COMMON THINGS. ms, dear Lord, thy magic common things, uich all can see, which all may share. ight and dewdrops, grass and stars and

Nothing unique or new, and nothing rare, TWO BAVING MANIACS.

I have determined to never again read any tale of madness or lanacy, or even of spirits; to never again peruse any of those blood-cardling anecdotes that abound in every printed sheet. You see thosts in the newspapers, in the weeklies, in the magazines; you see haunted spots, uncanny sights, spirit visitations and mysterious murders, but especially you see the demoniscal madman.

Up to a month ago I had read enough stories of demoniscal madmen to turn my hair white. I concocted a craving for their horrible adventures. I searched all current literature for them until I had a close acquaintance with lunatics of every description. My friend Gibbets was in much the same state as I. He had begun by reading frightful tales in the newspapers; these gave him a taste of the unhealthy excitement.

Gibbets and I were sitting in my reading room and on Sunday morning. My reading room is also my parlor and sitting room—everything except bedroom and dining-room. I have two rooms on the first floor of a very select boarding-house, both of which, I flatter myself, are quite comfortably furnished; and in the one of these that is not the bedroom Gibbets and I were sitting. He had come in, as was his custom, directly after breakfast, with his arms full of newspapers. He took every Sunday newspaper that was published and so did I. We sat down before the cracking wood in two large easy chairs, piled our respective sheets on the floor beside did I. We sat down before the crackling wood in two large easy chairs, piled our respective sheets on the floor beside us, and commenced to examine them.

An ordinary man, a sensible man, would have looked first at the important news of the day. Gibbets and I did not do that; we glanced eagerly from one page to another until we arrived at the department of fiction,
"Ah "exclaimed Gibbets, with the utmost satisfaction, folding his paper,
"here is a good one, entitled "Confined with a Maniac;" looks first rate."
"Excellent," said I, as my eye fell upon the story, "we'll both read it and compare notes."
"Madness," ran the article, "is always ess," ran the article, "is always "madness," ran the article, "is always unseen, unsuspected by others, until at a critical moment it flashes out furiously in all its terrible intensity. No one can ever tell but that his next-door neighbor—his intimate friend—the very companion with whom he is sitting—is a dangerous maniac!"

And suddenly a terrible thought darted through my mind, causing my every nerve to quiver, filling me with unknown fear—what if Gibbets was a maniac?

panion with whom he is sitting—is a dangerous maniac!"

And suddenly a terrible thought darted through my mind, causing my every nerve to quiver, filling me with unknown fear—what if Gibbets was a maniac!

I withdrew my eyes alowly from the paper, turned my head and looked at him. Heavens! He was glaring at meglaring steadfastly at me with dilating pupils! I was spellbound and I could not remove my gaze. His eyes became more and more queer, seeming to dart cut ferocity and destruction. My flesh crawled. In that moment that we remained thus silently looking at each other all that I had ever read of sudden madness, all the knowledge that I had ever read of sudden madness, all the knowledge that I had ever possessed of concealed lunacy, passed through my mind.

Half a minute had passed; Gibbets had not yet moved a muscle, and you may be sure I had not. I discovered that I was still alive, and began to recover myself a little; the blood commenced so flow slowly through my veins again. With my eyes still fixed upon his glaring, enlarging orbs, which seemed to bore me, though I called upon all my faculties to form a plan of escape. Then suddenly I realized why he had not yet sprung upon me; my steadfast gaze had hald him quiescent, as the human eye often will hold an infuriated animal or madness.

If I could keep him thus till I reached had deep or provented a measure I wished.

Help Help!" yelled Gibbets, madman.

If I could keep him thus till I reached he door or procured a weapon, I might yet be saved. But the door was at the other end of the room; I could never get to it before him. And there was no weapon in the room—yes, there was; my heavy cane. It stood in the corner, about ten feet away. But Gibbets was as near to it as I was, and at my first movement he might leap upon me. Never mind; I must try it—it was my hour that you were a raving manise." Movement he might leap upon me, Never mind; I must try it—it was my only hope, I would move very very quietly—cautiously—and hold him spell-bound with my gaze as I did so.

