plastics

The new resolution which I am introducing this evening flows from the Tariff Board report on chemicals under reference 120. The first volume of the board's report was tabled in the house in June 1966. The revised schedule proposed by the board in this volume formed the broad basis for our Kennedy Round negotiations on chemicals and plastics. In these negotiations the rates of duty on chemicals were "bound" at not more than 15 percent. The plastics rates were, in general, bound at the highest recommended rate within any group of products.

In the Kennedy Round, Canada undertook to introduce the concessions offered on chemicals and plastics not later than July 1. It was not, in fact, possible to implement the proposed new chemical and plastics schedule our trading partners that Canada could delay putting these concessions into effect to not the present tariff nomenclature were made by order in council for the period July 1 to December 31.

As to the tariff structure proposed by the Board, the industry proposed and the Board recommended the adoption of the so-called Brussels Nomenclature for most of its new tariff schedule. This nomenclature is used by the major trading countries, with the exception of the United States; it is a system for classifying goods in headings which are grouped into chapters and sections. It also contains rules and notes defining the scope and priority of the various headings. The board recommended that these rules and notes be adapted for Canadian use and that the Customs Tariff provide that the governor in council may prescribe such rules and notes.

The schedule proposed by the board is very long. In part this is due to the use of this nomenclature and in part because the Board was directed not to make any general changes in the margins of preference, i.e. in the difference between the British preferential and most-favoured-nation rates of duty. Generally, the present rates are 15 percent B.P. and 20 percent M.F.N. on chemicals of a kind produced in Canada, and Free B.P. and 15 percent M.F.N. for those not produced in Canada. As these chemicals are ruled by the Department of National Revenue to be made or not made in Canada, they automatically move, by this administrative action, from one set of rates to the other.

Accordingly the board, in general, recommended a very long list of chemicals produced in Canada, identified by name, with rates of 10 percent under the B.P. tariff and 15 percent under the M.F.N. tariff, and rates of Free B.P. and 15 percent M.F.N. on the residual tariff items providing for chemicals not produced in Canada. The structure proposed by the board, particularly with regard to the preferential tariff, would be less flexible than the present tariff.

The board's proposals have given rise to many representations urging a less rigid system. I found considerable merit in these representations. It seems to me that both the present flexibility and the results intended by the Board could be brought about in another manner.

I am therefore proposing that a 10 percent B.P. duty be established for certain items in the chemical sector and that parliament grant authority to the governor in council to lower this duty from time to time. This authority would be similar to that set out in the Customs Act to reduce or remove duties on articles used in Canadian manufactures. Thus I am presenting for the consideration of the house a much shorter schedule than that proposed by the board. At the same time I should make clear that, by appropriate orders in council, we will ensure that British goods will face no increases in rates of duty other than those fully consistent with the principles underlying the board's proposals. Moreover, for many products imported from Britain there will be reductions in rates from 15 percent to 10 percent or even lower rates.

A somewhat similar situation exists with regard to plastics. For these products the board recommended a progression of rates, from resins to the more fabricated forms. It named those which it felt should be dutiable because they were made in Canada or were competitive with Canadian made plastics, and proposed residual items free of duty, in most cases, for those not named.

Representations were received to the effect that the Board's proposals provided no assurance of protection when new products are made in Canada. It appears to me that there is validity in this view. On the other hand, it is important to have a procedure for free entry when circumstances warrant, so as to avoid imposing unnecessary costs on Canadian users. Accordingly, I propose that rates of duty higher than those proposed by the board be established for the residual items, and that the governor in council be given authority to waive, reduce or restore these duties. This procedure will permit a shortening of the list of statutory tariff items in the plastics schedule.

I am also recommending a few other departures from the board's proposed schedule, based for some products on new information, on new production in Canada or to meet certain problems not foreseen by the board. All the changes I am proposing are consistent with our international commitments.

It goes without saying that I have received a large number of representations for changes from the board's proposals, many for higher duties which are not being met in the resolutions I am tabling. One I would like to mention in particular relates to the board's recommendation on polyethylene. This is an important issue but I am not willing to propose any changes in the duties on polyethylene as recommended by the board without a further study by the Tariff Board. Accordingly, I am asking the board for a thorough but prompt review of the current status of polyethylene.

In order to meet our new international obligations our new chemical and plastics tariff must be in effect by January 1 next.

