"NONPAREIL"
Billiard Hall!
SHARKEY'S BUILDING,
OPP. OFFICERS' BARRACKS, QUEEN ST., FREDERICTON, N. B.
I. E. FOSTER, Proprietor
THIS HALL has been newly fitted up, and handomely furnished, and for room, light, ventilation and business compares most favorably with any Billiard Hall in the Dominion. The Billiard and Pool Tables are pronounced by players to be superior to any now in use in this Province.
They are the BRILLIANT NOVELTY, size 6 x 9 feet.
The main object in the construction of the Billiard Novelty, and the one most noticeable, is that it embodies all the more salient or most important features that have rendered popular all the other styles of tables. The Billiard Novelty has all the advantages and good points, including the respective inlays claimed by the "Nonpareil" and "Exposition," "Novelty," "Acme" and "Amaranth" Tables. The Billiard Novelty is a happy combination of all these celebrated tables, and has rapidly taken the position of pre-eminence in the estimation of all players of Billiard and Pool Tables. The "Novelty" is finished and handomely inlaid in many different colors, made up from California Laurel, Red Oak, French Walnut, Bird's Eye Maple, Mahogany,
Rose Wood, Elm, and other fine woods.
It is supplied with the finest of Vermont Slate bed, Simons Cloth, and a first-class outfit of everything necessary.
A call is respectfully solicited from lovers of the game.
Boys under sixteen not allowed in the Hall.

Jas. D. Fowler,
WATCHMAKER & JEWELLER,
Will appear in the next issue.
You have some medals and clasps, I think?
Yes. I received a medal for Persia and the only clasp that was given for that campaign—a medal for India; a clasp for the Relief of Lucknow; a medal for good conduct and long service; and a medal for meritorious service, which carries an annuity.
The Persian Campaign.
Where did you first see active service?
In the Persian campaign of 1857, when I was present at all the principal engagements as staff bugler.
Can you call to mind any special incidents of that campaign?
There is one that might be of local interest. Lieut. Col. Maunsell's uncle, Colonel James Stopford, was the first man killed at Reshire. He fell into my arms mortally wounded, and the tourniquet and bandage I applied in vain to the Colonel I carried for many days and had occasion to use them several times afterwards during the campaign. The sword held by the Colonel at the time is now in possession of his son, George Stopford, who lives at the Elms, near Fred-erickton. Col. Stopford was Brigadier in command of the fighting line or skirmishers, and as this was the first battle his regiment (the 64th) was engaged in, the Colonel, who had received several medals and clasps for engagements before in India whilst in the 43rd Light Infantry, led the regiment to take the fort of Reshire. The fatal shot was fired by one not twenty yards distant from us, in the rifle pits on the other side, after we had mounted the mud walls of the fort.
In the expedition up the Euphrates against Mohammed, Sir Henry Havelock's servant, while talking to me on board of the flat bottom man-of-war steamer, was killed by a cannon ball. Sir James Outram and Sir Henry Havelock were standing close by at the time.
The enemy had both sides of the river well fortified with artillery and infantry; the cannonade was a warm one, and the attacking force had great difficulty in landing. In fact a bridge of barrells had to be made before we could gain the shore.
One of the most brilliant scenes of the campaign was the breaking up of a square by the 3rd Bombay Light Infantry on the plains of Kooshab the morning after the night attack. The city of Bushire is nearly surrounded by water when the tide is in, and when our force returned