So thought I, and prepared to act. I took my newspaper in one hand and lowered it slowly to the floor, concentrating all my will in my look upon him. Heavens! Gibbets was doing the same thing. Then he was not about to spring suddenly upon me but was going to play with me awhile—cat-like. Still leaning over upon the very edge of the seat.

which me awhite—cat-like. Still leaning over upon the very edge of the seat, I placed my left hand carefully upon the carpet. Gibbets did the same! Oh, this was carrible! I slipped, by imperceptible gradations, from the chair, until my knees touched the floor, and I was kneel. A firm in August, Me., sends to potteries touched the floor, and I was kneel-Gibbets did likewise. All the I steadily watched his maniacal eyes, which seemed to snap with repres-sed fury.

Now, very softly I moved first one thee and then the other, and shifted my hands a little forward. I was crawling hands a little forward. I was crawling towards my heavy cane in the corner. But no matter how slowly or softly I crept, Gibbets kept pace with me.

As I said before, never was man in such a situation. Many men have been confined with lunatics and found themselves in more dangerous places than I was. But whoever, in the sanctity of his own room, before his own grate fire, aitting comfortably with his own best, friend, suddenly saw that friend go craxy and play with him maliciously before killing him?

Yes, I had about resigned myself to bring killed; I realized that the maniac was thus minnicking me merely for the pleasure of watching my anguish, and I repeatedly pictured my stark, white body lying upon the floor of this room an hour later, covered with wounds and ghastity brinses. The idea caused me to shiver from head to foot and to involuntarily think of the door. The door—wes; I might reach that by crawling very softly towards it. But I must proceed quietly; at my first violent move I would be a dead man.

ceed quietly; at my first violent move I would be a dead man.
I wheeled cautiously around, an inch at a time. Gibbets still imitated me. I, at a time. Gibbets still imitated me. I crawled gently over the carpet toward the door, but Gibbets kept up with me, neck and neck. I increased my pace; Gibbets went faster. I stopped entirely; Gibbets stopped. Evidently I could not reach the door either. I had now been in this frightful danger so long that calm began to succeed the throbbing tempest in my head. One cannot long smulres such extreme emotion. My heart resumed its natural beat, my ideas assumed order in my brain. I thought serventy, "Well, if I must die now I must die."

sumed order in my brain. I thought, serencity, "Well, if I must die now I must die."

But I also commenced to think of all, the expedients I had, ever heard of being resorted to in conflicts with madmen. A plan quickly occurred to me. I would pacify this creature, address him in kind and gentile accents, subdue his ferocious fury. I turned on my knees to as to face him.

"Gibbets," said I, in a low, sweet voice, "do you feel badly? Poor Gibbets."

His look became instantin more her.

His look became instantly more hor-rible than ever. He backed away and prepared for a spring. But I perse-vered. rered.

His lower jaw dropped in a threatening manner; I wondered if he had determined to eat me when I was dead.
He backed further away and seemed to coil himself for a leap. I went on hastily.

be coil himself for a leap. I went on hastily.

"Dear Gibbete, how I love you. And you love me, don't you, deary?"

The maniac did not answer; he raised one arm and laid hold of a large straight backed chair by which he was inceing. I saw instantly his intention. He was about to hur! it at me with tremendous force. Evidently my words had irritated him instead of acothing him. My time was come. But no—my wits saved ma. The idea occurred to construe the action as if he was only bout to take a seat; if I sat down quickly he might imitate me. I was directly before the sofa. I backed my hour to take a seat; if I sat down quickly he might imitate me. I was directly before the sofa. I backed my had at down upon the chair. Then we sat and watched each other to a while in silence. It seemed to me hat my nerves would soon give out, he strain upon them was too great. I was shaking all over. I began to wonse what his ultimate design upon me.

arry to devise some other means of scape before my stealy gaze had lost he power of keeping him quiet. Sudenly an excellent idea came to me. I ad often read of the wonderful influnad otten read of the wonderful influ-ence that one crazy person has upon an-other, that if confined together the be-havior of each one will astound the other into stupid reflection, and often effect an entire cure. I straightway de-termined to become very insane myself and astound him so that I could reach the door.