Other Tariff Questions

I have received a number of representations for other changes in the Customs Tariff. However, I have decided that these should be held over for consideration until a later occasion.

I am also tabling a resolution regarding the implementation of our obligations under the "Anti-dumping Code". A proposal regarding a bill to achieve this objective is already before members in the form of a White Paper. I would not suggest that we proceed with this resolution until the standing committee has examined the draft bill. Members will be aware, of course, that we are committed, under the GATT, to revise our anti-dumping procedures by January 1 next.

The changes in the chemical tariffs which I have proposed above and in the antidumping duties will have I believe only a minor effect on customs revenues. It is very hard to set a figure on them because of the rather complicated changes in many small flows of import trade that are involved.

Central Fiscal Problem

I return now, Mr. Speaker, to our central fiscal problem and the revenues that we must raise to meet our forecast requirements this fiscal year and next.

In respect of the current fiscal year I have come to the conclusion that tax measures introduced now to secure enough revenue to balance the budget this year would have to be so severe that they would be damaging to the Canadian economy. Therefore I feel we should look ahead to next year and determine what we need, and put it into effect as soon as we can.

The measures I have already outlined should increase our total budgetary revenue for next fiscal year, 1969-70, by $130 million and add $10 million to our extra-budgetary receipts. However, they would leave our budgetary revenues about $710 million short of the initial forecast of aggregate expenditures I made of roughly $11,670 million. Clearly a deficit of this order of magnitude next year is quite contrary to the economic and fiscal policies I believe necessary, and we must raise substantially more revenue to meet it.

In selecting further changes to accomplish this purpose I have in mind that next year we shall be engaged in our major tax reform legislation and will then have in view our requirements for 1970 and beyond. We will be taking into account the fact that our income and corporation tax surcharges of 3 per cent enacted early this year will terminate at the end of 1969. Regard must also be had to the non-recurring revenue effects of the change in timing of the payment of tax by corporations.

Further Tax Measures

In view of this consideration I feel we can secure a part of what we require for 1969-70 by completing the moving forward of the dates of payment of the corporate income tax-bringing it then in line with the current payments on account which we are required to make from wages and salaries. I therefore propose that in taxation years following their next taxation year corporations be required to commence payment of their instalments of tax in the first month of their taxation year to which it relates and complete the instalments in the twelfth month. They will make their final adjusting payment, as now provided, by the end of the third month of the following taxation year. In order to make the transition to this system I propose that corporations be required to pay their instalments of tax in respect of their next taxation year in ten instalments commencing in the third month of the taxation year and terminating in the twelfth month. This acceleration will yield us about $275 million of revenue in the 1969-70 fiscal year. The effects of this acceleration on corporate liquidity will be offset to a significant degree by the completion of repayment of the refundable tax on corporate profits during 1969-70.

The remainder of the additional revenue required I propose to obtain by adding to the Old Age Security Tax on personal incomes an additional similar Social Development Tax at half the rates of the former. This Social Development Tax will be 2 per cent on taxable income up to a maximum tax of $120 per annum. It would go into effect January 1st. I estimate it would add some $55 million to our revenues in the current fiscal year and about $440 million in the next fiscal year.

I gave serious attention to alternative sources of additional revenue, including for example an increase in our general sales tax which would produce comparable amounts. But I concluded that what I am proposing would be the fairest and best, all things considered, including the desirability of not adding to the rate of increase of prices and costs of production.

I recognize that provincial governments will be concerned about parliament using any form of income tax at this time when clearly the provinces would like to get a larger share of it. I believe however that the total income tax including this addition and the higher rates of provincial tax applicable in Manitoba and Saskatchewan is within the capacity of Canadians to bear.

At this point Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the permission of the house to insert some small tables in Hansard. One would illustrate the effect of the new Social Development Tax on the total of taxes on income paid by a married man with two children. The second one gives the estimated yield of our various taxes in the current fiscal year, after taking account of the changes I have proposed. I also include last year's figures for comparison. The third table summarizes our budgetary position for the current fiscal year and for the next fiscal year, taking the revenues from the tax changes into account. I shall also include with the Budget papers at the conclusion of this speech, if the House will agree, tables giving the budget for 1968-69 on a national economic accounts basis and a reconciliation with the budgetary accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed? Some hon. Members: Agreed.