A SOLDIER'S LIFE.
Sergeant-Major MacKenzie is an applicant for the position of Adjutant of the Military School. He would fill the place excellently. In a St. John paper a few years ago an interview with the Sergeant-Major, now Capt. MacKenzie, was published, and we reproduce it in the work that it will lead the militia authority to appreciate the Sergeant-Major's claims.
You see I am the son of a soldier, born at Gibraltar, when my father was master tailor of the 94th. He subsequently left the service and returned to England, and it was when I was not quite eleven years old that he was urged to join the 64th in his former capacity. The 64th was then stationed at Halifax, and my father who had long entertained the idea of visiting America, said he would accept the position provided they would enlist his two sons. For the sake of securing my father's services, this rather unusual condition was finally acceded to, and my elder brother and myself were duly enlisted. I was a stout little gaffer, but I will never forget the laugh that greeted my childish stature (for I was not 4 feet
3) as I stepped up to join.
How many years did you remain in the army?
From 1841 to 1868 in the regular service;
and I got a year added to my time, in common with all that took part in the relief of Lucknow.
You must have seen a good deal of active service?
Yes, some. I have been through twenty three general engagements.
Could you give me a short sketch of your military career?
What for?
For publication in the Press, of course. I feel that it would prove interesting to our readers generally and especially to all who have met you or heard of you during your long connection with the militia of this Province.
Very well put, replied the Captain, with a laugh, from your standpoint, but I don't care to go on dress parade before the public.
The reporter, however, persisted, till finally, after extracting a promise that the interview would not be "touched up" or sensationally colored, Capt. Mac-Kenzie consented to answer a few more questions.
You said a little while ago you joined the 64th. In what capacity and what were your promotions?
As drummer in the band. My first promotion was that of a drill corporal. I was in succession acting drum major (drill sergeant as well as there was 15 rupees per month extra but I afterwards resigned the drum majorship and remained as drill sergeant. While drill sergeant
I was also field bugler, and in that capacity
I was attached to the staff of the late Sir James Outram, Sir Harry Havelock, and Sir Colin Campbell (Lord Clyde) during the Persian campaign and Indian mutiny.
You have some medals and clasps, I
think?
Yes. I received a medal for Persia and the only clasp that was given for that campaign—a medal for India; a clasp for the Relief of Lucknow; a medal for good
conduct and long service; and a medal
for meritorious service, which carries an annuity.

The Relief of Lucknow.
From Cawnpore I presume you proceeded to the relief of Lucknow?
Yes, though Lucknow was but 48 miles distant by the roads, we were a long time making the journey. On our first advances we only penetrated ten or twelve miles and had then to fall back on Cawnpore. It was after this that Sir James Outram brought up his reinforcements and when the forces were ready to proceed Sir James had it placed in General Orders that as Sir Henry Havelock had done such gallant service with such a small force, he would waive his rank and entrust the command to Sir Henry Havelock. Such generous magnanimity is rarely seen. Sir James Outram took command of the cavalry. Of that march to Lucknow it is useless for me to say much. The gallant little army, its fate unknown for months to the outside world, ploughed its way through the hot tide of rebellion to a complete success. We had several hot engagements before the Residency was reached; in fact it was fought all the way. One of the defences on the line was a peculiar one.
It was a yellow brick building, with an iron shutter painted to match the walls so perfectly that no break could be perceived. Behind this shutter was a large gun, and it was fired as the shutter was raised, the dense smoke preventing us for some time from discovering the exact location of this screened battery. To silence it gave us great trouble. The greater part of our force got into Lucknow but the convoy and commissariat had to take possession of the Alum Bagh (Queen's Palace) and fortify themselves there. This was four miles from the Residency. It took a whole day to fight these four miles, as we had to force position after position through the outskirts into the town itself. By the convoy remaining at Alum Bagh, we had to enter the Residency without provisions, and we had to use part of the little food of the garrison. While defending the Residency, we were undermined and twice nearly blown up.
How was your relief accomplished?
We were daily telegraphing to and from Alum Bagh, and therefore were informed of Sir Colin's approach. Seven o'clock the night before the grand attack, Sir Colin's force, two miles distant, and we in the Residency, shelled the enemy's position up till 7 in the morning, when

