wish to say is that if I am poisoned with adulterations it will be the worse for you. Perhaps you can understand that as a matter of self-interest. And, I presume, the sheets have been aired?"

"Aired!" repeated the landlord, ix strident tones. "Every bed in the house's as dry as the fog in a lintie's nest and as sweet as new mown hay."

"I trust I shall find mine so," sald the great man. "If I should be so unfortunate as to contract rheumatism in your bed, I know how to get damages."

"Maybe you know how to get the breeks off a Highland man," retorted the landlord.

"There is one thing I know," sald the great man, freezingly, "a civil innakeeper when I see him."

He then emptied his glass, caught up his whip and gloves, and strode out, asting never a glance at ohe in the room. The landlord, uncertain whether to follow and aploogize or remain behind and give vent to his feelings in profane language, compromised the matter by falling viciously on a ser-

I did not see the great man at break-

I did not see the great man at breakfast the next morning. But no sooner had I taken my seat on the coach than he clambered up beside me. The day being chill and foggy he was wrapped to the eyes in a great coat and an enormous woollen muffler, such as the Scottish people like to hide their head in when the airs happens to be too shrewd.

"Ugh, dear me, it's raw!" he remarked to the world at large as he settled back in the midst of a bile of rugs and plaids, sublimely oblivious of the fact that he was reclining upon me and appropriating half my space.

We were not far on our journey when the sun shone out warmly, the mists which filled the valleys and lay heavily on the wooded slopes began to rise, and some of the fairest scenes in all fair Scotland opened to the sight. The landscape smiled, but there was no corresponding token of geniality in the face of the pompous and taciturn individual by my side. He so far responded to the benignancy of nature indeed as to unbutton his great coat, lower his muffler, and lay himself out to the sun as if he were a bundle of mouldy hay. But even this he did out of sheer condescension, and in the process he made me suffer. He dug into the with his ollow. accessory before the fact. That is the law."

Thus admonished the guard returned to his bugle and blew lustly to keep limself in countenance, and my companion, having settled his ruffled feathers a bit, sat up, pulled out a fat notebook and began to study a page of figures, keeping, however, the corner of his eye on me. As he studied a smirk of satisfaction now and again relieved the austerity of his face. I judged the figures represented some profitable investment, but little could I have guessed what that investment was.

At length he closed the book, returned it to his pocket, and, in spite of all that had taken place, once more reclined comfortably on me. It was now my turn to appeal to authority, so I called out. "Guard, have the goodness to remove this carcass!"

The aggressor sat bolt upright, as if an arrow had pierced him, his faced darkened by a scowl.

"Such insults are intolerable," he said, savagely, "I will write to the owner of this coach; I will have justice."

I made no reply, only smiled at his chagrin, and stretched myself to the limits of my space, glad that at last I had made a definite impression. For the rest of the journey he punctillously kept from touching me, and though.

"That word sounds in the world that I wouldn't make, sir," I responded; "but—" and there I stuck with my eyes on the embarrassed food of the embarrassed state of our affeirs," I faltered, with my eyes on the ground.

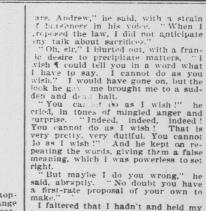

"Yes, Andrew," put in my father, quickly, "we are embarrassed, fear-fully embarrassed, but our fortunes may be restored quicker than we think." And the dear soul in his confidence came forward, took my hand, and looked in my face in a way that stabbed me to the marrow.

"I would do all I can for the family redit," I said.

"The right sentiment, Andrew, if rather haltingly spoken," said my father, with an encouraging pressure of the hand. "Come, my boy, give your courage topy. You would.

"The aggressor sat bolt upright, as if an arrow had pierced him, his face darkened by a scowl.

"The right sentiment,

a instruce proposal of your own to make."

I faltered that I hadn't and held my breath for the effect. It was electric. With an energy I had never seen in him before my father sprang to his feet and began to stride about the room, or rather to stamp, his face like a thundercloud, his breathing a series of angry snorts. As I stood quaking in every fibre, my mother gave me a look which seemed to say:—" My dear, unfortunate boy, what does all this mean? Have you taken leave of your senses?"

unfertunate boy, what does all this mean? Have you taken leave of your senses?"

