Miscellaneous.

THE PROTEGEE. (Continued.) One lovely evening, Mary having been invited to compose herself to rest after her slight dinner, yielded to Mrs. Brommell's entreaties, and went out to refresh her health and spirits by an hour's ramble through the pretty grounds of the mill.

Her lover seemed to conjecture her intention, and at that said, in a voice hoarse from internal emotion, "I fear you are not going to be true to me."

"I am not," she said, and attempted, but in trembling, to take her hand.

"I am not," she said, and attempted, but in trembling, to take her hand.

of his supporting arm. She attempted to speak, but the effort only increased her sobbing until she suffocated.

"Good God! Mary," exclaimed Brommell, now more terrified than ever, "are you ill?—are you dying? Oh! tell me, that I may die with you—for I will not live without you. Love you, Mary, better than my life—now know well that I do."

"The poor girl now made another ineffectual effort to rise from the sofa, when the elder Mr. Brommell making his way through the plantation, came round and stood before them. He made a fruitless attempt to speak, and his voice, springing from his throat in a paroxysm of surprise and alarm, by a hoarse, but natural movement, had the unfortunate Mary gently on the grass at his feet.

"So, sir, in your conduct—this is your respect for your father's roof, your mother's Protegee and your sister's friend—every feeling of a man and a gentleman outraged at once; but I always guessed how this educated young lady would repay us, and I was not mistaken!"

"What do you mean, Father?" exclaimed young Brommell, "now started in another point—what can you mean? you cannot—no, you could not, think of it!"

"Oh! no, of course I cannot," replied his father, with bitter irony: "then changing his tone—'Sir! did I not hear you swear you loved her, and speak to her with knowledge and care that declaration on my part, Brommell to Mary Jane, argue ought but infamy?'"

"I am sorry you are not able to talk to me, and the girl listening to you; but, were you not my father, you dared not to insult her thus; and I tell you now they were the first words of love I ever uttered to Mary, and they were uttered in the same spirit as if they had been addressed to a princess whom I loved as well!"

"Then, sir, my first words of congratulation shall be, that the curse of the unfaithful child may light upon you for your latest generation, if that generation springs from her—no, with faithful purity heaved his breast, and looked up to heaven as he spoke; then turning from his son in indignation, and not deigning a glance at Mary, he retired by the same way he had come.

Young Brommell sat down upon the grass beside Mary, in agonized silence. He felt absolutely obliged to address her; and she by apparently shrugging, except that a stifled sob now and then showed she was too truly alive to the misery of her situation; but she could not utter a single word: for her feelings were lacerated in every possible way: her mother, mistress, friend, companion, and, though not her father, her poor old respectable parent—all, all that had hitherto constituted her life, were now involved in one common sea of bitterness and apparent grief. There was a case in which conciliatory rectitude gave but little consolation, for she felt how ridiculous, after what Mr. Brommell had seen and heard, would be the assurance that she had intended to preserve the sacred passion of his son. Yet nothing could be more certain—far although to a heart that adored his father, his expressions of affection, and his caresses could not but be soothing under the circumstances, yet to her brought more than their counterpart of agony; and Mr. Brommell's abrupt and unceremonious manner, which she had never before perceived, seemed to her to be a reproach to her father's name. Yet nothing could be more certain—far although to a heart that adored his father, his expressions of affection, and his caresses could not but be soothing under the circumstances, yet to her brought more than their counterpart of agony; and Mr. Brommell's abrupt and unceremonious manner, which she had never before perceived, seemed to her to be a reproach to her father's name.

Fame, through the babbling tongue of fame, catching some vague rumours of some rupture between Mr. Brommell and his son, in which Mary's name was perpetually mentioned, she felt, as if she were neither the sad, but sincere assurance of that lady of her belief in Mary's exemplary conduct, nor Mrs. Brommell's entreaties, nor the voluntary lamentation of the young man—who indeed retired not to his father's house that night, but wrote from Dover next day, to have his baggage and servant sent after him—could now induce the venerable old woman to leave Mary longer amongst them. She said, and said truly, Mary was now herself no more than a shadow, and she would not have her name sullied by her presence in the house of her father's friends.

"I am not," she said, and attempted, but in trembling, to take her hand.

of inquiry should be assembled for the purpose of examining all the circumstances of the case, and deciding whether his (Capt. Hammer's) conduct had been such as to justify the system of exclusion practiced towards him. The Lordship, instead of complying with this request, ordered all the officers of the Blues to wait upon him at the Horse Guards, where he received them, dressed in full uniform, as colonel of the regiment. His lordship commenced by asking whether Lieutenant Colonel Richardson or any of the other officers, desirous of being employed in the conduct of Captain Hammer, as colonel of the regiment, and his lordship desired that of such were the case, the officers would immediately proceed to lay the complaint before him. Upon an answer in the negative, Lord Hill produced a paper, on which he stated he had written to the Duke of Devonshire, and such as he was to make, in order that it might serve as a record of the steps he had taken, should the case come again before him. He then proceeded to enquire, in the strongest terms, the course pursued by the officers in regard to Captain Hammer, which his lordship designated as an unworthy of their character as gentlemen, and highly detrimental to the service.

CAUSES OF FIRE.

The Commissioners to examine into the causes of fires in the City of New York, in submitting a preliminary report of the result of the investigations had before them, have the satisfaction to announce the cordial co-operation which they have received from those who have come within the province of their enquiries, by affording to them every facility in their power to carry into effect and successful operation the designs of the Common Council, in organizing our department, which it is hoped will be of great benefit to the city.

In 1792, there were not in the whole of Great Britain 20 Roman catholic churches; there are now 512, and 43 buildings. In that year, there was not one single Roman catholic college; there are now 10, and many seminaries of education, besides 200 schools. In the United States, although it is not forty years since the first catholic seminary was created, there now a population of 600,000 souls, and the number of churches is 401; mass houses, 399; colleges, seminaries, five; novitiates for Jesuits, monasteries and convents, with academies attached, 31; seminaries for young ladies, 20; schools of the sisters of charity, 23; an academy for coloured girls at Baltimore, a female infant school, and seven catholic newspapers. Thus in every part of the world popery is pursuing its triumphant course, trampling upon the consciences of mankind.