from the victory at Kooshab, it being high water, Sir James Outram ordered that each man of the force be served with a pair of trousers and boots for marching five and a half miles through the salt water, which at places was two or three feet deep. This is only one instance of the attention paid by Sir James to the comfort of the men under his command.
If you like to put it in, you may say that at the close of the campaign I was presented by Sir James Outram, in front of the force, with a fine silver watch.
The Indian Mutiny.
We then returned to India, where lotter work was ready for us, as "the flash of lightning" which Sir Charles Napier had anticipated and for which years before Sir Colin Campbell had been prepared, had fallen with terrific power and was doing its deadly work.
Where did you first go?
We expected to go to Kurrachee, our headquarters, but on arrival in Bombay, being one of the first corps on the spot after the outbreak, we were sent by steamer to Calcutta, in the Bengal Presidency. From Calcutta we proceeded up to Allahabad, disarming the rebels on the route, and had several engagements, on the way. From there we set out on the march to Cawnpore. We had two engagements, and at Futtehpore we had a general engagement of four hours and drove the enemy from a strong position.
The routed Sepoys fell back on Cawnpore. Another battle at Pandoo Nuddee followed, and it was in revenge for this defeat that Nana Sahib ordered the immediate massacre of the wives and children of the British soldiers, an order which was executed with fiendish malignity.
Cawnpore was re-taken after a determined defence, and all Nana Sahib's guns captured. It was a strongly fortified position and our loss was heavy.
The Well of Cawnpore.
After the town was secured for rebels, the troops were marched to Wheeler's bungalow, where the massacre had taken place. Outside the house was the well into which dead and wounded alike had been thrown.
It must have been a horrible scene?
Words fail to describe it. The gore was in places ankle deep, and the walls were covered with sword cuts and the messages of dying mothers tread on the walls in their own blood. Here, every soldier, maddened at the terrible sight, swore an oath never to spare a "Sepoy's life. The world knows how well they kept their oath.
How were you situated in Cawnpore?
The Sepoys, who had retired across the river, annoyed us daily by the fire of heavy artillery, and we had to fortify ourselves by rebuilding part of the fort which had been broken down. We crossed the river three times to hunt them out, but had to retire each time for want of strength.

The Relief of Lucknow.
From Cawnpore I presume you proceeded to the relief of Lucknow?
Yes, though Lucknow was but 48 miles distant by the roads, we were a long time making the journey. On our first advances we only penetrated ten or twelve miles and had then to fall back on Cawnpore. It was after this that Sir

nanimity is rarely seen. Sir James Outram took command of the cavalry. Of

maining at Alum Bagh, we had to enter

twice nearly blown up.
How was your relief accomplished?
We were daily telegraphing to and
from Alum Bagh, and therefore were informed of Sir Colin's approach. Seven o'clock the night before the grand attack, Sir Colin's force, two miles distant, and
position up till 7 in the morning, when the garrison, as well as the relieving force advanced to meet the enemy; but it took us all day before we met Sir Colin. In consequence of this shelling, groves of trees and houses were laid low. Very hard fighting we had that day. We then returned to Alum Bagh. It was here that Sir Henry Havelock died and was buried.

What was the cause of his death? The want of nourishing food. He had to be held up on his horse for a while when leaving Lucknow, and later grew so weak that he had to be put in a palanquin. It was just after the battle of the gallant hero that we received intelligence that the Gwalior contingent had attacked and recaptured Cawnpore. We consequently made a forced march of 44 miles. On our approach to the bridge of boats across the Ganges, near Cawnpore, the Sepoys set it on fire. One of the 64th immediately went with rope in mouth and attached it to the burning boats and brought the bridge in position, so that we were able to cross. For this he was thanked by Sir Colin Campbell at the time and subsequently received the Victoria Cross. It took us about three days to recapture Cawnpore, where we remained some time.

Where did you go next? We were ordered off on an expedition, under Sir James Inglis, to attack the forces that had left Cawnpore and Delhi, which were advancing on to Cawnpore. We had several engagements on our way up to Meerut, within 40 miles of Delhi.

What did you do then? We remained there till Sir Colin Campbell recaptured Lucknow, when the troops for Bombay Presidency were ordered home.

What was your route? We went through the central part of India to Mauh, which is the central military station between Bengal and Bombay Presidencies. We remained there till the mutiny was at an end, when we proceeded home to Kurrachee, our headquarters, where we expected to go after the Persian campaign, and had we done so, there would not have been so many widows when the regiment returned home.

You were on the staff all this time? Yes, and consequently took part in engagements in which my regiment did not participate, both in Persia and India.

Were you promoted during the Indian campaign? "Yes; I was made color and pay sergeant, and was requested to remain at my old trade of field bugler.

How did Havelock, with such a small force, take Cawnpore? We first took and spiked some of their heavy 24 pounder guns, made a feint to attack on the right, near the upper bridge of boats; retired, and while retreating made a feint towards the lower bridge of boats or left of the town, when Nana Sahib and his force rushed towards the left to face us, when we attacked them on the right and drove a number over the upper bridge and got them into such confusion that the most of them retreated across the river on the lower side and left us in possession of the town.