"I can scarcely believe my ears," cried my father, when he had got over the first spasm of rage. "I doubt my very scases. A son of mine telling me, in the very crisis of fortune, he cannot do as I wish—cannot do as I wish." Did ears of man ever hear the like of that? 'I cannot do as you wish, says the beardless Solomon to the foolish gray head. That's good. The world's improving. Cannot do as I wish! This is what colleges and professors do. Go out, sir, and get me a hazel rung till I teach you obedience. By my faith, Wallace Kilgour will hear no such language as that in his own house!"

"Do not agitate yourself," pleaded my mother. "Andrew means no disobedience. I'm sure. You haven't given him a chance to explain himself."

"To be sure, to be sure," said my father, "we have not heard his explanations. I'll warrant they're very ingenious and convincing, coming direct, as they do, from that nest of lesuits, the College of Edinburgh." Then after a turn or two more about the room he threw himself into a chair. Thinking that now was my chance to speak. I began very humbly.

"If you listen, sir, I'll try."

"Listen!" be thundered, jumping to his feet, as if I had offered a deadly insuit. "Listen to you? No, the listening shall be on the other side. And this is what I have to say:—That you shall obey me without troubling about explanations or you shall leave my house. It is mine as yet, and I will be master in it."

"I only wanted to tell you," I ventured again. Eut he would not hear me.

"If you attempt to argue with me, out you go," he said, peremptorily.

And I verify believe he would forthwith have thrust me from the house.

had not his attention been arrested by a knock at the outer, or hall, door, a loud, imperious knock, that seemed to announce a person of importance. The next minute the door of our apartment us opened and in walked my bumptious travelling companion of the pre-

Mr. Emmerson thought the house would be showing scant courtesy to the petitions if it disposed of this bill in such a summary The matter was one of importance concerning as it did the great body of medical practicioners in New Brunswick as well as the general public. The statement was made that by passing this bill in either of the forms proposed the House would be following a fad or a fuke. But the fact was that the science of Ostensthy had been recognized by some

Mr. Pitts—If they want to die they can.
Mr. Emmerson said many people if debarred from securing treatment here would go to the institutions in Michigan and Mistended with any danger. The hon, member for York (Pitts) had claimed that the govway, but was promoted by the medical pro-fession. He had no direct interest in the bill but if he had a child in the situation that Mr. Patterson's child was, and was denied the right to try this remedy he would consider that a great injustice had been done, the bill did not propose to interfere with the medical profession in the practise of drugs and surgery. If osteopathy was quackery as some contend it would die out quackery as some contend it would die out quickly. Taking all interests into consideration the house should not place a barrier to the enjayment by these people of any possible benefit the bill might give. If there was nothing in the claims of osteopathy the bill would not injure the medical profession. If there was the house would simply consider the medical profession.

Mr. Flower said no strong reason had been authorised to be expended shall not exceed in any one year the sum of $5,000, and this shall be paid out of current revenue. The measure was largely experimental and authority was not asked for the continuance of the act beyond five years. As honorable member, Fowler, had had some difficulty in act beyond five years and Dairymen's Association had passed a resolution in favor of such measure. The government, no description of the same and the provincial grants it received every year, the Globe's report would seem to indicate that the hone at the time it was made.

"I contracted a severe cold, which settled on my lungs, and I did what is often done in such cases, neglected it. I then consulted a doctor, who found, on examining me, that the upper part of the left lung was badly affected. The medicines he gave me did not affected. The medicines he gave me did not seem to do any good, and I determined to try Ayer's Cherry Peétoral. After taking a few doses my trouble was relieved, and before I had finished the bottle I was cured."

I boped that luncheon would pass without reference being made to what had brought me home, but in that I was disappointed, for the matter lay too mar my father's heart to be kept out of his conversation. Sir Thomas was told of the plans that had been made for me, and how for some unaccountable reason I was bent on spoiling them.

"We must not be angry or disappointed if youth does not see with the eyes of age," said Sir Thomas, graciously, looking at me. "Morning and evening have different lights. Mr. Andrew has the fresh vision and quick intelligence of his time of life. They are not to be despised. At the same time I am sure he will consider soberly, and not underestimate the importance of the decision he is called on to make. Least of all will he grieve by any obstinacy those to whom his welfare is perhaps dearer than to himself," and then he added, after a parse: "People's thoughts run on the lines that are most familiar to them. India occurred to me. I make a mere suggestion. How would you like to make your fortune in India?"

