Weariness and Rest.

Saviour, I come to Thee,

Upon thy loving breast !

The way is very dark ;

A weary child, with pain and care opprest;

Oh, let me lean this aching, burdened heart

I cannot see it, Lord, through these my tears

Take Thou my hand, and draw me up to Thee

Through all the lonely years.

Ob, let me lie where I can kiss Thy feet,

And look up from the dust into Thine eyes

That are so true and sweet !

And come, oh, come to me

To listen to my prayer.

My spirit yearneth for one little word

To cheer the still, sad silence of my life :

Speak to me, O my God !

There are sweet voices falling on mine ear,

Their tones I cannot hear.

A few of the incidents peculiar to the move ment may not be uninteresting. after all, the crown jewels of the world. They are more used than any other gems as investments, and in this country especially the wealthy flaunt them as a sort of placard of their ability. In times of commotion, princes and nobles have found diamonds their best friends. Indeed the largest diamonds in the world have each a history, and more than one brilliant has been the witness of bloody and tragic scenes. The Koh-i-noor, for instance, had changed hands in many an East Indian conflict before it was taken by the English troops at Lahore, and presented to Queen Victoria. The Orloff dismond, set in the scepter of Czar of Bussis, is said once to have formed one of the eyes of an idol in the Brahmin temple, and to have been set in the peacock throne of Nadid Shah. It was stolen by a Frenchman and ultimately fell into the possession of Catharine II, of Russia. The Sancy diamond was actually taken from the body of tue Duke of Burgundy, and found its way, in 1849, to Baron de Sancy, who sent it as a present to the King of Portugal. The servant by whom it was sent, being attacked by robbers, swallowed the stone, and it was found after his death in his body. The diamond is composed of pure carbon crystelized, and is the hardest known substance. The English were, at one time, famous as gem cutters, but the art is now wholly lost among them and most of the valued stones are intrusted to Dutch Jews. The ruby is the next hardest thing in nature after the dismonds. The finest rubies are found in the East Indies, and the King of Burmah takes one of his titles from themthat of the "Lord of the Rubies." In old times, the ruby was considered to possess many magical properties. It was thought to be an amulet against poison, plague, evil thoughts and evil spirits. It was supposed to darken when the wearer was in peril, and to become bright when the danger was over. The sapphire is composed of identically the same elements as the ruby, except the coloring matter. It is blue, instead of red, and is less valuable than its kindred jewel.

The emerald comes next to the diamond and ruby. A fine emerald is of a brilliant green color. The ancients used to ascribe wonderful properties to it, and it was though to endow the owner with courage. The finest emeralds are found among the limestone rocks of New Grenada. The frideseent, wondrous-tinted opal, is we are told, nothing but quarts and water. Still it is the only precious stone which defies imita-A Great Organ. tion.