Did you lose much of the force here? Yes, a large number both of officers and men, for Nana Sahib's force, although partly of undisciplined forced levies, was as ten to one. In the retreat, Nana Sahib's elephant was shot under him.

Did you see Nana Sahib? Yes, I saw him mount another elephant and cross the bridge of boats. I never saw him afterwards, though it was known he was attacking us daily. He was also at Lucknow.

Did you remain long in India after the rebellion was stamped out? We left India early in 1861, but I was not long at home till I was ordered out to Canada, application having been received by the Imperial authorities for drill instructors during the Trent affair. At that time I was doing the duties of sergeant-major of our corps, our Sergeant-Major having died on the way home from India.

His Career in New Brunswick. When did you reach this Province? I arrived in St. John in February, 1862. But you don't want to know anything about my life here—there's no fighting in it.

Just a few more questions, Captain, if please. How has your time been occupied here? Oh, I have served in various capacities in the militia, both before and after the Confederation, I have been instructor to corps and instructor and Acting Adjutant to military schools of instruction, and Adjutant of the 62 Battalion. I have been Camp Quarter-Master or supply officer to all camps of instruction held in New Brunswick, and I was last, Brigadier Major at the last Brigade Camp held in Nova Scotia. I had charge of the Militia stores in New Brunswick for three and a half years, without extra salary, too, from 1862 to 1865, when the first appointment of a Superintendent of Stores was made in N. B.—an office I could not accept on account of belonging to her Majesty's service at that time.

What is your present rank in the Canadian militia? After being discharged from H. M. S. I was promoted to be lieutenant and adjutant, and drill instructor, and captain, under the Dominion Militia Act. My pres-keeper, but am doing duty as caretaker of Red River Battery and messenger to militia officers. That's all you want, I guess.

Not so fast. What about the Grammar School Cadets? Oh, I have instructed the Cadets since their formation and it is a labor of love with me, the lads try so hard to learn. They will put some of the older volunteers to the blush next summer if all goes well. I am quite satisfied.

After twenty-five years of ministerial life, Cool Burgess has abandoned burnt-cork.

SIR JOHN'S MISSION.

The telegraphic reports from Ottawa do not agree as to the probable object of Sir John Macdonald's very sudden departure for England. The Premier made some indefinite remarks to a Montreal reporter about his health being the occasion of the trip; but no one will accept this as the true reason, as his departure was unexpected, even by himself. One report connects his trip with the C. P. R., and the fact that some prominent members of the Company are also going to England would seem to give color to the story. Such an explanation seems improbable. The only business the C. P. R. people have in England is in connection with financial matters, and we cannot imagine how Sir John Macdonald's presence in London would be of the least assistance in this respect. It is not unlikely that he has been summoned to England to discuss the relations of the British possessions in America with the United States. The Imperial Government must grapple with the West Indian question in some way; and Lord Derby has expressly declared his preference for a union between these Islands and Canada. It is quite intelligible that the Counsel of the Canadian Premier should be asked as an aid to the determination of the problem presented by the demands of the Islanders. Sir John is to return in December, and Parliament is to meet early in January. The public will not therefore be kept long in doubt as to the object of his mission.

JOEY BAGSTOCK IN POLITICS.