"No better place in the world for a young man of ability and enterprise," put in Mr. Clephane, quickly. "Dod, many's the fortune has been made in India. I think I see in Andrew a nabob in embryo."

No one took the least notice of him,

CHAPTER IV. THE ELMS-A MOMENTOUS DE-CISION.

Youth has an enviable knack of turning its back upon the troublous past so soon as a blink of hope shines out of the future.

Next day I had forgotten my woes, and was as snugly in conceit with myself, as ardent, as full of preposterous schemes as if, instead of being the football of fortune, I had been her first favourite and grand vizier. I passed the day zealously cultivating those aerial estates which make so fine a show in the eye of imagination and promise so rare a revenue, and waited with impatience for the evening. Yet when the hour came, and I found myself at The Elms, somehow my elation forsook me, and with it my confidence and self-possession. The ordeal of the introduction to Miss Gordon was trying. It left me with hot gills and an uneasy foreboding that I was going to make a fool of nivself. Youth has an enviable knack of addicted to letter withing, and my correspondents in the East seem somehow or other to have lost sight of him. It may be that he is dead," and there was a quiver in his voice. "If so, it would be some satisfaction to know it. And, to be brief. I thought that if Andrew were going to India he might possibly be able to look Donald up." "Gad, Sir Thomas, Andrew is just the very man to do that," put in Mr. Clephane. "I'll warrant he'll find your son. It is a mission to suit one of Andrew's adventurous spirit. I only wish I could substitute my own son. But Andrew is not to be superseded. I envy him his opportunity." "We all envy the opportunities of youth," said Sir Thomas. Then turning to my father, with a smile, "You see. Kilburnie, my motives are selfish after all."

"As I was ready to wager, your

"He is a shame, Androw", the salt, says, "but Mr. Cluphan probably have been shaped by the salt says," but Mr. Cluphan probably have been shaped by the salt says, "but Mr. Cluphan probably have been shaped by the salt says," but Mr. Cluphan probably have been shaped by the salt says, and the same shaped by the same shaped by the says, and the same shaped by the same shape ing about him. He seemed to fill me whole soul, to be her only thought, a circumstance that secretly plaued me not a little.

"Oh," she would often break out in the most irrelevant way, "if you could only find my brother, if you could only find Donald, I should be so grateful to you. But Indeed, Indeed," and here she would look in my face till I thought I saw visions of heaven, "I will be just as grateful to you if you never find him. Words cannot express your goodness in irving."

Then I would reply that if Donald were in India I would find him, a speech which always brought me a rapturous smille of thanks and further visions of paradise.

I will pass swiftly over the preparation made at Kilburnle for my departure. My dear mother took care that my outfit lacked nothing it was possible for her to procure, and my father softened toward me, busying himself with my affairs and seeming conscience-stricken for having been so stern with me.

"You do well, Andrew," he said one evening, when we chanced to be by ourselves, and his voice was husky." You do well, Andrew, I have no doubt, in following your own instincts. When you go away, do not forget that we are left behind, and you'll let us hear from you. And as to the other thing, we may and a way out of our troubles, God bless you, my low, We are all in His hands." And he could say no more.

At dinner, on the last evening, Duncan, the coachman, who was also gamekeeper, factor, forester, and general factorum, and served the Kilgours, man and boy, for fifty years, got out his pipes and served the Kilgours, in an and boy, for fifty years, got out his pipes and served the Kilgours, and mis work before me, assisted by the numerous friends of my patron. I had no difficult in discovering that we are left behind, and you'll let us hear from you. And as to the other thing, we may and a way out of our troubles, God bless you, my low, We are all in His hands." And he could say no more.

At the thought our faith that from the rive and along the class of Dover." There is the seas completely slipped all his friends in Bombay. In my first report home, then, I had In my first report home, then, I had nothing better to send than hope, of which I was no niggard. I stated, truthfully enough I trust, that I had already learned something about Donald; also, I fear not quite so truthfully, that I was not without reasonable ground for thinking that he and I should shortly have a dish of curry together. I did not tell them that as a last resource I had employed the cleverest private detective in the city cleverest private detective in the city to help me, and that he had failed to find so much as a single clue. Had course would have been to say that I saw this more clearly when the letter was gone, and I had stronger rea-