I raised my arms and began, slowly at first, to wave them about in wild circles, first, to wave them about in wild circles, crying in a monotonous voice—"Boo—woo—Kalamazoo,—Buckelty—foo—boo—woo." Meanwhile I watched him as closely as ever; he did not move save to grasp the arms of his chair and start forward a little. I increased my efforts, thrashing my arms about like a windmill in a gale, and squeaking—"Blunketty—poo Kalamazoo." Yet he did not move—he was becoming astounded. Good. I ran my fingers through my hair, assumed a demoniacal expression, kicked my feet madly to and fro, thrashed my arms about still more furiously, and ahrieked unintelligible sounds.

Suddenly the maniac leaped to his feet, gave a great bound from the floor, and I threw my legs into the air, stood on my head and pitched myself over the back of the sofa to get away from him. I struck the floor with cruel force, and all was still. How strange—not a pindrop disturbed the silence. Had he nurdered me and was I in another world? I dragged myself painfully to my knees and looked over the back of the sofa, to see that wretched maniac glaring at me from behind his straight-backed chair on the other side of the room. crying in a monotonous voice—"Bowoo-Kalamazoo,—Buckelty—foo-l

This was very queer. Gibbets, then, was still playing with me; still enjoying my poor attempts to escape him, since he knew it was impossible. I rested my chin on the top of the sofa and looked at that ghastly face a while in despair. I thought over a couple of dozen stories concerning lunatics that I had lately read and reflected upon the different ways in which the hero outwitted them. Soon it struck me that I might try one of them with favorable results. I would address my maniac, pretend to fall in with his ideas, and propose some action to him in the pursuance of which I might escape. My former words angered him. I must proceed carefully.

"Gibbets," said I, softly, "you want to kill somebody, don't you?"

The lines around his eyes deepened; his mouth finally opened.

"Yes" renlied Gibbets in a bears.

his mouth finally opened.
"Yes," replied Gibbets, in a hoarse, uneven voice.
"Well," said I, "I would like to kill somebody also."

thunderation! I thought for the last hour that you were a raving maniac."
'Great Casar's ghost!" said Gibbets, also uttering a tremendous sigh, rising to his feet and coming from behind the chair. "You don't mean it? Why I thought for the whole hour that you were one."

But ever since then Gibbets and I are unwilling to be together alone. We have deep, underlying suspicions of each other that will never be dissi-ON THE BARGAIN COUNTER.

NERVOUS DISEASES. As a cure for every class of Nervous Diseases, no remedy has been able to compare with the Nervine Tonic, which is very pleasant and harmless in all its effects upon the youngest child or the oldest and most delicate individual. Nine-tenths of all the ailments to which the human family is heir are dependent on nervous exhaustion and impaired digestion. When there is an insufficient supply of nerve food in the blood, a general state of debility of the brain, spinal marrow, and nerves is the result. Starved nerves, like starved muscles, become strong when the right kind of food is supplied; and a thousand weaknesses and ailments disappear as the nerves recover. As the nervous system must supply all the power by which the vital forces of the body are carried on, it is the first to suffer for want of perfect nutrition. Ordinary food does not contain a sufficient quantity of the kind of nutriment necessary to repair the wear our present mode of living and labor imposes upon the nerves. For this reason it becomes necessary that a nerve food be supplied. This South American Nervine has been found by analysis to contain the essential elements out of which nerve tissue is formed. This accounts for its universal adaptability to the cure of all forms of nervous derangement.