You remember Dickens' Joey Bagstock, old Joey, who was "tough, but devilish-ly." Joey though dead yet lives, and he has changed his residence from London to Fredericton and his avocation from that of a major on half pay to that of a politician on the half shell. He retains all his old time characteristics, especially his faculty of inventing marvellous devices for pulling the wool over the eyes of the inquisitive—devices which deceive no one but himself. Of course our Joey is none other than the valued alleged representative of this county at Ottawa. This gentleman was at Stanley to see the Fair; and he was, of course, interviewed in reference to the location of the Miramichi Valley Railway, which the residents of Stanley village naturally desire shall pass through that locality. To locate the line as they desire would make it five miles longer than by the route now proposed to Boiestown; and as the subsidy is only for forty miles, or for no more than the direct route to Boiestown, the company cannot be expected to make the detour asked for. Mr. Temple thus found himself called upon to explain why he had failed to get a subsidy for these additional five miles. This was a reasonable question; and if he had answered it according to the facts he would have probably said that the idea of locating the road by any particular route never entered his mind, and that he asked for a subsidy for forty miles so as to reach Boiestown by the shortest route. But here was a chance for a Bagstockian triumph, and our alleged representative was equal to it. "Gentlemen," said he, "I thought it was only 35 miles to Boiestown and the extra five miles subsidized was to permit the road to be built through Stanley." For nearly twenty years Mr. Temple was Sheriff of York County, and he has travelled over every mile of its roads a dozen times. He has served writs out on the Boiestown and Stanley roads and endorsed his mileage upon them; he has held elections for the local and Dominion Governments, and has charged for mileage for posting notices and holding polls, and at this late day he makes the discovery that he did not know how far it was to Boiestown. How many sleepless nights will he not spend in figuring up what he has lost through this error? It is satisfactory to know that his position as a supporter of the Forry Government will probably enable him to get the mileage earned in the several Dominion elections which in his ignorance of the county he did not charge for. We fear that what he has lost on writs and on the local elections will never be regained; but if he subtracts it from the Fredericton Railway subsidy which he is in honor bound to return to the county, he will still be something in pocket.

If it were not that we had the example of Joey Bagstock before us we would hesitate to believe that even Mr. Temple would think this pretended ignorance would deceive the people of Stanley. Instead of excusing his neglect of the important business centre, which finds itself five miles away from a railway, he has put an additional slight upon it by insulting the intelligence of its people.

BAPTIST UNION.

The proceedings at the Free Baptist Conference looking to a union of the two branches of the Baptist Church are of very great interest. A union of these two important denominations would help the cause of religion materially, as it would be a strong proof of the oneness of aim of all bodies calling themselves Christians. It is pleasing to note that this spirit of union, which has already found expression among the Methodist and Presbyterians, is meeting with acceptance, not only among the Baptists, but among all branches of the Church of Christ. Probably if the disciples were asked what their idea was of the teachings of the great Head of the Church, each would differ from the others in minor points. They would be more or less than human if they did not so differ; and in these latter days it is not to be wondered at that all men do not see alike on all points. It is sufficient if they be agreed on the fundamental principles.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The action of the City Council in referring the matter of the McLean & Dowling wharf back to the Wharf Committee can only mean that the Council intends either that the lease shall be made out to the highest bidder, namely Mr. Woodward, acting for Mr. George, or that the wharf should be leased for a lower sum than those competing for it were willing to give. It is true that the difference between the highest bid and that for which the lease was knocked down was small; but the principle is the same as if a larger amount were involved; for it will not be contended that an auctioneer has a right to stop the bidding before the competitors are done, merely because a bidder, who is not the highest saks that the property be knocked down to him.

Mr. Temple's son-in-law has been appointed paymaster on the river improvement job. The contractors engaged in the work are Capt. Duncan and Mr. Hartley. Mr. Hartley got his share of the work in consideration of his support to Mr. Temple at the last election. It was agreed on before hand, Mr. Temple's son-in-law pays Mr. Hartley what is coming to him in a lump sum; he lives in York. Capt. Duncan, does not live in York, and so Mr. Temple's son-in-law goes around and pays Capt. Duncan's bills for him. Mr. Temple's son-in-law will be paid for his work; and there is reason to believe that it was because he was appointed to this position that the Farmer wanted a committee of Tories appointed to regulate the patronage. The Farmer knows that what is Mr. Temple's son-in-law is Mr. Temple's; and it voices the sentiments of its party in growing when its political leader wants everything for himself.

A special despatch to THE GLEANER announces that the text of the proposed Distribution Bill is published. England receives an increased membership in Parliament of 110; Scotland an increase of 10; but Ireland no increase. A large number of the Irish cities are disfranchised, or more properly speaking they are merged in rural constituencies.

STANLEY. The Fair and the List of Prizes.

What the Politicians had to say to the People.

The annual fair of the Stanley Agricultural Society was held yesterday, and was well attended. The display of articles was very good. There were the usual festivities. A new feature was some speech making in reference to the location of the Miramichi Railway. The Attorney General, Messrs F P Thompson, Thomas Temple, E L Wetmore and George J Colter spoke. Mr. Temple explained to a delegation which waited outside that the reason why only one line of railway was subsidized was because the thought it was only 35 miles to Beauséjour, and the extra 5 miles would permit of a detour to Stanley. This very thin explanation was poorly received.

Mr. Wetmore on being called upon said he did not expect to be asked to speak and as this meeting for a non-political purpose he would not discuss any of the burning questions of the day. After speaking generally of the exhibit and of the pleasure he had in being present, he referred to the Railway question and made a very lengthy argument to show the advantages of Railways generally, and the extension of the Northern and Western Railways to the village of Stanley particularly. Mr. Wetmore said he had brought a market to every man's door and made it quite unnecessary for the farmer to incur the expense of taking their products to town to market. He mentioned the immense trade done in raspberries in Arctostook county and wondered that the people do not build starch factories like the Arctostook people and thereby make a market for a class of potatoes which are not even worth feeding to the swine. He suggested that the people should see to it that the authorities (he did not care whether it were the Dominion or the Local Government or the Company having control of the matter), but whoever it was, they should bring the road through or near to the village.

Mr. Thompson was loudly called for and responded. He said he was glad that he had very much to say. He did not feel that he had very much to say. He was glad to greet his old friends and make new ones on occasions like these. The Stanley people never failed to extend a hearty greeting to their outside friends and the stranger, many of whom belonged to other portions of the Province, were attracted hither, if in the county at the time of the show, by the reputation the fair had made for itself far and wide. He hoped the people would not slacken in their energies but would keep up their reputation as the seat of a prosperous and useful Agricultural Society. Touching upon the railway question, he said, amid great applause, that he could assure his constituents that he would do all that lay in his power to secure them the nearest possible extension of the Railway consistent with engineering possibilities.

The Attorney General next spoke and said he did not wish to appear singular; his colleagues had all addressed them, some at great length, and therefore he would say only a few words. He presumed the good people of Stanley had been for nearly 50 years keeping up this annual festival it did not require any argument to justify its continuance. It already answered a two-fold purpose; he hoped it could be made to promote a third. It had no doubt stimulated the adoption of improved methods in agriculture and promoted improvement in stock. He hoped the interest in these directions would not flag. An opportunity was also afforded their friends from the whole Parish to meet with them and strengthen and renew the old ties. Another purpose he would be glad to see effected by their annual gathering. He would like to see the people impressed upon the young men of the Parish that they could find in New Brunswick as large a measure of prosperity by the exercise of industry and frugality, as in any other part of the world. Distant fields always looked green; we know the drawbacks under which we have to labor here, but we know nothing of those existing in other countries until, as many do, they find themselves separate from home and friends and unable to return. There is No Country where less Poverty Exists than in New Brunswick, and there is no place worth living in, where a comfortable subsistence is assured to a man with less real toil. He hoped the young men of Stanley would take up their valuable tracts of splendid virgin soil, and within, he might say, the limits of their own parish. Treating the question of the Railway he advised the people not to place their anticipations too high as to the benefits to accrue to them. He agreed that Railways were a necessity in this day, but sometimes they effected localities prejudicially. They did not always improve prices. Sometimes they equalized them to the disadvantage of particular localities, that had before the monopoly of the trade. He felt that as they wished the road to come as near the village as engineering difficulties should permit, they should have it; and he would as a member of the Local Government, use his influence with his colleagues to secure the subsidy for any additional mileage rendered necessary. He trusted some one of the three routes proposed would be found capable of adoption, and that next year, if he lived to make his usual visit to the Stanley show, he hoped he would be able to come by rail. Mr. Temple and Mr. Colter also spoke. The following is the

WHAT CAN SHE DO?

By E. P. Roe.

She detached herself from his encircling arm, went to a book-stand near and took from it a richly bound Bible. With this she came and stood before Gus, who was half trembling with fear and perplexity, and said in a tone so grave and solemn, that his weak impressionable nature was deeply moved.

"Mr. Elliot, perhaps I do not understand you. I have received several offers before, but never one like yours this evening. Indeed I need not remind you that you have spoken to me in a different vein. I know circumstances have greatly altered me. That I am no longer the daughter of a millionaire, I am learning to my sorrow, but I am the same Edith Allen that you knew of old. I would not like to misjudge you, one of my oldest, most intimate friends of the happy past. And yet, as I have said, I do not quite understand your offer. Place your hand on this sacred book with me, and as you hope for God's mercy, answer me this truly. Would you wish your own sister to accept such an offer, if she were situated like myself? Look me, an honest girl with all my faults and poverty, in the face, and tell me as a true brother."

Gus felt himself in an awful dilemma. Something in Edith's solemn tone and manner convinced him that both he and Van Dam had misjudged her. His knees so trembled that he could scarcely rise. A fascination that he could not resist drew his face, stamped with guilt, toward her, and slowly he raised his fearful eyes and for a moment met Edith's searching, questioning gaze, then dropped them in confusion.

"Why do you not put your hand on the book and speak?" she asked in the low, concentrated voice of passion.

Again he looked hurriedly at her. A flash of lightning illumined her features, and he quailed before an expression such as he had never seen before on any woman's face.

"I—I cannot," he faltered.

The Bible dropped from her hands, they clasped, and for a moment she seemed to writhe in agony, and in a low, shuddering tone she said:

"There are none to trust—none."

Then as if possessed by a sudden fury, she seized him roughly by the arm and said hoarsely:

"Speak, man, what then did you mean? What have all your tender speeches and caressing actions meant?"

Her face grew livid with rage and shame as the truth dawned upon her, while poor, feeble Gus lost his poise utterly and stood like a detected criminal before her.

"You asked me to marry you," she hissed. "Must no one asked your immoderate sisters to do this, that you could not answer my simple question? Or, did you mean something else? How dare you exist longer in the semblance of a man? You have broken the sacred law of hospitality, and here in my little home that has sheltered you, you purpose my destruction. You take mean advantage of my poverty and trouble, and like a cowardly hunter must seek out a wounded deer as your game. My grief and misfortune should have made a sanctuary about me, but the orphaned and unfortunate, God's trust to all true men, only invite your evil designs, because defenceless. Wretch, would you have made me this offer if my father had lived, or if I had a brother?"

"If it's all Van Dam's work, curse him," ground Gus, white as a ghost.

"Van Dam's work," shrieked Edith, "and he's with Zell! So this is a conspiracy. You both are the flower of chivalry, and her mocking, half-hysterical laugh curdled Gus' blood, as her dress fluttered down the path that led to the arbor.

She appeared in the doorway like a sudden supernatural vision. Zell's head rested on Mr. Van Dam's shoulder, and he was portraying in low ardent tones the pleasures of city life, which would be hers as his wife.

"It is true," he had said, our marriage must be secret for the present. You must learn to trust me. But the time will soon come when I can acknowledge you as my peerless bride."

Foolish little Zell was too eager to escape present miseries to be nice and critical as to the condition, and too much in love, too young and unsuspecting to doubt the man who had petted her from a child. She agreed to do anything he thought best.

Then Edith's entrance and terrible words broke her pretty dream in fragments.

Snatching her sister from Van Dam's embrace, she cried passionately—

"Leave this place. Your villainy is discovered."

"Really, Miss Edith," began Van Dam with a poor show of dignity.

Leave instantly!" cried Edith imperiously. "Do you wish me to strike you?"

"Edith are you mad?" cried Zell.

"Your sister must have lost her reason," said Van Dam, approaching Zell.

"Stand back," cried Edith sternly. "I may go mad before this hateful night passes, but while I have strength and reason left, I will drive the wolves from our fold. Answer me this; have you been proposing secret marriage to my sister?"

Her face looked spirit-like in the pale moonlight and her eyes blazed like coals of fire. As she stood there with her arm around her bewildered, trembling sister, she seemed a guardian angel holding a baffled fiend at bay.

This was literally true, for even hardened Van Dam quailed before her, and took refuge in the usual resource of his sanctified ally—lies.

"I assure you Miss Edith, you do me great injustice. I have only asked your sister that our marriage be secret for a time."

"The same wretched bait—the same transparent falsehood," Edith shrieked. "We cannot be married openly at our own home, but must go away with you, two spotted knights of New York. Do you take us for silly fools? You know well what the world would say of ladies that so compromised themselves, and no true man would ask this of a woman he meant to make his wife. These premises are mine. Leave them."

Van Dam was an old villain who had lived long in the atmosphere of brawls and intrigue, therefore he said brazenly—

"There is no use of wasting words on an angry woman. Zell, my darling, do me justice. Don't give me up, as I never shall you," and he vanished on the road toward the village, where Gus was skulking on before him.

"You weak, unmitigated fool," said he savagely, "why did I bring you?"

"Look here, Van Dam," whined Gus, "that isn't the way to speak to a gentleman."

"Gentleman! ha, ha," laughed Van Dam bitterly.

"I'll be hanged if I feel like one to-night. A pretty scrape you have got me into," remarked Gus.

"Well," said Van Dam cynically. "I thought I was too old to learn much more, but you may shoot me if I ever go on a lark again with one of your villains who is bad enough for anything, but who hasn't brains enough to get found out. If it hadn't been for you I would have carried my point. And I will yet," he added with an oath. "I never give up the game I have once started."

And so they plodded on with mutual revilings and profanity, till Gus became afraid of Van Dam, and was silent.

The dark cloud that had risen unnoted in the south, like the slowly gathering and impending wrath of God, broke upon them in sudden gusts, and then chased them with pelting torrents of rain and stinging hail, into the village. The sin-wrought chaos—the hellish discord of their evil natures seemed to have infected the peaceful spring evening, for now the very spirit of the storm appeared abroad. The rust and roar of the wind was so strong, the lightning so vivid, and the clashing thunder peals overhead so terrific, that even hardened Van Dam was awed, and Gus was so frightened and conscience smitten, that he could scarcely keep up with his companion, but shuddered at the thought of being left alone.

At last they reached the tavern, roused the startled landlord and obtained welcome shelter.

"What!" he said, "are the boys after you?"

"No, no," said Van Dam impatiently, "the devil is after us in this infernal storm. Give us two rooms, a fire, and some brandy as soon as possible, and charge what you please."

When Gus viewed himself in the mirror, as he at once did from long habit, his haggard face, drenched, mud-splashed form awakened sincere self-commiseration; and his stained, bedraggled clothes troubled him more than his soiled character. He did not remember the time when he had not been well dressed, and to be so was his religion—the sacred instinct of his life. Therefore he was inexpressibly shocked, and almost ready to cry, as he saw his forlorn reflection in the glass. And he had no change with him. What should he do? All other phases of the disastrous night were lost in this.

"There's nothing to be bought in this mean little town, and how can I go to the city in this plight?" he anxiously queried.

"Go to the devil then," and the sympathetic Van Dam wrapped himself up and went to sleep.

Gus fustily worked at his clothes till a late hour, devoutly hoping he would meet no one that he knew before reaching his dressing-room in New York.

CHAPTER XVI.

BLACK HANNIBAL'S WHITE HEART.

Edith half led, half carried her sobbing sister to the parlor. Mrs. Allen, no longer languid, and Laura from her exile, were already there, and gathered with dismayed faces around the sofa where she placed Zell.

"What has happened?" asked Mrs. Allen tremblingly.

Edith's self-control, now that her enemies were gone, gave way utterly, and sinking on the floor, she swayed back and forth, sobbing even more hysterically than Zell, and her mother and Laura, oppressed with the sense of some new impending disaster, caught the contagion of their bitter grief, and wept and wrung their hands also.

The frightened maid stood in one door with her white questioning face, and old grey-haired Hannibal in another with eyes streaming with honest sympathy.

"Speak, speak, what is the matter?" almost shrieked Mrs. Allen.

Edith could not speak; but Zell sobbed, "—don't—know—Edith—seems—to have—gone—mad—"

At last, after the application of restoratives, Edith so far recovered herself to say brokenly—

"We've been betrayed—they're—villains. They never—meant—marriage at all."

"That's false," screamed Zell. "I won't believe it of my lover, whatever may have been true of your mean little Gus Elliot. He promised to marry me, and you have spoiled everything by your mad folly. I'll never forgive you."—When Zell's wild fury would have ceased cannot be said, but a new voice startled and awed them in silence. In the storm of sorrow and passion that raged within, the outer storm had risen un-noted, but now an awful peal of thunder broke over their heads and rolled away among the hills in deep reverberations. Another and louder crash soon followed, and a solemn expectant silence fell upon them, akin to that when the noisy passionate world will suddenly cease its clamor as the trump of God proclaims the end.
